§ 12. To the next argument it must be said that this is false, that the Saints engage in strife simultaneously for triumph, unless "simultaneously" is the same as "in concord": but if it denotes similar acts or the same time, the proposition is false: but only in that sense would it conclude anything for the proposition: and therefore it is clear that it proceeds from what is false, and proves nothing.

§ 13. To the last argument it must be said that it is not similar concerning Angels and men: because Angels were all created simultaneously, in that one is not in potency to another, and one is not brought forth from another: and therefore their merit was simultaneous, and consequently their reward was simultaneous. But in men it is otherwise: because one is in potency to another, and generation in them passes away, and generation arrives: and therefore their merits are divided according to time and acts: and consequently they are rewarded divisively according to the soul, as was said before.

Articulus 11 — Whether In Confession All Crimes Ought To Be Expressed Individually

An oportet in confessione omnia criminalia sigillatim exprimi?

Whether all criminal sins must be expressed individually in confession?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at E, After these things it must be considered, What confession profits, etc.

For it seems to be false: because in contrition someone is not held to recollect sins individually in order that the contrition be valid: therefore neither in confession: but it suffices to confess in general.

§ 2. Response. It must be said that it is not similar: because contrition is before God, who sees all things equally whether resumed individually or in common through memory: but confession is before a man, who does not know how to enjoin penance unless they are expressed individually: and also the shame is greater before a man, before whom sins are expressed individually.

But whether one ought to repeat confession, and when not, should be sought above: because it also has a place here.

§ 3. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at K, after the beginning: But venial sins, as Augustine says, because they are innumerable, etc.

Upon that it has been disputed above and it falls here just as there: and so those things which were said there in the question are confirmed by those things which are said here in the Text.

Articulus 12 — Whether Pious Minds Ought There To Recognize Fault Where Fault Is Not

Whether pious minds ought to recognize a fault there where there is no fault?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at F, But just as the penitent ought not to conceal, etc.

For to this it seems contrary that: 1. Gregory says that it is characteristic of good minds to acknowledge a fault there where there is no fault:[636] therefore also to confess it once acknowledged.

1. Furthermore, Augustine in the book of Confessions: If it is asked of me, whether I am just? I say that I am not.[637] And yet it is established that Augustine was just.

§ 2. Furthermore, it is further asked here: How is a doubtful sin to be confessed, whether as mortal or venial?

For it seems that if he confesses it as venial, that: 1. He is in danger: because he does not do condign penance. But if as mortal: then he pronounces a doubtful thing as certain, and thus he lies: therefore he sins, or the things which he says in the Text are false.

1. Furthermore, a little before he said that if any are repeated more frequently, those are to be expressed: therefore either because they are made mortal from repetition: or because they are repeated venial sins. If in the first mode: then a venial becomes a mortal sin: and this was disproved above. If in the second mode: then that general confession which is made at Prime and Compline is to be made concerning venial sin, which is against those things which are said in the Text.

§ 3. Furthermore it is asked: If he confesses such repeated things which are venial by genus, whether a penance is to be taxed to him?

It seems that it is: because confession is made for the sake of the taxation of penance.

To the contrary: The taxed [penance] suffices for a mortal sin: therefore none is due to a venial sin, because they are incommensurable.

§ 1. Response. It must be said that all these matters were discussed in previous sections: yet to the first it can be said, that there is an acknowledgement of the intellect judging what is in the soul, and what is not: and there is an acknowledgement of the fearing affect as to whether it acts rightly or not: as it is said,[638] I feared all my works, knowing that you would not spare the offender: and such is the acknowledgement of a good mind, of which Gregory speaks, and it does not demand confession.

§ 2. To the next it must be said, that every man is unjust compared to God: and thus speaks Augustine. Thus also Job says:[639] Can a man be justified compared to God? And thus it is said:[640] All our justices are as the rag of a menstruous woman. However, this injustice, because it is not absolute in the work, but in comparison to the primary justice, which mortal infirmity cannot perfectly imitate, therefore he is not obliged to confess it.

§ 3. To the next it must be said, that doubts are to be interpreted toward the more certain side: for let penance be received as if for a mortal sin: and yet let not the mortal sin be pronounced in confession, but let him confess that he doubts whether it was mortal or venial.

§ 4. To the next it must be said, that mortal sins are not made from repetition per se, but accidentally, namely if contempt and lust increase: and enough has been said about this above.

§ 5. To the next it must be said, that penance is not to be enjoined upon one confessing venial sins, but the daily satisfaction for venial sins instituted by the Church is to be recalled to memory, namely the striking of the breast, the Our Father, Hail Mary, and the like: and if penance is undertaken, it will not be enjoined by precept, but by counsel. Nevertheless this argument is invalid: "some penance suffices for a mortal sin: therefore none is owed for a venial sin": because some penance does not suffice for a mortal sin, except once it has been made venial; and this has often been explained above.

§ 6. Now, this which he says in the following chapter G, But let the priest beware, is contained in the decree on penance, distinct. IV, etc., and the whole is clear from the disputations above.

DISTINCTIO XXII

Divisio Textus

§ 7. And since by many authorities, etc. In this last distinction concerning penance, the return of sins is treated, and consequently the repetition of penance.

§ 8. And two things are inquired into in the Letter, of which the first is what was said: but the other is about the sign and the reality of this sacrament, and it begins there, C, After the predicted things it remains to investigate, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Sins Remitted Return Through Any Relapse

Do forgiven sins return through any relapse? § 9. Here falls the question: Whether forgiven sins return through any subsequent relapse into mortal sin?

§ 10. And it seems that they do: 1. By that of Ezekiel: All his justices, which he had done, shall not be remembered. Therefore, if he had done no justice, he would be punished for all his sins: but he is not punished except for the sin which he has: therefore every preceding sin returns upon him through the subsequent relapse.

§ 11. 2. Furthermore, Justice is equal in rendering equals for good and evil things: but to the converted, past good things mortified by an intermediate sin are restored: therefore to the perverted, past evil things mortified by intermediate penance are restored: therefore sins return.

§ 12. 3. Furthermore, in human laws a freedman is recalled into his former servitude and the punishment of servitude on account of a subsequent offense: since therefore those laws are patterned after divine ones, it seems also that this is just according to divine laws: therefore on account of an offense the former servitude of forgiven sins must be recalled.

§ 13. 4. Furthermore it is argued by that of James: Whoever shall keep the whole law, yet offend in one point, is become guilty of all. Now he cannot become guilty of all, except through all returning upon him: therefore it seems that all sins return on account of one subsequent offense.

§ 14. Furthermore it is objected more strongly: Let us suppose that someone is sufficiently contrite for the deletion of guilt, but not for the deletion of punishment: and afterwards he contemns repenting and confessing, and thus dies: it is certain that God will punish the sin which man did not punish: but man punished nothing of the past acts: therefore God will punish all: but He cannot punish except where he is: but he is in hell: therefore He punishes in hell all his sins: and they are not punished unless he has them by return: therefore all sins forgiven in contrition have returned through the subsequent sin.

§ 15. Exactly the same objection applies concerning him who is contrite and confessed, and did not fulfill condign penance, and falls into one mortal sin, and thus dies.

§ 16. On the contrary to this it is objected: 1. Because the Philosopher says: What entirely passes into non-being, is not reiterated as numerically the same: but a forgiven sin has entirely passed into non-being: therefore it is not reiterated as numerically the same: therefore the same sin which was forgiven is not reiterated.

§ 17. But if it be said that a sin is not reduced to nothing when it is forgiven. ON THE CONTRARY: If it remains: then it remains either as guilt, or as a stain, or as the liability to eternal punishment: for these three things are in mortal sin. Not in the first or second way: because according to this, guilt and grace would be in the same subject, and grace and the stain of mortal sin, which cannot be. Similarly it cannot remain in the third way: because the liability to eternal punishment is conjoined to guilt, and when the latter is loosed the former is loosed: therefore it seems that nothing of the mortal sin remains: and thus the proposition stands.

§ 18. If perchance you say that some circumstance of the sin remains: this is ridiculous: because a circumstance is a property and a certain form of the sin: but a form does not remain unless the formed thing remains in being.

§ 19. 2. Furthermore the ancients object, that if any of the past sins returns through any subsequently committed sin: let us suppose that someone sins through avarice, and afterwards falls into mortal prodigality: it seems that the prodigality brings the avarice back into being: and thus a contrary leads a contrary into being, which is impossible.

637. Cf. Augustine, Confessiones, lib. IX, c. 13.

§ 20. 3. Furthermore, this seems to be contrary to God's justice: because no good remains unremunerated by Him, nay even more than it is worth: but the intermediate penance was worth an eternal good, and was a perfect remedy against sin: therefore it seems that he would be dealt with unjustly, if all his sins were to return upon him.

§ 21. But there are some who say to these things, that the preceding sin does not return in stain or liability: but on account of the subsequent sin a liability is born so great that it is equivalent to all the preceding sins which were forgiven. But this seems false: for sin is not measured except from its species or root which is contempt: but a subsequent sin in its species is not equivalent to the quantity of all the sins: nor even in its root as a frequent occurrence: but rather it can proceed from a lesser contempt: therefore it seems that it is false, that from it is born a liability as great as from all the forgiven sins.

§ 22. Furthermore, this liability is either born from that sin according to its being a certain sin in itself, or according to its order to the preceding sins, or according to its order to the preceding penance, or simultaneously according to its order to the preceding sins and to the preceding penance. If in the first way: then from any mortal sin such a liability is born: because the reason is the same for one, and for all others, which is false. If in the second way: then from any second sin a liability would be born as great as that of two sins, and from a third as great as of three, and from a fourth as great as of four, and so of others: and God forbid, because thus a sinner could never make satisfaction. If in the third way: then a good conjoined to an evil makes a greater evil, which is impossible. The same follows if it is said to be in the fourth way: therefore this opinion is impossible.

§ 23. Because of this came a third opinion, and it says that preceding sins return on account of four sins, and not on account of others: and these are drawn from the Letter. Now these are fraternal hatred, apostasy from the faith through heresy, and contempt of confession on account of the objection introduced above, and regret of penance (sloth). For then they say that God makes his past penance to be of no avail to him: and about this the ancients made a verse, because almost everyone held this opinion. And the verse is this:

He hates his brothers, becomes an apostate, and scorns to confess, It irks him to have repented, his pristine guilt returns.

§ 24. But then it is asked, What is there specially in these sins, on account of which the prior guilt is said to return rather than in others? For either they have this from the side of the species, or from the deformity of the root. If in the first way: then preceding guilt ought to return through murder, because it is a greater sin than fraternal hatred: and this is not said, unless in fraternal hatred any sin against the neighbor is supposed, which is not true according to them. If it has this from the deformity of the root. ON THE CONTRARY: because then the preceding guilt ought to return from a sin against the Holy Spirit, because it has the most deformed root: and this again is not true according to them.

§ 25. Furthermore, If anyone inspects the authorities which are introduced in the Letter, he will find more things on account of which the Saints say sins return. In the sixth which is of 638. Gregory the Great, Dialogi, lib. IV.

Bede on Luke, the carelessness of negligence, or of idleness, is posited: and in the seventh which is of the same, human cupidity is added. Therefore it seems that sins do not return only for these four causes.

§ 26. Therefore there were some of a fourth opinion, following the Master in the Letter, saying that sins return solely on account of ingratitude.

§ 27. But AGAINST these it is objected: because ingratitude is not found except in one of three ways: for either it denotes an actual returning of evil for good, done by heart, mouth, or work: or it denotes an actual non-caring for a received benefit, namely either that the benefit is not esteemed, or is esteemed less than it is: or it denotes a certain habitual forgetting of benefits, through the fact that one does something contrary to the benefit. But in the first two ways ingratitude is a special sin, divided from others, not conjoined to any subsequent sin whatsoever: therefore by ingratitude taken in those two ways, sin is not posited to return on account of any subsequent sin. If therefore ingratitude is taken in the third way, let it be asked what it is, that is of such great efficacy? But it seems that it is not an act of sin: because one act of sin is distinguished from the act of another sin in species: and ingratitude is conjoined to any subsequent sin: therefore it is not an act of sin. In the same way it seems that it is not a circumstance either: because a circumstance of one is not the circumstance of another: and ingratitude is one and the same for any subsequent sin. Furthermore it seems that it is not an effect of the subsequent sin either: because diverse causes have diverse effects: but ingratitude of one nature follows upon diverse sins following upon penance: therefore it is neither an act, nor a circumstance, nor an effect of sin: therefore it seems that it is nothing of sin: therefore through it a preceding sin cannot return.

§ 28. RESPONSE. It seems to me that it must be said in this question, that a sin never returns as numerically the same, nor specifically the same, nor with equal liability: but out of the ingratitude of the subsequent sin it is said to return as regards the reproach and deformity of the one sinning, which is a greater ingratitude than if his sin had not been forgiven: and therefore he merits ampler rebukes, and a more just condemnation: and it cannot be understood otherwise how sins return.

§ 29. Now to understand this, some have invented a distinction of those things which are from sin in the penitent: for the penitent is bound to sorrow for things committed, and detestation of things to be admitted, and memory of the benefit received, which is as great, as will be clear below, as are those things which were forgiven: but it is certain that the subsequent sin interrupts all these three things: and therefore there is born in him a certain deformity of ingratitude from comparison to the forgiveness of preceding sins: for he to whom many things have been forgiven is more bound to give thanks, and it is more shameful for him to sin against the forgiver: and thus preceding sins not as sins, but as so many forgiven things, give quantity to the subsequent ingratitude: and as to this they are said to return, because as to this they in a certain way result in the subsequent sin. But if they return in some other way, at present I do not understand it, except for the objections introduced.

639. Hugh of Saint Victor, De Sacramentis, lib. II, p. 14, c. 3.

§ 30. To the first therefore it must be said, that Ezekiel does not intend that justices should not be remembered for a lesser punishment, because this would be against God's mercy: but he intends that they should not be remembered for the attainment of eternal life: and this is true.

§ 31. To the next it must be said, that justice is never so equal, that it is not more toward indulgence than toward condemnation, because otherwise it would be cruel. If however it is granted to be equal: then it must be said that it does not follow: because what is introduced as similar is not similar: for a good work of itself had a vivifying spirit, which afterwards can avail for merit: but an evil work does not have anything sustaining it, by whose return it could afterwards return: whence an evil is much more deficient than a good. Similarly, all good works have a union in grace, and therefore when grace returns they can return: but evil works have no union at all except that of aggregation, which is simply a plurality, like the union of a heap: and therefore since they have no union by whose return they could return, they cannot return like good works. But how good works return, was investigated above.

§ 32. To the next it must be said, that in human affairs many things are done for precaution and the fear of future events: like the law itself which recalls a manumitted sinner into servitude: for this renders them more cautious, and instills fear in others, and without such precautions man could not live civilly: but in divine matters it is not so, but they are directly according to the norm of justice, and especially in the condemnation and punishment of sins: because God never punishes beyond what is condign.

§ 33. To the next it must be said, that he is never punished for that part which was forgiven him: but such a one is punished in hell forever for the past sin, just as a venial sin conjoined to a mortal sin is punished eternally: but nevertheless he is punished less in hell, than he would be punished if he had never repented.

§ 34. Now to all the things which are to the contrary up to the second opinion, they can be conceded straightforwardly.

§ 35. But concerning the second opinion I think it must be said that it is false, unless it is stated in this way, that the liability of the subsequent sin has a greater deformity by comparison to the preceding committed ones.

§ 36. And all the things which are objected against this opinion, I think should be conceded.

§ 37. To the third opinion I think again it must be said that it is false: nevertheless to that which it asks, what was the reason why they posited those four sins? It must be said that this could be because preceding sins seek remission on the part of God and of the neighbor and of the penitent himself. And on the part of God indeed more generally is apostasy from the first of those things which are in justification: and this is faith: and therefore because he sins against the first thing in justification, as to God the sin returns: but as to the neighbor communicating charity works well towards the remission of sin, because the charity of the

640. Glossa Ordinaria on Matthew 5:26.

Church merits the justification of the impious: and therefore again sinning against this, he sins against justification: and then the sin returns for him, namely. But on the part of the penitent there are two operating things: one against the guilt, namely sorrow informed by grace and contrition: and the contrary of this is the regret of penance. But the other operates against the punishment by the power of the keys: and against this is the contempt of confession enjoining satisfaction. But the others are not so directly against justification: and therefore through them it does not return.

§ 38. And by this the solution to the objection concerning this opinion is clear, if anyone should wish to sustain it: for it could be said that a sin does not have from the quantity of deformity in the act that it causes the sin to return, nor from the quantity of deformity in the root, but from this that he sins against the things affecting justification. Nevertheless I think that this opinion too is false, as was said before.

§ 39. To the last opinion it must be said that neither does it return on account of the ingratitude of the sin, except as was said in the beginning of the solution: and then ingratitude is taken in the second way for the habitual non-remembrance of benefits, and especially of that benefit, that sins were forgiven.

§ 40. To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that it is neither an act, nor a circumstance, nor an effect of the subsequent sin, but a certain deformity consequent upon the sin by the fact that it interrupts habitual thanksgiving: and thus it is something of sin, in the way in which a defect is said to be something of a defect: yet it does not follow that it is an act or circumstance or proper effect: because a defect has only a defect as its cause.

§ 41. But if it is asked, Why do the Saints in the Letter touch upon those sins which they touch upon? It must be said that concerning the four it is already clear: because in them one sins more directly against justification: but the two which are carelessness and love of the world, are general, and are posited rather for the roots of sins, than for sins: because from them frequent sins frequently befall, which induce ingratitude.

§ 42. And by this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 2 — Whether Venial Sin Also Returns Through Ingratitude As The Others

Does a venial sin also return through ingratitude like the others? § 43. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, A, after the beginning: Until he should pay the entire debt, etc.

§ 44. Whether from this it is held that a venial sin returns through that mode, by which it must be conceded that the others return through ingratitude?

§ 45. It seems that it does not: because 1. That which is not contrary to charity, is not contrary to ingratitude either: but a venial sin is not contrary to charity: therefore, etc.: therefore it ought not to return on account of its opposite, namely ingratitude.

§ 46. 2. Also, It is not said to return on account of ingratitude, except that it makes ingratitude greater: but venial sins do not make ingratitude greater: therefore they do not return in it. The first is clear from the foregoing. But the second is clear from this, that:

whatever things neither take away nor diminish charity, do not increase ingratitude: and thus the proposition stands.

§ 47. But ON THE CONTRARY is the Letter: because 1. The entire debt is said here, and in that venial sins are included.

§ 48. 2. Also, Since the Lord's Prayer is for daily things which are venial, and in it is said, Forgive us our debts: therefore venial sins are included under debt.

§ 49. RESPONSE. It must be said that venial debts do not return, except by that mode by which the others do: and I well concede, that they return in this mode.

§ 50. To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that it is a disposition disposing towards the contrary, and thus it is contrary to the fervor of charity. And through this its remission increases ingratitude.

§ 51. In the same way the solution to the following is clear.

Articulus 3 — Whether Original Sin Also Returns Through Ingratitude

Does original sin also return through ingratitude? § 52. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, A, after the beginning: But also original sins, etc.

§ 53. 1. For original sin is only one, against which baptism is ordained: therefore it seems that it does not return: because if it were to return, since it is not deleted except by baptism, one would need to be rebaptized: and it is heretical to say this.

§ 54. 2. Moreover, Since original sin is one, how does he call it plurally original sins?

§ 55. RESPONSE. It must be said that original sin according to its essence never returns: but it returns in the predicted mode: because its remission increases the debt of thanksgiving, and increases ingratitude.

§ 56. To the second it has been disputed and answered in the second book of the Sentences in the tract on original sin.

Articulus 4 — Whether He To Whom More Has Been Forgiven Is More Bound To Give Thanks Than He Who Has Preserved Innocence

Is he to whom more has been forgiven, more bound to thanksgiving, than he who preserved his innocence? § 57. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, A, a little before the end: He ought therefore to have thought of as many gifts of God, as his own evils, etc.

§ 58. And three things are asked here, namely who is more bound to thanksgiving, namely he to whom more has been forgiven, or he who preserved his innocence? Secondly, According to what is a greater or lesser thanksgiving measured? Thirdly, Whether for many gifts there is one thanksgiving, and one ingratitude, or many?

§ 59. To the first it is objected thus: 1. In bodily things continuous health is worth more than interrupted and restored health: therefore similarly in spiritual things the continuation of innocence is worth more than the restoration of grace by penance: but for a greater good greater thanks are to be given: therefore to greater thanksgivings the innocent one is bound, than the penitent restored to his pristine state.

§ 60. 2. Furthermore, The state of innocence is worthier and more secure, than that of penance: because the penitent does not know that his sin is forgiven him, but the innocent one knows with certainty, because it was not committed: therefore as before.

§ 61. ON THE CONTRARY 1. Luke 7:42 and 43: Who therefore loves him more?... I suppose that he to whom he forgave more. And He, namely Jesus, says to him: You have judged rightly: but more was forgiven to the penitent: therefore he is more bound to love: therefore also to give more thanks.

§ 62. 2. Furthermore, He who is helped in danger is bound to his liberator, to whom he who was never helped is not bound: but the innocent one was never helped, whereas the penitent is helped: therefore to greater thanksgivings the penitent is bound, than the innocent.

§ 63. SECONDLY it is asked, According to what is the quantity of thanksgiving measured?

§ 64. But it seems that it is according to the quantity of the gifts: because thanksgiving is the recognition of a benefit from perceived gifts with praise and compliance: therefore for a greater gift there is a greater thanksgiving, and for a lesser one a lesser.

§ 65. But if this is conceded, the Gospel will seem to be against it: because everyone says that charity is the greatest gift: and yet the Gospel seems to intend that he must give more thanks to whom more is forgiven, as is clear from the previously introduced authority.

§ 66. THIRDLY it is asked, Whether for many things there is one thanksgiving, and one ingratitude?

§ 67. But it seems that there is not: because just as causes properly differ, so do their effects differ: but the proper cause of thanksgiving is the perception of a gift: therefore for diverse gifts there are diverse thanksgivings and ingratitudes: and the proposition is had.

§ 68. RESPONSE. It must be said that Augustine determines the first article of this question in the book On Virginity, saying that other things being equal, each is bound to equal thanksgivings: because from as many sins as the grace of God rescued the penitent, from so many it preserved the innocent from falling: nor could he have stood, except by Him preserving him: but if they are not equal in other things: then he is more bound who has greater charity, and other greater gifts. Whence in those cases nothing prevents one from being more bound in one respect, and the other in another respect: because in such things operations are related as exceeding and exceeded.

§ 69. To the first therefore it must be said, that in one sense it is so, and in another it is not: because if interrupted health is greater than continuous, it is not true what he says: but if it is equal, and other things are equal, then it is true. And so it is also in spiritual things: because then the avoidance of danger is a great good, for which he who fell into danger is not bound.

§ 70. To the next it must be said, that it does not conclude, except as to this: but in other things the opposite can be true, as was said.

§ 71. To the next it must be said, that the objection to the contrary proves that the penitent is bound from more things, because from what is forgiven and what is committed, but not more: and thus the Lord speaks.

§ 72. And by this the solution to the whole first part is clear.

§ 73. To that which is asked secondly, it must be said that quantity is twofold, discrete, and continuous. Now the discrete spiritual quantity of thanksgiving is measured according to the number of gifts, and the quasi-continuous spiritual quantity is measured according to magnitude, and especially according to the magnitude of charity, because that is more excellent than any other gift.

§ 74. To that which is objected to the contrary, the solution is already clear by what was said before.

§ 75. To that which is asked thirdly, it must be said that thanksgivings do not regard gifts differing specifically, but according as they are indicative of divine bounty and magnificence: and because in this mode they fall under one formal notion, therefore thanksgiving is one in species, and there ought to be many in number by the diversity of the remembrance of the gifts: and consequently ingratitude is one by species able to be divided into many in number.

§ 76. And by the aforesaid things the solution to the objections is also clear: because it is not true that for a diversity of gifts in species diverse thanksgivings in species are owed: because thanksgiving does not regard gifts in this mode, but in the predicted mode.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Sacrament Of Penance Has Three As The Others Do, Namely A Thing Only, A Sign Only, And A Thing And Sign Together

Does the sacrament of penance have three things like the others, namely the reality only, the sign only, the reality and the sign together? § 77. Next it is asked concerning the second part of this distinction which begins there, C, After the predicted things it remains to investigate, etc.

§ 78. And in the beginning immediately five things are asked. The first is, Whether this sacrament like the others has three things, namely the reality only, the sign only, the reality and the sign together? The second is, What is in it the sign only, and what the reality and the sign, and what the reality only? The third, Whether it is one sign, and a unique sign and reality, and one reality or many? The fourth, Whether it is itself one sacrament? And the fifth, According to what mode is it one?

§ 79. To the first of these it is objected thus: 1. Nothing among those things which perfect their entire reality by an interior operation, has a sacramental sign: penance perfects its entire reality by an interior operation or can perfect it: therefore it has no sacramental sign. The first premise is proved from the definition of a sacramental sign posited in the beginning of the book. But the second is proved: because from interior contrition frequently the whole sin is forgiven, nay the whole sin with its whole punishment can be deleted, before anything is ever done exteriorly.

§ 80. 2. Furthermore, Everything that has no matter externally subjected to the eyes to be administered by the ministers of the Church, has itself no sacramental sign: but penance is such a thing, or can be: therefore it has no sacramental sign. The first is proved by the definition of a sacrament, which Hugh gives,[641] that a sacrament is a visible and bodily element, externally subjected to the eyes, representing by similitude, signifying by institution, and conferring invisible grace by sanctification. But the second is proved, just as what was previously held of the preceding argument.

§ 81. On the contrary to this it is objected by this that penance is a sacrament: but every sacrament is a sign of a sacred reality, whose image it bears and whose similitude it exists as: therefore penance also.

§ 82. RESPONSE. It must be said that there is one judgment concerning penance, according to its being a virtue moving free choice into the detestation of sin, as was said above: and another, according to its being a sacrament. For according to its being a virtue, it does not have these three things, but it is moving free choice in the manner of a certain nature to detest committed sin insofar as it is committed. But according to its being a sacrament, it has sorrow for matter, and grace for form, and it has exterior signs, consisting in three parts, namely contrition, confession, and satisfaction: and all these have been noted above: for thus...

those three parts are all together, not in act, but in desire. But according as it is a virtue, it does not have the conjoined vow of confessing to a minister of the Church, nor of satisfying by a satisfaction exacted under the power of the keys.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that penance according as it is a sacrament, does not perfect its reality interiorly, rather it has a conjoined vow to proceed exteriorly: and this is its sign in which it necessitates toward an exterior manifestation.

To the next it must be said: in entirely the same way.

Articulus 6 — What In The Sacrament Of Penance Is A Sign, And What Is A Thing And Sign, And What Is A Thing Only

What in the sacrament of penance is the sign, and what is the reality and the sign, and what is the reality only?

Secondly, it is asked, What is here the sign, and what the reality and sign, and what the reality only?

Now the Master says in the Text, that exterior penance is the sign only, while interior is the reality and the sign, and the dismissal of sin is the reality only.

But against this it is objected: because 1. According to this, the reality precedes the sign in time, since in other sacraments the sign precedes the reality: for the remission of sin precedes exterior penance.

1. Further, it is objected thus: Many things are done exteriorly in this sacrament before exterior penance: therefore it seems that exterior penance is not the first and principal sign of penance: for confession is enacted, and many other things, before exterior penance, which is the enjoined satisfaction.
2. Further, there is a sign of the future, which is called prognostic by Physicians and Astronomers; and there is a sign of the present which is called an icon or type; and there is a sign of the past which is called rememorative by Tully in the third book of his Rhetoric: therefore the sacramental sign is one of these signs. And it is certain that it is none other than a prognostic: and that always precedes the signified. Therefore in penance, since it is a sacrament, there can be no sign that does not precede the remission of sin: therefore it seems that exterior penance is not the sign.
3. Further, if exterior penance is called the enjoined satisfaction, as the Master seems to wish, it seems that many contrite and confessed persons die without the sacrament of penance; who nevertheless are saved, because many die without exterior satisfaction. And this seems unfitting.

Further, in the preceding distinction it was held that satisfaction is to be moderated according to the quantity of sorrow and devotion: therefore to some nothing will be imposed, namely to those for whom interior sorrow and devotion suffice. And thus they would have nothing of the sign of the sacrament of penance, which is absurd.

1. Otherwise it is objected against the same thing, namely that nothing exterior can be a sacramental sign in penance: because in a sacrament of the New Law the sign is a cause, and effects what it figures; but the exterior things in penance do not effect, but the interior: therefore it seems they are not sacramental signs.

Against this it is objected, that every sacrament has a sign subject to the senses on the outside; but in penance only exterior penance is subject to the senses: therefore it alone is the sign, as the Master says in the Text.

Response. To this it must be said with the Master in the Text, that exterior penance is the sign only, and interior is the sign and reality; and the remission of sin in fault and punishment is the reality only. But exterior penance is not called, in my judgment, only the enjoined satisfaction: but rather in common, taken according to the three parts of penance, it is the exterior sign of sorrow in gesture, the voice of confession, and the work of enjoined satisfaction: and this is divided according to the three parts of penance, namely that the sign of sorrow on the outside is the sign appropriated to contrition, and the exterior recounting is appropriated to confession, and the exterior acceptance of satisfaction is the sign of satisfaction. But the reality and sign together, as the Master says, is interior penance: and this similarly must be taken in common, namely according as it is voluntary sorrow with the vow to confess and to satisfy through the keys. But the reality only is the remission of sin in its total fault and total punishment: and these two are divisible, because to contrition corresponds the sign which is interior sorrow informed by grace; to confession the vow to confess by which one already confesses within; and to satisfaction the vow to satisfy by which one already embraces the enjoined penance within. Similarly the reality is divided: because in contrition there is the remission of fault and eternal punishment, in confession the remission of punishment in purgatory, and in satisfaction the remission of temporal punishment.

To that which is first objected, it must be said that the Master resolves it in the Text: because sometimes it is not unfitting for the reality to precede the sign, as happens frequently in the baptism of adults: but because this happens, therefore it can be said otherwise, namely that it is one way in a sacrament only, and another way in that which is a virtue and a sacrament. In those which are sacraments only, nature always precedes the sign, even if in time it sometimes accompanies, sometimes follows; but in penance which is a virtue and a sacrament, penance as it is a virtue is prior to itself as it is a sacrament, that is, the act of virtue is before the action of the sacrament, and sin cannot be together with virtue: and therefore the reality, according as it induces the total remission of sin in fault and punishment, precedes some sign in nature, or sometimes in time.

To the next it is already clear: because confession and whatever appears exteriorly is comprehended under satisfaction.

To the next it must be said that this is a sign preceding the reality according to some part: and this suffices on account of the said cause.

To the next it must be said that they do not die without the sacrament: because exterior penance is not only called the sacrament, but more truly the interior: but it follows that they die without a certain sign which is in the sacrament: and this is not unfitting. Indeed, even without the sacrament, yet with the reality of the sacrament, it is not unfitting for some to be saved, as was held in the tractate on baptism.

To the next it must be said that the objection of some in this place is founded upon a falsehood: because no sacrament among them all has a sign that is causative of the reality: for water does not cause sanctification, but rather the power of the words in the water: and the species of bread and wine do not cause the body of Christ, but rather the words in such matter, and so of the others. And this is what Master Hugh says, that from sanctification a sacrament is made conferring invisible grace. Hence what he says is false: but it suffices that that which is reality and sacrament, with form and matter, is significative and causative: and this indeed happens here, because sorrow with its signs is the matter and it is formed by grace: and this sanctifies, because in such sorrow it causes the remission of sins.

Articulus 7 — Whether In The Sacrament Of Penance The Sign Is One Or Several Whether in the sacrament of penance the sign is one or many?

Thirdly it is asked, Whether there is one sign, and a single sign and reality, and a single reality, or many?

Now it seems, that there is a single one: because 1. The reality of one sacrament ought to be single: but penance is one sacrament: therefore, etc.

1. Further, the Master in the Text names one, namely exterior and interior penance, and the remission of sin: therefore, etc.

Response. It must be said that they are many and one in different respects. For penance taken in common, as it includes within itself its three parts, is one sign only, and one sign and reality, and similarly is one reality only. How this is so, was said in the preceding article of the question. But if the parts of the act of penance are taken, then they have these three divided: and this also was said in the same place.

To the objection, therefore, it must be said that there is only one in common, but in particular they are many, in this and in other sacraments, as is clear in the Eucharist, where the signs are the species of bread and wine.

To the next it must be said that the Master does not touch upon these things except according as they belong to the whole penance in common.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Sacrament Of Penance Is One Or Several

Whether the sacrament of penance is one or many?

Fourthly it is asked, Whether this sacrament is one or many?

Now it seems, that it is one: because 1. There are only seven sacraments of the New Law, and this is one of them: therefore it is one: for if it were granted that it was many, it would follow that there were more than seven sacraments of the New Law.

1. Further, there are two kinds of sins, namely original and actual: and one sacrament, namely baptism, is ordained against original: therefore also one against actual: but this is penance: therefore it seems that penance is only one sacrament.

Against this it is objected: because where there are many signs and many signified realities, there are many sacraments.

Response. It must be said that almost the whole matter is clear through what has been said: for the sacrament of penance is a single sacrament: and so it was said above. Its reality is single, namely the deletion of all actual sin in fault and punishment: and to this deletion the three parts come in order, just as in medicine there are three doses operating individually and in order.

To the argument therefore it must be said that there is one reality in common and one sign and cause: and yet it does not follow, if there were many things which are signs only, that there would be many sacraments: and the counter-instance is in the Eucharist, in which there are many signs, yet not many sacraments: and this is the cause, because the sacrament draws its unity from the reality, and especially from that which is reality and sign: and this is one in the Eucharist: and this is the cause why it is so in such things, because one and the same signifiable thing is signifiable by diverse signs: and therefore a diversity of signs does not make a unity or diversity of realities.

Articulus 9 — In What Way The Sacrament Of Penance Is One

How is the sacrament of penance one?

Fifthly it is asked, How is it one?

For "one" is said in many ways, as diverse Authors distinguish. For there is a substantial unity of three persons in one divine substance; a personal unity in Christ; a spiritual unity, in which a holy man and God are one spirit. Beyond these there is an aggregative unity, like a heap of stones; and a constitutive unity, as members constitute one body; and a native unity, as body and soul naturally perfect one man; and a conjugative unity, by which a man and woman are one flesh.

Now it seems that the sacrament is not one in any of these ways. And this is clear, 1. For one easily deducing it through each of the unities.

1. Further, Dionysius posits many modes of "one," saying that those things which are many in number, are one in species: and those many in species, are one in genus: and those many in processions, are one in principle. How then will this sacrament be called one?

Response. The determination of this question depends much on what was said in distinction 15, near the beginning: I say, however, that it is one by a native unity in Bernard's division, which is from matter and form: for everything that is from form and matter is reduced to native unity in that division: now the form is grace, and the matter is sorrow, manifestable or manifested with its exterior signs: and thus the solution is clear.

And note, that some have said that this is the special unity which is called that of a sacrament: and Boethius posits this mode of unity in his book On Unity and the One: but that mode has to be reduced to native unity according to Bernard's division. Note also, that some say the unity is of principle according to Dionysius' division: and this is nothing: because a principle is called there that from which many proceed, not in a single mode: and it is according to some mode through prior and posterior in some of them: just as from being proceed the most general genera: but after this in the division it is one in species, in the way that a species itself consisting of matter and form is called one in species.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Sacrament Of Penance Needed Institution

Whether the sacrament of penance required institution?

Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, chapter 1, at the end: But the sacrament of penance, just as of marriage, etc.

And five things are asked concerning its institution. First is, Whether it required institution? Second, Whether it was instituted before sin, as the Master says in the Text? Third, Whether it was instituted in the time of the law of nature, and how is it? Fourth, How was it in the time of the Mosaic law? Fifth and lastly, How was it in the time of the law of Christ?

To the first of these it is proceeded thus: 1. None of those things which nature dictates to man require institution: but nature dictates to man that penance is necessary after a sin has been perpetrated: therefore penance does not require institution.

1. Further, Master Hugh says that a sacrament signifies from institution. From this it is accepted that if there were no institution, it would neither signify, nor oblige by way of a sacrament. Thence I proceed thus: Everything which equally obliges to make satisfaction, whether an institution has been made or not, is not instituted by way of a sacrament: but penance equally obliges in this way: therefore penance is not instituted by way of a sacrament. Proof of the middle term. Let it be that it is not instituted; it is still necessary for the sinner willing to make satisfaction: but it is not so concerning baptism and the others: therefore the proposition stands.
2. Further, what is instituted by way of a sacrament is not rendered a cause except from the power of the institutor and the form: but penance does not have its causation in this way: therefore it is not instituted like a sacrament. Proof of the minor. For if penance is not instituted, it will still move toward the destruction of sin, and thus the proposition stands.

Against this is the definition of a sacrament which Master Hugh posits, that it signifies from institution: therefore it seems that every sacrament has an institution.

To the same is that which is said in the Text.

Solution. It must be said that it is one thing concerning penance according as it is a virtue, and another concerning penance according as it is a sacrament. For as a virtue it does not have institution, but belongs to those things dictated by nature: but for a sacrament institution is exacted: because every sacrament exists in a certain exterior rite essential to it, which rite is in the dispensation of ministers: therefore it does not seem it should be conceded that a sacrament as a sacrament is dictated by nature, but rather the sacrament as it is a virtue, or penance as it is a virtue.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that reason does not dictate that penance is necessary as it is a sacrament, which is with some display of the disease with the sign of the keys or with the keys: indeed, if there were no institution, salvation could be had without such penance.

Through this also the solution to the two following is clear, and to the whole of what was asked concerning this article.

Articulus 11 — Whether The Sacrament Of Penance Was Instituted Before The State Of Sin

Whether the sacrament of penance was instituted before the state of sin?

Secondly it is asked, Whether this sacrament was instituted before sin?

Now it seems that it was: because the Master says so in the Text.

Further, when the Lord said: On whatever day you shall eat of it, you shall die the death: it is certain that He understood it of the death of penance: because of the death of the body it was not true: and He said this before sin: therefore He instituted penance before sin.

Against this it is objected thus: 1. Penance is only for a preceding sin: therefore the foretelling of penance foretells a future sin: but foretelling a future sin before it exists reveals to man his future fall, which ought not to have been done, as Augustine proves: therefore neither ought penance to have been instituted before sin.

1. Further, a cause necessarily precedes its caused effect: but the fall is the cause of the institution of penance: therefore the fall was before the institution: therefore it seems that penance ought not to have been instituted before sin.

Response with the Master, that penance according as it is a remedy for the fall, was instituted before sin: because since the Lord is prone to show mercy, He applied a remedy before the fault was admitted: so that falling into fault, he might immediately find a remedy prepared.

To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that He did not thereby reveal it: because it does not follow that someone will sin from the fact that sins require penance, for the antecedent cannot be inferred from a conditional : but it is true that Adam knew himself to be capable of sinning: and if he were to sin, that he would need a remedy. And thus the solution to the first is clear.

To the next it must be said that the fall is the cause of institution, but it is not necessary that it be in act; but it suffices that it be in possibility: just as a wise physician prepares medicine for a disease which it is possible will arise.

Articulus 12 — Whether The Sacrament Of Penance Was Instituted In The Law Of Nature

Whether the sacrament of penance was instituted in the law of nature?

Thirdly, it is asked concerning its institution in the law of nature.

1. For Master Hugh of St. Victor says in his book On the Institution of the Sacraments, that as long as there is a disease, there is a time for medicine: but the disease existed in the law of nature: therefore the medicine also exists.
2. Further, in the Text it is said that it was from the beginning of the human race. Therefore it seems that it was in the time of the law of nature: because there was no law from the beginning of the human race, except only the law of nature.
3. Further, on that text of Genesis 3:9: And the Lord God called Adam, and said to him: Where are you? the Gloss says: While He calls, it denotes that He calls back to penance. Therefore penance was instituted then.

4. Further, the sacrament of penance has three parts: contrition, confession, and satisfaction: all these existed in the law of nature: therefore also the sacrament of penance. Proof. Adam was contrite, because he sorrowed for his sin: he confessed, when he said: The woman, whom you gave me as a companion, etc. he received penance from the Lord, when He said to him: In the sweat of your face, etc. and to Eve: I will multiply your sorrows, etc..

Against this it is objected: because 1. Hugh enumerating the sacraments of the law of nature, says they are tithes, sacrifices, oblations: and none of these is the sacrament of penance: therefore it seems that penance was not a sacrament of the natural law.

1. Further Hugh: The sacraments of the law of nature do not seem to have been introduced by precept, because they were proposed from counsel for a vow: but it is certain that everyone is obliged to penance by precept: therefore it is not a sacrament of the law of nature.

To this it must be said that this sacrament had a certain institution in the law of nature. And contrition indeed was instituted when He said: Adam, where are you? Hence the Gloss expounds: See in what misery you are, that is, recognize and confess your sin. But satisfaction in this indeed: In the sweat of your face, etc. And these sufficed in the law of nature: because it was not yet necessary to recognize one's sin before a man, and to expect enjoined penance from him.

It must be said therefore to the first, that Master Hugh does not enumerate the sacraments, except those very signs of the future liberator and of the liberation through Christ, which conferred no grace ex opere operato. But penance always conferred some grace, although not fully, as it does in the New Testament.

To the next it must be said that this saying of Hugh is understood of those things which were signs only, according to that definition, that a sacrament is the sign of a sacred reality only, in the same way that all the signs of the fathers speak of the future liberator.

Articulus 13 — How The Sacrament Of Penance Was Instituted In The Time Of The Mosaic Law

How was the sacrament of penance instituted in the time of the Mosaic law?

How was the sacrament of penance instituted in the time of the Mosaic law?

Fourthly, it is asked concerning the institution of penance in the law of Moses.

1. For it seems to have been instituted again then, as is clear, Leviticus 4 and 5, where it is said what must be offered for the sin of the soul of a ruler and of the synagogue: since therefore penances were taxed in the old law for sins, it seems that penance was specially instituted there.
2. Further, it seems to be said of penance in Proverbs 28:13: He that hides his sins shall not prosper: but he that shall confess, and forsake them, shall obtain mercy.

Likewise, concerning contrition, Joel 2:13: Rend your hearts, and not your garments. And in Psalm 50:19: A contrite and humbled heart, etc. Therefore it seems the whole of penance was instituted in the old law.

Against this it is objected, that penance is satisfactive through the keys: therefore before the keys there was no institution of penance: but the keys were not in the Old Testament: therefore neither was the institution of penance, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said that penance was instituted in the Old Testament according to a certain mode: and this mode will be clear in the following article of the question.

To the argument to the contrary, it must be said that it was not instituted according as it is dismissive of punishment by the power of the keys, but according as it was a remedy for actual sin with grace and exterior penance: for the law did not diminish burdens, but rather increased them. And thus the solution is clear.

Articulus 14 — How The Sacrament Of Penance Was Instituted In The Time Of The Evangelical Law

How was the sacrament of penance instituted in the time of the Evangelical law?

Fifthly and lastly, it is asked concerning its institution in the New Testament.

For it seems that it is not instituted in the New Testament: because 1. Everything which was observed before the New Testament, would be superfluously instituted in the New Testament: but penance was instituted and observed before the New Testament: therefore it would be superfluously instituted in the New Testament: but Christ did nothing superfluously in the New Testament: therefore He did not institute it in the New Testament.

1. Likewise, if He instituted it, where did He institute it? If it is said that, Matthew 3:2: Do penance, etc., by the same reason John instituted it, Matthew 3:2, who began his preaching from the same sentence.

If it is said that, Matthew 8:4, where He says: Go, show yourself to the priest, as was held above. Against: Neither does the text there expressly say so, nor can it be had from it except very allegorically.

Further, if He had instituted penance there as it is in the New Testament, it seems that He ought to have committed the administration to the priests of the New Testament: but conversely it seems that He sent him to the priests of the Old Testament: therefore He did not will to institute penance there, according as it ought to be observed in the New Testament.

Further, in the institution of baptism He did not send to the priests of the Old Testament: therefore neither in the institution of penance according to what belongs to the New Testament.

If it is said that He instituted it in John 20:22 and 23, where He said: Receive the Holy Spirit, etc., whose sins you shall forgive, etc. Against: There He gave power to those having the keys: and this is something other than instituting penance: therefore He did not institute penance:

therefore it seems that He instituted nothing, because in those places He seemed more to institute.

Against this it is objected thus: 1. It belongs to a Lawgiver to ordain the whole of life: but Christ is the Lawgiver: therefore, etc.: but a great part of life is in the state of penance: therefore the mode of penance is to be instituted by the Lawgiver: therefore penance was instituted by Christ: because it is left as a constant that whatever was to be instituted for salvation, this was instituted by Christ.

1. Further, other sacraments which preceded in another way, like orders, and marriage, received a new institution from Christ: therefore penance also ought to have received a new institution.
2. Further, such a mode of confession and satisfaction by the power of the keys never existed except in the new law: therefore it seems to have been instituted in the new law.

To this it must be said that there are four things in penance, namely the recognition of the necessity of medicine against the disease of sin, and the recognition of the perpetrated sin with the purpose of amending, and the manifestation of the sin according to its kind in some sign before a man, and the explanation of the sin by its circumstances with faith in the remission of punishment by the power of the keys. And regarding the first of these penance was instituted before sin, regarding the second in the law of nature, and regarding the third in the written law before grace, and regarding the fourth in the law of the Lord, namely grace.

And the prior is always contained in the posterior, and the posterior relates to it as more perfect through addition to that which is prior, as is manifest to anyone per se. For there is a recognition of the medicine in the knowledge of the sin with the purpose of amending through penance. Similarly, manifesting the sin before a man, promising amendment, recognizes the sin with the purpose of amending: but the converse is not true. And similarly, declaring the sin with its circumstances, and seeking pardon through the keys and satisfaction, explains it before a man, etc.: but the converse is not true. And through this it is clear how penance diversely considered had diverse institutions.

To the first therefore it must be said that in the last mode penance was never instituted before, nor even observed: and therefore the institution was necessary.

To the next it must be said that penance had its institution in another way in all those places which have been touched upon. For there is in penance the very act of voluntary sorrow, and the minister whose keys diminish a part of the punishment and tax the enjoined penance, and the power of those keys. And as to the first of these penance was instituted, Matthew 3:2 et seq. As to the second, Matthew 10:3 et seq. as to the third, John 20:22 and 23. And as to the work of the ministers it was further instituted, John 11:44, where He said to the disciples that they should loose Lazarus and let him go.

To the first object to the contrary, it must be said that as for John it was not his to institute, but to prepare the way: hence his preaching was a way to penance, and Christ gave place to penance through institution, because, as it is said, Acts 4:12: There is no other name under heaven given to men, whereby we must be saved.

To the next it must be said that the disciples were not yet placed in the ministry of order: but were still only a type of the ministers of the New Testament: and therefore He sent to typical priests, implying in ministry what is owed to true priests.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

And let these things said concerning the treatise on Penance suffice.

§ 79. After these things it must be considered what marriage is, etc. In this distinction three things are said. For first he gives a foretaste concerning those things of which he speaks. Next, he reveals what matrimony is, there, B, There are therefore, etc. Thirdly, he speaks of the consent which is the efficient cause of nuptials, there, C, Now the efficient cause.

§ 80. But a question occurs concerning what he says, there, B, There are therefore nuptials or matrimony, etc.

§ 81. For he seems to err by placing two names for one defined thing: for those naming name according to something: therefore those imposing diverse names name something diverse: therefore a single definition does not respond to two names.

§ 82. To this it must be said that he considers the same reality according to diverse properties. For nuptials are named from the act of matrimony: but matrimony is named from its goods, because the woman conjoined to the man has the duties of a mother in the pouring forth of offspring, and of other works in which she communicates with the man.

§ 83. But now it is asked, Why is it not called patrimony?

§ 84. And it must be said that the bond of matrimony burdens the mother more, that is, her who is made a mother, because in sorrow she brings forth and nourishes: and therefore it is more the duties of a mother, than of a father.

§ 85. But to what is objected, that one definition follows two names, it must be said that it is a definition of the thing rather than of those properties from which the names are imposed. Or let it be said that the property by which nuptials are called nuptials, is toward that by which it is called matrimony: and therefore each name responds to the definition: one in remote differences, but the other in proximate and ultimate ones: for since it is necessary that definitions begin from the most general, they contain both remote and proximate differences.

DISTINCTIO XXIII

Articulus 1 — Whether Extreme Unction Is A Sacrament

Whether extreme unction is a sacrament?

§ 4. But it seems that it is not a sacrament: 1. For every sacrament of the New Law is ordered against some special disease of sin: but extreme unction is not ordered against a special disease: therefore extreme unction is not a sacrament. The first premise is proved through the distinction of grace in virtues and sacraments, proved at the beginning of this work. The second is proved: because the disease is only original, and actual mortal, and venial, and the infirmity left behind from both: but Baptism is sufficiently ordered against original [sin], Penance against actual mortal, Confirmation against the infirmity left from both, which is why it is even called confirmation: but the Eucharist against the multitude of venial [sins], as many say: therefore it seems that Extreme Unction is ordered against no disease.

§ 5. 2. Furthermore, Every sacrament of the New Law in some way preceded in a figure of the Old Law: but extreme unction did not precede: therefore it seems that it is not a sacrament. The first is proved by induction. But the second is proved from this, that nothing was done in the Old Testament concerning the sick that corresponded to extreme unction.

§ 6. 3. Furthermore, Every sacrament of the New Law is effective of spiritual grace: this unction is not effective of spiritual grace, but of corporeal: therefore it seems that it is not a sacrament, but a corporeal medicine. The first is clear from the definition of a sacrament of the New Law posited at the beginning of this fourth book of the Sentences. The second is written in the Letter, that it avails for the alleviation of the body: and if it avails for grace, as many say, that this is through the prayer of faith joined with contrition: and thus per se it avails only for the body.

§ 7. To the contrary of this is that: 1. The whole Church enumerates seven sacraments of the New Law, and this as one: but what the whole Church holds cannot be false: therefore this is a sacrament.

§ 8. 2. Furthermore I see that there is one sacrament of infants, such as baptism. There is again one of those progressing, such as the viaticum. One of those standing, such as confirmation. One of those returning, as penance. One of those ministering, as orders. Therefore there will also be one of those departing: and this can be nothing other than extreme unction: therefore it seems that it is a sacrament, or the Church would be diminished in its sacraments.

§ 9. 3. Furthermore, Everything that confers invisible grace represented in a visible element, is a sacrament: but extreme unction is something of this sort: therefore it is a sacrament. The first is clear through this, that to whatever the definition applies, also the defined applies. But the second [is clear] through what is said in James 5:14-15 "Anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith will save the sick man, and the Lord will alleviate him: and if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him." But sin is not forgiven except through grace. Therefore the proposition stands.

§ 10. Response. It must be said that without any doubt extreme unction is a sacrament, which had the origin of its institution from the Lord and the Apostles, as will be clear below.

§ 11. Therefore to the first it must be said, that this sacrament is ordered against a special disease of sin, against which no other is specially ordered, even if secondarily another can cooperate. But that disease is the remnants of spiritual infirmity remaining from original and actual [sin]: and this was much discussed above around the beginning, where the division and necessity of the sacraments were taken up.

§ 12. Nor is it true what it says, that another sacrament has a substantial ordering against venial [sin]: and all these things are required above in the aforesaid question: and there the perfect solution of this question is clear.

§ 13. To the next it must be said, that this sacrament did not have any sacrament in the Old Law corresponding to it on account of its own perfection, and the imperfection of the Old Law. For just as it is said in Hebrews 7:19 "The law brought nothing to perfection." Hence those dying in it were drawn to Limbo. But unction, on account of the fact that it removes the remnants, avails for immediate flight [to heaven]: and therefore it did not have a place in the Old Testament, nor did a figure of it.

§ 14. But this is found most excellently in the Gospel of Nicodemus, where it is hinted that Adam sent his son Seth to receive the oil of mercy from the Angel of Paradise, with which his body that was sick might be anointed: and it was denied him until Christ should come, who by His unction would restore bodies and souls: because such an unction has no place except in the full grace that is made through Christ: and therefore it could not even be shown by any type, because such a type concerning the sick would have been entirely useless.

§ 15. To the next it must be said, that a falsehood is supposed in the objection: and I think that it is presumption to say that this sacrament does not confer invisible grace making acceptable (gratiam gratum facientem): and yet certain people have said and written this, supported by no authority, nor even by a strong reason. Hence we say, that it confers grace principally operating against sin, and secondarily against the infirmity of the body. Nor is it imported from the words of James, that grace is given from the prayer and not from the unction: but rather it is hinted from those words that it is given from both.

Articulus 2 — Whether Extreme Unction Is Well Defined

Whether extreme unction is well defined?

§ 17. Secondly it is asked, What is extreme unction?

§ 18. Now some say that extreme unction is an anointing made with sanctified oil for the alleviation of both infirmities, namely of body and soul.

§ 19. But it seems that this definition is not valid: because 1. If something is common to the defined and the definition, the remainder that is added in whole is the definition of the remainder: just as if I were to say, a white man is a colored man, disgregative of sight: this that I say, "colored, etc.," in whole is the definition of white. Similarly when it is said: "Extreme unction is an anointing made with sanctified oil, etc.," it seems that the whole of this that I say, "Anointing, etc.," is the definition of "extreme", which is false: therefore it seems that the definition is entirely invalid.

§ 20. 2. Furthermore, with sanctified oil is made the anointing of children and priests and kings, as is said in the Letter, for the alleviation of the body and the soul: because the body is anointed so that it may not impede the soul, and so that the power of the demon in the fomes may be weakened: therefore it seems that this definition applies to many anointings.

§ 21. 3. Furthermore, many anointings are read of as being done by Saints, just as it is read of St. Genevieve, that she anointed the sick with oil, both sanctified and blessed, and they recovered in body and soul: therefore it seems that that was extreme unction.

§ 22. 4. Furthermore, there is no sacrament that is equally of two effects: therefore it is poorly posited in the definition, "For the alleviation of both infirmities, etc."

§ 23. 5. Furthermore, as spiritual medicine relates to a spiritual disease, so corporeal relates to a corporeal [one]: but corporeal medicine avails only for the alleviation of bodies: therefore spiritual medicine avails only for the alleviation of the spirit: but every sacrament is a spiritual medicine: therefore it avails only for the alleviation of the soul: therefore it is poorly said, "For the alleviation of both infirmities."

§ 24. 6. Furthermore, Baptism is more strongly a sacrament than extreme unction: and it does not avail for the curing of bodily infirmity: therefore it seems that neither [does] extreme unction, which is a less efficacious sacrament: and thus again it seems that it is poorly said, "For the alleviation of both infirmities."

§ 25. Response. If someone wished to state the whole being of extreme unction, he could define it thus, that extreme unction is a sacrament from an anointing made through sanctified oil, conferring on the sick a remedy against the remnants of sin, and if expedient, bringing alleviation to the infirmity of the body. And this definition is plainly gathered from those things which the Master determines in the Letter.

§ 26. If however someone wished to sustain the one first introduced on account of antiquity, he could say to the first, that in the defined, "extreme unction" is posited for one name of the defined: and because we do not have it [in one word], we circumlocute it through two: and "unction" which is posited in the definition, sounds as an act or passion which is in the one receiving the sacrament itself. And this can well be done, that a sacrament be defined through its act, just as baptism is a dipping made in water, etc.

§ 27. And through this the solution to the first is clear, that it is not the same in the definition and the defined.

§ 28. To the next it must be said, that it is understood concerning oil sanctified by the sanctification of sacramental matter: but this sanctification is only done by a Bishop.

§ 29. And through this the solution to that which is objected concerning the anointing of the Saints is clear, such as of Saint Genevieve, and of certain others in the Lives of the Fathers.

§ 30. But through this which is added, "For the alleviation of both infirmities, etc.," it is distinguished from the anointings of children in catechism, and the anointings of others who are anointed not on account of infirmity, but so that they may be strong for works.

§ 31. But to that which is objected concerning the two effects, it must be said that this sacrament is only of one effect according to itself, namely of the alleviation of the soul regarding the purgation of the remnants: and of the other it is secondarily, as was said before: and this fits well: because even baptism somewhat purges the body, but principally the soul.

§ 32. Nevertheless, another solution and question will be upon this below, where it will be better discussed in its own place.

§ 33. To the next it must be said, that it is not similar concerning corporeal things to spiritual things, and spiritual things to corporeal things: because the spirit contains bodies: but it does not convert. And therefore certain infirmities are caused in the body from the soul, as from a cause, and not conversely, except by occasion: and therefore things availing against the infirmity of the soul, avail by consequence against a disease of the body: because when the cause is cut off, the effect is cut off: but not conversely. And therefore the argument is not valid, and especially in this sacrament: because then it especially avails against a disease of the body, when this disease is caused from a disease of the mind: and thus one medicine can well be ordered against two diseases, of which one is the cause of the other.

§ 34. To the next it must be said, that it is not from the efficacy or strength of this sacrament that it avails in this way or that way, but from the institution and order of corporeal things to spiritual things: and therefore the argument which is made from the efficacy of baptism is entirely invalid.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Oil Consecrated By The Bishop Is The Matter Of The Sacrament Of Extreme Unction

Whether oil consecrated by a Bishop is the matter of the sacrament of extreme unction?

§ 36. Thirdly, it is asked concerning the matter of this sacrament.

§ 37. And the Master says in the Letter, that it is oil consecrated by a Bishop for the use of this sacrament.

§ 38. Hence two things are asked here, namely: whether oil is the matter? And secondly, whether it is necessary that consecrated oil be the matter?

§ 39. For it seems that its matter ought not to be oil: because 1. Since this sacrament is a sign of the smearing of glory after the resurrection: but chrism confers incorruption: therefore it seems that chrism is a more congruent matter than oil.

§ 40. 2. Furthermore, in its name it sounds of an anointing (unctio), as is said in the Letter: therefore it seems that the most convenient matter is of extreme unction: therefore it seems that chrism ought rather to be the matter, than oil.

§ 41. 3. Furthermore, it seems that neither oil nor chrism ought to be the matter: because in the sacrament of baptism it is assigned as a cause, that it has a common matter which is found everywhere, because it is of all generally: therefore also since extreme unction is of all generally, it ought to have a matter which could be found everywhere: but this is not oil, but water: therefore it seems that water ought to be the matter.

§ 42. 4. Furthermore, none are so frequently in danger as the sick: therefore since they ought to be provided with a swift remedy, there ought to have been some matter of this sacrament which could immediately be had at hand: but this is not olive oil: therefore it seems that its matter ought not to be oil.

§ 43. 5. Furthermore, in the Old Testament the cure of infirmity was done through the poulticing of figs: therefore since the things which are in the New Testament ought to correspond to those which are in the Old Testament as much as they can, it seems that the matter of this sacrament, which is the medicine of the sick, ought to have had this same thing as matter in genus or in species.

Likewise, the sacrament of the Eucharist has blood in reality and in sacrament, and it was signified in the blood of sacrifices.

Similarly, the sacrament of baptism is done in water, and it was signified in water, as Damascene says: therefore it seems that this ought to have something similar to figs, because it was signified in them in the Old Testament.

§ 44. Furthermore it is further asked, for what purpose must the matter of this sacrament be sanctified oil?

§ 45. For it seems that it is superfluous: because 1. No sacrament ought to have two sanctifications, one upon the matter, and the other upon the form: because one sanctification suffices: therefore neither [should] this one: therefore the sanctification which is done upon the matter is superfluous. The first premise is proved. In natures one form suffices, and two substantial forms are never impressed upon one matter: but spiritual things are more complete than natural things: therefore in spiritual things one ought to suffice.

§ 46. 2. Furthermore, in the greatest of all sacraments a common non-sanctified matter suffices, as in baptism and the Eucharist: therefore it seems that much more ought it to suffice in the others.

Furthermore, a non-sanctified matter can be had more commonly than a sanctified one: but what can be had more commonly is more suitable for those using the sacrament: therefore it seems that non-sanctified oil ought to be the matter.

§ 47. 3. Furthermore, in a sacrament, according to Hugh [of St. Victor], there are only three acts, namely to signify, to represent, and to sanctify. For he says that a sacrament is "representing from similitude, signifying from institution, and conferring invisible grace from sanctification." Now it is certain that it has representation from the non-sanctified matter, because oil in itself is lenitive of pain: but from institution it has signification, and from the form which is said in the exercise it has sanctification: therefore the sanctification which is done upon the matter does nothing for it; therefore it seems that it is superfluous.

§ 48. 4. Furthermore, in the principal ones of the sacraments, certain things are of the well-being (bene esse) and solemnity of the sacrament. For nothing is of the being (esse) of baptism except the dipping made in water, sanctified by the word of life through the invocation of the Trinity. And in the body of the Lord nothing is of the being except the due matter, and the words which cause the transubstantiation: the rest are of solemnity. Therefore it seems that it ought to be so also in the others: therefore only oil with the words which the priest says in the anointing are of the being: therefore it seems that the sanctification of the matter is superfluous.

§ 49. 5. Furthermore, in baptism we say that Christ by the touch of His most pure flesh conferred regenerative power to the waters: therefore by a similar touch of His institution He conferred to all other sacraments a certain other effective power of grace which they have: but it is certain that He instituted this sacrament just as the others, as is clear in Mark 6:13 , where He sent the disciples, and it is said that "they anointed many sick with oil, and healed them": therefore beyond the anointing, the matter of this sacrament does not need any sanctification.

§ 50. Response. It must be said that in truth in this sacrament, as the Master says in the Letter, there is no more competent matter than oil sanctified for the use of the sick.

§ 51. Therefore to the first it must be said, that the smearing of glory is the thing signified (signatum) of this sacrament, not the thing contained (contentum), nor is it caused by it alone, but by all sacramental grace and that of virtues and merits: and to such a signified thing the sacrament does not posit a proximate similitude, but a remote one, and it has this, because bodies smeared with oil are preserved, and they become radiant on account of the lucidity and clarity of the substance: but its contained thing, caused and signified, is to be a lenitive of the pain of the soul caused from the remnants of sin: and to this it posits a proximate similitude, because oil in itself, especially olive oil, is mitigative of pain. And olive oil, and no other, is the matter of this sacrament.

§ 52. To the next it must be said, that as is said in the Letter, there are many anointings: but on account of the dignity of the minister and the place of those anointed, one is called unction antonomastically, namely of confirmation: and therefore for that one He retained as matter that unction which is made by the confection of oil and balsam, which unction is called chrism. Another reason for the same could be: because it perfects the Christian in the power of fighting for the Christian faith, and because it is thus perfective, therefore He retained that unction for the matter. You will find other reasons also in the questions concerning the matter of confirmation noted above in this work.

§ 53. To the next it must be said, that the sacrament of baptism is a sacrament of necessity, and therefore it takes a common matter, which nevertheless posits a convenience to its effect: but in this sacrament neither of these is true: because it is neither of necessity, nor is there any common matter, so that it might posit a convenience to its effect in that way: and therefore it ought to have had this one. For the proper cause of any sacrament having this or that as matter, is to have a proximate convenience with its effect.

§ 54. To the next it must be said, that because it is not a sacrament of necessity, sufficient provision is made for the danger of the sick in this, that ministers are prepared: and if he should not attain it, provided there is a desire of receiving it, it suffices before God for salvation, although the sick man may not perhaps so quickly obtain the effect of full liberation.

§ 55. To the next it must be said, that what Isaiah did was not generally convenient for every infirmity, but only for an ulcer: because sweet things are mundificative of pus, and extract it from the deep to the surface: but in this sacrament there ought to be a general mitigative of all pain: and for this no liquid is as convenient as oil, as was said.

§ 56. To the same it must be said, that this sacrament was not signified in that deed of Isaiah: nor was what Isaiah did a sacrament of the old law: because this sacrament had nothing corresponding to it in the old law, for the reason said above in the first article of the question: but the deed of Isaiah was a corporeal medicine, in which something could be understood morally concerning the satisfaction of sins, as the Saints say, expounding that place: but extreme unction was not signified there, or anything of extreme unction: for that was given to one recovering, but extreme unction is not given except to one of whom it is presumed that he ought to depart from this world, as will be clear below.

§ 57. To the next it must be said, that every sacrament which seeks an abundance of grace, seeks a double sanctification: one upon the matter, and the other when it is received. And this is clear in Confirmation, and Orders, and Extreme Unction. And it is for this reason that it is so in these three: because an abundance of grace is sought either on account of the excellence of the act in comparison to our powers, or on account of the excellence of the grade received, or on account of the shortness of time, because it cannot be done to merit through the works of man. And in the first way indeed it is sought in Confirmation to fight manfully and suffer for the faith, if necessary: in the second way in Orders: and in the third in Extreme Unction; they have the sanctification of their matter essential to them, nor can they be done in another matter.

§ 58. But to that which it proves in natures, it must be said that both are not substantial, but one is the necessity of matter and the ultimate disposition, and the other is what completes the sacrament in species. And this well happens in natural things: for Plato says that forms are not infused except according to merits: calling the ultimate dispositions of matters "merits".

§ 59. To the next it must be said, that the fact that unconsecrated matter suffices in certain sacraments is not because they are the greatest regarding effect, such as Baptism and the Eucharist: but the cause is that, for the stated reasons, they do not require excelling grace, but they require grace in common for the gaining of virtues and the restitution of lost spirituality. But in these it is otherwise: and therefore matter does not suffice for them unless consecrated by one in whom according to his grade there is an abundance of grace, namely by a Bishop, although he might perhaps lack grace inasmuch as he is this man, because he might perhaps be a sinner. Hence in that objection a non-cause is posited for a cause, and therefore it is invalid.

§ 60. To the next it must be said, that conferring invisible grace is fitting to some from one cause, and the reason was assigned above: but to this one it is fitting from a double cause: and thus it is clear that it is not superfluous.

§ 61. To the next it must be said, that in this sacrament certain things are of the being, certain things of the well-being, just as in other sacraments: but it is not necessary that all those things should be of the being in one, which are of the being in another: but more things can be of the being in one than in another, because its effect requires this: and the reason for this was said here: and therefore in Confirmation and Orders more things are of the being than in the others.

§ 62. To the last it must be said, that although it is not read, yet I think it must be believed that if the disciples anointed the sick with oil, they anointed with sanctified oil: and He conferred the power of making this sanctification to the disciples as to Bishops: but the touch of the matter by Christ did not suffice, for the reason stated, but rather on account of the abundance of grace which these three sacraments demand.

Articulus 4 — What The Form Of This Sacrament Is

What is the form of this sacrament?

Fourthly, it is asked concerning the form of this sacrament. And concerning this three things are asked. First, whether it has a form? Second, whether one or several? Third, which of them is formal to the other if it has several?

Now some have said, that it does not have a form outside of itself: because the anointing itself made with such oil, is the form for it: and to this they adduce these reasons:

§ 1. Everything whose sacramental form is not held and exercised in one way by the Church, does not have a sacramental form: but this sacrament is such: therefore, etc. Now they prove the first: because since the form is of the essence of the sacrament, it would happen that those who celebrate differently, would not perfect the sacrament. But they prove the second through this, that certain Churches hold an indicative prayer, while certain ones a deprecative one.

§ 2. Still, every sacrament having a form, by the power of that form confers the sanctification of invisible grace; this sacrament does not confer the sanctification of invisible grace by the power of its form: therefore this sacrament does not have a form. But the first is proved by the saying of Augustine on baptism, who says: Whence this power of water that it touches the body, and washes the heart, unless from the word? As if he were saying, from no other. And the same must be in the others: because there is one rationale in all. But the second is proved by the saying of James at the end of his epistle, where he does not say, The anointing will save the sick: but, The prayer of faith will save the sick : and thus he does not attribute the effect to the sacrament, but to faith and prayer.

§ 3. Still, that which is effective of bodily health, perfects that from a bodily form, and does not need a spiritual one: but this sacrament is such: therefore it needs nothing but bodily anointing, and not another sacramental form. The first is evident per se. But the second is evident through the sayings of James.

§ 4. Still, whatever things are toward one act, are of one form, but that act is theirs per se: but actions which are done by holy men are to the same act as extreme unction: therefore they are of one form. The first is proved from the fact that form is the principle of act and of acting. But the second from this, that Genevieve and the holy Fathers in Egypt, sent oil blessed by themselves to anoint the sick, and they were healed. Thence thus: The anointing of the Saints does not require another form than the sanctification of the matter: therefore neither does extreme unction.

§ 5. Still, there are only two things on account of which this sacrament is performed, namely the infirmity of the soul and the infirmity of the body: but it is certain that bodily anointing suffices to soothe the pain of the body: and a pontifical blessing is less efficacious than the bodily power of the oil: therefore it suffices for the alleviation of the soul: therefore another form is not required in the collation of the sacrament. These reasons are or can be those of certain men, so that it is concluded by them saying [these things].

BUT TO THE CONTRARY of this it is objected thus: § 1. The Master says in the text, and Hugh, and they take it from Augustine, that every sacrament is in things and in words. Now it is certain to all, that the sacrament is not in the matter of the sacrament, but is in the one receiving it: therefore according as it is in the one receiving it, it is in things and in words: therefore there must be some words when it is given to the receiver.

§ 2. Still, there are two others which require the blessings of their matters, namely Confirmation and Holy Orders, and the word of blessing the matter does not suffice for them: therefore neither for this one, but there must be a special form.

§ 3. Still, for every sacrament of the Church the intention of doing what the Church does is required: but this intention is imported through the form of the Church, through which it distinguishes that work from other works, and makes that be of the Church: therefore for every sacrament some form is required in the work, which is conferred by the Church: therefore also in this one there ought to be a certain form of words under which it is conferred.

§ 4. Still, in sacraments in which grace is conferred for ministering or meriting in the Church, in which the recipient is more able than in this one, a form is required, by the power of which the grace which is desired to be done may be done: therefore much more is this required in this sacrament, which is conferred on one already impotent, in whom it is necessary that grace supply the whole: therefore it seems that it has a special form, just like other sacraments too.

Furthermore it is asked here, What is that form, and whether it is one or several?

Now it seems that it ought to be of an indicative prayer: because

§ 1. The sacraments of the Church most certainly perfect their effect, if the fiction of the recipient does not impede: therefore the effect itself ought to be signified in the mode of certitude, but there is no mode of certitude except through the indicative: therefore it ought to be done through the indicative.

§ 2. Still, in all others it is done through the indicative, which is evident in singulars, because in penance it is said: I absolve thee: and in matrimony: I take thee for my own: therefore also in this one it will be done through the indicative, as it seems.

§ 3. Still, the intention of doing what the Church does, is not expressed except through the indicative: for it does not follow, that if I say, May God give thee grace, that I intend to give just as the Church gives: or if I say, Would that God might give thee grace, or in another way: but if I say, I baptize thee, or I anoint thee, it follows that I am performing the act, and I outwardly show myself to be doing what the Church does: and this suffices in sacraments: therefore it seems that in this one too the indicative mood is required.

§ 4. Still, many Churches have an indicative prayer for a form, such as the whole Church of Germany: and that is said to be Gregorian: therefore it seems that it ought to be so.

Besides, it is certain to me, that the most ancient books in those lands have an indicative prayer for a form, and afterwards a prayer is subjoined. And these are the words written in the most ancient books, which because of antiquity I could scarcely read: I anoint these eyes with sanctified oil in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. And afterwards it follows: Through this anointing and His most pious mercy may God indulge thee whatever thou hast offended through sight. And similarly it was written for the hands, and for the feet, and for the mouth and the other places of anointing. Therefore it seems that it ought to be done thus.

But to the contrary of this it is objected: § 1. The use of other Churches which have only that deprecation: Through this anointing, etc. or, Through this most sweet anointing, etc.

§ 2. Still, in James it is held, that the prayer of faith will save the sick. But the saving element in the sacrament is the form giving sanctification. Therefore it seems that the form ought to be in the mode of a prayer.

§ 3. Still, one departing from life withdraws from the disposition and governance of the Church: therefore the Church can do nothing more regarding him, except to commit him to the disposition of the Lord: but this is more congruously done through prayer, than through enunciation: therefore it seems that the form of this sacrament is more congruously a prayer, than an enunciation.

Furthermore it is asked here thirdly, Since according to the use of diverse Churches both are found among those which have both, which of them is referred to the other, as to the formal [element]?

Now it seems that the enunciation is referred to the deprecative prayer: because

§ 1. Deprecation is ordered last: but preceding things are referred to the last as to a form: therefore it seems that the deprecation is formal.

§ 2. Still, this sacrament is exhibited to a sick person destitute of strength, who awaits everything from divine indulgence: but for this a deprecation avails more than an enunciation: therefore it seems that a prayer is more substantial to this sacrament than an enunciation.

To the contrary of this is: because § 1. That which directly expresses the Church's intention seems to be more formal and substantial in a sacrament: but an enunciation expresses more directly than a deprecation: therefore it is more formal and substantial: therefore the deprecation is referred to it, like a disposition to material things.

§ 2. Still, in other sacraments deprecations both preceding and following are referred to that form, which is by way of enunciation: therefore it seems that it ought to be done thus also in this sacrament.

Solution. It must be said without prejudice, that, as I think, the first opinion adduced is an assumed novelty against the observation of the Church, and the sentence of all the ancients: and therefore I think it to be incautious, and not able to be sustained without the danger of error.

But to that which they first object, it must be said that there is one sacramental form, which is held in one way by the Church: and that is formal and substantial, as will be evident below. And in the other which is a certain disposition, the use of the Church is difform, by the fact that it is of well-being rather than of being: whence that objection relies on a falsehood.

To the other it must be said, that the first is true, and the second is false. But to the proof of the second, it must be said that James calls the prayer of faith the form of the sacrament, which is by way of prayer: and he calls it of faith, because in sacraments faith operates most: and therefore what is attributed to the prayer of faith, is attributed to the operation of the sacrament.

To the other it must be said, that this sacrament secondarily has an effect concerning the body, and especially then when the infirmity of the body is caused by the infirmity of the mind, as was said before: and therefore that objection proves nothing.

To the other it must be said, that the unctions of the Saints do not with certitude consequently attain their effect, nor are they for purging the relics of sins: and therefore it is false that the substantial act of this sacrament is the same as the act of unction, which is caused from the devotion and sanctity of the one blessing: and therefore this sacrament requires another form than the blessing of the matter.

To the other it must be said, that it is true that there are two things on account of which the sacrament exists: one principal, and the other adjunct and secondary; but it does not have the effect from the blessing of the matter, but rather from the ultimate form, by which the matter cannot be impressed unless disposed through blessing, as was said before: and therefore that objection is not valid.

But those things which are objected to the contrary, I think should be conceded.

To that which is asked secondly, it must be said that the formal elements in the act of ministry of this sacrament are two, but one is referred to the other. The reason of which can be: because this sacrament is for the departing who are destitute of their own strength, and insofar as it is a sacrament, for its well-being it has an indicative prayer: but insofar as it is of the departing who are committed to divine grace alone, for its being it has a deprecative prayer.

To that which is first objected against it, it seems it must be said, that the prayers of the Church are certain, although particular or singular prayers are uncertain. Whence this sacrament contracts the certitude of its effect through the fact that it does not rely on the prayer of one person, but of the Church: for it is impossible for the prayers of the Church not to be heard: and therefore on account of certitude it was not necessary for its form to be in an enunciative prayer.

To the other it must be said, that a falsehood is supposed in the objection: because in Holy Orders prayer is the form, in which the translation of power from the Bishop to the ordained is signified, as, Receive the Holy Spirit: or, Receive these keys: or, Be a relator of the word, as will be evident below, when Holy Orders is treated. Whence sacraments sort their forms in prayers of that mode which is more competent to their effect. But concerning the destitute departing from the Church, no mode is more competent than the deprecative.

To the other it must be said, that the intention of the Church is sufficiently expressed through the mode of exercise: because other unctions are not exercised in this mode, like the unctions of medicine or the devotions of the Saints: but if in baptism and in certain others it is done otherwise, this is not for expressing the intention, but on account of such an institution of the sacrament. Now the Institutor of the form had consideration to the mode of causing the effect, as was said. And since this effect is committed to divine disposition, it is evident that it is most competently expressed through the deprecative.

To the other it must be said, that the ancients in those Churches wanted to affix whatever is of the being and of the well-being of the sacrament: and indeed I think that it is better to do so, than to affix only one of them. But if it is not affixed, it would be grave to say that the sacrament is not celebrated: because many Churches do not affix it, and even certain orders of great authority.

To that which is asked thirdly, the solution is already evident through the things said before.

But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that enunciation more directly expresses the intention, and nevertheless the indicative is not posited in the form for the expression of intention, as was held: but that mode is more formal, which in the sacrament is more competent in effecting its reality: and that is the deprecative, as was said.

To the other it must be said, that in certain other sacraments it is otherwise: because those are exhibited to one who remains in the Church, and is disposed by the Church: and therefore concerning him the operation of ministers in sacraments is more signified to be: but this one is presumed to be in the state of one passing to divine disposition: and therefore the Church, doing what she can, commits him to divine disposition.

Also another cause of this, without prejudice, I say is the magnitude of the reality of this sacrament: for its reality is the purgation of all the relics of sin impeding immediate transit to rest as to the soul, and glorification as to the body: but such a reality is so great that it cannot be totally effected by sacramental grace: but what sacramental grace works, still requires that the completing residue be petitioned through prayer from divine mercy. And because this sacrament transmits this person to the operation of divine mercy, therefore its form is in the mode of deprecation to mercy, completing the operation of the sacrament.

And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Sacrament Of Extreme Unction Is Well Ordered Among The Other Sacraments

Is the sacrament of extreme unction well ordered among the other sacraments?

Fifthly and lastly, it is asked concerning the order of this to the other sacraments.

For it seems that it is badly ordered here by the Master: § 1. For the sacrament of those ministering in the Church is before the sacrament of those departing from the Church: but Holy Orders and matrimony are sacraments of those ministering in the Church, while unction is of those departing: therefore Holy Orders and matrimony ought to have been treated before this.

§ 2. Still, extreme unction is not truly called extreme, if some unction follows it: but in Holy Orders there is an unction: therefore that will be before it, and thus again they are badly ordered.

§ 3. Still, after the extreme reception of a sacrament no sacrament is received: but this unction is called extreme because it is received last: therefore none is received after it: therefore it itself is the last sacrament: therefore it ought to be handed down in the last place.

Response. It must be said that just as is evident above in a certain question concerning the order and sufficiency of the sacraments, some are sacraments of the person, and some of the Church. Among the sacraments of the person the last is extreme unction, and therefore among them it is posited in the last place: but all sacraments of the person are before the sacraments of the Church: and therefore this is posited before the two following which are sacraments of the Church: one for the spiritual multiplication of the Church, the other for natural multiplication, in which the spiritual life of the Church is saved. And through this the order is evident: for just as the Church is from many persons, and therefore the person is prior to the Church, so the sacrament of the person is before the sacrament of the Church.

To the first therefore it must be said, that this sacrament is of persons departing, and not of the Church departing: but Holy Orders and matrimony is of the persons of the Church instituted for the multitude of the Church: and therefore it is not given to a person on account of the person, but to a person on account of the Church: and therefore they are ordered subsequently.

To the other it must be said, that it is truly called extreme with respect to the recipient, but in the ordering of the sacraments it is not called extreme.

To the other it must be said, that the anointed receives nothing beyond, as the objection says: but nevertheless the Church remains in the others: and secondly it does not follow, if it is received lastly by this one, that it is the last in the order of the sacraments of the Church.

Articulus 6 — Whether It Ought To Be A Bishop Who Consecrates The Oil Which Is The Matter Of Extreme Unction

Is it necessary that the one who consecrates the oil which is the matter of extreme unction be a Bishop?

Is it necessary that the one who consecrates the oil which is the matter of extreme unction be a Bishop?

Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, A, § 1: With oil consecrated by a Bishop.

For it seems that it is not necessary that it be a Bishop who consecrates the oil: because

§ 1. To whom the greater is conceded, the lesser is also conceded: but it is greater to dispense the sacrament in its form, than to bless the matter and dispose it: and this is conceded to many priests: therefore the blessing of the matter ought also to be conceded to priests.

§ 2. Still, in all artificial things the same artisan prepares the matter and induces the form: therefore it seems that also in this sacrament it ought to be done thus: but a simple priest gives the ultimate form to the recipient: therefore the same one ought also to prepare the matter.

§ 3. Still, in ethics arts are ordered according to works: and that one is more worthy which has the perfecting work, but less worthy which prepares the matter, just as the maker of bridles is less worthy than the equestrian: therefore it seems that it is similarly in sacraments: therefore it belongs to a less worthy one to prepare the matter, and to a more worthy one to operate in the prepared matter to induce the form: but the priest performs the ultimate work: therefore it will belong not to Bishops, but to someone less worthy than a simple priest, to prepare the matter of this sacrament.

To the contrary of this it is objected: because, § 1. As was held, an abundance of grace is required in this sacrament: but an abundance of grace does not descend except from one having a higher grade in the Church: and such are Bishops: therefore it seems that this matter ought not to be prepared except by a Bishop.

§ 2. Still, in other sacraments requiring an abundance of grace the matter is prepared by a Bishop: therefore also in this one.

§ 3. Still, in Psalm 132:2: Like the ointment on the head, that ran down, etc. Therefore it necessarily ought to flow from the head: but Bishops are in the place of the head: therefore the preparation of the matter of this sacrament ought to flow through from Bishops to inferiors.

Response. To this it must be said, that in truth the ultimate reasons are to be consented to.

And to the first it must be said, that the exercise of the sacrament is conceded to a priest on account of the danger of the sick: for this often happens in divine sacraments. And this is done for the reason that the Church, instructed according to the counsel of God, in all ways consults for the sick in the utility of the sacraments: and therefore she wishes to have such ministers as can easily be had by those who are to receive the sacraments: but since they are sick, in this sacrament it pleased God that there should be simple priests who could be had closely in all places. And on account of necessity He willed that every man could baptize every man: nevertheless He holds the order in the others, in which there is no danger without the sanctification of the matter.

BUT TO THE ARGUMENT it must be said, that what is said, To whom the principal is committed, the accessory is committed, it must be said that it is understood concerning that accessory without which someone cannot be in the operation of the principal: but this is not the case here: because even if he does not bless the oil, he can nevertheless anoint the sick with blessed oil.

To the other it must be said, that it is one thing to prepare the matter, and another to induce the form of the already prepared matter: and another to prepare the matter through some form, and to use it for the end of that form. For the first two belong to one habit, which is one art, according as Aristotle says, that art is a factive habit with true reason: just as is evident in the smith's art, which heats the iron, and polishes it, and induces the figure of a sword, existing as one art. But the second two are never of one habit which is an art, but rather of two, as is evident in the sword-making art, and the military art. For the first makes the sword, and the second uses the sword for its end, and knows that end, on account of which it is also architectonic with respect to the prior one. But so it is here, that one induces sanctification in the matter, and the other uses it for the utility of the Church by anointing the sick with sanctified oil: but which is more principal, will be evident in the solution of the following question.

To the other it must be said, that in divine things it is not as in political things: because divine things descend from one power, but political things descend from many and ordered powers: and therefore in political things the more principal art is that which is nearer to the good which is the end of politics: but in divine things that one is more worthy from which more divine things descend: and therefore since the sanctity of the matter according to origin descends from a higher grade, as it also ought, it belongs to the more worthy one to confer sanctity on the matter, than to exhibit use in the sacrament. But that this is so in divine things, is evident: because those things by derivation are from one: and therefore what is prior is both nearer and more worthy to it, by a totally contrary order than in political things: and therefore since to sanctify the oil is prior, this will belong to the superior: and to exhibit the use of the sacrament, will belong to the inferior and posterior.

Articulus 7 — Whether There Is Any Principal Anointing, And Whether That Is The One Which Is Done In Baptism, Confirmation, Or Extreme Unction

Is there some principal unction? and, Is it that which is done in baptism, confirmation, or extreme unction?

Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, A, § 2: Which is called the principal unction, etc.

For it seems that Confirmation is not the principal unction. For it is called principal either from the principality of the office or of the place which is anointed: or from the principality of grace: or from the principality of the matter of the unction itself. If the first: then the more principal unction is the unction of Holy Orders: because there a character of excellence is given for the more principal office of the Church which is the dispensation of the sacrament. But if it is said in the second way: then the unction of a catechumen is called principal: because there the crown of the head is anointed for the perfection of the intellect, which according to Aristotle is the principal part of the soul. If in the third way: then again the anointing of Baptism will be called the principal unction: because in baptism the greatest grace is brought. But if it is said in the fourth way: then the unction both of Holy Orders and of Confirmation is called principal: because in both the unction is done with chrism.

Response. It must be said, as was noted in the question concerning Confirmation, that for three causes that unction is called the principal unction, namely from the place, from the grace, and from the liquid of the matter of unction. The place is the forehead, which is the seat of shame in man, where the place of honor is: and that place is of more excellent dignity in the confession of faith, than the crown of the head: although the latter is more excellent in the place and order of the parts of the body. But the grace, as is said in the Text, is not for being as in baptism, but for strength to fight. This again is more excellent than grace merely for being. And the liquid is from oil and balsam.

And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 8 — Whether Kings Ought To Be Anointed On The Shoulders With Oil, Not Chrism, And Not On The Head

Ought Kings to be anointed on the shoulders with oil, not with chrism, and not on the head?

Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, A, § 2, before the end: With which the heads of Kings and Pontiffs are anointed, etc.

For the contrary is in the custom of the Church: because Kings are not anointed with chrism on the head, but on the shoulders.

Response. It must be said, that if we wish to sustain what he says: then one of the two substantives is reduced to the adjective of the other, so that the sense is, with which the heads of King-Pontiffs, that is, royal pontiffs: because they have a royal priesthood: and then what he says is true. Or we can say, that in antiquity in the Old Testament kings had power over priests: because they were not true priests, but a shadow of true priests: and then they were anointed with chrism, and on the head: but now because they are ministers of the Church and do not need grace for spiritual things, by the fact that there they administer temporal things, they are not anointed with chrism, but with oil, in which is noted the fame which they ought to have among subjects: and on the shoulders on which burdens are borne, so that they may recognize that they are posited to support the burdens of subjects and of the Church.

Articulus 9 — Whether Only The Sick Are Capable Of Receiving This Sacrament

Are only the sick perceptible of this sacrament?

Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, A, § 2, at the end: The third unction is that which is called the oil of the sick concerning which, etc.

Here it is also implied that none but the sick are perceptible of this sacrament.

And for the sake of this it is asked concerning those participating in this sacrament. And four things are asked. First, Whether the healthy as well as the sick is perceptible of it? Second, In what age is one perceptible? Third, Whether in every sickness one is perceptible? Fourth and last, Why are the furious primarily removed from the perception of this sacrament?

To the first of these it is objected thus: § 1. Every medicine against some disease is exhibited to him in whom the disease is: but this sacrament is a medicine ordained against the disease of the relics of sin: therefore it is exhibited to him in whom the disease is found: but the healthy as well as the sick have the disease of the relics of sin: therefore the healthy as well as the sick are perceptible of this unction. The first is evident per se. But the second is proved from the division of the sacraments posited at the beginning of this book, and will be proved below.

§ 2. Still, for the consecution of perfect health in the body a medicine purging relics is required: therefore it is similarly in the mind: but perfect health of the mind is required for merit: therefore it seems that everyone who wishes to be in the state of meriting, ought to receive this sacrament: but such persons are especially healthy: therefore this sacrament is especially for the healthy. § 2. If perhaps you say that this sacrament is ordained against bodily disease. On the contrary: the sacraments of the New Law effect what they signify in one who does not feign [reception]: but this is a sacrament of the New Law: therefore it always effects bodily health in one who does not feign, which is evidently false: because we see that many holy men who are anointed do not recover after the unction. § 3. If perhaps you say that it thus effects [it] in all for whom it is expedient: it is ridiculous to say that a sacrament of the New Law sometimes effects its principal effect in one who does not feign, namely when it is expedient, and sometimes does not effect it, namely when it is not expedient: because thus all sacraments would be drawn into illusion. § 4. But if it is said that a healthy person is a capable recipient. § 5. On the contrary: it is said Is any man sick among you? Therefore no one is a capable recipient unless he is sick. § 6. Also, it is said They anointed with oil many that were sick, or infirm: therefore no one is a capable recipient unless he is sick. § 7. Response. It must be said that no one is a capable recipient of this sacrament unless he is sick. § 8. Now to the first [objection] it must be said that the purging of the remnants [of sin], insofar as they are immediate impediments to the flying away [of the soul] and the glorification of the body, is the substantial effect of this sacrament, as will be proven below: because there will be a question about this. Because, therefore, a healthy person is not on the way of passing over to glory, for this reason he is not a capable recipient of this sacrament. § 9. To the second it must be said that it is indeed true that the remnants of sins, insofar as they are impediments to merit, are sufficiently eradicated by the Eucharist and other sacraments: and therefore this sacrament is not ordained against them in this way: but rather in the aforesaid way, when they drain the powers of the body and impede the flying away of the soul, especially insofar as they are caused by forgotten sins and those committed through ignorance: and therefore the tabernacle was anointed once a year on account of irregularities contracted from unknown and forgotten things. § 10. To the other things which were objected, I think they must be conceded: because that response is worthless.

Articulus 10 — At What Age The Sick Person Is Capable Of Receiving The Sacrament Of Extreme Unction

At what age is a sick person a capable recipient of the sacrament of extreme unction?

§ 11. Secondly, it is asked: Who is a capable recipient of this sacrament? § 12. Now it seems that [one is capable] at every age: because § 13. 1. An authority says that no one is clean from sin, not even an infant of one day: since therefore unction is given against final sins, it seems that every human being should be anointed. § 14. 2. Furthermore, Although its principal reality is not bodily health or the curing of pain, nevertheless the sick are alleviated by hope from the participation in this sacrament: and the natural philosophers say that infants more easily fall sick and die: therefore it seems that unction is more necessary for them than for the elderly. § 15. 3. Furthermore, All personal sacraments are given to everyone in whom is found the cause against which they were instituted: therefore this one as well: but the remnants of sin are in the elderly just as much as in the young: therefore this sacrament must be given to all. § 16. To the contrary of this is that § 17. 1. In infants there is nothing but original [sin]: and against this, baptism is sufficiently ordained: therefore extreme unction would be superfluously conferred upon infants through this anointing.

§ 1. 2. Furthermore, Here there would be a false supposition in the form, when it would be said: May the Lord indulge you through this anointing whatever you have sinned through sight: because this does not hold in the saints, nor in an infant who has offended in nothing through sight, and similarly through hearing, and walking, because perhaps he has never walked:

therefore it ought not to be exhibited to infants. § 2. Which we concede, saying that this sacrament is to be exhibited only to adults advanced in age. § 3. Therefore to the first objection, it must be said that that authority is understood concerning original [sin], and not concerning any other: and this sacrament has its principal ordination against the remnants of forgotten and unknown actual [sins]. § 4. To the next it must be said that bodily health is never the reality of this sacrament, except when it depends upon the infirmity of the mind: and this never occurs in infants who have never sinned: and therefore also they are never to be anointed on account of bodily infirmity. § 5. To the last the solution is evident through the aforesaid: because the cause against which this sacrament is principally ordained is not found in infants. § 6. And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 11 — Whether In Every Illness Someone Is Capable Of Receiving This Sacrament

Whether in every sickness someone is a capable recipient of this sacrament?

§ 7. Thirdly, it is asked: Whether in every sickness someone is a capable recipient of this sacrament? § 8. Now it seems that this is the case: because § 9. 1. Every sickness according to any species of sickness can be caused by sin and the infirmity of the mind: but in such [cases] this sacrament has a place, as was said: therefore in every sickness this sacrament ought to be received. § 10. 2. Furthermore, Neither in James nor in Mark is any special sickness specified: therefore it seems that it can generally be received in every sickness. § 11. 3. Furthermore, Spiritual things differ from bodily things, as Augustine says: because the more general bodily things are, the more useless are the individual ones: but spiritual things are the converse: but this sacrament is a spiritual medicine: therefore the more general it is, the more useful: but that which is said to avail against every disease is more general than that which avails only against a certain disease; therefore it seems that it is better to say that this sacrament should be received in every infirmity. § 12. To the contrary of this it is objected: § 13. 1. Through the name of this sacrament, because it is called extreme unction: therefore it is never to be exhibited except in the extreme: but not every infirmity shows the extreme of a human being: therefore this sacrament is not to be exhibited in every infirmity. § 14. 2. Furthermore, Aristotle in the book On the Causes of a Longer Life says that certain infirmities are the cause of a longer life: but this sacrament is never to be received in a cause of a longer life: therefore the sacrament is not to be received in those infirmities. § 15. 3. Furthermore, This sacrament is called by all the "extreme sacrament": but extremes are not present except when death is at the gates and life is despaired of: therefore they are never capable recipients of this sacrament unless they are such: but this is not the case in every infirmity: therefore this sacrament is not to be received in every infirmity. § 16. Response. It must be said that this sacrament is not to be received in every infirmity, just as the last introduced arguments prove. § 17. To the first therefore it must be said that this would well follow if the principal effect of the sacrament were concerning the body: but this is not true, rather it is an effect which it never attains, except when the infirmity of the body depends upon the infirmity of the mind: and then this is not always the case, except when it is useful to the sick person who receives the unction: and therefore that argument is invalid: because the sacrament is never to be received merely for the utility of the body. Since therefore its effect is the purging of remnants insofar as they are an impediment to receiving the stole of the soul and the body, this sacrament is never to be received except in transition [from this life]. § 1. To the next it must be said that the Apostle is speaking because every bodily infirmity by increasing can lead a human being to death: and when death is presumed to be imminent, the sacrament ought to be received. § 2. To the next it must be said that it is well ordained secondarily against all diseases, as was said, and insofar as they are caused by a sin of the soul: but this medicine is not for every state of a disease, but rather in a state of a disease that is above the nature of the location.

Articulus 12 — Why The Insane And The Mindless And Others Suffering From Similar Infirmities Are Prohibited From The Reception Of This Sacrament

Why are the furious and the mad, and others laboring under similar infirmities, prohibited from the reception of this sacrament?

§ 3. Fourthly, it is asked concerning certain infirmities, such as fury, and mania, and certain other species of madness, why those sick with these infirmities are prohibited from the reception of this sacrament? § 4. For it seems that they ought not to be prohibited: because § 5. 1. It is dangerous to prohibit medicine to a sick person when he is in transition from this life: since therefore they are sometimes near death, it is dangerous to prohibit medicine to them. § 6. 2. Furthermore, Baptism is of a more excellent sanctity than extreme unction: but baptism is not prohibited to them: therefore neither ought extreme unction be prohibited to them. § 7. 3. Furthermore, Those who cannot help themselves are most in need of the help of the Church: but the help of the Church is in the sacraments: therefore extreme unction is most especially to be conferred upon such [people]. § 8. To the contrary of this is that this sacrament is not to be exhibited except to those who recognize it and request it: but the mad and the furious are not such: therefore it seems that it should not be given to them. § 9. Response. It must be said that extreme unction is not to be given to such persons: because they do not recognize it, and there could be a danger in the irreverence of its reception: because they could throw it away or behave irreverently with other impurities in the reception of the sacrament. § 10. Moreover, [the reception] of this sacrament [involves] more [cooperation] than that of another sacrament, as was said before, because of the faith and devotion of those cooperating with the sacrament: and such things cannot be conferred upon these [persons], unless they have lucid intervals, and then in that time in which they have the interval, this sacrament can be given to them. § 11. To the first therefore it must be said that medicine is not to be prohibited from a sick person who knows how to apply it to himself, or who is capable of learning from another how it is to be applied: but otherwise the medicine is harmful, and therefore he is prohibited from it. So it is concerning the sacraments: because they yield to the detriment of one who uses them badly, and it would be a sin of the ministers to give the sacraments of God to a beastly human being. § 12. To the next it must be said that baptism is not ordained except against original sin, which was contracted from elsewhere: and therefore another's merit suffices for him: but concerning the other sacraments it is not so, but rather they are ordained against actual [sin]: and therefore in that case it is true that He who created you without you, will not justify you without you: and therefore it demands a ready judgment and a free will for receiving. And this is true of all [the sacraments] except Confirmation, which is ordained against the infirmity caused by concupiscence: and therefore also it comes from elsewhere and does not require one's own merit except accidentally, just as Baptism does, namely if it is an adult who receives it: and therefore also Confirmation and Baptism can be exhibited to infants. § 1. To the next it must be said that such persons experience the mercy of the Church in other things, namely in prayers and custodianships: but in these things it would be foolishness, because it would yield to the sin of the ministers, and to no utility of the recipients on account of the aforesaid cause.

Articulus 13 — Whether The Sacrament Of Extreme Unction Was Instituted By The Apostles Or By Christ

Whether the sacrament of extreme unction was instituted by the Apostles or by Christ?

§ 2. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at B: This sacrament of the unction of the sick, etc. § 3. For this seems to be false: because § 4. 1. In sacraments a human institution is not sufficient, but it is necessary that it be divine: therefore it seems that it was not instituted by the Apostles. § 5. 2. Furthermore, It belongs to a legislator to establish laws and to sanctify: but Christ alone is our legislator, as it is said The Lord our lawgiver, supply is: therefore it belongs to Christ alone to confirm and institute laws, and especially divine ones: but divine laws are especially in the sacraments:

therefore it seems that in any sacrament there is a divine institution. § 1. 3. Furthermore, Augustine says that a sacrament is that in which divine power more secretly works salvation: but there is no human institution above the operation of divine power: therefore in every sacrament there must be a divine institution. § 2. 4. Furthermore, All the sacraments of the Old Law which were infirm, because the law brought nothing to perfection , God instituted through Himself: therefore since the sacraments of the New Law are perfect, much more ought He to have instituted these through Himself: therefore it was not instituted by the Apostles, as is said in the Text. § 3. 5. Furthermore, Christ instituted all the other sacraments of the New Law through Himself, even matrimony: therefore this one as well. § 4. 6. Furthermore, Master Hugh of St. Victor says that a sacrament signifies from divine institution. § 5. To the contrary of this is: § 6. 1. That which is said in the Text. § 7. 2. Furthermore, Because it is not read that it was instituted by the Lord: therefore it seems that its institution was not made by the Lord. § 8. 3. Furthermore, Sacraments are said to be instituted by the Lord in two ways, namely by word, such as Baptism, and Penance, the Eucharist, and Matrimony: and by the exhibition of a deed, such as Holy Orders, as when He read the prophecy in the book of Isaiah and when He changed bread into His body: and Confirmation, when He laid hands upon the little children but in neither way is it read that He instituted extreme unction: therefore it seems that He did not institute it. § 9. Response. It must be said that this can be answered in two ways: for some have said that the Apostles, inspired by God and by divine authority and the will of God, were able to institute certain sacraments: because it was not they, but God who instituted them within them. And through this they solve the arguments introduced. And they give a similar case, that they temporarily changed the form of baptism, thus inspired, so that it would be done in the name of Christ and God. And concerning this it was held above in the questions on baptism. But this does not seem agreeable: because it is one thing to change, and another to institute an entire sacrament to be celebrated anew: for a man having authority could interpret some doubt in the sacraments, and a man having authority and an inspiration known to the whole Church, as the Apostles had, can change something temporarily for some cause: but to institute the whole I do not believe anyone can, except God: and therefore it seems that the first arguments must be agreed with. § 10. To the first in the contrary it must be said that the Master is speaking of the institution of the canon, not of the authority of the person: because James first published the canon and rule for observing this sacrament. § 11. To the next it must be said that many things are not read: which nevertheless are proven to have been done by the Church itself in the general observance taught by the Apostles. For in Mark it is read that the Apostles going forth, having been sent by the Lord to preach, anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them: and it is not to be presumed that they did anything except by the institution and command of the Lord. § 12. To the next it must be said that God did not institute it by a deed: because already by Himself He would seem impotent for the curing of the sick, but rather it is presumed He instituted it by word, when He sent the disciples to preach, as was said before.

Articulus 14 — Whether The Master Well Says That The Sacrament Of Extreme Unction Was Instituted For A Twofold Reason

Whether the Master rightly says that the sacrament of extreme unction was instituted for a twofold cause?

Whether the Master rightly says that the sacrament of extreme unction was instituted for a twofold cause?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at B, after the beginning: In which it is shown that this sacrament was instituted for a twofold cause, etc. § 2. This that he says seems false: because there is no single cause of two per se effects: but a sacrament is a single cause: therefore it is not of two effects per se. § 3. If perhaps you say that it is of one per se, and of the other as something adjoined to it: for it does not cure infirmity per se, except that which depends upon the infirmity of the mind: then let it be asked, what is the per se effect of this sacrament? And it is said in the Text that it is the remission of sins. But it seems that this is false: because the remission of sins is the effect of contrition, and contrition is not extreme unction: therefore the remission of sins is not the effect of extreme unction. § 4. If perhaps you say that nothing prohibits one effect from being of diverse causes, this is impossible: because thus none of them would be a cause per se: and it would happen that there would be some effect which would have no cause per se: and this whole thing is impossible. § 5. Moreover, He immediately says below in the Text, that the reality of this sacrament is perfected by the remission of sins and the amplification of virtues: but the amplification of virtues is also perfected by baptism, and similarly the remission of sins: therefore there are two sacraments of the same reality. And the same objection concerning penance is touched upon: and since one of them is sufficient, it seems that the other two are superfluous. § 6. If perhaps you say that one of them does not suffice without the other, there follow two other absurdities, one of which is that divine causes are more imperfect with respect to their effect than natural causes. The second is that when someone receives baptism or penance, he does not yet have the remission of sins and the amplification of virtues, unless he receives extreme unction: because one sacrament is not sufficient without the other. § 7. Response. It must be said that the effect and the reality of this sacrament (as the Master says) is the remission of sins and the amplification of virtues according to a certain mode; because nothing prohibits the same thing in genus from being caused by many causes according to the diverse species which it has: hence the remission of sins, insofar as it is conjoined to the purging of original [sin], is the effect of baptism: but insofar as it is conjoined to the purging of actual [sin] caused from the detestation of sin by a movement of free choice toward God, it is caused by penance: and these two are sacramental causes, which are like necessary dispositions in the subject: but formally it is the effect of justification. But insofar as sin is removed in the remnants which impede the passage to rest, it is purged in extreme unction. And in this way the Master understands it: and according to this diversity, an augmentation of virtue is demanded for every purging of sins and follows it diversely. § 8. And through this the solution to the whole is evident: because the first objection is solved through the argument introduced to the contrary.

Articulus 15 — Whether The Sick Person Receiving This Sacrament Ought To Be Anointed In Some Determinate Place

Whether a sick person receiving this sacrament must be anointed in some determinate place?

Whether a sick person receiving this sacrament must be anointed in some determinate place?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at B, around the middle: Whence it is established that he who faithfully and devoutly receives this unction, etc. § 2. And three things are asked here on the part of the recipient of this sacrament, namely whether the sick person is to be anointed in some determinate place? Secondly, In what place? Thirdly, Whether multiple unctions are many sacraments or only one? § 3. To the first of these it is thus proceeded: § 4. 1. In every location of a disease, it is necessary to apply the antidote there: but the disease against which this sacrament is ordained, whether it is received in the body or in the soul, is in every member and place of the body: therefore it seems that the unction must be done universally on the whole body. § 5. 2. Furthermore, Sin is principally in the rational soul: and this, according to the Philosopher, is the actuality of no body: and it is commonly glossed, that is, of no part of the body: therefore it seems that the whole body is to be anointed, and not certain parts of it. § 6. 3. Furthermore, Augustine says that the soul is whole in the whole [body]: since therefore one is anointed principally on account of the infirmity of the soul, it seems that the whole [body] should be anointed. § 7. 4. Furthermore, In medicines of bodily unctions, when the location of the disease is determinately unknown, all the places of the body around it are anointed: therefore it must be done similarly in a spiritual disease, if the location of the disease is unknown: because it is impossible that the minister of the Church should know the location of the remnants of sin: therefore it seems that the whole body ought to be anointed. § 8. 5. Furthermore, The thing signified by this sacrament, namely the anointing of glory, will be done with the oil of future gladness, and in the whole body: therefore as before. § 9. To the contrary of this it is objected: because § 10. 1. To whatever the act belongs, to that belongs the habit and the remnants remaining from the act and the habit: but the acts of actual sins belong to determinate powers of the soul and determinate organs of the body: therefore the remnants and habits belong to the same: but unction is done to remove such remnants: therefore it ought to be done in determinate places of the body. § 11. 2. Furthermore, The right usage of the Church holds that the sick are anointed in determinate places of the body: therefore it must be done thus: therefore not on the whole body. § 12. Response. It must be said that the last two arguments must be agreed with. § 13. And to the first it must be said that although the infirmity is in the whole, yet the cause of the infirmity is in certain parts, and for the removal of the infirmity it suffices to cut off the cause through the sacrament. § 14. To the next it must be said that sin is in the rational [soul] as in its primary efficient cause: but not every sin is in it as in a subject: rather, the remnants of sin abound on the part of the powers which are conjoined to the body: because through them one operates concerning pleasures and communications with human beings: and therefore they contract evil dispositions and the remnants of sins from frequently operating badly. But through those powers the effect of the sacrament redounds into the rational soul, which moves those powers united to the body. § 15. To the next it must be said that the soul through its essence is whole in the whole [body], but not through its powers. But the powers are those which maximally contract evil remnants from sin. § 16. To the next it must be said that there is no doubt concerning the instruments through which we have sinned:

for they are the very same ones which nature gave for operating well: and therefore, once those are anointed, it is certain that the location where the cause of the infirmity against which this sacrament [is ordained] dominates, has been anointed. § 1. To the last it must be said that the anointing of glory is not caused by this sacrament, but is only signified, and is also signified by baptism: and for noting other signified things, it is not necessary that the sacrament posit an express signification. But it suffices for this sacrament that it signifies the whole anointing of glory through the anointing done on the principal organs, which have an ordination toward the whole body: because by their movements the whole is administered and moved.

Articulus 16 — In Which Parts Of The Body The Sick Person Ought To Be Anointed

In which parts of the body should the sick person be anointed?

§ 2. Secondly it is asked: In which parts of the body should the sick person be anointed? § 3. Now it seems that § 4. 1. On the breast and on the shoulder blades and on the crown of the head and on the forehead, for this reason: because in whatever organs one is armed and perfected for work in the other sacraments through the unctions of the other sacraments, in the same one contracts the stains of evil operation: but in the aforesaid places one is armed and perfected by the other sacraments: therefore, etc. The proof of the first is: because good and evil operations belong to the same organ. But the second is proven through the rite of the Church in confirmation and in catechism. § 5. 2. Also, It seems that one ought to be anointed only in three places: because there are only three things in the substance of sinning, as was held above, namely the mouth, the hands, and the breast: therefore it seems that one ought not to be anointed except on the mouth, breast, and hands. § 6. 3. Furthermore it seems that it suffices to anoint only the head: because all sensation and movement are rooted in the head, as the natural philosophers say: but every sin of ours is in internal or external sensation, or in movement: therefore it seems that only the head is to be anointed. § 7. Further it is asked here concerning mutilated members, how they are to be anointed, or concerning those blind from birth? § 8. It seems that it is not necessary to anoint those places: because § 9. 1. They have not sinned with them. § 10. 2. Moreover, If they were anointed in them, it seems that something false would be supposed by the minister saying: May the Lord indulge you whatever you have offended through the feet and hands or eyes, which perhaps he never had, or does not have then. § 11. Response. To this it must be said that there is diverse usage of diverse Churches and orders: because in certain Churches more places are anointed, and in certain ones fewer. Nevertheless I think that it suffices to anoint the places of the five senses. Now I assign this reason for it: because our every will or appetite is informed concerning [its] account and species, as if from phantasy or reason: but everything that is in phantasy or reason arises from sense, as a proper or common sensible: or is elicited from it by a collation made by composing and dividing: and therefore the first fount of our appetites are the senses concerning the objects themselves: and there it suffices to place the unctions: for it would be shameful to anoint certain organs and places of sin, and not without injury to the sacrament would certain places be touched with consecrated things. § 12. To the first therefore it must be said that in the other sacraments unction is not done to prepare those organs for acts: which is evident, because nothing is done with the forehead, on which the principal unction is placed: but on the crown and on the breast unctions are done on account of the operations of the heart and the intellect, which are originated within: and on the shoulder blades on account of bearing burdens under the yoke of Christ. But sins are not originated from those places, but rather from the senses, as was proven before in the beginning of the solution: because even spiritual [sins] have their origin from the senses insofar as they are in act: because our every concept begins from sense, as the Philosopher says and Dionysius confirms. § 1. To the next it must be said that although a sin is originated from three as from operating principles: nevertheless it is originated from many according to objects outside: and this is attended to in extreme unction: and therefore in the more approved orders and in certain Churches only the extremities are anointed, such as the mouth, and nostrils, and eyes, and ears: because the organs of the five senses are in them: nevertheless others besides these anoint the shoulder blades, and the breast, and the loins in which the pleasure of venereal things exists, although it is not necessary. § 2. To that which is objected concerning the unction of only the head, it must be said that although all sensation and movement originate from the head regarding the sensitive and motive power: nevertheless the senses do not draw to themselves from there the objects which are the causes of desires and operations, but rather in the hands and feet, insofar as one goes through the feet to the desired thing, and the progressive movement, which is for the completion of desire, is perfected through them. But unction is against that which is born from sensibles drawn from outside, and not against the sensitive and motive [power] itself: and therefore the aforesaid places are anointed, and not only the head. § 3. Through this the solution to the following is also evident. § 4. To the next it must be said that I think such persons are to be anointed in the places of mutilation: because although they lack the member, they nevertheless do not [lack] the power by which the act of sin is completed within, even if not outside.

Articulus 17 — Whether Extreme Unction Is One Or Several Sacraments

Whether extreme unction is one or many sacraments?

§ 5. Thirdly it is asked: Whether it is one sacrament or many? § 6. It seems that it is many: because § 7. 1. The matter is more often received in multiple unctions, and the form is more often iterated: but when baptism is done more often with the iteration of the form, it is established that there are many sacraments of baptism: therefore it seems that there are also multiple unctions here: therefore multiple sacraments. § 8. 2. Furthermore, Here there are multiple unctions, each of which is a sacrament: therefore there are multiple sacraments. Proof of the first. It is established that multiple unctions are done according to the diversity of organs, as was said: but each of them is a sign of a sacred reality, the similitude of which it bears and exists as its cause: therefore each is a sacrament: therefore the proposition is established. § 9. 3. Furthermore, Every sacrament is in the one receiving it: because it is ridiculous to say that a sacrament of the Church is in the pyx: but I see that there are multiple unctions there: therefore multiple sacraments. § 10. To the contrary of this is that this sacrament is never to be iterated over the same infirmity, as will be said in the following chapter: therefore there is only one: and it is received once: therefore there are not many. § 11. Response. It must be said that multiple unctions do not constitute anything but one sacrament: because all the unctions are for one single effect which was stated above. § 12. To the first therefore it must be said that the ma-

The third is one, although divided by parts: and from all the prayers together is understood one purification of remnants beseeched by the Church. Nor is it similar concerning baptism: because that is done by the general immersion of the whole or principal part of the body: and therefore its form is said only once. Another reason for this is: because, as was said above, the effect of this sacrament requires others cooperating: and therefore the desires of the faithful are multiplied in different prayers.

To the other it must be said, that there are many anointings there, which all unite in one effect, which they complete: and therefore all are one sacrament. And as it is said, that each is a sacrament, it must be said, that all are one sacrament: because each is a sign and cause of the purification of remnants not according to part, but according to the whole all together: for as was disputed above, sacramental graces are not had simultaneously. Hence when each is called a sacrament, this is from incomplete signification and causality of the effect: and when all together are one sacrament, this has the complement of signifying and causing.

To the other it must be said, that in the recipient the perfect sacrament is only one, as is already clear from what has been said, although he receives many incompletely signifying and causing.

But if it is asked, which anointing completes the whole and perfect essence of the sacrament? It must be said that the last in comparison to all the others preceding: just as when we say, that from acts the habit of virtue is caused, the last act in comparison to the remaining left from all preceding causes the habit. And a similar judgment is here in the perfection of the sacrament.

And through this the solution to the whole question is clear.

Articulus 18 — What Ought To Be Done If The Priest Anointing Dies While Anointing

What is to be done if a priest, anointing, dies while anointing?

Fourthly, the question is asked which is left from those, from which the completion of the sacrament depends on the last anointing in comparison to the preceding ones, what is to be done in the case when the priest anointing dies, when he has already performed some anointings, and has not completed others, one, or two, or more?

For it seems that it should be begun from the beginning; because 1. The action of one is one: but the action of the conferring of the sacrament is one of only one: therefore, he who has not completed this, has done nothing, as it seems: therefore, from the beginning the whole must be repeated.

1. Furthermore, Ambrose says that the sacraments of Christ are simple: it is impossible for the acts of two to be simple: therefore, one sacrament cannot be of two: therefore, the second ought to begin from the head.

But on the contrary of this is what the Pope responds in the Order, because in the imperfectly ordained, what is lacking is supplied, and what has been done is not repeated: therefore, much more is this to be done in extreme unction.

Therefore, it is conceived: whence the following ought to begin where the preceding left off, prevented by death.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that this sacrament, by reason of its great effect, has the form in the manner of a prayer: and it is more effective when more say that prayer: because the prayers of many are heard more quickly: and this is suggested in James 5:14, when it says: Let him call the presbyters of the Church, not a presbyter.

To the argument, however, it can be said that in such a case two are as one: and this suffices for the unity of the sacrament.

To the other, it must be said that the saying of Ambrose is understood concerning the simplicity of the sacraments in effect, and not in species, or matter, or form.

Articulus 19 — Whether In The Sacrament Of Extreme Unction There Is Something Which Is The Sacrament Only, And Something Which Is The Sacrament And The Thing, And Something Which Is The Thing Only, And Whether It Imprints A Character

Whether in the sacrament of extreme unction there is something which is a sacrament only, and something which is both sacrament and reality, and something which is reality only? And, whether it impresses a character?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said there, B, §2: And as in other sacraments, etc.

For it seems that this is false: because in other sacraments there is something which is a sacrament only, something which is both sacrament and reality, and something which is reality only: but in this one it is not necessary for there to be something which is both reality and sacrament: therefore it seems that he speaks falsely.

Concerning this it is gratuitously inquired, Whether it impresses a character which is in this sacrament and reality?

And it seems that it does: because
1. In other sacraments which consist in anointing, a character is impressed: therefore also in this one.

1. Furthermore, to whom the act belongs, to him also belongs the habit and power: but the act of the character belongs to the anointed: therefore, etc. First proof: because the anointed is distinguished from the non-anointed, and to distinguish is the act of the character: therefore, etc.
2. Furthermore, bodily anointing does not reach the soul: therefore it is necessary that there be something joining it or its power with the soul: but this medium does not seem to be anything except the character: therefore it seems that it impresses a character.

On the contrary, it is objected: because no sacrament impressing a character is repeated: but this one is repeated: therefore it does not impress a character. The first proof is from induction and the nature of the character: because it is an indelible sign placing one in a state of faith, and an indelible sign would be injured if it were repeated: therefore the proposition stands.

Response. It must be said to this that it does not impress a character. And yet I think it should be well conceded that there are three things in it as in any other sacrament: but it is not necessary that the medium which is both reality and sign be a character. However, I think that the medium is a certain spiritual disposition inducing grace purging the remnants of sins.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the medium has already been stated what it is.

To the other, it must be said that sacraments do not have from anointing that they impress a character, but rather from this that they distinguish according to some special state of faith the faithful who receive them: and this is explained in the treatise on Baptism, where it is discussed concerning the character.

To the other, it must be said that it is false, To whom the act belongs, to him belongs the habit: and Aristotle gives an instance, that not every grammarian grammaticizes, and not every doctor medicates. However, the distinction of the character is different from that of any other form which another does not perceive: for the character distinguishes by a sign placing in a special state of faith in which without this it would not be: but other forms distinguish from those not having those forms by a certain distinction of restriction from supposits of the same species not participating in that form.

And by this the solution to all that is objected is clear: because the non-anointed is distinguished from the anointed.

To the other, it must be said that although bodily anointing does not reach the soul, yet its power reaches to the soul, which is its power through the sanctification of the matter and form which is said in conferring the sacrament.

Articulus 20 — Whether Extreme Unction Can Be Repeated

Whether extreme unction can be repeated?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, CG, QGuerunt aligui, If this sacrament, etc.

For it seems that it ought not to be repeated: because
1. No injury should be done to a sacrament: but repetition, as Augustine says, is an injury to the sacrament: therefore it ought not to be repeated.

1. Furthermore, the very name seems to show that it ought not to be repeated: because it is called extreme unction: but after the extreme, there is nothing: therefore it seems that it cannot be repeated.

2. Furthermore, after the purgation of the remnants of sin, nothing remains to be purged of sin: but when nothing remains to be purged of sin, the sacrament is uselessly repeated: therefore it seems that it would be uselessly repeated if it were repeated: but nothing is useless in the works of the Church: therefore it seems that the sacrament is not repeated.

It is further asked concerning the reason of the two opinions which the Master introduces, which is truer?

Response. It must be said that this sacrament, like certain others, is repeated if their cause is repeated: as Augustine expressly says in the Letter: If the disease does not return, the medicine should not be repeated. But if the disease cannot be restrained, why should the medicine be prohibited?

To the first, therefore, it must be said that no injury is done to the sacrament when it is repeated on the same subject, but when it is repeated on the same cause in number: hence those sacraments which have their causes immobile are not repeated, like Baptism, because the original sin never returns: and Confirmation, because the weakness from the fomes never returns. Similarly, the deprivation of ecclesiastical power never returns in him who receives Order: and therefore those are never repeated. However, some have mobile causes on the same subject: and therefore in the same man they are repeated, although not for the same cause.

And through this solution it is clear how both opinions which are recited in the Letter are to be reconciled, and the solution to the last is clear.

To the other, it must be said that extreme unction is called from the presumption and sign of the extreme of life, and not from the extreme according to act and thing: for it suffices that the extreme of life is presumed to be imminent for the sick to be anointed. And thus it is clear that the objection is not valid.

To the other, it must be said that after the remnants are purged, other sins return again, and other remnants if life is prolonged: and therefore such a one again needs unction.

Articulus 21 — Whether In Chronic Illnesses Extreme Unction Ought And Can Always Be Repeated

Whether in chronic illnesses extreme unction ought and can always be repeated?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said there, C, after the beginning: If indeed the illness cannot be restrained, etc.

The question here is concerning chronic illnesses which never recede, such as paralysis, leprosy, consumption, and the like: whether the sacrament can be repeated in them?

And it seems that it cannot: 1. By those things which are said in the Letter: because that illness does not return, since never receding it never returns: therefore it seems that medicine ought not to be repeated upon it.

1. Further, One cause does not require more than one spiritual medicine: but here there is one cause: therefore one spiritual medicine.

On the contrary of this is that as long as the illness remains after the reception of the sacrament, so long are sins and the remnants of sins contracted: but the sacrament is principally ordained against the remnants of sins: therefore it seems that even in the same chronic illness it ought to be repeated.

Response. To this without prejudice I think it should be said that if the illness remains beyond a year after the unction has been received, the unction can be repeated. And the cause of this is: because it is not judged to be the same illness in number, which is altered according to the perfect imitation of the higher things: for our bodies by the influence of the higher things according to the four humors in the four seasons of the year are changed, and habits are broken into dispositions, and they are not the same: and therefore the sacrament will not be repeated from the same cause entirely. If, however, it is found to be determined otherwise in this question by some holy father or by the Lord Pope, I would judge that opinion should be adhered to rather than mine: because in this part it is more to be believed in the inspiration of the Church than in reason conjecturing from uncertainties.

By the aforesaid the solution to both objections is clear.

However, the words of Augustine are to be noted, by which he says: Just as prayer can be repeated because from this it expressly seems to testify, etc.: to favor that opinion, which says that a supplicative mode ought to be placed in the form of this sacrament.

And let these things said about extreme unction suffice.

It follows concerning the sacrament of Orders.

Divisio Textus

§ 1. DIVISION OF THE TEXT.

"Besides the premises there is also another sacrament, etc." Here also the Master touches upon three things concerning extreme unction, namely concerning its essence regarding form and matter, and he does this in the first chapter; and concerning its institution, and this in the second; and, Whether it can be repeated, or not? and this in the third, and in that he touches upon two opinions, as is clear in the Letter. And through this the division and content of the Letter are clear.

§ 2. But concerning this sacrament, around the beginning of the distinction, five things are asked, namely: First, Whether extreme unction is a sacrament? Second, What is it? Third, Concerning its matter. Fourth, Concerning its forms. Fifth, Concerning its order to other sacraments.

DISTINCTIO XXIV

Divisio Textus

DIVISIO: TEXTUS.

Now let us approach the consideration of sacred ordination. Having dealt with personal sacraments, here the Master touches upon the sacraments of the Church, or of the mystical body in common. And first he touches upon Order. Second, upon Matrimony.

However, concerning Order, he determines in two ways. First, indeed, he inquires about order in itself in common, and according to parts. Then he inquires about order from the side of the giver and the recipient. And this begins in distinction XXV, there, A, It is accustomed to be asked, If heretics cut off from the Church, etc.

However, concerning Order in itself, he inquires four things, namely about the individual orders by distinction to the preceding order: and about the individual orders according to their proper acts, there, C, The same of the doorkeepers and janitors. Third, What order is in common, there, K, But it is asked, What is called order here, etc. Fourth, about the names of the offices joined to the ordained having jurisdiction, there, L, There are also certain others, etc.

Through this, the division for the introduction of questions is sufficiently clear.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Sacrament Of Order Follows Well After The Sacrament Of Extreme Unction

Whether the sacrament of Order rightly follows the sacrament of Extreme Unction.

Here arises the question concerning the order of this sacrament.

It seems, however, that before all it ought to be ordered: because
1. The sacrament to which the dispensation of all other sacraments is granted, is before all others.

1. Further, the sacrament placing in a degree of dignity is prior to that which only places in a degree of subjection: but such a sacrament is Order with respect to all others: therefore, before all others, Order ought to be treated.

2. If perhaps you say, that it is for the spiritual multiplication of the Church: and others are personal. On the contrary: Because the material multiplication of the Church is before the spiritual: because no one can become spiritual unless he first is something in nature: but marriage is for natural multiplication, and order for spiritual: therefore marriage is before order: and the Master determines in the contrary way, namely concerning order before marriage.

Response. It must be said that the order of sacraments has been sufficiently treated. To the preceding, however, it was said that in truth personal sacraments are before those which serve the Church commonly: and therefore the five preceding are before the two which remain.

Moreover, Baptism is the gate of the sacraments, without which none can be received: the other personal ones are as dispositions for worthily receiving order: for if one has conducted himself well in the reception of those, he is worthy to be promoted to order.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is not valid: because ministers of the sacraments are not otherwise disposed except through personal sacraments, which are ordained against personal defects: and therefore it is not necessary for those to precede.

To the other, it must be said that this sacrament is more dignified in that it places in a sublime degree: but this order cannot be attended to, because worthiness precedes the degree of the Church. And this, as was said, is not done except through other sacraments.

To the last, it must be said that in the New Testament spiritual fecundity is more attended to than carnal: and therefore the sacrament which gives the office of spiritual propagation is before the sacrament of bodily fecundity, that is, order before marriage.

Articulus 2 — Why This Sacrament Rather Than The Others Is Divided Into Parts

Why is this sacrament divided into parts more than others?

Then it is inquired about what is said there, A, near the beginning: There are seven grades or orders of spiritual offices, etc. Four questions are asked here. The first is, Why is this sacrament divided into parts more than others? The second, By what division is it divided? The third, Whether it is one sacrament or many? The fourth, What is the sufficiency of the orders?

To the first, it is objected thus. 1. A single grace has a single and indivisible sacrament: but order is of a single grace: therefore it is one and indivisible sacrament: therefore it ought not to be divided into parts. The second is proved from this, that there are only seven sacramental graces, just as there are seven sacraments. The first is evident by itself.

1. Furthermore, Two, as often held, are ordained against the defect of the Church, namely marriage and order: but marriage is not divided into parts: therefore neither should order be divided.
2. Furthermore, Division is of no value where some common genus is divided with a species. For example, if it is said: Of substances, one is animal, another is man: but the sacrament taken in common is divided into seven sacraments: therefore if one sacrament is an indivisible species by differences, all other sacraments will be species: but baptism, confirmation, etc., are most specific indivisible species, except by division of matter: therefore also order: therefore order ought not to be divided, except as it is said order of Peter and Martin, and so of others receiving the order.
3. Furthermore, Aristotle in the Tenth Book of Ethics says that the more powerful things are, the more indivisible and smaller in quantity they are: but that sacrament is more powerful which places in a degree of dignity: therefore it is smallest in quantity: therefore it seems that it is most indivisible.
4. Furthermore, United power is more infinite than multiplied, as it is said in the Book of Causes: therefore the more it is united, the more powerful it is: but this sacrament is most powerful: therefore it ought to be most one and united: therefore least divided: therefore not divided into seven, as it is said in the Letter.

On the contrary is what is said in the Letter from the words of Isidore.

Furthermore, by reason thus: 1. The more something is closer to the first, the more it participates in its goodness with many gifts and offices and powers: but order places most closely next to the first head of the Church, namely Christ: therefore according to all that it participates, it can be divided. The first is written by sense in the Book of Causes: because it is correlative to a certain proposition, but the second is evident from the prelation and dignity of ministers having the order.

1. Furthermore, In natures it is so, that those which have the most dignified form, are the greatest in division: therefore it will be so in graces: but order is most dignified: therefore it will be most of division. The first is evident in man, who even in body and soul agrees with what is: because he has the mixture of simple things, and the complexion of mixed things, and the composition of dissimilar things in the body: in the soul, however, there is to live, to sense, to reason, and to understand simply through the possible and agent intellect: therefore the proposition is evident.

Response. It must be said that it was fitting for order to be divided by differences, as the reasons ultimately prove.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that order is of a single ultimate grace, which nevertheless, because of its perfection, requires many preceding, to which inferior orders are given.

To the other, it must be said that it is not similar concerning marriage and order: because spiritual fecundity requires the greatest perfection according to power and grace: and for this, not one, but many are required: but material fecundity is because of the infirmity of the flesh, and is of the imperfect in the Church: and therefore it is the least of grace, nor does it require many into which it is divided.

To the other, it must be said that order, insofar as it divides the sacrament with other species, is not a genus of the sacrament, but a species: because all inferior orders are united and completed in the last, namely in the order of priests, as will be evident below, and by reason of that it is a species dividing the sacrament in common with others.

To the other, it must be said that it is true that such things are least in quantity of motion, as he himself says there, but nevertheless they are of many powers: and therefore if such things are divided by power, they are most divisible: for he speaks of the power of the intellect with respect to other powers joined to bodily organs: and in this way he speaks truly. But it is not valid for the proposition, unless it is inferred from the division of movable quantity, and not from division by powers and virtues.

To the last, it must be said that united power outside the first cannot be unless in which many powers concur: just as it is the ultimate power of the whole power, like a kingdom in urbanities, and to reason or to understand in spiritual natures: and in this way is priesthood in orders. And because in it they are thus united as in the last, it itself can be divided according to them.

But what the Philosopher says, that united power is more potent than multiplied, he understands of multiplicity which is not gathered into one ultimate, as is the multitude of mass. And by this it is evident that it is not for the proposition.

How, however, the powers of orders are gathered into one, will be evident below.

Articulus 3 — According To What Division This Sacrament Of Order Is Divided

By what division is this sacrament of orders divided?

Secondly, it is asked, by what division is it divided?

It seems, indeed, that it is not by the division of genus into species; because 1. In that division, one species is not a disposition to another: but one order disposes to another: therefore, the division of orders is not a division of genus into species.

1. Furthermore, species are disparate forms over diverse matters: but all orders are impressed upon one subject as matter, because one man has all orders: therefore, orders are not species of orders taken in common.
2. Furthermore, the division of the sacrament by the seven sacraments would be none at all, as was held in the preceding article.

If perhaps it is said that it is a division of the whole into parts. On the contrary: 1. Parts do not receive the notion and predication of the whole: but particular orders receive the notion and predication of the whole order in common: therefore, they are not its integral parts, because it is about these that we are dealing here.

1. Furthermore, parts coming together constitute the whole: and before this, neither is the whole, nor is it called as a whole: but order in one and two and three, etc., is called, and is order: therefore, particular orders are not its integral parts.

However, it is evident that the division of the equivocal is not here. If, however, there is some division of accidentals: this seems inconvenient: because then either the inferiors will be accidental to the superiors, or conversely: and both are inconvenient: because they could be absent, so that the following would have the power of execution, and this the Church does not hold, nor admit.

Response. To this, it must be said that this division is of the whole into parts: but the parts differ, just as the whole does. For a certain whole is gathered from parts of quantity according to mass, like a house, and other things corporally composed: others, however, are gathered from parts of quantity according to power and virtue, just as governance is gathered under monarchy from the part of the bailiff, the prefect, the praetor, and the president, and all others, and they are perfected in that: and in this way, the soul is divided by its powers in those which perfect the soul, like order: for order, even according to Grammarians, is reduced to power, because it is a part of power.

Hence, I say that this whole is intermediate between the integral and the universal: because in the mode of constitution or perfection from parts, it is similar to the integral, that is, by the respect of parts to the whole: but by the respect of the whole to the parts, it has similarity with the universal whole, which is predicated of each part: but it falls short of both in some respect: of the universal indeed, because although it is predicated of all, yet according to the perfect notion of its power, it is not predicated except of the ultimate: and of all others, it is predicated not according to the perfect notion, but as something of the ultimate power of the part is participated: because in every potestative whole, the potestative part of the antecedent is always in the subsequent. Hence Boethius says that whatever the inferior can do, the superior can also do, and it is not converted: and Dionysius, that the superiors have the power of the inferiors excellently and eminently, but it is not converted. However, it falls short of the integral whole: because the essence of the whole is present to each part, and for this reason also the notion is present, although according to imperfect and perfect power, as was said before.

And through this, the solution to the whole is clear: because I think the first reasons must be conceded: because it is not a division of genus into its species. However, the second do not proceed except from the integral whole corporally composed according to mass from its parts.

Articulus 4 — Whether This Sacrament Is One Or Several

Whether this sacrament is one or many?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether this sacrament is one or many?

It seems, however, that it is many: because
1. The multiplication of the inferior also multiplies its superior, whence many men are many animals: but it is evident that there are many orders, as it is said in the Text: therefore it seems that there are many sacraments.

1. Furthermore, Whenever powers are divided by diverse acts not reducible to one notion of object, they differ in species, and are many: but such are the powers of orders: therefore they are many simply: therefore there are many sacraments, as before. The first is proved: because every power is defined by its act: because acts precede power according to reason, as the Philosopher says. The second is proved by introducing the acts of individual orders: just as to exorcise demons is not an act of the same notion as to read prophecies: and neither of those is the closing of doors, and none of these is the same as the carrying of candles, and the like: therefore the proposition is clear.
2. Furthermore, The following order is entirely obtained without the preceding being received: therefore it is entirely divided from it: therefore the sacrament is divided: therefore there are many sacraments. The first is proved: because one making a leap never again receives the subsequent order, but always has it, although lacking the execution which is rather of jurisdiction than of order: and thus the proposition is evident.

On the contrary of this is that
1. The Church numbers only seven sacraments: and one of those it says is order: therefore order is only one sacrament.

1. Furthermore, All preceding are united in the last, as previously was evident in the whole of power: therefore all are one in that: therefore all are only one sacrament.

Response. It must be said that Order is simply one sacrament, but in some respect many. For according to imperfect powers it is many, but according to the perfection of power it is only one: and the reason for this is sufficiently clear from what has been previously stated.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that if the division of the inferior were by things perfectly separating from each other, then what was said would be required: but they are not separated, but rather one is a disposition to the other: and therefore they are ordered among themselves. Perfectly separating things, however, are two, namely opposite specific differences which formally separate into diverse species by deduction: and separate matter, namely which separates individuals of one species. And neither of these is in the division of the whole power, as has already been evident.

To the other, it must be said that all acts of orders are reduced and refer to one ultimate: whence the middle is false.

To that by which it proves it, it must be said that doors are not objects to doorkeepers simply, but as the place of conservation of the Eucharist is closed by them. Similarly, the exorcist does not exorcise demons simply, but as they impede the perception of the sacraments. And similarly, the acts of readers and candle-bearers, as will be evident below, refer to the communion of the Eucharist: and the common reason is in some way regarded in their objects: and therefore the objects are not entirely divided.

To the last, it must be said that the following order is divided by the division of part from the preceding, and therefore it is not again received: but by the division of the perfect it is not itself divided, but rather it is thus ordered to the preceding, as having all that is of the preceding: and it is ordered to the following, as in which its power is completed and perfected: and therefore it does not follow that the sacrament is simply many, but simply one, and in some respect many.

Articulus 5 — What The Sufficiency Of The Orders Is

What is the sufficiency of the orders?

Fourthly, it is asked, What is the sufficiency of the orders?

It seems, indeed, that there are more orders: because
1. the human hierarchy descends from the celestial: but in the celestial there are nine orders: therefore also in the human.

1. Furthermore, the more things are inferior and more material, the more they are of a broader division, as is evident in descending from the most general to individuals in categories, and from the first mover to the entire diversity of natural things in the natures of things. It is evident, however, that the ecclesiastical hierarchy is inferior and more material than the angelic: therefore it is of a broader division than that, or at least it ought to be as great: therefore at least nine orders ought to exist.
2. However, it seems that there ought to be eight: because of two acts not reducible to each other concerning the sacrament, there are two powers: but to consecrate the body of Christ, and to bind and loose, are acts of this kind: therefore they require two powers: and power makes a special order: therefore there are two sacraments for those two acts: therefore in the whole there are eight sacraments.

3. However, it seems that there ought to be only three: because in the primitive Church, as is evident in the hierarchy of Dionysius, there were only three, namely ministers, priests, and bishops: therefore it also seems that now there ought to be only three.

4. Furthermore, it does not seem that more are required: because if for the sake of reverence, as it is said, of the sacrament, lower orders are required, it is evident that they are required only for ministering: however, the entire ministry of offerings on the altar (as will be evident below) belongs to the order of deacons: therefore it seems that that alone, besides the priesthood, is required.

Concerning tonsure and psalmists and others of this kind, objections will be placed in their proper places below.

Response. It must be said to this question that there are only seven orders.

§ 1. ...names, as the Master says; and there are other names not of orders, but of offices; and some are preparations for orders. Now, although the sufficiency [of orders] can be understood in many ways, it can nevertheless be assigned from this, namely, by saying that only the order which is called the presbyterate is the perfect order. It has one principal act, namely, to confect the body and blood of the Lord; and another secondary act, which is given for preparing the people so that they may fittingly communicate in the body and blood of Christ, and this act is to bind and to loose. All other orders, however, subminister to it in one of these acts.

§ 2. Let it therefore be stated thus: order, which is a spiritual power, is given either over the true body of Christ, or over the mystical body of Christ. If over the true body of Christ: it is either in the principal act, or in an act ordered to minister to the principal act. If in the principal act: then it is the priesthood or presbyterate in its principal act. But if in an act ordered to minister to the principal act: then it will be over the hosts from which the true body of Christ is confected. Now, these [hosts] have two relations: one to the people offering them in the temple, the other to the priest consecrating them by sacred prayer. If over the hosts in relation to the people offering them in the temple, it is the subdeacon who receives the hosts from the people, as Isidore says, and places them in the presbytery. But over the hosts in relation to the priest, the deacon receives power: as Isidore says, it belongs to the deacon to place upon the altar the hosts received from the subdeacon in the presbytery, and to arrange them so that the priest may consecrate them for himself. But if the order is over the mystical body of Christ: it is either in a principal act, or in a secondary act ministering to it. If in the principal act: then again it is the order of the presbyterate in the act which is over the mystical body of Christ, preparing it so that it may worthily receive the true body of Christ. But if by ministering concerning it: it ministers either by removing from evil, or in relation to the good.

§ 3. If by removing from evil: either from an external evil, or from an internal evil. If from an external evil: then it is the order of porters, whose office is to exclude the unworthy and vile things, lest they violate the place of the communion of the faithful. But if from an internal evil: then it is the order of exorcists, whose office is to ward off the power of the demon in the fomes [tinder of sin], lest it impede the reception of the sacraments. But if it ministers in relation to the good: it is either on the part of the intellect, or on the part of the affection. If on the part of the intellect: then it is the order of lectors, whose role is to read distinctly and openly for understanding, as Isidore says. But if in relation to the affection: it is the order of acolytes [candle-bearers], whose role is to drive away the darkness of sin through fiery speech, so that the affection may grow warm and be inflamed.

§ 4. To the first objection, therefore, the solution is clear: because the orders of the celestial hierarchy are multiplied according to conversion towards God, towards the Angel, and towards man; but the hierarchy of the Church according to conversion over men only. And therefore the celestial, which is according to a threefold conversion, is of a broader division than the Ecclesiastical.

§ 5. To the argument, it must be said that it does not follow: because although the latter descends from the former, it nevertheless cannot imitate it in its entirety. Therefore it descends from it particularly, namely through conversion to man only. And it differs from it because the offices of an Angel toward man are one thing, and the offices of man are another. But it imitates it in this: that it reduces the purged, illumined, and perfected inferiors unto God, just as the celestial [hierarchy] does.

§ 6. To the next, it must be said that the proposition is doubtful: for Dionysius seems to say the opposite; he says that if these material things consist in such great multitude, then it must be believed all the more that the superior things are in a maximum multitude. If, however, it is conceded: then a twofold descent from the one must be distinguished. For one is in a mutable number through motion and governance, and then it is true what he objects. The other mode is the procession from the One into participation in the glory of the First, and it is in this way that Dionysius speaks; and he says that the inferior things are far more numerous than the superior things, because it would not befitting to divine generosity to display the beatitude of His presence to merely a few. And since order concerns the differences of that glory, it is evident that according to this, it must be of a greater division than the order in the Church, which belongs to grace alone.

§ 8. To the next, it must be said that those acts cannot be divided from a single power, because the true body of Christ is not consecrated except on account of the mystical body; and to unite the true body with the mystical subject is not of an inferior power than to consecrate it for the mystical body.

§ 9. And to the objection it must be said that to bind and to loose absolutely are not the acts of priests, but rather to conjoin to the sacraments by binding and loosing, as was determined above in the question concerning the keys. Thus it is clear that those acts are conjoined and ordered to the same thing.

§ 10. To the next, it must be said that in the primitive Church there are not said to have been orders, except those that are simply orders and sacraments. And that which we now call orders, and which in truth are orders, they called offices.

§ 11. To the next, it must be said that although there is nothing but ministry in the secondary orders, nevertheless the ministry is manifold, as was clear earlier in the division and sufficiency of the orders.

Articulus 6 — Whether There Are Seven Orders On Account Of Sevenfold Grace

Are there seven orders on account of the sevenfold grace?

§ 12. Next it is inquired concerning what he says there, at A, around the middle: But there are seven on account of the sevenfold grace, etc.

§ 13. For this seems to be false, because: 1. The seven grades of order cannot be adapted to the seven gifts: therefore the number of orders is not taken according to the number of gifts.

§ 14. 2. Further, once the gifts of the Holy Spirit are possessed, then first the first order is to be received: therefore all the gifts are pre-required before the reception of an order; therefore the number of orders is not taken according to the number of gifts.

§ 15. I think this should be conceded here: but what he says, he intends only on account of the suitability of the recipient. Nevertheless, there are some who say that to porters is attributed fear, which is the principle of wisdom, or the door; to exorcists, knowledge, which teaches how to avoid evil ones, just as exorcists expel demons; to lectors, piety, through the fact that they illuminate according to the intellect those marked with the image of God; to acolytes, the spirit of fortitude, who expel the darkness of the air through the fortitude of fiery speech and example; to subdeacons, the spirit of counsel on account of the excellence of their life, because they fulfill counsels through chastity; and to deacons, the spirit of understanding, because they penetrate interior things, which is signified by the fact that they stand immediately at the altar next to the priest; and to priests, the spirit of wisdom on account of the savor of eternal things, because the soul of priests is inebriated with richness in the confection of the body of Christ. But nevertheless, because this exposition is strained, the first view is more pleasing. But if anyone wishes to say it thus, he will be able to answer that they are adapted in the aforesaid manner.

§ 16. To the next it must be said that they are not so adapted that by receiving one order one gift is received, or conversely; but rather, because the acts of the orders have some congruence with the acts of the gifts, as was clear before.

Articulus 7 — What Things Are Required For This, That Someone May Be Able To Receive Orders

What things are required so that someone may receive orders?

§ 17. Next it is inquired concerning what he says there, at B: But such clerics are to be elected to spiritual ministry, etc.

§ 18. Here is a useful question concerning the suitability of those to be promoted to orders. And concerning this let us ask six things summarily. First, What things are summarily required for someone to be suitable? Second, What knowledge suffices for him who is to be promoted? Third, What life [character]? Fourth, How much does one sin who promotes an unsuitable candidate: whether mortally, or venially, or if he is excused by some necessity? Fifth, Whether one who is unworthily promoted sins mortally in every act of his order, or not? Sixth and lastly, How a remedy can be had for that sin, whether through dispensation or in another way?

§ 19. To the first of these it is objected: 1. Through the words of the Apostle, 1 Tim. 3:2 ff.: It behooves a bishop to be blameless, the husband of one wife, sober, prudent, adorned, which the Apostle enumerates there. [642]

§ 20. If perhaps you say that these things are required for a Bishop, but not for anyone ministering in the orders. On the contrary: In the same place he adds, v. 8: Deacons in like manner chaste, etc. Now it is established that in the primitive Church there were no orders except of deacons, who are called ministering, and of priests, who attended to the greater things: therefore it seems that all the ordained are bound to this at least.

§ 21. 2. Further, in another decree nine things are enumerated, namely that he has not been a public penitent, not a curial [state official], not a slave, not physically impaired, not born of a priest or otherwise illegitimate, not baptized as an adult in sickness, not a foreigner or unknown, not of minor age, not infamous: therefore it seems that they are bound to all these things.

§ 23. 3. Further, all that is there in the priest is reduced to four things, two of which are on the part of him who receives the order, and two are expedient for the act. The two on the part of the one to be ordained seem to be regularity [absence of canonical impediment] and legitimate age. But the two expedient for the act are knowledge and life [character]. Therefore it seems that these are summarily the things to which they are bound.

§ 24. On the contrary to this, it is objected that: 1. We see depraved men promoted to some orders, concerning whose knowledge and morals there is no certainty; and we see this done both by religious and by others, and they are not said to sin mortally. Therefore it seems that not universally are those to be ordained bound to these things.

§ 25. If perhaps you say that by receiving orders he can be prepared for these things, so that he may thus minister fittingly, and is not bound to have these before the reception of the order. On the contrary: No form is impressed in a subject that is merely being prepared, but rather in one already prepared; therefore, since the things of grace are more ordered than the things of nature, the form and character of order also ought not to be impressed except upon one already prepared, and not upon one to be prepared. Therefore the proposed solution is null.

§ 26. 2. Further, if someone were to see the form of a man in a stone with a wholly hollowed and unorganized body, he would judge it a monster: because it is contrary to nature for the form of anything to be in a subject unless it is first prepared for it; therefore this will be much more strongly monstrous in morals. Therefore, if the order is impressed upon someone not suitably disposed but merely to be disposed, it will be monstrous and against nature; therefore this solution is null.

§ 27. Response. To this it must be said that order has parts, as was said above; and by reason of the ultimate order, the one to be ordained is bound to certain things of necessity, and to certain things for fittingness [de bene esse]. Of necessity, it seems to me that he is bound to the four things introduced above, unless perhaps concerning age a dispensation is sometimes made for a reasonable cause; and then it is required that a reasonable age be possessed.

§ 28. But if it is asked, which are the things to which they are bound by necessity, and which are those to which they are bound from honesty and fittingness? It must be said that there are some things without which there is no life of virtue, such as sobriety, prudence, and the like; and some things without which he cannot execute the act of his office, such as knowledge, and the age in which physiological temperament settles, because boys cannot execute their acts wisely: and to these he is bound of necessity. But there are some things which adorn a man: and if they are lacking, the life is not on that account vicious, nor is the office frustrated of its act, such as that which the Apostle calls adorned, that is, composed in morals and exterior decency; and to such things they are bound from honesty and fittingness.

§ 29. As to what is asked, Whether order wishes to find these things in the subject, or whether by receiving orders he ought also to dispose himself in them?

§ 30. It must be said that, as far as the congruence of reason goes, every order wishes to find these things in the subject; but of necessity the ultimate order, which is the priesthood, wishes to find those things which are required for its office: for knowledge is required less in a monk, and more in him who has the care [of souls].

§ 31. To the two objections which are to the contrary, it must be said that the preceding orders are like certain dispositions to the ultimate order; and therefore it is not a monstrosity if the former are received before some of these things; but if they were ultimate perfections, then without doubt the objections would hold.

Articulus 8 — What Knowledge Is Required For The Promotion Of Orders

What knowledge is required for the promotion to orders?

What knowledge is required for the promotion to orders?

§ 32. Second, it is inquired: What knowledge is required for the promotion to orders?

§ 33. It seems that [the knowledge] of Sacred Scripture [is required]. 1. In the Decretals, 38, dist. 1, a chapter says: "Ignorance, the mother of all errors, is chiefly to be avoided in the priests of God, who have undertaken the office of teaching among the people." [643] But it is established that they have not undertaken the office of teaching except the sacraments. Therefore they are bound to know Sacred Scripture.

642. 1 Timothy 3:2.

§ 34. 2. Further, Cap. 1, Omnes psallentes, etc., it is said thus: "The substance of our high priesthood are the divinely handed down oracles, that is, the true discipline of the divine Scriptures." [644] And from this follows the same as before.

§ 35. 3. Further, in the fourth distinction Isidore says: "Just as the worthy conjunction of a man and a woman makes one marriage, and just as the copulation of two perfects one body: so the clerical state and the priesthood make one presbyter." [645] And he calls the clerical state clerical knowledge.

§ 36. 4. Further, Gregory in the Pastoral Care: "No art is presumed to be taught unless it is first learned by intent meditation. By ignorant pastors, therefore, the pastoral magisterium is undertaken in great temerity, since the governance of souls is the art of arts." [646]

§ 37. 5. Further, in the same place: "Who, however, would not know that the wounds of thoughts are more hidden than the wounds of the viscera? And yet often those who have in no way known spiritual precepts do not fear to profess themselves physicians of the heart, whereas those who do not know the power of drugs would blush to appear as physicians of the flesh." [647]

§ 38. 6. Also, Deut. 23:1: "An eunuch shall not enter the Church of the Lord." The Gloss says there: "He who does not have the seed of the word of God cannot beget good works: or he ought not to enter, that is, receive a place of governance." [648]

§ 39. 7. Also, Isidore: "Let him cease to receive a place of teaching who does not know how to teach. The ignorance of prelates, indeed, does not befit the life of subjects: for if the blind lead the blind, both fall into the pit." [649]

§ 40. 8. Also, it is commanded by the Lord that doctrine and truth be written on the breast of the priest; and in the Gloss: "Let the priest remember that he was consecrated by the received priesthood for studying doctrine and inquiring after truth, not for caring about and ruminating over secular affairs." [650]

§ 41. 9. Also, 1 Pet. 3:15: "Be always prepared to give an answer to everyone who asks you for a reason concerning the hope that is in you." [651] But this cannot be done except through the knowledge of Sacred Scripture: therefore, etc.

§ 42. 10. Also, Mal. 2:7: "The lips of the priest shall guard knowledge, and they shall seek the law from his mouth, because he is the Angel of the Lord of hosts." [652]

§ 43. 11. Also, Hosea 4:6: "Because you have rejected knowledge, I will reject you, so that you shall not exercise the priesthood for me." [653]

§ 44. 12. Also, the Apostle to Titus, 1:9: "Embracing that faithful word which is according to doctrine, that he may be able to exhort in sound doctrine and to refute those who contradict."

643. Decretum Gratiani, Pars I, dist. 38, c. 1.

654 From this authority it is held that he is bound to know even excellently, so that he can refute heretics.

§ 45. 13. Also, 1 Tim. 4:13: "Attend to reading, to exhortation, and to doctrine." 655

§ 46. 14. If perhaps you say that these authorities are for the purpose of instilling terror, it is objected by reason thus: No one presumes an act, not having the habit for it. The act of the priesthood is a certain act. Therefore no one except perversely presumes it, not having the habit. But it was held above that knowledge and the key have one act:

therefore one not having knowledge does not presume the act of the key except perversely, and therefore neither the act of the priesthood.

§ 48. 15. Further, an operation is perverse which is not rectified by a governing habit; but to govern the people is the operation of a priest. Therefore it will be perverse unless he has a governing habit; but this habit can be nothing other than the knowledge of Sacred Scripture. Therefore priests are bound to the knowledge of Sacred Scripture.

§ 49. On the contrary to this, is that we see in many lands priests who are entirely ignorant and do not understand the things they read: and yet they are not condemned, but are tolerated by the Church. Since therefore the Church does not err, it seems that priests are not bound to have knowledge.

§ 50. Response. It seems to me that a distinction must be made among those to be ordained: for some receive orders out of devotion alone, such as monks and other religious; but some others receive orders so that they may minister to the people by dispensing words and sacraments, such as certain religious and those who are titled to the care of souls. Concerning the first, I think a further distinction is to be made: for either they have the care of souls in their orders, like abbots and confessors appointed by abbots, or they do not have it and will not have it. If they have it, the same judgment seems to apply to them as to others who have the care. But if they do not have it, and receive the order for the sake of devotion, it seems to me that they are bound only to know the pronunciations of the Psalms and the distinctions of the readings, which are learned from the knowledge of grammar. If, however, they accept the office of teaching from a benefice, as titled clerics, or from profession, as certain religious: it seems it must be said that they are bound to know more, and I believe those things to be what must be expounded in general to the people regarding faith and morals, which are called the rudiments of the Christian faith; and so that in other cases they may determine issues and questions according to the counsel of superiors.

§ 51. Hence I understand the authorities introduced above concerning those ordained in this way, and with regard to this kind of knowledge of discerning, namely, what is venial and what is mortal in common matters, and which articles are solemnized by the Church, and other such things. And to other things, in my judgment, they are not bound, because theological matters cannot be proven except through the constancy of martyrdom. In perplexing questions, however, he is bound to be so discreet that he knows such things to be difficult, and that one must not proceed in them without the counsel of superiors or the authority of the canons: and these things I think suffice for the reckoning of him who asks a reason concerning the faith and hope that is in us.

§ 52. As to the reasons introduced, it must be said that the act will not be perverse when presumed with such an extent of habit; but this much suffices for governance in my judgment, unless perhaps he is in a higher grade; because a superior is bound to greater things, as an Archbishop or a Bishop, as will be clear below when treating of Bishops.

§ 53. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 9 — What Life Is Required For This, That Someone Be Suitable

What life [character] is required for someone to be suitable?

§ 54. Third it is inquired: What life is required?

§ 55. It seems, however, that it is that which is known according to reputation, and good according to virtue: and this is shown

§ 56. 1. Through many authorities of the saints, some of which we will touch upon, and others we will omit to avoid prolixity.

§ 57. 2. Jerome in a certain epistle: "A Bishop is commanded to be without crime: let him be without any crime not only for that time when he is to be ordained, but from that time when he was reborn through Christ, let him be bitten by no conscience of sin." [656] Therefore it seems this is also proportionally true of a priest.

§ 58. 3. Gregory in the Pastoral Care: "Let each man measure himself skillfully, lest the place of governance" [657] And from this it is argued as before.

§ 59. "...he dare assume, if a vice still damnably reigns in him: for those whom their own faults still blacken are not able to wash away the faults of others." [658]

§ 60. 4. Further, Lev. 21:17 and 18: "A man of your seed throughout their families, namely of Aaron, who has a blemish, shall not offer bread to his God, nor shall he approach to His ministry." [659] The Gloss there says that by blemish is understood vice. Therefore it seems that one having a vice cannot perform the office of a priest even in the sole celebration of the Mass.

§ 61. 5. Also, Isidore: "He who does not live as he teaches makes the very truth which he preaches contemptible: as the Psalmist, Ps. 49:16, says: But to the sinner God has said: Why do you declare my justices? etc." [660] Therefore much less can a sinner hold the office of declaring.

§ 62. 6. Also, Ecclus. 15:9: "Praise is not beautiful in the mouth of a sinner." [661] Also, Isidore: "An Ecclesiastical Doctor ought to shine as much in doctrine as in life: for doctrine without life renders one arrogant, and life without doctrine renders one useless."

645. Isidore of Seville, cited in Decretum Gratiani.

§ 63. 7. Further, Gregory: "He who preaches contempt for temporal things must necessarily first contemn them himself: for preaching is brought forth usefully when it is efficaciously fulfilled."

§ 64. 8. Also, Gregory: "To him who is ignorant of the law, let your tongue be a book, and in your work let him look upon what he should imitate."

§ 65. 9. Also, Augustine: "An innocent conversation without speech harms by its silence as much as it profits by its example."

§ 66. 10. Furthermore, it seems that a cleric is bound to have even an excellent [life]. Hence Isidore: "He ought not to undertake the leadership of honor who does not know how to precede his subjects on the path of a better life."

§ 67. 11. Also, Gregory: "The action of a prelate ought to transcend the action of the people as much as the life of a shepherd is accustomed to be distant from the flock: for he who is required by the necessity of his place to teach the highest things is compelled by this same necessity to demonstrate the highest things."

§ 68. 12. Also, Jerome in the Decree, cause 8, q. 1: "For what sort of edification will there be for the disciple, if he understands himself to be greater than the master? Hence not only Bishops and priests and deacons ought to greatly foresee that they precede all the people over whom they preside in conversation and speech: but also the inferior grades, exorcists, lectors, keepers of the buildings, acolytes, and absolutely all who serve the house of God: because it vehemently destroys the Church of God that laymen are better than clerics." [662]

§ 69. 13. Infinite other things in agreement with these are found. Hence it is also to be proven by reason: In every thing the exemplar must be more direct than the exemplified. But the cleric is the exemplar for the layman: therefore he must be more direct than the layman.

§ 70. 14. Further, to one approaching holy things more closely, greater holiness is imposed: because they must be cleansed who bear the vessels of the Lord [663]; but a cleric approaches more closely than a layman: therefore it seems that he is bound to a greater perfection of virtue.

§ 71. 15. Further, every teacher must necessarily have an appropriate instrument of proof: but a cleric cannot prove what he teaches except through the excellence of his work, as the Saints say: therefore it seems that he is bound to excellence of work.

§ 72. To the contrary of this seems to be what the Lord says, Matt. 23:3: "All things whatsoever they say to you, observe and do: but according to their works do not do: for they say and do not." [664]

§ 73. Response. To no one of sound mind is it a doubt, as was proven first, that a cleric, as long as he ministers in the house of God, is bound to greater perfection than a layman, and especially if he undertakes pastoral care.

§ 74. Therefore, to what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the Lord says this so that power may be recognized even in the wicked: for such ones have power to the augmentation of their own damnation.

646. Gregory the Great, Regula Pastoralis, Lib. 1, c. 1.

Articulus 10 — How Great A Sin One Who Promotes One Not Suitable Commits, And Whether He Can Be Excused By Some Necessity

How great a sin does one commit who promotes an unsuitable candidate? And, can he be excused by any necessity?

§ 76. Fourth it is inquired: How much does one sin who promotes an unsuitable candidate, or if he is excused by some necessity, as they commonly say?

§ 77. It seems, moreover, that [he sins] mortally. 1. Ezekiel 44:7: "You bring in aliens uncircumcised in heart, and uncircumcised in flesh, to be in my sanctuary," etc. [665] And there He reproaches the priests of the Old Testament. Therefore much more is this damnable for the prelates of the New Testament.

§ 78. 2. Further, it is a lesser sin not to correct an unsuitable person when he is promoted, than to promote an unsuitable person. But Eli, because he did not correct [his sons], was expelled from the priesthood along with his kindred, and Israel was led to the sword and captivity, and the ark was captured, and his sons were slain, and he himself died, as is contained in 1 Sam. 2, 3, and 4 passim. [666] Therefore much more most damnable is he who promotes an unsuitable candidate.

§ 79. 3. Further, this is said in the Littera [Sentences], that "an unsuitable person brings a heavy burden upon the one ordaining": but a heavy burden is nothing other than the burden of eternal damnation. Therefore he sins mortally who knowingly promotes an unsuitable candidate; therefore much more he who gives him a benefice, especially one having the care of souls.

§ 80. 4. Further, putting the temporal goods of the Church at risk is a mortal sin; therefore much more he who puts souls at risk. But by promoting an unsuitable [wait, it should say inidoneum, reading context: promoting an unsuitable] candidate, he puts souls at risk; therefore he sins mortally.

§ 81. Furthermore it is inquired here: Can he be excused?

§ 82. And three causes are posited which they present for their excuse. First, because the Church is honored by him on account of his nobility. Second, because another equally useful to the Church in temporal matters is not easily found. Third, because it is better to have some than none.

§ 83. But against all these three causes it is objected thus: 1. Nothing concerning the truth of life is to be omitted for any cause. But to promote a suitable candidate belongs to the truth of life; therefore it is in no way to be omitted.

§ 84. 2. Further, Rom. 3:8: "And let us not do evil that good may come: whose damnation is just." [667] Therefore much more strongly evils must not be done lest evils come; but to promote the unsuitable is an evil. Therefore it is not to be done in any way.

§ 85. Response. It must be said to this, that there is no doubt that every one who knowingly promotes an unworthy candidate to sacred orders, or to pastoral care, or to any ecclesiastical benefice, sins mortally. Now a candidate is unworthy in two ways, namely contrarily, and privatively. Contrarily unworthy is he who has what is contrary to dignity: and he is in no way to be promoted. But privatively unworthy is he who is deprived of dignity, yet without having the contrary: and in such cases, on account of the necessity of some Churches which lack literate men and defenders, a dispensation could be made so that they might have something from the Church until they learned. But I think that the care [of souls] or a prebend cannot be conferred upon them without sin: rather, expenses for them could be made from the Church or from the benefice of the Church which in the meantime is committed to another.

§ 86. To that which is objected against the causes, it must be said that the one concerning the nobility of his lineage, so that an evil person could be promoted on account of this, is ridiculous: because the more noble he is, the more harmful he is if he is evil. Nor do I think this suffices, that he is not evil; but I think it is necessary to know that he is good by such knowledge as it is possible to have of a man.

§ 88. But what is said, that another would not be as useful, is nothing at all: because every temporal utility must be subordinated to spiritual utility.

§ 89. The third is completely null: because in the Littera it is said that it is better to have a few good men, than many bad ones.

§ 90. Furthermore, what is conferred upon bad men makes you bad: because they know that such men hold a place in the Church and good men are expelled; and therefore they become bad, so that they may be promoted more quickly.

Articulus 11 — Whether One Promoted Unworthily Sins Mortally In Any Act Of His Office

Whether one unworthily promoted sins mortally in every act of his office?

§ 91. Fifth it is inquired: Whether an unsuitable person promoted sins mortally in every act of his order and office?

§ 92. It seems, moreover, that he does: because 1. On account of the holiness of the order he sins mortally by first approaching it; but the same holiness always remains in the order. Therefore if he is unsuitable, he will always sin equally by executing the order. But in every act of the order he executes the order. Therefore in every act of the order he sins mortally.

648. Deuteronomy 23:1, with Glossa Ordinaria.

§ 93. 2. Further, the reception of the order is for the sake of its execution: therefore the execution is greater. But in receiving it, he sinned mortally at least on account of his unsuitability. Therefore also in executing it, he will sin more mortally for the same reason.

§ 94. 3. Further, 2 Sam. 6:6 ff., Uzzah was struck down, as Dionysius says, because he unworthily communicated with holy things. Now, the striking down signifies mortal sin which kills the soul. Since therefore the things of the New Testament are holier than those of the Old, everyone who unworthily administers an order or ecclesiastical office will sin mortally. But administration in any act of the order is an ecclesiastical office. Therefore in every act of his order and office he will sin mortally. [668]

§ 95. To the contrary of this is that: 1. This would be a grave judgment to make.

§ 96. 2. Further, because one vowing virginity with a simple [non-solemn] vow sins mortally by contracting marriage, yet not afterwards by rendering the debt. Therefore, by similar reasoning, one receiving an order or ecclesiastical office unworthily will sin mortally, but not afterwards when administering.

§ 97. 3. Further, if he sinned mortally in every act, he would seem to be perplexed: because from his office and order he is bound to administer, therefore he sins mortally by omitting it.

§ 98. Also, from his unworthiness he is bound to resign lest he minister; therefore he will sin mortally by ministering. Therefore whatever he does, he will sin mortally; therefore he is perplexed.

§ 99. Response. It seems to me that he sins mortally as often as he knowingly and without necessity administers an order or office in any act while he is unworthy, as the first part of this disputation proves. I say without necessity, which is twofold only: for if the body of the Lord or something of the sacred things were to fall, and there were no other to lift it up, he could then with humility of heart and with fear and reverence lift it up. Also, if someone were led to sin by his example, he could ask him with sorrow not to take an example from him, as we said above in the question concerning fraternal correction. In all other cases he sins mortally by administering holy things unworthily.

§ 100. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that broad is the way that leads to hell, and many there are who go by it, as is contained in Matthew 7:13.

§ 102. To the next it must be said that it is not similar, since in a contracted marriage the vow does not remain, but is broken; and therefore it does not make every subsequent act illicit. But with the administration, the unworthiness remains, and therefore every act is rendered illicit.

§ 103. To the next it must be said that he is not perplexed [caught in an unavoidable dilemma of sinning]: because let him yield his office, and not administer, and he will be freed; or if he prefers, let him amend his sin, and administer worthily: and again he is freed from perplexity.

649. Isidore of Seville, De ecclesiasticis officiis.

Articulus 14 — Whether Tonsure Was Prefigured In The Old Law In The Nazirites

Whether the tonsure was figured in the Old Law in the Nazarites?

Whether the tonsure was figured in the Old Law in the Nazarites?

§ 11. Next, inquiry is made concerning what he says, there, B, around the middle: But the use of the Ecclesiastical tonsure, etc.

§ 12. For it seems to be false: because 1. Whatever pertains to the sacrament of Order in the New Testament was signified in the priesthood and priests of the Old Testament: but the Nazarites were not necessarily of the priests: therefore it seems that the Ecclesiastical tonsure was not signified in them.

§ 13. 2. Furthermore, the Nazarites offered (otherwise, shaved) their hair at the end of their vow, as is held in Numbers 6:18 but clerics offer their hair at the beginning of their religious life: therefore it seems that there is no agreement: therefore no sign.

§ 14. 3. Further, it seems that order in the Old Testament could not have a corresponding sign: for it was held above that sacraments of excellent effect had nothing corresponding as a figure in the Old Testament: but order places one in a most excellent state through its office: therefore it seems that it could have had nothing corresponding in the Old Testament.

§ 15. Response. It must be said to this, that those things that belong to the New Testament, because of their perfection, could not be signified in only one single type of the Old Testament, but were signified in many according to diverse aspects. And so also the priesthood as to the tonsure is signified in the Nazarites, and as to the power of offering in the priesthood, and as to the power of binding and loosing in the power of judging between leprosy and non-leprosy, and the cleanness and uncleanness of the priests. And through this the solution to the first is evident.

§ 16. To the next it must be said that although there is no agreement in time, nevertheless there is an agreement of fact to fact: because hair formerly nourished is offered to the Lord both here and there. And the Author intends this in the Letter: for allegory is taken in many ways, as Gregory says.

§ 17. To what is further inquired, it must be said that this is not to be understood of the excellence of power, but of the excellence of grace, as was said in confirmation, and extreme unction as to the immediate flying away [to heaven], which could not be done there: but the perfect power of the ministers could well be signified there.

650. Cf. Exodus 28:30, with Glossa Ordinaria.

Articulus 15 — Whether Clerics Have A Right Of Inheritance Among Their Relatives Or Not

Whether clerics have the right of inheritance among their parents or not?

§ 18. Next, inquiry is made concerning what he says, there, B, a little before the end: Because they are of the lot of the Lord, or because they have God as their portion, etc.

§ 19. For from this it is argued that clerics do not have the right of inheritance among their parents.

§ 20. This also seems to be so by other reasons: 1. For it is said in Matthew 5:20: Unless your justice abounds more than that of the Scribes and Pharisees, you shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. But the Levites and Scribes and Pharisees in the Old Testament did not have an inheritance: therefore neither ought they to have one in the New. Now that the Levites did not have an inheritance is evident in Numbers 18:20, 23, and 24, where this is said many times: The sons of Levi shall not have an inheritance in the midst of their brethren: for I am their inheritance.

§ 21. 2. Furthermore, in the tonsure they are commanded by the Bishop to say with their own mouth: The Lord is the portion of my inheritance and of my cup, etc. therefore with their own mouth they seem to resign earthly inheritance: therefore from now on they have no right in it.

§ 22. 3. Furthermore, he who has earthly things necessarily has to think of earthly things: but a cleric is shaved for this reason, as is said in the Letter, because he ought to think of nothing except heavenly things: therefore he ought to have nothing earthly: therefore neither does he have a right in an earthly inheritance.

§ 23. 4. Furthermore, earthly possessions are possessed by the right of Emperors, as the laws say, and as Augustine confirms: but a cleric ought to have no respect concerning Emperors or Kings: therefore it seems that he ought to possess nothing earthly.

§ 24. To the contrary of this is what is said, 1. Jeremiah 32:7: Possess for yourself my field which is in Anathoth, in the land of Benjamin, because the inheritance belongs to you, and you are the near kinsman to possess it. For Hanameel said this to Jeremiah: who nevertheless was a priest: therefore inheritance belonged to priests.

§ 25. 2. Furthermore, Leviticus 25:32: The houses of the Levites which are in the cities can always be redeemed. Therefore the Levites had the right of redeeming an inheritance, even more than others: since therefore the priests of the New Testament are not less worthy, they can have the right of receiving their inheritance.

§ 26. Response. There is no doubt that clerics have a right in their inheritance, which is a patrimony: for it seems otherwise in the case of certain fiefs: for some fiefs are exhibited to someone for an annual price with homage: and some are owed for the stipends of military service. Therefore it seems that they can have a patrimony. And I know that in many places they also have fiefs, and they exhibit a price: and by price or entreaties they induce someone else equivalent to themselves in temporal matters, and equally worthy, who does homage in their place: but those fiefs that are, as it were, for the stipends of soldiers, it seems to me, cannot be had without injury to the Lord of the fief.

§ 27. To the first, therefore, it must be said that the Levites had the right to receive the inheritance of their parents in the Old Testament: but they did not have the right to divide the land equally with the other tribes. And the Lord commanded this for this reason: because if they had had one portion equally like the other tribes, then they would have dwelt in one place, and would not have been dispersed through the people to teach everyone: and this would not have been fitting for their office.

§ 28. To the next it must be said that in the tonsure he does not renounce anything except the solicitude of inheritance that draws him back from the clerical office: for a layman is not bound to this: and thus is understood what he says with his own mouth before the Bishop.

§ 29. To the next it must be said that they can well think of earthly things in relation to heavenly things: because this is meritorious. Likewise, they can well think of them without drawing their thought back from heavenly things: but they ought not to think of earthly things as earthly: and the tonsure and the unveiling of the senses signify only this.

§ 30. To the next it must be said that fiefs and other things for defense are possessed by the right of Emperors: and therefore since a just tribute is not withdrawn from princes, a cleric or another man assigned to the offices of the Church can possess such things.

Articulus 16 — Whether The Order Of Doorkeepers Is The First, And Has Some Spiritual Act

Whether the order of doorkeepers is the first, and has any spiritual act?

§ 31. Next, inquiry is made concerning what he says, there, C, Doorkeepers, the same as porters, etc.

§ 32. And two things are inquired here, namely concerning the act of doorkeepers; and, Whether this order imprints a character?

§ 33. As to the first, let what he says in the Letter be accepted.

§ 34. 1. To guard those things which are inside and outside is the act of doorkeepers: but to make such a guard with a material key is purely corporeal: therefore it seems that only corporeal power is ordained to this: but every order is a spiritual power: therefore it seems, since the order of doorkeepers is a spiritual order, that this is not its act.

§ 35. 2. Furthermore, a minister ministering spiritual things is required in vain for a corporeal act: but in the order of doorkeepers a minister excellent in the Church ministering spiritual things is required: therefore it is not for a corporeal act: therefore the act which is said in the Letter is not its act.

§ 36. 3. Furthermore, to the sacraments which Christ exhibited in Himself, He conferred a spiritual virtue: but He exhibited this through Himself, as is said in the Letter: therefore He exhibited spiritual force to these: but spiritual force is for a spiritual act, not a corporeal one: therefore it seems that this is not its act.

§ 37. To the contrary of this it is objected: because the act in the order is conferred for this purpose, the instrument of which is given by the Bishop to the ordained: but the material keys of the temple and the sanctuary are given to the doorkeepers: therefore order and power are conferred upon them for this purpose: but the act of a key is to close and open temples and sanctuaries: therefore this is the act of that order.

§ 38. Response. It must be said that that which is called the order of doorkeepers is the first order, and having acts over the corporeal ordered to the spiritual: for its proper role is to guard the place of the sacraments, in which both the sacraments are conferred and the people communicate in the sacraments, from unclean things and men.

§ 39. To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is not purely corporeal: and therefore a spiritual power is required for this, because spiritual things are well conversant about corporeal things ordered to spiritual things: but it is true that this spiritual power is in the lowest grade of spiritual things.

§ 40. To the next it must be said that this would follow, if it were a corporeal act, and concerning a purely corporeal thing: but it is a corporeal act concerning a corporeal thing ordered to the spiritual: and the spiritual is the end: because the whole guarding is done lest spiritual things be violated.

§ 41. To the next it must be said that Christ gave spiritual force to this power: because just as when Christ expelled the unclean from the temple, a certain divine reality shone forth, as the Gloss on John 2:15 says, by which those He expelled were terrified, and yielded to Him; so a certain element of divine power makes the doorkeepers prevail, so that they may expel from the sacred place those things that violate sacred things: and those receiving this order have this from Christ.

Articulus 17 — Whether The Order Of Doorkeepers Imprints A Character

Whether the order of doorkeepers imprints a character?

§ 42. Secondly it is inquired, Whether this order imprints a character?

§ 43. For it seems that it does not: 1. For as was said in the question on baptism, in the treatise on the character, the character consigns the created trinity to the uncreated, and establishes one in some spiritual state of faith: but this order does not seem to do this: therefore it does not imprint a character. The middle [premise] is proved: because a state of faith is of prelacy or subjection, and then of beginners or of those fighting for perfect faith: and this order confers neither of these, because it does not make prelates, but rather ministers, because doorkeepers are ministers: therefore it does not imprint a character.

653. Hosea 4:6.

§ 44. 2. Furthermore, it belongs to the most perfect sacraments to imprint a character: but this order is not the most perfect, but rather the order of priesthood: therefore it seems that it does not imprint a character.

§ 45. 3. Furthermore, although one thus ordained may be distinguished from the people so that he may minister in the temple, nevertheless he is still conjoinable to the people, because he can take a wife: therefore it seems that he is not distinguished by a perpetual distinction: but a perpetual distinction belongs to a character: therefore it seems that it does not imprint a character.

§ 46. 4. Furthermore, this office is entirely of the way [i.e., of this earthly life], because in the future there will be no need of guarding: therefore it seems that it ceases with the way: therefore its ministers need nothing except a character of the way: but a spiritual character is perpetual: therefore it seems that this sacrament does not imprint a spiritual character.

§ 47. 5. Furthermore, those guardians who are in the celestial hierarchy and are guardians of souls, are more worthy than the guardians of temples: and yet we do not say that a character is imprinted on them because of their office: therefore a character is not imprinted on these because of the office of these.

§ 48. 6. Furthermore, into the act of that sacrament or office which imprints a character, none is capable except one characterized by it: but one not having this order is capable of the act of this order: therefore it does not imprint a character. The first [premise] is proved by induction: because none can be for the detestation of original sin except one receiving baptism if an article of necessity does not exclude the sacrament, nor for the strengthening which is from confirmation, nor for the consecration of the body and blood of the Lord except one who has the order. The proof of the second is obvious to the eye: because even any layman can guard temples: therefore the proposition stands.

§ 49. To the contrary of this it is objected thus: 1. Nothing establishes one immovably in a grade of spiritual power, unless something immovable is received by the recipient: the order of doorkeepers establishes one immovably in a grade of spiritual power: therefore it itself is something immovable. The first [premise] is proved from this, that no cause which is as disposing in a subject is separable from its effect, whatever also may be the case concerning an efficient cause, since the Philosopher says this is true of every cause, and Avicenna proves it: but because of prolixity it is accepted here in a disposition, because in that it is transparently true. Now every sacrament causes its effect as a disposing cause in the subject, as is evident from what was previously held around the beginning of this fourth book of the Sentences. The second, however, is proved: because a doorkeeper, however much he may deviate, is never reordained, but is only reconciled: and thus he ministers, if it seems expedient to the Prelate. Thence thus: Neither that which is there a sign only, nor that which is there a reality only, is immovable from the one receiving this order: therefore there is there an immovable mean, which is both reality and sign: now the immovable mean existing in all sacraments is the character: therefore also in this sacrament: therefore this sacrament imprints a character. The first is proved: because the action of the Bishop over the doorkeeper is transitory: and because grace, which is only a reality, is often lost: therefore the first stands. The second is proved from induction in baptism, confirmation, and priesthood.

§ 50. 2. Furthermore, there is only a twofold cause for the non-iteration of sacraments over the same subject, namely because the cause does not return, just as original sin does not return after baptism: and because something immovable remains in the recipient, because of which it cannot be iterated: it is certain therefore that the first cause is not in this sacrament, as to why it is not iterated: therefore it will be the second: therefore something immovable is imprinted in this sacrament, which is never deleted: but this in all cases is called a character: therefore also in this one.

§ 51. 3. Furthermore, a distinctive sign establishing one in a grade of faith and to a spiritual act seems to be a character: such a sign is given to a doorkeeper: therefore a character is given to him. The proof of the middle [premise]: for it is certain that by separation in office he is determined and distinguished from others, not by a distinction of disposition as in the corona, but by assignment to a spiritual office: therefore the proposition stands.

§ 52. 4. Furthermore, it belongs to the uncreated character to characterize with a created character: but I see that the uncreated character has characterized this office: therefore He Himself imprints a character on the one assigned to this office.

§ 53. Response. It must be said that it does not seem doubtful to me that it imprints a character: because otherwise it could in no way be seen how an indelible power would be impressed upon the doorkeeper, as the last arguments prove.

§ 54. To the first, however, it must be said that this character makes a configuration: because it is imprinted upon our image so that in spiritual power he may imitate Him who "will not slumber nor sleep in keeping Israel" [Ps 120:4], and it places one in a state of prelacy and in a state of faith.

§ 55. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that he is a prelate among the people not having the power of approaching thus, although he is not a prelate absolutely: for he is in a higher grade than the simple ones of the people: and this suffices for a state of prelacy in a state of faith: just as the whole tribe of Levi was prelate, nor however were the Levites of the lower orders prelates absolutely.

§ 56. To the next it must be said that this order is something of the most perfect sacrament, just as a part of a potestative whole is something of the whole: and therefore insofar as it is ordained to that, it has something of its effect: and this is to imprint a character of power according to a part, just as that [the priesthood] has to imprint the character of perfect power: for otherwise it would not be a potestative part of it. And this is easy to see: because unless he gives power to the bailiff in part, he will not be a potestative part of the kingdom which has the capacity to give power perfectly, and so it is of others. Here, however, because of the

§ 57. To the next it must be said that he is never conjoinable to the people in such a way that he loses the seal, rather he is bound to have it outwardly in perpetuity, just as he cannot lack it inwardly: but he can lose jurisdiction, and as to this be made like one of the people: because if he were in total made like one of the people, he would be reordained when he again returned to the clericate: and this is not done.

§ 58. To the next it must be said that it does not follow, if some office is entirely of the way, that it does not imprint a character: because even baptism belongs to the way, and confirmation, and priesthood, and yet they imprint a character: because although the use of such a grade will not be in the homeland when all prelacy will cease, nevertheless the sign of the grade remains for glory because he ministered faithfully and well in the office committed to him.

§ 59. To the next it must be said that concerning the signs of the Angels it is uncertain to us: but nevertheless concerning the grades of the Angels this is certain to us, that as regards the eminence of dignity one remains above another perpetually, although perhaps they may be evacuated as to act and office, when God will be all in all, as is said, 1 Corinthians 15:28. Whence I think it is false that Angels are not distinguished by seals of nature, grace, and glory among themselves, according as their offices are diversely higher and lower.

§ 60. To the next it must be said that into the act of that order nothing is capable except one having the order. And to understand this, it must be recalled to memory what was said before, namely that just as Christ showed a certain divine ray, by reason of which those who violated the holy place were terrified and yielded, so a certain divine power of deterring the unclean from a sanctified holy place is conferred upon the doorkeepers, and out of such a power to repel the unclean is the act of the doorkeeper. And it is plain that he who does not have that power cannot do this: but he does not have it, who does not receive the order.

Articulus 18 — Whether In The Sacrament Of This Order There Is Some Special Form

Whether there is any special form in the sacrament of this order?

§ 61. Next, inquiry is made concerning what he says, there, C, in the middle: And it is said to them: Act thus as those about to render an account to God, etc.

§ 62. For from this it seems that this is the form of this order.

§ 63. But against this it is objected: 1. For the form of a sacrament is either by way of indication, or deprecation: but this one is by way of command: therefore it seems that it is not the form of the sacrament.

§ 64. 2. Furthermore, divine power operates in a sacrament: therefore the operation of a sacrament is not subject to human command: therefore neither ought the collation of a sacrament to be conferred by way of command.

656. Jerome, Commentary on Titus 1:7.

§ 65. 3. Furthermore, what is done by someone's command consists in their power: but the operation of an order does not consist in the power of the Pontiff, but of God: therefore the form ought not to be by way of command.

§ 66. 4. Furthermore, those words seem rather to sound like an enjoining of an office to one already having power, than a collation of power: for if he were then conferring power, he ought to say: Receive the power of closing and opening.

§ 67. Response. It must be said that the forms of the sacraments are diversified according to the diversity of the sacraments, as was evident in baptism, and the Eucharist, and extreme unction. Whence since in this sacrament power is conferred to divine acts and about divine things, it ought to be signified by way of a transferring of power from one to another, just as it was signified by the Lord, John 20:22 and 23, when He said: Receive the Holy Spirit: whose sins you shall forgive, etc. For in that word is understood by similarity as to the mode every form of collation of the sacrament of order signified and instituted.

§ 68. To the first, therefore, it must be said that the solution is evident.

§ 69. To the second it must be said that although in a sacrament divine power alone works the ultimate effect, nevertheless the act of that sacrament is in the power of the ministers: and since an order is for receiving power to that act, it is signified by way of a transferring of that power by the Bishop, who is there in the place of Christ conferring that power.

§ 70. To the next it must be said that it is in the power of a man as a minister participating in the place of God: but it is not in the power of a man insofar as he is a man, and the power of a man is referred to the act: but it is true that divine power alone is for the effect of grace which is done in the sacraments: and this is signified from the mode of speaking by which he does not say: Receive grace, etc., but rather: Act thus, etc.

§ 71. To the next it must be said that power is not complete except in its act to which it is ordered: and therefore so that complete power may be noted, he says: Act thus, etc. And nevertheless this is the sense: Have complete and perfect power of acting.

Articulus 19 — Whether The Order Of The Lectorate Is Well Ordered Among The Orders

Whether the order of the lectorate is well ordered among the orders?

§ 72. Next, inquiry is made concerning what he says, there, D, The second grade is of lectors, etc.

§ 73. And three things are inquired, namely concerning the order of this to the preceding, and to the following non-sacred orders. Secondly, On the difference of it to the psalmistate. And thirdly, On its proper act.

§ 74. For the others, namely whether it imprints a character? and concerning the form, have been held from the preceding: because the mode of disputing is the same in both places.

§ 75. To the FIRST one proceeds thus: 1. Among the four non-sacred orders there are two removing from evil, namely of doorkeepers, and of exorcists: and two ordering to good, namely of lectors, and of acolytes: but things having a symbol [in common] are more fittingly conjoined: therefore it seems that exorcists ought to be ordered immediately prior to janitors [doorkeepers].

§ 76. 2. Furthermore, in the way of justice it is prior to decline from evil, than to do good: but exorcists are by way of declining from evil, whereas lectors are for doing good: therefore exorcists are before lectors: therefore lectors do not have the second grade.

§ 77. 3. Furthermore, Boethius says that vices are to be extirpated before virtues are inserted: but exorcists extirpate vices, and lectors insert virtues: therefore it seems that exorcists are before lectors.

§ 78. To the contrary of this is that the evil of the will is not forsaken unless known: therefore to know evil is prior to forsaking it: but the lector's office is for the knowledge of evil, and the exorcists' for the forsaking of evil: therefore the lector's grade is before the grade of exorcists.

§ 79. Which must be conceded. It must be said therefore to the first, that orders are ordered here according to how their acts are generated in those receiving the sacraments. Whence the first among them is the preparation and guarding of the sanctified place, and then all the rest consists in the preparation of those communicating in the sacraments and in the confection of the sacraments. Now as Aristotle says in the last chapter of book X of the Ethics: Admonition is the first thing disposing to virtue and to good through words, although it does not have coercive power. And therefore among the grades it is the first, and therefore the second among all: and they are not ordered according as they agree in a certain general aspect, namely which is to be from evil, and to be to good.

§ 80. To the next it must be said that in the way of justice, even that which is from evil is preceded by persuasion and the showing of evil, which belongs to the office of the lector. Whence although reading implants the good of the intellect, and therefore is said to be in an order to good, as is evident in the division of orders assigned above: nevertheless for the continuation of the readers, that is, of those things which are read, it precedes both the order from evil and the order to good, as the last objection proves.

§ 81. And through this the solution to the last is evident.

Articulus 20 — On The Difference Between The Lectorate And The Psalmistate

On the difference of the lectorate to the psalmistate.

§ 82. Secondly, inquiry is made concerning the difference of this to the psalmistate, which he touches upon in the Letter.

§ 83. Now it seems that they differ in nothing: because 1. As he says in the Letter, the office of lectors is to read prophecies in the Church: and the psalms are a nobler part of prophecy: therefore it seems that they do not differ except by matter; because lectors pronounce one part of prophecy, and psalmists another and nobler part: therefore either the psalmistate is an order, or a part of the order of lectors.

§ 84. 2. Furthermore, if force is made in the sanctity of the reading or in the difficulty of those things which are read, psalms are in as much excellence as other prophecies are: therefore just as an order is required for reading other prophecies, so it is required for reading psalms: from which follows the same as before.

§ 85. 3. Furthermore, an order is principally required for those things which the ministers of the Church frequent more: but they frequent the psalms more than all other prophecies: therefore a special order is required for them.

§ 86. 4. Furthermore, Gregory on Ezekiel, on that word of Psalm 49:23: There is the way by which I will show him the salvation of God, says that in the singing of psalms, either the spirit of compunction is given, or the spirit of prophecy, if it is done with attention and devotion but it is not done thus in other prophecies: therefore the psalms are even of greater authority and greater sanctity and utility than other prophecies: therefore there ought to be an order for them just as for reading other prophecies, or it will be a part of the order of lectors.

§ 87. To the contrary of this is that the singing of psalms is a deprecation and a certain prayer: but these are to be forbidden to no one: and what is forbidden to no one does not have an order, since order is of distinct persons: therefore there ought not to be an order for reading psalms.

§ 88. Response. It must be said that the psalmistate is not an order, but the office of the whole choir. Now the whole choir is the assembly of the faithful responding to certain ones leading the singing in the praise of God: and therefore the office...

It pertains to the community and the whole body of the Church serving God in devotion, and not to the office of ministers as they are ministers. And that hours and psalms are imposed upon them, this is done for perfecting them in the merit of holiness, just as they are perfected in the power of order.

To what is first objected, it must be said that prophecy, as it is simply read in the Church, does not have an order ordained to itself, but as it is read with explanation: for thus it has an order giving authority to do this, because for this it requires the power and grace of the Holy Spirit, as will be evident in the following article.

To the other, it must be said that in neither is there force, but only in the authority of explaining that which is read or sung concerning prophecies.

To the other, it must be said that certain things are frequented for the accumulation of merit by the ministers of the Church, and certain things for the communion of the faithful so that they may communicate in the sacraments. And those which are frequented in the first way do not have an order, but free will informed by grace, so that they may merit. But those which are frequented in the second way necessarily have an order in which the power of fre-quenting such things is conferred, according to which sacraments are said to be for exercise at the beginning of this fourth book of the Sentences.

To the last, it must be said that this does not show the necessity of order, but the force of those prayers which are said in the psalm for obtaining grace.

Articulus 21 — What Is The Act Of The Order Of The Lectorate

What is the act of the order of lectorate?

Thirdly, it is asked about the act of this order.

It seems, indeed, that it is not the act of the order: because
1. The ability to accentuate and pronounce distinctly is sufficiently caused by the science of grammar: therefore, for this, it is not necessary to have one order. Similarly, the power of explaining is sufficiently caused by the science of theology: and thus again, for this, it is not necessary to have an order: therefore, from the act of this order, it is shown that this order is superfluous.

1. Furthermore, we see many who have the order, and yet cannot do those things which are said in the Text. Since, therefore, everyone who has perfect power to do something can do it whenever he wishes, it seems that they do not have perfect power: therefore, neither the order: because order confers perfect power.

2. Furthermore, two acts are touched upon here in the Text, namely, to pronounce distinctly and to preach, which belong to different faculties, namely, grammar and theology: therefore, it seems that they should not be reduced to one immediate power: therefore, neither to one order, because one order is a single power for some act of ministers, as has often been shown from what was said before.

Response. It must be said that the power of this order is to read prophecies with the authority of explaining them to the people. And the reason for this is gathered from the Text in two places, namely, in the form of this prayer, which the Bishop says when transferring power and imprinting the character, he gives the book saying: Be a true relator of the word of God, having, if you faithfully and usefully fulfill your office, a part with those who have well administered the word of God from the beginning: for such are called in the Church unless preachers of the words of God.

The second is that the Lord, when he exhibited the act of this order, not only read plainly and openly, but immediately explained to the people.

From the third, it can also be gathered, namely, that it says the order arose from the Prophets, when they said: Cry out, do not cease!: for they preached the prophecies to the people for edification. And these three arguments are valid for the confirmation of our intention.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that the order is not given to read or to explain, but to the authority of reading and explaining: and yet it is false that the faculty of explaining prophecies is sufficiently had from theology: for although the faculty of accentuating is sufficiently had from grammar, it is not so sufficiently had from theology for explaining: because it is not from the reason that is taught there, but from grace: hence there must be an order conferring both grace and authority.

To the other, it must be said that in truth, unless necessity urges the Church in some way, no one who is not sufficiently literate should receive this order. Hence in the Text, it says that for this order, the knowledge of letters is required. If, however, there is necessity: then power can be conferred, and the act expected for a time, as is done now, because this order is sufficiently conferred on boys.

To the other, it must be said that both acts follow each other: because the first is as if the acceptance of the matter and theme, so that the people may know the source of preaching to be Sacred Scripture: but the perfection of the office consists in the second, and there is the ultimate of this order.

To what is objected against, it must be said that as far as voice and significations are concerned, they are referred to the habits of different faculties. But here it is not taken so: rather, pronunciation is referred to the things pronounced, and the things pronounced are contained under the power of the order and the grace which is conferred in the order: because, as was said before, neither science nor the faculty of reason, but rather from the power of the order and grace. And according to this, they are reduced to one power and faculty.

Articulus 22 — What Is The Act Of The Exorcists

What is the act of exorcists?

Then it is inquired about what is said, there, E, the third is the order of exorcists, etc.

And two things are inquired about this order, namely about the act to which it pertains, and whether it in itself gathers all preceding according to the nature of the whole power.

To the first, it is objected thus:
1. Exorcisms have power from the words of the exorcisms: therefore, whoever pronounces those words, always achieves their power: therefore, they are equally effective when pronounced by the ordained and the non-ordained: therefore, order is not required for this act, as it seems.

1. Furthermore, Solomon invented exorcisms: and it is certain that they had effect: and yet he had no order: therefore, it seems that order is not required for this.
2. Furthermore, the acts of the sacrament of the New Testament never have the same effect in the New and Old Testament: but this act has the same effect in the New and Old

661. Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) 15:9.

Testament, as is clear from the Letter: therefore, it does not seem to be an act of the sacrament of the New Testament.

3. Furthermore, to the same effect, there is not the power of the evil spirit and the sacrament of the Church: but to expel demons through exorcisms is the power of the evil spirit: therefore, for this, it is not a sacrament of the Church. The first is evident by itself. The second is proven through the art of necromancy: and thus the proposition is established.

4. Furthermore, the exorcisms of Solomon that are held, all are necromantic, as is clear in the book called Alman Det, which is inscribed to Solomon, king of Israel: therefore, it seems that those acts had their origin from necromancy: therefore, such acts should not be of the sacrament of the Church.

Further, it is inquired about the acts mentioned in the Letter: because it seems to place three in the Letter, namely to expel demons, to miraculously cure the mute and deaf, and to open the mouths of men for confessing and hearts for understanding.

And it seems that these acts are not reducible to one power: because the expulsion of demons is of exorcisms, and the curing of the sick is the grace of miracles, and the opening of mouths for understanding is the doctrine of preachers or teachers: therefore, it seems that they should not be assigned to one sacred order.

Response. It must be said that the power of exorcists is to expel or diminish the power of the demon in the impediment of the reception of the sacraments: and the others, namely the liberation of the possessed and the curing of the sick, are adjuncts, when it is expedient, and not always.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that exorcisms do not have all their power from the words, but rather they require a proper agent and minister, as they are for such an act as has been said: just as the confection of the Eucharist does not have everything from the form, but also seeks a proper agent, because a non-priest could not do this.

To the other, it must be said that Solomon invented exorcisms of imperfect curing, as they were fitting for the Old Testament. And I think that they were only effective for the curing of bodies: but these are effective for souls: and if they are referred to bodies, then this is done insofar as the infirmity of the body depends on the mind: and if the curing of the infirmity of the body is effective for the curing of the mind, then sometimes it is also effective for the body. And although Solomon invented them, yet he was not the proper agent, but the Levites: just as David also invented the Psalms, and yet they were committed to the Levites for singing.

To the other, it must be said that it did not have such a full effect in the Old Testament, as has been said: because in the New Testament it weakens its power in the impediment that hinders the perception of the sacraments, but in the Old Testament it was only effective in the body.

662. Decretum Gratiani, C. 8, q. 1.

To the other, it must be said that it is far from this, that the power of the evil spirit is for this: but, as it is said in the life of blessed Bartholomew, sometimes demons harm, and they seem to cure when they cease from harming: and thus necromancy operates, because one demon harms, and another wards off the harming one or makes it cease from harming: but the sacrament operates through grace contrary to all the operations of demons.

To the other, it must be said that it is a false inscription: because it is not believed that Solomon made it: but if he did, without a doubt he did it when he worshipped idols and inclined his thighs to women.

To the last, it must be said that those three acts are referred to one, namely to expel the power of the demon insofar as it is an impediment to the perception of the sacraments: for when it operates in the body, whether possessed or deaf or mute or otherwise infirm, it does not operate concerning this except insofar as it is cured through the body by the demon impeding the mind: and the ultimate of this order and its power is to open the intellect and mouth for confessing, but to open by removing the power of the demon closing: but the lector opens by infusing the illuminating habit to the act. And in this diverse way, nothing prohibits different orders from being for the same.

And through this, the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 23 — Whether The Order Of The Exorcists Combines The Two Preceding According To The Nature Of The Whole Potestative

Whether the order of exorcists gathers the two preceding according to the nature of the whole potentiate?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether this order gathers the two preceding according to the nature of the whole potentiate?

However, it seems that it does not: because
1. Those things which are of the same power have an order, such that the preceding is necessarily presupposed in the power of the following, just as in the sensible the vegetative is presupposed, as a triangle in a tetragon: but the operation of readers is not necessarily presupposed in the operation of exorcisms: therefore it seems that it does not unite in itself the acts of the preceding orders.

1. Furthermore, in the whole potentiate the following is in no way without the preceding: but the exorcistate can be without the readership, as is evident in those making a leap: therefore it seems that it does not unite in itself the preceding orders. Proof of the middle: if someone makes a leap, he indeed has the following order, although he does not have the execution: therefore the proposition stands.

Response. To this it must be said that this order unites in itself the preceding, and the characters of the preceding are united in its character, since character is a habit according to substance, and it is accidental if something is by reason of which it distinguishes, the habits of the preceding acts are united in the habit of this one, just as those who are ordered to one end: and yet the faculties remain for the acts of each, as happens in every whole potentiate: for this has parts related separately to acts, and unity in the power of the last act, which is from perfect power.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that in the parts of the soul union is by nature. But this union is perfected by the institution of the Church and Christ. For to whomever it is granted to ward off demons, in him is presupposed the power of doorkeepers and readers, because they are powers of inferior acts ordered to the expulsion of demons: and although the union is less than nature, yet it is such as suffices for the offices of the Church.

To the other it must be said, that in this way the preceding is presupposed in the following, namely because it is ordered to the same, although it is of a lower degree of office preceding: and therefore one making a leap when he has the character, does not yet have the execution, because it is necessary for the power of the inferior to concur. And it is similar as if the sensible did not have the vegetative, it could not act, because every act of the sensible is founded in the vegetative.

Articulus 24 — Whether The Acolythate Is An Order

Whether the acolyte is an order?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, "Fourthly, the acolytes succeed."

And two things are inquired here, namely, whether the acolyte is an order? And secondly, when is the character imprinted on them?

To the first, it is objected thus:
1. For a corporal act, no order is required: to carry candles and tapers is a corporal act: therefore, for this, no order is required.

1. Furthermore, the preparation of lights in the sanctuary belongs to the doorkeepers and custodians, who are said above to be ostiaries: therefore, it seems that for this, no special order should be instituted.
2. Furthermore, a book is holier than a candlestick: and for the preparation and carrying of a book, no order is required: therefore, neither for the preparation of candlesticks and candles.
3. Furthermore, if there is an order for this act which is to prepare and carry tapers and candlesticks, it seems that it is of a much lower grade than the order of readers or exorcists. Since, therefore, orders are ordained according to how they are more remote from the last, which is the priesthood, it seems that this should be the second or first and not the fourth.

664. Matthew 23:3.

4. Furthermore, how is it true separately, that three preceding ones are required for its act, when we see that both the learned and unlearned can carry candles: and to the office of the reader pertains to be learned?

Response. It must be said that according to my judgment, to carry candles is not the act of this order, except as a sign shows that of which it is a sign: but its act is to work by fiery speech and example to the kindling of affection.

And through this, the solution to the first and second is clear.

To the third, however, it must be said that the order of readers is more for this, that the book is given to them: for the perfection of the intellect is more through knowledge, and the perfection of affection is through the grace of examples, not words: whence it seems that this order is a continuation to the sacred orders, which work upon the matter of the body of Christ.

To the following, the solution is clear through the preceding.

To the last, it must be said that this is clear in this way by understanding as it has been said: because then it is the highest among the four offices. And that it is so is clear through this which the Master says in that place: "Not to dispel the darkness of the air, since the sun at that time shines, but, etc."

Likewise, through that which he says, that Christ exhibited this order when he said: "I am the light of the world."

Articulus 25 — When A Character Is Imprinted On Acolytes

When is the character imprinted on acolytes?

Secondly, it is asked, When is the character imprinted in this order?

For two things are said here, namely that he carries the candle, and he himself carries the vessel with wine and water suggested for the Eucharist. However, it is evident that the work closer to the Eucharist is what he has when he carries the vessel with water, rather than the carrying of candles: but in the more dignified part, the facility to operate is imprinted: therefore, it seems that the character is imprinted when that vessel is given to him.

On the contrary of this is that 1. He is named from the carrying of candles: therefore, it seems that when he receives the candlestick, then the character is imprinted on him.

1. Furthermore, by receiving the candlestick from the Bishop, he is first taught how he ought to minister in the office: and then he receives the vessel from the archdeacon: however, it is evident that the archdeacon does not give the order, but the Bishop: therefore, it seems that he gives them the order in this, that he gives them the candlestick, and not the act of the vessel.

Response. It must be said that it seems to me that the character is imprinted when the candlestick is given with the instruction of the signification to dispel the northern darkness, that is, of the devil: for thus the figure in the Old Testament corresponds to it, as is evident in the Letter: and thus Christ exhibited the order. However, what the archdeacon does, this is to denote the excellence of the order, to show the continuation in this to be towards the sacred orders.

Therefore, to the objection, it must be said that the work of the vessel is not a work in the orders except accidental and popular, except when it is given to the subdeacon: and therefore it is not except for the acolyte to minister with the vessel immediately to the deacon: but rather to provide that there is no impediment on the part of the offering people, who in the consecration is the prepared matter from which the Eucharist is made: but the divine work that he does concerning the sacraments is to dispel spiritual darkness with the light of word and example: for he himself is almost an argument of the proof of what he says to the divine colloquy.

And through this, the solution to the whole is evident.

G. Concerning subdeacons.

The fifth is the order of subdeacons. In Greek, they are called dnedizxeves, whom we call Subdeacons. They are thus called because they are subject to the precepts and offices of the Levites. For they receive the offerings in the temple from the faithful, and carry them to the Levites to be placed on the altars. Among the Hebrews, they were called nathinnet, that is, serving the Lord in humility. It pertains to the subdeacon to carry the chalice and paten to the altar of Christ, and to deliver them to the Levites, and to minister to them. Also, to hold the vessel and basin and towel for the Bishop and Priests and Levites, to provide water for washing hands before the altar. To them, the law of continence is imposed: because approaching the altar, they carry the vessels of the body and blood of Christ. Hence, they ought to fulfill that: Cleanse yourselves, you who bear the vessels of the Lord. It also pertains to them to place only as much of the offerings on the altar as may suffice for the people, and also to wash the corporals and palls and coverings. When they are ordained, they receive from the hand of the Bishop the paten and empty chalice. From the archdeacon, however, the vessel with the basin and towel. The Lord used this office when he girded himself with a towel, and pouring water into a basin, washed the feet of the disciples and wiped them with the towel.

Articulus 26 — What Is The Act Of The Subdeacon, To Which The Character Is Imprinted

What is the act of the subdeacon, to which the character is imprinted?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said, there, G, the fifth order of subdeacons, etc.

Three things are inquired here, namely, what is the true act of the subdeacon, to which the character is imprinted? Secondly, whether it excels the four preceding ones? Thirdly, why certain orders are called sacred, but others not sacred?

666. 1 Samuel (1 Kings in Vulgate) 2-4.

To the first, it is objected thus:

1. The subdeacon is subject to the deacon: therefore, he has an inferior act for an act: but the New Testament is given to be read by the deacon, as is said in the following chapter: therefore, the Old is given to be read by the subdeacon: but this same is given to the lector: therefore, it seems that the act of the lector and the subdeacon is one and the same.

1. Furthermore, in the text it says that they ought to carry the chalice and paten to the altar and hand them to the Levites: but this is less than expounding the divine readings: therefore, it seems that it is a nobler act that they read the epistles and prophecies: but an order, like anything else, is defined by its ultimate act: therefore, it is defined by reading: and hence as before.

2. Furthermore, it is greater to minister to the bishop and priests than to the deacon: but in the ewer and towel and basin, he serves the bishop and priests, in the chalice and paten only the deacon: therefore, it seems that it is a sign of more excellent power that he receives the basin and towel than that he receives the chalice: but in more excellent power the character is given: therefore, it seems that the character is imprinted on him when he receives the basin and towel.

1. Furthermore, that is the act to which the character is imprinted, which Christ exhibited prefiguring this order: but Christ exhibited the act of washing in the basin and towel prefiguring this order: therefore, to that the character of this order is imprinted. The first is evident from this, that this order, like no other sacrament, had any power except from divine institution. The second, however, is written in the text at the end of this chapter.

On the contrary, it is objected to this: because the act is more excellent in orders, the closer it is to the act of the priest, which is to consecrate the body of Christ: but to prepare the chalice and hosts on the altar proportionate to the number of those receiving, above all, is closer to the act of the priest, which is to consecrate the body of Christ: therefore, it seems that that act is more excellent: but to the more excellent the character is imprinted: therefore, the character of this order is then imprinted when he receives the chalice from the hand of the bishop with the words pertaining to this.

Response. What was lastly proven here, seems to me to be conceded.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the subdeacon is so called because he ministers to the deacon in the principal act, which is that the deacon ministers on the altar to the priest the matter of the body of Christ, as was evident in the division of orders placed above.

To the other, it must be said that this is much more than to read the readings: because this is to minister to the true body of Christ, but the other only to the mystical: and yet the reading of the subdeacon is higher than that of the lector, just as the explanation of the Gospel, which is in the epistles, is greater than the explanation of the law, which is in the prophecies.

To the other, it must be said that this is true insofar as he is a bishop: but he does not perform this ministry for himself except in common, as a certain purity is required to shine in all ministers. Hence, in the same ministry, he also serves the Levites, as it says in the text. Hence, the act of that minister is not done for the bishop as he is a bishop, or for the priest as he is a priest: but this is the common ministry of those serving near the altar, and this is adjunct to the deacon, who among the inferior ministers can more approach the holy things.

To the other, it must be said that Christ exhibited both at the supper: for it was necessary to prepare the vessels in which he would consecrate that body and blood: hence he also said: Take, this chalice is of the New Testament: but the Master here from the latter act demonstrates the former to be supposed: because no one doubts if Christ performed by himself the inferior and adjunct act, which is of humility, that he also performed by himself the more excellent act, which is closer to the sacrament of the Eucharist.

Articulus 27 — Whether The Order Of The Subdiaconate Excels The Four Other Orders

Whether the order of subdiaconate excels the four other orders?

Whether the order of subdiaconate excels the four preceding orders?

Secondly, it is asked whether this order excels the four preceding orders?

And it seems that it does not: because

1. As Aristotle says in Book X of the Ethics: the operation of the intellect is more worthy than any operation of man: the act of the lector is concerned with the operation of the intellect, and the subdeacon's is concerned with certain irrational and inanimate vessels: therefore it seems that the operation of the lector is more worthy than the operation of the subdeacons: but as operation is to operation, so is order to order: therefore the order of lectors is more worthy than the order of subdeacons.

1. Furthermore, to ward off demons is a supermundane power, but to prepare the vessels of the Church is a mundane operation: but a supermundane operation is more worthy than a mundane or human one: therefore it seems that the operation of exorcists is more worthy than the operation of subdeacons: therefore as before.

On the contrary of this is that

1. The subdeacon enters into the holy things, to which it is not permitted to approach for those of lower order grades: but he who is closer to the holy things is more worthy: therefore the order of subdeacons is more worthy than all lower orders.

1. Furthermore, the order which in its operation is closer to the first act of priests is nobler: but among all, the subdeacon approaches more in operation except for the deacon alone: therefore that order is more worthy except for the order of the diaconate.

Response, It must be said that assent should be given to the last two reasons.

668. 2 Samuel 6:6-7.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that although it is concerned with irrational and inanimate vessels, it is not concerned with them as they are such, but rather as they are referred to the containment of the body of Christ, which is more worthy than the whole world, even if the world were multiplied.

To the statement of the Philosopher, it must be said that it is understood of the operations of man insofar as he is man: but those operations which are of ministers in the sacraments are divine rather than human.

To the other, it must be said that to ward off demons is in no way as worthy as to operate concerning the vessels of the body of the Lord as they are containers of the body of Christ: and although that is a supermundane power, yet this is also supermundane, because this power is given to man by God.

Articulus 28 — Why These Three Orders Are Called Sacred

Why are these three orders called sacred?

Thirdly, it is asked concerning the sacred orders, why these three are called sacred?

And it is objected thus:
1. Every operation is sacred, which is around sacred things: but every operation of order is around sacred things: therefore every order is sacred.

1. Furthermore, an operation is said to be sacred in two ways, namely from the sanctity of the one operating, just as a meritorious act is holy: or from the sanctity of the matter around which it is. And it is evident that in the first way order is not said to be sacred: because many not having orders have such sacred operations. But if in the second way order is said to be sacred, then it follows as before, that every order is sacred.

Response. It must be said that these orders are called sacred on account of the sanctity which is enjoined upon those ministering in them: for it is necessary to have a vow of continence either simply or according to time. Simply, as in the Western Church, because these last three orders are not given except to those vowing and keeping perfect chastity. According to time, however, in the primitive Church, and in the Eastern Church, if any receive order in marriage, they remain in marriage: but yet as long as they minister, they are separated from their wives: and again, with her dead, they cannot take another.

And through this the solution to both objections is clear.

Articulus 29 — What Is The Principal Act Of The Order Of The Diaconate

What is the principal act of the order of the diaconate?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said, there, "The order of deacons holds the sixth place," etc.

657. Gregory the Great, Regula Pastoralis, Lib. 1, c. 10.

Three things are inquired concerning deacons, namely concerning the principal act of this order. Secondly, whether that order, like others, requires other sacraments beforehand, or can be received without these.

Thirdly, it is inquired concerning the sacred vestments of this order and of the preceding ones.

To the first, it is objected by those things which are said in the Letter, where it says: "To the deacon pertains assisting priests," etc. For it enumerates nine things pertaining to the deacon, namely, assisting priests in ministering in the sacraments. Secondly, bringing in the offerings of the faithful and arranging them on the altar. Thirdly, composing the Mass. Fourthly, carrying the cross. Fifthly, preaching the Gospel and other Scriptures. Sixthly, frequenting prayers. Seventhly, reciting the catechumens. Eighthly, that he warns to have ears towards the Lord. And ninthly, that he gives and announces peace. Therefore, it is inquired, which of these is the principal act? For of one power there is one act: and the order of the deacon is one power only: therefore, it has only one act.

However, it seems that it is to preach the Gospel: because

1. The preaching of the Gospel was the office of Christ: however, it is evident that the office of Christ was the most dignified and most divine: therefore, no act can even the deacon have more dignified.
2. Furthermore, in the Letter it says concerning this act, that to deacons is granted the preaching of the New Testament just as to readers of the Old: but to preach the Old and New differ only by matter: therefore, the order of the reader and the deacon differ only by matter, which is false.
3. Furthermore, it seems false: because even to subdeacons is granted the recitation of the epistles of the New Testament: and when they recite, they preach as if in a choir: whence also the choir responds to them by singing the graduals through which is signified progress from virtue to virtue, and the tracts through which is signified long-suffering in the tribulation of the present life, and the alleluia through which is signified joy in the hope of future things: and this is the whole that is preached. Through this also it seems that it is not true that it is proper to deacons to preach the New Testament.
4. Furthermore, to minister by setting the table and carrying the cross does not seem to be of deacons, but rather of acolytes: because according to the use of the Churches we see acolytes doing this.

Response. To this and similar things it must be said that the highest and principal act of the deacon is to minister to the priest in the consecration of the body of Christ immediately upon the altar. For he gives him the chalice with the host and wine, and by kissing the hand he returns the paten to the subdeacon, arranges the corporal, and upon it arranges the hosts to be consecrated. He also, if necessary, dispenses the sacrament itself already made to the people, as is evident where it says that the Lord used this office when after supper he dispensed his body and blood to the disciples. To this act, however, all others are referred: for what he ministers to the priest, all is referred to the composition of the hosts on the altar. However, what he warns the people by saying: "Let us bend the knees. Lift up," what he gives peace immediately taking it from the priest, what he recites the catechumens, what he preaches, etc., all this is ordered to this, that he may worthily communicate from his hands the Eucharist dispensing. Whence it is evident that this is the first act.

To that, therefore, which is objected, it must be said that to announce the Gospel is the most dignified act that can be done concerning the mystical body: and in this way Christ worked our salvation: but he had a more dignified act concerning his true body, when from bread and wine he made for us the sacrament of himself, and to that act the deacon approaches by ministering on the altar to the priest, as has been said.

To the other it must be said that as Dionysius says, those things which are of the lower orders, the higher have more powerfully and eminently. Whence the preaching of the reader is according to the obscure resonance of the Old Testament: but of the subdeacon clearer, and of the deacon most clear. And in this way it cannot be distinguished sensibly, except that to one the Old, to another the Epistles, and to the third the Gospel is committed: so that it may be known that in full clarity it is fitting for the deacon, which in a proportionate manner is fitting for the reader and subdeacon. And therefore this difference is not only material, but of power: just as I say that a candle shines, and the sun, does not differ materially only, namely by the small and the eminent, but according to the power of shining: and the causes of this power are diverse forms.

To the other the solution is evident by what has been said: because the eminent mode is proper to the deacon, and the inferior to the subdeacon. And if anyone objects that more and less do not diversify the species: it is nothing: because Aristotle says,

Those who believe this, that what is spoken of according to more and less is univocal, have not believed upon a sufficient sign: because 'more and less' are sometimes caused by the powers of diverse forms that are more and less noble, and then they are not of one species: and thus it is here. But sometimes they are caused through movement toward a terminus by the same form, and then they are of the same species: and it is not so here. But this was also noted in the second book of the Sentences, in the question: Whether the soul and an Angel differ in species?

The solution to the other [objection] is clear, that on great feasts in the celebration of Bishops, a deacon carries the cross, especially before an Archbishop: and the preparation of the altar here is understood as the bodily arrangement [i.e., of the corporal] on the altar: for no one ought to do this except a deacon!

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

665. Ezekiel 44:7.

Articulus 30 — Whether Both The Diaconate And The Other Prior Ones Pre-Require Other Sacraments

Whether both the diaconate and the other prior [orders] pre-require the other sacraments?

Secondly it is asked: Whether both this [order] and the others pre-require the other sacraments in the recipient?

And it seems that they do: because § 1. Order is joined to order more essentially than to the other sacraments: and a subsequent order can be received without the preceding ones having been received: therefore it can also be received without the other sacraments having been received.

§ 2. Furthermore, let us posit that someone is not baptized, yet firmly believes upon probable signs that he is baptized, and he receives the diaconate or another sacred order, and ministers: does he effect the act of the sacrament, or not? If he does not effect it: then the Church would be deceived. For suppose there is such a priest: then neither would those whom he heard in confession be absolved, nor would it be the true body of Christ which he confects, and many abominable things would follow. But if he confects and effects the act of the order: since the act does not proceed except from the power of the character, it seems that he can have the character of order without the character of baptism, which almost all deny.

If perhaps you say that such a one is reputed as baptized by the Church. ON THE CONTRARY: It is certain that he does not have the character of baptism, although he perhaps has the grace and a certain effect of baptism: therefore the character of order can be had without the character of baptism: and this is what we proposed to show.

IN CONTRARY to this is that the character of baptism is the foundation of the other sacraments and characters: and without a foundation nothing stable is built: therefore without the character of baptism he receives no order.

Furthermore, let it happen that such a one is known not to be baptized, either through revelation or in another way: it is certain that he will be reordained: but he would not be reordained if he had previously had the character of order: therefore it seems that he did not previously have the character of order. If perhaps you say that he had it previously, but was ignorant [of not being baptized], but lost it when he knew: this is ridiculous, that an indelible character should be destroyed through the knowledge of something.

RESPONSE. Without doubt it must be said that one not having baptism does not receive any order, but he can receive it without the other sacraments: because although actual sin is greater than original sin, nevertheless penance is not required in the same way as baptism, because penance is not the door of the sacraments and the foundation through which we are founded in Christ just as baptism is.

To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that although order is more substantial to order as regards the form of the sacrament, yet it does not have an order to the foundation in this way, because it has diverse acts: but order has no act diverse from faith: and therefore the sacrament of faith, which is baptism, is the foundation. And it is similar in the senses also in nature: because hearing is more similar to sight with respect to the form of sensing, than touch is: and yet sight can exist without hearing, but in no way without touch, because touch is not so much a sense as the foundation of the senses.

To the other it must be said without prejudice that such a one has no character of order: yet I think that he confects the sacraments, not in his own power, but in the power of the Church: and therefore he is reordained when it is known through some means that he was not baptized: for then a power descends into him from the virtue of the Holy Spirit animating the Church, lest the Church be deceived, and invincible ignorance excuses him.

Articulus 31 — Whether A Sacred Vestment Is Required For The Act Of The Order To Be Performed

Whether a sacred vestment is required for the act of the order to be performed?

Thirdly, it is asked about the sacred vestments of this and the other orders: because the Master first makes mention of them in the Text.

Now it is asked: Whether a sacred vestment is required for the act of the order to be performed, such that it cannot be done without the vestment?

And it seems that it is: because § 1. Those vestments, just like the orders, were instituted by the Lord, as is clear from Leviticus 8:2 and following: but there is no force in the sacraments to confer an effect except from divine institution: therefore if what was instituted by God is omitted, it will not be a sacrament: but vestments were instituted: therefore if they are omitted, it will not be a sacrament.

§ 2. Furthermore, in all arts it is thus, that the artisan must be perfect according to the habit proper to that work which he does, or else he does not operate well according to the art which is in him, but rather accidentally and badly, just as an old woman heals: therefore it ought to be similar in the sacraments: but vestments, as he says in the Text, signify the proper habits of the ministers, such as the cleanness of chastity, and so on for the others: therefore it seems that if those vestments are not on the ministers, they do not operate as ministers: but the acts of the sacraments belong to them as they are ministers: therefore without the vestments they do not effect the acts of the sacraments.

SOLUTION. To this it must be said that vestments pertain to the well-being [bene esse], and not to the essence [esse] of the orders.

To the two objections that were made, therefore, it must be said that the habit of the minister is twofold, namely of suitability and of necessity. The vestments show the habit of suitability: but the habit of necessity is the order which is given to them: and this alone is similar to the habit of artisans: for just as without art the artisan does not operate artfully, so without order the minister does not operate as a minister of the sacraments.

Articulus 32 — Whether The Priesthood Is Conferred By Consecration Or By The Merit Of Holiness

Whether the priesthood is conferred by consecration or by the merit of holiness?

The seventh order is that of priests, etc.

Four things are asked here concerning the priesthood. First it is asked: Whether it is given by consecration or by the merit of holiness? Secondly, Whether the priesthood of the New and Old Testament is the same? Thirdly, How the character of the priesthood unites to itself the characters of all the preceding orders? Fourthly and lastly, concerning the acts of the priesthood, which he touches upon in the Text.

To the first it is objected thus: § 1. Chrysostom says: Not every priest is holy: but everyone who is holy is a priest. But it is certain that not every holy person has the priesthood from consecration. Therefore it seems that the priesthood is conferred by the holiness of merit, not by consecration.

§ 2. Furthermore, Revelation 1:6: He has made us a kingdom and priests to God and his Father. And from this the same follows.

§ 3. Furthermore, in Psalm 98:6: Moses and Aaron among his priests: and it is certain that Moses was never consecrated: therefore as before.

§ 4. Furthermore, 1 Peter 2:9: You are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a purchased people. And he is speaking to all who were in the Church, to women as well as to men: therefore as before.

IN CONTRARY to this is: that one thing which is required for the reception of orders is sex [i.e., being male], as the canons say: therefore a woman cannot become a priest: yet she can be holy in body and spirit, as the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 7:34: therefore holiness does not confer the priesthood.

SOLUTION. To this it must be said that holiness confers suitability for the priesthood, but not the priesthood.

To all the objections it must be said that 'priest' is said in two ways, namely according to its signification, and according to the interpretation of the name. According to its signification, no one is a priest unless legitimately consecrated as a priest. According to the interpretation of the name, any just person is called a priest [sacerdos]: because he is a priest by merit, and a sacred leader [sacer dux] by example. And in this way also any just person is called a king, as is said in the Text. Now it is in this way that 'priest' is taken in the authorities adduced.

Articulus 33 — Whether The Priesthood Of The Old Law And Of The New Is The Same Priesthood

Whether the priesthood of the Old Law and of the New is the same priesthood?

Secondly it is asked: Whether the priesthood of the New and Old Testament is the same?

And it seems that it is: because § 1. Ezekiel 10:10: A wheel is in the midst of a wheel: therefore the priesthood is in the priesthood: therefore it is not distinguished.

§ 2. Furthermore, 1 Corinthians 10:3: All ate the same spiritual food. Therefore the spiritual food was prepared in the Old Testament just as in the New: and this is the priesthood of the New Testament: therefore the priesthood of the New and Old Testament is the same: because to whatever the proper [accident] belongs, to that also belongs that of which it is the proper [accident].

§ 3. Furthermore, Augustine says that the faith of the ancients and of the moderns was one. Therefore the charity is the same: therefore the priesthood is also the same.

IN CONTRARY to this is that: § 1. The Apostle says, Hebrews 7:12: For the priesthood being translated, it is necessary that a translation also be made of the law. Therefore he supposes that that priesthood has been translated. But the New remains, as he proves in the same place, because Christ is a priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek: therefore they are not the same priesthood.

§ 2. Furthermore, a priest of the Old Testament converting to the faith had to be ordained: but this would not be done if it were the same priesthood: therefore it is not the same.

RESPONSE. It must be said that it is not the same: but they differ as figure and truth: and thus the old is in the new as a figure in the truth: but the new is in the old as truth hidden in a figure. Hence the old is in the new openly through the showing of the signified truth: and therefore it is no longer kept, but has been translated. But the new is in the old hiddenly: and therefore it was kept until the revelation of this [new]: and this is what Ezekiel intends to say: and through this the solution to the first is clear.

To the other it must be said that they were not the same except through spiritual understanding and faith, and not according to species: because these things were understood in those: but the species of the sacraments on each side is different, and therefore a different rite, and a different power, and a different grace of the priests, as was held in the question concerning the keys.

To the other it must be said that the unity of the priesthood is not from the unity of faith, but rather from the unity of the power and rite of the sacraments.

Articulus 34 — In What Way The Character Of The Priesthood Unites To It The Characters Of The Preceding Orders

How does the character of the priesthood unite to itself the characters of the preceding orders?

Thirdly it is asked: How does the character of the priesthood unite to itself the characters of the preceding orders?

For whatever are many and not united, are simply many: if therefore the characters of the seven orders do not have something uniting [them], they will simply be many, and not one sacrament.

IN CONTRARY it is objected, that we see the acts of the orders to be divided: and just as acts are related, so are habits: therefore if the powers of the orders are divided: therefore also the characters [are divided].

RESPONSE. It must be said that the sacerdotal character alone is as the perfection of the sacrament, and all the others are dispositions.

To the argument to the contrary, it must be said, as was solved above in a similar question, that in every potestative whole the acts of the parts are distinct, but through this they are perfected in the subsequent and in the whole: because in that they receive perfection according to eminence: just as sensible cognition in the sense is imperfect, and is perfected more in reason and most of all in intellectuality. Hence all the characters of the preceding orders are as dispositions in this way to the ultimate order: and it is itself uniting in itself and perfecting them all.

Articulus 35 — Whether The Three Acts Of The Priesthood Set Down By The Master Are Sufficiently Assigned

Whether the three acts of the priesthood posited by the Master are sufficiently assigned?

Fourthly and lastly, it is asked concerning the acts of priests.

Now he seems to touch upon three in the Text, namely to confect the sacrament of the Eucharist, and to say prayers, and to bless gifts.

Now it is asked: § 1. Since the power of binding and loosing is conferred on priests alone, especially in the forum of confession: why does the Master not touch upon the act which is to bind and loose in the forum of confession?

§ 2. Furthermore, since several acts are given here, which is the principal one to which the character is conferred?

RESPONSE. It must be said that from the previous disputations on the keys, almost whatever can be asked concerning this order has been said.

Nevertheless it must be said to the first, that the Master here touches only upon the principal act of the priest, to which the order substantially [pertains], and not the secondary act: because this was sufficiently spoken of in the tractate on penance, where the keys were treated.

To the other it must be said that the principal act is to confect the Eucharist: and the others are adjoined for the suitability of those communicating in the Eucharist, and of the priest, such as prayers, blessings, and the like.

Note, however, that some here moralize all the vestments of the priests of the Old and New Testament, and the signs which are made in the Mass, and the things which the other ministers have for a habit and do: but because this is preaching rather than disputation, therefore it is entirely passed over by me, because it is not proper to this science.

Articulus 36 — Whether The Canons Properly Call Two Orders Sacred

Whether the canons rightly call two orders sacred?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says there, chapter 1, § 2, near the beginning: The canons excellently call only two orders sacred, etc.

For this seems contrary: § 1. To those things which were determined above, namely that there are three sacred orders.

§ 2. Furthermore, he seems to speak falsely in the Text: because nothing is a sacrament except from divine institution: but the inferior orders, especially the subdiaconate, are sacramental: therefore they were from divine institution: therefore [they were] from the beginning of the Church.

§ 3. Furthermore, he seems contrary to himself: because in every order he shows when and how Christ functioned in the office of that order: but it is certain that the Apostles and the primitive fathers did not neglect what Christ so solicitously exhibited in Himself: therefore those orders were in the primitive Church.

RESPONSE. It must be said that without doubt all the orders were in the primitive Church, and were instituted by Christ in that mode of institution which was determined above: but an order is observed in two ways, namely joined to another order, and disjoined. For in the primitive Church, on account of the scarcity of ministers and the great suitability of the recipients, because almost all were of excellent holiness, all the inferior orders were conferred with the diaconate: just as still in some Churches the first four are conferred together. But afterwards the number of ministers increased, and suitability decreased; and then the Church decreed that the orders should be divided among themselves. Hence the Master means that in the primitive Church they were not observed dividedly among the ministers.

And through this the solution to all except the first is clear.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the Master calls the orders sacred here for one reason, and they are called sacred today for another reason: because his reason is the authority of the primitive Church, which is sacred and worthy of veneration: but today they are called sacred from holiness, which although few have, yet all the ministers vow and profess it simply or in a qualified sense, as was said above in the question on the order of subdeacons.

Articulus 37 — Whether Order Is Well Defined In The Text By The Master

Whether order is well defined in the Text by the Master?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says there, chapter K: But if it is asked, What is it that is here called order?

And two things are asked, namely, What is order? and, What does it have as matter, and what as form?

To the first, let the two definitions posited in the Text be accepted. The first is this:

Order is a certain signet [signaculum], that is, a certain sacred thing by which spiritual power is handed over to the ordained, and an office.

The second is as if concluded from this:

A spiritual character where a promotion of power takes place, is called order or degree.

The third is of the ancient Masters, and it is this: Order is the sacrament of spiritual power ordained to some office in the Church for the sacrament of communion.

Now IT IS OBJECTED against the first: because § 1. Signet is either said of the character, or it designates exterior signs. If of the character: therefore since a character is also imprinted in two other sacraments, it seems that it ought to have been posited in their definition: and this is false: therefore neither ought it to be posited in the definition of this one. If it designates exterior signs: since these are in all the sacraments, 'signet' ought to be posited in all the sacraments when they are defined, as it seems: and this again is false.

§ 2. Furthermore, the exposition of 'signet' through 'sacred thing' seems bad: because many signets are not sacred, such as that of which it is read in Ezekiel 28:12: that it is the signet of resemblance, etc.

§ 3. Furthermore, it is better called a 'sacrament' than 'a certain sacred thing': because sacrament is the genus of order, whereas a sacred thing is outside the genus of order, because it also applies to a meritorious work, and to other things which are not sacraments.

§ 4. Furthermore, there is no mode of defining through a particular sign: for it means nothing to say, 'man is a certain animal': because if that were a definition, then the definition of man would also apply to a donkey, because a donkey is also a certain animal: therefore it seems that the definition is bad.

In the same way it is objected against the second, where he says, Character, etc.: because

§ 1. A character is imprinted in [other] sacraments: and yet they are not defined through character: therefore neither [should] this one.

§ 2. Furthermore, order and degree either mean a degree of nature, or a degree of dignity, or a degree of grace. If you say in the first way, it is false: because all men, ordained and not ordained, are of one nature: hence Gregory says that to be proud against nature is for a man to wish to be placed over a man. If in the second way. ON THE CONTRARY: That to which the recipient of the sacrament is promoted is the reality [res] of the sacrament: therefore if the recipient of the sacrament is promoted to a dignity, the dignity will be the reality of the sacrament: and this is false, because as he says here in the Text, grace is the reality of this and of all the other sacraments.

But if it is said that degree means a promotion in grace: then every sacrament will be an order or degree, because in every sacrament there is a promotion according to degree: and this again is false.

RESPONSE. It must be said that in truth the second definition of the Master corrects the first, and is an explanation of it. Hence the first is not a definition, but an investigation or assumption of the proximate genus. But the second he says to be of order.

To what is therefore first asked, I say that 'signet' supposits for 'character'.

To the argument to the contrary, it must be said that although a character is imprinted in two others, yet not a character of excellence or dignity, as in this one: and therefore it is specially posited in the definition of this one.

To the other it must be said that such a signet is always sacred, and the sign of a sacred thing, and a cause insofar as it is in itself: and yet the objection is not valid, because that is a signet of resemblance, which is expressed in the image of God: and there is an equivocation in the argument.

To the other it must be said that 'sacred thing' is posited there as contracting 'signet' to its proper genus: and this is the same as a sacrament which is truly a sacrament imprinting a character: hence 'signet' is a more immediate genus taken in this way, than 'sacrament': and therefore it is more fittingly posited in the definition.

To the other it must be said that the word quoddam [a certain] intends nothing except to distinguish the equivocation which is in 'signet', as was said. Or better it may be said, that he intends through a particular sign to take a genus under a genus, namely a sacred signet under sacrament, and thus to conclude a true definition: and this can well be done when we are hunting for a definition.

To that which is first objected against the true definition, the solution is clear through what has been said before.

To the other it must be said that degree is of dignity.

To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that one is promoted to two things by the exterior sacrament, namely to that which is reality and sign [res et signum], and therefore substantially a sacrament, and this is the character of excellence according to dignity: and one is promoted to that which is reality only [res tantum], and this is grace.

Articulus 38 — What There Is In The Sacrament Of Order Concerning Matter And Form

What is in the sacrament of order as matter and form?

What is in the sacrament of order as matter and form?

Secondly it is asked: What is here as matter, and what as form?

For every sacrament (as the Master said above) consists in things and words. And Augustine says the same. It is asked: What is the matter, especially in the inferior orders?

For it seems that it ought to be chrism or oil consecrated by a Bishop: because

§ 1. In excellent sacraments the matters ought to be excellently prepared: but this one is excellent: therefore the matter ought to be sanctified by a Bishop.

§ 2. Furthermore, as some say, the keys or candlesticks, books of exorcisms, the chalice, which are given to the ordained in the orders, are the matter of this sacrament: then it seems that just as baptism does not exist without water and oil, and confirmation without chrism, etc., so ordination cannot exist without these: therefore if someone does not touch them, he is not ordained, which would be grave to say.

RESPONSE. It must be said that the matter is those things which are enumerated, and are extended by the Bishop to the ordained.

But to the first it must be said that the matter is not sanctified on account of excellence, because it is not sanctified in baptism: but on account of the act which these sacraments confer, as was clear when they were treated. Hence this sacrament has for matter that in which its act and effect is shown through similitude: and the acts of these orders are shown in the instruments which are extended to them by the Bishop.

To the other it must be said that nothing is required except the extending, and the touching pertains to the well-being [bene esse]: because as was said, in this sacrament is the form signifying the handing over of power: and this is signified by the whole extension, when he to whom it is extended does not expressly dissent: for he is understood to have accepted, when he shows that he does not dissent when he is presented to accept. But others say otherwise: but it is not to be heeded, because they have little reason.

Articulus 39 — Whether The Episcopate, And The Others Which The Master Enumerates, Are Orders

Whether the Episcopate, and the other things which the Master enumerates, are orders?

Whether the Episcopate, and the other things which the Master enumerates, are orders?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says there, chapter M: But the order of Bishops is quadripartite, etc.

And two things are asked, namely whether those things which he enumerates here are orders? And secondly, When and how are they conferred?

To the first it seems that they are orders: because § 1. They are powers for divine acts in the Church, such as to veil nuns, to consecrate Churches, and the like: therefore they are orders.

§ 2. Also, this is a signet of the promotion of power: therefore from the definition they are orders.

RESPONSE. All this is clear through what has been said before: for since there can be no more excellent act than to confect the body of Christ, there can be no order after the priesthood: but those which he enumerates are distinct offices of jurisdiction over the mystical body, to which those thus officiated intend: and when they obtain them, they receive grace not for an order, but for the execution of jurisdiction in the Church if they are worthy.

And through this the solution to the objections is clear: because when it is said that order is a promotion of power, it is not understood of the power of jurisdiction, but rather of operating concerning the sacrament of the Eucharist.

Articulus 40 — When And In What Way The Aforesaid Are Conferred

When and how are the aforesaid conferred?

Secondly it is asked: When and how are they conferred?

§ 1. For the Apostle says, Hebrews 7:7: that without any contradiction, that which is less is blessed by the better. Therefore an Archbishop is not blessed by a Bishop: therefore neither is he consecrated: therefore no jurisdiction is conferred on him: but according to every usage of the Church, an Archbishop is blessed by a Bishop: therefore, etc.

§ 2. The same is the objection concerning the Lord Pope, whom the Bishop of Ostia blesses.

§ 3. Furthermore, since Dionysius in the epistle to the monk Demophilus seems to distinguish only priests and Bishops in the hierarchy: whence comes this quadripartite order of Bishops?

§ 4. Furthermore, there are Primates in the Church, whom he passes over here: therefore it is insufficient, as it seems.

To this it seems it must be said that 'order' is here called a degree of dignity according to jurisdiction, as was said before: and it is called an order because it exercises certain sacred acts of jurisdiction.

But to this which is objected, it must be said that an Archbishop is not consecrated by a Bishop, but rather a Bishop by him: but the Archiepiscopal right is conferred on him by the Pope with the pallium: hence since he is a major Bishop, he is not blessed by a Bishop.

To the other it must be said that even the Supreme Pontiff is not consecrated by the Bishop of Ostia insofar as he is supreme, but only insofar as he is pontiff: but the jurisdiction of the universality of power descends into him from the Lord, from the fact that he succeeds Peter.

To the other it must be said that Dionysius comprehends three orders under the hierarchies, namely the Primacy, the Archiepiscopate, and the Papacy.

To the other it must be said that Master Hugh calls Archbishops those whom the Church now calls Primates: whereas those whom the Church now calls Archbishops, he calls Metropolitans.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 12 — How Remedies Of That Sin Can Be Acquired

How remedies for that sin can be acquired

Sixthly it is asked, How the remedies for that sin are to be acquired?

Now it seems, that they are acquired by dispensation: because 1. It is certain that he who has the universality of power has the power of dispensing: but a dispensation is a relaxation of law: therefore what he is bound by law to do can be relaxed for him: but by law he is bound to be worthy in life and knowledge: therefore this can be relaxed for him.

1. Further, we see this being done all day in the Curia of the Lord Pope, concerning which it is not lawful to presume that anything unjust is being done: therefore it seems that this can be done by dispensation.
2. Further, it is not ours to judge of a dispensation: therefore it seems that either he with whom it is dispensed is entirely deceived, or he is absolved from the sin.

Against this is what Bernard says to Pope Eugene, that if a dispensation lacks a cause of public utility or legitimate necessity, the dispensation is not a dispensation, but a dissipation.

Response. It must be said that with an unworthy person a dispensation can never be made in such a way that he himself does not sin mortally by any act of administration, as long as he is unworthy. For the Lord Pope, as he himself protests in a certain Decretal, leaves each one to his own conscience with respect to God: but sometimes, because it is necessary to tolerate evils lest worse ones happen, he dispenses in this way, that in the judgment of men what has been dispensed cannot be objected against them.

To this therefore which is first objected, it must be said that he has the universality of power over human judgments, but not over divine judgment: and this is the judgment of conscience.

To the next it must be said that abuses do not diminish evils, but aggravate them: and therefore if in such dispensations a prelate does anything, he himself sins mortally. But if he endures it, compelled by the necessity of an evil lest a worse one happen, then he does not sin mortally, but then he does not dispense, but dissimulates for a time until it can be corrected.

To the next it must be said that it is true, that it is not ours to be judges: but yet it is ours to be doctors, and to know speculatively what is worthy and what is just, and to say this to others: hence we do not know by way of judgment in order to correct or punish: but we know by way of those wise in the law of God, what accords with the law of God and what discords from it, by whomever of men it is done, whether superior or inferior.

Articulus 13 — Whether The Crown Is An Order Or Only A Disposition To Order

Whether the tonsure is an order or only a disposition to an order?

Whether the corona [tonsure] is an order or only a disposition to an order?

§ 1. Next, inquiry is made concerning what he says, there, B, a little before the middle: For the corona is a seal, by which they are sealed, etc.[669]

§ 2. For it seems that the corona is an order: because 1. In all spiritual matters, exterior things are done for the sake of interior things: but an exterior seal is made in the corona:

therefore, it is made for the sake of an interior seal: but the interior seal is the character: therefore, the corona imprints a character: but whatever imprints a character, establishing one in a grade of dignity in the Church, is an order: [therefore] the corona is an order.

§ 3. 2. Furthermore, the corona is either purely corporeal, or a spiritual thing is held in the corporeal. If purely corporeal: then it could be conferred by anyone, which is false: because today it cannot be conferred except by a Bishop. But if a spiritual thing is received in the corporeal: then it is a sacrament by the definition of a sacrament: but it is certain that there is no sacrament except that of Order: therefore the corona is an order which is a sacrament.

§ 4. 3. Furthermore, it belongs to the excellent ones in the Church to give something excellent, as is evident in confirmation, where the excellent ones in the Church give the Holy Spirit for strength: but the corona is not given in the Church except by the excellent ones in the Church, such as Bishops: therefore in it they give something excellent: but nothing excellent is corporeal: therefore it seems that they give something spiritual: and this cannot be anything except a character: therefore it imprints a character: therefore it is an order.

§ 5. 4. Furthermore, in baptism where a man is distinguished from an unbaptized person, a character is imprinted: therefore also in the corona where a man is distinguished into the lot of the Lord: but this is done in the corona: therefore it seems that a character is imprinted in the corona.

§ 6. To the contrary of this is that: 1. By the Master in the Letter only seven orders are distinguished: and the corona is not one of them: therefore the corona is not an order.

§ 7. 2. Furthermore, every excellent form in nature demands many dispositions on the part of the matter: therefore it will be similar in grace: but the excellent thing in grace is order: therefore it pre-requires dispositions on the part of the recipient. But the first thing that is received is the corona: therefore it seems that the corona is the first disposition to order, and not an order.

§ 8. We concede this, saying to the first, that exterior things in the corona are done for the sake of interior things: but the interior thing which corresponds to the corona is the unveiling of the mind toward divine things, so that a man may thus be disposed to receive order: and it is not a character or an order.

§ 9. To the next it must be said that the corona is not purely corporeal, but is corporeal ordained to the spiritual: but this spiritual thing is partly conjoined, and partly consequent: for the conjoined thing is the unveiling of the mind toward divine things, as has been said; but the consequent thing is the order which is received.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that this is not the reason why it cannot be conferred except by a Bishop, because something excellent in the corona is conferred: because sometimes it used to be conferred by non-Bishops. But this was instituted so that those who are being prepared to receive orders may be known by the Bishop: because one must act with greater solicitude regarding such men: and therefore they were instituted to pass through the corona to the hand and acknowledgment of the Bishop.

DISTINCTIO XXV

Divisio Textus

It is also usually asked, If heretics, etc. In this chapter of the distinction two things are contained, namely, whether heretics can give sacred orders?

And, concerning the diversities of simony, there, D, But concerning simoniacs there is no ambiguity, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Heretics Cut Off From The Church Can Confer Orders

Whether heretics cut off from the Church can confer orders?

Concerning the first the Master disputes much in the Text: and we ask there: Whether heretics cut off from the Church can confer sacred orders, or not?

And it seems that they cannot: § 1. Everything which descends from one into another, descends into him either by personal merit, or by the merit of the Church: but in a heretic there is nothing of personal merit, nor of the merit of the Church, since he is cut off from the Church, as has been posited: therefore nothing descends through him: therefore nothing is conferred: therefore neither is order.

§ 3. Furthermore, no wise person works toward the destruction of his own work. But if a heretic, as it says, were to confer the sacraments of the Church, this would be to the destruction of the Church: therefore the author of the Church does not work that work: but the author of the Church works every effect of a sacrament: therefore he works nothing through cut-off heretics: therefore they confer nothing.

IN CONTRARY it is objected thus: § 1. In the collation of the sacraments nothing operates except form and intention: if therefore these are preserved by a heretic, of necessity the effect, which is the sacrament, will be conferred by the heretic.

§ 2. Furthermore, in the collation of the sacraments a bad minister does not differ from a good one: therefore neither does a faithful one from an unfaithful one, provided he preserves the form and intention of the sacrament: therefore even those cut off confer [them]: and...

In this part also many authorities are adduced in the Text.

The Master, however, to resolve these matters, introduces four opinions, which are known to one inspecting the Text. But among moderns there is no doubt concerning this; because all sacraments are conferred by heretics, whether they still exist inside the Church or even outside it, provided they are priests or Bishops, or in other orders in which they can minister the sacraments, and provided they preserve the form and intention of the Church.

Therefore, according to this, it must be said to the first, that a sacrament does not take place by the merit of the Church, but by the power of the institutor, who gave this power to man, so that when he preserves the form and intention, such or such a sacrament is effected.

To the next it must be said that this channel is joined to the Church through the likeness of form and intention: and these suffice, as has been said.

To the next it must be said that God does not operate for the destruction of His own work, but rather for its construction: because He shows the power of His own work even by operating through evil men: and on account of this the Church adheres to Him all the more, and the damnation of heretics is more just.

Articulus 2 — What Simony Is

What is simony?

Next it is inquired concerning the second part, concerning that which is said there, D, Concerning simoniacs, etc.

Now four things are inquired here concerning simony. First, what is it? Second, whether it is a heresy, as it seems to say in the Text? Third, whether an inferior can commit simony with a superior? Fourth, in what ways is simony committed?

For the first, the definition of the Jurists is taken, who commonly define it thus:

Simony is the deliberate will of buying or selling a spiritual thing, or a thing annexed to a spiritual thing.

Therefore it is inquired: What is called a deliberate (studiosa) will? 1. For either this is one that strives to go out into act, and does not go out: or one that is perfected, and goes out. If in the first way: then the will of buying a spiritual thing would be simony, which is false, as is clear below in the division of simony. But if it is that which strives and goes out into the act of buying or selling: then many simonies take place in the selling of chalices and other vessels of the Church: which again is false, since such things can be done licitly.

1. Furthermore, it seems that the will alone without deliberation suffices for simony: because simony is baser than usury: and someone is a usurer from the mere hope of gain: therefore it seems that one is also a simoniac from the mere will or hope of buying.

Furthermore, this seems to be the case from Acts 8:18 et seq.,[670] where Simon never bought a spiritual thing, but only willed to buy it: and yet he was a simoniac, such that all simoniacs are named after him: therefore it seems that the will alone makes a simoniac.

1. Furthermore it is inquired: Why does it say deliberate? For that which is done out of ignorance is done without deliberation: but there are many who are ignorant that spiritual things ought not to be put under a price: therefore if they put spiritual things under a price by buying or selling, they do not have a deliberate will in this: therefore they do not commit simony, which is absurd.

Also, Tully says that deliberation (studium) is a vehement application of the mind to doing something. Therefore it seems that this is not present in buying or selling: and therefore it is badly posited in this definition.

1. Furthermore it is inquired concerning that part which says, Of buying or selling a spiritual thing. For there was a deliberate will to buy the vessel of the tomb [i.e. right of burial] in Abraham, when he made an agreement with Ephron concerning the double cave of the field;[671] and yet he is not called a simoniac: therefore the definition is false, as it seems.
2. Furthermore, nothing is more spiritual than the kingdom of heaven: and yet it is bought and sold all day long, as it seems, Matthew 13:45: The kingdom of heaven is like to a merchant man seeking good pearls, etc.[672] And Augustine says: He holds it for sale. Gregory: this, etc. The kingdom of heaven is worth as much as you have. Therefore it seems that other spiritual things can also be sold.
3. Furthermore, it is inquired what is called annexed to a spiritual thing? For nothing is annexed to itself: therefore a spiritual thing is not annexed to itself: therefore what is annexed to a spiritual thing is a bodily thing. But a bodily thing can be sold, which is annexed to a spiritual thing, as is clear when a knight sells a villa in which he has the right of patronage: therefore the definition is false.

Response. To this it seems that the definition is good: and that which is said, Deliberate will, speaks of the will with the effect of the work as far as it is on the part of the simoniac. And that it says, Of buying or selling, speaks of the proper act of simony. And that it says, A spiritual thing or what is annexed to a spiritual thing, speaks of the matter.

Therefore to the first it must be said that it speaks of the will with the act on the part of the simoniac.

To the objection against this, it must be said that chalices and such things are spiritual according to the fourth mode of spirituality, as will be clear below: and such things can be sold: and this is the solution of the Decretists, and it has no reason. Hence it must be said that when it says, Of buying or selling a spiritual thing, it is understood insofar as it is spiritual, that the buying or selling falls upon the spiritual thing insofar as it is spiritual, so that the spirituality increases the price: and then the definition is true, because thus simony is committed as much in chalices as in other things.

To the next it must be said that although this sin is baser, nevertheless it is perfected in something other than usury, because in an external act, whereas for perfection the completed will suffices. And there is a counter-instance: because murder is baser than usury, and a greater sin: and yet it is not completed in the will alone as usury is.

To the next it must be said that deliberation (studium) here is taken for the diligence applied by the simoniac himself to perfect the sin: and therefore the equivocation deceives, because it is not defined in that sense by Tully.

To the next it must be said that ignorance excuses no one: and someone can well be diligent in that which he is ignorant of whether it is a sin, yet he knows it insofar as it is a certain act which he strives and intends to do.

To the next it must be said that Abraham was not a simoniac, but Ephron was, as Jerome says, because he knew that unless he gave something for the redemption of his right, he would be molested in the future by him: and if it pleased Jerome it could be said that neither was a simoniac: because he did not buy a cemetery, but rather a non-sacred place, namely the field of a certain peasant named Ephron: and afterwards he made a cemetery out of it, because he buried the bodies of the Saints there, in which the Holy Spirit had rested: and this it is always licit for any man to do.

To the next it must be said that the kingdom of heaven is not properly bought, but merited: for a properly bought thing passes from the dominion of the seller into the possession and dominion of the buyer: but here he who buys the kingdom of heaven passes into the dominion of the seller of it, so that the Lord of the kingdom of heaven possesses even this buyer.

Another cause of the same is assigned: because buying in this way he gives nothing to God which was not His own, but only orders to the Lord what was disordered by sin: and this is a work of virtue which every man ought to do.

To the next it must be said that what is annexed to a spiritual thing is called annexed to spiritual things: because it ought not to be had except by spiritual persons, or places, such as the right of patronage: which even if a knight is said to have it, yet he does not have it except for the uses of spiritual persons and places: and thereby the objection ceases, because numerically the same thing is not annexed to itself, but the same in genus or species.

Articulus 3 — Whether Simony Is Heresy

Whether simony is a heresy?

Secondly it is inquired, Whether it is a heresy, as is said in the Text?

670. Acts 8:18.

But it seems that it is not: because 1. To Titus 3:10, on that text: A man that is a heretic, after the first and second admonition, avoid,[673] the Gloss says: Heretics are those who impugn the law through the words of the law: but simoniacs are not such: therefore they are not heretics.

1. Furthermore, above Augustine says that a heretic is one who, for the sake of some temporal advantage, and especially for the sake of glory and his own principality, begets or follows false or new questions: but a simoniac does not do such things: therefore it seems that he is not a heretic.
2. Also, heresy is in knowable or credible matters: but simony is only in operable matters: therefore simony is not a heresy.

If perhaps you say that he errs in operations. Against this: because if this were so, since every evil man is ignorant, every evil man would be a heretic, which is false: therefore, etc.

Response. To this it must be said, according to some, that heresy is to attribute to God what is not fitting to Him, as Augustine says in the book On the Trinity: and the simoniac does this: therefore they call him a heretic, because he says it is fitting for him that His [God's] things and he himself be put under a price. But it seems wondrous if this moved the holy fathers.

To the next it must be said that simony is a heresy; because simoniacs do not attribute this by asserting it, but by willing to possess it in whatever way possible. Hence it seems it must be said that just as Jerome says, and as was noted above, heresy is incurred from words inordinately uttered, especially when those words are about spiritual things to be believed and hoped for. Now there are two things which we believe and hope for concerning spiritual things: namely, that they exist, and that they infinitely exceed these worldly things in value, because they are things which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man, what things God hath prepared for them that love him.[674] Against the first of these, therefore, heresy strictly taken sins. But against the second simony directly sins: because it posits them as viler than the temporal things for which it sells and buys them: and therefore it is called a heresy.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that there heresy is taken strictly insofar as it is opposed to things to be believed on the part of the knowledge which is had of them, that they exist. And it is similarly taken by Augustine above, dist. XIII. But simony sins rather against the value which one ought to believe to be in the spiritual things themselves.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 4 — Whether An Inferior Together With A Superior Can Commit Simony

Whether an inferior can commit simony with a superior?

Thirdly it is inquired: Whether an inferior can commit simony with a superior: and especially someone of the Church with the Lord Pope?

671. Genesis 23:9.

And it seems that he cannot: because 1. Jacob did not commit simony by buying that which was owed to him by succession, but rather Esau did, who willed to give it in another way: therefore since all things of the Churches are entrusted to the Lord Pope, it seems that he never commits simony by receiving from ecclesiastical persons for spiritual things, since they otherwise would not give to him.

1. Furthermore, no person has a right in ecclesiastical goods except through the jurisdiction of the Lord Pope: therefore just as the person himself receives, so the Pope can receive.

To the contrary of this is that: 1. Simony is called simony from the contract which Simon willed to make with Peter, who was the Pope of the Apostles: therefore much more can simony be committed with other Popes.

1. Furthermore, one who aids toward mortal sin, and does not impede when he can impede, sins with an equal sin as the doer, as the Saints say: but the Pope knows that this man can commit simony with him, and he commits it: therefore if he does not prohibit it, but aids by deceiving and granting what he asks, he himself sins with an equal sin: therefore he is made a simoniac.

Response. It must be said that in truth I well think that he can commit simony: nor does this seem doubtful to me, when he sells a spiritual thing.

To the first therefore it must be said that it was not similar: but rather the right of the firstborn had been given by the Lord to Jacob: and therefore it was a redemption from the vexation which he caused rather than a contract of buying. But the goods of the Churches are not given to Prelates to possess, but to dispense for the uses of others, namely the poor: hence they cannot buy and sell or even give at their own pleasure to whomever they will: but they are to be expended for the general necessities of the Church or the uses of the poor or of the persons of the Church.

To the next it must be said that it is true that no one has a right in the Churches except through him: but nevertheless I do not think this is from the fact that they are his, and that he confers them as his own, but because the patronage of defense has been collated upon him: just as the legislator also says that all things belong to the Emperor for defense and protection: for as Basil says, and Aristotle had said before him, a tyrant is one who extorts all things for his own uses, and does not seek the utility of his subjects.

Articulus 5 — In What Ways Simony Is Committed

In what ways is simony committed?

Fourthly it is inquired: In what ways is simony committed?

Now many ways are posited by the Jurists, which are noted in these verses:

672. Matthew 13:45.

A gift, a tongue, fear, flesh with popular fame, Do not make a spiritual thing to be given for free. Or thus: Praise and kinship, violent request, gifts, Vile service, sell the spiritual right.

Therefore it is inquired concerning these: 1. For praise is a gift from the mouth. But, as the Philosopher says, praise is properly about an act of virtue, and about virtue according as the act proceeds from it, and it is sought from the good and the known: but it is established that the good according to virtue intend nothing evil: therefore they do not intend to buy spiritual things: therefore simony is not committed through praise.

1. Furthermore, praise is not a bodily gift, because fame is necessary even for the Saints: therefore in praise a spiritual thing is not given for a bodily thing, but rather for a spiritual thing: therefore simony is not committed.
2. Similarly, kinship does not seem to make simony: because in all simony there is a contract: but kinship brings it about that a gift is given without a contract: therefore kinship destroys simony rather than making it. The first is proved by this, that in the definition of simony there falls buying or selling, which do not happen without a contract. But the second is established by this, that kinship is for conciliating friendship, which makes gifts to be given for free.
3. Furthermore, we see that the priesthood of the Old Testament was held by right of propinquity, and all the other grades of the Levites: therefore it seems that kinship can also be a reason for holding spiritual dignities in the Church: therefore it does not make simony.
4. In the same way an objection is raised concerning what he calls a violent request. Because there seems to be a contradiction in terms: because if one requests, one does not compel: and if one compels, one does not request: because a request is made to incline a free will to act for the petition: whereas violence excludes the will from the extremes, because violence is (as the Philosopher says) that whose principle is in another, with the one suffering force contributing nothing: now principle denotes a factive cause, as Damascene says: therefore it seems that there is no violent request, or armed prayers.
5. Furthermore an objection is raised concerning gifts. Because the Philosopher says that a gift is an unreturnable giving: therefore gifts do not seek that something be given for the gifts, neither spiritual nor temporal: therefore they do not constitute simony.
6. Lastly also concerning vile service. For vile service is in vile things: therefore if one were to serve in honorable things, he would not seem to commit simony: and this is false: therefore it seems that these are none of the things which are said to make simony.

Furthermore, it is inquired concerning cases occurring all day long, namely of hypocrites, who sell long prayers for the praise of men, whether they are simoniacs?

And it seems that they are: because they give a spiritual thing for a temporal thing.

Furthermore, cloistered monks or canons indeed make no pact: but yet they delay for so long and consider the circumstances, until they probabilistically know what the one to be received as a confrere will give: and if then it is much, they receive him: if it seems little, they refuse. Therefore it is inquired: Whether they are simoniacs?

It seems that they are: because a cause is (as the Philosopher says) that which being posited the effect is posited, and being destroyed it is destroyed: but among them, with such an emolument posited which they conjecture they will perceive, they offer the prebend, and when it ceases they do not confer it: therefore the temporal thing is the cause of conferring the prebend: therefore they commit simony.

If perhaps you say that they do not inquire by themselves, but others in their place, who nevertheless are their procurators. Against this: It does not differ to do by oneself or by another, where the whole cause of the collation of the prebend is the expectation of temporal gain: because by whomever it is done, they themselves expect this in return for the collation: therefore simony is committed in whatever way it is done.

But if this is said: 1. Then all places of religion would perish: because so many would be placed there that the goods would not suffice: and this seems to be inconvenient.

1. Furthermore, it is not evil to induce men to alms: therefore if they induce that by receiving him they might confer an alms, whom otherwise they would not receive, it is not evil: therefore it is not simony.

Response. It seems it must be said, as the Jurists say, that the spiritual is fourfold.

For a certain kind is not possible to be sold on account of its spirituality, because it communicates nothing with bodily things, and therefore cannot pass into the dominion of another, such as the gifts of the Holy Spirit themselves, and the virtues, and the beatitudes.

A certain kind is spiritual in the second place, which is essentially entirely spiritual, yet given in bodily things, such as sacramental graces: and therefore this indeed cannot be sold by its own nature and by right: but it is sold in hope on the part of the bodily work, which is in the power of the ministers: but it is never sold without simony.

A third kind is not essentially spiritual, but rather bodily: but attributed to spiritual persons, to sustain them in spiritual exercises, such as prebends, and other revenues of the Churches: and therefore these are sold: but simony is committed in them by reason of the spiritual thing to which they are attributed.

In the fourth and last mode of spirituality, inanimate bodily things are called spiritual, by which certain spiritual things are treated, such as the vessels of the beauty of the house of God, like chalices, a thurible, crosses, books, and the like: and only of these is it true that they can be sold without the commission of simony. But they differ, for either a Church sells to another Church: and then they can be sold whole without the price being increased for the consecration of their value. Or they are sold to lay persons: and then they must first be broken up and melted down by sacred persons, with a prayer premitted for the indulgence of the breaking. As for cemeteries, they seem to have a spiritual right: for either they are only consecrated: or bodies are buried there. If they are only consecrated, they say that they can be deconsecrated and reduced to other uses. But if the bodies of the blessed are buried there, since the ash of the bodies cannot be separated from the rest of the earth, just as the body of a Saint cannot be sold and reduced to other uses, because of the Holy Spirit, whose temple it was while he lived: so neither can the place of burial of that body be reduced to other uses.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that it is one thing for which praise ought to be, and another for which it is: for the Philosopher touches upon only that which ought to be praised: but nevertheless the impious man is praised when he has done evil: and therefore when the reason for giving a spiritual thing is praise, it becomes simony.

To the next it must be said that popular praise has nothing spiritual in it: rather it is more temporal even than time itself: because it is rarer, and is dissolved into the air: but the fame of the Saints is in spiritual things, and therefore is spiritual.

To the next it must be said that it is similarly understood that kinship must be the cause and reason of giving: for if goodness of life were the cause and kinship the con-cause, it would not be simony, because kinship is a bodily thing and derived from the flesh.

But to the argument it must be said that buying and selling are not taken so strictly in the definition of simony: but it is called selling when whatever price causes spiritual things to be given, with price taken in a broad way for every temporal thing which is the whole and sole cause of the giving.

To the next it must be said that the priesthood of the Old Testament did not have the spirit, but was a shadow of the spiritual priesthood: but the New has the spirit: and therefore the spiritual things of the new priesthood ought to be given in the liberty of the spirit.

To the next it must be said that a violent request is taken there for that which induces fear in a constant man. Now I call fear the loss of things, or the injury of fame or person. For when this is the cause of giving, simony is committed.

To the argument it must be said that violent is not taken so strictly here: but for violence here the necessary mixed with violence suffices: such as is the throwing of merchandise into the sea in a time of storm: for of such things the Philosopher says that they are mixed from the voluntary and the involuntary: and this suffices here to lose the liberality of the donation of spiritual things.

To the next it must be said that every temporal service which is the cause of giving spiritual things is vile in comparison to spiritual things, even if it is honorable or useful simply speaking: and thus vile service is understood here.

To the last it must be said that in the giving of a prebend three things seem to me to be considered, namely the poverty of the place, the liberty of the spiritual things, and the intention of the salvation of the one to be received. If the place is poor, it seems that a prebend cannot be conferred without much burdening of the persons dwelling there, no matter how liberally they would will, if they could, to give a spiritual thing, and to intend the salvation of the one to be received: and then it seems to me that by themselves or by others providing for them they could say that if their goods were to increase, they would gladly receive him, and otherwise they could not receive him. Now I understand increase as with a notable increase, so that the person received can be sustained without notable burdening of the others in that place. But if they do not increase, that they cannot receive him. But to receive under a pact, especially when there is no necessity of the place, is openly simony.

But to the argument it must be said that this does not make the cause of the giving, but rather necessity extorts it: because they would gladly give for free: and therefore they have an eye to this in the collation.

But to the authority of the Philosopher it must be said that what he says is true in natural things: but in voluntary things it fails every day: because it can well be that I will something simply speaking for a good and honorable cause, and yet I am not able: and then with something posited I do it, which not being posited I do not do it: and it is not the cause of the doing according as it proceeds from my will, as is clear to anyone.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 6 — Why Sellers Of Spiritual Things Are Called Simoniacs, Although They Do Not Follow Simon But Rather Gehazi

Why are sellers of spiritual things called simoniacs, since they do not follow Simon, but rather Gehazi?

Next it is inquired concerning that which it says there, G, But the simoniacal heresy, etc.

It is inquired: 1. Since sellers do not imitate Simon, but rather Gehazi, why are they called simoniacs?

1. Also it is inquired: Since simoniacs do not have the right of perceiving prebends, are they held to restitution?

It seems that they are: because they perceive what is not theirs.

1. Furthermore it is inquired concerning a certain case. For let us posit that I know my Bishop to be a simoniac, or otherwise irregular, and latently so. He is still tolerated by the Church. And orders are impending: and it is commanded to me that I receive orders; what ought I to do? For if I receive from a simoniac, I am to be degraded: but if I do not receive, I am disobedient: therefore I am perplexed.

Response. It must be said to the first that they are called simoniacs broadly whether they buy or sell: because Simon also thought to sell the purchased grace afterwards: however there is a verse noting the difference:

What Gehazi sells, Simon seeks to buy (hire).

To the next it seems it must be said that if he knowingly committed simony, he is held to restitution. But if it was committed for him by others while he was ignorant of it, he is not held to it as long as he is ignorant: but after he knows, he is held to it, as it seems.

To the next it must be said that in such a case I ought to seek permission, or another way of evading: but if I cannot have it, I ought to seek an escape from obedience: but if I cannot have even this, I ought sorrowfully to receive the order of the title.

To the argument to the contrary, it must be said that it is not understood of those who are latent, whom the Church still tolerates. But today this scarcely has a place, because almost no one except a money-changer has a place in the temple.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Canons Have Well Determined Concerning The Age Of Those To Be Ordained, Although It Is Not Observed

Whether the canons have well disposed concerning the age of those to be ordained, since nevertheless it is not observed?

Next it is inquired concerning that which it says there: The sacred canons, he says, etc.

For today this is not observed, especially in religious orders: therefore it seems that they violate the canons of the holy fathers: and this is a mortal sin.

Response. It must be said that just as in marriage malice sometimes makes up for age, so conversely in religious orders gravity of morals and discipline make up for age: especially since what is said here concerns those who are promoted not to orders only, but also to jurisdiction, such as archdeacons and Bishops.

And let these things concerning Order be said by us for the present time.

DISTINCTIO XXVI

Divisio Textus

§ 7. Division of the Text

Since other sacraments after sin, etc. In this part the Author inquires concerning four things regarding marriage: namely, first concerning the cause. Second, concerning the effect, namely where he treats of the goods of marriage, dist. XXXI, there at A, After these things concerning the goods of marriage, etc. Third, concerning its state, dist. XXXIII, there at A, It is inquired here concerning the ancient fathers, etc. Fourth, concerning the matter, namely which persons are legitimate, and which are not, dist. XXXIV, there at A, Now it remains to consider which persons are legitimate, etc.

Regarding the first, two things are inquired. The first is concerning the cause of the institution of marriage. The second is concerning the cause of marriage itself in itself: and this is touched upon in dist. XXVII, there at A, After these things it must be noted, etc.

In this distinction he does three things: for first he touches upon the institutions of marriage. But because God instituted nothing except what is good, therefore in the second part he reprobates the error of certain heretics who say that marriage is evil, there at E, There were some heretics, etc. But because again from its institution every sacrament is signifying, as Master Hugh says, therefore in the third part he shows what is the thing (res) and what is the sign (signum) in this sacrament, there at F, Since therefore conjugal union is a sacrament, etc.

And from these things the Text is sufficiently clear.

Articulus 1 — Why Marriage Was Instituted

Why was marriage instituted?

Now first a question arises concerning that which it says there, A, Since other sacraments, etc.

1. For in Luke 10:34,[675] it is said that the bindings of the sacraments are the bound wounds of the wounded: but bindings are not necessary except for the wounded: therefore sacraments are not necessary except for one wounded by sins: but the rationale of a sacrament and of every sacrament is the same: therefore it belongs to every sacrament to bind up the wounded: therefore to this one as well: therefore what it says in the Text is false.
2. Also, a sacrament by itself is ordered against sin, as was noted in the beginning of these notes on the fourth book of the Sentences: therefore if there is no sin, neither will there be a sacrament: but if it is not a sacrament, it is not marriage, by an argument from genus: therefore if there is no sin, there is no marriage: and thus again it speaks falsely in the Text.
3. Also, grace differs in sacraments, and virtues, and gifts, as was proved above: since therefore every sacramental grace is ordered against sin, it seems that the grace of marriage also is ordered against the same.
4. Also, as the door and foundation of the sacraments stands, so stand all the things built upon it: but the door of the sacraments, which is baptism, is ordered against the wound of sin: therefore all the things built upon it as well: but one of the things built upon it is marriage: therefore marriage is ordered against sin.
5. Also, whatever is done according to indulgence is ordered against sin: but marriage is done according to indulgence: therefore it is ordered against sin. The first and second propositions are written later in this same distinction in the Text.

6. Also, to what is maximally corrupted, a medicine is maximally necessary: but the generative power is maximally corrupted: therefore a medicine is maximally necessary for it: but it has no medicine except marriage: therefore marriage is its medicine: but it is established that a medicine is not ordered except against a disease: therefore marriage is ordered against the disease of sin.

7. Also, that in which a disease is first felt, against that a medicine is principally ordered: but the disease is first felt in the genitals: therefore the medicine against this is found first: but this medicine is marriage: therefore marriage is a medicine, and only that, as before.

To the contrary of this is that: 1. Those who do not pay attention to the medicine for sin ordain the laws of marriage, such as the civil laws: therefore it is not only against sin. 2. Also, even if sin had not existed there would still have been multiplication: but not except through marriage: therefore marriage would have existed even if sin had not existed: therefore it is not spiritually or substantially ordered against sin. 3. The things which are said in the Text, which are supposed for the present, argue to the same conclusion.

Response. It must be said with the Master that marriage does not have a substantial order against sin: but it is principally for an office, in which office nevertheless a remedy is found against the wound which occurred from sin.

§ 1. To the first, therefore, it must be said that all sacraments are bandages for the wounds of the injured; but this bandage is applied partly by those newly instituted, and partly also by those instituted beforehand, but which nevertheless draw their medicinal effect from the passion of Christ. Hence that which is a sacrament could have existed before sin; but nevertheless, according as a sacrament is the anointing of a wound, thus it was instituted against sin.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that every sacrament, insofar as it is a sacrament, or an action healing by its own consecration, is ordered against sin; but nevertheless it is not necessary that everything that is a sacrament have this, as is clear from what has been said before.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that this difference is accidental to sacramental grace as such, and does not belong to that which is a sacrament if it is taken generally.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that baptism is the foundation of matrimony according to a certain respect. For it is its foundation with respect to making persons simply legitimate: because those who are of disparate worship can, in some cases, be separated; but according to the substance of matrimony it is not the foundation of matrimony. And therefore it is not necessary that, although baptism is ordered against sin, matrimony also be ordered against sin.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that matrimony does not have indulgence simply speaking, but only according to this, that copulation takes place for the sake of satisfying lust. But it can take place for other causes, namely for the hope of offspring, or for the cause of fidelity or rendering the debt. And then it is an act needing no indulgence.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that what is most corrupt needs medicine more than what is less corrupt; but nevertheless matrimony is not in every way its medicine, but only according as it is for a remedy. Whence nothing prevents that, according as it is for an office, it could have been instituted before sin. And through this the solution to the last [objection] is clear.

Articulus 2 — Whether Adam Felt Pain In The Removal Of The Rib

Did Adam feel pain in the removal of the rib?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, in A, around the middle: A deep sleep having been sent upon Adam, and one of his ribs having been taken, etc.

§ 8. And here two things are asked principally, and a third incidentally. The first principal thing is: Did Adam feel pain in the removal of the rib? The second is concerning the part that He took. The third, however, which is asked incidentally, is the whole question concerning ecstasy [raptus].

§ 9. To the first one proceeds thus: 1. Pain is the sense of the division of a continuum, as the Philosopher says; but in him a continuum was divided; therefore there was pain in him, as it seems.

§ 10. 2. Also, the soul not only according to itself as a whole naturally appetites the conjunction of the body, but also every part appetites the conjunction of that part to which it is united: therefore it naturally suffers pain in division from that part. Now it is established that the soul of Adam, or a part of it, was separated from that part which was divided from Adam; therefore he naturally felt pain.

§ 11. 3. If perhaps you say that sleep so bound the senses that he did not perceive it. Against this: Sleep does not bind so strongly that even a minor pain would not wake one up, especially one of a good complexion, as Adam was: therefore it seems that Adam would have woken up in such a great division: therefore he felt pain.

§ 12. Furthermore it is asked: Whence did that deep sleep come? 1. For the Lord, by sending the deep sleep, sent a sleep into him either against nature or according to nature. If you say that it was against nature, it seems false: because Augustine says that the Lord did not work against the nature which He Himself made. But if He did it according to nature: according to nature sleep does not occur except through the evaporation of food; but Adam had not eaten then: therefore he could not have had sleep according to nature.

§ 13. 2. Moreover, it seems false what he says in the Letter, that in spirit he understood for what use the woman was made: because sleep is the binding of the senses per se, and of the rational powers per accidens; but when the rational powers are bound, it is impossible to understand anything; therefore Adam could not then understand for what use the woman was made.

§ 14. 3. Also, if some power receives from a prior one, if the prior one is not in act, the posterior one will not be in act. But reason receives from sense. Therefore, since sense is bound, reason will not be in act. But in sleep, sense is bound; therefore reason cannot be in act; therefore what he says in the Letter is false.

§ 15. Response. It must be said that Adam did not feel pain in the separation of the rib from him. Of this a manifold cause is assigned: one which Augustine has: because He who created him was able to do this, that he would not feel pain when He took the rib.

§ 16. But there is, or can be, another cause: because that which in man belongs to the superfluity of the individual, although necessary for the species, is separated from man not only without pain, but even with delight. And this indeed is in two ways: for sometimes that superfluity is that in which a man is made, as is human seed; and this is separated through the action and cutting off of nature. But another is not that in which it is that a man be made, but that he could be made, as Augustine says, that is, in which there is the possibility of obedience: and this is not separated except through the act of the first Maker. And in this way the rib was separated, in which it was not that a woman be made, but that she could be made. In seed, however, there is not only a material possibility, but also a formal one; whence in it, it is that a man be made from it. Both, however, are separated with delight, as I think, even if there were no sin, but it would not be a delight binding to reason. And this is what Avicenna and Constantine say, that nature placed delight in copulation so that it would be appetited because of the need of the species.

§ 17. To the first, however, it must be said that the sense of the division of a continuum which causes pain, is the sense of the division or separation of a conjoint thing pertaining to the consistency of the individual: but the rib was not so, but rather was a superfluity of the individual given for the multiplication of the species.

§ 18. To the next it must be said that the soul does not appetite to be united to anything, except to that which is the matter of the soul, according as it is the mover and form of a physical organic body: but the rib was not such, as has already been held.

§ 19. To the next it must be said that he did not wake up, because the separation for the said causes did not inflict pain.

§ 20. To that which is asked further, it must be said that He sent the deep sleep according to nature.

§ 21. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the Lord created Adam perfect in all things according to the state of animality; and therefore his veins were full of blood, and his nutritive vessels full of nourishment: and from those proceeded sleep for him.

§ 22. To the next it must be said that the powers of the rational soul are not always bound; but sometimes they are rather relaxed, insofar as the soul is then not occupied with other things: and then revelations occur, as is said in Numbers 24:4: Who falls, and so his eyes are opened, that is, who lies sleeping and slumbering, and thus sees the visions of God. And thus it was in Adam.

§ 23. To the next it must be said that the intellect does not always take from sense, but rather sometimes takes from separated intelligences, and their impressions are in it, when it is not occupied with the clamors of the senses. And this occurs in sleep, and especially in deep sleep [sopor], because of the difference which some have assigned between sleep and deep sleep, saying that sleep is the rest of the animal powers with the intensification of the natural ones, whereas deep sleep is the rest of the animal powers with the intensification of the intellectual ones.

Articulus 3 — Whether Eve Ought To Have Been Formed From Bone Or From Flesh

Ought Eve to have been formed from bone or from flesh?

Second, it is asked concerning the part which He took, namely concerning the rib.

§ 25. For it seems that He took flesh and the rib: because 1. Below he says: This now is bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh.

§ 26. 2. Moreover, it seems that it would have been better to take flesh: because flesh was more formable than bone, and more apt for figuration; therefore it seems that He ought rather to have taken flesh than a rib.

§ 27. 3. Also, a woman is softer than a man; therefore she seems to have been taken from a softer matter. But this is not bone. Therefore it seems that she ought not to be taken from bone.

§ 28. 4. Moreover, it seems that she ought not to have been taken either from bone or from flesh: because what is in act something, cannot be in potency to that [same thing]. But a bone is in act a bone. Therefore it could not be in potency a bone; therefore the bone of the woman could not be made from bone.

§ 29. 5. Moreover, what is in act one part of a man, is not in potency all the parts; but a bone is in act one part of a man; therefore it is not in potency all the parts. But that from which the woman was made, was in potency the whole woman; therefore it ought not to have been in act some part of a man. But a bone is in act one part; therefore that one thing from which the woman was made, ought not to have been that part which is bone.

§ 30. Response. It must be said that the woman was made and ought to have been made from bone, for a manifold cause: of which one cause is that through this the power of the Maker would be given to be understood: because He can produce any soft things not only from obedient matter, but also from disobedient and hard matter. Another cause is: because if she had been taken from soft matter, she would have been made too soft, and she would seem excused for her softness: and therefore the Lord taught to temper the softness of her complexion through the hardness of the matter: so that thus the woman might universally be taught constancy and the hardness of continence.

§ 31. But why she was taken from the side, and not from the head or the foot, the Master assigned the reason in the second book of the Sentences; and let these suffice.

§ 32. To the first, therefore, it must be said that he does not say "Flesh from flesh" for the reason that she was essentially taken from his flesh, but because originally: because flesh was filled in for the rib, and the rib was transformed into flesh and the other parts of the woman.

§ 33. To the next it must be said that although flesh is more formal than bone, nevertheless to an artisan of infinite power one is not more formal than the rest; and therefore for the aforesaid causes He took bone and not flesh.

§ 34. To the next it must be said that the woman has this from her complexion, and not from her matter, as was explained earlier.

§ 35. To the next it must be said that this is true as long as it remains in the act of that part whose form it has; but the Lord transformed or transmuted the bone from the form of bone, and then induced another form into it.

§ 36. To the last it must be said in the same way. And thus the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 4 — Whether Adam Said Prophetically This Now Is Bone Of My Bones And Flesh Of My Flesh

Did Adam say prophetically: This now is bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh?

§ 37. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, in A, before the end: After the ecstasy he said prophetically, etc.

§ 38. For concerning present things which are subjected to sense and reason, there is no prophecy. But that the woman was made for this use was subjected to reason receiving from sense; therefore he did not say this prophetically.

§ 39. But if it is said that the prophecy refers to the future state of the Church, which was signified in the woman, this seems to be false: because the sacraments would not have been propagated from the side of Christ unless man had sinned. Therefore the propagation is not known unless the sin is known. Therefore Adam foreknew his own fall, which Augustine denies, and it is also proved in the second book of the Sentences.

§ 40. Solution. To this it must be said that the prophecy refers to the future state of the Church, and not to the present use of the woman: because that could be sensibly known from the distinction of sex and reason.

§ 41. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it does not follow: this does not happen without that, therefore it is not known without that. And there is a counter-instance: because mathematical lines do not exist without sensible matter, and yet they are known without it; and the universal animal does not exist without the individual, and yet it is known without it. And it is the fallacy of the consequent.

§ 42. However, some say that Adam did not foreknow his fall for this reason, that he did not collate [the premises], nor was he bound to collate, because otherwise he could have been freed. Yet it seems to me that it can also be said that he could know the future propagation from the side of Christ, and not foreknow the fall, even if he collated: because Christ could have been incarnated for many causes, and not only for sin.

Articulus 5 — Whether Marriage Can Be Instituted Several Times

Can matrimony be instituted multiple times?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, in B: Moreover, the institution of marriage is twofold.

§ 44. For this seems to be false: because 1. Divine institution is that from which marriage receives its power, just as every sacrament does. But divine institution is most efficacious. Therefore it is not doubled or tripled to effect the same thing. The first is proved through the definition of a sacrament by Master Hugh, who says that it is signifying from institution.

§ 46. 3. Moreover, a cause is not multiplied for the same thing according to one causality, unless it is inefficacious. But the institution is here said to be multiplied for the same thing: because it is done through the same words and for the same act, namely to increase and multiply, as is clear to one inspecting the Letter in the two institutions made in Adam and Noah and his sons; therefore the divine institution was inefficacious, which it is nefarious to say.

§ 47. 4. Also, in human laws one single institution sanctioned by the emperor suffices; therefore much more in divine laws. Therefore there could not be a twofold institution of matrimony.

§ 48. Against this is what is said in the Letter.

§ 49. Solution. It must be said that nothing prohibits the same thing from being instituted twice or thrice or multiple times according to its multiple reasons and effects. Whence since matrimony is for an office of nature, and for a remedy against concupiscence; and this in two ways, namely from the act itself ordered through the fidelity of the marriage bed, and through the signification of the sacrament, and from the grace which is from the espousal of human nature with the divine in the person of Christ: nothing prohibits matrimony thus from having two or even three divine institutions: one with respect to nature according to itself, another with respect to corrupted nature, and a third according to the state of nature repaired through Christ. And thus matrimony is a sacrament of innocence, of the old law, and of the new law.

§ 50. To the first, therefore, it must be said that the institution of the one openly instituting is efficacious; but nevertheless, on our part, it is necessary for it to be doubled or tripled, so that we may know that it is for many things, and not for one, since it cannot effect those many things except by the power of the institution.

§ 51. But if anyone should object, saying that He could have instituted it with one expression, saying: "Let matrimony be valid", to this however it must be said that this was not fitting: because thus He would have revealed to man his future corruption.

§ 52. Furthermore, the disease and the medicine ought to have become known with the succession of time, as is said in Matthew 5:31-32; and the causes for this were assigned above.

§ 53. To the next it must be said that some of the others are more efficacious; but greater or lesser efficacy is not the cause of one or multiple institutions, but rather the plurality of effects, as has been said. And if anyone should argue that if this has more effects, therefore it is more efficacious: it must be said that he fails according to the fallacy of figure of speech, by changing the species of the predicament, namely the discrete into the continuous or quasi-continuous.

§ 54. To the next it must be said that it is not multiplied according to the same causality.

§ 55. But to the proof it must be said that although the same act is repeated, it is not however under the same dispositions: for because the flood had inundated on account of the very act of concupiscence, and Noah, and his sons, and their wives were commanded to enter the ark dividedly, they could out of fear of concupiscence fear lest the human race were to be multiplied again; and therefore again it was commanded, especially having excepted concupiscence through the fidelity of the marriage bed and the good of the sacrament, lest it rush headlong.

§ 56. To the last it must be said that that argument proceeds as if the power of the institutor were the cause of one or multiple institutions. And this is not true, as is clear from the aforesaid.

Articulus 6 — Whether In Paradise There Would Have Been Nuptials And Marriage

Would there have been nuptials and matrimony in paradise?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, in B, a little after the beginning: Where the marriage bed would be immaculate, and nuptials honorable, etc.

§ 58. 1. For Augustine says in the book De Bono conjugii that nuptials are a good of mortals. But in paradise human beings were immortal; therefore there would not have been nuptials in paradise.

§ 59. 2. Also, John Damascene says that if man had not sinned, he would have remained immortal. Therefore human nature would have been propagated not through nuptials, but otherwise; therefore what Augustine says in the Letter is false.

§ 60. 3. Also, according to every nature, that which has perpetual salvation [i.e., preservation] in itself, never seeks to be perpetuated in another of the same species. But if man had remained immortal, he would have had perpetual being preserved in himself. Therefore he would not seek to be perpetuated in another; therefore there would not have been nuptials, because nuptials in paradise would not have existed except on account of that.

§ 61. 4. Also, nothing seeks in another what it has more nobly in itself. But he who has this permanence in himself, has it more nobly than he who has it in another. Therefore he who has it in himself does not seek it in another. But man, if he had not sinned, would have had it in himself; therefore he would not have sought it in another, namely in children through fecundity.

§ 62. To the contrary of this is that: 1. According to nature, everything whose entire matter is not within it, multiplies itself through individuals, so that it may induce matter under its form. But the matter of man was not entirely within him. Therefore he would have multiplied himself through the generation of individuals. The first is established from what was disputed by Aristotle in the first book of De Caelo et mundo. The second is proved by this, that that which has its entire matter within it, is impossible to be multiplied through individuals: but man is multiplied.

§ 63. If perhaps it is said, as Damascene seems to feel, that propagation would have been done otherwise than through the commingling of sex. Against this: Sex was created distinct by the Lord in paradise. Therefore, since every wise person intends a determined end in his work, He Himself intended the end of distinct sex; but it is nothing other than commingling: for the male is he who generates in another out of himself by his own seed, whereas the female generates in herself out of another, as the Philosopher says. Therefore it seems that they would then have commingled.

§ 64. 2. Also, through the text of Genesis 2:20 and seq., it is clear that Eve was made as a helper for Adam. Now it is established that it was not as a helper for life, or for operations: because man had no indigence then, especially since a man would cooperate more with a man for life and operations than a woman with a man. Therefore it is left that she was made as a helper for generation. But she could not help in a diverse sex except through the commingling of sex. Therefore it seems that propagation would have been then as it is now with respect to this.

§ 65. Response. It must be said that, with respect to the commingling of sex, the mode of propagation would have been the same then as now.

§ 66. To the first, therefore, it must be said that the statement of Augustine is understood according to the nature of mortals in the animal state; for man, according to his nature indeed, was always mortal even in paradise, but through the grace of innocence he had immortality, as one can find disputed at the end of the second book of the Sentences.

§ 67. To the next it must be said that Damascene does not refer the dissimilitude to the act of commingling, but to what is conjoined [to it], which is corruption in conception, heaviness in pregnancy, and pain in childbirth.

§ 68. To the next it must be said that the Philosopher speaks of things incorruptible according to nature: and these are only those things which nature has removed far from contrariety and mutation. And man was not such by nature in the first state, but out of grace, as has been said.

§ 69. Through the same, the solution to the following is clear: for it is true that such naturally incorruptible things do not seek to be preserved or multiplied according to the species, except in individuals.

Articulus 7 — Whether In Paradise Conception Would Have Been Without The Heat Of Lust

Would conception have been without the ardor of lust in paradise?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, in B, a little after the beginning: From which they would conceive without ardor, and bring forth without pain.

§ 71. For this seems to be false: 1. For either ardor there is understood as the heat of the members in copulation, or as that vehement delight which is felt in copulation. But in the first way it is false: because even in the first state man would have had heat complying with the works of nature more than now. Therefore, since the work of nature is to generate, heat would then have complied with that work. But to comply is to extend the members, as the Philosophers say. Therefore then as now, or more, he would have extended the members; therefore then there would have been ardor. But if it means delight. Against this: It is natural in a well-disposed nature to be delighted in its proper operation, as Aristotle maintains in the tenth book of the Ethics. But nature would have been optimally disposed in the state of innocence if man had stood [firm]. Therefore he would have delighted in his proper operation more than now. But the proper operation is generation; therefore in the act of generation he would have delighted then more than now.

§ 72. If perhaps someone says that he would have had the use of his members at the command of reason, and not by the power of heat. Against this: This is foolish to say: because reason does not move like a power affixed to an organ, but only through command. Therefore there must be some power affixed to an organ which it commands; but this, whatever it is, does not move without an instrument: and since this is nothing other than heat, it follows as before.

§ 73. 2. Also, in every well-disposed complexioned nature, the heaviest pain arises from an excessive touch of the nerves, and vehement delight from what touches fittingly and sweetly. But in the resolution of seed a most fitting touch of the nerves occurs, and similarly it would have been then as now; therefore then as now, or more, man would have been delighted; therefore he would have felt the ardor of delight.

§ 74. Furthermore, it seems that she would have brought forth with greater pain than now: because pain is the sense of the division of a continuum; therefore the sense of the division of a more nobly conjoined continuum causes more pain. But the woman would then have been more nobly conjoined than any woman is now. Therefore she would have felt more pain in division. But it is impossible for an infant of due quantity to be born without the division and extension of the genital member. Therefore then it would have been impossible to bring forth without pain.

§ 75. Response. It must be said that conception would then have been without ardor, and childbirth without pain. Now "ardor" means a delight which suffocates reason according to its act. And I well concede that then there would have been a greater and purer delight in the work: and nevertheless under the command of reason: because reason would then have been comforted by the grace of innocence, so that nothing existing under it, however vehement it might be, would have averted it from the intuition of the immutable first good.

§ 76. And through this the solution to everything that is objected concerning ardor is clear.

§ 77. To the other which is objected concerning pain, it must be said that there would have been no pain, nor division: because the excessive extension and narrowness of women comes from sin; but then the members would have been proportioned to those being born, so that infants could have been brought forth through an extension not dividing the body of the woman. If however even then the body had been struck by iron, it would not have been divided, as Isidore says; and therefore it also would not have been susceptible to pain.

Articulus 8 — Whether Matrimony Is A Remedy And Medicine Against The Disease Of Concupiscence

Is matrimony a remedy and medicine against the disease of concupiscence?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, in B, around the middle: What is for an office to the healthy, is for a remedy to the sick, etc.[676]

§ 79. For this seems to be false: 1. For no infirmity receives medicine from the same thing from which it receives intensification. But the concupiscence of copulating is an infirmity; therefore, etc. Now it is established that carnal concupiscence is satisfied from the matter exhibited to one's faculty and the license of copulating; and this happens through matrimony. Therefore matrimony intensifies concupiscence; therefore it is not a remedy against the disease of concupiscence.

§ 80. 2. Also, no infirmity is cured by that which it appetites. But concupiscence is an infirmity of destitute nature. Therefore it is not cured by the same thing that it appetites. But it appetites copulation; therefore it is not cured by it. Since therefore matrimony is consummated by copulation, it seems that matrimony does not cure concupiscence. The first is proved by the statement of Galen and Aristotle, who say that the appetites of the sick are corrupted by their sickly habit; and therefore they are not to be satisfied.

§ 81. 3. Also, no infirmity remains after its cure if the cure is efficacious; but the concupiscence of copulating still remains and acts after matrimony. Therefore matrimony does not cure the concupiscence of copulating.

§ 82. 4. Also, in all corporeal and spiritual things medicines are by way of the contrary. Therefore it seems that also in this one. It seems therefore, since matrimony does not have contrariety to the concupiscence of copulation, that it is not its cure.

§ 83. 5. If perhaps you say that matrimony is a medicine in this way: because the concupiscence of copulation, which would rush headlong through absolute copulation, is bound to one [woman]; and because it restricts by the fidelity of the marriage bed, therefore it is made not illicit, and thus it receives medicine. Against this: No disease is medicated in such a way that it is restricted to a part of the matter in which it is diffused: because the more it is restricted, the more severe it is made concerning that in which it is. Therefore neither ought concupiscence to receive medicine in this way.

§ 84. Also, what is in itself illicit, is never made licit from the fact that it is concerning one and not concerning many. But the concupiscence of copulation is in itself illicit. Therefore it is not made licit from the fact that through matrimony it is restricted to one marriage. The first is proved in all moral matters. For avarice and prodigality, and thus of others, which are in themselves illicit, are never made licit from the fact that they are concerning one. The second is proved by this, that nothing in itself rushes into vice and headlong, except what is in itself illicit; but the concupiscence of copulation in itself rushes headlong, as is often said in the words of Augustine in the Letter. And thus the proposition is established.

§ 85. Also, in natures it is thus, that a natural power restricted to one is more intensified in it, as is clear in the hot, the cold, and all others. Since therefore concupiscence acts in the mode of nature, it seems that neither can it take medicine in this way.

§ 86. Solution. To this, however, it seems it must be said that matrimony is a twofold medicine for the concupiscence of copulating. In one way from the grace which it gives in the faith of the Mediator to those contracting, which for it is sacramental grace. And this mitigates concupiscence, as is clear, Tobit 6:16-17: Hear me, and I will show you who they are over whom the demon can prevail. For those who undertake marriage in such a way as to exclude God from themselves and from their mind, and so give themselves to their lust, as the horse and mule which have no understanding, the demon has power over them. And he subjoins, vv. 18 and seq., that others receive it in the fear of God, over whom he does not have power. Now the power of the demon there is called power in the fomes [of sin] with respect to the concupiscence of copulating.

§ 87. But in another way it medicates by restricting with divine and human laws, by which the turpitude which is conjoined to concupiscence is excluded; and in this way it is excepted lest it rush headlong, as is said in the Letter.

§ 88. To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that it does not receive intensification and medicine from the same thing: because matrimony through interior grace remits the fire of the fomes, and through the honesty of exterior divine and human laws removes the turpitude of the vice; so that nothing remains except the turpitude of the penalty which is inseparably conjoined to the act. And this is false, that through matrimony the faculty and license of copulating is given: for although this is in matrimony, nevertheless it is not for this, but rather for those things concerning which it has been spoken.

§ 89. To the next it must be said that this infirmity does not appetite this twofold restriction of itself, but rather licentious copulation. And thus it is clear that that argument does not proceed.

§ 90. To the next it must be said that the infirmity of the vice of concupiscence does not remain after matrimony, but the infirmity of the penalty is diminished for the two causes stated above.

676. Peter Lombard, Sententiae, IV, d. 26, c. 2.

§ 91. To the next it must be said that medicine cannot be made entirely by way of the contrary, when the infirmity is rooted in radical members and is chronic: because nature could not sustain such medicine. And thus it is here: because concupiscence is rooted in corrupted nature, and therefore it is done by way of the contrary as much as possible, so that the good of nature and grace may be preserved, lest it be subverted by the violence of the disease.

§ 92. To the other which is objected against the adduced solution, it must be said that this...

§ 1. ...the two arguments proceed as if that restriction were made only through the diminution of the matter, and not through the diminution of concupiscence: and this is already clear to be false from what has been said. And this is confirmed by the fact that even he who burns with equal concupiscence for his wife as for a harlot or an adulteress is called an adulterer in the sentences of Sextus the Pythagorean, as Jerome will say below in the Text.

§ 2. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 9 — Whether Concupiscence Is Mortal Or Lethal, And, Since Concupiscence Inheres In Intercourse, Whether That Is Always Mortal

Whether concupiscence is mortal or lethal? And, since concupiscence inheres in coitus, whether it is always mortal?

§ 3. Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, at B, towards the end: "The law of lethal concupiscence has inhered in the members, etc." § 4. From this it seems that: 1. Concupiscence is lethal, because lethal and mortal are the same thing. § 5. 2. Also, if something is blamed on account of something inevitably conjoined to it, it will always be blamed. But, as is said in the Text, intercourse is blamed on account of concupiscence. But this inevitably inheres in coitus. Therefore, it is always blamed. Therefore, it is always mortal. § 6. 3. Also, one act is called specifically the same in morals, which is about a specifically identical object of will, and with the same formal mover. But this act is thus specifically the same regarding a harlot and a wife. Therefore, it is specifically the same. But the judgment of things that are specifically similar is the same. Therefore, if it is mortal regarding a harlot, it will also be mortal regarding a wife. The first premise is proved by induction, because in all things an action is called an action for the reason that it is from the act of the maker, that is, from the form, as the Commentator says on the first book of First Philosophy. The second premise is proved, because a harlot and a married woman are of the same species, and the concupiscence moving toward a wife and a harlot is of the same species, which is the form of the pleasurable thing apprehended in the wife and the harlot. § 7. 4. Also, in the Text a little below he will say that coitus is evil unless it is excused by the goods of marriage. If therefore it cannot be excused, it will always be evil. Let us prove, therefore, that it cannot be excused. For the good of offspring accompanies coitus in both cases, namely in a married woman and an unmarried one. But the good of faith seems not to operate, because faith does nothing except that, while she is alive, he is not joined to another. But this faith can be given to an unmarried lover. Therefore, it does not seem to make an excuse. But the sacrament is caused by the indivisibility of the flesh: but when one is joined to a harlot, they are made one flesh. Therefore, it seems that it is altogether equal in a harlot and a wife. And therefore, since they do not excuse in the one, they do not seem to excuse in the other; and thus the proposition is held. § 8. 5. Also, everything that is excused is evil. But every matrimonial coitus is excused, as is said in the Text. Therefore, it is evil. § 9. 6. Also, if perhaps you wish to say that when it has an excuse, it is made not evil. This, first of all, is against rhetorical discipline, in which arguments of excuse are referred to nothing except to an evil. But secondly, it seems that it cannot be excused, because evil things must not be done so that any good things whatsoever may result , but coitus is evil, as is said in the Text. Therefore, it is not to be done so that any good things whatsoever may result. Therefore, neither so that the goods of marriage may result. § 10. And these are, or can be, the arguments of the heretics condemning every matrimonial intercourse. § 11. To the contrary of this, it is objected thus: 1. In Luke 1:6, concerning the parents of John the Baptist knowing each other mutually in charity, it is said: "They were both just before God, walking in all the commandments and justifications of the Lord without blame," etc. But this could not be true if coitus were a sin. Therefore, coitus is not a sin.

§ 12. 2. Also, 1 Corinthians 7:3: "Let the husband render the debt to his wife, and the wife also in like manner to the husband." It is evident that he is not speaking of a debt of money, but of the body. But a sin is owed to no one. Therefore, to share the body for intercourse is not a sin for spouses. § 13. 3. Also, it is objected by reason thus: Every voluntary act rooted in nature or in human communication takes a mean of virtue. But coitus is an act of this kind. Therefore, it takes a mean of virtue. Therefore, sometimes it is not only not a sin, but even a virtue. And this is nowhere but in marriage. Therefore, matrimonial intercourse is not always a sin. The first premise is proved by induction in the works of chastity, fortitude, and justice. The second premise is evident from the fact that the generative power is a natural power, and therefore its act is necessary. § 14. 4. Also, in every nature that is maximally divine which maximally attains perpetuity. Therefore, it is similar in man. But what maximally attains perpetuity is the act saving the species. Therefore, this is maximally divine. Therefore, even if it is formed by divine or human law, it will be honorable. Therefore, then it will not only not be a sin, but even an act of virtue. § 15. 5. Also, what nature does in some things within one subject and in other things through diverse subjects, is equally natural done in one or in diverse subjects. But nature accomplishes impregnating and being impregnated in one subject in plants, and in a diversity of sexes in sensible creatures. Therefore, it is equally natural in both. But what is natural in all things, if it is made voluntary, is not thereby made blameworthy. Therefore, to impregnate and be impregnated by a rational will is still not made blameworthy. But every natural voluntary act ordainable by reason with the due circumstances of nature will be an act of virtue. Therefore, the intercourse impregnating and being impregnated, or of the impregnator and the impregnated, can be an act of virtue; and from there as before. § 16. Response. It must be said that those things which the first arguments attempt to prove are profane; and to rebuke those heretics it suffices to say that they themselves are children of adulterers and children of darkness and of the devil according to their own confession, and therefore they will also receive the inheritance of their father the devil, that is, eternal punishments, unless they repent; and this is most certainly true. § 17. To that therefore which they object first, it must be said that concupiscence is called lethal because it is induced by death, not because it always induces death. It is also called lethal because it inheres in a mortal body. § 18. To the next, it must be said that concupiscence is almost inevitably adjoined to coitus, but not to fault. And a punishment is not blameworthy except in a qualified sense, namely insofar as it is from sin. § 19. To the next, it must be said that according to the species of morals, matrimonial intercourse and unmarried intercourse are not the same act in species. § 20. But to the proof it must be said that materially the remote object is the same in species, but not the formal and proximate object. For the remote object is materially the same in both cases, but the proximate object is materially under circumstances which in the one case are an undue loosening as a kindling of one's own wantonness, but in the other case bounded and bound by human and divine laws from divine and human right, in which the good of offspring or of medicine is sought. Similarly, the moving habit in the one is the concupiscence of fornicating; in the other, however, the honorableness of nuptials. And therefore it is clear that that argument does not proceed. § 21. To the next, it must be said that none of the goods of marriage is in the unmarried woman. For there is no good of offspring, which is clear from the fact that it belongs to the definition of the good of offspring that it be received honorably, which is not sought in an unmarried woman. Nor is faith there, because it does not happen to have faith except toward one's own; and this one is not his own, but there is a certain established baseness there. Nor is the sacra- ment there, because this is more rooted in the division of spirits than of bodies. Whence it is clear that that proof is worth nothing. § 22. To the next, it must be said that that which is excused is excused in two ways, namely as that which is essentially guilt, and as that which is not essentially guilt, but is conjoined to a baseness on account of something preceding which was the guilt of the same in species not in number, from which there is a dependence, as upon a father. That therefore which is excused in the first way, this without doubt is an evil of fault; and concerning this the objection holds. But that which is excused in the second way is not an evil in itself, nor is it the fault of him in whom it is excused, but rather a punishment proceeding from the fault of the father. § 23. To the next, it must be said that evils of fault must not be done, not even the least, so that any goods whatsoever may result. But coitus in itself is not a fault of this kind, as is clear from what has been established previously. § 24. However, when it is said that coitus in itself is evil or a sin, there is a twofold equivocation of that which is "in itself." For if it denotes the property or condition of the nature and essence of coitus, the expression is false, because in this way coitus in paradise would also have been evil. But if it denotes the exclusion of those things which order coitus by the laws and goods of marriage, then it is true; and in this way coitus "in itself" is understood, that is, alone by itself not constrained by the law and good of marriage. § 25. And this distinction is valid both for the preceding and the subsequent ar- guments.

Articulus 10 — Whether The First Institution Of Marriage Had A Precept

Whether the first institution of marriage had a precept? Whether the first institution of marriage had a precept?

§ 26. Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, at C: "The first institution had a precept, etc." § 27. For this seems to be false: 1. Because either this was an affirmative precept or a negative one. If affirmative: therefore every man is always bound to it. Therefore, no man is absolved from it, because it is not read to have been retracted. Therefore, at some time even monks and nuns are bound to the act of marriage; which seems false, since they vow perpetual continence, and "no weight is worthy of a continent soul." But if it is negative: then it obliges always and for always; and then it is always necessary for a man to be in the matrimonial act, which is impossible and frivolous. § 28. 2. Also, if there was then a precept: either this precept was then for us, or about things to be done in themselves. If in the first way: then it ought to have been in an indifferent matter, and not to oblige after the state of sin, just like the precept about not eating of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. But if it is about things to be done in themselves, since things to be done in themselves are always in one way, the precept will oblige in one way. Therefore, it still obliges every man, which is false. § 29. 3. Also, we see that the precept concerning the salvation of the individual, which is about eating, still obliges every man. Therefore, by similarity, the precept concerning the salvation of the species ought to still oblige every man. § 30. 4. Also, the species is more worthy and more necessary than the individual. But there is a greater obligation toward what is more worthy and more necessary. Therefore, there is a greater obligation toward the act saving the species than the individual. But we are still obliged to the act saving the individual. Therefore, to that one too. Therefore, all who vow continence sin mortally by vowing continence. § 31. 5. If perhaps you should say that it obliged when there were few men, and it would still oblige in a similar case. To the contrary: A moral precept obliges equally when there are few and when there are many. Therefore, if this is moral, it seems that it is saying nothing to state that it obliges when there are few and does not oblige when there are many. But if it is said to be ceremonial, this is evident to anyone to be frivolous. § 32. 6. Also, it seems that in all ways it still obliges everyone, because according to the desire of nature there ought always to be an order of natural things. But the desire of nature is towards the all-encompassing multiplication of individuals. Therefore, the precept and order of natural things ought to be towards this. The first premise is proved by the fact that nature never errs, as the Philosophers say, and is most wise in its effects and acts. The second is self-evident. § 33. 7. Also, when there are many, if anyone does well by living continently, generation would be dissolved; and this would be evil. Therefore, he would not do well by living continently. But the reason is the same for one and for another. Therefore, either all would do well by living continently, or none. Not all. Therefore, none. Therefore, all who live continently sin. § 34. And these are, or can be, the arguments of the Jews who say that all must contract marriage, and of certain Judaizing heretics. § 35. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Sirach 26:20: "No weight is worthy of a continent soul." But continence is principally in virginity, namely in indivisibility. Therefore, it seems that it is better than matrimonial chastity. § 36. 2. Also, the principal good is that which principally offers the faculty of keeping oneself for the Lord without impediment. But this is virginal and widowed chastity. Therefore, it seems that that is better than matrimonial chastity. § 37. 3. Also, virtue is about the difficult and the good, namely the honorable. But virginity and widowhood are more about the difficult and the good. Therefore, they are more good than marriage. § 38. 4. Also, the sixtyfold fruit is owed to widowhood, and the hundredfold to virginity, but only the thirtyfold to marriage. Therefore, it seems that virginity and widowhood are better than marriage. § 39. 5. Also, there is no precept concerning an easy thing to which nature by itself inclines, even if it is about things to be done. But nature inclines to the act of matrimonial intercourse, and it is easy. Therefore, there ought not to be a precept about it. The first premise is proved by the fact that everyone says that there is no precept about loving oneself because this is easy and nature inclines itself to it. The second is self-evident. § 40. 6. Also, everything that is commanded for some cause seems not to oblige when that cause does not exist. But when it is said: "Increase and multiply," if there is increase and multitude, the precept does not have a cause and reason. Therefore, it seems that then it does not oblige. § 41. Response. It must be said that this precept belongs to nature from the cause of a defect of multitude; and therefore I well concede that it does not oblige when a multitude exists. § 42. To the first, therefore, it must be said that it was an affirmative precept made for a determinate cause, and it obliges every man when the cause is the same, because then it is a time of necessity; and then I well concede that, no vow withstanding, every man would be bound if the case were similar. § 43. But to that which is proved, it must be said that the weighing of personal good is not worthy of a continent soul; but yet the weighing of the common good outweighs any personal good whatsoever, especially such a good as is the salvation of the human species. And this is what Aristotle says, that if the good of one man is good, that of the city will be better, and the greatest good that of the nation. § 44. To the next, it must be said that it is about things to be done in themselves from a cause which is a defect of inhabitants of the world and of those serving God; and therefore it does not oblige unless that cause exists. § 45. To the next, it must be said that it is not similar, because the salvation of the individual is not procured except through that same individual, but the salvation of the species can be procured through another. § 46. To the next, it must be said that it is true that the species is more worthy than the individual, and it is better that the species be saved than the individual, if the one cannot be saved without the other. But the salvation of the species is in no way in danger when many men exist, for the reason that nature, concupiscence, and the love of offspring incline towards the act of generation; and therefore one who abstains for the sake of God merits. § 47. To the next, it must be said that this precept, "Increase and multiply," was not given simply, because it does not happen to increase after perfect increase, nor to be multiplied after perfect multiplication; but it was given for a cause, as has been said, and therefore it obliges when that cause exists, and not otherwise. § 48. To the next, it must be said that there is integral nature and corrupt nature, and according to this it has a twofold desire; and because the desire of corrupt nature is mixed with corruption, therefore it is necessary to resist the desires of nature, and maximally of Venus. But the argument proceeds concerning the desire of integral nature alone. § 49. To the next, it must be said that when many exist, anyone does well by living continently; and if everyone were to vow continence, it is certain that then God would reveal His will concerning the disposition of the world either by Himself or through faithful dispensers of the Church; and then they would have to be obeyed in all things that they would command, either concerning keeping the vow, if perhaps from those present the nu- mber of the elect would be fulfilled; or concerning breaking the vow and recompensing through the material multiplication of the faithful, lest the world be dissolved.

Articulus 11 — Whether The Marital Act Has Indulgence, Or A Reward

Whether the matrimonial act has indulgence, or a reward?

§ 50. Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, at C, after the beginning: "But indulgence, because it does not choose the better things, has a remedy, not a reward, etc." § 51. 1. For it seems first that this consequence is null, and there is a counter-instance, because any precept of the Lord does not choose the better things, but rather a counsel does. Therefore, it only has an indulgence, not a reward; and this is false. § 52. 2. Furthermore, it seems to be false: for what is announced by an Angel to be done has a reward, not an indulgence. But the act of marriage is sometimes announced by an Angel to be done. Therefore, it has a reward, not an indulgence. The first premise is proved from the fact that God announces through Angels neither great evils nor small ones. But everything that has an indulgence is a sin, as is said in the Text from the words of Augustine. The second premise is proved by the conception of John the Baptist, Samson, and certain others. § 53. 3. Also, every act to which a formed virtue moves is meritorious and has a reward. But the act of marriage is many times such an act. Therefore, many times it has a reward. The first premise is proved because an act receives the ratio of merit from the form of a formed virtue. The second premise is proved because the faith of the marriage bed is a formed virtue in those having charity, and it often moves to the act of marriage. § 54. 4. Also, every act of formed justice is meritorious and has a reward. But the rendering of the debt in the act of marriage is an act of formed justice. Therefore, it is a meritorious act, and it has a reward. § 55. 5. Also, an act of virtue in whatever state, as long as it remains formed by charity, is meritorious and has a reward. But the act of marriage is an act of a certain state of continence having the form of charity. Therefore, it has a reward, and it is meritorious. § 56. 6. Also, everything that divine and human law commands, and punishes if it is not done, is meritorious if it is done in charity. But divine and human law commands the act of marriage, and punishes if it is not done. Therefore, it is meritorious if it is done in charity. § 57. 7. Also, everything that is done in the sole fear of God, not with human lust, can be meritorious. But such is the act of marriage. Therefore, etc. The proof of the major premise is in Tobit 8:4-5, where Sarah said: "I consented to take a husband with fear of You, not with my lust." § 58. 8. Also, the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 7:5: "Return together again." But it is evident that he would in no way command a sin to be committed. Therefore, to return to the act of marriage is not a sin. Therefore, it does not always have an indulgence after sin, as the Text seems to sound. § 59. 9. Also, there is a rule among the Doctors that no one ought to commit a lesser sin so that another may avoid a greater one. But if the coitus of marriage always had an indulgence, a woman consenting to her husband for coitus lest he fall into adultery would be committing a lesser sin so that another might avoid a greater one. Therefore, this must not be done by a woman. Therefore, women must be counseled not to render the debt, which is absurd. Therefore, intercourse does not always have an indulgence. It is false, therefore, that after sin it was always for a remedy, which nevertheless the Text seems to sound. § 60. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. The Apostle speaks generally when he says in 1 Corinthians 7:6: "But I speak this by indulgence." But whatever has indulgence is a sin, as is said in the Text. Therefore, generally every matrimonial intercourse is a sin. § 61. 2. Also, that whose cause is evil, itself is also evil. But the cause of intercourse is the concupiscence necessarily adjoined to

it. Therefore, matrimonial intercourse generally is evil. § 62. 3. Also, in natural things, that is called evil and corrupt which is mixed with evil and corruption. Therefore, similarly in morals, that is called evil which is mixed with the corruption and evil of morals. But the coitus of marriage is inevitably mixed with the evil of morals, which is the foulness of concupiscence. Therefore, every coitus of marriage is evil. § 63. 4. Also, that which an evil always follows, when it is caused by it, seems to be evil as a cause of evil. But the concupiscence of coitus is always followed by the evil of original sin, as Augustine says in the book On Marriage and Concupiscence against Julian the Pelagian. Therefore, matrimonial coitus generally is evil. § 64. 5. Also, Damascene says that there is shame in the act of marriage. Therefore, it is base. But everything base is opposed to the honorable. Therefore, matrimonial coitus is opposed to the honorable. But nothing is opposed to the honorable except a vice. Therefore, the act of marriage is a vice. Therefore, it is a sin. § 65. Response. It must be said that the act of marriage can be done for four causes, and with three moving factors. The first cause is the hope of offspring. The second is the faith of rendering the debt. The third is in remembrance of the good of the sacrament. The fourth is the cause of healing infirmity. The moving factor, moreover, is sometimes solely a virtue, and this in three ways, namely the love of propagating the worship of God in offspring, the love of justice in rendering the debt, and the faith of future union in one spirit to God. Sometimes the moving factor is nature with virtue. Sometimes the moving factor is nature with vice, and this in two ways: for sometimes nature precedes vice, and sometimes conversely vice precedes nature. § 66. Therefore, it must be said that if intercourse is done for the first three causes, and with the first two moving factors, in my judgment the act is meritorious, and has a reward, and has no indulgence. But if it is done for the fourth cause, and with the third moving factor, in such a way that nature precedes by restraining concupiscence lest it move towards the wife as towards an adulteress, then it is a venial sin, and it has an indulgence. But if concupiscence precedes, and lust is posited as the ultimate end, it is a mortal sin not having an indulgence, except through penance just like any other mortal sin; because these give themselves over to their lust "as the horse and mule in which there is no understanding; and therefore the demon has power over them," as is said in Tobit 6:17. § 67. Through this, therefore, the solution to the first objections is clear. § 68. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the Apostle does not speak generally, unless it is called the indulgence of concession, as is distinguished in the Text; but then not everything that has an indulgence is a sin. § 69. And what Augustine says, that whatever has an indulgence is a sin, is understood of the indulgence of permission. § 70. To the next, it must be said that the cause of matrimonial intercourse is not always evil, as is clear from the aforesaid; and therefore that argument is worth nothing. § 71. To the next, it must be said that the coitus of marriage generally is mixed with the evil of punishment, but not with the evil of fault; and therefore it cannot be called an evil of fault, but of punishment. § 72. To the next, it must be said that this original sin which is born from concupiscence is not from an evil act, because it is not evil, but rather from the force of the sentence of a just Judge, from which penal concupiscence draws its strength, infecting the infant who is born, for the reason that every generating man (as Anselm says) is Adam in the generating nature, whatever he may be in person. § 73. To the next, it must be said that the base is twofold, namely of punishment and of fault. And matrimonial coitus has the baseness of punishment, not of fault. But many punishments of such a kind have shame, yet not an accusable one, just like defecation, urination, and the like; and such baseness is commonly called base, but it is not opposed to the honorable. There is another baseness which is a crime not having beauty in an act of virtue, and this is opposed to the honorable, and is a sin; but this baseness is not in the act of marriage.

Articulus 12 — Whether Permission In The New Testament Is Of Moral Goods

Whether permission in the New Testament is concerning moral goods?

§ 74. Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, at D, after the beginning: "And there is a permission in the New Testament, concerning lesser goods, etc." § 75. For this seems to be false, because: 1. Since there are five signs of the divine will, as was held before the end of the first book of this volume: but permission there is always concerning evil. Therefore, it is not concerning lesser goods. § 76. 2. Also, divine operation and permission are not of the same thing. But God operates lesser goods, just as greater ones. Therefore, it seems that He does not permit them to be done. § 77. 3. Also, the precept of God and permission are among the signs of the will. Since therefore they are diverse, they will not be about the same thing. But there is a precept concerning lesser goods. Therefore, permission is not concerning lesser ones. § 78. Furthermore, it is asked, why does he say "in the New Testament"? § 79. For it seems that permission is not about ceremonial things, but about moral things. Therefore, it applies equally to the New and the Old Testament. Therefore, it is not only in the New Testament that it is concerning lesser goods. § 80. To this it must be said that permission, insofar as it is a sign of the divine will, and insofar as it is concerning lesser goods, is not taken in a single sense. For there it is opposed to operation, since both are about the present, one about evil, and the other about good; but here it is opposed to counsel, for the reason that the greater goods are those about which there is counsel; and when a man is not inclined to those, God permits a man to be saved in lesser goods, that is, He concedes it. But there is another difference: because in permission insofar as it is a sign of the divine will, God does not will the act, but something surrounding it which is elicited from that very evil act being ordered; but here God wills the act itself, but He would reward more him who was of a more excellent merit. § 81. And through this the solution to the first objection is clear, which fails according to equivocation. § 82. Through the same, the solution to the second and third is also clear. § 83. But to that which is asked further, it must be said that in the Old Testament something else reforms sin, because there was a state of imperfection, grace not yet made public, and there were few serving God, and all the nations around were drawing towards idolatry. And therefore then there was not a permission, but a precept, so that there would be a multiplication of those worshipping God, so that with the propagation of seed there would be a propagation of religion. And therefore then there were multiple wives of one husband.

Articulus 13 — Whether The Opinion Of The Heretics Saying That Intercourse With One's Wife Is A Sin Should Be Tolerated

er the opinion of the heretics saying that coitus with a wife is a sin, is to be tolerated? Whether the opinion of the heretics saying that coitus with a wife is a sin, is to be tolerated?

§ 84. Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, at E: "But there were some heretics, etc." § 85. 1. For what the Apostle says in 1 Corinthians 7:29 seems to be in their favor: "Those who have wives, let them be as though they had none." [677] For one not having a wife does not use a wife. Therefore, even one having her ought not to use her. § 86. 2. Also, that which impedes receiving God seems to be a sin. But the coitus of a wife does this. Therefore, it seems that it is a sin. The first premise is proved by the saying of Isaiah 59:2: "Your iniquities have divided between you and your God." The second is written in Exodus 19:15, where when the people were to meet the Lord, Moses said that they should not approach their wives. § 87. 3. Also, in 2 Samuel 6:6-7, Uzzah is said to have been struck because, when he had lain with his wife, he wanted to hold the ark lest it fall, for the reason that a kicking ox had tilted it; but this could not be unless coitus were reputed an iniquitous sin. Therefore, these heretics seem to speak the truth. § 88. 4. Also, the disciples, hearing from the Lord how the case of a man with his wife was, said: "It is not expedient to marry." [678] Therefore, it seems that this is an evil, because every good is expedient or honorable; and even the honorable has the expedient joined to it, as Tully says. Since therefore marriage is a good, it itself will be expedient. § 89. 5. Also, it is proved by reason thus: An act of nature is not diversified in species on account of what the will posits around it. But coitus is an act of nature. Therefore, it will be diversified in species on account of no circumstance of the will. Therefore, whether it is done with a married woman or with an unmarried one, it is the same in species. Therefore, it will be of the same judgment in good and in evil. But the first premise is proved from the fact that artificial things are caused by the will, and they do not diversify the species. The second is self-evident, because the generative power is a natural potency. § 90. 6. Also, as the Philosopher says in the tenth book of the Ethics, the whole good of man insofar as he is a man is the good of reason and intellect. Therefore, what subverts that is an evil in itself. But coitus subverts and binds reason. Therefore, it is an evil. But the evil of man which is a fault, as Dionysius says, is to be against reason. Therefore, coitus generally is an evil of fault. § 91. 7. If perhaps you should say that coitus subverts reason in act, but not in habit. To the contrary: From all acts (as the Philosopher says) which are voluntary, similar habits are left behind. Therefore, from the voluntary act which is the act of marriage, a habit is left behind. But as act relates to act, so habit relates to habit. Therefore, as the act subverts the act, so the habit subverts the habit. § 92. 8. Also, acts which are about innate passions, and those which are about equally intense pleasures, are equal in superfluity. But the act of marriage and the act of unmarried intercourse are about equally intense pleasures. Therefore, they are equal in superfluity. But acts which are equal in the superfluity of pleasure are equally vicious. Therefore, the act of marriage and unmarried intercourse are equally vicious. Therefore, just as unmarried intercourse is a mortal sin, so too is the act of marriage. § 93. 9. Also, in acts which are about pas-

§ 1. ...inflicted passions, those are equal which are about the equally terrible: therefore, by similarity, the acts which are about the equally pleasurable are equal: but the act of matrimony and free intercourse are about the equally pleasurable: therefore they are equal: therefore, as much as free intercourse is a vice, so much is the act of matrimony a vice.

§ 2. To the contrary of this is: § 3. 1. What is said They that buy, as though they possessed not. But this cannot be understood regarding the use of the bought thing: therefore neither is what he says They that have wives, let them be as though they had none, understood regarding use.

§ 4. 2. Also, either matrimony absolutely impedes the reception of God, or not. If so: then Moses should have absolutely forbidden wives, and not only for three days. If not: then the proposition is held, namely that it is not a mortal sin: because every mortal sin absolutely impedes the reception of God.

§ 5. 3. Also, the father of John is praised, and similarly his mother: but those heretics condemn John: therefore this cannot be understood concerning a spiritual father and mother: therefore it is understood of carnal ones: therefore a carnal father who has intercourse with his wife can be holy: and this would not be so, if intercourse were a sin: therefore intercourse is not a sin.

§ 6. 4. Also, the Lord [679] says: Whosoever shall put away his wife, excepting for the cause of fornication, maketh her to commit adultery. Therefore he must remain with her: therefore intercourse with her is not a sin.

§ 7. Also, nothing prevents an act of greater pleasure from being an act of virtue, and one of lesser pleasure from being an act of vice, as is evident in eating pleasurable things when one ought, and where one ought, and as much as one ought, and in eating coarse foods as one ought not, and when one ought not, and as much as one ought not, like Esau who sold his birthright for a vile meal: therefore, by similarity, thus it is in intercourse: therefore it does not follow that if the intercourse of matrimony is of as much or greater pleasure as intercourse with an unmarried woman, that if one is a sin, the other is as well.

§ 8. RESPONSE. It must be said that these are the worst heretics who were once called Tatiani, but now Paterniani, who assert about themselves that they are the sons of fornications and prostitutes: and therefore no right in temporal inheritance ought to be left to them, just as they have no right in eternal inheritance. But it must be said that they lie, not understanding what they speak about, nor what they affirm.

§ 9. To the first, therefore, it must be said that, as is evident from the objection made to the contrary, it is not understood that they ought not to know their wives, but that they ought not to place their hope in them as in an enjoyable thing.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that it does not impede the reception of God, but has an incongruity for seeing God immediately after intercourse, on account of the annexed concupiscence.

677. 1 Corinthians 7:29.

§ 11. To the next it must be said that Uzzah was perhaps not struck for this reason as is said in the Book of Kings: but because, although he was a Levite, he did not carry the ark on his own shoulders. But if he was struck for this reason, then it was on account of unsuitability arising from concupiscence and carnality, and not from sin.

§ 12. To the next it must be said that the disciples say it is not expedient, for this reason, because due to the entanglement of worldly things it withdraws one from divine service: just as the Apostle says by contrast concerning virginity [680], that it provokes to that which is honorable, and that it gives the facility of attending upon the Lord without impediment. And it is not true that the good of grace is opposed to such an inexpedient thing, nor is it itself an evil of fault: but only to that expedient thing which follows the honorable: for sometimes evil itself is called expedient, insofar as it cooperates toward good: although it is said improperly, because it does not cooperate toward good except occasionally.

§ 13. To the next it must be said that the act of nature is twofold: for one is the act of the will which is a certain nature, and the act of a determinate nature which behaves in one way, which is defined by Aristotle, that it is the principle of motion and rest in that in which it is per se and not accidentally. Therefore it must be said that the act of nature, according as the will is a certain nature, is well varied by the will, and intercourse is an act of such a nature: but the act of nature spoken of in the second way is not varied by the will.

§ 14. But to that by which he attempts to prove it, it must be said that the generative power is not the first mover in the act of generation, but rather the commanding will: and therefore from that first mover intercourse is a voluntary act, and on account of diverse circumstances it is made a sin in an unmarried woman, and an act of virtue in a married one.

§ 15. To the next it must be said that reason holds itself in a twofold way toward those works, insofar as reason is right reason, namely as preceding, and as accompanying: for the preceding [reason] orders the circumstances, how much one ought, and as, and when, and with whom, and how: but the accompanying [reason] directs. Therefore it must be said that vice subverts preceding reason, as Socrates said, and Aristotle attests, that pleasure subverts the estimation of prudence in the minor proposition: and this is written in Book VI of the Ethics, in the chapter on prudence. But the act of matrimony does not subvert preceding reason, but accompanying reason: and therefore it is not a vice.

§ 16. And if it is objected that because that accompanying reason directs, if it is subverted, the act remains undirected: it must be said that it does not direct as ordering, but as inspecting: rather the act is ordered by the preceding discretion of reason: and this order remains in the act of matrimony, just as the projective force remains in the medium, even when the first projector ceases.

§ 17. To the next it must be said that from all acts a habit similar to the act is left behind: and therefore if from the acts of matrimony a habit is left behind, since those acts are ordered, the habit will not be unordered.

678. Matthew 19:10.

§ 18. To the next it must be said that what is supposed as true is false, namely that acts are equal in evil and good which are about equal pleasures: because the act of nature makes neither evil nor good that which is about pleasures: which is evident from this, that the acts of virtues and vices are about pleasures and sorrows: but what makes acts good or evil is having undue or due circumstances and ends.

§ 19. And through this the solution to the last is evident: because that argument proceeds upon a false similarity.

Articulus 14 — Whether Marriage Is A Sacrament, And What Its Reality Is, And From Whom It Draws The Power Of Its Effect

Whether matrimony is a sacrament? and What is its reality? and, From what does it draw the power of its effect?

§ 22. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, E, Since therefore marriage is a sacrament, etc.

§ 23. And the disputation proceeds over the whole chapter.

§ 24. For it seems that the Master poorly determines the reality of such a sacrament:

§ 25. 1. For a contained and signified reality is more substantial to a sacrament of the New Testament than a signified and non-contained reality: but the union of a faithful soul with God in one spirit, or the union of two natures in Christ is a reality signified and not contained: therefore it seems that it ought not to be determined with respect to that.

§ 26. 2. Also, a sacrament of the new law effects what it figures: but matrimony is a sacrament of the new law: therefore it effects what it figures: but it figures the union of two natures in Christ: therefore it effects it, which is false: therefore it is not its reality: it seems therefore that he says what is false in the text.

§ 27. 3. Also, what is equally effected by every grace and merit, or most especially by charity, does not seem to be the reality of matrimony: but the conjunction of the faithful soul with God in one spirit is effected with virtue, and especially charity: therefore it is not the effect of matrimony.

§ 28. NEXT TO THIS three things are further asked, namely whether matrimony is a sacrament of the new law? Secondly, What is its reality? Thirdly, From what does it draw the power of its effect in it?

§ 29. TO THE FIRST of these it is objected in many ways:

§ 30. 1. Firstly, indeed, on the part of the form of the sacrament: for every sacrament has a form promulgated by divine institution, which grants sanctification to the sacrament: but matrimony does not have such a form: therefore it is not a sacrament of the new law. The first is evident from the saying of Augustine who says, that the word is added to the element, and it becomes a sacrament. But the second is evident: because the consent which effects matrimony is according to the laws of those who contract, as is held below in the text.

§ 31. 2. Secondly, it is objected to this same thing from the consideration of matter: for every sacrament of the new law or most have matter which is some visible element, as water, oil, bread, and things of this sort, as Hugh says: but this does not have matter: therefore it is not a sacrament of the new law.

§ 32. 3. To the same it is objected thirdly from the consideration of effect: because every sacrament of the new law effects grace which assists inwardly: but matrimony does not effect anything such: therefore matrimony is not a sacrament of the new law. The first is PROVED from the definitions of a sacrament assigned at the beginning of this fourth book of the Sentences. But the SECOND is written below, where he says: Matrimony does not merit the palm.

§ 33. Secondly it is asked, What is its reality if it is a sacrament of the new law?

§ 34. For it seems that there is none: because 1. An act with baseness is what consummates matrimony: therefore it does not confer grace.

§ 35. 2. Also, for what is conceded to infirmity, it suffices that it avoids punishment: but matrimony is conceded to infirmity: therefore it suffices that it avoids punishment: it seems therefore that it does not confer any grace.

§ 36. 3. Also, everything that confers grace, if its exercise can be repeated, is not dissuaded: but the repetition of matrimony, when a wife has died, is dissuaded, and the penalty of irregularity is added: therefore matrimony does not confer grace.

§ 37. Further it is asked thirdly, On what is its efficacy founded?

§ 38. But it seems that it is founded on nothing: because every sacrament effects what it figures by the virtue of the passion of Christ: but this does not have a figure with the passion of Christ, because it consists in maximal pleasure: therefore it seems that it does not have anything from which it might draw its effect.

§ 39. RESPONSE. It must be said to the first, that the Master does not touch in the text upon anything except the signified and not contained reality: because according to him and many others baptism did not have another reality. But what seems to us concerning this will be evident below in the solution of the same question.

§ 40. To the next it must be said that a sacrament of the new law is twofold: one which is a sacrament only, another which is a sacrament and an office. A sacrament only is one whose whole substantial effect is in the opus operatum [the work performed], as is baptism, confirmation, the Eucharist, holy orders, and extreme unction. A sacrament and office is twofold, namely an office of the person, and an office of nature. The office of the person is penance, the office of nature is matrimony. Therefore, as to what is said, that a sacrament of the new law effects what it figures, some say this is understood concerning that which is a sacrament only: because that is so of the new law that it did not exist before it, and draws its entire force from the new law. And it is not understood concerning that which is a sacrament and an office: because in that there is a personal and moral and civil act, which also existed before the new law, and it does not draw its force from the opus operatum alone, but also from the opus operantis [the work of the one performing].

§ 41. To the next it must be said that it is well conceded, that the conjunction of the faithful soul with God is not a contained effect of this sacrament, but a signified one only. And the reason was stated earlier.

§ 42. To what is asked, Whether matrimony is a sacrament of the new law, it must be said that matrimony is considered in four ways regarding four things which are in it: the first of which is the commingling of the sexes for the salvation of nature. The second is the distinction concerning conjunctions in the diversity of sex. But the third is its effect against the wound of concupiscence. And the fourth and last is the honorableness which surrounds the efficient cause of matrimony, and the friendship which follows from it, and the mutual aid of the spouses from mutual works communicated to one another.

§ 43. Regarding the first, indeed, matrimony is of the law of nature: and because the law of nature accompanies every law, therefore this remains in every law: and thus it was instituted in paradise.

§ 44. But regarding the second, it is of the law of Moses, in which the distinction of persons legitimate for matrimony is made.

§ 45. But regarding the third, it is specially of the law of Christ, because from the very opus operatum it confers medicine against the disease, which it did not do before except in the opus operantis.

§ 46. But regarding the other three things following matrimony from its efficient cause and from its effect, it is of the civil law. And in this way the philosophers speak of the honorableness of nuptials, as Cicero, Aristotle, Aspasius, and certain others.

§ 47. But to the objection which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that matrimony has a form which is consent expressed through words. Nor is it necessary that a sacrament always have sanctification from its form: because this is not necessary except in that sacrament which is purely a sacrament: and penance and matrimony are not such, as was said earlier: because those are directed to things around which our works are concerned: and therefore it is necessary that they draw their perfection in some way from us. And therefore in matrimony, standing in for the formal perfective principle, is the indivisibility of life, which is caused from the consent existing perfectly in each of the spouses.

§ 48. To the next it must be said in the same way: because such matter does not exist except in those sacraments which draw their entire rational principle of effecting from the passion of Christ, and the sacraments which are in Christ, such as the baptism of Christ, the passion of Christ, the resurrection of Christ, and things of this sort. But in those which are concerned with our works, some of our own things are the matter, or we ourselves under some disposition: just as in penance sorrow is the matter, and in matrimony we ourselves, existing under the potency of the commingling of the sexes.

§ 49. To the next it must be said that it well effects what it figures: because it effects medicine against concupiscence. And how it effects that will presently be evident in the solution of the following article, and partly it has become clear from the premises.

§ 50. Therefore to that which is asked whether it confers grace?

§ 51. It must be said that concerning this there are three opinions, none of which is to be prejudiced.

§ 52. Now the first is that of some saying that it does not confer any grace: and according to these, 'sacrament' is said of this and the others by priority and posteriority, because of the others it is said by signifying and causing grace, but of this one by signifying only. And this seems to have been the opinion of the Master in the text: and it was the opinion of Praepositinus and William of Auxerre, and of other ancients.

§ 53. There were others who said that it confers grace, namely a withdrawal from sin, but not an order toward the good. And if it is asked, What is that grace? they say that it is that by which it intercepts concupiscence lest it rush headlong: and according to them it must be said that that grace is according to matrimony, or something adjoined to it externally, which mitigates concupiscence, lest it burn beyond the honorableness of nuptials and the goods of matrimony. And in this last way they say is the grace which matrimony confers. And these state probably that this is the reason why certain Fathers seem to say that it does not confer grace, because it does not confer it in order toward the good, but only away from evil: for toward the good it has a certain impediment not from itself, but from its consequent burdens. And this they say the Apostle senses , saying: And this I speak for your profit; not to cast a snare upon you, but for that which is honest, supply, I may provoke, and that which may give you power to attend upon the Lord without impediment. Now this opinion is more pleasing to me than the first.

§ 54. A third group, sufficiently skilled, said that it confers grace in order toward the good, not just any good, but this good which the married person ought to do: and this is that he faithfully assist his spouse, and communicate his works to her, and religiously nourish the offspring received, and things of this sort. And this is also highly probable.

§ 55. But to the objection to the contrary, it must be said that it confers grace: and how it is understood that it does not merit the palm was explained above. But as to what is said, that it is consummated through an act of baseness, it must be said that it is false, but rather it is consummated through an honorable act blessed by the Lord, to which the baseness of concupiscence is adjoined as a punishment: and this is no obstacle, as was said above.

§ 56. To the next it must be said that it is conceded to infirmity, as the Saints say: but infirmity is twofold. One is a prostrate infirmity lying in the lowest things, and another which does not lie, but is infirm toward an elevated excellent thing, which nevertheless is worthy of greater praise. And what is conceded to infirmity in the first way is like what is said He that is weak, let him eat herbs. And this has no reward nor grace. But what is conceded to infirmity in the second way is a meritorious good, but it does not have excellent praise: and this is matrimony, and therefore it confers grace.

§ 57. To the next it must be said that this happens to matrimony from adjoined things, and not from itself, but especially from two adjoined things, namely the concupiscence which is adjoined to the act, and the impediment to attending upon the Lord, which is adjoined to its burdens: and therefore that argumentation deceives by accident.

§ 58. TO THAT which is asked thirdly, it must be said that it draws the power of effecting from the union of natures in Christ, in which natures the spouse of the Church suffered: on account of which it is said A bloody spouse thou art to me.

§ 59. And thus the solution to the whole is evident according to the last two opinions, but according to the first they do not need this solution.

Articulus 15 — Whether Marriage Before Carnal Union Is Perfect

Whether matrimony before carnal copulation is perfect?

§ 62. Next it is asked concerning what is said in that chapter G, a little after the beginning: There is no doubt that that woman does not belong to matrimony, etc.

§ 63. For this seems to be true what the three decrees first introduced say: § 64. 1. For according to the Philosophers it is the same thing for a thing to be perfect and consummated: but matrimony is not consummated without carnal copulation: therefore neither is it perfect.

§ 65. 2. Also, the perfect is that to which nothing is lacking of things yet to be done: but in those conjoined by consent alone, something is lacking of things yet to be done, because of the commingling of bodies: therefore it seems that matrimony before the commingling of bodies is not perfect.

§ 66. 3. Also, the words of the first formed man seem to imply this, who said: They shall be two in one flesh : therefore if they will not be in one flesh, they are not in perfect matrimony: therefore before they are made into one flesh, they do not have perfect matrimony.

§ 67. 4. Also, if something of the essentials of a thing is not perfect, the thing itself is imperfect; but to signify is something of the number of the essentials of the sacraments: therefore if it itself is not perfect in something, the sacrament is imperfect there: but the signification of matrimony before carnal copulation is imperfect, as the Master says in his solution in the text: therefore before this matrimony is an imperfect sacrament. The first is PROVED from this, that all things are thus perfected when their essentials are perfect. But the SECOND is shown through this, that signifying is placed in the definition of a sacrament, and the sign is predicated of it univocally and in the nominative [directly], just as a superior of an inferior, that is, as of a subject, as Aristotle says in the Categories.

§ 68. 5. Also, from the same thing a sacrament draws causality and signification, as was held in the beginning of this book: therefore what is of imperfect signification, is also of imperfect causality: therefore it is imperfect in all those things which are of the essence of a sacrament of the new and the old law: if therefore that matrimony is imperfect in signification, that matrimony will be absolutely imperfect: and thus the proposition is held.

§ 69. RESPONSE. It must be said that matrimony is perfect through consent: because from that essentially is caused the indivisibility which is the essence of matrimony: and therefore whether they are continent by an equal vow, or are commingled, it is always equally matrimony as to essence.

§ 70. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the Philosophers call perfect in essence and consummated in essence the same thing, and the Theologians also say that, because perfect is what attains the term and end of its becoming: and this is the ultimate form, and this is also its highest point by reason of which in essence it is called consummated, if it is the highest point of the thing not only in being, but in its ultimate potency: and according to this, 'consummated' adds something above 'perfect', because perfect speaks of that which attains the term of its making and becoming, but consummated speaks of the ultimate potency following the perfect itself: just as we call an infant a perfect human, but not a consummated one. And in this way 'consummated' is taken when matrimony is called consummated, namely when it is in its ultimate potency able to signify maximally: and it does this when the bodies are commingled, because then it signifies more things.

§ 71. To the next it must be said that that is perfect in which nothing is lacking of things to be done regarding being: but regarding well-being something can be lacking: and that is carnal copulation which contributes to well-being according to signification.

§ 72. To the next it must be said that the first formed man said this about consummated matrimony, such as was necessary then, humans not yet being multiplied.

§ 73. To the next it must be said that perfect signifying is in the sacrament of matrimony, even before carnal copulation: because it perfectly signifies both what it figures outside its conjunction, and what it figures within: outside, the spiritual conjunction of the Church with God: within, the spiritual union between the spouses, as the Master says at the end of this chapter: but it signifies more things through commingling, yet it does not signify more intensely or to a greater degree. And therefore in the argument there is the fallacy of figure of speech, in that the continuous is changed into the discrete.

§ 74. Through the same the solution to the last is evident.

§ 75. And through these things what is said in this distinction is somewhat evident: because concerning what he says about the holiness of the continent, there will be a special treatise below.

DISTINCTIO XXVII

Articulus 1 — In What Genus Marriage Is

In what genus is matrimony?

§ 88. This being held, there occur here three questions pertaining to the understanding of these chapters, of which the first is this, In what genus is matrimony? But the second, What is it? The third, concerning the things consequent upon matrimony, of which mention is made in the text.

§ 89. To the first it is objected thus: 1. There is no bond unless there be something binding which is the tying by which it binds: but matrimony is the bond by which legitimate persons contracting matrimony are bound: therefore it is not the tying itself: therefore it is something which is prior to the tying itself: but this is absolute: therefore matrimony is in some absolute genus.

§ 90. 2. Further, If it is asked of someone joined in matrimony, by what is he bound? he will say, by matrimony: therefore the essence of matrimony is diverse from the tying itself: therefore as before.

§ 91. 3. Further, There is never similarity between any persons, unless there be one absolute quality in them both: therefore by similarity there will never be a conjunction or bond between any persons, unless there is some absolute thing conjoining both: and this is the essence of matrimony: therefore matrimony is in an absolute genus.

§ 92. 4. Further, Augustine says that there is no relative thing that is not also something else which is not relative: but the conjunction of matrimony is a certain relation: therefore matrimony is also something else which is not relative, but absolute: therefore it is in an absolute genus.

§ 93. 5. Further, concerning what is essential to it, nothing absolute is predicated obliquely, nor is what is essential predicated of it obliquely: because it is not said, man is of an animal, but rather an animal: but it is sufficiently clear that matrimony is predicated obliquely of conjunction, because we say that this is the conjunction of matrimony: therefore matrimony is not essentially a conjunction.

§ 94. 6. Further, Aristotle says that the definitions of passions and subjects are different: because in the definition of a passion that which is essential is like a genus, and the subject of the passion is like a defining difference: just as when snubness is defined, and is called the curvature of the nose, curvature is specified and contracted by the nose: and yet curvature is the essence of snubness, and the nose is the subject: and in all such things the contracting element is no part of the essence of the contracted: therefore by similarity when it is said, the conjunction of matrimony is a conjunction, it seems that conjunction is drawn by the fact that I say matrimony: therefore matrimony is not of the essence of conjunction: therefore it seems that it is in some absolute genus, and not in relation: and this is contrary to everyone.

§ 95. To the contrary of this it is objected thus: 1. Matrimony is divided through conjunction and bond: therefore it is in it as in a proximate genus: therefore it is in the genus of conjunction as in a primary genus.

§ 96. 2. Further, When one is predicated of another as of a subject, that which is the genus of the superior is also the genus of the inferior: but conjunction in this way is predicated of matrimony: therefore what is the genus of conjunction is also the genus of matrimony: but the genus of every conjunction is relation: therefore matrimony is in relation as in a genus.

§ 97. 3. Further, Whatever is in one with respect to another, and conversely in the other with respect to this one, is a relative of equivalence: but thus is matrimony in the man and in the woman: therefore, etc.

§ 98. RESPONSE. To this it must be said that matrimony is in the genus of relation, just as the last objections prove, and it speaks of a relation of equivalence: because the man and the woman are equal in those things which are of matrimony.

§ 99. But to the first which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that matrimony is the bond itself: but just as it is said that paternity is the very nature of the relation by which the father is referred to the son, and yet paternity is a relation: but because it is signified as abstract, therefore it does not seek to be determined externally: so matrimony is spoken of as abstract: and therefore matrimony is called a bond or conjunction, just as paternity is called a relation: and there is no diversity there, except in matrimony.

§ 100. And through this the solution to the first three is evident.

§ 101. To the next it must be said that Augustine understands a relative as what is related, and not the nature of the relation itself: and concerning that, what he says is true. But matrimony speaks of the very nature of relation.

§ 102. And through this the solution to all except the last is evident.

§ 103. And to that it must be said that they are not conjoined in such a way when one says the bond of matrimony, as when one says a curved nose. For the first are conjoined in the habitude of a form to its act, but the second in habitude to its subject and form; and therefore it is not similar. For when it is said the bond of matrimony, it is similar as if it were said, the relation of paternity is that by which the father is referred to the son.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Definitions Of Marriage Are Well Assigned

Whether the definitions of matrimony are well assigned?

§ 106. Secondly it is asked, What is matrimony?

§ 107. And let whatever definitions are found concerning it be accepted.

The first in the Letter is this:
Marriage is the marital union of a man and a woman among legitimate persons, retaining an indivisible way of life.

The experts of law define it by saying:
Marriage is a partnership of common life, and a union of divine and human law.

Hugh of Saint Victor defines it thus:
Marriage is the legitimate consent of two suitable persons to a union.

Against the first, it is objected thus:
1. Because it says: Of a man and a woman: for sometimes more women could be had by one man: therefore it should say, Of a man and a woman or women.

1. Likewise, it is questioned about what it says: Marital union: for just as there is a non-marital union, so also a wifely one: therefore it should as well say, wifely or wifely union as marital.
2. Likewise, in those things which pertain to marriage, man and woman are equal; therefore that union should as well be named from the woman as from the man.

Likewise, marital union does not seem to be except in the act of the husband: but the act of the husband is carnal copulation: therefore it seems that there is no marriage except in carnal copulation: and this has been previously refuted.

1. Likewise, it is questioned about what it says: Among legitimate persons: for every person is legitimate, because what is not legitimate to one is legitimate to another: therefore it seems that this is superfluously added to the definition.
2. Furthermore, if it is said that legitimate are those who are able to come together. Against: Marriage is neither perfected nor is by carnal concubinage: therefore, with that not existing, it is not impeded: therefore it seems that even if they are impotent to come together, they are still legitimate to contract.
3. Likewise, legitimate persons are those bound by the laws of marriage: therefore the wife of someone is still legitimate to contract, which is false: therefore it seems this is badly added.
4. Further, it is objected about what follows: Retaining an indivisible way of life. It seems that it is a divisible life: because neither in merit nor in the act of sin do they agree, but are distinguished: therefore they do not have an indivisible way of life.
5. Likewise, if divorce or separation from the bed is made perpetually, then there is not an indivisible way of life between them: therefore there is no marriage between them, which is false.

Further, it is questioned about the second thus:
1. Among partners, as the Philosophers, Aristotle and Cicero, say, there is a partnership of common life, and also among citizens, and similarly between father and son, and communication of divine and human law: therefore it seems that there is marriage among them, which is false.

1. Likewise, what is called divine law there? for they do not communicate in divine things. For divine things (as blessed Dionysius says) are not given except by merit: but merit is unequal between woman and man: therefore they do not communicate divine things to each other.
2. Likewise, it often happens that one of the spouses participates and follows divine law, and the other does not: therefore it seems that they do not communicate divine law to each other.
3. A similar objection is about human law: because by human and divine law the man is the head of the wife: and this law does not communicate to the wife: therefore it seems that neither the communication of divine nor human law is marriage.

Further, it is questioned about the third which is Hugh's in the book II of the Sacraments:

1. For there seems to be an instance against what it says, Of two persons, etc., that Jacob had two wives, and David ten: therefore it is not only of two, but of two, or three, or more.

1. Likewise, it seems that it is badly added, Suitable: because suitability is through virtue, or grace of dignity: and not only those, but also those existing in sins can contract.

Likewise, Suitable either says suitability by grace, or by nature. If by grace. Against: Those existing in sin can contract, and are suitable to contract: therefore it does not say suitability by grace. But if it says suitability by nature. Against: According to this, nature begot men equal: therefore all are equally suitable to contract, which is false, therefore it is badly placed there, Suitable.

1. Further, Legitimate consent is the efficient cause of marriage: and the efficient cause is not its effect: therefore legitimate consent is not marriage: it seems therefore that the definition is bad.

Response. It must be said that these definitions are quite good. For the first says the genus, and the remote and proximate matter, and the act which is the indivisibility of life. The genus, however, is like the form: and therefore it can be given to all others.

To the first objection, it must be said that according to nature it is best instituted, as the Master Moses says, that there is not but one of one: for which Adam said: This now is bone of my bones... and they shall be two in one flesh: he did not say three or four. And as to this, which according to nature is best instituted, this definition of marriage is given. And this is what Master Hugo says: At this time with one woman not at the same time with many is marriage entered, as the Apostle says: For the sake of fornication let each have his own wife, he does not say wives.

To the other, it must be said that marital union is a union into marital copulation.

To what is objected against this, it must be said that marital copulation is called the communication of operations by that communication by which man and woman communicate conjugally: but this can happen even without subsequent carnal copulation. And thus the solution to the objection against that part is clear.

To the same, it must be said that that copulation is named from the more dignified, namely from the husband.

To what is objected, that they are equal, etc., it must be said that it is true in the payment and request of debt: but yet in many other things the man is the head of the woman.

To the other, it must be said that not all persons are legitimate, but some are legitimate simply, and some legitimate in a certain respect. Simply legitimate are those to whom none of those impediments which make persons illegitimate are an obstacle. Legitimate in a certain respect are those to whom something is an obstacle. Nor is it valid, This woman is legitimate to this man: therefore she is legitimate: because there is a fallacy of the certain respect and the simple.

To what is objected about those impotent to come together, it must be said that this is one cause of the illegitimacy of persons: but more are determined below.

To the other, it must be said that legitimate persons are those to whom no impediment is an obstacle: but it does not follow that they can always contract, because they have already contracted: and then essentially there is marriage between them.

To the other, it must be said that life is called indivisible, because it communicates works to marriage, and is ordered to relieve the burdens of marriage, namely because they cannot be separated while living to be joined to others as long as both live: and it is not called a communion in merit or sin, because in such things persons remain distinct.

To the other, it must be said that even if separation from the bed is made either from malice, or from another just or unjust cause, nevertheless indivisibility remains as to this, that they cannot be joined to others.

To what is objected about the second, it must be said that the partnership of man and woman is a partnership of indivisible and indissoluble life, except by death: and such a partnership is not among partners and other persons introduced: and therefore it is not a partnership simply, except among spouses, as it is said, Esther, vii, 8: The partner of our kingdom, Esther, he wished to oppress.

To what is said about communication, it must be said that it is understood of the communication of souls and bodies, unless by equal consent they abstain: and this is confirmed by divine and human law. And if the definition is understood thus, then the objections do not hold: however, the Decretists are little accustomed to care about definitions or other things pertaining to subtle understanding.

To what is objected about the third, it must be said that according to Hugh as he glosses, that definition is understood of marriage contracted in the New and not the Old Testament. If, however, someone wished to extend it to all time, it is said as before, that according to the nature of marriage one is of one: but for a cause more can be taken: and this happens by accident, namely when few worship God.

To the other, it must be said that suitability is neither from nature, nor from grace, but from legitimate causes: and therefore that reasoning proceeds from the insufficient.

To the other, it must be said that indeed this definition is given by the efficient cause: hence there is not essential predication there, but rather it is said by cause, just as day is the sun shining upon the earth.

Divisio Textus

DIVISIO TEXTUS,

Then it is inquired concerning what is said, there, C, Efficient cause of marriage, elec.

This part is divided into four parts: in the first of which he shows the efficient cause of marriage. In the second, he introduces opinions on why she who is joined in marriage is called a spouse, there, E, For from the very betrothal, etc. In the third, he states the reason why the spouse is not immediately given when the marriage is contracted, there, M, Concerning the nuptial. In the fourth and last, he speaks of how a spouse becomes a widow, upon the death of the husband, and who does not, there, N, It is to be known, that that bride, etc.

Of these parts, the second is divided into three: in the first of which he touches upon the true opinion; in the second, the false with its assertions, there, F, However, some as In the third, by opposing they have solved, etc. there, 1, To these things we thus respond, etc.

And let these suffice concerning the division of this distinction.

Articulus 3 — Whether One Of The Spouses Can Be Continent Without The Other

Can one of the spouses contain without the other?

Thirdly, it is asked concerning those things which the Master subsequently says in the explanation of the definition, and especially concerning what he says there, B, that without the consent of the other, neither can profess continence, nor devote themselves to prayer: and that between them while they live, the conjugal bond remains, so that it is not lawful for one to join with another, and that they should render to each other, etc.

For it seems that this is false: because
1. True spouses are made by consent: but after that, before carnal copulation, one can, without the other being asked, fly to the fruit of a better life: and then permission is given to the other to marry: therefore it seems false what is said in the Letter.

1. Likewise, a lesser good does not prejudice a greater good: but a vow of continence is a greater good than marriage: therefore marriage does not prejudice the vow: therefore marriage does not exclude the vow of continence: therefore even after marriage is contracted and consummated, a vow of continence can be made, even without the other being asked.

2. Likewise, in natures, a lesser light does not exclude a greater, but conversely: but marriage is like a light, and a vow of perpetual continence is like a greater light: therefore although a vow excludes marriage, yet it does not exclude a vow of perpetual continence.

3. Likewise, the way of progressing to a better state should not be closed to anyone: therefore not even to one joined in marriage: but by the vow of continence one progresses to a better state: therefore marriage should not impede him from this vow.

4. Likewise, in no other virtue does a lower state exclude a higher state, just as beginning chastity does not exclude the state of progressing and perfect chastity, and so it is with justice, fortitude, and all others: therefore even in continence, a lower state does not exclude a higher state of continence: therefore although a person is joined in marriage, it cannot be prohibited by the spouse that they pass to continence of a higher state.

On the contrary, nothing should be done with prejudice to the right of another person: but by marriage, a woman becomes a person of another's right, and conversely: therefore nothing should be done with prejudice to that right: however, a vow of continence cannot be made without prejudice to the other spouse: therefore it cannot be made without their consent. The first is proved by what the Apostle says, to the Romans 1, 8: And let us not do evil that good may come: whose damnation is just, by what the Apostle says, I to the Corinthians vii, 4: The woman does not have power over her own body, but the husband: likewise also the husband.

Which is to be conceded, by saying to the first, that before carnal copulation there is only a spiritual bond between them: and therefore for the dissolution of that, spiritual death suffices. Hence, when one flies to the fruit of a better life in the cloister, then they die spiritually: and then the other is absolved.

To the other, it must be said that a lesser good, when it is simply so, does not prejudice a better good: but when the better cannot be done except with damage and injury to another's right, then one should not pass from a lesser good to a better: because what is unjust is not better.

To the other, it must be said that what is introduced is not similar: because a vow of perpetual continence in such a case is not like a greater light, but rather like the darkness of injustice from the invasion of another's right, as has been said.

And by this, the solution to the last two is also clear.

Articulus 4 — Whether Mutual Consent Expressed By Words Or Signs Is The Efficient Cause Of Marriage

Whether mutual consent expressed through words or signs is the efficient cause of marriage?

Three questions arise concerning the first question of the Master here: of which the first is, Whether mutual consent expressed through words or signs is the efficient cause of marriage? The second, Whether such consent has always been the efficient cause of marriage, or not? The third, Why in this sacrament consent is required as a cause, and not in others?

To the first, it is objected thus:
1. Hugh of Saint Victor says in the book on Sacraments, in the treatise on marriage: Those who are joined must consent so that they may receive each other spontaneously. Therefore, consent makes marriage.

1. Moreover, many authorities are introduced in the Letter to this effect.
2. Likewise, it is objected by reason thus: because what is mine cannot become yours without my consent: therefore, since in marriage what is mine becomes yours, and vice versa: therefore, mutual consent is required to effect this.

But because this is said by all, it is objected to the contrary thus:

1. Marriage is a sacrament: but in every sacrament the efficient cause is divine power, as Augustine says: therefore, in marriage the efficient cause is divine power: therefore, mutual consent is not the efficient cause of marriage.
2. Likewise, different species have different efficient causes: but a sacrament and a contract of justice are different in species: therefore, they have different efficient causes: but consent is the cause of the contract: therefore, it is not the cause of marriage.
3. Likewise, every sacrament of the Church consists in the operation of the ministers of the Church: therefore, also marriage: but those contracting marriage are not ministers of the Church: therefore, their operation should not be the efficient cause of marriage.
4. Likewise, consent is hidden: but the efficient cause should be manifest at least in operation: therefore, it seems that consent is not the efficient cause.

If you say that it is expressed through words. On the contrary: A word is often a deceitful messenger, because it is said in Psalm 110:11 that every man is a liar: therefore, it seems that it cannot be sufficiently certified through words.

1. Likewise, let us suppose that someone speaks words expressing consent to deceive, and not to consent: it is clear that here there is no consent: therefore, there is no marriage: therefore, the woman admitting him would fornicate, which is grave to say, and false.
2. Likewise, marriage, just as it seeks consent in one, so it seeks consent in the other spouse: therefore, there must be two consents: and these two cannot be certified: therefore, it always remains in doubt whether there is marriage or not: but whoever makes doubtful what he fears to be mortal sin, sins mortally: therefore, anyone knowing his wife, according to this, would sin mortally, which is false.

3. Likewise, it is objected concerning what is said, Expressed through words: for some are mute, who do not form words: therefore, they cannot contract, which is false.

4. Likewise, some do not understand each other: therefore, they cannot contract.

5. Likewise, either consent has from words that it makes marriage, or conversely words from consent, or both together have to make marriage. If you say that consent has from words. On the contrary: Nothing gives what it does not have: therefore, words have it even without consent: therefore, if someone speaks words, even if he does not consent, he effects marriage, which is false. Conversely, if words have from consent, it is similarly objected: therefore, consent has it before words: it may happen, therefore, that two persons silently consent to each other: therefore, there will be marriage between them: therefore, they cannot be joined to others, which is false. But if both together have it: then it is badly said in the Letter that only consent makes marriage.

6. Likewise, we see some not expressing their consent, but remaining entirely silent while their parents give them to others: therefore, it seems that such would not be marriage: which again is false.

7. Likewise, an oath is stronger than a simple word. Let us suppose, therefore, that someone contracts today in the face of the Church through a word of the present, and tomorrow or at another time swears in the face of the Church that he never consented, it will be more credible to his oath than to his word: therefore, the Church should not compel such a one to remain.

If you say that the Church is a witness of past consent. On the contrary: The Church is not a witness except of what it has seen: but it has not seen consent: therefore, it cannot be a witness of consent, except as much as it believes the word that was then spoken: but this one now swears that he never intended to consent: therefore, it seems that his oath should be upheld, which is false: therefore, it seems that the efficient cause of marriage is not consent.

Further, it is asked concerning what is added in the Letter: Through words of the present: and if they consent in the future, that consent is not effective for making marriage.

For it seems this is false: because
1. A contract can be made in the future concerning any other thing: therefore, also concerning this.

1. Likewise, philosophers have spoken of exchanges and contracts, and they never posit another efficient cause of a contract in the future, and another cause of a contract in the present: therefore, it seems that nothing is said in the Letter.

2. Likewise, just as the future is distant from the present by expectation, so the past by memory, as Augustine says: therefore, since consent in the future does not make marriage, it seems that neither does consent which was in the past make marriage: which is false, because marriage is between those who consented in the past.

3. Likewise, the future and the present differ only by matter: but those things which differ only by matter do not differ in species by the efficient cause: therefore, there is not another efficient cause of marriage in the future and in the present.

4. Likewise, it is greater to enter a cloister than to contract marriage: but I can consent in the future to entering a cloister: therefore, I can also consent in the future to the contract of marriage: therefore, there is nothing that is said in the Letter, as it seems.

Response. It must be said that the Master speaks truly in the Letter.

To the first objection, it must be said that this sacrament, as was previously determined, is not only divine: and Augustine's statement is understood of sacraments that are only divine: but this, since it is about human acts, depends on human acts, just as penance does in some of its acts.

To the other, it must be said that the ministers of the Church simply have in administration the sacraments of the Church that are only divine: but those that are human must be administered according to doctrine: and therefore, such things, because of the imperfection joined to them, they do not administer, but teach how they may be done honorably and according to God: and this suffices in such sacraments.

To the other, it must be said that entirely hidden consent cannot make marriage, because it is only of one, since it does not proceed to the other: and therefore, consent expressed in signs makes it, and then it is not hidden.

To what is objected against, it must be said that a word is sometimes a deceitful messenger: but nevertheless, because the Church does not strive for the impossible, and it is impossible for man to know the heart, therefore it judges according to appearance: and therefore it says there is marriage when it is contracted through words of the present, and therefore compels him to remain.

To the other, it must be said that for him who does not consent, there is no marriage, nor is there simply marriage: because marriage is not in one, but in two, and it does not limp: yet the other is excused in coitus, because according to appearance it is fully satisfied concerning marriage: and therefore there is ignorance of fact particular, but not of law or universal: and the Church compels her to remain, because it judges according to appearance: and if he wishes to avoid hell, it is necessary that he consents.

But let us suppose such a case, that someone deceives the first through words of the present in the face of the Church, but contracts truly with the second, what is to be done for him? It must be said that the Church should compel him to the first: but he should rather endure excommunication than remain with her: but let him go with the second to distant regions, and there remain with her rendering the debt: which if he cannot, let him endure excommunication with sorrow of heart and die in it.

To the other, it must be said that for man it should suffice to have certainty according to appearance: because he cannot have another, and he has that through words of the present expressing consent.

To the other, it must be said that words are put there generally for any signs expressing consent of the present, and especially for coitus if a promise of the future follows.

To the other, it must be said that words have from consent, and consent alone would effect if it could proceed into the knowledge of the other.

To the objection against, it must be said that such do not have consent expressed through words, and consent in words alone makes marriage, for the reason stated: and therefore that objection is of no value.

To the other, it must be said according to Hugh saying thus: Those who are joined must consent so that they may receive each other spontaneously: it is judged to be done if in the betrothal there is no contradiction: for he consents who does not contradict, according to that of the Pandects: He seems to consent to his father's will, unless he evidently dissents elsewhere. What does not oppose the father's will is understood to consent.

To the other, it must be said that even if he swears with many, as long as the antecedent can be proven, he will not be believed: because the Church judges according to appearance, but God looks at the heart: and therefore such a one should make peace between himself and God as he wills and can: because the Church compels him to return to the first.

To the other, it must be said that only consent of the present makes marriage, and not of the future.

To what is objected against, it must be said that another contract of the future is not even a contract, but it will be a contract if in the future it is made through the present: but nevertheless, another is a contract of the future, and another is the expectation of the price in the future of a contract already made. Whence it is clear that a contract can be present, with the price received in the future. And similarly, it is in marriage, that betrothals of the future do not make marriage, but it will be marriage when consent of the present intervenes.

To the other, it must be said that the statement of the philosophers is true both of contract and of marriage, as is clear from the foregoing.

To the other, it must be said that a contract of the past does not effect marriage, but it effected it: and so it is with a contract of the future, that it does not effect, but it will effect when it is converted into the present.

To the other, it must be said that those things which differ in species in things, nothing prohibits them from differing in species in will and desire: because an accident that happens to a thing per se as the end of the will is taken from the act of the soul: and therefore an accidental difference in a thing sometimes makes a substantial difference in wills, which differ according to the willed things which are taken as ends. And so it is in consent relating to the word of the present time and the future.

And this solution is to be noted in the whole matter: because it is necessary.

Articulus 5 — Whether Such Consent Always Brings About Marriage

Whether such consent always effects marriage?

Whether such consent always effects marriage or not?

Secondly, it is asked whether such consent always effects marriage or not?

It seems, however, that it does not: because
1. Master Hugh says: I think,
Therefore it seems that a man then that it sufficed in ancient times of the fathers to contract marriage by the mutual provision of man and woman in necessary matters, and by consent concerning the payment of the debt of the flesh:
provided, however, that the woman promised to keep the faith of the bed to the man, but the man could sometimes take another and, having given a bill of divorce, dismiss his wife.
He was not bound to consent.

1. Likewise, if the words were of the present,
I take you as mine: since he who is another's cannot be mine, it seems that a woman cannot say this, who is joined to one who has many: therefore she cannot consent to him:
therefore it seems that then consent did not make marriage.
2. Likewise, he is not mine who can dismiss me:
but then he could dismiss by giving a bill of divorce: therefore it seems that he was not hers: therefore neither was there consent, because consent makes one his own. And this was sometimes the opinion of Hugh of Saint Victor.

On the contrary, it is objected: because 4. It is said, Genesis 24:57: Let us call the girl, and ask her will: and the consent of the girl was sought:
but it was sought only for marriage: therefore consent of the present, and then it made marriage.

1. Likewise, what would make marriage if not consent? It is evident, however, that she who is matrimonially joined is known as his own: but nothing can make her his own except consent: therefore it seems that even then consent made marriage.

Response. It seems to me without prejudice, that even then consent made marriage expressed by words of the present.
And I say that a man can be his own of a woman in two ways, namely simply in all things: and thus he could not be of another spouse:
and in this way he is his own in the New Testament in which one is of one. In another way, he could be his own in the work of generation: and in this way one can be of many, as Aristotle says in IV of the first philosophy, that one fulfills many. And the consent of the Old Testament when it was said,
I take you as mine, was understood thus,
and that was the consent which then effected marriage: and the cause is that which was said, namely the scarcity of those serving God, and the multitude of those who were led to idolatry, when the time of spiritual fecundity was not yet.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the authority introduced is understood that they did not consent entirely as now.

To the second, it must be said that the sense of the words when they said,
I take you as mine, has already been explained.
And through that exposition of the distinction previously held,
the solution to that argument is clear.

To the third, it must be said that as the Lord says, Matthew 5:34 and 19:7, a bill of divorce was given because of hardness, and therefore it was beyond the law of marriage: and therefore the dismissed was still his own by law.

Whether, however, such dismissal was imputed then or not, will be in the question below.

Articulus 6 — Why In This Sacrament Rather Than In Another Consent Is Required

Why is consent required in this sacrament rather than in another?

Why is consent required in this sacrament rather than in another?

Thirdly, it is asked, Why is consent sought in this sacrament rather than in another?

It seems that it ought not to be sought: because 1. Matrimony is of the lower members of the Church: but it is for the lower to be moved according to the disposition of the higher in the reception of sacraments: therefore it seems that the consent of the lower ought not to be sought, but of the higher.

1. Likewise, every participation of the hierarchical is derived from the hierarch, as Dionysius says: but every sacrament is a certain participation of the hierarchical: therefore it seems that it is participated according to the consent or dissent of the hierarchy, and not according to the consent of the lower.

The response to this is that this sacrament, as was said before, consists in a certain exchange or contract of the person contracting: such an exchange cannot be made without the consent of the one exchanging or contracting: and therefore in this and not in others is consent required.

To what is objected against this, it must be said that in all things which pertain to the hierarchy, the lower ought to be moved at the nod of the higher: but matrimony is of those things, namely when, and in what form they contract, and suchlike: but the contract itself is not subject to obedience, but to the consent of the contracting party.

To the other it must be said, that from that part where it is only about human acts, it is not of the hierarchical: but from that part where it is a sacrament, and in this way it is dispensed by ministers having power from the hierarch: and in this part also marriages are blessed, and presented to the Church.

Articulus 7 — Whether Marriage Is Said To Consist In The Union Of Souls Or Of Bodies

Whether marriage is said to consist in the union of souls or bodies?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, E, "But from the very betrothal," etc.

For it seems to be objected for this opinion thus:
1. To have a debt in the body of another, when before it was not had, does not continue unless in another conferring that right in that body: but that right is conferred from the first consent expressed by words of the present: therefore from then is that debt: but this debt is the effect of marriage: therefore then is marriage: therefore marriage is from then.

1. Likewise, the soul is nobler than the body: therefore the union of souls is nobler in marriage than of bodies: therefore marriage is more perfected by the conjunction of souls than of bodies: therefore in such conjunction there is more marriage.
2. Likewise, it was proven above that marriage is more perfected by the consent of souls: therefore from then it is also called marriage, and neither before nor after.

§ 4. Further, that makes a thing by the positing of which it is posited, and by the destruction of which it is destroyed: but the consensus of conjugal union does this: therefore they are called spouses from that moment. The minor premise is evident from this, that if the joining of bodies made a marriage, it would always make it: and this is evidently false: therefore since there is nothing in a marriage except consensus and the commingling of bodies, it seems that they are called spouses from consensus.

§ 5. Further, copulation does not effect a conjugal union unless consensus precedes it, and through consensus: therefore consensus rather effects the marriage: and thus again the proposition is established.

To the contrary of this, it is objected in favor of the following opinion, that: § 1. Augustine says that marriage is a good of mortals: but mortality is not aided except through the commingling of bodies: therefore marriages are not marriages except through the commingling of bodies: therefore they ought not to be called spouses except through the commingling of bodies.

§ 2. Further, a wife is given to a man as a helpmate, as is said in Genesis 1:19 but there is no help except of generation: since therefore this does not happen except through corporal commingling, it seems that she is called a wife from corporal commingling.

§ 3. Further, Adam did not say: "They shall be two in one soul," but rather, "they shall be two in one flesh" therefore they are called spouses from the unity of flesh: therefore before corporal commingling they ought not to be called spouses.

§ 4. Further, certain persons are prohibited from marriage both in the law of nature, and in the old law, and also in the new law: therefore this happens either on account of the joining of hearts, or on account of the commingling of bodies, or on account of both. If in the first way, it seems that this is false: because consanguinity rather serves to foster unity of hearts: therefore such persons ought not to be prohibited from marriage: therefore it remains that it is either on account of the unity of bodies, or on account of both: and whichever is said, the result is what the following opinion says.

§ 5. Further, where Moses prohibits persons who cannot be wives, he uses this mode of speaking there: You shall not uncover the nakedness of your mother but it is evident that this does not happen except through the commingling of bodies: therefore she does not become a wife except through the commingling of bodies.

§ 6. Further, a joining of hearts exists among many without conjugal union: but a joining of bodies with a preceding pact of marriage exists among none except spouses: therefore it seems that the joining of bodies makes a marriage, and not the joining of minds alone.

Solution. To these it must be said that the first opinion is true, but the second is false.

And to what is first objected in favor of the second, it must be said that marriages are called a good of mortals by reason of the good of offspring: but nevertheless they are not only a good of mortals, because they would also exist if there were no mortality: and therefore it is not necessary that it be effected by the act of intercourse.

To the next it must be said that a wife is given to a man as a help for generation, and according to Aristotle she is also given as a help for other operations: because man is a conjugal animal, inasmuch as he does not suffice for himself in his operations, and therefore he is also a gregarious animal, as the Philosopher says. But nevertheless, if it is granted that she is given as a help for generation, it does not follow on this account that she is made a spouse by intercourse itself, but rather by the preceding conjugal pact: because otherwise he would not know her as his own in the first intercourse.

To the next it must be said that Adam said this concerning marriage by reason of its principal good, and he did not say this by reason of the essential cause of marriage: and the principal good of marriage is the good of offspring.

To the next it must be said that those persons are prohibited by reason of the well-being of marriage: because since consanguinity is a sufficient cause of a human pact, God wished to give a pact by which even more remote persons would be bound together: and therefore He excepts closer relatives, so that He might create a necessity of joining oneself to others in a matrimonial pact. Whence this does not touch the essence of marriage: and therefore that does not demonstrate the proper essential of marriage.

To the next it must be said in the same way.

To the last it must be said that society in general is one thing, and conjugal society is another. For the first can exist among many who are not joined by marriage. But the second cannot: because even if he never knew her corporally, a man still could not have a conjugal pact with prohibited persons.

And thus the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 8 — Whether And When It Is Necessary To Render The Debt

Whether and when it is necessary to render the debt? Whether and when it is necessary to render the debt?

Next, it is inquired concerning what he says, there, G, after the beginning: Because although to a spouse before carnal copulation, etc.

For it is inquired here: When is it necessary to render the debt if it is requested?

It seems that it is immediately: because § 1. Through words concerning the present, each one has power and right in the body of the other: but I can demand my right immediately: therefore it seems that immediately after marriage each is bound to pay the debt.

§ 2. Further, if someone makes a contract with someone absolutely, not determining a time, he is bound to pay immediately: but in the contract of marriage the contract is made such that the time is not determined: therefore he is bound to pay immediately.

§ 3. Further, 1 Corinthians 7:5: Do not defraud one another, except perhaps by consent for a time. The debt cannot be denied to a man except by consent: therefore he is bound to pay immediately if it is requested.

§ 4. Further, let us suppose that a danger of temptation threatens someone, taking precautions against which he contracts marriage: since therefore he ought to beware of his own danger, he ought immediately to request the debt; therefore the other is also bound to render it immediately.

To the contrary of this is what will be held below, that § 1. A spouse should not be presented immediately, lest a husband hold cheap the given woman whom he sighed for when delayed: therefore it seems that he ought not to render it immediately.

§ 2. Further, Tobit 7 and 8, passim, the younger Tobit did not render the debt immediately: but first for three nights they both called upon God, he and his wife according to the teaching of the Angel: therefore it seems that others must also do thus.

Solution. It must be said that according to what the Jurists say, he is bound to render the debt within a month. For this time is prescribed for him on account of three causes. One and the principal cause is so that he may have deliberation about passing to higher vows if he wishes. The second is the preparation of those things which are required for the solemnity of the marriage. The third is so that delayed desire may afflict their minds, and from this they may persevere more abundantly afterwards in mutual love.

Therefore, to the first it must be said that he immediately has the right, but he does not immediately have the use: because it concerns the Legislator how each one uses his right: and therefore the law has established how marriage should be consummated honorably.

To the next it must be said that it is otherwise in the purchase of another thing: because a burden and an individual fellowship are not attached to it, but only use, which can displease no one: and therefore it is not necessary that the desire of the buyer be suspended for this, so that he may love the possessed thing more abundantly: but both of these are in marriage.

To the next it must be said that the Apostle is speaking of a marriage that is already consummated.

To the next it must be said that he who contracts on account of temptation can add a condition that copulation through carnal copulation be done immediately. However, he is excessively weak who cannot resist temptation for even such a short time.

Articulus 9 — Whether A Husband Can Dismiss His Wife

Whether a man can dismiss his wife?

Next, it is inquired concerning what he says, there, H, shortly after the beginning: And if human law conceded this, nevertheless divine law prohibited it, etc.

For it seems that divine law ought not to have prohibited this: because § 1. Divine law is more perfect than human law: therefore it ought to accord more with the perfect: but it belongs to the perfect to be without marriage: therefore the law of God ought to have conceded this.

§ 2. Further, human law is patterned after divine law: therefore human law is either just, or unjust. If it is just: since therefore every just thing accords with what is just, the divine law ought not to have prohibited what human law conceded. But if it is unjust: therefore it was so patterned after divine law, which is against the hypothesis.

§ 3. Further, some are sterile from one of the spouses, or from both: but he who is sterile is more usefully occupied around the contemplative life: but since nothing would be lost if license were given him to marry another: therefore it seems that, since this seems to be more perfect, the divine law ought to have urged or permitted this.

§ 4. Further, human law conceded this. Whence Marcia, the wife of Cato, separated from him on account of Cato's sterility, was joined to another for a time: and Philosophers also write that this is just: therefore it seems that it was patterned after divine justice: therefore divine justice promulgated in the Gospel ought to have urged and conceded this.

Response. It must be said that it is unjust that a wife be dismissed after a consummated marriage, unless both spouses consent to vows of continence: and it was always unjust.

And to what is first objected, it must be said that nothing belonging to the perfect is that which is done with injury: but the loss or taking away of another's right against their will can never be done without injury: and therefore since it would be done if she were dismissed against her will, the divine law prohibited dismissing a wife on account of religion, unless she herself wishes to be made religious.

To the next it must be said that human law which is without error is patterned after divine law: but this was with error, and the cause of the error will be determined below in this solution.

To the next it must be said that even if both are sterile, or one: nevertheless on account of the faith of the pact and the sacrament, they cannot be separated while they live, such that they might be able to be joined to others: because the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 7:39, that a woman is bound to the law as long as her husband lives, etc.

To the last it must be said that gentile Philosophers did not consider marriage except from the good of offspring: and therefore when this was lacking, they dissolved it: but divine law considers it from three goods: and therefore although the good of offspring is lacking, nevertheless it commands that it not be dissolved on account of the two remaining goods.

Articulus 10 — Whether, After Entering Religion And Making A Vow Of Continence, A Man Can Return To His Wife, And Whether The Wife Is Bound To Receive Him

Whether after entrance into religion and the emission of a vow of continence a man can return to his wife, and whether the wife is bound to receive him?

Next, it is inquired concerning what he says, there, H, § 1, before the middle: Wherefore we command your experience, that you discuss with diligent inquiry lest perhaps he was converted by her will, etc.

For it seems to be invalid: because § 1. A time of probation is established, in which he can return to the world and to worldly things: therefore without the wife's will, if he has not assumed the habit, in some case she can receive him and is bound to.

§ 2. Further, let us suppose that it was done by her will, and both entered religion, and before the time of profession they wish to leave, it seems that they have the power: because they did not enter except to be tested: therefore they have already tested that they do not wish, or cannot further sustain it.

§ 3. Further, let us give another case, namely that they profess on the first day, and afterwards they repent, and one wishes to leave, it seems that she is bound to receive him: because the time of probation was instituted by the Pope and the holy Fathers on account of the good of the community, lest those who leave religion on account of the violence of temptation remain entirely infamous. But what was introduced on account of the community cannot be renounced by one person. Therefore it seems that such a profession is not a profession: therefore if he wishes to return to the world, then the other is also compelled to leave in order to render the debt. § 4. Further, Pope Innocent IV commands this, saying that a profession which is made before a year should be considered void and empty: but what is void and empty does not impede a return to marriage: therefore it seems that such a one returning ought to receive his wife, even if she is in another religion.

§ 5. Further, I posit that in a house they emit a vow of perpetual continence, and one of them wishes to break it, it is inquired whether the other ought to consent to him?

It seems that she should: because a vow of religion is greater than a simple vow of continence: and from that he can return: therefore from this too.

On the contrary: By breaking a vow he sins mortally, but one consenting to a mortal sinner also sins mortally, as the Gloss says on that passage of the Epistle to the Romans 1:32: They did not understand that those who do such things are worthy of death, etc. Therefore if the woman consents to him, she herself sins mortally: but for nothing ought one to sin mortally: therefore for nothing ought she to consent: therefore nor to render the debt.

Solution. It must be said to the first that he is speaking there in that case when he has emitted a vow of continence with the reception of the habit pertaining to profession: because otherwise he would not command that he provide that he remain in the Monastery.

To the next it must be said that such persons, unless a vow other than that of probation stands in their way, such as a vow of perpetual continence is, can well return to their former embraces with a sound conscience on account of weakness: nor does the Text speak of such persons.

To the next it must be said without prejudice, that unless a precept of a superior stands in their way, who prohibits or has prohibited this, they can well make profession on the first day: and then by license of the superior they have renounced the time of probation. And then the objection is invalid: because although it was introduced for the community, nevertheless it can be revoked by the license of a superior.

To the next it must be said that that precept and constitution of Pope Innocent liberates him from the impediment by which religion would impede him, if he professed before the established time: however, because the Pope does not interpose himself concerning the heart, let him himself see how it is between himself and God.

To the last, I concede plainly that after a vow, even a simple one of perpetual continence, a woman sins mortally by receiving him, nor is she bound to render the debt.

But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it is not similar unless in a vow of religion a vow of perpetual continence is co-understood. But if it is a vow of probation only, then it is not similar: because the eternal prejudices the temporal: nor is it a vow, but an experiment of himself, whether he wishes to vow or not.

Next, it is inquired concerning what he says, there, H, § 1, in the middle: He cannot be partly converted, and partly remain in the world, etc.

For according to this, the woman could not be holy, and the man not be holy, nor conversely.

Response. It must be said that conversion is spoken of here in the transition to religion through the reception of the habit, and a vow of perpetual continence.

Articulus 11 — Whether Impotence Of Intercourse Or Another Impediment Can Dissolve Marriage

Whether the impotence to copulate or another impediment can dissolve a marriage?

Next, it is inquired concerning what he says, there, H, § 1, before the end, from the words of Augustine: If you abstain without your wife's will, etc.

For it seems by a similarity: because § 1. Those who are made impotent to copulate give their wives an occasion for committing adultery: therefore it seems that such persons should be separated, and license should be given to the wife to join herself to another.

§ 2. Further, Blessed Bernard says: What was instituted for charity, ought not to militate against charity. Therefore, by a similarity, what was instituted for medicine, ought not to militate against medicine: but the contract of marriage was instituted for medicine: therefore it ought not to militate against medicine: but it militates against medicine by the very fact of being impotent to copulate: therefore in such cases the marriage ought no longer to be observed.

§ 3. Further, in all things to be done this is true, that when the end of a reasonable action ceases, the action and the observation of the action cease: therefore also in the contract and observation of marriage. I posit therefore that she contracted only on account of her infirmity, and to the end that it be a marriage: but subsequent impotence to copulate removes both: therefore it seems that the marriage ought to be dissolved as lacking the intended end.

§ 4. Further, he who takes away another's property deserves to lose his own: but this impotent man does not pay what is another's, that is, the wife's debt: therefore he demerits his own, that is, the debt which the wife owes him: but if she owes him nothing, then she is absolved from him: and absolved from him, she can join herself to another: therefore by the very fact of being impotent to copulate, she can join herself to another.

Response, that no impediment supervening upon a marriage dissolves the marriage.

Whence it must be said to the first, that it is not similar: because in him who denies the debt when he can render it, an injury is caused by the iniquitous will of a man: and therefore it is imputed to him, and he is compelled to render it and satisfy the one requesting: but when impotence to copulate supervenes upon a marriage, then it is caused by a just, hidden judgment of God: and therefore then the inability of the debtor excludes the action of the woman.

To the next it must be said that it does not militate against marriage, but rather for it: because marriages are holier without intercourse than with it: and therefore it is not similar, because nothing militates against charity except evil: but it is not so, as is evident from what has been said.

To the next it must be said that the end is twofold, namely of marriage, and of the one contracting marriage. But the end of marriage is still preserved in the good of faith, and the good of the sacrament: but one must not look to the end of the one contracting marriage, because the intention of those contracting is often vicious, but marriage is never vicious, but always honorable.

Articulus 12 — Whether The Definition Of Betrothal Has Been Well Assigned

Whether the definition of betrothal is well assigned? Whether the definition of betrothal is well assigned?

Next, it is inquired concerning what he says, there, I, To these we thus respond, etc.

For it is inquired here, first, What is betrothal? Second, Of whom is it? Third, What are its effects? Fourth, In what ways is it contracted? And fifth, In what ways is it dissolved?

To the FIRST: § 1. Let the definition of betrothal be taken from the Jurists, which is this: Betrothal is the promise of future nuptials. And this definition is drawn from the words of Pope Nicholas. And below: But after betrothal, which is the promise of future nuptials, pacts are also celebrated by the consensus of those who contract this, and of those in whose power they are, etc.

§ 2. Further, it is proved by reason: because betrothal (sponsalia) is derived from the word for promising (spondendi): but promising looks to the future: therefore betrothals are nuptials promised in the future.

To the contrary of this it is objected: § 1. What is uncertain cannot be promised with certitude: but a future copulation is uncertain: therefore it seems that it cannot be promised without a condition: therefore betrothal is never contracted absolutely, which is false: therefore this is also false, that betrothal is the promise of future nuptials.

§ 2. Further, James 4:15: What is our life? It is a vapor appearing for a little while, and afterwards it shall vanish. For that you ought to say: If the Lord wills, and: If we live, we will do this or that. Therefore it seems that on account of the uncertainty of life such a promise ought not to be made absolutely.

§ 3. Further, in other matters a promise made and confirmed obliges to payment, such that he is compelled to payment, even if he afterwards makes an opposite promise to another: therefore much more in this is it also to be done thus: therefore whatever is promised to another man after a betrothal, it seems that he is compelled to this, that he contract marriage with the first one: therefore even if he contracts with another through words concerning the present, it seems that he is bound to return to the one he first promised.

§ 4. Further, either some right is acquired in the girl for him to whom betrothal is promised, or nothing. If yes: therefore since he loses it by no sin of his own, the girl ought in every state to be compelled to pay this: therefore even if she contracts with another, she still ought to be compelled to pay the first, which is false: therefore betrothal is not a promise, etc. But if no right is acquired for him: therefore she is in no way joined or united to him: therefore by no reason is he prohibited from accepting her blood relative, which again is false: therefore the definition is null, from which this follows.

§ 5. Further, future nuptials are either future at a determined time, or at an undetermined time. If at a determined time, then it seems that the time should be appended in the definition, as is usually done in other contracts of sale and purchase: and it is not appended: therefore the definition is diminished. But if the promise is made at an undetermined time: therefore it seems that he is never bound to pay at any determined time: and thus if she comes to the years of puberty, she cannot be compelled to the payment of what was promised, which is false: therefore it seems that the definition is unfitting.

Response. It must be said that the definition of Pope Nicholas is fitting: for this that he says, Promise, is as a genus. But this that he says, Of future, excludes marriage which is contracted through words concerning the present. But this that he says, Nuptials, makes it differ from other promises, in which men communicate with each other.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that in a promise that which necessity does is understood: because Jerome says that he is cursed who says that God requires impossible things. And if God does not require impossible things, neither ought man to require them: because if he dies, then through the very impossibility of paying he is absolved.

To the next it must be said that James in common speech teaches us to speak cautiously: but in contracts it is understood by the law itself that a legitimate impediment dissolves a contract concerning the future, as also death, or the like.

To the next it must be said that this promise binds, just as another: but it binds to contracting marriage: and he is compelled to pay unless he has a legitimate impediment. For legitimate impediments are if something after the first deed prejudices it: for then he is not compelled: and this is so because unwilling conjugal unions meet with bad outcomes: on account of which even in the Old Testament the Lord permitted a bill of divorce to be given.

To the next it must be said that he acquired some right in her whom he betrothed: but this is not the right of the debt in her body, but rather a disposition to that debt: and on account of the smallness of that in which he is damaged, and because he can recover it in another, the girl is de-obligated in some cases on account of a subsequent deed, even without any sin of the other spouse who had contracted betrothal with her.

To the next it must be said that no promise is made to an infinite time: but the time is sometimes determined by word, sometimes by things. I mean the time of rendering what was promised. But it is determined by things, namely when by the discretion and quantity of the body they are made pubescents: and then they are to be compelled to pay what they promised, unless they proffer a legitimate impediment.

Articulus 13 — To Whom Do Betrothals Belong

Of whom is betrothal?

Second, it is inquired, Of whom is betrothal?

§ 1. It seems that it belongs to all who can be joined in the future matrimonially: but children from the cradle can be joined thus: therefore recently born children can contract betrothal.

§ 2. Further, a contract which can be made by another and by me, can be made whether I can discern or not: but such is the contract of betrothal: therefore it seems that they can be contracted at every age.

§ 3. Further, it seems that seven years is not the time in which betrothals ought to be contracted: because some children at seven years are less discerning of nuptials than others at five years: therefore it seems that seven years should not be prescribed generally for all.

§ 4. Further, Blessed Gregory narrates in the fourth book of the Dialogues, that a certain boy of five was so small and such a great sinner, that even on account of the sin of blasphemy the devil killed him: since therefore sin is not imputed to any indiscreet person, it seems that that five-year-old boy had discretion: therefore he himself could at least contract betrothal.

§ 5. Further, it seems that the cause which is assigned is null: because betrothals then please. For either this is taken from signs, or from the incitation of complexion. If from signs, it seems to be nothing: because children even before this age are frequently seen to practice shameful games with each other: therefore even before this age betrothals please them, it seems. But if from the incitation of complexion. On the contrary: Seed does not distil before the second septennium, as the Philosopher says: therefore it seems that on the part of the passive quality in intercourse, namely on the part of humor, one is not incited before the second septennium: therefore by reason of this, the age ought not to be posited at the first septennium.

If perhaps it is said that this happens by reason of the inciting element on the part of the active quality. On the contrary: The active quality which is heat extends the members even before seven years: therefore incitation on the part of the active quality is before seven years: therefore the age of the contracting parties is irrationally posited at the first septennium.

§ 6. Further, the age of matrimonial contract in a boy and a girl is not one: because a twelve-year-old girl can contract, and a fourteen-year-old boy: since therefore a boy and a girl are related to contracting marriage just as to contracting betrothal, it seems that the age of contracting betrothal in a boy and a girl ought not to be one.

§ 7. Further, nature does not form a boy and a girl at the same time, but a girl more slowly: therefore also a greater age ought to be given to a girl for contracting betrothal than to a boy: therefore if seven years are assigned to a boy, more ought to be assigned to a girl for contracting betrothal.

§ 8. Further, let us suppose that an adult contracts betrothal with someone younger than seven years: and it is inquired, what is to be said? If you say that it holds. On the contrary: Betrothal cannot be contracted before seven years. But if nothing. On the contrary: Betrothal is the promise of future nuptials.

§ 9. Further, for one party there is more than a legitimate age for contracting betrothal: therefore in regard to him at least something can be done.

§ 10. Further, let us suppose that such a one contracts through words concerning the present, since he himself is of full age, because he himself does what is in him: therefore he binds himself to her, although she is not bound to him: therefore in regard to him there is a marriage. On the contrary: Marriage is not in one, but in two, as was held above: therefore unless marriage is enacted by both spouses, nothing is enacted: but here it is not enacted from both: therefore nothing is enacted.

§ 11. Further, I posit if an adult contracts through words concerning the present with a seven-year-old or one less than seven years, it seems that at least betrothal is effected there: because nature, when it cannot do the greater thing intended by it, nevertheless does what can be done: therefore this is also so in the works of men: but betrothal can be contracted between such persons: therefore betrothal is effected by such a contract. But on the contrary: In voluntary things it is said by Ambrose that intention imposes the name on the work: but this one through words concerning the present intends to contract marriage, and not betrothal: therefore betrothal is not effected there, nor can marriage be effected between such persons: therefore nothing is effected between them.

§ 12. Further, I posit another case: for let us suppose that children before seven years contract betrothal as much as they can, and after seven years contract through words concerning the present before the time of puberty, it seems that nothing is effected between them: because betrothal before seven years cannot be contracted: and things which are not contracted can never be consummated: therefore by the subsequent contract betrothal is not consummated.

Further, by words concerning the present they do not intend to effect betrothal, but marriage: and this cannot be between them before the years of puberty: therefore they effect neither betrothal nor marriage: therefore they effect nothing.

To the contrary of this is that betrothal contracted before seven years, and afterwards approved by a certain sign of pleasure, holds, as the laws say: but a subsequent contract through words concerning the present is a certain sign of pleasure of a betrothal contracted before the years: therefore it seems that they perfect the betrothal.

§ 13. Further, I posit that an adult wishes-

§ 1. ...[if someone] being near adult age, contracts with a girl younger than the age of puberty, or nearly close to puberty, and he contracts by words of the present, and it is asked whether he effects a marriage or a betrothal? It seems that it is not a marriage; because both are not of lawful age: therefore they do not effect a marriage. On the contrary, it seems that it is not a betrothal: because the form of words which is in betrothals is not observed, nor do they even intend to complete a betrothal: therefore they complete neither: therefore they do nothing. But against this: the Decretals, concerning betrothal, just as Alexander III said of those who are betrothed at a minor age: "If they should be so close to the age of puberty, that they were able to be joined by carnal copulation, they ought not to be separated out of consideration for their minor age, if one is seen to consent to the other," etc.[681] It seems, that such persons effect a marriage between themselves.

§ 2. Response. It must be said that seven years is laid down as the time in which marriages are pleasing: although that age is impotent for carnal commingling. This authority, moreover, is sufficient, because it so pleased the Fathers inspired by the Holy Spirit: nevertheless, because this is founded in natures, the reason for it must be drawn from philosophy.

§ 3. Aristotle, moreover, says in Book XVIII of On Animals, that all impregnations and maturations of the parts are according to the revolutions of the celestial orb.[682] Moreover, those who speak of natural things, namely Ptolemy and Albumasar, write that the revolution of the circle in the one born gives a year for each sign. Now the first computation of the circle is into the sign opposite the ascendant, and this is seven years from the ascendant. And the second computation is into seven years from that one, and this is the ascendant. And the third is again into the seven years which is opposite. And the fourth is again into the ascendant according to the iterated circle. And according to this there is a change of complexion [temperament] in the one born. Whence after the first seven years, in most cases the flowing humor settles down, which dominates in children on account of the closeness to the seed: so that then they are capable of understanding the things they hear, especially those pertaining to the body. Whence from then on they begin to be subjected to disciplines, and from then on to be handed over to literary studies: and therefore then they are said to be capable of being pleased by or displeased by a marriage, and therefore they can promise a betrothal. In the second septennium, however, the genitals already begin to vaporize, and they gather down-hair there on account of the drawing of the seed to those places: and therefore then there can be a marriage between them. But in the third septennium when the half circle is already completed, according to the Philosophers the seed tends to a maturity which is completed in the second perfect circle, and then it is in a steady state until the third circle, and afterwards it begins to be in decline: this however is varied according to the dominion of the planets which preside over the figures of nativity: because as Augustine says in the fifth book of The City of God: "It is not incongruous that the afflatus of the stars should avail for the alteration of bodies, although they cannot act upon free will except insofar as it is drawn by the body."[683]

§ 4. To the first, therefore, it must be said that before seven years, as in most cases, they are not capable of discipline, nor of the good of marriage: and therefore then they can promise nothing, because a promise is an act of reason, and it is necessary that reason be in some established state, when it is able to promise. But because, by sitting and resting, as the Philosopher holds in Physics VII, the soul becomes knowing and prudent, and while the flowing humor settles, and the animal power begins to rest: a turning of the soul toward the apprehended thing is brought about: and this begins after the first septennium, as has already been held.

§ 5. To the other it must be said that, if a contract is made through another, both children, or one of them, before the years of puberty can raise a claim against it, and nothing has been enacted: so much so that one of the children is not even forbidden to take a blood-relative of the other, on the grounds that nothing has been done between them: but as to what is said, that parents sometimes promise on behalf of children, this is understood in this way: if the children coming of age hold the promise of their parents to be ratified.

§ 6. To the other it must be said that although certain individuals in whom the natural humidity is less, at seven years of age are less discreet, and less capable of the good of marriage, nevertheless as in most cases at seven years they are rendered capable of discipline, and of the things they hear and see: and therefore the law considers that which happens in most cases: for since the particular accidents which are according to each individual are infinite, the law could not be given according to each individual singularly, but according to that which happens in most cases.

§ 7. To the other it must be said that, without prejudice, I rather think this was done for the terror of the parents: and the boy was only punished for this in body, who like a brute animal spoke what he heard from his parents, since at that age almost no reason yet appears.

§ 8. To the other it must be said that this pleasing [consent] is taken from the signs of discerning among those things which children hear, as was previously said that it first begins at the age of seven years.

§ 9. To this, moreover, which is objected, it must be said that as Aristotle says, the genital members are of many vapors, and therefore excite itching: and therefore I think that the motion of boys of a lesser age than seven years, proceeds from corrupt nature: but after seven years reason begins to be mixed in, as was previously shown. Whence the proper sign of this is, that then reason begins to be mixed into human acts.

§ 10. To the other it must be said that the age of the contract of marriage is not single [identical for both]: because in a girl the flesh is soft and extensible: and therefore the humor is easily digestible to maturity: and therefore it is more quickly matured for receiving, because receiving is caused by the cold humor, so that the humid [fluidity] is receiving and the cold is holding. But the humor of a boy is digested for imprinting and sealing: and this is caused by the hot and dry, because it results from the hot overcoming the humid. And therefore more time is required for the maturation of a male than of a female: just as more time is required for the hot to overcome the humid by drying it out, than for it to merely direct and extend it for receiving. And therefore the age of coition for a male is one thing, and for a female another. But in the admixture of reason to acts it is not so: because this is caused by the fact that the humor begins to settle, and not to impede the turning of reason toward things heard and seen: and this happens equally in male and female.

§ 11. To the other it must be said that the animation of a girl is of a longer time than of a boy: but nevertheless because the humor of the already born boy equally begins to settle, or not to settle, the time of betrothal is given to them equally: but the time of contracting [marriage] is unequal, because frigidity in a female when it is with humidity, operates toward the good disposition of the female, as was said: and this is when the hot does not fully overcome the humid.

§ 12. To the other it must be said that, according to many great men, in such a case one can use words in two ways: for if he says, "I take you as mine," and she answers, "And I take you as mine," or equipollent words, nothing is enacted: because a marriage cannot be enacted, and they do not intend to contract a betrothal. But if someone should say, "My words, even if they cannot contract a marriage, let them avail for what they are able to avail": then betrothals are contracted, because these can be contracted between such persons, and it may well be that they are speaking the truth.

§ 13. But to that which is objected, that before seven years they are not contracted, it must be said that this is true unless after seven years they are pleasing. But if the girl is seven years old and the other is a pubescent, betrothals are contracted, and the betrothed man is bound to wait for her, until she comes to the years of puberty.

§ 14. To the other it must be said that as to one part nothing can be done there: because it is necessary that everything which is done in marriage, should be done by the common consent of both: whence nothing is effected there.

§ 15. To the other it must be said that he who so contracts, also effects nothing, by the reason previously stated. And the objection made to the contrary, holds and resolves it.

682. Gen. 2:24.

§ 16. To the other it must be said that it is otherwise regarding nature, and regarding this work: because nature operates toward an intent, but this person neither intends a betrothal, nor operates toward it: and therefore it is not similar.

§ 17. To the other case it must be said that such betrothals hold, because they did nothing before: nevertheless by a subsequent deed they are understood to have approved the deed which preceded: and this approval makes a betrothal between them.

§ 18. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the approval of the past, which is most certainly supposed in a word of present tense, makes a betrothal: and it is false that entirely nothing was done before: but it is true that they did nothing of a betrothal, but they did something toward a betrothal, namely a disposition, which even if it had been done by others beforehand, could be consummated by their subsequent approval.

§ 19. But to that which is objected, that they do not effect a marriage, I concede plainly, especially if they are far distant from the year of puberty.

§ 20. TO THE FURTHER case it seems it must be said that such persons can contract, especially if the lacking age is supplemented by the disposition of the body and the sagacity of mind. Now I understand the disposition of the body especially in the genital areas, namely that they can act and suffer in the carnal work. However, some say that the time of distance from the due age ought not to be extended beyond six months: but it seems to me rather, that it must be determined according to more and less, even according to the diverse disposition of members and sagacity: because I have seen a girl of whom it was claimed that, being nine years of age, she conceived and gave birth to a boy when she was beginning to complete her tenth year. And the Philosophers say that some are born with teeth and with down-hair and hair in the genital areas, and they are more quickly matured for coition than others. And I think that this also varies in hot and dry regions: just as impregnation itself and bodily growth do.

§ 21. And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 14 — What The Effect Of Betrothal Is, And Whether Betrothals Can Be Dissolved

What is the effect of a betrothal? and, Can a betrothal be dissolved?

§ 22. Thirdly, it is asked concerning the effect of a betrothal.

§ 23. It seems, moreover, that the effect is to oblige to contract a marriage: because 1. The effect of the genus is preserved in the species: but the genus of betrothal is a promise: therefore it seems that just as a promise obliges one to pay, so a betrothal should oblige one to pay.

§ 24. 2. Also, in the Decretals, Book IV on betrothals, Ex litteris, Alexander III says to the Bishop of Poitiers: "You should admonish him: and if he does not acquiesce to the admonitions, you should compel him with ecclesiastical censure, that he receive her as a wife, and treat her with marital affection." And he speaks of a certain woman whom he had betrothed beforehand: and he says that he is to be compelled to marry the one he betrothed: therefore betrothals oblige one to contract [marriage].

§ 25. To the contrary of this is that: 1. An obligation which is made by law, is not dissolved unless payment is made: but betrothals in many cases are dissolved without payment being made: therefore betrothals do not oblige.

§ 26. 2. Also, if betrothals obliged, then it would be a mortal sin not to pay: but the pastor of the Church is bound to ward off from mortal sin: therefore by ecclesiastical censure he is bound to compel always those who have contracted a betrothal to contract [marriage]: but this is false, as is clear in the Decretals, Book IV on betrothals, Praeterea hi, where Innocent II says: "But if they are unwilling to admit each other mutually, lest perhaps something worse should befall from it, namely that he should marry such a one whom he holds in hatred: it seems that after the likeness of those who contract a fellowship by the interposition of faith, and afterwards remit the same to each other, this can be tolerated in patience."

§ 28. For it seems that betrothals do not make this: because 1. What is promised for the future, does not exist: but in betrothals, nuptials are promised for the future: therefore they do not yet exist: but what does not exist, effects nothing: therefore such nuptials effect nothing: therefore not even affinity.

§ 29. 2. Also, affinity cannot be made unless there is one kin-group [genus], as will be held below: but the betrothed are not united to a kin-group: therefore let there be no affinity between them. Proof of the minor. He who is carnally copulated with no one of a kin-group, is not united to the kin-group according to the flesh: but one contracting only a betrothal, is carnally copulated with no one of the kin-group: therefore he is not united to the kin-group: and thus the proposition is held.

§ 30. 3. Also, in other contracts where something is promised concerning the future, if it is rescinded, it does not impede that one can make that contract with another of the same kind: therefore neither in this one ought it to impede, as it seems.

§ 31. To the contrary of this is what is said in the Decretals, Book IV on betrothals, Ad audientiam, etc., Alexander III says thus: "Since it is written, that a brother cannot have the betrothed of his brother, we mandate that you do not permit him to fulfill his proposition." And he speaks of a certain man who wished to give his own daughter to that one's brother, who had beforehand, with the consent of the girl, betrothed her.

§ 32. Response. It must be said that the effect of a betrothal is to bind to contracting a marriage, as long as the betrothal remains, as the first arguments prove: but it is true that for certain causes they are dissolved, as will be evident below, and then they do not bind, because they are dissolved: nor is this surprising, because they do not bind when they are dissolved.

§ 33. To that therefore which is objected against this, it must be said that as long as they remain, so long do they bind: but they are dissolved in cases in which they would bind with a greater harm: therefore according to the common law they are reputed dissolved: for what is established for the utility of the contracting parties and the honor of the Church, is set aside when it is observed against the utility of the contracting parties and the honor of the Church.

§ 34. To the other it must be said that Alexander says this in a case in which betrothals are dissolved on account of a supervening marriage with another: because a lesser bond yields to a greater, and is broken when that one supervenes.

§ 35. But to that which is objected, that the Church ought to ward off from mortal sin: it must be said that she does so: because she indicts and enjoins penance for the sin, but she does not compel the fulfillment of the promise: because already by common law the betrothals are dissolved.

§ 36. To that which is asked concerning the further effect, it must be said that they make affinity, as has been said according to the institutions of the Fathers.

§ 37. But to that which is subsequently objected, it must be said that that which is not, does not effect, but that which is: but betrothals are, and they are something of a marriage, namely a disposition toward it, as was said above.

§ 38. To the other it must be said that there is in betrothals a conjunction to the kin-group in a qualified sense [secundum quid], although not absolutely: for just as in natural things something is made akin to fire by a disposition of fire, even before it has the species: so also in moral matters someone accedes to the kin-group of another through a disposition, when he contracts with him a betrothal, although he is not made one flesh with him: and therefore the holy Fathers established that affinity should be contracted between such persons.

Articulus 15 — In What Ways Betrothals Are Contracted

In what ways are betrothals contracted?

§ 39. Fourthly it is asked, In what ways are betrothals contracted?

§ 40. Now Law experts say that betrothals are contracted in two ways, namely absolutely, and under a condition.

§ 41. They are contracted absolutely in four ways, namely by nude promise, such as, "I will take you as mine," or conversely: by giving betrothal earnest-money [arrhae], such as some money, or other things: by the subarrhation of a ring, and by an intervening oath.

§ 42. They are contracted under a condition in two ways, namely under an honest condition, or under a dishonest condition. Honest, as if he says thus: "I will contract with you if it pleases your parents": and then they say that while the condition stands, the promise stands, and when it does not stand, it does not stand, unless consent by words of the present or carnal copulation follows. A dishonest condition is twofold, namely contrary to the good and honor of marriage, and not contrary. An example of the first is, if he says thus: "I will contract with you, if you procure poisons of sterility, or procure an abortion, or are joined with me sodomitically, or gain a living for me by committing adultery," or something of this sort: and then the promise made concerning marriage does not stand. An example of the second condition is, if he says: "I will contract with you, if in the future you gain for me, either by usury, or by something of this sort involved in sin": and then the condition must be renounced, and the betrothals hold, according to that saying of Bede: "In a base vow break your faith, and in evil promises change your resolve."[684]

§ 43. Also, when they are contracted absolutely, if they are contracted without an oath, they are to be admonished to consummate it, but not to be compelled if they are unwilling. But if they contracted with an oath, they are to be compelled on account of the oath by ecclesiastical censure: and I understand this of those who are both seven years old, because if both or one are minors they cannot contract betrothals, as is clear from the disputation held previously.

§ 45. Against this, however, it is objected:

§ 46. 1. And first indeed concerning the division which says that betrothals are contracted absolutely in four ways. For in a promise a man is not obliged except from himself: but the holy Fathers say that God promising is not obliged from us, but from Himself alone, and He would not be unjust if He did not pay: therefore by similar reasoning one contracting by a nude promise will not be unjust if he does not pay: therefore it seems that the other party cannot bring action, which is false: therefore betrothals are not contracted by nude promise.

§ 47. 2. Also, it seems false what the law says, that one contracting by nude promise is not to be compelled to consummate the marriage. For he who promises and does not pay the promise, lies: but "a mouth that lies slays the soul":[685] therefore that one sins mortally: but anyone ought to be warded off from mortal sin: therefore anyone ought to be warded off [by being forced] to the consummation of the promise.

§ 48. 3. Also, he who deceives another in money deceives in a lesser thing, than he who deceives him in marriage and in himself: but one deceiving in money is compelled by a judge to payment: therefore much more ought he who deceives another in marriage and in himself be compelled to payment: therefore it seems to be nothing what the laws say. § 49. Further it is objected concerning the second way.

§ 50. For it seems that that way is illicit: because 1. Marriages ought to be free: but that which is appraised is not free: therefore marriages ought not to be appraised: but earnest money [arrha] is part of a price, as the Gloss on the Apocalypse says:[686] therefore betrothals ought not to be sealed by earnest.

§ 51. 2. Also, marriage, as will be proved below, is in the genus of the honorable [honestum] by reason of two of its goods, and in the genus of the useful by reason of the third: but everything spiritual is honorable: therefore marriage ought not to be placed under a price: therefore neither is it contracted by giving earnests, because an earnest is part of a price, as has already been held.

§ 52. 3. Also, it happens that those betrothals are dissolved by some case: therefore either the earnests are returned, or not. If they are not returned, Against this: because according to this it seems to be dealt with unjustly with him whose part of the price is retained: and yet the contract is rescinded. But if they are returned: then it seems that the marriage was placed under a price: because there seems to be no cause for the returning, except because the contract which the price effected is rescinded.

§ 53. Concerning the third way it is similarly objected: because 1. A ring signifies marital faith: but this is consequent upon marriage: since therefore in betrothals a marriage is not contracted, it seems that the subarrhation of a ring does not pertain to the contracting of a betrothal.

§ 54. 2. Also, a necklace [monile], as Isidore says, is so called as if a fortifier [munile], because it fortifies the bosom lest an adulterer insert his hand:[687] therefore it seems, since betrothals bind to one rather than to another, that they ought rather to be made by a necklace than by a ring.

§ 55. 3. Also, Genesis 24:22 and 47, Eliezer gave to Rebecca earrings, and rings:[688] let it be asked therefore, What do earrings signify in betrothals, and what do necklaces, and what do rings, and why are they made more frequently with these three than with others?

§ 57. For it seems that that way is illicit: because 1. For many causes an oath can become illicit: but no one can swear that which can become illicit: therefore an oath ought not to be made for a betrothal.

§ 58. 2. Also, it seems that in some case an oath induces perplexity. For example: let us posit that he hates her before he contracts by words of the present: then there is danger in completing the marriage, because unwilling marriages sort out bad ends, and what is done with danger is not to be done: therefore that marriage is not to be consummated. But on the contrary, a licit oath is to be observed: and the oath is about the marriage: therefore it is to be consummated, and not to be consummated, which is impossible: therefore it seems that an oath is not to be interposed.

§ 59. Further it is objected concerning those ways which are done under a condition.

§ 60. And let it be objected first concerning an honest condition: for this is twofold according to the Law experts, namely simply honest which pertains to good morals, such as, "I will contract with you if it pleases parents, or pedagogues, or priests, or the Church," or something of this sort. And a condition useful on account of the burdens of marriage, such as, "I will contract with you if you give a hundred marks."

§ 61. Let it be objected therefore concerning the first condition which is simply honest.

§ 62. For it seems that it ought not to be attached: because 1. One cannot contract a marriage for another, unless he himself consents: therefore it is nothing to say, "I contract with you if it pleases this one, or that one."

684. Isidore of Seville, Synonyma, lib. 2, cap. 58 (often attributed to Bede or cited via Gratian).

§ 63. 2. Also, if it pleases the parents and not the daughter, neither a marriage nor even a betrothal is made there: if therefore in negating, the consent of the daughter does not depend on the parents; therefore neither in affirming does it depend: therefore in no way does it depend: because consent is either by affirming, or by negating: therefore for naught is a condition of the consent of parents, or even of any others, attached.

§ 64. 3. Further it is objected concerning the other condition which is also reputed not dishonest, namely that which is with the adjunction of money.

§ 65. For it seems that that one does not hold: because marriages ought to be free. But the Philosopher says that that is free which is the cause of itself: therefore marriage ought to be the cause of itself: therefore there ought not to be a condition of price or money.

§ 66. 4. Also, Aristotle says that some things are mixed between voluntary and involuntary, namely those which we do not will simply, but nevertheless lest other worse things happen, we choose them, like throwing merchandise overboard in the time of a storm lest the ship be submerged: and these are not praiseworthy in morals. Since therefore in morals according to all Philosophers the honor of marriage is of the number of praiseworthy goods, it seems that it ought not to be thus partly voluntary and partly involuntary. Now it is mixed thus if a pecuniary penalty is added: therefore there ought not to be a condition of a pecuniary penalty.

§ 67. 5. Also, coercion excludes consent which is the efficient cause of marriage: whence the Praetor says: "What is done by force or because of fear, I do not hold ratified." But fear is twofold, namely of person, and of nature: and both fall upon a constant man, whom civil law reputes constant: therefore it seems that it excludes the consent of marriage: since therefore such fear of loss occurs when the addition of a pecuniary penalty is made, it seems that consent is evacuated: therefore betrothals ought not to be contracted in such a way.

§ 69. For it seems that it evacuates the marriage: because there are certain things, as Augustine says, which cannot be done with a good end, because they are essentially conjoined to an evil end, such as theft, adultery, and the like: but marriage is a good: therefore if it is taken as an end, the end itself will be good: therefore it cannot be the end of such an evil: therefore it seems that the marriage is annihilated, when it is contracted with such an end, or when it is made the end of such an evil.

§ 70. Next to this it is asked, Whether it is worse to contract with such an end, or condition, or not to contract, and to use a woman for this without a contract in the manner of pimps who prostitute whores?

§ 71. For it seems that the second is worse than the first: because at least he is excused in his coition who knows his own [wife]: but he who knows not his own and prostitutes her, is excused neither in his own, nor in another's: therefore the second is worse than the first. Against: In the prior there is adultery into which the husband consents: but in the second only fornication: therefore the first is worse than the second.

685. Wisdom 1:11.

§ 72. Further it is asked concerning the last condition, which is base and contrary to marriage.

§ 73. For it seems that it does not nullify the contract, because from everything the good that can be elicited from the same must be held: but there are two contracts [items], and the condition of the contract is good, and the condition is bad: therefore the contract is to be held, and the condition refuted. Moreover the first is confirmed from this which is said, 1 Thessalonians 5:21 and 22: Prove all things, hold fast that which is good. Abstain from all appearance of evil.

§ 74. Solution. It must be said that the above-mentioned ways are those by which betrothals are contracted, as those teaching the laws say. But they are reduced to two, namely of simple promise, and of confirmed promise. But confirmed is twofold, through a condition, or through a further bond. And a condition is then spoken of in that way which was said above. But a bond binding more amply than a promise: is either a sign appropriating the betrothed woman, or a confirmation of the promise. But a sign is either concerning things pertaining to a gift on account of nuptials, or to the ornament of the betrothed woman. And the first is seen to be a nuptial earnest: but in the second way the subarrhation of a ring. But if it is a confirmation of a promise: then it is an oath. However, of this reduction to art [i.e., systematic classification] the Law experts do not care: because they focus on broad things for common people, about which there are cases and particulars.

§ 75. These things having been held, it must be responded to that which is objected concerning the first way, and it must be said that it is otherwise regarding God, and man: because God promising neither has the cause of the promise in us, nor utility, nor an end, and therefore He is not obliged by an obligation of debt: because, as the saints say, God owes nothing to man, but man owes all his things to God. But when a man promises, he has the cause of the promise and utility in him to whom he promises: just as here in the contract one of the conjugal parties promises, and the cause is in the other who promises back to him, and the utility which is a debt in the body of that one with whom he contracts, which he can even exact by the right of marriage: and therefore that one is obliged.

§ 76. To the other it must be said that the one promising is bound to pay as much as is in him, unless it should stand hindered by the other: and I well concede that he sins not paying if he is able to pay.

§ 77. But to this which is objected, that he should be compelled, it must be said no: because frequently a lesser evil is passed over, lest a greater occur. It is passed over, I say, such that it is not brought into the face of the Church for judgment, although it is not passed over in confession. And this is what is said, Decretals, Book IV on betrothals, Praeterea hi qui, etc., where Innocent II says: "But if they are unwilling to admit each other mutually, lest perhaps something worse should befall from it, namely that he should marry such a one whom he holds in hatred: it seems that after the likeness of those who contract a fellowship by the interposition of faith, and afterwards remit the same to each other, this can be tolerated in patience."

§ 78. To the third it must be said that although he deceives in a greater thing, nevertheless it is a more recoverable loss, than that of money: because he can contract with many others: but other money it does not happen that he recovers easily: and therefore that is not brought to judgment just as this is.

§ 79. To that which is further objected concerning the second way, it must be said that it is a certain confirmation of the promise, because through gifts the betrothed woman is in a certain manner appropriated to the betrothed man, or conversely, as is hinted at in Genesis 30:16, where Leah said to Jacob: Thou shalt come in unto me, for I have hired thee with a reward for my son's mandrakes.[689]

§ 80. But to the first which is objected against it, it must be said that earnest [arrha] here is taken otherwise than for a price, or for part of a price: for just as by an earnest a bought thing is appropriated to the buyer, so the betrothed woman to the betrothed man by a nuptial subarrhation: and therefore the first argumentation fails through equivocation. If however it were conceded, that it was part of a price, then it must be said that marriage is not placed under a price: but that which is given, is for relieving the burdens of marriage.

§ 82. To the third it must be said that if it were given under the name of a dowry, or promised, and marriage did not follow, he would be bound to restore it. But if other gifts are rather indicating love, than bringing great utility, I do not believe that he is bound to restitution: but nevertheless it does not follow, that the marriage is placed under a price for the reason stated above.

§ 83. To that which is further objected concerning the third way, it must be said that that ring signifies the faith of betrothals in the present, namely lest she promise another, and that she may preserve the faith of the marriage bed in the future: and therefore it is placed on the finger of the left hand, which is called the ring finger, because a certain pulsating vein, or artery, comes into it from the heart, which is bound by a circle as a sign of love.

§ 84. And through this the solution to the first is evident: because it proceeds from a false, or from an insufficient cause of the ring: and therefore it does not conclude.

§ 85. To the other it must be said that nothing prohior by a necklace that the betrothal [subarrhation] be done, but it is more fittingly done by a ring: because since the faith of betrothals obliges to two things, one of those is principal, and the other is consequent: and the principal one indeed is to preserve faith to the groom: but the consequent one is to guard oneself from another. Now the ring signifies the principal thing, and the necklace signifies the consequent thing: and therefore it is more fittingly done by a ring than by a necklace.

687. Isidore of Seville, Etymologiae, lib. 19, cap. 31.

§ 1. To the third point it must be said that the bride is related to the groom in three ways: for insofar as the husband is the head of the woman, she is bound to hear, follow, and obey him.[690] For from matrimony she is bound to fidelity, and to guarding herself from another: nor are there more things so substantial to the bride insofar as she is a bride. Now the first of these is signified by the earnest [arrha]; the second is signified by the ring; and the third by the necklace. And therefore in ancient times girls were betrothed with these three.

§ 2. To what is further objected concerning an oath, it must be said that it can well be done if the contracting parties do not otherwise believe each other: because as the Apostle says, in Hebrews 6:16: Men swear by one greater than themselves, and an oath for confirmation is the end of all their controversy.[691]

§ 3. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that in such cases, as will be clear below, betrothals are dissolved: and then he is de-obligated from the oath, for the reason that he is not bound by the oath except in the mode of betrothals: and therefore once the betrothals are broken, he is not bound by the oath any longer: but I readily concede that it is incautious to swear in such matters.

§ 4. To another point it must be said that in such cases there is no perplexity, because he can fulfill the oath: otherwise he sins mortally. But if another matrimony supervenes: then he sins mortally contracting with another, but nevertheless he is not bound to perfect the betrothals, because they are dissolved: but he ought to do penance for perjury.

§ 5. To what is asked, Whether he is to be compelled? It must be said that although certain ones have said that he is to be compelled on account of the oath: nevertheless it seems to the wise that he is not: but it is to be passed over if out of hatred for the bride he does not wish to fulfill what he swore, because a greater evil could follow: and this case is expressly written in the Decretals, book four, title De sponsalibus, chapter Requisivit, where Lucius III speaks thus: Your fraternity has asked us by what censure a woman ought to be compelled who, having neglected the religion of an oath, refuses to marry the one to whom she affirmed by an interposed oath that she would marry. To which I briefly respond that, since marriages ought to be free, she is to be admonished rather than compelled, since compulsions frequently are accustomed to have difficult outcomes.[692]

§ 6. To what is objected concerning a simply honorable condition, it must be said that it is meritoriously to be added, such that the contracting parties can be blamed if they do not add it: because the contracting parties are either of mature age, or infants. If they are adults, although reason is confirmed in them, nevertheless one alone cannot see what is expedient as well as many faithfully consulting can see. But if they are infants, they cannot discern except by the doctrine and counsel of other elders: and therefore since discretion makes for the liberty and honorableness of consent, such a condition makes for a free matrimony rather than an ancillary or servile one: for liberty is not called free among the wise when it has liberty as a sort of bond or cloak for malice, but rather that which is done freely according to virtue: and therefore such a condition holds, and is favorable.

§ 7. To another point it must be said that consent is twofold, namely of making matrimony, and this does not depend on another in matrimony . There is also a conditioned consent, when out of one's own will one adds a condition, for the reason that a human being does not suffice for himself as to counsel, and that one depends on the reason previously introduced.

§ 8. To what is further asked concerning a condition of utility, which is money, it seems it must be said that it can be added in two ways: namely, either in the manner of a dowry, or in the manner of a penalty if the marriages are not consummated. If it is added in the first mode, I say that it stands and can be exacted: and if the condition does not stand, he is not bound to the consummation of the promise. And this happens on account of the burdens of matrimony, as was said above. But if it is added in the manner of a penalty, as if it is said thus: 'Unless I contract with you, I will give you a hundred marks': I say that the condition does not hold nor can it be exacted if the matrimony is not consummated. The argument for this is in the previously cited decretal, Requisivit: namely because marriages ought to be free.[693]

§ 9. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that matrimony is not put under a price, as is clear from what was said above.

§ 10. To another point two things must be conceded: because those arguments proceed in that sense in which a pecuniary condition is added in the manner of a penalty, and they are good against those who feel otherwise than what is determined here.

§ 11. To what is further objected concerning a base condition that is contrary to matrimony, it must be said that matrimony is never the end of an evil, nor even for an evil end. For there is a twofold end, as you will find noted upon the second book of the Sentences, namely, the end of the work, and the end of the worker. The end of the work of matrimony is never for a bad end, nor is it the end of an evil. But the end of the worker can thus be in evil: and the saying of Augustine is understood concerning the end of the work, not of the worker. And because the end of the worker is not the essential end of matrimony, therefore the law says that the condition ceases, which is the intention of a base end on the part of the contracting party, but not the contract: and the contract of betrothal holds.

And through this the solution and the reason of the law are clear.

§ 12. To another point it must be said that one sins more in the act, and the other more in the circumstance drawing into that kind of sin, that is, into adultery: for nothing prohibits each from sinning more from a different consideration.

§ 13. But if it is asked, Who sins more absolutely? It seems it must be said that he who prostitutes his own wife, sins by a greater sin from this, which is adultery, and against more things: for against whatever things a panderer sins, this one also sins, and moreover against the good of matrimony.

§ 14. To what is objected concerning the ultimate condition, it must be said that it annihilates the contract: because there is no consent in such cases to matrimony according to the intellect, but according to the voice alone: but according to the intellect they consent to a base cohabitation, because there cannot be matrimony where all the goods of matrimony are renounced.

689. Genesis 30:16.

And through this the solution to the objection is clear: because in such a contract there is nothing of good: and therefore nothing of good can be elicited from it which might hold, as was the case in other conditioned contracts.

Articulus 16 — In What Ways Betrothals Are Dissolved

By what modes are betrothals dissolved?

Fifthly it is asked, By what modes are betrothals dissolved?

Let that first be accepted which is determined by the law.

There are therefore eight cases in which betrothals are dissolved: of which the first is if one of the spouses crosses over to religion, which he can do even with the other unwilling and reclaiming before carnal copulation: and then the one who remains in the world is absolved from the bond of the betrothals, even if they were betrothals by words of the present. The second is when the groom is not found, because he transfers himself to another region: provided, however, it did not stand through her fault that the matrimony was not consummated: for if it stood through her fault, then she shall do penance for the promise, and also for perjury if an oath intervened.

The third is if one of the spouses, after betrothals have been contracted, incurs leprosy, or paralysis, or epilepsy, or has been shamefully mutilated in the nose or eye.

The fourth is if affinity supervenes, namely if the groom has carnally known a female blood-relative of the bride, or conversely: and this is sufficient to prove by rumor alone.

The fifth is if they mutually absolve themselves: which case, however, some do not accept.

The sixth, if one of them has fornicated.

The seventh, when matrimony supervenes contracted with another by words of the present: because then the lesser bond is dissolved on account of the greater supervening: but then he ought to do penance for the lied-about faith, oath, or promise.

The eighth, when a minor comes to adult age, and asks to be absolved from the bond of the betrothals, and for a license to marry another to be given to him.

Moreover, legal experts say that in two cases they are dissolved by the law itself, namely when one enters religion, and when one contracts with another by words of the present. But in all other cases they are to be dissolved by the judgment of the Church.

Behold what the law determines concerning this article.

But it is objected against the first case: 1. The offering of one who sacrifices from what is unjust will be execrable but he sacrifices from what is unjust who sacrifices what is another's: therefore it is not accepted by God. But that is another's which is promised to another, and owed through a promise: since therefore the groom is thus made bound through betrothals, and the bride conversely, it seems that he cannot sacrifice himself to God: therefore he cannot enter religion.

1. Also, if someone were made my debtor for money, he could not sacrifice or offer that money by which he would be made not paying me: but the debt of matrimony is greater: therefore much less can it be offered by which he is made not paying another: but if he enters religion, on account of the vow of continence he is made impotent to pay the debt of matrimony: therefore it seems that he ought not to enter religion.

TO THE CONTRARY of this is what is said in the Decretals, title De conversione conjugatorum, book III. For Alexander III speaks thus, in Ex publico instrumento, etc.: Furthermore, because although she was betrothed by the aforementioned man, nevertheless (as she asserts) she is still unknown by him, we mandate that if the aforesaid man has not known her carnally, and the same woman wishes to cross over to religion: having received sufficient caution from her that she ought either to cross over to religion or return to her husband within the space of two months, you may absolve her from the sentence by which she is bound: such that if she crosses over to religion, each must restore to the other what he is known to have received from him, etc. Of course, what the Lord says in the Gospel, That it is not lawful for a man except for the cause of fornication to dismiss his wife, is to be understood according to the interpretation of sacred eloquence concerning those whose matrimony has been consummated by carnal copulation, without which it cannot be confirmed. From these it is clear that the law speaks truly in this first case.

Further it is asked concerning the second case.

For it seems that it is unjust: because 1. In doubtful matters the safer part is to be accepted or held: but it is safer that he wait: because in waiting no prejudice is done to another: therefore it seems that betrothals are not dissolved from that absence.

1. Also, the absence of bodies is in no way repugnant to a spiritual bond: because it was contracted between the spouses from consent: therefore it seems that on account of the absence of bodies the bond which is between them will not be dissolved: therefore neither the betrothals.

To the contrary of this it is objected: because in the Decretals, book four, title De sponsalibus, Alexander III writes thus to the Bishop of Palermo: But concerning those who, having taken an oath, promise that they will marry certain women, and afterwards dismiss them unknown, transferring themselves to other parts: we wish to make this known to you, that it will be free for those women themselves (if it has not proceeded further in deed) to transfer themselves to other vows: having received, however, a penance for perjury, if it stood through them [i.e., if it was their fault] that the matrimony was not consummated.

691. Cf. Aristotle, Historia Animalium.

Further it is asked concerning the third. 1. For it seems that a bodily necessity ought not to make someone fall from his right: but this person acquired a right of contracting matrimony: therefore it seems that he ought not to lose it through a bodily infirmity.

1. Also, the involuntary that compels a human being, according to Aristotle, merits forgiveness and pardon: therefore much more that which God inflicted: but such is the necessity of this infirmity: therefore it seems that the bride ought to forgive such things.
2. Further it is asked, Why does a fever or something similar not dissolve it in this way, just as the infirmities mentioned above?

To the contrary of this it is objected through what Urban II says, in book four, title De conjugio leprosorum, chapter Litteras. And further down: Because you have asked whether, if after betrothals concerning the future contracted between legitimate persons, before the woman is led over by the man, one of them incurs the disease of leprosy, the other ought to be compelled to consummate the marital copulation. We respond that he ought not to be forced to take her, since matrimony has not yet been consummated between them.

Further it is asked concerning the fourth case.

For that one seems entirely unjust: 1. For from the sin of another, another ought not to be punished by him: therefore if one of the spouses makes an affinity through fornication, he who does not fornicate ought not to be punished: therefore he ought not to lose the right acquired to him through the betrothals.

1. Also, let us posit that someone fornicates with a blood-relative of the bride for this very purpose, so as to dissolve the betrothals: for it is certain that fraud ought to patronize no one: therefore neither to this one: therefore neither ought this one to attain absolution from the betrothals through his fraud.

To the contrary however it is objected through what is said in C. 27, quaest. 2, from the Council of Tribur: If anyone violates the bride of his son, and afterwards his son takes her: let the father afterwards not have a wife, nor the woman a husband: let the son who was ignorant of the father's crime take another.

Further it is asked concerning this fourth case, whether it is sufficient to prove it by rumor alone? Because

1. Since it ought rather always to be judged in favor of matrimony, it seems that betrothals ought to stand until the fact is most certainly proved: therefore betrothals are not to be dissolved on account of rumor alone.
2. Also, rumor is often false: and therefore it seems that rumor alone is not to be believed.

To the contrary of this is what is held in the Decretals, book four, title De consanguinitate et affinitate, where Urban III writes thus to the Archbishop of Bordeaux: Concerning the fact that you assert a young man betrothed a not yet nubile girl with an interposed pledge of faith, who, now made nubile, demands him: and he rejects her, saying that he ought not to marry her, for the reason that after he pledged faith to the girl, he carnally knew a female blood-relative of hers. I respond that if it is ma- nifest that the young man knew the relative of the aforesaid girl: or if it is not manifest, but nevertheless the rumor of the place holds this, since she was only a bride concerning the future, he ought to be absolved from her hindrance.

Further it is asked concerning the fifth.

Because that one seems entirely not to be accepted; because 1. What has once been justly done, cannot be held for not done: therefore it seems that an absolution by which they mutually absolve each other is null.

1. Also, what belongs to levity, the Church ought not to admit: but it is of the greatest levity to contract now, and mutually absolve oneself now: therefore this case ought not to be accepted by the Church.

To the contrary is the previously cited decretal, Extra, title De sponsalibus, chapter Praeterea, where Innocent II says that after the likeness of those who contract a society of faith, and afterwards remit the same to themselves, it can be tolerated in patience if they mutually absolve themselves: so also those who have contracted betrothals.

Further it is asked concerning the sixth, if one of them has fornicated.

For from this the betrothals do not seem to be dissolved simply, but only to the separation of the bed: yet the bond seems to ought to remain: because the Lord says, that he who marries a dismissed woman, fornicates.

Still it is asked, whether he is to be admonished that he receive her?

But it seems that he is: because 1. It will be held below, that it is mercy to receive a penitent: but every human being is to be admonished to mercy: therefore this one also is to be admonished that he receive her who has fornicated: or conversely the bride the groom.

1. Also, we see this every day, that grooms fornicate: and yet brides receive them by the right of the contracted betrothals: therefore it seems that this case is null.

To the contrary of this is, that 1. Even in consummated matrimony a wife is separated from the bed on account of fornication: therefore much more through it ought betrothals to be annulled.

1. Also, nothing renders spouses so hateful as fornication: but it is a danger if they contract while mutually hateful to each other: therefore it seems that such a case ought to separate or dissolve betrothals.

Further it is objected concerning the seventh.

693. Aristotle, Physics, VII, 3 (247b11).

For it seems that that one does not hold: because 1. What is posterior ought not to infringe upon that which was done prior: but the betrothals were done justly prior: therefore it is not derogated from them by a supervening matrimony.

1. Also, if someone sells to another a thing which he previously sold to me: if I prove that that thing was previously sold to me, it will be restored to me: therefore by similarity it is so in betrothals, and with a supervening matrimony: therefore in such a case one must recede from the matrimony, and return to the betrothals.

To the contrary of this, however, is a decretal of Gregory IX, book four, title De sponsalibus, chapter Si inter virum et mulierem, etc.: But if between them there acceded only a promise of the future, with each saying to the other, 'I will receive you into mine,' and, 'I you into mine,' or similar words: if another betroths that woman by words of the present, even if between her and the first an oath intervened concerning the future (as we have said), in consideration of this sort of betrothal the second matrimony cannot be separated: but a penance is to be enjoined upon them concerning the violation of faith.

Further it is asked concerning the eighth and ultimate. Because that seems nothing to the purpose because, 1. As was held above, a minor without due age cannot contract betrothals: therefore this case is null.

1. Also, from that which binds nothing, absolution is not to be asked: but before the due age betrothals bind nothing: therefore absolution is not to be asked from them.

To the contrary of this is a decretal of Alexander III, book four, title De sponsalibus: Concerning those who contract betrothals below the years apt for matrimony, whether both, or one reclaims, before they have arrived at the years apt for matrimony, and they ask to be separated, they are not to be heard in any way. But if one of them has arrived at the years of puberty, while the other is below those years when betrothals are contracted, if he who is of minor age, when he arrives at those years, reclaims, nor wishes to consent to the other, they can be separated from each other by the judgment of the Church.

Solution. It must be said that in contracting betrothals many things are considered: for when a promise is made for the future concerning contracting a marriage, that promise is for the payment of matrimony in the determined time of puberty for the good of offspring undertaken in an indivisible life with a legitimate person for contracting.

The first case therefore dissolves betrothals, for the reason that a spiritual death intervenes, impotent to pay what it promised: and therefore also the other is absolved from the promise.

The second case, however, sins against the determined time of the sponsion: because he does not appear at the agreed-upon time for the payment of the promise.

But the third case would sin against the good of the offspring on the part of the body: because from the infirm, the infirm are born. It also sins against a certain end of matrimony which is the collation of works, for the reason that one human being is insufficient for himself in work: and three Philosophers posit this end of matrimony, namely Cicero, Aristotle, and Aspasius: for a groom who is infirm with a chronic infirmity cannot contribute anything of his works, so that the burdens of matrimony might be lighter.

The fourth case, however, sins against the legitimacy of the persons to be joined.

The fifth case, however, against indivisibility in this mode by which he dissolves the betrothals, because he does not dissolve them in every mode, as will be clear below.

But the sixth sins against the good of faith.

The seventh, because it binds in the opposite direction with a greater bond: and therefore it is contrary to the future indivisibility in the promised matrimony.

The eighth case, however, is for the reason that there was no due disposition in the contracting parties: for just as every form requires a due disposition in the matter, so also do betrothals: and one of those dispositions is a due age, as is clear from what was held previously.

And through this the reason of the law is clear, if anyone should wish to reduce it to the universal and to an art: for although it is positive [law], nevertheless according to Cicero there is no positive law that has not set out from reason: and what has set out from reason can be resolved to reason and the universal.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that he does not sacrifice from what is unjust: because the betrothals are dissolved through a better and greater bond: but if he were to do it while the betrothals remained, then the objection would be valid.

But if it is asked, How are they dissolved? It must be said, by the law itself: just as when a greater light supervenes, a lesser light is obscured.

To another point it must be said that it is otherwise concerning money: and that reason was expedited in the preceding article: and therefore that objection is not valid.

Moreover, between spouses each equally owes the other, and therefore as much as he who enters religion subtracts, so much is compensated to the other by the retention of his own debt who remains in the world. The decretal, however, brought forward to the opposite, is to be conceded and proves the case. And in the same mode it must be said concerning all the laws which are introduced in this question.

To what is further asked concerning the second, it must be said that the doubt is determined from the mode of the promise: because the time is certified in the years of puberty. Whence, in the Decretals, book four, title De sponsalibus, it is commanded that at the time of puberty, or within two months, she should render the debt to the groom, or enter religion: and therefore when at that time the groom is not found, the other who remains in the land is absolved.

To another point it must be said that absence is repugnant to the matrimonial effect which is carnal copulation, and therefore it is also repugnant to the bond: and therefore the betrothals are dissolved.

To what is further asked concerning the third, it must be said that when a defect of the body of this sort is present before matrimony, it makes the spouses abominable to each other, and the indivisibility of their life is bitter: and therefore it is better that they not be joined, because such marriages sort out bad outcomes, and because the offspring would be destroyed on the part of the body: but if it should supervene upon matrimony, then that which is objected holds. For since betrothals are nothing but a disposition to matrimony, they are more easily dissolved than matrimony.

To another point it must be said that such a necessary or involuntary thing in act, merits pardon and forgiveness: but in contracts it is otherwise, because there a human being considers his own utility, and therefore guards himself from an undelightful and harmful contract.

To another point it must be said that chronic sicknesses, both generating horror and impotence to cooperate toward alleviating the burdens of matrimony, dissolve betrothals. But fevers and the like are temporal, and therefore do not dissolve them: because they do not always render one impotent, but for a brief and moderate time.

To what is objected concerning the fourth, it must be said that he who fornicates loses his right, and is made abominable to the other: and therefore a license is given to him [the innocent party], that he is not bound to the betrothals unless he wishes: whence he loses nothing of his right, but rather gains liberty from him who rendered himself abominable to God and to himself.

To another point it must be said that fraud does not patronize him, but harms him when he loses his right: and this is introduced in favor of the other who does not sin, as was said.

To what is further asked, Whether in such a case it is sufficient to prove it by rumor alone? It must be said that it is: because this crime especially perturbs spouses, and makes them hateful to each other: and therefore separation is easily permitted on account of that crime.

To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that this is true of matrimony; but betrothals are not matrimony, as was clear above: and therefore on account of a future danger which is accustomed to be generated from hatred, separation of betrothals is admitted even on account of rumor alone.

To another point it must be said that that case is not posited by certain ones: and they respond to the introduced decretal that it is not a decretal, nor does it contain law, but speaks of comparative permission, that is, that just as the violation of a society is permitted lest a greater evil be done, so also the dissolution of betrothals through the fact that each absolves the other, lest convening in hatred they mutually kill each other. Yet it could be said that this case holds when they are moved from the promise with money: for then it is a sign that they do not convene well: and therefore then the Church suffers it rather than that it should enact their separation.

To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that betrothals do not speak of something perfectly done, but rather to be done: and therefore they can be revoked: because concerning the principal thing that is in them, they depend upon the future.

To another point it must be said that in truth, absolving themselves in such a way, they do not take heed to the vow: nevertheless the Church suffers it out of the aforesaid cause. To what is objected concerning the sixth it must be said that it is otherwise in matrimony and betrothals: because in matrimony a joining to another cannot be made: and therefore he is admonished to return to his own, lest his chastity be in danger: but in betrothals a joining to another can be made, and therefore they are dissolved: and he is not admonished, because such persons are hateful to each other: and through this the solution to the second is also clear.

To another point it must be said that it is otherwise in males, and otherwise in females: because the male has a greater impulse toward lust than the female: and therefore it is less base concerning a male if he fornicates: and therefore the vices of a male are more easily received by females, but not by right.

To what is further objected concerning the seventh, it must be said that matrimony is a greater supervening bond: and therefore when it binds in the opposite direction, the bond of betrothals is broken.

But to the objection it must be said that if they were equal in all things, then the objection would hold: but they are unequal, as has already been said.

To another point it must be said that it is not similar, as was expedited above.

To what is further objected concerning the eighth, it must be said that there is a mode of betrothals there, although not the matter for the whole, but for the other part only: and therefore this case is posited in the treatise on the dissolution of betrothals.

To another point it must be said that because he seemed to approve in the years deputed for contracting betrothals, and on account of a good example, he asks to be absolved: and not for the reason that he knows himself to be bound to such a person.

Articulus 17 — Whether Betrothals Are Said Of The Future Or Of The Present Or From The Solemnity Of The Nuptials

Whether betrothals are so called from a bride concerning the future, or concerning the present, or concerning the solemnity of nuptials?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, L, near the end: For there are certain nuptial pacts, etc.

For here it is gathered that "bride" is said in three ways, namely concerning the future, and concerning the present, and the solemnity of nuptials. And the Master says that betrothals are properly called in the ultimate mode.

But it seems false. 1. From the decree of Pope Nicholas introduced above, where he says that betrothals are the promises of future nuptials: therefore betrothals and bride are properly spoken of in the first mode, as it seems.

1. Also, the name seems to sound this, as was held above: therefore he lies in the Letter.

Further it is asked here, Whether it is said equivocally or univocally of these three?

But it seems that it is equivocally: because 1. He distinguishes the voice of betrothals in the Letter into its significations: but such a distinction does not convene except to an equivocal term: therefore it is equivocal.

1. Moreover, no one distinguishes in such a way that a man might signify Socrates in one way, and Plato in another: but the Master says that it signifies one thing in one way, and another in another: therefore it is equivocal.

To the contrary of this it is objected: For it is said from a single betrothal in whatever mode it is said: therefore it has one ratio: therefore it is univocal.

Response, that betrothals are properly called the pacts of future nuptials made with solemnity: and therefore what the Master says is not understood concerning the solemnity alone, but rather concretely concerning the solemn sponsion of future nuptials: and through this it is clear that it is not contrary to what was previously held: and through this the first two are solved.

To another point it must be said that it is neither said univocally of these, nor even equivocally, but rather by analogy to one thing, as the last objection proves. For an analogue is said of several diverse modes looking back to one thing: and therefore the Master in the Letter distinguishes the modes of diverse betrothals.

And this is the solution to all the things asked.

Articulus 18 — Whether In Betrothals There Ought To Be A Term For Solemnizing Marriage

Whether in betrothals there ought to be a term for solemnizing the matrimony?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, M, Concerning nuptial pacts, where there is only a sponsion of the future, etc.

For it seems that the cause which he assigns in the Letter is null: because 1. That, as the Author says, is understood concerning betrothals promised for the future: but betrothals are not contracted for the future [merely for that reason], but because the age of the contracting parties is not sufficient: therefore the cause is not that it is not exhibited immediately so that he may desire it delayed, but because there is not sufficient age and habit of body to consummate the matrimony.

1. Also, it seems to be against the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 7:9: It is better to marry than to burn. Since therefore in the delay one of the spouses burns, or both, it would be better that it be exhibited immediately.
2. Also, every delay is to some term which is in human contracts: therefore it seems that a term ought to be assigned to this delay.

Response. It must be said that the holy Fathers constituted it thus from the beginning, as the Letter contains, and on account of the cause which is assigned in the Letter.

To the first, however, it must be said that frequently even those having age contract betrothals of the future: and I think that he speaks of those: and this is clear by this, because little children contracting before age would not sigh at the delay of the nuptials.

To another point it must be said that it is not delayed long: and therefore concupiscence cannot burn up much: for it is not delayed except up to two months, as is clear from the decretal introduced above: if nevertheless temptation should grow too dangerously, I should think it better, saving the judgment of a greater authority, that matrimony be consummated immediately.

To the ultimate point it must be said that the time for contracting parties having age is prefixed by the law, namely to at most two months or one, as was clear above.

Articulus 19 — Whether The Definition Of Bigamy Has Been Well Assigned

Whether the definition of bigamy is well assigned?

Whether the definition of bigamy is well assigned?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said, here, N, at the end: For a widow marrying again is prohibited from becoming a priest just as a bigamist, etc.

However, four things are inquired here concerning bigamy:
First, What it is, and whence it is named?
Second, In how many ways it occurs?
Third, By what reason is irregularity joined to it?
Fourth, Whether that irregularity admits any dispensation?

To the first of these, it proceeds thus:
It is the statement of some that bigamy is the division of one into not one wife or wives.

However, it seems that this definition is not valid: because
1. Bigamy is opposed to monogamy: and the monogamist is divided: therefore bigamy is not the division of one, etc. By the middle. Everything that is united to another from itself, it is necessary that it be divided in itself: but every man adhering to a wife is united to another from himself: therefore he is divided in himself.

1. If perhaps you say that it is divided into one. On the contrary: It is proven that it is not: because she herself is also divided from herself and united to the man who mingles with her: therefore it is divided into not one.
2. Likewise, Nothing seems to be said, if not one: because Boethius says that every thing is one: therefore every wife is one wife: therefore no one is divided into not one.
3. Likewise, Everything that is (as the Philosopher proves) is one or many: therefore also the wife or woman into whom this one is divided is one or many: but it is evident that not many: therefore one: therefore it is false that anyone is divided into not one.
4. Likewise, We never say something is divided into more which are not, but into more which are: if therefore no one is divided into more wives which are, no one is divided into more wives: but those which are not at the same time in the same time, but one has died, and another remains, those wives are not more: therefore he who first has one, and after her death another, it seems that he is not divided into more.
5. Likewise, This seems from the words of the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 7:39: A woman is bound by law as long as her husband lives; but division is from the law: therefore when she is freed from the law, she is freed from division: therefore after his death she is not divided into him: if therefore then into one afterwards taken she is divided, it does not seem that she is divided into more.
6. Likewise, It is objected concerning what is said, Wife, or wives. For division follows the separation of one: because Aristotle says that we know number by the division of the continuous: but such a union is also to a harlot, as it is said, 1 Corinthians 6:16: Do you not know that he who is joined to a harlot is one body? Therefore such a division follows if he is joined to many by fornication: therefore he who fornicates with many is a bigamist, which is false.

Response. It must be said that the definition previously introduced is quite good. For a bigamist is said from "bis" and "γυνή" which is woman in Greek, as if divided twice into a woman: just as also a monogamist is not so repeated, and a trigamist thrice repeated, and a quadrigamist, and a pentagamist, and a hexagamist, and a heptagamist, and a polygamist.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the separation which is in bigamy is opposed to the unity of the sacrament: but the unity of the sacrament is the individuality of the sign: and this is never better known than from the signified: but the signified is twofold, namely the union of the faithful spirit with the uncreated spirit, and the union of the divine nature with the human in one person of Christ. And the first indeed is signified by the individuality of consent: the second however by the individuality of the flesh, as was evident above in the distinction previously held. It must be said therefore that the individuality of the sign is nothing other than the individuality of consent and carnal conjunction. But the individuality of consent is from two things, namely that it is from an individual and an individual: and from these two is caused the individual conjunction of the flesh: but no one is individual unless he is undivided in himself: and similarly no woman is individual unless she is undivided in herself: and this alone is she who never had any conjunction with another through individual coupling. And thus it is evident that bigamy is the privation of this individual coupling, because bigamy is the privation of individuality, just as blindness is the privation of sight. Whence it is evident that a monogamist does not have the privation of individuality: because with one there is only one individuality, not separated.

To the proof it must be said that she is unique in this kind of individuality if she was a virgin when she was transferred: because individuality is of marriage, as was said, rather than of one person in itself, because it is of the sacrament and the sign.

To the other it must be said that one sometimes says the unity of the supposit, and sometimes the unity of the accident: and similarly negation or privation is made in not one. It must be said therefore that here it denies the accident according to which one is said in such individuality and unity of the sign, which was or is of one: and not one which was or is of many, although it is always one according to the supposit.

To the third it must be said that if "one" says the unity of the supposit, then it is true that nothing is that is not one: because everything that is, is only one. But if it says the unity of the accident opposed to the aforementioned division, then there are many women who are not one: because they are not uniquely of one, as it is taken, Canticles 6:8: One is my dove, my perfect one, one is her mother's, chosen of her who bore her, that is, unique.

To the other it must be said in the same way, that it is understood of the unity of the supposit.

To the other it must be said that something is well divided into those which are not, but which were: although indeed the woman in whom the man was first divided does not remain, nevertheless the division remains in him when he is joined to the following: and this is evident by looking at the signified through the indivision of marriage: because the unity of natures in Christ is only between two extremes and once. Therefore the sign can not respond to the signified in three ways, namely if it is as one, but not one: or if one, but not one: or if not once, but this third mode cannot be between the same man and the same woman: because sacraments are not repeated over the same numerical matter: and thus it is evident that it is in the first two ways. However, the form of arguing is not valid: because the instance is, because if something is first divided, as wood into fire: for with the fire not existing, the division still remains in the wood: and if afterwards it is divided, it will be twice divided: and it will not be the division of one into one, because although the first with the second is not according to the thing, it is nevertheless according to the effect which it leaves in that into which it is divided.

To the other it must be said that the Apostle understands concerning the law of rendering the debt and obedience, and not concerning the effect which remains in the man even after the death of the woman.

To the other it must be said that there is a twofold union between a man and a woman, namely of carnal work, and of the individuality of the sign. The first is with any woman whom he knows carnally. The second however is only with the legitimately joined: and therefore only that one can make bigamy: for the other does not make it except through conjunction to this one by right or by consummated fact, as will be evident below.

Articulus 20 — In How Many Ways Bigamy Occurs

In how many ways does bigamy occur?

Secondly, it is asked, in how many ways does bigamy occur?

There are, however, four ways noted by law on this matter: and let these be taken first, and afterwards objections be made against them.

The first is the proper way, when someone successively has two wives, both of whom he has carnally known. The second is an improper way, when he has two at the same time, one in fact, and the other in law. The third is when he has one in law, and she having died, he takes another in fact, and not in law. The fourth is when someone contracts with a corrupted woman.

It is objected first against the first way,

1. For he is never joined to two, who is joined to one, and is not joined to another, unless released from her: but he who takes two successively is joined otherwise: therefore it seems that he is never joined to two: therefore he is never made a bigamist.
2. Likewise, in ancient times, several could be joined to one in one marital affection: therefore much more can several be joined successively to one in one marital affection: but to one marital affection corresponds one individuality of the sacrament: therefore in one individuality of the sacrament someone can be joined to several successively: since therefore bigamy does not occur except from the violation of this individuality, it seems that such a one is not made a bigamist.
3. Likewise, he who is never except of one, is never made a bigamist: but he is never except of one alone: therefore, etc. The proof: because there is no time in which he is of two: therefore the proposition is held.

On the contrary of this is what is held in the Decrees, where Jerome says:

Let the detractors of me open their ears, I pray, and see that I have granted second and third marriages in the Lord, etc. And so I do not condemn bigamists, nor even trigamists: but if it can be said, nor octogamists. It is accepted that he is a bigamist who consummates second or subsequent marriages: therefore that is one and the proper way of bigamy.

Further, it is asked about cases that are often taken according to this way. For I suppose that someone takes one by words of the present, and before he consummates the marriage she dies: and afterwards he takes another, and knows her carnally. For it seems that he is a bigamist by what is expressly said in the Letter from the words of the Master and the distinction of Pope Nicholas, which is made in the Letter between contracting with the bride of someone deceased who was by words of the present.

On the contrary of this, however, is objected what Innocent III writes to the Bishop of Metz, book 1, Extra, on Bigamists, The Duty of Pastoral Office, etc., and below: Since therefore it is prohibited due to the defect of the sacrament, that a bigamist or the husband of a widow should presume to be promoted to sacred orders: because neither is she the only one of the only one, nor is he one of one, indeed where the commixture of bodies is lacking among such spouses, the sign of the sacrament is not lacking. Hence he who takes as a wife a woman led by another man, but not known, should not be hindered from being able to be promoted to the priesthood.

The decretal is very notable: because it abrogates what the Master says in this chapter.

Further, it is asked about the second way. 1. For that does not seem to be the case: because there is no defect of the sacrament, where there is no sacrament: but with her with whom he contracted, in fact there is no sacrament: therefore it does not seem that a defect of the sacrament occurs because of this.

1. Likewise, it would be absurd to say that commixture with a prostitute would signify the copulation of natures in one person of Christ: therefore that adherence by which he adheres to a woman in fact does not have any individuality: the sign of which is, because he separates from her whenever he wishes: therefore it seems that he never has except one individuality with one: therefore he should not be considered a bigamist.

On the contrary of this is what

1. Jerome says, 31, question 4, How to Virgins. And below: First, from this it is accepted that Lamech, a bloodthirsty and homicidal man, divided one flesh into two wives, fratricide and bigamy were destroyed by the same punishment of the flood, etc. It is said that he who has two at the same time not in law, like Lamech who did not have in law, nor by divine inspiration, is called a bigamist by Jerome.
2. To the same effect is what is held, distinction 34, from the Council of Toledo: It is accepted from this that it is not lawful for a Christian to have, I will not say many, but not even two at the same time, unless only one, either a wife, or certainly in place of a wife (if the spouse is lacking) a concubine. However, if such a concubine is not, and the age of him about whom it is discussed is known to remove suspicion of future incontinence, by Apostolic concession he can be promoted to the order of deacon. In the contrary sense, that if he contracted in fact with a second, he is prohibited from orders, and not except because of bigamy: therefore such a one is a bigamist.
3. To the same effect is what is held, Extra, on divorce, We Rejoice, and it is a long decretal: but there it is said that it is not lawful for anyone to have two at the same time: therefore much less one in law, and another in fact, without being considered a bigamist.

Further, it is asked about cases that are reduced to that.

1. Let us suppose, therefore, that he has one in law, but did not consummate the marriage with her, but only contracted marriage with her by words of the present, and with another he contracted in fact, and knows her: for it seems that he is a bigamist, because he has either in law or in fact two: and he who has two is a bigamist: therefore he is a bigamist.
2. Likewise, the individuality of consent signifying the individuality of the faithful soul with God is preserved in her whom he has in law: but with another there is also a certain individuality of flesh: therefore he is not the only one of one, but rather double of two: therefore the reason of the sacrament is not preserved in him: therefore he is a bigamist.
3. Further, let us suppose that he returns to the first whom he has in law: it is clear that he is then a bigamist: since therefore before the return he sins more against God and against marriage, it seems that then he should be more considered a bigamist.

On the contrary is that he has not actually divided his flesh into many: therefore according to the decretal of Innocent above introduced, he should not be called a bigamist.

Further, it is asked about the third way.

For it seems that he is not at all: because

1. It is more to be divided with sin than without sin: but if someone is divided into many fornicators, he is not made a bigamist: therefore it seems that neither is he who had one in law, who having died, takes another in fact.
2. Further, let us suppose that after the death of his wife he knows many by fornication, and does not contract with any: it seems that he is more a bigamist, because neither is the form of honesty preserved in him: therefore it seems that even such a one is more a bigamist than the first.

On the contrary of this, however, is what is said, Extra, on bigamists not ordained, etc. And below: We, however, in this question respond in such a way, that with such clerics who as much as was in them joined second women to themselves matrimonially, it is not lawful to dispense with them, as with bigamists, although in truth they are not bigamists, not because of the defect of the sacrament, but because of the affection of intention with the subsequent work.

Further, it is asked about the fourth way. Because no reason seems to be for that:

1. For I am not divided because of the division of another: therefore neither is a man divided because of the division of a woman: therefore he remains the only one of one: therefore he is not a bigamist.

2. Likewise, the son will not bear the iniquity of the father, as it is said, and the father will not bear the iniquity of the son: therefore neither will a man bear the iniquity of his wife, nor vice versa: therefore neither the punishment of bigamy: therefore it seems that he is not a bigamist who contracts with a corrupted woman.

On the contrary of this is what

1. It is said, distinction 32, where Pope Leo against the letter of Nicetas the Abbot:

Let us proceed serially and openly, what is accepted from this, that whether the holy Roman Church says about the degrees of clerics: Clerics, doorkeepers, readers, exorcists, acolytes, if they are found outside the vow and habit of a monk, and are unwilling to profess continence, they are permitted to take a virgin wife with priestly blessing, but not a widow or repudiated woman: because because of this they will not be able to be promoted to the subdiaconate: because neither is a layman considered a bigamist unless he has taken a virgin wife, and has taken a widow or repudiated woman, he is considered as a bigamist irregular for sacred orders.

1. Likewise, distinction 34, it says: Therefore it must be taken care of in the first place, that no one who has not taken a virgin as a wife as written in the prior deeds above, aspires to sacred orders.
2. To the same effect is what Gregory writes to the Bishop of Syracuse: We command you not to ever make illicit ordinations, nor to permit a bigamist, or one who has not taken a virgin as a wife, or one ignorant of letters, or one in any way defective in body, or one subject to penance, or to the court, or to any condition, to approach sacred orders: but if you find any such, you should not dare to promote them.

Further, it is asked here about cases that seem similar. For let us suppose that someone first deflowers someone by fornication, and afterwards contracts with the same.

For it seems that he is a bigamist: because

1. He does not take a virgin wife, but a corrupted one: therefore according to the decrees introduced he is irregular as a bigamist. This seems to be confirmed by what is held, distinction 832: No one should be permitted to approach sacred orders, unless either a virgin, or of proven chastity, and who up to the subdiaconate has had one and a virgin wife.
2. To the same effect seems to be, 30, question 5: What kind of wife should be had according to the law, a chaste virgin, and betrothed in virginity, and legitimately endowed, and given by parents to the spouse, and to be received by paranymphs. If she is not such, she does not seem to be the only one of the only one: therefore contracting with her he is made a bigamist: but the above said is not such: therefore contracting with her, he is considered a bigamist.

On the contrary of this it seems that

1. He is not divided into another, except into this one: therefore he should not be considered a bigamist,
2. To the same effect is what is held, Extra, on bigamists, Debt. And it is the decretal introduced above, which says that unless he is divided into many according to carnal concubinage, he is not considered a bigamist.

Further, it is asked about another case, namely that if someone contracts with someone whom he believes to be a virgin, and when he consummates the marriage, he does not find her a virgin: for it seems that he is not a bigamist, because

1. There is pure ignorance of fact: therefore if there were even sin there, it would be excused in whole: therefore much more would he be excused from punishment: therefore he should not be considered irregular from this for receiving sacred orders.
2. Likewise, in things that are not openly evil, intention imposes a name on the work: but he intends to contract with a virgin, and does what is in him for this, that he contracts with a virgin: therefore it seems that he is not punished with the irregularity of bigamy from this that he does not find her a virgin.

On the contrary of this is the decree of Pope Leo, that those handmaids of God, who lost the integrity of modesty by barbaric oppression, will be more praiseworthy in humility and modesty, if they do not dare to compare themselves to uncontaminated virgins. Therefore such a one is not at all to be compared to monogamists: therefore it seems that he is a bigamist and irregular.

Further, it is asked about another case, namely that someone contracts with a virgin and knows her: then she is known by another through adultery: and the husband, ignorant of this, knows her.

For it seems that he is not a bigamist: because he is the only one of one: therefore he is not a bigamist.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. She is not the only one, who is divided into many: therefore she is not the only one of one: therefore he violated the sacrament: therefore it seems that he should be considered a bigamist.

1. To this also seems to be what is said, distinction 34: If someone's wife has evidently committed adultery while he was a layman, he cannot be admitted to ecclesiastical ministry. But if she committed adultery while he was already constituted in the clergy, he must give her a divorce. But if he wishes to retain her company, he cannot enjoy the ministry he has undertaken.
2. To the same effect, in the same place, in the following chapter,

If a layman's wife is caught in adultery, such a one should not be brought to ecclesiastical ministry in any way. But if after the ordination of a cleric his wife is adulterated, he should dismiss her. But if he wishes to remain with her, he should be alienated from the ministry.

Further, it is asked about another case. Let it be that a husband accuses his wife of adultery, and she before the sentence is given, asks for the debt, and he renders it as he is bound, and afterwards the sentence declares her guilty. And it is asked whether he should be considered a bigamist?

It seems that he should not: because 1. He does what he ought: but no one is punished for doing what he ought: therefore neither should he: but irregularity is a great punishment: therefore he is not made irregular.

1. Likewise, he does not act, but rather suffers: but passions do not deserve punishment: therefore he should not be punished with irregularity.

On the contrary is that irregularities are often contracted only by the fact beyond will and sin: since therefore he is mixed with an adulteress as the only one of the only one, it seems that he should be considered a bigamist and irregular.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that those four ways receive the predication of bigamy by prior and posterior: because the first is said properly: because in it sacramentally he is neither the only one, nor of one wife. But the others are said by some approach to this way, according to which he can be deprived of being the only one and of one. Either therefore he is deprived by the likeness of the sacrament, or without likeness. If with likeness: either with succession, or without succession. If without succession, it is the second case: and this imitates Lamech. If with succession, it is the third case: and this imitates second marriages, although it does not have existence, except as that which in fact imitates that which is in law, so that at least it keeps the form of honesty before the Church. But if it is without the likeness of the sacrament of marriage which is between two successively in first and second marriages: then it is the fourth case: and in this way particular laws are reduced to universals.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that just as to Christ only one nature was united to the human, and by one union not repeated, so it must be in the sign: hence since in such a one he is divided into many and by many unions, it is clear that the sacrament is not preserved. And when it is said that there is never except one sacrament, it must be said that this is true in act, but nevertheless successively there are two: just as there is never except one hour of the day, and yet successively there are many.

To the second it must be said, that never were there many wives of one according to the perfect state of marriage: but by divine dispensation it was sometimes allowed to be joined to many: and among them the sacrament was never preserved, just as today it is not preserved in bigamists.

To the third it must be said, that he is never except of one in act: but nevertheless he is divided into many, because the division remains in him, even with the wife dead, as is clear from the above.

But what is brought in the contrary, must be conceded.

To what is objected to the further case which is taken according to this, it must be said that today what is said in the Letter does not hold, and it is abrogated by the decretal of Innocent which is brought in the contrary.

To what is objected about the second case, it must be said that he is considered a bigamist: because as much as is in him, he has worked for this that he is a bigamist, and he has divided himself into many.

To the objection against, it must be said that it is not necessary that in every bigamy there is a repetition of the sacrament: but it is necessary that there is some union not of one with one: and so it is here, because he is united first with one, and he afterwards as much as is in him, is united with another: and therefore the sign is not preserved.

To the other it must be said, that no individuality is signified in the adherence to a prostitute: and therefore from the conjunction to them as to prostitutes bigamy is not contracted: but in those with whom in fact or in law individuality is contracted, there is a sign: which when the form of the sacrament fails, it is violated: and therefore bigamy is incurred.

But the objection in the contrary is to be conceded.

To what is asked about the case according to this case introduced: it must be said that he in my judgment is not a bigamist, because he is not a bigamist, except when having consummated the marriage in law or in fact he divides his flesh, as is clear from the decretal of Innocent introduced above.

To the objection against, it must be said that there are not diverse carnal unions there: but only mentally a diverse union does not induce bigamy.

To the other it must be said, that he is the only one as to the only one, although not uniquely, because she is not his: and therefore she is not his only one: but nevertheless as to the external form he is as his only one: and therefore he is not a bigamist.

To the third it must be said, that as Augustine says on the letter to Titus, here it is about the sacrament, not sin. Hence although with sin he adheres to her with whom he contracted in fact, having dismissed her with whom he contracted in law, nevertheless if he returns, and knows the first carnally, his flesh will be actually divided, and then he will be a bigamist.

To what is asked about the third case, it must be said that such a one, as the decretal introduced in the contrary proves, is considered a bigamist.

To the objection against, it must be said that greater sin does not make bigamy: for sometimes bigamy is contracted without any sin: and therefore although he who knows many by fornication is not made a bigamist, nevertheless he is made a bigamist in whom is the form of the sacrament, and he is not the only one to the only one.

To the other it must be said, that such a one is not made a bigamist: and it is not similar to the proposition, as is clear from the above.

To what is asked about the fourth case, it must be said that he contracts irregularity as a bigamist, and has a certain mode of bigamy.

But to what is objected against, I say without prejudice, that he is not divided except into one: and the sacrament remains well as to this, that he is the only one: but it is violated as to this, that he is not of one or of the only one, because the woman with whom he contracts is divided, and thus disagrees with the nature betrothed in Christ: and therefore he is irregular.

To the other it must be said, that bigamy is not iniquity, but punishment: and to what is objected, that it is beyond fault: therefore it is not just, etc., it must be said, that punishment is not directly inflicted except for fault made in itself or in many. But this punishment is inflicted indirectly, and follows more some other thing, than it is inflicted: for it follows the defect of the sacrament: and this can well happen justly. But if it were inflicted by the sentence of a judge, then it would not be just, unless it were caused by fault.

But those things which are brought in the contrary, are to be conceded.

To what is further asked about him who contracts with her whom he deflowered before: it must be said, that there are opinions on both sides: but the opinion seems to be that it should be said, that he is not a bigamist, because of those things which are introduced in the contrary.

But to what is first objected, it must be said, that he is not divided by carnal concubinage except into one: because even by the concubinage which was before the copulation of marriage, she is not made of another, and therefore not divided: but both before and now she is his only one and of his only one: and this is the reason of the law saying that such a one is not a bigamist: for one is not made not the only one, except by this that she is not the only one: nor is anyone made not the only one, except by this that she is not of one.

But to the things which are alleged in the contrary, it must be said that they speak of those who are corrupted by others, and not by those same who afterwards contract with them.

To what is further asked about him who contracts with her whom he believes to be a virgin, and finds her corrupted: it must be said, that he is a bigamist.

But to the objections which are objected in the contrary, it must be said that it would well follow if it were about sin: but here it is not about anything except the sacrament. But the reason why he is a bigamist here is this, because she is not his only one, as is clear from the above.

But what is brought in the contrary, is to be conceded.

To what is further asked about him who contracts with a virgin, who is known to have committed adultery, and he knows her ignorantly: it must be said that as is proved by the canons introduced, he is a bigamist.

But to what is first objected, it must be said that she is not his only one: and therefore what is supposed in the objection is false.

Hence the objection made in the contrary solves the first objection.

To what is asked lastly about him who knows her whom he accuses, before adultery is proven, at the request of the wife: it must be said that there are opinions on both sides, and their reasons are hinted at in objecting: nevertheless it seems consistent with the sayings of the Saints, that he should be considered a bigamist.

Therefore, it must be said that it is not a punishment directly inflicted, but rather consequent upon the defect of the sacrament: and this frequently arises in someone without sin.

Or it must be said that this well excuses the sin and the harm that would be generated for him in the one whom he accuses now: but here the question is about the sacrament: and because that is lacking, I think that he is to be considered a bigamist.

And through this, the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 21 — Whether Irregularity Is Attached To Bigamy

Is irregularity joined to bigamy?

Thirdly, it is asked, By what reason is irregularity joined to bigamy?

For this is done either by reason of concupiscence or by reason of sin.

Not by reason of concupiscence: because 1. In fornication with many, there is a greater sign of concupiscence: and yet irregularity is not joined to it.

1. Likewise, in sodomy and effeminacy, concupiscence burns against grace and reason and nature: but in fornication, against grace, and not against nature, nor against reason: but in bigamy, neither against grace, nor against reason, nor against nature? Therefore, since irregularity is not joined to sodomy, it seems that it should not be joined to bigamy either. But if it is by reason of sin: it still seems that it should rather be joined to fornication: and it is not: therefore, as it seems, neither to bigamy.
2. Likewise, as Gregory says, spiritual sins are of greater guilt than carnal ones, although they are of lesser infamy: and irregularity is not joined to them: therefore, neither to this.

Further, there is a question here about the controversy between Jerome and Augustine: and it is placed in the Gloss on the Epistle to Titus 1, 6. For Jerome says that if anyone had several before baptism, or one before baptism and another after, he is not a bigamist. But Augustine says the exact opposite, that whether he had them before or after, he should be considered a bigamist.

It seems, however, to object for Jerome thus, 1. Whatever is sordid is erased in baptism: but bigamy is something sordid: therefore, it is also erased in baptism: therefore, it seems that after baptism he should not be considered a bigamist.

1. Likewise, what does what is greater, seems also able to do what is lesser: but it is greater to expel all sin than to purge bigamy, and baptism does the first: therefore, also the second.
2. Likewise, in baptism man is conformed to the uncreated Trinity, as noted above in the question about baptism: therefore, it seems that whatever deforms that configuration, all is removed: but bigamy deforms: therefore, it is removed, as it seems.
3. Likewise, it seems that even remaining bigamy does not impede: because Augustine says on the Epistle to Titus, and it is placed in the Decretals, dist. XXI: A man of one wife, a bishop signifies from all nations unity subjected to one man: but it is evident that in the gathering of all nations there are many divisions: therefore, it is better signified by the divided than by the unique: but bigamy divides: therefore, it is better signified by a bigamist than by a non-bigamist.
4. Likewise, in the Church which according to the words previously held is signified by the bishop or by the priest, there is perfection of active and contemplative life, which is signified in the two wives of Jacob, namely Leah and Rachel: and they cannot be signified in one: therefore, it seems that the perfection of the Church is better signified by a bigamist than by a non-bigamist: at least, therefore, after baptism it seems that a bigamist can be ordained, as Jerome says.

On the contrary of this is that 1. Augustine says in the Gloss on the Epistle to Titus, ii, 3, and dist. XXVI, thus, Those understand more acutely, who judged that even he who had an adulteress as a catechumen or pagan should not be ordained: because it is about the sacrament, not about sin, because of the sanctity of the sacrament, just as if a catechumen woman is violated, she cannot be consecrated among the virgins of God after baptism: so it is not absurd to see that a bigamist has not sinned, but has lost the norm of the sacrament, not to the merit of life, but to the sign of ordination.

1. To the same, there, Ambrose

Only one union, not repeated, is permitted to us: and in marriage itself, the law is not to repeat marriage, nor to seek the second union of a spouse, which seems strange to many, since even before baptism repeated marriages generate impediments to the choice of office and the prerogative of ordination: since even sins are not usually an obstacle if they have been remitted by the sacrament of washing. But we must understand that in baptism guilt can be remitted, the law of marriage cannot be abolished: in marriage, it is not guilt, but law. What is of guilt, therefore, is relaxed in baptism: what is of law, is not dissolved in marriage. How, then, can he be an exhorter of widowhood, who himself has frequented marriages?

1. To the same, below, A bigamist should not be promoted to priesthood: not because he sinned by taking a second wife, but because he is excluded from the prerogative of priesthood.

The response is that there are several causes why irregularity is joined to bigamy. However, one is true, and the cause of others, namely, because the sacrament fails in it, that is, the sign of the individual conjunction of one to one: and this has been sufficiently held in the preceding and explained.

This, however, is drawn from the decree of Augustine introduced, Acutius: and from the decree of Ambrose, Only one: and from the decretal above introduced about bigamists, Debitum.

Other secondary causes are assigned to this, one of which is because of the irregularity joined: but that is caused by this: and here it is not to the purpose, because this is in question why it happens. However, some assign this as a cause, like Jurists, not sufficiently noticing in their solution that the principle has been begged.

Hence, another cause is assigned as a sign of incontinence: because neither cooled in him did concupiscence cease by the first wife, but it flared up in the second. And this is drawn from the words of Ambrose introduced at the end of the chapter, where he says: How can he be an exhorter of widowhood, who has frequented marriages?

Another cause is the excellence of orders, that to such an excellent degree, namely, to be in the degree of a minister of Christ, it is not fitting to admit those who are divided, and are compelled to think about the things of a wife, and how to please a wife. And this is also drawn from the words of blessed Ambrose, etc. The middle of the authority introduced is also drawn from the words of the Apostle, 1 Corinthians ix, 25, where he says about the priest, that everyone who contends in the contest abstains from all things, etc.

Another cause can be: because although marital intercourse is not a sin, it nevertheless has the uncleanness of concupiscence joined: but in the office of order, there is the greatest cleanliness and congruity: therefore, the greatest cleanliness and repeated uncleanness with the second is the cause that it is prohibited to be promoted. And this is drawn from what is held, Isaiah lii, 11: Be clean, you who bear the vessels of the Lord. And, Exodus xix, 15, Moses commanded that they should not approach their wives, who wished to see God. And, 1 Samuel xxi, 4, where the priest Abimelech asked David when he gave him to eat the showbread: if the young men are clean, especially from women.

Another cause again can be: because the exercise of spiritual offices and especially of psalms gives the grace of prophecy, as Gregory says, for the illumination of the intellect: but the agitation of concupiscence impedes: and therefore, since the agitation of concupiscence is denoted in a bigamist, he is prohibited from being ordained to divine offices.

Another cause again and better than all others is drawn from the words in the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy of Dionysius, in the theory of the holy synaxis, that is, communion: where he says, that the priest is proceeding among the people and returning to the holy altar, as God proceeds into all creation and returns into himself, not detained, nor polluted by anything. It is prohibited for the priest, and it signifies the detention of his heart in those whom he has to sanctify, and to return into himself through the contemplation of divine things: and if a sign of affected and persevering concupiscence is found in him, he is considered irregular.

Many other causes of this can also be found: but these suffice for the present.

Therefore, it should be said to the first, that this is done principally by reason of the sacrament, namely, the violated sign, and secondarily because of the sign of the weakness of incontinence adhering to him from a long time, which urges him to contract with the second.

To the objection against, it should be said that in fornication and sodomy there is no violation of the sacrament: and although a greater fervor of incontinence is signified there, it is not so adhering from one to another binding itself because of the weakness of continence.

To the other, the solution is clear by the same.

To the other, the solution is clear by the things said before: because it is not because of sin, but because of the cause stated.

To what is further asked about the sayings of Jerome, it should be said that Jerome is contradicted in this. But if anyone wishes to save him, it should be said that he speaks concerning an easier dispensation to be made with him than with another: especially if he was ignorant that such irregularity was joined.

To what is objected for this, it should be said that irregularity is not something sordid: because it is a penalty, not a penalty of sense, but of loss: it is indeed a certain defect consequent from the violation of the sacrament of the individuality of marriage, as is clear from what has been held: and therefore it is not necessary that it be dissolved in baptism: because baptism is not ordained against such penalties.

To the other, it should be said that that proposition generally understood is false, unless more and less are of the same kind: like the overcoming of a hundred men and one, and eating a hundred grapes and one, and the like: for it is not necessary that these are so when they are not of the same kind: because then they do not even have a properly said comparison: it is not properly greater to overcome ten men than to eat a morsel of bread. And it is similar here: because to expel sin and to expel penalty are not of the same power, nor of the same kind: and therefore also one is not properly said to be greater than the other: nor is it necessary if baptism does one, that it also does the other.

To the other, it should be said that man is conformed to God in baptism, according to which he is three and one in himself, but not according to which he united our nature to himself: and such configuration is required in him who is not irregular. Hence, what is introduced is not to the purpose.

To the other, it should be said that that objection proceeds according to a false understanding of the letter: because some decretists have thus explained it. But the true sense is this, that the fact is compared to the fact: so that the unity of the gathered Church has a relation to Christ, as one to one man who is a bishop, when a married man is made a bishop: and then the objection is not valid except from the part made about the wife: and then it should be said, that although in the Church now there are many varieties of persons and works, and many impurities mixed, yet the sign of the Church should not be of impurity, but of perfection which will be in the future, when the whole Church will be united not having spot or wrinkle, as it is said, to Ephesians v, 27.

However, that exposition happens to some decretists: because they do not know how to solve an objection they make, namely, if a woman is corrupted by fornication or even violently, as Pope Leo seems to want, she cannot be consecrated among sacred virgins: since therefore a bishop ought to be of greater perfection than a veiled woman, it seems that a bishop who has fornicated should not be ordained.

To solve that objection, they say that the veiled signifies the triumphant Church in which there is all purity: and therefore she must be entirely pure. But the bishop signifies the militant Church, in which there are many impurities: and therefore the bishop can be impure, provided he is not a bigamist: hence it is said, Matthew xiii, 47 and 48: The kingdom of heaven is like a net cast into the sea, and gathering of every kind of fish. Which when it was full, drawing it out, and sitting by the shore, they chose the good into vessels, but the bad they cast out. But as it seems to me, their solution is worth as much as the objection: because it seems to be said that the same is signified in different ways: hence the veiled virgin signifies the Church in the custody of love and conformity of minds: and it is of her to admit or have admitted no lover besides him: because otherwise she is not said to be among virgins, but next to virgins: as Augustine says in the Gloss on that Psalm xiv, 15: They will be brought to the king virgins. But the bishop signifies the bride purging and illuminating and perfecting the bride united to him, as Dionysius says in the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy: and because it is not necessary for the type to fulfill the prototype in all things, therefore, as the Apostle says, to Hebrews v, 2: And he himself is surrounded by infirmity: and therefore it is possible to have many imperfections, provided he does not have that which takes away the sacrament: just as the veiled can have many imperfections of envy, gluttony, and the like, provided she lacks that which takes away the sign of conjunction in chaste love. But according to them, if a virgin ought to be entirely pure, because she signifies the triumphant, then she should not be veiled stained with envy, or pride, or anger, or avarice, or gluttony: because none of these are in the triumphant Church, just as neither is fornication.

To the other, it should be said that Leah and Rachel agree in the integrity of purity: and therefore although they were two women, yet not as to this do they signify two acts of the Church, but rather as they in common entirely built the house of Jacob, namely by acting and contemplating: and although there is dissimilarity in the type as to something, it is not necessary that similarity be taken from that: because it is not necessary to be similar in all things, because thus it would not be similar, but the same; and therefore here one wife is fitting to be working and contemplating, and not to lack the sacrament of unity.

And by this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 22 — Whether Bigamy Admits Dispensation

Does bigamy admit dispensation?

Fourthly, it is asked whether bigamy admits dispensation?

It seems, however, that it does not: because

1. The Apostle says that a bishop must not be a bigamist: but in these things, he must be blameless, the husband of one wife, etc.

What must not be, does not admit dispensation which makes it be: therefore, it seems that in bigamy, dispensation is not admitted.

1. To the same, Extra, concerning bigamists not to be ordained, and below: We, however, respond in this question in such a way that with such clerics who, as far as it was in them, have joined second wives to themselves matrimonially, it is not lawful to dispense as with bigamists.
2. To the same, it is objected by reason: For the deeds of the Church ought to be reasonable: but it is an unreasonable deed, which does not have congruence with what it signifies: therefore, such ought not to be the deed of the Church: but if a bigamist were ordained, it would lack congruence: therefore, it seems that it should not be dispensed with them.
3. Likewise, Dionysius says in the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, that in all things, therefore, and in this which is the Church's invisible theorems are considered: to ordain a bishop or priest. Dionysius, however, says in the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, that the invisible are the principles, therefore if the invisible are the principles of the visible sciences: they are unique and individual, it is necessary that even the visible themselves be of this kind, or they will not be principled by those: but if it is dispensed with a bigamist, it will be an individual principle of division and science: therefore, it seems that the rite of the Church is nullified: but because this is impossible: therefore, it cannot be dispensed with such.

On the contrary of this is that

1. It is read, dist. 34, where it says: Pope Martin, if a Reader has taken a widow or another's wife, let him remain in the readership: or if necessity requires, let him become a subdeacon: but nothing above if he has been a bigamist. At least for receiving a lesser sacred order, dispensation can be made.

1. Likewise, it is commonly said that Pope Lucius dispensed with the Bishop of Palermo who was a bigamist: therefore, it seems that it can be dispensed.

2. Likewise, II Corinthians 2:10: To whom you forgive anything, I also forgive: for what I have forgiven, if I have forgiven anything, it is for your sakes in the person of Christ. As if it is clear that if Christ forgave. Christ would dispense with a bigamist, it would be dispensed: since therefore Apostolic authority is on earth, it can still be dispensed by those who have the authority of the Apostles.

But then it is further asked, by whom could it be dispensed, whether by his Bishop, or only by the Lord Pope?

And it seems that by the Bishop: because

1. That decree of Pope Martin above mentioned cannot be understood of the Pope: because an equal does not have power over an equal: therefore, it is understood of the inferior, namely of the diocesan Bishop: therefore, he in necessity can dispense.
2. Likewise, Extra, Who clerics or those vowing can contract marriage, where Alexander the Third thus writes to the Archbishop of Reims: Concerning a deacon, who on Holy Saturday wounded another deacon, and took a wife. We respond in such a way that if with a contrite and humbled heart he wishes to return to the Church, having dismissed her whom he took as a wife, and having obtained absolution, and penance having been enjoined for both excesses, after it has been performed, you can dispensatively restore to him the office of deacon: and if he is of perfect life and good conversation, ordain him a priest. However, a subdeacon, whether he has killed a man or not, cannot contract marriage, the censure of the sacred canons demonstrates. This is understood, that the Bishop can both dispense and restore the execution of the order previously received, and dispense for receiving a further order.
3. Likewise, there it says: Alexander

From the tenor of your letters we have received that the bearer of the present, constituted in the office of subdeacon, has joined a certain woman to himself in marriage, whom you have made him abjure. Concerning which we commend your prudence in the Lord, commanding that if he wishes to transfer to the monastic order, and it seems to you after his laudable conversation, you may allow him to be promoted to higher orders. But if he does not wish to transfer to religion, neither allow him to minister in the subdiaconate, nor to be promoted to further orders.

Response, It must be said that with a bigamist it can be dispensed: and without prejudice, I say that by the Bishop it can be dispensed to minor orders if necessary, that is, up to the subdiaconate, and that he may minister in those received: and thus is understood the decree of Pope Martin above mentioned. Or if a bigamist enters religion for the favor of religion and the praise of conversation and the discourse to be observed, the Bishop can also dispense for receiving major orders. And in such a case, the last two decretals of Alexander above mentioned speak. But if he remains in the world, he cannot dispense for receiving minor orders except only the Pope.

From this, the solution to all the introduced objections is clear except for the reasons which are introduced.

To the proof of those, it must be said that the Pope in that decretal restricts the power to the Bishops, not to himself.

To another, it must be said that the deed of the Church is always reasonable: but reason varies according to the state, because it reasons differently for necessity, and differently when ministers abound: and therefore with a lesser sign it accepts ministers in time of necessity, provided there is suitability on the part of life.

To another, it must be said that that congruence is of the well-being of the order, and draws force from the institution of the Church, and not from being: and therefore even by the Church with such it can be dispensed.

To another, it must be said that blessed Dionysius speaks of the theories of the perfect according to the highest and best state: hence he posits many things which are of the well-being, and not of being: and therefore in such the vicar of Christ in the Church can dispense.

And thus the solution to all questions concerning bigamy is clear.

DISTINCTIO XXVIII

Divisio Textus

Here it ought to be asked, Whether consent concerning the future, etc. Having considered the consent which makes marriage, here it treats of confirmed consent, whether it completes marriage if it is concerning the future?

However, this distinction is divided into two parts: and in the first, it treats of this question, Whether consent concerning the future makes marriage? In the second, it treats of what matter consent is.

In the first question, it first touches upon the truth. Second, an objection is made to the contrary, there B, The aforementioned sentences, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether An Oath Together With Betrothal Makes A Marriage

Whether an oath with betrothal makes a marriage?

Here arises a question concerning the principal inquiry: and three things are asked,

First, Whether an oath with betrothal makes a marriage? Second, If they do not make a marriage, whether betrothal and an oath concerning the future with subsequent intercourse make a marriage? Third, If they do not make it sometimes, what penance should be imposed on the one who deceives?

To the first, it is objected thus: 1. If two things are ordered to do the same, if the weaker can effect it, then also the stronger can effect it: but a simple word and an oath are ordered to make the obligation of marriage, and a simple word is weaker than an oath: therefore, since a simple word makes a marriage, an oath will much more make it: therefore it seems that an oath with a word concerning the future makes a marriage.

1. Likewise, God is greater than man: but in an oath divine truth operates, in a simple word only human truth: therefore an oath can do more than a simple word: therefore an oath concerning the future makes a marriage.
2. If perhaps you say that this is true of an oath concerning the present. On the contrary: What is present is under the eyes: therefore it is not necessary to swear about this: therefore, since it makes a marriage, it will be concerning the future: and thus the aforementioned reasons proceed. However, it is clear that a simple promise concerning the future makes a betrothal: therefore, since an oath is of greater obligation, an oath adds something beyond what simple promises do: but there is nothing that can be added to betrothal except marriage, because there is nothing intermediate between betrothal and marriage: therefore it seems that an oath adds to it marriage, and makes a marriage.
3. Likewise, Matthew 5:33: "You shall render your oaths to the Lord": and this is in divine law: therefore it is to be observed in all ways: and if anyone comes to the contrary, it is to be revoked as null: therefore if anyone swears to someone that he will take her in marriage, and does not take her, but takes another, the following is to be revoked as null: therefore an oath dissolves a contracted marriage, not otherwise unless because it first made a marriage: therefore an oath with a promise of the future makes a marriage.
4. Likewise, an oath that does not tend to a worse outcome, as Bede says, is to be kept: but this oath is licit, and does not tend to an evil outcome: therefore it is altogether to be kept: therefore if he even afterwards contracts with another by words of the present, it seems that he ought to return to the first.

1. Likewise, a divine obligation is greater than a human one: but in a human obligation, if I were to obligate myself to one, I could not obligate myself to another to the prejudice of the former: therefore much more is this the case in a divine one: therefore it seems that if he even afterwards obligates himself to another by words of the present, he should return to the first.

On the contrary, the Master in the text sets forth three reasons. 1. One is: because what is promised in the future is not yet done: but nuptials are promised in the future with an oath: therefore they are not yet done: but a thing is done when it is acted upon by an efficient cause:

therefore nuptials have not yet been by an efficient cause: therefore a promise with an oath is not the efficient cause of marriage.

1. Likewise, if by the force of an oath they immediately become spouses, it is not necessary to add anything in the future to that marriage: but when nothing is to be done in the future, it is in vain to swear to do something in the future: therefore such an oath that makes a marriage is in vain sworn, which is inconvenient: therefore it is also false from which it follows, namely that an oath concerning the future makes a marriage.
2. Likewise, if an oath makes a marriage: therefore what they swear they will do is already effected: but what they swear they will do still remains to be done: therefore what still remains to be done is already effected, which is impossible.

It must be said with the Master, that an oath with a promise concerning the future does not make a marriage.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the first is true: but the second has a fallacy, because a simple promise absolutely does not make a marriage, but a simple promise of the present: and it is indeed true that if an oath is also made of the present, it will obligate more strongly: but a simple promise of the future and an oath are not ordered to make a marriage, but only betrothal: and there again an oath makes a stronger obligation.

To the other, it must be said that if it were of the present, then the oath would hold.

To what is objected against, it must be said that concerning what is under the eyes according to what is under the eyes, it is not necessary to swear, but according to what is not under the eyes: for although he speaks truly, it is nevertheless doubtful whether he intends and consents with the heart, and this can be confirmed by an oath, so that the contract is firmer and in this way an oath falls upon words of the present.

To the other, it must be said that an oath added to a promise of the future does not make anything, but rather confirms the same: for no oath is made to effect something more than what the word says, although it is invented for confirmation, as the Apostle says, to the Hebrews 6:16: "Men swear by one greater than themselves, and an oath for confirmation is the end of all their controversy."

To the other, it must be said that that reason proves nothing more than that an oath is to be held as long as it is licit: and this is plainly to be conceded: but it must be said that as soon as he contracts with another by words of the present, the oath becomes illicit: and therefore it is not to be kept then. And the precept that says, "You shall render to the Lord," etc., is to be understood according to what is possible and licit to render: and therefore this is done because a contracted marriage gains strength from the divine sentence which said: "What God has joined together, let not man separate": for all legitimate persons contracting by words of the present are joined by God: and therefore the first oath is made perjury: and therefore penance is to be imposed for perjury, and the marriage stands: and in this way also the laws determine, which would be long to insert here.

To the other, it must be said that the oath is first licit, but by the subsequent act it becomes illicit: because the sentence of the Lord would be violated, for the following marriage, strengthened by the firmness of the divine sentence, is a greater bond than the first oath: and therefore the bond of the oath is broken, and penance for perjury must be undertaken.

To the other, it must be said that in all other things being equal, a divine obligation is greater than a human one: but here they are unequal, because the divine obligation is only in an oath concerning the future: but in marriage there is a contract of the present, having firmness from the divine sentence.

And by this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 2 — Whether, When Carnal Copulation Is Added, A Promise Of The Future Makes A Marriage

Whether with the carnal union added, a promise concerning the future makes a marriage?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether with the carnal union added, a promise concerning the future with an oath makes a marriage?

It seems, however, that it does (On this there is a clear text, xtra, on betrothals and marriage, chapter, "Quae fidem") because

1. Each thing is made actual by that which consummates it: but the carnal union is the act consummating marriage: therefore it seems that in such cases marriage is effected.
2. Likewise, a promise and oath concerning the future are about carnal union: therefore with the coming of carnal union, that which was promised and sworn concerning the future is made: but this was the perfection of marriage: therefore with the carnal union added, the perfection of marriage is made.
3. Likewise, those who have premised betrothal agreements are united differently than those who have not premised them: because those keep the faith which they promised, but others do not: but to keep the promised faith is of the honesty of marriage: therefore it seems that those are united matrimonially: but to be united matrimonially is nothing other than the perfection of marriage: therefore it seems that through such a union marriage is perfected.
4. Likewise, if in other matters a contract is made, and afterwards it is fulfilled, that which was previously promised is completed: therefore it is similarly the case in betrothals: therefore the following union perfects the marriage previously promised, as it seems.

On the contrary, it has been held above, that

1. Only consent through words concerning the present makes a marriage, which if it is lacking, the rest, even with the union itself, cannot effect a marriage: but it is evident that this consent is lacking here: therefore it seems that marriage is not effected.

2. Likewise, let us suppose that someone has contracted betrothals, and does not intend to consummate the marriage: it is evident that this one does not consent: but only true or interpreted consent makes a marriage: therefore that one perfects or consummates the marriage.
3. Likewise, besides betrothals there is nothing here except union: but union is a bond not consummating marriage, because more sacred are the unions by the vow of the continent: therefore through union alone marriages are not effected.
4. Likewise, the same is not both consequent to something and making it: but union is consequent to marriage: therefore it is not making it. Proof of the middle: because the first is evident by itself. As Augustine says, that union is excepted from the honesty of marriages: but whatever is excepted from something while it is done, is consequent to that which excepts it, and thus the proposition is evident.

On the contrary, also of this is for the solution, that the more interpretable is that by which after the betrothal they come together carnally: therefore that makes marriage, and this is in the very act of intercourse: therefore marriage either is perfected by intercourse with betrothal, or is perfected by the intercourse itself.

1. Interpreted consent, not only expressed, makes a marriage: no one, however...

1. Likewise, Augustine says that it is more to say by deed than by word: therefore it is also more to consent by deed than by word. But in intercourse with preceding betrothal, consent is given by deed: therefore since consent expressed by words makes marriage, much more does consent expressed by deed make marriage.

Response. To this it seems to be said that interpreted consent is if after betrothal they come together carnally, having the age and condition of body for the power of cohabiting: and I think that it makes marriage, unless dissent from marriage is expressed by both or one.

To that which is first objected, it must be said that the force is in what he says, who if he should fail, etc.: for here it is not understood to be absent unless it is protested: indeed it is most likely understood to be present: for a vehement conjecture suffices for the judge, as is proven in Rhetorics.

To the other it must be said that if he does not intend and expresses it: then it is clear that it is not marriage. But if he does not intend and does not express it: then as far as he is concerned it is not marriage, and the other is excused because of ignorance of the fact.

To the other it must be said that because of intercourse there is interpreted consent which makes marriage.

To the last it must be said that intercourse in such marriage is naturally consequent and temporally concomitant: and this suffices, because in many things even according to nature it is so.

Articulus 3 — What Penance Should Be Enjoined Upon One Who Expresses Words Of Consent And Does Not Intend It, And Thus Deceives The One With Whom He Seems To Contract

What penance is to be enjoined upon him who expresses words of consent and does not intend: and thus deceives him with whom he seems to contract?

Thirdly, it is asked, What penance ought to be enjoined upon him who expresses words of consent, and does not intend, and thus deceives him with whom he seems to contract?

It seems, however, that none except that he should contract marriage from the heart: because

1. Sin is not forgiven unless what was taken away is restored, as was held above in the treatise on penance: but he took away marriage from her: therefore it is necessary for him to restore it.

If you say, that it is not: because he can contract with another, On the contrary: He perhaps deflowered her, and then he cannot contract as well as when she was a virgin: since therefore he cannot restore virginity, it seems that he is bound to take her in marriage.

1. Likewise, Deceit ought to protect no one: but he committed deceit: therefore it ought not to protect him: therefore he ought to be condemned to penance, so that the marriage stands.

On the contrary of this is, that
1. The Lord, Exodus 22:16 and following, does not condemn him who deflowered a virgin determinately to this that he should have her as a wife, but that he either have her, or provide for her concerning marriage if she is free. Therefore, since the New Testament is less to condemn than the Old, it seems that neither should the New determinately condemn to this that he should have her as a wife.

1. Likewise, Let us suppose, that he after the deception of the first according to truth contracted with the second: it then seems, that he cannot be separated from the second: therefore he is not always to be condemned to take the first whom he deflowered.
2. Likewise, From the distance of condition or fortune the deception is easily known, as if a free man by promising deceives a maidservant, and a rich man a poor woman: for it is then easy to notice, because he does not intend in heart what he says with the mouth: therefore it then seems, that he is not entirely deceived: because from externals he could conjecture about internals, if he wished, and concupiscence does not blind his heart: therefore it seems, that in such a case he is not to be condemned, except as for simple fornication and the lie of the word: neither of those is condemned, that he either take her, or provide for her concerning marriage: therefore it seems, that he who speaks words with deception, is not always bound to take her or provide for her concerning marriage.

Response. It must be said without prejudice, that if there is equality of both persons in condition and fortune, or even on the part of the deceived person there is better fortune, and the deceiver has not contracted with another: it ought to be enjoined upon the deceiver, that he contract from the heart, or provide for her concerning marriage, as the first objections prove. But if he does not do this, I think that he sins mortally. The deceived, however, in such a union is excused by ignorance of the fact, because she admitted him as her own. But if there is a great distance of persons, it seems to me, that he is bound to neither, as the last objection proves.

And from this the solution to all objections is clear.

Articulus 4 — Whether A Daughter Of The Household Can Be Given To A Husband Against The Parents' Will

Whether a daughter of the family can be given to a husband against the will of the parents?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there B, after the beginning: A legitimate marriage is not made, unless by those who seem to have dominion over the woman, etc.

For it seems that this is simply true:

1. For a thing existing in the power of another is not transferred to another, unless by the one in whose power it is giving it: but a daughter of the family is in the power of the parents: therefore she ought not to be given to a husband unless by the parents giving her.
2. Likewise, 30, q. 2, Pope Leo says what kind of wife ought to be, who according to the law is to be a chaste virgin, and betrothed in virginity, and legitimately endowed, and given by the parents to the spouse, and to be received by the groomsmen. From this it is clear that she is not a wife unless she is given by the parents: therefore it is true what is said in the Letter.
3. Likewise, from the Council of Carthage:

The bridegroom and bride when they are to be blessed by the priest, are to be offered by the parents or groomsmen in the Church to the priest. From this follows the same as before.

If you perhaps say that it is true as to solemnity, as the Master says here, but not as to the being of marriage. Against: There Gratian says: By all these authorities marriages are secretly prohibited; and therefore when marriages are made against authority, they ought to be considered as not made. Therefore it is clear that if these things which he says are not in the marriages, the marriages are not: therefore they are not only of solemnity, but also of essentials.

1. Likewise, the Philosopher says that the seed emitted by man is likened to a son going out from the house of the father: because that has a part of substance from the father, and this multiplies by the augmentation of menstrual blood: just as the son receives a part of substance from the father, and this he multiplies by gain outside the house: but it is evident that thus going out, he goes out from the power of the father, and takes with him the things which are of the father: therefore it is necessary that this be with the consent of the father: such is the going out to marriage: therefore it seems that it is necessary to make marriages with the consent of the father.

2. Likewise, Genesis xxiv, 58, Rebecca was asked by the parents: therefore it seems that this would be in vain if the consent of the parents did not operate towards marriage.
3. The same is clear, Tobit, ut, 18, where Sarah is asked by the parents.
4. Likewise, either the statute of the Church pleases God, or not: but it is evident that it pleases: therefore one omitting the statute of the Church sins against God: but it is the statute of the Church that she be asked by the parents: therefore not asking her from the parents, one sins against God: but no sin at all against God is stable: therefore such a marriage is not stable, but every marriage is stable; therefore no union which is without the consent of the parents is marriage.
5. Likewise, the mode of honest and dishonest cannot be the same: but marriage is honest, and fornication dishonest:

therefore they are not of the same mode: but the mode of fornication is to be done secretly without the consent of the parents: therefore by opposition marriage will be with the consent of the parents and the blessing of the priest.

On the contrary of this is that

1. It has been said above that only consent of the present makes marriage: therefore the consent of the parents is not required.
2. Likewise, although the daughter is in the power of the parents as to something, yet not as to all things, because she is not their maid or servant: but it is evident that since she is not their servant, it is hers and not another's to give that in which it is not another's but hers: but this is the common service of the body in the office of marriage, because thus she is not under the father: therefore for this, that in this she be made another's, only her consent operates.

Response. It is to be agreed with these last reasons, and especially the second: because that says the whole cause of it which the Master determining says in the Letter.

To the first, therefore, which is against this, it must be said that it is not in the power of the parents to possess, but to educate and direct until adult age.

To the other it must be said that the decretal introduced is understood of marriage, of which the Church judges, and not of marriage according to its first being: but rather as it falls under the judgment of the Church according to its greatest honesty.

To the other it must be said that Gratian speaks according to the judgment of the Church: because the Church holds it as not marriage, unless the consent is made known: because otherwise the ecclesiastical censure would compel them to separate as fornicators.

To the other it must be said that in part it is similar, and in part dissimilar: for the son cannot have substance which the father does not give him, and in this it is similar: but yet because he has in himself power as to giving the due of the body to whom he wills, in this it is dissimilar.

To what is further objected, it must be said that as it is said at the end of the same chapter, the girl was called, and her consent was sought: whence the consent of the parents makes for the well-being.

To the other it must be said that according to the saying of Master Hugh confirmed by the law of the Pandects, Sarah consented when she did not contradict the father: and such often happens through the parents, because girls are ashamed to do such things by themselves.

To the other it must be said that God is pleased with every deed of the Church which is truly of the Church: and he sins who contracts secretly, but he does not sin who contracts: and therefore that which is sin does not remain, because it is made public: but that which was not sin, namely the contract proceeding from the consent of both spouses, remains firm and ratified.

To the other it must be said that the substantial mode of honest and dishonest is not the same: because in fornication there is not the contract and matrimonial consent, but in marriage: and thus the substantial mode is not the same. But nothing prohibits the accidental mode from being the same, as also in many other vices and virtues: just as the mode of liberality and avarice is the same in retaining what is to be retained.

Articulus 5 — Whether Consent Which Is Made In Secret Sanctifies Matrimony Or Only That Which Is Made In Public

Whether the consent which is made in secret sanctifies marriage, or only that which is made in public?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, B, shortly before the end: But marriage was not sanctified by the consent, which was in secret, etc.

For it seems that this is false: because that sanctified marriage, which makes it: but consent makes it: therefore also it sanctified.

To this it must be said, that the Master speaks of confirmation in the judgment of the Church, not in the penitential judgment: because in that it is sufficiently sanctified by the consent made in secret, but he speaks of the judgment of the forum of causes.

C. Of what thing is that consent: whether of carnal copulation, or of cohabitation, or of another?

Here it is asked: Since consent of the present makes marriage, of what thing is that consent: whether of carnal copulation, or of cohabitation, or of both? If the consent of cohabitation makes marriage, then a brother with a sister, a father with a daughter can contract marriage. If of carnal copulation: then between Mary and Joseph there was no marriage. For Mary had proposed to remain in virginity, unless God should command otherwise: according to what she seems to have said to the Angel: How shall this be, since I know not a man, that is, I have proposed not to know. For neither because she did not know a man was it necessary to inquire how she could have a son: but because she had proposed never to know. For Bede says, that she had disposed to remain in virginity. If therefore against her proposal after consent to carnal copulation, she seems to have been made guilty, in mind, even if not in deed violated. Let us say therefore, that the consent of cohabitation or carnal copulation does not make marriage: but the consent of conjugal society, expressed in words according to the present time: as when a man says, I take you into my, not mistress, not handmaid, but wife. For because she is not given as a handmaid or mistress, therefore neither from the highest, nor from the lowest was she formed from the beginning, but from the side of the man, for conjugal society: lest if she were made from the highest, as from the head, she would seem to be created for domination. But if from the lowest, as from the feet, she would seem to be subjected to servitude. But because she is assumed neither as a mistress, nor as a handmaid, she was made from the middle, that is, from the side: because she is assumed for conjugal society. When therefore they thus agree that the man says, I take you into my wife: and the woman says, I take you as my husband: by these words or others signifying the same thing, consent is expressed, not of carnal copulation or bodily cohabitation, but of conjugal society from which it is necessary for them to cohabit, unless perhaps for the sake of religion by mutual will they are corporally separated either for a time, or until the end.

Articulus 6 — Whether Consent Is In Carnal Copulation

Is consent in carnal copulation?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, C, Here it is asked, Whether consent of the present makes marriage, etc.

For it seems that consent is in carnal copulation:
1. For the consent of a ratified marriage is ordained to consummate the marriage: but marriage is consummated through carnal copulation: therefore it seems that there is consent in that.

1. Likewise, Genesis 2:24, Adam says: "They shall be two in one flesh": but this is not except through carnal copulation: therefore according to the prophecy of divine inspiration consent is in carnal copulation.
2. Likewise, the chief among the goods of marriage is the good of offspring: this, however, is principally intended: therefore to this it is principally consented, as is proven, Tobit 8:9, where it says: "Behold, Lord, you know that I take my sister as wife not for lust, but for the love of posterity, in which your name may be blessed forever and ever": but offspring cannot be made except through carnal copulation: therefore it seems that to that it is principally consented.

3. Likewise, marriages are a good of mortals:

   but mortality is not remedied except through coitus: therefore the consent of marriage is principally to coitus.

4. Likewise, imperfect signification is reduced to perfect, just as every imperfect thing must be reduced to perfect:
   but marriage in which there is only consent of minds is of imperfect signification, as was held above: and marriage of bodily commingling is of perfect signification: therefore that is ordained to this as perfecting and completing: but the first is in consent, and the second in concubinage: therefore consent is to concubinage: and thus the proposition is held.

5. Likewise, let it be granted that it is ordained only to conjugal society, as the Master says in the Sentences: but conjugal society does not impede the transition to the fruit of a better life: therefore after cohabitation of conjugal society one spouse could pass to religion with the other unwilling, which many consider false.

6. Likewise, the instance which he brings in the Sentences, seems to be none: because by all it is said and believed that the blessed Virgin committed her will to God to be preserved, or not preserved: therefore she by her consent ordained herself into the power of a man, if he wished to demand the debt: therefore the instance seems to be none.

On the contrary of these is what is said in the Sentences.

And furthermore what Augustine says, that holier are marriages by equal vow therefore also better are of the continent: but each thing is ordained to its better: therefore marriage is rather ordained to continence than to concubinage: therefore consent to concubinage is not ordained.

Response. It must be said that the Master says the truth. However, some say that consent in common is made to carnal copulation, and to cohabitation, not any, but marital: and I well think that they speak more expressly. But for the Master it is, that carnal copulation unless it impedes the vow of either, is included in marital society, and thus the two solutions return to the same: but the former is more express.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that coitus does not consummate marriage in the first being, but in the second being, which consists in having the conjunction of the bed, as is clear from what was said above.

To the other, it must be said that Adam said this by reason of the state which was then, and not because of the essentials of marriage: because then there were only two humans, and multiplication was necessary: yet he did not wish to say that there was no marriage without this.

To the other, it must be said that the good of offspring is an effect consequent from a certain matrimonial act, and not consequent to marriage immediately, but after its work and a certain act, as was said:

and therefore this does not show that it is consummated by that in being, nor that it is made for this, but rather it is for its best, which is the signification of the double union of which was held above: for this is much better than the good of offspring.

To the other, it must be said that marriages are a good of mortals according to the state of marriage after the fault: yet even if there were no fault, still marriages would be a good of humans: and therefore it happens to marriage. Nothing, however, is to that which happens to it, but rather to its substantial end.

To the other, it must be said that there is a fallacy of the figure of speech: for it perfectly signifies this, which perfect marriage signifies, but not all, which consummated: and therefore the discrete is changed into the continuous, and therefore the process is not valid.

To the other, it must be said that it is not considered inconvenient that one passes to religion: because then one dies spiritually, and the other is absolved from the bond of marriage: yet after cohabitation, the Church compels her to stay with the other,

unless also he consents: and this for this reason, because it is not certain that they continued cohabiting with equal consent.

To the other, it must be said that the instance is good: because it is probable that it was revealed to her about Joseph, that he also was in a similar vow. And what the Saints say, that she committed her virginity to God:
it must be said that she did this because of the state of the law and divine command, if perhaps God commanded otherwise.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Husband Is The Lord Of His Wife

Whether the man is the master of his wife?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, C, after the middle: For since she is not given as a maidservant or mistress, therefore she is formed neither from the highest nor from the lowest from the beginning, etc.

For it seems that she is taken from the most excellent place: because
1. As Basil and Aristotle say,
The heart is the principle of life and generation in man. Since therefore she is taken from that which is near the heart, it seems that dominion is handed over to her.

If you say that she is not taken from the heart, but from the rib. On the contrary: Ribs are the defenses of the heart and belly: therefore it seems that the woman ought to be the defense of virtue: and she is not, but rather the opposite: therefore it seems that she is taken from a bad part.

1. Likewise, the Philosopher says that the most extraneous mode of having is that by which a man has a wife: therefore it seems that he does not properly have her: but everything superior to something governing it, properly has it: therefore the man is not superior to the woman: therefore he is not her head, just as the head is the head of the side and the helm.

Likewise, in the second book of the Ethics it is said that dominative justice is not properly between a man and a wife: therefore he is not properly the master: therefore neither the head: therefore it seems that she ought to have been taken from an equal part either of the earth or of the body.

1. Likewise, those of which each is had from another, are equal: but between a man and a woman it is so: therefore each is equal to the other: therefore she ought to have been taken from equally high parts.
2. Likewise, in those things which pertain to marriage, they are equal: therefore also in bodily formation they ought to have been equal.

On the contrary is what the Lord says, Genesis 3:16: But you shall be under the power of the man, and he shall rule over you. And, 1 Corinthians 11:3: The head of the woman is the man. And, 1 Timothy 2:12: I do not permit a woman to teach. Therefore it seems that she ought not to have been assumed from a higher part of the body to dominate over the man.

Response. It must be said that the Master speaks well in the Letter, and it is the reasoning of Augustine.

To the first objection, it must be said that the dignity of the first mover or the one influencing life is not considered here, but rather the dignity of height in the seat of the members which is manifestly apparent to men.

To the other, it must be said that the cause of the Philosopher's statement is, as he explains in the fifth book of the Ethics, the equality of right in dominion and the rights of marriage between a man and a woman, since nothing is properly had unless it is possessed as one's own: however, it is had with respect to the use of governance and the due in the body. For this use also the woman has the man: and this mode is also extraneous.

To the third, it must be said that although each of the spouses is had from another, yet not each is governed by another: and therefore the governing one alone retains the dignity of the head.

To the other, it must be said that it is true that in those things which pertain to the due of marriage, they are equal: but in the governance of the house and family, they are unequal.

And thus the solution to the whole is clear.

DISTINCTIO XXIX

Divisio Textus

DIVISION OF THE TEXT,

It is necessary, however, for the consent of the spouses, etc.

In the two distinctions here following, the Master removes two impediments to the consent which makes marriage: for according to the fact that consent proceeds from the will, coercion excludes it, and about this he deals in the first distinction; but according to the fact that it proceeds from reason, error excludes it, and about this he will deal in the following distinction.

Likewise, in this section there are three parts. First, he shows that coercion excludes the consent which makes marriage. Second, he deals with the consent that subsequently approaches marriage, there, A, §2: But third, however, those who are unwilling and coerced, etc., he deals with interpretative consent, there, B,

However, to consent is proven, etc.

And by this, the things said in the Text are sufficiently clear.

However, here arises a question concerning the principal inquiry in the Text: concerning which five things are asked.

The first is, What is force or coercion? The second, Concerning the division of coercion. The third, Whether any coercion falls upon a steadfast man or not? The fourth, Whether coercion or force nullifies the consent of marriage? The fifth, Whether in him who suffers force, any sin remains, and how that should be amended?

Articulus 1 — How Force Or Coercion Is Defined

How is force or coercion defined?

How is force or coercion defined?

Concerning the first, let definitions of authority be taken. Aristotle, Gregory of Nyssa, and Damascene say that what is done by violence or force has its principle in another, with nothing contributed by the one suffering the force.

In the Digest or Pandects, it is thus defined: Force is the impetus of a greater thing, which cannot be repelled.

And there it is said concerning Fear: Fear is the trepidation of the mind caused by imminent or future danger.

Also, Tullius says, Force is the impetus of a dominating one retaining a thing within foreign boundaries.

It is objected concerning the first. Because 1. That which has its principle entirely in another does not have in the one who suffers it praise or blame: but those things which are done by force or coercion sometimes have praise or blame: therefore it seems that they are not done by violence. The first is evident by itself, since in those things which we only suffer, there is neither praise nor blame. The second is proven by this, that if someone coerced by fear or violence commits perjury, he will be condemned by the ecclesiastical judge in the forum of penance, and he who denies out of fear of death dies.

1. Also, it seems that what is coerced or violent, although it does not regard the will of man, yet the will does not suffer force in such a way that it contributes nothing: but in this definition it is said, with nothing contributed by the one suffering the force: therefore it seems that it is not concerning the will.
2. Also, Aristotle wishes that those things done because of fear, like the jettison of goods from a ship in a storm, are mixed: for simply they are involuntary, but in a certain respect they are voluntary: since therefore in those the will of the one suffering contributes something, it seems that they are not violent: therefore similarly when someone is coerced by a powerful man to give or promise something, it is not simply to be judged involuntary, and done by force or violence.

But if it is conceded, on the contrary is that which is held in the old Digest, book four, concerning those things done by force or fear, where the Praetor says: What is done by force or fear, I do not hold valid: but it stands that the Praetor holds every promise in some way voluntary as valid: therefore it seems that no promise made because of fear is simply involuntary.

Further, it is objected concerning the second.

For it seems that it is not well said, the impetus of a greater thing: because 1. Often this impetus is also from a lesser thing: as a servant sometimes coerces a master, taking the opportunity with the help of friends or others: therefore it seems that it is not always the impetus of a greater thing.

1. Also, it seems not well said impetus: because what is done by impetus is done without premeditation and suddenly: but human coercions are not always done thus, but frequently with deliberation: therefore it seems that it is not well said impetus.

Also, every impetus can be repelled by one who cannot be coerced: but the will cannot be coerced: therefore every impetus can be repelled by the will of man.

Further, it seems that that is not a competent definition of fear: because 1. If someone being in possession sees armed men coming and flees, he cannot act as if he were ejected from possession because of fear: and yet there was danger there: therefore it seems that the fear about which it is treated here, which restores integrity, is not the trepidation of the mind caused by future or present danger.

1. Also, there is no fear of imminent danger, but rather of future: therefore it seems that it is badly said, Present or future, etc.
2. Also, the trepidation of the mind is sometimes in small and fearful dangers: and yet those are not excused by fear, as Pedius says. For he says thus, book 7: If therefore it seems, someone fearfully feared something in vain, he is not restored by the edict, namely what the Praetor says: What is done by fear, I do not hold valid: which does not well define civil fear.

Further, it is objected concerning that which is Tullius's. 1. For not always does only the dominating one exert force, but also the repulsed one before he is repelled: therefore it seems that it is not always the impetus of the dominating one.

1. Also, foreign boundaries are either of essence or of place. If it is said that of essence: then someone would not suffer force remaining essentially what he is, which is false. But if they are boundaries of place, again it seems false: because someone sometimes suffers force in his own place.

Response. It must be said that each of these definitions is sufficiently good. But the first which is Aristotle's in the Ethics, that is of what is simply and absolutely violent, such as a man cannot suffer except according to the body, as is the oppression of a virgin in body, or the taking away of money without any consent of the will, both interior and exterior: and therefore such merits pardon, or forgiveness and mercy, according to Aristotle.

To what is first objected, it must be said that such violent never has blame, but sometimes has shame and embarrassment, as in the oppression of women: because of which also Pope Leo says that those virgins who were corrupted by barbaric oppression do not dare to compare themselves to sacred virgins.

To the argument, it must be said that the ecclesiastical judge then considers the act proceeding from the will, which has its principle in the one swearing, and therefore is not entirely violent: and therefore one perjuring in such a way is condemned by him.

To the other, it must be said that such coerced does not fall upon the will of man: but yet because it falls upon something which is the state and decorum of the virtue of chastity or justice, because of this it is treated by the ethicist, and takes laws from the civil.

To the other, the solution is evident from the aforementioned: because it is well conceded that such are not simply violent.

To what is objected by the law of the Praetor, it must be said that the Praetor regards natural equity, according to which it is regarded in contracts and promises to a sufficiently inducing cause: and this is sometimes the will of another, and sometimes fear: and then the Praetor rescinds, because although there is an act of will there, yet the cause is not voluntary.

To what is further inquired concerning the second, it must be said that that is of a certain Paul, a jurist, and good: and there it takes force civilly, as force is said to be necessity contrary to the will, lest one falls into greater danger.

To what is objected against, it must be said that everything here is called a greater thing, which is sufficiently stronger to coerce: and it is not said there greater in dignity or status.

To the other, it must be said that the will cannot be coerced sufficiently, that it contributes nothing to the act: but it is efficiently coerced by fear, which falls upon a constant man: and this suffices in civil law.

To what is further inquired concerning the definition of fear, it must be said that it is of Vulpian, as is said above in the old Digest, book four, concerning those things done because of fear: and it is good.

To what is objected against, it must be said that in this case he cannot act: because it was not yet time.

There is little fear, because he did not know for what purpose the enemies came: but then is the time of fear, when they strike or threaten to strike, intending this probably as estimated.

To the other it must be said, that there is mentioned an imminent danger, whose instruments and efficient cause are present, although they are not yet exercised in action: and of that there is rightly fear, because it is present in a certain respect, and future simply.

To the other it must be said, that here danger is not said to be a danger to someone, but what seems to be a danger to all: for this is what cannot be averted: and therefore Pedius the Jurisconsult rightly says in his laws.

To what is objected concerning that which is of Tullius, it must be said, that unless it is from a dominant one, it is not and is not called danger in law simply: because it is not a danger that can be easily avoided. Hence Vulpianus calls danger a necessity contrary to the will: for what is necessity is elevated above our power, and oppresses the sufferer: and it takes away from him free consent to do this.

To the other it must be said, that the terms are there called the terms of free power to consent: for outside the terms of freedom one is placed by a coercing or forcing one: because the free one is the cause of himself, as the Philosopher says: and freely doing his acts, he is the cause of his acts.

Articulus 2 — How Coercion Is Divided

How is coercion divided?

Secondly, it is inquired about the division of coercion.

Let any divisions that are in law be accepted.

It is gathered from the fourth book of the ancient Pandects that some force falls upon a steadfast man, while another does not.

Likewise, force or fear is sometimes of oppression, sometimes of the body, sometimes of things, sometimes of a wife, sometimes of children.

Likewise, fear or force is sometimes concerning disgraceful things, sometimes concerning honorable things.

Likewise, fear is sometimes about a worse condition concerning oneself or children, sometimes about another's matter.

However, it is objected concerning the first. For it seems that no fear falls upon a steadfast man:

1. For steadfastness is only from virtue and grace: but such a one ought to do nothing out of fear of death: therefore it seems that it does not fall upon him.
2. Likewise, Seneca proved that no disturbance falls upon a wise man: therefore neither upon a steadfast man: therefore neither does the disturbance of fear: therefore he ought to do nothing because of fear.
3. Likewise, if any fear falls upon a steadfast man, it is the fear of death: but the Lord commands in the Gospel, Matthew 10:28: "Do not fear those who kill the body." Therefore, none of the other dangers ought to be feared: therefore no fear falls upon a steadfast man.
4. If perhaps you say that no fear falls upon a steadfast man to compel sins, but to compel other things, such as to promise something temporal, namely marriage, or money, which if he promises, he is not bound to pay. Against: 1 Thessalonians 5:22, it is said

"Abstain from every form of evil": but it is an evil form to promise and not to pay: therefore it must be abstained from: therefore he sins who does not abstain: therefore coercion makes it be paid, because otherwise sin would occur.

1. Likewise, Aristotle says that even in great dangers, such as in death, the brave man is not bent: therefore it seems that no one is excused by fear.

Further, it is inquired here whether this division is the same as that given by some jurists, that violence is either light or violent.

And it seems that it is so: because violent falls upon a steadfast man, and light does not: therefore it is the same.

But on the contrary, it seems that it is not the same: because something falls upon a steadfast man that does not fall upon another: but violence is in one way with respect to all: therefore it seems not to be the same. Proof of the major: because the law says that it is not probable for a man of clear dignity to have feared in a city where a man of unclear dignity fears. But it is proved from the reason of simple violence, that it seems violent to every man.

Further, it is inquired about the second division.

For this seems to be good for the first part, and which falls upon a steadfast man: because

1. Jerome says that he is cruel who neglects his reputation: therefore also he who does something out of fear of reputation, he ought to deserve pardon and forgiveness.
2. Likewise, Aristotle in the first book of the Regimen of Lords says that reputation ought to be most desired by kings and others: therefore he who tarnishes reputation ought to be most feared: therefore for the danger of reputation, the fear held excuses, as it seems.

Against this is that

1. Ulpian says that what is done because of fear is not contained in this edict as fear of infamy. Pedius says the same.
2. Likewise, it is ridiculous if someone wants to be satisfied by a judge for rape, because fearing to be noted for infamy, she did not cry out: therefore fear of infamy is no fear, as it seems.
3. Likewise, concerning fear of the body, nothing seems to be: because it is said, Job 2:4:

"Skin for skin, and all that a man has he will give for his life." Therefore it seems that for the danger of the body, it should not be omitted: therefore if he does something for the danger of the body, it is blameworthy: blameworthy does not excuse: therefore it seems that he does not deserve excuse from the judge.

1. Likewise, evil excuses no one, but human fear is evil, as Bede and Gregory say: therefore no human fear excuses, when someone fears for his skin: therefore such a one is not excused: therefore if he contracts with such fear, he ought not to be excused.

Further, it is objected concerning fear of things: because even Aristotle says in the Ethics that the brave man does not suffer great things for small things: but small things are things: therefore for them, no one ought to suffer great things: therefore he who does this is blameworthy: but by blameworthy, no one is excused: therefore it seems that fear of things does not excuse anyone before a judge.

Against this is the decretal of Alexander III in the first book concerning things done by fear and force: From this it is accepted that he who did it of St. Edmund from whom R. the presenter is known to hold his patrimony, sent knights and burgesses to the house of the said R., who would expel him from the house and all possession unless he completely abjured his church: which when the same W. had done in such a way, the abbot granted the said church to another. Hence, because things done by fear and force ought by law to be revoked into nullity, we command that you restore all things to the said R. with integrity, that resignation made by fear of things, namely expulsion from possession and house: and yet it is revoked into nullity by the Pope: therefore fear of things excuses, and restores in full.

Further, it is inquired about what is said to be fear of a wife. It seems not to be done: because

1. We read, Genesis 12:11 and following, and 20:2 and following, that Abraham exposed his wife to another out of fear of the body, when he said she was his sister. And Isaac did similarly. Therefore it seems that rather the wife should be exposed than something penal be done: therefore fear of a wife does not excuse.
2. Likewise, Augustine says in the first book of the City of God that another's lust does not stain the soul: and it is placed in the decree, cause 13: but because of that which does not stain, it is foolish to suffer something: therefore he who does something because of fear of a wife is foolish: and because of foolishness, no one is excused: therefore neither does this fear excuse.

The same objection is entirely about children.

Against this, however, is what the law of Paul says: What is done because of fear, as we have said, pertains to the edict, it does not matter whether one feared for himself or for his children: yet parents are more moved by affection in their children.

Further, it is inquired about another division, that fear is sometimes concerning disgraceful things, sometimes concerning honorable things.

For no force or fear seems to be concerning disgraceful things: because rather we ought to endure all things according to the Philosophers, before we ought to admit disgraceful things: therefore it seems that this is nothing that is said.

Against this is what Ulpian says: We accept force as atrocious, and that which is done against good morals.

Further, it is objected concerning the last.

Because it seems that it is vain to care about condition: therefore it seems that condition is not a sufficient cause of fear. It is proved, 1 Corinthians 7:21, where it is said: "Were you called as a slave? Do not let it concern you," etc. Therefore it seems also that we ought to desire to change our condition for the worse: therefore it seems that this cause is not sufficient.

Against this is what Paulus says:

I think even the fear of servitude should be admitted. And so Paulus in the same book: If he receives money who is about to take up again the instruments of my status unless I give, it is not doubted that I am compelled by the greatest fear, certainly if I am already sought into servitude, and with those instruments lost, I cannot be declared free.

Response. It must be said that every division of fear is properly reduced to three; one of which is on the part of those inflicting fear, and this is noted in this verse, namely, of disgrace or status, of blows and of death.

Another is on the part of those concerning which there is fear, as concerning the matter, and these are sometimes honorable, sometimes disgraceful or existing against good morals: sometimes not. For example, if someone is compelled to give or promise not to be raped, or is compelled to promise not to be hindered from rape: because Aristotle says that the absence of pleasures in the continent causes sadness.

The third is taken on the part of him who is compelled, namely that one falls upon a steadfast man, but another does not, but upon a fearful one: and this is what Ulpian says: Fear, Labeo said, is not to be taken as any, but of greater evil. And Paulus, Fear not of a vain man, but which ought rightly to fall upon a most steadfast man, we say pertains to this dictum.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that fear is with respect to a lesser good than that which fear threatens: as fear threatens death, or that money be given, money is to be given or promised. In the same way, if it threatens rape, or deterioration of condition. But if it threatens death for the denial of faith or justice, fear is not to be regarded even according to the Philosophers and according to the civilians. And so the law is understood which makes it whole to restore, if something is done because of fear: which restoration cannot be done in the denial of faith or justice: for it is the wise man's choice to choose the lesser evil, namely death rather than the denial of faith: or even the loss of goods rather than virtue, or the body. And this is what is said, Hebrews 10:34: "You accepted the plundering of your goods with joy, knowing that you have a better and enduring substance."

And by this, the solution to the first three is clear.

To the other, it must be said that the law of the Praetor is understood concerning those things which are lesser, and rather to be endured, than that which fear threatens, as has been said.

To what is objected, it must be said that it is not an evil form to promise, because this can be done badly and well: but not to fulfill a promise unless excused is an evil form. And I concede well that where there is judgment, defense can be found. Also, one compelled by a judge ought to fulfill the promise: and he has an action from law and canon, and the judge ought to restore him in full. But if there is a defect of the judge, I think he ought not to fulfill, but to do some light penance for caution concerning the promise, especially if faith or oath did not intervene: for if he made an oath to fulfill, many say, which also seems quite probable to me, that it must be fulfilled. But if he does not fulfill, and violated the oath, and later comes to penance, it seems to me he ought not to be compelled to fulfillment, but only to the amendment of the broken oath.

To the other, it must be said that Aristotle speaks of those who endure dangers for the sake of a good man, or the city, or winds: for then it must be endured, which is the lesser danger, than that which intends to extort.

To what is further inquired, it must be said that the division is the same, although given for another reason. For the first regards the constancy of the sufferer, and the second the quantity of the evil inflicting fear.

To what is objected against, it must be said that that which is not violent is said which does not move the steadfast, and this is not in one way: and therefore it is falsely supposed in the objection.

To the other, it must be said that fear of reputation does not excuse: for it is not understood of the reputation that is, but of that which could arise from what fear threatens if it were done, as was done in Susanna, Daniel 13:21 and following, to whom the elders said, unless she agreed with them, they would testify against her that a young man was with her: and she said: "It is better for me to fall into your hands without doing it, than to sin in the sight of the Lord." But the saying of Jerome is understood of him who gives occasion of infamy by his own deed, or negligence.

To the other, it must be said in the same way: and therefore the law speaks differently, the Philosopher differently.

To the other things objected concerning fear of the body, it must be said according to the rule held above, that fear of bodily torture or fear excuses when it is with respect to a lesser evil than that which fear threatens: and thus it is clear that those objections are not valid.

By the same, the solution to what is objected concerning fear of things is clear: yet that fear is not contained in the verse held above, but according to the rule previously held, fear is in all fears: because, as Aristotle proves, it is not wise and brave to endure greater danger for a small or lesser thing than the danger of those.

To what is further objected concerning fear of a wife, namely lest she be adulterated, it must be said that that cause is most sufficient because the law of Paul says that if he gives lest he or she suffer rape, this edict has place, since for good men this fear ought to be greater than that of death.

To what is objected concerning Abraham, it must be said that the deeds of the Patriarchs are not to be drawn into consequence: because they did all things in the figure of future things and by the instinct of the Holy Spirit. Nevertheless, it can be said that Abraham did not exhibit his wife, but protected himself, assured by inspiration that she could not be defiled. Hence in Psalm 105:14 and 15: "But he reproved kings for their sakes. Do not touch my anointed ones, and do not malign my prophets."

To the other, it must be said that another's lust, as long as it is another's, does not stain the mind: but what is first another's, by consent becomes one's own, and then it stains. And therefore if someone even compelled were to say he consents to the rape of his wife, he would sin mortally: because he would already cooperate somewhat by permitting to the disgrace which is graver than what the tyrant threatens.

To the other, it must be said that Ulpian's saying is understood when the violence of the tyrant compels to do something against good morals, such as to unjustly promise or give, or to consent to marriage, or to rape, or to something such: for then what is done because of fear is revoked into nullity. But when it compels to what is according to good morals, such as to restore, or something such: then it is not judged violence.

And by this, the solution to the whole is clear.

However, this last has two doubts,

Let us suppose, for example, that a judge who has power compels someone to unjustly promise, will it be revoked into nullity?

It seems not: because a thing done by a judge ought not to be rescinded. On the contrary: Here nothing is done except because of fear.

To this, it must be said that it ought to be revoked into nullity by a superior: and this is what the law says thus, If by injury something is done by a magistrate of the Roman people or a governor of a province, Pomponius writes that this edict has place. Perhaps, he says, if by the terror of death or blows he extorted money from someone.

The second doubt is, if I suppose that someone committed adultery whom I can betray, and lest I betray him to death, he gives money, whether this edict of the Praetor has place or not?

It seems, however, that it does not have place: because he gives for a disgraceful thing: therefore what is done by force ought not to be restored.

Response. It must be said that the edict has place: because the judge ought not to regard the cause of giving, but rather the manner of extorting: and this is what Paulus says speaking in the same case

The Praetor ought to intervene to restore: for even if it is done in a bad manner, the Praetor does not regard whether the one who gave is an adulterer, but only that he received because of the fear of death inflicted.

Articulus 3 — Whether Fear Falls Upon The Constant Man, And Who The Constant Man Is Whether fear falls upon the constant? and, Who is constant?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether any force or fear falls upon a constant man or not?

It seems, however, that it does not: because it is of the nature of the constant not to tremble in danger: therefore no danger brings fear,

1. Further, it is asked here, Who is the constant man, whether a man is called constant from the virtue of the soul, or from nature?

It seems, however, that it is not from the virtue of the soul: because he who has one virtue, has all: therefore he who has constancy of soul, has all virtues: if therefore he is called constant from the virtue of the soul, he will not be constant unless he has all virtue: therefore a sinner would never be excused by fear: and this is false, since even an adulterer is sometimes excused by fear from a promise, as was previously held from the sentence of Paulus the Jurist.

If, however, he is called constant from nature: therefore all whose nature is one, have one constancy: but all men have one nature: therefore there is one constancy: and this again is false.

Further, it is asked, Why is it not similarly said of a constant woman, since a strong woman is praised, Proverbs 31:17, of whom it is said: She girded her loins with strength, etc.

Further, it is asked, Whether constancy is in all constants in one way?

And it seems that it is: because 1. Perfection following the species of man is equally in it: the honest, however, as Avicenna says, man naturally participates: therefore it seems that he equally participates both the honest and parts of the honest: but of the parts of the honest one is constancy: therefore it seems that it is equally in all constants.

1. Likewise, Humility, mercy, and the like, do not differ in great and small, except according to merit: therefore it seems that neither does constancy: therefore where the small is called constant, there also the great, and conversely: and where the small fears, also the great,

ON THE CONTRARY is the response of the wise, that a small man and a constant can fear this, that if a man of clear dignity fears, he will be called fearful: therefore constancy is not said in one way in all constants.

Response. It must be said that a constant man is one who does not fear things not to be feared. And he is called constant from the part of civil fortitude. And the understanding of the constant is principally taken from four things, namely, the virtue of the soul, state, time, and place. From the virtue of the soul, that he has much confidence in overcoming dangers proportionate to him, and is not immediately cast down, like a vain and fearful man, of whom it is said in Psalm 12:5: They trembled with fear where there was no fear. As in Job 15:21: Fear was upon him when peace was. From state: because a prince does not have to fear what a commoner has to fear. From time: because it is different in a time of desolation, or of help to be feared. From place: because something is feared in the field, and something else in the city where helpers are ready. In all these, however, if there is proof of sufficient fear, a constant man of clear dignity in a city in a time of peace can have fear rescinding every promise. But these conditions are of the constant as frequently.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is not of the nature of the constant to fear nothing, but rather not to fear things not to be feared, just as it is also of the nature of the brave: but one who fears nothing, and is excessive in daring, is called presumptuous and bold.

To the other, it must be said that he is called constant from the virtue of the soul: but that virtue is civil: and therefore it is not necessary that he who has one, has all, namely, that he is not a sinner: because Hercules, Hector, and certain others, had this kind of virtue excellently: and yet they were sinners. For what is said, He who has one, has all: is understood of infused virtues, and not cardinal virtues according to all their state, but rather according to the most perfect state, as is proved in the Ethics, towards the end.

To the other, it must be said that even if it were said to be a natural virtue, that is, natural strength of the soul, it would not follow that it is in all equally: because it does not follow the species, but rather the complexion, namely, melancholy. For since melancholy is earthy cold, it has black vapors to the clear brain, by which terrible phantasms are imprinted: and there is in them not sufficient heat to warm the heart and blood, to make the heart's motion according to diastole, and the exhalation of blood and spirits into the exterior members and body: and therefore they remain destitute cold and trembling, with the blood fleeing to the heart and standing there. And since this complexion is not in all, it is not necessary that all are equally constant.

To the other, it must be said that the complexion of women is very timid because of weak heat and prevailing moisture, in which terrible things are quickly sunk: and weak heat is not sufficient to warm the heart and blood, as was said before: hence every woman is naturally timid, unless it is by accident, as virgins who do not fear.

And what is objected from Proverbs, it must be said that it is understood of fortitude in spiritual matters, and not internal and external.

To the other, it must be said that constancy is not in all constants in one way, and it varies from two things, namely from complexion, and the study of virtue, as was said. And what Avicenna says, is not understood except in relation to the capacity of the honest, and not that it is equally participated.

From the other, it must be said that even other virtues in their acts are unequally held for the above-mentioned causes: and therefore of every saint it is verified: There was not found one like him, etc.*

Articulus 4 — Whether Force Makes Void The Consent Of Marriage

Whether force nullifies the consent of marriage?

ARTICULUS 1Y.

Whether force nullifies the consent of marriage?

Fourthly, it is asked, Whether force nullifies the consent of marriage?

It seems, however, that it does not: because
1. In the reception of other sacraments, if one consents externally, it is not necessary for him to consent internally: therefore neither in this case.

1. Likewise, Marriage falls under the judgment of men: but this is not from the heart: therefore even if fear internally dissents, as long as he externally says he consents, the marriage seems to stand.

On the contrary is what is said, Extra, Cum locum, where Alexander the Third writes about betrothals: Since marriage has consent alone, where fear or coercion intervenes, it is necessary that where the assent of anyone is required, the matter of coercion be repelled. It is contracted by consent: and where it is questioned about itself, he whose mind is to be investigated ought to enjoy full security, lest through fear he says to himself that he pleases what he hates, and the outcome follows which is wont to arise from unwilling marriages, etc.

Response. It must be said that fear which falls upon a constant man excludes the consent of marriage, so that the contract is revoked as void.

To the first, it must be said that it is not similar concerning other sacraments and this one: because others do not have obligation except perhaps divine, but this one is effected in a certain human obligation, which can be done by fear.

To the other, it must be said that the judgment of the Church is from what is seen and heard: and although fear is in the heart, yet it is manifested externally through signs, as when arms, swords, and the like are seen, and when threats are heard: and therefore then the Church can judge.

Articulus 5 — Whether Fear Leaves Any Sin In One Who Suffers Violence

Whether fear in him who suffers violence leaves behind any sin?

Fifthly, it is asked whether fear in him who suffers violence leaves behind any sin?

It seems, however, that it does not: because
1. What is done by another should not be imputed to us: but fear is caused by another: therefore it should not be imputed to us: therefore it leaves no sin in us.

1. Likewise, human justice does not impute what is done through fear: therefore neither does divine justice: therefore there is no sin from it.
2. Likewise, if it were a sin, then a judge would do wrong by absolving or restoring to him who did something because of fear: but it is clear that he does not do wrong: therefore it seems that it leaves no sin in him who suffers violence.

On the contrary,
1. He who promises out of fear lies: because he says a word and intends otherwise: but every lie is a sin: therefore fear leaves sin in him who suffers.

1. Likewise, it is a kind of evil to promise and not fulfill: therefore it must be abstained from, as it is said in 1 Thessalonians 5:22. Therefore he is bound to fulfill: and if he does not fulfill, he sins, as it seems.
2. Likewise, promises and oaths that do not tend towards a worse outcome must be kept, as Bede says: but the observance of this promise or oath does not tend towards any evil outcome: therefore it seems that it ought to be observed.
3. Likewise, to this, Judges 21:23, where the sons of Benjamin seized the daughters of Shiloh: and yet the marriage stood: therefore it seems that it should also be enjoined on others that they keep what they promised or permitted under compulsion.

Response. It must be said that it is not always to be enjoined that it be kept: but when it is useful to keep it because of fear of future danger, then they can be advised, but they should not be compelled, nor should this be enjoined on them in penance.

To what is objected against this, it must be said that for that lie penance can be enjoined, or even for perjury, and he can be induced to be bound: but I do not think it should be enjoined.

To the other, it must be said that it is a kind of evil not to fulfill a promise made voluntarily: but it is not so with a coerced promise, because this would harm many if it were observed: and therefore it should not be enjoined.

To the other, it must be said that this tends towards a worse outcome: because the stain of sin is increased in him by receiving what is another's: and also Bede's saying is understood of voluntary vows and oaths, not coerced ones, in which voluntary consent is established. But in this case, for perjury, penance should be enjoined, and it should not be enjoined that it be done, although he can be induced and advised, as was said before.

To what is objected about the sons of Benjamin, it must be said that the magistrate of the people did that violence lawfully, lest any tribe perish: and that force holds, as Ulpian says in the law cited above.

DISTINCTIO XXX

Divisio Textus

Not only coercion impedes, etc. Here it is discussed concerning the impediment of error.

It is divided, however, into three parts. In the first, it treats of the error of the person which nullifies consent. In the second, concerning the marriage of the Blessed Virgin, there, B,

"Having premised something." In the third, it treats of the secondary causes of marriage, there, C, "Something must be added," etc.

Exposition of what is the efficient cause of marriage, etc.

Further, the first is subdivided into two. In the first, it touches upon which error of marriage nullifies consent, and which does not. In the second, it objects against this, there, A, §2: "But it is objected concerning Jacob who for Rachel," etc.

Articulus 1 — What Error Is

What is error?

However, here falls the question concerning error.
And four things are sought before the Letter.
First, What is error?
Second, Whether by its nature it impedes marriage or by some other thing?
Third, What is the error of the person?
Fourth, concerning the division of error which the Master places in the Letter.

To the first, it is objected thus: Augustine says that error is when false things are approved as true; therefore error is the approval of false things as true.

It seems, however, according to this, that error does not differ from ignorance: because

1. From ignorance of fact, false things are approved as true: therefore ignorance and error are the same, which is against Augustine in Book II of On Free Will, where he says that ignorance is the not-knowing of some things to be done.
2. Likewise, it seems rather that ignorance should be posited as an impediment to consent, since consent ought to be voluntary, that which is contrary to the will seems to be contrary to consent: but the involuntary through ignorance is contrary to the will: therefore to consent: therefore it seems that this more excludes consent: therefore it ought more to be posited as an impediment to consent.
3. Likewise, the will supposes knowledge of the willed: therefore that which entirely deprives knowledge of the willed more removes the will than that which leaves knowledge in part: but ignorance removes it in whole, error however only in part: therefore it seems that ignorance more impedes consent than error.
4. Likewise, it is not said that error of fact excuses, but rather ignorance of fact, but that which excuses in all things, because it does not permit it to be voluntary, that ought more to impede the consent of marriage than that which is not said there: but ignorance is posited by all to excuse the fact: therefore it seems that it ought more to be posited as an impediment than error.

Further, it is asked: because

1. Aristotle says that the involuntary through ignorance follows the not-knowing of singulars, in which is the act and repentance in act: but error is not accompanied by every ignorance of particulars in which is the act: therefore it seems that ignorance ought more to be posited as an impediment than error.
2. Likewise, it seems that in every lie and deception, false things are approved as true: therefore it seems that in all such things there is error: therefore all such things would be involuntary, which is false.

Response. It must be said that that definition of error is good: for error is not ignorance or not-knowing: because not-knowing is the privation of knowledge of any speculative thing, and therefore is not a sin: but ignorance is the not-knowing of things to be done which ought to be known, and therefore is a sin: but error does not remove all knowledge, but sometimes arises from the supposition of opposites of principles, and then it is called by the Philosophers ignorance of bad disposition, and then it occurs in the major proposition: sometimes however it occurs in the minor proposition, and then it is error of quality, or of person, or of some other of those enumerated in the Text. And from this it is clear that error always presupposes some knowledge of that about which one errs, namely through reputation, or sight, or opinion, as the Jurists say: and therefore it is clear that it is not pure privation: and this is what the definition says, to approve true things for false: because ignorance or not-knowing approves nothing for anything, but simply the ignorant is deprived of knowledge: but error in the major proposition is like error of law, and error in the minor is like error of fact, like the error of Nicholas, Apocalypse 1, 6, who because God said: "Increase," etc., said it is not a sin for a woman to mix in any way in the sex which the Lord created, and whose mixing He commanded and blessed the fruit. But the error of Jacob, Genesis 29, 23 and following, was like error of fact, which recalls the done to the not done.

And through this the solution to the first is clear.

To all others except the last there is one solution, that in ignorance and not-knowing there is no consent at all: because concerning the unknown there is no cognition, and therefore it never happens that consent of marriage is made: and therefore it does not nullify it: but the erring one thinks about that which he knows in a certain respect and not perfectly: and therefore he takes another for him, but in him whom he knows in a certain respect, he consents: and therefore it nullifies consent in this one: although it does not simply nullify consent in him who is known in a certain respect.

To the last it must be said that in every lie there is the intention of deceiving: but he who lies is not deceived: because he does not approve what he says: but the listener can err and be deceived concerning the statement: and therefore concerning the listener a lie can well attach error.

Articulus 2 — Whether Error By Its Nature Makes Void And Impedes Marriage

Does an error by its nature nullify and impede marriage?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether by its nature it nullifies the consent of marriage?

It seems, however, that it does not:

1. For that which by its nature nullifies marriage seems to sin against some of the goods of marriage: but such an error does not sin against any of the goods of marriage: therefore it seems that by its nature it does not nullify marriage. This is evident per se. The second is proved from this, that marriage does not make honest except the goods which make it.

1. Again, That which by its nature impedes marriage, according to the whole scope of its community impedes marriage: but error does not impede marriage according to the whole scope of its community: therefore it does not impede it by its nature. The first is proved from this, that whatever is fitting for man according to his nature, is fitting for every man. The second is written in the Letter: because it is said there, that an error of quality or fortune does not impede marriage.
2. Again, That which is fitting for something according to its nature, is most fitting for that in which that nature is most: but the nature of error is more in the error of a universal proposition or law, than in the error of a minor proposition or fact: therefore that error more nullifies marriage: but this is false, because just as ignorance of the law excuses no one, so neither does error: therefore it seems that this is also false from which it follows, namely that error by its nature nullifies marriage.

On the contrary of this is what Gratian says, 29, question 1:

Consent is of two or more. But he who errs does not feel nor consent, that is, he does not feel together with others: it is therefore evident from the definition of error and consent, that error is contrary to consent: therefore also according to nature: because that which is most fitting for a thing by nature, is what is fitting for it from the definition.

1. Again, Every error excludes the voluntary: but every consent is voluntary: therefore every error excludes consent concerning that about which there is error: therefore this is fitting for it naturally, because generally.
2. Again, In the Digests, concerning the jurisdiction of judges, book II of the ancient pandects, Ulpian says: If by error another has been added as Praetor, nothing will be valid that has been done: for it is not to be endured that they are said to have consented to the president, since, as Julian writes, those who err do not consent: for what is so contrary to consent as error which is chosen by ignorance? it is so contrary to consent as error: therefore by its nature it nullifies consent.
3. Again, 39, question 1, Gratian: As if he were to say, if someone were to agree to sell a field to Marcellus, and afterwards Paul were to come saying he is Marcellus, and buy the field from him, did he agree with Paul about the price? no: therefore error by itself excludes the pact of communication in any contract: therefore by its nature it also excludes consent.

4. Again, Aristotle, Gregory of Nyssa, and John of Damascus commonly say, that the voluntary is that whose principle is in itself, being aware of the singulars in which the act is: but one erring in person is ignorant of the principle of singulars: therefore the act is not voluntary: therefore neither is there consent concerning this, because all consent is voluntary: and thus the same is held as before.

Response. It must be said that by its nature error of person nullifies consent, and consequently marriage, so that even if the Church did not so determine and establish, yet by natural equity consent would be excluded by error.

To the first, therefore, which is against this, it must be said that error sins against the very essence of marriage, which is the individuality of souls and bodies, retaining the individual custom of life: and therefore afterwards the goods of marriage do not have place, because it immediately nullifies the faith of those contracting by consent.

To the other, it must be said that according to the whole scope of the species it impedes marriage, and annuls the contract, because it is not a contract: and this happens because the impeding force of consent follows this species and not the genus: and therefore error of person impedes, but not error of quality.

To the other, it must be said that error in the law of marriage concerning the contracted marriage could not be except in this way, that it would be said to be marriage if it were not contracted by legitimate consent, and among legitimate persons: and then it would indeed be nullified, because there would not be the consent of marriage, and it would be imputed to them as a sin who would agree thus. And therefore that objection is not to the purpose.

And what it infers, that error of law does not exclude, he himself says is false: but it is true, that it does not excuse him from sin as error of fact does.

And by this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 3 — What Error Of Person Is

What is the error of the person?

Thirdly, it is asked, What is the error of the person?

For it seems that this is to approve a person for a person: just as if I intend to consent to Peter, and Marcian is presented to me.

However, it seems that this does not exclude marriage: because 1. All things which are required for the goods of marriage are found in one as in the other: therefore it seems that presenting one is as valid as the other.

1. Again, if I intend to buy some gold, and another presents to me other gold equivalent to it, I cannot say I am deceived: therefore if a woman consents to a man of a certain dignity and condition, and a man of equally good condition is presented to her, it seems that she cannot say she is deceived: therefore neither will the marriage she contracted be impeded.

2. Likewise, let us suppose that she who erred in the person has lived with him for many years, and after the birth of children first realizes, and demands him in whom she consented: it seems that then it is grievous to depart from this one: therefore it seems that not always does the error of the person exclude the consent of marriage.

3. Likewise, let us suppose that a brother is substituted for a brother, and she consented to the first by words of the present: but with the second she has carnally mingled. It therefore seems that it is better that she remain with the second, although she is joined to him by error, because due to affinity the first seems not to have her.

To this it must be said that where there is error, there is no will, as the law says: and therefore the error of the person entirely excludes consent, and no marriage can exist there.

To the first, therefore, it seems well to be conceded that such is the error of the person as is explained there.

To the other, it must be said that although with another there can be the faith of the bed, offspring, and sacrament, yet there is no marriage, because there is no consent to him: and therefore there is no essence of marriage there.

To the third, it must be said in the same way, that it is not similar, because in the contract of buying and selling there can be recompense by equivalence: and this cannot be in marriage: for a woman cannot receive an equivalent for her own, because she is bound by the law, as the Apostle says, as long as her husband lives, 1 Corinthians 7:39.

To the other, it must be said that if she consented with the first by words of the present, the second cannot be her husband, even if she has children by him, and he is the brother of the first: and therefore she ought to be separated from him, and returned to the first.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Division Of Error Which The Master Sets Forth In The Text Has Been Well Assigned

Is the division of error which the Master places in the Text well assigned?

Fourthly, it is asked concerning the division of error which he places in the Text, namely that there is an error of condition, person, fortune, quality, etc.

However, it seems that all these errors exclude the consent of marriage: because

1. Every consent of itself makes voluntary, and every error of itself makes involuntary: therefore every error of itself excludes consent.

2. Furthermore, it seems that error nullifies the will by that of Aristotle previously introduced: because the voluntary knows singulars: but the erring one does not know: therefore every error excludes consent.

3. Further, it seems that the error of condition does not nullify: because it is not contrary to the good of marriage, therefore it seems that it ought not to exclude.

4. Truly, an error of a certain quality, like leprosy, more corrupts cohabitation and offspring than an error of condition: and the first error does not exclude: therefore neither does the second.

5. Further, it seems that the error of quality sometimes excludes consent: because impotence to copulate is a quality: and it excludes, as will be had below: therefore the error of quality sometimes nullifies marriage.

6. Likewise, a bad quality of the soul is more to be avoided than of the body: but some bad quality of the body excludes, as has been proven: therefore also a bad disposition of the soul: therefore if one is believed to be good, who is bad, it seems that that error excludes consent.

7. Further, it seems that even the error of fortune nullifies consent: because there are many burdens of marriage, on account of which it needs a dowry and paraphernalia: but the poor cannot bear these burdens: therefore when one consents to a poor person who is believed to be rich, it seems that the error of fortune ought to exclude the consent of marriage.

8. Further it is asked, since there are many qualities both those which he enumerates in the Text, such as youth and old age, health and infirmity, and many others which make the cohabitation of spouses burdensome or pleasant, why does he not touch upon all those in the Text as these qualities?

Response. It must be said that no error nullifies the consent of marriage, except that which is concerning the thing upon which the consent falls, as upon the matter: because one ought to know that if one consents, as is clear in the examples introduced in the Text. And this is expressly clear in the error of person. But because condition is immobile concerning the person, therefore it is impossible that the same person is both free and a slave: and therefore when one consents to a free person, and a slave is presented, it is not only an error of condition, but also of person: and therefore these two errors nullify consent.

To the first objection, that every error nullifies the consent of marriage, it must be said that not every error nullifies the consent of marriage, nor makes the consent involuntary concerning the person, but concerning something which is believed in the person by accident and changeably, such as wealth, goodness, and the like: and therefore since it does not directly make the consent involuntary, it does not exclude marriage.

To the other, it must be said that one knows singulars under some act: because one knows in whom or in what one consents: but something is concerning that by accident, which one is ignorant of, and this does not hinder marriage.

To what is further objected concerning the error of condition, it must be said that it nullifies consent for the reason previously stated.

To the objection against, it must be said that it is against the free state of marriage, and against all the rights of the spouse and offspring, and it defiles the entire honesty of both spouses and children, and therefore freedom is favorable, and therefore the error of condition excludes consent.

To the other, it must be said that it is not from this that it excludes consent, but rather from this that the error of condition implies an error of person, although it adds the defilement of condition in spouses and children, as has been said.

To the other, it must be said that quality is not taken here broadly, but specifically for that which is not contrary to the matrimonial act: because that quality also is: but the other is like a certain substantial privation of marriage.

To the other, it must be said that the quality of the mind can be cured otherwise than by the exclusion of marriage, namely if the woman does not imitate the man: because in such a case it is also sometimes useful to join a bad man with a good woman, or conversely: because the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 7:14, that one spouse is frequently sanctified by the other good one.

To what is further asked concerning the error of fortune, it must be said that it is changeable concerning the person, and therefore does not exclude.

To what is objected against, it must be said that this is for the well-being of marriage, and not for the being: and therefore the objection does not hold.

To the other, it must be said that such qualities frequently lie open to the eyes of the contracting parties, namely old age, youth, infirmity, and health: and therefore such do not need to be placed: because when they see to be, they can consent or dissent. But those which he enumerates here are more hidden, and it might seem to someone that they would exclude consent unless they were expressed.

Articulus 5 — Whether Leah, Joining Herself To Jacob Who Had Consented To Rachel, Sinned Mortally And Committed Adultery

Did Leah, joining herself to Jacob who had consented to Rachel, sin mortally and commit adultery?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said, there, A, § 2: But it is objected concerning Jacob, etc.

For it seems false to say in the Text, that Leah is excused by this, that she rendered the marital debt with conjugal affection, thinking by the law of the firstborn and paternal commands that she was lawfully joined: for this seems false, because

1. Ignorance of the law excuses no one:

but this is ignorance of the law, that someone by that very fact believes herself to be the spouse of her sister's betrothed, because she is the firstborn: therefore it seems that Leah is not excused.

1. Furthermore, without the consent of the girl, marriage cannot occur; however, consent is the agreement of two, as was held before: and Leah knew well that she did not do this: therefore she knew she was not the spouse: therefore she sinned mortally by joining herself to Jacob.

To this it must be said that Laban sinned mortally, but not Leah: because the consent of marriage is not only made by oneself, but through another existing as a mediator, and thus through the father as a mediator Leah consents.

And thus the solution to the objections is clear.

Articulus 6 — Whether Someone Adoring The Devil Transfigured Into An Angel Of Light Sins Mortally

Whether someone worshipping the devil transformed into an Angel of light sins mortally?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, A, 8, 2, at the beginning: For if the devil transforming himself into an Angel of light, etc.

For it seems that he speaks falsely: because it is said, 1 John 4:1: Do not believe every spirit, but test the spirits to see whether they are from God. Therefore, he sins who does not test, but believes the spirit; but he does not test, who worships the devil in place of Christ, therefore it seems that he sins: therefore the similar does not hold.

But because this is noted on the third of the Sentences, it must be said that he speaks in such a case, when sufficient caution of testing the spirit is applied: then he ought still to say with Bartholomew: I worship, but not an idol, and if then also it is, but I worship God, not a demon, but Jesus Christ: deceived, it does not harm.

Articulus 7 — Whether One Receiving A Heretic Under The Name Of A Catholic Sins Mortally

Whether one receiving a heretic under the name of a Catholic sins mortally?

Further, it is inquired concerning another similar matter which is touched upon there, A, § 2, shortly after: If anyone is a heretic under the name of Augustine, etc.

For this seems to be of no value: because he receives heresy; but he who receives heresy is not excused even if he had received it through an Angel: therefore he sins; and thus the similar case is of no value. But that the minor is true is evident, according to Galatians 1:8: "But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed."

Response. Here it speaks of the deception of a man, not of error: for although the deceivers of heretics are condemned, yet one receiving a heretic under the name of a Catholic will not be condemned. And this is intended in the Text. And through this the solution is evident.

Articulus 8 — Whether There Was A True Marriage Between Joseph And The Glorious Virgin Mother Of God

Was there a true marriage between Joseph and the glorious Mother of God the Virgin?

Was there a true marriage between Joseph and the glorious Mother of God the Virgin?

Then it is asked about what is said there, B, Something must be added to the premises about the manner, etc.

However, five questions are asked there, the first of which is, Whether there was a marriage? Secondly, Whether it was perfect? Thirdly, Whether a vow is contrary to the consent making marriage? Fourthly, Whether the good of the offspring of that marriage was good? Fifthly and lastly, Whether there was individuality of life there?

To the first of these, it is objected thus: 1. The highest status was fitting for the mother of God: but the highest status is outside marriage; therefore the mother of God was not bound by marriage: therefore there was no marriage between her and Joseph.

1. Furthermore, A vow made absolutely is more perfect than one made under doubt: but the best and most perfect must be attributed to the mother of God: therefore it seems, that her vow was such: but this impedes marriage: therefore she afterwards did not contract marriage.

2. Furthermore, Genesis xv, 16, says, that in the fourth generation they shall return here: and this is contrary to the second: because the first was of a man from the earth. The second of a woman virgin from a man not betrothed. And the third from the mingling of sexes customary in marriage. Therefore the fourth ought to have been of a man from a woman not married: therefore the blessed Virgin did not have marriage with Joseph: because I hold it as certain, that she did whatever she ought.

1. If perhaps you say, that God willed, that she be married to have the solace of a man in provision, On the contrary: It is of greater merit not to have a man nor the provision of a man, than not to have indeed through mingling, but to have his provision: but she always did what had greater merit: therefore it seems, that she in no way had a man: therefore it seems, that she in no way had a man: therefore between her and Joseph there was no marriage.

On the contrary of this is, that 1. The highest wisdom ought to have most carefully provided for his mother both from infamy, and from danger: but it would not have been provided except through betrothal, because otherwise she would have been believed an adulteress, and stoned: therefore Christ who is the highest wisdom, ordained that she be married: therefore there was marriage between her and Joseph.

1. Furthermore, The higher status is of virginity, the more it has an assailant, provided it perseveres in perfect purity: but such an assault is especially in the most holy continence of marriages: therefore in such the highest status of the virgin is: but the highest status was fitting for the mother of Christ: therefore it was fitting for the mother of Christ to be married, provided she was not joined to her spouse in concupiscence.

Further it is asked about the causes of the betrothal of the blessed Virgin which Origen touches upon in the homily on the vigil of the Nativity of the Lord saying thus: What was the necessity And below, that Mary be betrothed to Joseph, except for the reason that this sacrament might be hidden from the devil? and that wicked one might find no fraudulent schemes against the betrothed virgin? Or for this reason she was betrothed to Joseph, that to the born child and to Mary herself care might seem to be given whether going into Egypt, or coming again from there. For if she had not been From these are gathered three causes betrothed, the incredible enemies of all good and the Jews would have killed her with stones. why Christ willed to be born of a married woman, that the sacrament might be hidden from the devil, that solace and service might be shown to the mother and to himself, and that the mother might not be defamed and stoned by the Jews as an adulteress.

However, the first seems to be nothing: because 1. Demons, as Dionysius says, have not lost natural gifts, but through nature they know and recognize God: therefore through nature they recognized the deity in Christ: therefore this sacrament was not hidden from the demons through marriage.

1. Furthermore, Demons see all natural things: therefore they recognize the signs of virginity and corruption: therefore through these signs they recognized the mother of Christ to be a virgin after birth: therefore they knew Christ to be the son of a Virgin: therefore through this the sacrament was not hidden from them,
2. Furthermore, They themselves knew Christ not to have sin through this that they found nothing of their own in him: therefore they knew him either to be cleansed, or born beyond the common law: but they did not know him to be cleansed, because he never had sin: therefore they knew him to be born beyond the common law: therefore not from a man, nor from a woman, but born of a virgin: therefore the sacrament was not hidden from them. That which follows is proved by Augustine in the book on Marriage and concupiscence against Julian the Pelagian, and by Anselm in the book on the Conception of the Virgin, who strive to persuade with many reasons, that everyone who is born through the common law from a man and a woman contracts original sin: and therefore the blessed Virgin could not transmit original sin, because she gave birth beyond the common law.

3. Further it is asked about the second: because when he came to suffer poverty for us, it seems that he ought more to have willed his mother to be deprived of such solace, than to help her.

4. Similarly it is objected about the third: because the Jews had read the Scripture of Isaiah, vii, 14, in which it is said: Behold a virgin shall conceive, etc.: but then they were expecting redemption: therefore it seems, that if she had given birth without betrothal, they would not have stoned her, but would have received her with joy.

5. Likewise, It seems that marriage was an impediment to them believing: because they knew, that Christ ought to be born of a Virgin, and she through marriage concealed her virginity: therefore it seems to have generated an impediment to them believing through this.

Response. It must be said, that there was a true and perfect marriage between the glorious Virgin, and holy Joseph, the witness and steward of her virginal chastity.

To what is first objected, it must be said that marriage by reason of conjugal consent does not lower the status of virginity, but rather by reason of intercourse: and that was not in this marriage: because as Origen says, although she was betrothed, she was not joined in concupiscence.

To the other it must be said, that a vow is the conception of a better good: but the better good is twofold, namely simply, and according to the time in which it is more valuable. For the Philosopher says in the Ethics of Tropics, that each thing in the time in which it is more valuable, is more to be chosen: and therefore the vow of the blessed Virgin was best, because simply it was of the best, that is, of virginity: but the good which then was more valuable, she committed to dispensation: hence she did not doubt whether she wished to remain a virgin, but rather whether she ought to remain what she wished, because then the fruit of the womb according to the time was more valuable to the Church, than virginity: because many were being led to idolatry, and few worshipped the true God. And this is what the Lord commanded, Leviticus ii, 13, that in every sacrifice salt should be offered: because no vow ought to be made, unless discerning the will of God concerning the good which he then more willed.

To the other it must be said, that in the fourth generation they return, as the objection says: but it is not necessary, that in all things it be similar to the second: and this for the reason, because the state of the time was not the same: for one existing alone cannot have a wife, but a wife was formed for him, and to the blessed Virgin a husband was not born, but a most sweet son, who by his generation begot all sons, to lead them back to the homeland of eternal salvation.

To the other it must be said, that because merit is in the will, and indiscretion is to lack the solace of necessity, God provided the mother with the solace of necessity, and excluded the solace of pleasure: - and therefore that objection supposes a falsehood, namely that it is of greater merit to lack the solace of necessity, than to have it: but if it speaks of the solace of pleasure, then it is not to the purpose.

From what is objected about the causes which Origen assigns, it must be said that they are good.

To what is objected against the first, it can be answered in two ways. In one way indeed: because although demons have natural knowledge of divinity, yet not of union: and therefore it does not follow, that they knew the deity as united: and thus it was hidden from them, because if the son had been of a non-married virgin, they would have had more certain conjectures. In another way it can be said, that Origen speaks of the devil in his members, and not in himself. But the first is better: because the Gloss on the epistle I to the Corinthians ii, 8, on that: Whom none of the princes of this world knew: for if they had known, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory: is explained of the demons who did not know the sacrament of the Incarnation: because if they had known, they would never have persuaded the crucifixion: for they would have known that they would lose power through this.

And if it is objected against that, which is said, Matthew viii, 29: What have we to do with you, Jesus, Son of God? Have you come here before the time to torment us? the demons said through conjectures of miracles and the holiness of life, and not from certain knowledge.

To the other it must be said, that it can well be, that by divine will they were impeded from daring to consider anything about the mother of God: and therefore their knowledge of her natural things was as if in habit and dormant, as someone knows something in universal, which yet in particular he does not consider.

To the other it must be said, that of the Son

They well knew God, that they had no right in Him: but this could be done by the divine will for many other reasons: and therefore from this they had only conjecture. And therefore, in Matthew 4:1 and following, and Luke 4:2 and following, the devil insists much on temptation, so that he may take true experience of divinity.

To the other, it must be said as before, that to refuse the solace of necessity is perverse and not meritorious, and especially in the case of a virgin who, when she is alone, is not to wander through lands and roam through various businesses.

To the last, it must be said that those loving primacy had become blind, and therefore they would not have believed the testimony of Scripture, but would have stoned, as was later discovered in the work, where great and evident miracles could not bend them. Hence, although they had the Scripture, yet they would not have believed the Blessed Virgin to have been she, of whom this was foretold.

Thus through this is also clear the solution to the following: because it would not have been an impediment to them, but rather an argument of credulity confirmed by the testimony of the holy man Joseph.

Articulus 9 — Whether The Sacrament Of Marriage Between Mary And Joseph Was Perfected, And Whether Joseph Wished To Dismiss Mary Justly

Whether the sacrament of marriage between Mary and Joseph was perfect? And, whether Joseph justly wished to dismiss Mary?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether the sacrament there was perfect?

However, it seems that it was not, and this in three ways.

1. First, from the efficient cause itself: for simple consent causes marriage simply: therefore conditional consent does not cause marriage simply, but in a certain respect: but the consent of the Blessed Virgin was conditional: therefore it did not cause marriage except in a certain respect: but marriage in a certain respect is imperfect: therefore the marriage of the Blessed Virgin was imperfect.

1. Likewise, on the part of the good of faith it seems to have been imperfect: because the vow of absolute chastity is one thing, and the faith of the bed is another: for the absolute vow keeps absolute chastity from every man, and at every hour: but the faith of the bed neither at every hour nor absolutely, and this custody was not in the Blessed Virgin: therefore her marriage as to the faith of the bed was imperfect.
2. Likewise, also as to offspring it seems to have been imperfect: because the offspring was not caused by the marriage: therefore it was not its good: therefore it does not receive any perfection from it.
3. Likewise, as to the good of the sacrament: for perfect in the good of the sacrament is perfect in signifying: but this is imperfect in signifying, as the Text says: therefore it is an imperfect sacrament: therefore it also seems imperfect.
4. Likewise, as to the essence of marriage it seems imperfect: because individuality is the essential perfection of marriage: but those who never perfectly become one, never have perfect individuality: but the Blessed Virgin and Joseph never perfectly were one: therefore the proposition is clear. The proof of the minor is that the unity of souls is ordered to the unity of bodies: but the final in all things is completing: since therefore they never were one in the unity of body, they never perfectly were one.
5. Likewise, everything in which the ultimate completing is lacking is imperfect: but in the marriage of the Blessed Virgin and Joseph the ultimate completing is lacking: therefore it is imperfect. The proof of the minor is: because the ultimate consummating of marriage is the mingling of sexes.
6. Likewise, the cause which the Text says seems to be nothing, because chastity does not perfect marriage, although it perfects merit in some way: therefore what it says is nothing.

1. Likewise, that perfects marriage in which the spouses consent to exercise: but this is not chastity: therefore chastity does not perfect. The first is clear by itself. The second is proved by this, that if chastity perfected marriage, mother, sister, and daughter, and such persons would be excluded from marriage in vain.

But the contrary is what
1. Is said in the Text, and the same is in decree 31, throughout.

1. Likewise, it is still objected by reason thus: God's works are perfect: therefore especially those are perfect which He does concerning Himself and His own: but this marriage He did concerning Himself and His own: therefore it is most perfect.
2. Likewise, the Angel himself says, Matthew 1, 21: Do not fear to take Mary as your wife. But they are not called spouses, as was proved above, unless from the time when marriage between them is perfect: therefore there was perfect marriage there.

But if this is conceded according to truth, it is then asked, why Joseph, since he was just, and did not wish to expose her, wished to dismiss her secretly: for he could not dismiss her and take another, nor remain in the world, if it was a perfect marriage: but it was allowed since he was just, for a just man does nothing unjustly: therefore it was not a perfect marriage, as it seems.

Response. It must be said that it was a most perfect, uncontaminated, and immaculate marriage: because, as was shown above, carnal intercourse follows marriage, and does not perfect it, but rather consent expressed by words of the present.

Therefore, not repeating what was said, we say to the first, that the consent was sufficient for marriage, which was in the matrimonial union permitted under divine disposition: for charity by itself wills better things: but sometimes it is compelled to act concerning those things which are lower and more necessary at such a time, as the Gloss says on the epistle to Titus: Charity. And therefore charity of truth always wills what is better simply: but the truth of charity compels those things to be willed from time. It must be said that the argument does not proceed except from a condition diminishing conjugal consent, and such is not this.

To the other it must be said that faith keeps chastity for its own sake, and offers itself maritally to the joined one for infirmity or the good of offspring. Hence what it offers itself, this is for another: but the custody of chastity is as desired for its own sake: and therefore in the first is the perfection of the good of faith, and not in the second.

To the other it must be said that two things make the good of marriage, namely the reception of offspring through marriage, and education in it. Therefore it must be said that Christ has the latter expressly, because He is educated by the piety of parents, and is presented to the Father in the temple, to present Him to the Lord: and in place of the first He has that He was received in marriage, although not through it, and therefore it is called the good of marriage, not entirely as other infants.

To the other it must be said that signification is of the essence of the sacrament inasmuch as it agrees with the old sacrament: and therefore it follows the genus of the sacrament, and not the species: and therefore from signification the sacrament does not contract essential perfection.

To the other it must be said that no union is the essential reason of marriage, unless marital founded in the consent of souls: but that which is of the flesh is consequent to it: and therefore the first is not ordered to that as to the essential, but as to the effect which can follow if the spouses will: and therefore the argument falsely supposes.

To the other it must be said that the act of lying together is not perfecting and consummating according to being: and the reason for this is sufficiently had from the above.

To the other it must be said that the cause given in the Text is good: for there is a twofold chastity, namely simple chastity and in kind, and specific chastity. And simple chastity indeed does not perfect marriage, but in species, and this is marital chastity, and this is which is according to the will of the spouses whether to contain or to render the debt: and it is more perfect when it is to contain, and such was in this marriage from the will of both, because both vowed chastity, and for this reason from common will they continued; and such is not the chastity of a virgin not joined to marriage, nor even the chastity of a widow.

To the further PROBATION it must be said that among illegitimate persons there cannot be conjugal chastity, as was already and above evident: and by this all things which were first objected are solved.

To the last, Origen responds that Joseph did not think this, to have suspicion of the glorious Virgin, but rather, because he deemed himself unworthy to serve such sanctity: and therefore unless he had been strengthened by the Angel, he wished to withdraw himself elsewhere, to give place to another more suitable by his reputation.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Good Of Offspring Was The Good Of This Marriage

Whether the good of this marriage was the good of offspring?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether the good of offspring of this marriage was good? For although this is now almost assumed, yet it is further to be inquired.

However, it seems that it is not:
1. For the good of marriage relates to marriage as an effect to a cause: but this offspring was not effected by this marriage: therefore it cannot be its good.

1. Likewise, an adopted son by someone cannot be the good of his marriage: therefore much less he who is not, nor is even adopted.

2. Likewise, as the father relates to the daughter who is joined in marriage, so the son to the marriage: but the father of Christ was not Joseph truly, but only putatively: therefore it seems that Christ was only a putative good of the offspring of that marriage: but it does not follow, this is a putative good of that: therefore it is the good of that: therefore it seems that it ought not to be called the good of that marriage.

3. Likewise, it is not the good of marriage which is before the matrimonial conjunction: but Christ, conceived as a true man, existed before the matrimonial conjunction of the blessed Virgin and Joseph: therefore he was not the good of that marriage. The first is evident by itself. The second is written, Matthew 1:18: Before they came together, she was found to be with child of the Holy Spirit.

To this it must be said, as before, that for offspring to be called the good of marriage, several things are required, namely that it be received in marriage according to the fear of God and be religiously educated, and that divine worship remain in it as it remained in the parents, as it is said, Tobit 6:9: And now, Lord, you know that I take my sister as wife not for the sake of lust, but only for the love of posterity, in which your name may be blessed forever. In Christ, by reason of which it is called the good of the offspring of that marriage, namely because he is received in marriage, although not from marriage, but from the Holy Spirit, and in marriage he was nourished and educated, subject to them, as it is said in Luke 2:51: and the religion of the parents not only remained in him, but also all that had fallen, rose again.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that marriage would not have been sufficient for such an effect, but it effected something concerning him, namely the protection of the mother, and his education.

To the second, it must be said that Christ is not an adopted son of anyone, but the natural son of the mother, and through her pertaining to the marriage.

To the other, it must be said that that comparison is not valid: because Christ can be compared to marriage in two ways, namely through the mother, and Joseph: but Joseph is not compared to Christ, except as a putative and nurturing father: and therefore the argument does not proceed.

To the other, it must be said that Christ was conceived before cohabitation: but the Gospel does not say that he was conceived before the conjugal pact, but implies that after, when it says: When she was espoused, etc.: but whatever happens after the conjugal pact which is there called espousal, all pertains to marriage.

Articulus 11 — Whether The Blessed Virgin's Vow Of Chastity Was Contrary To Matrimonial Consent

Whether the vow of chastity of the Blessed Virgin was contrary to matrimonial consent?

Fourthly, it is asked, whether that vow was contrary to matrimonial consent?

It seems, however, that it was: because

1. Those whose acts are contrary, they themselves are contrary, as the Philosopher says: but the acts of the vow of chastity and of marriage are contrary: therefore the vow and matrimonial consent are contrary. The proof of the minor is that the vow wills to abstain from all, but not the consent of marriage.

1. Likewise, a vow is not about those things which are subject to a precept, because everyone is bound to these things without a vow: therefore a vow does not exclude fornication there:

since therefore it excludes something of those things which are not under a precept, it seems that it excludes marriage: therefore it seems that it is contrary to matrimonial consent.

1. Likewise, to one vowing voluntary poverty it is not permitted to return to having riches for use, even if he subjects them, but he must renounce them: therefore similarly to one vowing the state of virginity it is not permitted to return to the state of marriage, even if he abstains in marriage: therefore it seems that since the Blessed Virgin vowed thus, she could not afterwards consent to marriage.

But if this is said, it is contrary to what is said in the Letter, and in the Gospel, and by all the Fathers.

Response. It must be said that she never vowed absolutely to remain a virgin: but she always willed this absolutely, and never willed carnal union, unless God revealed that this was better for that time: for which reason, as it is said in the Letter, she entrusted her virginity to divine providence and disposition because of the state of the time: because everyone who at that time descended from the line of David through the right line desired to be a participant of that promise, and sought to leave behind a posterity from which Christ would be born, and in this hope she consented to marriage.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that the vow of chastity was conditional, and therefore was not contrary to marriage: for Augustine wills in the Letter that she consented to marriage in such a way that unless God commanded the opposite, she would even have rendered the debt.

To the other, it must be said that this seems to follow if she had made the vow solemnly and without condition.

To the other, it must be said that it is not similar: because he who vows to renounce riches does not renounce but uses them when he has them: but one vowing virginity and keeping it with a man does not use the act which is in carnal union.

Articulus 12 — Whether Between The Blessed Virgin And Joseph There Was An Indivisibility Of Life

Whether there was an individuality of life between the Blessed Virgin and Joseph?

Whether there was an individuality of life between the Blessed Virgin and Joseph?

Fifthly, it is asked whether there was an individuality of life between the Blessed Virgin and Joseph?

It seems, however, that there was not: because

1. Individuality is when separation is impossible: but this does not occur except through carnal union: therefore, it seems since this was not between them, that there was not full individuality there.

1. Likewise, there is a different individuality of charity and friendship and marriage: but I see that individuality of spirit is between those who love and friends: therefore, that is not proper to marriage: since therefore it does not have another, it seems that they did not have the proper individuality of marriage between themselves.

On the contrary, individuality is caused by consent: however, it is most fully established that they consented to each other: therefore, it seems that they had the fullest individuality.

Response. It must be said that the individuality of souls was greatest in that sacrament, which never was among other spouses.

To that which is objected against, it must be said that union posits possible separation through death, and that is among such in spiritual death: because this was not there except a spiritual bond: and the reason for this is clear from what was said above. Hence it is false that there is a possible division, as long as they endure in life with the possible marriage itself united.

To the other, it must be said as above, that here individuality is specified by the contracting form and difference, which is marital conjunction: for such is not among those who love or among friends.

D. Concerning the final cause of marriage.

Having explained what is the efficient cause of marriage, it follows to show for what cause marriage is usually or ought to be contracted. Therefore, the principal final cause of contracting marriage is the procreation of offspring: for this reason God instituted marriage among the first parents, to whom He said: "Be fruitful and multiply," etc.[694] The second is, after the sin of Adam, the avoidance of fornication: whence the Apostle says, "Because of fornication, let each man have his own wife, and let each woman have her own husband."[695] There are also other honorable causes, such as the reconciliation of enemies and the restoration of peace. There are also other less honorable causes for which it is sometimes contracted, such as the beauty of a man or woman, which often inflames minds with love and impels them to enter into marriage, so that they may fulfill their desire. Profit and the possession of riches are also frequently causes of marriage, and many others, which are easy to discern for anyone who applies diligence. Nor should assent be given to those who say that it is not marriage which is contracted for these less honorable causes. For it is established from the premises that marriage is made from mutual consent expressed in words of the present, even if love has drawn to this. A document of this matter is provided by Jacob, who loved Rachel, beautiful in face and with a pleasing appearance, and said, loving her greatly: "I will serve you for Rachel seven years." In Deuteronomy it is also read: "If you see among the captives a beautiful woman, and you desire her, and wish to have her as a wife, you shall bring her into your house," etc.[696]

E. That an evil end does not contaminate the sacrament.

And although marriage is contracted with a not good end, when the appearance of the contracting party moves the mind, nevertheless the marriage is good: because the evil life or perverse intention of someone does not contaminate the sacrament.

However, the marriage of Mary and Joseph had other special causes, namely that the virgin might be sustained by the solace of a man, and that the birth might be hidden from the devil, that Joseph might be a witness of chastity, defending her from the infamy of suspicion, lest she be condemned as an adulteress.

Articulus 13 — Whether Matrimony Can Be Contracted For Several Causes

Whether marriage can occur for multiple reasons?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, D, Exposition of what is the efficient cause of marriage, etc.

1. For it seems that one and the same thing ought not to have multiple final causes: but offspring, infirmity, beauty, wealth, friendship, and reconciliation of enemies are many not of the same kind: therefore it seems that they cannot be the cause of one marriage.
2. Likewise, if something is caused by multiple causes not existing in one kind, it is impossible for it to be simple: but marriage is simple: therefore it seems that it is not caused by multiple causes differing in kind, as are those which are enumerated in the Text.
3. Likewise, Boethius: Of which the cause is good, it itself is also good: of which the cause is good and evil, it itself is good and evil: therefore further by similarity, of which the cause is honest and less honest, it itself is at once less honest and more honest, which is false.
4. Likewise, no sacrament is required under a dishonest cause: this is false, therefore it is said in the Text.
5. Likewise, the Church does not judge or ordain concerning dishonest things, or concerning those things which are done for dishonest causes: but it judges concerning marriage: therefore it is never done for less honest causes.

Response. It must be said that there are twofold causes of marriage, namely per se, and per accidens. The per se causes of marriage are always honest, but the per accidens causes are not always: however, the per accidens causes are those which are not direct causes of marriage, but rather causes inclining to contract: and therefore they are rather causes of contracting than of marriage, as the Master expressly says in the Text.

694. Genesis 1:28.

Therefore, it should be said to the first, that this is understood of the per se cause.

To the other, however, it can be said that this is true of essential causes: but it has already been shown that these are not such.

To the other it must be said that this would follow very well if the causes were of equal causality: and therefore since the honest ones are essential to marriage, it itself is similarly honest, as it is said in the Text: but since the dishonest ones are not essential causes of it, but rather inclining to contract, they do not place their dishonesty around marriage, but rather around those contracting marriage.

And through this the understanding of all those things which are said in this distinction is clear.

DISTINCTIO XXXI

Divisio Textus

After these things concerning the goods of marriage, etc. This is the part in which the goods of marriage are treated by the Author, and it is divided into two parts.

In the first, it is treated concerning the goods of marriage. In the second, how by these goods the act of intercourse is excused: and this begins, there, By Cran therefore: three goods, etc.

Likewise, the First is divided into three. In the first, he shows what the goods are. In the second, he shows that they are not in every marriage, there, C, Lé est scien. In the third, he inquires whether it is valid, etc. that a marriage is, in which there is none, there, E, Hicgueri solet, etc.

However, here before the Letter, six things are to be inquired, of which the first is, In what kind of good is marriage?

The second, In what kind do its goods fall?

The third is concerning the comparison of these goods.

The fourth, Whether they are fitting to it according to what is a remedy, or according to what is an office, or according to both?

The fifth, Whether this pertains to every marriage of whatever persons?

The sixth, Whether these are fitting to marriage inasmuch as it is initiated, or inasmuch as it is ratified, or inasmuch as it is consummated?

695. 1 Corinthians 7:2.

Articulus 1 — In What Genus Of The Good Marriage Is

In what kind of good is marriage?

To the first it is objected: and it seems that it is in the kind of useful: because

1. Augustine says in the book On the Good of Marriage, that marriage is a good of mortals: but every good of mortals, insofar as it is such, is only useful to mortality: therefore marriage is useful for that: therefore it is in the kind of useful.
2. Likewise, that which is not desired except for the sake of something else is in the kind of useful: but marriage is not desired except for the sake of something else: therefore it is in the kind of useful. The first is proven from the definition of useful, which is given by Tully at the end of the first Rhetoric. The second is suggested in the words of the sacred Scripture, Tobit 3:16, where it says: "You know, Lord, that I have never desired a man, etc." For there it suggests that she never desired marriage except for the love of posterity.
3. Likewise, the Philosopher wishes that nothing seeks generation except that it may participate in the divine good as much as possible, so that what cannot be saved in the individual may be saved in the species: therefore generation is desired for the sake of another: but marriage is not desired according to nature except for the sake of generation: therefore marriage is much more desired for the sake of another than generation: and thus the proposition is held, as before.
4. Likewise, at the end of the first Physics it is said that the female desires the male insofar as she is imperfect: therefore for the sake of another: therefore the conjunction of the female to the male is for the sake of another: therefore it seems that marriage is in the kind of useful.

On the contrary of this, it seems that it is in the kind of pleasurable:

1. For marriage is a remedy for concupiscence: but this is done through the pleasure which is in marriage: therefore it seems that it is desired for this: therefore it is in the kind of pleasurable good.
2. Likewise, Solomon seems to wish this, Proverbs 5:18: "Rejoice with the wife of your youth, etc." And there, verse 19: "Let her breasts intoxicate you, etc." However, it is clear that he speaks there literally of those joined in marriage: therefore it seems, since the intoxication of the breasts is in the kind of pleasurable good, that marriage is also in the same.
3. Likewise, in the book On Intercourse the Author says that nature has placed the highest pleasure in intercourse, so that it may be more desired: and since this is in marriage as in other intercourse, it seems that it is referred to the appetite as a pleasurable good.
4. Likewise, if it were useful, then it would not be useful except for the end of attaining beatitude, because every useful thing is referred to this end: but it presents an impediment to that, as the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 7:14: therefore it seems that it is not desired as useful: therefore it seems that it is desired as pleasurable.

On the contrary of this, it seems that it is in the kind of honorable:

1. For every state of virtue and degree is in the same kind as virtue itself: but virtue is in the kind of honorable: therefore also the degree of virtue: but marriage is a degree and state of the virtue of continence; therefore, etc. The first is evident by itself. The second is written at the end of the first Rhetoric.
2. Likewise, Hebrews 13:4: "Marriage is honorable among all, and the bed undefiled." But everything honorable is in the kind of honorable: therefore also marriage. The second is taken from the definition of honor, which is gathered from the first Ethics, namely that honor is the exhibition of reverence as a sign of virtue. And, 1 Thessalonians 4:4: "That each of you should know how to possess his own vessel in sanctification and honor, etc." And he speaks there literally of the marital vessel: therefore possession is in sanctification and honor: but everything thus possessed is in the kind of honorable, like sanctity itself, and honor: therefore it seems that marriage is in the kind of honorable.

Response. It must be said that marriage is among mixed goods. What mixed goods are, Tully teaches at the end of the first Rhetoric, namely those which are partly desired for the sake of utility, and partly draw us by their own power and allure us by their own dignity. But it must not be conceded in any way that it is a pleasurable good in my judgment: because pleasure is not in it, except as an incidental without which the act is not exercised. But these mixed goods (as Tully says) are named from the more dignified, and are called honorable.

Therefore, to all that is first objected, it must be conceded: but nevertheless this is not the only reason why it is desired, but also the honesty of faith and the sacrament, and the consent of the individuality of life, and other things.

Similarly, the solution to the last is evident: because it is truly honorable in marriage, but it is implicated concerning the useful.

To the objections concerning pleasure, it must be said to the first, that it is remedied by the honorable which is in it, namely by the faith and grace which it confers: for it is ridiculous that someone is remedied of concupiscence by that which excites it more, and makes the itch burn more: for when there was not such suffocating pleasure, there was marriage. And by this it is evident that its good is not in the kind of pleasure: for pleasure does not regard the essence of marriage, but sometimes speaks of the cause in the contracting party only.

To the other it must be said that that exposition is ridiculous: but Solomon intends that they delight in it, as pleasure is joined to the honorable: and this is pleasure in the good of reason, namely in conjugal faith, and signification, and the piety of the offspring received.

696. Deuteronomy 21:11-12.

To the other it must be said that marriage does not make an impediment to the attainment of beatitude per se, but per accidens, namely by the burdens joined to it: and therefore that argument is not valid.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Goods Of Marriage Are In The Same Genus With Marriage, Or Are In The Genus Of The Honest Good

Whether the goods of marriage are in the same genus with marriage, or are in the genus of the honest good?

Secondly, it is asked, In what genus of good do its goods fall?

It seems, indeed, that they do not fall into the same genus:
1. For the sign, which is the good of the sacrament, is not desired except as it is an aid to knowing the signified; therefore, it is not desired except for the sake of another; therefore, it is in the genus of the useful; but it is certain by faith that it is in the genus of the honest; therefore, it seems that it is not in one genus of the desirable.

1. Likewise, it is certain that offspring is not in the genus of the honest; therefore, it seems that it is not in one genus with faith; therefore, as before.
2. Likewise, as Tullius says, nothing but sacrament and offspring is in the genus of the honest except virtue and part of virtue; they are not virtues, nor parts of virtue; therefore, since faith is a virtue, offspring and sacrament are not in the same genus with faith.

Therefore, it is asked whether offspring and sacrament are in the same genus of good?

It seems, however, that they are not: because

1. One is in the genus of natural good in which nature stands, but the other is in the genus of moral good: therefore, they are not in the same genus.
2. Likewise, the sacrament serves faith, but offspring rather serves succession; therefore, etc.
3. Likewise, the sacrament does not remain after marriage, but the good of offspring remains: therefore, and so forth.

Response. It must be said that these three are considered in two ways, namely absolutely, and as they are goods of marriage: if each of these is considered absolutely in itself, then they are not in the same genus. But if they are considered as goods of marriage, then they are all goods according to the form of that goodness in the same genus of the honorable, although not according to the same species of honorableness.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it does not follow, if something is desired for the sake of another, that it is not honorable: as Augustine says in Book I of the City of God: Virtues are desired for the sake of happiness: and yet they are in the genus of the honorable.

And when it is said that the honorable is desired for its own sake, it is understood not accidentally: because Ambrose says on the epistle to the Galatians 1, 16, that they have certain innate sweetnesses, by which they delight their possessors with sincere and holy delight. Hence, since "per se" is opposed in two senses, namely to "for the sake of another," and to "accidentally": it must be said that the honorable is desired "per se," that is, not accidentally: and yet for the sake of another: and thus all three goods of marriage are desired.

To the other, it must be said that offspring is not a good of marriage, as is clear here from the text given: but rather offspring as it stands under the piety in which it is received and educated, so that there may be in it the propagation of religion, as well as of flesh: and in this way it has in itself the form of the honorable. Hence, inasmuch as it is a good, it is in the genus of the honorable.

To the other, it must be said that although nothing is essentially in the genus of the honorable, except virtue and the parts of virtue, nevertheless each thing is referred to the genus of the honorable, insofar as it participates in virtue and a part of virtue: and in this way, not essentially, but through the form of the good of marriage, the sacrament and offspring are referred to the genus of virtue.

To the other, the solution is clear from what was said before.

To the objection, it must be said that offspring is one thing, and the good of offspring is another, as was previously clear. And indeed in offspring nature stands, but in the good of offspring stands the good custom of religion.

To the other, it must be said as before, that offspring serves succession only through substance, and serves religion through habit.

To the last, it must be said that the good of offspring remains afterward, which is in a different subject than the subject of marriage: but faith and sacrament do not remain accidentally: and from the fact that one remains afterward, and the other does not, it does not follow that it is in the same genus. And there is an instance: because the son often remains after the father, and yet is in the same genus and species with the father.

Articulus 3 — Which Of The Goods Of Marriage Is More Excellent

Which of the goods of marriage is more excellent?

Thirdly, it is inquired about the comparison of these goods.

It seems, however, that the good of offspring is more substantial and better in marriage: because

1. In the Text it is said that this is the principal reason for which marriage was instituted: therefore it is also more substantial and better.
2. Likewise, this seems through the word of Adam, Genesis 2:24: "They shall be two in one flesh." For it seems from this that the final cause of marriage is the good of offspring rather than anything else: and this was also expressly held in the Text before the end of the preceding distinction.

This is also taken from the words of Tobit, 8:9, who said: "And now, Lord, I take not this my sister for lust, but for the love of posterity."

1. Likewise, the blessing of marriage is ordained for this, when it is said: "Increase," for this cannot be understood except concerning the good of offspring: therefore, etc.
2. Likewise, this alone is the end of natural desire, which seeks to be preserved in the similar: therefore it is more substantial and principal.

On the contrary of this is, because 1. That which leads to the best is the best: but the sacrament leads to the best, because it leads to understanding the union of the faithful in one spirit with God, and of natures in one person of Christ, which are better than all children: therefore it seems that it is the best.

1. Likewise, that which is more essential and general in every marriage seems to be its best good: but this is the sacrament, for this is in every marriage, even when faith is violated: therefore it seems that this is its principal good.
2. Likewise, in all natural and moral causes which the Philosophers consider, the principal effect of a cause is always judged, which it always and everywhere follows: but the good of the sacrament is so related to marriage: therefore it is the principal.
3. Likewise, that which is most similar in name and essence to the cause, that is its more essential and principal effect: but the good of the sacrament is most similar in name and essence among them to marriage: therefore it is its more essential and principal effect: therefore it is also the principal and more essential good. The first is evident by itself. The second, however, is proved by this, that both are called a sacred sign, and both are a certain individuality: and this has been proved above: and thus the proposition is evident.

It seems further that faith is the principal: because

1. If some things are called good, that which is more essentially good is better: but faith is more essentially good, because it is a virtue in the genus of honesty, and the others are not so: therefore it seems that faith is the principal good of marriage.
2. Likewise, the efficient cause of marriage directly obliges to faith, and regards the others only consequently: therefore it seems that it is more principally effected by marriage: therefore it is the principal good.
3. Likewise, let the other two goods be understood not to be, namely the sacrament and offspring, there will still be marriage: but if faith is understood not to be according to habit and act, the marriage is dissolved: therefore faith is a more essential good of marriage than the sacrament and offspring. This is proved, however, because if the conjugal pact does not exist, there is no marriage: and the conjugal pact will not be unless faith is according to habit at least and due, although it is not according to act.

Response. It must be said that the principal good of marriage is said in three ways, namely greater and more principal as intended by the institutor, and also commonly intended by those using marriage: and thus the good of offspring is the principal good of marriage. Otherwise, the principal good is said which more essentially participates in the nature of goodness: and thus faith is a more essential and principal good. In the third way, the principal is said which more essentially and ultimately follows marriage: and thus the good of the sacrament is the principal good. And so by different considerations nothing prohibits each of these from being principal.

And through this the solution to all the arguments of the first order is clear: because all those consider the intention of the institutor, and the more common observance of those using marriage.

But to what is objected for the second part, it must be said to the first, that that which leads to the best is twofold, namely leading cognitively and motivating: just as the knowledge of what is above, and the light, lead differently upwards. But that which leads upwards motivating to the best, this is the best: but in this way the sacrament, which is the good of marriage, does not lead to the best, but only cognitively.

To the following it must be conceded: but not every sacrament is the principal good, except in a determined way.

And through this the solution to all that is inquired is clear.

Articulus 4 — Whether These Goods Befit Marriage Insofar As It Is A Remedy

Whether these goods befit marriages inasmuch as it is a remedy?

Fourthly, it is asked, Whether they befit marriage according to that which is a remedy, or according to that which is an office?

It seems, however, that according to that which is an office; because
1. As Tullius says, an office is, as I see, the duty of marriage according to the institutions of the fatherland: an office is exercised in these acts: for if it is taken according to that which is the office of nature, offspring is elicited: and if in comparison to the spouse, faith is elicited: and if in comparison to future and divine things, a sacrament is elicited: none of these, however, is according to that which is a remedy: therefore, these do not befit it according to that which is a remedy, but according to that which is an office.

1. Likewise, If there were no sin, still marriage would have these three: but then it would only be in office: therefore it seems that these befit it according to that which is an office.
2. Likewise, An office sounds in the effective of utility: but marriage effects those utilities: therefore this compels it according to that which is an office, because every officious thing is effective of some utility.

On the contrary of this is that
1. It is said in the Letter, because the act of marriage is joined with concupiscence, through these goods it is excepted lest it fall headlong: but according to that which it is excepted, it is in medicine: therefore through these goods excepting coitus, it is in medicine. But that it is in medicine according to that which concupiscence in it is excepted, is proven from this that it does not need exception according to that which is an office: and thus the proposition is established.

1. Likewise, Everything that is medicated through excuse must have adjunct goods, through which the evil is excused and cured, by the mode of medicine: but marriage is medicated through excuse, inasmuch as it is in medicine: therefore according to that which is in medicine, it must have adjunct goods, through which it is excused and medicated.

Response. It must be said that those three goods are effected by marriage inasmuch as it is in office, but they are joined to it according to that which is a remedy: because otherwise they would in no way excuse coitus: whence the first reasons must be plainly conceded.

To the objection, however, it must be said that it excepts concupiscence not through the goods which it effects inasmuch as it is in medicine, but which it had from the first institution, and make it honorable, even after concupiscence has entered.

To the other, it must be plainly conceded that it has adjunct goods inasmuch as it is medicated, but it does not make them inasmuch as of this kind, but rather uses those made by it for the excuse of carnal concupiscence, which otherwise would be mortal sin, unless it were excused by the honesty of these goods.

Articulus 5 — Whether Every Marriage Has These Goods Of Marriage

Whether every marriage has these goods of marriage?

Fifthly, it is asked whether every marriage of whatsoever persons has these goods?

It seems that it does: because
1. Marriage is of all persons according to what is in office: and it effects these goods insofar as it is of this kind: therefore it seems that the marriage of all persons has all these.

1. Likewise, in every marriage of certain persons there is individuality which of itself signifies the faithful soul to whom it is a society with God, and carnal commingling which signifies the union of natures. Then, procreation of offspring follows. There is also faith in rendering the debt: therefore these are of marriage generally accepted as it is of all persons.
2. If perhaps you say that unbelievers do not have the sacrament, because they do not understand it. On the contrary: If anyone had understood circumcision to be given as a sign, nonetheless it would still be a sign: the same is similarly true of the sacrament of marriage: therefore no response seems valid.

3. Likewise, the first state in man preceded every state: therefore every other state took its beginning from it: but these three were fitting to marriage as it was instituted in paradise: therefore every state of men received marriage according to these three.

On the contrary of this is that
1. In the marriage of unbelievers there is not altogether the impossibility of division: therefore there is not there complete individuality: therefore the good of the sacrament is not perfect there.

1. Likewise, faith is in this that it is not joined to another: but the case can happen that, being absolved from an unbelieving husband, she can be joined to another: therefore it seems that neither is the good of faith perfect there.
2. Likewise, offspring is not the good of marriage, as the Letter seems to say, but rather piously received and religiously educated for the worship of God: but unbelievers do not receive any such offspring: therefore it seems that they never acquire the good of offspring through their marriage.

Response. It must be said that these three goods belong to the marriage of believers and unbelievers in a prior and posterior manner: for they belong perfectly and integrally to the marriage of believers, and they belong imperfectly to the marriage of unbelievers, as the last three reasons clearly prove because these three goods are not perfect there: for there is the sacrament habitually, faith movably, because it can be moved and changed, and the good of offspring only materially.

Therefore, to the first, it must be said that although it is in all in office, it is not, however, an office according to the laws of Christ, but is only ordered according to polities and civilities: and therefore it effects these imperfectly: because the principles and laws upon which it is founded are imperfect.

Through this the solution to the following is clear.

To the second, it must be said that habitually in such things there is a sign, as was said before, and it is dissoluble: and therefore individuality is imperfect there.

To the third, it must be said that every state, as much as it has of equity, takes as much from the first state: yet by the persuasion of men many things are depraved: and therefore by perverse and imperfect laws nothing is effected perfectly: but in the faith of Christ all things are perfect: and therefore in the marriage of believers these three are perfect.

Articulus 6 — Whether These Goods Befit Marriage Insofar As It Is Initiated, Or Ratified, Or Consummated

Whether these goods belong to marriage insofar as initiated, or ratified, or consummated?

Whether these goods belong to marriage insofar as it is initiated, or insofar as ratified, or insofar as consummated?

Sixthly, it is asked whether these three belong to marriage insofar as it is initiated, or insofar as ratified, or insofar as consummated? For it is said by some that it is initiated through consent of the present, ratified through translation, and consummated through carnal commixture: or initiated through betrothal, ratified through consent of the present, and consummated through carnal copulation.

However, it seems that two of these belong to initiated marriage: because there is a pledge of faith and indivisibility there: therefore, sacrament and faith are of initiated marriage.

Likewise, it seems that these two belong to ratified marriage: because this expressly makes faith and indivisibility of minds: therefore, it seems that these two belong to ratified marriage.

However, the good of offspring does not seem to be except of consummated marriage: because offspring is not born without carnal commixture: and this is only in consummated marriage: therefore, etc.

Likewise, further it seems that neither is the perfect good of the sacrament: because it was said above that it is not to be doubted that a woman does not pertain to marriage who does not experience carnal intercourse: and it was said there that this is understood as to signification: therefore, signification is not complete except of consummated marriage: and thus the proposition is held.

Likewise, further it seems that none of these is of initiated marriage: because when marriage is initiated through betrothal, it is not marriage: but where there is no marriage, none of the goods of marriage is: therefore, of initiated marriage none of the goods of marriage is.

Response. It must be said that the three are most fully of consummated marriage, and are less fully of ratified marriage: because there is faith, and imperfect signification, and the good of offspring in expectation if they wish carnal commixture: but in initiated marriage, if it is said to be initiated through betrothal, none of these goods is, as the last objection proves.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that there is a pledge of these, but not the essence and truth.

To all others, the solution is clear through what has been said.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Nuptial Good Is Threefold

Whether the nuptial good is threefold?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, A, after the beginning, at the words of Augustine:

The nuptial good is threefold, etc.

For it is asked here, By what is the number of the nuptial good taken?

For it seems to be of a greater division:

1. For just as faith is in the preservation of the bed, so justice is in the rendering of the debt: therefore it seems that justice is one of the nuptial goods.

1. Likewise, Aristotle proves that man is a conjugal animal because he is not sufficient for himself in operations: but when two confer works into one operating, they suffice: therefore the sufficiency of works is one good: therefore more goods.
2. Likewise, There is there a medicine of concupiscence for each spouse: and this is the best of goods: therefore it seems that there are more.
3. Further, In Proverbs, xxxi, 10 and following, many and very many goods are placed of the strong woman, in whom the heart of her husband trusts: therefore it seems that it is badly restricted to a trinity.

Response. It must be said that the nuptial good is called that good alone which always or frequently follows from those things which essentially constitute marriage and consummate it: for from this that there is a union of two legitimate persons united into an individual life, and made one body, these three follow: for from the union of souls follows faith, and from the very individuality of life follows the sacrament, and from the union of bodies follows offspring.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that justice does not immediately follow the essence of marriage, but through faith: because faith is the cause why the body preserved from another is exhibited to the spouse.

To the second, it must be said that although this can be one of the causes why man among other animals is a conjugal animal, and contracting marriage, nevertheless it cannot be a good effected by marriage, but is ordered to well-being.

However, below we will consider that man is a conjugal animal alone.

To the other, it must be said that there are many praises of a good woman depending on her virtue, and not effected by the essentials of marriage, and therefore they are not called goods of marriage.

Articulus 8 — Whether Faith, Insofar As It Is A Good Of Marriage, Is Well Defined

Whether faith, insofar as it is a good of marriage, is well defined?

Then inquiry is made concerning what is said there, A, in the middle: In faith it is attended to, etc.

And two questions are asked, namely, what is faith insofar as it is a good of marriage? and, What is its act?

To the first, Haymo on the Apocalypse says that faith is said and composed from fio, fis, factus sum, and dicta: whence it is said that faith is that by which things said are done:

therefore it seems that the faith of marriage is the preservation of things said through promises made to each other in the conjugal pact.

Against this definition, however, it is objected: because
1. According to this, faith is effected from words of the present making marriage: therefore it is not effected by the marriage itself: but faith, which is a good of marriage, is posited as an effect of marriage: therefore it seems that faith is poorly defined.

1. Likewise, according to the Philosophers, faith is a conception in which the intellect consents because of the aid of reason: for Aristotle says that opinion is aided and Boethius says, faith is made by reasons, which is an argument of the reason of a doubtful thing, but in marriage there is nothing making faith: such are the reasons: therefore it seems that in marriage there is no faith.

If perhaps you say that faith is there a virtue. Against: Either it is a cardinal virtue, or a theological virtue. Not cardinal * which is evident by induction: therefore theological: but that faith intends only towards God: therefore it is not between spouses towards each other: therefore it is not a good of marriage.

If perhaps someone wishes to say that there is faith there, as the Apostle to the Romans xiv, 23, says: Whatever is not from faith is sin. Against: the Gloss says that there faith is called conscience: but it is evident that conscience is not one of the goods of marriage: therefore neither is faith.

The response is that faith is taken in the first way according to which things said are done: and I well concede that things said are nuptial pacts through words of the present: and things said are taken broadly to every mode by which nuptial pacts can be made.

To the objection, it must be said that faith is not effected immediately by things said, but through the mediation of marriage: and this is proven thus * Suppose that the words of some pact do not effect marriage, I ask whether they are then bound to keep faith with each other? It is evident that they are not: therefore, with marriage posited, faith is posited, and with it destroyed, it is destroyed: therefore marriage is the immediate cause of this faith, which is the same as fidelity.

And thus the solution of the whole disputation is clear.

Articulus 9 — What The Act Of This Faith Is

What is the act of this faith?

Secondly, it is asked, What is the act of this faith?

And it is said in the Letter, that it pertains to faith that after the bond of marriage one should not unite with another.

But against this it is objected: because
1. More is contained in faith than what is said: for fidelity in what is entrusted implies two things according to human laws, namely, that it should not be given to another, and that it should be rendered to me when I wish: therefore it is similarly in the fidelity of spouses: therefore it is not only contained that they should keep themselves from others, but also that they should communicate themselves to each other.

1. Likewise, the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 7:5, "Do not deprive each other, except perhaps by consent for a time." Therefore, it is fraud to withhold the due by consent for a time: but fraud is contrary to faith: therefore in fidelity is contained the communication of the body and the payment of the due.
2. Likewise, more principally in faith is contained the payment of the due than the keeping from adultery. Proof. The inability to give something to another is caused by the fact that another is in possession of that thing: therefore similarly in the faith of marriage, that one keeps oneself from another is caused by the fact that one belongs to one's spouse: therefore, since this is more principal, it seems that this should have been principally stated: therefore it is a fault when the secondary is stated.
3. Likewise, this is expressly contained in 1 Corinthians 7:4, where the Apostle says, "The wife does not have authority over her own body, but the husband does; likewise the husband does not have authority over his own body, but the wife does." Since therefore this makes the obligation of faith between them, it seems that this is principal in faith: therefore mention should have been made of this rather than of another.

Further, it seems that neither of these is of faith: because
1. One act in number cannot be proper to two virtues: but the act of conjugal continence is not to unite with another: therefore it seems that it is not an act of faith.

1. Likewise, in no nature is it found that one act is per se of two natures: therefore neither in morals should it be so, since Cicero says at the end of the first Rhetoric, and Aristotle in the books of Ethics, that virtue moves to acts as nature does.

If perhaps you say that it is similarly here: because this act is per se of one, and per accidens of another: as heat when it is strengthened against cold by opening pores through which cold enters and constricts. Against: This act, since it is about the matter of continence and circumstances, will be per se of conjugal continence: therefore it will not be of faith per se except per accidens: but by what belongs to something per accidens, it can never be determined: therefore faith cannot be determined by this act: therefore what Augustine says in the Letter, when he determines faith, is nothing.

Solution. It must be said that, as Augustine says, so the truth is: but I concede the first part of the objections, namely that what is more principal of faith is to serve each other with the service of the body: and what Augustine says is as a consequence to this.

To what is objected against, it must be said that the consequence is more manifest to many; and therefore Augustine declares faith by that.

To what could be objected, that any thing should be determined by what is essential to it, and not by consequences, and thus Augustine errs when he does not do this. It must be said that there is a twofold determination of a thing: in itself, and to us: either definitively, and exemplarily. And in the first way it is true that it should be determined by prior essentials: but in the second way by consequences more manifest to us: and thus Augustine does here, because he does not define, but exemplarily manifests the act of faith.

To what is further objected, it must be said that when one formal virtue is to another, then nothing prohibits one act from being of both, one as commanding and directing, the other as eliciting and executing: and thus it is here: because faith here commands to render the first and consequent act: but conjugal continence executes.

And by this the solution to the first is clear.

To the other it must be said that in nature it is similarly: for the virtue of the heavens moves the elemental virtues, and governs them, and they execute: and the universal virtue in man moves and governs the particulars. But what is proposed in the objections holds when the virtues are equally particular, or equally universal: and this is not here: because faith is in reason, and as a certain form encompasses the concupiscible, so that according to the promise one is faithful in communicating the body to the spouse, and keeping it from another. This is clear by such a sign: if it is asked of a discreet spouse, why do you communicate yourself to your spouse? he will say because he is bound to keep faith in the promise: and thus it is easily clear how faith is as a formal reason to the act which is elicited by conjugal continence.

And by this the solution to the whole is clear: for this act is not per accidens of another virtue, but per se according to the diverse reasons of virtue.

Articulus 10 — Whether Offspring According To Substance Is A Good Of Marriage, Or According To Goodness

Whether offspring according to substance is a good of marriage, or according to goodness?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, A, shortly before the end: for offspring to be lovingly received, etc.

For it seems that this is false:
1. For the sacrament of marriage does not work the goodness of offspring, but the substance: therefore it seems that offspring according to substance is a good of marriage, and not according to the goodness which is placed concerning offspring.

1. Furthermore, it seems that which falls under the command of the Lord, when He said, Genesis 1, 28: Increase, etc. For it is evident that He understood this concerning multiplication according to number: therefore it seems that offspring is only through number, and not through merit the effect of marriage: therefore neither is it a good: because nothing is a good of marriage, unless through that which it effects itself.
2. Likewise, this seems to be taken from the words of Adam, where he says: They shall be two in one flesh: and he does not say, in one merit, but according to that which is expounded concerning one flesh of the child: therefore it seems that offspring according to flesh, and not according to merit, is a good of marriage.

On the contrary of this is that
1. It is held in the following chapter in Latfera, where it says: Nor all those even. For it is evident there, that not those who receive offspring have the good of offspring, etc. it is called the gift of offspring, only insofar as it is under goodness pertaining to religion.

1. Likewise, it is not of the married to destroy the good effected by marriage: but, Deuteronomy 21, 18 and following, it is commanded to parents to have a contumacious son stoned: therefore a contumacious son was not a good of marriage: therefore it is necessary that only a son standing under the goodness of religion is a good of marriage.

Which must be conceded.
To the first, therefore, it must be said that marriage, according to this, that it is founded upon divine worship, from the foundation has to make through such a disposition a good, although it does not have through the mixture of flesh alone.

To the other, it must be said that as it is said, Wisdom 4, 3: The numerous multitude of the impious will not be useful. And therefore God never willed the multiplication of the wicked, as He willed the propagation and multiplication of religion: and therefore He commanded that they increase.

To the other, it must be said that they are two in one flesh of the child, because they work that materially and effectively: but they do not work goodness except dispositively and educatively, but God effectively: and therefore they are not said to be in goodness as in flesh.

Articulus 11 — What Divorce Is

What is divorce?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, A, at the end: In the sacrament so that marriage is not separated, etc.

Here it is inquired about divorce: and two things are inquired. The first is about divorce on account of the impediment of marriage. The second, however, is about separation from bed on account of fornication.

Concerning the first, however, three things are inquired, namely, what is divorce? Second, who are those who can declare the causes of divorce? Third, how is divorce effected?

Concerning the first, it proceeds thus: The Jurists say that divorce is a sacramental separation made on account of a legitimate impediment of marriage: and this definition is as if drawn here from the Text, where the Master divides separation into corporal and sacramental, as is evident to one inspecting the Text.

However, it is objected against this definition: because 1. Sacramentally they are never divided, who were never sacramentally joined: but those having a legitimate impediment were never sacramentally joined: therefore it seems that they are never sacramentally divided: therefore the definition is null.

1. Likewise, when it is said, Sacramental separation: it is either understood concerning the sacrament of marriage, or concerning the sacrament which is the good of marriage. If the first is said: then sacramental separation is the same as matrimonial separation: but there they are opposites: because matrimonial is joined in the indivisible of life.

custom: therefore, when sacramental separation is spoken of, there is opposition in the adjective, just as if I were to say, division of the indivisible. However, if it is said from the sacrament that it is the good of marriage, then this follows more, because that is the indivisibility itself.

1. Likewise, in no nature or science does one opposite denominate its opposite, for it is never said that the indivisible is divisible, and that white gathers sight, or something of this sort: therefore, neither here does one of the opposites denominate the other: but separation is opposed to the sacrament: therefore, it cannot be called sacramental separation.
2. To the same, it is objected by what is held in the Letter: because in the Letter it is said that it pertains to the sacrament that marriage is not separated: and from this, it is objected as before.

Response. It must be said that this definition could be better: nevertheless, it can be sustained.

And then it must be said to the first, that sacramental separation is called the separation of the bond of the sacrament, not of what was, but of what seemed to be before the impediment was proven: whence if even the definition is thus corrected, so that it is said: Divorce is the separation of those who seemed to be sacramentally joined, due to a legitimate impediment that prevents marriage from being contracted, and dissolves the contract: this would be a better definition.

And through this, the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 12 — Who Are Those Who Can Denounce The Causes Of Divorce

Who are those who can denounce causes of divorce?

Secondly, it is asked, Who are those who can denounce causes of divorce?

1. It seems, according to the statements of the Jurists, that all are prohibited from accusing the marriage of another, if there are any of consanguinity able and willing to accuse the marriage: but if they are lacking, the older and more truthful neighbors are admitted. That this is so is confirmed, Extra, Who can accuse marriage, it seems to us, where Celestine the Third writes to the Bishop of Florence, that parents, brothers, From this it is taken, that relatives and kinsmen of both sexes are admitted in testimony for joining or dissolving their marriage, approved by both ancient custom and laws. Therefore, especially parents, and if parents are lacking, the nearest are admitted: because each one labors to know his genealogy with witnesses and documents from the recitation of elders: for who ought to be better received than those who know better, and whose interest it is, so that if they were not present and did not give consent, according to the laws no marriage is made? But what is read, A father is not received in criminal cases and in the cause of the son, nor the son in the cause of the father, is true in contracts. But in joining or disjoining marriage, by the prerogative of the marriage itself, and because it is a favorable matter, they are fittingly admitted. Or neighbors, if relatives are lacking, ought to accuse the marriage that is to be separated.

2. Likewise, the reason seems to be the same: because no one ought to testify to what he does not know: but they do not know the causes of marriage as to kinship unless they are joined from infancy, to whom the progenitors were born: therefore only those can be witnesses in this cause.

3. Likewise, Not knowing any person, much less does he know the genealogy of that person: strangers do not know the person: therefore, etc.: therefore they cannot be witnesses.

On the contrary of this is, that a stranger proving the truth of his statement, is to be heard beyond exception if he wishes to testify against someone: but a stranger is beyond all exception: therefore if he proves what he says, he is to be heard.

According to this, it is further asked, Whether the passage of time or prescription makes a marriage not accusable, even if it has a legitimate impediment?

It seems, however, that it does: because 1. It is difficult to separate a marriage after offspring has been had, and it is ordered to the destruction of congregations and civilities: therefore it ought not to be admitted in law.

1. Likewise, Prescription is alleged in other matters: therefore also in marriage.

On the contrary of this is what is held,

Extra, concerning consanguinity and affinity, where it says Innocent in the general council I prohibit. And below:

And if anyone presumes to be joined against this kind of prohibition, he is not defended by any length of years, since the duration of time does not diminish sin, but increases it: and the crimes are so much graver, the longer they hold the unhappy soul bound.

But suppose that someone was present when certain persons were joined, and was silent, and later wishes to denounce the impediment, is he to be heard?

It seems that he is not: because 1. First he was silent when he could have denounced without harm: therefore when later he wishes to denounce with harm, it seems that he is not to be heard.

1. Likewise, Since he did not speak when first present, presumption is against him, or it may be that he later maliciously composed: therefore it seems that he is not to be heard.

On the contrary of this is what is said, Extra, Who can accuse marriage, Cum in tua. And below: If indeed from this decretal after the marriage contract someone appears as an accuser, since he did not come forth in public when the banns were published according to custom in the churches, whether the voice of his accusation ought to be admitted, it can rightly be asked. Upon which we have decided to distinguish, that if at the time of denunciation the one who now impugns the joined was outside the diocese, or otherwise the denunciation could not come to his knowledge, as if he were suffering from the fervor of excessive illness, enduring exile of a sane mind, or was of such tender years that his age could not suffice for the comprehension of such things, or was impeded by another legitimate cause, his accusation ought to be heard. Otherwise, since it is reasonably presumed that he did not ignore the denunciation publicly made while he was in the same diocese, he is undoubtedly to be repelled as suspect: unless he confirms by his own oath that he later learned what he objected, and does not proceed from malice: because then even if he learned from those who were silent at the time of denunciation, the access to accuse ought not to be closed to him: because even if the fault contracted from such silence would exclude those from such impugnation, yet he could not be removed, since he is not culpable. It is taken that even if he was first silent, in many cases he can later accuse the marriage.

Further it is asked here, Whether the father, mother, and brothers of those whose separation is being dealt with can be brought as witnesses?

And it seems that they cannot: because 1. Suspect witnesses from private love or hatred are not admitted: such are these: therefore they ought not to be admitted.

1. Likewise, Hatred often arises between spouses, so that one of the spouses would induce his parents to testify against the marriage: therefore lest this happen, the judge ought not to receive parents and kinsmen as witnesses.

On the contrary of this is what is said,

Extra, concerning witnesses: where Alexander the Third says, Concerning what your devotion has asked of us, whether the mother of the woman and another woman can be received as witnesses when the man denies that he betrothed the woman. I respond in this way, that since the mother seems to love the increase and honor of her daughter, where the man is superior in wealth, nobility, power, or honor, her testimony seems suspect, and therefore ought not to be admitted in any way. But the father or mother of the spouse, being inferior in wealth and honor of marriage, are to be heard: because it is presumed that they do so unwill-ingly, compelled by the conscience of truth, since they would more willingly have their daughter joined to that man than separated from him.

Further here it is asked, Whether the same person can be both accuser and witness in this cause?

And it seems that he cannot: because if one related by blood to the accuser is held suspect, much more ought the same person compared to himself be held suspect: therefore he cannot be both witness and accuser.

On the contrary of this is, 1. What is held, Extra, concerning witnesses, where it is written, that Pope Celestine and it is established, public witnesses who are called synodal can be witnesses in marriage: which are the same as accusers.

1. An argument to the same is taken in decree 35, question 6, Bishops in synod. And especially in the apparatus of the decree under the same place.

Solution. It seems to be said, to this, that all persons not infamous, that is, beyond exception, that is, not impeded by the infamy of crime, however close, can denounce marriage, if it is a matter of a perpetual impediment to marriage, which impedes contracting and dissolves the contracted. But if it is a matter of the contract itself, whether it is contracted or not, then parents as suspect are to be repelled: unless it is so, that the parent who testifies against the marriage is inferior in dignity, wealth, and honors: because then it is probable that he would willingly have the marriage stand,

Therefore it is to be said to the first objection, that he who is objected is to be heard if he proves what he says: but it cannot be sufficiently proven except by relatives, because a stranger as a stranger cannot know the consanguinity of those who are strangers to him: and if he speaks without the assumption of relatives, he is repelled as suspect, because thus anyone could weaken a marriage.

To what is further asked according to this, Whether the passage of time makes any difference? It is to be said that in such matters where conscience is concerned, prescription has no place, as is shown in the cited decretal.

To what is objected against this, it is to be said that although it is difficult, yet that difficulty is more to be endured than to stand against conscience in fornication, or that someone be permitted to remain in fornication: because narrow is the way that leads to life, and few are those who find it: and therefore it is not to be neglected.

To the other, the solution is clear from the above.

To what is objected later by the decretal, it is sufficiently well distinguished when he is to be heard and when not to be heard: and therefore by the decretal itself a full response is clear.

To what is further asked, it is to be said that they can be brought according to the manner determined at the beginning of these solutions.

To what is objected against this, it is to be said that as is clear in a certain decretal cited in the objection, this does not hold in this case: and this is because since the detriment is of honor and things to separate such marriages, it is probable that parents do not desire such separation, and therefore say nothing out of love for their children: and especially because they know the impediments more certainly.

To the other it is to be said, that it is better, that is, less evil for such to be separated than to remain, lest homicide follow: and therefore the judge in such a case admits suitable witnesses.

To what is lastly asked, it is to be said that the same subject in this cause can be both accuser and witness, although not the same according to reason; because in truth in such a case something is acted against by way of inquiry rather than denunciation or accusation: in such a way of acting against someone (as is said in law) fame accuses: and afterwards what is introduced are witnesses of the truth of fame: yet because there is no other man here accusing and testifying, therefore it is said that the same is witness and accuser.

To what is objected against this, it is to be said that the accuser here does not testify to what he himself says, but rather to what fame proclaims: and therefore there is here a certain diversity of accuser and testifier.

However, it is to be noted here something that is said in 35, q. 6, in the apparatus, which holds in many places, namely that it is special in marriage, that the same can be both accuser and witness: just as also, that there is no oath in this cause concerning calumny, since it is almost a spiritual cause, and that relatives are admitted, and that the judicial order is not entirely observed there, since with such denunciation made, the contumacious can be excommunicated without the case being contested: and that testimony from hearsay is valid here, and because after the publication of the attestation witnesses can be brought.

Articulus 13 — Whether And When Marriage Can Be Accused

Whether and when can marriage be accused?

Thirdly, it is asked, How is divorce made, and since the cause of this is accusation, therefore it must be asked, when can marriage be accused?

It seems, however, that as soon as it begins to be culpable: 1. This is in the first will and promise of contracting: therefore then it can be accused: therefore in betrothals accusation can be made.

1. Likewise, To the same is that then accusation more easily has place, and with less scandal and harm to the contracting parties: therefore it seems that then it ought to be made.

On the contrary, it is that 1. That which is not cannot be accused: but marriage in betrothals is not: therefore in those it cannot be accused.

1. Likewise, It seems that it cannot be accused: because as Innocent says in the general council, accusation is made by inscription: but denunciation of the marriage bond can be made by inscription, and without inscription.
2. Likewise, In accusation the accuser obligates himself to the penalty of retaliation if he cannot prove what he says: but in denunciation of the marriage bond nothing such is done: therefore it seems that it is not accused nor can it be accused.

Further it is asked: Let us suppose, that two brothers have two sisters, and one is separated from his wife because of proven consanguinity, whether the other is separated from his wife by the same law?

It seems, however, that yes: because of similar things there is similar judgment: but their marriages are in all things similar as to the marriage bond: therefore if one is separated, the other will also have to be separated.

But on the contrary of this is what is said, Extra, concerning faith instructed. Among the beloved: and the Pope says there, that a matter done between others does not prejudice another.

But then further it is asked, Whether they can render and demand the debt from each other?

It seems, however, that yes: for what is prohibited by no law, can be licitly demanded: but this (as has been held) is prohibited by no law: therefore it can be licitly demanded.

On the contrary of this is, that conscience reproaches, because it knows itself to be judged similarly: but he who acts against conscience, builds towards hell: therefore it seems, that neither ought he demand nor render.

Response. It must be said, that as is held from the council of Urban held in Apulia: If two or three have confirmed consanguinity by oath, or they themselves perhaps have confessed, marriages are dissolved: if neither has happened, Bishops should beseech them by baptism, by the faith of Christ, by the judgment of Christ in true obedience that they make it clear whether they, as is the rumor, recognize themselves to be consanguineous; if they deny, they are to be left to themselves: yet so, that if they have something else in conscience, they know themselves to be segregated and made infamous from the thresholds of the Church, from the body and blood of the Lord, from the communion of the faithful, until they desist from the incestuous crime: if they have segregated themselves by the judgment of the Bishops who are young, they are not prohibited from contracting another way. As to the number of witnesses and the inquiry, divorce is to be made. However, one denouncing marriage can do this by word or writing through such words: I say or denounce to you, Lord, that the marriage of N. and B. cannot stand, because they are consanguineous in such a degree. He ought to append this in a little book, Moreover concerning consanguinity and affinity he is held to give the little book to the accused, so that he may know who impugns and how he can respond.

Having this, it must be responded to the first, that marriage cannot be accused unless when it is, and therefore in betrothals it cannot be accused: but a denunciation of a simple impediment can be made without proof by witnesses, unless perhaps the betrothals are confirmed by oath: because then due to the obligation of the oath he is held to proof.

To the argument, however, which is against this, it must be said that marriage does not begin: because no part of it is then, but only a disposition towards it, as was held above, when it was disputed concerning betrothals.

To the other it must be said, that denunciation of consanguinity can be made, but not accusation of marriage, because it is not.

To that which is further asked, Whether it can be accused? It must be said that not properly: but accusation is taken here in an extended name for denunciation: and through this the solution to the following is clear.

To that which is further asked, it must be said that another brother ought not to withdraw from his wife because of this: because often human judgment is deceived, which proceeds according to what is alleged: and therefore it is not necessary to judge similarly concerning this.

To that which is objected concerning conscience, it must be said that either there is knowledge of consanguinity, or opinion, or he has nothing of such in conscience. If in the first way, he can neither render nor demand. If in the second way, he can render, but not demand.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Concerning separation from the bed, there will be a question below in its proper place.

Articulus 14 — Whether Marriage Imprints A Character

Then it is asked concerning this which is said there at B, around the middle: "Just as the apostate soul," etc.

For from this it seems that matrimony imprints a character: because
1. Otherwise, the likeness introduced is worth nothing.

1. Likewise, when the cause ceases, the effect ceases: but immediately after the hour of the first contract, the effect departs and ceases: therefore the cause ceases as well: therefore, since the effect does not cease, it is necessary that something conserves it: but this can only be a character: therefore matrimony imprints a character.
2. Likewise, the sign of an eternal character is not a corporeal and deletable character: but matrimony signifies the eternal conjunction of the faithful soul with God: therefore it is necessary that this is done through something indelible: but this can only be a character: therefore matrimony imprints a character.

3. Likewise, the soul of the married person passing from this world, is either distinguishable from the unmarried or not. If so: then since this is a character, because nothing distinguishes except a character, matrimony imprints a character. But if it is not distinguishable, then matrimony according to its whole being is corporeal, and does not signify something remaining in eternity.

On the contrary of this is that sacraments imprinting a character cannot be repeated in the same person: but matrimony can be repeated: therefore it does not imprint a character.

Response. It must be said that it does not imprint a character.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the likeness is in part, and not in whole: so that matrimony does not follow similarly in part: because just as on account of the perpetual character the sacrament is not rendered to the soul apostatizing from God when it returns, so here on account of the bond which lasts as long as one of the spouses lasts, matrimony is not repeated.

To the second, it must be said that those whose being is in becoming, it is necessary to be with their causes: but those whose being is after their causes, especially not proximate ones, can remain after, and especially voluntary effects of ours: hence this does not hold in voluntary contracts.

To the third, it must be said that it is distinguishable not by a character, but by the knowledge of the prior life which remains with him and with others.

Articulus 15 — Whether The Preservation Of Continence Belongs To The Things Confirming Marriage And Its Essence

Whether the preservation of continence pertains to the confirmers of marriage and its essence?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said there, B, shortly before the end: Indeed, it adheres more firmly the more those agreements, etc.

For it seems to be false: because the preservation of this continence is not of the essence or confirmers of marriage, but rather of the confirmers of the will of continence: therefore, it is falsely stated in Liddera.

Likewise, it seems contrary to the consummation of marriage: therefore, it does not confirm it.

Response. It must be said that it speaks in the Letter of the confirmation of the sanctity of marriage more than of the essence of marriage.

And through this, the solution to both is clear.

C. These three are not present in every marriage.

And it must be known that some contract marriage where these three goods do not accompany. For faith is lacking where a man lies with another, or a woman with another. Therefore, this good adheres to marriage in such a way that if it is present, marriage is more commended: if it is not present, it is not thereby annihilated. For she who is an adulteress is not for that reason not a wife: indeed, if she were not a wife, she would not be an adulteress: for it is not adultery unless the faith of the legitimate bed is violated. When this happens, a fault is committed, but the sacrament is not ceased. The good of offspring is also not present to all spouses. For some by mutual vow preserve continence. Others, due to the defect of age or some other cause, are not able to generate. Nor do all those who receive offspring have the good of offspring. For the good of offspring is not said to be the offspring itself, or the hope of offspring which is not referred to religion, but rather to hereditary succession: as when someone desires to have heirs of earthly possession, but the hope and desire by which offspring is sought is that it may be informed by religion. Many therefore have offspring, who nevertheless lack the good of offspring: yet for that reason marriage does not cease to be. But the sacrament adheres so inseparably to marriage of legitimate persons, that without it marriage does not seem to be, because the marital bond always remains among the living: so that even with divorce intervening for the cause of fornication, the firmness of the marital bond is not dissolved. Where marriage is not contracted among legitimate persons, that good which is called the sacrament is not present: because the bond of such can be dissolved, about which it will be said later. But that marriage is among those who come together with marital affection, not for the grace of offspring, but for the sake of fulfilling lust: they are not called fornicators, but spouses, as Augustine shows saying: It is usually asked, When a male and a female, neither he the husband, nor she the wife of another, join together not for the sake of procreating children, but for the sake of mere intercourse due to incontinence, with that mutual faith, that neither she with another, nor he with another does that: whether they are to be called nuptials? And perhaps it can not absurdly be called a union, if it pleases them until the death of one of them: and the generation of offspring, although they are not joined for that reason, they do not avoid so that they either do not want children to be born to them, or even do something evil so that they are not born. But if either both or one of these is lacking, I do not find how we can call these nuptials. For if someone takes a woman for a time, until he finds one worthy of honors or his means, whom he may lead into marriage, he is an adulterer in intention: not with the one he desires to find, but with the one with whom he lies in such a way that he does not have marital consortium with her. Behold, they are called spouses, who come together for the sake of mere intercourse, if nevertheless they do not avoid the generation of offspring by some evil deceit.

Articulus 16 — Whether Every Marriage Has The Goods Of Marriage

Whether every marriage has the goods of marriage?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, G, around the middle: Where indeed marriage is not contracted among legitimate persons, that good which is called the sacrament is not present, etc.

It seems this is false: because

1. There is the indivisibility of individual life and custom: but this is the sacrament: therefore it is said to be false in the text.
2. Likewise, there is no marriage that does not have some good: but I posit that such cannot have offspring, nor even keep faith with each other: therefore, since there is neither the good of the sacrament, there is none of the goods there: however, there is marriage among such, as is proven below: therefore there is some marriage that has no good, which is absurd to say.

Response, It must be said that sacrament is said in two ways, namely in habit, and in act. In act, the sacrament is not there, because it does not lead to any sacred thing, but in habit it is there: but in the text, he speaks of the sacrament existing in act.

Or it can be better said that there is a twofold indivisibility, namely from that which the preposition can deprive of the act of division, or potentially. And in the first way indeed, the marriage of unbelievers is indivisible. In the second way, however, it is not: because in some contingent case it can be divided, if one converts to the faith, and the other does not wish to cohabit with them except in contempt of the Creator. And in this way, he understands in the text.

Articulus 17 — Whether There Is Marriage Between Those Who Are Joined For The Sake Of Exercising Lust

Is there marriage among those who are united for the sake of exercising lust?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, C, shortly after: It is accustomed to be asked, When a male and female, etc.

For it seems that there is no marriage among such: because
1. In such a case, no good of marriage is sought from the woman, which is evident to the one asking through each point: but in every marriage some good is sought: therefore it seems that this is not marriage.

1. Likewise, Sextus the Pythagorean says, as will be said below, that the more ardent lover of his own wife is an adulterer: but he seems to be more ardent, because he follows only the lust of passion, therefore it seems that he is an adulterer.

1. Likewise, in the Letter it says, If he does not act against it, then it is marriage: therefore if he acts against it, by contrary sense it is not marriage: let us suppose, therefore, that he prevents birth, then it seems that the marriage previously contracted and consummated is dissolved, which is false.

Response. It must be said that there is marriage among such, as is said in the Letter: and this has been sufficiently inquired above.

To what is objected, it must be said that the good of medicine is sought in such a marriage, and this is not a small good: and others are supposed in potentiality and in habit, although not in act.

To the other, it must be said that the saying of Sextus the Pythagorean is understood concerning fervent passion outside the common honesty of marriage, namely, one who knowingly and with intention uses his wife in the place and name of a prostitute, which even if she were not a wife, he would want to lie with her.

To the other, it must be said that the Master does not say this because he understands that a supervening impediment to marriage impedes or dissolves the contracted marriage: but because then they do not act as spouses, but as adulterers against the goods of marriage: and indeed, the spouses themselves, being spouses, do not perform the conjugal act.

And through this, the solution is clear.

Articulus 18 — What Penance Is Owed To Those Who Procure Poisons Of Sterility

What penance is owed to those who procure poisons of sterility?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said,

there, D, "But those who procure poisons of sterility," etc.

However, it is asked here concerning the penance of these,

1. For it seems that they are parricides, or killers of their own children: because he who gives occasion for harm seems to have given the harm: but he gives occasion for homicide; therefore, he commits homicide.
2. Likewise, in external matters, it is more damaging to render the land infertile than to uproot the crops once: therefore, by a similar reasoning, in human nature, to make nature sterile is a greater sin than to kill one living infant or two: therefore, they are to be punished with a graver penance than murderers.
3. Likewise, in Genesis 38:9, it is said of Er and Onan, who spilled their seed, that the Lord struck them. Therefore, it still seems that such should be punished by death or with very grave penance.

Further, it is asked concerning those who give counsel and assistance for sterility, whether they are irregular?

It seems that they are: because they make homicide interpreted: but murderers are irregular: therefore, such are irregular.

On the contrary, it is held below that they are not murderers unless after the formed fetus: therefore, neither are they irregular.

Response. It must be said that great penance is to be enjoined, and that they cease, lest they do such things hereafter: and if they can be induced, because they sin against matrimony, they are to be induced not to use matrimony hereafter: but if they cannot be induced, I do not believe that they can be constrained, lest worse things happen.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is not certain that a child will be born: because it is doubtful concerning conception: and even after it is conceived, it is doubtful concerning animation and birth: and therefore, he does not directly give occasion for such.

To the other, it must be said that in this respect it is graver, because it is probably more damaging: but it is not of greater deformity in the act of sin: and from the quantity of deformity sins are said to be graver simply, and from other circumstances they are said to be graver in a certain respect.

To the other, it must be said that those two were wicked: but it does not follow, if God punished that sin with death, that they also are to be punished with death: because the Lord did this for terror, and the Church does not punish except the contrite for satisfaction of the offense.

As to what is further asked, it must be said that they are not irregular, because they are not murderers: and therefore, what is supposed in the objection is false.

F. When are those who procure abortion murderers?

Here it is usually asked concerning those who procure abortion, when they are judged murderers, or not? Then the fetus pertains to homicide when it is formed and has a soul, as Augustine asserts on Exodus. But the unformed fetus, where there is not a living soul, the law did not wish to pertain to homicide. Augustine also says that the unformed fetus does not have a soul, and therefore it is punished with money, not life for life. But

Now to the formed body the soul is given, it is not born in the conception of the body derived with the seed. For if with the seed both the soul exists from the soul, then many souls perish daily, since the seed by flow does not advance to nativity. First, the house must be constructed, and thus the inhabitant introduced. Therefore, when the lineaments have not been compacted, where will the soul be? Likewise, Jerome to Algasius: Seeds are gradually formed in the womb: and it is not considered homicide until the elements completed receive their images and limbs. From this it appears that they are then murderers who procure abortion, when the offspring is formed and ensouled.

Exposition of the text. Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, E, in the middle: For if with the seed, etc.

Concerning this, however, because much has been disputed in the treatise on the Soul, it is to be inquired there: because it is not introduced here except incidentally, nor is it of the matter. However, verses useful for this can be noted here thus:

Conceived from seed in the first six days rightly It becomes as milk, and in the remaining nine it is blood: That which a twelve-day period consolidates, twice nine thereafter It shapes, the following time brings forth to birth.

Articulus 19 — Whether The Act Of Rendering The Debt Is Meritorious

Is the act of rendering the debt meritorious?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said, there, F, "When therefore these three goods concur together in some marriage," etc.

For it seems false to say: because

1. What is good does not need excuse, but such an act is a certain good: therefore it does not need excuse.

1. Likewise, it seems that it is meritorious: because according to the species of the mover, the motion and act are informed: but the species or form of the mover here is the piety of offspring and justice: therefore the act is meritorious, as it seems: and thus again it does not need excuse.
2. Likewise, the one rendering the debt renders to another what is theirs: but the one rendering to another what is theirs merits if they are in charity: therefore spouses rendering the debt to each other merit if they are in charity: therefore such an act needs no excuse.
3. Likewise, it is absurd to say that the act of the marriage of the Patriarchs needs excuse: therefore it seems that it is not necessary for many goods or one to be present, so that it may be excused.
4. Likewise, it seems that if it needed excuse, then the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 7:5, would speak badly by commanding: "Do not defraud one another, except perhaps by consent," etc.: and then return to the same, etc.

On the contrary of this is that

1. Every passion leading reason is base for a rational creature: because as the Philosopher says: From the leading away of reason follows a perverse custom: every coitus is such a passion: therefore every coitus is base: everything base, unless excused, is considered a crime: therefore every coitus is criminal if not excused.

1. Likewise, everything that excludes the act of virtue and the Holy Spirit needs excuse if it should not be a sin: but every concubitus does this, as is held below, and it is said in the Gloss on the epistle 1 Corinthians 6:17, on that: "He who fornicates sins against his own body." Therefore every conjugal concubitus needs excuse.

Response. It must be said that every concubitus needs excuse, that is, that something be added to it, by which, if removed, it becomes base. And yet I well concede that sometimes it is meritorious from that adjunct; and this is because the knowledge of woman is not evil in itself, but from the concupiscence added: and that is sometimes only a penalty, and is base not as a vile fault, but as a penalty, which is a mark from fault: and on account of that it needs excuse.

And through this the solution to all that is first objected is clear: because that act is good and meritorious in itself, but from the adjunct it has a base penalty annexed, which is protected by the good of marriage: because otherwise a man would sin, who would subject himself to it from will.

To that which is on the contrary, it must be said that reason has a twofold act towards the voluntary work of virtue or vice, namely the preambulatory by which it orders things to be done, and the concomitant by which it as if inspects the execution. In the coitus of marriage which is done by the species of the good moving, reason does not fall, nor is it led away as to the preambulatory act of the work, but as to the concomitant act of the work: but this does not make something to be a sin, but only subjects it to a penalty not lacking in shame, because reason, if it had not been sin, would always have remained in its power and dignity.

Through this also the solution to the following is clear.

Articulus 20 — Why A More Ardent Lover Of His Wife Is Compared Rather To An Adulterer Than To A Fornicator, And Who Is Called A More Ardent Lover

Why is a more ardent lover of his wife rather compared to an adulterer than to a fornicator? And, who is called a more ardent lover?

Then it is asked concerning what Sextus Pythagoricus says, there, F, after the middle: Every more ardent lover, etc.

For it seems to be false: because
1. He knows his own, which the adulterer does not do: but the fervor of intercourse is equal in both.

1. Likewise, "more ardent" indicates a comparison, and comparison denotes excess, it is asked with respect to what? If it is said with respect to the ardor which is in intercourse that occurs due to the goods of marriage moving, then the more ardent lover will be the one who, overcome by concupiscence, uses his spouse: but this is false, because Augustine says in the Letter, that this is venial. But if it is said that it denotes excess with respect to the one who, overcome by concupiscence, uses his spouse: then it seems that he should be called most ardent, because the first degree is in him who uses his spouse moved by the good of marriage: the second, however, in him who is overcome by concupiscence: and the third in the one exceeding those.
2. Likewise, it seems that no intercourse of marriage is venial, but all are mortal: because acts which are of the same and equal conversion to a changeable good, are also of the same aversion: but it is evident that he is mortally averted, who uses a prostitute: therefore also he who uses his spouse.
3. Likewise, in the eighth book of the Ethics, Aristotle suggests that pleasure corrupting the estimation of prudence is blameworthy in ethics: but what is blameworthy there, is mortal to theologians: therefore such pleasure is mortal, because it is corruptive of virtue: but such pleasure is in every intercourse: therefore it seems that every intercourse is mortal sin.

Response. It must be said that "more ardent" here is called the ardor exceeding the concession and honesty of the whole marriage. Under the concession and honesty of marriage, fervor is in a positive degree with respect to which excess is noted.

And through this the solution to the first is clear.

If, however, it is asked why such a one is compared to an adulterer, and not to a fornicator? It must be said that this is because the fornicator does not sin against marriage, but such a one does sin: and therefore from the corruption of marriage he is called an adulterer, not from the transgression of the bed.

And through this the solution to what is objected concerning the adulterer is clear: because it does not make a comparison in this respect.

To what is further asked, it must be said that conversion is twofold: for there is one through reason preambulating the act, and another through the act itself. And concerning the conversion of reason preambulating the act, it is true what is objected, namely that those which are of the same and equal conversion, etc.: but this does not hold here: because he considers the concession and honesty of marriage, and therefore is converted under God: but the other considers only foul pleasure. And this solution is valid in many cases.

To the other it must be said that the pleasure of marriage does not corrupt the estimation of prudence: because preambulatory prudence orders it: but the act of prudence concomitant suspends it for a time.

Articulus 21 — When Intercourse Is Good

When is coitus good?

Then it is asked concerning what Jerome says there, F, before the end: "The impulse of the will does not reign in it," etc.

Since indeed there can be three simple movers in coitus, and two composite, because a third cannot be: let it be asked concerning coitus according to each of the movers, whether it is good or bad? and how much it is good, and how much it is bad?

For there is a natural mover which desires the health of the species, and again a mover for the good of marriage. Likewise, there is a mover of lust; these are simple. However, there is a mover of nature with grace, and nature with lust, which are two composite movers.

Let therefore the first mover be nature.

However, it seems that then it is good: 1. For natural being is good: therefore also this.

1. Likewise, the act of nature is more dignified, which operates towards the better: but the species is more dignified and better than the individual: therefore the act operating towards the species is more dignified than towards the health of the individual: but coitus operates towards the health of the species, while eating operates towards the health of the individual: therefore it seems that it is better to copulate than to eat.

2. Likewise, the Philosophers say that coitus is a divine thing, in which nature has placed an abundance of delight, so that it may be more strongly desired for the permanence of the species: therefore it seems that it is the best and most dignified act.

3. Likewise, in higher natures than man, we do not doubt that the best and ultimate in them is to generate another like each of them, as it is written in the second book of the Soul: therefore it seems that it is similarly in man: therefore if nature moves to coitus to expand and sustain the species, it seems that it is not only not bad, but very good.

In contrast to this is that 1. Whenever that which is of a superior nature inclines to an inferior nature, it is worsened according to nature: and Aristotle hints at this proposition in the first part of the tenth Ethics: but man has a superior nature, intellectual, not organic: therefore if he operates according to an inferior nature, it will be an operation not according to his own nature: therefore man is defiled in it according to his own nature: but to copulate is according to an inferior nature, which is of the brute: therefore it naturally defiles man.

1. Likewise, we see Philosophers who do not consider this sin as a theologian does, nor even the goods of marriage, to blame coitus, and to praise those who insist on contemplative happiness: since therefore they consider only nature and natural good, it seems that coitus is among the disgraceful things of men.

Further, it is asked concerning the good of marriage as a mover.

For it seems that it cannot move: because 1. That which is mixed with evil is evil: but good never moves to evil: therefore neither does it move to good mixed with evil: but every coitus is mixed with the evil of concupiscence: therefore good never moves to coitus.

1. Likewise, virtue is more certain than art, as the Philosopher says: art never seeks the end by a more remote way, but by a nearer one: therefore neither does virtue: but every good more easily and quickly attains the good moving to the simply good, than to that mixed with disgrace: therefore it seems that none of the goods of marriage ever moves to coitus, because it is mixed with disgrace.

2. Likewise, nature never moves to something in which it is necessary for natural acts to fail: therefore since virtue moves in the manner of nature, it seems that virtue never moves to something in which it is necessary for the acts and operations of virtue to fail: but all acts and operations of virtue fail while coitus is: therefore no good ever moves to coitus, as it seems.

In contrast to this is, 1. What is said, Tobit III, 18: "But with your fear, not with lust," etc.: therefore the fear of God and the love of posterity move to coitus.

1. Likewise, that which God commands by the special appearance of an Angel to a priest attending to worship, is done by virtue and good moving to it: such is the knowledge of a wife sometimes: therefore, etc. The first is in Luke 1, 5 and following, in the conception of John the Baptist.

Further, it is asked concerning lust as a mover.

For it seems that this is always a mortal sin. 1. For Augustine says that lust is an improper will: but everything caused by an improper will is a vice: therefore every such coitus is a vice: but every vice is detestable: therefore such coitus is a mortal sin.

1. Likewise, that which neither has a preceding reason ordering, nor accompanying, entirely perverts reason: but such is coitus in which lust moves: therefore such coitus subverts reason: but everything that subverts reason is a mortal sin: therefore every such coitus is mortal.
2. Likewise, Tobit vi, 17: "For those who," etc., "receive marriage in such a way that they exclude God from themselves and their mind, and so devote themselves to their lust, like a horse and mule, therefore whoever thus receives, sins mortally: but everyone whom lust incites, thus receives: therefore everyone whom lust moves to act, sins mortally.

In contrast to this is that intercourse which is done for the sake of satisfying lust is placed among daily and light sins here in the Letter by Augustine: therefore it is not a mortal sin.

Further, it is asked concerning this act, when lust moves with nature.

For it seems that this is always: because 1. As Avicenna says: Unless lust is present in the soul, it does not command the virtues preparing the emission of semen, and extending the members: coitus cannot occur: therefore neither without lust.

1. Likewise, Augustine says that from concupiscence joined to coitus original sin is born in infants: but from every intercourse as to the act of copulating an infant can be born: therefore in every act of copulating there is concupiscence: therefore intercourse never occurs without it.
2. Likewise, the digestive act of lepers never occurs without the corruption of leprosy, because the vessels themselves and the humors in the vessels are corrupted: therefore similarly in the corrupted by concupiscence, the act of concupiscence will never occur without the corruption of lust: but the generative in all is thus infected and corrupted: therefore it can never be in act without the corruption of lust.

Further, it is asked concerning that intercourse, which is done by nature and the good of marriage as movers.

For that seems to be the best act: 1. Because it is perfected by a double perfection, namely of nature, and of custom; therefore the best: but the best acts are meritorious: therefore such an act is meritorious.

1. Likewise, whatever has the species of the good of virtue, is ordered to happiness: but every such act is meritorious: therefore also this one.

In contrast to this is that 4. The Apostle says that it is an impediment to observing the Lord: but none of such things is meritorious: therefore neither is marital coitus.

1. Likewise, in the Letter it is never said that it is meritorious, nor does the Apostle say this, but only says that the virgin does not sin if she marries: therefore it seems that it does not have merit.

Response. It must be said that as the objections proceed, all these can sometimes be movers by intention: because the one copulating can be moved by the intention of the good of nature, or of piety, and religion, or of justice, or by the delight of lust together with nature, or by the good of piety together with nature.

But when lust alone moves, it must be further distinguished: because either it moves fervently outside the honesty of marriage and concession, and then in a certain way it is adulterous, as was shown a little before. Or it fervently within the bounds of the honesty and concession of marriage: and then it must be said to be venial, as is clear from the words of Augustine placed in the Letter. Similarly, when lust precedes, and nature follows, and, as I think, then it is a more serious sin, but not mortal: or lust follows, and then it is less.

Having these, it must be responded to the objections. Therefore, to what is first asked, it must be said that there is no sin when nature thus moves: and this, as Tully says, orders coitus to honest marriages and certain children: because otherwise no one would recognize certain children: but nevertheless although it is not evil, because it is not necessary, it is not as evil to abstain from coitus, as from food. And this for two reasons: of which the first is, because the subsistence of the individual is more necessary to me, than the species in another. The second is: because it is not true generally, that the better simply is always more to be chosen, but the better for me is sometimes to be chosen and so it is with food, and coitus. However, all the reasons proceed as if the more dignified and better simply is always more to be done by me.

But to what is objected in contrast, it must be said that from this it is not proven that it is evil, but rather it follows that it is not proper to man. And thus Aristotle solves the argument: because it is fitting to man according to the common, and not according to the proper, that is, intellect. Otherwise, it can be said and better, that descents and lower delights occur in two ways. The first is with reason ordering the delights themselves: and this mode does not contradict the good of reason. The other way is according to the corruption of reason perversely: and this contradicts. But in marital coitus there is a descent in the first way, not in the second way.

To what is later objected, it must be said that the intellectual nature, whose happiness the Philosophers praise, is considered in two ways, namely according to itself, and according to its being. If it is considered according to itself then it is separate, and also the act of its happiness is separate. But if it is not considered according to itself: then it must incline to lower things, ordered however by reason: because otherwise it does not have being except in the lower, and according to the multiplication of that the intellectual nature is multiplied, although it is not multiplied by the same: because the lower nature is multiplied by generation, but the higher by creation: and according to this the happinesses differ.

To what is further asked it must be said that the first two objections conclude only concerning the evil of fault, but not concerning the evil of penalty, and such an evil of penalty is mixed in marital coitus.

To the third it must be said that nature is not moved to that in which it fails essentially, but often moves to that in which due to the intensity of one act of a power, it is withdrawn from the act of another power: and thus it happens here: because the good of marriage moves to that in which it is abstracted from the act of another good and power due to the vehemence of delight.

To what is further asked, it must be said that if lust follows reason, it is not a mortal sin: but if lust precedes and dominates, then it is a mortal sin, as the objections prove.

To the first it must be said that lust is said in two ways, namely an improper will against God, resting in lustful coitus: and the objection proceeds concerning this. Again, there is lust not so much an improper will, but a penalty of improper concupiscence: and this is not entirely perverting, but rather following reason, and not corrupting the order of reason.

To the other it must be said that this does not hold concerning lust which precedes reason.

To the other it must be said that the Angel speaks to Tobit concerning him who is a more ardent lover of his wife: and concerning that one it is true, because he excludes God from his mind, because in him lust dominates.

To what is further asked, it must be said that lust does not always move with nature: because as Augustine says, lust is the pleasure of a changeable good: but this does not always move the one copulating, but rather the eternal or natural good sometimes.

To the objection it must be said that he calls lust the desire of the pleasurable in venereal matters; and this is not always called lust, except by an extended name: and concerning this Avicenna speaks truly, because unless it is desirable according to the body, the body is not disposed to attain it.

To the other it must be said that this happens from penal concupiscence, not vicious, as Augustine says in the book on Marriage and Concupiscence. And the reason for this is assigned in the second Sentences, in the treatise on original sin.

To the other it must be said that it is not similar concerning leprosy except to concupiscence of penalty, because this is necessary: but concupiscence of fault is not necessary: and therefore it is not similar to that which is introduced as similar.

To the last it seems to me to be conceded because of the first objections, that it is a meritorious act: although some think otherwise, about whom it is not now to be concerned.

To what is objected in contrast, it must be said that as was said above, this is said by reason of the adjunct, and not by reason of the act, that it is an impediment: because if it had been an impediment according to itself, it would always have been an impediment, which was shown above not to be true.

To the last it must be said that in the Letter it is not said because of the difficulty of that good which concupiscence strives to exclude, and there were many snares.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 22 — Whether The Debt Should Be Rendered To Pregnant Women

Whether the debt is to be rendered to pregnant women?

Then it is inquired concerning that word of Jerome, there, D, before the end: "neither at least the cattle, etc."

For it seems this is unreasonable: because
1. Marriage is for a remedy, as has already been held: but a remedy is most necessary in a time of greatest infirmity: therefore marriage is most necessary in a time of greatest concupiscence: but this is in the time of impregnation, as the Philosophers say.

Therefore then the debt ought most to be rendered to her. For the Philosophers say that then embryos begin to touch the nerves, and by tickling they excite concupiscence: and therefore a woman never so much desires intercourse as when she is impregnated: it seems therefore that it is badly said in the Text.

1. Likewise, now infants are not lost because of this: because once conception has occurred, the Philosophers say that the inner orifice of the womb is closed, which even a needle could not enter: therefore then there is no danger of effusion: therefore it seems that infants are not lost from intercourse.
2. Likewise, it does not seem similar: because man, on account of the delight and abundance of food, desires intercourse more than other animals: since therefore marriage is its remedy, it seems that at all times he can and ought to have intercourse: therefore it is not similar to what is induced.
3. Likewise, other animals have conjunction with other females of their species: but man does not: therefore it seems that nothing is similar.

To this, however, it seems it must be said, as Avicenna says in his book on Naturals, that the movement of the womb is caused by delight in intercourse, because of which also Pythagoras thought the womb to be an animal: but movement and delight together cause the dilation and opening of the womb: and then frequently the seeds and conceived embryos are expelled. And in this way Jerome speaks.

To the first, it must be said that therefore then, on account of the fear of great danger, one ought to restrain oneself: yet if one uses intercourse, one does not sin mortally.

To the second, it must be said that in truth it is closed: but yet on account of the movement arising from delight it is opened again, and especially before the first four months, before the embryos are rooted.

To the other, it must be said that this is true: but yet it is reasonable that one should temper oneself then from food and intercourse: for the kingdom of heaven suffers violence, and the violent take it by force.

To the fourth, it must be said that therefore man has reason, which makes him do what other animals do not do: and to this blessed Jerome exhorts, he does not command.

Articulus 23 — Whether It Is A Mortal Sin To Ask For The Debt At The Appointed Time Of Prayers

Whether it is a mortal sin to request the debt during the appointed times of prayer?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said there, G, around the middle: If, however, he is not so excessive as to impede, etc.

1. For from this it seems that it is a mortal sin if during the appointed times of prayer one demands the debt.
2. And this also seems to be the case from that of the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 7:5: Do not defraud, etc.: and it is the end of prayer. Give to each other.

Likewise, Exodus 19:15: Be ready. Thus Moses said when the law was to be given on the third day, and do not approach your wives: therefore, much more should this be observed in the New Testament.

Likewise, Genesis 6:18 and 7:7, Noah and his sons are commanded separately from their wives to enter the ark. Therefore, since God commands only what is right and just, it seems that one who does the contrary sins mortally: therefore, during times of mourning and sacred times, the debt should not be rendered.

Likewise, Joel 2:16: Let the bridegroom go forth from his chamber, and the bride from her bridal chamber.

Likewise, 2 Samuel 11:11: My lord, thus said Uriah to David, and the servants of my lord remain upon the face of the earth, and I... shall I sleep with my wife? Therefore, it seems that during times of mourning and sacred times, one should abstain.

1. Likewise, the same is proven by reason: for spirit and flesh cannot be in act simultaneously: but during the time of prayer, the spirit ought to be in the highest act: therefore, at that time, one should abstain from carnal work. That the spirit ought to be in act at that time is proven, John 4:23, where it is said: True worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and truth.

Likewise, Jerome says that during the time of prayer, one should abstain even from lawful things, so that grace may be more easily obtained. Therefore, it seems that at those times it is a mortal sin to act contrary.

On the contrary of this is that

1. No circumstance makes a venial sin mortal: but to know one's wife due to weakness is venial: therefore, it seems that from the circumstance it does not become mortal: but time is a circumstance: therefore, from that it does not become a mortal sin, which otherwise is venial.
2. Likewise, one who is bound without a term must immediately fulfill: but the married are bound to each other without a term: therefore, they must immediately fulfill: therefore, if one requests during sacred time, one is bound to fulfill.
3. Likewise, marriage is for medicine: but we ought to use medicine at all times of illness: therefore, also in marriage: if therefore the present illness of concupiscence occurs during the appointed time of prayer: therefore, then I ought to use the medicine.

Response. It seems to be said that it is incongruous to use carnal commixture during the appointed times of prayer: but it is not a mortal sin to demand the debt. However, if a worse case is probably feared if it is not rendered, I say that one of the spouses is then bound to render, and does this without sin, but the one demanding sins venially.

To the other that is said in the Text, it must be said that it does not intend to exempt from venial sin, but rather from the indulgence of concession. Or it can be better said that it notes excess when it burns beyond the concession and honesty of marriage, which neither cares for it nor the honesty of marriage, concerning which it was said above, that the more ardent lover of his wife is an adulterer.

To the other it must be said that force must be applied to the words of the Apostle: because they are said with weight: whence he by what he says, perhaps and by consent, implies that there can be such an instance of demanding the debt in one of the spouses, that even then it must be rendered. That it is perhaps said to be done, it is implied that there can be something why it is not done. Similarly, that it is done by consent, if the other does not consent, it should not be done.

To all other things that are brought forward by authorities, it must be said that they prove nothing more than that to render in marriage at that time is a venial sin and to demand, and neither is mortal. Nor did God command Noah to enter separately, but rather showed what would be fitting.

To what is objected by reason, it must be said that the married cannot pray and copulate simultaneously, nor are they bound to this: but after copulation and before they can pray, because they cannot always copulate. However, it will be had in the Text below which times are appointed for prayer.

Articulus 24 — Whether There Can Be Use Against Nature With One's Own Spouse, And Whether One Having Intercourse Against The Due Use Sins Mortally

Whether in one's own wife there can be use against nature? And, Whether one engaging against due use happens to sin mortally?

ARTICULUS XNIY.

Whether in one's own wife there can be use against nature? And, whether one engaging in intercourse against the due use happens to sin mortally?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, G, around the middle: Nor is it matured in any use which is against nature, etc.

For it seems that no use against nature is in one's own wife.

1. For to use that which is made for use is not against nature: but the woman is made for the use and help of the man: therefore, that use is not against nature.

If you perhaps say that the perversion of the mode of intercourse is against nature. On the contrary: As long as he engages in intercourse in the due vessel, no use or mode of intercourse seems to be determined: therefore, no mode of intercourse will be more against nature than another.

1. Again, the members pertaining to intercourse are proportionate to each other: therefore, as long as that proportion is maintained, there will not be force in another disposition of the body: if therefore the man is below, or above, whether standing, or lying, or sitting, whether from behind, or from the front joined, it does not matter, as it seems.
2. Likewise, in some cases the common mode is impeded by accident: because due to the thickness of the belly they cannot be joined belly to belly, and they would be well joined if the woman were disposed bent backward against the man; since therefore they have not lost the due in the body of the other because of fatness, it seems that they can be joined in this way without sin.
3. Similarly, it sometimes happens that the belly of the woman is swollen or is pregnant, so that it is not applicable to the man from the front: and then the same objection as before: it seems therefore, that none of those uses is against nature.

Further, it is asked, whether one engaging in intercourse beyond the common mode always happens to sin mortally?

However, it seems that yes: because

1. It changes the natural use: but this the Apostle, in Romans 1:26, calls passions of ignominy.

And by such a name are not considered except those sinning mortally: therefore, it seems that it is a mortal sin.

1. Likewise, in the Letter it seems to except this from venial sin: therefore, it is left from the Letter, that it is mortal. For it says that marriages are deprecators of intercourse, which is not done for the sake of generating, unless it is changed into use against nature: therefore, from the destruction of the consequent, if it is changed into that use which is against nature, marriages will not be deprecators: therefore, such intercourse is not venial: therefore, it is left that it is mortal.
2. Likewise, Aristotle says that the body of every animal is formed for intercourse: just as in the camel the rod is disposed backward, and therefore it mates from behind: and in some it is disposed in front, and in females behind, and they mate by leaping through ascensions. But the same Aristotle says that the vulva of the female is disposed in front: for he says that all female animals urinate backward except the female of man: and it is evident that this is because of the disposition of the vulva. He also says that the rod of the man is rooted above the nerve of the leg: therefore, both the vulva of the female is disposed from the front, and the rod of the man: therefore, according to this they are applicable from the front: therefore, if they are applied otherwise, the mode of nature is changed: but to change the natural mode into unnatural is a mortal sin: therefore, every mode of intercourse other than that in which the woman lies on her back, and the man lying on her belly, is a mortal sin.

Response. It must be said that such shameful questions should never be treated unless those monsters compel, which are heard in confession in these times.

However, it seems that it must be said that nothing of those things which a husband does with his wife, preserving the due body or vessel, is in itself a mortal sin: but it can be a sign of mortal concupiscence, when namely the mode which nature determines by the disposition of the members does not suffice for them, and they enter into the modes of brute animals. Therefore, in order that the natural mode and the corruption from it may be better understood, it must be noted that because according to Aristotle, only man is of a long and broad body, and because the virile member is founded upon the nerve of the leg, and the member of the woman at the end of the belly, nature teaches that the due mode is that the woman lies on her back, and the man on her belly lies upon her, as was proved by the natural reason lastly induced: and in this mode women conceive more easily than in another, unless it is impeded by accident. However, deviation from that is less in lateral intercourse, and greater in sitting, and greater than that in standing, and greatest in that which is backward in the manner of beasts. And therefore some have said that this last is a mortal sin, which nevertheless did not please me, as was evident elsewhere.

Having these things, it must be said to the first, that a natural sin is said in two ways, namely greater and lesser. It is more unnatural when the act is not fulfilled by the instruments formed for this by nature. It is less unnatural when the act is fulfilled which does not preserve the mode of nature which is taken from the natural disposition of the members.

To what is objected concerning proportion, it must be said that although the proportion of the instruments is preserved, nevertheless the proportion of the mode of disposition is not preserved.

To the other, two things must be said, that in such a case it is well permitted: because otherwise they cannot agree.

To what is further asked, I say that it is not in itself a mortal sin.

From the objection to the contrary, it must be said that the Apostle speaks of the unnatural which is not preserving the due vessels.

Similarly, it must be said that the Letter here speaks of such a mode.

Finally, it must be said that from this the unnatural mode is not proved except in a lesser way: and thus it is not a mortal sin in a spouse, as it seems to me.

Articulus 25 — Whether Intercourse Proceeding Beyond Necessity Is A Mortal Sin

Whether intercourse proceeding beyond necessity is a mortal sin?

ARTICULUS XNXY.
Whether intercourse proceeding beyond necessity
is a mortal sin?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said, there, G, around the middle: He who proceeds beyond necessity, etc.

For it seems false: for that which serves lust is immediately named conjoined with evil: and such is mortal sin:
therefore also such an act is a mortal sin.

But if it is said, the Letter is in contrary, which says that the honesty of marriage is the intercessor of this act: which would not be, if it were a mortal sin.

Response. It must be said that it is not a mortal sin.

From the aspect it must be said that it does not serve lust as an end, but as an infirmity. And the objection proceeds as if it served it as an end. But in order that this may be understood, it must be known that he serves infirmity, who is compelled by temptation rather than wills this: but he serves lust, who seeks and procures such things in the manner of a sinner:

on account of which it is said in VIII of the Ethics that the fornicator is more blameworthy than the incontinent: and he calls the fornicator who seeks venereal things in the manner of fornicators, and the incontinent who is drawn by the temptation of infirmity.

Articulus 26 — What Are Those Things That The Apostle Granted By Way Of Concession

What are those things which the Apostle granted according to indulgence?

Then it is asked, concerning what is said there, G, after the middle: What is it that the Apostle grants according to indulgence, etc.

For it seems that such a concession is a permission of evil:
1. However, permissions are corrected so that they do not occur in the New Testament, as is evident in Matthew 5:31 and 19:7. Therefore, it seems that here the Apostle ought not to have granted indulgence.

1. Likewise, permission does not befit supreme perfection: but the New Testament is of supreme perfection: therefore, no permission occurs in it.
2. Likewise, according to the doctrine of the New Testament, there is judgment: therefore, what is granted in the New Testament will not be judged: but marriage is granted, as is said in the Letter: therefore, it will not be judged, which is false.

Response. Some have said that mortal permission was in the Old Testament in the bill of divorce, and venial permission in the New in intercourse which occurs for the sake of satisfying lust. But this does not seem to be fitting.

Indeed, concerning the bill of divorce, there will be a question below.

But with these things not distinguished above between concession and permission being supposed, it must be said here that there is no permission of evil per se in the New Testament, but per accidens, that is to say, something is granted in the New Testament, to which many goods are attached: and evil can occur to it, and on account of the evil which can mix with it, it is not revoked: and indeed such is intercourse, to which the goods of marriage are attached and lust can mix with it, and on account of that it is not revoked. And therefore it is clear that the objections conclude well concerning per se evil, but concerning evil attached to that which is good, and the cause of many goods, they do not conclude: because those goods are greater than that evil.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 27 — Whether Every Intercourse Is A Vice Or A Sin, And Whence That Sin Or Vice Has Its Origin

Whether every coitus is a vice or sin? And, whence does that sin or vice have it?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, ii, H, But perhaps someone will say, every concupiscence of the flesh, etc.

For it seems that this is true:
1. For everything that is most excellent in passions is always a vice and sin: but every coitus is of this kind: therefore every coitus is a vice and sin. The first is proved from the reason of ethical virtue, which is in passions concerning the mean relative to us. The second is evident by itself.

1. Likewise, everything that in act turns away from conversion to the immutable good is at least a venial sin: but such is every coitus: therefore it is at least a venial sin.
2. Likewise, every act frustrated in its essential and natural end is vain and evil: but every intercourse that is done for the sake of pleasure is of this kind: therefore every such is vain and evil: therefore it is a sin. The second is proved by this, that the natural end of intercourse is the procreation of offspring: because nature found it for this, and for this it thus formed the organs. The first is evident by itself: because evil is nothing but the privation of a perfecting end.
3. Likewise, we see brute animals not moved to coitus except for the sake of procuring offspring: since therefore reason is in man which ought to govern the lower powers in man more than they are governed in the brute, it seems that man is bound to the same or to more: therefore he sins whenever he cohabits unless with the intention of generating.

Response. It must be said to this, that not every carnal intercourse is a sin.

To the first, it must be said that an act is not said to be in the mean by reason of pleasure, but by reason of circumstances, namely when he ought to cohabit, and where, and with whom, and how, and the like: and therefore the objection and the first proof of the proposition is founded upon a perverse exposition of the words of Aristotle.

To the other, it must be said that it does not turn away the reason preambulatory to the act, but only concomitant, as has been often said above.

To the other, it must be said that this act is not always frustrated in its end: because it has the end of medicine, and of the honor of faith, and of the sacrament, because it shuns separation.

To the proof, it must be said that this act is of nature and of man, and insofar as it is an act of marriage, it is more accepted as an act of man than as of nature: and therefore the end of man suffices for it. The objection, however, proceeds as if it were of nature only.

To the other, it must be said that this happens in certain brutes (as Aristotle says) because of the smallness of food: whence also when they take more of food, unless they are weakened, then they begin to leap often: and therefore also man because of the abundance of food desires more than others. Or it must be said that man is of a softer complexion than others, and therefore is more quickly changed by desires: because of which he also speaks, as Avicenna says: and therefore a remedy is constituted for him for those desires in the sacrament of marriage.

Articulus 28 — Whether One Having Intercourse With His Wife In Some Case Should Be Repelled From The Church

In cognoscens uxorem suam aliquo casu sit repellendus ab Ecclesia?

In cognoscens uxorem suam aliquo casu sit repellendus ab Ecclesia?

Then it is questioned concerning this which is said, there, 1, after the beginning: "Loc autem quoties fil, ab ingressu Ecclesiae est abstinendum," etc.

For this seems to be false: because 1. The Church does not eject except the excommunicated: however, such are not excommunicated: therefore it seems that it is not necessary to abstain from the entrance of the Church.

1. Likewise, besides excommunication, we do not see anyone ejected from the Church except solemn penitents: however, solemn penance is not done except for a crime by which someone has disturbed the whole city, as was held above in the treatise on penance: since therefore that is not except a venial sin, it does not seem that it is necessary to abstain from the entrance of the Church in this case.
2. Likewise, as Dionysius says in the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, in the theory of holy synaxis, that is, communion, five kinds of men were ejected from the Church at the time of communion by the deacon in the primitive Church, namely infidels, catechumens, energumens, newly converted, and solemn penitents: but these are in none of those orders: therefore it is not necessary to abstain from the entrance of the Church because of the act of matrimony and its use.
3. Likewise, we have above in the Letter from the words of Augustine, that this which spouses use each other beyond the intention of procreating children, is to be placed among those for which we daily say: "Forgive us our debts" therefore it is reckoned among daily and very light sins: but for those it is never necessary to abstain from the entrance of the Church: therefore it seems false to say in the Letter.
4. Likewise, Gregory says that spiritual sins are of greater weight than carnal ones: therefore also venial ones in those are of greater weight than venial ones in these: therefore for a movement of anger or pride it is more necessary to abstain from the entrance of the Church than for such an act of the use of matrimony.

Response. It must be said that this is said not to show the magnitude of guilt, but to demonstrate the incongruity of the act of coupling to understanding and seeing spiritual things which are treated in sacred places in divine services and sacraments: because contemplation of divine things cannot be, unless the spirit ascends above the body: and in intercourse the spirit lies as if suffocated under the flesh. Nor is it said that it should be so observed, but rather that those serving the flesh may be moved, that they then humbly withdraw themselves from sacred places, but they are not to be reproved if they have not done so.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that excommunication ejects from a sacred place even unwillingly: but here only the incongruity of the delight of the flesh to the contemplation of sacred things is shown, so that a man then humbly withdraws himself.

By the same it is clear the solution to the three following.

To the last it must be said that although spiritual guilt is greater than bodily, nevertheless they do not suffocate the spirit by the impetus of delight, but remain in their vigor, and do not have shame attached: but intercourse entirely enervates the spirit, as has been said: and therefore then a man ought to withdraw himself from the contemplation of divine things.

However, how he ought to conduct himself in communicating, in the following distinction will have its own disputation, although here certain things of value to this are said in the Letter.

DISTINCTIO XXXII

Divisio Textus

That indeed without the consent of the wife, etc. Here it is treated concerning the payment of the debt in which spouses are equal.

However, it is divided into two parts: and in the first, he does what has been said. In the second, he determines the times of the payment of marriage, namely, C, And although the debt, etc.

And let these suffice concerning the division.

Articulus 1 — Whether Spouses Joined In Matrimony Are Equal To One Another

Whether spouses joined matrimonially are equal to each other?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said there, A, "It must also be known that since in all other things the man is superior to the woman," etc.

For it seems false what is said in the Text:

1. In any act of two, one is principal and acting, the other secondary and suffering; in that, those two cannot be equal: but thus the man is principal and acting in the act of matrimony, the woman, however, secondary and suffering: therefore it seems that they are not equal.

2. Likewise, this is taken from the text of Genesis 2:18, where the Lord says: "Let us make him a helper," therefore he is principal, and is helped by Eve: therefore they are not equal.
3. Likewise, the Philosopher says that the female desires the male as the imperfect desires the perfect, and as the base desires the good: however, it is evident that the imperfect and perfect, base and good, cannot be equal: therefore neither can man and woman be equal in the act of matrimony.
4. Likewise, it is impossible that the same according to the same be head to another and equal: but in matrimony the man is the head, as the Apostle says; therefore in the same he cannot be equal.
5. Likewise, the distinction of sex is like that of generating in another, and generating from another: because the male generates in another from his own seed, the female however from another's seed: but these are unequal as to the mode of nature: therefore it would be against nature that they be reduced to equality in matrimony.
6. Likewise, sealing is not equally of the wax and the ring, because the ring makes the whole sealing, and the wax only receives: but thus are the masculine and feminine, as the Philosophers say: therefore it is impossible that they be equal.
7. Likewise, this is intimated from the very words of the Lord, where it is said: "You shall be under the power of the man, and he shall rule over you."

On the contrary of this is,

1. What is said, 1 Corinthians 7:4, as it is held in the Text: "The woman does not have power over her own body, but the man," etc.
2. Likewise, matrimony does not make the consent of one, but of two, as was held above: but what two make equally, is equally effected by both: therefore matrimony is equally effected by the man and the woman: therefore also the rights which follow from matrimony are equally of the woman and the man.

Response. It must be said that in the right of matrimony, in rendering the debt and demanding, the spouses are equal, as was lastly proven: but in the dispensation of the house and acts of governance they are unequal: because the man in such things is principal, and also in the act of generation: and this the objections previously introduced prove.

Therefore to the first it must be said that this is true in the act of generation, but as to demanding and rendering they are equal.

To the other it must be said that that help pertains to the act of generation, and not to the governance and management of the house.

Through this also the solution to the following is clear.

To the other it must be said that the same which has in itself many things, some can be equal and unequal: and this is to say the same, but not according to the same: and so it is here.

To the other it must be said that it would be against the mode of nature if they were equated in the power of generating: because two equal in the power of generating never generate: because those would either both be active, or both passive: but two unequal in generating, in the right of matrimony can be equal, as has already been evident from the things said before.

And through this the solution to all the following arguments is clear.

Articulus 2 — Whether It Always And Equally Falls To Render The Debt

Whether it always and equally happens to render the debt?

However, here first arises a threefold question.
The first is: How does it happen to pay the debt?
The second is: Whether this is counted for the perfection of sanctity to the one paying, as it is said in the Letter?
The third is: Whether the debt ought to be paid to one not demanding or asking.

To the first, it is objected thus:

1. To whom the debt is paid, it is necessary that it be paid at the time of need, because since it is an affirmative precept, it obliges for the time of necessity to pay: but in the spouse, this is the time of present concupiscence: therefore, then it is to be paid. But let us suppose that then the husband is impotent due to some cause which he made for himself: therefore, it seems that he sins mortally by not paying then.
2. Likewise, the payment of this debt is valid in the manner of medicine: therefore, it is to be applied at the time of illness: but perhaps then he cannot as before: therefore, if he knows afterwards, it seems that he does not pay the debt.
3. Likewise, let us suppose that the husband pays many times, until with the heat evaporating and the moisture flowing, he can no longer pay, and the woman still insists from the incitement of concupiscence: it is clear that he cannot pay: therefore, he is not bound, because the action is vain which the debtor's lack excludes: therefore, it seems that it does not always happen to pay the debt.
4. Likewise, it is objected concerning those who, by exercises, dry and cool themselves, that they cannot frequently copulate, or even by excessive drinking suffocate the natural heat, and their wives demand intercourse: what is to be done? It is clear that they are bound by law to pay: therefore, they sin by omitting, as it seems.

Response to this, that it happens to render the debt.

To the first objection, it must be said that at the time of need, it is to be paid according to the ability of the one paying. Concerning the cause, it must be said that it is either caused by marriage, or by other causes. If in the first way: then this is because either he has copulated, and then he has sufficiently paid, because he is not bound to immoderate copulation: because if the woman complains after a decent payment, she shows herself more a harlot than a wife. But if it is from another cause: it is either lawful or unlawful. If lawful: then he is not bound to pay, because God made him impotent. But if it is unlawful: then I think well that the following sin of the wife is in some way imputed to him, unless he repents and does as much as he can, that the wife may contain herself from good will: for the fragility supervening upon marriage does not dissolve the marriage.

And by this, the solution to all the questions is clear.

Articulus 3 — Whether Rendering The Debt Is For The Perfection Of The Sanctity Of Marriage

Whether to render the debt is for the perfection of the sanctity of marriage?

Second, it is asked, Whether this is accounted for the perfection of the sanctity of marriage?

It seems that it is: because
1. Augustine expressly says this in the Letter.

1. Likewise, justice, which is a good virtue, or better than chastity: therefore its act is worth the act of chastity: but the one rendering exhibits an act of justice: therefore it seems that it is accounted also for the perfection of sanctity.
2. Likewise, Cicero proves in the first book of "On Duties" that the duty of justice is better than all the duties of other virtues: therefore its act is worth more than the acts of others: but the one rendering exhibits justice: therefore it seems that he does more than if he held perfect chastity.
3. Likewise, Aristotle in the fifth book of "Ethics" says that justice makes the ultimate good, and it is like the evening star shining in the sky: but this chastity does not do: therefore it seems that the act of justice recompenses more even than chastity: and from there as before it is inferred.

On the contrary of this is,
1. What is said, Ecclesiasticus 26:20: "All weight is not worthy of a continent soul." Therefore justice cannot recompense the worth of a continent soul.

1. Likewise, it has been held above, that marriages are holier with the equal vow of the continent: therefore the use of intercourse diminishes sanctity: therefore it is impossible that intercourse is imputed to anyone for the perfection of sanctity.

To this it must be said that Augustine here speaks of the one rendering unwillingly, whose whole devotion is to continence, and only by the debt of marriage, and by the faith of the bed is compelled to the solution, rather than incited by carnal desire.

To the first reasons, it must be said that if justice and chastity are compared according to what they are worth in politics and to others, justice surpasses chastity: but if they are compared according to the decorum and honesty which they have, chastity surpasses justice.

And according to the first mode proceed the reasons first introduced: according to the other, however, proceed the reasons secondly introduced.

And through this the solution to each part of the objections is clear.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Debt Ought To Be Rendered To One Not Demanding It

Whether a debt ought to be paid to one not demanding it?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether it ought to be paid to one not demanding it?

It seems that it should not: because 1. He who is silent, consents: therefore a woman or man not requiring the debt seems to consent in this, that it is not paid: since therefore it is better to abstain than to engage in intercourse, it seems that such a one ought not to pay.

1. Likewise, Even one demanding can be turned away by prayers so that he does not demand: therefore much more can one not demanding be not paid.

On the contrary of this is, that the payment of the debt is ordered against damnable corruptions of softness, and sodomy, and adultery: but some spouses are out of modesty not revealing themselves to their spouses, and yet burn in their desires: therefore it seems that it ought to be paid to them, even not demanding.

Response. It seems to me to be said, that it is discreet to pay even to one not demanding, who sometimes has signs of wantonness, and also to the spouse who does not contradict, but silently endures the payment.

To what was first objected, it must be said that although it is not required out of modesty, yet the right of previous petition, namely when one contracts marriage, still stands, and then in the first contract it is always understood to ask unless one protests at some time for some reason.

But what is objected, that he who is silent, praises: it must be said that this is true, when he has said nothing to the contrary: but this is not in spouses who contract so that the debt may be paid to them.

To the other it must be said, that it is not safe unless it is done for a legitimate cause of time or infirmity: and then also I think, that it ought not to be turned away with insistence and pertinacity.

Articulus 5 — Whether A Husband Can Vow Not To Render The Debt Without The Consent Of His Wife

Whether a husband can vow not to render the debt without the consent of the wife?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, B, before the middle: For such things are not to be vowed by the married, except by consent, etc.

Let us suppose, indeed, that one of the spouses vows without the consent of the other, that he will never demand.

For it seems that this is a lawful vow: because
1. To demand itself is not in the power of the spouse, but only to render: therefore he can vow that.

1. Likewise, To demand is of infirmity, but to render is of justice and necessity: but those things which are of infirmity are to be rejected by man as much as he can: therefore it seems that it is also good for a man, that he vows, that he does not demand the debt from the spouse.

On the contrary of this is that
1. It is forbidden for spouses not to depart from each other except by mutual consent, unless both go to religion: therefore much more should it be forbidden for this one not to vow what he can scarcely or never observe while remaining with the wife.

1. Likewise, Proverbs 6:27: Can a man hide fire in his bosom, so that his garments do not burn? As if he would say, no. Therefore, being in marriage, he cannot preserve himself from burning with fire: therefore he ought not to vow.
2. Likewise, Bede says, that in a fool it is established to rescind the promise: therefore, what is a foolish vow is to be rescinded: therefore he ought not to vow.

Response. It must be said that no one ought to vow this: and if he has vowed, I believe that he can even be dispensed by the Bishop: and then he is to be reproved for foolishness, and penance is to be enjoined upon him: and thus he ought to be absolved from the obligation of the vow: because if before marriage it is better to marry than to burn, much more in marriage this is better.

To the first, however, it must be said that it is indeed in his power: but it matters how each one uses his own thing: and this pertains to the judge to know, and it is not without some prejudice to the other spouse: because it induces shame in her for so often asking, and it seems as if he cohabits with her unwillingly: and therefore that vow is foolish and irrational.

To the other it must be said that not all things which are of infirmity in any state are to be vowed and rejected, namely when the destruction of such things is not without prejudice to others, as previously became clear in this case.

Articulus 6 — Whether One Of The Spouses Can Abstain From Rendering The Debt In Order To Be Free For Prayer

Whether one of the spouses can abstain from rendering the debt so as to be free for prayer?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, B, around the middle: "Nor for a time so that they may be free for prayer," etc.

For it seems that this is false: because
1. An interdiction of the Church imposes necessity: therefore, whether he consents or not, then it is necessary to cease from rendering the debt.

1. Likewise, this is written in the canon, Joel 2:16: "Let the bridegroom go forth from his chamber, and the bride out of her bridal chamber." Therefore, even if one of the spouses commands to remain in the chamber, it is not necessary to remain on account of him.

According to this, it is further asked concerning those vowing pilgrimages without the consent of the wife.

For it seems that they cannot do this: because
1. It is said in the Text, that it is not permitted to abstain even for a time except by consent: but in pilgrimages, it is necessary to be absent for a long time: therefore, it is not permitted to vow pilgrimages except by consent.

1. Likewise, he who owes without a term, owes immediately: but such is the debt of matrimony.

It follows: therefore it is immediately owed: therefore a man cannot withdraw by pilgrimage without rendering.

1. Likewise, let us suppose that a woman wishes to vow a pilgrimage, and the husband objects: it is evident that she cannot vow, and her vow will be considered as nothing: since in those things which pertain to matrimony they are equal, even with the woman objecting, the man cannot vow such a pilgrimage.

Response. It must be said to the first, that the prohibition of the Church regards suitability, and not necessity.

To the other concerning Joel, it must be said that he speaks of a time of great mourning: and yet even in that it does not bind, as is clear from what was said previously.

To what is further asked, it must be said that if the wife objects due to the inability to contain, and the husband knows this, I believe that he sins by vowing the pilgrimage, and by dispensation he ought to change the vow. However, if she objects due to affection for companionship, then I believe that for the necessity of the Holy Land and the visitation of the thresholds of the Apostles he can pilgrimage: because then she does not object stubbornly.

And through this the solution to all is clear except to the last: to which it must be said, that this is because men have a greater incitement to lust than women: and also because men go on pilgrimages cautiously, and with the utility of the Church and edification: none of which is in women.

Articulus 7 — Whether If A Woman Vows Something With Her Husband Consenting, She Is Bound To Its Observance If The Husband Later Opposes

Whether if a woman has vowed something with the husband's consent, she is bound to the observance when the husband later opposes?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, B, shortly after the middle: For since it pertains to the sin of the same husband, etc.

For it seems that something false is imposed here by Augustine:
1. For this is drawn from Numbers 30:11 and 12, where it is said that if the husband did not immediately contradict when he heard, the woman herself will be held guilty of the vow. Therefore, it is false what is said in the Letter.

1. Likewise, Augustine says that if she vowed with the husband first consenting, it is truly of the will, and to render is of necessity: if the husband, not contradicting, vowed, it will be necessary that she renders.
2. Likewise, if something is vowed by common consent, it is clear that she is bound: but being silent when he hears, and can contradict, and does not contradict, he consents as it is said in the Digest. Therefore, it seems that this is understood to be the vow of both: therefore, the woman is bound to observe this, even if the husband later contradicts.

Response. It must be said that Augustine draws this from a certain word which is said at the end of chapter 30 of Numbers, verse 16, where it is said: But if he contradicts. Perhaps according to another translation it is more expressly: after he knew, he himself will bear her iniquity.

To the other, it must be said that to render is always of necessity: but it is not understood to be a vow, which is usurped with the husband contradicting. But to what is said, that the husband first consents, it must be said that it is understood that the husband did not consent, but rather before deliberation he dissimulated: and after he deliberated, he contradicted: and in such a case I understand Augustine to speak, because if he had expressly consented, the woman ought not afterwards to incline to the breaking of the vow.

And through this the solution to the last is clear: for he speaks in such a case, when the husband is silent only as deliberating, and not as expressly consenting.

Articulus 8 — Whether A Woman Who Has Vowed Continence With Her Husband Permitting, When The Husband Later Forbids, Is Bound To Render The Debt

Whether a woman who, with her husband's permission, has vowed continence, is bound to render the debt if the husband later forbids it?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, B, shortly before the end: To some it seems that the woman not departing, etc.

For it seems that this opinion is not true, because
1. Although a vow preceding marriage impedes contracting, it does not dissolve a contracted marriage unless it is solemn: therefore much less does a subsequent vow dissolve a marriage: because there are many impediments which, preceding marriage, dissolve a contract, which, however, do not dissolve the marriage when they occur subsequently: but this vow occurs subsequently, and is not yet solemnized: therefore it does not dissolve a marriage already contracted: therefore he cannot compel his wife to the payment of the debt, as before.

1. Likewise, that vow is only private: therefore it does not dissolve a contracted marriage: but this is contracted and consummated: therefore it does not dissolve it; therefore this opinion speaks the truth.

Response. It must be said that that opinion is false: but the one which he subsequently posits as his own is true.

To the first objection, it must be said that this is understood of a marriage which the vow precedes: because then a greater bond always supervenes and breaks the marriage: but now the vow of continence follows by common consent, therefore it does not dissolve the marriage, but suspends the debt of demanding and rendering: because this is in the power of the spouses, and by their will, to vow or not to vow.

By the same it is clear the solution to the following.

And therefore it is clear that they sin mortally by breaking the vow.

Whether, however, that vow receives dispensation or not, must be determined below in the question concerning the vow.

Articulus 9 — Whether In Marriage The Debt Should Always Be Rendered, But Not Demanded

Whether in marriage the debt must always be rendered, but not demanded?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said there, C, "And although the debt must always be paid to the one demanding it," etc.

Three things are inquired here.

First, concerning the Letter, why it is more fitting to always render rather than demand the debt of marriage?

Second, why those times enumerated in the Letter are more fitting for demanding than other times?

Third, whether one is obligated equally at any hour of that time, or in some is obligated, and in some not, and in some more, and in some less?

To the first, it is objected:

1. To Romans 1:32, on that: "Not only those who do them, but also those who consent to those doing them," the Gloss says, "he consents who, when he can, does not contradict: and those consenting and doing are worthy of equal punishment." Therefore, since the one rendering the debt consents to the one demanding in sacred time, the one rendering sins as much as the one demanding: it is false, therefore, that the debt must always be rendered, and not always demanded.

2. Likewise, I ought not to sin venially so that another avoids mortal sin: but it is certain that every corrupt circumstance makes sin: therefore, to render the debt when it ought not is sin: therefore, this one ought not to render, even if he thought that the other would fall into mortal sin: therefore, it seems that what is said in the Letter is false.

3. Likewise, those sharing in one act act or suffer equally in that act: but in this marriage, the one rendering and the one demanding share in the act of intercourse: therefore, they act and suffer equally: but those acting and suffering equally concerning the substance of the act merit or demerit equally, all other things being equal: therefore, it seems that the one demanding and the one rendering at such a time demerit equally: but what is demerit should not be done in any way: therefore, this one ought not to render the debt for anyone.

4. Likewise, a sword should not be given to a madman so that he kills himself: but sin kills more than a sword: therefore, the faculty of sinning should not be granted to him: but the one rendering gives such a faculty of sinning: therefore, he ought not to render.

5. Likewise, Aristotle says that equity is better than justice because it considers what is to be done in particulars: just as if the law says that a pledge is to be returned to one who redeems, or a deposit to one who lends, yet equity does not return it when robbers are present, nor at a time when it would be in danger of being lost through one's own foolishness or another's violence. Therefore, it should be similar in marriage: but the one rendering knows that it is not expedient for the debt to be rendered in that way: therefore, at that time he ought not to render.

6. Likewise, at such times one rests from works of necessary service, and a worker hired by someone is not then bound to work for him, since it is forbidden by ecclesiastical censure that he should work for him: therefore, much more should one rest from lustful works: and the one owing the debt should not render it then, and he who renders it then should be restrained by ecclesiastical censure, as it seems.

In opposition to this is what the Philosopher says, that whatever is more effective at a certain time is more to be chosen: but medicine is most effective in time of sickness: therefore, it is then most to be chosen: but the medicine of lust is marriage: therefore, in time of lust the use of it is to be chosen, and then most to be exhibited: therefore, the rendering of the debt is owed at the time of the feast if the other demands it out of fear of incontinence.

Response. It must be said that one is bound to render at the time of the feast, as is said in the Letter, and the last objection proves.

To the first, it must be said that he does not consent, but rather gives reluctantly what is his: he grieves over the lust, but provides such a remedy as can be to prevent the infirmity from being aggravated to mortal corruptions.

To the other, it must be said that he does not sin venially by rendering, but rather merits strongly from the act of faith and justice of the marriage bed.

To the other, it must be said that the proposition concerning the act of nature is false, but concerning the act of morals it is true: but in such a case the married do not share one act of morals, but of nature: because the act of morals is caused by all its circumstances and form and end. And it is clear that these are not the same: because in one there is informing lust, and in the other justice and faith: in one the end is the relief of lust, in the other merit according to the exercise of justice.

To the other, it must be said that a sword is not given to him, but medicine to the madman: just as if someone's memory begins to be seized, the head is perforated to the brain: although a wound is given to him, yet this itself is medicine to him: but if an occasion of mortal sin were given to him, then a sword would be given to him.

To the other, it must be said that the one rendering at the time of lust is the mind, because then the one to whom it is rendered is most effective for the preservation of ruin: and it is clear from the aforementioned that the objections brought forward are worth nothing, because they are not similar.

To the other, it must be said that there is not such an instance of temptation of other concupiscences as of lust, which quickly precipitates a man: and therefore against this disease a more prepared medicine must be had than against another.

Articulus 10 — Whether It Is Lawful For Spouses To Come Together In The Times Named In The Letter

Whether it is permissible in the times in the Nominal Letter for spouses to come together?

Secondly, it is asked, Why are these feasts rather than others determined?

1. For indeed the days of processions according to truth are only three, when Christ Himself held a procession, namely the day of the Presentation, when with the procession of His parents the Lord came to the temple, and with the procession of Simeon and Anna and those who awaited the redemption of Israel, He was received in the temple; and Palm Sunday, when with a great crowd He came to Jerusalem and was received with palms and olives; and another day is the Ascension, when He led the disciples to the mountain and ascended into heaven. There are, however, other days equal to these, such as the Annunciation, Passion, Resurrection, Epiphany: why then are those days not determined like these?
2. Likewise, the days of fasting are only forty, and the Ember Days, and other fasts are not authentic in the Church: it seems, therefore, that it is not necessary to abstain on other fasts.
3. Likewise, it determines three weeks before the feast of John, and Advent, and others: therefore, it is asked, what is the reason for these?

Response. It must be said that the Saints speak of the times of contracting marriages in the last chapter; but here they speak of the time of demanding the debt of already contracted marriages.

Hence it must be said that the days of processions and fasts are very well determined, but the days of processions are twofold, namely those established from the processions of the Lord, as was introduced in the objection: and those which are caused by common and legitimate necessity, such as the days of rogations for pestilence, and such are also done in particular Churches for this according to the will of the Prelates instituting them, because on such days the spirit ascends in the Lord, for prayer is the ascent of the intellect to God, as Damascene says, and it is inappropriate that at one hour the spirit ascends to God, and at the end is depressed under the flesh. The same reason is for great feasts, especially of the most blessed Virgin, and of Christ: because then commemoration is made of the immaculate chastity and flower of our Lord Jesus Christ, and it is incongruous then for a member of Christ to give itself to incontinence and pleasure and corruption.

However, the times of fasting, such as Lent, and the Ember Days, and vigils, are instituted to mortify the flesh, and it is inappropriate that when the flesh is withdrawn from necessities for the individual, it should be filled with the indulgence of pleasure ordering to the salvation of the species.

And through this the solution of all that is asked in this chapter is clear.

For what is said in the authority of Ambrose about the time of conception and birth, had a question above.

But concerning the times of contracting marriages, it will be asked below.

Articulus 11 — Whether At Every Hour Of The Said Feasts One Must Always Abstain

Whether at any hour of the aforementioned feasts
one must always abstain?

Whether at any hour of the aforementioned feasts
one must always abstain?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether any hour of that time is inconvenient?

However, it seems that it is not: because
1. Not all that time is instituted for prayer: therefore, when lauds are not said in the hours or masses, it seems that someone can demand: because from this one is not impeded in divine matters.

1. Likewise, Through marriage the highest spirituality is signified, both in the person of Christ, and also in the conjunction of the faithful soul with God: but such signs are especially to be used in the chief festival:

therefore it seems that then the use of marriage should be insisted upon.

Response. It must be said that by no means, but rather abstaining, as it is said in the Letter, because it is very incongruous.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that although we cannot attend to prayer and divine praises at every hour of these days, nevertheless we must always hold ourselves fit:
and therefore we must abstain from embraces, which depress the mind so that it cannot rise to heavenly things.

To the other, it must be said that it does not hold:
because to some is joined foul concupiscence subjugating reason in the impulse of delight much more than that sign can demand: and therefore it is prohibited by the Church due to the congruence of the time.

Articulus 12 — Whether When One Ought To Be Free For Prayer, One Can Render The Debt

Whether when it is time to devote oneself to prayer, someone can render the debt?

Whether when it is time to devote oneself to prayer, someone can render the debt?

Then it is asked about what is said there, "However, what was said, that rendering the debt is not a sin," etc.

And two things are asked here. The first is, When it is time to devote oneself to prayer, can another demand the debt at the same hour? The second, Whether one rendering the debt can eat the flesh of the Lamb on the same day? And for the sake of this, it is also asked, Whether one demanding the debt ought to eat the flesh of the Lamb?

To the first, it is objected thus: 1. To pray is a positive precept: therefore it obliges to be fulfilled at some time: therefore let any time be given, and at the same time one of the spouses demands the debt: either he will render the debt, or not. If so: since therefore he cannot pray at the same time, nor do anything spiritual, as it is said in the Letter, he will not fulfill the precept of prayer: therefore he omits it at the time when he ought to do it: but to omit at the time when he ought to do it is a mortal sin: therefore he sins mortally. But if he does not render the debt: then he defrauds the sick of medicine in time of danger: therefore he is the occasion of his own death: but such a one also sins mortally: therefore he is perplexed, which is false, because according to Theologians no one is perplexed.

If perhaps you say that he is absolved from the obligation of the debt by reason of the time appointed for prayer. On the contrary: the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 7:5: "Do not defraud each other, except perhaps by consent." Therefore even at that time he is not absolved except by the consent of the other spouse:

but it was posited that he does not consent, but demands.

1. The same objection is made concerning a sacred place, if the debt is demanded in a sacred place. For it seems that it should be denied: because if it is rendered, the sacred place is harmed: but the sacred place is not to be contaminated: therefore the debt is to be denied.
2. To the same: because it seems less that the Church is harmed by eating and selling there than by copulating there: but it is clear that it is harmed in the first two: therefore also in coitus. For the lesser, 1 Corinthians 11:22: "Do you not have houses to eat and drink in?" etc. Matthew 21:12, Jesus expelled those buying and selling from the temple.

But against this it seems that in certain lands, due to the assaults of warriors, it is necessary to remain with children and wives in the Church for many nights and many days: therefore, since they ought not to be without the debt for a long time, it seems that in the Church it can be demanded and rendered.

Response. It must be said that the debt of marriage is always owed to the one asking, and at every hour it must be rendered according to opportunity and ability. I call opportunity: because, however, since coitus has a certain shame attached, it is not necessary that it be rendered in public before people, but at every hour, leaving aside the business in which one is, if he knows the other to be in dangerous concupiscence, he is bound to seek the privacy of the bed and render the debt.

To what is asked about the precept of prayer, it must be said that there is never a time of necessity for rendering, unless in which if he does not do it, he omits: and this is caused by two things, namely by the institution of the Church, and by the impossibility of recovering. By the institution of the Church, however, they are not obliged, except ecclesiastical persons who ought to be chaste as long as they handle divine sacraments;

otherwise, the Church does not oblige, but advises. The impossibility of recovering cannot occur here: because even if he renders the debt now, he can recover the prayers later or on the morrow: and thus it is clear that he is not perplexed: because he does not have the necessity to do the other, since there is no determined time instituted for prayer for the married. And by this the solution to the first is clear.

To what is asked about the place, it must be said that he is not bound to render the debt in a sacred place if another place can be had: but if it cannot, then he should render it with sorrow of heart, and even if he demands it with lamentation, which cannot be without the use of marriage, I do not believe that he sins mortally.

To what is objected, that the place is contaminated, it must be said that the contamination of the place is twofold, namely from the incongruity of the work done in it to the consecration and act of the place, and from the contrariety proceeding. That which proceeds from incongruity does not so contaminate the place that it needs reconciliation, but rather that which proceeds from contrariety, and that occurs from great crimes, namely sacrilege, homicide, and the like.

To what is further asked, it must be said that the Apostle does not want the place to be contaminated by this, but there was a certain incongruity: and therefore he corrected it so that necessity would not occur.

To what is objected from Matthew, it must be said that in the negotiation: there were joined robberies, thefts, and simony: and therefore he expelled them from the temple. And therefore it is not similar, because in the oratory, as Augustine says, "No one should do anything except for what it was made, from which it also takes its name."

And by this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 13 — Whether One Of The Spouses Rendering The Debt Can On The Same Day Eat The Flesh Of The Lamb, And Whether The One Demanding Can Receive The Body Of The Lord, And Whether On The Same Day On Which It Is Received One Can Render The Debt

Whether one of the spouses fulfilling the debt, on the same day can eat the flesh of the Lamb? And, whether the one demanding can receive the body of the Lord? And, whether on the same day when it is received, can the debt be rendered?

Secondly, it is asked, whether the one fulfilling the debt can eat the flesh of the Lamb on the same day? Or even on the same day on which the flesh of the Lamb is eaten, ought to fulfill the debt?

It seems, however, that not: because
1. In the Letter here it is said, that the bread which descended from heaven cannot be violated and touched by those who shortly before adhered to conjugal embraces: this is the proposition.

1. Likewise, a less incongruous act to the sacrament of the Eucharist is to eat than to copulate, and he sins mortally who receives the body of the Lord after eating: therefore also after copulation: but nothing should be done that is a mortal sin: therefore the one fulfilling the debt should not touch or take the flesh of the Lamb.
2. Likewise, in wild lettuces of penance and sorrow the Eucharist is to be taken: but it is impossible to be in the pleasure of copulation and in sorrow at the same time: therefore it seems that after the pleasure of copulation the Eucharist should not be taken. But that it is impossible is evident from the Gloss on 1 Corinthians 6:13, where it says that nothing can be done or thought in the meantime, because the whole spirit descends into the flesh.

3. Then, Gregory writes to Augustine, Bishop of the English, and it is placed in the decree, distinction 6, that even after nocturnal pollution one should abstain from the flesh of the Lamb. Therefore much more after copulation perpetrated in the vigil.

1. Likewise, to receive a thing of highest spirituality in the greatest carnality is perversity: but the Eucharist is of highest spirituality: therefore it seems that in the greatest carnality after copulation it should not be received.

On the contrary is this, which in the preceding distinction was held by Gregory: If anyone uses his wife not seized by the desire of pleasure, but only for the sake of procreating children, he indeed should be left to his own judgment whether to enter the Church or to take the body of the Lord in ministry: because he should not be prohibited by us from receiving, who being placed in fire does not know how to burn. It is evident that he who fulfills for the sake of justice or for the sake of children, he after such a concubitus can receive the body of the Lord: because it does not matter whether he fulfills for the sake of justice or the faith of the bed, or for the piety of procreating children.

Likewise, it is further asked, whether the one demanding due to infirmity can receive the body of the Lord?

It seems that not: because
1. In the preceding distinction from the words of Gregory it was held, that even from entering the Church one should abstain: therefore much more strongly from the communion of the Eucharist he should abstain.

1. Likewise, Augustine said: Believe, but this one still, and you will eat me: he is small to whom carnal things taste dangerously: therefore he should not eat the flesh of the Lamb.

2. Likewise, in figure it is said of this sacrament, Exodus 12:11: Gird your loins. But Gregory says, that we gird our loins when we restrain the luxury of the flesh through continence: therefore he who does not gird his loins should not eat the flesh of the Lamb: but the one demanding the debt from infirmity does not gird his loins: therefore he should not eat the flesh of the Lamb.

3. Likewise, 1 Samuel 21:4, Achimelech said: If the young men are clean, let them eat. Therefore if they are not clean from women, it was not lawful to eat even the figure of this sacrament. Therefore much less will it be lawful to receive the thing: therefore after such a demanded debt it will not be lawful to eat the flesh of the Lamb.

On the contrary of this is that
1. Such a concubitus is only venial, but for venial things one should not be dismissed: because thus every man should be dismissed, since in many things we all offend: therefore it is not necessary that this one dismisses taking the body of the Lord because of this.

1. Likewise, Peter is argued by blessed Bernard, because he said: Depart from me, because I am a sinful man, Lord? God is rather to be called, as by Zacchaeus, provided he grieves for sins: but this one grieves: therefore he should approach God as much as he can through the perception of the Eucharist.
2. Likewise, Matthew 9:12: It is not the healthy who need a physician, but the sick. It is evident, however, that the highest medicine and physician is the Lord himself perceived in the sacrament: therefore it should be taken by him who is ill in concupiscence for which he demands the debt.

Further it is asked here, whether after the body of the Lord has been received, on the same day shortly or much later the debt can be demanded or rendered?

It seems that not: because
4. The motions of concupiscence and of the sacrament are contrary: because one moves to the highest spirit, and the other to the lowest of carnal pleasures: therefore the motion of one excludes the other, because contrary motions exclude each other: therefore the motion of concupiscence in concubitus excludes the motion of spiritual nourishment: therefore the effect of the sacrament is lost: but by all means it must be avoided that the effect of the sacrament is lost: therefore by all means it must be avoided that the debt is demanded or the requested is fulfilled.

1. Likewise, I see that even suitable foods which are of the same kind, if one is taken immediately after the other, the second evacuates the first, and there will be a distemperance from indigestion: therefore much more will this be done by spiritual food and the most intense bodily pleasure immediately succeeding each other: therefore the pleasure of copulation evacuates the effect of the sacrament: therefore it must be avoided by all from the pleasure of copulation after the taking of the Eucharist.
2. Further it is asked here, whether the body of Christ should be taken by a menstruating woman?

It seems that not: because according to the law such a woman is unclean, as is evident, Leviticus 12:4: therefore nothing of the holy should be touched: therefore neither the Eucharist.

In the same way it follows that neither a polluted man, nor one with a seminal flow, as Leviticus 15:1 and following, is expressly prohibited.

On the contrary of this is that such things are penalties, not faults according to themselves: but the punished should not be punished further: therefore neither in this should he be punished again, that the saving food is withdrawn from him.

And because much has been asked about these in the treatise on the Eucharist, let these now asked suffice.

Response to the first, that the one rendering the debt for the faith of the bed and justice, or even demanding for the good of offspring, should not be prohibited from the flesh of the Lamb, but should be left to his own judgment concerning this, whether from humility, because such a business was not without pleasure, he wishes to abstain, or from devotion he wishes to take.

To what is objected from the Letter, the Master responds in the Letter. However, it can be said otherwise, that Jerome speaks of those who are excessive lovers of their wives, that is, too ardent, of whom it was held above, that they are adulterers.

To the other it must be said, that it is because of the institution of the Church which opposes: but here there is no institution of the Church to the contrary, but rather the concession of the Apostle saying, Do not defraud one another, etc.

To the other it must be said, that pain and pleasure are not together according to act, but pain according to habit can be with pleasure according to act, and after the pleasure of copulation, when he goes to communion, he can grieve according to act and exclude the pleasure which was before at the time of copulation.

To the other it must be said, that Gregory speaks of priests confecting the Eucharist in the mass: because greater sanctity is imposed on them, as in the Letter the saying of Jerome is explained: whence if the saying is taken generally, it must be said that pollution is a sign of preceding fault: and therefore since it is of good minds to fear fault where there is no fault, much more must they fear where the sign of preceding fault is found: but the rendering of the debt is not a sign nor effect of any fault: and therefore it is not similar to what was introduced. However, concerning this our question must be looked at in the treatise on the Eucharist: and thus the manifestation of the solution will be made.

To the other it must be said, that to take one thing with another according to existing act would be perversity: but nothing prohibits after carnality with which there is spirituality according to habit, to take that which is of highest spirituality: because carnality has already ceased.

To the first, however, which is further asked about the demanding one, it must be said that he should be admonished not to take, not left to his own judgment as the first: if however in all respects...

in ways from devotion he should engage, he is not to be prohibited.

To that which is objected against, it must be said that as was stated in the preceding distinction, by this is shown only an incongruity inviting to humility, and Gregory does not intend to impose necessity.

To another it must be said, that it is one thing to receive the effect of the Eucharist, and another to perceive. The first is of the sick palate: the second of the healthy palate. And in this respect, Augustine's statement was that it would grow, and not in the first respect: for anyone who is contrite can receive the Eucharist.

To another it must be said, that everyone having the continence of conjugal concession has loins girded: and Gregory's statement is understood of girding from illicit intercourse.

To another it must be said, that the cleansing of boys was sought for the reason of suitability, because the loaves were priestly, and not for the reason of necessity.

To that which is further inquired, it must be said that on that day the debt is not to be demanded, nor even rendered, unless the other spouse insists greatly: if however it is done, I do not believe it is a mortal sin.

To the objection against, it must be said that although they are contrary in act, not however in habit: because one is of one sacrament, and the other of another: and one of charity, and the other of conjugal continence, which have no contrariety between themselves: hence the act of intercourse is not against spirituality, except as a disposition remaining for a time and passing.

To another it must be said, that this is so because it oppresses nature, and suffocates the following digestive heat: but it is not so here, because as already stated, the delight which is in intercourse is not deepened as a habit, but passes as a temporal disposition.

To that which is further inquired, it must be said that such things are from infirmity rather than fault.

A competent solution is sufficiently had in the treatise on the Eucharist.

Then by reason of this where it is said, there, D, at the end: Nor yet at the time when conjugal acts are conducted, will the presence of the Holy Spirit be given, even if he seems to be a Prophet, etc.

The question of prophecy must be treated, so that it may be perfectly seen why this is said in the Letter.

DISTINCTIO XXXIII

Divisio Textus

Here it is inquired about the ancient fathers, etc. In this distinction, it is treated of the various states of marriage.

However, four things are inquired here by the Master. The first is, Why did some of the ancients have multiple wives? The second, concerning the comparison of their marriage to the celibacy of the new grace, there, B, But truly the chastity of virginity, etc. Thirdly, it is inquired, Whether it was permitted for one woman to have multiple husbands, there, D, But under the law, etc? Fourthly, it touches upon the state of celibates and celibacy, there, iM, But virginity of the mind is better than of the flesh, etc.

And let these suffice concerning the division.

However, around the beginning, by reason of the first chapter, six things are to be inquired here. The first is, Whether marriage is natural? The second is, Whether having multiple wives is natural, or against nature? The third, Whether one woman having multiple husbands is against nature or the order of nature? The fourth, Whether only the lustful then committed bigamy, as it seems to intend in the Letter? The fifth, Whether it was then permitted or ever permitted to have a concubine? The sixth, How the good of marriage, which is a sacrament, was preserved in the marriages of the ancient fathers?

Articulus 1 — Whether Marriage Is Natural Or Of The Law Of Nations

Whether marriage is natural or of the law of nations?

Whether marriage is natural or of the law of nations?

To the first objection it is argued thus: 1. Nature dictates only the copulation of male and female: but this does not make marriage: therefore it seems that marriage is not natural.

1. Likewise, Aristotle says in the second book of Ethics, that natural things are the same among all: but the contract of marriage is not the same among all: therefore the contract of marriage is not natural: therefore neither is marriage natural.
2. Likewise, Tullius in Rhetoric at the beginning says that men were originally wild: and then no one knew their own children, nor certain marriages; but it is evident that men lived naturally then: therefore it seems that marriage is not natural, but rather of the law of nations.
3. Likewise, at the beginning of the Digest of the ancients, it is said that natural law in the Institutes is what nature teaches all animals: but nature does not teach all animals marriage: therefore it seems that it is not natural. The middle proposition is that we see many dogs following one female dog, and certain animals not having specific females with whom they mate: therefore the proposition is clear.

On the contrary of this is, 1. What is said at the beginning of the Pandects: Natural law is the union of male and female, which we call marriage: therefore it is natural.

The same is said entirely in the Institutes.

Likewise, it is said that Tullius in Rhetoric natural law is what opinion did not give birth to, but some innate force inserted, as the union of male and female: therefore, etc.

1. Likewise, Aristotle in the ninth book of Ethics says these words: Man is a naturally conjugal animal more than political, and as much as the house is prior and more necessary than the city. Therefore, man is more naturally conjugal than political, and as much as the order of the house is more necessary and prior to the order of the city: but man is naturally political, as Aristotle and Avicenna prove: therefore he is more naturally conjugal: therefore marriage is natural.

2. Likewise, Aristotle introduces another reason to the same, saying thus: And the procreation of children is common to animals: he intends to argue thus: To whomsoever the procreation of children is naturally common, to them also the manner by which children are certified is natural, as birds join to one in a special nest: therefore also man joins to one due to him in a special house: but this is marriage: therefore marriage is natural.

3. Likewise, the Philosopher introduces a third reason there, saying thus: Men cohabit not only for the sake of procreation of children, but also for those things which pertain to life: for immediately the works are divided, and they are of the man and the wife: therefore they suffice to each other for the common provision: Whatever contributes to life preserving nature is natural: marriage is of this kind: therefore marriage is natural. The first is assumed by the Philosopher as self-evident. The second is proved: because when men are born and grow up, they have divided works, and are insufficient for themselves for the safety of nature and the provision of the house. But when man and wife contribute their works, they will be sufficient for the building of the house and the safety of nature: but they do not contribute unless joined in marriage: therefore marriage is natural; and thus the proposition is established.

4. Likewise, Aspasius on the same place in the commentary says that what is from the genus is more natural than what is from the difference, although both are natural: but man has from the difference that he is a civil and political animal: and because of this the life of one alone, as Avicenna says, is not unless worse than it can be: but from the genus he has that he is conjugal, as was shown before in birds and the lion: therefore marriage is more natural than political.

Response. It must be said that the words of Aspasius solving this question in the commentary on the ninth book of Ethics are very noteworthy, and they are these: It cannot be. Up to this point, the union of male and female is entirely without fault, unless it intends the procreation of offspring: and since man is a rational animal, and reason not perverted intends the best, not only does the generating man intend to procreate offspring, but also to educate the procreated, and by educating to advance them to perfection: not only in the goods of the body, but also in the goods of the soul, which are virtues and sciences: but it is not only the man generating, nor only the woman, but both together are one generating: therefore it is necessary that both together intend with one common intention the procreation and education and advancement of offspring to perfection: therefore it is necessary before they come together, that they mutually consent to each other in one individual life for the procreation and education and advancement of offspring to perfection: for there cannot be a rational intention of the generating rightly, unless each of the generating consents to an individual life: since therefore the natural end of the generative virtue, and the act of generating in man is the offspring perfect in both perfections, and the safety of the species is not only in the first being, but also in the second being, which is the true consummation of man: but this end cannot be intended by man and woman generating with a common intention, who are more one generating, unless matrimonially united: and what is not done with a right end is a sin, it is evident that marriage is natural, and that every union outside of marriage is a sin, and transgresses the law of nature. The words of Aspasius: and they determine the whole question, nor do they need exposition.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that nature dictates or instigates nothing to any animal, unless it also gives it the instinct and faculty of perfectly accomplishing it according to the mode of its nature: and so also marriage as to the mode that it is accomplished by its wife, so that it may be known who are the proper children, and who are not, will be natural.

To the other it must be said that in one substantial thing all agree, which is the consent of both, but in accidentals they differ: and this does not impede.

To the other it must be said that Tullius understands this of nature as it is considered only in generation, and in no way in species: and if it is also considered in genus, still its union is determined to the certain knowledge of their children even naturally in many animals, as was previously evident. And the expert who joined men in the habitations of houses and cities, and the contract of marriage, did this by the demonstration of natural reasons: and therefore from that reason it does not follow that marriage is not natural.

To the other it must be said that as was said before, nature teaches all animals this, but in different ways according to the diversity of species: for it teaches some the procreation of children without the determination of a certain female: and this is in those in which the male has no care about educating the children, like the bull, horse, donkey, dog, and the like. But in others the father is concerned about the children, and therefore seeks a certain union with one female of his species, and with her generates and nourishes the children, like almost all birds, and many walking animals: nevertheless, however, some marriage is in all in which there is male and female: but in the most perfect animal marriage is most perfect according to nature, and this is man.

Articulus 2 — Whether To Have Several Wives Is Natural

Is it natural to have multiple wives?

Is it natural to have multiple wives?

Secondly, it is asked whether having multiple wives is natural.

It seems that it is: because 1. Aristotle says that one man fulfills many: therefore it seems that this is not against nature.

1. Likewise, in other animals we frequently see that many females are possessed by one male: since therefore natural law is what nature has taught all animals, it will not be against nature for a man to have multiple wives.
2. Likewise, in the order of nature we see that one mover towards generation moves many movables, just as the sun generates all things below, and the first mover moves and in a certain way impregnates all animals: therefore it seems according to the order of nature that one male, who is as a mover, can have many wives.

3. Likewise, Plato posited that universals are like art and male: particulars, however, like the material of artifacts and female: because one universal form impregnates many particulars, and one form of art is in many artifacts: therefore a male can have many females according to the order of nature.
4. Likewise, there is no head to which only one member coheres: but the man is the head of the woman: therefore it is necessary that many women cohere to him.
5. Likewise, in the Scripture, it is said in the authority of Augustine, which is drawn from holy virginity, that the ancient fathers did not do this against nature: therefore it seems that a man according to nature could have multiple wives.
6. Likewise, we see that many men, excellently following nature and reason, like Cato and certain Arabs, had and have multiple wives: therefore it seems that this is not against nature.
7. Likewise, to cast seed ordered to the multiplication of nature where it is lost is beyond the order of nature: but when a woman is impregnated and has a closed womb, if someone then has intercourse with her, he casts seed where it is lost: therefore he ought to know another: therefore at least at the time of conception he can use multiple in marriage, as it seems.
8. Likewise, if it is against nature to have multiple, it is asked against which nature? For it is clear that it is not against sex, nor against the customs of animals in general, nor against reason, nor against the species of man: therefore it seems that it is not against nature.

Against this, it is objected thus: 1. That seems to be most natural which was established in the first nature created: but then it was instituted that one should be for one: therefore this is most natural: it seems therefore that it is against nature to have multiple. This is proved from what is held in Genesis 2:24: "And he shall cleave to his wife," and it does not say, "to his wives."

1. Likewise, in other animals we see that those for whom the works of educating offspring are not sufficient, but it is necessary to contribute something, as birds do, especially those that have chicks that must be fed by parents, that one is for one: therefore since man is such an animal, it seems that according to the nature of the genus one should be for one. The Philosopher says that this is most natural, which agrees with the reason of the genus: therefore it seems that according to the nature of man one should be for one.
2. Likewise, if a more remote genus than animal is taken, like one that is in plants, then it is clear that in the same subject masculine and feminine power are joined: but in those, only one masculine power is joined with one feminine: therefore it seems that this should be observed according to nature in all following the genus in man: therefore according to nature only one is for one.
3. Likewise, in all nature it is so that one moving form is not proportioned except to one matter: since therefore the male is as a mover, and the female as moved matter, it will seem according to nature that only one is joined to one: therefore it will be against nature if one has multiple.

4. Likewise, according to Aristotle, both in arts and in natures, the way is more in few, that nature expedites itself with the fewest: therefore it seems that in seeking generation the natural way is in fewer than it can: but these are two, namely male and female: therefore it seems that it is beyond the way of nature for more to be joined to one.
5. Likewise, in all nature it is not found that one proper mover is of other movables: but according to nature in generation the male is as a proper mover, and the female as movable: therefore it seems that it is against nature for one male to have multiple females.
6. Likewise, in the heavens and elements it is never joined except one agent as male with one female as patient, as is clear in stars, signs, planets, and elements, where it is never except one hot with one dry or one moist, and one cold with one dry or one moist: therefore it should also be so in the conjunction of humans.
7. Likewise, every agent in nature is diminished if that in which it acts is multiplied, and its diminution will be a cause of hindrance or weakness of the effect: but the male is most truly the agent in generation: therefore, with the multiplication of that in which it acts, it will be diminished, and its diminution will be a cause of hindrance or weakness of the effect: but the effect is the production of the similar: therefore if one had multiple, this would be a hindrance and weakness of generation. The first is proved by induction in individuals, and it is also written by the Philosophers in many places.

Response. To this, without prejudice, it must be said otherwise, that according to Aristotle, the nature of man is twofold, namely that which is from the genus, and that which is from the difference. According to that which is from the genus, it is not against the nature of man to have multiple wives: and this nature is in man as potential and as imperfect. However, the perfect and formal is that which is from the difference: and this is twofold according to how reason is taken in two ways, namely as nature which is in the form of man considering only natural things: and as deliberative reason of those things which man alone among others perceives, such as what is honorable, base, preservative of peace, and incitative of discord, deliberative of the city, and destructive of the city and house. And in the first way, it still seems that it is not against nature to have multiple. However, in the second way, it seems to be beyond nature. That it is so is held from the Scripture, as Augustine says, that it was not against nature that Jacob had multiple: and there are many things about this in the decree, question 4: and many of those are also placed here in the Scripture from Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine. And thus it is not necessary to solve except the second part of the objections: because all the first objections proceed in the two prior senses of nature.

Therefore, it seems to be said to the first, that marriage was not then instituted in the office of nature in the genus or in the species absolutely, but as in the species related to the end of moral good, of which the perceptive is the nature of man alone: because the Philosophers say that it is the nature of man alone to discern between the base and the honorable: and therefore also afterwards, doing nothing against the nature which God instituted, when few were good and many were evil, by the dispensation of the good, many had multiple.

To the other, it must be said that animals are joined to one for multiple causes, and also are not joined to one for opposite causes. There are, however, chiefly three by which they are joined to one, of which one is that the motivating power of the male is not sufficient for impregnating many: and this sometimes happens due to the diminution of food, sometimes also due to the deprivation of the nature of the living. The second is: because in fostering and nurturing one is not sufficient, because within the womb the offspring cannot be completed, nor can they be completed outside unless they are warmed by the heat of the parents' bodies, as is seen in birds warming successively in alternating turns. Hence we see that birds of which only one warms, or even animals that do not warm their eggs, are not so ordered that a certain male has a certain female, as is clear in every kind of chicks and geese, and also in fish, and lizards, and serpents. The third and last cause is the ingenuity that nature has for discerning its own offspring: because as Aristotle says, animals are not equally memorative, nor equally teachable, and consequently not equally ingenious concerning the care of offspring. Hence some nurture other offspring as their own, in which the partridge is argued where it is said: "The partridge warms what it did not bear." Some, however, never nurture others unless deceived, like the buffalo which does not suckle another's offspring unless it is first smeared with its own dung, and then it suckles deceived. Some, however, can in no way be deceived in their own, and reject all others, and do not bestow care on them. These, therefore, are the causes by which animals claim certain females for themselves, and with these ceasing, they do not do so, like the horse, and the donkey, and many walking animals. However, in man, due to industry, there is the procreation of multiple females: and therefore it is not against his nature to have multiple, unless nature is taken in the last way: because it is true that a house is not well governed with multiple wives existing, and consequently neither a city nor a nation.

To the other, it must be said that the masculine power which is in plants is indeterminate and imperfect: because, as it is said in the book on Plants, plants do not have a soul, but a part of a part of a soul. That it is imperfect is clear from its indetermination and materiality: because it is immobile and indeterminate, generating leaves, branches, and fruits, and in the fruit it generates many things surrounding the fruit: and therefore it must be joined in distinction to move due to its imperfection. However, if it moved by some imagination, it could move many: hence it does not move many except as nature, and also by natural qualities which are hot, cold, moist, and dry. However, it is not so in animals which are of perfect nature, and move by imagination which is diversified in images: and therefore one mover in such moves many.

By this also the solution to the following is clear.

To the other, it must be said that in few there is a way in one act, but in many acts it is not necessary: for generation is always completed in two minimums: but many generations can be completed by one with many.

To the other, it must be said that this is understood of the proximate mover, and in such a way the male and female do not relate in the species of man: and therefore nothing is proved by this.

By this also the solution to the following is clear. To the last, it must be said that by one simple action the agent in many is diminished, as much as those are multiplied, but successively acting cannot be diminished: because, as Aristotle says, he fulfills one at a time, and after this, with the seed drawn to the seminal vessels and matured, he fulfills another, and a third, and so on.

Articulus 3 — Whether For One Woman To Have Several Husbands Is Against Nature

Whether for one woman to have multiple husbands is against nature?

Whether for one woman to have multiple husbands is against nature?

Thirdly, it is asked whether for one woman to have multiple husbands is against nature or the order of nature?

It seems, however, that it is not: because 1. It seems that man and woman are of the same species: therefore, what is not against the nature of man is not against the nature of woman: but it has been held that it is not against the nature of man to be joined to many: therefore, neither will it be against the nature of woman to have multiple husbands.

1. Likewise, a woman desires a man as matter desires form: but I see that matter desires not one form, but many: therefore, neither does a woman by natural desire desire one man, but many: therefore, according to nature, she can be joined to many.
2. Likewise, inferiors relate to superiors as woman to man, as the Philosophers have said: but I see that the earth, which is impregnated by the starry sphere, is not joined to one impregnator, but to many: therefore, it seems that a woman according to nature can be joined to many.
3. Again, in many animals we see that many males follow one female, and never many females one male, as in dogs and wolves: therefore, it seems that by the nature of the genus, a female can be joined to multiple husbands and males.
4. Likewise, a woman is related in generation as a recipient: but every recipient is receptive of many according to the nature of the recipient: therefore, a woman can receive from many men: therefore, according to nature, she is joinable to many men.

On the contrary, however, is that 1. Aristotle says that one man fulfills many: but one woman is not fulfilled except by one: therefore, although a man can be joined to many according to his nature, yet a woman is joined only to one.

1. Likewise, the joining of women to men according to nature is only for generation, because sex is distinguished by God and nature only for this: but when a woman receives from one, she is not receptive from another except with the danger of the first conception: therefore, according to nature, she is not joinable to another when she has received from one: but after she has given birth, she can receive from the same: therefore, she is sufficiently joined to one for generating: but it has been held before that the way of nature is in fewer as much as possible: therefore, according to nature, a woman is not joinable except to one.

2. Likewise, according to nature, there are many members of one head, but never are there many heads of one member: since, therefore, a man is as the head, and a woman as a member, one man can according to the order of nature have many women, but in no way can one woman have many men.

3. Likewise, in many animals we see that the male claims many for himself and fights for them to the death, as stags, boars, and roosters: but we do not see that females fight for many males or follow many males: therefore, it seems that according to the natural order of the genus, it is natural indeed that a man can have many, but in no way is it according to the order of nature that one woman should have many husbands at the same time whom she follows.

4. Likewise, from this would arise dissension in household and political matters: for a wife is subject according to laws, canons, and natural reasons. Therefore, let it be granted that one has many: therefore, she will obey both, and follow them: therefore, when one commands to build his house, another perhaps commands about building another house: therefore, destruction and confusion of the house and city follows from this.

5. Likewise, as Cicero says, marriage was invented so that certain children may be known: but if one has many, no one will know certain and proper children: therefore, no one will be solicitous for them: therefore, the children, for whom nature invented marriage, will perish, which is inconvenient: therefore, according to nature also, it is inconvenient that one should have many husbands.

Therefore, it must be conceded, and it is to be said to the first, that for many reasons it is in no way according to nature that one woman should have many: but I will assign four more evident reasons, three of which I will take from the nature of the genus, and one from the nature of the difference.

The first, taken from the nature of the genus, is that excessive shaking of the womb causes the offspring to fall, because the conception adheres by cotyledons, like fruit to a tree, and at the beginning of conception because of the tenderness of the cotyledons, and at the end because of the maturity and weight of the infant, it easily falls: but in the middle time, it adheres more strongly: and therefore even with one, much intercourse is dangerous to conception, as Jerome said above in the Letter, and it is placed in the decree 32, question 4, but to have intercourse with different ones would be entirely contrary.

The second is that from excessive flow of semen both injected and ejected, the womb is lubricated, so that it holds nothing: therefore, prostitutes do not conceive: and therefore those who are with one in too frequent intercourse conceive less and more rarely.

The third is that although the semen of a woman is material in conception, yet it operates towards conception: and therefore it is necessary for it to have due maturity: but due maturity cannot be in semen that flows too much, because for it to mature, it must be drawn in the seminal vessels for a time: and therefore it is not fitting that a woman should have many. But that this does not impede in a man will be shown below, where it will be asked if many could then be had.

The fourth, however, which is taken from the part of the difference, is that this would be ordered to the destruction of household and political matters, as is proven in the objection.

TO THE ARGUMENT, therefore, it is to be said to the first that it does not follow: because although man and woman are in one species, they are, however, differently related in sex to generation: and therefore it is not of the nature of woman what is of the nature of man.

To the other, it is to be said that there is a likeness in a certain respect, namely in imperfect desire: because a woman is imperfect as matter: but yet as proximate matter, she is not of many forms, thus neither is a proper woman of many men: but it is not similar in this that remote matter desires many forms.

To the other, it is to be said that superiors are not proper movers of inferiors, but rather common: but if proper matter is taken, it will be only one. However, a man is not similar to a proper and conjoined mover, but rather to a separate and common one, as was held before: just as the recipient is always proper, although the impressor is frequently common.

To the other, it is to be said that in animals there is diversity, nor do many males follow one female, except in those for whom there is no concern for the upbringing of children: and such an animal is not man: whence also dogs do not recognize their offspring, nor are they solicitous for them, but rather the female dogs: but in man, it is not so, but he imitates the nature of those who certainly discern their children, and are solicitous for them with special affection.

To the other, it is to be said that a woman is related as a recipient proportioned to one infusing, and not as a recipient commonly for the reasons induced above: but a proportioned recipient is not receptive of many. And this

In the manner all natural recipients are disposed, which are filled by the acts of those from which they receive: for in all such cases the recipient is determined, and the filling is separate, being the fulfilling of many.

Articulus 4 — Whether Before The Law Of Grace Only The Lustful Were Bigamists

Whether before the law of grace only the lustful were bigamists?

ARTICLE LY.

Whether before the law of grace only the lustful were bigamists?

Fourthly, it is asked, whether only the lustful were then bigamists?

It seems that they were: because

1. It is said in the Text that the first Lamech is read to have introduced bigamy or to have had two wives: and this is concluded because he is said to have done it for the fulfillment of carnal pleasure: therefore it seems that only such were reprehensible for bigamy at that time.

1. Likewise, in the Text it says that the marriages of the Patriarchs are compared to the celibacy of this time. Therefore it seems that they are not accused of anything: therefore neither of bigamy.
2. Likewise, that someone is called a bigamist, this is by reason of a violated sign, as was held above: but in the marriage of the Patriarchs there was the best sign: therefore it seems that they are not accused of bigamy from having many. The first is evident from what was said in the question about bigamy. The second is written, 32, question 4, where Augustine says that the generation of Jacob through the handmaids signifies those reborn through the wicked, but the generation through the free women signifies those reborn through the good: and both pertain to the inheritance, because they are from the seed of the father.

On the contrary of this is that someone is made a bigamist in four ways, as was touched upon above: and one of these is he who has many at the same time: but the ancient fathers had many at the same time: therefore they were bigamists.

Which is to be conceded.
To the first, it must be said that Lamech is first reprehended for sin, and not for bigamy, because he was not reprehensible: and also then it did not obstruct the priesthood, because there was not a true priesthood there, but only a figure of our true priesthood.

To the other, it must be said that the comparison is made in personal merit and utility, which is for the variety of time: but the comparison is not made in integrity.

And thus the solution to the whole is clear: because the last has a sign not a sacrament, but an allegory.

But for the individuality of marriage to be preserved, it is necessary that the sacramental sign of marriage be preserved: and this is not preserved in the marriage of the ancients who had many.

Articulus 5 — Whether It Was Ever Lawful To Have A Concubine

Whether it was ever permissible to have a concubine?

Fifthly, it is asked whether it was ever permissible to have a concubine?

And this question is one cause of the decree of Gratian.

And it is objected concerning Abraham, who sought offspring from a concubine, Genesis 25:1, and concerning Jacob, who sought offspring from two maidservants, Genesis 29 and 30, throughout: and concerning many others. Therefore, it seems that this was permissible at some time.

Likewise, Leviticus 19:20 says, "Whoever lies carnally with a woman who is a slave, he shall not be punished, nor shall he be condemned: because she is his property." Therefore, if in the Old Testament by divine law it was not punished by death of the body, then it does not seem that now it ought to be punished or imputed to the death of the soul.

On the contrary of this is what Ambrose says in the book on the Patriarchs: "Let no one flatter himself, by the laws of men every fornication is adultery, nor is it permitted for a man what is not permitted for a woman: because the same chastity is owed by a man as by a wife. Whatever is committed with one who is not a legitimate wife is condemned by the crime of adultery."

Likewise, it is not permitted for anyone to know a woman except his wife: therefore, the right of marriage is given, lest you fall into a snare, and sin with another's woman. It is not permitted for anyone to have intercourse with a maidservant, that he might seek children from her.

Response. It must be said that it was never permissible to know a maidservant or another's woman, but a maidservant taken in marriage by the instinct of the Holy Spirit: and thus the Patriarchs did.

And through this the solution is clear.

Articulus 6 — How The Good Of The Sacrament Was Preserved In The Marriages Of The Ancients

How was the good of the sacrament preserved in the marriages of the ancients?

Sixthly, it is asked, How was the good of the sacrament preserved in the marriages of the ancients?

It seems, however, that it was not preserved: because 1. This good is the individuality related by sign to the individuality of the faithful soul with God and of the two natures in Christ: but the ancient fathers were divided into many: therefore, there was not such individuality in their marriages.

1. Likewise, He is not individual who is not unique to one, as was held above in the question of digamy: but the ancient fathers were not unique to one: therefore, in their marriage, there was not the good of the sacrament.
2. Likewise, It seems more to be preserved in him who successively does not use many at once, than in him who uses many at once: and it is not preserved: therefore, neither in him who uses many at once: but such was the marriage of the ancient fathers; therefore, in their marriage, there was not the good of the sacrament.

On the contrary, it is objected that 1. Whatever exceeds the greater, exceeds also the lesser: but the marriage of the ancients exceeds the greater, than is the marriage of our time: therefore, it exceeds also that which is of our time. The first is evident by itself. The second is written in the Letter, that their marriage exceeds the celibacy of our time. Hence thus: Marriage is not said to exceed another except by reason of the goods which are in it: therefore, that marriage had as many or more goods as this: but this has the good of the sacrament: therefore, also that.

1. Likewise, That which signifies the Church according to every difference of its state, signifies it more nobly, than that which signifies it only in general: but the multiple wives of the holy fathers signify the conjunction of the Church with God according to every difference of state, as is evident, 32, question 4, in the decree of Augustine above: therefore, it signifies the conjunction of the Church with God more nobly, than marriage in which one is joined to one: since therefore a lesser sign suffices for marriage for the good of the sacrament: therefore, also a greater: therefore, those marriages had the good of the sacrament.

Response. It must be said that the good of the sacrament and also of celibacy was not preserved in those marriages except in a certain respect and imperfectly: but in the marriage of the New Testament, it is perfectly preserved. I say imperfectly: because there was a sign of the conjunction of the Church with Christ in faith as to the Church militant: but in our marriage, it is as to the Church triumphant: for the Church is joined in faith according to a multiple state with Christ in which one goes thus, another thus: but the triumphant is joined in one state of open vision face to face, which is the whole reward, as Augustine says.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that their marriage is not said to exceed the marriage of our time, except as to the sanctity which is the chastity of the soul, and not in the act of chastity: and this does not regard this sign which is called the sacrament. But as to what it says, that marriage is better and holier in all goods: it must be said that this is false: because marriage is holier with the equal will of the continent: and yet it is not so perfect in signifying as marriage consummated by carnal union, as was held above.

To the other, it must be said that that mode of signifying is rather allegorical from the spouses themselves, than sacramental taken from the individuality of the spouses, as is evident from the aforesaid.

Articulus 7 — Whether It Was Ever Permitted To Any Man To Have Several Wives

Whether it was ever permitted for any man to have multiple wives?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, A, shortly after the beginning: It is permitted by God to join multiple in marriage to oneself, etc.

However, it seems that this was never permitted: because

§1. Nothing of those things which are against human good was ever permitted: but to join multiple to oneself was and is against human good: therefore this was never permitted.

§2. Likewise, it is impossible for one thing to belong simultaneously to two who are not ordered to each other: but the husband belongs to his wife: therefore it is impossible for him to belong to two wives not ordered to each other: but one wife was not ordered to another, but equally they were of the husband: therefore it is impossible for one husband to be matrimonially joined to multiple: no union was ever permitted except matrimonial: therefore it was never permitted to join multiple in marriage to oneself.

§3. Likewise, let it be granted that one belongs to two, perplexity follows: for let it be that both demand their due at one hour, if he satisfies one, it is evident that he becomes unable to satisfy the other: therefore he leaves or defrauds the other: and if he satisfies the other, by the same reasoning he defrauds this one: therefore he is perplexed: but according to the theologian no one is perplexed: therefore it was never permitted for anyone to be joined to multiple.

§4. Likewise, man and woman are judged by equal rights in marriage: a woman could never have multiple husbands: therefore neither could a man have multiple wives: therefore it was never permitted to have multiple.

§5. Likewise, no cause seems to be as is said in the Letter: because when many were then idolaters, an easier and better mode of multiplying the faithful would have been through preaching than through fecundity: therefore it seems that that should have been, and not this.

§6. Likewise, evils are not to be done that good may come, as the Apostle says, Romans 8: but it is evil to have multiple: therefore this was not to be done for any good that could arise from it: therefore it was never permitted for the cause of fecundity and religion to have multiple.

§7. Likewise, when there was a great scarcity of men, no one was joined to multiple, namely neither Adam, nor Seth, nor Noah, nor any of his sons. Jude objects thus: What is not done because of the scarcity of men and divine worship, is not to be done because of the rarity of worship alone: but the joining of one to multiple was not done because of the material scarcity of men: therefore it also should not have been done because of the rarity of worship alone: therefore it was never permitted to have multiple wives.

On the contrary of this are:
1. The examples of the holy Patriarchs, who in no way would have committed something illicit: and they had multiple: therefore this was permitted, and they did it licitly.

1. Likewise, what is prohibited neither by custom nor by law nor by nature, that is permitted: but to have multiple wives is prohibited neither by custom nor by law nor by nature: therefore that is permitted. The first is proven by what is held, 1 Corinthians 6:12, on that: All things are lawful for me, where the Gloss says: This is permitted, which is prohibited by no precept. The second, however, is written shortly below in the Letter: and, 32, question 4: They are objected. And it is proven in Jacob four wives. Letter.

Response. It must be said without prejudice, that if human good is considered from the end of reason ordering the offices of human acts in the city, then it was never permitted to have multiple, although it is not entirely against nature, as was said above.

And if it is objected that the law of nations in laws permits having multiple: it must be said that permission is one thing, ordering that it be so is another: and it must be known that in permissions the law is not ordered to divine justice as it is ordering human acts, but rather as it is permitting certain evil deeds: and therefore unless a dispensation were made concerning this by the familiar counsel of the Holy Spirit, I say that it would never have been permitted: and thus also said Pope Innocent III.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that when the multitude of those leading to idolatry was pressing, and the scarcity of those worshipping God to such an extent that (as Philo narrates in his Pentateuch) Abraham was compelled by prison and fire to offer his name engraved on a brick to posterity for veneration by leaders who came from the East: then by the familiar counsel of the Holy Spirit, the use was had, that they could take multiple, so that with the propagation of seed there would also be the propagation of religion. And from the same cause, it was that they did not want to take wives except from their own progeny, lest the minds of their sons be subverted from divine worship by foreigners, just as also in the New Testament for a time God willed the form of baptism to be done in the name of Christ, as is noted above in the treatise on baptism, not that it should be observed thus thereafter, but rather that his name might be made lovable to men; and then it would return to the true form of baptism.

To the other, it must be said that custom is said in two ways, namely true custom, and that which necessity makes. True custom is a habit serving according to human good to anyone. And if indeed custom is taken thus, such marriage was not of custom. If, however, it is taken in the second way, it is true that then such marriage was of custom, but that custom is nothing else than an observance caused by the necessity of danger, just as we also say that to take another's in time of necessity, if necessity were to last long, would be of custom: yet it would not well follow that it would simply comply with good customs.

Similarly, I say concerning nature: for if nature is taken from the difference of man related to human end, it was never of nature: and from this nature alone are human acts and offices ordered in cities, as is evident in all the books of the Philosophers who have spoken of urbanities and polities. If, however, nature is taken in other ways which are noted above, then it would not be against nature: many things, however, not against such nature, are illicit: for to lie with a woman is not against such nature, and yet it is illicit.

Similarly, I say concerning law: because it is natural and written: and natural seems just as nature. Hence it is against some nature, and against some natural mode it is not. But against the written it was not: because it had not yet been given. And in this way Augustine understands.

Hence it is evident that from this it is not proven that they were simply permitted, but rather from cause and divine dispensation.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Intercourse Of Lot With His Daughters Was Lawful

Whether the intercourse of Lot with his daughters was permissible?

Then it is asked concerning what is said, A, shortly after the beginning: "The daughters used their father Lot while he was drunk," etc.

The example seems inappropriate because:

1. The daughters were not joined to the father in marriage: therefore it is not to the purpose.

1. Likewise, it seems false because wine taken immoderately constrains lust: therefore drunkenness removes lust: therefore they could not use the father while he was drunk.

2. Likewise, it was impossible for him to have intercourse except in imagination: therefore imagination presented a woman to him: therefore it seems false what is said in the text of Genesis, xix, and 33-35, that he did not perceive, neither when he lay with his daughter, nor when he rose.

Response. It must be said that it is similar in regard to the intention of the deed, not in regard to the substance of the deed: because by the intention of conception, not of lust, they were joined to the father: and therefore they are excused not entirely, but to a certain extent. However, other Fathers excused them entirely: Ambrose calls Lot holy: but this must be referred to repentance through subsequent works.

To the other, it must be said that drunkenness is an excess of drink: for it is a measure (as Haymo says on the Apocalypse) a cup in which a man is accustomed to drink, and an excess of the measure which is called a measure. Or, drink is called drunkenness: and this happens in two ways, namely enormously or moderately. Enormously it happens when the excessive humor of wine impedes digestion, and excessive vapor obstructs the passages of imagination and reason: and this drunkenness cuts off intercourse. However, there is another moderate kind, namely when the heat of wine elevates the spirits and subtle blood upwards, but does not block the passages: but nevertheless by strong motion it destroys the stability of images and confuses, so that those things which are before the eyes seem to be doubled: and with closed eyes many things occur as if confused dreams: and this does not cut off intercourse, rather it incites to it from heat, and provides material from moisture, and from the multiplication of motion upwards in the animal spirit it confounds discretion: and yet imagination remains uncertain. And such was the drunkenness of Lot: hence what is said that he did not perceive, is to be understood that he indeed perceived a woman in general, but did not discern whether this one or that one, nor whether it was an image or reality.

Thus through this the solution to both questions is clear.

Articulus 9 — Whether The Marriages Of The Ancients Are Equal To Our Virginity

Whether the marriages of the ancients are equal to virginity?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, A, a little before the middle: When the marriages of those equal our virginity, etc.

Concerning this Augustine thus says in the book On the Good of Marriage: If we compare them, there is no way to doubt that the chastity of continence is better than the chastity of marriage, although both are good. But when we compare men, he is better who has more good than another.[697]

Concerning this, inquire in the treatise on Virgins, question on continence, where I have said and discussed many things: and the safe solution depends on the authority introduced.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Immoderate Use Of Our Time Nearly Imitates The Shamefulness Of The Fornication Of Ancient Times

Whether the immoderate use of our time
almost imitates the baseness
of fornication of ancient times?

Whether the immoderate use of our time
almost imitates the baseness
of fornication of ancient times?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, A, in the middle of the chapter: The immoderate use of marriage of our time almost imitates the baseness of fornication of that time, etc.

For it seems this is false: because fornication of that time was a mortal sin, but the use of marriage never.

Response. It must be said that he speaks as to the intention of the contracting parties in most cases, who in these times contract on account of the infirmity of lust: but then they did not come together except for the sake of receiving offspring. Similarly, fornicators come together for the sake of lust, and not for the sake of receiving offspring. Hence there is a certain similarity in intention, and not in fact.

Articulus 11 — How The Patriarchs And Apostles Took Delight In The Advancement Of Religion

How did the Patriarchs and Apostles delight in the progress of religion?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, A, in the middle: As the Apostles with the listeners marveling, etc.

It seems that nothing is similar: because every man ought to rejoice in good things, and this joy is honorable and beautiful: but the delight of intercourse is always base: therefore, nothing is similar to what is introduced.

697. Augustine, De Bono Conjugali

Response. It must be said that it is similar in that the ultimate intention delighted in both in the progress of religion: but the act of progress was different: for there it was through the flesh, but here through the spirit; yet here and then similarly in one did the Fathers of the Old and New Testaments delight.

Here, however, the whole question concerning continence, and its states, and the comparison of states ought to be set forth: and this was noted before in the treatise on the Cardinal Virtues*, and therefore I entirely pass over it here.

Articulus 12 — Whether It Was More Difficult To Be Continent In Ancient Times Than In These Times

Whether it was more difficult to be continent in ancient times than in these times?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, A, after the middle: Who could and would be continent much more easily, etc.

For every art and virtue is about the difficult and the good: since therefore virtue is about being continent, it was more difficult to be continent than to contract.

To this it must be said that there is difficulty on the part of sensuality: and from that proceeds the objection. There is also difficulty caused according to reason from the force of honesty, just as it is difficult for the just to sin: and concerning that he speaks in the Letter.

Articulus 13 — Whether Under Different Laws Those Who Had Several Wives Were Excused In The Same Way

Whether under different laws those who had multiple wives were excused in the same way?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, A, after the middle: Consider first, that Abraham before the law, etc.

For it seems that this cause is none: because
1. Even under the law many had multiple wives as at the beginning Regeam Elea~nat, and David had, and many others: therefore it is clear that this cause is none.

1. Likewise, the written law is nothing but an explanation of the natural law: therefore it does not excuse, that he did not sin against the written law, because he could have sinned against the natural law.

To this it must be said, that he does not say this for the excuse of Abraham, but because of the state of the time: because then there was a need for material multiplication: and therefore by the familiar counsel of the Holy Spirit (he says) many had multiple wives.

And through this the solution to the second is clear.

To the first it must be said that before the law in the time of Abraham there were much fewer worshipping God than under the law: and therefore they were more excused, and the dispensation was more reasonable.

Articulus 14 — Whether Moderate Intercourse Can Be Absent From Lust

Whether moderate intercourse can be absent from lust?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, A, a little before the end: Which nevertheless modified and restraining, etc.

For it seems that there is no modification there: for if there is any, it is around the passion around which virtue consists, but that is caused in the wife or greater than in the prostitute: therefore it seems that it is not modified.

If perhaps you say that it is modified and restrained by others, and not in the intensity of the passion itself, which is delight. On the contrary: In gluttony I see well also, that to be ardently delighted in a single food is a vice of gluttony, as is evident in Esau, who for a single meal sold his birthright. Therefore, since lust in general is a greater sin than gluttony, it seems also that lust is where there is vehement delight in one woman.

To this it must be said that restraint occurs in two things, namely in the object, because it is confined to one: and restraint occurs in the circumstances, namely that he knows how much is fitting, and when, and where, and how much, etc., which the rhetorician determines.

To the objection on the contrary, it must be said that that excessive delight arises from corrupt nature, and not from reason preordaining: but in gluttony such delight is intended: and therefore one sins, and the other does not.

Articulus 15 — Whether Gluttony Is Well Defined

Whether gluttony is well defined?

Then it is inquired by reason of this which he says, there, A, a little before the end: But that food is licit in sustaining life, etc.

It is inquired, I say, here concerning the species of gluttony, and its daughters.

Concerning the first, five things are inquired.

The second is, Whether gluttony is a carnal vice? The third is, Whether gluttony is concerning what is delightful to taste, insofar as it is taste, or insofar as it is a certain touch? The fourth is, Whether every movement of will is a sin? The fifth, Whether gluttony is a capital vice?

To the first, it is thus proceeded, and it seems that the definition of Hugh of Saint Victor, Gluttony is an immoderate appetite, is incompetent:

1. For gluttony is not only committed concerning the quantity of food, as he says, but also concerning other things, as when it is sought too studiously or ardently: but immodera-tion signifies an excess of quantity: therefore it does not encompass the nature of gluttony.

2. Likewise, Those whose conception is with matter, ought to have matter placed in their definition, as the Philosopher says, of which kind are all natural things: but gluttony has a determined matter: since therefore matter is not placed in its definition, its definition seems incompetent.

3. But it seems that gluttony is only concerning quantity. For contraries are made concerning the same: but the mean of sobriety, to which gluttony is contrary, as the Philosopher wills, is determined according to quantity with respect to us: therefore gluttony will also be only in the excess of quantity.

4. Likewise, The insensible person who lacks appetite for food does not have a moderate appetite for eating, because he does not reach the mean, nor is he moderate: but he is not gluttonous: therefore an immoderate appetite for eating is not the definition of gluttony.

5. Likewise, Gregory places under one chapter drunkenness, which consists in drink, and gluttony, which is especially in food: and that capital vice is defined here: therefore both ought to have been placed, namely of eating and drinking.

6. Likewise, Nothing desires its own corruption: but, as Gregory says, the dignity of the human condition is wounded by immoderation: therefore an immoderate appetite cannot be.

7. Likewise, Sin, as Augustine says, corrupts the mode, species, and order: but gluttony is a certain sin: therefore it ought not only to be defined by the corruption of mode, but also of others.

8. Likewise, As Gregory says, It does not matter what or how much is taken: but an immoderate appetite regards what or how much is taken: therefore it does not matter concerning it: but concerning gluttony it matters, because it is a vice: therefore they will not be in one appetite of eating.

9. Likewise, In a perfect definition it is not sufficient to say what it is, unless it is said why, as the Philosopher says in the book of the Posterior Analytics: but in the said definition it is not said why it is an immoderate appetite: therefore the definition is imperfect.

10. Likewise, In natural appetite few or none err: but in gluttony many err: therefore gluttony is not an immoderate appetite for eating.

11. Likewise, As Augustine says,

The people in the desert did not sin, because they desired, but because they blasphemed from desire: they desired moderately, whence it is said in the text, that the people burned with desire for meat; therefore an immoderate appetite is not a sin: but gluttony is a sin: therefore it is not an immoderate appetite for eating.

1. Likewise, He who is ignorant in what the due mode consists, can desire immoderately: yet he is not gluttonous: therefore the definition is in excess, more than the defined.
2. Likewise, He who provokes others to eat by words is called gluttonous: yet he perhaps does not desire immoderately: therefore the definition does not agree with all of whom the defined is said.

1. Likewise, The gluttonous person not only delights in eating, but also in drinking and smelling: therefore this also ought to be contained in the definition.
2. Likewise, Natural and moral sciences are distinct from each other: but gluttony, since it is a vice, pertains to the moral, but appetite pertains to the natural: therefore gluttony ought not to be defined by appetite.

Solution. It must be said that gluttony can be considered in two ways, either in act or in habit: and the said description is given of it according to how it is in act, because thus the Saints strive to define vices. Hence appetite is taken here for appetite in act, and it is determined by the proper act of gluttony which is to eat, which is an act upon determined matter, namely food: and thus the definition of the act ought to be given. But because gluttony is a vicious act, and evil is specified insofar as it is evil, from the corruption of the opposite habit, therefore it is completely manifested both concerning the nature of the act and concerning the nature of the vice.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that mode is said in two ways. In one way according to the measure of quantity: and in this way it is not deprived here. In another way according to determination to the mean according to all circumstances in which the mean is preserved: and thus mode is substantially the virtue itself, and thus it is deprived here.

To the other, it must be said that determined matter is included in the act of eating which is placed in the definition of gluttony: and therefore it is not necessary to add further.

To the other, it must be said that the Philosopher does not understand that the mean of virtue is determined according to the quantity of the thing in itself, because thus it would be simply the mean of the thing: but as it stands under appetite, and thus it is determined with respect to us, all circumstances being preserved according to the proportion of appetite: whence the mean is corrupted not only by quantity, but also if more is desired than is fitting, or not fitting: and similarly it is concerning other circumstances.

To the other, it must be said that the insensible person, although he does not have a moderate appetite, yet he does not have an immoderate one: because he does not desire. But a composed negation is not carried beyond the term to which it is joined: whence the affirmed appetite remains.

To the other, it must be said that drink is never desired for its own sake, but for carrying food through the limbs: and therefore in the definition of the capital vice it ought not to have been placed, but only the ultimate end.

To the other, it must be said that although nothing desires its own corruption, yet it can desire that which corrupts its own nature, not however insofar as it corrupts, but insofar as it is an apparent good: whence it is a fallacy of the accident.

To the other, it must be said that mode is not deprived here as it divides natural good against species and order, but as it regards the measure of circumstances according to the determined mean: and thus it is substantially the virtue itself, and contains those three.

To the other, it must be said that it does not matter what or how much is taken according to what is in the thing, but according to what is referred to desire, and thus what the moderate appetite desires regards privation.

To the other, it must be said that although the matter from which something is made does not fall into the hands of others: yet concerning which the act is, is the end and moving according to metaphor: and therefore from the determination of the proper matter or object it is determined why.

To the other, it must be said that in those whose appetite is natural, few or none are deceived, according to which their appetite is natural: yet speaking simply concerning those many can be deceived: because, as the Philosopher says, in common things according to which their appetite is natural among all, not many are deprived, as concerning this which is desired for the nourishment of the body: but in proper things which each desires according to his own concupiscence, there is sin, as to desire for sweetness, or something else.

such, which is not common, but proper to the concupiscence according to gluttony.

To the objection, it must be said that in desiring, the people did not sin in the desire of them: but according to the state under the appetite which is enticed by certain proper things added to the common ones; for they sinned because they so ardently desired that they despised the food of the Lord, and by despising God they blasphemed.

To another objection, it must be said that although the ignorant does not observe the mode, he does not corrupt the mode, because he does not will something contrary to the mode: but the immoderate one indicates the corruption of the mode.

To another objection, it must be said that he who provokes with words to gluttony is called gluttonous: for he provokes to this, that they may be like him: but from the fact that he provokes, it is not reduced to gluttony as species to genus, but by reduction of principle, as a point to a line. Hence it is not necessary that according to this the definition of gluttony agrees with him, just as neither the definition of line with point.

To another objection, it must be said that the glutton does not take delight in color and odor for their own sake, but refers everything to the delight which is according to taste: as the Philosopher says at the end of the first Ethics.

To another objection, it must be said that just as the moralist can consider the parts of the soul to a certain extent: just as the physician considers the nature of the eye to know how to cure infirmity. Similarly, however, this consideration pertains to the natural philosopher. For appetite can be considered in two ways: either according to that it is a part of the soul which is the perfection of the natural body, and thus the consideration of it pertains to the natural philosopher: or according to that it is compared to its proper object of virtue, or in an opposite ordination, and thus the moralist can consider it.

Articulus 16 — Whether Gluttony Is A Carnal Sin

Whether gluttony is a carnal sin?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether gluttony is a carnal sin?

And it seems that it is: because

1. Ambrose says: Sin where it arises, there it dies: as Bernard says, Fasting heals the plagues of the body: therefore, since gluttony is healed by fasting, let it be granted to be a plague of the body and of the flesh: and thus it is a carnal sin.

1. Likewise, That sin is called carnal, which is effected in the flesh: but as it is said in the Conferences of the Fathers, the effect of certain sins is consummated in the flesh, such as gluttony and lust, and of certain others not: therefore gluttony is a carnal sin.

On the contrary of this is what the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 6:18: Every sin whatsoever a man does is outside the body, and he excepts only fornication. Gloss: Outside the body, that is, outside the bond of carnal concupiscence. Thus: No carnal sin is outside the bond of carnal concupiscence: therefore gluttony is not a carnal sin.

1. Likewise, To desire is not of the body, but of the soul: but gluttony is defined by desire, as has been said: therefore it is not a carnal sin.

Response. It must be said that a sin is said to be carnal in three ways. Either because it has its first origin from the flesh: and thus every sin in us is carnal, even infidelity, because it has its first origin from the corruption of the flesh contracted through original sin. A sin is also called carnal, which is not perfected without some act or motion of the body, although it also has a spiritual object: and thus anger is also called a carnal sin, because anger does not occur without the boiling of blood and another carnal passion. But infidelity is not thus a bodily or carnal sin: because it consists entirely in the act of the mind. A sin is also called carnal, whose object is delightful to the flesh, in whose conjunction delight is perfected: and thus it is divided against spiritual sin, whose object is spiritual, as anger desires vengeance, and hatred, and pride, and the like. And thus gluttony and lust are called carnal: of which gluttony is about what is delightful to taste, because it is ordered to the conservation of the individual: and lust about what is delightful to touch, because it is ordered to the conservation of the species.

To that which is opposed first in the contrary, it must be said that only lust is said to be a sin in the body, because through it the body is divided, and not through gluttony, although both are about what is delightful to the body.

To the Gloss it must be said that a bond is called from binding: hence gluttony is said to be outside the bond of carnal concupiscence, because reason in the delight of gluttony is not so bound and subverted as by the delight of lust due to its vehemence.

To the second it must be said that although gluttony begins in the act of the soul, nevertheless it is completed in the act of the flesh and about a carnal object, and on this account it is called carnal.

Articulus 17 — Whether Gluttony Is About What Is Pleasing To The Taste

Whether gluttony is concerned with what is pleasurable to taste?

Thirdly, it is asked whether gluttony is concerned with what is pleasurable to taste, insofar as it is taste, or insofar as it is a certain touch?

1. For if some two things are opposed to one, it is necessary that according to some one thing they are opposed to it, which is concerned with that around which its opposite is, because opposites are naturally made around the same, and one is opposed to one in the same mode of opposition:

but temperance is opposed to gluttony and lust: therefore, it is necessary that temperance is concerned with the pleasures of touch: if therefore gluttony is concerned with the pleasures of taste, it will be insofar as it is a certain touch,

1. Likewise, as the Philosopher says, gluttony is concerned with food not insofar as it is around the pleasure of flavor only, but insofar as it is referred to some use which tastes the flavors of foods: and in this the glutton is said to delight: but taste is not referred to the use of nourishment except according to the objects of touch in hot, cold, moist, dry: because from these the body is constituted, and as the Philosopher says, we are nourished from the same things from which we are: therefore gluttony is concerned with taste insofar as it is a certain touch,

In opposition to this is,
L. What Chrysostom says: The region of touch is not divided into two, namely the tongue and the palate: rather, they are common to all parts of the body: therefore gluttony is not concerned with taste as it is touch, but as it is divided to itself.

1. Likewise, as the Philosopher says, a sweet friend loves wine, not because of the wine, but because of the sweetness: but the glutton seems especially a sweet friend: therefore he loves and delights in food because it is sweet: but sweetness is the proper object of taste: therefore gluttony is concerned with such things.

Response. It must be said that gluttony is concerned with taste insofar as it is a certain touch: for it does not only seek to delight in food, insofar as it is a delightful flavor, but insofar as it comes into the use of nourishment: and this is fitting only according to the objects of touch. And we concede the reasons for this,

But to what is first objected in opposition, it must be said that gluttony is not simply concerned with food insofar as it is suitable for the nourishment of the members, but it is necessary that what is suitable be known: but this happens in those two parts, and therefore they are appropriated to gluttony.

To the second, it must be said that the sweetness of food delights because of the suitability of the food: but what is suitable is according to the object of touch: and therefore gluttony is concerned with such things.

Articulus 18 — Whether Every Movement Of Gluttony Is Sin, And Whether Gluttony Is Always Mortal Sin, And Whether Gluttony Is A Greater Sin Than Lust

Whether every movement of gluttony is a sin? and, Whether gluttony is always a mortal sin? and, Whether gluttony is a greater sin than lust?

ARTICLE XVIII, Whether every movement of gluttony is a sin? and, Whether gluttony is always a mortal sin? and, Whether gluttony is a greater sin than lust?

Fourthly, it is asked, Whether every movement of gluttony is a sin?

It seems that it is: because 1. As it is said in the second Sentences, every temptation from the flesh is a sin: but in any movement of gluttony there is a temptation from the flesh: therefore every movement of gluttony is a sin.

1. Likewise, Every appetite in the delight of lust is a sin, so much so that if someone approaches his wife for delight, he sins: but every appetite of gluttony is for the delight of food: therefore every such is a sin.

Further, it is asked, Whether gluttony is always a mortal sin?

And it seems that it is: 1. In sin, there is a threefold occurrence of movement: either when nature precedes and desire follows: or when they move together, so that it is not discerned what moves first: or when desire precedes and nature follows. But when nature precedes and desire mingles, it is a venial sin: therefore it seems that when desire precedes and nature follows, it is mortal: and this is the reason for judging something mortal in gluttony: and this happens many times.

1. Likewise, The excellence of an act corrupts the mean: but the excellence of an act is greatest when reason is forbidden, which happens when desire precedes and nature follows: therefore then the mean of virtue is corrupted: but it is not corrupted except by mortal sin: therefore according to the aforesaid rule it will always be a mortal sin.

2. Likewise, Every abundance corrupts the mean: but gluttony is always consisting in abundance, otherwise it would not always be a vice: therefore it corrupts the mean of virtue, and thus it is always a mortal sin.

3. Likewise, In the acts of men nothing can be more base, unless when the mover is base, the matter is base, and the end is base: but when desire precedes, the mover is base, namely desire: and the end, because it is for delight: and also the matter or object, because it is about a changeable good: therefore nothing can be more base: therefore it is a mortal sin.

Further, it is asked, Which is the greater sin, gluttony or lust?

And it seems that gluttony: because 1. As the Philosopher says, That to which we are more inclined, more opposes the mean: we are more inclined to the delights of gluttony than to the delights of lust, because we cannot be without them: therefore gluttony more opposes the mean of virtue than lust.

1. Likewise, As Augustine says, Where there is greater corruption, there is less sin: the generative is more corrupt than the nutritive, because the generative is also infected: therefore since lust is about generation, gluttony about nutrition, lust will be the greater sin.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: Where there is greater necessity, there is less sin: but greater necessity lies around the delights of gluttony than around the delights of lust: therefore gluttony is the lesser sin.

Response. It must be said that gluttony is always a sin, yet it is not always mortal: nor even whenever desire precedes and nature follows, is it a mortal sin: for this happens whenever someone desires food solely for delight, or intending some utility, either of soul or body: which happens many times without mortal sin. But to know the rule by which we can judge when it is mortal and when venial, it must be noted that for the determination of the mean in which the mean of sobriety consists, three things are required, namely determining reason, and the determined mean, and that with respect to which it is determined, namely the nutritive virtue, so that only as much is taken as the natural virtue can convert, and as much as can suffice to be preserved in its being and in its vigor, and in comparison to the work which it ought to exercise. Similarly, the corruption of the mean can be attended to according to these three: for the corruption of the mean can be according to itself, and according to this the reason of sin cannot be attended to without it being hidden how much the determined mean is: hence the mean can be corrupted in this way with right reason preserved. But if the corruption of the mean is attended to according to that by whose proportion it is determined, if the determination of reason is separated by the intellect, according to this there will be sin in nature which is generated from the superfluity or diminution of food. Therefore, it remains that the rule of sin is taken when the mean is corrupted on the part of right reason: but reason is regulated to determine the mean, either by natural reasons determining the mean according to the proportion of the nutritive virtue: and if it is corrupted according to this, it will be sin in nature, as also a premium: or by civil reasons, so that the mean is determined in foods by civil circumstances, which it is fitting to observe in the conservation of citizens, so that when and where and how much is fitting according to one's condition and according to one's work: and according to this also there is again a civil vice in the corruption of the mean, and not according to the theologian who considers the reason of sin according to the comparison to the guilt of divine vengeance. Sometimes indeed it is regulated by divine reasons to determine the mean: as when it determines by taking less than the natural virtue requires according to its vigor, although it does not subtract from it what it needs for the sustenance of being: or for satisfaction for sin, because with the addition of the necessary at the same time concupiscence is increased, or also for some statute. And in this consideration is the measure of sin when reason determines the mean against the precept, it is a mortal sin: when indeed there is no contrary precept, but it determines beyond the precept, it is a venial sin. And this is universally to be held in all in which there can be mortal and venial sin.

We concede the first two objections.

To the other, it must be said that not whenever desire moves for delight, is it a mortal sin, for although desire precedes, yet nature does not altogether follow, so as to place its end in that delight, but it can still be regulated, although it follows desire in some way.

Similarly, to the following it must be said.

To the other it must be said that because the mean is hidden, it suffices to be the proper mean, however much it is departed from the mean in some way, but when it is perfectly departed from it to the contrary,

To the other it must be said that the end is not simply base: because the delight of food is not placed as the ultimate end in which one rests so as to be turned away from God, but it is baser when it is placed as the ultimate end,

To what is further asked, it must be said that gluttony is a lesser sin than lust.

To what is objected, That to which we are more inclined, etc., it is said to oppose the mean more, not because it differs more from the mean, but because it more hinders that one may reach the mean, and for this reason it is a lesser sin.

To the other it must be said that the generative is said to be infected and more corrupt because of the vehemence of delight: but such corruption induces infirmity: and therefore it does not excuse from sin, as the conclusion wishes.

Articulus 19 — Whether Gluttony Is A Capital Vice

Is gluttony a capital vice?

Fifthly, it is asked whether gluttony is a capital vice?

And it seems that it is not:
1. For whatever vice is reduced to something before it, is not capital; but gluttony is of this kind: therefore it is not a capital vice. By the proper middle. If two things are opposed to one, there must be something common to them according to which they are opposed, for one is opposed to one: but gluttony and lust are opposed to temperance: therefore there must be one common vice to both, which will be prior to both, because the common is prior to the proper.

1. Likewise, as the Commentator says on the fourth of the Ethics: the incontinent is one who eagerly hunts after every pleasurable thing: but incontinence which is about any pleasurable thing is prior to that which is about some determinate pleasurable thing, such as gluttony: therefore it is not a capital vice, since it has something prior to it.
2. If you say that gluttony does not have any vice in reality before it, but only according to reason: this, however, does not take away from it the notion of a head. On the contrary: Whatever things are such that they fall under the will according to more and less, those can be separated according to the act of reason which the appetite follows, and concerning those there can be different inordinations in ordering the act of the will: but concupiscence in the whole is less voluntary, as the Philosopher says, than in part, for few or none desire to be concupiscent: but those things in which concupiscence is determined, such as foods, many desire: therefore concerning concupiscence in the whole and in part there can be different inordinations of the will, and thus a different vice in reality, and not only in reason: and thus follows what is prior.
3. Likewise, on that of Psalm 134, 8: "Who smote the firstborn of Egypt," the Gloss says: The firstborn of Egypt are gluttony and lust, which the belly first generates: but the belly is not taken for the nature, because from this evil is not generated per se: but it must be taken for some vice of the belly: which is not gluttony, because nothing generates itself, but something prior to it: therefore gluttony is not a capital vice.
4. Likewise, as Isidore says: From gluttony drunkenness and revelry are generated, which is gluttony: therefore it is a capital vice, because it is generated.
5. But since contraries are those which are most distant, that vice would be contrary, whose act is most intense in the corruption of the mean: but such an act is concerning the most intense pleasurable thing, which is not pleasurable in common, but rather a proper pleasurable thing: therefore, a capital vice will not be a vice which is concerning a pleasurable thing, but rather gluttony which is concerning the pleasurable thing of food.
6. Likewise, as the Commentator says on the fourth of the Ethics, gluttony is called from "gaster" which is belly, and "margia" which is madness; but madness denotes a vehement appetite which is not subject to the governance of reason: such an appetite, however, cannot be except concerning a determinate pleasurable thing of the belly, since a pleasurable thing in common does not have the perfect notion of a pleasurable thing: therefore gluttony is not a common vice, but the same as gluttony: and since it is a capital vice, gluttony also is a capital vice.

Response. It must be said that gluttony is a capital vice: and we concede the reasons for this: for it is of the nature of a capital vice that it has an object containing the complete notion of a pleasurable thing, so that it need not be referred to another, but is posited as the end of the appetite in which it perversely delights, to the attainment of which even other things are called together in the cause: just as a prince in an army calls his subjects to his aid, and even other princes: to the likeness of which it is called a head in vices: and all this agrees with gluttony.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that gluttony is not reduced to any prior vice which has the complete notion of a pleasurable thing in its object, but to something which is prior according to reason: and this reduction, since it is not to a head, but to a genus, does not take away the notion of a head.

To the second, it must be said that incontinence is one mode of the seven which he enumerates: yet it is not a capital vice, nor are there more from the other modes enumerated there.

To the other, it must be said that although it may happen that there is some vice which disorders the will concerning a pleasurable thing in common, yet such a pleasurable thing does not have the perfect notion of a pleasurable thing. For sensible delight is a generation in the sensible soul, as the Philosopher says, concerning which is gluttony: but perfect delight is only in the act of conjunction suitable to itself: but the acts of singulars are and most of all of the sensible soul. Hence delight can be perfect in two ways: either because it precedes the act as is the delight of hope, or because the object is common, and needs addition to become singular, and desire and delight are perfected in it: and therefore that vice which is concerning a pleasurable thing in common cannot be capital, but rather is concerning a determinate pleasurable thing, as is gluttony, and lust.

To the other, it must be said that the belly is taken for the habitual concupiscence of the belly, from which those arise as from a cause, not as from a head, but as from a root.

To the other, it must be said that gluttony is the same as gluttony, and revelry is not called gluttony in common, but its daughter: for revelry is in banquets, which happen when each one puts forth his part, or in some similar way.

Articulus 20 — Whether The Five Species Of Gluttony Have Been Well Assigned By Gregory

Whether the five species of gluttony assigned by Gregory are well assigned?

Secondly, it is questioned concerning the species of gluttony. Gregory assigns five species of gluttony over chapter xxv of Genesis, which are contained in this verse:

Hastily, sumptuously, excessively, ardently, eagerly.

1. It seems that in what is excessive eating, there is no species of gluttony: because, as Tullius says in the book of Offices, four things determine, namely nature, reason, fortune, and will: but nature is not the same in all, so that the quantity of food can be determined by it, because what is excessive for one is little for another: reason, however, follows nature, nor is it contrary to itself: nor are all men of one fortune, because one is rich, and another poor: nor is the will the same: therefore concerning what is excessive, there is no vice of gluttony, since there is no determined mode there.

2. Likewise, as it is said in the Collations of the Fathers, fasting is indifferent: therefore when its opposite consists in excessive eating, it is not a vice.

3. Likewise, fault and punishment differ: but excessive eating is a punishment, both with respect to nature which is burdened, and with respect to the things which are expended: therefore it is not a fault: and thus truly it is not under the species of fault.

1. Likewise, it seems that concerning what is hastily, there is no species of gluttony: for different people desire food at different hours, and without vice, either from nature or from custom: as it is read in the Itinerary of Clement, concerning Clement, that when he came to Peter, they desired food before the day, because he was accustomed to it with sailors: nor is he reproved: therefore it seems that there is no determined time for taking food, which to anticipate is a vice.

2. Likewise, either the time from whose anticipation there is a vice is determined by nature, or by the Church: but not by nature, because the nature of different people requires food at different times: nor does it seem to be able to be determined by the Church, because it is not determined by any Scripture, and especially since it does not suit nature: therefore it seems in no way determined time, and thus the same as before.

3. Likewise, it seems that concerning what is sumptuously, no species of gluttony is taken: for sumptuously is the same as eating sumptuously, which is done for the cleanliness which is required concerning food: but cleanliness is not blameworthy: whence the Lord often in the Old Testament commanded sanctification: therefore concerning this there is no species of gluttony.

4. Likewise, it seems concerning what is ardently, that there is no species of gluttony: for that which is not in our power is not a vice: but to desire food ardently is not in our power, but either it is from infirmity, as in embolism, and then it is more a punishment than a fault: or also from the vigor of natural heat: therefore concerning this there is no gluttony.

5. Likewise, it seems that concerning all these together there is no gluttony: for as Augustine says, all human perversity consists in enjoying what should be used, or using what should be enjoyed: all these can occur together, yet no one enjoys what should be used: therefore there will also be no perversity: therefore concerning this there will be no gluttony.

Response. It must be said that the aforementioned are the accidental species and modes of gluttony: and gluttony is divided by them as by accidents: and their number can thus be taken from the properties of gluttony. For what provokes to an immoderate appetite for eating is either intrinsic or extrinsic. If extrinsic: this can be in two ways: either because the species of the food itself provokes, as when food is sought inordinately chosen and precious: as it is said,

Amos, vi, 4: "Who eat the lamb from the flock, and calves from the midst of the herd": and thus it is sumptuously. Or the adjunct of the species provokes, which makes it more desired, like taste, and other such things, of which Bernard says, that they deceive the palate: and thus it is eagerly. If, however, the appetite which is within provokes: thus it is in two ways: because either it is according to what precedes the act, and thus it is hastily: or according to what is in the act of eating: and this again in two ways: because either the appetite is immoderate in itself, as when it pours itself entirely over the food, and thus it is ardently: or in comparison to the object, because namely it desires too much of the food, and thus it is excessively.

To what is first objected, it must be said that although due to the diversities of men a mode in the quantity of food cannot be determined in particular, it can nevertheless be determined in common, which will be a rule by which someone can be directed in most or all: just as a legislator (as the Philosopher says) cannot by establishing a law consider all particulars without in some case someone transgressing the established law without punishment: just as if against prohibition someone ascends a wall to defend against enemies: for if the legislator were present, he would discern this to be done: nevertheless right reason can determine in three ways the quantities of food in particular, by divine, civil, or natural reasons: and thus by transgressing the mode, one sins concerning what is excessive eating.

To the other it must be said that fasting considered in itself is indifferent: however, according to what is added to it by some cause from divine reasons, as because it is done for satisfaction, or to repress the concupiscence of the flesh, it is good: but according to what is considered without such a cause, thus it is blameworthy, and it is the vice of insensibility, in which one is diminished in food.

To the third it must be said that excessive eating is not fault and punishment for the same reason: but it is punishment in comparison to the effect, fault however as it is considered in itself without the mode of due quantity from a freely operating cause.

To the fourth it must be said that although time cannot be determined for all in particular, it can nevertheless be determined in common, according to which it will be regulated by its own reason in its operation: and the determined time is in common at the sixth hour, as Hugo of Saint Victor says over the rule.

To the fifth it must be said that the time of eating is found determined in Scripture, as Peter says, Acts ii, 15: "For these are not drunk, as you suppose, since it is the third hour of the day": considering after the third hour it is fitting to be the time of taking food commonly, which is at the sixth hour. It is also determined by nature: for the fitting time of taking food is when heat is called forth to the exterior: for then the stomach is empty, and winds and fumes settle, and then it desires: the time of the calling forth of heat to the exterior is determined according to the motions of the sun itself heating. The middle of the sun's motion is from the meridian of the sky, where the sun is at the sixth hour. If therefore food is taken, since it is necessary to give to the taking of food and its placement in the place of digestion at this time, it indeed serves for the fourth part of the natural day, in which the sun moves to the point of the West: but because for digestion to occur, it is necessary to gather heat within, which was outside by the heat of the sun: and this is successively completed by the constriction of pores and the subtraction of the sun's rays until the end of another fourth, when the sun is in the angle of the night, namely in the part opposite the beginning of its motion: then another fourth serves for complete digestion until the sun comes to the point of the horizon. But because digested nourishment must be divided through the limbs, which cannot be done without heat carrying it to each limb: however, heat when it is gathered cannot carry nourishment through the limbs unless it is called forth to the outside by the heat of the sun, therefore when the sun begins to ascend, heat begins to carry nourishment: and when the sun has reached the middle, nourishment is completely distributed to each limb: and then is the hour of taking food, and it is the sixth hour. That indeed the motion of the sun begins from the meridian of the sky is proved by Psalm xvi, 7, where it says: "From the summit of the sky is its going forth": and it speaks literally of the motion of the sun. It can also be proved astronomically: because from that point the sun begins to move, where the motion of the sun is divided into equal arcs: but this does not happen at the point of the horizon, or in the East, or West: because thus day and night would always be equal: but they are equalized at the point of the meridian of the sky: because as much as is diminished in one fourth of the day, so much is added in the fourth of the night: and therefore there the motion of the sun will stand. A natural reason can also be assigned: because when the sun begins to ascend at dawn, heat is excited and moisture exhales: and thus when the ascent of the sun is completed, moisture has already exhaled, and the limbs emptied need food, as the Philosopher says in the book on the Conservation of Health, that it is not the time of taking food until a man is emptied of the prior food.

To the sixth it must be said that sumptuously is not said when cleanliness is sought in those things which pertain to food: but when those things are sought according to the mode, when sumptuously among others, as a lamb is chosen from the whole herd.

To the seventh it must be said that although in

Although the vehemence of appetite is not in our power, yet it is in our power to follow the appetite or to restrain it, not pouring ourselves out entirely upon food.

To the eighth, it must be said that although sometimes in these matters there is not a perfect fruit, when there is venial sin, yet it is not entirely a use, but is a disposition towards fruit, just as venial is to mortal: and therefore there is some perversity, although not mortal.

Articulus 21 — Whether The Daughters Of Gluttony Are Well Assigned

Whether the daughters of gluttony are well assigned?

Thirdly, it is questioned concerning the daughters of gluttony.

Gregory assigns five, namely, much speaking, scurrility, inept joy, uncleanness, and dullness of mind.

1. It seems that much speaking arises from the weakness of reason: but drunkenness, which pertains to gluttony, especially impedes reason: therefore it is not a daughter of gluttony.

2. Likewise, it seems that scurrility is not a daughter of gluttony: for one daughter cannot have two mothers: but according to Isidore, scurrility is a daughter of lust: therefore it is not a daughter of gluttony.
3. Likewise, it seems that dullness of mind is not a daughter of it: for punishment is divided against fault: but dullness is a certain punishment: therefore it ought not to be placed among the vices generated from gluttony.
4. Likewise, it seems that uncleanness is not a daughter of it: for uncleanness is a species of lust, whereby someone procures the delight of intercourse without intercourse by some movement of their own body: therefore it seems to pertain more to lust than to gluttony.

If it is said that such uncleanness is not called a daughter of gluttony, but that which is in foods.

On the contrary: Augustine in the book "On the Conflict of Three and Four" enumerates the uncleanness of which it was spoken among the daughters of gluttony: for he introduces it speaking thus: "It is a crime to delight in some movement of the limbs without intercourse": therefore the response was nothing.

1. Likewise, it seems that inept joy is not a daughter of it: for inept joy is joy from evil: but this is in every sin, as it is said in Proverbs 2:14: "They rejoice when they have done evil, and exult"; therefore it ought not to be placed among the worst things specifically as a daughter of gluttony.
2. Likewise, Isidore places two, namely drunkenness and revelry. Gregory, however, otherwise. Therefore either one is superfluous, or the other is diminished.
3. Likewise, in the "Conferences of the Fathers" it is said that from gluttony is born lust, from lust avarice, from which is born anger: therefore this anger ought to be counted among the daughters of gluttony.
4. Likewise, what is generated not according to univocal generation does not have the name of a son, as Augustine says, that a worm is born from a body, yet they do not call it a son, nor is a man the son of the sun: but the generation of the said daughters from gluttony is not according to univocal generation, since there is no likeness in species: therefore the aforementioned ought not to be called daughters of gluttony.
5. Likewise, Ambrose says: "A base thing generates a baser daughter: while Chrysostom says, nothing is baser than gluttony: therefore it has no daughter."

Response. It must be said that the same vice is called both mother and head, although for different reasons: it is called head because it has the end of perfect delight which it enjoys, to the attainment of which it calls others in considering that it receives something from outside: hence from the reason of such calling it is called head. But for another reason it is called mother: because a mother is one who generates from another, and is called mother from the reception of something external: just as by the conception of the end it produces another vice, so that it may have the perfection of delights in it, just as gluttony produces much speaking, so that the delight is consummated not only in eating, but in making it more delightful by vain words. The same is true in virtues: for some virtue like charity calls the act of another virtue to its end, just as someone believes in God not for the first truth, but for love: and this is to import an act: and it is said that charity imports the act of other virtues, but it only elicits its own act which is to love, it is said to elicit that act which it produces by way of nature, and of one nature thus is its own act. Because therefore different vices can call some vice to their end, it is not inconvenient that the same vice is called the daughter of different vices for different reasons, because the reason of filiation is from the end: hence according to the diversity of the end there will be a diversity of reason. Therefore, in the aforementioned way, those five are said to be daughters of gluttony.

And their number can be taken thus: for what follows gluttony; either it follows it according to its matter, or according to its effect. But since gluttony consists in the delightful according to taste, according to the conjunction of such delightful and its effect, there is a multiplication of spirits and heat exciting vapors: and thus multiplied by gluttony they can be referred to the heart, which is the immediate principle of bodily passions, and thus from the dilation of the heart will also be caused inordinate joy spreading through the limbs, and dissolving them from the restraint of modest honesty: and thus is inept joy. Or they are referred to the brain, which is the proximate principle of animal operations: and thus phantasms are multiplied, as appears in sleep, how much more in wakefulness and not less: and hence words are multiplied not measured by reason, and thus proceeds much speaking, because wine, as it is said, makes a man speak by talents. Or they are referred to both: and thus scurrility is produced, when someone by illicit words and gestures and dissoluteness provokes others to laughter. On the part of the matter as it serves the generative there is uncleanness, because it is a species of lust due to the multiplication of matter arising from gluttony: but according to what is drawn to the higher, dullness of mind is produced.

To the first and second, therefore, it must be said that much speaking and scurrility according to different reasons are daughters of gluttony or of lust: for according to what someone by illicit words or deeds intends to provoke a harlot to use and to delight with her, it is a daughter of lust: but according to what is from food and for the delight of food, it is a daughter of gluttony.

To the third, it must be said that dullness of intellect which is from nature or sickness is not called a daughter of gluttony, but that which is from depraved action, whereby someone is affected around the delights of food and becomes wholly carnal, and does not perceive spiritual things: as Chrysostom says, that not so vehemently does the course of flowing waters usually gnaw and undermine the banks, as do delights and luxury undermine all the foundations of our health. For if you enter a medical office and inquire, you will find almost all the causes of diseases there. For a frugal and slight table is the mother of health: and for this reason the skilled of the physicians have named it so, not indeed calling satiety health (for the lack of food is health), and less aptly calling satiety the mother of health. But if poverty is the mother of health, it is clear that satiety is the mother of sickness and produces infirmities and diseases. Even those who transgress the art of the physicians, foot pains, and heaviness of the head and dizziness, and torments and tremors of the hands and relaxations and curvatures, and long and burning fevers, and many more than these (for it is not possible to run through all) are usually born not from lack and frugal living, but from gluttony and satiety.

To the fourth, it must be said that uncleanness pertains to lust as a species, to gluttony as a daughter to which it supplies material.

Another is solved above in the response.

To the fifth, it must be said that inept joy which is from evil is not taken here, which is common to every sin, as was said.

To the sixth, it must be said that the two which Isidore places are taken according to the general things into which the object of gluttony is divided, namely into food, around which is revelry: and drink, around which is drunkenness: but the five which Gregory places are taken in whatever way something is born from gluttony.

To the seventh, it must be said that that production is by way of root, not by way of mother.

To the eighth, it must be said that they are not called daughters properly, but only metaphorically.

To the ninth, it must be said that a vice can be called baser in two ways: either according to the quantity of fault, and in this way gluttony is not the basest: or according to ignominy, and in this way nothing is baser than it: because, as Gregory says, carnal vices are of lesser fault, and of greater reproach: nor is it necessary that the saying of Ambrose be understood universally.

Articulus 22 — Whether The Saints Who Say That It Is Good For All Men To Be Virgins Judge Well

Whether the Saints think rightly who say it is good for all men to be virgins?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, B, shortly before the end: He served his law and his time, let us also serve our law and our time, etc.

For from this it seems that Jerome wished that all would be virgins.

And it contributes to the same, what is said, 1 Corinthians VII, 7: For I wish all of you, that is, to remain to be like myself in chastity.

However, this seems to be inconvenient: because if all were chaste, the world would be dissolved: and God does not wish the world to be dissolved: therefore it seems that He does not wish all men to be chaste, therefore since the Apostle wished this, he did not conform his will with the divine will, which is inconvenient.

To this it must be said, that some say, that it was revealed to the Saints speaking in such a manner, that if those present remained chaste, the number of the elect would be fulfilled. But because this cannot be proven by any reason, therefore others say otherwise, namely that the will there is perfect and conditional: and the sense is, I wish all of you to be like myself, that is, I would wish, if it were possible. But because it is not probable that the saints had an imperfect will, therefore others say, that the distribution is understood divisively thus: I wish all, etc., that is, concerning each one I wish this divisively, although concerning each one I do not wish the same conjointly.

Otherwise it can be said as Jerome here suggests, that the Apostle wishes this according to the condition of the time: whence the sense is, I wish all, etc., as much as is opportune for the time. And yet Jerome says, that just as they were in their time, so we in ours.

And through this the solution to all objections is clear.

Articulus 23 — Whether The Concubines Of The Patriarchs Were Handmaids Or Wives

Whether the concubines of the Patriarchs were maidservants or wives?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is stated there, LB, at the end: For now he calls wives, etc.

It seems that they are not concubines: because
1. If a maidservant is led into marriage by her master, she is made free: because according to the law of marriage, a wife is from the side, lest she be held as a maidservant.

However, it is evident that such a great Patriarch did not engage in fornication with maidservants. Therefore, they were truly and freely wives: therefore they should not be called concubines.

1. Likewise, they received an equal portion with the other brothers: but this could not be unless they were legitimate sons: but they are not legitimate unless from a free and legitimate wife: therefore neither concubines nor maidservants should be called the mothers of those sons.

On the contrary, it is stated in Genesis 25:6 that Abraham gave gifts to the sons of the concubines when he separated them from the inheritance: therefore they were not legitimate sons.

Response. I think it should be said here that the maidservants remained joined with conjugal affection: so that the future mystery might be signified: whence, in 32, question 4, Augustine gives the reason, what the maidservants signify, and what the free women signify.

To the first objection, therefore, it should be said that it is true in a marriage that is of one with one: but in other marriages where one by the dispensation of God has several, it is not necessary that it be so: because the wives would remain in a condition more suitable for signifying the future state.

To the other, it should be said that this was not general: hence neither legitimately nor from a concubine were the sons of any father pertaining to the future inheritance, unless concerning whom the Lord had commanded. And therefore Ishmael, born of a maidservant, is cast out, and Esau, born of a free woman: so that it may be known that the whole inheritance is possession from the one choosing, and not from one's own merits or those of others.

And thus the solution is clear.

Articulus 24 — Whether The Ancient Fathers Having Wives And Handmaids As Concubines Kept The Fidelity Of The Bed

Whether the ancient fathers having wives and maidservants as concubines kept the fidelity of the bed?

Whether the ancient fathers having wives and maidservants as concubines kept the fidelity of the bed?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, C, If anyone objects, etc.

However, it seems that there was not fidelity of the bed in that marriage: because
1. Fidelity of the bed in itself has that one is not joined to another: but they were joined to others: therefore they did not keep the fidelity of the bed.

1. Likewise, Fidelity of the bed binds both spouses equally: but the woman does not have power over her body for another man: therefore neither does the man for another woman: since therefore the men of that time joined themselves to another woman, it seems that they did not keep the fidelity of the bed.

Response. It must be said that the fidelity of the bed was kept according to the requirement of the time and the dispensation concerning having many, as the Master says in the Text. And therefore it was kept in this respect, that they were not joined to others except their own wives, and with the intention of offspring: nor did the woman have the power to demand otherwise.

And through this the solution to the first is clear.

To the second, however, it must be said that the fidelity did not then bind both equally, due to the causes stated above, and due to the dispensation of marriage, which was then, the reason for which dispensation has been sufficiently stated above.

Articulus 25 — Of What Kind The Bill Of Divorce Was, And What Was Written In It

What sort of document of repudiation was it, and what was written in it?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, C, around the middle: However, he permitted divorce to be made by giving a document of repudiation, etc.

Three things are asked here.

The first is, What sort of document of repudiation was it, and what was written in it?

The second, Why was it permitted?

The third, Whether those who took dismissed women sinned? and, Whether they could be saved in second marriages if they did not return to the first marriages?

To the first, it is objected thus: L. Deuteronomy xxiv, 1 and 2, the Lord says:

If a man takes a wife, and has her, and she does not find favor in his eyes because of some indecency, he shall write a document of repudiation, and give it into her hand, and send her away from his house. However, since the text says some indecency, and does not specify, it seems that she could be dismissed for any indecency.

1. Likewise, the Gloss on the same place says that there were many causes, therefore it seems that for which a man could dismiss his wife according to the law. He could allege any indecency against her.
2. Likewise, it is commonly said by the saints Jerome, Augustine, and Ambrose, that Moses permitted the document of repudiation lest homicide be committed: but any indecency could be a cause of hatred of the husband towards the wife: however, hatred leads to homicide: therefore, for any indecency, the wife could be dismissed.

On the contrary, it is objected thus: Every marriage that was before the law of nature, in which there was perfect multiplication of the faithful spiritual, was ordered to fecundity: therefore, a foul wife ought not to be repudiated, unless in that in which fecundity could not be found: therefore, only those indecencies ought to be repudiated, which impede the good in the body and soul conceived of women. I say, however, in the body, as if she were simply sterile, or to the one whom she had as a husband: or if she were suffering from chronic illness, such as leprosy, epilepsy, paralysis, hemorrhoids, menstruation, and the like: for all these impede conception, or destroy what is born in the body. In the soul, however, foul, if she were contumacious, turning daughters away from God, and the like.

If perhaps it is said that it ought to have been so according to the reason of the time: nevertheless, men did not observe it thus. On the contrary: It is not asked here about the justice of the person, but rather about the justice of the law given through Moses: since therefore the law is a certain written right adopting the honorable prohibiting the contrary, as the Philosopher says, it must have honorable causes: therefore, it seems that the document of repudiation could only be given for these causes.

Further, it is asked here, Whether the causes of dismissal were written in the document?

It seems that they were: because 1. Otherwise, the dismissal seems to be unjust: therefore, it seems that the causes of dismissal were written.

1. Furthermore, this is expressly stated in the Letter, where the Master and the Gloss on Matthew, v, 31, say that in that document they wrote the causes for which they were dismissed.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: Those causes were either sufficient or insufficient. If insufficient: then they precluded her way to second marriages: and this was not to be done, because second marriages are granted in the same place. But if they were not sufficient: then it was shown that the dismissal was unjust: therefore none: because an unjust dismissal is none. Since therefore she was not yet dismissed according to the law from the first husband, again her way to second marriages was precluded: and it was inconvenient, since they are granted to her according to the law.

To this, saving better judgment, I think it should be said that the document of repudiation was not given for any indecency: for if there was any indecency which he could see or know when he contracted marriage with her, it seems to me that he could not dismiss her for that, but he was bound to sustain her for the faith of marriage. Similarly, if there was any bodily indecency not diminishing or taking away the good of offspring, it seems to me that neither could the wife be dismissed for that.

But if it is objected that it was done lest a greater evil occur: it must be said that this is true: but nevertheless, a cause of hatred which could move was to be set forth. However, a cause which could not commonly move to hatred could not be a cause of separation. For if he had killed his wife out of will, the law would have avenged upon him: and so it avenged when there was no cause which could move to hatred, if he had killed her.

However, the causes introduced in the objection could greatly move for the state of that time.

To the first, it must be said that the Lord says some indecency: because there are many things which either take away offspring or corrupt it in soul or body: and therefore he did not specify in particular. It could also be said that he did not specify in particular so that he might leave any particular case in doubt: so that they might fear more to dismiss,

By this, the solution to the following is also clear.

To the first, however, which is further asked, it must be said that the causes could be written in two ways, namely in general and in particular. In general, I think well that they were written, as the two objections introduced prove. However, not in particular: because by this, prejudice would have been done to the woman.

Articulus 26 — How The Bill Of Divorce Was Permitted

How was the bill of divorce permitted?

Secondly, it is asked, How was that bill permitted?

1. For laws proceed differently in the judgment of external acts and causes, and differently in the judgment of conscience: because in the judgment of causes, a lesser evil is tolerated to prevent a greater evil, but not in the judgment of conscience. However, God judges according to conscience: therefore, no law ought to have been given by Him in which any evil would be permitted: therefore, it seems that if the law is unjust, it was not given by God: but if it is just, then it was not a permission, but rather a law ordering and obliging to observance.

2. Likewise, Chrysostom on Matthew says: It was permitted by Moses. From this, I argue that just as divorce, indeed an evil, was nevertheless lawful: for the reason that the Apostles permitted second marriages because of the incontinence of men. Hence, just as marriages are lawful in the New Testament, so divorce given by a bill was lawful in the Old Testament: therefore, that bill was lawful.

3. Likewise, human judgment, especially given by God, is exemplified by divine judgment: but I see that if a case was brought, a sentence was given according to the judgment of the Lord for the man, who could dismiss his wife, having given such a bill. Since therefore this judgment was informed by justice which was exemplified by divine justice, the judgment itself was just: therefore, both the bill and the divorce and all that followed from it were just and lawful.

On the contrary of this is, 1. What the Lord says, Matthew 19:8, that Moses permitted you to dismiss your wives because of the hardness of your hearts, namely to give a bill of divorce: but what is permitted because of the hardness of heart is simply unjust: therefore, that bill was simply unjust.

1. Likewise, Chrysostom on Matthew 5:32: Moses permitted the bill to be given. From this it is understood that the bill of divorce was given so that blood would not be shed out of hatred: he permitted evil to be done so that worse evils would not occur. The bill was simply evil: but every evil is illicit: therefore, it seems that the giving of the bill was illicit.

2. Likewise, Augustine in the Gloss on the same, and this is placed here in the Letter: Moses writes in Deuteronomy 24:1-2, that if a wife does not please her husband because of some indecency, he may dismiss her: which permission Christ explains was because of the hardness of husbands, not to allow separation, but to prevent homicide: and from this follows the same as before.

Response. I think it should be said here, saving a better opinion, that this bill was simply unjust, just as it was also unjust to have multiple wives: but according to the time and the congruence of men, it was just. This seems to be said from the text of the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, Matthew 19:4 and following, where the Lord prefaces the sentence about divorce with how God from the beginning created man male and female, and that they would be two in one flesh, and what God has joined, let not man separate, and afterwards He adds about the bill of divorce. Hence also Chrysostom says on the same, that a woman should think only of one male created, just as God Himself created one for one, and one for one from the beginning.

Therefore, it should be said to the first, that the law of God, as the Apostle says, to the Hebrews 7:19, is imperfect, and brought nothing to perfection: but it was given according to the congruence of the time and persons, as a pedagogue to lead to Christ. Hence also many good significations are elicited from the dismissal of the wife in the Gloss on Deuteronomy by Origen and Gregory: and therefore it had imperfect commands, and was dispensed for the time.

To what was objected from Chrysostom, it should be said that it is not similar except in the first incitement to the giving of the law, because here and there it is disgraceful: but here it is the disgrace of cruelty, and there the disgrace of lust.

To the other, it should be said that a right principle corrects each thing according to the possible mode for itself, and not according to the truest rectitude: and so also does the judgment of causes which is exemplified by it: because it seems to me that this was judicial, not primarily ceremonial, nor sacramental, nor moral: and such things are changed by the variety of times and persons: hence that objection does not compel, that divorce was simply just.

To what is objected on the contrary, it should be said that without doubt the law permitted divorce for the reasons stated, and also the Justinian law: and every law always permitted divorce except the law of Christ: in which the perfection of Christ's law is noted in holiness, piety, and chastity.

Hence to the objection it should be said that the hardness of hearts was then the moving cause: but nevertheless unless there had been utility, it would not have been granted. Its utility was exemplified above: and therefore according to the time the bill was just, although not simply.

To the other, it should be said that Chrysostom touches on the inciting or exciting cause for giving the judicial law: but nevertheless there was also another cause of utility which excused for that time.

Similarly, it should be said to what Augustine says,

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 27 — Whether The One Dismissing His Wife By A Bill Of Divorce And The Repudiated Woman Could Be Saved In Another Marriage

Whether one dismissing a wife through a bill of divorce and the divorced could be saved in another marriage?

ARTICULUS XXVII,
Whether one dismissing a wife through a bill of divorce and the divorced could be saved in another marriage?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether the one dismissing could be saved in another marriage, and also the dismissed?

It seems that not: because
1. Christ says, Matthew 19:9: Whoever dismisses his wife and marries another commits adultery, and adulterers and adulteresses are not saved: therefore it seems that in another marriage neither of them could be saved.

1. Likewise, because of the hardness of heart the bill was permitted: but it is said, Ecclesiasticus 27: A hard heart will fare badly: therefore such as these will fare badly in the end.

To the contrary of this it is objected:
1. By what Jerome says: By permitting this, He did not show the justice of God, but removed the guilt of sinning from the sin: so that what is done according to the law does not seem to be sin, it does not seem to be sin: but from any act from which guilt is removed, no one is demerited. In the second union, none were condemned, as it seems.

1. Likewise, both the law and the prophecy agree in the same. Malachi 2:16, where it is said: When you hate, namely the wife of your youth, dismiss, says the Lord. Therefore it seems that the whole people would have been miserably neglected, that their wise men would know there is no salvation for them, and yet would permit such unions: but this would be too absurd: therefore it seems that then they could be saved being joined to others.

1. Likewise, if the law attended only to the hardness of heart, then it ought to persuade a return; but it does the contrary, because it says that if the second dismisses her through repudiation or through death, the former could not take her back: therefore it seems that it was lawful in the second marriage.

Response. To this I think it must be said that in the second marriage there was salvation for them because of the statute of the law and the congruence of the time: just as also in multiple wives, which God never willed except for a time, as in the victims of holocausts, which God never willed except accidentally, namely lest they be sacrificed to idols. And this seems to be what Jerome wants, saying that the legislator removed the guilt from sin when he granted repudiation.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that Christ says this with respect to the abundant justice in the New Testament, fulfilling the imperfect of the Old Testament.

To the other, it must be said that Christ says this with respect to the principal cause of permission, according to which it was a judicial law: yet from the state, the time was ordered to greater fecundity: because it was congruent to that time, and according to this it was dispensative and indulgent: because often she is barren to one who is not barren to another: and therefore the law also commanded that if she married many and was barren to many, she cannot return to the first, nor can the first receive her. In this way Cato agrees who dismissed Marcia so that she might be fruitful, and the Philosophers have spoken thus about repudiation.

And because this agrees with reason, it seems it must be said thus: which, however, I do not entirely assert in this question, but let each say what seems good to him.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

Then it should be noted, that upon that chapter: "But better is virginity" should be placed of the mind than of the flesh, etc. the whole question concerning virginity and widowhood, and concerning the veil of virgins: and that has been diligently treated among those which we have written concerning the cardinal virtues*.

Articulus 28 — Whether Some Wives Are Said To Be Several, And Which They Are

Whether some wives are called many? and, Which are they?

Whether some wives are called many? and, Which are they?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, D, after the beginning:

The king shall not have, etc., many wives.

For it is asked here, Which are many?

1. For if it is said that those are many who allure his mind to idolatry. On the contrary: A single one can allure his mind: therefore a single one can be many: but this is false: therefore they are not called many.
2. Likewise, It is not determined by law how many he ought to have, but more are granted without determination: therefore it seems that there is no greatest number for him.

But if it is said that many are those who exceed his strength in sustenance, namely that he cannot feed them. On the contrary: A king and a rich man can feed more than a poor man: therefore what are many for one are not many for another: and the law speaks nothing of this: for it never says that a rich man should have more than a poor man: therefore it seems that it is not to be understood thus.

1. Likewise, More were then permitted for the sake of fecundity: but if there are more, so much greater is the fecundity: therefore it seems that there is no greatest number: but rather he who had more than another served that time more: just as he who is more chaste than another serves our time more, as Jerome said above.

I respond, that as I think, they are called many excelling in the power of impregnating, for which three things are required, namely perfectly moving heat, perfectly digested seed, and the vigor of nature: for through excessive intercourse the natural heat exhales, and the dry extracts the moist: and thus the body is cooled through excessive intercourse, and the seed is ejected before it is digested: and then it easily expires, and is found ineffective. Excessive intercourse is also placed by Aristotle as one of the causes of a shorter life, and it loses the vigor of nature, so that through it fecundity continuously remains: and therefore according to this I think it is to be measured. But this power, if it ought to fecundate all equally, I think that it exceeds seventy women, or around this more or less, according to the diversity of men: and therefore Solomon is accused of having many, and David is said to have remained among many.

And through this the solution to all is clear, except to one: to which it must be said, that the law did not say how many should be had: because for us it is necessary that this be determined, and therefore the number varies: and perhaps because the law never intended this except accidentally, and therefore spoke little concerning this except by indulgence.

DISTINCTIO XXXIV

Divisio Textus

Now it remains to consider which persons, etc.

Here falls that part which is about legitimate or illegitimate persons: and it is divided into two. In the first, it treats of the effect of impediment in general. In the second, however, of the impediments themselves, there, B, Concerning those which are the cause of frigidity, etc.

FOR UNDERSTANDING, however, three things are sought, namely, what is the legitimacy of contracting persons? Secondly, By what is the number of impediments taken? Thirdly, Why are impediments assigned to this sacrament and not to others?

Articulus 1 — What The Legitimacy Of The Persons Contracting Is

What is the legitimacy of contracting persons? and, By what law is it said to be legitimate?

To the first objection it is thus objected: The Master says in the Letter, that legitimate persons are those to whom no impediment of marriage is opposed: therefore legitimacy itself is immunity from impediments of marriage.

However, it seems that this is badly defined: 1. For a definition is given through essentials: but negations are essential to none: therefore it ought not to be given through negation: but it is given through negation: therefore it seems that it is not valid.

1. Again, Defining things are essential predicates of the thing: but these can never be denied of the thing: therefore no definition is constituted from negations of the thing: therefore as before.

Further, it is asked more by touching the thing, By what law is a person said to be legitimate?

For either by a law universally accepted, or particularly. If universally, it is necessary that a legitimate person be legitimate according to every law: but this is false, because one is legitimate when one is according to one law only, as Pope Nicholas said above, that for marriage it suffices according to the law of those who contract, consent.

But if it is said to be legitimate by a particular law. On the contrary: For either it is of the law of nature, or of Moses, or of Christ: and whatever is said, it is clear that it is not true, because not every person by that law is legitimate.

Further, it is asked about the division which the Master gives, that some were legitimate before the law, etc.

For it seems that this is not true: 1. For marriage is of morals: therefore it was in one way in the law, and before the law, and after, just as other morals.

1. Also, I see that the same bodily medicines are given to the sick for the same cause in any law: therefore since marriage is a medicine of infirmity, for the same cause from the beginning of the world by the same laws marriage ought to be given to all: therefore there were not other legitimate persons according to the diversity of times.
2. Also, it is objected about another division, where it says that some are fully legitimate, etc. For if legitimacy is defined by negation and privation, as it says in the Letter, and negations and privations do not admit of more and less, or more and less, it seems that all are either equally legitimate or equally illegitimate: therefore there is nothing that it says in the Letter.
3. Also, in other works it is not said legally just, except one who agrees in every law: and if he disagrees in one thing, and agrees in another, he is simply said to be legally unjust, as Aristotle says in the Fourth Book of Ethics. For a thief agrees in some things with the laws, because perhaps he is chaste: and yet he is hanged, because he is legally unjust by handling another's property against the will of the owner: therefore it seems that also in this case one who does not agree with all laws is an illegitimate person: therefore none ought to be said moderately legitimate, or simply illegitimate: therefore his division seems to be nothing.

Response. It must be said that the Master gives a description of legitimate persons through a consequent negation from affirmation, because it is more known to us from those things which it denies, and he principally intends to be well understood, rather than to define well. However, the definition of a legitimate person is one who according to the laws has the freedom of contracting marriage with whomever he wishes. And from this follows the negation which the Master places in the Letter; because legitimate is one to whom no impediment is opposed, etc.

And by this the solution to the first two is clear.

To what is further asked, it must be said that by the law which is of persons contracting marriage according to what it abstracts from the law of nature and of Moses and of Christ, persons are said to be legitimate.

To what is objected first against this, it must be said that it is not valid: because this law is universal, not universally taken: and this is taken in the genus which is verified according to any species by dividing: and since the species of laws are varied by different times and states, therefore the Master rightly says that others were legitimate before and after the law of Moses: and by this also the solution to the following is clear.

To what is further asked, it must be said that although marriage is of morals according to its substance, yet the mode of contracting is judicial: and therefore it is varied according to the laws of those contracting, as Pope Nicholas says.

To another it must be said, that the disease was not similar except concupiscence: but many other diseases were varied according to times, such as the scarcity of men, and the scarcity of women and men, and of one and the same worship, and the scarcity of foreigners; and therefore the law gave a sister, a relative, a foreigner, according to the diversity of time.

To another it must be said, that it is a privation consequent from a certain preceding affirmation: and therefore the argument is not valid. Otherwise it can be said, that negation and privation are considered in two ways, in themselves, and in their cause. In themselves they do not admit of more and less. In the cause they are varied according to the variation of the cause. Hence when privation is false, Aristotle does not say that he lies more who says five is a hundred, than he who says five is six.

To another it must be said, that he does not say legitimate moderately, because he moderately agrees with the laws, as the objection implies: but because he can easily be reduced to the law: hence it is clear, that it is not similar, which was introduced for the similar.

Articulus 2 — What Is The Number Of Those Who Impede Marriage

What is the number of those who impede marriage?

Then it is asked about the number of impediments,
They are noted in these verses:

Error, condition, vow, kinship, crime,
Disparity of cult, force, order, bond, honesty,
If you are related by affinity, if by chance you cannot consummate.
These prevent unions from being joined, retract what is done.

And again there are other verses through which impediments are understood, which impede contracting, but do not dissolve the contract:

The Church's prohibition, and also the time of feasts,
Impediments to be made, they allow the joined to be held.

However, it seems that not all these have one reason for impeding marriage: because

1. Not all dissolve, as was evident in the verses; therefore, there is not one reason for impeding.

2. Condition does not impede, unless the free spouse wishes: therefore, it is not similar to others.

For concerning each, it will be objected below:
it is asked, Whether these impede marriage?

And it seems that they do not: because
1. What is ordered to greater sanctity of marriage, should not impede marriage: but many of these which exclude union, are ordered to greater sanctity of marriage: therefore, they do not impede marriage. The first is evident through this, that sacraments are more perfect, the holier they are. The second is proven through what Augustine said above, that marriages are holier with the equal vow of the continent.

1. Also, If something impedes something from being done according to nature, it, supervening upon it, destroys it: but these impediments supervening upon marriage, do not destroy it: therefore, they do not impede it from being done. This is evident in all natural causes operating something: just as coldness impedes heat, and supervening upon it, destroys it.

2. Also, Madness is not placed here among the impediments; and yet the Master pursues it in the Book: therefore, the division seems insufficient.

It is asked again, What is properly an impediment, and by what are each distinguished?

Response. It seems to be said that there is one reason in common for an impediment, which makes a contracted impediment special: and this reason is contrary to the laws, by which marriage is joined.

To the objection, however, it must be said that this happens because the differences which contract an impediment in the genus are unequal: for this difference can be so valid that it excludes something essential to marriage, and then it dissolves the contract: because it was never a true marriage. Hence, to dissolve marriage is the same as to show that there is no contract, and therefore no marriage. However, some do not have such a valid difference that excludes something essential, and those impede it from being contracted: but because they do not impede the contract, it remains, and also the essence of marriage is inviolate by them.

To the other, it must be said that condition impedes on the part of the material cause of marriage: but it can be accepted if one wishes, because anyone can make their condition worse.

To the other, it must be said that it is not ordered to the sanctity of marriage, unless what allows marriage to stand: but here marriage does not stand: hence neither can the sanctity of marriage stand: but if marriage stood, then I would well concede that sanctity would be with the equal vow of the continent.

To the other, it must be said that this in contracts is worth nothing, even in the contract of buying or selling grain: because many impede before, which supervening do not dissolve:

just as if the grain becomes worse in its power. And this happens because these do not occur by necessity, but by will: and therefore, whatever cause was made first, the will cannot act contrary: but natural causes act by necessity of their essence, and therefore destroy what was done before if they impeded what was to be done.

To the other, it must be said that madness is contained under error: because it cannot discern so as to consent.

To the last, it must be said that an impediment is something truly an impediment: but something else is in a certain respect.

However, that which is truly an impediment, is that which impedes contracting, and dissolves the contract. And this can be in two ways: for it is either against marriage insofar as it consists in the disposition of the ministers of the Church: or according to what is taken in itself. If according to what is in the disposition of the ministers of the Church, who are in the place of God on earth, then those things are against marriage which are from the institution of the Church. Therefore, either that institution is about betrothals, or about weddings. If in the first way, then it is the justice of public honesty. But if it is about the weddings themselves, either this is for the reverence of a more excellent sacrament to which the act of marriage is not fitting, or it is for the relationship of persons joined in marriage. If in the first way, then it is order. But if for the persons themselves: either it is in the person itself according to comparison to those from whom it is propagated, with whom it is as if one flesh, because derived from one with them: or this is for the spouse with whom one flesh is made. And in the first way, it is kinship both spiritual and corporal. But in the second way, it is affinity. But if it regards marriage in itself; either it regards marriage according to the efficient cause to which it is contrary: or according to the act in which it is consummated: or according to the matter, which is legitimate persons: or according to goods, and especially according to the principal good, which is offspring: or on the part of the form: and marriage cannot be considered in more ways. If in the first way, either this is from an opposite bond, or contrariety to the efficient. If in the second way, this is in two ways, namely either on the part of reason, or on the part of free will. And in the first way, it is error. But in the second way, it is force or violence. But if it regards it according to the act in which it is consummated, then it is impotence of consummating, from whatever cause it happens. But if it regards the matter, this cannot be unless from the malice of the matter which is induced to it, and thus it is crime. But if it is contrary to the best disposition of offspring, thus it is condition, because no one wishes to have free servants, and subject to others, as much as it is in itself. But if from the contrariety of the foundation, then it is disparity of cult. And if it is in the last way according to the contrariety of form which is individuality, then it is a bond with another, because no one can be individual with two.

The other two are evident: because one is taken from the simple prohibition of the Church, but the other from the incongruity of time caused by prohibition.

Articulus 3 — Why This Sacrament Alone Has Impediments

Why does this sacrament alone have impediments?

Thirdly, it is asked, Why does this sacrament alone have impediments?

For it seems that it ought not to have them alone: because even penance depends on our will and act: and yet no impediments are assigned to it: therefore it seems that neither should this one.

Response. It must be said to this, that there is a twofold cause why others do not have impediments: one of which is that they consist around one simple person, and he cannot be impeded by another. Another cause is because they are around spiritual acts, which God alone operates in us without us, in which He can have no impediment: because nothing is stronger than Him to impede Him. But both of these fail in marriage: because it depends on the wills of two, and on two agents: and its consummation consists in a bodily act: and therefore it can have multiple impediments.

And through this it is clear that it is not similar to penance, which was introduced as similar.

Articulus 4 — Whether Frigidity Is An Impediment To Marriage

Whether frigidity is an impediment to marriage?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, B, Concerning those who on account of frigidity, etc.

However, it seems that frigidity ought not to impede: because
1. That which is ordered to the continence of marriage does not impede marriage, but frigidity is ordered to greater continence of marriage: therefore it does not impede.

1. Likewise, it is evident that all old men are naturally frigid: and yet an old man can contract with an old woman: therefore frigidity does not impede.
2. Likewise, if they know themselves to be frigid and contract, the marriage stands: therefore frigidity by itself does not impede marriage, but rather the intercourse which follows a certain marriage, as was proven above: therefore it is wrongly posited that frigidity impedes marriage.
3. Likewise, an impediment of marriage which is natural can equally happen to either spouse: but frigidity does not impede the woman: therefore neither ought it to impede the man: therefore it ought not to be posited as an impediment.
4. Likewise, excessive heat impedes, just as excessive frigidity: because excessive heat dries up moisture: therefore excessive heat ought to be posited as an impediment.
5. Likewise, in many males an impediment is found from excessive heat: therefore it seems that it ought to have been posited as one of the impediments.
6. Likewise, excessive moisture dissolves the nerves: therefore it impedes the vigor which is required for intercourse: therefore that also ought to be posited as an impediment.

Further, it is inquired here concerning those who have weak heat: for this suffices to move the members to concupiscence, but quickly evaporates, and extends weakly: therefore having a virgin wife, since he has only the first impulse, he cannot deflower her: and yet he could know a corrupted one, if he had such a wife. What then is to be done for him?

It seems that he can do nothing: because if he causes another to corrupt, he is the cause of adultery, and this ought not to be done.

Likewise, if he corrupts her by hand, this is a species of sodomy, since it is not done with the due instrument: therefore it seems that he ought to lack the due for which he contracted marriage.

The response is to this that frigidity here encompasses every natural and perpetual impediment of intercourse from whatever cause: but nevertheless because frigidity is more general, and is intensified always with advancing age, for this reason it is posited: for if it were an accidental impediment, namely by the removal of the penis, or the cutting of the testicles, or the perpetual constriction of the woman, which cannot be remedied by the benefit of medicine, then according to the verses placed above, the whole is contained under that member, which is perpetual impotence of intercourse, and here it is contained under frigidity: and this because the law does not speak of frigidity as frigidity, but as it causes impotence of intercourse: and therefore all things which cause the same naturally and perpetually, it calls frigidity.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that conjugal consent is in carnal copulation, and that supposes the power of intercourse if the due is demanded: and therefore frigidity excludes marital copulation in that which it supposes: nor is there conjugal continence, where such copulation by the exclusion of the due, if demanded, is excluded.

To the second, it must be said that old men have sufficient heat to move, although not to generate: and therefore marriage is granted to them as a remedy with respect to the faith of the bed: and therefore it is not similar.

And by this the solution to the following is clear.

To another, it must be said that in intercourse the woman is passive: for which reason Aristotle says that a woman is not properly called continent, because the impetus of the agent in intercourse does not pertain to her: but for suffering, frigidity suffices, although not for acting: because Avicenna says that frigidity stops motion: and therefore since the male behaves as an agent, if frigidity supervenes, motion is cut off, and he cannot act, and therefore on his part it impedes marriage.

To another, it must be said that it is not the same with excessive heat: because heat is hardly ever a perpetual impediment: because when foreign moisture is digested by food continuously taken, natural heat begins to be moderated, and is tempered in such a way that what before consumed, afterwards begins to dissolve and consume, and finally to dissolve without consumption. This also happens with the process of age: and therefore the Philosophers hand down that many impotent in youth for intercourse, with the process of age begin to copulate: and many not generating in youth, with the process of age begin to generate: and therefore it is not posited as an impediment like frigidity. If however it were found to impede intercourse for three continuous years, they would be separated: but this hardly happens: because even when they are impotent to generate and copulate with respect to the mixing of seeds, because the seed is consumed in them, yet they can render the due from excessive vigor of the genitals, which is not in the frigid.

By this also the solution to the following is clear.

To another, it must be said that excessive moisture cutting off intercourse is only from frigidity inducing and inspiring that moisture: because frigidity is an active quality, and moisture more passive: and therefore moisture by itself cannot be the cause of an impediment.

To what is further inquired, saving a better opinion, it seems to be said that by the application of the hand a way could be made.

To what is objected against this, it seems to be said that it differs to apply the hand, as medicating, and polluting. For the hand applied as polluting induces softness or sodomy: but the medicating hand does not induce: just as we also say in women whose womb descends outside the mouth of the vulva: it is prescribed that they replace it with their fingers, and yet we do not say those hands pollute or corrupt them, but rather heal them.

Articulus 5 — Whether A Woman Wishing To Be Separated From Her Husband On Account Of Impotence Ought To Swear With The Seventh Hand Of Friends That She Has Not Been Known By Her Husband

Whether a woman wishing to separate from her husband on account of impotence ought to swear with the seventh hand of friends that she has not been known by her husband?

Whether a woman wishing to separate from her husband on account of impotence ought to swear with the seventh hand of friends that she has not been known by her husband?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, B, shortly after the beginning: It was decreed that each of them with the seventh hand of relatives, etc.

For this seems inconvenient, since
1. The Lord says that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word stands: therefore it also seems that here two or three witnesses suffice.

1. Likewise, the Apostle also in the accusation of a presbyter says that two or three witnesses suffice. Therefore, it seems that the seventh hand is unjustly noted here.
2. Likewise, relatives are more suspect than others, because they willingly help their relatives to achieve the effect of their will: therefore it seems that it would be better to call strangers to the oath.
3. Likewise, since the work of marriage is very hidden, how can they swear concerning that which they have not seen?

4. Likewise, in what manner is the oath to be given to them?

Response. It must be said that in favor of marriage and because of the horror of separation so that others may be deterred, the multiplication of witnesses was introduced.

But what the Lord says, He understands in causes which are not so favorable and can come to knowledge better than this.

To the other, it must be said that the crime of a presbyter can be known better than the act of marriage, in which, as Augustine says in the book On Marriage and Concupiscence against Julian, even parents wish to have their own children whom they have begotten as witnesses because of the impudent concupiscence which is in intercourse.

To the other, it must be said that such familiar things are known to none so much as to relatives, who, if they are lacking, neighbors are assumed: who also, if they are not, others are taken who are greater than exception: and all those are said to be relatives here, with the term taken broadly.

To the other, it must be said that synodal witnesses or witnesses do not swear that they have not been mixed, but rather that they believe those to have sworn truly: whence those whose marriage is denounced by them first swear that they have never met carnally, and others afterwards swear that they believe them to have sworn truly.

To the last, it must be said that the man ought to swear in this manner, that for three continuous years he has faithfully without deceit given effort to know such a woman carnally, and he has never been able to know the same woman. She, however, swears that she has faithfully helped him to be known and has not impeded without deceit, and yet she has not been known by him: and others afterwards swear that they believe them to have sworn truly.

Articulus 6 — Whether, A Separation Having Been Made On Account Of Impotence, And Afterwards It Being Found By A Just Judgment That There Was Not Impotence, If They Have Contracted With Others They Ought To Be Separated

Whether separation is made on account of impotence, and afterwards it is discovered through just judgment that there was no impotence, if they have contracted with others, whether they ought to be separated?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, B, before the middle: But if he has taken another, let them be separated, etc.

Of this, however, in the Decretals, concerning the rigid and bewitched, a reason is given: because then it is evident that coldness was not the cause which they alleged, but rather by the instigation of the devil, because they held each other in hatred, they sought separation: whence when the Church, after the fact, saw itself deceived, it revokes the prior marriages which were true marriages: but separates the second ones which appeared only in the sight of men.

But against this it is objected: because

1. As it is proven in natural things, someone in youth is impeded from intercourse, and as age progresses begins to have intercourse: therefore the alleged impediment of the man can be true at first, and yet later the ability returns: it seems, therefore, that when the marriage was separated due to a true impediment, they ought to remain separated.
2. Likewise, one woman is more lovable than another: let us suppose, therefore, that someone does not have sufficient heat from complexion for intercourse: yet he can be excited by accidents of the soul which are love, concupiscence, and the like: for this is possible according to nature: because accidents of the soul also transform the body into infirmities and health, as the natural philosophers say: and thus it seems that such a one would be sterile perpetually to an abominable woman, and yet would have intercourse with a lovable one. If, therefore, he is separated from the first, and is permitted to contract with the second: and again when he has intercourse with the second, he is returned to the first, it seems unjust: because he has a perpetual impediment to that one, and not to this one.

Response. It must be said that this cannot happen except from excessive heat: and because such a one can render the debt, although he does not emit seed or generate: therefore such a case does not occur. But complete impotence of having intercourse is caused by coldness which always increases as age progresses: and therefore if for three years he has made the effort, and could not have intercourse, it is presumed to be a perpetual impediment.

To the other it must be said that perhaps in such a case consultation should be had from the responses of the wise: and without prejudice it seems to be said similarly as about the bewitched: because also a certain kind of bewitchment is the abomination which he conceives towards the woman: whence she is to be advised that she present herself clean and with adornment and affability lovable to the man: and he is to be advised that he consider the causes by which the woman may become more lovable: and if this does not help, it seems to be similar to bewitchment: and therefore they can be separated, and joined to others.

Articulus 7 — Whether, If A Husband To Whom Impotence Is Imputed Asserts That He Has Rendered The Debt, But The Woman Denies It, The Assertion Of The Husband Should Be Upheld

If a man to whom impotence is imputed asserts that he has rendered the debt, but the woman denies it, should the assertion of the man be upheld?

If a man to whom impotence is imputed asserts that he has rendered the debt, but the woman denies it, should the assertion of the man be upheld?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said, there, B, shortly before the end: But if the man asserts that he has rendered the debt, etc.

1. It seems this is unjust, when it can be proven by bodily inspection: and then by the judgment of the multitude the woman prevails over the assertion of the man, as it is said, Extra, concerning the frigid and bewitched. Therefore, the assertion of the man is not always upheld.

2. Hem, it seems there is no cause as he says: because they are equal in marriage: therefore, it is said in vain that the man should be believed because he is greater.
3. Likewise, marriage is a medicine: but if the medicine is withdrawn, the sick falls into danger: but if the man lies to the woman, the medicine is withdrawn: she is exposed to fornication: therefore it seems that the judgment is unjust.
4. Likewise, a woman who could remain continent while lying alone, if she is compelled to lie with the man, from the continuous imagination and contact of the man, becomes incontinent: if therefore the man does not have intercourse with her, many other corruptions follow: and thus it seems that the judgment would be tolerable if they were separated.

Response. It must be said to this that this statute is just and most equitable, both because of the constancy of the man, and also because he is understood to be the head of the woman, all other things being equal except this alone, that the woman denies and the man affirms.

To the first, it must be said that if it is proven by inspection, then the woman prevails by ocular faith: and then the other things are not equal.

To the other, it must be said that the man is the head of the woman in governance, but in rendering the debt he is equal to her.

To the other, it must be said that the medicine is not withdrawn from the woman, but she fails in proof: and therefore the judge who does not see the hidden cannot involve himself in the cause.

To the other, it must be said that there is no doubt that such a woman is more incited to lust: and therefore she should provide for herself, namely by lying separately: for such a man will not deny this: and if he were to deny it, I do not think that the woman would be bound to consent.

Articulus 8 — Whether By The Impediment Of Sorcery Someone Can Be Hindered From The Power Of Having Intercourse

Whether someone can be impeded from the power of coition by the impediment of witchcraft?

Whether someone can be impeded from the power of coition by the impediment of witchcraft?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, C, Concerning the impediment of witchcraft, etc.

Three things are inquired here,
First, Whether someone can be impeded from the power of coition by the impediment of witchcraft?

Second, Whether witchcraft can be impeded or cured by another witchcraft?
Third, What is the statute of law concerning those bewitched?

To the first, it is objected thus:
1. The devil does not have power over pigs without divine permission: therefore, for him to receive power over pigs, he cannot be compelled by witchcraft: therefore, much less can he be compelled to receive power over a man.

1. Likewise, If someone is impeded by witchcraft, it must be by the operation of demons who are compelled to this, but with God permitting: however, it is evident that God does not relax the power of anyone through any work unless it is good and meritorious: but witchcraft is not meritorious: therefore, through this, power is not given to anyone: therefore, power is not given to impede someone from coition.
2. Likewise, The power of the demon is not read to have been given except to the Saints: but he who performs witchcraft has the demon in his power: therefore, he himself is a saint: therefore, it seems that witchcraft is holy: therefore, it is not done through incantation.
3. Likewise, The work of the devil cannot nor should destroy the work of God: but witchcraft is the work of the devil, while marriage is the work of God: therefore, witchcraft cannot impede or destroy marriage.
4. Likewise, If someone is bewitched, it is necessary that some operation be done either concerning the bewitched body or concerning the soul: therefore, the demon will operate. Therefore, the mode is sought: for he cannot operate through contact, because he does not have a body. Similarly, he cannot operate through command, because he is not established above anything: and there are not multiple modes of operations: therefore, the demon cannot impede anyone.
5. Likewise, The demon more wishes someone to be in the concupiscences of women and coition than continent: therefore, since witchcraft makes someone continent, it seems that it bewitches no one.

To this, it must be said that it should be doubtful to no one that many are bewitched by the force and power of demons: because the holy Fathers say this, and the Church has promulgated laws concerning this: and this is also evident to all those who know something about necromancy and the deeds of images.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the devil receives this power permitted because of the sins of the sufferers, or as an example to others. However, how this happens through witchcraft, it must be said according to Theologians, that by divine virtue compulsion is made, and it is rather a certain vengeance and gravest punishment of sin, than by the aid of witchcraft, namely that he who is in filth, becomes more filthy, and receives the cooperation of error, who did not wish to believe the truth. Hence, compulsion is made by God and by the holy Angels, but the operation by the demon.

To the other, it must be said that it is not a meritorious work, but pestiferous, and the effect follows with God permitting. Hence, also sometimes the effect does not follow: and I think that this happens because God in his mercy restrains demons of this kind. Necromancers assign another cause about which nothing at present.

To the other, it must be said that the power of demons, that is, over demons, coercing from witchcrafts, is not read to have been given except to the Saints: but the power of the demon for the operation of error is often read to be given to infidels, and evil men, as it will be given to Antichrist, and is given daily to necromancers.

To the other, it must be said that the work of the demon by its own authority does not destroy the work of God, but with God permitting, and the man deserving to suffer this: but often the devil destroys the work of God, namely charity, faith, and the effects of other sacraments.

To the other, it must be said that the operation of demons is diverse concerning such things: however, the principal one is through command, as you will find noted on the second of the Sentences, where it is treated of the operation of demons.

Articulus 9 — Whether Sorcery Should Be Excluded By Sorcery

Whether evil is to be excluded by evil?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether evil is to be excluded by evil?

1. For necromancers teach that one evil is excluded by another: as is evident in the book of Hermes, which is titled concerning the secrets of Aristotle. Therefore, it seems that this way can be sought.
2. Likewise, in bodily medicines, it is of the same art to cause an illness and to cure the same: therefore, it will be in the same way in spiritual matters: but it is of the necromancer to confer evil: therefore, it will also be of the same to remove it: therefore, it seems that one can resort to it for the medicine of evil.

On the contrary, it is that
1. The Law of God commands that he who consults magicians and seeks truth from the dead be killed: therefore, no one ought to resort to them.

1. Likewise, in the Sacred Scripture, medicine is not taught except through fasts, and prayers, and suchlike: therefore, another medicine is not to be sought, since the demon operates nothing except by God's permission: if therefore God is pleased, the operation of the demon will be removed.
2. Likewise, Isaiah viii, 19 and 20, it is said that they ought not to go to diviners, who mutter, but to the law and to the testimony. Therefore, medicine from necromancers ought not to be sought.

The response is that medicine is in no way to be sought through an enchanter: but rather evil is always to be endured.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that those teach as pestilent to know: and when demons cease from harming, then they seem to cure, as is said in the life of St. Bartholomew.

To the second, it must be said that it is not similar: because medicine is a salutary art, and uses reason through the operations of a creature, to which God has given the power of making cures. Hence it is said, Ecclesiasticus xxxviii, 1: Honor the physician for necessity: for the Most High created him. And there, 3.4: The Most High created medicines from the earth, etc.: but necromancy is a pestilent art concerning its operations, and uses experiments more than reason, and uses the power of the demon as an antidote: and therefore the Church has condemned this entirely.

Articulus 10 — Whether Those Bewitched Should Be Separated

Whether those bewitched ought to be separated?

Whether those bewitched ought to be separated?

Thirdly, it is asked, What law is established concerning this?

What is said here in the Letter, and also, in the Decretals, concerning the frigid and bewitched is stated, and is held by the universal Church, namely that one bewitched to one is not bewitched to another: and therefore if he cannot be helped by the prayers of the good, he is separated, and both are given license to marry another, nor is this license ever revoked.

But against this it is objected: because in the book of Images it is taught that an image can be made which simply bewitches: for it causes love of chastity, and universally cuts off intercourse: therefore it seems that someone can be bewitched to all: therefore if he contracts, and is separated because of impotence of consummation, and afterwards knows another, it seems that he ought to return to the first just as the frigid, as was held above.

1. Likewise, just as the frigid can be cured, so also the bewitched: therefore just as the cured frigid is returned to the first marriage, so the bewitched, as it seems.

On the contrary, it is that the bewitched: when he contracted, was an illegitimate person: therefore the contract is null: therefore he ought not to be restored to a contract which is null.

Response. It must be said that it is to be held as the Letter says.

And to the first it must be said that there are many bewitchments: but without destruction of the body, and great infirmity, the body cannot be brought to this, that it is moved to none: but it is true that the love of chastity is indeed induced through necromancy, and the abomination of intercourse, but nevertheless a movement remains towards some due to the inflammation of concupiscence, unless he is entirely chilled.

To the other it must be said that the bewitched can be cured if he wholly devotes himself to God in prayer, compunction, and satisfaction: but nevertheless because then he was an illegitimate person for contracting when he contracted, therefore he is absolved from that. But in the cured frigid it is presumed that because he contracted, he was not entirely frigid, but feigned when he contracted: and therefore he is restored to the prior marriage according to the judgment of the Church, which especially follows external presumptions.

Articulus 11 — Whether Madness Impedes Marriage

Whether madness impedes marriage?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, D, "Also while they are in madness," etc.

For it seems that it ought not to impede, because
1. It is not against any good of marriage: therefore it seems that it ought not to impede.

1. Likewise, some are mad who have lucid intervals, and then they can discern: therefore they can contract: therefore it is not generally true what is said here.
2. Likewise, it has been held above that the commixture of male and female is of natural law: but this is naturally in the madman as in others: therefore he can contract marriage.
3. Likewise, in the text it says that if marriage has been contracted, it should not be separated: but whatever contract stands, was valid in the contract itself: therefore when the madman contracted, the contract was valid; therefore madmen can contract.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
Consent to marriage ought to be voluntary, as was shown above: but the madman cannot have voluntary consent: therefore he cannot contract marriage. The first is proved from the pre-established concerning the efficient cause of marriage. The second from the third of the Ethics, where it is written that involuntary is said in two ways: because one is through ignorance, and another through violence. And involuntary through ignorance is, whose principle is in the one not knowing the particulars in which the act is.

Response. It must be said that madmen, as long as they are in the act of madness, cannot contract: and the reason for this is given by the last objection.

To the first, it must be said that it is contrary to the good of faith: because such a one does not know what faith is, and therefore does not keep it: however, it is principally contrary to the efficient cause of marriage.

To the second, it must be said that some have lucid intervals, and then they do not have madness according to act: and therefore they can contract.

To the other, it must be said that marriage is of natural law in the manner which was said above from the words of Aristotle and Aspasius, namely according to the resolution to the end of man: because otherwise it would not be law, because law considers the reason of the just and the unjust, and therefore supposes the discretion of reason.

To the fourth, it must be said that it is understood of one who contracted not in the time of madness.

Articulus 12 — Whether He Who Has Known One Sister Can Take The Other As A Wife

Whether he who has known one sister can take another as wife?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, H, Concerning those also who with two sisters, etc.

It seems unjust what is said here: because

1. The marriage was lawful, and intercourse with the sister of his wife occurred: but a supervening impediment to marriage does not dissolve it: therefore it seems false what is said in two decrees of the Saints.
2. Likewise, the wife is not aware of the crime: therefore it seems that she is unjustly treated, namely that she is deprived of her due in the body of her husband: therefore it is unjust what is said in the Letter.
3. Likewise, God joined them first when they were legitimate persons: therefore they ought not to be separated: therefore license should not be given for marrying while the husband lives: therefore Pope Zacharias speaks unjustly in the Letter.

Response. Although the Master in the Letter resolves this last point, yet I think that the Holy Fathers speak here of the impediment of crime, which prevents marriage: and then it is clear that if he carnally knew one sister, he cannot take the other in marriage. Or if he speaks of a subsequent crime: then it must be understood that he speaks according to the rigor of the law, namely that he ought not: but yet if there is danger of incontinence, even with the wife dead or alive, license is given to him to demand his due: and also after the death of his wife to contract with another.

Through this the solution to the first is clear.

To the other it must be said that the wife has not lost the power of demanding, but he has: and thus the decree speaks: whence it is illicit for him to demand, but not to render: and he ought not to demand by right. However, I think that license ought to be given to him by the Church, if she does not demand separation from the bed: because otherwise there would be danger.

Articulus 13 — Whether An Adulterer Can Contract With An Adulteress

Can an adulterer contract with an adulteress?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said there, E, a little before the end: "But an adulteress never, even if her husband has died," etc.

For it seems false: because
1. We see many adulterers contract.

1. Likewise, the laws say that even an adulterer can contract with her whom he previously defiled through adultery, except in the three cases which are contained in the Letter: therefore, much more can he contract with another.

Response. It is from the strictness of the law what is said here: whence Gregory touches on what he ought to do concerning the contradiction of his crime, but not what he ought to do if he does not wish to contain himself.

Articulus 14 — Whether Someone Can Dismiss His Wife For However Small A Cause, Fornication Alone Excepted

Whether someone can dismiss a wife for any cause whatsoever, except for fornication alone?

Whether someone can dismiss a wife for any cause whatsoever, except for fornication alone?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, F, Lud it must also be known, that for some infirmity, etc.

For it seems unjust: because
1. It incites hatred, and frequently leads to adultery: therefore it ought to be guarded against by the Church: therefore it seems that in such a case she can be dismissed.

1. Likewise, there are many burdens of marriage, even if the spouse is delightful: therefore it is not necessary that one should also be burdened by the spouse: therefore it seems that in such a case she ought to be dismissed.
2. Likewise, certain infirmities are passed on to children, such as leprosy, and the like, and then the good of marriage is destroyed: therefore it seems that then the marriage ought to be separated.

Response. It must be said generally, that nothing supervening upon marriage separates it, as is said in the Text.

To the objections, however, it must be said that the fidelity of the bed and the charity of Christ ought to restrain from hatred, and make one willingly endure burdens for the sake of Christ.

To the last objection, however, it must be said that offspring from such cases is not destroyed, except in the body, and it has been shown above that according to the body is not the good of marriage, but rather according to the soul.

DISTINCTIO XXXV

Divisio Textus

It is also to be noted that when the Lord grants, etc. Having certain impediments, which in the law itself and nature impede the contracting of marriage and dissolve the contracted, the Master touches upon separation from bed, in which there is no sacramental separation: concerning which he inquires four things.

The first is that the right of each in this separation is equal.

The second, that if they are in similar crime, neither spouse can dismiss the other, there, B, If indeed it is asked whether the adulterer, etc.

Thirdly, he shows that the dismissed man or woman cannot join themselves to another, while both the dismissing and the dismissed are alive, there, CG, But if anyone is free from fornication, etc.

Fourth and lastly, with a reason suitable to the matter, he touches upon those who first defiled themselves through adultery, and afterwards contract marriage, there, E, But all these things are to be understood concerning that, etc.

And let these suffice concerning the division.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Right Of Each In Separation Is Equal

Is the right of each in separation equal?

The determined question arises in the first chapter, namely that the right of each in separation is equal.

For it seems that it ought not to be so:

1. For right perfects nature: but according to the order of nature, man excels woman: therefore, they ought not to be considered with equal right in dismissing each other on account of fornication. The first part is evident by itself. The second is proven in the books on Animals, where it is said that particular nature never intends woman, but rather that the female is an occasioned male.
2. Also, Tullius says that all right has proceeded from nature through reason: since therefore nothing proceeds from nature contrary to the order of nature, it seems that there can never be a right that judges man and woman equally in dismissing.
3. Also, according to the law of Christ, the man is the head of the wife: but the head is never cut off with the body being safe, but some other putrid member can be cut off: therefore, since the woman is like a member, the woman can be cut off from the man if she becomes putrid through fornication, and not vice versa the man from the woman.

4. Also, one good of marriage ought not to prejudice another: but I see that a fornicating woman makes the offspring uncertain, as Tullius says: therefore, she ought not to be tolerated for the good of the sacrament, but rather cast off, so that certain children may be born from another.

5. Also, if the woman fornicates, uncertain children are established for the husband's inheritance and marriage, as it is said, Ecclesiasticus 1:3: but if the man fornicates, uncertain children are not established in marriage and inheritance for this reason: since therefore they are unequally affected in harm, it seems that they ought to be unequally affected in the right of dismissing each other.

6. Also, in the Old Testament, Deuteronomy 24:1 and following, it was permitted for a man to dismiss his wife, and not vice versa: therefore, it seems that even in the New Testament they ought to be unequally affected in this right.

On the contrary, that which is effected by two concurrent vows ought to have an equal cause in both: but such is marriage: therefore, both are equally affected in the cause of separation from the bed.

Response. It must be said that those things which are said in the Text are without ambiguity true.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the man does not excel in all things, but only in governance and the efficacy of generation: but in establishing the individuality of marriage, and in the debt, and in the faith of the bed, they are in all things equal: because these are as it were civil, and are effected by the will of both.

To the other, it must be said that all right proceeds from nature: but it is not necessary that it proceeds from one condition of nature: for in the woman, it is that she is female: and this is sex, and on account of this she needs a ruler, and an effective generator: and from this it proceeds that she does not dominate over the man, that she is subject, that she is not permitted to teach him, that she is rather an aid to generation than generating. It is also in her that she is a human having reason and free will: and from this it proceeds that she is the mistress of her own acts, that she makes marriage by her consent, that she has a debt acquired for herself, and that she can keep the faith of the promise. And thus it is clear how this right proceeds from nature.

By this, the solution to the following is also clear: because she is not the head in all things, but in some, as was evident.

To the other, it must be said that one good does not prejudice another, but rather preserves it, just as the faith of the bed certifies the children. Hence what is objected held when the paucity of men merited dispensation of separation: but after the good began to multiply through preaching, the state of continence is praised: and therefore the fruit of the womb is not sought in another woman.

To the other, it must be said that although the sin of the man does not generate doubt of offspring, nevertheless he sins in marriage, and therefore loses the debt in the body of the wife, which he had acquired by the right of marriage. And that objection proceeds from a non-cause: because the cause of separation from the bed is not the uncertainty of children, but rather the sin which he commits in marriage.

To the other, it must be said that in the Old Testament this was not as a right, but rather as a dissimulation in the judgment of causes rather than in the judgment of the soul, as was said before in the question of the bill of divorce: and therefore it is nothing to the purpose.

Articulus 2 — Whether Men Ought To Accuse Their Adulterous Wives To The Priests

Whether husbands ought to accuse their adulterous wives to priests?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said there, A, a little before the end: Husbands, however, more freely accuse their adulterous wives to priests, etc.

It seems that the contrary of this ought to be: because
1. Chrysostom says that the proper passion of women is lust: therefore it is less to be imputed to them if they commit fornication: therefore they are less blameworthy in accusation than men.

1. Likewise, in the following chapter below, Augustine says that men ought to be punished more severely, as it pertains more to them to conquer in virtue and to rule women by example. And from this follows the same as before.

2. Likewise, on account of the easy incontinence and inclination of the sex, the Philosopher says that they are not properly called continent, but rather men: therefore it seems that an incontinent woman is not as blameworthy as a man: therefore she is not as blameworthy in action as a man.

Response. It must be said that there are two qualities which conjointly cause incitation to intercourse and the faculty of coition: these are heat and moisture: women have less active than men, because they are colder than men in general as pertains to complexion, and thus they have less incitation to intercourse than men: and therefore their incontinence is more blameworthy. But it is true that they resist the temptation of intercourse more weakly, namely in this that they are more moist than men, and that moisture easily receives impressions and is more quickly bent than dryness: but this is material: and therefore they are simply more blameworthy than men. However, in marriage there are two special causes, one of which is that according to the faculty of one man, he can generate in many, and not a woman: and the reason for this has also been explained above. The second is: because the uncertainty of children arises from the sin of the woman, but not from the sin of the man: and this has also been explained above.

Therefore, I say to the first, that the saying of Chrysostom is to be referred to the passive quality, which causes resistance to reception, and this is a secondary quality, and the active is principal.

By the same it is clear the solution to the saying of Augustine, because men have to resist from dryness.

To the other it must be said that the Philosopher says this because every virtue seeks a certain highest state, because virtue is the ultimate potency in a thing: but since continence is said from resisting and holding passions, especially from venereal ones, and women fail in holding such passions due to abundant moisture, he says that they do not have the virtue of continence in the highest, because they are not agents, but rather patients in venereal matters. And therefore the Poet said:

Chaste is she whom no one has asked.

Articulus 3 — Whether Adulterers Are Bound To Dismiss One Another And To Be Separated, Or Can Live Together

Are adulterers bound to dismiss and separate themselves, or can they dwell together?

Whether adulterers are bound to separate and part, or can they live together?

Next, it is asked concerning what is said there, I, If indeed it is asked, Whether an adulterer can dismiss an adulteress, etc.

For it is asked here, Whether they are bound to separate on account of fornication, or can they still cohabit if they wish?

It seems, however, that they are bound to separate: because
1. A separating act always divides, unless something reunites it: but fornication is a separating act: therefore it divides, unless a reunion is made: but there cannot be a reunion there: therefore it is necessary that the division remains.
This is assumed by the destruction of the consequent: between two and the same persons, a matrimonial and legitimate union is not repeated: therefore, since they were previously united, after the separating act, the union will not be repeated, lest injury be done to the sacrament.

1. Likewise, it seems that an adulterer can dismiss an adulteress, because the adultery of one causes separation: but in every nature it is such that when the cause is doubled, then the effect is strengthened: but by the adultery of both, the cause of dismissal is doubled: therefore the effect is strengthened, therefore much more can an adulterer dismiss an adulteress than a non-adulterer can dismiss an adulteress.
2. Likewise, the sin of both is greater than that of one simply: therefore it seems that both sin more against marriage than one; therefore they divide the cohabitation of the bed more by both sinning than if one sinned: therefore it seems that they can dismiss each other.
3. Likewise, both have lost their right in marriage: therefore, since this is not acquired again for them on account of sin, it seems that they sin by remaining together afterwards: therefore they are bound to separate.

On the contrary, this is what the Lord says, John 8:7: "He who is without sin": and he said this concerning the adulteress: therefore it is yours, let him who is without sin cast the first stone at her; an adulterer cannot accuse an adulteress: therefore neither can he bring her to judgment by accusation: but he cannot dismiss her except by judgment: therefore a wife adulteress cannot be dismissed by an adulterer.

Response. It must be said that an adulterer cannot dismiss an adulteress, as is said in the Text.

To the first objection, it must be said that it is not simply a separating act: because it separates from the bed, but not from the sacrament: and therefore the objection is not valid: for such union and separation are personal, and therefore cannot be repeated often between the same persons.

To the other, it must be said that the adultery of one is a cause of separation by the merit of the faith kept in the other: for it is adjudged to him, that the adulteress has sent away the debt she had in the body of the other, although the other has lost nothing. But when both commit adultery, then that faith merits nothing, and therefore they cannot be separated: because neither can be judged to the punishment of the other. The objection proceeds as if the judgment is made by the merit of adultery alone: and this is not true.

By this, the solution to the following is also clear.

To the third, it must be said that neither has lost their right: because what one loses their right, it is judged in favor of the faith kept by the other: and this does not happen here.

And thus the reason for the assigned law is clear here.

Articulus 4 — Whether A Husband Who, Being Free From Fornication, Has Dismissed A Fornicatress, Can Be Joined To Another

Whether a man who is free from fornication can dismiss a fornicating wife and marry another?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there,

C, If anyone, however, is free from fornication, etc.

From this it seems that in this chapter it is said that it is entirely unjust:

1. For the Lord says in the Gospel that not all receive the word concerning continence: therefore, it ought not to be imposed on all: either therefore the man will dismiss, or he will not dismiss. If he dismisses, then since he is imperfect, perfection is imposed on him: but this is a snare for the imperfect, as the Apostle suggests, 1 Corinthians 7:35: Moreover, I say this for your benefit, not to cast a snare upon you, but for that which is honorable, I supply, to provoke, and which provides the ability to beseech the Lord without impediment. But if he does not dismiss, then he provides an incentive to sin: because he is foolish who holds a harlot, as it is said in the Letter: therefore it seems unjust what is said here.

2. Likewise, This woman from marriage had nothing more than the debt in the body of the man, and this she lost by the merit of fornication: therefore she has nothing more in common with him: therefore it seems that although she is not released from him who did not sin in marriage, yet he is released from her: therefore he can marry another, although she cannot marry another.

3. Likewise, Since there are three goods of marriage, I see that by fornication two are expressly violated, namely faith and sacrament. And concerning faith indeed it is clear. Concerning the sacrament, however, it is also clear thus: because the sacrament according to being is the very individuality of marriage, by which man and woman were one in soul and body: but it is impossible for that unity to remain in union with another: therefore since by fornication one unites with another, he divides himself from the first: therefore individuality is dissolved: therefore these goods which are made null do not hold the being of marriage between man and woman. But the good of offspring is better and more certainly sought in another, and even in animals: therefore it seems that none of the goods of marriage prevent that he who has not fornicated can contract with another: therefore it is false what is said in the Letter.

4. Likewise, Marriage is a medicine: but no art of medicine is such that it prepares only one electuary or antidote, but rather if one is offended, another is prepared: therefore by similarity, since the disease of concupiscence is more dangerous than the disease of the body, it seems that different antidotes ought to be continuously prepared for it. If therefore one of the spouses offends (because it is better to marry than to burn) the ability to contract with another ought to be given.

On the contrary of this is that everything inducing lasciviousness and dissolution of the civilities of the Church ought to be prohibited by law, as the Philosopher says in the Politics: but to be joined to several successively is of this kind: therefore it ought to be prohibited: therefore the law which is set here is right. The middle is proven: for if the separated one is joined to another, hatred of kinship towards kinship is born, and dissension of the house of children against children: therefore the proposition is established.

To this it must be said that those things which are said in the Letter are to be held without ambiguity.

To the first objection, however, it must be said that it is permitted and advised to him, that with caution he spare his wife, and thus remain with her: because she is not a harlot who is penitent: and if she does not wish, let her impute it to herself: nor by this does he provide an incentive to sin, because the man can rightly restrain her with disciplines and priests, so that he will not fear a second lapse.

By this also the solution to the second is clear.

To the other it must be said that the good of the sacrament is not violated: because such separation is not sacramental: because although she is united to another bodily, yet not sacramentally: and bodily union with another does not contradict sacramental union with the husband, and therefore does not sever it.

To the other it must be said that marriage is a medicine: yet if the sick person abhors the medicine, which alone avails against the disease, another cannot be made for him, but the same differently disposed will be salutary: so it is with the woman first a harlot, and afterwards penitent.

Articulus 5 — Whether A Husband Can Dismiss A Fornicatress And Be Joined To Another, As It Is Falsely Imputed To Ambrose That He Held This

Whether a man can dismiss a fornicator and join with another, as it is falsely attributed to Ambrose that he held this?

Whether a man can dismiss a fornicator and join with another, as it is falsely attributed to Ambrose that he held this?

Then it is asked concerning what Ambrose says, there, C, after the beginning: Because it is permitted for a man to take another, etc.

For this seems to be true: because
1. As was said before, men have more incitement than women: therefore, they ought to be more assisted by the statutes of marriage: therefore, something ought to be granted to them, which is not to women: but this cannot be, unless it is that they take others: therefore, it is permitted or ought to be permitted for men to take others.

1. Likewise, a man fulfills many, as was proven above: therefore, according to the nature of his sex, it ought to be permitted for him to contract with many: therefore, what is said is licit:

therefore, it is not falsely attributed to Ambrose's books, but rather it is decreed or said from reason.

Response, that it was added by a falsifier to Ambrose's book, and is openly false.

1. To the first, it must be said that the law of continence is enjoined on the one dismissing: or if he does not contain, to be reconciled, and this befits the perfection of the New Testament: nor will God deny grace, provided that he prepares himself by repenting for reception, to which if he does not prepare himself, he imputes it to himself and not to another.

To the second, it must be said that here the Philosopher speaks of the nature which is the sex from the genus: because every male is thus disposed: and this is not the proper nature of man, but rather that which is from difference. And what this means is clear from the above. Thus, however, the law of the fathers speaks concerning the right of man insofar as he is man, that is, insofar as he uses reason and intellect through the consideration of the reward of chastity.

Articulus 6 — Whether A Husband Is Bound To Dismiss An Adulteress, Or To Keep Her With Him

Whether a man is bound to dismiss an adulteress, or to keep her with him?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, D, John Chrysostom says, etc.

For this is confirmed by reason: because
1. The ease of pardon begets an incentive to sinning: but often to receive is an ease of pardon: therefore it begets an incentive to sinning: therefore it is not to be hoped for in receiving.

1. Likewise, on that of the epistle to the Romans 1, 82: Not only those who do these things, etc., the Gloss says, that he consents, who, while he can rebuke, is silent: by sending away the woman through this that he accuses her of fornication, he can rebuke: therefore he sins by being silent and dissembling: but reception is made from the dissembling of fault: therefore he sins by hoping to receive.
2. Likewise, to be a patron of disgrace and of lenocinium, is a mortal sin: but to keep a fornicator is to be a patron of disgrace and lenocinium, as it is said in the Letter: therefore to keep a fornicator and not to cast her out, is a mortal sin.

On the contrary of this it is objected thus:
1. A wise man takes care not to lose an irreplaceable remedy for himself: but a wife is an irreplaceable remedy for concupiscence while she lives: therefore a wise man does not cast her out: therefore he does not wish to separate from her, as long as she lives, whatever she may do.

1. Likewise, Jerome says on Hosea, that it is good to induce a harlot to be invited to continence: therefore it is much more good to keep one already led: therefore it is evil to dismiss a wife even practicing prostitution.
2. Likewise, if she were an unbeliever, he would be advised to keep her in hope of repentance: therefore much more should he be advised to keep a believer, but erring in morals: therefore in no way is she to be dismissed.
3. Likewise, as long as she is with the man, she has some restraint from disgrace: but when she is dismissed, she has none; therefore it seems that it is better to keep her than to dismiss her.

Response. It must be said, that as long as there is hope and the faculty of correction, so long the man is to be advised not to dismiss his wife: but if neither of these is present, it is rather to be advised to the man that he withdraw himself from disgrace: because he is judged a patron of disgrace, when he dwells with one unwilling to withdraw from fornication.

And through this the solution to the first part of the objections is clear.

To the first objection in the contrary, it must be said that a wise man has something of the fear of God and love of honesty: and therefore he more willingly lacks a remedy which does not directly heal, because by the grace of nature a remedy is against concupiscence, which he uses with infamy and participation in sin in a nefarious woman.

To the other it must be said, that it is true, where there is hope of repentance: but if there is no hope, then he is foolish, who takes such a woman.

To the other it must be said, that it is true concerning an unbeliever who cohabits not in contempt of the author of marriage: but such a harlot in whom repentance is not hoped for, cohabits with contempt of the honesty of marriage and blasphemy of chastity.

To the other it must be said, that if the man can restrain her from disgrace, then without doubt he is to be advised to keep her: but if he cannot, then it is safer to dismiss her, lest the man himself also perish in the crime of the woman.

Articulus 7 — In What Manner The Accusation Of Adultery Ought To Be Made

How ought the accusation of adultery to be made?

How ought the accusation of adultery to be made?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said, there, E, But all these things are to be understood, etc.

First, How ought the accusation to be made? Second, When is the husband admitted to the accusation of the adulterous wife, or conversely? Third, What is the effect of this separation? Fourth, In which cases can the husband not act for the separation of the bed? Fifth, Whether after the sentence of separation of the bed has been pronounced, he is bound to receive the adulteress if he himself has also committed adultery? Sixth, Whether the woman after the sentence has been pronounced ought to be reconciled to the husband recalling her, even if she does not wish? Seventh, Whether the adulterous woman after penance for adultery can repel the husband from accusation? Eighth, Whether the secretly adulterated husband can without sin act against the manifestly adulterous woman for the separation of the bed? Ninth, Whether the reconciled adulteress has lost the debt she had in the body of the husband, so that she cannot without sin demand the debt, but only render it?

To the first, it is objected thus: Accusation is properly made concerning a crime by inscription, with the accuser obligating himself to the law of retaliation before the judge if he fails in proof.

However, it seems that this cannot be observed in the accusation of adultery: because

1. Accusation ought to be concerning what is known: but that sin is committed in secret. Therefore, it cannot be accused.
2. If you say that it ought to be accused by suspicion. On the contrary: Human judgment is often deceived: therefore suspicion does not lead to the certainty of judgment: therefore neither will the judge proceed to a definitive sentence.

3. Likewise, How is the inscription to be made? For it cannot be understood to inscribe that which is to be proven: but the act of intercourse cannot be proven, because it very rarely happens that this sin is committed before so many as to suffice for proof.

4. Likewise, It seems that it cannot be maintained, that he obligates himself to the law of retaliation: because if it is granted that he does not prove, then he himself would be separated from the spouse, because this is just as if the wife were separated from him: therefore whether he proves or does not prove, he would achieve his purpose: and this is not just: therefore the mode of accusation cannot be made in this case.

Response. It must be said that the accusation of marriage on account of manifest adultery is twofold: one for legal punishment, the other for the separation of the bed. That which is for legal punishment is made before the secular judge by inscription and the penalty of retaliation: because then the same penalty ought to be inflicted on the man if he fails in proof as would be inflicted on the woman if he could prove what he says. But that which is made for the separation of the bed is made by inscription before the ecclesiastical judge and without the law of retaliation: because the law of retaliation does not apply: because as was objected, the man would achieve his purpose, whether he proves what he objects or not.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is judged known according to what is violently presumed at least according to the rhetorician, who proceeds from violent signs, as if he finds her alone with him alone in bed or lurking in the dark. Sometimes even both men and women, when they know adulterers, lie in wait for them, and then they catch them in the act with clothes, and then it can be evident to the judge concerning the fact.

To the other, it must be said that suspicion is called light and violent, according to what even in dialectics sometimes a sign is found deepened, which is almost turned with cause, and this sometimes makes knowledge almost demonstrative like a cause, and such is presumption in rhetoric, and this well makes faith to the judge: but light ought not to be admitted.

To the third, it must be said that inscription is to be made thus: In the year from the incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ 1249, with Lord N. presiding.

To the other, it must be said as is evident in the beginning of the solution.

Articulus 8 — When A Husband Is Admitted To The Accusation Of An Adulterous Wife; And Whether It Can Be Done For Sodomy; And Concerning Heresy And The Other Cases

When is a husband admitted to the accusation of an adulterous wife? And, can it be done through sodomy? And, concerning heresy and other cases?

Secondly, it is asked, When is a husband admitted to the accusation of an adulterous wife, or conversely?

It seems, however, that when fornication or adultery is committed: because
1. The Lord says, Matthew 5:32 and 19:9, that dismissal cannot occur except for the cause of fornication: therefore, if there is fornication, then it seems accusation can be made.

1. Likewise, accusation is concerning a crime sinning against marriage: but that is fornication: therefore, with that perpetrated, accusation can be made.

On the contrary, it is said,
4. According to the Lord, Matthew 18:17, everyone must first be admonished before being accused before the church: therefore, it seems that immediately with fornication existing, the wife is not to be accused, but admonished to repent.

1. Likewise, in such fraternal correction, a man is held to an outsider: therefore, much more in such matters is he held to his wife: therefore, she is not to be immediately accused.

The question arises here, Since the more disgraceful mode is abusing oneself in sodomy, whether through sodomy accusation can be made for the separation of the bed?

It seems, however, that it can: because
1. It is more to sin against nature than against marriage: but sodomy is against nature, whereas fornication or adultery is against marriage only: therefore, sodomy is a greater sin than adultery: therefore, separation should more be made because of sodomy than because of adultery.

1. Likewise, Genesis 38:7 and 10, the Lord killed him who spilled his seed on the ground: therefore, much more will He kill him who acts against nature and annihilates the seed: therefore, it seems that for the enormity of the crime, separation should be made concerning the marriage bed.

On the contrary of this is that it does not divide itself into another: therefore, it keeps the faith of the bed in that it does not communicate itself to another, and to another the faith of the bed is not obligated: therefore, it seems that it does not sin against marriage: therefore, neither is it to be punished in marriage concerning the separation of the bed.

Another question arises here concerning spiritual fornication:
1. For that is greater than bodily: therefore, since it sins against the author of marriage through heresy or Judaism or paganism, it seems that he who sins in such a way in marriage is to be punished concerning the separation of the bed.

1. Likewise, in such fornication, the evil of the offspring is more feared than even in bodily: therefore, such a wife is more to be separated from the bed than one fornicating bodily, lest the offspring be infected with heresy.

On the contrary is: because

1. Such a one in no way sins against marriage: therefore, it is unjustly acted with him if he is punished in marriage.

1. Likewise, let us suppose that he does not cohabit in contempt of the Creator, nor teaches heresy to the other spouse or children, it seems that then separation is not to be made.

Response. It must be said that in these three cases accusation can be made of those who are touched in objecting.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that there is a manifold mode of accusation, through accusation, through denunciation, and through inquisition. The objection, however, holds concerning the mode of denunciation, but not concerning the mode of accusation: because in the mode of accusation it is more acted towards the punishment of the accused than towards correction: but in the mode of denunciation it is the converse. And there is an instance: because in theft I can act towards my thing, and accuse the thief before the ecclesiastical judge, yet I am not held to admonish him first.

To the other, it must be said that this is true when a man acts towards the correction of the person: and then the mode of accusation is not that which is done through inscribed accusation.

To the other which is further asked, it must be said that, as I think, for sodomy violently presumed and proven, the wife can be dismissed, and conversely, unless it is presumed that by the exhibited female concubinage she is purged from the vice of sodomy.

To what is objected against, it must be said that it does not keep the faith of the bed: because it stains chastity, for whose custody the faith of the bed is to be kept: but it is true that it does not unite itself to another, but rather loses chastity, than if it united itself to another.

To what is further asked, it must be said that without doubt for heresy or other pertinacious infidelity the wife can be dismissed, when it objects to carnal fornication: but when it objects to spiritual, then custom must be alleged, because otherwise it would not be judged pertinacious in its sense.

To what is objected against, it must be said that it sins against the foundation of marriage and the author: and this is worse than if it directly sinned against marriage: and therefore, supervening, it causes separation from the bed.

To the other, it must be said that this itself is contempt: because it has fallen into heresy from the Christian faith, and there is less hope concerning her than if she had never been faithful: and therefore it is not similar, because the Apostle speaks there of those who contracted in gentility, and afterwards one of them was converted: but here it speaks of him who, existing in Christianity before, contracted, and afterwards fell into heresy.

Articulus 9 — Whether The Effect Of Separation Is Severance From The Bed

Is the effect of separation a cutting off from the bed?

Thirdly, it is asked, What is the effect of separation?

And it is commonly said that it is a cutting off from the bed.

However, it seems that it ought not to be: because
1. To no one from whom fear is held, and who can be guarded, should the liberty of sinning be given: but a woman thus departing receives greater liberty of sinning: therefore it ought not to be granted to her by the husband: therefore she ought not to be separated from the bed.

1. Likewise, Hosea 1:6 speaks of an adulteress saying: "I will hedge up your way with thorns, and I will hedge her in with a wall, and she shall not find her paths," and she is not to be separated from the bed.
2. Likewise, Jerome in the prologue of the Galeated Prologue of Hosea describes an adulterous woman shut in the chamber of her husband, and sitting as a widow for a long time, and awaiting the return of her husband to her: therefore, in this way it can also be done here.
3. Likewise, a madman wishing to kill himself is bound and well treated: but the death of the soul is more dangerous than the death of the body: therefore it seems that one wishing to cause the death of the soul to himself ought not to be released, but bound.

On the contrary, it is what the Pope says, that no one is injured who uses his own right: but he who dismisses uses his own right: therefore he injures no one: therefore he can do this licitly.

Response. It must be said that she can be dismissed even for simple fornication: but she also ought to be dismissed when she frequently repeats it and does not wish to repent, for the reasons assigned above.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that force cannot be applied to her because coerced services do not please God, and, as Damascene says, neither does it compel virtue nor persuade malice: and even if she were bound externally, the heart could not be bound: and therefore she is not to be bound.

To the following two, it must be said that the way of fornication of the soul is to be hedged with thorns by the Lord, who can convert in this way: but the husband cannot convert, and for the favor of the husband it is permitted to him to act towards separation, so that the woman, thus confused, may return to herself, just as excommunication is medicinal.

To the fifth, it must be said that it is not similar to the madman: because he does not foresee his danger, but the adulterous woman sees well.

Articulus 10 — In Which Cases A Husband Cannot Bring Action For Separation Of Bed

In which cases can a man not act for the separation of bed?

Fourthly, it is asked, In which cases can a man not act for the separation of bed?

And seven are mentioned. The first case is, if he is similarly convicted of fornication. The second, If he prostituted his wife. The third, If she believed her husband to be dead due to his long absence. The fourth, If she was secretly known by someone in the guise of her own husband entering the bed. The fifth, If she was oppressed by force. The sixth, If he reconciled with her after the adultery was committed. The seventh, If in infidelity the marriage was contracted, the other converted gives a bill of divorce to the one unwilling to cohabit, and he departing marries another, and after dismissing that one is converted: for then he is bound to receive her, notwithstanding that she was known by another in infidelity.

However, it is objected concerning the first case: because 1. Double fault increases guilt: therefore also punishment: since therefore the punishment of the wife's fornication is separation from bed, on account of double fornication they ought to be separated.

1. Likewise, Each of them sins against marriage: therefore each of them ought to be punished in marriage: therefore they ought to be separated from each other.
2. Likewise, The faith of each is harmed towards the other: therefore they cohabit dangerously: therefore it seems that it should be granted to them that they act for separation from each other.

Concerning the second, it is objected: because 1. Then most of all the companionship between man and woman seems vile: therefore the right should be given that they be separated from each other.

1. Likewise, The circumstance is more disgraceful to be prostituted by a man than by a stranger: therefore it seems that some right should be introduced by which she is separated from the man: and this cannot be unless an accusation is given for separation: therefore such a one should not be hindered from acting for the separation of bed.

Concerning the third, it is similarly objected: 1. For let us suppose that she prefers the love of the following to the preceding, and does not wish to return when admonished: therefore it seems that she, guilty of adultery, becomes so, as will be said below in the text: therefore it can be acted against her for the separation of bed.

1. Likewise, Doubts are to be interpreted in the better and safer part: but with the husband long absent, it cannot be certain of his death: therefore it seems that she is bound to choose more safely, namely to wait continuously: because in that there is no danger: if therefore she has not waited, it seems that this can be objected to her: therefore the man can act against her for the separation of bed.

Concerning the fourth, it is similarly objected: because 1. A man is easily notable from another man in touch and speech and other signs: therefore if she does not discern, it seems that she does not do what is in her power: therefore she becomes guilty: therefore that sin can be objected to her for the separation of bed.

1. Likewise, Ignorance does not excuse from everything, but from so much: therefore not the whole accusation against her is removed by the man.

Concerning the fifth, it is also objected, if she is oppressed: 1. For by no fear ought she to fornicate, because in this respect no fear falls upon a constant man, because this is a mortal sin: therefore by this she is not absolved, but that the man could act against her.

1. Likewise, She contributes something to the action, because she grants the body, although unwilling: therefore it is not entirely force.
2. Likewise, Those corrupted by force are not veiled: therefore by similarity they are not entirely absolved from the action of the man: therefore the man in such a case can act for the separation of bed.

Concerning the sixth, it is also questioned thus: 1. Either reconciliation is understood through the judgment of the Church, or because he asked for the debt from her, and she rendered it. If in the first way: then there is no case: because it has already been judged by the Church that that adultery is not to be held as adultery, and then there is no doubt there. But if in the second way. On the contrary: Let it be supposed that while the case is pending before the sentence given by the Church, she asks for the debt: either it will be denied, or not. If he denies: therefore he does injury: because he is not yet absolved from her by the sentence of the Church: therefore he does not render to her what is still considered his: therefore he sins mortally. But if he renders: then he is reconciled to her after adultery: therefore he cannot afterwards act for the separation of bed: and this is nothing: therefore this case is none, as it seems.

1. Likewise, For a benefit no one loses the action which he has against someone: but by reconciling himself to her he does well: therefore from this he does not lose the action: therefore it seems that even after reconciliation he can act as before for the separation of bed. The first is proved: because if the opposite is granted, then it follows that someone is punished for a benefit: because to lose an action which is granted to him by law in favor is the greatest punishment. The second, however, is evident by itself.

Concerning the seventh, it is objected: because 1. The Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 7:15: "But if the unbeliever departs, let him depart." Therefore similarly for the brother or sister is not subject to servitude in such a case who is separated from an unbelieving spouse, in no way is he bound to them: but by conversion...

§ ... departure, he does not become liable to her by a new servitude: therefore he is not bound to receive her: therefore it seems that this case is null.

§ 2. Also, if he must receive her, this is only by the bond of marriage that remained even after her departure. But let us suppose that the believer contracts with another woman before the first wife, who was his wife while he was an unbeliever, converts. Therefore, if the first wife subsequently converts, he is bound to withdraw from the believing wife and receive the first, and this is contrary to the Apostle.

§ To the contrary of this is what Innocent III says (Extra, de divortio, cap. Gaudemus): "If she who has converted follows the one who has converted to the faith, before he has taken a legitimate wife for the aforementioned causes, he shall be compelled to receive her. Furthermore, although according to evangelical truth he who marries a dismissed woman commits adultery, nevertheless the dismisser cannot object fornication to the dismissed woman on the ground that she married another after the repudiation, unless she fornicated otherwise." [698]

§ Response. It must be said to the first case, that it holds according to the sentence of the Lord in the Gospel of Matthew 5:32 and 19:9.

§ To the first objection to the contrary, it must be said that there is a greater sin in both from a double fornication than from a single one. However, because this action is granted by law in favor of the one who has not committed adultery, when neither merits that favor, the action for the separation of the bed will cease.

§ To the next it must be said that both sin against the marriage, and yet neither can bring an action, because each has a beam in their eye. And therefore no judgment is made except of inquiry and penance, and not of accusation for the separation of the bed, because this saying is understood of that mode of acting, John 8:7: "He that is without sin," etc.

§ To the next it must be said that for the violated faith penance must be enjoined upon both in the forum of confession, or even by a visitor if it was denounced; but the action said for this cause ceases by way of accusation.

§ To what is objected concerning the second, it must be said that it is true that the sin is greater there if the husband prostitutes his wife than if he does not prostitute her. However, because that right was introduced in favor of innocence, the husband prostituting his wife does not merit to enjoy such a right. The objection, however, proceeds as if the right was introduced only for the detestation of the crime.

§ And by this the solution to the following is also clear.

§ To what is objected concerning the third, it must be said that without a doubt if a woman does not want to return to her prior husband after she knew him to be alive, and flees from him, preferring the love of the following one to him, she will then be reputed guilty of adultery. And the husband can object this to her before an ecclesiastical judge for the separation of the bed; and in this case she is not excused, but only when, thinking her husband dead, she contracted with another.

§ To the next it must be said that the better part is more reasonable; and since our reason in such particulars cannot proceed except from sensible judgments, a part is called safe enough according to human judgment when it sufficiently has sensible things from which reason may be caused, such as fame by hearsay, and a long expectation beyond the agreed time for return, and the like.

§ To what is objected concerning the fourth case, it must be said that when a malicious machination is presumed, then it could be discerned easily. But when nothing evil is presumed, then such caution is not applied, nor is she bound to apply it: because she presents herself in the customary place for the frequentation of her husband and at the customary hour, and she is not bound to do more.

§ To the next it must be said that this is understood of ignorance of the law, not of fact: for ignorance of fact completely excuses: and § such is this ignorance, when one is received for another, just as Leah was received by Jacob for Rachel.

§ To what is objected concerning the fifth, it must be said that this case is understood of absolute force, which although it does not fall upon the mind, yet falls upon the body; and it is not understood of the fear of honor, or of parents, or of anyone else. And this force is called oppression, rather than fear or the violence of fear.

§ By this the solution to the following is also clear: since it is certain that she contributes nothing, but only suffers.

§ To the next it must be said that women thus oppressed are not veiled, for the sake of caution. However, if complete force is done to them, they can in my judgment be veiled, as was noted in the question concerning the veil of virgins, and this is proved by sufficiently fitting reasons, and also by authorities, although Pope Leo alone seems to say something to the contrary, which was said for the sake of caution of greater humility. If, however, someone wished to hold the contrary opinion, namely that they ought not to be veiled, he can say to this that it is not similar: because the veil requires a sign rather than virtue and grace. But that right [to accuse of adultery] is introduced in favor of virtue and the detestation of vice, and since it does not find greater virtue in one union than in another, nor the vice which is principally in the mind, license is not given to the other to object to this kind of fornication.

§ To what is asked concerning the sixth, it must be said that it can be understood in either way. For if he renders the debt to her, he either renders it as to a reconciled woman whose fault he has dismissed, or he renders it as to one from whose debt he has not yet been absolved by ecclesiastical judgment. If in the first way: then the case holds, because it is not right that what is once dismissed be repeated again or objected as a crime: because, as the Prophet says, a double tribulation shall not rise up; [699] nor can the same sin be both pardoned and punished as if it were not pardoned. But if he renders it in the second way: then it does not stand in his way that he can still accuse her.

§ And by this the solution to the first objection is clear.

§ To the next it must be said that concerning benefits no one loses anything of his right: but from a benefit a loss sometimes follows, just as if you owe me a hundred, and I remit it to you for the sake of God as a benefit of alms, I lose the right of seeking a hundred from you. And so it is here, for by remission this man loses the right of accusing.

§ And to what is further objected concerning the seventh, it must be said that the Decretal introduced last states the entire law that exists in this case.

698. Decretales Gregorii IX, lib. 4, tit. 19, c. 8.

§ But to the first that is opposed to the contrary, it must be said that this is true which the Apostle says, that in such cases a brother or sister is not subject to servitude; but in another mode he is subject, that is, if he is made of another mode, that is, a believer like the husband.

§ To the next it must be said that if he took another woman before the conversion of his spouse, then in favor of the faith he is absolved: because the bond of marriage which is founded upon the faith of Christ is stronger than that which is contracted in infidelity. And therefore the second marriage stands, even if the one he had previously converts. But when no bond was binding in the opposite direction, it was otherwise, as is clear in corporal bonds, that a weak one binds by itself; but if a stronger one comes binding in the opposite direction, the first is broken, which when it was alone, was not broken.

§ But nevertheless it must be noted that in the same Decretal it is said shortly before, namely, that if he had several wives in view of his infidelity, since it was never lawful for anyone to have several except by divine dispensation, he should choose one from the many,

§ if all are converted with him, the one who is more suited to him. And license to marry is given to the others, because they were never truly wives. But she whom he chooses is made his true wife by the new contract of the Christian faith.

Articulus 11 — Whether After A Sentence Of Separation Has Been Pronounced, The Husband Is Bound To Receive Back The Adulteress If He Himself Commits Adultery

Whether after a sentence of separation has been passed, a husband is bound to receive an adulterous wife if he himself commits adultery?

§ Fifthly it is asked: Whether after a sentence of separation of the bed has been passed, he is bound to receive the adulterous wife, if he himself also commits adultery?

§ And it seems that he is: because § 1. Then he has nothing to object to her: therefore it seems that he is bound to receive her.

§ 2. Also, this right was introduced in favor of continence; but falling into crime, he does not merit the favor of the law. Therefore this man ought no longer to enjoy that right: therefore he is bound to receive her, as it seems.

§ 3. Also, Alexander III writes in Extra, de divortio, Hiis litteris, and further: "Indeed, having convened your chapter, since by their advice you enjoined upon both private individuals that continence must be observed, so that they should live chastely separated from each other, the aforementioned V. furtively and rashly celebrated betrothal and nuptials with another. But when you labored to inquire into the fact, the above-mentioned V., explaining and expounding the series of the matter, is reported to have appealed to our audience. Wherefore we command your fraternity that if he proceeded thus, you compel the said husband to return to his legitimate wife." [700] From this I argue that since on account of nuptials he is compelled to return and receive his first wife, much more so on account of fornication.

699. Nahum 1:9.

§ 4. Also, it pertains to an ecclesiastical judge to compel by ecclesiastical censure the avoidance of crime: but the other cannot if this fornicator is in a crime. Therefore it pertains to the ecclesiastical judge to compel him to avoid that crime; but he cannot fitly avoid it except by taking up his adulterous wife. Therefore it pertains to him to compel such a one to take up the first wife whom he had dismissed.

§ To the contrary of this is what is said thus: What has been well defined once, ought not to be retracted by any repetition. But the separation of that man has been defined once: therefore it ought not to be retracted: therefore he ought not to be compelled to receive her any more, whom he once dismissed by sentence.

§ Response. It must be said that by the rigor of the law he is not bound to receive her, as was proved last. But nevertheless the ecclesiastical judge, by his office, ought to compel him to receive her.

§ And by this the solution to the last two is clear, which prove nothing except that the judge by his office ought to compel such a one to receive her whom he dismissed.

§ To the first it must be said that although after the fact he does not have anything to object, nevertheless when the cause was in judgment, then he had. And because the matter was defined then, it ought not to be retracted for any cause. Now the cause of this right can be this: because when the woman first fornicates, she does not have a cause, since she is not provoked by her husband, and she could use marriage as a remedy for concupiscence; and therefore her fornication is detestable and lacking excuse. But when the husband fornicates afterwards, when he had no medicine for concupiscence and was provoked by his wife, he has a greater cloak of excuse. And therefore by the rigor of the law it is granted that he cannot on account of this be summoned by the wife for reconciliation. And the same is true conversely of the wife if she kept the faith of the bed, while the husband committed adultery.

§ To the next it must be said that that favor looks to the state of the person bringing the adultery into court, and not to a future state:

§ for since future events are uncertain, no right can be introduced in favor of a future state, but rather in favor of a present state.

Articulus 12 — Whether An Adulterous Woman Is Bound To Be Reconciled To The Husband Recalling Her After A Sentence Of Separation Of Bed, Even If She Is Unwilling

Whether an adulterous woman is bound to be reconciled to her husband who recalls her after a sentence of separation of the bed, even if she is unwilling?

§ Sixthly it is asked: Whether an adulterous woman is bound to be reconciled to her husband who recalls her after a sentence of separation of the bed, even if she is unwilling?

§ And it seems that she is: because § 1. The husband lost no right in her: but he himself had a right in his wife's body: therefore she is bound to render it to him: therefore also to be reconciled. But the husband recalled her. The first premise is proved from the fact that no right is lost except through sin. And the husband did not sin, and thus the proposition is established.

700. Decretales Gregorii IX, lib. 4, tit. 19, c. 3.

§ 2. Also, she is not separated except at the husband's action: therefore if the husband ceases from the action, she is bound to remain together: therefore even if he ceases from the effect of the action, she is bound to return: therefore if she has been recalled by the husband, she is bound to return.

§ 3. Also, anyone can renounce that right which is introduced in his own favor: but this right is introduced in favor of the husband who does not fornicate: therefore he can renounce it: therefore if he renounces it, she is bound to pay the debt just as she was bound before.

§ 4. Also, if she were not bound to the pristine servitude, then she would recover liberty and advantage from her own sin. But this is unfitting: therefore she is bound to return if the husband recalls her.

§ To the contrary of this is that: § 1. By a sentence he was separated from her. But what is done by a sentence of law, is done justly: therefore the separation is just. But anyone can use what he has justly obtained by sentence: therefore she can lawfully remain separated, even if he recalls her.

§ 2. Also, she can fear hatred and bodily harm: because, Proverbs 6:34, concerning such a husband whose wife has fornicated, it is said: "Because the jealousy and rage of the husband will not spare," etc. But anyone can take precautions for themselves: therefore she too can remain separated, even if she has been recalled.

§ Response. It must be said according to the law which states: "What is introduced in my favor ought not to be twisted to my detriment." Whence the husband can seek her even against her will, as the first objections prove.

§ But to what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that if that sentence were founded upon the truth of the cause, then the objection would hold; but it is not so: but rather it is introduced in favor of the one who keeps the faith of the bed.

§ And by this the solution is clear.

Articulus 13 — Whether An Adulterous Woman, After Penance For Adultery, Can Repel Her Husband From Accusation

Whether an adulterous woman, after penance for adultery, can repel her husband from accusation?

§ Seventhly it is asked: Whether an adulterous woman, after penance for adultery, can repel her husband from accusation?

§ And it seems that she can: because § 1. Ambrose says that penance is a most excellent and perfect thing, which recalls all defects to perfection: therefore it also recalls this defect to perfection, for which she could be accused: therefore she cannot be accused henceforth.

§ 2. Also, in the text Gregory says that she ought not to be reputed what she was, but

§ what she is now, holy and just. Therefore adultery ought not to be objected against her.

§ 3. Also, human judgment ought not to be stricter than divine judgment. But God in his judgment does not object past things which have been wiped out by penance. Therefore neither ought a human to object them: therefore it seems that the woman ought not to be accused for adultery wiped out by penance.

§ To the contrary of this is that: § 1. The penance of another does not take away from me a right which was introduced in my favor. But this right, namely, accusation for the separation of the bed, was introduced in my favor: therefore by the penance of another it is not wiped out, nor is it taken away from me.

§ 2. Also, if she is dismissed before penance, I am not bound to receive her when she is penitent. Therefore a penitent woman cannot impede me from accusation either.

§ 3. Also, penance wipes out guilt, but not punishment, because in penance one must undergo punishment. But separation is a punishment: therefore separation is not taken away from him: therefore she can be accused for the separation of the bed.

§ Response. It must be said that penance ought to induce the husband to cease voluntarily from accusation; but nevertheless he is not compelled if he is unwilling. He must be admonished, however, to cease, and he is hard-hearted if he cannot be induced, because what suffices for God ought to suffice for him.

§ To the first therefore it must be said that penance recalls defects with respect to immunity from guilt, but not with respect to immunity from unworthiness and any punishment whatever.

§ Moreover, penance is valid in the forum of God or of confession; but not in the forum of judgment or of contention, because a judge cannot see this, but God alone.

§ To the next it must be said that the saying of Gregory is a counsel, not a precept.

§ To the next it must be said that human judgment is not stricter, nor more right, than divine; but it is through other means, because it is through exterior things which can be certified from the vices of men. And this is not penance; but God alone sees penance in the heart. And therefore what suffices for God does not suffice for man; and sometimes what suffices for man does not suffice for God.

Articulus 14 — Whether A Husband Who Has Secretly Committed Adultery Can, Without Sin, Bring An Action For Separation Of Bed Against A Wife Manifestly Adulterous

Whether a husband who has committed adultery secretly, can without sin bring an action for separation of the bed against a woman who has committed adultery manifestly?

§ Eighthly it is asked: Whether a husband who has committed adultery secretly, can without sin bring an action for separation of the bed against a woman who has committed adultery manifestly?

§ It seems that he can: because § 1. What is secret cannot be objected; and nothing can impede him from accusation except the objection of a similar crime. Therefore it seems that the husband can bring an action for the separation of the bed.

§ 2. Also, he who is in secret mortal sin can preach when necessity is urgent. But to preach is much greater than to bring an action for the separation of the bed. Therefore he who is in secret adultery can also bring an action for the separation of the bed.

§ 3. Also, there is no scandal concerning the husband's sin; but there is scandal concerning the woman's sin. Therefore she ought to be punished publicly, as the Apostle says, 1 Timothy 5:20: "Them that sin reprove before all, that the rest also may have fear." Therefore this woman ought to be punished publicly; now this punishment is in that wherein she sinned, namely in marriage. Therefore since she cannot be punished except by separation from the bed, it seems that the husband can bring an action for the separation of the bed without sin.

§ To the contrary of this is that: § 1. For an exception against the husband, the woman lacks nothing except proof; but the truth even unproved by witnesses profits her and suffices before God. Therefore before God the woman has an exception against the hus§ band: therefore before God he sins when he accuses her.

§ 2. Also, "secret" and "manifest" are circumstances of similar adultery according to species. But circumstances do not alienate a sin nor infinitely weigh one down over another. Therefore it seems that the same sin in species creates a similar right in both: but this is the right of separation: therefore one has the same right against the other as conversely, although in a different circumstance. Therefore the woman can except before God against the husband.

§ Response. It must be said that what was proved last is true and probable.

§ Whence it must be said to the first, that in a human judgment he can object without obstacle; but this is not what is asked, but rather, whether he can do it without sin or not?

§ To the next it must be said that it is true that such a one can preach in necessity, because preaching is necessary for souls. But it is not so concerning the separation of the bed, which is for disturbance rather than for consolation.

§ To the next it must be said that it is true that such a one can accuse, although there is no scandal: yet he himself is bound in conscience by his own sin. And therefore his own conscience ought more to incline him to compassion for his wife, than to casting her away.

Articulus 15 — Whether A Woman, After Reconciliation, Has Lost The Right Of Demanding The Debt From Her Husband

Whether a woman after reconciliation has lost the right of seeking the debt from her husband?

§ Ninthly it is asked: Whether after reconciliation she has lost the right of demanding the debt?

§ And it seems that she has: because § 1. Unless the husband were absolved from that debt, he himself would be bound to render it even after separation. But since this is false, it seems that the woman has no right in the husband's body. Therefore since that right is not restored to her, it seems that even when reconciled she cannot seek it.

§ 2. Also, that right is conferred only by matrimonial consent; but that is not repeated after reconciliation. Therefore the right is not conferred upon her: therefore she does not have the right of seeking the debt.

§ 3. Also, by what things one sins, by these he will also be punished; but she sinned in faith and the right of the bed. Therefore she ought to be punished in that. Now she is not punished except by losing the right which she had. Therefore it seems that she will never henceforth have any right of seeking.

§ To the contrary is that: § 1. The reconciliation of a husband is different from that of any other friend; therefore something special is conferred in it. But this in which he is distinguished from other friends is nothing except the right of seeking the debt, because she previously had all the others. Therefore the right of seeking the debt is restored to her in reconciliation.

§ 2. Also, if it is granted that it is not restored: therefore if she denies herself to him after reconciliation, he cannot demand it again. Therefore even after reconciliation he could enter religion against her will, which is false and absurd. Therefore it is also false that the right of demanding the debt is not restored to her.

§ Response. The last part seems to be concedable, namely that she can seek the debt after reconciliation, and receives power over the husband's body just as she had before.

§ To the first therefore it must be said that that right is considered in two ways, namely in habit or sacramentally only, or according to an order to an act, which is rather the use or execution of the right. And in the first way indeed the adulterous woman never loses that right while she lives, but in the second way; and this is restored to her when reconciliation takes place.

§ To the next it must be said that matrimonia-

§ l consent creates that right sacramentally and habitually; and this is not repeated, but on account of fault someone can be suspended from the use and execution of their right; and this is relaxed in reconciliation.

§ To the next it must be said that she is sufficiently punished in marriage when she is suspended from the use and solace of her husband, even if she is not sacramentally and habitually separated from her husband.

Articulus 16 — Whether An Adulteress May Be Taken In Marriage

Whether an adulteress may be taken in marriage?

§ Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, F, "It is also customarily asked, whether she may be taken in marriage," etc.

§ For it seems that what is said here is not law: because § 1. The Church does not have the power to reject what God has shown to be lawful; but God has shown that it is lawful for adulterers to be joined. Therefore the Church does not have the power to reject this: therefore neither to interdict it. The first premise is self-evident. The second is proved by what is said in the Gloss on 1 Corinthians 9:4 and following, thus: "Lawful is what is prohibited by no precept." [701] Therefore the proposition is established.

§ 2. Also, those whom no impediment stands in the way of can contract, since they are legitimate persons; but no impediment stands in the way of these: therefore they can contract with one another. The first premise is established from what was said before. But the second is proved from this, that adultery does not stand in the way, as is plain, nor even homicide; therefore if both are joined, nothing will stand in the way. Therefore even if she plotted the death of her husband with effect, she herself can contract with the adulterer; and thus the proposition is established.

§ 3. Also, in other sacraments if the form is observed and the matter is present, a sacrament is made: therefore similarly in this one. Therefore both the man and the woman pronounce these words making a contract regarding the present: therefore it seems that they effect a true marriage.

§ 4. Also, other sins are greater, because Gregory says that spiritual sins are of greater weight than corporal ones; and yet they do not impede, because a proud man can contract with a proud woman, and an envious man with an envious woman. Therefore an adulterer with an adulteress: therefore it seems that what is said here is not law.

§ 5. Also, let us suppose that a woman kills her husband so that she could contract indeterminately with another; it seems that according to this law she could contract with no one. But this is false: therefore also what he introduces.

§ 6. Also, one evil is more to be tolerated than two; but adultery is one evil, and separation from the other is a second evil: therefore it seems that on account of the first the second ought not to be commanded.

§ 7. Also, I posit that first they plotted death, and afterwards they repented. And let it be asked: Whether they could then contract?

§ It seems that they could: because penance wiped out what stood in the way, namely the crime: therefore they can contract after penance.

§ Response. It must be said that there are three cases, of which if any one exists, he cannot contract with her whom he previously polluted through adultery: namely, if on account of this, in order to contract with her, he plots with effect for the death of her spouse (for if he only thought of doing it, and did not proceed to the deed, he would not be impeded on account of this). The second is if he gave her his faith to contract after the death of the spouse. The third, if he contracted with her in fact. Now this is ordered reasonably by the Church, so that many homicides and adulteries may be avoided, which would or could be committed for the sake of that familiarity.

§ To the first therefore it must be said that the Lord therefore gave the Church the keys and the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, so that she may ordain expedient things in such matters; and these are not so much human statutes, as also divine.

§ To the same it must be said that the impediment of crime stands in the way of these persons.

§ To the next it must be said that although separately they do not impede, yet conjoined they impede: because things conjoined are capable of more than things divided, as can be seen in many other things: for two move a stone which neither alone could move, and thus it is easy to see concerning other things.

§ To the next it must be said that here the matter is not under the due disposition, and this is required in every thing to be generated: because the malice of the obstructing crime is in the matter.

§ To the next it must be said that although certain other sins can be greater, nevertheless they do not sin so directly against marriage: and therefore they do not impede like this one.

§ To the next it must be said that such a woman has the impediment of crime, which impedes contracting, but does not annul the contract: because no man was in fault with her. And therefore, on account of the innocence of the man who contracts with her, the contract is permitted to stand.

§ To the next it must be said that it is not an evil that such a marriage is annulled, because it is null, as Augustine says. If however it were an evil, it would not be a common evil, but a personal one, and such would be compensated by the common utility which is in the fear of others, lest they easily perpetrate adultery.

§ To the last it must be said that penance can wipe out the guilt: but nevertheless some just punishment remains, and of those this is one.

§ Nunc de conditione videamus, etc. ("Now let us see concerning condition," etc.) In this distinction he determines two things. One is principal, namely concerning the impediment of condition. The other is secondary, concerning the age of the contracting parties, there, D, Hoc etiam sciendum est, quod pueri, etc. ("This also must be known, that children," etc.).

§ Concerning condition he determines three things in order in three chapters, namely: which condition impedes? Whether the slave of one can contract with the maidservant of another? And, Whether a marriage is dissolved by servitude supervening upon the marriage? And these lie plainly in the Text.

701. Glossa ordinaria, ad 1 Cor 9:4.

§ But for the knowledge of these three chapters five things are asked here.

The first is, What is the condition impeding marriage? The second, Whether servitude impedes marriage? The third, Whether it impedes by natural, or positive, or divine, or human law? The fourth, What of the slave of one contracting with the maidservant of another? The fifth, Concerning the condition which supervenes upon marriage.

Articulus 1 — What Is A Condition Impeding Marriage

What is the condition impeding marriage?

§ To the first, namely what is the condition impeding marriage, it is objected:

§ The Laws say that the condition impeding marriage is servitude; now servitude is a condition of subjection, by which a person according to himself and his things is in the power of a superior.

§ But it seems that such a condition ought not to exist in the human race: because § 1. Gregory says that nature begot all humans equal: therefore it is against nature for one human to be inferior to another, and to be in the power of another according to himself and his things. But those things which are against nature can be established by no law: therefore by no law can the condition of servitude exist among humans.

§ 2. Also, Gregory says that it is to be proud against nature to wish for a human to preside over a human: therefore the same as before.

§ 3. Also, the Apostle says that in Christ Jesus there is neither slave nor free: [702] therefore in the faith of Christ all are equal. Therefore it is false that one is the lord of another: therefore there is no condition of servitude.

§ 4. Also, in the first ordering of the human race it was said to humans before sin and after sin that they should cultivate the earth, and subject it to themselves; but nowhere that they should rule over another. Therefore it seems that it pertains to the dignity of human nature not to be of servile condition.

§ 5. Also, Cicero says in the Rhetoric that all right proceeds from nature: therefore what does not proceed from nature is an injury. But this right concerning the condition of servitude does not proceed from nature: therefore it is an injury. Proof of the minor premise. Nature is equally worthy in the slave and in the lord: therefore it is impossible that one should be placed before another from the participation of nature: and thus the proposition is established.

§ If perchance you say that Cicero lies. To the contrary: Positive law necessarily must have some reason of equity. Therefore that reason necessarily reasons from some habit ruling it, and it has some exemplar to which it looks. But that exemplar is necessarily prior to positive law [...positi]ve: but what is prior to positive law is not positive law: therefore, the exemplar which reason imitates when discovering positive law does not belong to positive law. But nothing is prior except natural and divine law: therefore, it is necessary that this exemplar be natural and divine law. But every exemplified thing is perfected by its exemplar: therefore, positive law is perfected by natural and divine law: and this is what Tully says.

To the contrary of this is: § 1. What Noah said: Cursed be Canaan, a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren. If, therefore, servitude was introduced by the Patriarchs having the inspiration of God, therefore it belongs to divine law.

§ 2. Also, concerning Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob it is read that they had menservants and maidservants: since, therefore, they had the inspiration of God, and did nothing against nature or law, servitude belongs to natural and divine law, as it seems.

§ 3. Also, in the New Testament, and in many other places, servants are commanded to obey their masters in all fear, not only the good and honest and gentle, but also the froward: therefore, the condition of servitude belongs to the law of Christ: and thus it is neither against nature, nor against divine things: therefore neither [is] servitude [evil].

§ 4. Also, I see that on account of sin man is handed over to be in the power of the devil: therefore much more will he be handed over into the power of a man: therefore, by the just judgment of God, one can be made the servant of another.

Response. It must be said that the condition of servitude is present in the human race: because if it were not, it would not impede marriage.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that servitude is not derived from an inequality of nature, but rather it is introduced as a punishment from an inequality of deeds: and therefore it is not favorable, but rather among those things which are avoided in themselves, as the Philosophers say.

To that, however, which is objected, that it is against nature, etc., it must be said that nature is spoken of in two ways, or rather in three ways: for sometimes nature itself means the species communicable to individuals, and participated by them, just as all human beings are called human beings by nature. Nature is also sometimes called natural reason: and this in two ways, namely proceeding from natural things, and consisting in natural things, or proceeding from natural things to the ordering of those things which occur contrary to nature, insofar as it is possible for them to be ordered. And in the first way, indeed, what is against nature cannot stand: and in this way servitude is not against nature, but rather it is personal, and against the state of the person. But in the second way, again, it is not natural: because thus nothing is natural except that right which nature teaches all those things which belong to that nature. But in the third way servitude is natural: because through it the fault which was introduced into nature from the vice of the person is ordered.

And through this the solution to the following is also clear: because Gregory calls "against nature" what is against nature spoken of in the first way, but not in the third.

702. Galatians 3:28.

To the next it must be said that a servant is considered in two ways, namely according as he is a participant in grace or glory, which are the greatest perfections of the soul, and in such things he is equal to his master, or even sometimes placed above him. He is also considered according to his work and capability, and in such things he is in the power of his master. And the Apostle speaks in the first way.

To the next it must be said that the solution is clear from the distinction introduced earlier: because servitude is introduced from an unnatural thing, which is sin: but yet by reason both the sin and the punishment for sin, which is servitude, are ordered.

To the next it must be said that Tully takes nature for natural reason, the habit of which rules in all positive law: and thus it is drawn from it like the exemplified from the exemplar, as the objection proves: and thus from thence the order of sin is drawn through the punishment which is servitude: for sin is ordered in punishment and through punishment.

Articulus 2 — Whether Servitude Impedes Marriage, And By What Law

Whether servitude impedes marriage, and on what grounds?

Whether servitude impedes marriage, and on what grounds?

Secondly it is asked, whether servitude impedes marriage?

It seems that it does not: § 1. For every impediment to something has some contrariety to another: but servitude has no contrariety to marriage: therefore it does not impede it. The first premise is proved: because nothing impedes another, except what operates or acts to the contrary: and what acts to the contrary is necessarily contrary. But the second premise is evident: because a servant can have faithfulness, offspring, and the sacrament.

§ 2. Also, if it impedes: either it impedes from the genus, or from an added difference. If from the genus: therefore every condition would impede marriage, which is false, since the condition of liberty does not impede. But if from a contracting difference. On the contrary: Therefore every servitude impedes, and always: therefore a male servant cannot contract with a female servant, which is false: therefore the servile condition does not impede marriage.

§ 3. Also, according to nature it is so, that if something of its nature impedes something, that thing multiplied impedes more: therefore if servitude impedes marriage, multiplied servitude impedes it more: but this is false, because a male servant can contract with a female servant, although yet in them the servitude is multiplied: therefore it is false that servitude impedes marriage.

§ 4. Also, the punishment of servitude supervenes upon the previously existing state of marriage from the vengeance for sin, just like other punishments: but I see that other punishments do not impede: therefore neither should this impede.

§ 5. Also, in the signified marriage, the contract of a handmaid with a freeman is greater than that of a freewoman with a freeman: therefore also in the sign, the marriage of a handmaid with a freeborn man should be more ratified than that of a freeborn woman with a freeborn man: therefore the condition does not impede marriage, but even promotes it. The first premise is proved from the fact that the most noble Word of God the Father married our nature in the one person of the Son in the bridal chamber of the virginal womb, although yet the Philosopher says in the first book of the Metaphysics that in many ways our nature is a handmaid. But the second premise is evident.

To the contrary of this is that: § 1. All deception and fraud rescind a contract: but if a freeborn man contracts with a handmaid in ignorance, there is deception there: therefore the contract must be rescinded.

§ 2. Also, marriage is among goods to be sought partly for themselves, and partly for the sake of something else, as the Philosopher says: but liberty is among things to be sought for themselves, while servitude is among things to be avoided: therefore liberty agrees with the character of an appetible good for marriage, and servitude is contrary to it: but a contrary impedes: therefore servitude can impede marriage.

§ 3. Also, there are many burdens of marriage from itself; therefore a burdening from an alien source ought not to be added to the burden of marriage, because it would be made too heavy: but servitude burdens from an alien source: therefore it ought not to be added to marriage: but rather if a contract is made in ignorance, it ought to be reputed as null by law, lest the burden of marriage be made too heavy.

Response. It must be said that by civil and Church constitution in favor of liberty, unknown servitude with the opposite condition, namely of liberty, impedes a marriage to be contracted, and invalidates a contract, unless they wish to remain together willingly, after the freeborn spouse knows about the condition of servitude in the other.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that this has some contrariety not to the essence of marriage, but rather to the consequents, namely to the rendering of the debt, and to the good status of the offspring: and therefore a marriage with that condition is too heavy: on account of which it has been established that it is an impediment to it.

To the next it must be said that it impedes from the difference, and the argument does not follow: because a difference does not have contrariety to itself in another individual, but rather to the opposite difference: as it is clear that rational in Plato is not contrary to rational in Socrates, but it is contrary to irrational. So the condition of servitude is not opposed to the servitude of marriage, but rather to liberty, and with that it impedes marriage.

To the next it must be said that this is true of that to which it has a contrary, but its like rather increases: and therefore if servitude could be multiplied against liberty in marriage, it would well have to be conceded that it would impede more: but this cannot be, since one belongs to one only: and therefore that argument does not compel.

To the next it must be said that other punishments belong to both spouses, and do not increase the burdens of marriage, nor make it of a viler condition in its goods: but servitude does all these things: and therefore it is not similar.

Moreover, other punishments followed original sin, and this one followed a personal vice: and therefore it is not equally in all: and therefore again it is not similar.

To the last it must be said that our nature is a handmaid in this, that it is not the total cause of its own works: but that handmaiden status does not hand it over into the power of a contrary master: and therefore there is an equivocation in the argument: whatever, however, may be in us who have frequently sinned, and therefore are servants of sin in some way. Yet our nature as it was assumed by Christ, was most free: and therefore the objection supposes a falsehood: and it is clear how the saying of the Philosopher is understood.

Articulus 3 — Whether It Impedes By Natural Law Or By Positive Law

Whether it impedes from natural or positive law?

Thirdly it is asked, whether it impedes from natural, positive, or divine law?

§ 1. But it seems that it does not from natural [law]: because this, as is said in the Old Digest, is what nature teaches all animals: but it is evident that nature does not teach servitude: therefore it seems that this condition does not belong to natural law: therefore neither does it impede marriage by natural law.

§ 2. Also, if it impeded by the force of natural law, it would be necessary that it be contrary to some of those things which belong to marriage in the conjunction of male and female: but this is not easily found: therefore it does not impede by the force of natural law.

§ 3. But it seems that it is not from divine law either: because this rather persuades humility than exaltation. Whence also it is said:[703] Art thou called being a servant? care not for it: but if thou mayest be made free, use it rather. Therefore, even by divine law it is persuaded concerning servitude, that a freeman remain with a handmaid, or conversely; therefore it does not impede marriage from divine law.

It seems that it does not impede from human positive law either: because all human law arises from divine or natural law: but this arises neither from divine nor from the other: therefore it is not an impediment by positive law.

Response. It must be said that this impediment has its force from positive law, which is a statute of the Church having the authority and inspiration of God for the ordering of sin through punishments, as was held earlier.

To the objection in contrary, it must be said that as to this it is natural, that nature rises up against and punishes the harmful: and therefore the punishments of sin are established by natural law: and in this way it is reduced to nature: but it is not necessary that it be natural or divine like one of the natural or divine precepts, but rather a judicial statute for the punishment of those sinning, and in favor of liberty, which first arose from the liberty of the soul from the nobility of virtue.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Slave Of One Can Contract Marriage With The Handmaid Of Another

Whether the male servant of one master can contract with the female servant of another?

Fourthly, it is asked about the male servant of one master contracting with the female servant of another. And this is asked on account of those things which are said in chapter B, It is also asked, if a servant, etc.

But it seems that this cannot be: because § 1. The servitude of one makes marriage burdensome: but here there is triple servitude, or even quadruple: therefore the marriage is made excessively burdensome: for here there is the double servitude of the two masters of the spouses, and the servitude of the husband to the wife, and conversely.

§ 2. Also, Matt. 6:24:[704] No man can serve two masters. Therefore neither here: therefore those of servile condition cannot be joined to two masters.

If perchance you say, that this is true when contrary things are commanded. On the contrary: Let it be that the wife asks for the debt, when the master demands service: for then they command contraries: therefore this man is in perplexity: but no one ought to be perplexed: therefore no one ought to contract such a marriage.

§ 3. Also, let it be that the master commands him that he never render her the debt, but always remain in the master's house to watch over the master's acts: and similarly the handmaid's master commands her: it is evident that they are bound to obey, because the Apostle commands this: therefore it seems that there is never a time of demanding or rendering the debt: therefore neither can marital society exist between such persons: therefore neither can marriage.

§ 4. Also, suppose that the master commands him not to consent to marriage: it is evident that he must be obedient, otherwise the master would punish him: therefore it seems that he cannot consent: therefore neither can he contract marriage.

§ 5. Also, whatever belongs to the thing which is in my possession, is mine along with my thing: but this servant belongs to his master: therefore also whatever belongs to the servant belongs to the master: but the servant's wife belongs to the servant: therefore the servant's wife belongs to the master: but one woman cannot belong to two men who have nothing in common: therefore the servant's wife ought to be the handmaid of that master whose handmaid she had been before. The same objection holds for the male servant in comparison to the handmaid's master. Since therefore all these things are absurdities, it seems that there is no marriage between a male servant and a female servant of diverse masters.

§ 6. Also, the children of such servants are ambiguously generated: for although according to certain laws the offspring follows the womb, yet the customs of different lands concerning this are ambiguous: because as was proved above, man is an animal whose both sexes are solicitous for the education of children, but the substance of the father is more principal in the generation of the son, than even of the mother: therefore it seems that more of the offspring pertains to the father, than to the mother: if therefore these generate one infant, he will belong to two masters, and perhaps ones commanding contraries, which would be a great absurdity. Since therefore many absurdities follow from such a marriage, it seems that such a marriage is illicit.

Response. It must be said that such marriages, although they are difficult, nevertheless are licit.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the servitude of the husband to the wife, and conversely, is equivocal to the servile condition: because a wife is not the handmaid of the husband, nor is the husband the servant of the wife: and therefore that objection does not conclude to an absurdity.

To the next, a distinction must be made: because either the servant contracted marriage with the consent of the masters, his own and his wife's, or with them dissenting, or with one consenting and the other dissenting. If however in the first way, then the conjugal debt must be paid: because he who consents to the principal, is understood to have consented to the accessory. And thus when they consented to the marriage, they are understood to have conceded also the time to pay the debt. If however both dissent, then it still seems a distinction must be made, namely either because it is not the hour of paying the marital debt, or of serving the masters. If in the first way, if it is night, and he is in a secret bedchamber with his wife, I think that he is bound to pay the debt. If in the second way, then I think they ought to serve the masters. If however in the third way, then under the same distinction they will not consent to serve.

To the saying of the Evangelist, however, it must be said that it matters how someone uses his property: and therefore there are laws regarding what the masters ought to do for their servants. Whence the Apostle says: Masters, give unto your servants that which is just and equal, knowing that ye also have a Master in heaven.

To the next it must be said that the master cannot command that the servant never attend to himself: because this would be against natural care and providence. Whence just as he cannot prohibit him from attending to the sustenance of the species, for there is a time of working and of resting in one natural day, just as night comes, when no man can work, as is said: And similarly it is in one week, like the time of feast days: and then the servant cannot be suspended from the rendering of the debt. But it is true, that he can well be impeded by the command of the master from continuous cohabitation.

To the saying of the Apostle the response is clear through what was said before.

To the next it must be said that as to this consent, the servant is not in the power of the master: because that consent has the condition of liberty from itself, as was clear above in the question concerning the impediment of violence or coercion. And the cause of this is, because what nature conceded for the permanence of nature as a solace for mortality, ought not to be placed in the power of anyone: and therefore even if the master contradicts, provided that the servant otherwise wishes, he can freely consent to marriage.

To the next it must be said that it deceives according to the equivocation of that which is "his" or "mine": because it is one thing for the husband to belong to the wife, and conversely, and another for the servant to belong to the master, as is clear from what was held previously: for the most extraneous mode of possessing is that by which a husband possesses a wife, and is possessed by her, and the most proximate is that by which a servant is possessed by a master, like a possession: and therefore that reason is not valid.

To the last it must be said that if several such persons were to generate children, then they are divided by the masters in certain parts of Germany: but if only one, then it cannot be divided, but one receives a price from the other, and then it belongs to one only.

Articulus 5 — Whether A Husband Can Give Himself Into Servitude To Another Without The Consent Of His Wife, And Be Absolved By This From The Rendering Of The Debt; And The Like Is Asked Concerning The Wife

Whether a husband can give himself as a servant to another without the consent of his wife, and by this be absolved from rendering the debt? And similarly it is asked about a woman.

Fifthly, it is asked about the condition which supervenes upon marriage: and this by reason of the third chapter, where this is raised in the Letter.

But it seems that the law which is determined in the Letter is not according to reason.

§ 1. For Bernard says: What was instituted for the sake of charity ought not to militate against charity. Therefore by similarity what was instituted in favor of liberty ought not to militate against liberty: but that this man makes himself a servant is against the free use of the wife, by which she ought to use her husband: therefore it seems that she ought to rescind the marriage, so that she being free might contract with another, of whom she could have free use.

§ 2. Also, in every nature it is so, that the same thing impedes the generation of a thing, and destroys the generated thing, as is clear in cold, and hot, and in all mixed and simple things: but servitude impedes the generation or contract of marriage: therefore it also destroys the already contracted marriage if it supervenes upon it: therefore it is badly determined in the Letter.

Also it is asked, whether he can give himself as a servant to another?

It seems that he cannot: because § 1. He does not have power over his own body, as the Apostle says:[705] but he who does not have power, cannot give himself to another: therefore this man cannot give himself to another as a servant.

§ 2. Also, what is done with prejudice to another, cannot be done by law: but this is done with prejudice to the woman, because the husband is impeded from the payment of the woman's debt, which she sought in the husband: therefore by law it cannot be done: therefore he cannot give himself to another.

§ 3. Also, he himself cannot give himself to God to serve in a cloister without the consent of the wife: therefore much less can he give himself to a man: because divine servitude is more favorable than human.

§ 4. Also, since two things are favorable, and a third not favorable, the laws ought to be for the two favorable things against the third: but in marriage there is the liberty of the persons, and the marriage, both of which are favorable: and servitude is the third, which is not favorable: therefore the laws ought to be for the liberty and honorableness of marriage: therefore it ought not to be conceded that he can make himself servile to the prejudice of the marriage and of liberty.

§ 5. Also, as the law says in the Old Digest, book four, Concerning those things which are done by cause of force or fear: If fear falls upon the wife or children, it is reputed to fall upon a constant man: because it belongs to a good man rather to want to suffer in himself, than to suffer shameful things in his wife or children. Therefore by similarity since a wife who remains free, much more abhors servitude in the offspring than in herself, nothing ought to be admitted in law which places her offspring under servitude, since she contracted with a freeborn man to this end that the offspring might remain freeborn. Since therefore the servitude of the offspring is caused from the servitude of the husband in most lands, it seems that it ought not to be admitted in law that a husband can give himself as a servant.

Further it is asked, whether a woman can similarly give herself as a handmaid?

And it seems that she can: because husband and wife are judged as equals: therefore also what the husband can do, the woman can do.

To the contrary is that: § 1. From this the servitude of the offspring expressly follows: because according to the laws the offspring follows the womb.

§ 2. Also, the husband is the head of the woman: therefore she cannot do anything, to which she is not directed by the husband: therefore neither without the consent of the husband can she make herself a handmaid.

Response. Without prejudice it must be said, that if a husband gives himself as a servant against the will of the woman, in no debt by which he is bound to the wife can the master impede him: because that in him which belonged to the wife, he cannot give to another master, while she is living:

and therefore also it is conceded that the marriage stands: for in this way God has joined them, and it is not lawful for man to separate them on account of any trouble, whatever may supervene.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that this does not militate against liberty: because the woman remains free, and in the free use of the husband in every debt of hers.

To the next it must be said that this is so in nature, because natural things act and suffer by the necessity of nature. But it is not thus in moral things: whence faults in morals are curbed

705. 1 Cor. 7:4.

by punishments, which have no contrariety to them, although they are contrary to the delights and appetites of those sinning: and therefore also on account of the institution of the Church something impedes it from being contracted, which does not dissolve the contract.

Nevertheless, concerning this another solution was had above, which is better than this one, and let it be looked at there.

To the next it must be said that this man can give himself as a servant saving every right of the wife, as well in body, as in goods, and in children: otherwise I think that it is a mortal sin for the masters if they receive him: and therefore the objection ceases, because the wife incurs no prejudice.

Through this the solution to the following is also clear.

To the next it must be said that divine service in the cloister is annexed to the vow of continence, which prejudices the debt of marriage, and therefore it cannot be done without the consent of the wife: but the service of a carnal master is not such: and therefore the argument is not valid.

To the next, without prejudice it seems to me, that without mortal sin children are not subjugated to servitude, if the mother before she gives birth to them, does not consent to the servitude.

To the next it must be said that a woman, in my judgment, cannot give herself as a handmaid: because in this they are not judged as equals.

Articulus 6 — Whether Males Before Fourteen Years And Girls Before Twelve Years Can Enter Into Marriage

Whether males before fourteen years of age, and girls before twelve years of age, can enter into marriage?

Whether males before fourteen years of age, and girls before twelve years of age, can enter into marriage?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, D, This also must be known, that boys before fourteen years, etc.

For this seems to be absurd: because § 1. According to the laws they receive a tutor up to the twenty-fifth year: therefore it seems that up to that time reason is not strengthened for the discretion of consent: therefore it seems that the constitution ought to place the time of contracting at twenty-five years.

§ 2. Also, those who enter religion, cannot make profession up to the eighteenth year, as the new constitution says: therefore since it is greater to be obliged to God than to man, even for the obligation which is made to man in marriage, it seems that nineteen years should be expected.

§ 3. Also, to the office of preaching and priesthood no one ought to be assumed before the thirtieth year: since therefore the bond of marriage is perpetual while the spouse lives, and has many tribulations adjoined to it, as the Apostle says,[706] it seems that the time of thirty years is to be expected.

Also, why is the time determined otherwise in a male than in a girl, so that two years are cut off?

Response. It must be said that the things asked here were partly determined above, where betrothals were treated.

For having the determination of all these things it must be known, that the augmentative power for the most part stands perfect in the thirtieth year: and this happens, because the natural heat is weakened from the much ingestion of extraneous moisture acquired from nutriment. But the heat is weakened from evaporation insofar as it draws with it natural moisture, and the body remains dry, not extensible in its radical members beyond what it has been extended: and therefore growth stops according to the physical cause. But the mathematical cause is, because the celestial mover which moves singularly to the perfection of the individual, is completed in no less than thirty years. For if the ultimate motion of the planets is taken, then it is completed in thirty years: because Saturn completes its course in so many years, with which all others are joined, and itself with none of the others, as the Philosophers say, and all other Doctors of the stars.

Still further, the motion of the dragon's head is completed in a lesser [time]. Similarly the minor conjunction of Saturn and Jupiter is completed in thirty years minus an eighth part of a year: and the great conjunction of Saturn and Mars in the sign of Cancer is completed in thirty years. But the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn from triplicity to triplicity, and the conjunction of the same from circle to circle, happen in a greater time: but these cause general accidents of the world and provinces, and not personal ones except in a qualified sense. And therefore the ultimate span of human perfection is in thirty years, and within that the increase begins to be declared, and similarly the superior motion to be joined to it, so that the intellect begins to dominate perfectly for the regimen of life and body: and this by five years: and therefore another limit is placed by the laws over thirty-five years. But the perfect motion of the head and tail [of the dragon] is in eighteen years, in which all conjunctions are completed, and preventions, and eclipses of the sun and moon, which among all stars have a greater effect upon our bodies: and therefore a third limit is placed at fourteen years. The mode of the period or giver of life which the Ishmaelite mathematicians call [it], is according to the number of the signs of the circle of the nativity which is twelve years, as Albumasar says: and therefore a fourth limit is placed at twelve and fourteen years. And because in the period of nativity seven signs see each other, as Abraham and Albumasar say, therefore a fifth limit is placed in betrothals at seven years.

Therefore it must be said, that these acts are ordered to be able to please in betrothals, and to be able to generate, and to discern spiritual things and their force, and to be able to govern oneself and a family sufficiently, and to be able to have perfect knowledge for the instruction of others: because always one is higher than another: therefore the limit of betrothals is placed at seven, and marriage at twelve in a girl, and in a boy at fourteen: the reason of which is assigned above: and entrance into religion in the eighteenth year, and of the regimen of a family and provision in the twenty-fifth, and of the authority to teach in the thirtieth.

And through this the solution of all the objections is clear.

DISTINCTIO XXXVII

Divisio Textus

There are therefore certain orders, etc. Here he treats of the impediment of Order: and there are in this distinction only two small chapters, the first of which is about the impediment of Order: the second, about the killers of their own spouses, and begins there, B, To these must be added concerning the strikers, etc.

But concerning the first chapter seven things are asked. First is, whether Order impedes marriage to be contracted, and invalidates the contract? Second, whether it is a local and temporal impediment, or perpetual and general? Third, whether every order does this, or certain ones, and which is that one? Fourth, concerning him who having a wife, with the wife consenting, is ordained, whether the wife herself is bound to enter religion? Fifth, concerning him who is ordained with the wife not knowing or reclaiming, whether any prejudice is done to the wife? Sixth, concerning Oriental clerics who are ordained, whether they can be ordained with their wives reclaiming? Seventh, concerning the wives of Orientals, who are ordained with their wives willing, whether after the death of the cleric husband they are bound to perpetual continence?

Articulus 1 — Whether Order Impedes Marriage

Whether Order impedes marriage?

To the first one proceeds thus: § 1. A sacrament is not contrary to a sacrament: but nothing impedes another, except what is contrary to it: therefore it seems, that a sacrament does not impede a sacrament: therefore neither does Order [impede] marriage.

§ 2. Also, either Order impedes from itself, or from an adjunct. Not from itself: because thus every order would impede, which is false. But if it impedes from an adjunct, this is nothing else but the vow of chastity: therefore it should not be assigned as a special impediment of marriage, but be contained under the vow: therefore a special tract should not have been about this impediment, but in the following distinction it should have been contained under the impediment of vow.

§ 3. Also, the type and the truth correspond to each other: but the order of the old law was a type of the order of the new law: therefore it responds to it: but it is evident that the priests of the Old Testament had and took wives while existing in order: therefore also in the New they can do this: therefore Order is not one of the impediments of marriage.

§ 4. Also, if Order impedes marriage, either this is by reason of offspring, or by rea-

...by reason of faith, or of the sacrament, or by reason of the intercourse which is in marriage. If by reason of offspring: then offspring would have a contrariety to orders, which is false, since it is commanded by the Lord that men increase and multiply. Similarly it is evident that it is neither by reason of faith, nor by reason of the sacrament. If it is said that this is by reason of the act, this also is not so, except because the divine act is contraried. But on the contrary: It is most especially not contrary to the divine [act], namely the participation of the Eucharist, because those joined in marriage receive the Eucharist: therefore a lesser divine [act] is not contrary to it: therefore it is not contrary to it: therefore orders do not impede marriage.

§ 5. Again, it seems that it even promotes it: because orders establishes one in the right of Christ, who is the spouse of the Church, fecundating her with grace for good works: therefore it is fitting to express this in a figure: but the figure of this is the condition (habitus) of a wife, as is said in Ephesians 5:22 and following. Therefore it seems that it is fitting for those ordained in sacred orders to have wives: therefore orders do not impede marriage, but rather marriage makes the ordained person better.

On the contrary to this is: § 1. What is said in Isaiah 52:11: Be clean, you who bear the vessels of the Lord. For if this was commanded in the Old Testament, much more must it be held in the New: but marital intercourse is mixed with a certain uncleanness: therefore he who bears the vessels of the Lord and the Lord Himself ought not to be subject to intercourse: therefore neither ought he to be joined in marriage.

§ 2. Again, to think only on the things that are of God, and to be divided toward thinking how to please a wife, and the things that are of the world, and the things that are said, do not fittingly exist together: but one deputed to divine services ought to think only on the things that are of the Lord: therefore he himself ought not to be subject to thinking on the things that belong to a wife and the world: but those existing in sacred orders are mancipated (dedicated) to divine services: therefore, etc. Therefore they ought not to have wives, because he who has a wife is thus divided, as the Apostle says in 1 Corinthians 7:33.

§ 3. Again, as is evident in Numbers 16:8 and following, the Lord forbade the Levites to have possessions, but rather the labors of others were to minister to them freely, lest, hindered by labors, they might be less able to devote themselves to divine services: but the care of a wife and house abstracts from divine service more than the care of cultivating fields: therefore, since there is a necessity of time, it is more fitting that the care of a wife and house be forbidden to the ministers of the altar than the care of cultivating lands: but in the New Testament there is no necessity to propagate oneself further, as was proved above: therefore in the New Testament it is fitting that the law of continence be imposed on the ministers of the Altar.

§ 4. Again, as the Philosophers say, the study of the highest sciences requires abstraction from the flesh: but the highest science is the divine law: therefore those studying it ought to be abstracted from the flesh: but all ministers of the altar are bound to study in it: therefore, etc. But there is no better way of abstracting oneself from the flesh than through the law of continence: therefore it seems that it is fitting to impose the law of continence upon them.

§ 5. Again, Augustine in the book On the City of God adduces Apuleius saying that scarcely anyone can perceive the God of gods with the mind unless he is maximally separated from the flesh: but it is evident that a priest ought maximally to perceive God with his mind: therefore through the law of continence it maximally befits him to be abstracted from the flesh.

§ Response. It must be said that the ultimate reasons prove that it is congruous (fitting) that sacred orders impede marriage; but nevertheless it is not necessary: and this must be conceded. Hence orders of itself has a congruity to continence: but the necessity...

...of continence is caused by the rational constitution of the Church.

§ To the first, therefore, it must be known that orders, insofar as it is a sacrament, does not impede marriage, but from what is annexed to it, namely the uncleanness of intercourse, and the distraction toward the care of a wife and children. Hence, although a sacrament is not contrary to a sacrament, nevertheless what is annexed to one sacrament can be unfitting for the act and office of another sacrament, and thus impede it.

§ To the next it must be said that orders has something of the nature of impeding even besides the vow, because it has an incongruity, as is evident in all the reasons introduced last. And thus it is evident that it is a special impediment, drawing its force from the institution of the Church. Nor is it similar regarding non-sacred orders: because by reason of the holiness of this order, this order has an incongruity toward the things which belong to marriage: although, however, that holiness is substantial to the order, because it is the holiness of the office, and of the act which is about the altar.

§ To the next it must be said that it does not impede marriage by reason of its substance, or of its effect which is the threefold good of marriage, but by reason of that which has been said.

§ To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it is much less to communicate [i.e., receive communion] than, by consecrating, to effect the body of the Lord, and to attend to divine things for the people committed to oneself: and therefore that objection does not proceed.

§ To the next it must be said that it does not promote, but impedes, as has been said: and this which is objected fails according to equivocation: because that similitude is metaphorical, and not to be referred to the letter, and it is as if one were to object: a laughing one is joyful; the meadow laughs; therefore the meadow is joyful.

Articulus 2 — Whether Order Is An Impediment Of Marriage Local, Temporal, Particular, Or Universal, Everywhere And Always

Is order a local, temporal, particular, or universal impediment, everywhere and always?

§ Secondly it is asked: Whether this impediment is local, temporal, particular, or universal, or everywhere and always in general?

§ Now, it seems to be local: because it does not impede everywhere, but only in the Western Church: therefore, etc.

§ Similarly it seems temporal: because it did not always impede, since Peter is read to have had a wife, and Philip, and certain other Apostles and Bishops.

§ Similarly it seems to be particular: because not every order impedes, but certain ones: for the first four [minor orders] do not impede marriage: therefore it seems that it is local, temporal, and particular.

On the contrary to this is: § 1. Because what is natural to something, as Aristotle says, befits it everywhere, just as fire burns in Persia and in Greece: but it is natural for orders to impede marriage: therefore it ought to impede everywhere. The first is proved through Aristotle in the second book of the Ethics. The second, moreover, is proved through all the reasons introduced in the preceding article to the effect that orders impedes marriage.

§ 2. Again, as the Gloss on the epistle 1 Corinthians 14:33 says: The statutes of the Church have their authority from universality: but this is a statute of the Church having authority: therefore it is general: therefore it is not local. For on account of this the Apostle says in 1 Corinthians 14:33: As also I teach in all the churches of the saints.

§ 3. Again, Boethius in the prologue of the book On the Trinity says that the Church is called Catholic from universality, inasmuch as it is diffused everywhere: therefore it seems that even that which impedes in one part and at one time, ought always and everywhere to impede marriage.

§ Furthermore it seems that every order ought to impede: because even exorcists receive the power of expelling demons, and lectors the power of expounding prophecies: but for the first of these, spirituality is required, with which the carnality of the marital debt does not fit: and for the second, study is required, with which the care of a house and wife does not comport: therefore it seems that it is not lawful for such persons to contract [marriage]; and the same is the reason concerning the others.

§ Response. To the first it must be said that insofar as it is of congruity, that impediment is everywhere and always: but because this congruity bespeaks only an aptitude and not a necessity, but rather this necessity is caused by the institute of the Church, therefore, as to the necessity of separating a marriage, it is local and temporal.

§ And thus the solution to all the objections except the last is clear: because the arguments prove nothing but an aptitude. But that the Church instituted this particularly, and after the time of the primitive Church, the reason is because particularly and temporally, and not from the time of the primitive Church, certain subjects chose it and from then on bound themselves to it.

§ To the last it must be said that those [minor] orders do not impede from maximal congruity, but from remote congruity.

§ To the objection it must be said that exorcists do this more by the force of the exorcisms which they hold in memory, than by the force of a holiness which is in the office of the order: because their act is not upon the true body of Christ, but upon the mystical, and with respect to the possessed (energumens), who are not truly of the mystical body, but in potency. And similarly lectors recite prophecies, which are the light of truth overshadowed by figures. And therefore it is not necessary to impose the law of continence upon them.

Articulus 3 — Whether Every Sacred Order Impedes Marriage

Does every sacred order impede marriage?

§ Thirdly it is asked: Whether every sacred order impedes the contracting of marriage, and diriments [invalidates] it when contracted?

§ Now, it seems that it does not: because § 1. Just as order relates to holiness, so it relates to impeding marriage: but it relates differently to holiness: therefore it relates differently to impeding marriage. The first is proved from this, that order does not have a reason why it impedes marriage, except from the holiness of its act and office. The second, moreover, is self-evident: because a priest is bound to a greater holiness than a deacon, and a deacon than a subdeacon: since therefore the priesthood impedes the contracting and diriments the contract, it seems that the diaconate should impede the contracting, and not diriment the contract, and the subdiaconate should neither impede nor diriment.

§ 2. Again, all holiness which is in the sacraments is from the form: but the subdeacon and deacon do not receive an order toward the form of the Eucharist, but only upon the matter to be received from the people (the subdeacon), and to be ordered on the altar (the deacon): therefore they touch nothing of the holiness of the sacrament: therefore it is not necessary that they impede marriage on account of this.

§ 3. Again, none stand more in need of medicine against concupiscence than the ministers of the altar: but marriage is a medicine against concupiscence: therefore they maximally need marriage: therefore marriage ought maximally to be conceded to them.

§ 4. Again, it does not pertain to the subdeacon to read the Gospel, but the Epistle: but it pertains to the deacon to read the Gospel, and not to confect the sacrament: but it pertains to the priest to confect the sacrament: therefore these orders relate to one another in degrees of higher and lower power: therefore this power ought to ascend by certain degrees of holiness: but this holiness is not well expressed unless an unequal mode of continence is imposed upon them: therefore it seems that not all three of these orders impede the contracting of marriage and diriment the contract.

On the contrary to this is that all these orders are called "sacred" from an excellent holiness above the common people: therefore they are bound to something to which not all the people are bound: but this cannot be anything other than perpetual continence: therefore they are bound to perpetual continence.

§ Response. It must be said that by congruity all these three orders impede the contracting of marriage, and diriment the contract: and this congruity is reduced to act through the institution of the Church, as was said before.

§ To the first, therefore, it must be said that that differing holiness is not in removing oneself from venereal delights, but rather in attaining a higher mode of perfection: hence anyone [in these orders] is bound to continence: but continence in the subdeacon is like a simple virtue, in the deacon like a purgatorial virtue, and in the priest like the virtue of a purified soul: because also the intention of the virtues is not principally in receding from evil, but in approaching good.

§ To the next it must be said that holiness is in the sacraments in two ways. One is as the form of the sacrament itself. The other is that which is not the form in the sacrament, but rather in the soul in which it is effected. I say therefore that the holiness which is formal in the sacrament is in the matter of the sacrament as a certain disposition, and in the place, and in the nod, and in the words, and in other things of this sort, and it is not only from the form of the sacrament. But the holiness which is the effect of the sacrament in him who receives it, that is from the form of the sacrament in such matter. Hence since holiness is as a disposition in the matter of the sacrament, and in the place, and in the words, and in the rite which is called teleta by the blessed Dionysius: it is necessary that all those approaching the cult of the sacrament be perfectly separated from the contagion of incontinence: and therefore perpetual continence is imposed upon all of them.

§ To the next it must be said that marriage is an indirect medicine, receiving the disease rather than curing it. But the ministers of the Lord ought to be cured from concupiscence: and therefore they receive another true and direct cure, which is spiritual grace cooling the heat of concupiscence, and the exercise of spiritual things which abstracts the mind from the thought of concupiscible things.

§ To the next it must be said that that differing degree presupposes for its minimum a perfect withdrawal from impurities which depress reason beneath the flesh: but in exaltation they differ as purifiers, and illuminators, and perfecters, as Dionysius says. For what he refers to the order of deacon, and priest, and Bishop, calling the deacon a purifier inasmuch as he ejects the unclean from the sacred place, and the priest an illuminator on account of doctrine, and the Bishop more perfect on account of his consummated power in confirming and consecrating—this we can refer to the subdeacon, and deacon, and priest, saying that the subdeacon purifies through the doctrine of the Epistles, the deacon illuminates by Evangelical light, and the priest perfects by conferring the Eucharist.

§ And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 4 — Whether One Having A Wife, If He Is Ordained With The Wife Consenting, The Wife Herself Is Bound To Enter Religion

If one having a wife is ordained with the wife's consent, is the wife herself bound to enter religion?

If one having a wife is ordained with the wife's consent, is the wife herself bound to enter religion?

§ Now, it seems that she is not: because § 1. It is up to her to consent as much as she wills: but this ordained man is not bound to chastity except while he lives: therefore if she consents to live chastely while her husband lives, it seems that this suffices for the husband to be ordained: therefore after the death of that husband she can marry another: therefore she is not bound to enter religion.

§ 2. Again, if the husband had fornicated, and was dismissed on account of fornication, she would not be bound to remain continent except while the husband lived: therefore it seems that this suffices for the ordained husband, that she remain continent while he lives: therefore she is not bound to enter religion.

§ 3. Again, this woman is not bound to chastity from the fact that he receives an order, except by that bond by which she is subject to the law of the husband: but as the Apostle says in 1 Corinthians 7:39: A woman is bound to the law as long a time as her husband lives: but if her husband falls asleep, she is freed, namely from the law. Let her marry to whom she will, only in the Lord. Therefore, since in that part of life in which she lives after the death of her husband she is not subject to the husband, it seems that in that [time] she is not obliged to chastity by the fact that her husband receives an order: therefore she is not bound to enter religion.

On the contrary is that: § 1. The vow of chastity of the husband is in a certain way solemnized through orders: but a husband and woman cannot be perpetually separated except by a vow solemnized on both sides; therefore such a woman is bound to a solemnized, or quasi-solemnized, vow of perpetual continence.

§ 2. Again, as long as she has not vowed perpetual continence, so long is there fear concerning her chastity, because she would make this vow if she did not fear concerning her chastity: but as long as there is such fear, he cannot vow continence: therefore neither can he receive an order to which it is annexed: but he does receive an order: therefore he no longer fears concerning the chastity of his wife: therefore she has vowed perpetual continence, quasi-solemnly.

§ Response. It must be said that such a woman is bound to chastity as long as she lives, that is, to perpetual chastity: but if she is young, concerning whose fall there is fear, she is bound to enter religion: but if she is not such, she ought to remain in an honorable place in perpetual chastity.

§ To the first, therefore, it must be said that it belongs to her will to vow or not to vow: but nevertheless in the manner in which she gives license to her husband, she herself is also understood to vow. Moreover, the vow of the husband is solemnized and perpetuated through the order: and therefore she herself is also understood to perpetuate and solemnize her vow. And this is so because they are of equal bond: and therefore concerning something similar, it is necessary that they absolve each other by common consent.

§ To the next it must be said that it is not similar: because the husband then loses the right which he possesses in the body of the woman on account of his sin: but the woman is, on the contrary, retaining the right in the body of the husband, and therefore remains free. But here he does not lose it except by a voluntary consimilar vow in both: and therefore it is necessary to perpetuate her vow.

§ To the last it must be said that the woman impedes by that bond by which she is subject to the law of the husband regarding the carnal debt: but that debt is not absolved by just any vow whatsoever, but only by a perpetual vow which is understood to be solemnized.

Articulus 5 — Whether One Ordained, With His Wife Objecting, Is Bound To Render The Debt Notwithstanding Orders

Is one ordained against his wife's protest bound to render the debt despite the order?

§ Fifthly, it is asked concerning him who is ordained while his wife protests, whether any prejudice is done to the wife?

§ Now, it seems that there is: because § 1. He in every way has the order: but a solemn vow of chastity is annexed to orders: therefore he is bound to perpetual chastity: but he cannot be bound to chastity unless she loses the debt in the husband's body: therefore prejudice is done to the wife regarding the bodily debt of the husband.

§ 2. Again, the stronger prejudices the less strong: but a solemn vow in orders is stronger than marriage: therefore it prejudices it: therefore it diriments the contracted marriage: therefore prejudice is done to the woman.

On the contrary is that: § 1. When the husband received the order, he did not have his own flesh in his power: therefore he could do nothing concerning it through a vow: therefore he must still be returned to his wife.

§ 2. Furthermore, if he were tonsured in religion without the consent of his wife, he would be returned to her: therefore much more will he be returned to her when he only received a sacred order without the consent of his wife.

§ Response. It must be said that such a man must be returned to his wife, but he does not have the power of demanding the debt, but only of rendering it. And he sinned mortally by receiving the order in this way: and even after the death of his wife he is bound to perpetual chastity even if he survived her.

§ To the first, therefore, it must be said that the vow was null and foolish: because no one can vow concerning what belongs to another, and it belonged to another regarding that which the wife possessed in his body.

§ To the next it must be said that there was not a vow there, but rather a certain foolish promise concerning what belongs to another.

Articulus 6 — Whether Eastern Clerics Can Be Ordained With Their Wives Protesting

Can Eastern clerics be ordained if their wives protest?

§ Sixthly it is asked: Whether Eastern clerics can be ordained if their wives protest?

§ It seems that they can: because § 1. No prejudice is done to them, since after the order they can render the debt and live together as before.

§ 2. Again, since there are three things in marriage, namely the essence of marriage, and the act of the carnal debt, and the good, the order of the Easterners impedes none of these: therefore it seems that it cannot be impeded by the contradiction of the wife. And the first is indeed self-evident.

§ 3. Again, if a wife contradicts, a husband is not impeded from the vow of the Holy Land, where it happens that he is absent from his wife for several years: therefore much less among the Easterners, if a wife contradicts, is he impeded from an order by which she is never deprived of her debt.

§ 4. Again, a protest against amendment saving the right of the wife is null if it is made by a wife against a husband amending his life: but through the reception of orders the husband is amended, because a greater grace is conferred upon him: therefore it seems that it can be done with the wife protesting, provided the right of marriage is saved.

On the contrary, But against this is: § 1. What the Apostle says in 1 Corinthians 7:5: Do not defraud one another, except perhaps by consent for a time. Therefore if there is not equal consent on both sides, nor even for a time can they absolve themselves from the payment of the debt: but the Eastern during the time of his turn (vicis) is bound to chastity, which he cannot observe unless the wife consents: therefore it seems that he cannot consent to receive the order, to the reception of which such an obligation of chastity follows.

§ 2. Again, the wife of an ordained man among the Easterners, according to many, is bound to perpetual chastity after the death of the ordained man: therefore prejudice is done to her liberty through the order received by the husband: therefore the order cannot be received except by the will of the wife.

§ Response. This last proof seems to me to be convenient, although certain ancients said the contrary.

§ To the first, therefore, it seems it must be said that although no prejudice is done to her in the substance of the debt, nevertheless prejudice is done to her for a certain time, namely the time of his turn, and prejudice is done to her in her future state of liberty, as the ultimate objections prove.

§ To the next it must be said that it contraries the act in a certain way: because it deprives her in time, although not simply.

§ To the next it must be said that this vow [of crusade] is necessary for the liberation of the Holy Land: yet if he knew with probability of future danger to his wife, I believe that he would do better by not going on pilgrimage.

§ To the next it must be said that not the whole right of the wife remains saved, as was clear from the aforesaid.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Wives Of Easterners, Consenting To The Ordination Of Their Husbands, Are Bound To Continence After Their Death

Are the wives of Easterners, consenting to the ordination of their husbands, bound to remain continent after their death?

§ Seventhly it is asked: Whether the wives of Easterners consenting to the ordination of their husbands, are bound to remain perpetually continent after the death of the husbands?

§ It seems that they are not: because § 1. A woman after death is freed from the law of her husband: therefore let her marry to whom she will, according to the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 7:39, only in the Lord.

§ 2. Again, what would be the cause why she could not marry? For her husband, from the moment he is dead, does not contract bigamy, nor was this woman bound to him except by reason of the marriage: therefore it seems that when the marriage is dissolved she can join herself to whomever she wills.

On the contrary is that husband and wife are judged as equals in continence and the debt of marriage: therefore of whatever sort the vow of the husband is, of such sort necessarily is also the vow of the woman: but the vow of the husband is such that after his wife he cannot marry another: therefore by a similar reason the woman after the death of the husband cannot marry another husband.

§ Response. It must be said that the wife after the death of the priest (as they say) cannot marry another husband: for when she consented to the order of the husband, she also consented or is understood to consent to the consequence of the order: and this is the vow of perpetual continence, which some say is caused by the institution of the Church, but others from the force of the vow, which I believe is better, because it is understood to be solemnized in the manner in which the vow of the husband is solemnized, so that namely after the death of the husband she never accepts another: just as neither can he marry another after the death of the wife.

§ To the first, therefore, it must be said that she is freed from the law of the husband after his death, but not from the vow, which she is understood to have solemnized when she consented that her husband should receive the order.

§ To the next it must be said that the interpreted vow is posited for the cause: and thus the solution is clear.

§ However, Hugh [of St. Victor] said the contrary, namely that it is lawful for her to marry another: [but] the said opinion is more renowned.

Articulus 8 — Whether It Is True That In Some Orders One Can Contract Marriage, Unless The Habit Of Religion Is An Obstacle

Is it true that in some orders marriage can be contracted, unless the habit of religion stands in the way?

Is it true that in some orders marriage can be contracted, unless the habit of religion stands in the way?

§ Then it is asked concerning what he says there, at A, after the beginning: But in others it is permitted, etc.

§ For this which he says, or have made a vow of continence, cannot be understood except of a simple vow: because otherwise the disjoined alternatives would be null: but a simple vow does not diriment the contract: therefore it seems that in a simple vow a marriage is permitted to be made: therefore the cause which he posits in the Text is null.

§ Response. It must be said that it is understood of a simple vow, and this impedes the contracting and prohibits sortition (the obtaining) of marriage: because one obtains a thing when it is first acquired, not when one uses a thing already acquired.

§ And through this the solution to the objection is clear.

Articulus 9 — Whether Any Of These Is Bound To Take A Virgin To Wife

Is any such person bound to marry a virgin?

§ Then it is asked concerning what he says there, at A, after the beginning: To marry a virgin wife, etc.

§ It seems to be nothing: because he can take a virgin or a non-virgin, as seems good to him.

§ Response. He speaks hypothetically, if the cleric intends to become a priest: because if he were to marry a non-virgin, bigamy would stand in the way of his being made a priest.

Articulus 10 — Whether Any Of These Can Take A Widow Or A Repudiated Woman

Can any such person marry a widow or a repudiated woman?

§ Then it is asked concerning what he says there, at A, a little after: Not a widow or a repudiated woman, etc.

§ For in the New Testament there is no repudiated woman: therefore he seems to say that for nothing.

§ Response. It must be said that a repudiated woman is one dismissed in whatever manner, even if she was not a true wife, because bigamy is induced in whatever manner a corrupted woman is married.

Articulus 11 — Whether Crime Is An Impediment, And Of What Force

Is crime an impediment, and of what force?

§ Then it is asked concerning what he says there, at B: To these must be added concerning killers, etc.

§ For it is asked here concerning the impediment of crime.

§ And four things are asked. First is: Of what force is this impediment? Second: Which and how many are the crimes impeding marriage? Third: Concerning the three cases in which a contracted marriage is divided through a committed crime. Fourth: Whether it is lawful for husbands to kill adulterous wives, as the Text seems to say, or not?

§ To the first one proceeds thus: § 1. No impediment is as worthy of punishment as crime: therefore none ought so efficaciously to impede marriage: therefore crime ought to impede the contracting, and diriment the contract.

§ 2. Again, crime is directly contrary to the conjunction of the soul with God: since therefore marriage is a sign of such a conjunction, crime frustrates the signate in marriage: therefore it takes away from marriage the good of the sacrament: but with that taken away, marriage is taken away, as was held above: therefore it seems that crime impedes the contracting, and diriments the contract.

§ 3. Again, in all other sacraments crime impedes the effect: therefore also in this one: therefore it seems that it diriments the contract.

§ 4. Again, there is no impediment which is so directly contrary to marriage as crime: but certain other lesser contrarieties diriment the contract: therefore this one also will diriment it. The first is proved: because others are frequently without the sin of the person who contracts marriage: but this one never. The second, however, is self-evident.

On the contrary is that: § 1. Marriage is a medicine: but...

the more infirm someone is, the readier the medicine ought to be for him: therefore, since crime is an infirmity, the more criminal someone is, the less he ought to be impeded from marriage, lest through concupiscence he fall headlong.

§ 2. Also, let us posit that this [impediment of crime] supervenes upon a marriage: it is established that it does not impede on account of a danger; therefore it should not impede even then, since the same danger of incontinence exists.

§ 3. Also, other impediments frequently impede with respect to one person and not with respect to another, and in those the medicine is not removed: but this one impedes with respect to all: therefore it removes the medicine: therefore unless it is moderated, the sick person will despair: therefore it must be moderated by the Church, such that although it impedes contracting [marriage], it does not however dissolve a contract [already made].

WHAT MUST BE CONCEDED is: that no impediment of crime so impedes contracting such that it also dissolves a contract except adultery in a threefold case, just as was partly said above, and will again be said below.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it most greatly impedes from the rationale of guilt, but on account of this it does not contract the strength to impede, but rather from this, that it destroys the essentials for marriage, such as consent, or the rendering of the debt, or something such: but a crime destroys none of these: and therefore it is not so violently impeding as others.

To the other it must be said that it is contrary to the conjunction from the fact that it destroys the cause of conjunction which is merit, and not from the fact that it destroys the sign. Hence it is not true that that which is contrary to the signified is contrary to the sign, unless it is understood per se and formally, namely that it is contrary to the signified insofar as it is the signified of that [sign]: but in this way a crime does not contradict the conjunction of the faithful soul with God: hence the argument does not stand.

To the other it must be said that it impedes the effect of marriage which is grace: but nonetheless it does not impede the effect of marriage, that is, that the marriage is effected: just as also a crime in other sacraments does not impede the sacrament, but the effect of the sacrament, which is grace.

To the other it must be said that this is false: because no impediment is so contrary to marriage as a crime, as is clear from the aforesaid.

Articulus 12 — How Many And Which Are The Crimes Impeding Marriage

How many and what are the crimes impeding marriage?

Secondly it is inquired, What and how many are the signs of crime impeding marriage?

And they are accustomed to be posited as six, namely the killing of one's own spouse, incest, the rape of another's betrothed, plotting against the right or debt of a wife, like him who raises his own son from the font, so that by this having been made the godfather of his wife, he is not bound to the debt: the killing of a presbyter, and solemn penance.

§ 1. But it is objected concerning the first: because one killing his own spouse does not sin except against the marriage which was between him and his spouse: therefore he ought not to be punished except in that marriage: therefore it seems that it is permitted to him to contract another marriage, against which he has not sinned.

§ 2. Similarly it is also objected concerning incest: for in that the burning of concupiscence appears: since therefore the medicine of that is marriage, it seems that he should maximally be invited to marriage by the Church: therefore it should not be established by the Church that this crime impedes marriage.

§ 3. In the same way it is objected concerning the third. For it seems that one raping a betrothed ought to have her: because between her and the first there are nothing but betrothals, and between her and the second carnal commerce intervenes: and by this the betrothals are dissolved, as was held above: therefore it seems that from this very fact that he rapes her, she is made not the betrothed of another: therefore it does not impede marriage from this, that he ravished the betrothed, but he can have her as a wife.

§ 4. Further concerning the fourth: because he in no way sins against every marriage, but only against his own spouse: therefore just as one sinning in the contract of one marriage is not on account of this impeded from another, so neither should this one be impeded from contracting another marriage after the death of his spouse.

§ 5. But concerning the fifth it seems that it is entirely irrational: because a presbyter is not a person pertaining to marriage: therefore one killing him sins nothing against marriage: therefore he is unjustly punished in marriage.

§ 6. The sixth also seems to have no reason: because one solemnly repenting is praiseworthy: because not even open blame draws him back from penance: but it has no reason that anyone should be punished in that in which he is praiseworthy: therefore for that penance the solemn penitent ought not to be punished: but to be impeded from marriage is a great punishment: therefore a solemn penitent ought not to be impeded from marriage.

Further it is inquired, Since heresy and apostasy from the faith and infidelity itself are graver crimes than these, why are they not posited among those impeding marriage?

For it seems that they ought to be posited: because they are enormous, and they sin against the foundation of marriage: therefore they ought to impede marriage.

Solution. It must be said that the six mentioned by the ancients are posited as crimes impeding the contracting of marriage from an interdict of the Church, but they do not dissolve the contract, nay rather they said that if they are youths committing such crimes, the Church ought to dispense with them even concerning contracting marriage, lest any occasion of ruin be given to them from the fire of concupiscence.

It must be said therefore to the first, that this statute is for a punishment: for it is sufficiently equitable that one killing a spouse should not find a spouse for the rest, although he has not sinned except against one: for it is feared that a similar fury should rouse him also against another, so that he should also kill her. Hence this is done, not therefore because he has sinned against the second marriage, because it does not yet exist, but in detestation of the crime, and on account of the fear of a similar one in a subsequent marriage.

To the other it must be said that although incest signifies an excessive heat of concupiscence, nevertheless it also renders the person in some way illegitimate for marriage, insofar as he does not heed or it is feared he will not heed the honesty of marriage, who does not heed the degrees of nature: but chiefly nevertheless the Church heeds, that these crimes be more avoided on account of the fear of the adjoined punishment.

To the third it must be said that one is called the raptor of another's betrothed, not because she remains a betrothed if he so willed, but because he raped her who was a betrothed: for on account of some inchoation of marriage which occurs in betrothals (as was held above) the Church wills that anyone should detest this crime, and therefore adjoined such a punishment.

To the fourth it must be said that it is not similar concerning the contract of marriage: because there only temporal damage occurs, but here damage and plotting also of spiritual things occurs, such as of faith, and the like: and therefore this is detestable.

To the fifth it must be said that the enormity of the crime demands long and most severe penance: and therefore marriage is interdicted for him, so that occupied by nothing else he may be able to weep for his sins: for it must be counseled for such a one that he enter religion: and this is the reason of the ecclesiastical institution.

To the other it must be said that a solemn penitent cannot for the rest be vacant for delights; because a solemn penance is not done except for a crime which moved a whole country or city, as was said above in the tract De Poenitentia: and therefore it is not congruous for him to be vacant for delights further with a wife: and therefore the contracting of marriage is interdicted for him.

To that which is further inquired, it must be said that to many other crimes the Church could adjoin this as a punishment, that they might not contract if he wished: but nonetheless it has done so in those previously had: because they sinned more against marriage or by their enormity demanded perpetual mourning, as the last two. And I well believe that this should be counseled for an infidel and an apostate: nevertheless because such sins are mixed with error and ignorance, although they are enormous in themselves, they more easily obtain pardon before the Church: because they proceeded not so much from malice, as from ignorance. Hence, 1 Timothy 1:13: I have obtained the mercy of God, because I did it ignorantly in unbelief. Acts 3:17: And now, brethren, I know that you did it through ignorance, as did also your princes.

Articulus 13 — Whether In Three Cases One Who Has Defiled A Woman By Adultery, After The Death Of His Wife, Cannot Take Her In Marriage

Whether in the three cases he who polluted a woman through adultery, cannot marry her after his wife's death?

Thirdly, it is inquired concerning these three cases in which he who polluted some woman through adultery cannot marry her after the death of his spouse: for as was clear above, they are, if he plotted with effect for the death of his spouse, if he gave a pledge concerning contracting, if he contracted de facto.

§ 1. But it is objected concerning the first: for let it be that out of anger or out of enmity he plots for the death of his prior spouse, and not for this, that he may contract with the adulteress, it seems then not to impede: because such angers do not make any special danger for the spouse, because even without adultery such things can happen: therefore it seems that this is general.

§ 2. Similarly let us posit that when he gave a pledge concerning contracting or even contracted, she did not know that he was married, but thought him free: for then ignorance excuses the whole sin: therefore she would be unjustly punished, if after the death of the other spouse it were not permitted to her to contract with him.

§ 3. Also, I posit that it was not a true marriage, but nevertheless before separation by the judgment of the Church he gives a pledge or contracts with another: for it seems that he is not impeded: because since there is no impediment except from a marriage, and that is null, it will make no impediment: therefore the second contract will be made.

§ 4. Also, further I posit that he gives a pledge concerning contracting or contracts, before he pollutes her through adultery, and afterwards he pollutes her through adultery. It seems that this does not impede: because the law is not except concerning him who married her whom he first polluted through adultery: but this one did not do so: therefore this does not impede.

Response. It must be said that in all these cases except the last, those three cases which were adduced have an instance [i.e., apply].

But concerning the last it must be said that it is determined from new law that whether he gave a pledge before adultery, or after, that it impedes contracting with her to whom he gives a pledge, and dissolves the contract: because similar plots are made by both against the first marriage: and therefore they determine similarly concerning both.

But in the others it must be held as the objections prove.

Articulus 14 — Whether It Is Lawful For Husbands To Kill Adulterous Wives

Whether it is permitted to husbands to kill adulterous wives?

Whether it is permitted to husbands to kill adulterous wives?

Fourthly it is inquired, Whether it is permitted to husbands to kill adulterous wives, as seems to be said in the Text in the decree of Pope Nicholas?

It seems that it is: because § 1. The law commands an adulteress to be stoned: but what divine law commands, man is bound to execute: since therefore no one is so offended by an adulteress as a husband, he himself can stone her.

§ 2. Also, the law says: Thou shalt not suffer evildoers to live: but the adulteress is maximally an evildoer: therefore it is even a sin for the husband if he suffers her to live: therefore he is bound to kill her.

§ 3. Also, by human laws a husband is pardoned if with one wound he pierces both, both the adulterer and the adulteress: therefore since human laws are modeled from divine ones, it seems that according to divine law the same ought to be done: therefore if he kills her, he ought to be pardoned.

To the contrary is what is said, Ezekiel 33:11: I will not the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live. Therefore a man ought to await her for penance, and not immediately kill.

Response. It must be said that by ecclesiastical judgment no one is killed: but if an adulterer makes her to be killed by civil judgment, let him see to it: for I well think that if human law is preserved in such matters, it is not a sin.

To the first therefore and the second it must be said that the law of fear was the old law: and therefore it punished crimes atrociously, and condemned adulterers and other criminals: but the new law is a law of love: and therefore the Lord, John 8:3 et seq., freed the adulteress.

To the other the solution is clear through what was said: because if the civil law is preserved, no sin, as I think, is incurred: but nevertheless out of mercy it must be dissimulated, just as the Lord Himself exalts judgment with his mercy, dissimulating the sins of men on account of penance.

DISTINCTIO XXXVIII

Divisio Textus

Now let us inspect concerning the vow, etc. In this distinction three things are inquired, namely first concerning the vow. Secondly, concerning the quantity of the guilt of adultery, there, D, When a man and a woman, etc. Thirdly, it is inquired concerning women contracting after a long expectation of a husband, who was believed to be dead, there, E, Here it is inquired concerning those women, etc.

Circa the first the Master determines two things, namely concerning the vow, and the differences of vows: and this second begins, there, B, It is to be known, that one vow is common, etc.

Now circa the first six things fall to be inquired, namely first what is a vow? Secondly, Concerning what is a vow? Thirdly, Who can vow? Fourthly, Whether it is of necessity to render a licit vow? Fifthly, Whether a vow is more obligatory than an oath, or conversely? Sixthly, What is that from which a vow has the force of its obligation?

To the first let whatever definitions are found be taken up.

Now this one is contained in the Text: A vow is a certain testification of a spontaneous promise, which properly ought to be made to God and concerning those things which are of God.

Hugh of St. Victor in the book De Sacramentis, thus defines a vow: A vow is a voluntary pledge of the mind.

And certain Jurists thus: A vow is a promise of some good made with deliberation.

But the ancient Doctors of Theology thus: A vow is a conception of a proposed good firmed by deliberation, by which someone obligates himself to God to do or not do something.

But others thus: A vow is a promise of a better good firmed from deliberation.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Definitions Of A Vow Are Well Assigned

Whether the definitions of a vow are well assigned?

But it is objected against the first, thus: § 1. Every testification is before certain persons who can be witnesses: but not every vow is thus: therefore not every vow is a testification. The first is clear from the rationale of testification, which is nothing else than the invocation of witnesses to the assertion of truth. But the second is proved by this, that a certain vow is private, which is made only before God.

§ 2. Also, a testification is either through a sign, or through witnesses. Through a sign, as we say that the word is the witness of the heart. If through a sign. Against: A certain vow is made only in the heart, which never proceeds to any sign. But if through witnesses: then it would not be a vow unless it could be proved through witnesses, which again is false.

§ 3. Also, testification is one thing, and that concerning which testimony is borne is sometimes another: therefore it is not a testification: therefore it is badly defined through testification.

§ 4. Further it is objected concerning this that it says, Of a spontaneous promise. For this does not seem generally to apply to a vow: because certain Jurists divide the vow saying that one of vows is of will, another of necessity: therefore some vow is of necessary exhibition, rather than of spontaneous promise: therefore it is badly defined.

§ 5. Also, a spontaneous promise is a vow: because spontaneous promise is the essential predicate of a vow: therefore it seems that it ought to be posited in the nominative case, not in an oblique case in the definition.

§ 6. Further it is inquired concerning this that it says, Which ought to be made to God. Because vows are frequently made to the Saints: therefore it seems that a vow is not always made to God.

Further it is objected against the second. Because § 1. Every pledge made even to a man is voluntary, because not coerced: therefore every such pledge is a vow.

§ 2. Also, betrothals are voluntary pledges of nuptials: therefore they are vows, which it is a derision to say: therefore it seems that the definition is bad.

Further it is inquired concerning the third. Because § 1. There is some good of nature: therefore a promise of that good firmed with deliberation is a vow, which is absurd.

§ 2. Also, a promise which is made to a man firmed with deliberation, if it is of some good, according to this would be a vow: and thus many vows would be made between associates and fellow citizens and friends all day, which is false: therefore the definition is worth nothing.

Further it is inquired concerning the fourth. § 1. For a conception of a good has not yet proceeded into a promise: since therefore a vow is a promise, as is said in the Text, it seems that it badly and imperfectly defines through conception.

§ 2. Also, a conception by nature and time is before a proposition: therefore it is not a conception of a proposed good, but rather a proposition of a good conception: therefore again it is badly defined through this mode. But the first is proved by this, that nothing is proposed which is not conceived in the heart beforehand: but many things are conceived which are not proposed to be done.

§ 3. Also, deliberation is not of every thing according to the Philosopher: but rather deliberation is on account of counsel while it is in doubtful matters only: therefore deliberation is also only in doubtful matters: but a vow is frequently concerning those things which are with certitude good: therefore not every vow is firmed by deliberation, but rather about the supposition of a good.

§ 4. Also, a vow is not firmed by deliberation, but rather by promise and publication and solemnization: therefore it seems that it does not say well, Firmed by deliberation.

Further it is inquired concerning the last. It seems that a vow is not always of a better good, because a vow of necessity is not of a better good, but of a common one: therefore it is not well thus defined.

Moreover, since to one thing it belongs to be one, and a definition declares the being of the defined, it is inquired, according to what are so many definitions assumed?

Response. It must be said to this last one, that a vow is spoken of in two ways: commonly, and properly. Commonly, however, any promise made to God concerning those things which pertain to the Christian religion is called a vow, and thus a vow is a promise made in baptism and in penance, and in other divine precepts without which there is no salvation, and this vow is called chiefly by certain Jurists a vow of necessity: because will he nill he, a man must observe them if he wishes to be saved.

A vow is also spoken of as a promise made concerning those things which are above precept, which God does not require from us, unless we spontaneously obligate ourselves to them: and concerning those Augustine says that to vow is of the will, and to render is of necessity: and thus a vow is spoken of properly.

Let it be said therefore that the first definition which is posited in the Text, touches upon the genus and the proper matter of a vow in common, and to whom it must be made. But the second touches upon nothing except the form of a vow in the genus of a common vow. But the third touches upon the proper efficient and matter: because deliberation effects, and the good is the matter. The fourth indeed touches upon the remote and proximate efficient, and to whom it is made and for what, that is, the end, because it is made for obligating oneself to God. But the fifth and last is given concerning a vow most properly so called: because that is not except concerning a better good: and it touches the form in genus through a promise and the effective which is spontaneous deliberation: and therefore this last is better among all.

To the first therefore it must be said that this testification is through a sign proceeding from deliberation, which is a promise which is the witness of the heart: and therefore it can be made between oneself and God: because then his promise will be a witness either against him if he should be a transgressor of the vow, or for him if he should observe it.

To the other it must be said that in the heart there is also a promise, which is a witness between oneself and God: and therefore the solution is clear.

To the other it must be said that the Master here does not define except a vow properly taken. Or it can be said that a divine precept can be attended to in two ways, namely in comparison to the end which is salvation, and thus it is necessary: or absolutely regarding observation, and thus it is voluntary, because voluntarily fulfilled: and thus it is not repugnant for something to be voluntary and necessary.

To the other it must be said that a vow properly is of a confirmed will: and therefore a promise properly speaking is consequent to a vow, as testifying and confirming it: and therefore it falls obliquely in the definition of a vow: but because a promise is materially accepted for the thing promised, because that is willed of a confirmed will: therefore materially a vow is sometimes said in the nominative case, but nevertheless it is more properly predicated obliquely of a vow.

To the last it must be said that a vow is not made to the Saints, except through this, that God shines in them as to suffrages: and therefore every vow is referred to God.

To that which is further inquired concerning the second definition.

To the first it must be said that a pledge is accommodatively accepted by Master Hugh, such that it is concerning those things which pertain to religion.

To the other it must be said that betrothals are ordained to marriage, which does not only pertain to religion, but according as it is an office of nature.

To that which is opposed concerning the third definition, it must be said that this is of a vow in common: and it is understood as a pledge made concerning those things which pertain to religion.

And through this the solution is clear to both of those objections.

To that which is objected concerning the fourth, it must be said that conception is spoken of in two ways. In one way when something is in whatever way cogitated: and this is improperly called a conception. In another way a conception is spoken of when it is enclosed in the heart, and formed toward act and toward work, just as an infant which is formed is called conceived. And in this way conception is posited in the definition of a vow. And it is clear that in this way a conception designates something perfectly willed.

To the other it must be said that conception spoken of in the first way precedes by nature and time the proposition, but spoken of in the second way it follows it: because nothing is formed in the aforesaid way, except what is beforehand proposed for willing and acting.

To the other it must be said that although the matter of a vow is most certainly good, nevertheless the mode of execution is doubtful, and the power of the vower, and the exit of the vow: and regarding those deliberation has a place, and is necessary.

To the last it must be said that deliberation firms a simple vow, but promise and publication and solemnization firm a certain vow also regarding another aspect.

To that which is opposed concerning the fifth, it must be said that that is more proper among all, and is given concerning a vow most properly so called, which is always of a better good than is any good which falls under a precept.

Articulus 2 — Whether A Vow Is Of Those Things That Are Under Counsel

Whether a vow is of those things which are under counsel?

Secondly it is inquired, Concerning what is a vow made?

But it seems that of every good: § 1. For since every actable good is voluntarily done, and a vow is a spontaneous pledge, it seems that it is of every good.

§ 2. Also, Genesis 28:20 et seq., Jacob vowed a vow concerning those goods which were of necessity, namely that God should be to him as God, and that he would offer tithes and peace victims: therefore it seems since this is of necessity, that a vow is of a good necessary for salvation.

To the contrary of this is, that § 1. Augustine says that to vow is of the will: therefore a vow falls upon a good which God does not require from man: but this is a good of counsel: therefore a vow is of a good of counsel only.

§ 2. Also, a vow properly is of a better good, as was held: but a better good is of counsel: therefore a vow is of a good of counsel.

§ 3. Also, we see that only they are said to have vows upon themselves, who obligate themselves to counsels, as religious, pilgrims, and the like: therefore it seems that a vow is of a good of counsel only.

But again further it seems that it is also of an illicit thing, as was clear in the vow of Jephthah, who vowed that he would first offer to God what met him returning home from victory, and he offered his own daughter: therefore it seems that it is not only of a better good concerning which there is counsel.

If you say that it was a foolish vow, and therefore not accepted. Against: Hebrews 11:32, Jephthah is numbered by the Apostle in the catalog of Saints: but this would not be done, unless his vow and other things which he did had pleased God: therefore that vow was not foolish, nor impious.

§ 2. Also, we see certain ones and chiefly women vow that they will not comb their head on such or such a workday when it is permitted to work, or that they will not eat this food, like eel, or something similar: and concerning these there is neither counsel, nor precept: therefore it seems that a vow is not always of a good concerning which there is counsel.

§ 3. Also, certain ones vow for themselves perilous things, like two-day or three-day fasts, or with bread and water: and a danger is generated for them in such a life either from infirmity, or from poverty: but it is established that concerning perilous things there is neither counsel, nor precept: therefore it seems that a vow is not always of a better good concerning which there is counsel.

Response. It must be said that a vow properly so called is not except concerning those things which fall under counsel: but a vow commonly accepted is concerning those things also which fall under precept: and through this the solution to the first is clear.

To the second it must be said that Jacob's vow was of a good of counsel: for when he says, The Lord shall be to me for a God, it is understood through special worship to which others in common were not bound, such as the erection of an altar, the preordination of a place for the future building of a temple. And when he says, Tithes, etc., this was counselable: because there were not yet ministers to whom tithes were due, nor even many poor, because the inhabitants then were rare: and therefore they fell under counsel.

But those which are objected to the contrary are to be conceded.

To that which is further inquired, it must be said that as the authority says, Jephthah was foolish in vowing, and impious in rendering.

But to the objection it must be said that by reason of the victory which he had by God's help, he is posited in the catalog both of Saints, and of those who by great virtue of faith did things, and not by reason of that which he foolishly vowed, and impiously paid: because Isidore says concerning such: In evil promises rescind faith, and in a base vow change the decree.

To the other it must be said that all such vows are rather certain sortileges than vows, and are relics of the vanity of pagans, who to the images of heaven or lords of hours or days said these or those things were not to be done. Hence concerning such the Apostle said, Galatians 4:10: You observe days, and months, and times, and years. And if anyone should do these things even in honor of God and his saints, nevertheless they are to be prohibited, nor held as vows on account of the similitude of idolatry: because as Jerome says on Hosea: Not only is idolatry to be fled, but also the similitude of it. And it is said, 1 Thessalonians 5:22: Abstain from all appearance of evil.

To the other it must be said that into the danger of his health and life no one can vow anything: and therefore when there is danger, a vow is rather to be fled, or held for a non-vow. It is safe nevertheless that in such things a dispensation of a superior be sought: but if that is had late, even without dispensation in time of danger it is to be broken. But it seems to me that a sufficient cause of danger is poverty or infirmity. Poverty indeed, as if he vowed not to eat meats, and when he begs, nothing is given to him except meats, or those things which are with meats, which if he does not eat, he will be consumed by starvation. But infirmity, as if he vowed not to eat this or that, and afterwards is debilitated unless he eats, then I think the vow can be loosed.

And thus the solution is clear to all the things inquired.

Articulus 3 — Who Are Those Who Can Vow

Who are those who can vow?

Thirdly it is inquired, Who can vow?

But it seems that anyone: for if he is impeded, this will not be except because he is bound to a man to the contrary of the vow.

But against: § 1. No one is so bound to a man as to God: therefore a vow to God is never to be dismissed on account of an obligation to a man: therefore anyone can vow.

§ 2. Also, an inferior lord cannot prohibit the obsequy of a superior lord: but every man with respect to God is inferior: therefore he cannot prohibit or impede the obsequy of God: therefore a vow to God which is concerning divine obsequy is never to be dismissed on account of a man: therefore anyone can vow.

§ 3. Also, to a carnal lord who has power over someone, spiritual obsequy exhibited by an inferior profits more than carnal: therefore on account of carnal he ought not to draw him back from spiritual: but a vow is spiritual: therefore he ought not to draw him back from a vow on account of carnal.

§ 4. Also, it matters how anyone uses his own thing, as the law says: but it is established that he can never use it better than to the obsequy of God: therefore it seems that a lord can never use a servant better, than that he fulfill a vow: therefore he cannot impede one vowing.

Further it is inquired, Whether a monk can vow?

It seems that he can: because in many things he has his own will: but what is of his own will in something and he is arbiter, he can vow: therefore a monk can vow. The first is proved through the saying of Bernard in the book De Dispensatione et praecepto, where he says: Let the Prelate exact nothing of those things which I have not promised. But the second is established from this, that no monk promises that he will observe all good things.

To the contrary is that he promises to live obediently unto death: therefore in nothing does he have his own will: therefore he can vow nothing.

Further it is inquired concerning a wife.

For it seems that she could vow many things: because she herself is not a handmaid, and in many things is judged on a par with the husband: therefore she can vow in many things just as the husband.

To the contrary of this is, § 1. What is said, Numbers 30:4 et seq., where none of her vows are approved, unless the husband is the author.

§ 2. To the same the saying of Augustine posited above makes: It is manifest that the law willed thus, that the woman is under the husband, etc.

§ 1. Further, it is asked about a son and daughter of a household (filius et filiafamilias). § 2. For it seems that neither can they vow: because the same law forbids it: and what the law forbids ought not to be done: therefore such persons cannot vow by themselves. § 3. To the contrary is that we see sons of a household flock to religion against the will of their parents, and their vows are ratified: therefore they can vow, as it seems. § 4. Response. It must be said that a slave insofar as he is a slave, and a monk insofar as he is a monk, and a wife insofar as she is a wife, and a son or daughter of a household insofar as they are such, can vow absolutely nothing by their own authority: but with their superiors confirming their vows, or when they know of them and do not contradict them when they can, the vows of such persons receive force. The cause of this is because a vow is a voluntary pledge, and such persons do not have a free will in such things, and therefore they cannot vow. § 5. To the first, therefore, it must be said that although every man is more obliged to God than to man, nevertheless God does not require that obedience which is done to the prejudice of human right: and therefore God wills that he render to man what is his, and in this he mostly obeys God. § 6. To the other it must be said that this is true, when the obediences of the inferior and the superior are contrary: but when it is one obedience of both, then often someone is drawn back from the obedience which is only of the superior by the obedience of the inferior which is from the ordination of the superior: and so it is here in the proposed case. § 7. To the other it must be said that although spiritual obedience might perhaps profit a carnal lord more than corporal obedience, nevertheless God does not require this of him, that he lack the carnal for the spiritual, unless he freely wills this: and therefore he can draw him back if he wills. § 8. To the other it must be said that that law does not restrict someone to the best possible use of his thing, but only to a licit one: whence provided he uses it licitly, the lawmaker does not intermeddle whether he uses it for a better use, or a less good one. And God also acts thus: because he wills that man should rejoice in the goods granted to him. § 9. To that which is asked about monks, it seems to me (saving the counsel of elders) that as long as he remains in his order, he can introduce nothing special through his vow: because prejudice would be done to the community: because if he were to vow concerning abstinence, there would be no one to prepare food for him outside the hour, and an abuse of eating separately would be introduced, which must be especially avoided in cloisters, and many other inconveniences. § 10. To the argument therefore it must be said, that he has not retained his will in anything that would derogate from the common life, but perhaps in praying beyond the common course of the order: and in this way he can do or vow something special. § 11. To that which is asked about the wife, it must be said that she is under the power of her husband: and therefore perhaps she can vow nothing, except in some prayers, without the consent of the husband: and I well believe that neither can the husband without the consent of the wife, except in a favorable vow for the Holy Land. § 12. To the last it must be said that no person ought to be received in the cloister except one who is of his own right according to age: and a son of a household is not such by age, although perhaps he is under the care and regime of his father.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Fulfillment Of A Vow Is Of Necessity

Whether it is of necessity to render a vow? § 13. Fourthly it is asked, whether it is of necessity to render a vow?

§ 1. It seems that it is: because § 2. Augustine expressly says this. [707] § 3. Also, Proverbs 20:25: It is ruin for a man to devour holy things, and after vows to retract. § 4. Also, Deuteronomy 23:21: When you shall have vowed a vow to the Lord your God, you shall not delay to pay it, because the Lord your God will require it: and if you delay, it shall be reputed to you as a sin. § 5. Also, ibid., v. 23, thus: That which has once gone out of your lips, you shall observe, and you shall do as you have promised to the Lord your God, and with your own will and with your own mouth you have spoken. § 6. Also, on the same, the Gloss: "You are bound by right, because you promised of your own will": [708] but what someone is bound to, he must render: therefore to render is of necessity. § 7. Also, Psalm 75:12 (76:11): Vow, and render to the Lord your God, all you who, etc. There the Gloss says: "Certain vows are proper to individuals, such as chastity, virginity, and the like. Therefore to vowing these he invites us, he does not command that we vow, but that we render vows: for to vow is counseled to the one vowing, but after the promise of a vow, necessary rendering is exacted." [709] From this it is gathered that rendering is of necessity. § 8. Also, another Gloss on the same: "If you vow, render: otherwise they are held guilty concerning the vow and have damnation, because they have made void their first faith." [710] From this is gathered the same as before. § 9. Also, Psalm 65:13 and 14 (66:13-14): I will render to you my vows, which my lips have uttered. § 10. Also, by a promise confirmed by deliberation which is made to a man, someone is bound to render: therefore much more is he bound by a promise made to God: therefore the vower is bound to render. § 11. To the contrary is that 1. Sometimes it is impossible to render, just as when a woman vows virginity and is corrupted: therefore it is impossible to render: but no one is bound to the impossible: therefore it seems that we are not always bound to render vows. § 12. 2. Also, one cause is assigned by the ancients why God is not bound by a promise, because He is not bound out of necessity, but out of His free will: therefore by similarity since in vows we are bound out of our free will, it seems that we are not necessarily bound to rendering. § 13. 3. Also, among men it is considered wicked if someone promises another out of friendship, and he afterwards coerces him to necessarily pay the whole: therefore much more is this the case with God, who is wholly goodness itself: therefore it seems that God does not restrict one to necessarily paying a vow to Him, which was promised to Him out of a free will. § 14. Response. It must be said that necessity is twofold, namely of inevitability or absolute coercion, and of conditional necessity. The first is a necessity such as it is necessary for a heavy body to descend. The second, however, is such as a sick man has a necessity to take medicine if he wishes to be freed from disease: and in this mode of necessity it is necessary to render vows, because otherwise the cause of damnation of the soul is incurred, that is, mortal sin. § 15. And therefore the first part of authorities and arguments is conceded. § 16. But to that which is first objected to the contrary, it must be said that that which is lost in the quantity of the promise through corruption, must be restored in the quantity of sorrow in penance: because it is well rendered, what is rendered through an equivalent according to the estimation of God, although it may not be equivalent according to the value of the thing: for the sorrow of penance is thus equivalent to all that which is lost through sin: and therefore through penance every sin is pardoned. § 17. To the other it must be said that it is not similar concerning God and men: because God neither owes man, nor can He owe: but man owes to God all that he is, and can do, and does, although God may not require all this from man: and therefore because nevertheless he owes, he is bound to necessarily pay-

Articulus 5 — Whether A Vow Is More Obligatory Than An Oath, Or Conversely

-ing out of a promise made to God, unless a compensation is made which is then considered the payment of the vow, as is determined below on the compensation of a vow. § 2. To the last it must be said that it is not similar, as is already evident: because man owes nothing to man from what is committed, but owes his whole self to God: and therefore, if concerning this which he nevertheless owes of condign right, he obliges himself by a vow, God exacts this from him, and he will be guilty if he does not pay.

Whether a vow is more obligatory than an oath? § 3. Fifthly it is asked, whether a vow is more obligatory than an oath, or conversely? § 4. But it seems that it is more obligatory: because 1. If someone by a solemn vow were to vow that he would enter religion, he is compelled to enter, nor can he be absolved by marriage, nor by any other mode, unless he fulfills it: but if he had sworn an oath, he would be absolved in many cases, and penance for perjury would be enjoined: therefore a vow is of greater obligation than an oath. § 5. 2. Also, if two bonds are joined to one thing which bind in opposite directions, and one is broken by it, while the other is not, but rather breaks it: it is evident that that which breaks is stronger than that which is broken by it: but this is how a solemn vow and an oath of chastity relate to marriage, that the oath is broken, and the vow breaks it [marriage]: therefore a vow is of greater obligation than an oath. § 6. If perhaps you say that this is true of a solemn vow, but not of a private one. Against this: It is commonly said that a solemn and a private vow are of equal obligation with respect to God: therefore the proposition stands concerning both vows. § 7. 3. Also, a vow properly binds to a more excellent good: but an oath is only a confirmation of the truth in a statement, and sometimes it binds to nothing, but confirms the truth concerning the past: therefore to bind is accidental to an oath, and substantial to a vow: but that to which binding is substantial, binds more strongly than that to which it is accidental: therefore a vow is of stronger obligation than an oath. § 8. To the contrary of this is that 1. That which binds from divine truth binds more strongly than that which binds from human truth: but an oath binds from divine truth, and a vow from human: therefore an oath binds more strongly than a vow. The first is self-evident. But the second is proved by what the Apostle says, Hebrews 6:16: For men swear by one greater than themselves, and an oath for confirmation is the end of all their controversy. Now it is evident that they do not vow by one greater than themselves. § 9. 2. Also, a simple promise and an attestation relate to each other as binding less and binding more: but a vow is a simple promise of one man, while an oath is like an attestation: therefore an oath binds more than a vow. § 10. Response. It must be said that an oath applied to a pledge and a vow can be considered in two ways, namely, according to that from which they bind, and according to the nature and mode of the bond itself. If in the first way: then there is no doubt that an oath binds more than a vow: because it binds from the attestation of divine truth. If in the second way: then a vow binds more than an oath: and this is because the bond has strength from the good to which it binds, and from the firm deliberation of the one vowing or binding himself, and a vow is always from deliberation, and a greater good, which an oath is not always: however, if sometimes an oath is also added to a vow, that is obligatory above all.

Articulus 6 — Whence A Vow Has The Force Of Its Obligation

§ 1. The solution to the first part of the objections is therefore clear, except for the last. § 2. And I concede that one: because it proceeds from the nature of the bond which is accidental to an oath: and therefore it is not in every oath, but only in that which concerns something to be done in the future. § 3. Similarly the solution to the two things introduced to the contrary is clear: because they proceed according to that from which an oath binds: and this is plainly greater than that from which a vow binds.

Whence a vow has the force of its obligation? § 4. Sixthly it is asked, What is that from which a vow has the force of its obligation? § 5. For it seems to be extremely weak: because in the one promising there are only three things, namely the purpose of doing, deliberation, and promise. Either therefore the vow draws its force from one of these, or from two together, or from all three. If from one: it is evident that this is extremely weak: because human purpose is contingent, as the Philosopher says, and a necessary effect is never produced from a contingent cause: therefore a vow never becomes inviolable from the human purpose alone. § 6. The same follows if it is said to be caused by deliberation alone: because, as is said in the book of Wisdom, 9:14: The thoughts of mortals are fearful, and our counsels uncertain. Now it is evident that all our deliberations are founded upon our thoughts. Therefore all our deliberations are uncertain: therefore nothing certain is caused by them: therefore neither the immobility of a vow. § 7. But if it is said that it is from the promise. Against this: Our initial promise is caused by something uncertain, because it is from purpose and deliberation: therefore it is itself also uncertain. § 8. Also, a promise made to a man is uncertain to such an extent that man even seeks from man greater confirmation through a pledge, or guarantors, or an oath: therefore neither is it sufficient to make a vow. § 9. But if it is said that it has its force from two or all three. Against this: If all three, since they are contingent, are joined together, nothing inviolable is generated: therefore neither do they generate an inviolable vow: therefore it seems that there is no firmness of a vow. § 10. To the contrary of this is that 1. Everything which is in the effect, must necessarily be reduced to something which is in the cause: but the immobility and necessity of rendering is in a vow: therefore it is necessary that it has some cause which causes this necessity. § 11. 2. Also, where the Apostle speaks of the immobility of the divine promise, there he reduces the firmness of our consolation to the immobility of the divine word and oath, speaking thus, Hebrews 6:17-18: Wherein God, meaning more abundantly to show to the heirs of the promise the immutability of his counsel, interposed an oath, that by two immutable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie, we may have the strongest comfort. Therefore by similarity if the firmness of rendering follows the vow, it is necessary to reduce it to some firmness which is in the cause of the vow. § 12. This seems to me necessarily to be conceded. Whence it must be said that it is in the cause of the vow which is deliberation: because it is firmed up by deliberation, as was said above, and in the definitions of a vow two things are considered, namely the very rectitude of the deliberation in itself, and its relation to the exemplar which it imitates. And in itself indeed it does not have firmness, but related to the exemplar which is the first rectitude, by which everything right which is promised is held to be deliberated, and especially what is promised to God,

708. Glossa ordinaria, on Deut. 23:23.

Articulus 7 — Whether Vow Is Said Of A Vow According To One Notion

to Whom even without a promise we can never answer one for a thousand. Thus related, I say, it is most firm: because this justice is immortal and remains forever and ever. § 2. To that therefore which is first objected, it must be said that it is founded upon all those three things related to the exemplar of the first rectitude, from which they contract that firmness. § 3. And through this the solution to all is clear.

Whether "vow" is predicated of a vow according to one rationale? § 4. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, B, But it is to be known, that of vows one is common, etc. [711] § 5. And four things are asked here. The first is, Whether according to one rationale "vow" is predicated of a common and a proper vow? The second, Whether the transgression of a common vow constitutes a special sin, or a deformity of sin, just as the transgression of a singular vow does? Thirdly it is asked, Why is it called common and singular? Fourthly, Whether a common vow admits of dispensation and commutation, just as a singular vow sometimes does? § 6. To the first it is objected thus: 1. Whatever things divide one common thing, those are of one rationale in the name of that common thing: but common and singular vow divide one vow in common: therefore they are of one rationale in the name of vow: therefore vow is of one rationale insofar as it is said of the common and of the proper or singular. § 7. 2. Also, each is a votive pledge of the mind concerning those things which pertain to religion: and this was above the definition of a vow in common: therefore by one rationale "vow" is predicated of both. § 8. To the contrary of this is that 1. Whenever some things participate a genus in one rationale, one does not more properly receive the predication of that genus than another: but a singular vow more properly receives the predication of "vow": therefore it is not said univocally of a common and a singular vow. The first is self-evident. The second is proved from this, that a common vow is not concerning voluntary things, but concerning necessary things:

709. Glossa ordinaria, on Ps. 75:12.

but a vow (votum) is named from the will (voluntas). § 9. 2. Also, it is of the rationale of a vow, that it is confirmed by the deliberation of the one vowing: but a common vow is not confirmed by the deliberation of the one vowing, but by the authority of a precept: therefore "vow" is not predicated of the common by a full rationale, but of the special: therefore the common and singular are not univocal in the rationale of a vow. § 10. Furthermore, however, it is asked concerning the vow of fools, of which he previously made mention in the Letter: for that seems to be called a vow entirely equivocally with these two: whence the act of a vow which is to oblige to doing, is not in it. § 2. But to the contrary of this is that the vow of fools is also a deliberate promise, just as a singular vow: therefore it seems that it receives predication by one rationale with a singular vow. § 3. Response. It must be said that "vow" is predicated of the common and of the singular according to prior and posterior: and it is a division of an analogue and not of a pure univocal term. § 4. To the first therefore it must be said that division is spoken of in two ways: for some things divide a common term by differences, which are in that common term in potency: and the first proposition is not concerning those. But some do not divide it properly, but state diverse modes of it: and such are analogues in the name of the divided term: and such a division is here. § 5. To the other it must be said that a pledge is not in one mode in necessary things and in voluntary things: and therefore that rationale also according to diverse modes belongs to the common and singular vow. § 6. But the two reasons which are to the contrary, are simply to be conceded. § 7. But to that which is asked further concerning the vow of fools, it must be said that it has less among the three things concerning the rationale of a vow: nevertheless, by posteriority and not entirely equivocally does it receive the predication of "vow". § 8. To the objection it must be said that it does not oblige, for the reason that it is not truly a vow: but nevertheless the vow is mutated on the part of the one vowing.

Whether the transgression of a common vow constitutes a special sin? § 9. Secondly it is asked, Whether the transgression of a common vow constitutes a special sin? § 10. But it seems that it does: because 1. Every corruption of a good is a special sin: but a common vow is a good: therefore its corruption is a special sin: but transgression is its corruption: therefore it is a special sin. § 11. 2. Also, as the Apostle says, Romans 7:7 and following, and the Gloss there, by the written law sin was made a transgression: [712] therefore by similarity through a vow added to a mandate, sin becomes a prevarication of the vow: therefore the corruption of a vow constitutes a special deformity. § 12. 3. Also, if a special vow is corrupted, it is reputed to be and is apostasy: therefore a corrupted common vow also generates apostasy: but apostasy is one of the greatest sins: therefore the corruption of a common vow is a special sin. § 13. 4. Also, it is more detestable to transgress that to which all are bound, than that to which few are bound: but all are bound to the common, as is said in the Letter, while few who have spontaneously bound themselves are bound to the singular: therefore it is more detestable to 710. Glossa ordinaria, on Ps. 75:12, quoting 1 Tim. 5:12.

transgress a common vow, than a proper one: but a singular transgression constitutes a special deformity: therefore also the transgression of a common vow, and much more so. § 14. To the contrary is: because according to this every man by any sin would sin doubly or triply: because he sins against the good of morals by the deformed act itself, and against the divine precept by disobedience to the law forbidding sin, and against his vow and through apostasy: therefore for any sin a triple penance would have to be enjoined, which is false. § 15. Response. This last is to be conceded, and it must be said that there are not three things in the sin, but one in a triple deformity: and Praepositinus called this sin one triple sin, or one double sin if it had a double deformity: whence penance is to be enjoined only for one, and he is to be admonished that he subject himself to the precept, and remember his vow: and no other special penance is to be enjoined. § 2. To the first therefore it must be said that when the transgression of a vow is separated from the transgression of a precept, and from that which is a sin in itself, then that objection holds: as it is in the singular vow concerning living without personal property: for to have property is not a sin nor against the law of God: and therefore if it is vowed away, property will be a sin, which is nothing but against the vow: and then the apostasy of the vow is a special sin. But it is not thus in a common vow, which is always joined to a good in itself and to a precept: and therefore apostasy does not constitute a special sin, although it brings some rationale of deformity to the act of sin which would not be without it. § 3. To the other it must be said that this proves nothing, except that it constitutes some special deformity in the act: and this is to be conceded. But not every special deformity constitutes a special sin: because the corruption of any circumstance constitutes a special deformity, yet not a special sin. § 4. To the other it must be said that it is not similar: because a special vow is concerning an act separated from the act which falls under a precept, but a common vow is not, as is clear from the aforesaid. § 5. To the other it must be said that the detestability of a sin is considered from two things, namely from the bond obliging to do something, or from the state of the one obliged. And if the detestability of sin is considered in the first way, it is more detestable to transgress the common than the singular: because three things are binding to it, namely the good in itself, the precept, and the vow. But if it is considered in the second way; then it is more detestable to transgress the singular, because the higher the state, the more disgraceful the fall.

Articulus 9 — Why Some Vow Is Called Common, And Some Singular

Why is some vow called common, and some singular? § 6. Thirdly it is asked, Why is it called common and singular? § 7. 1. For it seems that it is meaningless to say a common vow: for either it is called common by the community of that which is vowed, or by the community of the one vowing. If by the community of that which is vowed. Against this: That is common which is vowed by a singular vow, just as that which is vowed by a common one: therefore it seems that this is not the rationale of these names. But if it is called common by the community of the one vowing: still this does not seem to be the rationale, because singular vows are commonly made, just as common ones. § 8. 2. Also, it seems that it would be better called a universal vow, than a common one, because all are bound to that vow: therefore it ought to be called universal. § 9. 3. Also, a vow is willed (volitum), that is, chosen to the will: but what is chosen to the will does not receive any community, but rather singularity: therefore it is against the rationale of a vow that some vow be called common. § 10. Response. It must be said that a common vow expresses a community of obligation: because that concerning which the vow is obliges all in common, for this is that concerning which is the faith and the decalogue, because this we are commanded to confess in baptism. § 11. To the first therefore it must be said that by the community of that concerning which the vow is, it is called a common vow. § 12. To that which is objected against it, it must be said that it is false in that sense of "common" which was stated, if it is common because it belongs to many: and therefore there is a sophistical place of equivocation there.

Articulus 10 — Whether A Common Vow Receives Dispensation

§ 1. To the other it must be said that it is not as well called universal: because although by debt it is universal, because all differ (or all owe it); nevertheless it is not universal by observance, but common: and therefore it is better called common, in which both debt and observance are preserved. § 2. To the other it must be said that in a common vow two things are considered, namely obligation and fulfillment. And obligation indeed does not fall under the will, but rather under necessity: but fulfillment is voluntary, because otherwise it would not be laudable. And as to this it is called a vow: whence it is false that this vow is said to be voluntarily chosen: for this mode of interpretation does not apply to a vow except when it is taken most properly.

Whether a common vow admits of dispensation? § 3. Fourthly it is asked, Whether a common vow admits of dispensation? § 4. But it seems that it does: because 1. As Hugh says in Book I of De Sacramentis: "He who has vowed any good whatsoever, but afterwards either could not fulfill it, or was unwilling to fulfill it for the greater part, his vow, according to the license of those to whom dispensation over him is entrusted, can either be relaxed or changed, such that it does not rest in his own judgment either to abandon what he vowed to do, or to do another thing for it, even if what he did not vow is greater." [713] Since therefore Hugh speaks generally here, it seems that it is understood of every vow. Therefore every vow admits of dispensation: therefore the common vow as well. § 5. 2. Also, we see that sometimes dispensation was granted concerning that to which all are bound, namely that one woman should belong to one man, and concerning this a dispensation was granted: therefore since the Church is of no lesser power now than then, it seems that it can also dispense concerning common vows. § 6. 3. Also, even concerning the form of baptism a commutation was made for a time, as was held above in the tractate on baptism: which however is from divine institution: therefore divine institution does not prejudice in other things as well, such that a commutation and dispensation could not be made: now it is evident that all the power is in the Church which ever was: therefore today whatever vow can be dispensed or changed, even a common one. § 7. 4. Also, the vicar of a king who is of full power in a part of his kingdom, can do in that part of the kingdom everything that the king can do: but it is evident that the vicar of the heavenly king on earth in full power is the supreme pontiff: therefore he can do what Christ can: but Christ dispensed on earth with the Israelites taking alien goods, and with Hosea taking a loose woman, as Bernard says, and with Abraham whom he also commanded to sacrifice his son: therefore it seems that his vicar can do the same: therefore dispensation and commutation falls in a common vow. § 8. 5. Also, 1 Maccabees 2:39 ff., Mattathias dispensed concerning the breaking of the sabbath, lest both the law and the worshipers perish together: and they said that they would give battle to every man who fought against them: and this however is from the first table: therefore now too it can be dispensed concerning those things which are contained in the divine precepts of the first table: because it is evident that the supreme pontiff is of greater power than Mattathias ever was. § 9. 6. Also, he can dispense against the Apostle, as all say: now it is evident that the whole Church supposes that this is antecedent to our faith, that what they write is received as authentic-

712. Glossa ordinaria, on Rom. 7:7.

-which the Apostles write: therefore he dispenses concerning those things which are antecedent to the faith: but these draw their strength from divine authority which promulgated them through the Apostles: therefore he can dispense against what God has instituted. § 2. To the contrary of this is that 1. An equal has no power over an equal: therefore much less an inferior over a superior: but the Pope is inferior to God: therefore he cannot dispense or commute in those things which God has instituted. § 3. 2. Also, if this were said, it would follow that he could change the whole Christian religion, which is incongruous: therefore he does not have the power of dispensing in such things. § 4. 3. Also, a king did not have the power of leading the people back into Egypt: but this would be to lead the people back into Egypt: therefore our king the Pope does not have power concerning this. § 5. 4. Also, 2 Corinthians 13:10: According to the power which the Lord has given me unto edification, and not unto destruction. Therefore neither does the Apostolicus have power unto destruction: but this power would be ordained unto destruction: therefore the Pope does not have power concerning this. § 6. Response. It must be said that in no way does he have power concerning this, that he should dispense in a common vow, as was last proven. § 7. To the first therefore it must be said that Hugh speaks of a singular or proper vow, which is properly called a vow. § 8. To the other it must be said that for one woman to belong to one man is not one of those things to which all are bound according to every state, just as neither is it that a daughter not take her father, nor a brother his sister: and therefore in such things divine dispensation had place, and a man of whatever authority, who was not specially inspired by God, would not have had the power of dispensing even in those things. § 9. To the other it must be said that concerning the form of baptism there was no dispensation: because in the name of Christ the Trinity is understood: and if it had been dispensed with, it was shown above that there it behooved there to be a special showing of the divine will: and this is not denied since God can do what He wills: for He himself could abolish and change baptism, if He willed: but a man of however great authority cannot do this. § 10. To the other it must be said that a vicar cannot do all that the king can do: because the king can change the laws of the kingdom, which the vicar cannot do. Whence that is founded upon a falsehood. § 11. But if you say that he can also do this if the king were to give him power concerning this, it must be said that then it is not similar: because the heavenly king gave no man power concerning this, that he might change the laws laid down by Him concerning faith and morals. Whence Pope Urban says thus: "There are some who say that it has always been licit for the Roman Pontiff to establish new laws: which we not only do not deny, but even strongly affirm. But it is to be known above all that he can establish new laws concerning that about which the Evangelists and Prophets have by no means spoken. But where the Lord or His Apostles and the holy Fathers following them have openly and finally defined something, there the Roman Pontiff cannot give a new law, but rather he ought to confirm what has been preached, even unto his soul and blood. For if he strove (which God forbid) to destroy what the Apostles and Prophets taught, he would be convicted not of giving a sentence, but rather of erring. But far be this from those who have always optimally guarded the Church of the Lord against the snares of wolves." [714] These are the words of Urban, and they are placed in the Decree, cause 25, question 1: and from these this determination is confirmed. § 12. To the other it must be said that the determination of the seventh day was not moral, but judi-

§ 1. ...[judi]cial or ceremonial, although the sanctification itself was moral: and how this is so, is explained in the third book of the Sentences, on the precepts, in those notes.[715] And therefore this does not serve the proposition: because even the Pope can change the mode or even dispense from resting on Sunday, if he has a cause of utility or necessity.

§ 2. To the last point, it must be said that against the Apostle, where he spoke as a man, he can dispense: because there the word of the Apostle is the word or counsel of a man: but where he spoke by reciting the word of God in faith and morals, he himself cannot dispense: because by dispensing against the Apostle in this way, he would dispense against God, and it is absurd to say that a man can do this, no matter of how much authority he might be.

Articulus 11 — Whether The Division Of The Singular Vow Into Private And Solemn Is Good

Whether the division of a singular vow into private and solemn is a good one?

§ 3. Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, at B, after the beginning: Likewise, of singular vows, one is private, the other is solemn, etc.

§ 4. And four things are asked here.

§ 5. The first is about this division: what kind it is, and whether it is sufficient? The second is about a private vow: whether it is of equal obligation with a solemn vow, as is commonly said? The third is about the modes of solemnizing a vow. The fourth is whether a solemn vow consists in one vow or in many?

§ 6. To the first, it is thus objected: 1. Private and solemn do not differ by the substance of the vow, but by accident: therefore it is a division of a subject into accidents.

§ 7. 2. Also, substantials are not changed into one another: because, as is said in the last chapter of the book of Meteorology: "Let the artisans of alchemy know that species cannot be changed." But one of these vows is changed into the other: therefore they do not differ by substance, but by accident, as it seems. Therefore it seems that this division is of a subject into accidents.

§ 8. 3. Also, "public" is that which proceeds to the notice of another, and this is called "solemn" in the Letter: but for something to be in the notice of another is accidental to it. Therefore, to be solemn is accidental to a vow: therefore, as before.

§ 9. To the contrary of this is that: 1. Things whose substantial acts are different, themselves differ by substance: but the acts of these vows, namely of the private and solemn vow, differ by substance: therefore the vows themselves differ substantially. The major premise is written by Damascene, who says that substances differ by their proper operations. The minor premise is extracted from the Letter, where it says that a solemn vow breaks a contracted marriage, and a private vow does not do this.

§ 10. 2. Also, in all powers where one power can do what the antecedent does and more, the difference is according to species, such as vegetative, sensitive, rational, and intellectual, each of which is in the other like a triangle in a quadrangle. Therefore it will be similarly the case in vows: therefore the solemn can do what the private can do and more: therefore they differ in species and substance.

§ 11. 3. Also, in holy orders I see that it is thus: that a subsequent order can do whatever a preceding order can do and more, and according to this they differ in species: therefore it will be similarly so in vows. Therefore the private and solemn vow differ substantially.

§ 12. Further, it is asked concerning the sufficiency of that division.

§ 13. For it seems to be insufficient: because

§ 14. 1. Between solemn and private there is the "public" [vow]: which can indeed be proven by witnesses, but is not according to the profession of a rule and of an approved habit: therefore it seems that there ought to be three vows.

§ 15. 2. Also, in the Letter it says that a private vow is that which cannot be proven, and which does not cause scandal: but a public vow causes scandal and can be proven: therefore it is not private. Similarly it is not solemn: because a solemn vow is not solemnized by witnesses, but by habit and profession: therefore it seems that there are three vows. Therefore the division is insufficient.

§ 16. To the contrary is that all the Jurists say that every vow is called private which is not solemn.

§ 17. Response. It must be said that solemnity is added upon a vow, confirming the obligation of the vow. But privation adds nothing upon it that would make the obligation stronger: and for this reason the solemn and the private vow differ as having an obligation simply, and having a confirmed obligation. Hence solemnization is said in a certain way to make a certain species of vow under this common genus which is the vow: but the private vow does not make a species, because it does not add anything of this sort. Hence the division is not properly of a genus into species, but is like the division of a potential whole into parts, as was proven in the objections.

714. Decretum Gratiani, C. 25, q. 1, c. 6 (Urbanus Papa).

§ 18. To that which is first objected, therefore, it must be said that the solemn vow adds a form adding upon the obligation in the genus: and therefore it is a substantial species of a vow, and not an accident.

§ 19. To the other it must be said that there is a transition of a private [vow] into a solemn [one], just as the transition of potency to act and privation, and not as a mutation by accident. And it is established that the private vow does not properly name a species except according to a mode: because it adds nothing to the genus that would be a confirmation or determination of the obligation.

§ 20. To the other it must be said that it is not on account of this called a substantial form, because it proceeds to the notice of another, but rather because it is specifying and strengthening the obligation, which is the genus and general nature of a vow.

§ 21. To that which is further asked, I think it must be conceded that there are necessarily three vows: a first which is in potency to the second, and a second and first which are in potency to the third: and in the third the obligation of the vow is completed. But in the Letter, the Master speaks with respect to the determination of law: because the same law with respect to the impediment of marriage exists in the private and public vow: and therefore they are called and accounted as one.

Articulus 12 — Whether A Private Vow Is Of Equal Obligation With A Solemn Vow

Whether a private vow is of equal obligation with a solemn one?

§ 22. Secondly it is asked: Whether the private vow is of equal obligation with the solemn one?

§ 23. It seems that it is: because 1. A public vow obliges from the same source as a private one, namely from a promise made with deliberation: but those things which oblige from the same source, oblige equally: therefore the private and solemn vows are of equal obligation.

§ 24. If perhaps it is said that the publication or solemnity itself contributes to the obligation. To the contrary: Publication and solemnity are only in relation to one's neighbor: therefore they neither increase nor diminish the obligation, which is to God in itself: but every vow obliges from a promise which is to God: therefore every vow, namely private, public, and solemn, are of equal obligation before God.

§ 25. 2. Also, I Kings 16:7: Man sees those things that appear, but the Lord looks into the heart. But those things that are in the heart are equal in the private, public, and solemn vow: therefore those things that are before God are equal: therefore they are of equal obligation.

715. Decretum Gratiani, C. 25, q. 1, c. 6 (Urbanus Papa).

§ 26. 3. Also, the strength of the obliging bond in a vow is from the quantity of the good that is vowed. Let this therefore be equal in a private vow and a solemn vow: therefore it seems that then the obligation would be equal in both vows.

§ 27. To the contrary of this is that: 1. A solemn vow impedes and breaks a marriage, but a private vow only impedes it: therefore they are not of equal obligation.

§ 28. 2. Also, in the Letter it is said that a transgressor of a solemn vow sins and causes scandal: but a transgressor of a private vow does not scandalize, but only sins: therefore they are not of equal transgression: therefore neither of equal obligation.

§ 29. Response. It must be said that, simply speaking, there is an unequal obligation in these vows: for it is maximal in the solemn vow, in the middle mode in the public vow, and minimal in the private vow. As to the fact that certain laws say that one does not oblige less than the other, some gloss this, meaning, not for a lesser time, or not less in genus, although less in species. But it is better that it be said that there are certain things in a vow from which it obliges as being substantial to the obligation: and there are certain things in it from which it obliges as bearing witness to and proving the obligation. And those things which are in a vow in the first way are equal in the private, public, and solemn vows: and in this way are understood the laws which say that these vows are not of lesser obligation. But with respect to the other things they are of unequal obligation: and these also work toward the obligation, although not as substantially as the first.

§ 30. To that which is objected, therefore, it must be said that the breaking of marriage is caused from that which is in the vow in the second way, and not in the first way.

§ 31. To the other it must be said that scandal is in a twofold vow according to those things which are ordered to the notice of one's neighbor, and not according to those things which are substantial to the promise.

§ 32. And thus the solution is clearly manifest to all the questions concerning this article.

Articulus 13 — What Is The Mode Of Solemnizing A Vow

What is the mode of solemnizing a vow?

§ 33. Thirdly, it is asked concerning the mode of solemnizing a vow?

§ 34. For it seems that it may be solemnized in many modes: 1. For each thing is solemnized in as many modes as solemnity is applied to it: but solemnity is applied to a vow in many modes: therefore it is solemnized in many modes. The first premise is proven through the definition of solemnity. The second is proven from this: that the authority of the person in whose hand the vow is deposited pertains to solemnity, and the taking of a habit, and the profession of a certain rule, and likewise for many other things which can be done.

§ 35. 2. Also, in the Letter it is held that a private vow does not break a contract: because what is done secretly cannot be proven. Therefore, conversely, whatever avails to the publication of the vow avails to its solemnity: but there are many such things: therefore there are many things which solemnize a vow.

§ 36. 3. Also, in all the other sacraments those things are said to pertain to the solemnity of the sacrament which decorate it, and do not pertain to its substance: therefore in a vow it seems that every decoration of the vow pertains to the vow's solemnity, and not to its substance, such as the invitation of many on the day of the vow, and the confession of the vow before many, and so of others.

§ 37. If perhaps it is said that according to the Jurists a vow is not solemnized except in one mode, or in three, according to diverse opinions: let it be asked about that statement: because what the Jurists say contrary to reason is not to be held, because it is rather an injury than a law, since all law rests on reason, which is the first rule of law. Some, therefore, say that a vow is not solemnized through the taking of a habit, nor through entrance into religion, nor through the fact that it is made into the hands of an authentic person, but through profession alone to a certain rule, whether one makes this when one assumes the habit, or before taking the habit, or even after.

§ 39. But this seems to be nothing: because 1. It is established that from the beginning the vow was solemn: but profession to a certain rule did not exist from the beginning, because before the rules of Basil, Benedict, and Augustine, no certain rules are found: therefore a vow is not always solemnized through profession to a certain rule.

§ 40. 2. Also, it is accidental to a vow that it be to a certain rule; but nothing is perfected through what is accidental to it: therefore neither is a vow [perfected] through profession to a certain rule: but solemnity perfects it, as was established previously: therefore solemnity is not brought about through profession to a certain rule.

§ 41. 3. Also, let it be that someone vows continuous continence upon entrance into religion (for it is established that this is free for him to do), according to this opinion he could never solemnize his vow, which seems incongruous, since solemnity is of those things confirming a vow.

§ 42. Further it is asked concerning another opinion, which says that there are three things solemnizing a vow, namely the hands of an authentic person in which it is deposited, the taking of a habit, and profession to a certain rule: do these taken divisively solemnize the vow, or taken conjointly?

§ 43. If divisively: then 1. Whoever would vow into the hands of any abbot, and afterwards contract marriage, the marriage would be broken: and this is not true.

§ 44. 2. Also, whoever would take a habit, his vow would be solemnized: and this again is false, because during the time of probation he can set aside the habit and contract marriage, or if he contracted it de facto, it would be broken [if the premise were true]: and all this is false.

§ 45. If conjointly. To the contrary: Only that which proceeds from the free will of the one vowing solemnizes the vow: but neither the authentic person nor the habit is this: therefore they do nothing for a solemn vow.

§ 46. Response. It must be said that, as is commonly said, nothing makes a vow solemn except profession itself to a certain rule, in which a mode of living approved by the Church is contained. And the cause of this is because that alone makes a return to secular life impossible.

§ 47. To the first, therefore, it must be said that the solemnity which is approved by the Church and which makes the vow stronger, is profession alone. The other things do not bring about solemnity, unless solemnity is taken equivocally, namely as a festivity before men.

§ 48. To the other it must be said that publication and proof are twofold. For one kind is from things substantial to the vow, and confirming or perfecting it: but the other is from accidentals. And in the first way nothing is proven except the solemn vow: because that is proven from the profession confirming and perfecting it. But in the second way it is proven through accidentals, that is, because it proceeded to the notice of some, yet this notice does not cause the vow itself to be of greater confirmation and perfection.

§ 49. To the other it must be said that the case is not similar between the sacraments and a vow: because the sacraments have virtue from the divine operation which occurs in them, as was frequently proven above: and therefore the solemn acts of men are accidental to the sacraments. But a vow draws its strength from human authority: and therefore an added solemnity which expresses a mode of express will approved by the Church, is substantial to the vow itself and perfects it.

§ 50. To that which is objected concerning the opinion of the Jurists, it must be said that that opinion seems to be judged true which says that it is solemnized in one mode.

§ 51. To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that from the beginning there were modes approved by law by the synagogue or the Church, such as the mode of the law of the Nazirites, who vowed a perpetual vow, and of the Rechabites: and modes of this sort were in the place of a certain rule.

§ 53. To the other it must be said that it is not accidental to the vow by accident, but rather it happens to it as a perfection confirming and corroborating the vow, as was said before.

§ 54. If, moreover, it is asked: How can the Church establish that mode of solemnity?

§ 55. It must be said that the care of all Churches and persons falls upon the Supreme Pontiff, and all power of ordaining in the Church those things which exclude heresies and schisms and scandals: and therefore he established certain modes of living, because if anyone could make conventicles, then since everyone strives to defend their own deeds and words (as the Philosopher says), schisms and heresies would be generated. Moreover, if any given vow were reputed to be solemn, there would be persons obliged by solemn vow living among seculars, and they would be corrupted by a depraved and perverse nation, and scandal would arise, and a worse damage would be introduced in common from such a profession than any personal sanctity could be of benefit: and therefore this statute is reasonable.

§ 56. To the other it must be said that without profession a vow is not reputed as solemn on account of the causes stated: and this argumentation contains nothing incongruous.

§ 57. To that which is objected against the other opinion, I think it clearly must be conceded.

Articulus 14 — Whether A Solemn Vow Is Made In One Way Or In Several

Whether a solemn vow is made in one mode or in many?

§ 58. Fourthly it is asked: Whether a solemn vow is made in one mode, or in many?

§ 59. It seems, however, that it is made in many modes: because any good that is better than a precept falls under a vow, and any such good can be solemnized: therefore a solemn vow can be made in many things.

§ 60. Also, profession is not made of one thing, but of many things, namely of obedience, of chastity, of poverty, of living without meat, and things of this sort: therefore that vow is solemnized in many modes.

§ 61. To the contrary of this is that it breaks a marriage: but it does this by reason of nothing except by reason of the vow of chastity: therefore it seems that only the vow of chastity is solemnized.

§ 62. Response. It must be said that every perpetual vow can be solemnized in the first mode stated above: but a temporal vow cannot be solemnized, because profession intends to be perpetual, and it is solemnized through profession alone: yet a greater confirmation can be applied, but perpetuity never accrues as long as it remains temporal.

§ 63. To that, moreover, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that this effect is not of a solemn vow in its genus, but in a species, namely of a solemnized vow of chastity.

Articulus 15 — Whether A Private Vow Of Continence Impedes Marriage; And Whether Those Contracting Thus Can Render The Debt

Whether a private vow of continence impedes marriage? And, whether those contracting in this way can render the debt?

§ 64. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at B, after the beginning: Those who make a private vow of continence, etc.

§ 65. For it seems to be false: because if the marriage stands, then it is necessary that the bond of the vow be broken: but this is not broken: therefore the marriage does not stand. Proof of the minor premise: the bonds of the Church do not bind except by reason of the quantity of the good which is in them: but there is a greater good in the vow than in marriage: therefore it binds more: therefore if one has to be broken by the rest, the marriage will be broken by the vow rather than conversely.

§ 67. If perhaps you say that marriage is a greater good. To the contrary: This is the heresy of Jovinian, as Augustine says, that he wished to equate marriage to virginity and widowhood: therefore he is much more a heretic who wishes to prefer it: but he who says marriage is a greater good, prefers it: therefore he who says thus is a condemned heretic.

§ 68. Further it is asked concerning someone contracting in this way: Whether afterwards he can render the [marital] debt?

§ 69. But it seems that he cannot: because 1. He who retained nothing of himself for himself, could give nothing of himself to anyone: but this man by his vow retained nothing of himself for himself: therefore he could give nothing of himself to anyone: therefore he is not bound to render anything to anyone.

§ 70. 2. Also, it is established that this man gave himself wholly to God through a vow: let it be asked, therefore, by what is he absolved from it? It seems that by nothing: therefore he is still bound.

§ 71. If it is said that he is absolved by marriage. To the contrary: He sinned mortally through the act of marriage in carnal copulation: but one ought not to reap an advantage from a sin: therefore he ought not to be absolved from the vow on account of this: therefore he is still bound not to render it.

§ 72. Also it is further asked: Whether he can exact the debt?

§ 73. It seems that he cannot: because 1. As much as is in him, he vowed away carnal copulation: therefore he cannot exact it afterwards.

§ 74. 2. Also, to exact is to will coition: and this is directly against the vow: therefore it cannot stand with it: therefore he cannot exact it.

§ 75. To the contrary of this is that the vow is just as repugnant to the giving by which one gives the right over one's body to another, as it is to the exaction of the debt: but the former stands and one is bound to render it to the one to whom he gave the right over his body: therefore it seems that he can also exact it.

§ 76. Response. To the first it must be said that a private vow is of lesser obligation than a solemn one, as was sufficiently and reasonably proven earlier. And I well concede that marriage is in itself a lesser bond than a vow, and therefore it impedes the contracting [of marriage]: but marriage instituted with solemnity by the Church is made more powerful than a [private] vow: and therefore that private vow does not nullify the contract. For although chastity is a better good, nevertheless a lesser good in genus, when it becomes common to the Church, prejudices a better private good: and a good of the Church of this sort is the justice which is overt on behalf of a marriage before the Church, and the caution and edification of other living persons, that a promise be kept.

§ 77. To that which is further asked, it must be said that someone contracting in this way is bound to render the debt.

§ 78. To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that any person is considered in a twofold way, namely in himself, and insofar as he is a common member of the Church. Insofar as he is considered in himself, he can do with himself whatever he wishes that does not cede to his own prejudice insofar as he is a member of the Church: because this would cede to the prejudice of the community. Hence it must be said that that person did with himself what he wished, insofar as he is considered in himself, but not insofar as he is a member of the Church: for in this way the ordination of the Church still falls upon him, and thus by the right of an institution made for the common utility he gives himself to the other, even though he sins mortally by doing this: for it often happens that someone sins mortally by contracting, and yet the contract stands: and this is because there is no vice in the contract itself, but rather in the one contracting, who obliged himself to the opposite.

§ 79. To the other it must be said that he is absolved through the right which is acquired by the other by virtue of an ecclesiastical institution, and the objection does not proceed against this, because it is well conceded that he is not absolved through coition.

§ 80. To that which is further asked, it must be said that he cannot exact the debt: because in all things which regard the person in himself, he is obliged by the vow, and to exact is such a thing: but he is not obliged in those things which regard him as he is a member of the Church: and thus it is evident how the vow is not repugnant to the one in the same way as to the other.

Articulus 16 — Whether Every Vow Receives Dispensation

Whether every vow admits of dispensation?

§ 81. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at B, around the middle: Not only to undertake nuptials, etc.

§ 82. For by reason of this, three things are asked here. First, whether every vow admits of dispensation, or not? Second, by whom can it be dispensed? Third, with what ought it to be dispensed?

§ 83. To the first it is objected thus: 1. Augustine says that to vow is of the will, but to render is of necessity: but what is of necessity does not admit of dispensation: therefore it seems that no vow admits of dispensation.

§ 84. 2. Also, a cause is assigned why the precepts of the Decalogue do not admit of dispensation: because the Lord Himself commanded them, and an inferior does not have the power of dispensing in the precept of a superior: therefore by a similar reasoning, since the Lord commanded, Deut. 23:21, that whatever anyone vows he shall render, it seems that no one can dispense concerning what someone has vowed.

§ 85. 3. Also, it is commonly said that a vow, a precept, and an oath do not differ in their fulfillment, but only in their mode of obliging: therefore since a precept cannot be dispensed, it seems that neither can a vow be dispensed.

§ 86. To the contrary of this is what Master Hugh says, who states: "Whatever anyone has vowed can be dispensed, or changed, provided that it is not in his own power or will how it is dispensed or changed," and the authority for this is induced above: therefore it seems that every vow admits of dispensation.

§ 87. Further it is asked here concerning the vow of continence: Whether it can be dispensed?

§ 88. But it seems that it cannot: because 1. No weight is worthy of a continent soul: but every dispensation repays that which is vowed by dispensing it into something equally useful or more useful: therefore the vow of continence cannot be dispensed.

§ 89. 2. Also, Luke 10:42: Mary has chosen the best part, which shall not be taken away from her. But this is the part of the continent, who do not think of the things of the world, but only of the things of God, and how they may please God, and be holy in body and spirit. Therefore it seems that it cannot be commuted into anything better and more useful: therefore neither can it be dispensed.

§ 90. To the contrary of this is that: 1. Marriage was even sometimes commanded, when it was said: Increase and multiply. Therefore then it was not permitted to be continent. But it is established that God would in no way have commanded this, unless marriage had been more useful at that time than continence. Therefore in a similar case and for a similar cause, a vow would still admit of dispensation.

§ 91. 2. Also, let it be that through marriage many could be converted to Christ and to the power of the Church: since therefore the common good of the Church is much better than a personal one, it seems that then, when by the copulation of that person so many good things could be done, it would be licit to dispense.

§ 92. Response. It must be said that there are two things in vows, namely a temporal vow, and a perpetual vow. But a temporal vow, such as a pilgrimage, or a fast, or something else of this sort, can lightly be commuted into something more useful. But a perpetual vow can be commuted in two ways: for it is either commuted into an act contrary to the rendering of the vow, or into a non-contrary act, which is nevertheless besides that by which the vow is rendered.

§ 94. It therefore seems it must be said that that vow which cannot be changed except into an act contrary to the rendering of the vow, cannot be dispensed: because this is to go directly against the vow, and to break the vow: and this was never licit for anyone, nor will it ever be licit: and the solemn vow of continence is such a vow, which can never be changed: and this is the cause of the saying of Ecclesiasticus 26:20: No weight is worthy of a continent soul. But a vow whose change does not bring about the breaking of the vow, but only a mutation, can be dispensed, as Master Hugh says: such as that a religious may have personal property, because he does not have it in his own name, but in the name of the Church or chapter: and this is not against the vow, because even previously he could have such power in his order: similarly that he may accept pastoral care, he who is a monk, because in pastoral care there is also the custody of one's own self, from which the term "monk" is derived. Nor do I approve of that solution of the Jurists, who say that a religious cannot be dispensed so that he can have personal property, but rather he is dispensed so that he is not a religious, and then it is licit for him to have personal property. For these are merely words: because he who can do what is greater, can also do what is less: but it is a greater thing for a religious to become a non-religious, than for a religious to have personal property: therefore if the Pope can do the first, he can also do the second. Hence although there may be a sophism of composition and division in such a solution, nevertheless to me it seems rather the contrary must be said, that it is not licit to break religion, but to change it into that which is besides it, and not contrary to it, as has been said.

§ 95. To the first, therefore, it must be said that rendering is preserved in an equivalent simply speaking, or according to time. But I say "equivalent" in two ways, namely in the genus of the good, or in recompense. An equivalent in the genus of the good to a vow is when it is changed into another good equally good, as if a fast is changed into almsgiving. But an equivalent in recompense to a vow is as when a greater personal good is changed into a lesser common good, which by its commonality recompenses for the personal good, just as the contemplation of one person is changed into an action serving the community, even though the state of contemplation is better than the state of action. And an equivalent according to time is as when a vow which is greater in its genus, is changed into that which is more useful according to that time for the Church, even if in itself it is less, just as a vow of the Holy Land is changed into a vow of another crusade.

§ 96. To the other it must be said that the case is not similar, because the precepts of the Decalogue belong to the natural law: and therefore they cannot be changed even by God, as Augustine says: because if God acted against that which He Himself made right, He would be acting against His own proper rectitude: but nothing makes a vow right except the will: but the will is a variable cause, and its effect also is in a certain way more variable than the exemplar and image of divine justice.

§ 97. To the other it must be said that in a certain respect those three are similar in their rendering, because namely they oblige one to render: but in the mode of rendering they are not equal, because some of them can be rendered in an equivalent with the authority of a superior, but others cannot, as has been said.

§ 98. To that which is further asked concerning the vow of continence, it must be said that it does not admit of dispensation for the reason stated above: because its dispensation would result in the breaking of the vow, not a commutation.

§ 99. To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that marriage was a divine precept, and in such a case a license for marrying could still be given: because in such a case the vow would be...

an irrational promise, because nothing can be vowed that is contrary to a divine precept; but this cannot be done by a human being.

To the next it must be said that this would be nothing, because evils are not to be done so that good things may come about. Hence in the times of blessed Matthew, the virgin Iphigenia refused to marry the king, to whom she promised that he would become a Christian with all his people, to which blessed Matthew also refused to consent, such that he even suffered death instead.

Articulus 17 — By Whom Dispensation Can Be Made

By whom can a dispensation be made?

Secondly, it is asked: By whom can a dispensation be given?

It seems, moreover, that [it can be given] by any Prelate: because 1. In the aforementioned authority of Master Hugh, it is said that [it is given] by those to whom dispensation is entrusted in the Church: but dispensation is entrusted to any prelate: therefore any prelate can dispense.

1. Also, a Prelate exists for this purpose, that he may consider those things which are expedient for the utility of his neighbor; but the necessity of dispensing is for this purpose: therefore any prelate ought to have the authority of dispensing.

ON THE CONTRARY to this is that: 1. In the human body, the head so retains certain functions in the natural body that it does not commit them to other members; therefore it ought to be so in the mystical body. But this especially seems to be required in dispensations. Therefore, the power of dispensing must reside with the head, that is, the Pope alone.

1. Also, the ruling power of life is reason, and it has no seat except in the head; therefore it ought to be similarly in the mystical body. Since, therefore, the power of dispensing is quite principal in governance, it seems that it resides only with the Pope.

Response. It must be said that without a doubt all power of dispensing fully is in the head of the Church, as the last arguments prove, and in other prelates only as much as is granted to them. And therefore they can dispense in those things in which they are not prohibited by express law. Now they are prohibited from dispensing in a vow of the Holy Land, and not in other temporal vows. And therefore in all temporal vows, having weighed the quality of the persons and the cause of necessity or utility, Bishops and Archbishops can dispense. But in perpetual vows which belong to religion, and the like, I do not believe that they have the power of dispensing.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that Master Hugh understands that the power of dispensing resides with superiors; but he does not deny that it resides with them differentially, as has been said.

To the next it must be said that governance is twofold, namely universal and particular. And therefore in great matters the power of dispensing is not committed to one having particular governance; because from this it would happen that sometimes a deformity of the members would arise against the head. For order must be preserved in the members in relation to the head. And therefore it is established in law that in some matters the recourse of all the members is to the head of the Church, just as the recourse of all the members with respect to motive and sensitive power is to the head in a physical organic body.

Articulus 18 — Whether One Can Be Dispensed With Respect To All

Can a dispensation be given to everyone?

Can a dispensation be given to everyone?

Thirdly, it is asked: With whom ought a dispensation be given?

It seems, however, that with no religious: because 1. The state of contemplation has nothing more secure and better; and such is the state of every religion. Therefore a dispensation can never be given with any of them.

1. Also, all power, as the Apostle says, is for edification, and not for destruction; but there is no edification when the better thing is destroyed so that a lesser good may be built up. But this happens when someone is taken from religion into an office of action. Therefore it seems that such a dispensation can never be made.

On the contrary to this is that: 1. The Holy Fathers in several decrees establish and concede that monks, when they are worthy, can be appointed even as plebans and as parish priests. Therefore much more to lesser offices.

1. Also, in Genesis 41:6, Pharaoh says to Joseph that if he knew his brothers to be industrious men, he would set them over his cattle. Therefore in spiritual matters much more should industrious and good men, wherever they are, be taken up for the custody of the Lord's flock.

Furthermore, it is asked concerning temporal vows: Whether a vow of the same species is to be dispensed in the same way, such as a vow of abstinence?

And it seems so: because 1. The compensation of one good in a species is made through one thing. But a vow of abstinence is the same in species in whomever it is made. Therefore it must be compensated in one way.

1. Also, God in His benefits and dispensations does not distinguish between persons; therefore neither ought a human ecclesiastical judge to distinguish in such matters.

BUT AGAINST THIS: A certain rich man is afflicted more by abstinence than by the greatest conferral of alms, and conversely for a certain poor man. But diverse qualities are to be considered in dispensing; therefore the abstinence of a rich man and of a poor man ought not to be compensated by the same thing.

RESPONSE. It must be said to the first that a dispensation can be made, in such a way that the vow is commuted and not broken, as has been said. And I well concede that wherever a person may be, if he is useful for governance, he ought to be taken up and is bound to obey:

because the common good is better than any particular good. Hence, what is objected is true when state is compared to state; but when the community of the good is added in the other state, that state becomes of a better good than the other which belongs to the singular good of an individual human being.

To the next it must be said that there is great edification when his good is not broken off, but is sometimes interchanged so that he can be of use to many, as was said to Jeremiah (Jeremiah 1:10): Behold, I have set you this day over nations and over kingdoms.

To what is further asked about temporal vows, it must be said that vows of pilgrimage can also quite easily be dispensed, because in such pilgrimages there is no great correction of the pilgrims. But in a vow of abstinence one must act cautiously, and it is not to be dispensed with a rich man as with a poor man; for the poor man does not have the means to satisfy for himself, but the rich man abounds too much in these things. Hence, if a dispensation is given to a rich man, great alms must be imposed, or some great thing must be enjoined that would compensate for the pain of hunger which he ought to have endured in abstinence.

To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that, all other things being equal, what is objected is true. But these conditions are exceedingly disparate.

To the next it must be said that God looks at hearts, and therefore He infuses hearts diversely prepared with diverse gifts, sometimes giving more to a rich man, and sometimes less to a poor man. But an ecclesiastical judge sees only the face, and therefore diverse circumstances in the diversity of the face ought to diversify the dispensation in his eyes.

Articulus 19 — Whether A Conditional Vow Ought To Be Fulfilled Simply, Or Only When The Condition Stands

Ought a conditional vow be fulfilled absolutely, or only while the condition stands?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says, there at C, Now concerning virgins who are not veiled, etc.

For here it is asked about a conditional and interpreted vow.

Concerning the first, we proceed thus: 1. Suppose that someone vows with a condition attached, just as Jacob seems to have done (Genesis 28:20) when he said: If God shall be with me, and shall keep me in the way, etc. It seems that even notwithstanding the condition the vow ought to be fulfilled, for we owe our being and our capacity to the Lord without condition. Therefore, whether a condition is attached or not, it seems that what is promised ought to be fulfilled to the Lord.

1. Also, mercenary servitude is not pleasing to God; but conditional [servitude] is mercenary. Therefore it is not pleasing to God. Therefore either a condition is not to be attached, or, if attached, not to be heeded.

ON THE CONTRARY is the fact that a vow does not oblige out of necessity, but out of the will. Therefore it does not oblige further than as the will promises; but the will does not promise except under a condition.

WHICH MUST BE CONCEDED; and therefore unless he who vowed wishes it, if the condition is not present, he himself is not bound to the vow.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that although we owe to the Lord all that we are, nevertheless this entire whole is not required of us; and therefore we are not bound except with a condition or by an absolute promise.

To the next it must be said that it is not a mercenary servitude, because this is understood of those who do not even do those things which are necessary for salvation except for the sake of a temporal reward. But this condition is placed on that which is not necessary for salvation.

Articulus 20 — On The Interpretative Vow. Whether Someone Entering Religion And Remaining Beyond The Time Of Profession Is Professed; And Whether He Is To Be Compelled To Remain And To Make Profession

Concerning an interpreted vow. Is someone who enters religion and remains beyond the time of profession professed? And, is he to be compelled to remain and profess?

Concerning an interpreted vow. Is someone who enters religion and remains beyond the time of profession professed? And, is he to be compelled to remain and profess?

Secondly, it is asked concerning an interpreted vow, namely when someone of age does not make a vow in religion, but delays longer than the time of probation: whether he can leave if he does not profess by word, or if he is to be compelled to remain there?

But it seems that he can leave: because 1. A vow is made by the promise of a word; but he promises nothing by word. Therefore he can leave.

1. Also, the Church permits many women in the parts of Germany to leave in this way, and to marry husbands: which would not happen if by that time the vow had been solemnized.
2. Also, in certain cloisters of the Black Order [Benedictines] there exists no memory that the rule was ever observed there in its entirety, but only certain parts, such as the nocturnal and diurnal office, and not the mode of fasting. And certain persons do not enter with this intention, except to observe what they find. Since, therefore, they do not profess anything more, it seems they are not obliged to anything more.

ON THE CONTRARY to this is that the customs and institutions of Churches cannot be changed without the authority of a superior; but we know those Churches are assigned to the order of Saint Benedict, and have been changed by none of the superiors. Therefore they are bound to observe the order of Saint Benedict, as it seems.

I ANSWER without prejudice that every person makes an interpreted vow and profession when he stays beyond the time commonly assigned for probation, having the liberty of departing if he wished. But this can be prolonged in certain cloisters according to what seems expedient and convenient to the community for the time. Hence it also seems safe to me that in cloisters where nuns live in danger to their chastity, it is delayed greatly until they despair of someone taking them in legitimate matrimony; and therefore the delay is overlooked [dissimulatur] in the cloisters of Germany.

To that which is contrary, therefore, it must be said that such Churches belong to the order of Saint Benedict, and the change is introduced in the observances from the dissimulation of the Prelates: for what the Prelates see and yet overlook, they seem to concede or indulge.

Articulus 21 — Whether Adultery Is More Serious Than Homicide And Other Sins

Is adultery graver than murder and other sins?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says, there at D, after the beginning: What among all sins is to adultery, etc.

For it seems false: because 1. Murder in the genus of morals is graver than adultery, and infidelity is graver simply speaking.

1. Also, adultery is a sin arisen from the infirmity of the flesh; but a sin against the Holy Spirit is graver than that. Therefore adultery is not graver among all sins.

Also it is asked: Why does it hold the second place in punishments?

For if you say that it holds the second place because it transgresses the second commandment. ON THE CONTRARY: There are three commandments in the first tablet, of which it transgresses none.

If you say that it holds the second transgression in the second tablet. ON THE CONTRARY: The second commandment is: Thou shalt not kill; and adultery is not against this.

If perhaps you say that it has the second transgression among the negative precepts. ON THE CONTRARY: This will be against the text; for he says that those who stray from God have the first place, which he would not say if he understood it in the aforesaid manner, but rather that murderers would hold the first place.

If indeed you say that it holds the second place in punishments because they are stoned like one straying from God. ON THE CONTRARY: The law ought to punish a greater sin more; but murder is a greater sin than adultery. Therefore by the law of justice it ought to be punished more.

Also, she who fornicates in her father's house is stoned, as it is said in Deuteronomy 22:23-24.

Also, a stubborn son is stoned because he does not want to hear his father's admonitions.

Therefore it seems that it holds the second place in punishments in no way.

Response. Without prejudice it must be said that one straying from God breaks the faith of the unity of spirit which he has with God in the signification of matrimony regarding the good of the sacrament. Now the adulterer breaks the faith of the marriage bed and of the indivisibility of matrimony, which signifies the fellowship of the soul with God. And therefore, exemplarily and with respect to the quantity of guilt, the one straying from the faith is in the second place. And therefore the Lord through Isaiah speaks to the one straying in the manner of an adulteress, Isaiah 28:20: For the bed is straitened, so that one must fall out: and a short cloak cannot cover both. And, in the same book, 57:8: Near me thou hast uncovered thyself, and hast received an adulterer.

And similarly, Ezekiel 16:1 and following, and Hosea 3:4, and in many other places.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 22 — What Is To Be Done For Women Who Think Their Husbands To Have Been Killed, Or To Be In Captivity, Or Never To Be Freed From Unjust Domination

What is to be done by women who think their husbands have been killed, or are in captivity, or will never be freed from an unjust domination?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says, there at E, Here it is asked concerning those women, etc.

For it seems that it should be conceded to those women that they may marry others in the meantime: because

1. Matrimony is as a medicine, and the disease of concupiscence cannot lack medicine for so long.
2. Also, the good of nature, which is offspring, is impeded. Therefore it seems that matrimony with a second man ought to be conceded.

Response. In the preceding [distinctions] enough has been established concerning this: because all hardships supervening upon matrimony are to be tolerated on account of the faith of the marriage bed. And therefore a long captivity is to be awaited with patience.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is an indirect medicine, because grace medicates more. Hence, if she turns herself to the faith of the marriage bed, she will be aided more than in matrimony; and if that faith is set aside, then she lives rather in concupiscence than in the honesty of matrimony.

To the next it must be said that the good of offspring has in its formal notion that it be received by the honesty of matrimony; and since this cannot be the case here, she cannot procure such a good of offspring through intercourse.

Articulus 23 — Whether, The Husband Returning, The Other Man Can Remain With Her Whom He Thinks His Wife, On Account Of Scandal

When the husband returns, can the other man remain with her whom he thinks is his wife on account of scandal?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says at the end of the distinction, there at E, a little before the end: From which, wishing to return to the first but not being able, etc.

For this seems to be false: because for the sake of no scandal must anything be done against the truth of life. But to be with another woman, having set aside his own, is against the truth of life; therefore he ought not to be with her on account of scandal or even the fear of excommunication.

To this I answer that the Master errs here, and what he says is false; because this man ought rather to die excommunicated than cohabit with her who is not his wife.

DISTINCTIO XXXIX

Divisio Textus

§ 8. Division of the Text

After these things we must consider disparate worship, etc. Here it treats of an impediment that impedes on the part of the foundation which it destroys.

Now the Master touches upon four things in this distinction, namely, why does disparate worship make persons illegitimate? Secondly, what is spiritual fornication? And thirdly, whether a dismissed faithful party can join himself to another? And lastly, whether there can be true matrimony among infidels?

And it is self-evident where these begin.

Concerning the first, however, he introduces two things. For the first opinion is that disparate worship impedes matrimony from being contracted and diriments [nullifies] the contract. Secondly, however, he objects against it and resolves it; and again it is clear where he does this.

Now here three questions begin to be asked. The first is, Does disparate worship make a person illegitimate? Secondly, Why does the opposite of faith do this rather than [the opposite] of another virtue? Thirdly, By reason of which article does faith have the power to make a person legitimate?

Articulus 1 — Whether Disparity Of Cult Makes A Person Illegitimate

Does disparate worship make a person illegitimate?

Now IT IS OBJECTED to the first as follows: 1. Of any two things, if one was sometimes without the other, neither of them has an essential dependence on the other. But matrimony and the faith of Christ are two such things. Therefore, etc. PROOF of the minor premise is that before Christ there was matrimony, and today it exists among infidels, as is proved by the last part of this distinction.

1. Also, that which is contrary to no good of matrimony does not seem to make a person illegitimate for contracting [it]. But infidelity is such a thing. Therefore, etc. PROOF of the minor premise: because one woman belonging to one man can be an infidel observing the faith of the marriage bed, and generating children who can be nourished for the religion of God.
2. Also, it was not said from the beginning: "They shall be two in one faith," but rather in one flesh. Therefore, a disparity of faith ought in no way to impede matrimony, as long as the unity of the flesh can be saved there.
3. Also, the friendship of matrimony binds more closely than any other. Therefore it seems that such marriages should even be advised, because by this occasion infidels will be converted to the faith.

ON THE CONTRARY to this, many things are adduced in the text concerning Ezra and others.

But by reason it is objected thus: 1. Where there is not the foundation of the sacraments, there is not any ratified sacrament. But baptism and faith are the foundation of the sacraments. Therefore where this is not present, there is not any sacrament. But in disparate worship it is not present. Therefore, etc. Therefore neither is the matrimony a sacrament.

1. Also, Malachi 2:11-12: Judah hath profaned the holiness of the Lord, which he loved, and hath married the daughter of a strange god. The Lord will cut off the man that doeth this, the master, and the scholar, out of the tabernacles of Jacob. Therefore, a matrimony in which there is the daughter of a strange god is to be cut off. Therefore disparate worship makes a person illegitimate.

Response. It must be said that what is said in the text seems entirely to be held.

Now to what is objected first, it must be said that matrimony was never ratified without the implicit or explicit faith of Christ, in such a way that "ratified" is said to be entirely indissoluble. Hence in the natural law, Genesis 27:46, Rebecca says: I am weary of my life because of the daughters of Heth: if Jacob take a wife of the stock of this land, I choose not to live. Although therefore it is said below that there can be a true marriage among infidels, it is not, however, entirely ratified; because if some case intervenes, it could be dissolved.

To the next it must be said that it is contrary to the good of offspring; because as regards one of the parents, it is not received in the fear and piety of Christ. Similarly, one who does not keep faith toward Christ can never keep true faith toward a human being. Moreover, the good of the sacrament is in potency only in such cases, and it does not lead in act to the conjunction of the faithful soul with God, but only in potency. And therefore all those goods of such a matrimony are imperfect.

To the next it must be said that although it was not explicitly stated, nevertheless it is pre-understood, just as a foundation is pre-understood for a building.

To the next it must be said that such a friendship is dangerous where a Christian is bound to an infidel, because perhaps he could be perverted, and therefore it is prohibited by the Lord for such persons to be confederated.

Articulus 2 — Why This Belongs Rather To Faith Than To Another Virtue

Why is this proper to faith rather than to another virtue?

Secondly it is asked: Why does faith have this rather than another virtue, and infidelity rather than any vice?

1. For Augustine says that any vice whatsoever separates from God; therefore it is contrary to that which by its indivisibility signifies that conjunction. But this is matrimony. Therefore any vice whatsoever makes a person illegitimate for matrimony.
2. Also, below in the text it is said that theft, avarice, and many other vices do this same thing; therefore the proposition is established.
3. Also, faith is not unitive, but rather charity; because as the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 6:17: He who is joined to the Lord, is one spirit. Therefore the opposite of charity ought rather to make a person illegitimate, inasmuch as it is opposed to the conjunction and union of the faithful soul with God, which matrimony signifies.
4. Also, the sin against the Holy Spirit is the gravest, which shall not be forgiven either in this world, or in the world to come. Therefore it struggles against the copula of the soul with God both in this world and in the future; and matrimony prefigures this. Therefore a sin against the Holy Spirit rather makes a person illegitimate for matrimony than disparate worship.

On the contrary to this are: 1. Those things which are said in the text.

1. Also, it is further objected by reason: As the Apostle says, Hebrews 11:1: Faith is the substance of things to be hoped for; because, as the Gloss says, it makes the things to be hoped for subsist in us. Therefore without faith nothing of the things to be hoped for subsists in us. But nothing is firm that does not subsist with the things to be hoped for. Therefore what subsists without faith is not firm. Therefore also matrimony subsisting without faith does not have perfect firmness. Now that nothing is firm which does not subsist with the things to be hoped for, is proved from the fact that the things to be hoped for are eternal; and what is neither eternal nor with the eternal, this is only temporal; existing only temporally, it has no firmness.

2. Also, what does not please God, ought not to be firm in human contracts; but without faith it is impossible to please God, as the Apostle says, Hebrews 11:6. Therefore it has no firmness. Therefore also the matrimony of an infidel ought to lack firmness.

1. Also, there could be no contract in which the legislator is excluded, and the law rectifying the contract. Therefore also in spiritual matters, no contract holds where God and divine law are excluded. But in the matrimony of an infidel, God and divine law are excluded in this way. Therefore such a contract is not fully ratified.

Response. According to the last arguments it must be said that it is most equitable that matrimony is not ratified where there is disparate worship.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that although any vice separates from God, nevertheless not any vice entirely dissipates the foundation of good and of the sacraments, but only infidelity. And therefore nothing of the building stands where there is not the foundation of faith; because Augustine says that infidelity is the vice and sin by which all other sins are held.

TO THE NEXT it must be said that moral vices which are not against matrimony do not impede matrimony from being contracted, nor do they nullify the contract, but they can dissolve cohabitation. For it is not necessary to cohabit with a thief who does not want to repent, or even with a usurer. And in this regard, those things which are said below in the text are understood. However, it was established above which vices impede matrimony and which do not.

To the next it must be said that the perfection of the conjunction of the soul with God is in charity, but the betrothal and first conjunction is in faith. And therefore the contrary of faith dissolves the whole that follows, but not the contrary of charity, because the preceding part of a building is not destroyed when the posterior part is destroyed, but rather conversely.

To the next it must be said that a sin is said to be greater than another in many ways, as was noted on the Second Book of the Sentences. But insofar as pertains to the present proposition, it must be said that infidelity is the greatest sin by reason of the harm, and of that against which it is, and by reason of the act. But the sin against the Holy Spirit [is greatest] by reason of the root. And therefore infidelity is the greatest sin simply speaking. Yet a sin does not have the power to impede matrimony from its magnitude, but rather from the contrariety which it has to the foundation or the act.

Articulus 3 — By Reason Of Which Article Faith Makes A Person Legitimate

By reason of which article does faith make a person legitimate?

Thirdly it is asked: By reason of which article does faith have the power to make a person legitimate?

1. It seems that it is by reason of that which is, "Life everlasting"; because eternal life will be in the conjunction of the soul with God, and matrimony signifies that.
2. But again it seems that it is by reason of the "Communion of Saints"; because the communion of Saints will be in the indivisibility of life and fellowship, which matrimony again prefigures.

To this it must be said that it is by reason of that article which is, "The Holy Church," that faith makes a person legitimate. Because it is understood thus: that is, "I believe in the Holy Spirit," namely sanctifying and uniting the Church. For just as it is said, Ephesians 5:32: This is a great sacrament: but I speak in Christ and in the Church.

To the FIRST, therefore, it must be known that eternal life is not the union of the faithful soul with God, but rather the vision, and union follows the vision.

To the next it must be said that the communion of Saints consists in the communion of goods mutually. But the signification of matrimony is rather in relation to God; and therefore it is not by reason of that article that faith makes a person legitimate.

Articulus 4 — Whether If Someone Takes A Baptized Heretic To Wife Who Is Unwilling To Abandon Her Heresy, He Ought To Dismiss Her

If someone marries a baptized heretical woman who refuses to give up her heresy, ought he to dismiss her?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says, there at A, a little before the end: Or a foreigner, that is, a heretical woman, etc.

1. For let us posit that someone knows a certain woman to be a heretic, and yet baptized, and marries her, and she afterwards refuses to dismiss her heresy. It seems that such a man, according to those things which are said in the text, can dismiss her.
2. Also, it is a greater thing to be segregated from the consortium of the faithful, than from the society of a husband. But a woman is segregated from the consortium of the faithful on account of heresy; therefore much more from the consortium of a husband.

On the contrary to this is that: 1. One baptized by a heretic is baptized. Therefore one joined in matrimony to a heretic has true matrimony. Therefore it is not to be separated.

1. Also, baptism is the foundation of the sacraments; but whatever is built upon an immobile foundation, that is a firm building. Therefore this is firm matrimony; therefore it is not to be dissolved.

ALSO, let us posit that some Jew, or heretic, or pagan, wishes to be baptized, and he does not find water, or a baptizer to baptize him, and in that state he contracts [matrimony]. It seems that the matrimony stands; because by the baptism of desire [flaminis] even if not of the river [fluminis] he has obtained the remission of all sins. Therefore no sin is repugnant to his matrimony which he contracts with a Christian woman. Therefore the matrimony stands.

On the contrary to this is that baptism is the foundation of the sacraments; and this man does not have the baptismal character. Therefore he does not have the foundation. Therefore it is not a firm building.

Response to this is that as Hugh says, in the first case the matrimony stands on account of baptism, and he seems to me to speak reasonably.

To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that Ambrose in the text is speaking of a heretic not baptized in the form of the Church.

To the next it must be said that although it is a greater thing to be segregated from the consortium of the faithful than of a husband, nevertheless not everything segregating from the consortium of the faithful is ordained from contrariety against the foundation of matrimony, and therefore it does not dissolve contracted matrimony. But it is true that it ought not to be contracted.

To that which is asked concerning the second case, it must be said that it is not ratified matrimony; because he does not have the baptismal character, although he has the reality of baptism [rem baptismi].

To that which is objected against this, it must be said that immunity from sin does not lay the foundation of the sacraments, but rather the impression of the character. Hence one not baptized, though immune from sin, if he were ordained, would receive nothing of the order; and one having the baptismal character, and not immune from sin, if he is ordained, receives the order.

Articulus 5 — Whether Disparity Of Cult Supervening Upon Marriage Dissolves The Marriage

Does disparate worship supervening upon matrimony dissolve the matrimony?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says, there at B, To this however what the Apostle [says] seems to oppose, etc.

For it seems, according to those things which are said in the text of this chapter, that disparate worship supervening upon matrimony dissolves the matrimony: because

1. Disparate worship supervening upon matrimony is of equal or greater danger as antecedent [disparate worship]. Therefore it does the same or more for the separation of matrimony than the antecedent, as it seems.

2. Also, such a person does not cohabit except to the contumely of the Creator; but this is assigned as a cause of separation in the text. Therefore on account of such disparate worship the matrimony is to be separated.

3. Also, such a person sins against the author of matrimony; and this again is said to be a cause of separation. Therefore such persons can be separated.

§ 1. To the contrary is the rule that says, that 1. No impediment supervening on matrimony dissolves a contracted matrimony; therefore neither does this one. 2. Also, the faith of a Christian once given, is to be firmly kept: but faith is given to her who becomes a heretic: therefore it ought not to be made void: therefore the matrimony is to be held firm.

§ 2. To this it must be conceded, and it must be said to the first, that there is no danger: because a separation from bed can be made, if she is pertinacious in heresy.

§ 3. To the other it must be said, that although she communicates only to the reproach of the Creator, if she is pertinacious, yet from the first reception of faith she is subject to ecclesiastical censure: and by that she can be prohibited, or even separated from the assembly of the faithful, so that it is free for the secular judgment to avenge itself on such a one.

§ 4. To the other it must be said, that in truth such a one sins against the author of matrimony, and therefore is punished in matrimony as to separation from bed: but nevertheless by merit of the foundation the matrimony stands, as long as both live who contracted in the faith of Christ.

Articulus 6 — Whether Someone In Paganism, Having Several Wives, If He Is Converted With All Of Them, May Have All Or One, And Which One Can Be The Wife

Whether someone in Paganism having multiple wives, if he is converted with all of them, all or one, and which one can be his wife?

§ 5. Then it is inquired concerning this that he says, there, B, after the middle: Therefore by merit those whom they had married to the Lord, etc.

§ 6. For suppose that someone in Paganism or Judaism had multiple wives, and is converted with all of them: and it is asked, Whether all, or one, or which of all can be his wife?

§ 7. For it seems, that all: 1. For it is held below, that between infidels there is true conjugal union: therefore since according to his rite he could have multiple, any one of them is a true wife: but, as Augustine says,[716] baptism does not dissolve conjugal unions, but sins: therefore it seems, that any one of them still remains his wife: therefore after baptism he can have multiple. 2. Also, baptism adds greater liberty to him, and does not take any away: therefore since before baptism it was free for him to retain multiple, this same thing will also be free for him after baptism. 3. Also, if they are separated, then it seems, that this would generate an impediment to conversion: because they would already hate baptism on account of the horror of separation from their spouses: therefore they ought not to be separated, but all permitted after baptism.

§ 8. To the contrary of this is what Innocent says:[717] "Since from the beginning one rib was formed into one woman, it was never permitted to anyone to have multiple wives, except by divine dispensation and for a time out of necessity;" therefore it was neither permitted to him before baptism, nor is it permitted to him after.

§ 9. But then it is asked, Which of them is the wife? It seems, however, that 1. He can choose: because he himself is the head. 2. Also, because his conversion is worthy of favor: and therefore the choice ought to be permitted to him.

§ 10. Further it is asked, Suppose for instance that someone in his law gave a bill of divorce to the first wife with whom he contracted, and after her contracted with another according to the rite of his law, and with her is converted to the faith of Christ. It seems, that he must dismiss the second: because she was never his true wife: therefore it is necessary, that both these converts be separated.

§ 11. To the contrary of this is, that this would generate disturbance and an impediment to conversion.

§ 12. Response. It must be said, that in the first part of the question there is no doubt that he cannot have multiple, [but] only one: nor was it permitted to him before to have multiple according to divine law, but rather according to the error of human perfidy.

§ 13. To the first therefore it must be said, that what is said below, is understood of licit matrimony: and this is not against divine law: and this is of one with one.

§ 14. To the other it must be said, that to have multiple is not liberty, but servitude: because whoever commits sin, is a slave of sin. And Anselm says,[718] that even the potency of sinning, is neither liberty, nor a part of liberty: because added to liberty it diminishes it, and taken away it increases it.

§ 15. To the other it must be said, that what belongs to the truth of life, is never to be dismissed on account of anyone's disturbance or scandal, especially out of love for Christian honesty: but that one is of one, ought more to draw to conversion, than the love of little women is able to entice.

§ 16. To the second part of the question it must be said, that none is his wife except the first with whom he contracted; and therefore when all are converted only she will remain. But if she herself did not want to be converted, then I think, that it would be free for him to choose from the other converts whom he wanted, and to contract anew with her: because the prior contract was not valid, for the reason that among all those with whom he contracted secondly in his rite, none has more than another, because none of them was truly his wife.

§ 17. But to the objection it must be said, that the man is the head in governance, but not in contract: because in that the man and wife are judged on par, since the consent of both is required.

716. Augustine, De adulterinis conjugiis.

§ 18. To the other it must be said, that there is no favor in the man, especially since he receives baptism, so that he may be freed from vices.

§ 19. To the third part of the question it must be said under a distinction, that either the first to whom he gave the bill of divorce, wants to be converted, or not. If yes, he is bound to have her. If not, then he can contract anew in the faith of Christ with the second: and then even if the other is converted afterwards, she does not have the right of demanding him, for the reason that she lost her right by merit of infidelity, since in nothing ought she so to follow her husband as in conversion to the faith of Christ.

Articulus 7 — Whether On Account Of Unbelief A Wife Can Be Dismissed

Whether a wife can be dismissed on account of infidelity?

§ 20. Then it is inquired concerning this that he says, there, C, Yet he can licitly dismiss, etc. It seems that what he says is not valid: because 1. He himself said in the third book of the Sentences, that one must not argue from tropes: but it is evident, that infidelity is not fornication except by speaking tropically. 2. Also, faith is not the foundation, except that which works through love, as the Gloss says:[719] therefore for the husband to object the sin to her, it is necessary that he himself has charity: and this would be heavy. 3. Also, from this it follows, that every matrimony contracted outside of charity, would be without a foundation: therefore separable, as it seems.

§ 21. Response. It must be said, that he does not argue from tropes, although the saying is tropical: but what he says follows, because infidelity has contrariety to the foundation.

§ 22. To the other it must be said, that faith founds two things, namely merit, and sacrament. And as to the founding of merit that Gloss is understood: because charity informs every merit. But as to the founding of the sacrament alone without the sacramental reality [res] and effect both in baptism and in others, unformed faith suffices.

§ 23. And through this the solution to the following is evident.

Articulus 8 — Whether On Account Of Mortal Sin One Of The Spouses Can Dismiss The Other

Whether on account of mortal sin one of the spouses can dismiss the other?

§ 24. Then it is inquired concerning this that he says, there, D, But if you ask, Whether on account of another, etc. For the whole of what is said here in the Letter seems false: since, 1. According to this, divorces would happen all day long, which is false. 2. Also, he either understands of these vices before matrimony, or after. And it is evident, that he understands it in neither way, because with both or one existing in mortal sin, they contract, and are not separated, and are compelled to cohabit by the Church: therefore what he says is false. 3. Also, it is expressly against the Gospel, where it is said,[720] that whoever dismisses his wife, except for the cause of fornication, etc. And it is evident, that it speaks only of corporal and literal fornication. Also, in Luke, where it says,[721] that two will be in one bed: one will be taken, and the other left. Therefore the one bed is of one good, and the other bad.

717. Innocent III, Decretals.

§ 25. Response. It must be said, that if the Letter ought to be sustained, it must be referred to betrothals: because I well believe, that those can be severed on account of mortal sin existing in one of the betrothed, especially if it is appended in a condition, as the Letter seems to say: and if he does not want to be converted from sin. And this is noted above in the question on betrothals.

Articulus 9 — Whether One Faithful Spouse Can Dismiss The Other Before The Death Of The Other

Whether one faithful spouse can dismiss the other before the death of the other?

§ 26. Then it is inquired concerning this that he says, there, E, Here it is asked, If a faithful dismisses an infidel, etc. For the determination of the Master seems not to be true thus: 1. In every true and legitimate matrimony each of the spouses is obligated to the other until death: but between infidels there is true and legitimate matrimony: therefore each of the spouses is obligated to the other until death. The first is proved, where it is said,[722] that a woman is bound to the law, namely of her husband, as long as her husband lives. The second is written in the Letter. 2. Also, the matrimony of infidels is perfect in signifying and causing: but what is perfect obligates until death. 3. Also, there is a lesser bond between master and slave, than between husband and wife: but the first is not dissolved through the conversion of the other: therefore neither the second. 4. Also, Ambrose says,[723] that in baptism sins are dissolved, not conjugal unions: therefore through baptism the wife is not de-obligated from the husband: therefore she cannot contract before his death. 5. Further it seems, that if the dismissed infidel contracts, the matrimony holds. For either the faithful can contract, or not. If not, this will be against the Letter. If yes, he cannot contract unless absolved from the matrimony by which he was previously obligated: but since matrimony is a certain relation, and a relation is not dissolved in one unless it is dissolved in both relatives, the infidel will be absolved from the matrimony: but one who is absolved can contract: therefore an infidel thus dismissed can contract. 6. Also, it is unjust if someone should owe from the right of another and it should not be owed to him from the same: therefore no right of matrimony obligates an infidel to a debt, such that it is not owed to him from the same: but it is not owed to him, as is said in the Letter: therefore neither does he himself owe anything, as it seems: therefore it is licit for him to contract just as for the faithful. 7. Also, let us posit, that he is converted: for then by merit of faith he ought not to be deprived of the liberty of contracting: suppose therefore, that the other already contracted with another: therefore she too after being converted can contract with another. 8. Also, penance restores entirely, as was held above: therefore it also restores the liberty of contracting: and thence as before. 9. Also, if it were not licit to contract after being converted, many would be drawn back from the faith: therefore it seems, that it ought not to have been instituted by the Church, that afterwards it is not licit for them to contract.

718. Anselm of Canterbury, De libertate arbitrii.

§ 27. To the contrary of this, however, is that 1. The Apostle says:[724] If the infidel departs, let him depart: for a brother or sister is not subject to servitude in such matters. And he does not say, that the faithful is not subject to servitude: therefore he hints that the infidel is still held by the servitude of matrimony. 2. Also, no unratified matrimony has sufficient stability: but the matrimonies of infidels are not ratified: therefore, etc.; therefore they can be dissolved.

§ 28. Response. It must be said, that those things which are said in the Letter, have the firmness of law.

§ 29. To the first therefore it must be said, that the matrimony of infidels is not entirely legitimate, for the reason that it is not entirely between legitimate persons: and therefore upon the intervention of some case it can be dissolved.

§ 30. To the other it must be said, that it is not perfect in causing and signifying except in potency, as was said above: but the faith of Christ is that from which it draws firmness.

§ 31. To the other it must be said, that although the bond is of one servitude, nevertheless it is not founded upon the faith of Christ: and therefore from faith it neither contracts strength, nor weakness from its contrary: but matrimony insofar as it is a sacrament, is founded upon the faith of Christ, and when that is lacking it does not have perfect ratification.

§ 32. To the other it must be said, that baptism does not dissolve conjugal union, but confirms it, provided the person is legitimate: whence that it dissolves, this is from a defect of person or matter.

§ 33. To that which is further objected, it must be said that an infidel cannot contract by right: because in punishment for infidelity he remains under servitude.

§ 34. And to the argument to the contrary, it must be said that the bond does not remain: but in punishment that is inflicted on him by which he loses his right in the liberty of contracting.

§ 35. And through this the solution is also evident to the following: because anyone can lose his right from sin, and become an outlaw.

§ 36. To the other it must be said, that if he is converted, he is still bound by the punishment of not contracting as a punishment for obstinacy. I believe however, that the Church can and ought to dispense with such a one in favor of others.

§ 37. To the other it must be said, that penance restores as to immunity from fault, but not as to immunity from every punishment.

Articulus 10 — Whether Among Unbelievers There Is True Marriage

Whether between infidels there is true matrimony?

§ 38. Then it is inquired concerning this that he says, there, I, Therefore marital copulation, etc. For it seems, that it is not a true conjugal union: because 1. No superstructure is without a foundation: but matrimony is a certain superstructure: therefore it is not without a foundation: but that is faith: therefore without the faith of Christ no matrimony is true. 2. Also, other sacraments are of greater spirituality and efficacy, than matrimony: and those cannot be without faith and baptism: therefore neither this one.

719. Glossa Ordinaria on Galatians 5:6.

§ 39. To the contrary of this is, that if there were not true matrimony between infidels, by every act of concubitus they would be fornicators: and this would be heavy to say.

§ 40. Response. It must be said, that the matrimony is true, but not having ultimate firmness: because it has a contrary disposition in the matter.

§ 41. To the first therefore it must be said, that it is called true from the honesty of the contract, but firm from the foundation: whence faith does not found the truth of the conjugal union, but its immobility.

§ 42. To the other it must be said, that this is rather the cause why it can be without faith, than that it always demands it as to its truth: because insofar as it is a human duty, and not only spiritual, it can be effected by contract, and obtains truth from human consent.

DISTINCTIO XL

Divisio Textus

Now it remains concerning cognation, etc. § 43. In these three distinctions it is inquired concerning the impediment proceeding from the vicinity of cognation: and therefore here first he treats of carnal cognation. Secondly, of affinity, namely in distinct. XLI. And thirdly, of spiritual cognation, namely in distinct. XLII. Fourthly, of legal cognation, there, Dist. XLII, D, But that spiritual or adoptive children, etc.

§ 44. Further this distinction is divided into three parts. First it is inquired, In how many degrees is it licit for someone to be joined matrimonially? Secondly, he renders the cause why in so many, there, C, § 1: But why he computes six degrees, Isidore, etc. Thirdly, he objects certain things and solves them, there, C, § 2: But to these it occurs, etc.

§ 45. In the first there are two chapters. In the first it is shown in how many degrees matrimonial copulation is considered. In the second, he shows a twofold mode, namely of Isidore, and of others, how those degrees are to be computed, there, B, But how the degrees of consanguinity, etc.

Articulus 1 — What Consanguinity Is

What is consanguinity?

§ 46. Around the beginning of these chapters five things are inquired. The first is, What is consanguinity? The second, Whence is it so called? The third, What is a line? The fourth, What is the division of a line? The fifth, What is a degree of computation in a line?

720. Matthew 5:32; 19:9.

§ 47. But other things of this question will be inquired below in their own places.

§ 48. To the first let this definition of the Jurisconsults be posited: Carnal cognation is a bond of persons descending from the same stock contracted by carnal propagation.

§ 49. But it is objected against this: because 1. According to this all men would seem to be consanguineous: because all men descended from one stock, namely from Adam and Eve, and are mutually joined to each other, and sown through carnal propagation from Adam and Eve: therefore it seems, that all men are consanguineous. 2. Also, original sin is a bond of persons, etc.: therefore original sin is carnal cognation. 3. Also, just as a collection of many descending from one, makes one genus, as Porphyry maintains,[725] so also it makes carnal cognation: therefore carnal cognation is more a collection of many, than a bond. 4. Also, it is evident, that bond is equivocal to a corporeal bond, and to a spiritual one: therefore it ought not to be posited in a definition before distinction. 5. Also, as is said below by Isidore,[726] consanguinity tears itself apart gradually, so that propinquity ceases to be: but descent from the same stock never tears itself apart nor is it finished: therefore it seems, that the definition is insufficient, because finished consanguinity is not posited there. 6. Also, when it is said, By carnal propagation, etc., it is either understood of active propagation, or passive, or both. If in the first way: then the father will be consanguineous to the son, and not conversely. If in the second way: then a diction posited once in a definition must be used equivocally: and this is against art according to the Authors.

§ 50. Response. It must be said, that the said definition is suitable concerning consanguinity, which is treated here. Because it is treated here as it generates an impediment to matrimony: and there bond is posited as a genus: but of persons is posited as matter. The difference contracting the matter, however, is descending from the same stock: but by what is said, contracted by carnal propagation, the proper efficient cause is posited. And thus this definition is real, touching upon three causes of consanguinity, the formal, the efficient, and the material. But the final cause which is the nexus of friendship, is outside its essence, and therefore is not posited in the definition.

§ 51. To the first therefore it must be said, that all who are in the line of ascendants and descendants directly, are called consanguineous according to this definition: but in the transversal line although anyone is referred to the stock, nevertheless on account of the variation of the line, his proximate stock is also varied: and therefore they are not called consanguineous here beyond the fourth degree: but there it is varied.

§ 52. To the other it must be said, that original sin is not an existing one bond of diverse persons, but existing only as one in species: but carnal cognation is one relation in one whole genus. Furthermore, original sin follows propagation by accident, namely from corrupted nature: but consanguinity is the per se effect of propagation through the propagated flesh itself.

§ 53. To the other it must be said, that a collection to one does not express anything but the habitude of inferiors to a superior: but consanguinity is equally in the habitude of an inferior to a superior, and of inferiors to each other: and therefore it is better defined through a bond than through a collection.

§ 54. To the other it must be said, that although bond is equivocal, nevertheless it is determined through the following adjunct, just as if one says "a barkable dog" [canis latrabilis]: and therefore it does not generate a confused intellect in the definition.

§ 55. To the other it must be said, that consanguinity tears itself apart: but this is not from consanguinity, but from the distance of degree, as will be said below: and therefore the severing itself is rather to be posited in the determination of the number of degrees, than of consanguinity. But that severing is not essential to consanguinity, is evident: because if it were essential, then in every line it would be severed: and this is not true, because in the line of ascendants and descendants it is never severed: and the cause of this will be said below.

§ 56. To the other it must be said, that active carnal propagation is taken here: but what is inferred does not follow: because consanguinity is not the essence of the action, but rather an effect which follows both in the propagator, and in the propagated, and in other propagated things from the habitude of the substance from which the severing is made to those which are severed.

Articulus 2 — Whence Consanguinity Is So Called

Whence is consanguinity so called?

§ 57. Secondly it is inquired, Whence is consanguinity so called? And it is commonly said, that it is so called from the composition of the word, as if a society of blood on account of propagation from one.

§ 58. But it seems, that this is nothing, of which there is one reason: because 1. Generation or propagation does not happen from blood, as the Physicists say,[727] but rather from the superfluity of the fourth digestion: therefore neither can consanguinity be called on account of blood. 2. Also, Laban said of Jacob:[728] You are my bone, and my flesh. And Judah to his brothers concerning Joseph: He is our brother and our flesh. Therefore it ought rather to be called con-carnality, than con-sanguinity.

§ 59. Response. It must be said, that it is optimally called consanguinity; because what is most proximate in ultimate potency to the body and to the nature of man, is blood.

§ 60. To the first therefore it must be said, that that is materially and through vicinal dispositions blood well deputed, but through more ample digestion it becomes white, and through the admixture of spirit it is made frothy, and appears more white.

§ 61. To the other it must be said, that generation does not happen from flesh: but flesh and bone are posited there for the matter having in itself the formative virtue of flesh and bone: for the sons of one father receive this from one.

722. 1 Corinthians 7:39.

Articulus 3 — What The Line Of Consanguinity Is

What is the line of consanguinity?

§ 62. Thirdly it is inquired, What is a line? And it is commonly said, that a line is an ordered collection of persons joined by consanguinity, descending from the same stock, containing diverse degrees.

§ 63. But it is objected, 1. Concerning this that is said, Ordered collection: because this ought to be understood of one order: and this is not suitable, because there are three orders in a line. 2. Also, a line is also between persons not consanguineous, like affines, and adopted ones, and those joined by a spiritual bond: therefore it is badly said, Of those joined by consanguinity. 3. Also, it seems to be badly said, Descending from the same stock: because those who are in transversals insofar as they are transversals, are in a line not related to the stock: therefore descent from one stock is not always attended to there. 4. Also, since every line is between two terms only, there seem to be only two diverse degrees: and this again is false.

§ 64. Response. It must be said, that there is no great force in these things, provided the virtue of law concerning lines is attended to.

§ 65. Nevertheless it must be said first, that the line is sufficiently commonly defined: and this that is said, Ordered collection, is the genus according to which line is taken here. But the matter or subject of the form of the genus is touched upon by this that is said: Of persons joined by consanguinity, etc. But the efficient cause is touched upon by this that is said: Descending from the same stock: because, just as in mathematics according to Alfarabi,[729] the motion of a point makes a line, so the motion and a certain quasi-multiplication of the stock here makes the line, concerning which it is treated here: but this that is said, Containing diverse degrees, is the ultimate difference completing the being of a line taken civilly.

§ 66. But to the first that is objected to the contrary, it must be said that order is taken here for the general habitude to one, that is, to the stock: and that habitude is saved in all lines: nor is it necessary in the definition of a genus to descend into the differences of a species: because those are posterior to the genus, and do not define it.

§ 67. To the other it must be said, that the line of consanguinity is defined here, and not a line in genus, unless the proximate genus is taken, namely of consanguinity.

§ 68. To the other it must be said, that there would be no transversal line, unless there were a descent from one stock: because he who is in a transversal line on one side, would in no way regard him who is in another line, except mediating the stock from which both descend: whence a falsehood is supposed in the objection.

§ 69. To the other it must be said, that this line is like a designated line in geometry which is divided into parts: and therefore it can contain diverse degrees.

723. Ambrose (Ambrosiaster), In 1 Cor. 7.

Articulus 4 — What The Division Of The Line Is

What is the division of a line?

§ 70. Fourthly it is inquired, What is the division of a line? And it is commonly said, that it is divided into three, namely of descendants, ascendants, and transversals. And of ascendants is like father mother, grandfather grandmother, great-grandfather great-grandmother, great-great-grandfather great-great-grandmother, sub-grandfather sub-grandmother, etc. But of descendants like father mother, son daughter, grandson granddaughter, great-grandson great-granddaughter, sub-grandson sub-granddaughter, tri-grandson tri-granddaughter. But of transversals like father mother, brother sister, son of a brother daughter of a sister, who are called cousins: grandsons of brothers or sisters great-grandsons of cousins, and their tri-grandsons, and so on of the others.

§ 71. But this division of a line seems insufficient: because 1. Just as there is a transversal habitude to the stock, so there is a habitude of the same to a descendant from himself: therefore there are two lines in a transversal, namely one transversal, and another descending. 2. Also, there seems to be a certain straight lateral: as there is a habitude in the tree of the sons of two brothers, for they regard each other directly: therefore mention ought to have been made of that line. 3. Also, it seems that it is an abundant division: for those who transfer transfer themselves according to some similitude (as the Philosopher says):[730] but in mathematics where lines are properly taken, there are only two species of lines, namely a simple one which is straight, and a composite one which is curved, for the reason that the simple is of a simple form, but the curved has one form in the concave, and another in the convex: therefore the law transferring lines, ought to posit two to the similitude of the others, and not three.

§ 72. Response, that this division according as it pertains to the proposition, is good.

§ 73. To the first therefore that is objected to the contrary, it must be said that every line must be referred to its term, and that is the stock on one side: and without respect to it no habitude is found between persons: and therefore there is no line of descendants in the side: because it must be directed to the stock, and then it will be transversal.

§ 74. And through the same the solution to the following is evident.

§ 75. To the last it must be said, that in the tree of consanguinity there cannot be a curved line: for either it would be regularly curved, or irregularly curved. If in the first way, thus it could not be except circular, and thus matrimony would return from the branches to the stock: and this cannot be, because the sap descends into the branches from the stock, and not conversely. But if irregularly, then it neither is subject to art in mathematics, nor here: because the irregular does not obey art. And thus it is evident, that translation cannot be made except from straight lines referred to one: and this cannot be except in ascending, or in descending, or laterally, not indeed at a right angle, because a son and daughter do not stand equally high with the parents, but at half a right angle, as is evident in the tree of consanguinity.

724. 1 Corinthians 7:15.

Articulus 5 — What A Degree Is

What is a degree?

§ 76. Fifthly it is inquired, What is a degree, according as it is computed in a line? And they say, that a degree is a habitude of distant persons, by which it is known by how much distance of cognation the persons differ among themselves.

§ 77. But the definition seems to be inconvenient: because 1. Degree sounds of a habitude of inferiority and superiority of distant persons, etc.: therefore it is badly defined through a simple habitude of distant persons, etc. 2. Also, from a degree insofar as it is a degree, it is not known how much the distance is, etc.: but rather from a degree insofar as it is an aliquot, either second, or third: therefore this is badly attributed to a degree in genus. 3. Also, in material degrees of wood or stone it is not known how much the distance is from an inferior or superior place, unless it is known what number the degree is from a lower or an upper [degree]: therefore neither in these degrees is the distance known from the degree insofar as it is a degree, but rather it is known from it insofar as it is an aliquot [part].

§ 4. Item, what is known and the principle of knowing are not the same, as the Philosopher says. But the degree is what is known in these things: for those asking about consanguinity must know the degree which is between the persons. Therefore the degree is not the principle of knowing. Therefore it is badly attributed to it to be the principle of this kind of knowing from the mode of speaking, when it is said: By which it is known.

Reply. It must be said that a degree is appropriately defined here: for it is a general habitude or form, of which the proper subject and matter are the distant persons; but the proper act is the difference by which it is known, etc.: and the known is expressed through this which is said, How much distance of kinship, etc.

Whence it must be said to the first, that a degree in general does not signify inferiority or superiority, but abstracts from both, and so it is defined here: and through this it is clear, that there is a lower degree and an upper degree: and this division is into species of degree. And therefore degree in general, as abstracting from both, is prior to both: however, the state or site of superiority and inferiority is imported in general through the mode of distance of persons.

To the next it must be said, that from the degree insofar as it is a degree, habitude is known in general, but habitude in species is known from the degree determined in species: and because cognition in general is imperfect cognition, therefore one does not stop in it, but asks about the species. However, when degree is defined in general, it ought not to be defined except through the cognition which it causes in general.

To the next it must be said, that the same is true in material degrees: but because one does not stop there, therefore the process seems to be toward the species.

To the next it must be said, that a degree as degree is never the thing sought, nor the known as that which was before sought or doubted: but rather whether there is consanguinity or not, that is sought, and is found from the degree. Whence that a degree is sought, this is only insofar as it is a principle of concluding consanguinity, just as also in syllogisms and theorems one thing is concluded accidentally, so that afterwards through it the intended conclusion may be concluded: for one does not always proceed from things known per se, but also from those things which have received faith through first and true things.

Articulus 6 — Whether There Are Three Ways Of Counting Degrees

Are there three ways of computing degrees? And which is stronger among them?

Then it is asked about what he says there at B, But how the degrees of consanguinity are to be computed, etc.

There are indeed three modes of computing here: and we ask, Which mode is more reasonable? And, concerning the consonance and contrariety between them.

And two modes of degrees are indeed according to the canons, each of which is mentioned in the Text. For Pope Zachary computes thus, saying: We compute the degrees of kinship in this way: I and my brother are one generation, and make up the first degree. Again, my son and my brother's son are the second generation, and make up the second degree, etc. And this way is considered more famous.

Isidore, however, thus: Let the son and daughter, who are brother and sister, be the trunk itself. With them set apart by themselves, from the root of this trunk these little branches go forth, grandson and granddaughter, the first [degree]; great-grandson and great-granddaughter, the second, etc. And so on for the others.

But according to the laws it is computed thus: Father and mother are the trunk; brother and sister, the first degree. And the second, the son of the brother and the daughter of the sister, who are the grandson and granddaughter. The third degree and fourth, the great-grandson and great-granddaughter. And the fifth and sixth degree, the great-great-grandson and great-great-granddaughter. The seventh degree and eighth, the great-great-great-grandson and great-great-great-granddaughter. The ninth degree and tenth: and so on for the others.

From these it is easy to see, that that person who according to the first computation is in the fifth [degree], that is, outside the prohibited degree today: according to the second is in the fourth, that is, inside the prohibited degree today: and according to the laws in the tenth on one side, and in the ninth on the other. Therefore there seems to be the greatest contrariety between these laws, which speak thus.

But it is objected against the first mode of computing and for the last thus: § 1. Just as the descent of generation is on one side through the son, so on the other side through the daughter: but a double descent demands a double degree. Therefore the grandson through the son, and the granddaughter through the daughter, are in two degrees. Therefore the first opinion which says that they are in one, speaks falsely: and the last which says that they are in two, speaks the truth.

§ 2. Item, In natures, if two things are moved by contrary motions from each other, there will necessarily be a double distance there, and a double degree, just as if A is moved upwards, and B downwards: but a double descent is like a double motion in nature. Therefore in the generation of sons or of a son and a daughter there is a double distance and a double degree. Therefore the first computation is false, and only the second and third are true.

But it is objected specially against the second thus: § 1. A son and a daughter, who are brother and sister, are united in nothing material or formal intrinsic to themselves: therefore one trunk cannot be posited, but rather the father and mother who are one flesh. Therefore the first is true, and the second and third are false.

§ 2. Item, Everything that is distant through generation from some one thing, has more the likeness of a little branch and a degree, than of a trunk: but a son and a daughter, who are brother and sister, have descended through generation from one, as is imported by the very name, since a son is not a son except a son of a father. Therefore the son and daughter, who are brother and sister, do not make a trunk or stock, but degrees. And from this as before.

But it is objected for the first and second against the third thus: § 1. Material diversity alone in no way makes a different species of degree: but generation through two is a material diversity only. Therefore it does not make a different species of degree. Therefore these are distant from the trunk in one degree, although they are two materially.

§ 2. Item, In natures things which are moved by one mode of motion from one, are equally distant, and have one degree of distance: just as B is moved from A, and in the same mode of motion C is moved from the same A. But a brother and a sister are moved by one mode of motion from one trunk. Therefore they are distant by only one degree, and not by two. Therefore the first and second opinions are true, and the third is false.

Reply. It must be said that all these opinions have something of reason: but yet the first is more reasonable: and therefore the Church has adhered to it. For it considers that the person from whom there is descent has one habitude, and does not descend according to the rationale of his name, just like a father and a mother: because those names express those from whom another is, and do not express that they themselves are from another, although sometimes according to the truth of the thing they are from another. It considers also that the one descending by one descent has one habitude, and the one descending by multiple descents has another: and according to this it locates the trunk and the first and second and third and fourth degree, so that the first is called by one descent, the second by two, the third by three, and the fourth by four: and in that consanguinity is ended today.

But the second considers that the trunk arises from a certain other thing which is the root, and therefore it locates the trunk, the brother and sister, upon one root of the father and mother: and there is no diversity, except in rationale, as is said in the Text, between the first opinion and the second.

But the third considers those two reasons which were posited for it, and against the first and second opinions: and these it is not necessary to repeat.

And thus it is plain how to answer all the objections: because the ones introduced last solve the first two: and that which is objected against the second is plainly solved through those things which the second opinion considers: because it takes another rationale of a trunk than the first.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 7 — Whether All The Forbidden Degrees Are Prohibitive For Contracting Marriage

Are all the prohibited degrees for contracting matrimony?

Then it is asked about what he says, there, at B, after the beginning: Note, that Isidore computes six, etc.

For three causes are found assigned here concerning the number of degrees, in which it is permitted or not permitted to contract: for according to the computation of Isidore, and according to the ancient laws, the sixth degree is prohibited, and the seventh granted: and he assigns the cause, because there are six ages of the world, and six states of man, namely infancy, childhood, adolescence, youth, mature age, old age and senility, which Isidore takes for one, because then bodies begin to dry up and putrefy, and become unfit for the use of matrimony.

According to the computation of Zachary the seventh degree is prohibited, and the eighth granted: and he assigns the cause, because all time is enacted in seven days, after which the Church also will be joined in body and soul to the spouse Christ.

But according to the new laws, by which all the ancient ones are abrogated, the fourth degree is prohibited, and the fifth granted: and Innocent assigns the cause of this (Extra, De consanguineis et affinibus), because there are four elements, out of which the four humours are composed, out of which the human body is constituted and complexioned.

§ 1. But these causes seem ridiculous, and to do nothing to the proposition, because no habitude of the caused to the cause seems to exist.

§ 2. Item, What is the cause that Innocent assigns the four elements rather than the Gospels, or the four corners of heaven, or the four Evangelists, or the four animals of Ezechiel? For in all these the same affinity to the caused seems to exist. Whence it is said, that not without shame for the Church did the Pope allege that for a cause, since by such a great man only reasonable things ought to be done.

§ 3. Item, What shall we assign for a cause, that according to the consonance of the laws to the canons today the eighth degree according to the laws is prohibited, and the ninth and tenth granted? Unless indeed the eight men who were in the ark of Noah are assigned, or the eight beatitudes enumerated (Matt. 5:3 et seq.).

Similarly regarding the cause of Isidore concerning the six ages of the world: for the six ages of the world do not seem to do more than the six water jars placed in Cana of Galilee for the purification of the Jews.

Similarly the septenary of days in the computation of Pope Zachary does not seem to avail more than the seven gifts, or the seven stars having an aplanes (fixed) motion in heaven.

But it seems that it would be better not to assign such causes: because literate men reading such things despise them, and judge the Church to found its institutes upon nothing or very little.

Reply. It must be said that in truth in such things there is not great force: because they have no force except from the position of the Church: nor do the Saints assign a number of this kind for a cause, but for a sign that Scripture uses such a number: and therefore it is more fitting for instituting something in it.

If someone however wished to subtilize here, then for a cause there could be assigned the prohibition of the fourth degree: because up to the fourth degree many men see themselves and their succession, and it is abominable that a man should see his succession torn apart: just as the Lord also said according to the exposition of the Saints, Exod. 20:5: Visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me.

But to the cause of Innocent it must be said, that in every new generation there is a mixture of blood with foreign blood, and insofar as it is mixed with another, to that extent it recedes from the first, and from each other. But the elements are easily and difficultly mixable: for the maximally subtle (as the Philosopher says) is well mixable, and this is fire, which is alienated as it were in the first mixture, and in the second air, and in the third water, and in the fourth earth; and so the components of the human body recede from previous dispositions, and consequently from consanguinity: and this is clear also in seeds, which are sown in earth not natural to them: because in the fourth generation they cross over to another species entirely: and this the Pope intends.

But to this which Isidore and Zachary say, it must be said that it is not a cause, but an adaptation, as has been said.

But to that which is objected concerning the laws, it must be said that the eighth according to the laws is the same as the fourth according to the canons: and therefore it is not necessary to assign another cause in that.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

C. Why are six degrees computed?

But why Isidore computes six degrees, he himself reveals, saying: While consanguinity, separating itself little by little by the orders of shoots, has drawn itself out to the ultimate degree, and 728. Genesis 29:14; cf. Genesis 37:27.

propinquity has ceased to be, then first the law will receive it into the bond of matrimony, and will somehow begin to call back the fleeing thing. But therefore consanguinity is constituted up to the sixth degree of the genus, so that just as the generation and status of man is finished by the six ages of the world, so the propinquity of the genus may be terminated in as many degrees. In these six degrees all names of propinquities are contained: beyond which neither affinity can be found, nor can succession be prolonged further. According to others, seven degrees are computed for this reason, so that after seven degrees the groom may be joined to the bride: just as after this life which is enacted in seven days, the Church will be joined to Christ.

But to these occurs that which Gregory writes back to Augustine the Bishop of the Angles, by whom he had been asked in what generation they ought to be copulated, thus: A certain Roman law permits, that the son and daughter of either a brother, or a sister, or of two full brothers, or of two sisters, may be mixed. But we have learned by experience that from such a marriage offspring cannot grow up. Whence it is necessary that the fourth or fifth generation of the faithful be joined to each other licitly. But after a long time the same Gregory, asked by Felix the president of Messina in Sicily, whether he had written to Augustine that marriages contracted by the Angles in the fourth generation should not be dissolved, among other things rendered such a reason: What I wrote to Augustine, the Bishop of the Angles, and to the very nation of the Angles which had recently come to the faith, lest it should recede from the good which it had begun by fearing more austere things, you must recognize that I wrote specially and not generally. Nor therefore did I write these things to them, so that after they had been solidified in the faith, if they were found within their proper consanguinity, they should not be separated, or should be joined within the line of affinity, that is, up to the seventh generation.

Articulus 8 — Whence The Church Has The Boldness To Prohibit From Marriage According To These Degrees

From whence does the Church have the audacity of prohibiting from matrimony according to these degrees?

Then it is asked about what he says, there, at C, § 2: But to these occurs that, etc.

§ 1. For since the Lord did not prohibit from matrimony except twelve persons, who all are either the trunk, or in the first, or in the second degree: from whence comes such great audacity to the Church, that it should dare to prohibit over and above this, since up to the eighth exclusively or inclusively, and now up to the seventh exclusively?

For since according to the law of the Lord those who are in the third are legitimate persons, it seems that if they contract, that God has joined them: therefore a man is prohibited from separating them.

§ 2. Item, This seems to make for peace and society and a joyous life: because there will be two reasons of love between such persons, namely marriage, and consanguinity: therefore matrimony ought rather to be promoted, than prohibited.

729. Alfarabi, Commentary on Euclid's Geometry.

To this it must be said, that the Church did this inspired by the Holy Spirit, so that friendship might be more lasting, and there might be more reasons binding men in love and peace, when many were reputed within consanguinity. And thus the solution to the first is clear: for God never joined those who are joined against the inspired Church.

To the other it must be said, that this was when the propagation of the faithful was carnal, and a small grace of love had been shown to men: but now the great love of the Son of God has been shown, and an alien nature has been espoused to the divine: and therefore the bonds of love are extended to them diverse and wide in consanguinity.

And thus the solution to the whole is clear.

DISTINCTIO XLI

Divisio Textus

Now we must see concerning affinity, etc. Here he treats of affinity, and touches upon four things in this distinction.

For first he teaches the degrees of affinity. Secondly he asks, Whether there was true matrimony between those who are separated on account of consanguinity and affinity? And it is also asked, by what accusers is the separation made, and how many? there, at C, This is to be known, that the Church, etc. In the third, he incidentally introduces about fornication and its species, there, at D, § 1: Here it must be said, that fornication is one thing, etc. Fourthly, he touches upon the proper names of certain affinities, there, at D, § 2: That must also be added, etc.

About the first he introduces two chapters, of which the first introduces the ancient law concerning the degrees of affinity. But in the second he introduces certain things which seem contrary to those, and solves them, there, at B, But others seem to concede, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Affinity Exists

Whether there is affinity?

But here three things to be asked fall in. The first is, Whether there is affinity? The second, What is it? The third, How many kinds of affinity are there?

But to the first it is thus objected: § 1. Things which were one, after they have been separated from each other, it does not follow if something is united to the one, that it is united to the other also: but consanguineous persons are separated from each other out of one: but if some person is united to one, she is not on this account united to the other: but for there to be affinity, there must be such a union: therefore it seems that there is no affinity.

§ 2. Item, No one is united to anyone, who is not reunited to him conversely: but no one of the consanguinity is united to the added woman except her husband: therefore she is not reunited to anyone of them except to him: therefore no affinity is contracted to anyone, as it seems, except to him.

§ 3. Item, If a union of blood, as is said in the Text, is the cause of consanguinity, it seems that where there is the greatest union of the added person, there is the greatest affinity: but between the husband and the added woman there is the greatest union: therefore between them is the greatest affinity: but there is no affinity between them: therefore by destruction of the consequent, neither between the others and her.

§ 4. Item, That on account of which each thing is such, is itself more such, as the Philosopher says: but on account of this one who is the husband of the added woman, there is affinity between her and all the other consanguineous persons: therefore between him and her there is much more affinity: but it is not between him and her: therefore neither between the others.

§ 5. Item, It is agreed that if affinity is anything, it is a certain relation: but relations arise from some mutation, as the Philosopher says: therefore where there is no mutation, by the topic from the cause, there is no relation: but in the whole affinity except in the man there is no mutation: therefore there is no affinity except in him, if there is affinity: but in him there is no affinity: therefore neither in anyone else, as it seems.

Reply. It must be said that affinity is, and what it is, will be plain in the following article of the question.

To the first however it must be said, that there is absolute unity, and unity of relation. Concerning absolute unity what is objected is true, but concerning unity of relation it is false, as will be plain in examples: for I and my sister are divided from one: and therefore the son of my sister will still hold to me in respect of blood. And the same is true of affinity.

To the next it must be said, that by a union of relation all the consanguineous persons are united to the added person, and she is reunited to all: and the objection does not proceed except concerning the union of flesh in coitus.

To the next it must be said, that it does not follow, unless the union were the per se cause of affinity: and this is not true, because a relation does not have a per se cause, but arises by accident, just as also filiation arises in the begotten from this that the one is begetting and the other is begotten. And there is an instance [counterexample]: because that which whitens is the cause of whitening, and a likeness to itself does not necessarily arise, but rather to other white things.

To the next it must be said, that this is not true, except in per se causes participating in that which they cause in others, just as if fire is the per se cause of heat, fire will be maximally hot: otherwise an instance is customarily made in drunkenness and wine, because on account of one [wine] someone is drunk, and yet the wine is not more drunk.

To the next it must be said, that affinity is a relation: but it is not necessary that relations always arise from a mutation of both relative terms: but a mutation of one suffices, just as

from passive nativity a son born from my father is made my brother, with no mutation having been made in me, so it is here: for a mutation is made in the added person, and this suffices for the relation of affinity to arise in the whole consanguinity.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Definition Of Affinity Is Well Assigned

Is the definition of affinity well assigned?

Secondly it is asked, What is affinity?

And it is commonly said, that affinity is the propinquity of persons coming from carnal copulation, lacking all parentage.

But against this it is objected: § 1. There is no greater propinquity than the union of flesh to flesh, such as is between husband and wife: and this cannot be called affinity: therefore neither can any other.

§ 2. Item, Carnal copulation does not intervene except between two: therefore neither does affinity.

§ 3. Item, Carnal copulation is in a fornicatory manner just as in a legitimate one: therefore affinity is contracted from it: and this seems to be inconvenient, since affinity is about honest things pertaining to urbanities [social customs], while fornication is about detestable things.

§ 4. Item, Let us suppose that someone has invaded and opened the cloisters of modesty of some woman, but has not arrived at the perfection of the work: it is agreed that there flesh was united to other flesh through contact: therefore affinity would be contracted according to this: therefore no one of his consanguinity could afterwards have as wife her who was thus attempted in fornicatory concubinage: and those who know the laws do not say this.

§ 5. Item, Let us suppose that through sodomy he polluted her by hand or by his own instrument: it is agreed that there was a foul carnal copulation: therefore affinity would be contracted to his consanguineous persons: and this again the laws do not admit.

§ 6. Further it is objected concerning this which he says, Lacking all parentage. For this seems to be false: for let someone be my brother from my father alone, and some woman my sister from her mother alone: it is agreed that that brother of mine can legitimately be joined to that sister of mine: and that sister of mine will be to me consanguineous and affined: therefore it is not necessary that affinity lack all parentage.

Reply. It must be said that affinity is conveniently defined: for propinquity is the genus and the proper subject of the persons. The cause however is carnal copulation. And the difference distinguishing it from consanguinity is understood through this which is added, Lacking all parentage: for to that privation there is pre-understood an affirmation, which is in the person added to the consanguinity: because she cannot be added to the consanguinity, unless she is not consanguineous.

To the first therefore it must be said, that affinity is a propinquity in the genus of relation, as has been said: and it does not follow, if a union of flesh makes it in others, that it makes it in those carnally united, as was clear before, but there it makes another relation which is the indivisibility of husband and wife.

To the next it must be said, that it does not follow, unless it were a per se and essential cause, as was said before.

To the next it must be said, that by fornicatory concubinage affinity is indeed contracted just as in legitimate.

To that which is objected against this, it must be said that there are two things in fornicatory concubinage, namely the union of flesh to flesh: and this is not foul, because it is similar to that which is in matrimony. Another thing is the perverse act and evil end: and those are not in matrimony. It must be said therefore, that from the first fornicatory concubinage makes affinity, and not from the second: whence the foul insofar as it is foul, can be the cause of the honest, especially the per se accidental cause, just as relations admit a cause.

To the next it must be said, that such a concubinage does not make affinity: because the union of flesh to flesh is not made through contact, but rather through the commixtion of seeds: and therefore unless such a thing is made, no affinity is contracted.

To the next it must be said, that in sodomy when a due instrument is not used or not the proper vessel, there cannot be a commixtion of seeds, nor even affinity: nor is there a union of flesh to flesh, as was clear before.

To the last it must be said, that that locution is understood per se, namely lacking all parentage, according to the fact that it is affinity, although in another respect there can be a propinquity of blood to the affine.

Articulus 3 — How Many Kinds Of Affinity There Are

How many kinds of affinity are there?

Thirdly it is asked, How many kinds of affinity are there?

For it seems that there ought to be more than one: because § 1. If on account of propinquity of blood the added person is made affined to me, it is agreed that when my consanguineous relative is dead, the affinity remains in the added person: therefore he who is united to her, is united in a certain way to me: therefore if she then takes a husband, he is made affined to me: therefore there will be two kinds of affinity.

By the same objection it is proved concerning a son who is born from the second copulation, that he is made affined to me.

§ 2. Item, It is often seen even in birds, that the disposition of a preceding copulation remains in the second, and that a female makes an egg from which a chick similar to the first male comes forth: and this is especially experienced in doves: therefore it is so also in men: therefore the propinquity seems to pass over to the subsequent copulation: therefore the husband of my female affine and the one born from the non-consanguineous seem to have affinity to me: therefore there seem to be multiple kinds of affinity.

727. That is, the natural philosophers and medical authors.

In contrary to this is, that affinity is not caused from affinity, but from consanguinity: but of this one to me there is no consanguinity: therefore no affinity to me is caused in such a case.

Which must be conceded. And it must be said to the first, that affinity remains there, as is had below in the Text: but that does not generate another affinity, because there is no affinity, except from consanguinity which is not here.

To the next it must be said, that such dispositions are weak, and are made from a long infusion of the matrix from the seed of one disposition, and then they do not cause anything in the birth, except some qualities, such as color, and do not cause the substance: and therefore in substantial things the propinquity to the first affine does not remain, although some weak one remains to the first: and therefore the husband of any woman cannot take as wife the daughter of that woman from another husband.

It must be noted therefore, that although in antiquity there were three kinds of affinity, nevertheless now there is only one in the person added to consanguinity by carnal wedlock: and therefore she alone is interdicted to the consanguineous, and not her sister, or her other consanguineous relative, or a daughter from another husband.

Articulus 4 — How The Degrees Of Affinity Are Computed

How are the degrees of affinity computed?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, at A, a little after the beginning: Wherefore I and the sister of my wife will be in one and the first degree, etc.

For it is asked here concerning the computation of the degrees of affinity: § 1. For every propinquity having a nearer and remoter distance, has degrees to be computed in itself: but affinity is a propinquity of this kind: therefore it has degrees in itself: therefore they are not to be computed by degrees of consanguinity, as is said in the Text, but by proper degrees.

§ 2. Item, Commonly one is called an affine in the first, and an affine in the second degree: therefore there are some proper degrees of affinity.

Further it is asked concerning the rule which the Jurisconsults give, that a person added to consanguinity through whom affinity is contracted, changes the genus of relation, not the degree, but a person generated in consanguinity changes the degree, and not the genus of relation: whence the verse: Mutat nupta genus, sed generata gradum. [The bride changes the genus, but the generated woman changes the degree.]

For this seems to be false: because a person joined to consanguinity, causes diverse degrees of affinity.

Reply. It must be said that just as affinity is caused from consanguinity, so the degrees of affinity are found and caused from the degrees of consanguinity, as is said in the Text.

To the objection however it must be said, that it has proper degrees, but caused from elsewhere...

...begotten: and therefore, since a thing properly has to be known from its cause, it is necessary when coming to know the degrees of affinity to have recourse to the degrees of consanguinity.

§ 1. To the next it must be said that it does have degrees, but not ones knowable in themselves, as has been said.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that the rule is true and good: because a person added to a consanguinity never changes the degree; rather, by the very degree of the blood-relation whose wife she is made, she is joined to the whole kin group. Thus the wife of my blood-relation in the second degree is related to me by affinity in the second degree, and so for the rest. And my blood-relation who through my affine is added to the kin group of his wife, is joined to everyone of his wife's kindred in that degree of affinity by which that wife is joined to them in the degree of blood. And through this both the truth of the rule and the understanding of the Letter are easily evident.

§ 3. Moreover, the objection is invalid: because it is not understood in such a way that she does not bear with her diverse degrees in diverse persons, but rather that she herself does not create a different degree than the one in which he to whom she is joined is situated. Instead, she changes the genus of relation, because she is my affine, since her husband is my blood-relation. But a person begotten of my blood-relation in the third degree becomes my blood-relation in the fourth degree, and thus a person begotten from a blood-relation changes the degree, but not the genus of relation, because she is a blood-relation, just as the begetting person is.

Articulus 5 — Whether In Equal Degrees Affinity Is Prohibited And Admitted As Consanguinity

Is affinity prohibited and admitted in equal degrees just as consanguinity is?

Next, it is asked concerning what Pope Julius says, there at A, after the middle: We permit none in either sex, etc.

For this seems to be unfitting: because:

§ 1. Affinity is a lesser bond than consanguinity. Therefore, it ought to be ended at fewer degrees. Therefore, it seems that in antiquity it should not have been posited up to the seventh degree, nor presently up to the fourth degree inclusively.

§ 2. Again, let us suppose that someone is a blood-relation or affine in the fifth degree on one side, and in the second degree on another side, and let us ask: Can they be joined? It seems not: because the second degree is prohibited; but it validly follows: "These persons are in the second degree on one side; therefore they are in the second degree; therefore they cannot contract marriage."

To the contrary of this stands the custom of the Church.

§ 3. To the first motivating argument it must be said that, in equal degrees, consanguinity and affinity are prohibited and permitted both in antiquity and presently.

§ 4. To the objection, however, it must be said that affinity is indeed a lesser bond than consanguinity; nevertheless, on account of the mingling of blood that occurs, a breaking of that mingling cannot be presumed to exist, except in the same degree in which the consanguinity itself is broken. If, however, it were pleasing to the Church to set fewer degrees both in consanguinity and especially in affinity, it seems to me that she could do this quite fittingly.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that, in the computation of consanguinity and affinity, one must stand by the further degree. The cause of this is that no degree exists unless caused by a trunk; and therefore, the respect of no person to another exists—whether in consanguinity or affinity—except through the trunk. Whence one who is distant from the trunk in the fifth degree is distant from any of the descendants in the other line in the fifth degree or more. And when it is said that these persons are in the second degree on one side, it is understood as being in the second degree not from themselves, but from the trunk; and therefore, between themselves they are distant further than even in the fifth degree; and therefore they can contract, because the fifth degree from the trunk is permitted.

And through this the solution to the objection is evident.

Articulus 6 — Whether Affinity Remains After The Death Of The One For Whose Sake It Is Contracted

Does affinity remain after the death of the one on whose account it was contracted?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says, there at B, around the middle: That also must not be passed over, which Gregory, etc.

For this seems to be irrational: because

§ 1. When a cause ceases, its effect ceases. But the joining of carnal copulation is the cause of affinity, as was held earlier. Therefore, when it ceases, the affinity also ceases. But it ceases through death; therefore affinity does as well.

§ 2. Again, no person is an affine unless adjoined. But after death she is not adjoined. Therefore, it seems she is not an affine. The first premise is established from things previously held. The second is proven from the fact that if she were still adjoined to him, she could not be adjoined to another; and this is false, because through a second marriage she can be adjoined to another.

§ 3. Again, in all relative things it is the case that when the mutation inducing the relation ceases, the relation ceases; just as if the whiteness which was induced through whitening were destroyed, the similarity to white things ceases. Therefore, here it seems to be similar. But it is established that marriage was the cause of this relation; therefore, when it ceases, the relation which is called affinity is destroyed.

§ 4. Response. It must be said that, just as it is said in the Letter and in the Gospel of Matthew , affinity remains after death: and for this reason John rebuked Herod on account of Herodias, the wife of his brother Philip, who had married her.

§ 5. To the first, therefore, it must be said that this holds nowhere, except in the case of an essential and immediate cause; but it does not hold in an accidental and remote cause, because when the builder is destroyed, the building is not thereby destroyed. However, from the foregoing it is evident that carnal copulation is not an essential cause of affinity in this way.

§ 1. To the next it must be said that, although she is not adjoined to the husband who no longer exists, she nevertheless remains adjoined to the consanguinity.

§ 2. To the proof, it must be said that one adjoined to a husband cannot be adjoined to another: but one adjoined to a consanguinity and released from her husband can well be adjoined to many others successively through the deaths of husbands and subsequent marriages.

§ 3. To the last it must be said that the case is not similar: for whiteness is a form upon which similarity is founded, but marriage is not a form upon which affinity is founded, even though it is caused by carnal copulation. Rather, it is because she had become one body with someone belonging to the consanguinity: and this fact remains even after the death of the husband; and therefore, the relation of affinity stands.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Definition Of The Justice Of Public Honesty Is Well Given By The Master

Was the definition of the justice of public propriety well given by the Master?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says, there at B, after the middle: But neither the offspring of another conjunction, etc.

Although what he says here concerning the offspring of another conjunction is abrogated by the new laws, nevertheless, for the sake of this, we will inquire concerning the justice of public propriety, regarding which we will ask three things: namely, what is it? And, whether it has degrees or not? Third, what is its status in law?

§ 1. To the first, they commonly say that the justice of public propriety is a proximity proceeding from betrothal, drawing its strength from the institution of the Church on account of its propriety.

But objections seem to be raised against this: because § 2. 1. Betrothal does not effect the union of marriage or of flesh. Therefore, since every proximity proceeds from some one thing, it seems that no proximity is derived from betrothal.

§ 3. 2. Again, in natural things it is the case that because some matter has merely been inclined to receive one form, it is not thereby hindered from being able to be joined to another, and to one neighboring it more quickly than one remote. Therefore, since female is to male as matter to form, it seems that from betrothal—which is an inclination or disposition to marriage—nothing is introduced whereby this woman is more prohibited from the blood-relation of her betrothed than from anyone else. Therefore, it seems that there is no such proximity.

§ 4. 3. Further, it is asked here concerning what he says, Drawing its strength from the institution of the Church. For an institution of the Church ought not to be irrational. Therefore it is founded upon some reason. But if one asks what that is, it is not found, neither in the Old Law, nor in the New, nor even in civil law. Therefore, it seems that it should rather be called an injustice of public propriety, than a justice.

§ 5. 4. Again, why does he say, On account of its propriety? For no propriety seems to be generated for the Church in this; but rather many inextricable snares are procured for souls from this.

§ 6. 5. Again, since this pertains more to continence than to justice, it ought rather to be called the modesty or continence of public propriety, than the justice of public propriety.

§ 7. Response. It must be said that the stated definition is quite fitting, and it touches upon the genus, the cause, the confirming principle, and the end; and these are evident in order in the definition.

§ 8. To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that there is a certain union there, just as was said above in the question concerning betrothal: and therefore a certain bond is contracted there. And because the Church also loves the propriety of chastity in itself, she readily seizes the occasion of not contracting marriage with some person or persons.

§ 9. To the next it must be said that betrothals are like proximate dispositions to marriage: whence, just as matter having a proximate disposition to a certain form is not united to another unless there first occurs in it a corruption of the prior disposition, so too a betrothed person cannot contract marriage with another unless the betrothal is first broken; and this is not broken without sin or just cause, because it creates a certain bond of union.

§ 1. To what is asked further, it must be said that the Church always has sufficient reason when ordaining the bonds of love and proximity. Leviticus holds an argument for this, where it is said that the nakedness of one's relatives is the nakedness of the other; and therefore it is not to be uncovered. And so here, a betrothed woman is in a certain manner made adjoined to the consanguinity; and therefore no one belonging to that consanguinity can have her.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that it is not an injustice: because it pleases God that human beings be federated and confirmed through whatsoever affinities.

§ 3. To the last it must be said that every work of virtue, insofar as it is ordained by law, is a work of justice, which Aristotle calls legal justice. And because this has strength only from the law of the Church, therefore it is more properly called the justice of public propriety than modesty.

Articulus 8 — Whether This Propinquity Has Any Degrees, And Which They Are

Does this proximity have any degrees, and what are they?

Secondly, it is asked whether this proximity has degrees?

And it seems that it does not: because

§ 1. 1. It is weak. Therefore it is preserved only in one person. Therefore it seems that it does not have degrees in other persons.

§ 2. 2. Again, affinity has degrees accidentally—namely, through consanguinity, as was said before; whereas consanguinity has degrees essentially. Therefore, since the proximity of the justice of public propriety is weaker than both, it seems that it has degrees neither essentially nor accidentally. Therefore it has no degrees at all.

To the contrary of this is the fact that:

§ 3. 1. In whatever degree he is through whom this proximity is contracted in betrothal, in that same degree his betrothed seems to be conjoined. But diverse are the degrees of the blood-relations of the one betrothing; therefore they are adjoined to the betrothed woman in diverse degrees.

§ 4. 2. Again, the degree regards the ones contracting the betrothal rather than the contract itself. But those contracting are of diverse degrees in consanguinity; therefore the betrothed woman is also in diverse degrees of the proximity of the justice of public propriety.

§ 5. Response. It must be said that there are diverse degrees of this proximity, just as there are of affinity: because in whatever degree a blood-relation contracting a betrothal is joined, in that same degree the betrothed woman is joined in the justice of public propriety. And for this reason she is prohibited from contracting marriage with anyone of that consanguinity. Whence certain ancient authors used to say that this proximity was an affinity, although in truth it is not an affinity, but almost similar to it.

§ 6. To the first, therefore, it must be said that if the degree were extended from the adjoined person as adjoined, then the objection would be valid; but this is not true, because it possesses only the degrees of consanguinity, and it never changes that degree, but rather changes the genus of relation, just as affinity does.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that it does not follow: because it is a middle term between affinity and consanguinity, agreeing more with affinity, since it agrees with it in that it does not change the degree, but rather the genus of relation; but it agrees with consanguinity in that, in a certain way, it has degrees. Furthermore, the argument is formally invalid: it does not follow that if one thing is weaker than another, it must be weaker in this determinate respect. But it would be valid conversely; thus the fallacy of the consequent occurs.

Articulus 9 — What The Law Is Concerning This Propinquity

What is the rule of law concerning this proximity?

Thirdly, it is asked: What is the rule of law concerning this proximity?

And it is commonly said that a betrothed person cannot become the spouse of anyone belonging to the consanguinity of the one betrothing her, nor conversely can a betrothed man marry anyone of the consanguinity of his betrothed. But then it is asked:

§ 1. 1. Let us suppose that the betrothal was contracted before seven years of age; for then the betrothal is invalid. Therefore, it does not prevent them from being able to be joined to others of their consanguinity if the betrothal is broken.

§ 2. 2. Again, suppose that a eunuch having come of age contracts a betrothal with a woman having come of age, or one who is perpetually frigid, or perpetually bewitched. It is established that this man has an impediment to marriage, and therefore also to betrothal. Therefore, the betrothed woman is not prevented from being validly joined in matrimony to another of his consanguinity.

§ 3. Response. It must be said that the first case is clearly to be conceded. Concerning the second, they say that from such a contract of the betrothed woman an impediment is generated to contracting with another blood-relation of the betrothed man: because there was not yet an impediment in the act of impeding on account of age; and therefore such a betrothed man is separated from the one having an impediment of this sort.

And through this the solution to all questions is evident.

Articulus 10 — Whether And Which Children Are Legitimate

Whether and which offspring are legitimate?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says, there at C, after the beginning: Where their copulation was a marriage, etc. For it is asked here: Which offspring are legitimate? And three things are asked: namely, which offspring are legitimate? Secondly, how are they legitimized? And thirdly, what value does legitimation hold for them?

§ 1. To the first it is commonly said that a legitimate offspring is one who is born from a legitimate marriage, or from one that is reputed legitimate in the face of the Church.

Against this, however, it is objected: For it seems that every offspring is legitimate: because

§ 2. 1. The law of nature is more excellent and stronger than positive law. But by the law of nature every offspring is legitimate. Therefore, etc.

§ 3. 2. Again, let us suppose that they contract marriage in the face of the Church knowing of an impediment, and they keep silent about this. It seems that on account of this their offspring ought not to be called legitimate, because fraud ought to protect no one.

§ 4. 3. Again, let us suppose that they contract secretly, being ignorant of a matrimonial impediment. It seems that their offspring are legitimate, because ignorance excuses, as is held in Genesis , concerning Abimelech who took the wife of Abraham, and excused himself through ignorance; and the Lord accepted his excuse.

§ 5. To this it must be said that, according to the laws, there is a fourfold status of children: namely, natural and legitimate, procreated from a legitimate wife. Others are merely natural, such as the children of concubines who could be wives if they were married. Others are legitimate only, such as adopted children. Others are neither natural nor legitimate, such as spurious children, namely those born from adultery or incest.

§ 1. Therefore, to the first it must be said that nature is twofold, as was said above: namely, of the genus of human beings, and of the specific difference. And children are not commonly born by the law of nature, except in the first sense; and that is animal in nature. And therefore, with regard to the good of a human being, which is the good of reason, they are not reputed legitimate out of that law.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that in that case they are not legitimate.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that such a contract is against the interdict of the Church; and therefore, if one is ignorant, such is reputed an affected ignorance which does not excuse. Thus their children are reputed illegitimate, because neither is the marriage reputed legitimate. Nor is it similar regarding Abimelech: because in his case there was no ignorance of the law, but of fact, because he believed her to be unmarried who was actually married.

Articulus 11 — What The Mode Of Legitimating Is

What is the mode of legitimizing?

Secondly, it is asked concerning the mode of legitimizing: because

§ 1. 1. It is against reason to repute as legitimate what is illegitimate. Therefore it ought not to be done according to the laws, because according to law nothing is done against reason.

§ 2. 2. Again, in acts, an illegitimate act does not become legitimate: because an illegitimate act is vicious, and a legitimate act is ordered by civic virtue. Therefore it ought not to be done in offspring either.

§ 3. 3. Again, it seems to be against the order of nature that nature would ever make legitimate what is illegitimate by the law of nature, or conversely: since it always reputes monsters as defects (sins), and it decorates and adorns what is well-born. Therefore, in civil matters either, the illegitimate ought not to be legitimized.

§ 4. 4. Again, just as there is motion from one of the contraries into the other, both in natures and in motions, so there is the converse. But a legitimate one never becomes illegitimate; therefore conversely, neither ought an illegitimate one to become legitimate.

To the contrary of this is the fact that: § 5. 1. Both according to the canons and according to the laws, illegitimate persons are legitimized.

§ 6. 2. Again, without any fault of the one born, he himself is born illegitimate. But in those things which happen by necessity (according to the Philosopher and the legislators) they merit innocence and mercy. Therefore, such an error can be mercifully corrected. Therefore they can be legitimized.

§ 7. THIS MUST BE CONCEDED, and it must be said that illegitimate persons are legitimized in six ways: two according to the canons, and four according to the civil laws. The first according to the canons is through subsequent marriage contracted with the mother of the illegitimate children. The second, however, is through special indulgence and dispensation of the Lord Pope. And these two ways are contained in Extra, Qui filii sint legitimi, cap. Conquestus est nobis.

§ 8. The first way according to the civil laws is if a father offers his natural son to the court of the Emperor; for then, on account of the dignity of the court, the son is made legitimate, whether the father has legitimate sons or not. The second is if a dying father names him a legitimate heir in his testament, and he himself later presents the testament to the prince desiring to be made legitimate. The third is if, with no legitimate son existing and the father being deceased, the natural son himself offers himself to the prince. These three ways are held in the Authentic: By what ways are natural sons made legitimate heirs? § Quoniam de suis. The fourth way is if the father names him legitimate in a public testament, or with the reception of three testifying men, and does not append the word "natural": for then he is made legitimate, as in the Authentic, Non liceat, etc.

§ 9. To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is not against reason concerning the substance, that is, to make what is legitimate from non-legitimate matter for legitimate acts: but it would be true concerning the form, because a contrary cannot be made from a contrary, but a subject can exist under either of the contraries.

§ 1. To the next it must be said that it is not similar: because such an act is inseparably conjoined to perversity, and therefore can in no way be corrected; but it is not so in subjects.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that in the illegitimate things of nature, there is inseparably either a defect or a superfluity in monsters, and therefore they cannot be corrected. And it is not this way in human offspring, because through acts of the will a defect of natural things can be corrected which is called thus because it is not according to positive law.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that legitimate persons are often punished with the punishment of the illegitimate through disinheritance for the sin of their father or for their own; nevertheless, the argument is invalid, because a legislator is readier to grant indulgences than punishments. But in natural motion a subject holds itself equally to both contraries, and therefore it is moved equally from one into the other, and conversely.

Here it must be said that fornication is one thing... it is asked concerning lust and all its species and daughters.

Articulus 12 — What Does Legitimation Profit

Of what value is legitimation?

Thirdly, it is asked: What does legitimation profit?

It seems, nothing: § 1. 1. For God bestows natural goods equally on natural, legitimate, and spurious offspring alike. Therefore, since human justice is modeled on divine justice, it seems that according to human law they ought to succeed equally in temporal goods and be admitted to legitimate acts.

§ 2. 2. Again, one is treated unjustly to whom that is imputed as a punishment in which he had no fault. But no one ever had a fault in their illegitimate birth. Therefore, it ought not to be imputed to anyone as a punishment: therefore all children ought to succeed their father equally.

§ 3. 3. Again, according to the Philosophers Aristotle and Avicenna, a son going out from his father's house is similar to seed going out from his father's body. But I see that in the egress of seed, the substance of the father equally distributes radical moisture to the natural and legitimate son, upon which the formative power subsequently operates to perfect the substance of the conceived. Therefore, also to a son going out from his father's house, whether he be natural or legitimate, an equal part of the resources ought to be distributed, from which he might operate the management of his own house. Therefore they ought to succeed equally, as it seems.

§ 4. To this it must be said that in truth legitimation profits toward two things. One of them is that he can succeed his father in inheritance by legitimate right. The second, moreover, is that he is admitted to legitimate acts. Natural sons, however, can succeed only to a sixth part; but spurious sons and those born of a damnable intercourse succeed in nothing at all. It will be the concern of the Bishop's solicitude, however, to ensure that both parents procure the necessities for such children according to what their means afford.

§ 5. To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is not in voluntary things as it is in natural things: because natural things run on a necessary course, and therefore they do not possess sin: and thus God operates in nature. And this is not drawn as an example in voluntary things; but rather this which he says: I am the Lord your God, mighty, jealous, visiting, etc. for this is understood of temporal punishment. And so does the law which punishes the birth of one, so that such illicit intercourse might be avoided by another.

§ 1. To the next it must be said that this is not done as a punishment of the son, but as a punishment of the father, so that he may be punished in his son: and yet the punishment is good for the son, if he uses it for humility. As the Apostle also says, 1 Corinthians 7:21: Were you called as a slave? Let it not be a concern to you: but even if you can become free, make use of it instead.

§ 2. To the next it must be said, just as was said before, that the case is not similar between natural and voluntary things: and the cause was assigned above.

Now let us add concerning spiritual relation, etc. Here he says four things about spiritual relation, the first of which is: What is spiritual relation? Second, however: Who are the spiritual children, and in how many sacraments is spiritual relation contracted? Third, he touches upon the law which exists concerning such persons. Fourth is an objection and solution which seems opposed to such matters.

Articulus 1 — Whether There Is Any Spiritual Kinship

Is there any spiritual relation?

Three questions arise here around the beginning: namely, is there any spiritual relation?

The second is: What is spiritual proximity? The third is: Does it impede a marriage to be contracted, and dissolve one already contracted?

§ 1. To the first we proceed thus: 1. Either a union of spirit passes over into a union of flesh, or it does not. If it does: then in all those in whom there is a union of spirit, it passes over to a union of flesh. But between all those possessing charity there is a union of spirit; therefore, between all those possessing charity it passes over to a union of flesh. Therefore, no man possessing charity could copulate with a wife possessing charity, which is false. But if it does not pass over, then spiritual proximity does not impede marriage.

§ 2. 2. Again, as Dionysius says in book II of the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy: A coparent (a spiritual sponsor is not effected for the child here) but the office of a sponsor is the office of imbuing and instructing. Therefore, one holding the office of imbuing and instructing could not be joined in matrimony to a girl whom he teaches and imbues, which again is false. Therefore it seems that there is no spiritual proximity.

§ 3. 3. Again, what makes flesh proximate to flesh is propagation from one flesh. Therefore, where there is no propagation from a single source, there is no proximity. But one spirit with another is not propagated from a certain single source. Therefore there is no proximity in such things.

§ 4. 4. Again, it is established that if spiritual proximity exists, it emanates from some generation, just as every other proximity does. Therefore it is either the case that this generation is according to existence (esse), or according to well-being (bene esse). If in the first way, it is established that this is false: because in this way carnal parents, not spiritual ones, generate their spiritual son. If in the second way: this is either as regards the well-being of virtue, or of knowledge. Not in the first way: because such a habit (as Augustine says) is given by none save God. If in the second way, then any teacher would have a spiritual proximity to his male and female disciples, and this again is false. Therefore it seems that there is no spiritual proximity.

§ 5. To the contrary, however, are: 1. All the things which are said in the Letter.

§ 6. 2. Again, Ephesians 3:14-15: I bow my knees to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, from whom all paternity in heaven and on earth is named. But it is established that paternity in heaven is nothing but spiritual. Therefore, spiritual paternity is something.

§ 7. Response. It must be said that spiritual proximity exists.

§ 8. To the first, therefore, it must be said that the flesh of a human being, especially of a Christian, is not taken merely as the flesh of a human being, but insofar as it is a dwelling-place of the Holy Spirit. And therefore, the bond of the spirit has a place in the flesh; and therefore those who are one are not judged by the Church as divided. But all who are joined in marriage are taken as divided; and therefore it must be said that there is a passing over to a union of flesh—which is or ought to be a dwelling-place of the Holy Spirit—through the union of spirits.

§ 9. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that there is a sacramental union, which is by way of generating spiritual existence or the confirmation thereof, and there is the habitual union of charity. The first union does this, but not the second.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that the sponsor, from the office of godparenthood, does not have merely the voice of a teacher, but also of one operating toward the spiritual existence of the one who is regenerated.

§ 11. To the next it must be said that although a spirit does not come from a spirit, etc., nevertheless, according to the reality and character of the sacrament, it can be brought about ministerially by someone; and thus in a certain way a spiritual proximity is generated, because the existence of the spirit according to the good of the sacrament is in a certain way from a spirit.

§ 12. To the next it must be said that it emanates from a spiritual generation; but that is sacramental, as was said before. And the objection only concerns cooperation toward some well-being by way of alteration, and not through a generating minister, just as generation takes place in the spiritual sacraments.

Articulus 2 — What Spiritual Kinship Or Proximity Is

What is spiritual relation or proximity?

Secondly, it is asked: What is spiritual proximity?

And it is commonly said that spiritual proximity or spiritual relation is a spiritual propinquity arising from the giving of a sacrament, or from holding one for it.

But it seems that this definition is not fitting: because § 1. 1. Through the reception of a sacrament, a person is united to the whole Church, and not specially to one person. Therefore, if he contracts a propinquity, he contracts it to the whole Church, and not specially to one person.

§ 2. 2. Again, in the sacraments man does not operate, but God alone, as Augustine says. Therefore there is no action of man toward man there. But propinquity to a man is not contracted except from some action of a man. Therefore it seems that in the reception of a sacrament no propinquity to a man is contracted.

§ 3. 3. Again, an operation inducing grace in a person is more efficacious than a ministerial operation in a sacrament externally, which does not induce grace. But a prayer that is made for another, as Gregory says, aids predestination by inducing grace in the one for whom it is prayed. Therefore, it is a more efficacious operation than the ministerial operation in a sacrament; but prayer does not induce propinquity. Therefore neither does the operation in a sacrament.

§ 4. 4. Again, spiritual propinquity is either from the vicinity of the essence of one spirit to another spirit, or from the vicinity of the origin of one spirit to the origin of another spirit, or from the vicinity of the consonance of one spirit with another spirit toward a single end. But it is established that it is not in the first way: because the spirit of one is not more neighboring to one according to essence than to another. Nor even in the second way: because the origin of spirit is God, who relates Himself in one way to all spirits. Nor even in the third way: because coparents frequently discord, and one wills one thing, and the other wills another, and one wills good, and the other evil. Therefore it seems that there is no spiritual propinquity between them.

§ 5. 5. Again, those things which are natural occur frequently, as the Philosopher says. Whence, since carnal propinquity is natural, it frequently happens that a son imitates his father. Hence the poet: A son is often accustomed to be similar to his father. But it is established that spiritual grace is more efficacious than nature. Therefore it seems that if there is a spiritual propinquity between some persons, it ought to be manifested at least frequently in spiritual imitation. But none of these things is seen. Therefore there seems to be no spiritual propinquity from the giving of a sacrament.

§ 6. 6. Furthermore, an objection is raised concerning what is said, Or from holding one for it. For the one giving and the one holding operate equivocally toward the perception of the sacrament. Therefore, an equivocal spiritual propinquity is contracted between them and the one receiving the sacrament. Therefore it is badly defined.

§ 7. And it further follows that a baptizer is called the spiritual relative of a child in one sense, and the one holding him up from baptism in another sense: just as urine is called healthy in one sense, and an animal is called healthy in another.

§ 8. Response. It must be said that spiritual relation is fittingly defined by the above definition: because the genus or form is posited there, and the cause on account of which one contracts it acts as the specific difference. For it is a definition stating what a thing is and why it is, as is easily evident to one considering it.

§ 9. To what is objected first, therefore, it must be said that a union is contracted in two ways.

namely by conformity of grace, and by the operation of that conformity. And by conformity of grace, the one receiving the sacrament contracts a union to the whole Church: and this does not make proximity, but likeness. However, by the operation directed to the existence of that grace, he has proximity to the one giving him the sacrament and holding him in it when he perceives the sacrament: and this proximity is as it were of propagated grace: just as carnal kinship is of propagated flesh, although differently in one case and the other: and therefore this induces spiritual proximity.

§ 2. To the other it must be said that God alone operates as the efficient cause, but nevertheless a human being also operates toward grace: just as also in the generation of a human being, a human being does not generate the soul, but by generating he operates toward the soul: and therefore he is made by birth naturally proximate, and similarly there he is made spiritually proximate.

§ 3. To the other it must be said that a falsehood is supposed in the first proposition: because operation in a sacrament is never impeded except per accidens, namely if the one who receives the sacrament is feigning: and even then he is not frustrated from the reception of the sacrament: and therefore when the feigning recedes, it is not restored to him. But a prayer for another for obtaining grace is often impeded. If however no force is made on this point [i.e., if one does not press this point], then it must be said that the operation in a sacrament and through prayer are dissimilar: because the operation in a sacrament is as it were by propagating spiritually in ministry, but the operation of prayer is as it were inductive of another by entreaties: but no operation makes proximity, except that which is a propagation, or joined to propagation.

§ 4. To the other it must be said that a union making proximity is not taken in this way, and does not happen by way of such agreement: but rather just as a principle and what is principled agree, because what is principled has its being from the principle: and so it is here, except that they are not an effective principle, but as it were an instrumental and ministerially operating one: and such a mode of derivation is sometimes followed by agreement, sometimes not: because it is possible for what is principled to be altered after separation from the principle: hence not always is what is drawn forth bodily similar in flesh to the one deriving it: but unless there were alterations, it would be similar. So it is here: because he has the substance of sacramental grace from those very ones operating in ministry, and he would be similar, unless on both sides alterations of affections made a dissimilarity: hence this similarity would be in habit, if it were perfected and manifested in the conformity of wills and a single end.

§ 5. To the other it must be said that the alteration of affections on either side impedes conformity, not in the efficacy of grace.

§ 6. To that which is further objected, it must be said that all operations in the reception of the sacraments agree in one common thing, namely that they operate in ministry: and as to this there is a single reason of spiritual kinship.

Articulus 3 — Whether Spiritual Proximity Impedes The Contracting Of Marriage

Does spiritual proximity impede the contracting of marriage?

§ 7. Thirdly it is asked, Does it impede the contracting of marriage and dissolve a contracted one?

§ 8. Now it seems that it does not: because 1. Where there are more bonds of friendship and fellowship, there is greater indivisibility of life: but spiritual kinship unites spirits, and marriage binds bodies: therefore in such a marriage there would be greater indivisibility: therefore this is better than otherwise, and sorts a better outcome, and they remain together more delightfully: therefore it ought not to impede marriage.

§ 9. 2. Also, Marriage consists in both unions, namely of spirits and of bodies: therefore what cooperates toward the union of spirits, promotes marriage: but spiritual kinship promotes toward the union of spirits: therefore it promotes marriage: therefore it ought not to be posited as an impediment.

§ 10. 3. Also, All the goods of marriage between such persons are preserved, namely faith, offspring, sacrament: therefore it seems that it does not impede, but expedites.

§ 11. ON THE CONTRARY to this are all the things that are said in the Text.

§ 12. Response. It must be said that it impedes the contracting of marriage, and dissolves a contracted one, just as the Text says: because it does not please God that the spiritual union which is between such persons be reputed as non-union: for those who are united in marriage are reputed as distant: and looking to this, the Church established that that impediment have force, especially since civil law also on account of adoption forbids coming together in marriage.

§ 13. Furthermore, This is against the order of nature, that a shoot that ascends from some root should again be united to the root to propagate another: but spiritual propagation is no less worthy than carnal: and therefore the Church established both kinships to be an impediment.

§ 14. To the first therefore it must be said that this argument is not valid: because if this were attended to in marriage, then a son ought to take his mother, which is absurd: but in marriage what is attended to is the conjunction of those who are distant, so that a fleeing degree may again be reunited, and the covenant of the human race may remain, and civil urbanity in such persons thus conjoined.

§ 15. And through this the solution to the following is also evident.

§ 16. To the other it must be said that this suffices, but it is necessary that they be legitimate persons for contracting, as has often been held above.

Articulus 4 — How Many Species Of Spiritual Kinship There Are

How many are the species of spiritual kinship?

§ 17. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, A, at the end: "There is also between the carnal and spiritual children of the same man."

§ 18. And it is asked here, How many are the species of spiritual kinship?

§ 19. Now it seems that there are only two: because 1. He makes mention of these only in the Text, namely between the one receiving and the one received in baptism, and between the carnal and spiritual children of the one receiving.

§ 20. 2. Now it seems that there is only one: because those not communicating in spirit, do not communicate that communication even in consequence: but a carnal father receiving, and his carnal son, do not communicate in spirit as regards the ministerial operation in the sacrament, when the carnal father receives a spiritual son: therefore they do not communicate that spiritual operation even in consequence, which is spiritual kinship: therefore there is no kinship between carnal and spiritual children.

§ 21. 3. Also, If it is said that there is a spiritual kinship between them: it is certain that it would not be according to one degree, but two, or the trunk and a degree: but this has never been heard from the Saints, that they determine degrees in such kinship: therefore it seems that there is no spiritual kinship between carnal and spiritual children.

§ 22. 4. FURTHERMORE, It seems that there are three, namely compaternity, paternity, and spiritual fraternity: because this is commonly said by all who know: and also these are gathered from the Text.

§ 23. 5. Also, By the same reason by which the son of a spiritual father contracts fraternity, the father of a spiritual son also contracts compaternity: therefore necessarily there will be three.

§ 24. 6. FURTHERMORE, It seems that there are four: because the spiritual vicinity to a spiritual one is not less than the carnal to a spiritual one, but greater: but the carnal children of a spiritual father contract spiritual kinship with a spiritual son: therefore much more do the spiritual children of the same man have spiritual kinship with all the spiritual ones: therefore all the spiritual children of the same man are spiritual brothers among themselves: but this genus is not determined in the Text: therefore there are four species of spiritual kinship.

§ 25. 7. Also, The propagation of flesh from one makes carnal kinship among the propagated: but the propagation of spirit from one is better: therefore the propagation of spirit from one makes spiritual kinship among all those spiritually propagated: therefore as before, there seem to be four species of spiritual kinship.

§ 26. Solution. It must be said that there is only a threefold species of spiritual kinship, namely paternity, compaternity, and confraternity.

§ 27. Paternity is contracted in two ways, namely directly, and indirectly. Directly through a proper act, which is done in giving the sacrament, or holding the one receiving it. Indirectly, however, when it is contracted not by a proper act, but by the act of that one with whom one is one flesh, just as when a husband receives someone, this reception makes him a spiritual father directly: and because a husband and wife after they are made one flesh, communicate their actions to each other, therefore what the husband does directly, passes indirectly to the wife, and she too is made a spiritual mother. But I say, "after they are made one flesh": because if the husband before he was the husband of the wife, namely before the contract of marriage, or after the contract before carnal copulation, were to receive someone in a sacrament, it would not pass to the wife: and therefore she would not be made a spiritual mother. Just as I have said, however, that because the husband directly and the wife indirectly are made spiritual parents, so it is conversely when the woman directly, and the man indirectly.

§ 28. But compaternity is contracted between the carnal father and the spiritual one, and between the carnal mother and the spiritual one: hence the verse:

"One will always be the spiritual of the coparents, The other the carnal: nor does such a rule fail."

§ 29. And it is contracted in two ways, namely directly and indirectly, just as spiritual paternity also: because after a man and a woman are made one flesh, they communicate their children to each other.

§ 30. But confraternity is not contracted, except between the boy and girl, who is received or held in the sacrament, and the carnal children of the one receiving, whether they are born before or after: and it does not pass to the brothers or sisters of the one who receives the sacrament, whether they are born before, or born after: for all those, if no other impediment stands in the way, can licitly be joined to the brothers and sisters of the one to whom the sacrament is given, or who is held in the sacrament, as will be said below in the Text.

§ 31. THESE THINGS BEING HELD, one must respond to the objections, saying to the first, that for contracting kinship it is not necessary to communicate in the act mediating which it is contracted. And there is an instance [i.e., a counter-example]: because a first son does not communicate with the father in the generation of a second: and yet because the second is derived from the same one from whom the first took his origin, therefore the second is made over [i.e., related to] the first. Similarly I do not communicate with my brother in the act of generation: and yet his son is made related to me in the second degree through the relation of me and my brother to the trunk from whence we descend. Similarly also it is here in the proposed case: because through relation from the same one from whom the former descend carnally, and the latter spiritually, they are made spiritual brothers.

§ 32. To the other it must be said that degrees in this kinship are not distinguished for this reason, that it never is distant except in the first degree, which is between brothers: for between the trunk and the first degree there is no distance of degree. But a coparent has no distance of degree either to the father or to the boy received in the sacrament: because to the carnal father he stands as the trunk, and to the boy as to that which emanates immediately from the trunk: but the boy to the carnal or spiritual children of the father stands as brothers who are in the first degree, nor is it ever derived further.

§ 33. To the two following it must be conceded outright.

§ 34. To that which is further concluded, that there are four species, it must be said to the first that it is well conceded that spiritual kinship is greater as to dignity than carnal, but as to dependence upon one it is not so: hence in a kinship propagated to another, it is always necessary that carnal kinship be present, as is evident when spiritual [kinship] is propagated to the carnal children of the one receiving in the sacrament, and to the parents of the one received: and this is for this reason, because spirit cannot be propagated from spirit, but rather flesh from flesh. Hence since between the spiritual children of the one giving the sacrament or holding [the child] in it, and the one held in the sacrament, there is no conjunction of the propagation of flesh, there will be no spiritual kinship between them. For it is certain that direct [kinship] is not present: and indirect cannot be without a carnal dependence: and thus this kinship does not pass to spiritual children.

§ 35. To the other it must be said that through the same the solution is evident.

Articulus 5 — By The Mediation Of Which Sacraments This Spiritual Kinship Is Contracted

By means of which sacraments is this spiritual kinship contracted?

By means of which sacraments is this spiritual kinship contracted?

§ 36. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, B, "Spiritual children, etc."

§ 37. And it is asked here, By means of which sacraments is this spiritual kinship contracted?

§ 38. Now it seems that 1. Through the preaching of the Gospel: because the Apostle says, I Corinthians 4:15: "In Christ Jesus through the Gospel I have begotten you." And, to the Galatians 4:19: "My little children, of whom I am in labor again, until Christ be formed in you." But in spiritual generation spiritual kinship is contracted. Therefore a preacher has spiritual kinship with those to whom he has preached.

§ 39. 2. Furthermore, It seems that in penance: because Pope Symmachus says in the Text: "All whom we receive in penance, etc."

§ 40. Also, In a letter of Pope Sylvester it is written: "All whom we receive in penance, etc."

§ 41. 3. Also, From the Text it is held that in catechism, because this is said here in the Text.

§ 42. Also, 30, quaest. 1, more things are held concerning this.

§ 43. Also, Catechism by instructing generates to faith: therefore it causes spiritual kinship to be contracted.

§ 44. 4. Now it seems that in all the sacraments: because in any sacrament whatsoever the minister operates toward the spiritual generation of the one receiving the sacrament: but such an operation causes such a spiritual kinship to be contracted: therefore anyone operating toward the reception of whatever sacrament contracts spiritual kinship with the recipient.

§ 45. Response. It must be said that concerning this there have been various opinions among different people. For some have said that such kinship is contracted in all the sacramentals of baptism, namely catechization, exorcization, the immixture of salt, and the like. But because it relies on no reason, since baptism is the first sacrament and the door of the sacraments, and nothing of the antecedents regenerates a human being, others say otherwise, namely that three sacraments alone make spiritual kinship, namely catechism, baptism, and confirmation: but these are the Decretists, because they call catechism a sacrament, which in no way is true, because before baptism there is no sacrament: and if a Saint calls it a sacrament, sacrament is posited for a sacramental.

§ 46. Therefore it must be said that only two sacraments make spiritual kinship, namely baptism and confirmation. And the reason for this can be elicited from what was noted above concerning those sacraments: because one imprints a character distinguishing one to faith into the lot of the Lord: and the second the strength of the same character; and therefore they make generation and the completion of the one generated spiritually, and therefore they make spiritual kinship.

§ 47. But if it is asked concerning Orders, since it imprints a character, why does it not make [it]? It must be said that there are two reasons why it itself does not make [it]. One is, because it does not imprint the character of faith, but rather of excellence and prelacy: and that does not regenerate. The other is, because it is not given except to men: and therefore it can procreate no impediment to marriage, since no one receives another in that sacrament itself.

§ 48. But concerning the Eucharist and extreme unction it is self-evident, that they imprint no character, nor can they procreate any impediment to marriage from the mode of their reception.

§ 49. But to the first it must be said that a word, as Aristotle intends, has only a persuasive virtue; and therefore it does not regenerate , but only disposes toward this: but in a sacramental operation there is grace from the very work worked (ex ipso opere operato).

§ 50. Through this also the solution to the following is evident.

§ 51. To the other it must be said that penance draws its strength more from the devotion of the penitent, than of the priest: and therefore it does not imprint a character. And what is said in the Text, it must be said that they ought not to contract: but nevertheless if they have contracted, the marriage will stand.

§ 52. To the other it must be said that catechism is not completed except in baptism, and therefore it does not impede except existing with baptism. And through this the solution of the Text is evident.

§ 53. Nevertheless the Decretists say otherwise thus, that baptism and confirmation impede and dissolve, but the kinship which is from catechism is so exiguous and weak, that it scarcely impedes contracting, and does not dissolve a contracted one. But the first solution is truer: because it has reason, and saves the Text.

Articulus 6 — Which Godmothers And Which Godfathers Can Marry

Which godmothers and godfathers can contract?

§ 54. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, B, after the beginning: "But that a godfather and godmother cannot be joined to each other, etc."

§ 55. For it seems false: 1. For let it be that some woman is the godmother of some woman from her son, or from that one's: and afterwards she contracts with a man having nothing in common with either of them: afterwards his wife dies, and he takes her whose godmother she herself was. Laws say that the marriage stands, and yet this man had two godmothers.

§ 56. 2. Also, Let it be that someone takes a pregnant wife from another man: and afterwards she gives birth after she has been known by her second husband, and another woman receives that boy in the sacrament. Laws say that, his [wife] having died, he can marry the godmother of her who thus was made a godmother. And the same is if she gave birth after consent about the present, and before carnal copulation.

§ 57. Response. It must be said that the laws determine well and reasonably: because spouses do not communicate their acts to each other except in that in which they are one flesh, and after they are, as was said concerning indirect compaternity. And the truth of this question is in these verses:

"She who lifted from the font my child or the child of her who is mine, This my godmother cannot become my wife. If any woman lifted from the font a child of my wife not from me, I shall not be forbidden to have her after the fates of my [wife]."

Articulus 7 — What Adoption Is

What is adoption?

§ 58. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, D, "But that spiritual or adoptive children, etc."

§ 59. And here a question is posited concerning spiritual kinship. And because adoption falls into its definition, therefore let us ask six things concerning adoption. The first is, What is adoption? The second, What and how many are the species of adoption? The third, Who can adopt? The fourth, Who can be adopted? The fifth, What is the effect of adoption? The sixth, How many and what are the species of the adopted having kinship among themselves?

§ 60. But around the legal kinship itself we will ask two things, namely what it is, and how it impedes marriage, and how not?

§ 61. And thus there are eight things in total which are asked concerning this.

§ 62. To the first of these it is proceeded thus: It is commonly said that adoption is the legitimate assumption of an extraneous person into a son or grandson, or so on.

§ 63. But it seems that it is not always of an extraneous person: because 1. A non-extraneous person has greater right in the inheritance: therefore that one ought rather to be adopted.

§ 64. 2. Also, Proximity of nature makes degrees in the order of charity: therefore much more in the order of adoption: therefore it seems that a non-extraneous person ought more to be adopted, than an extraneous one.

§ 65. 3. Also, Some right in the inheritance as to succession is given to proximates: therefore without their injury an extraneous person cannot be introduced into the inheritance in whole or in part: therefore adoption is not always of an extraneous person.

§ 66. FURTHERMORE it is asked, Why does he say, "Into a son, or grandson"?

§ 67. 1. Because it is certain that the adopted does not differ by degree from the adopter: therefore anyone is adopted into a son, and no one into a grandson.

§ 68. 2. Also, It is one adoption making a son from an extraneous person who is maximally distant: therefore since from the maximally distant there is made by adoption nothing distant, for the reason that between a father and son there is no distance, it seems that there are no degrees in it: therefore nothing is said [when it is said], "Into a son, or grandson, or so on."

§ 69. Response. To this it must be said that adoption was introduced for the solace of lost children. And because it happens that grandsons and great-grandsons and so on are also lost, therefore for their solace also the adoption of grandsons and so on was introduced.

§ 70. And through this the solution to the last two brought in is evident.

§ 71. But to the first it must be said that adoption makes a successor from one not conjoined by the right of succession: and therefore it is necessary that it be an extraneous person, because otherwise he would have some right, namely of consanguinity, in the inheritance to be perceived.

§ 72. To the other it must be said that it is not similar: because charity perfects nature, and therefore it conducts any degree to the proper effect of charity: but adoption was introduced into solace as it were of nature in that part by which it has to be perpetuated, lest the name of someone from his posterity be deleted: and therefore it is not founded upon successors, but extraneous persons.

§ 73. To the other it must be said that a husband as long as he is in the power of his own goods, with the consent of his wife and the prince, can ordain concerning his goods what he has willed: and therefore proximates cannot impede adoption.

Articulus 8 — How Many Species Of Adoption There Are

How many are the species of adoption?

§ 74. Secondly it is asked, What and how many are the species of adoption?

§ 75. And it is commonly said that they are two, namely arrogation, and simple adoption. But arrogation is adoption made by the authority of the prince concerning him who is of his own right (sui juris), either by the death of the natural father, or by emancipation by which he passes into the power of the adopter. But simple adoption is adoption made by the authority of a magistrate concerning him who is not of his own right, nor does he pass into the power of the adopter. Hence the verse:

"I arrogate him who is his own, and it is necessary that he be mine. I adopt the 'his' of a father, and he does not cease to be the father's."

§ 76. But against this it is objected: because 1. Arrogation seems to be against the order of nature: because nature never calls back into the imperfect that which it perfects in being and capability (posse): therefore neither ought the civil [order] to do this: but one who is his own is perfect in his own governance, but one who is not his own is imperfect: therefore from his own order of right he can be made not his own: therefore arrogation through which this happens is against the order of natural right.

§ 77. 2. Similarly it is objected concerning simple adoption: for every son is his father's: therefore also an adopted son is his adopting father's: therefore when he is adopted, he himself ceases to be his natural father's, and begins to be the adopter's: and this is contrary to what the induced definition says here.

§ 78. 3. Furthermore, It seems that there are more species of adoption: because one who is not his own can by the consent of the natural father pass into the 'his own' of the adopter: and this species is not touched upon here: therefore the species are insufficiently assigned.

§ 79. FURTHERMORE it is asked, Whether adoption is said univocally of those two species?

§ 80. And it seems that it is not: because 1. One retains the name of the genus, for the reason that it adds nothing to the genus: but the other adds something: but such things never participate their genus univocally: therefore neither do these.

§ 81. 2. Also, When simple adoption is said, it seems to be intimated by simplicity that it has nothing common except a simple nature: but arrogation has more: therefore it is not said univocally of them.

§ 82. On the contrary is, that 1. In both a son is made from a non-son: but this is the reason of adoption: therefore by one reason it is said of both species of adoption.

§ 83. 2. Also, They do not differ except materially, because being emancipated, or being a son-in-power (filiusfamilias), are accidental differences: but a difference by accident is matter; therefore these two species are material, as it seems.

§ 84. Response. It must be said that the definitions introduced are very good, and in them are contained the agreements and differences of the two species of adoption: and anyone can plainly see this.

§ 85. Therefore it must be said to the first, that one and the same thing cannot be perfect and imperfect according to the same respect according to nature, nor even according to civil matters: but in nature indeed the adopted is perfect, but in the right of succeeding in other goods he is imperfect: and as to this he passes into the power of the adopting father.

§ 86. To the other it must be said that the 'his own' of a carnal father can be the 'his own' adopted of an adopting father, because he cannot be in the power of two, and therefore he does not pass into the power of the adopter.

§ 87. To the other it must be said that there are not more. But to the objection it must be said that when this does not happen, then the natural father emancipates him from his power: and then it is the species which is called arrogation.

§ 88. To the other it must be said that just as the two prior reasons prove, adoption is said by prior and posterior of arrogation and simple adoption.

§ 89. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the reason of the genus is in both species: but in one nothing is added to it, namely in simple adoption: but in the other a difference is added: and therefore the latter more strongly participates the being of adoption, than the other.

§ 90. To the other it must be said that in natural things they are accidents: nevertheless according as civil rights fall upon them, they are made substantial differences: and therefore civilly speaking they are species of adoption.

Articulus 9 — Who Can Adopt

Who can adopt?

§ 91. Thirdly it is asked, Who can adopt?

§ 92. And it is commonly said that three things are required for someone to be able to adopt, namely, that he be 'his own', that is, existing in his own right (sui juris), and capable of generating, and having an age beyond twenty years. And concerning the first indeed there is no doubt, but concerning the second.

§ 93. 1. For if adoption is in solace of children: and one not capable of generating is more destitute from the impossibility of offspring, than one capable of generating, it seems that adoption ought more to be conceded to one not capable of generating, than to one capable of generating.

§ 94. 2. Also, In children is the succession of the nature of the father and of inheritance: but both these are deprived from him who cannot generate: therefore to that one more than to others it ought to be conceded that he adopt.

§ 95. 3. FURTHERMORE, It is asked concerning the third member, namely having an age beyond twenty years.

§ 96. Now it seems that in the eighteenth year adoption ought to be done: because then he can generate naturally therefore also adopt.

§ 97. 4. Also, Being able to adopt follows upon being able to generate: therefore also time to time: but the time of generation is in the fourteenth year: therefore also the time of adoption.

§ 98. Furthermore it is asked, Whether a woman can adopt?

§ 99. It seems that she can: because a woman is saddened in the desolation of children: but adoption is conceded to such in solace: therefore also to a woman it ought to be conceded.

§ 100. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. A woman is never perfectly of her own right, but in the power of her husband: therefore she can never adopt.

§ 101. 2. Also, She never generates actively, but only passively: therefore she cannot adopt either, unless perhaps by helping her husband.

§ 102. Response. It must be said that those three things which are posited, are required: hence a slave who is not his own cannot adopt, nor one existing in the power of tutors, nor a son-in-power.

§ 103. To the first therefore it must be said that the extreme kind of unhappiness (as Boethius intends) is to have once been happy: and therefore one who is incapable of generating is not rendered destitute just as he who is bereft of some son, or does not have them: and therefore it is conceded to the latter [those bereft] what is not to the former, because in the former the very impossibility diminishes the desire for children.

§ 104. To the other it must be said that although both are deprived in him who cannot generate, nevertheless there is no anxiety of desire, because anxious desire is not except for a possible thing.

§ 105. To the other it must be said that although in the fourteenth year generation is possible, it is not however perfect and stable, but rather in the twenty-first year, as the Philosophers say.

§ 106. To the other it must be said that it can plainly be conceded concerning perfect and stable offspring, in which the succession of inheritance and nature can stand.

§ 107. To that which is further asked, it must be said that a woman cannot adopt, except in one case, namely, by a rescript of the prince and in solace of lost children.

§ 108. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that those two reasons sufficiently prove that in herself a woman is not sufficient, but there is a supplement from the rescript and dispensation of the prince.

Articulus 10 — Whether Anyone Whatsoever Can Be Adopted

Can anyone be adopted?

§ 109. Fourthly it is asked, Who can be adopted?

§ 110. And it is commonly said that a male and a female minor in age than the adopter, by as much as [a child] could be his natural son.

§ 111. Now it seems that this is nothing because, 1. As was said, someone can adopt when he is major than twenty years: but perfect adoption is arrogation: therefore then he can arrogate: but no one can be arrogated, except one who is of his own right: therefore then he can arrogate him who is of his own right: but that one is twenty-five or more years according to the laws: therefore he who is twenty years can adopt him who is twenty-five or more years: therefore a minor in age can adopt a major in age.

§ 112. 2. Also, It seems that a female cannot be adopted: because adoption is given in solace of children, or to him who has few or no children: but, as the Philosopher says, a female is a misbegotten male, not finally intended by nature: therefore the solace of posterity is not in a female: therefore she cannot be adopted, as it seems.

§ 113. Response. It must be said that the aforesaid persons can be adopted in the aforesaid mode.

§ 114. But to the first objection it must be said that no one except a major in age can adopt: hence one who is twenty-one years old cannot arrogate someone major in age: and if he arrogates someone, it is necessary that it be a boy whose father, already defunct, according to custom has made him to be his own, when he was of the years ...

thirteen or fourteen: because then by custom they are said to be of their own right, whose father has died.

To the other it must be said that although a female is not intended by a particular nature, she is nevertheless intended by universal nature: and therefore adoption can be made of her.

Articulus 11 — What The Effect Of Adoption Is

What is the effect of adoption?

Fifthly, it is asked: What is the effect of adoption?

And it seems that the effect is different in simple adoption and adrogation: because one simply adopted does not succeed the adopting father, unless insofar as he determines, or even in nothing: but one adrogated succeeds an intestate [father] in all things, just like a natural son: but if the adoptive father emancipates him, he is bound to assign him a fourth part of all his goods. Similarly, if he dies making a will, he is bound to leave him a fourth part: and this is because an adrogated person yields into the power of the adrogator with his non-emancipated sons and grandsons, but not one adopted by simple adoption.

But against this it is objected for the first part: because § 1. Simple adoption ought to be worth something to the adopted: therefore by reason of adoption he is bound to leave him something.

§ 2. Also, as the Apostle says, 2 Corinthians 12:14, parents ought to lay up treasure for their children: but this adoptive father is a father: therefore he is bound to lay up treasure for the adopted son: therefore he is bound to leave him something of his goods.

§ 3. Furthermore, it is asked by reason of the other part: because it seems unjust that an adrogated person succeeds an intestate in all things. For there is a great difference between a natural and legitimate son, and one adopted by adrogation: but a natural and legitimate son has no more, except that he succeeds in all things from an intestate: therefore one adopted by adrogation has less: therefore it seems that he ought not to succeed in all things.

§ 4. Also there is a question, why a fourth is given to him if he is emancipated or the adopting father dies making a will?

Response. It must be said to the first, that simple adoption has the least that can be of the being and rationale of adoption, and it is not contracted under the genus of adoption in common by a specific difference, but by a mode, as was said before: and therefore it is rather a disposition to perfect adoption than perfect adoption: and therefore the adopting father is not perfectly obligated to him, because he never passed into his power, so that he might make him as his own. But it is true that it is equity and civility that he leave something to him: and he has this from the effect of adoption.

To the other it must be said, that he is not yet a father perfectly, since this one is not his own: and therefore by strict law he is not bound to lay up treasure for him.

To the other it must be said, that the adopted has from good pleasure what the other has from nature: for nothing prevents good pleasure from confirming for someone in the right of succession, what another has from the fact that he was born to it: and the latter somehow has it by a stronger right, because a natural one, than the former: and this is the difference between natural and adoptive filiation in this case.

To the last it must be said, that a fourth is given to him in common: because one [fourth] yields to himself, and one to his wife, and one to blood relations or a natural son, and then a fourth remains which is given to the adrogated. And because this division of goods is more common and general, therefore the law places in a fourth the things that are to be given to the adrogated.

Articulus 12 — How Many Are The Species Of Adopted Persons

How many species of adopted persons are there?

How many species of adopted persons are there?

§ 64. Sixthly it is asked, What and how many are the species of adopted persons?

§ 65. And it seems that there are three, namely of descendants, of collaterals, and of those legally joined. The species of descendants is considered between the adopter and the adopted as son or grandson, and so forth. That of those coming collaterally is considered between a natural son and an adopted daughter, or conversely between a natural daughter and an adopted son. But legal affinity is said to be considered between the wife of the adopter and the adopted, or conversely between the wife of the adopted son or grandson and the adopting father.

§ 66. But against this it is objected thus: 1. The propinquity of descendants cannot be except through the affection of the adopter and the adopted: but these are not to be derived to the flesh: therefore it seems that there is no propinquity of the flesh between them.

§ 67. 2. Likewise, Just as there is a line of descendants, so also there is one of ascendants: therefore it seems that there ought to be more of one line than is determined.

§ 68. 3. Likewise, There seems to be no cognation between those coming collaterally: because it is certain that there is no affinity of the flesh there: similarly children do not communicate with parents in the acts of the soul and exterior acts: therefore from the fact that someone adopts someone, no propinquity is contracted between the adopted and the son of the adopter.

§ 69. 4. Furthermore it is objected concerning the third: because a man and woman are not one, except in those things which pertain to matrimony: but adoption is not of those: therefore it seems that no propinquity is contracted from the fact that someone is adopted, between the adopted and the wife of the adopter, or conversely.

§ 70. Furthermore it is asked, whether this affinity passes further into the father, and mother, and brothers, and sisters, and so forth, of the adopter and the adopted? If so: then there will be degrees in adoption just as in generation, which seems inconvenient, since adoption is much less than carnal consanguinity. But if it is said that it does not, that seems inconvenient, since it passes to the wife by mode of affinity, and not to cognates, because cognation is greater than affinity.

§ 71. Response. It must be said that there are three lines of adoption, as was said, and sufficiently explained at the beginning.

§ 72. Therefore to that which is first objected, it seems it must be said, that adoption is on account of the succession of the flesh, and therefore it looks to the posterity of the flesh, and posits propinquity to it: but if it were only in the spirit, then what is objected could be valid.

§ 73. To the next it must be said, that adoption does not exit the house of the adopter and the adopted, as will be said below: and therefore in those who constitute the house, such as the wife of the adopter or the adopted, it contracts a perpetual propinquity. But those coming collaterally, because they are only for a time in the house, do not have anything but a temporal cognation, namely as long as the adopted and natural son remain in the house of the adopter: and therefore it does not ascend.

§ 74. To the next it must be said, that cognation is as long as they are indistinct from the adopting father: because then they are in a certain way one, and communicate with him in acts: because they do not have their own acts, but existing in his house they are moved at his nod.

§ 75. To the next it must be said, that just as it is in spiritual cognation, that the man and woman communicate their acts to each other after they have been made one flesh, so it is in adoption, both active and passive. Hence it is false that it is only in those things which are of matrimony that the man and woman communicate their acts to each other, but they communicate them to each other also in other things: however adoption in a certain way looks to matrimony, because the adoption of children in a certain way pertains to the good of offspring.

§ 76. To the last the solution is clear through the things said before, because it does not pass further: and the reason for that has already been said before.

Articulus 13 — What Legal Kinship Is

What is legal cognation?

§ 78. Seventhly it is asked, What is legal cognation?

§ 79. And they say that legal cognation is a certain proximity proceeding from adoption.

§ 80. But it seems that this definition is bad: because 1. Every proximity by accident is rooted in some per se proximity, just as an accidental cause is reduced to a per se one, as the Philosophers say: but this is not rooted in any per se proximity: therefore it is not a proximity.

§ 81. 2. Besides, why does it say "a certain" (quaedam)? For a particular sign does not define, but consignifies when it is partitioned: therefore it ought not to be posited in a definition.

§ 82. 3. Likewise, A particular sign wishes to stand for a part: but a definition ought to contain essential parts only: therefore it is badly posited in the definition.

§ 83. But the other things which could be objected concerning the following part have already been objected in the preceding problem.

§ 84. Response. It must be said that that propinquity is rooted in a per se propinquity, which is natural in collaterals, and affinity in legal affinity, also in the line of descendants is founded on the carnal, not which is, but it was introduced as a solace for it on account of the privation or paucity of natural children: and such a reduction suffices in positive things.

§ 85. And through this the solution to the first is clear.

§ 86. To the next it must be said, that it is not a definition, but a description: or let it be said that the word quaedam does not compel the term to stand for an individual part, but for a species taken under this common thing which is proximity: and this which is added, "proceeding from adoption," states the cause which supposes the what, and states the why.

§ 87. And through this the solution to the following is also clear.

Articulus 14 — How Legal Kinship Impedes Marriage

How does legal cognation impede matrimony?

§ 89. Eighthly it is asked, How does it impede matrimony?

§ 90. And it is commonly said that in the first and third line the impediment is perpetual: but in the middle one, which is of those coming from the side, it does not impede except as long as the natural son and the adopted daughter or niece are in the power of the natural and adopting father: for when this is dissolved by death or emancipation, the impediment is also dissolved.

§ 91. Similarly only he who is adopted and those who are annexed to him, as son, and wife, and niece, and so forth, are made cognates of those who are in the power of the adopter, and not of others.

§ 92. But it seems that this right is irrational: because 1. Since God does not accept these persons, it seems that the Church ought not to approve these laws.

§ 93. 2. Likewise, the greater the covenant, the firmer the friendship: but the covenant would be greater if the adopted son were to marry the natural daughter, than that it should not be lawful for him to marry her: therefore it seems that this ought to be established for the sake of the firmness of friendship.

§ 94. Solution. It must be said that the laws will it thus, as was said, and the canons confirm it.

§ 95. Therefore to the first which is to the contrary, it must be said that God by inspiration conceded many things to the Church to be promulgated for a time, which He Himself did not promulgate: because the state of the primitive Church could not suffer such things, since at that time persons were joined according to diverse rites, and God willed all to be gathered into one Church, and to make the approach to the faith difficult for no one. But afterwards many persons were prohibited, when the faith was confirmed, as much in the degrees of consanguinity as of affinity and of spiritual and legal cognation.

§ 96. To the next it must be said, that any covenant with another through something proper has a contrariety, such as to be a son and to be joined to the daughter: because no one is joined to the daughter except a stranger: and so is this impediment. And according to the order of nature we see that things proceeding from one proceed by separating themselves, but distant things returning to one proceed by conjoining themselves: and the laws imitate this order, because the natural son and the adopted daughter proceed as it were from one: and therefore they ought to go separating: and it is thus also in the other two lines.

Articulus 15 — Whether Those Begotten Before Or After Co-Parenthood Are Illegitimate, Or Only Those In Co-Parenthood

Are those born before compaternity or after illegitimate, or only in compaternity?

Whether those born before or after spiritual kinship are illegitimate, or only in spiritual kinship?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, E, "However, some wish to understand this," etc.

For it is asked, What is true concerning these opinions?

For it seems that all born before and after are illegitimate for contracting: because

1. They are one flesh from whom they descended: therefore, just as one is illegitimate, so also the other.
2. But it seems that only those born later: because before them the father was not joined to the spiritual child: therefore, kinship could not pass to them, but only to those born later.

Response. It must be said that no one is illegitimate, except the one through whom spiritual kinship is contracted: and to him, both previously and subsequently born, is illegitimate: and all other opinions of the ancients which were on this matter are abrogated.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is true concerning him with whom paternity is contracted, and not concerning another brother or sister of his.

To the second, it must be said that spiritual kinship cannot pass to a non-brother: however, he who is not received in the sacrament is not a spiritual child: therefore, not a brother of the children: therefore, not a spiritual brother: and thus he can provide no impediment in marriage.

Articulus 16 — How Many Ought There To Be In The Reception Of A Child; And Whether One Not Baptized Can Sponsor One Baptized, And One Not Confirmed One Confirmed

How many ought to be in the reception of a child? And, Can one not baptized receive one baptized, and one not confirmed receive one confirmed?

How many ought to be in the reception of a child? And, Can one not baptized receive one baptized, and one not confirmed receive one confirmed?

Then it must be discussed concerning what is said there, H, It is also customary to ask, If a wife with her husband, etc.

For it is asked here, How many ought to be in the reception of a child?

And it seems that one alone; because 1. Dionysius says that there was one alone as sponsor in the primitive Church, who received the child for baptism, who pledged sacred confessions and renunciations for the child.

1. Likewise, Pope Leo established the same, as it is held, in De Consecratione, dist. 4: Let not more approach to receive the infant from baptism than one, whether man or woman. The same should be done in confirmation.

On the contrary, however, is 1. Almost the entire custom of the Church.

1. Likewise, Because when the husband receives, the co-maternity passes to the wife: therefore if she also receives, she is made co-mother twice, which is superfluity and an injury to the sacrament: therefore husband and wife ought not to receive together.

Likewise, it is further asked, Whether one not baptized can receive another in baptism, or one not confirmed in confirmation?

And it seems that yes: because one not baptized can have faith and grace through the baptism of water: therefore he can be a sponsor for another to receive baptism.

On the contrary of this is what is said, in De Consecratione, dist. 4, where the Council of Mainz thus prescribes: In baptism or chrismation, one who is not baptized or confirmed cannot receive another as a godchild.

But I remain, that he receives, and it is asked, Whether spiritual kinship is contracted?

It seems that yes: because

1. God approves all that is done for the reconciliation of men: therefore also this.
2. Likewise, Just as baptism only removes sins: so it seems that sacramentals have place equally before and after baptism: as it is evident in marriage, which remains before and after baptism: therefore it seems that it is contracted.

On the contrary of this is that 1. Baptism is the gate: therefore before it there is no entrance into anything spiritual.

1. Likewise, Dionysius objects thus in the theory of baptism: Just as in natures one cannot operate who has not yet subsisted through generation: so in sacramentals and divine things nothing operates, to whom it is not given to subsist spiritually through the sacrament of regeneration: to operate something spiritual is to receive from baptism and to contract spiritual kinship: therefore one who is not baptized cannot do this.

But then further I posit one spouse to be baptized, and the other not baptized, and the baptized one receives someone as a godchild. And it is asked, Whether spiritual kinship passes to the remaining one who is not baptized?

And it seems that yes: because he is made one flesh with him: therefore they communicate their acts to each other: therefore co-paternity passes to the other.

On the contrary of this is that he does not have the foundation and gate of the sacraments: therefore nothing adheres to him from the sacraments or sacramentals: but spiritual kinship is something of the sacramentals.

Therefore spiritual kinship does not pass to him.

Further it is asked, Whether it is lawful for all indiscriminately to receive godchildren in the sacrament?

However, it seems that not: because it is said, in De Consecratione, dist. 4, from the council of Auxerre: It is not lawful for an abbot or monk to receive godchildren from baptism, nor to have co-mothers.

Likewise, From the book of chapters: Let monks not make themselves co-fathers or co-mothers, nor kiss women.

On the contrary of this is that it is theirs to instruct in the creed and the Lord's prayer, who are especially instructed: but such are monks and religious: therefore it is theirs to instruct others: but this is the office of godparents: therefore monks and religious can be godparents. That this is the office of godparents is proved by Augustine in a certain sermon after the Lord's Easter, which begins thus, The present day: in which he says thus: I admonish you above all, both men and women, who have received children in baptism, that you recognize yourselves to have stood as sponsors of faith before God for those whom you have been seen to receive from the sacred font. Therefore always admonish them to keep chastity, love justice, hold charity: above all, hold the creed and the Lord's prayer, and show them to those whom you have received from the sacred font.

But from this it further seems that it is not lawful for women to receive anyone from baptism: because, as the Apostle says, 1 Timothy 2:12, it is not permitted for a woman to teach in the Church, but the office of godparents is to teach, as is proved from the word of Augustine introduced, and from the theory of baptism, and the last chapter of the ecclesiastical hierarchy.

Response. It must be said to this that is first asked, that one holding suffices, especially in confirmation: but also in baptism this suffices and is safe: and if there are more, this is rather permission than a statute that ought to be approved: it is permitted, however, by reason of the friendship that ought to be contracted among such.

To the other it must be said, that husband and wife ought not to receive the same godchild together. But if it happens, then it does not follow that co-maternity is contracted twice, but rather spiritual kinship is contracted for different reasons, namely directly and indirectly, and this is not inconvenient.

To what is further asked, it must be said that one who is not baptized cannot receive.

To what is objected against, it must be said that although he may have faith and grace, yet he does not have it as a Christian, but as disposed towards it: and therefore he cannot rightly teach a Christian.

To what is further asked, it must be said that no kinship or co-paternity is contracted.

To what is objected, it must be said that God approves things done in order and according to the rule of law, since He is the highest order ordaining all things, as Augustine says. But no order permits that in matters of faith a non-Christian should instruct a Christian.

To the other it must be said, that baptism does not dissolve good things found, but evil things: but yet it establishes all good things: and therefore in one not baptized as such, nothing of good things is established.

To what is further asked, it must be said that spiritual kinship does not pass.

To the objection against, it must be said that although they are one flesh, yet the communication of spiritual acts does not pass: because there is no foundation in him but there is also another as to the foundation of marriage, the person is not sufficiently legitimate, nor is the marriage sufficiently ratified among such, as was evident from the above said.

To what is further asked, it must be said that it is not lawful for religious, in my judgment, to receive godchildren, lest too much familiarity be generated between them and women, dissolving their religion, as the decrees of the Fathers say.

To the objection against, it must be said that it is one thing to be instructed and able to instruct from the habit of knowledge, and another from the office of pastoral care. In the first way, monks are sometimes more instructed: but in the second way they ought not to instruct, unless clerics to whom it is committed.

To what is objected concerning women, it must be said that they can receive: because their instruction is by way of exhortation, and not from office or authority: and this same is not granted to religious, lest they have occasion for wandering.

Articulus 17 — Whether Second Marriages Are A Sacrament

Whether second marriages are a sacrament?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, I, It must also be known, that not only first, or second marriages, etc.

And two things are inquired.
The first is, Whether second marriages are a sacrament?
The second is introduced by reason of all preceding impediments, namely whether a marriage contracted against the prohibition of the Church should be dissolved?

To the first, it is objected thus:
1. A sacrament is a sign of a sacred thing: therefore, what fails in signifying, fails in the name and reason of a sacrament: but second marriages do not signify, therefore they do not have the name and reason of a sacrament. The sign of marriage is, that there is one unique both in spirit and in incarnate person, as was evident above: and this is not preserved in second marriages, as was evident above in the question of bigamy.

1. Likewise, Every sacrament is made by the blessing of priests: but, as it is said in the Letter from the words of Ambrose, second marriages are not made by the blessing of priests: therefore second marriages are not a sacrament.
2. Likewise, Every sacrament is instituted by the Lord, as was proven above in the common treatise on sacraments; but second marriages are not instituted by the Lord, as it is said in the Letter: therefore second marriages are not a sacrament.
3. Likewise, In certain animals it is said there is such chastity, that they do not couple a second time, as in the turtledove: therefore much more should this be in man, since chastity according to the Philosopher is a good of nature: but nothing existing against nature is a sacrament: therefore second marriages are not a sacrament.

4. Likewise, No sacrament is a sin: but second marriages, as it is said in the Letter, are something for which man is punished: therefore they are not a sacrament.

On the contrary of this is everything that is said in the Letter. And the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 7:39: If her husband sleeps, and, 1 Timothy 5:14: she is freed. Whom she wills to marry, only in the Lord I wish. Therefore second marriages are a good: and it is evident, that they are only a good of the sacrament: second marriages are a sacrament.

Response. It must be said, that they are a sacrament, but not of so perfect a signification.

And through this the solution to the first is evident.

To the other it must be said, that there is a twofold blessing, namely that which is done in the face of the Church, and that which pertains to solemnity. However, second marriages have the first: because they are contracted in the face of the Church with the priests approving. However, they do not have the second: because they are a sign of concupiscence, to whose sign it is not fitting for priests to be present.

To the other it must be said, that divine institution in sacraments is of the substance of the sacrament, and not of the mode: however, second marriages are a certain mode of the sacrament: and therefore marriages are not instituted insofar as they are first or second, but simply: and this suffices for first and second, and thereafter marriages.

To the other it must be said, that this is fitting for those animals by reason of species, and not of genus: and therefore it is not necessary that it be fitting for man: because man and horse desire coitus more than others: and therefore more is given to man as a remedy: although chastity is a good of reason, nevertheless chastity is not cast aside by marriage, but rather is kept holy and pure in it.

To the other it must be said, that second marriage is not punished by direct penalty: but bigamy is followed by irregularity from the defect of the sign, as was sufficiently explained above in the question of bigamy.

Articulus 18 — Whether A Marriage Contracted Against The Interdict Of The Church Ought To Be Separated

Whether a marriage contracted against the interdiction of the Church should be separated?

Secondly, it is asked concerning a marriage contracted against the interdiction of the Church, whether it should be separated?

It seems that it should: because

1. As Augustine says on that passage of the Psalms, "The sparrow has found a house for itself," wherever someone places the offspring of works, unless in the nest of the Church, they are trampled: the interdiction of the Church is outside the nest of the Church: therefore it ought to be trampled and considered as nothing.

1. Likewise, "He who despises you, despises me," as it is said in Luke 10:16: but he who despises the interdiction despises the prelate of the Church: therefore he despises God: but nothing is valid that is done with contempt of God: therefore such a marriage is not valid.
2. Likewise, every sacrament consists in the dispensation of the ministers of the Church: therefore from the destruction of the consequent, that which does not consist in the dispensation of the ministers is not a sacrament: but that which is done against the edict of the ministers does not consist in the dispensation of the ministers: therefore it is not a sacrament.

On the contrary, it is said that only consent makes a marriage, as was held above, and that can even be interdicted: therefore it makes a marriage: therefore it is not to be separated.

Response. As it is established in the general council, as it is said in the Decretals, concerning marriage, those contracting against the interdiction of the Church are not to be separated unless perhaps for a time so that they may perform penance for disobedience, unless they have some other legitimate impediment, on account of which they ought not to remain together. And therefore it is instituted that priests before the contract should pronounce such a marriage: so that if anyone wishes to say something, they may. And a priest who does not pronounce, but joins otherwise, ought to be suspended from office for three years. However, one who maliciously pronounces something against those to be joined, on account of penance for sin, ought to undergo canonical punishment.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the offspring are not outside the nest: because they are in the form of the Church and faith, although there may be excess in morals among such, which ought to be punished and corrected by penance: especially since Augustine says that even sacraments given by heretics in the form of the Church are in the nest of the Church and hold.

To the other, it must be said that such do not despise the substantial form of the sacrament, but something concerning the sacrament, such as time or manner, which are not substantial to the sacrament, but accidental.

To the third, it must be said, as shown above, that this sacrament does not consist entirely in the dispensation of the ministers: and therefore it can be effected without them, but it ought to be publicly declared by them to the people.

And let these things said about marriage suffice.

DISTINCTIO XLIII

Divisio Textus

Finally, concerning the condition of the resurrection, etc. This is the part concerning the sacraments, in which the signified effect is touched upon, and not caused or contained by them, namely concerning the glory of the resurrected, for whose sake finally is added concerning the punishment of the wicked, and judgment.

The Master, however, divides the distinction into two; in the first of which he touches upon the state of the resurrected. In the second, he deals with judgment, which begins in distinction XLVII.

Likewise, the former is divided into two. In the first, he deals with the circumstances surrounding the resurrection in some reasoning of causality. In the second, concerning the resurrected themselves according to the quantity and quality of their bodies: and this begins in distinction XLIV.

This distinction is divided into two: namely into the treatise concerning the cause, and the treatise concerning doubts about the cause, and it begins there, "D, Here it is asked whether for the elect," etc.

Likewise, in the first he places two parts: for in the first chapter it is proven by authorities that there will be a resurrection: and in the second, he touches upon the cause.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Resurrection Of The Dead Will At Some Time Occur

Whether the resurrection of the dead will at some time be future?

Questions are asked before the Letter, namely: First, Whether there will be a resurrection? Second, What is resurrection? And third, Whether it is natural or miraculous?

To the first, it is objected by authorities and reasons.

Besides those which are in the Letter, three are more express.

The first is Daniel 12:2: "Many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." For indeed, since none sleep in the dust of the earth except the dead, it is evident that it speaks of the dead. But if it were also granted that someone sleeps in the dust, it is evident that no one awakes to everlasting life unless a resurrection is to be future.

The second is more express, Ezekiel 37:4 and following, where it says thus: "Dry bones, hear the word of the Lord. Thus says the Lord God to these bones: Behold, I will cause breath to enter you, and you shall live," etc., up to "for I am the Lord."

The third is most express, Job 19:24: "I know that my Redeemer lives," etc.

Besides the aforementioned, there are arguments of the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 15:3 and following.

And they are three in number. The first is from the efficient cause, as the Gloss says: namely, that Christ has risen: therefore the dead shall rise: or if the dead do not rise, Christ has not risen. And it is founded on this, that the cause being posited in act, the effect is posited in the same way as the effect is, namely, in the future or in the present. In the present indeed, as if a builder in act is building, his building is. In the future, however, as if the order of the sun's motion in the oblique circle is, which cuts the equinoctial, there will be an equinox at two points of intersection. Thus Christ's resurrection is the cause of our resurrection according to the Gloss.

The second is founded on this, that falsehood is not subject to faith: and therefore he says, "If the dead do not rise, your faith is in vain which believes this": but it is impossible for faith to be in vain, since falsehood is not subject to faith, as is clear in Hebrews 11:1, where it is said to be the argument of things not seen. It is, however, an argument, as John the Bishop says, as a principle, and it is of immovable truth.

The third is from the truth of preaching: because if the dead do not rise, the preaching of the Apostles is in vain, because they are found false witnesses: therefore everything they said about Christ is suspect, which is inconvenient, since the thing preached has had proof through miracles, and authority from the voice of the Father and the testimony of John, and many others, as five testimonies are read in John 1:19 and following, which give strength to the doctrine of the Gospel.

The fourth is assumed from the life of the Saints: because they are more miserable than all men, if the dead do not rise: because they are hoping only in this life in Christ, in which the good have nothing but struggle and tribulation, as the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 15:32: "I fought with beasts at Ephesus (according to man)." And this reason is founded on providence: because as Boethius says in the book of the Consolation of Philosophy, "Providence does not govern the world by chance." It is unjust that he who suffers for His name in this life should not be rewarded: therefore it is necessary that another life be manifested in such through resurrection.

The fifth reason of the Apostle, Ephesians 2:1 and following, is from the works of nature: because if nature can make something from the dead in a certain respect, alive simply and does, much more is it to be believed that God can do this: but in nature what is sown is not quickened unless it first dies: and it dies, and is quickened: therefore God also quickens that which is sown dead. And concerning this, Damascene says thus: "If blindness does not permit belief in the words of the Lord, at least it will believe in the works. For what you sow is not quickened unless it first dies: and what you sow, you do not sow the body that shall be, but bare grain, perhaps of wheat, or of some other seeds. But God gives it a body as He wills. Consider in the furrows as if you had buried seeds covered: who imposes roots and stalk and leaves, and the most subtle stems on them? Is it not He who is the creator of all, who constructed all by command? So similarly believe that the resurrection of the dead will be by divine will and command: for it has power concurrent with will."

The sixth reason of the Apostle is taken from the difference of the nature of man to other animals, which are not in the image of God. Hence, just as the soul is capable of the image of God and immortality of itself, so it influences the body with a certain order of power to attain the state of immortality. And he hints at this when he says: "Not all flesh is the same flesh." And this has two branches.

One concludes from the difference of man to lower beings: the second from the convenience of man with higher beings. And he first posits saying that not all flesh is the same, but one indeed of men, another of beasts, another of birds, another of fish. And it is to be formed thus: The diversity of matter according to nature is caused by the difference of form, but beasts, birds, fish, and men differ according to the nature of matter which is flesh: therefore that is caused by the difference of form which is the soul: just as therefore to the mortal soul drawn from the potentiality of matter, a mortal body only corresponds through conjunction: so to the immortal soul not drawn from matter, but coming from outside, a body having an order to immortality through resurrection corresponds, although it dies through sin.

Another branch is hinted at when he says: "There are celestial bodies, and terrestrial bodies," etc. And it is founded on the saying of the Philosopher: because Plato says that according to the merit of matter, form is infused by the giver of forms: heaven, itself in nature approaches the nature of heaven: but the form of heaven, as the mover of heaven, is intelligence, of which a certain likeness is the intellectual soul in us: therefore the body of which it is the perfection, approaches the nature of heaven, although it differs from it by some difference: since therefore heaven, as Boethius says in the book on the Trinity, is an immortal body remaining, the body of man not remaining, but rising again, ought to attain immortality.

And these are the reasons of the Apostle and they are good.

He also induces the faith of witnesses over the resurrection of Christ, because He rose on the third day according to the Scriptures: and because He was seen by Cephas, and after this by the eleven: then He was seen by more than five hundred brethren at once, of whom many remain until now, but some have fallen asleep: then He was seen by James, then by all the Apostles: lastly, as to one untimely born, He was seen also by me.

Damascene, however, adduces some of these, like the penultimate, and some of his own in the book IV of the Orthodox Faith, in the last chapter.

He goes by four ways to prove.

And the first is from the authority of Scripture, and he induces that which is Genesis 9:5: "I will require your lifeblood; from every beast I will require it, and from man, from his fellow man I will require the life of man." How will He require the blood of man from the hand of all beasts, unless because He will resurrect the bodies of dead men?

The second is from the New Testament, Matthew 22:32: "I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob: He is not the God of the dead, but of the living."

The third he adduces, John 5:28 and 29: "The hour is coming, in which all who are in the graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God: and shall come forth, those who have done good, to the resurrection of life: and those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment."

The second way is from the works of the Lord: because by raising certain dead, He proved that He will raise all by the power of His divinity. And these are the words: "How would the resurrection of the dead be known or believed, unless by signs of individual properties, from which that was evident? But He raised Lazarus indeed to show His own divinity and the belief of His resurrection and ours."

The third way is through the order of justice and divine providence, and this way induces three inconveniences over denying the resurrection. The first is concerning justice and providence, which orders each nature according to the degree of its dignity. The second is concerning providence governing more worthily in nature in greater good, than less worthily. The third is concerning justice and providence rendering to each according to merits. And these are the words: "If there is no resurrection, in what do we differ from the irrational? If there is no resurrection, let us bless the rustic life without sadness. If there is no resurrection, neither is there God, nor providence, but all things are done by chance: for we see many just ones hungry, and suffering injury in the present life, having no protection: but sinners and unjust ones, abounding in riches and all pleasure. But who ever, who is wise, would think this the work of just judgment and wise providence? Therefore there will be, there will be a resurrection: for God is just, and He becomes the rewarder of those who endure with Him."

But because someone might respond that providence and justice are preserved: and this when the unjust are punished in the soul, and the just are rewarded in the soul, although the body does not rise. Damascene objects against this saying thus: "If indeed the soul alone fought in the contests of virtue, it alone will be crowned: and if it alone was involved in pleasures, it alone will be justly punished. But because it neither subsisted separated, nor did it perform virtue, nor malice without the body, rightly both together will enjoy retributions."

The fourth way is from the works of nature, concerning seeds, which above from his words and the Apostle's were posited.

The Apostle places two other ways of proving the resurrection, Romans 8:18 and following: one of which is from the expectation of creation. And it is founded on this, that nothing vain is instilled by God into nature: but the desire of the revelation of another state which is fitting to glory is instilled into nature by God: therefore it is not vain: therefore that state will be revealed: but it cannot be revealed except through resurrection: therefore there will be a resurrection: and this the Apostle intends, Romans 8:19, when he says: "The expectation of creation awaits the revelation," etc., up to "the sons of God awaited from the bondage of corruption."

The second way is from the groaning of those having the firstfruits of the Spirit: because the Holy Spirit does not cause the Saints to groan for something, unless it is to be acquired: but the Saints groan for the glory of the resurrection: therefore they will have it. And this he intends when he says, ibid., v. 23: "Not only that, but we ourselves who have the firstfruits of the Spirit," etc.

These then are the ways by which the Saints have proved the resurrection.

But so that there may be something of ours there, we will object to the same thus:

1. Every mover according to nature has some mobile proportioned to its power of moving: the rational soul is a mover according to nature: therefore it has a mobile proportioned to itself according to the power of moving: but the power of moving in the rational soul is to perpetual motion: therefore the mobile must be proportioned by something to perpetual motion: and this cannot be done in it according to this state: therefore this will be according to another state given to it by the power of the first cause: and this we call resurrection. The major of this reasoning is written above XI of the first Philosophy, in the commentary where the Commentator says that movers are proportioned to mobiles.
2. Likewise, it is supposed in II of the Heavens and the World, where Aristotle solves why the lower spheres have only one star, and the eighth many: and he says that this is because of the proportion of the power of the movers to the mobile. The second is proved from this, that the rational soul is the mover of the body, and alone is separated as perpetual from the corruptible, as the Philosopher says in II of the Soul.
3. Likewise, whatever things differ from each other according to degrees of nature, and also differ in acts consequent to those degrees according to nature: vegetative and sensitive things differ from each other in degrees, as is evident to anyone by itself: therefore they will differ in acts consequent to those degrees according to nature: it is evident, however, that the vegetative is the principle of life without sense and motion, but the sensitive with sense and motion: therefore the rational will be the principle of intellectual life with some incorruption, because those acts follow these differences: but it does not happen to attain incorruption according to this state: therefore it happens to rise to another state.
4. Likewise, whatever perfection of something is separated from it according to two or three works, and it operates in the perfect one of those works, it will also operate...

all other things in the same according to some state: the rational soul is the perfection of man, separate according to that which is understanding, willing, and incorruptible being. Therefore, if it operates something in man [like] understanding and willing, it will also in some state operate incorruptible living in the same [subject]. But it is established that it operates understanding without any organ of the body, and also willing sometimes. Therefore, it will operate incorruptible living, and it cannot do so except through the resurrection. Therefore, the resurrection will be.

§ 5. Also, "living in living things is being," as the Philosopher says, and sensing in sentient things: therefore also understanding in intelligent things, because the reasoning is the same. But it is plain that the being of living and sentient things is according to the period of the vegetative and sensible soul. Therefore, the being of intelligent things will be in some way according to the measure of the rational soul. But it is perpetual. Therefore, it infuses a potency for some perpetuity, and this cannot happen except through the resurrection, since it has once been lost. Therefore, the resurrection will be, as it seems.

§ 6. Also, a stronger objection is made by another way, which the Philosopher hints at in the first book of the Ethics: because there is some good of man insofar as he is man. For it is established that this, as he himself says, does not belong to man according to the vegetative and sensible [soul], but according to reason. From this I object thus: Every good proportioned to some species is perceivable by that species according to the perfect nature of that species; but some good is proportioned to the human species: therefore, according to its perfect nature it is perceivable by it. But the perfect nature of the human species is in the conjoined body and soul. Therefore, man will perceive some good in the body conjoined with the soul. But that good is eternal beatitude or happiness, as Boethius proves in the book The Consolation of Philosophy. Therefore, he will perceive it with body and soul, and he cannot do so except through the resurrection. Therefore, the resurrection will be.

§ 7. Also, whatever species according to some power of its nature is capable of perceiving some good, the same is capable of perceiving the highest in that good. But man through his rational power is capable of perceiving the good of the rational soul, as is held by the Philosopher in the Ethics. Therefore, he is capable of perceiving the highest good according to the same [power]. But the highest good of the rational soul is to be continuous through intellect and will to the first mover, as the Commentator says upon the XIth book of First Philosophy [Metaphysics]. Therefore, man will perceive that. But it is established that the nature of the human species is not the soul alone: therefore, the soul alone does not perceive that. Therefore, the body must be united to the soul through the resurrection.

Perhaps Gregory was attending to these objections when he said in the Morals: "If we attended to the works of nature, the future resurrection would be more certain to us than that the sun will rise tomorrow."

§ 8. Therefore, this part being supposed, let us proceed to the contrary in this way.

§ 1. Job 14:7 et seq., it is said thus: "A tree hath hope: if it be cut, it groweth green again, and the boughs thereof sprout. If its root be old in the earth, and its stock be dead in the dust, at the scent of water it shall spring, and bring forth leaves, as when it was first planted. But man when he shall be dead, and stripped, and consumed, I pray you, where is he?" Here he makes a comparison of the death of man to the twofold destruction of wood, namely cutting down, to which the accidental death of man is similar, and putrefaction, to which natural death that comes through old age is similar. And he seems to say what the Philosopher had also said, that to wood destroyed in either way its life and youth returns, but to man never. Therefore, he will not rise again.

§ 2. Also, in the same place, vv. 11 and 12: "As if the waters should depart out of the sea, and an emptied river should be dried up: so man, when he is fallen asleep, shall not rise again, till the heavens be broken, he shall not awake, nor rise up out of his sleep." Therefore, just as it is impossible for the waters of the sea to return if they have receded from the sea, and for emptied rivers to flow again, and for the heaven to be worn down, so it is impossible for man to rise up from the sleep of death. But that it is impossible for the heaven to be worn down according to substance and motion, is supposed by the sayings of the Philosophers, and we disputed concerning this in II Sentences, where treating of the eternity of the world and motion: let it be sought there.

But you should know that in that authority of Job two heresies are rooted concerning the resurrection, of which one is of the Jews, namely of Rabbi Nasse, who composed the Talmud, who says that Job did not believe in the resurrection and denied it. And since he also says that Job was never a [historical] man, but Moses fashioned Job as an exemplar for a form and example of living, it amounts to this that Moses did not believe in the resurrection, and denied it in that place.

Another is the heresy of the Philosophers who say that there is no resurrection, such that the identical man in number should rise, namely of a similar complexion. For just as the sea, as the Philosophers say, is changed from place to place according to the mutation of the spaces by which the images of the signs in the motion of the firmament are moved—that is, of the eighth heaven—and in thirty-six thousand years they return to the first state according to Ptolemy and Aristotle in the book On the Causes of the Properties of the Elements; and then they cause things similar to those first created on earth, and the sea returns to its first channel, and the rivers flow as before. And this some Philosophers called the first great year, and half of it the great year of one habitation, namely eighteen thousand years, in which the axis of the sun is moved in the northern signs with respect to the habitation which is now inhabited. And then that will be destroyed, and it will be the year of southern habitation for eighteen thousand years, in which the axis of the sun will run through the southern signs. And Empedocles seems to have posited this, who said that all things in that great year go out of the mixture, and all things in the great year return to it. All of which the Church rejects: and we shall make a special tractate against all this, but yet touching upon it we shall solve what suffices for this work.

§ 3. Returning, however, now we object further through that [passage] of Psalm 1:5: "The impious shall not rise again in judgment." But the reasoning is the same regarding sinners with respect to nature and justice rendering punishments, and regarding the good with respect to nature and justice rendering rewards. Therefore, it seems that no one will rise again.

§ 4. Also, the argument of the Apostle does not seem to be valid: because a grain falling into the earth being sown does not die, except according to the being of a grain, but it lives according to the generative and formative [power] which forms in it the plant, grass, leaves, and such like. But man dies entirely.

§ 5. Also, further, the argument of the Lord does not seem to be valid: because it does not follow, if He is not the God of the dead, but of the living, that because of this Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob live, except in the soul only. And then it does not necessarily follow from this that the resurrection will be.

§ 6. But by reason it is objected thus: Of whatever things the causes are perpetual, the caused itself must necessarily be perpetual. But all the causes of generation and corruption are perpetual: therefore it is necessary that generation and corruption be perpetual. The first is clear from the definition of a cause. The second is proved in II On Generation and Corruption by Aristotle. For the efficient cause is the motion of the sun in the oblique circle. But the material is unfailing, since the generation of one is the corruption of another, and conversely. For thus generation will never stand still: for water is generated from air, and air again from water: and thus it is circular and unfailing.

And since everything participates in divine being always as much as it can, thence with generation and corruption running thus the state of resurrection will never begin, as the Saints say. But generation and corruption will run forever, as the Philosophers say: therefore, there will never be a resurrection.

§ 7. Also, the Philosopher in II On Generation and Corruption, at the end: "Whatever things have corporeal substance, being moved they are not reiterated identically in number." Man is a corporeal substance: therefore, having been corrupted he is not reiterated identically in number. But the resurrection is identically in number: if therefore it will not be in number, there will not be a resurrection. But it will not be identically in number, as has been proved. Therefore, there will not be a resurrection.

Response. It must be said to this, that it is more certain for us according to Catholic faith that the resurrection of the flesh identically in number in which we now live is future, and that everyone will receive in the same [flesh] good and bad things according to what they merited, than that the sun will rise tomorrow. For that the sun will rise will sometime fail, namely on the last day, when it will stand still. But that [the resurrection] is accepted from divine truth, which does not fail, nor has it failed, nor can it deceive nor be deceived.

Therefore, we concede the arguments first brought forward: for although reason does not suffice for accepting this without revelation, nevertheless once accepted it strives to confirm it, and refutes the contrary. Thus it is also in all the articles of the creed.

But to that which is first objected to the contrary, it must be said that Job did not intend to deny the resurrection, but indeed to assert that man will not rise from an intrinsic seminal power, just as in a plant there remains a seminent power, through which its life and youth returns to it, as the Philosopher says. And this indeed he does in the first part.

But in the second part he intends to assert that he will not rise by the moving rays of the images of the stars, but by divine power alone, which wears down the heaven and all the reason of heaven and the vigor which it has in moving to generation. For since there are two moving causes in generation, namely proximate ones which are in matter, and universal ones which are in the stars and their images, which they describe in heaven, Job denies that the resurrection will be by moving causes of this sort. Whence after that place, in chapter 19:25, he says: "I know that my Redeemer liveth." And Rabbi Nasse did not attend to this when he said Job denied the resurrection.

But to that which is objected concerning the heresy of the Philosophers, it must be said that it is folly: because if what they say is true, I show that not even then will there be anything of similar complexion: because the Philosophers say that a sign without a planet in causing is like a body without a soul, imperfect. But it is established to all who know the motions of the superior [bodies] that the eighth sphere returning to the same point from where it began, the planets are not reverted to the same place from where they themselves began. Therefore, nothing similar to the prior will be caused. And let this suffice for the present, because that error has a special difficulty.

To the next it must be said that the resurrection is aptly called a changing to the form of glory: and it is true that in this way [the impious] will not rise, because they will fall into eternal death.

To the next it must be said that nothing in nature is totally similar to the miracles of God: because otherwise nature could do as much as God could. But the Apostle argues from the lesser: because if weak and feeble nature can restore a nobler life to what is dead in a certain respect, much more can the creator of men do this to the human body, which is united to a soul marked to His image.

To the next it must be said that the Lord argues most subtly: because if the soul lives, which is substantially the form of the body, it is necessary that it itself be truly unible to the body. Therefore, since God leaves nothing imperfect, because, as Moses says, "the works of God are perfect," He Himself will unite it to an indissoluble body: and this will be in the resurrection.

To the next it must be said that generation and corruption, compared to proximate causes, have the character of perpetuity: and the Philosopher attended only to this, because through philosophy he could not know the higher cause. But it is the will of God, which is the cause of all causes, by which it will stand still, when God wills. And an argument of this sort is found disputed upon the second book of Sentences.

To the next it must be said that the Philosopher speaks there of the substance of the matter of the elements, from whose forms there remains no relation to the same form in number, because it itself is destroyed: and of those it is true what he says. But in the corruption of man there remains a relation to the same form remaining in number, because that body is associated with the soul: and therefore the man who dies will revert identically in number.

Articulus 2 — What Resurrection Is

What is the resurrection?

Secondly it is asked, What is the resurrection?

But Augustine says upon Genesis literally "Resurrection is nothing else than restitution into a consimilar life."

But Damascene in the book On the Orthodox Faith "Resurrection is the second uprising of that which fell." And a little after: "Resurrection is the copulation again of soul and body: and the second uprising of that which was dissolved and fell, of the animal."

But against the first it is objected thus: § 1. Consimilar life: it is either similar to the life before sin according to the state of innocence, or similar to this [life] according to the state of penalty and fault. If in the first way: therefore that life will need foods and mingling of sex, which is against the Lord in the Gospel saying that in the resurrection "they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, etc." If in the second way: therefore the future life will be in penalties of hunger, thirst, and such like, which is absurd. Therefore, the resurrection is not a restitution into a consimilar life.

§ 2. Also, Augustine upon Genesis says thus: "The return to that which we sense, we call rising again." But we already sense labors and miseries, and before sin we sensed an animal life. Therefore the return through the resurrection will be to such a thing: therefore no resurrection will be glorious.

§ 3. Also Augustine in book IV of The Trinity: "To rise again is nothing else than to revivify, and to return from death to life." And from this follows the same thing as before.

But from all these things it is concluded, since as much in the first state as in the second there was a life with the potency of dying, that in the future resurrection there will be the potency of dying, which is false.

IT IS OBJECTED moreover concerning that which is of Damascene, because: § 1. It is not a "second" resurrection, unless a first has preceded: but first the body of man never rose before the day of judgment is. Therefore, neither then will it rise secondly. Therefore, he says badly, "second resurrection."

§ 2. Also, "second" does not denote number and order, except of acts of the same kind. But the elevation of the body of man to this life, and its elevation to the form of glory, are not of the same kind. Therefore, the body will not rise secondly then.

§ 3. Also, according to the Philosopher in VI Topics: If some common thing is found in the definition and the defined, that is neither part of the definition nor of the defined. But "surrection" is commonly found in the definition and the defined: therefore it is part of neither. Therefore, the whole of what Damascene says in both of his definitions does not explain anything except the habitude of the preposition which is in the composite, when it is called "re-surrection".

Also, it is objected concerning the second, because "what is dissolved" seems to say the same thing as "what fell": therefore, the definition seems to have a nugatory repetition.

§ 4. Also, the definition of resurrection ought to convene to every resurrection: but this definition does not convene to the resurrection of the Lord, because His body was not dissolved: therefore, it is not general, nor good, as it seems. But that it does not convene to the resurrection of the Lord is clear through what Damascene says: "phthora, that is, the name of corruption signifies two things: for it signifies passions of this sort, hunger, thirst, labor, the piercing of nails, death, that is, the separation of the soul from the body, and whatever are such. According to this signification we call the body of the Lord phtharton, that is, corruptible. For all these things He voluntarily assumed. It also signifies phthora, that is, corruption, the perfect dissolution and destruction of the body into those elements (from which it is composed), which is rather called and named corruption by many. The body of the Lord did not have experience of this, as the Prophet David says: Because Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, nor wilt Thou give Thy holy one to see diaphthoran, that is, corruption."

§ 5. Also, it is objected concerning this that he says, "of the animal." For he ought rather to have said "of man" than "of the animal": because that which will rise has it from that which is man, and not from that which is animal.

§ 6. Also, according to all these definitions man will not rise, but only the body, as it seems: when nevertheless to rise again is the proper act of man, and not of a part of man.

Against which Damascene seems to speak, thus: "Mortal animals exist." And below it is clear how they will rise: "The very body which is corrupted and dissolved, the same will rise." Therefore, it seems that to rise again is not of man, but only of the body, which is not man.

§ 7. Also, he seems to have had to say the contrary: because an action is rather of the agent than of the patient. But the soul will act the resurrection by perfecting and moving the body: therefore, the soul will rather rise, than the body: and thus Damascene speaks and defines resurrection badly.

SOLUTION. It must be said that all these definitions are good enough: but Augustine, speaking of the resurrection, accepted all words commonly and not strictly. And to understand this, it must be known that resurrection is spoken of in two ways, namely commonly and properly. Commonly taken, resurrection contains under itself a relation to the state of glory, and to the state of animal life, just as we say Lazarus rose again: and in this way we do not seek its definition here. Properly it is taken exactly as it divides with resuscitation this common thing which is to be restored to an extinguished life: and thus it does not pertain to resurrection except to an inextinguishable life, whether it be in penalties or in glory.

To that therefore which is first objected, it must be said that if we wish to concede that Augustine is speaking strictly of resurrection, a consimilar life is spoken of in the species and truth of human life, although it differs from this [life] and from that which was in the state of innocence, in state and property.

To the next it must be said that "to sense" in the word of Augustine is put for to experience with respect to the substantials of human life: because we will experience the same things also in the resurrection: because otherwise we would not rise again: and it is not called "to sense" to suffer the same things through the senses which we suffer now.

To the next it must be said that there is no return from death to life perfectly unless life perfectly conquers death: and this is not except when every cause of natural death is excluded, which is the combat of contraries: and in this way there will not be a resurrection, except after the course of the world in the end of times.

To the next it must be said that there are two elevations of corporeal matter. One to the form which is the rational soul: and this happens in generation. And another of the same to the indissolubly reunited soul: and this is called regeneration. Matthew 19:28: In the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit, etc. And therefore it is false that there are not two surrections of the body of man there.

To the next it must be said that it is not necessary that those things of which the word "second" denotes an iteration be of the same accident, but only that they be of the same kind: just as when I drink a second time, it is not necessary that the second drink be similar to the first in accident. And so it is of the twofold life to which the body rises, that it is of the same species, and not of the same accident.

To the next it must be said that that which Aristotle says is understood of those things which are assumed in the same way in the definition and the defined: just as if I were to say, a white man is a white rational animal. But it is not so: for when "re-surrection" is said, "surrection" says the habitude of the body to receiving the soul, and the preposition denotes the iteration of the surrection. But in the definition it denotes the terminus of the motion of resurrection: because resurrection is a motion, and is defined through two termini, of which one is the fall and dissolution, but the other is the altitude of immortal life in the good and the bad commonly. And that is imported through the word "surrection" posited in the definition: because it is compounded from "upward" and "I erect", due to the fact that it is a decompounded figure.

To the next it must be said that that definition does not convene to the resurrection of the Lord. And he himself gives another in the same chapter which convenes to the resurrection of the Lord, saying thus: "The resurrection of the Lord is the union of the holy and incorrupt body and the soul."

To the next it must be said that "of the animal" [animalis] is there an adjective, and is the genitive of that which is said hic and haec animalis, and hoc animale: and it says the condition of the body falling into death. And the sense is, "of the animal," that is, of the animally living body, which fell through death, and was dissolved through incineration.

To the next it must be said that the resurrection is of man according to the body: and this Damascene intends to say, and not something else.

To the next it must be said that resurrection is not spoken of here as of a mover, but as of that whose act it is to rise, or of what is moved in that act. And therefore it properly convenes to man according to the body, but not according to the soul.

Articulus 3 — Whether Resurrection Is Natural Or Miraculous

Whether the resurrection is natural, or miraculous?

Thirdly it is asked, Whether it is natural, or miraculous?

But that it is natural, seems to be shown thus:

§ 1. Damascene says: "What is commonly inspected in all, does not characterize [individuate] in those things which are its atoms [individuals]" [731]. But the resurrection is inspected in all the atoms [individuals] of man: therefore it characterizes none. Therefore it itself is natural.

§ 2. Also, a Miracle, as Augustine says [732], is something arduous and unusual, appearing beyond the expectation and faculty of the admirer. But the resurrection will not appear beyond expectation: therefore it will not be miraculous, but natural.

§ 3. Also, what substantially convenes to all individuals of the same species, must be caused by the common nature. But resurrection substantially convenes to all individuals of man: therefore it is caused by the common nature of men. THE PROOF of the major is: because since there is nothing in individuals except the common nature with matter and individuating principles, and they differ by their matters and individuating principles, it is necessary that that in which all convene be the common nature, or caused by it. But THE SECOND is proved from this, that the resurrection will be according to substance, and not according to accident.

§ 4. Also thus, whatever is caused by the common nature of the species is natural to all its individuals. But the resurrection is caused thus, as has been said: therefore it is natural.

§ 5. Also, the appetite of matter to a form, even a remote one, is natural: therefore much more the appetite to a proper matter, and a proper form. But that appetite remains to the body: therefore that is natural. But the reduction of a natural appetite to act is natural: therefore since the resurrection is also reduced to act, the resurrection will seem to be natural.

§ 6. Also, whatever matter after the separation of the form from it, remains such that it is not conjoinable to another form in number or species: nor does this happen except from dispositions ordaining it to the first form, and impeding it from conjunction with another form. But it is impossible for the body of anyone to be united with another soul, because otherwise he would rise again in two [bodies]. Therefore the disposition to the first soul remains. But a disposition having been reduced to necessity and to species, nothing is done except what is natural. Therefore since in the resurrection this is done, nothing is done in the resurrection except what is natural.

§ 7. Also, every matter naturally ordained to some form is naturally ordained also to the highest state according to that form. But the matter of the human body is ordained to the rational soul, as to a form. Therefore it is naturally ordained to the highest state according to the form: therefore naturally it perceives its state: and that is not except in the resurrection. The first is proved from this, that if the opposite were given, nothing would naturally attain the perfection of its nature, which is absurd. The second is plain through itself.

§ 8. Also, it is natural for matter that it obey its mover, because God implanted this in it, as Augustine says upon Genesis [733]. But it is established that matter relates itself more naturally and immediately to the motion of God, than to the motion of heaven. But I see that every effect goes out from matter naturally through the motion of heaven. Therefore much more naturally will it itself go out into every motion of God. But God moves by will and power to the resurrection: therefore matter will be moved naturally into the form of the resurrection: therefore the resurrection will be natural.

§ 9. Also, natural things are also called those which we are innately apt to receive, although the perfecting be from some agent, as the Philosopher says in the Ethics, and in this way we say natural virtues. But it is established that from the rational soul we are innately apt to receive the form of the resurrection, as was clear above: therefore the resurrection will be natural to us.

§ 10. Also, Rabbi Moses says that only natural things delight and remain for a long time: but the resurrection will be remaining always according to the form which will be given then, and it is delectable unless it be impeded by fault. Therefore it seems that it itself is nothing but natural.

§ 11. Also, the ancients objected thus in this question: The effect of a power collated to someone by God is natural, as is clear in a blind man illuminated by God, for whom to see is natural. But the resurrection will be the effect of the voice of God, to which God will give the power of resuscitating bodies: therefore it will be natural. The first is established by the example [734]. The second is written in Psalm 67:34 [68:33]: He will give to his voice the voice of power.

§ 12. Also, to every natural dependence of two things mutually there corresponds a natural conjunction. But the body and the soul depend mutually naturally: therefore a natural conjunction responds to them. The first is plain through itself. But the second is proved from the desires of souls, which desire to receive bodies [735].

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Every motion to a form which is from nature, is from some mover in the matter. But resurrection is a motion to a form: therefore if it is natural, it is from some mover in the matter. But nothing moves in the matter to the form of a glorious body: therefore the resurrection is not a natural motion. But the first is PROVED in VII and XI of First Philosophy, where it is said that nothing transmutes matter, except what is in it. But the second is plain through the definitions induced above.

§ 2. Also, nothing of those things which are natural is done in a contrary way to natural things. But the resurrection is done in a contrary way to natural things: therefore it itself is neither from nature, nor natural. The first is plain through itself. But the second is proved from this, that the way of nature is from potency to act, and not from the privation of a natural habit to the habit: but in the resurrection there is a regress from privation to habit.

§ 3. Also, the Philosopher says in II On Generation and Corruption, at the end, that the generation of men is not circular, but straight, but of the elements is circular. Therefore if from man an element is made through corruption, man ought not to return from elements naturally. But in the resurrection he returns from elements: therefore the resurrection is not natural.

731. The term atomis here translates to indivisibles, i.e., individuals.

§ 4. Also, Chrysostom says that in whatever things the sole will of God is moving, those are miraculous. But as Damascene says, the will of God alone is moving in the resurrection: therefore it itself is miraculous, and not natural.

§ 5. Also, Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names: "And what is indeed more divine, is that He promises to translate us whole, I say souls and conjoined bodies, to perfect life and immortality. A thing indeed to antiquity appearing beyond nature, but to me and to you and to the truth both divine and appearing above nature. But above nature I say seen according to us, not [above] the omnipotent divine life" [736]. From this it is accepted that the resurrection is not natural: for it is caused above nature, although to resuscitate the dead is the highest operation and of divine nature.

Response. It must be said to this, that it seems to me that the resurrection is not natural. For a natural thing according to its nature, as is said in IV Physics, necessarily follows the nature of some form, as fire to be borne upward. But the resurrection of bodies does not follow the nature of man thus, but rather it is done by divine will, that it may be rendered to everyone according as...

he merited in the body, whether good or evil.

§ 1. To that, therefore, which is first objected, it must be said that Damascene understands [this] concerning those things that are consequent upon the substance. And there is a counter-instance: for suppose that every human being is white, then whiteness is found in all individuals, and yet it does not characterize the substance or nature. And therefore it is necessary that it be understood in the aforesaid manner: and in this sense the major premise is proved.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that if force is placed on this point, the resurrection will be wondrous, and not miraculous, as some say. However, it seems to me that the hope which falls into the definition is the hope of nature: just as the Gloss says on the Epistle to the Romans 4:18, on the text: Who against hope believed in hope and thus the resurrection will be miraculous, because it is beyond the hope of nature, although it is not beyond the hope of grace.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that "to belong substantially" is said in two ways. In one way, something belongs substantially because it is caused by a substantial formal or material cause: and in this way the resurrection does not belong substantially. But in another way, something is said to belong substantially because it happens to the substance: and this improperly belongs to the substance. And in this way it is not necessary that that which belongs substantially be natural: and thus the minor premise is proved.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that appetite in matter is twofold. One of these is merely the susceptibility of form, and this properly is not an appetite, because Boethius says in the book De Hebdomadibus[737] that nothing appetizes anything else, except that which in some way is similar to it, because appetite does not sound merely passive, but also active in some way. But this susceptibility adds nothing over the substance of matter, and therefore, since it is ordered to anything at all, it can be reduced to act by the divine will: and then it is a miracle, because there is no such thing in matter, except the power of obedience, so that what God wills may be done in it: and from this a natural eduction is not caused. Again, there is an appetite in matter which is the inchoation of form in a genus or species: and that appetite is only of a form owed to it in genus or species, and it is co-active, not merely passive, because it is one of the principles of generation, and this becomes natural when it is educed. But the form of the resurrecting body is not in the ashes in this manner, but only in the manner of obedience.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that it is not from some disposition that a dead body resolved into ashes is not joinable to another soul, but rather from its relation to the soul which first animated it, as Augustine says: for a disposition speaks of a quality transmuting to a species, but this is a relation of reason, which is caused from the good or evil merit of that body with this soul: and from this indeed is caused its order to punishment or reward with the same soul. And therefore divine justice does not permit it to be joined to another.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that the highest [attainment] of nature is twofold: namely, that which can be attained by the operation and goodness of nature, and that which is elevated above nature and is acquired by the order of divine justice. The first is natural, and not the second: and such is the perpetuity which the bodies of the resurrecting have.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that "natural" there only means the order of the creature to the Creator. But the natural, according to the running of the natural course, is the order of seminal causes, according to which one is in another in potency—and not merely material potency, but also that which is some inchoation of form.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that those things which we are innately apt to receive, in such a way that the power of nature attains them by one, or several, or all operations, are natural: just as by one operation the seed attains to the species, by several operations political action attains a habit, and by all operations the generation of a species attains perpetuity. But in no way can that which is attainable by no operation of nature, such as the form of the resurrection, be called natural.

§ 9. To the next it must be said that the statement of Rabbi Moses is understood of those things which are caused by nature, with the form of nature transmuting [them] into another state, and of these it is true. But the form of the resurrection will be [caused by] divine justice transmuting us into another state.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that God can give an effect in two ways: namely, one that follows the species and nature of a thing, just as He gave sight to the blind man by giving him the visual power: and that act is natural. He also gives an effect which does not follow the nature of the species of that thing which effects it: and in this way the power of resuscitating the dead will be given to the voice, and therefore it will not be natural. And it is like as if it were given to you to see by means of your elbow, or hand: for the act would then be miraculous.

733. Cf. Augustine, De Genesi ad litteram.

§ 11. To the next it must be said that there is no natural dependence of the corrupted body upon the soul, but only a dependence of divine justice: and therefore that argument does not hold.

§ 12. From this question it is clear that those are out of their minds who reprove the philosophers for not speaking of the resurrection, because the resurrection cannot be proved by philosophy, but rather by the principles of faith.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Cause Of The Resurrection Will Be The Voice Of The Trumpet

Whether the cause of the resurrection will be the voice of the trumpet?

§ 13. Then it is asked about what he says, there, B, For the cause of the resurrection of the dead will be the voice of the trumpet, etc.

§ 14. For against this it is objected: 1. Since there is nothing superfluous in nature, much less will there be in the divine works. But whatever is added beyond a cause that sufficiently causes the whole is superfluous. Therefore, if in the resurrection something is added to such a cause, it seems that it will be superfluous. But Damascene says: Believe that the future resurrection will be by divine will and power and nod. And it is evident that these three are most sufficient to cause the whole. Therefore, the voice of the trumpet is superfluous.

§ 15. 2. Also, there are three ordered works, namely creation, re-creation, and the state of the resurrection. And God worked two by Himself, not through any creature. Therefore, He will also work the third by Himself, which is not lesser than the second.

§ 16. 3. Also, although a superior power works with an inferior one in the proper act of the inferior, this is nevertheless not convertible. But it is evident that to raise the dead is among the highest acts. Therefore, in that [act], the inferior power will not work with the superior power. Therefore, neither the voice of the trumpet, nor any created thing [will work], as it seems.

§ 17. 4. Also, it is of greater power to restore a habit from privation than to educe from potency: which is evident from this, that the second is natural, while the first is not. But no one except God joined the soul to the body in the eduction of man from potency. Therefore no one, except God, will raise man from death when the soul is joined to the body again.

§ 18. 5. Also, Damascene posits nothing as a cause, except three things, which are all in God: namely, will, power, and nod. Therefore it seems that those things which the Master touches upon here, namely the ministry of the Angels and the voice of the trumpet, do nothing among the causes of the resurrection.

§ 19. 6. Furthermore, it is asked: What in the resurrection corresponds to the three, namely will, power, and nod, which Damascene posits in the cause of the resurrection?

§ 20. 7. Also, since God, and the man Christ, and the Angels work in the resurrection, let it be asked: what corresponds to the operation of each?

734. Refers to the example of the man born blind.

§ 21. 8. Furthermore, it seems that the voice of the trumpet is useless: for where it is impossible to hear, there the trumpet sounds for nothing. But it is impossible for ashes or the dead to hear. Therefore the trumpet sounds to them for nothing.

§ 22. 9. Also, since in Numbers 10:1 ff., a threefold use of the trumpet is determined, let it be asked: what three things in the resurrection correspond to those three?

§ 23. RESPONSE. It must be said that various opinions are posited in the Letter concerning the voice of the trumpet. However, according to the more probable opinion, it seems we must consent to Gregory, who says that for the trumpet to sound is nothing else than to demonstrate the Son as Judge to the world. Just as it is said in Matthew 24:27: As lightning comes forth from the East, and appears even unto the West, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. And this evidence is called the voice of the trumpet awakening the dead.

§ 24. Therefore, it must be said to the first [objection] that it is not superfluous: because God is the cause of the resurrection outside of a genus, but Christ coming as judge is making and showing a cause within a genus through the form of his own resurrection for ours. Because, as the Gloss on 1 Corinthians 15:4 ff. says, it is evident that Christ rose, who is the efficient cause of the resurrection of the dead. But according to the exposition concerning the ministry of the Angels, then the voice of the trumpet is a ministering and commanded cause. And thus, again, it is not superfluous, because although the primary cause is sufficient for all things, nevertheless, on account of congruity and the acquisition of merits, He works through ministers.

§ 25. To the next it must be said that it is not similar, because those two works proceed from the highest to the lowest, and therefore it was necessary for the Most High to work in them. But the resurrection proceeds from the lowest, namely the collection of ashes, to the highest, and therefore in it, as to the antecedent things, inferior creatures can work somewhat by ministering, but in the highest, the consummator is God by Himself.

§ 26. To the next it must be said that this is true in that this work is in the highest, but in that it proceeds from the lowest, something below Him can work ministerially, namely as to the terminus from which the resurrection is, although not as to the terminus to which, and in which is the consummation of the resurrection.

§ 27. To the next it must be said that the joining of the soul to the body will be the work of God alone; but there are certain works antecedent to that, just as in nature the coagulation of blood, the gathering of similar members, and the formation of members, and the composition of them, which the formative power in the seed works: so too in the resurrection there is the collection of ashes, and their mutation into the form of similar members, and the gathering of organs, and their composition in the body: and this God will work through the ministry of Angels and of the man Christ.

§ 28. To the next it must be said that Damascene considers only the efficient cause by authority, and not that which works in ministry.

735. Cf. Bernard of Clairvaux or traditional views on the soul's desire for reunion with the body.

§ 29. To the next it must be said that in those who resurrect there are three things, namely the participation of divine incorruption, the eduction of a habit from privation, and the facility of the work. And the will, which communicates goods, properly regards the first; power the second, because it is of the greatest potency; and the nod the third, because He works by a nod rather than by labor.

§ 30. To the next it must be said that it can be probably said that the collection of ashes, which is the lowest work in the resurrection, will be done by the power of the Angels; but the formation of the human body by mutating ashes into similar members, and forming organs, and composing [them], is attributed to the man Christ, who will reform the body of our lowness, configured to the body of his glory, as it is said in Philippians 3:21; but the mutation into incorruption and the animation will be a divine work.

§ 31. To the next it must be said that, as Isaac says, the senses are twofold, namely natural and animal. And in likeness to the natural, not the animal, sense, we can say that any creature can perceive the nod of the Creator: thus, Matthew 8:26: He commanded the winds and the sea, and there was a great calm. And therefore such a hearing, that is, a perceptive power of the nod and will of God, is in the ashes and the dead.

§ 32. To the next it must be said that the use of trumpets was to gather an army, and that will [also] be in the gathering of the dead for judgment.

§ 33. Also, the voice of the trumpet used to stir to battle, and this will be [seen] in this, that the whole world will fight for the Judge against the insensate, as is said in Wisdom 5:21.

§ 34. There was a third use of trumpets, the calling to a feast, and to that corresponds the calling of the saints to joys, when it shall be said to them: Come, ye blessed of my Father, possess, etc.

Articulus 5 — Whether Christ Is The Cause Of Our Resurrection

Whether Christ is the cause of our resurrection?

§ 35. Then it is asked about what he says, there, B, after the beginning: The hour cometh, wherein all that are in the graves, etc.

§ 36. For from this it seems to be elicited that 1. Christ is the cause of our resurrection.

And this also seems to be elicited from the Gloss on the First Epistle to the Corinthians 15:16, on the text: If the dead rise not, which says that Christ's resurrection is the efficient cause of our resurrection.

§ 37. 2. Also, it is argued here from the text: because if something posited posits another, and destroyed destroys it, it is the immediate cause of it. But the resurrection of Christ does both of these for our resurrection. Therefore the resurrection of Christ is the immediate cause of our resurrection. The proof of the minor is taken from the text, because both of these are written: if Christ rose, the dead rise, and if the dead rise not, neither is Christ risen.

736. Pseudo-Dionysius, De Divinis Nominibus, 6.

§ 38. 3. Also, it is said in Romans 4:25, that Christ was delivered up for our sins, and rose again for our justification. And there the Gloss intimates that the death of Christ is the cause and sacrament of our spiritual death, when we die to sin, so that we might live to justice; but it is the cause of our resurrection of soul and body, but not the sacrament. But Christ's resurrection is a cause, not a sacrament; while His death is the cause and sacrament of justification and of resurrection. From this it is argued that the resurrection of Christ is the efficient cause and exemplar (in the manner of a sacramental sign) of our resurrection. And from this the same as before is argued.

§ 39. 4. Also, as Ambrose says, and as is held in the third book of the Sentences: Our works of justification receive their power and efficacy from the works of Christ, and otherwise they would not be pleasing. But ashes have less capability for glory and incorruption than even free choice has for grace in the resurrection. Therefore, in the resurrection the dependence of the ashes on the resurrection of Christ will be even greater than that of free choice on the works of justification; but Christ is the cause of the justification of works; therefore His resurrection will be the cause of our resurrection.

§ 40. ON THE CONTRARY to this, many object thus: 1. A cause is that which the effect necessarily follows. But the effect of our resurrection did not follow Christ's resurrection. Therefore it is not the cause of our resurrection.

§ 41. 2. Also, the caused thing cannot be without the cause, that is, unless its cause has existed, or exists. But our resurrection can be without Christ's resurrection. Therefore our resurrection is not caused by the resurrection of Christ. They prove the minor premise in two ways. First, thus: Augustine says that another mode of our liberation was possible; and then it is evident that our resurrection would have followed without the resurrection of Christ. Therefore the proposition is evident. Second, thus: Suppose that Christ had not risen, it is still true that the holy Fathers believed the resurrection of the flesh would come. And falsity cannot underlie faith. Therefore the resurrection of the flesh was immutably still future, and not through the resurrection of Christ. Therefore, again, the previously held proposition is evident.

§ 42. 3. Also, the maker of one work in a whole single species is the same. But the resurrection is a certain work, which was perfected in Christ, and will be done in us. Therefore it will have the same maker both in Christ and in us. Therefore His resurrection is not the cause of our resurrection, but rather ours and His have one cause, whatever that may be.

§ 43. 4. Also, that which is a universal cause in some genus is not caused according to that which it causes in others. But Christ's resurrection is the universal cause in the genus of the resurrection of men, as the adversary says. Therefore it is not caused according to that which it causes in others. But this is the resurrection. Therefore He did not have a cause of His own resurrection, which is heretical. Therefore also that from which this follows, namely that Christ is the cause of universal resurrection [is false]. The major premise is proved in all of nature: in the sun which is the universal cause of all generable things, in the agent intellect, and in all others. The minor premise, however, is taken from the adversary.

§ 44. 5. Also, if it is a cause: it is either a necessary or a voluntary cause. If necessary: then, upon its existing, the effect would immediately follow, which we do not see. If voluntary: then either by a divine or a human will. If divine, it is evident that this is the same for the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Therefore then the resurrection is not to be attributed to the resurrection of Christ as a cause, but rather to the divine will, and this is what we wish. If, however, [by a] human [will]. On the contrary: this is weak and needs another. Therefore it cannot be the cause of the resurrection, which is the most excellent of works. And thus again it is evident that the resurrection of Christ is not the cause of our resurrection.

§ 45. These same people respond to the objection of the Apostle introduced above, saying that the argument is from hypothesis: for since Christ is man in such a way that human nature is in Christ, this same thing will belong to the same nature in all; or if this of human nature is not in all, then this also was not of human nature in Christ.

§ 46. But against this it is also objected again; 1. For whatever things agree to all that are of that nature through one nature, one of them is not said to be prior to another in that [nature]. Therefore, from the destruction of the consequent, since Christ is called the first in the resurrection, He Himself does not participate in the resurrection in the same way as others. Therefore it was not an argument from hypothesis. The major premise is self-evident. The minor is written in 1 Corinthians 15:23, where it is said: The firstfruits, namely of them that sleep, Christ: then they that are Christ's, who have believed in his coming. And in Revelation 1:5: The first begotten of the dead, and the prince of the kings of the earth.

§ 47. 2. Also, one having the power to raise himself, and one not having it, do not relate in one way to the resurrection. But Christ had the power, others do not. Therefore they do not relate in one way to the resurrection. Therefore the argument from hypothesis was worth nothing; and if the Apostle argued thus, then he knew absolutely nothing of the art of arguing. The first is evident. The second is written in John 10:18: I have power, etc., where Augustine says that the flesh had the power to raise itself by the power of the divinity latent in it.

§ 48. 3. Also, in the Psalm He alone is said to be free among the dead. Therefore He stood differently in relation to the resurrection than others.

This same thing is argued from Acts 2:24, where Peter says: Whom God hath raised up, having loosed the sorrows of hell, as it was impossible, etc. And it is evident that this could not be said of others. Therefore, etc.

§ 49. 4. Also, what cause could be imagined that Christ should cause our justification and deliverance from hell, and not cause the resurrection through His resurrection?

§ 50. RESPONSE. In this question, reason by itself is worth little or nothing. And therefore it seems we must entirely consent to the Saints who have divine inspiration. And because they say that Christ's resurrection is the efficient and sacramental cause of our resurrection, therefore I also say this, changing nothing of their words.

§ 51. Whence it must be said that the cause of our resurrection is threefold, namely an equivocal efficient, a habitual univocal efficient, and an actual univocal efficient. It is called an equivocal efficient cause when the cause is not of the same species as the effect, just as it is said that the sun generates man; and in this way the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are the efficient cause of our resurrection. A habitual univocal efficient cause, however, is called one that effects something similar to itself in species, just as man generates man; and in this way Christ rising is the efficient cause of our resurrection according to habit only. But the univocal efficient cause according to act, or actual, will be Christ in judgment bearing the insignia of our redemption; whence our resurrection immediately follows there. Therefore there is a threefold efficient cause of our resurrection, namely the equivocal efficient cause, the habitual univocal efficient cause, and the actual univocal efficient cause. In the first way, the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are the causes of our resurrection, by will, power, and nod, as was previously held. In the second way, however, Christ rising is the habitual cause of our resurrection. And in the third way, Christ in judgment bearing the insignia of our redemption, and as a judge demonstrating them by judging the world, will be the actual cause of our resurrection.

§ 52. Consenting, therefore, to the first and last authorities and reasons introduced, it seems it must be said to the first [objection] which is against this, that Christ's resurrection is called here Christ rising. Because the resurrection of Christ in the abstract is the formal cause of nothing, unless perhaps of Christ rising. But Christ rising is a cause in habit, and the effect does not necessarily follow it; just as one knowing in habit is a sufficient cause of consideration, but yet he does not necessarily consider, but he will consider when he wishes. So it is also with Christ rising in relation to our resurrection.

§ 53. To the next it must be said that power is twofold, namely absolute, and ordered under the immobile disposition concerning future things, by which disposition the divine counsel, which He foreordained from eternity, is explicated through times. Now, according to absolute power, another mode was possible, and thus it is evident that the proposed proof is invalid. And there is a counter-instance: because if God had permitted that first little cloud to stand, which created the first three days, it would have created all the days; and therefore the sun could have not been the cause of the day upon the earth. And yet if it is inferred, "The sun could not be the cause of the day; therefore it is not the cause," it is evident that the fallacy of the consequent occurs. And it is so in the proposed case. To the other proof of the proposition it must be said that the Fathers believed our resurrection would be through the efficacy of Christ's resurrection. If, however, God had ordained otherwise, then it could have been otherwise; but from this it does not follow that it is not a cause, as has already been held.

§ 54. To the next it must be said that Christ's resurrection is not entirely univocal with ours, as was evident above in the question, What is the resurrection? But if it were of entirely the same notion, then the argument would be worth something: because Christ rose by His own power, and we do not, but by the power of Christ rising.

§ 55. To the next it must be said that if that genus were one in all things, then the proposition would be most true: because then that act would flow from some one [source] into the whole genus. And it is not so concerning Christ: for although Christ is true man, nevertheless Christ is not a mere man, and so He has some influx over other men, just as a cause over the caused.

§ 56. To the next it must be said that He Himself is a voluntary cause, having the form of the caused within Himself: because He will reform the body of our lowness, etc.

§ 57. To that which is further asked, it must be said that there is the will of God in the resurrecting man, and it is united to the human [will]: and thus it is evident that what is inferred is invalid, because that [will] belongs solely to the resurrecting Christ.

§ 58. Moreover, their responses to the saying of the Apostle seem to be sufficiently disproved.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Voice Of The Trumpet Will Be Of One Or Of Many Angels

Whether the voice of the trumpet will be of one, or of many Angels?

§ 59. Then it is asked about what he says, there, B, in the middle: The voice will be of one or of many Angels, etc.

§ 60. The same is also said in 1 Thessalonians 4:15.

§ 61. And it is asked why he says, Of one, or of many?

§ 62. For it seems that it is in no way of one, but of many:

1. For there were many who ministered in guardianship. Therefore there will also be many ministering, so that they may rise for judgment, and render an account of how they obeyed the guarding Angels.

§ 63. 2. Also, it belongs to the Virtues to do wonders. But the resurrection is the most wondrous of all. Therefore it seems that for the resurrection to take place, all the Virtues would assemble. Therefore, many.

§ 64. 3. Also, Matthew 24:29 does not speak of one, but of all in common, for it is said there: The powers [Virtutes] of heaven shall be moved; and this is expounded of the choir of Virtues by Blessed Bernard in book V of De Consideratione to Pope Eugenius.

§ 65. RESPONSE. It must be said that it is of one and of many. Of one, as in the provost of the Church, because Michael is the provost and prince of the Church, as is said, Daniel 12:1. But of many complying regarding the accounts of individuals, as was held above.

§ 66. And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Time Of The Lord's Coming To Judgment Is Knowable

Whether the time of the Lord's coming to judgment can be known?

§ 67. Then it is asked about what he says, there, C, But at midnight He is said to be coming, etc.

§ 68. Now three things are asked here: namely, whether the time of the Lord's coming to judgment can be known? Second, What hour is more fitting for coming? Third, Why no citation precedes this hour, since this seems to belong to the form of justice?

§ 69. To the first it is objected thus: 1. The end of the principles of any thing is known, and its end will necessarily be known. But the end of the principles of the world is known. Therefore the end of the world itself will also necessarily be known. The proof of the major premise: because when the first principles are corrupted, it is impossible for any of the principled things to remain. The minor premise is taken from the fact that the principle of all generation and corruption is the bringing-to of superior [bodies], as the Philosophers say: and the end of those is known, as is taken from the proper doctrine of mathematicians. Therefore both premises are established. And since the end of the world is the day of judgment: therefore it is established that it is knowable.

§ 70. 2. Also, the Philosophers wrote about the great year, in which all things would revert to the first chaos, and they handed down to us the principles for finding the first, middle, and last [parts] of that year. Therefore it is also knowable to us when all things will return to the first chaos. Now it is evident that this is the end of the world and the day of judgment. Therefore it seems that the day of judgment is knowable to us.

§ 71. 3. Also, whatever has a principle that is determinate and finite in something, its end is known from the same thing, because [it is known] from the end of the principle. But the principle of the inferior world is in the determinate and finite motion of the heaven. Therefore its end is known from the same thing. And thence as before. The major premise is self-evident. The minor premise is written by Aristotle: because whatever has a principle in time as in number, its end will be in the same: and this is on account of the end of the period, as mathematicians say.

§ 72. 4. Also, Daniel and the Apostle write about the day of judgment. But it is not written that it is unknown. Therefore it seems that the day of judgment is knowable.

§ 73. 5. Also, there are many who speak of this through revelations, which they say were made to them. But what is known through revelation is known most truly. Therefore it seems that it is known.

§ 74. 6. Also, even the Philosophers, as is evident in the Timaeus of Plato, speak of a deluge by fire. But it is evident, according to the sayings of the Saints, that this judgment will be by fire. Therefore it seems that since this is known, the day of judgment is knowable.

§ 75. ON THE CONTRARY to this is that 1. The motion of every circular movable and of the mover of perpetual things is perpetual as regards the principles of motion. But such is the motion of the heaven. Therefore, as much as depends on the principles of motion, the motion is perpetual. The major premise is evident from book VIII of the Physics. And similarly the minor is evident from those things which were disputed by us on the second book of the Sentences. Thence thus: While the motion of the heaven stands, there will not be the day of resurrection and judgment, as is said, Job 14:12: Till the heavens be worn out, he shall not awake, nor rise up out of his sleep.[738] But as much as depends on the principles of motion, it will never not stand. Therefore, from those principles the end of the world, or the day of judgment, will never be known. Now it is evident even to all who know a little, that the Philosophers cannot know anything of future things except from those principles, namely of the mover and the movable. Therefore the day of judgment cannot be known through natural or mathematical reasons.

§ 76. 2. Also, none of the Philosophers wrote physically about the end of the world. Therefore it seems that they could know nothing.

If perchance someone says that it is known through revelation. On the contrary: It is probable that what God does not wish to reveal to the greater ones, He also does not wish to reveal to the lesser ones by this same token. But He refused to reveal this to the Apostles. Therefore He will not reveal it to any lesser ones. The proof of the minor. Acts 1:6: They therefore who were come together, asked him, saying: Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel, etc.[739]

§ 77. 3. Also, from that which He said, Matthew 24:36: But of that day and hour no one knoweth, not the Angels of heaven, but the Father alone.[740] Therefore they seem to be impostors who intermeddle themselves concerning that revelation.

§ 78. RESPONSE. It must be said that I think it is in no way possible for anyone to foreknow the day of judgment. And the cause is rendered in the Letter by Augustine, namely because the Judge wishes to come unexpectedly. But a reason can also be rendered: because it cannot be known through the disposition of the superior motion; but through revelation God does not wish anyone to know. And thus it can in no way be known.

§ 79. But why it cannot be known from the disposition of motion, will be evident below in the solution of the objections.

§ 80. Therefore it must be said to the first [objection] that the end of the world cannot be known from the motion of the heaven out of the proper science of mathematicians. But the end of the habitation of the kingdom of the city and of our habitable earth is well known from the proper science of mathematicians, but not of the whole earth: because when one fourth part of the habitable [earth] is now rendered uninhabitable on account of the shortness of the diameters of the planets, and especially of the sun, then by that very fact the longer length of the other part of those same diameters will be in the other side of the fourth part: and that [part] is rendered habitable, the inhabitant and habitability crossing over from one fourth part into another. And nothing more can be taken from the proper science of mathematicians, as all who have perfectly known something of the art know. And the authors Ptolemy, Malarba [Masha'allah], and Albumasar write these things in the book On the Great Conjunctions, and Abraham [ibn Ezra] in the book of Conjunctions...

...actions of Saturn and Jupiter, and Messalah in the book of the Conjunctions of the Planets, Aristotle also by objecting hints at this in the end of the first book of Causes concerning the property of elements and planets.

To the other it must be said, that the Philosophers have handed down different things about the great year according to its different acceptance: for it is called the great year of the planets, and this in many ways, namely as to the signification of one planet which instills the age, and thus there are other greatest years of Saturn and other planets, as the Authors say. And according to this, there are said to be middle years in which the signification of the planet lasts in a city or village: and the least in which its signification lasts in a birth, and other sidereal years of its honor. Sometimes, however, the great year is said with respect to the restorations of the planets to their places and origins, so that each progresses from its origin, just as it progressed from the beginning of its creation: and this is called the great year by the Philosopher Virmitius in the book of the Significations of the Stars. Sometimes, however, the great year is said according to the return of the entire starry sphere. In all those years, however, the state of motion is not taken, and there is no ultimate revolution, after which there is no other: and therefore the end of the world is never taken, as was clear before, but the end of this age or habitation, as we have had, and not the end of the world simply.

To the other it must be said, that the lower things are in number and time, but they are taken in two ways, namely according to their entire succession, or according to the special duration of this or that. In the first way, however, they are in the whole time, whose end is not comprehended by philosophy. In the second way, however, they are in a certain part of time that is known: and thus is understood the saying of Aristotle saying that the lower things are in time as in a certain number: whence he says there, that to be in time is nothing else than to be measured by a certain part of time.

To the other it must be said, that to the Saints a revelation was made about the preceding signs: but, as I think, the determined time was never revealed to anyone in whole, so that he would know how much from today or another determined day is until the day of judgment. And Daniel seems to say determinately the time that will be between the death of Antichrist and the judgment, but what is until the appearance of Antichrist he did not say.

To the other it must be said, that all who have hitherto involved themselves in such things have appeared foolish: and therefore that objection is founded on nothing stable.

To the other it must be said, that the Philosophers consider the causes of particular floods according to the elevations and depressions of the planets in hot and cold signs, and according to the dominions of the hot and cold: yet no one determines the day of judgment.

738. Job 14:12

Among the things which are objected to the contrary, none needs a solution, except this which says, that not even the Son knows the day.

And to this it must be said, that (as the Gloss says) the Son is said not to know, because he does not make us know. Or better it should be said, that he speaks of the Son of man as man: because from human nature he did not know this, but from the divine in which he was the same as the Father.

Articulus 8 — At What Hour The Judgment Will Be

At what hour will the judgment be?

ARTICULUS VIU.

At what hour will the judgment be?

Secondly, it is asked, Which hour is more fitting for coming?

1. It seems, however, that it is midday: because external things ought to agree with internal things: but on the day of judgment all internal things will be illuminated: therefore all external things ought then to be illuminated: and this is at midday: therefore that time is most fitting.

1. Likewise, there seems to be no reason which is placed in the Letter, namely when it will be very dark, that is, hidden: for the judge ought not to come hidden, but rather manifest: therefore it is more fitting that he comes in the day, than in the night.

Response. It must be said that reasons of fittingness can be assigned diversely, nor is there great force in them: therefore it seems to be agreed with the fathers, that it is fitting for him to come in the middle of the night from the mystery which he adduces: and from the fittingness of those to be judged, who deserve this, so that being uncertain of the hour they may always be solicitous.

To the first objection, it must be said that that fittingness is taken from the condition of the judge alone, who always inhabits the inaccessible light examining all things: but the quality of the time of judgment (as is clear in the Letter) is more taken from the side of those to be judged: and this is done for this reason, because judgment is for the sake of the judged, not for the sake of the judge.

Through this also the solution to the remainder is clear.

Articulus 9 — Why Citation Does Not Precede Judgment

Why does citation not precede judgment?

Thirdly, it is asked, Why does citation not precede?

739. Acts 1:6

For since the judge is supremely just, he omits nothing from the order of law: but it is of the order of law to cite for judgment: therefore this ought not to be omitted.

To this it must be said that all preachers have cited: however, the chief and final citation will be by Elijah and Enoch: and in this respect, the order of law will be observed there.

Articulus 10 — How Consciences Are Called Books

How are consciences called books?

Then it is inquired about what is said there, C, after the middle: Books are the consciences of individuals, etc.

However, four things are inquired here, namely, how are consciences called books? Secondly, whether those books contain all sins or certain ones? Thirdly, whether their own and others' sins will be revealed to them or only their own? Fourthly, about the torment or consolation following such manifestation.

To the first: 1. It proceeds from the manner, where it is said that the books are the consciences of individuals, which are then opened to others.

1. Likewise, Richard of Saint Victor in the book on Judgment says thus: What are the hearts of those to be judged, if not certain (so to speak) actions of Scripture? But what are the hearts of the judges, taught in all divine truth, if not certain quasi-decrees of canons? From this double scripture, therefore, every sentence is drawn, whence each of those to be judged is absolved or condemned. Both the consciences of those to be judged and of the judges are called books: but the consciences of those to be judged present the causes for judging, and the consciences of the judges exhibit the canons of the sentence to be passed in such cases.
2. Likewise, [in the same place, it is said thus: Judging, therefore, is nothing other than opening the records of their actions before the judges, than that they cannot hide their consciences from them.

1. Likewise, as the judgment of man is to the external face, so is the judgment of God to the heart, as is suggested in 1 Samuel 16:7: but the judgment of man is according to the face, and through witnesses, or the manifestation of evident fact: therefore, the judgment of God is to the heart according to the opening or manifestation of the heart: therefore, hearts ought to be opened there as certain books.

740. Matthew 24:36

On the contrary, it is objected that 1. Sins have passed in act from memory, at least many of the sins: therefore, they are not written in the conscience: therefore, concerning those, it cannot be a book.

1. Likewise, a book does not need illumination: but the hearts of the damned are most obscure: therefore, they cannot be books manifesting crimes.

Response. It must be said that, as the Gloss on the Epistle to the Romans 1:18 says, certain notes of sins remain in the conscience: and I think those notes to be guilt: and through that, each represents his sin. Similarly, the Saints rectified according to the form of first justice in their rectitude of conscience are a certain rule and canon: whence all dissimilar consciences are judged to condemnation, and congruent ones to absolution and salvation, as Richard says. And from those two proceeds judgment: and this is what is said, Wisdom 1:8: He who speaks wicked things cannot hide, nor does the reproving judgment pass him by.

To the first objection, it must be said that it passes both in act and memory: and yet it remains in guilt, unless it is erased by penance.

To the other, it must be said that they see in a double light, namely, of natural justice which is written in their hearts according to synderesis, because the obscurity of evil merit does not oppose it, but is preserved with it: and in the light of God and the Saints shining from above, as it is said in Zephaniah 1:12: And it shall be in that time, etc. I will search Jerusalem with lamps, and I will visit upon the men settled on their lees: who say in their hearts...

Articulus 11 — Whether The Books Contain All Sins Or Certain Ones

Whether all sins or some contain books?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether all sins or some contain those books?

It seems that not all: because
1. Everything that is recalled to the heart is either received through a new sense or brought forth from memory as from a treasury: but in neither of these ways do all sins come to the hearts of those to be judged: therefore it seems that not all sins will be manifested there. The first is evident in itself. The second is proven: because there is only a twofold way of knowledge, as the Philosophers say, namely the direct which is through the senses, and the reflexive which is from memory: but in neither way are all sins present.

1. Likewise, Jeremiah 17:9: The heart is perverse and inscrutable, who can know it? Therefore it cannot be fully known there: therefore the heart will not manifest all sins there.
2. Likewise, it is not for the judge sitting in judgment to uncover what is hidden: since therefore he is the most just judge, he will not uncover anything hidden: therefore hearts will not manifest sins, except those which are manifest.
3. Likewise, much of sins has been erased by penance, even if it was not final with perseverance, because every true penance erases sins: therefore it seems since those are erased in guilt and act, that then they will not be manifested: therefore the heart will not manifest all sins.

On the contrary of this is that
1. Every sin will receive the just condemnation of its deformity: but nothing is universally condemned unless it is manifest in judgment: therefore every sin will be manifest in judgment.

1. Likewise, II Corinthians 5:10: For we must all appear, etc. Therefore all our sins must be manifested before the tribunal of Christ there.

Response. This last must be conceded, namely that all sins will be manifest there: but those which are erased by penance are not sins: and therefore those are not recalled to conscience as to be judged, although perhaps they are recalled to participate in the quantity of ingratitude, namely from how great a gift it fell, so that on account of the following, the sin may be punished more severely.

And through this the solution to the last is evident.
To the first it must be said, that if there is the mark of sin which is guilt, the heart will be informed to know the sin to be manifested to another.

To the other it must be said, that it cannot be known now: but then it will be known by divine power for greater confusion, and the commendability of divine justice.

To the other it must be said, that this is true, where the witness is external from the face: but where the witness is internal, whose testimony is stood by, then it is for the judge (when he gives the sentence) to manifest the words of the witnesses, so that the sentence may appear just: and thus it is for God to show the interior words of the witnesses, namely of the accusing or even defending consciences.

Articulus 12 — Whether One's Own And Others' Sins Will Be Manifest To All

Whether one's own and others' sins will be evident to all?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether one's own and others' sins will be evident to all?

It seems that others' sins will not be evident: because

1. A cause ought not to be known, except to judges, that is, to the judge and his assessors: therefore it seems that even that cause will be known only to God and to the Apostolic men judging with the Lord: therefore others' sins and one's own will not be evident to all.
2. Likewise, What utility is there in this that they are manifested to all? It seems that there is none: because the manifestation of guilt is now evil: therefore it is better there to punish secretly than to manifest to all one's own and others': therefore as before.

On the contrary: 1. 1 Corinthians 4:5, on this:

Until the Lord comes, who will also illuminate the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of hearts. Then all things will be open and known to all, and they will be able to judge about themselves and others.

1. Likewise, a verse is said by the ancients:

And all the secrets of all will be evident to all.

1. Likewise, just as all good things are manifested to the good for their glory, so it is just that in the wicked all their own and others' evils are manifested for their confusion: but everything that is fitting and just to be done, will be done: therefore all one's own and others' evils will be manifested there.

Response. It must be said that all one's own and others' sins will be manifested there, as was lastly proven.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that not only God judges there, but the Saints will also judge the nations, as it is said, Wisdom 3:8: but it is true that only God will judge authoritatively there. However, there will be a question about this in its place below. Nor are sins manifested there only for the evidence of justice, but also for the confusion of sinners, as was lastly proven.

To the other, it must be said that there is this utility of vengeance through the punishment of shame: and that now the manifestation of guilt is evil, is because of the fear of scandal of imitation: and this will then be completely removed: and therefore only utility remains in the manifestation of guilt.

Articulus 13 — Whether From The Opening Of Those Books There Will Be Some Torment Or Consolation

Is there from the opening of those books any torment or consolation?

Fourthly, it is asked, What results from this, torment or consolation?

It seems, indeed, that the punishment from the repentance of evils is more bitter than from hell.

1. Hence Hugo: With the coming of the judge, the conscience of each one will be brought to the forefront: then every fault will be brought before the eyes, and the mind will be tormented more grievously by its own fire than by the fire of hell. From this is taken what was said.
2. Likewise, Luke 23:30: Then they will begin to say to the mountains: Fall upon us: and to the hills: Cover us. It is evident, however, that those saying this do not seek to escape, except the external vision of the angry judge in the accusation of conscience, not the internal torment. Therefore, something is harsher than the torment of hell: but the accusation of conscience is graver than the vision of the judge: therefore, the accusation of conscience is a graver punishment than hell. That the accusation of conscience is graver than the vision of the offended judge is clear: because the vision is not penal, except on account of the accusation of conscience, and because of which each thing is such, and it itself is more such.

3. Likewise, Wisdom 5:2, it is said that from the anguish of spirit they will say groaning: These are they whom we had once in derision. And it is not said there from the anguish of hell: therefore, the anguish of spirit seems graver than hell.
4. Likewise, in the blessed, the most delightful object is within, namely God filling the innermost for enjoyment: therefore, also in others the worst and most sorrowful is within, namely the affliction of spirit.
5. Likewise, what is most evil to someone is most afflictive: but one's own evil is most evil to someone: therefore, it is most afflictive: but this evil of the soul (as Dionysius says) is to be against reason: therefore, it seems that then this afflicts it most.

On the contrary of this is that the punishment is lesser in the agent against, than in privation alone: but fire is the agent against, and the accusation of conscience is of the privation of good alone: therefore, it is a more vehement punishment than the accusation of conscience.

Response. It must be said that there is the punishment of loss, and the punishment of sense. The punishment of loss is the greatest, being the privation of the uncreated good and the created natural good because of the deformity of sin. But the punishment of sense is twofold, namely the interior remorse of conscience, and the exterior fire with other afflictions. And among these, I believe the exterior fire to be more vehement: because the interior remorse is either about the loss, or about this that through sin it subjected itself to the afflicting corporeal, as is fire, or the like.

To that which is first objected from the saying of Hugo, it must be said that it is graver in a certain respect, namely as to indignation: because one is more indignant with oneself, because it was the cause of punishments: but nevertheless one is more sensibly tormented by fire.

To the other, it must be said that they say this in order to avoid one punishment, not that they consider this or that greater: for I well think that among their small punishments there are some which surpass the oppressions of mountains by their affliction: and therefore they would gladly exchange greater oppressions for the oppression of mountains.

To the other, it must be said that they groan from the anguish of spirit: and this is especially mentioned, because it is the cause of other punishments.

To the other, it must be said that it is not similar: because the enjoyable good is within not enclosed, and without not excluded: and that does not have a contrary: and therefore the evil opposed to it is not the most afflictive within, but rather the fire which is not evil in itself, but to them inasmuch as it afflicts the good nature, as Augustine says.

To the other, it must be said that if evil sounds like privation and loss, that is, which most takes away good: then the proposition is not true: because the most afflictive is the agent against, and the greatest evil is the privation of one's own and greatest good. But if it says the evil of punishment from the agent against: then it is true: and then that is false which says that the greatest evil is to the soul to be against reason in the same sense: and in the first sense it is true. And the deception is there through equivocation.

Articulus 14 — Whether The Final Judgment Will Occur In A Moment

Whether the final judgment will occur in a moment?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said there, C, shortly before the end: And with the gaze of the mind with wondrous swiftness, etc. And three things are inquired, namely, whether the judgment will occur in a moment? Secondly, whether it is possible for all evils to be accused in a moment by conscience? And thirdly, whether the future judgment will be in a moment?

Concerning the first, it is objected thus:
1. The Apostle, 1 Corinthians 15:52, says thus: In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye. But a moment is indivisible, and the twinkling of an eye is in the indivisible, as Jacob, son of Alkindus, proves, and also Aristotle in the book On Sense and Sensible: therefore the resurrection will be in a moment.

1. Likewise, the Gloss there: We believe from this the same is taken in the twinkling of an eye the future resurrection, and in the members destined to live without end, the dust of the most ancient corpses will return with such speed.
2. Likewise, as the Philosopher proves at the end of Book VIII of the Physics, infinite power moves and operates in the indivisible of time: but the cause of the resurrection, which is the power of God, is of infinite power: therefore the resurrection, which is His work, will be in the indivisible of time.
3. Likewise, if He were to operate the resurrection in time, it would be necessary that this time be according to the suitability of the resurrecting, and not according to the suitability of the cause of the resurrection: but the resurrecting, just as the being born, require different times for formation and for nourishment: therefore it would be similar there, and thus twenty years at least would be required, which is false: therefore it seems that the resurrection will not be in time, but in a moment.
4. Likewise, the divine work ought to be distinct from the work of nature in the speed of motion: but the work of nature is in time: therefore the divine work ought to be in the indivisible of time, as it seems.

On the contrary of this is,
1. What is said, Ezekiel 37:7-8: The bones came together, bone to its bone, etc.: and finally to its joint. And I saw, and behold, sinews and flesh came upon them, and skin was stretched over them, and they did not have spirit. These, however, do not occur in a moment, but in the succession of time. Therefore the resurrection will not be in a moment, nor in the twinkling of an eye.

1. Likewise, of many acts succeeding each other, there is not one indivisible measuring them: but the gathering of dust, the formation of bodies, their animation, are many acts succeeding each other in the resurrection; therefore there is not one indivisible measuring them: therefore the resurrection will not be in the indivisible of time.

Response. It must be said that the first part of the objections seems to be conceded.

To what is objected against, it must be said that Ezekiel was speaking to a rude people. Therefore, what was done simultaneously, he explained according to the order of nature, not of time, just as Moses explained the works of six days, which, however, according to Augustine, were done simultaneously in one moment.

To the other, it must be said that those acts do not succeed each other in time, but in the nature of matter: just as also the creation of the soul and its infusion and infection by original sin are three acts having an order: of nature, not of time: whence gathering the dust by the Angels, God converts and forms and animates them.

Articulus 15 — Whether It Is Possible For All Evils To Be Accused In A Moment

Whether it is possible for all evils to be accused in a moment?

Whether it is possible for all evils to be accused in a moment by conscience?

It seems, however, that it is not: because
1. That which is not considered according to act is not accused: but it is impossible to understand many things at once according to act or to consider them: therefore it is impossible to accuse many things at once, but rather one after another. The first is evident in itself. The second, however, is written in the Topics, where it is said that we can know many things, but not understand them at the same time.

1. Likewise, Wisdom 5:8, they accuse themselves of sins individually, saying: "What did pride profit us," etc.: but such an accusation made individually does not occur in an indivisible moment of time: therefore such an accusation does not occur in a moment.
2. Likewise, Augustine says on the Literal Interpretation of Genesis that God moves the spiritual creature through time. Therefore, much more does He do this in man: therefore through time, and not in a moment, will be the turns of thoughts accusing or defending on the day when the Lord will judge the secrets of men.

On the contrary of this is,
1. What is said in the Text.

1. Likewise, the movement of the spirit in thinking is swifter than any movement of bodies: but bodies are moved in a moment to rise again, as has already been established: therefore also the movement of the heart or spirit will be in accusing or defending much more in a moment or in an indivisible moment of time.

Response. It seems to me that it must be said that there will be a twofold accusation. One concerning sins in general returning to memory. The other, however, in species and number. And the first suffices for condemnation in judgment and absolution: the second, however, serves the worm of conscience. And the first will be momentary: the second, however, successive. I choose this solution because I in no way believe that it is possible to understand or consider many things at once according to act in species and number: but this is possible in that in which many are one, that is, in the universal. Others, however, say that it is possible to understand many things at once, and they solve it differently. But because the Philosopher denies this, and no one can experience it in themselves, I think it is false.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that the accusation will be in a moment: because it will be concerning sins in general, and not in species and number.

To the other, it must be said that the damned there will rather manifest the worm of conscience than the accusation of their damnation.

To the other, it must be said that Augustine speaks of the mode of understanding concerning intelligibles considered in species and number: and in this way it is also well conceded by us: but in this mode, there will not be an accusation on the day of judgment.

Articulus 16 — Whether The Whole Judgment To Come Will Be In A Moment

Whether the entire future judgment will be in a moment?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether the entire future judgment will be in a moment?

And it seems that it will not: because 1. To judge quickly is a deformity of judgment and against the discretion of the judge: but that judge will be most discreet: therefore it seems that he will not judge momentarily.

1. Likewise, Matthew 25:32 and 33: "And all nations shall be gathered before him, and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd separates the sheep from the goats, and he shall set them." But it is clear that the order of divine judgment is expressed there: since therefore it is impossible for all these things to happen in a moment, it seems that the judgment will in no way be in a moment.
2. Likewise, Joel 3:2 says: "I will gather all nations, and bring them down into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them there." But the pleading of judgment will not be in a moment. Therefore it seems that neither will the divine judgment.
3. Likewise, Matthew 25:44 says that they will ask the judge when they saw him hungry or thirsty and did not give him drink: but these questions and answers occur in the succession of time: therefore it seems that the judgment also will.

4. Likewise, Matthew 25:11 says: "Lord, Lord, open to us." And it is answered to them: "I do not know you." But all these things require time. Therefore that judgment will be in time.

On the contrary of this is that 1. Judgment follows the discretion of intellect and cognition: but divine cognition does not require time for discerning and knowing: therefore neither for judging.

1. Likewise, nothing of imperfection is to be attributed to God: but imperfect judgment is that which is with inquiry and time, because it proceeds from doubts to certainties: therefore it is not to be attributed to God: therefore it is not to be said that divine judgment requires time.

Response. It seems to be conceded that the judgment will be in a moment, as was lastly proven: because it is not fitting for God to judge with succession.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that this is in human affairs, insofar as human judgment is imperfect: because when the cause is under doubt and to be decided from allegations, it is rash to suddenly pronounce sentence: but it is not so in divine judgment, as has already been shown.

To the other, it must be said that Matthew speaks humanly, so that it can be understood by the unlearned: but that order is only of nature, not of time.

To the other, it must be said that as Bernard says: God will not plead with a bodily voice with those to be judged, but rather with an interior voice through the accusation and defense of their own conscience: because He moves this through the form of rectitude first to which all dissimilar is then reprehended, for this reason He is said to plead.

To the other, it must be said that all those questions will be in conscience and in the rectitude of justice responding, and they will be about the cause of the sentence after condemnation: and therefore they do not introduce succession in judgment, but rather in the thoughts of the judged after the sentence of their condemnation.

To the other, it must be said that all those knockings speak of the movements of the heart from the consideration of certain works of the kind of good, and the response of the judge is nothing other than the natural response of the judgment and the natural law, which convicts them of the justice of their condemnation after judgment.

Articulus 17 — Whether Memory And Recollection Of Sins Will Be Present To The Elect

Whether memory and recollection of sins are present to the elect?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, D, § 1: Here it is inquired, Whether memory is present to the elect, etc.

And three things are inquired, namely, whether memory is present? Second, Whether it is practical or speculative? Third, How the divine judgment proceeds from the deposition of one witness, which is conscience?

To the first, it is objected thus: 1. The Philosopher says that it is better not to know evils: therefore it is also better not to remember evils: but in the Saints, whatever is better will be done: therefore it seems that the Saints will not remember past evils.

1. Likewise, the best disposition of man for merit is to be wise in good and simple in evil, as is held by the Apostle, to the Romans xvi, 19: but the state of glory is better than that of grace: therefore in the state of glory this will be according to greater perfection: therefore it will be there according to not knowing evils and not remembering them.
2. Likewise, the knowledge of evils is not useful except to avoid them: therefore where it is impossible to fall into evil, there the thought or memory of evil will be superfluous: but in the homeland it will be impossible to fall into evil: therefore the thought of evil will be superfluous, as it seems: but it is certain that there is nothing superfluous there; therefore there will not be any recollection of evil there.

For this part, there are authorities in the Letter introduced from Jerome.

On the contrary of this is: 1. The saying of Gregory, which has the force of an objection from the Psalm ?, as is clear in the Letter.

1. Likewise, the glory of the Saints is in the Redeemer insofar as the Redeemer is the savior according to the act of redeeming and saving: but this does not happen without the recollection of the danger from which he saved: therefore there will be a recollection of the danger: but every danger is from sin: therefore there will be a recollection of sins.
2. Likewise, the Prophet blessing God gives the reason: Who heals all your infirmities, who redeems your life from destruction. It is certain, however, that the Saints in the homeland are most grateful for all the gifts given to them by God: since therefore the chief gift is salvation from sins, it seems that they will be grateful for this: but they would not be grateful unless they remembered: therefore it seems that they will remember their sins.

Response. It must be said that it is to be agreed with Gregory saying that there will then be a recollection of sins.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the Philosopher says this because of the evil inclination attached to certain knowables, not because of the knowing itself: because knowing is always good, even when evil is known.

To the other, it must be said that it is to know that practical thing which Priscian teaches, saying that proheretic verbs desire the infinitive: whence to know evil this, the sense is, to know to do evil: but to know, that is, to have simple cognition about this, just as to know evil, is good, and also about things to be sought for their own sake: and in this way the Apostle does not speak.

To the other, it must be said that something false is assumed in the proposition: because it is also beneficial that the mind delights in that knowledge, and especially in prophetic wisdom which results in that knowledge: whence by Tully knowledge is placed among things to be sought for their own sake: and one part of contemplative happiness is knowledge and wisdom.

Articulus 18 — Whether That Knowledge Which The Elect Have Of Their Sins Is Practical Or Speculative

Whether that knowledge which the elect have of their sins is practical or speculative?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether that knowledge is practical or speculative?

And it seems that it is practical: because

1. It is with the affection of thanksgiving and joy, as it is said in the Letter: but such knowledge which is with affection is practical and motivational, as the Philosopher says: therefore that knowledge is practical.

1. Likewise, speculative knowledge is contemplative of the differences and passions of that about which it is: but the Saints do not consider thus concerning sins, so as to dispute about their passions and differences, therefore they do not have speculative knowledge about sins.

2. Likewise, speculative knowledge about something is not about the particular, but about the universal abstracting from every particular: but the knowledge of the Saints is not about sin in the universal, but in the particular, because it is about their own sin: but sin in the universal is neither theirs, nor yours, nor mine: therefore it seems that the Saints will not have speculative knowledge about sins, but practical.

On the contrary of this is that

1. Practical knowledge moves according to the apprehended species to imitation or avoidance, as the Philosopher says: the Saints are not thus moved by the apprehended species of sin: therefore they will not have practical knowledge about the sin itself.

1. Likewise, in art I see that it is practical, which explains the species of art in matter: therefore also in morals where practice is, the apprehended species is explained in work; but the Saints do not apprehend sin thus: therefore they do not have practical knowledge about it.

Response. It must be said that a twofold knowledge can be had about sin: in one way about the sin itself according to itself, and in another way about the event following the sin. And in the first way indeed the Saints will not have knowledge about sin except speculative, which is called the knowledge of simple notice. But about the following event, which is care and pardon and healing and liberation through the mercy of God, the Saints will have practical and affirmative knowledge: and this is suggested in the Letter, when it says, that we remember pains without pain: and from there we are more joyful and grateful.

And through this the solution to almost both parts of the objections is clear: because to the first it must be said that the knowledge of sin does not have the affection of joy according to itself, but through the following event.

To the other it must be said that the Saints have both kinds of knowledge: but nevertheless practical or exercitative knowledge of joy is about the particular, and not about another.

But to those things which are objected on the contrary, the solution is clear: because those proceed from the knowledge of sin according to itself, and not by relation to the following event.

Articulus 19 — How The Divine Judgment Proceeds By The Deposition Of One Witness

How does the divine judgment proceed through the deposition of one witness?

How does the divine judgment proceed through the deposition of one witness?

Thirdly, it is asked, How does the divine judgment proceed from the deposition of one witness?

As is evident, in Romans II, 15:

Who, namely men, show the work, etc., of the law written in their hearts, their conscience bearing witness to them, and their thoughts accusing or even defending them among themselves, each one is either absolved or condemned by the testimony of conscience: but this seems to be against the law, which says, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word shall stand: therefore, since this law was given by the Lord who will judge, it seems that it ought to be observed by Him most of all.

Response. It must be said that the true cause of this is that the testimony of conscience is confession: and in human law after confession of guilt no other testimony is required, especially if the confession is made in law, because that prejudices the confessor. Similarly, it will also be in good things in the future judgment: because that judgment will be there of the inspector of the heart, who will also be judge and witness: but the law of the Lord was given concerning the judgment which is according to appearance, in which there are many doubts: and therefore the words of several witnesses are required for the proof of truth.

Articulus 20 — Whether The Sins Of The Elect Ought To Be Made Public In The Judgment

Whether the sins of the elect ought to be revealed in judgment?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, D, §2: If indeed it is asked, Whether the sins which the elect have committed, etc.

For it seems false what is said here: because
1. It was previously held that they will remember their miseries, and therefore they sing of their miseries: but through song they come into the knowledge of another: therefore others will know their sins,

1. Likewise, If they are erased through penance, then they themselves will remember their sins: but the contrary was previously held in the sayings of Gregory: therefore the text is contrary to itself.
2. Likewise, Nothing of those things which contribute to joy and thanksgiving ought to be taken away from the Saints: but to see the mercy of the Lord in the liberation of all sins contributes to joy and thanksgiving: therefore it ought not to be taken away from the Saints: therefore they themselves will see their sins, and also all others.

On the contrary of this is that
1. Then either they will wish to have sinned, or they will not wish. If they wish: then their will is perverse: because, as Augustine says, he who wills something evil is not blessed: therefore they themselves are not blessed, which is incongruous. If they do not wish: therefore there is something they do not wish: therefore they do not have everything they wish: but, as Augustine says, he is not blessed who does not have everything he wishes: therefore they again are not blessed.

1. Likewise, Delight and sadness (as the Philosopher says) occur in three ways, namely from the present, past, and future: but a well-ordered mind is saddened by a perverse work: therefore if it remembers a perverse work in the past, it will be saddened: but as the adversary says, the Saints will remember the perverse work in the past: since therefore they have a well-ordered heart, they will be saddened: and this is most incongruous.

Response. It must be said that the text can be sustained. Or it is better said through a distinction, that there is a revelation of sin as sin, and a revelation of sin remitted through pardon and penance. And in the first way, the sins of the Saints are not revealed, and thus the text is understood. In another way, however, the Saints will remember their sins, and they are also revealed to others for the increase of congratulation. And this is what the Gloss says on that of Psalm 31:1: Blessed are those whose iniquities are forgiven, etc. Thus they are erased, so that elsewhere, as the Lord does not see, that is, does not eternally punish: for to see of God is to punish sins. Turn away your face from my sins, etc.

As for what is objected against this, it must be said that they do not take pleasure in having committed sin, but nevertheless they rejoice in the remission: and therefore that will is not followed by anguish, which would obscure their beatitude. But what Augustine says is understood of those things which pertain to beatitude: because even now they do not have everything they wish, because they wish for the conversion of all nations, and yet they do not have it. However, some say that they do not wish to have sinned simply, but under the condition, namely if it pleased God. But I consider this frivolous: because it pleases God well that they had not sinned, since sin can never please Him.

To the other it must be said that sadness is not left from that memory because of the abundant matter, which appears in the remission, in which they glory in place of innocence.

And thus the solution to the whole is clear.

K. Concerning those who will be found alive.

It is also usually asked, Whether those whom Christ will find alive, if they are never to die at all, or at the very moment of time, when they will be caught up to meet Christ, will they be transformed to immortality with miraculous speed? For it is not to be said that it is impossible for them to be carried through the air into the heights, in that space both to die and to revive. To this sense, however, in which we think that they will in a short space both suffer death and receive immortality, the Apostle seems to urge us, where he says: As in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive. And elsewhere, What you sow is not made alive unless it dies first. Why should it seem incredible to us that that multitude of bodies should be sown in the air in some way, and there immediately be revived immortally and incorruptibly, when we believe that the resurrection will occur in the blink of an eye, and that the dust of the most ancient corpses will return with such speed to limbs destined to live without end? But I would rather hear from the more learned about these things. If therefore we believe that the Saints who will be found alive at Christ's coming, and will be caught up to meet Him, will in the same rapture depart from mortal bodies, and soon return to the same immortal bodies: we will suffer no distress in the words of the Apostle, generally accepting what was said: We shall all indeed rise again, namely both good and evil, but we shall not all be changed, namely in the solemnity of the resurrection. Concerning this also Ambrose says: In the very rapture of those who will be found alive, there will be death and resurrection: where the soul, as if through sleep, having departed from the body, is returned to the same in a moment. On the contrary, however, writing to Marcella, Jerome seems to testify, saying that some at the end of the world, with Christ coming, will not die, but being found alive will suddenly be changed into immortality. But what is truer of these things is not for human judgment to define.

Articulus 21 — Whether Some Remain Alive, And Are Supervested With Immortality In The Resurrection

Whether some remain alive, and are clothed with immortality in the resurrection?

Whether some remain alive, and are clothed with immortality in the resurrection?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, E, It is also usually asked, Whether those whom Christ will find alive, etc.

And it is asked here concerning the term of the resurrection from which is the resurrection.

And three things are asked here.
The first is, Whether some remain alive, and are clothed with immortality in the resurrection?
The second, Whether the resurrection is from death or from ashes in all?
The third, Whether the same is the term of the resurrection from which in the good and in the evil?

To the first, it is objected thus:

1. Both in the symbol of the Apostles and in the symbol of the Nicene synod, it is said to judge the living and the dead: therefore those to be judged differ by life and death: either therefore by present death, or past. Not present: because then all will live the life of the resurrection: therefore by past: therefore some were dead in the past, and some not: not therefore all will rise from death, but some will be clothed.
2. Likewise, 1 Thessalonians 4:16: Then. Therefore those who will then live, we who live, who remain, will be caught up together with them to meet Christ in the air: and thus we will always be with the Lord, therefore they will remain with the Lord: therefore they will be clothed.
3. Likewise, 1 Corinthians 5:4: We do not wish to be unclothed, but to be clothed, so that what is mortal may be swallowed up by life. However, it is evident that in the Saints there is no useless desire, and therefore it will have effect in some: therefore some will be clothed, as it seems.
4. Likewise, Jerome expressly says this in the authority which is introduced in the Letter, namely that some at the end of the age, with Christ coming, will not die, but found alive will suddenly be changed into immortality.
5. Likewise, In everything that acts orderly, the shorter way is more desirable: but the shorter and briefer is to be clothed, than to be one transition from life to death: therefore since God acts most orderly, it seems that such will not die, but will be clothed.
6. Likewise, Man is especially of greater dignity than other creatures: but some of the other creatures will be clothed: therefore much more man. The proof of the middle is air and heaven and others which will not be corrupted first, so that afterwards they may be glorified.

On the contrary of this is,
1. What the Lord said concerning those sinning originally: On whatever day you eat of it, you will die by death. Therefore it is necessary for all to die by the law of concupiscence born: but all are such except Christ: therefore it is necessary for all to die.

1. Likewise, 1 Corinthians 15:36: It is not vivified, unless it first dies, it stands, that all bodies will then be vivified. Therefore they will then die.
2. Likewise, In the definition of resurrection, it is, the second of that which fell and was dissolved: therefore it is necessary for all to fall by death, since the resurrection will be future generally, as the symbol says in that article, the resurrection of the flesh.
3. Likewise, Those who will then be found alive, will not be of better condition than the Apostles: therefore it would not be just, that it be granted to them, which was not granted to the Apostles: but the Apostles are all dead: therefore it will be necessary for them to die.

1. Likewise, Daniel 12:2: Many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth will awake. Therefore from the dust of the earth and not from those who sleep in the dust of the earth will rise to life.
2. Likewise, Isaiah 26:19: Your dead will live, Lord, my slain will rise. Therefore all will be dead.
3. Likewise, John 5:28: All who are in the tombs will hear the voice of the Son of God. Therefore all the dead will rise.

Response. It must be said that all will rise from the dead, and none will remain alive, as Zidéera says, from the words of Augustine.

To the first, therefore, it must be said, that they are not called living, because they remain alive, but because the time of the common judgment will apprehend them alive: but then they will die in that time by the fire of the conflagration of the world.

To the other, it must be said, that the Apostle similarly says living, whom those times will apprehend alive: but nevertheless either in the very rapture (as it says in the Letter) they will die, or even in the very conflagrating fire, which some probably estimate.

To the other, it must be said, that there is a double desire, namely natural conditioned, and natural perfected by grace. The first is of impossibilities, as the Philosopher intimates in the Ethics, where he says, that the will is of impossibilities: for we wish to be immortal: and of this the Apostle speaks. The second, however, is ordered: and by this he proves the future resurrection, as was said above.

To the argument it must be said, that the desire which is in the Saints insofar as they are saints, is not vain: but because they cannot lay aside nature, there are many conditioned vain desires in them, as in Peter, that another girded him, and led him where he did not wish: although God wished him to be led thus.

To the other, it must be said, that if Jerome is sustained, then he wishes to say, that they are not to be called dying, because without delay they are to be transferred to life: because they do not await the glory of the body, as those who die now.

To the other, it must be said, that it is a shortcut, that they die first: because just as in natural motion it is a shortcut, that dispositions and contrary forms be removed before the form is induced: so it is in the resurrection: and therefore by death it is necessary to remove the debt of Adam, and other conditions of sin, and then first to be clothed with the glory of the resurrection.

To the other, it must be said, that man is of greater dignity: and therefore all indignities must be diligently removed from him, so that he may be clothed with greater glory than any creature: and for this he needs death, as was said.

Articulus 22 — Whether The Resurrection Is From Death Or From Ashes

Whether the resurrection is from death, or from ashes?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether the resurrection is from death, or from ashes?

It seems, however, that it is from death alone: because 1. As the Gloss says on the Epistle to the Romans 4:25, on that: "He rose again for our justification," therefore the resurrection of Christ is the exemplar of our resurrection: it was from death alone, and not from ashes: therefore ours will be so.

1. Likewise, In fewer things is the way greater, as Aristotle says: but it is in fewer things that it is from a dead body, than from a body reduced to ashes, and afterwards reintegrated: therefore it will be from death alone, and not from ashes.
2. Likewise, The reason for the resurrection is the same in one and in the other: but those who will die in the very moment of their rapture will not be reduced to ashes: therefore neither should others be reduced to ashes, as it seems.
3. Likewise, The resurrection was prefigured in the raising of the dead: but no one was raised from ashes: therefore no one ought to rise from ashes.

On the contrary of this is what is said, 1. Genesis 3:19: "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return." Therefore it is necessary for the body conceived in original sin to return to dust; but it does not go to dust, except through incineration: therefore it is necessary to be reduced to ashes.

1. Likewise, Haymo: All born in original sin are held by this sentence: "Thou art earth, and unto earth thou shalt go."
2. Likewise, Damascene distinguishes a twofold corruption, namely divisibility, and putrefaction: and according to the first mode the body of the Lord saw corruption, but in the second mode it did not see: but it is evident, that there is nothing in the human body, which is not reduced to something preceding according to cause: but before corruption there is nothing, except matter composed of contraries, and sin: but the Lord did not assume sin: therefore His corruption was ordered to the nature of contraries as to cause, and not to sin: but in us there is sin: therefore it is necessary, that the second corruption be caused by it: therefore all who are conceived in sin will be reduced to ashes.
3. Likewise, In the acquisition of every form and state it is necessary first to purge the matter from contrary dispositions: but the dispositions contrary to glorification are dispersed throughout the whole body: therefore it is necessary to purge them throughout the whole body: but this cannot be done except through incineration: therefore it seems, that all will be reduced to ashes.
4. Likewise, The whole structure of man is corrupted by the corruption of vice and passibility: therefore it is necessary to dissolve in all before the form is induced.

5. Likewise, There are many things in the human body not of the truth of human nature: but all those will be removed, therefore it seems, that it is necessary to dissolve all bodies.

Response. It must be said, that in truth in my judgment the common resurrection will be from ashes, as the last reasons prove: however, on account of the perfect and complete immunity from sin and concupiscence, the resurrection of the Lord was not so, and on account of the vehement purgation of the fomes I believe, that it was also so in the body of the glorious Virgin, and the body of the blessed John the Evangelist.

But perhaps a place will offer itself for discerning these things. I think, however, that in objecting from the words of Damascene the cause is stated, because I do not believe it possible to make a sufficient purgation of the infection of the fomes for glory, except through incineration: and this I think the Apostle intended, 1 Corinthians 15:50: "Flesh and blood cannot possess the kingdom of God."

To the first, therefore, it must be said, that the resurrection of Christ, as Augustine says in the book on the Trinity, is the exemplar of our resurrection as to the terminus to which, and not as to the terminus from which.

To the other it must be said, that when the way is possible in few, then it is in few: for although all things are possible to God, yet on the part of matter this does not suit, except by a transmutation first made from a contrary form, as was evident in objecting, and is proved in every nature, which always first purges matter from contrary forms before it induces the intended form.

To the other it must be said, that the reason for the resurrection is not the same in all, as was previously evident: but yet it is the same in all who are pure men, except in those in whom there is a special access to perfect immunity from sin: and all those in my judgment will be reduced to ashes, as Haymo wishes in the commentary on the Apostle.

To the other it must be said, that the raising of the dead does not prefigure the resurrection of the dead, except in part: because no sign is such that it suits in all, because thus it would be the same, not similar: but it prefigures as to the restitution of life, and not as to the terminus from which.

Articulus 23 — Whether The Terminus A Quo Of The Resurrection Is The Same In The Good And In The Evil

Whether the same is the terminus a quo of the resurrection in the good and the wicked?

Thirdly, it is asked whether the same is the terminus a quo of the resurrection in the good and the wicked?

It seems, however, that it is not: because

1. Those whose terminus ad quem of the resurrection is not one, their terminus a quo ought not to be one: but in the good and the wicked there is not one terminus ad quem: therefore neither is there one a quo.

1. Likewise, those whose resurrection is dissimilar in cause, their resurrection ought to be dissimilar in termini: but the good and the wicked are dissimilar in the cause of resurrection: therefore also in termini. This is proved by Daniel 12:2: "Many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and others to reproach," etc.
2. Likewise, this sentence: "You are dust, and to dust you shall return," was introduced because of sin, as Haymo previously said: but the good and the wicked differ in sin: therefore they also differ in sentence: therefore they also differ in the terminus a quo of the resurrection, because that sentence indicates this terminus.
3. Likewise, in the good, the soul contains the body: but every merit of the soul ought to result in some effect in the body: therefore the effect of that containing in the body ought to result: but it results in no better way than that it is preserved from incineration: therefore it seems that the resurrection of the wicked ought to be from ashes, and not the resurrection of the good.
4. Likewise, it seems inconvenient that the temple of the Holy Spirit should be made similar to the habitation of the devil: but the bodies of the blessed are temples of the Holy Spirit, as it is said in 1 Corinthians 6:19: therefore they ought not to be made similar to the bodies of the wicked, which are the habitation of the devil: therefore it seems that when those are incinerated, these ought not to be incinerated.
5. Likewise, the infection of concupiscence is weakened by the exercise of justice: therefore in the good and the wicked the infection of concupiscence is not equal: therefore neither is the punishment of that infection equal: but this punishment is dissolution: therefore since the wicked are dissolved by incineration, it seems that the good ought not to be incinerated.

On the contrary of this is that
1. To all who were in Adam by the law of concupiscence it was said: "You are dust, and to dust you shall return": the good and the wicked were there: therefore the good and the wicked will equally go into the dust: therefore they will equally be incinerated.

1. Likewise, Ecclesiasticus 17:1-2: "God created man from the earth, and made him according to his own image. And again he turns him into it." Since therefore this is said generally, it seems that all will return to the earth through incineration.
2. Likewise, Ecclesiasticus 12:1: "A great occupation is created for all men," etc. From this it is taken that all will return to the earth which is the mother of all.
3. Likewise, Romans 14:8: "Whether we live, etc." From this follows the same as we said before.

Response. It must be said that the last of the authorities introduced seems to me to be conceded, since there are four, in my judgment, dispositions and differences of those rising, namely of Christ, and of those joined to Christ by the approach of holiness, and of those rising with Christ, and of those rising at the end of the world. For Christ has four things in his own resurrection, as Gregory says in the book XLV of Moralia, "For our resurrection is delayed to the end of the world, but his was celebrated on the third day." And we rise through him, but he through himself: for he exhibited the power of resurrection with the Father and the Holy Spirit as God, which nevertheless he alone perceived in humanity.

Whence it is clear that in four things his resurrection differs from the resurrection of others. The first is that he rose by his own power. The second is that on the third day, as the Gloss says on that: "But you, O Lord, have mercy on me, and raise me up," etc.: because if he had not risen quickly, the resurrection would not have profited them: because the disciples would not have believed. The third is that he was not incinerated, nor could he be incinerated, as the Gloss says on that of Psalm 16:10: "Nor will you allow your holy one to see corruption," Damascene in the authority previously introduced. The fourth is that his resurrection is the cause of our resurrection, as the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 15, passim, and in the authority of Gregory already introduced. But those specially approaching his holiness according to the more probable opinions, like the Blessed Virgin and John, in two things by privilege approach the resurrection of Christ, namely that they rose suddenly, and because not from ashes. But those rising with Christ agree in this: because their resurrection is not delayed to the end. But the resurrection of others will agree in nothing except in the incorruption of those rising. Therefore, speaking of the resurrection in common delayed until the end of the world, I say that all will rise from one terminus a quo of the resurrection, namely from ashes.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that no motion is specified by the terminus a quo, but rather by the terminus ad quem: for two can be moved from the same terminus a quo, and one to white, and the other to green: and yet they are not moved by one motion. And so it is not necessary that the difference of those rising be taken from what is cast off, but only in what is acquired through resurrection: and in this they differ, because the Saints will be changed into glory, and not others. Whence, 1 Corinthians 15:32: "The dead will rise incorruptible, and we will be changed."

To the second, it must be said that they are dissimilar in cause: but it is not necessary that this dissimilarity be in the terminus a quo, because that is cast off: but only in the terminus ad quem, because in that the state is made.

To the third, it must be said that penance does not remove concupiscence according to essence, but incineration corresponds to concupiscence according to essence: and therefore all will be incinerated.

To the fourth, it must be said that nothing corresponds to continence on the way, but in the homeland, namely the obedience of the body to the spirit, since in the wicked the flesh remains resisting the spirit, just as it was not content under the spirit.

To the fifth, it must be said that in that in which it is not the temple of the Holy Spirit, it can be made similar to the habitation of the devil, namely inasmuch as it is conceived and born in sin: but consequent merit makes dissimilarity in the terminus ad quem.

To the sixth, it must be said that the exercise of justice does not extinguish concupiscence: because, as it was held in the third Sentences, it is not extinguished except by divine miracle: and because incineration corresponds to concupiscence according to essence, therefore all must be incinerated.

Articulus 24 — Whether The Evil Will Rise Again With Mutilation Of Limbs

Whether the wicked will rise again with mutilation of limbs?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, G, "And when from the aforesaid it may be believed," etc. And three things are inquired. The first is, Whether the wicked will rise again with mutilation of limbs? The second is, Whether the pains which are caused by the inequality of humors will remain in them? The third, What concerning the resurrection of Christ appears in all, since His resurrection is the cause of our resurrection?

To the first, it is objected thus:
1. No punishment is to be corrected in sinners: but mutilation is a punishment: therefore, in sinners it is not to be corrected.

1. Likewise, they did not sin with mutilated limbs: but it is unjust that someone be punished in that in which he did not sin: therefore, they will not rise again in mutilated limbs.
2. Likewise, the Philosopher says in the second book of "On the Soul": "As the whole soul is to the whole body, so is a part to a part": whence if the eye were an animal, sight would indeed be its soul. One who is born with diminution was never animated: since therefore the body has from the soul that it rises again, it seems that that part ought never to rise again.

On the contrary of this is that
1. The error of an instrument is to be corrected by the artificer: but nature is the instrument of God: therefore, the error of nature is to be corrected by God the artificer: but the error of nature is diminution and superfluity: therefore, God will correct these in the resurrection.

1. Likewise, the soul is principally the cause of sin, and according to itself wholly: therefore, that it does not sin in the diminished part is not from a defect of will, but from a defect of the organ: but the will in the wicked is especially considered for the deed: therefore, it sins as much as if it had the organ: therefore, it sins with the will in the organ: therefore, it ought to be punished in the diminished organ: therefore, it is necessary that it be restored to it in the resurrection.
2. Likewise, as diminution is in to merit in good things, so in evil things to demerit: but to the good, for the will of meriting which they had in that organ, the organ will be restored glorified: therefore also to the evil, for the will of demeriting in the organ, the organ ought to be restored damned.

Response. As the Letter says, so it is to be held.

To the first, it must be said that punishment is caused in two ways, namely from nature, and from the fault of the will. The first punishment is corrected, because it is not to be imputed to man. The second, however, is not. I say, however, from the fault of the will remotely or closely: remotely, as is the disobedience of the flesh to the spirit, which remains in the damned: closely, however, as is the fire, and the worm of conscience, and the like, which are caused from voluntary sin insofar as it is voluntary by the will of the person, and not of nature.

To the other, it must be said that although instrumentally in such a member as in an instrument they did not sin, yet by will they sinned in it: and therefore it is just that they be punished in it.

To the other, it must be said as Augustine suggests in the twenty-second book of the City of God: A member is said to be twofold, namely what is present by virtue, and what is present by mass: so also a soul can be said to be twofold, namely by virtue, and in act. What is animated by virtue will rise again, as Augustine says, and from such a mode of animation the member has the power of rising again, and not from actual animation: because many animated parts are not of the truth of human nature.

Articulus 25 — Whether Pains Caused By The Inequality Of Humors Will Remain

Whether pains caused by the inequality of humors remained?

ARTICLE XXV,
Whether pains caused by the inequality of humors remained?

Secondly, it is asked whether the pains caused by the inequality of humors will remain in the damned?

It seems that they will: because
1. No painful thing ought to be removed from a body that is destined for perpetual pain: but fevers, leprosies, and the like, are painful: therefore, they ought not to be removed from the bodies of the damned, which will be destined for perpetual pain.

1. Likewise, with the destruction of the natural impotence of suffering, pain will cease: therefore, from the destruction of the consequent, if pain does not cease, the impotence of suffering will not cease: but this impotence is in the inequality of humors in every complexioned body: since, therefore, the bodies of the damned are complexioned, it seems that such impotence of suffering will not be taken away from them: therefore, neither will the consequent pain.

2. Likewise, every complexioned thing suffering from external heat is possible to suffer from its own, if it is intensified beyond the harmony of its own crisis: but the bodies of the damned will suffer from external heat: therefore, it will be possible for them to suffer from their own, if it is intensified beyond harmony, etc.: but it is evident that it is possible to be intensified, since there is no grace prohibiting it: therefore, it is possible for those bodies to become feverish, leprous, epileptic, and the like.

On the contrary of this is that
1. As the Philosopher says, every passion more made casts away from substance: but it is evident that such passions are more made by intense complexional qualities; therefore, they cast away from substance: therefore, it is possible for those bodies to perish, which is against Scripture, because they will desire to die, and death will flee from them: and Bede says that they die in such a way that they never perfectly die.

1. Likewise, Bernard says that fire and because guilt is inseparable, hell follows guilt, not nature: therefore, the fire will be perpetual: therefore, it is necessary for them to be perpetuated in fire: but this could not happen if the complexion were destroyed due to inequality: therefore, it is necessary that equal complexion be preserved: therefore, they will never have infirmity caused by the inequality of humor.
2. Likewise, corrupted flesh suffers less: therefore, since the impious suffer most according to sense, it is necessary that living and incorrupt flesh always endures: therefore, it is impossible for it to be corrupted by the corruption of the complexional elements.

Response. It must be said that as the last part of the objections proves, so it must be held: hence, just as contraries will then stand in the greater world, so their struggle will stand in the lesser world, that is, in man.

However, how they will suffer from external fire will be a place for discussion below.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that no painful thing caused by will, and not diminishing pain, is removed from the damned: but fevers, and the like, are not caused by will, and also diminish external pain, because a distempered mixture does not feel the touch of external fire as much as a tempered one.

To the second, it must be said that simple impotence of suffering will not be destroyed, but in something that would impede perpetual pain: for the cause of impotence of suffering externally is the excess of the agent beyond the harmony of touch: for a thing similar to the mixture of touch, insofar as it is similar, placed upon touch, is not felt, but the excellent: and therefore, it is felt more quickly and strongly, the more tempered the touching flesh is: and this is not removed, but the dyscrasia of the mixture from putrefaction bringing internal pains is removed for their greater punishment, as has been said.

To the other, it must be said that the instance is in the future state: because all things that are of the mixture of bodies will stand in the harmony in which God placed them, so that the artisan can contemplate in the works of wisdom: and therefore, there will then be affliction beyond the possibility of the intensity of internal qualities, and beyond the corruption of complexion.

Articulus 26 — Whether The Resurrection Of Christ Will Appear In All Who Rise, Since He Is The Cause Of Our Resurrection

Whether the resurrection of Christ appears in all those rising again, since it is the cause of our resurrection?

Thirdly, it is asked, What of the resurrection of Christ appears in all, since His resurrection is the cause of our resurrection?

For it seems that nothing of His resurrection appears in the damned: because

1. They did not bear His image in life: therefore they ought to be conformed to Him in nothing in the resurrection.
2. Likewise, the Apostle, to the Philippians 3:21, says that He will reform the body of our humility. However, it is evident that He will not thus reform the bodies of the damned, conformed to the body of His glory. Therefore it seems that they have nothing of His resurrection.

On the contrary, the incorruption of the bodies of the damned (as is said here in the Text) is some good: however, it is evident that they do not have this from the merit of the will, because from this they merit no good: therefore either this is caused by nature, or by the resurrection of Christ: however, it is evident that not sufficiently from nature, because nature of itself is mortal and corruptible: therefore it is caused by the resurrection of Christ as by its proper exemplary cause.

Response. This last seems to me to be conceded: because incorruption in all bodies is exemplarily and effectively from the resurrection of Christ, or from Christ rising: but from divine justice containing them in punishments it is also as from an efficient cause only.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the image from the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 15:49, where he says: As we have borne the image, etc., is called imitation through work, to which glorification responds: and this the damned will not have: yet through the order of justice continuing them in punishments they will have incorruption.

To the other, it must be said that there the Apostle speaks of perfect reformation, which is through transformation into glory: and not of that which is conformity in a certain respect.

DISTINCTIO XLIV

Divisio Textus

Some are also accustomed to inquire, etc. This part, which is about the circumstances of the resurrected in quantity and quality, is divided into two parts. In the first, quantity, quality, and place are touched upon. In the second, it is about the suffrages which are made for the deceased before the resurrection: and this begins in distinction XLV, there, A, "Nor is it to be denied, as Augustine says," etc.

In this distinction, however, there are five special questions touched upon in the Letter. The first is, On the quantity of the resurrected. The second, On the truth of the human nature of the resurrected. The third, On the mode of punishments both according to the body and according to the spirit. The fourth, On aborted fetuses. The fifth, On the diverse receptacles of souls. And it can be clear to anyone where these begin in the Letter, and where they end.

Articulus 1 — Whether There Will Be One Or Diverse Stature For Those Rising

Whether for those rising again there is one stature or diverse?

There arise, however, around the first four difficulties.
The first is, Whether for those rising again there is one stature or diverse?
The second is, Whether a glorious body can exist in a smaller place than the quantity of its stature?
The third, Whether it can exist with another non-glorious body in the same place?
The fourth, Whether it can exist with another glorious body in one and the same place?

To the first, it is proceeded thus:
1. Of those whose agent is one in species and number, and the matter equally disposed to receive the action of the agent, there is one production according to figure and quantity: but the agent of those rising again, etc.: therefore, of them, there is one production according to figure and quantity. The first is evident in every nature and art by induction. The second, however, is proven from this, that the agent (as is clear from the aforementioned) is God or the Son rising again, and the ashes are receiving the action, as was evident from the aforementioned.

1. Likewise, of whatever things the production is from one according to its whole genus, all have the power of that one to figure and quantity, unless by error it deviates from that: but the production of all men is from one, namely Adam: therefore, in all there is one power to figure and quantity of stature, unless it has deviated from that by the error of nature: it is evident, however, that every error is corrected in the resurrection, as has already been held: therefore, it remains in all one figure of Adam and stature: therefore, they will not be in diverse quantity and figure.
2. Likewise, the Philosopher says that of those whose substantial form is one, their figure is also one: therefore, also the quantity of perfection according to figure: but of all those rising again, there is one form: therefore, also one figure: therefore, also one stature, insofar as it is the perfection of that figure.
3. Likewise, in I De Anima, it is said that of all natural constants, there is a limit and reason of magnitude and increase: however, this limit must be set by some power: it is evident, however, that that power is of the form: therefore, of those whose form is one, their magnitude is one according to nature, unless there is an error: but error is corrected: therefore, in the resurrection, since the form of all is one, the stature of all will be one.

4. If perhaps someone says that the second according to nature is smaller than the first generating, because the matter from which generation is made is divided: and again the third smaller than that. Against: It is evident that this division is made by equals or by unequals. If by equals: then the second should be half smaller than the first, which is false: for long ago men would have been of no or insensible quantity. If by unequals: then that inequality is either according to a determined part of quantity, which measures the whole: or according to the reason of the continuous, which always remains divisible. If the first part is given: then the second in the whole part should be smaller than the first, and the third than the second: and thus it would follow the same as before, namely that the division would have stopped. If it is said in the second way: then the second will always be smaller than the first, and the third than the second, and so on: and although the division does not stop, yet it comes to the insensible: and this is absurd.

And this is the response of some knowing nothing of the nature of seed: because the natural body according to philosophy is not divided into infinites. And furthermore, they can feign no reason why the second is generated from a smaller part than the first, and the third than the second. And the third inconvenience is that from the same something signified both the first is formed, and the second, and the third, which is absurd in natural philosophy. And therefore, this response, although of many, is rejected by us as absurd.

To the contrary, however, this is objected thus:
1. The stature of every generated according to nature is taken from the quantity of extending heat and extensible moisture: but these are unequal in all: therefore, their quantity is unequal according to nature: but on the day of judgment nothing will be added to the natural quantity of each: therefore, on the day of judgment, those rising again will be unequal in quantity.

1. Likewise, from the Letter it is held that some are smaller, and some larger.

Response. It must be said that each of the bodies will then receive the quantity in length, breadth, and thickness, which it would have had in the measure of the fullness of the age of Christ, if nature had not failed through death or infirmity or the subtraction of nourishment, or erred through superfluity or another error. However, that quantity must be measured by the two things said in objecting, namely the extending heat and the extensible moisture according to the perfection of the organs and quantity. And because this is impeded in many ways on the part of matter, and on the part of power, and on the part of exercise or labor in which youths are occupied, and in all these ways according to defect or abundance: therefore, multiple errors occur in the quantity of men, of which it is treated in natures: and this is not the place to inquire into these errors.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that the agent is one, but the disposition is not one: because it was previously held that in the dust remains a relation to the soul, and to the natural instruments by which it perfects the body, which are hot, cold, moist, and dry, capable of being complexioned: and according to the reason of these, quantity will be given to it: because this is properly its quantity.

To the other, it must be said that it is one thing to deviate nature, and another for it to be other: because it is other and other in one man and another: but it deviates when it does not perfect that which is already in by the active and passive principle sufficiently for the perfection of quantity, whence although the production of men is from one, because, however, nature is other and other according to proximate principles, it does not deviate by constituting another and another quantity, but rather rightly attains the end according to principles accepted for the operation of quantity: and therefore in this it does not need correction.

To the other, it must be said that just as there is one form, so one figure and one quantity: whence since the form is only one in species, it cannot be had, unless the quantity is one in species and similarly the figure.

To the other, it must be said that this is true what the Philosopher says: but the reason of magnitude is taken from the principles which are in the seed, and are instruments of formative power, namely hot and moist, and these are diverse in diverse embryos and conceived seeds: and therefore naturally diverse quantity and diverse figure arise.

To the other, it must be said that that solution is absurd, as has been proven.

Articulus 2 — Whether A Glorious Body Can Be In A Place Smaller Than It Is, Or Requires A Greater, Equal, Lesser, Or Even No Place

Whether a glorious body can be in a smaller place than it is, or requires a greater, equal, smaller, or even no place?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether a glorious body can be in a smaller place than it is, or requires a greater, equal, smaller, or even no place?

It seems indeed that it is in a smaller place: because

1. Glorious bodies (as the Apostle says) will be conformed to the body of Christ: but the body of Christ can be and is in a smaller place, as is evident on the altar in the small species of bread; therefore, our bodies also.
2. Likewise, every subtle thing applied to the glorious is in a smaller part of the gross body: but glorious bodies are most subtle: therefore, applied in the place of a gross body, they can be in a smaller part of the gross body.
3. Likewise, a spirit is not compared to a place divisibly, but indivisibly: but gross bodies are in a place divisibly according to equal commensuration: therefore, a spiritual body, which is a medium between spirit and body, will indeed be in a place divisibly, but yet according to a smaller dimension than a gross body: therefore, it will be in a smaller quantity of place than it is itself.

But on the contrary, it seems that it is according to a greater dimension than its natural place: because

1. Every subtle body in nature is rare: and every rare thing occupies more of a place (as the Philosopher says) than a gross body: therefore, a glorified body will occupy more of a place than the same non-glorified: but the non-glorified occupies a place equal to itself: therefore, the glorified will occupy a greater.
2. Likewise, the more formal and spiritual a body is, the greater place it occupies, as the Philosophers say: and therefore, the place of water is greater than that of earth, and of air greater than that of water, and of fire greater than that of air, and the place of heaven is the greatest concerning those heavens which are in place: but it is evident that a glorified body is more formal and spiritual than a non-glorified one: therefore, the same glorified body occupies a greater place than itself non-glorified: but the non-glorified occupies a place equal to its dimensions: therefore, the glorified occupies a greater than its dimensions.
3. Likewise, from one handful of water (as the Philosopher says) ten handfuls of air are made: therefore, air is in a tenfold proportion to water: but the distance of subtlety between a non-glorified and a glorified body is greater than between air and water: therefore, a glorified body occupies more than in a tenfold proportion a greater place than the same non-glorified: since, therefore, the non-glorified occupies a place equal to its natural dimension, it seems that the glorious occupies a greater than the dimensions it had naturally.

Further, it seems that it requires an equal:

1. For everything that is in a place is in a place equal to itself, as the Philosopher says: but a glorious body is in a place: therefore, it is in a place equal to itself.
2. Likewise, everything that is in a place, its particles are joined to the same boundary as the particles of the place: but a glorious body is in a place: therefore, its particles and the particles of the place are joined to the same boundary.
3. Further, it is objected thus: Everything whose particles are joined with the particles of the place to the same common boundary has a place equal to itself: but thus the particles of a glorious body are joined with the particles of its place: therefore, it seems that its place is equal to itself.
4. Likewise, everything located by its dimensions makes the dimensions of the place distant, as Aristotle says in the fourth book of Physics, where he speaks of the distance of a wooden cube: but everything that makes the distance of the place by its dimension has a place equal to itself: therefore, glorious bodies have a place equal to themselves.

5. Likewise, everything circumscribed by a place has a beginning, middle, and end, according to the beginning, middle, and end of the place: but everything such has a place equal to itself: therefore, what is circumscribed by a place has a place equal to itself: but a glorious body is in a place and is circumscribed by a place: therefore, it has a place equal to itself.

Further, it seems that a glorious body is not in any place, thus:

1. Everything that is in a place has dependence on the place: but a glorious body does not have dependence on any place: therefore, it is not in a place.
2. Likewise, as the Philosopher says, a place is the preserver of what is placed: but a glorious body needs no preserver: therefore, it needs no place: but it is evident that nothing superfluous is in nature, nor in the works of God: therefore, no place is fitted by nature or by God to a glorious body.
3. Likewise, every container is nobler than the contained: but no body is nobler than the glorious: therefore, a glorious body has no containing body: but every place is a container: therefore, by superior negation, no glorious body has a place.

Response. It must be said that a glorious body has a place in some way, and in some way not. For the conditions of a place are to be more formal than the contained, and containing, and preserving, and immobile, to which there is natural motion, and to be the principle of generation, as the Philosopher says: and if these conditions of a place are all taken together, a glorious body does not have a corporeal place: for nothing is more formal, containing, and preserving, nor immobile to which its motion is as it is glorious, which has influence over it, as the principle of generation: and in this way also the lower orbs are not in a place, as the Commentator says on the physics of Aristotle. But if it is taken as the surrounding which is more congruent in the genus of bodies: then also the place is said more broadly: and thus a glorious body will be in a place in the empyrean heaven. But if place is taken most broadly: then it will be only the surrounding equal to that which is surrounded: and then a glorious body will be in a place wherever it wills, sometimes around us, sometimes in the empyrean heaven according to the will of God.

And therefore, the last part of the reasons is solved: because that does not hold, except of a place physically and properly taken. But according to what is given to mathematical and divine bodies, they do not conclude.

But all those which are penultimate I plainly concede, that no one rightly thinking can deny that they have places equal to themselves.

To the first part of the reasons, it must be said that the body of Christ is not under such a species of bread or wine as it is glorious, but rather as it is the food of the faithful, to be taken by faith, not by tooth, as we said in the treatise on the Eucharist: and therefore, our body will not be conformed to it in this, but only in that in which it is shown glorious.

To the other, it must be said that this is not true, except of the subtle which can be folded and compressed in parts, because this is the folding of parts, as the Philosopher says: but such folding and compression, since it changes the position of parts and corrupts the figure, cannot be in a glorious body, because otherwise it would take on a new figure in every new place, and its quantity would be compressed: and this is absurd to say of a glorious body.

To the other, it must be said that a spiritual body is a body according to nature, and has three dimensions: and this is not a medium in participating in place between spirit and non-glorified body, but rather an extreme: because the more spiritual it is according to the Philosophers (unless something reforms the agreement) the more it occupies a larger and greater place: and therefore, it is supposed false in the argument, namely that it is a medium in participating in place: because at least since the glorious is a body determined by its own figure and quality, it happens to it to have a place by that which happens to a gross body: and therefore, it is not necessary that it is in a larger place.

To the other part of the objections, it must be said that this is not true, although some less skilled have said it: but it is in a place equal to itself. And the three arguments introduced there do not hold, except of a body that is rare, subtle, formal, spiritual, by rarefaction: but it is not so of a glorified body: for if it were rarefied, then it would not retain its own figure, nor the stature of the fullness of the age of Christ: but its subtlety and spirituality is by the removal of ignoble qualities, which are grossness and materiality, with the same substance remaining not rarefied: as some have said of the sun, that it has parts conglobated in figure, and yet it is a subtle spiritual body: and such a gross and subtle body is in one stature, and one figure. And by this, the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 3 — Whether A Glorious Body Can Be In The Same Place With Another Non-Glorious Body

Whether a glorious body can be in the same place with another non-glorious body?

Thirdly, it is asked whether a glorious body can be in the same place with another non-glorious body?

It seems that it can, because: 1. In John 20:19, it is read that the Lord, having entered with the doors closed to the disciples, said to them: Peace be with you. But if He entered with the doors closed, at some point He was in the place of the door or wall, and did not break it. Therefore, He was then with it in the same place: but all glorious bodies will be conformed to His body: therefore, glorious bodies can be in the same place with another non-glorious body.

1. Likewise, almost all explain the subtlety or spirituality, which is one of the gifts of the body, to be such that it can pass through any body without dividing it: it is evident, however, that all glorious bodies will have such a gift: therefore, all glorious bodies can be in the same place with non-glorious ones.
2. Likewise, some object by saying that mathematicians teach that the body of the sun and other planets pass through their circles, and yet do not divide them: it is evident, however, that glorious bodies will be much more noble than celestial ones: therefore, they can do this, and they do: but this cannot be done unless they are in the same place with them: therefore, glorious bodies can be in the same place with non-glorious ones.

3. Likewise, a body is said in two ways, namely by corporeity and corpulence. By corporeity, it has dimensions: by corpulence, however, it has the filling of a place. Therefore, a body having only corporeity does not have to fill a place: but such is a celestial and glorious body: therefore, such bodies do not have to fill a place: therefore, they can be in the same place with another body.

4. Likewise, a spiritual body, which is light, is in the same place with any other body: but it is evident that those bodies are of the nature of light: therefore, they can be in the same place with any other.

These are the reasons of some that are found concerning this.

On the contrary, it is objected thus: 1. There is one distance of quantity between the same terms: but the same term is the place: therefore, between the dimensions of the locating surface, there is only one distance: if, therefore, it is granted that there are two bodies in it, there will be two bodies of one and the same distance according to quantity, which is impossible: and therefore, two bodies cannot be in the same place.

1. Likewise, let a wooden cube be immersed in water: it is evident that the water will be as distant as the distance of the quantity of the cube: either, therefore, there is one distance of the place and the cube, or two. If one: then whatever is the same to one, is the same to the other: but the distance of the quantity of the located cube is the same as the distance of the place of the cube: therefore, if something is located in the same place, it will also be the same with the distance of the place: therefore, that located thing will be the same with the quantity of the cube: therefore, two located things are one located thing, which is impossible.

But if you say that they are not the same, but two distances of the water and the cube. On the contrary: Among the distances of the locating water, there is nothing filling except the cube. If, therefore, there is something not the quantity of the cube, since this cannot be unless it is a place lacking any body, it will be a vacuum: therefore, a vacuum is something, which is impossible.

And to see this better, let the distance of the locating be a, the distance of one of the located be B, and the distance of the other be c: if it is possible that two bodies are in the same place, then thus: Whatever are one and the same to one, are the same: but according to the preceding demonstration, and Aristotle's words in the fourth book of Physics, and the exposition of the commentary in the same place, one and the same is the distance a and B: and one and the same is a and c for the same reason: therefore, one and the same is c for this maximum: Whatever are one and the same to one, etc.: is the distance in number and the same, they are the same: therefore, they are the same through c, which is impossible: because thus two bodies would be one body.

1. Likewise, it is evident that to the same common term of the place and the located, the particles are joined, as the Philosopher teaches in the Categories: if, therefore, there are two located in one place, each of them is joined to one common term with it: but they are one, whose term of conjunction and continuation is one: therefore, two located bodies in one place are one, which is again impossible.

If perhaps you say that this does not follow: because even the term of conjunction of the place and the located is one: and yet the place and the located are two. On the contrary: The term of the place and the located is the same, because according to Aristotle, one distance in number is of the place and the located: and they do not differ in distance nor in quantity, except that one is terminating, and the other terminated: but according to this, also two bodies will be both of one number of distance, and of one term to which they are joined, and they do not differ as terminating and terminated, but each is as terminated: therefore, it necessarily follows that they are one in number.

To this, some have said that this holds only for a gross body, and of that are the physical demonstrations. On the contrary: If this were true, then these demonstrations would not be taken from what is common to both gross and subtle or formal body, but they are taken from what is common to both: therefore, they hold for both: it is evident, however, that the distance of quantity is common to both: or if it agrees more with one, then it agrees more with the formal than the gross, because it has greater distances as it is formal.

1. Likewise, Avicenna objects thus: Let there be two bodies, however formal you wish, A and B: and let them be in the same place which is C: and let the center of that place be P: and let lines be drawn to the place above, which is P, and to the middle PR, and to the end PT: and let the whole place be CG FM: therefore, either the line PO is one line, or two. If you say that it is one line: therefore, of the two bodies, there is one line, and also the distances of the place: therefore, the distance of the place and the distance of the two bodies are one distance: therefore, also one quantity, and one quantum, therefore, also one thing, and one body, which is impossible.

But if you say that the line is not one: therefore, between two points, there are more straight lines than one, which is most absurd. To this, some marvelous men say that these determinations hold of mathematical quantity, not of quantity according to physical being: and they concede that two mathematical things cannot be in the same place, but two physical things can well be in the same place. But it will be shown in many ways that this is the greatest foolishness. In one way, if we compare the sayings of these, one of which is that a body does not fill a place by corporeity, but by corpulence and grossness: and another, that the mathematical cannot be in the same place with the mathematical. It is evident, however, that the mathematical has nothing of corpulence or grossness, but only corporeity. Therefore, it has nothing of the filling of a place: therefore, no other mathematical thing prohibits it from being in the same place with it. And now they say that the mathematical cannot be in the same place with the mathematical, but the physical can be with the physical. These sayings, therefore, are contradictory, and it follows against them that contradictories are simultaneously true, namely, that corpulence is the cause why two can be in the same place, and the same is not the cause of the same. In another way: because this physical demonstration is not taken according to the essence of abstract quantity, but rather according to the being it has in the quantum: and therefore it takes the line of this body and this distance, and suchlike: therefore, it is evident that that fiction is nothing. In a third way, because no Philosopher ever went this way: but they alone are men, and with them alone will this wisdom die. In a fourth way: because since all quanta are imaginable according to the Philosophers, what they say is impossible to imagine: for when two bodies are in the same place, either one is in one part of the place, and the other in another: or each is diffused through all the particles of the place. If in the first way: therefore, they are not in one proper place, but in a common one: and thus nothing prohibits a hundred men from being located in one place, because in one house, or one theater. If in the second way: then each is diffused through each: therefore, the parts of one pass through the parts of the other: and thus each is mixed with the other, which is absurd, since bodies are whole and indivisible.

Response. It seems to me to be said that in no way is it intelligible how two bodies are in the same place: and therefore I say that this according to nature and imagination is impossible to the intellect: but the contrary to the intellect and nature does not compel us except faith to posit: and therefore I say that the glorious body, by the fact that it is glorious, does not have the power of being with another body in the same place.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that this is fitting to the body of Christ: not by the fact that it is glorious, but by the fact that it is divine, whose divinity uses all that is at its command: whence when it was not glorious, thus it came forth from the womb of the Virgin Mother, that it did not open the seals of modesty: and yet other bodies do not have this.

To the other, it must be said that it is not by all by whom spirituality is thus expounded, that it is badly expounded: but rather because they are not spirits, they have the properties of spirits: and therefore they fill a place because of the distance of quantity which they have: but they are spiritual subjects to the spirit, from which what is animal and corporeal and ignoble is taken away.

To the other, it must be said that the books of those mathematicians in which those things they say are contained, have reached no one except them, since Ptolemy, Abbatemo, Thebit, Geber, Alpharabius, and others write nothing of these. Whence it is certain that they have fabricated this in their usual manner, and imposed it on the Philosophers for the establishment of their opinion.

To the other, it must be said that the distinction is valid for the proposed: because a body has to fill a place by corporeity, even with no corpulence existing, as has been proven: whence the Philosopher says that place is given to the mathematical.

To the other, it must be said that this is false, light is a body, as all authors say: and we have said something of this in the second Sentences.

Articulus 4 — Whether Two Glorious Bodies Can Be In The Same Place

Whether two glorious bodies can be in the same place?

Fourthly, it is asked, Whether a glorious body can be in the same place with another?

It seems that it can, from the sayings of the Masters: because
1. The ancients say that a glorious body has its quantity at the beck of the will: therefore, if it wills, it fills the place by it; and if it does not will, it does not fill it: therefore, it can be in the same place with another if it wills.

But that it has quantity at the beck, they prove thus: because the blessed are glorified: therefore they have all things at the beck: therefore also quantity.

1. Likewise, they have their visibility at the beck: therefore also quantity: for they are seen when they will, and when they will, they are not seen.

Against this, it is objected thus: because with the quantity remaining, it is impossible for the quantity to be made smaller without its contraction, or to be made larger without extension: therefore it is impossible for quantity to have at the beck, that it is greater and smaller, and with another body in the same place, and by itself in a place.

Response. To this, I think it must be said that glorious bodies do not have quantity at the beck in such a way that they can vary it when they will: but they have quantity and quality at the beck in such a way that nothing is contrary to their will concerning them.

To the proposition, it must be said that when it is said that the blessed have all things at the beck, it is understood of those things which are of the substance of beatitude: and others have in such a way that nothing will be contrary to their will concerning them.

And by this, the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 5 — What The Truth Of Human Nature Is

What is the truth of human nature?

What is the truth of human nature?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said, there, B, "For earthly matter does not perish for God," etc.

Here it is necessary to inquire about the truth of human nature, and three things are inquired before the Letter, namely, what is the truth of human nature? Secondly, whether it is one in all humans? And thirdly, whether something from nourishment is converted into human truth?

To the first, it is objected thus:
1. Anselm says that truth is a rectitude perceptible only by the mind: since this definition of truth is of all truth, but human truth or the truth of human nature is a certain truth, it seems that it is not convertible with this definition.

1. Likewise, the truth of the human race is said, which is not perceptible only by the mind, but also corporally: therefore it seems that this definition does not suit it.
2. If for this reason it is said that truth is taken according to what Augustine says, that truth is the true entity of a thing: but this again does not seem to fit: because the true entity of a thing is everything that is in the body of a human, and yet this will not all appear in the resurrection: but whatever is of the truth of human nature, all will appear in the resurrection: therefore it seems that the aforementioned assignment of Augustine does not fit it.
3. But if it is said that truth is taken according to the Philosopher Avicenna saying that truth is the indivision of act from potency: but this truth of human nature is not after death, because then act is divided from potency: but the truth of human nature always remains, and will appear in the resurrection: therefore the said definition does not fit the truth of human nature.

Response. It must be said that the truth of human nature is said in two ways, namely abstractly and concretely. Abstractly, according to this, it is the indivision of potency and act: because this makes a thing have a true nature according to act, that is, according to the completion of its form, just as the truth of a stone is that by which the true being of a stone is, and the truth of a human is that by which the true being of a human is. However, taking it concretely, then the truth of human nature is the true nature of a human: and this is what is completed by the natural form of a human, which is the rational soul, by substantial completion, not accidental, just as something is in the nature of a human by accidental augmentation, and something falls away from the nature of a human by violence and accidental detriment, as will be clear below: and what indeed inheres by accidental augmentation is not of the truth of human nature. But what it has by violence or detriment of matter, it is present by virtue and nature, although it is absent by accident: and therefore it is of the truth of human nature by power and virtue, as Augustine says: and in this way, it is inquired here about the truth of human nature: and this is true according to what is opposed to being mixed with foreign nature, just as we say true gold is unmixed with other metal.

That truth is thus taken is clear from Hilary in Book V on the Trinity, where he says thus: "It is not doubtful to anyone that truth is taken from nature and from virtue, as for example it is said: True wheat is that which, structured in the ear, surrounded by awns, and threshed from the husks, and ground into flour, and baked into bread, and taken as food, has rendered from itself both the nature of bread and its function." Therefore, it is sometimes said to be true from its true nature perfected according to virtue and operation. Hence the same: "It is not taken from this that the same is understood by this word if it is said to me, 'fire is,' but it is not true fire: or 'water is,' but it is not true: and I ask, in what does the truth of the same genus differ from the truth of the same thing? For what is fire cannot be unless it is true, nor can water, remaining in nature, lack being true. Destroy the water, which is water, and by that, you can abolish that it is not true."

Therefore, it must be said to the first that Anselm's definition does not fit except in the genus: and therefore it is necessary to add that it is the rectitude of human nature perceptible only by the mind.

To the other, it must be said that although it is in the body, it is not corporeal, but rather spiritual and formal: and therefore perceptible only by the mind, and not by sense or imagination: because the exclusive term placed in the definition of truth excludes the perception of sense and imagination.

To the other, it must be said that the true entity of a thing is only that in which, as in a substantial form, entity is rooted according to act and truth: other things are accidental influences and effluences.

To the other, it must be said that the truth of human nature is not after death, except as human nature itself, namely in potency, and therefore that argument concludes nothing inconvenient.

And by this, the solution to all is clear.

Nor should it be inquired here about the definitions of the truth of a sign or speech: because we speak here of the incomplex truth by which a human is called a true human.

Articulus 6 — Whether One Truth Of Human Nature Is In All Human Beings

Whether one truth of human nature is in all humans?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether one truth is in all humans?

It seems that it is so: because

1. Whatever things proceed from one naturally, are one in that: but all humans proceed from one naturally: therefore they are one in that: but that part of matter which will always appear under the nature of man, is true by the truth of human nature: therefore it seems that the truth of human nature is one in all.

1. Likewise, By one act nothing is done except into one: but by one act, all who were in the loins of the tither were tithed: therefore they were one in his loins: but here this is called the truth of human nature: therefore all the matter of man was in his loins: therefore the whole human race was one nature of matter in the loins of Adam: but by the nature of matter they were in his loins: therefore all humans are one truth of human nature, or have one truth of human nature.
2. Likewise, Human nature could not be infected, unless where it was wholly one: but by one and simple infection it was infected in Adam: therefore in Adam it was wholly one and simple: but all have that for the truth of human nature, which thus descended from Adam: therefore, etc.

On the contrary, whatever natural signate is not divisible into infinity, although the mathematical is divided into infinity: but the signate seed was natural: therefore, etc. And because we have disputed much about this in book II of the Sentences, these suffice for the present: because there both it is discussed, and the opinions which are around this, namely if matter not understood by quantity is divisible, as some have said, and whether it is possible for it to be multiplied in itself without the addition of nourishment, and other such things.

Therefore, it must be said to the question, that the truth of human nature by reason is one in all humans, but in reality and subject it is many.

To the first objection, therefore, it must be said, that humans are not in some signate individual of which each has taken a part, but they are from one originally, as was said in the second of the Sentences.

To the second and third it must be said, that by one act it was tithed and infected, which was originally one, and not by some assigned part of matter: for I consider this frivolous, that according to this the whole work of nature would be miraculous, and it is directly against Augustine in book XXII of the City of God as will be clear in the following problem.

Articulus 7 — Whether Anything From Nourishment Is Converted Into Human Nature

Whether something from nourishment is converted into human nature?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether something from nourishment is converted into human nature?

It seems that it is not: 1. For in Matthew 15:17, it is said: "Everything that enters the mouth goes into the stomach and is expelled into the latrine." But what is expelled is not converted into the truth of human nature. Therefore, etc.

1. Also, in the same place, the Gloss of Bede says thus: Any very thin humor or liquid food, when it has been cooked and digested in the veins and limbs, is expelled through hidden passages, which the Greeks call pores, into the latrine.
2. Also, the same reasoning applies to a certain thing and to all nourishment: but it is evident that something is expelled into the latrine: therefore, all nourishment is expelled into the latrine.
3. Also, the soul is owed to the organic body by itself: but the organic is not made from nourishment, but rather from radical and seminal moisture: therefore, the soul is not owed to the nutritional by itself: but there is no other truth of human nature: therefore, such nourishment is not of the truth of human nature.
4. Also, it seems harsh if that which is flesh of an ox by substance, rises again: but this follows, as some say, if nourishment is converted into the truth of human nature. For the flesh of an ox is eaten: if therefore nourishment is converted into the truth of human nature, the flesh of an ox is converted into it: but whatever is of the truth of human nature will rise again: therefore, the flesh of an ox eaten will rise again.

5. Also, the resurrection will be according to that which we were in the loins of Adam: but we were not in the loins of Adam according to nutritional substance: therefore, the resurrection will not be according to nutritional substance.

6. Also, the mode of the truth of human nature is the same in all humans: but in infants recently born, nutritional flesh is not of the truth of human nature: and yet they will rise in the quantity of the age of thirty years: therefore, it seems that neither in others is nutritional flesh of the truth of human nature.

On the contrary, it is objected thus:

1. On that passage of the Epistle to the Philippians 2:7: "And being found in appearance as a man," Augustine says that some food changes a man and is changed, just as food which is changed into the body and changes it into strength: therefore, not all is expelled through the latrine.

2. Also, whatever is exhaustible by hunger and restorable by the refreshment of food, with the substance of the body remaining one and the same, that is nutritional flesh: much flesh of man is thus exhaustible and restorable: therefore, much flesh of man is nutritional. This is evident by itself, and from the hypothesis of those saying nothing is converted into the body from food, because if it is converted, then that into which it is converted will be nutritional. This is written in Book XXII, by these words: "Of the City of God." From this the proposition is evident. For whatever flesh hunger exhausts, it is certainly exhaled into the air: whence we said that the omnipotent God can recall what has fled.

3. There Augustine asks: If someone is fed on the flesh of another, and changes it into his own flesh, in what will that flesh rise again? Which question is none, if nourishment does not pass into the body of man.

4. Also, just as it is of the truth of water, according to the saying of Hilary, of which I can say, this is water or true water: so it is of the truth of human nature, of which I can say, this is the nature of man, or true nature of man: but such is flesh generated from this nourishment: therefore, nutritional flesh is of the truth of human nature. The minor is evident there by the words of Augustine.

5. Also, if the nature of man which is matter is multiplied in itself, as they say, this cannot be except in one of three ways, namely by the addition of something extraneous, and by the creation of matter in which the form is multiplied, or because it is so naturally that one is drawn from another as a part from a part. If in the first way: then it does not differ whether the substance of food or another is added, and thus food can be converted into the body and into the truth of human nature. If in the second way: then matter would be continuously created for it, and again that would be alien, and insofar as it is alien it does not differ even if the already created matter of food is added. But if in the third way. Against: What makes something from itself, always makes it: human nature multiplies itself from itself: therefore, it always multiplies itself: therefore, its multiplication from itself will never stop, which is false, because if it were so, even growth would never stop, and we see that this stops.

6. Also, it seems according to this, that growth should be more intense in time when it stops, than when it begins: because when something is drawn from itself, less remains there than was before, and thus it resists less the action of multiplying: therefore, it will be more rapid then in multiplying, which is absurd.

But if you say that it multiplies without its diminution. Against: That one part becomes two equally first cannot be, except by the exit from potentiality to act: potentiality, however, does nothing: therefore, some agent would be posited there besides what is already there, whatever that may be.

If it is said that this is heat. Against: It acts only by rarefying and dispersing: therefore, the body multiplied in itself is rarer and more subtle than not multiplied: therefore, rarer and more subtle are the bodies of the old than of infants, which is absurd.

1. Also, what similar is found in the whole of nature, where act is drawn from act by multiplication, that is, flesh from flesh without any change, and many equal quantities from one smaller than themselves without addition?

2. Also, if there is any truth in natural philosophy, then generation is from the surplus of nourishment, which is separated by the fourth digestion: but none of such things is converted into human nature, as the adversary says: therefore, from none of such things is anything generated: therefore, it has been philosophized in vain, whatever has ever been said by Philosophers according to the marvelous philosophy of these.

3. Also, in the first book of Generation and Corruption, in the chapter on growth, the Philosopher says that food nourishes insofar as it is potentially flesh, but increases insofar as it is potentially as much flesh: therefore, it must be that it is converted into the human body.

4. Also, according to this, the whole work of nature would be miraculous, which is absurd.

5. Also, to what does natural heat in the body avail? For according to the marvelous wisdom of these, it does not act by increasing, and food is not placed in the body, except to be the matter of heat, lest the subject be burned: therefore, it would be better if heat were not there: because thus we would not need food, and then God would have perfected His work in a shorter way, which is ridiculous.

6. Also, everything that is made here by some active and heat, does not act by increasing: therefore, something else acts it: not coldness, because that motion is towards the center rather by diminishing through constriction within, than by increasing through multiplication outward.

If you say that it is from the substantial form, this is a new philosophy, that the substantial form acts in nature, when it is nothing and its contrary.

1. Also, if the saying of Bede is considered valid, saying that nourishment does not pass into the body of man, why is it not as valid to seek from him a remedy against dropsy, with Galen being despised? For Bede says that dropsy is a humor under the skin born from the defect of the bladder: but curing the bladder, cures dropsy. Galen, however, says that the liver should be cured, because it is born from the defect of the liver. And I wonder if these inquire, making the cure of Bede, with Galen being despised.

Response. It must be said that it is ridiculous to say that nothing from food is converted into the human body, and such sayings of certain theologians make theology laughable among the learned.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that "everything" is distributed for subjective parts, not integral: because whatever species enters the mouth there, has much impurity and little purity: and therefore, every species is expelled into the latrine, although not entirely.

To the other, it must be said that it seems to me little to be cared about the sayings of Bede, where he does not speak of faith and morals: because he was ignorant of natures. Yet, lest we seem to flee, it must be said that he speaks of the part of food according to the matter of nutritional flesh and not according to the species: because the Philosopher says that every flesh is increased according to the species, and not every is increased according to the matter: because the matter of similar members flows in and out, but not the species: and in this way, after digestion, every is nourished and increased according to the species, as is proved in the first book of Generation and Corruption.

To the other, it must be said that it is not the same reasoning about one and about all: because one is according to nature by accident, and one is completing quantity, and the other is restoring only what is lost: and therefore it is false that the same reasoning is about one and the other, as will be evident below.

To the other, it must be said that the soul is first owed to the organic body, and secondly it is owed to the adjunct organic for the completion of the quantity of the organs, and thirdly it is owed to restoring only what is lost, and fourthly to that which is united to the organic and material: and according to all these modes, it is said to be the truth of human nature, and the first which is from radical moisture, will all appear in the resurrection. The second, however, is there actually in the living, and potentially in infants, and also all will appear, unless it is taken from the feeding of human flesh, as will be said below.

Of the third, however, there will appear as much as is fitting: and of the fourth, nothing: because it has only an accidental and unnatural union to the immortal soul.

To the other, it must be said that this seems harsh to the unskilled, who say there that the flesh of an ass as an ass changes them, not knowing the sayings of the wise, that nourishment is first dissimilar, and finally similar, and then it is not the flesh of an ass, but proximate potentiality to the flesh of man. And in their argument, there is a fallacy of the figure of speech, as is this paralogism: Whatever you eat, is converted into nourishment: but you eat raw flesh of an ass: therefore, raw flesh of an ass is converted into your nourishment.

To the other, it must be said that in the loins of Adam we were not according to any designated matter, but according to original matter, as has been said.

To the third, it must be said that in infants is all the nourishment, which was to lead to the perfection of quantity, potentially: actually, however, as Augustine says, the power of creating and glorifying will supply.

And by this, the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 8 — How Many Are The Modes Of Dissolution; And In Whom Will The Rib Rise Again, In Adam Or In Eve; And How Will Those Who Eat Human Flesh Rise Again

How many modes of dissolution are there? And, in whom will the rib rise again, in Adam or in Eve? And, how will those who consume human flesh rise again?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, B, shortly after the first words: But into whatever dust or ashes it may be dissolved, etc.

First, it is asked why in the Text so many modes of dissolution of the human body are posited, namely dust, ashes, habit, air, the substance of other bodies, elements, food of animals and humans, and the flesh of animals and humans?

Further, it is asked concerning the rib of Adam, whether it will rise again in Adam or in Eve?

It seems that it will rise again in Adam by the rule given in the Text: because namely the soul of Adam first vivified it in the part of the human body: therefore it will rise again in Adam, as it seems: but if this is true, then Eve will not rise again, because she was entirely taken from that rib.

Further, a grave question of Augustine is asked, namely concerning him who is nourished by human flesh, in whom will that flesh rise again?

It is said that it will rise again in him who first animated it, because it is as if borrowed from another: then it is asked, What will rise again in him who was fed with that flesh?

1. For it seems that he will rise again with defect, which is false: because, as was previously held, they will rise again incorrupt.
2. Likewise, suppose that he who is fed with human flesh generates a son from the surplus of that food: then it is certain that from the moist seed the organic substance of the born is formed. Therefore, if this is restored first, then no organic substance will rise again in such a born: therefore it will not rise again, which is inconvenient.
3. Likewise, the question is aggravated thus: Suppose that someone is nourished from animated members in which there is nothing except organic substance, and generates from that surplus: for it is certain that it is first in truth in both, namely in him who is taken as food, and in him who is born from such food. But it is certain that it cannot rise again in both: therefore one of these will not rise again, which is inconvenient.

4. To this, some have said that such a...

The manner of food is impeded by the order of nature: because man ought to be nourished by vegetables and beasts, and not by human flesh: and therefore it cannot be food from such. But we see this to be nothing. For Aristotle says in the Ethics concerning the feral ones, that they are nourished by human flesh, as Medea who incorporated her two own sons in one meal: and in the Lamentations of Jeremiah, iv, 10: The hands of compassionate women have boiled their own children: they became their food, in the destruction of the daughter of my people. Therefore, the position made seems possible.

Response. To this it must be said, that in truth, as said elsewhere, there is a twofold moisture, namely radical and nutritive. The radical, however, is that which is in the substance of the seed which is formed by the formative power into organs. The formative power, however, is in the seed from the soul of the father alone, having heat as an instrument with a threefold heat, namely of the soul, of the heavens, and of fire: and from the heat of fire is dissolving and distending, but from the heat of the heavens moving into form and inducing form, and from the heat of the soul it moves to life and soul. Similarly, there is also cold there in a threefold power: for the cold of the element is coagulating, and the cold of the heavens terminating to form, and insofar as it is an instrument of the soul, it contains the complexible vivifiable. And similarly it is with the moist and dry, as the Authors say. This moisture, however, is nutritive superfluous in the generator, and radical or seminal in the generated: and therefore it is substantial to the generated, and accidental to the generator. The nutritive moisture, however, is twofold. One which by the power of nature is drawn to the nourishment of the seminal moisture, and this among others is more substantial after the seminal moisture. The other, however, which is acquired externally through food, and this is for a threefold use, namely for the nourishment of quantity according to the perfection of stature, and for restoring what is lost so that being and life may continue: and the third which is accidental, which arises from the excess of food, and is called by the Philosopher unnatural augmentation, as those who cool the places of digestion or have them cold become ventrose: for in these the natural heat is converting, not consuming: and much viscosity and fatness arises in them beyond nature. Therefore, the general rule in the resurrection is that the nourishment taken from these moistures will rise in that in which it is more nobly animated to life.

And this being supposed, it must be said to the first, that he posits so many, because the modes of resolutions are either natural, or through violent corruption into another body. If in the first way: then either the resolution is complete, or incomplete. If complete, then it is into the elements. Incomplete, so that something still remains, either as to the subtle parts, or as to the gross parts. If in the first way, then in two ways: for either it is a part more closely spiritual, or remote. And in the first way, breath: in the second way, aura, because both parts are airy vaporous due to the vaporous moisture exhaling from the body and expiring, and the grosser is more called breath, but the more subtle and approaching air is called aura. But if as to the gross parts, either this is by the desiccation of the continuing moisture, or by the exsiccation of the moisture extracting moisture. And in the first way it is dust, in the second way ashes. But if it is through violent corruption, it is the incorporation of man into another body of man: either this is as to the vegetable, or as to the sensible. If in the first way, it is that which passes into the substance of other bodies like vegetables, as the poet says:

The soil luxuriates with Phrygian blood. And roses planted in soil manured with human blood bring forth roses more quickly, as Hermes says in Alchemy as to the sensible: either according to the way of incorporation, or according to the terminus. And indeed in the first way it is what he calls the food of animals or men: in the second way it is what he calls the flesh of men or animals: and from this also it is taken, that food is converted into the flesh of men.

To the other it must be said, that Adam was made in two ways, namely according to those things which are required for the individual, and according to those things which are required for the principle of the human race which he was. And in the first way indeed the rib was never of the truth of human nature in Adam, but in the second way; and therefore it will rise in what is originated from him, and yet Adam will rise without diminution.

To the other it must be said, that one nourished from human flesh can be nourished in two ways. In one way indeed from that which is from the power of human nature in the first or second or third or fourth, and this whole will be restored in the first. Or he can be nourished from that which was in the fifth way from the truth, and this remains in the nourished, because it was never of the integrity of the first except by accident, and therefore it has a nobler being in the second than in the first.

To what is objected, it must be said that no one suffers defect from his own: and if it is, God will supply, as Augustine expressly says about dead infants.

To the other it must be said, that this will rise in the second: because it has a nobler being in the second, than in the first, because in the first it is from nutritive moisture: and in the second from radical and spermatic or seminal moisture.

To the other it must be said, that that case is difficult: yet without prejudice I say, that when the second is nourished by such offspring whose members are formed and animated, I say that there is a twofold moisture, namely seminal, and nutritive drawn in the womb: and because the species is not converted, but rather much is cast off from the matter, it seems to be said that from the cast off as impure the body of the first is restored: but from the drawn and sown the body of the second is restored by the omnipotent God, to whom by dying our bodies do not perish, but are transformed for the better: and thus it is clear, that both will rise, and what is lacking, the divine hand of wisdom, which created all things, supplies.

To the conclusion, however, induced it seems to be conceded, as it was proven by objecting to the contrary.

Articulus 9 — Whether A Man Will Rise The Same In Number With Respect To Matter, Such That The Matter Of Each Member Returns

Whether man rises again the same in number with respect to matter, such that the matter of each member returns?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, B, after the beginning: "Therefore the earthly matter which becomes a corpse when the soul departs, etc."

For it seems false what is said here: because

1. The Philosopher says that just as the whole soul is related to the whole body, so a part is to a part: therefore the matter perfectible by sight is not perfectible by hearing: therefore it will be incongruously ordered if it returns to hearing: but nothing will be incongruous there: therefore the matter of each member returns to itself: therefore it is false what is said in the Letter.
2. Likewise, it seems that it is not necessary for all the matter to return as the Letter says: because spiritual bodies need less of matter: but those will be spiritual especially with respect to the good: therefore they will have less of matter: therefore it is false what is said, that all the matter will return.
3. Likewise, the acts of different merits are made through different organs: therefore it is just that the matter of those organs be reiterated in those members in which they exercised meritorious acts: therefore it is necessary that it returns to the same members.
4. Likewise, just as there is a certain truth of the universal body, so there is a truth of the particular member, of which it can be said, "this is the true nature of a hand or foot": therefore just as by the power of universal truth all the matter will return to the whole, so by the power of the particular member the middle part will return to the determined part.
5. Likewise, one member is nobler than another; therefore it is incongruously done if the nobler is converted into the ignobler, or vice versa: therefore it seems that it is necessary that to each member its own matter be returned.

Response. It must be said that each part has its entity from the form: and therefore whatever variation is made in matter, or confusion of parts of matter, always one truth remains from the act of one form: and this is what Augustine intends. Hence, although conversion could be made, I nevertheless think, saving better judgment, that each will return to the same member in which it was: but yet it is possible to be otherwise, as is said in the Letter.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that this only makes for the congruity of return: but there will be another harmony of parts in the resurrection: and therefore this objection does not hold.

To the second, it must be said that, as was previously evident, glorification will not be by way of subtraction of parts of matter, but rather by way of subtraction of properties pertaining to the state of ignobility.

To the third, it must be said that merit is not of the member except instrumentally: but just as the act is of the whole, so also is the reward: and therefore no injury will be done to anyone, in whatever way they are rewarded.

To the fourth, it must be said that the truth which will appear in the resurrection is especially from the immortality of the soul, and the soul does not have this from the parts, but from the whole, namely from itself and from God: and therefore the parts do not confer this kind of truth except in a certain respect, namely insofar as they are united to the whole: and therefore also in whatever part it rises again, it is well done with it.

To the fifth, it must be said that if the harmony which now is were to remain, and the nobility of perpetuity were from the members, then that reasoning would proceed: but, as was evident above, neither of these is true: and therefore variation can be made in the parts of matter, as Augustine clearly says in the Letter.

Articulus 10 — Whether All Hairs And Nails Return In The Resurrection; And Whether The Truth Of Human Nature Is An Accident

Whether all hair and nails return in the resurrection? and, Whether the truth of human nature is an accident?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, B, around the middle: Otherwise if hair returns, etc.

1. For it seems this is against the Gospel of Luke, xxi, 18, where it is said: And, etc. Therefore it seems, the hair from the head that all will return.
2. Likewise, in the text it suggests, that although hairs do not return to hairs, nevertheless the matter of hairs and nails will return to the mass of the body: and this does not seem to be necessary since the whole integrity is preserved without this.

Further, it is asked for the sake of this inseparability, Whether the truth of human nature is substance, or accident?

However, it seems that it is an accident: because 1. The substance of each thing is in one way: but truth is in a diverse way, as it has been held according to five ways above: therefore it is an accident.

1. Likewise, everything that follows the being of man, is of the genus of accidents, as Boethius says: but truth follows the being of man: therefore it is of the genus of accidents.

On the contrary, the true entity of a thing can never be an accident: but truth is the true entity of a thing: therefore, etc.

Response. It must be said, that hairs are generated from the dry vapor of nourishment, which is dried when it reaches the air through the pores. Nails, however, are from the dry earthly matter expelled to the surface by the heat of the heart. And therefore, as Augustine says, they are not of the truth according to themselves, but insofar as they contribute to beauty: and therefore also insofar as they perfect beauty, they will rise again, and the rest will be cut off.

To the other it must be said, that it does not intend that they return to the mass, but it is an example, that it is not necessary that all material parts return to the same members, since what seems less, even certain parts can be discarded.

To what is further asked, it must be said that truth is said to be twofold, namely essential, and participated. Essential is the substantial form differing by reason: because truth is said insofar as it is the principle of cognition in act or habit: form however insofar as it gives being. Participated truth, however, is that which is had from the members from the perfect parts of the form, and this also is substance or potency following the substance of the form: and if it is such a potency, then indeed it is an accident, which is a natural potency, and is rooted as in its cause in the substance of the form, which perfects the matter and the parts of matter.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 11 — Whether The Same Man Who Died Will Rise Again

Whether the same man who died will rise again?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says there, B, shortly after the middle: It would not matter to his integrity, which is a part of the material, etc.

For from this it seems to follow that not the same man in number will rise again who died: because

1. The image which is restored is not the same in number.
2. Furthermore, whatever things do not have the same substantial form in number, those are not the same in number: but the substantial form of the dying and rising man is not the same in number: therefore the dying and rising are not the same in number. The first is evident per se. The second is evident from this, that the substantial form is humanity, and that perishes in death, because a dead man is not a man: but the form which has passed into nothing does not return the same in number, because the Philosopher says that the health in the morning is not the same as in the evening.
3. Likewise, the Philosopher at the end of the book On Generation and Corruption: Whatever things have a moved corporeal substance, are not repeated the same in number: but man thus has a moved corporeal substance: therefore he is not repeated the same in number.
4. Likewise, whatever things are generable and corruptible do not participate in divine being in the individual, but in the species: but man is generable and corruptible: therefore, etc.: therefore it does not happen that he returns according to the same individual, but only according to the identity of the species.

Response, It must be said that the likeness which Augustine adduces is similar in part:

because in bronze the same form, which is the figure, does not remain: but in the rising man the same form, which is the rational soul, remains.

To the other it must be said that there are two ways to respond to this. For if we say with Avicenna that the form of the whole is other than the form of the part which is the soul, just as the form of the whole is predicable as man and animal of this man and that: then that form is abstractly signified, although improperly, by what I call humanity, and that does not remain except in potency after death in the principles composing the whole, of which it is the form: and by reason of that form the individual does not have that it is the same in number, but it has the species only which is indifferent to the same in number and different: but from this soul thus completing the matter and from this matter it has that it is the same in number: and therefore it does not follow, if it does not have the same form of the whole which is of the species or genus or being, that it is not the same in number.

Furthermore, the same species is, although the being is not the same which it had before and after in this individual: and therefore it is the same in number in species with the prior man, nor is the species destroyed by death except accidentally, namely according to this being which it has according to this state in this.

But if we agree with Averroes and Aristotle that the form of the whole is the form of the matter, differing however by reason, as he seems to wish in the seventh of the first Philosophy: then it is clear that it is the same in number, and the form is not destroyed according to itself, or according to its being, but only with respect to the reason of predication of the composite, because the composite is dissolved.

To the other it must be said that this is understood of those things which altogether have a corruptible substance: but such a thing is not man, because the soul is perpetual, and from it the body acquires a certain potency for incorruption.

To the other it must be said that this is understood of those things which are generated according to themselves wholly, that is, whose form according to itself wholly is brought forth by the act of nature from the matter: and such a thing is not man, whose rational soul is made by creation, as Aristotle says in the first of the Causes of the properties of the elements and planets, and in the book XVI of Animals he says that the intellect is not brought forth from matter, like the vegetative and sensitive, but enters from outside.

Articulus 12 — Whether Mutilated Thieves Will Rise With Bodies Whole

Whether mutilated robbers will rise with whole bodies?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, C, §1: "This, however, is to be understood in the bodies of the saints," etc.

For it is inquired concerning those who are first robbers and are mutilated in robbery, and afterwards are converted and become saints, whether the mutilated parts will be restored to them glorified?

It seems that they will not: because this member will never cooperate with sanctity: therefore it ought never to be rewarded in glorification.

To this it must be said that they are glorified, and the reason is the opposite of what was said above concerning the wicked: because merit belongs to the whole man according to the soul: and therefore the will to merit in that member, if it is had, will be reckoned as an act, by reason of which that power of the soul will be glorified in its member restored to it.

Articulus 13 — Whether After The Resurrection The Bodies Of The Saints Are Impassible

Whether after the resurrection of the dead the bodies of the saints are impassible?

Then by reason of what he says, there, C, § 1, after the beginning: Without any vice, without any deformity, just as without any corruption, etc.

The question is about the impassibility of the bodies of the Saints.

And four things are asked, namely, whether they are impassible? And secondly, In what manner are they impassible? Thirdly, Whether all are equally impassible? And fourthly, What is the difference between being free from vice and deformity and corruption? All of which he sets forth in the Letter,

Against this it is objected thus:
1. Whatever has the same potency with passible things, those are passible: the bodies of the glorious have the same potency with passible things: therefore they are passible. The first is evident by itself. The second is proved by this, that the glorious and the non-glorious are of the same nature, which is passible in the non-glorious.

1. Likewise, Every composite of passible things is passible: the glorious body is composed of passible things: therefore it is passible.
2. Likewise, Every heterogeneous thing in parts is composed of parts suffering differently: every human body, glorious and non-glorious, is heterogeneous in parts: therefore it is composed of parts suffering differently: therefore it is passible in its parts.
3. Likewise, If anyone says that they are impassible by grace or glory, but passible by nature. On the contrary: Everything is more denominated by natural disposition than by actual, and by nature rather than by another form: therefore they ought rather to be called passible than impassible.
4. Likewise, Since every accident flows from substance, an accident contrary to the substance itself cannot flow from substance: therefore from a passible substance never flows an accident that makes that substance impassible: therefore no accident can be in such a substance by which it is said to be impassible: therefore since grace and glory are accidental, it seems that those bodies cannot be said to be impassible by grace or glory.
5. Likewise, Grace and glory are perfections of nature: but perfection never opposes the perfect: therefore, since the perfect is passible, impassibility will never be caused by perfection, because passible and impassible are opposed.

6. Likewise, The Philosopher says that every natural substance is passible, especially composed of contraries: if therefore that substance remains, it will always be passible: but that substance will remain in the resurrection: therefore in the resurrection it will always be passible.
7. Likewise, Every complex is informed and distinguished by passible qualities: therefore it will remain passible.

On the contrary of this is what is said,

1. 1 Corinthians 15:54: Death is swallowed up. But death is not swallowed up in victory unless passibility is swallowed up. Therefore the bodies of the saints will not be passible then.
2. Likewise, Revelation 21:4: And death shall be no more. From this the same is taken that neither mourning, nor crying, nor pain shall be anymore, because the former things have passed away.
3. Likewise, 1 Corinthians 15:42: It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption. But everything incorruptible is impassible. Therefore the bodies of the saints will be impassible.
4. Likewise, Matthew 13:43: Then the righteous will shine like the sun, etc. But the sun is impassible. Therefore also the righteous.

Response. It must be said that the bodies of the saints are impassible contrary to lesion.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the potency of passibility is twofold, namely disposed and indisposed. And indisposed is twofold, namely disposed to either, and joined to the necessity of the contrary act. And disposed indeed is in the mortal body. Indisposed, however, was in some way in Adam, although it was somewhat disposed to the contrary, namely if he did not sin, he would not suffer. Joined, however, to the necessity of the contrary, is in the glorious body, where there is no potency of suffering except in the root: and the impossibility of suffering is from the perfection of the form to glory.

To the other, it must be said that the components of the human body will not retain active and passive qualities, except as they are constituting complexionality, but not as to this that they act or suffer in the discourse of complexion: and therefore they will never induce any lesion. However, some have said that the elements will be there in the elemented as to the first being of the element only. And elemental qualities will be there as in the root and potency, and not as to any action. But the first is truer and more natural.

To the other, it must be said that that heterogeneous body has suffered all those things which it was necessary to suffer for complexion and formation: but thereafter passion is removed from it because of the victory of the form from glory over matter, because matter is not possible for the reception of any violent act of lesion, just as neither is the matter of celestial bodies from the victory of the form over matter: for every passion is of matter or composite, whose matter by the form is not removed from passibility and led to the impassibility of the form.

To the other, it must be said that from the natural which is the form, denomination ought to be, unless it is so that the form cannot perfect and convert the matter to itself in whole, as now the form of those things which are generated and corrupted imperfectly obtains the matter, but then it will obtain through the habit of glory in whole: and therefore from the act of that form they will be impassible, because it cannot act to the separation of the form from the matter in whole or in part.

To the other, it must be said that there is a twofold accident, namely caused by the substance in which it is, and that is not the perfection of it: and there is an accident caused by a superior substance to the perfection of the inferior, as is grace and glory: and this does not flow from the substance in which it is, nor is it contrary to it, but rather is the final perfection of it, and agrees with the form, and is not contrary except to materiality and privation: and therefore nothing prohibits denomination from it.

To the other, it must be said that as it was evident, grace and glory do not have contrariety to the perfect from them, but rather agreement, because they help the form to that which it is and cannot from natural things: for it is the form to remove privation from matter, and it removes it: but it cannot remove the potency of returning privation because of dissolving the complexion, except through grace and glory: and therefore grace and glory are added to it by God: because they raise nature to a higher state in which the continuity of the body cannot be dissolved.

To the other, it must be said that this is true as to the first components: but those are never overcome by the perfection of the mixed, so that they cannot further act and suffer to the destruction of the mixed.

To the other, it must be said that complexional qualities cannot act there, except to the state of the mixed, and not to the excess of one over the other, as has been said often: and this is effected in such a body through grace and glory.

Articulus 14 — How The Bodies Of The Saints Are Said To Be Impassible

How are the bodies of the saints said to be impassible?

Secondly, it is asked, In what mode of impassibility are they said to be impassible?

1. For either impassibility denotes the privation of the act of suffering, or the privation of potency. If in the first mode: then this gift was also had by the body of Adam in paradise, which is false. But if it deprives potency, since that is rooted in nature, it seems that it also deprives nature, and thus those bodies would not be of the same nature as these, which is false.
2. Moreover, Passion is said from the Greek "nafsiv," which is to receive: but those bodies are or seem to be susceptible, in that they are at least altered according to the senses, since they see and hear, and are affected according to other senses: therefore it seems that not all impassibility is removed from them, but some.

3. Moreover, Passion is twofold, namely of the division of the continuous, and of the sense of pain without division, as when the hot touches the cold. Therefore, either those bodies are said to be impassible according to the first mode, or according to the second. If it is said that in the first mode, even the bodies of the damned will be impassible: because they cannot be cut, nor divided, nor corrupted. But if in the second mode: then also the body of Adam in the first state had the impassibility of the gift, which is false.

4. Moreover, it seems that this mode of impassibility cannot agree with a complexioned body: because touch perceives only the excellent qualities of touch: but the excellent acts upon that which it touches, and suffers excess: therefore if the glorious body feels according to touch, of necessity it can suffer according to touch, if that which is touched is intensified.

1. Moreover, Either this impassibility follows the will, or the necessity of nature. If the will: then it is such as Adam's, namely that it does not suffer if he does not wish to sin, and if he wishes to sin, he suffers. But if the necessity of nature: then it must be rooted in an impassible nature, which is false.

2. Moreover, The will is nobler than nature, because the will is free, and not bound to necessity: therefore the impassibility which follows the will is nobler than that which follows nature: but the glorious body has the noblest impassibility, therefore it seems that it has that which follows the will. And if so, again further it follows, that it is of the same reason with the impassibility of Adam.

3. Moreover, A habit perfecting nature perfects it according to the mode and act of nature: but that impassibility does not so perfect the glorious body: therefore it does not follow nature. The first is evident by itself. The second, however, from the comparison which Augustine makes of the states of free will and immortality, which is had in the book of the Sentences: because the ability not to sin follows the ability not to die, and to necessarily sin is to necessarily die, and to not be able to sin is to not be able to die.

Response. It must be said that all passibility is from matter, and impassibility from form: and therefore habits exalting form over matter to remove privation and dispositions contrary to form perfect impassibility, and in man they cannot be except by grace and glory, thus containing agents and patients, so that they never act to the discursive of complexion or division of the composition of parts.

However, how this is done can be understood as Aristotle suggests and the Commentator explains. Elements are preserved in the mixture according to their substantial forms: but the elemental properties, namely the active and passive primary qualities, are in the mixture not according to their proper act, but according to the act of the mixture: for each of the contraries is altered by the other to the act of the mixture. However, that which contains the act of the mixture is everything that impedes the intensification of one contrary over the other in the act of the mixture and the union of the mixables, as medicinal things preserving health do: but in place of those, let us imagine a habit placed in the body making another state, and not another nature, namely in which state the act of the mixture so prevails that it completely dominates the powers of the mixables, so that they can never be intensified or diminished, neither by an internal cause nor an external one, and then the mixture is unalterable and impassible: and this is the impassibility of the glorious body.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that it denotes the privation of the potency disposed to suffering, namely, not the privation of the root which is only in this, that the elements are present as to their first being, which would suffer if the form making another state did not impede. Whence it is clear that the objections are worth nothing against this.

To the other it must be said, that perhaps the bodies will not be receptive according to sense. But whatever may be of this, it will be determined below in the question concerning the senses of the glorious body. But as far as pertains to the present, if they are conceded to be receptive: then it must be said that they do not receive the agent in the mode of nature, but the agent through spiritual intention in the manner of the soul: and from this no harmful passion arises. And what this is to say will be explained below when it is treated of the senses.

To the other it must be said, that in both ways it is said to be impassible, and it differs from that which was Adam's in the habit making and in the state. For the habit making impassibility...

In Adam there was the grace of innocence, but in the glorious there is glory. And the state of Adam was to be able not to suffer; but here it will be to be able to suffer.

To the other it must be said, that this does not follow except for those things which act in touch by the action of nature: but then the qualities of the touching will not be perceived, except by spiritual action and of the soul: and it is rather an intentional perception than a corporeal one, as will be determined below.

From Attup it must be said, that this impassibility is by nature, and yet it is caused by the merit of the will. But that objection and all objections up to the end prove nothing else. But how it differs from the immortality of Adam is clear from the things previously stated.

Also, how it is one and how it is diverse, let it be referred to those things disputed upon the second of the Sentences, where it is treated of the state of Adam before sin.

Articulus 15 — Whether All Glorious Bodies Are Equally Impassible

Whether all glorious bodies are equally impassible?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether all glorious bodies are equally impassible?

It seems, however, that they are equally so: because

1. Privations do not admit of intensity and remission: but impassibility is said from the privation of passibility: therefore it does not receive intensity and remission: therefore it is equally in all the glorious.

1. Likewise, there cannot be a greater impassibility than the privation of passion towards harmful internal and external things: and this is in all the glorious: therefore all are equally impassible.
2. Likewise, white is more unmixed with black: but if it is in no way mixed, then it will signify its thing in the term, and it is impossible for there to be intensity upon this. Similarly, the impassible does not seem able to be intensified beyond separation from all passion. Thus, however, all glorious bodies are impassible. Therefore, it seems that they are equally impassible.
3. Likewise, the Gloss on 1 Corinthians 15:42 says: "Equally all have that they cannot suffer."

On the contrary,
1. Impassibility is a reward: but rewards are not equal: therefore neither is the impassibility of the bodies of the saints and the glorious.

1. Likewise, the same reasoning applies to one dowry as to another: but the others are possessed unequally: therefore so is this one.

Response. It must be said that impassibility is possessed unequally.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that although impassibility according to the name signifies privation, yet it is founded upon a habit making that impassibility, as was said in the preceding problem. Moreover, in comparison to its cause, it can be intensified, even if in itself it is a privation.

To the second, it must be said that although it does not deprive more in one than in another, yet a more strongly resisting habit deprives in one than in another, and according to this, one is more impassible than another.

To the third, it must be said that it is equally in all in the mixed proportion of suffering: but yet from inequality it does not resist, as has been said.

To the fourth, it must be said that the Gloss is understood with respect to the exclusion of things causing passion: but yet there is inequality from the resisting, as has been said.

Articulus 16 — Whether It Is The Same To Be Free From Vice, Deformity, And Corruption

Whether it is the same to be without vice, deformity, and corruption?

Whether it is the same to be without vice, deformity, and corruption?

Fourthly, it is asked, What is the difference between being without vice, deformity, and corruption?

1. Because Augustine says thus in the book XXII of the City of God: "I do not know how we are so affected by the love of the blessed martyrs, that we wish to see in that kingdom the scars of wounds in their hearts, which they endured for the name of Christ, and perhaps we shall see them. For there will not be deformity in them, but dignity: and a certain beauty, although in the body, will shine forth, not of the body, but of virtue: nor, however, if some members were amputated and taken away from the martyrs, will they be without those members in the resurrection of the dead, to whom it was said: 'Not a hair of your head will perish.'"
2. Likewise, in the body of Christ the scars will appear, as is evident, John 20:27: therefore also in the bodies of other martyrs.

Response. It must be said that vice signifies a mutilation which is in the diminution of a member: deformity, however, signifies an incongruent proportion of the members to each other and of color to figure: corruption, however, signifies the potency of passion, and all these will be removed there.

To the objection, however, it must be said that scars will not appear insofar as they are corruptive of continuity, but rather insofar as they are signs of the most constant virtue, by which they suffered for justice and faith: and this is gathered from the words of Augustine introduced.

To the last, however, it must be said that the wounds of Christ will not appear, except in demonstration of the resurrection.

Articulus 17 — Whether Agility Befits Glorious Bodies

Does agility pertain to glorious bodies?

Then, it is inquired by the grace of this which is said, there, C, $4, shortly after: Burden, difficulty: in which there is such ease, etc.

It is inquired concerning the agility of glorious bodies, which is one of the endowments of the blessed.

And six questions are asked. The first is, Does agility pertain to glorious bodies? The second is, What is agility or the virtue which is posited as an endowment? The third, From what is the virtue of that agility caused? The fourth, Whether it is present in the saints in one way or in a different way? The fifth, Whether glorious bodies are moved? The sixth, Whether they are moved in time, or in an instant?

To the first, it is proceeded thus: 1. Every motion of some bodily organ having a contrary motion to the mover induces weariness and pain: such is the motion of progression of every man: therefore it induces weariness and pain: therefore glorious bodies will never be so agile that they are not burdened and wearied by motion. The first is evident by itself: because the cause of the predicate is in the subject. The second is proved from this, that as the Philosopher says in II of Generation and Corruption, in every mixed body earth dominates: but its motion is to the center, and not before, and back, to the right, and to the left, according to the appetite of the will which moves in progressive motion.

1. Likewise, Every motion causing distance from a principle is inductive of corruption: but such is every motion of an elemental body: therefore every motion of such a body induces corruption: but glorious bodies will be incorruptible: therefore they will not have a disposition to such motion: therefore they will not be agile, because agility signifies disposition.
2. Likewise, Every incorporation of an intellectual nature depresses it: but after the resurrection, the rational soul is incorporated: therefore the body depresses the soul: therefore it retards: therefore it is impossible for the body to have a disposition in which it attains the speed of the soul: therefore it is not agile, because such an endowment is posited by all to be agility.
3. Likewise, Indeterminate motion of a voluntary or violent terminus is only through an element which is also light in some way, such as air and water, as is proved in IV of Heaven and World. Therefore such motion cannot be in heaven: therefore agility would be given in vain for such motion.
4. Likewise, Every voluntary and violent motion is diminished at the end: however, it is evident that there is some cause of that diminution, and not unless it is the heaviness of the organ: therefore the organ is never sufficiently agile: therefore it will not have agility as an endowment.
5. Likewise, If someone says that it is not diminished. On the contrary: To whom its proper passion belongs, to that belongs the subject: but the proper passion of natural motion is not to be diminished at the end: therefore that motion of the glorious body is natural: therefore the natural motion of the same body is to different places, before, and back, to the right, and to the left, and downward, and upward, which is absurd and impossible.

On the contrary of this is what is said, ;. .

1. Isaiah 40:31: They shall run, and not be weary, etc.
2. Likewise, In the Letter it is said, that there is as much ease as there is happiness. But that happiness is agility for motion: therefore they will have agility: and these are the words not of the Master, but of Augustine[741].
3. Likewise, 1 Corinthians 15:43: It is sown in weakness, it rises in power. But by power, as a certain Gloss says there, mobility is understood which is called agility.
4. Likewise, It is of the nature of beatitude to have those things which are of the perfection of power in the mode of possession, that is, at will: but of the perfection of mobile power in that which is moved, is agility: therefore glorious bodies ought to have that in the mode of possession, that is, at will.

Resolution. It must be said that bodies will be agile not only for local motion, but in all works whatsoever the appetite which moves the organs will wish to accomplish, as will be evident below.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the heaviness which would be in the organ for the depression of the motive power if it were not glorified, is from materiality, and since then matter is entirely overcome by the glory of the resurrection, that heaviness will entirely cease, so that it will induce no labor to the motive power.

To the other, it must be said that motion which changes something in the subject causes the mobile to be distant from its principles: but in which the subject in one way remaining, passes to another place from another, is not such motion: and therefore local motion can pertain to perfect and immortal bodies, and such is the motion of organs in glorious bodies at the will of the motive power, and therefore it will never induce weariness and pain.

To the other, it must be said that the body is that whose motion reaches to the soul, so that from it the perfection of knowledge and work is received, as is the animal body, in which the soul is perfected by sciences and virtues: and of such it is true that it depresses the soul in the mode of thinking and working: and this is intended, Wisdom 9:15, where it is said: The corruptible body weighs down the soul. There is also a body or rather the state of the body, in which the soul receives nothing from the body, but rather all the glory of the body is a certain redundancy of the glory and splendor of the soul, and that body in no way depresses the soul, but will be apt to obey at will, and that aptitude is its agility.

To the other, it must be said that this is true of motion which is for the sake of the need of food or other solace, which is sought in different places by the heavy animated body: but motion which is in the demonstration of glory and beatitude is more fitting in heaven, than in another body or element.

To the other, it must be said that that motion is at will, and therefore it is not diminished, except as the will's command dictates: but the object holds of motion in which the mobile finally overcomes the power moving it: and this can never be in a body, whose mobility is entirely caused by the happiness of the will: and this is what is said in the Letter, that there is as much ease in them as there is happiness.

To the other, it must be said that the passion of natural motion is to be intensified at the end from the victory of the generator over the generated: for as much as is given to the generated from the form of the generator, so much also is given to it from the motion of the generator. And because by greater access the form of the generator overcomes the privation of the generated thing, and the form of the generator is strengthened in the generated, therefore it has more of motion. But it is not so with the motion of the organs of the glorious body: because that is at the beginning and at the end intense and remiss at the will of the motive power, so that its agility is possession: because according to the Philosopher nothing is part of happiness and in the mode of beatitude of habit, unless this which is had in the mode of possession at will.

741. Augustine, presumably referring to a work by Augustine of Hippo.

Articulus 18 — What The Dowry Of Agility Is

What is the dowry of agility?

Secondly, it is asked, What is this dowry which is called agility?

For it seems that it should not be so named: because in 1 Corinthians 15:43, it is said; "It is sown in weakness, it will rise in power." The Gloss there says, "in weakness," that is, immobile, and "it will rise in power," that is, mobile, alive, and invigorated, and powerful, to which nothing is harmful: therefore it seems that this dowry should be called virtue.

1. Likewise, from that Gloss it is further shown that this dowry is the same as impassibility: because one act belongs to one habit: but one act is to resist, and that belongs to impassibility and also to virtue: therefore virtue is impassibility.
2. Likewise, it is asked, Why does the Apostle call this dowry virtue rather than another?

For it seems that incorruptibility is more similar to virtue than agility: because the former denotes the strength of nature, which is virtue: but the latter does not denote such strength: therefore the former is more properly called virtue than the latter.

1. Likewise, virtue denotes its own thing in the end: because, as it is said in the first book of On the Heavens and the World, virtue is the ultimate of potency in a thing: but what is differently possessed by different beings cannot be possessed by anyone in the end: therefore it seems that what is differently possessed by different beings cannot be called virtue: but agility is differently possessed by different beings: therefore it cannot be called virtue as it pertains to each one, as it seems.
2. Likewise, since agility denotes a disposition or natural potency for local progressive motion only, and the members of glorious bodies are going to be suitable for all acts, why does this dowry take its name more from the natural potency for progressive motion than from another exercise of the official members?

Response. It must be said that this dowry is properly called agility, as the ancients named it: and I well concede that agility is called the free possession and ability of all similar and official members to execute every act of the soul, so that in all things the body obeys the mover and is not hindered in any way.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that in 1 Corinthians 15:43, this dowry is not called by its essence, but rather by the end which it can have according to the most perfect state of human nature: because thus it is called virtue in the way that the blessed Dionysius says that it is the virtue of having strength in all according to diverse operations, strong and unchangeable, and to have no weakness in any indicated divine illuminations. Thus it is said of all organs in fulfilling every will of God according to the command of the soul: and from this property, the Apostle names it.

To the second, it must be said that it differs from impassibility: because the latter is the potency not to suffer, but the former is the perfection of active potency to act. And what the Gloss says: "To which nothing is harmful," must be understood concerning harm that withdraws potency from operation because the organ would not be unimpeded.

To the third, it must be said that none of the others denotes the ultimate state of potency for acting as this one does, and therefore it is called virtue. Impassibility, however, does not denote the ultimate for work, but rather resisting harmful and injurious things. Virtue, however, is especially the ultimate of active potency, whose ultimate is determined in the greatest, as the Commentator says there, just as Hercules' virtue is in conquering thirty, if he cannot conquer more: but the ultimate of passive potency is determined in the least.

To the fourth, it must be said that the ultimate simply cannot pertain except to one alone: but the ultimate according to state pertains to all who obtain that state, and such an ultimate is called virtue when it is said that bodies will rise in virtue.

To the fifth, it must be said that although agility denotes the readiness of the whole body to fulfill the operations of the soul, it is nevertheless most known in progressive motion: and therefore this dowry is named from the perfection of natural potency for that motion.

Articulus 19 — By Whom The Dowry Of Agility Is Caused

From what is the dowry of agility caused?

Thirdly, it is asked, From what is this dowry in the glorious body caused?

And it is objected thus:

1. Every natural power for bodily action is caused by the disposition of the members: agility is such a power: therefore it is caused by the disposition of the members. The first is proven from this, that God is more subtle than nature, and nature contrives everything in the best and most fitting way it can be. The second is evident in itself: because agility is especially in the natural power for progressive motion.

1. Likewise, Nature does not give instruments of the same disposition to the slow and the swift: therefore it seems that neither does God. For we see that to the slow, nature gives gross and short instruments, namely legs, as to women: but to the swift, it gives long and subtle ones: therefore it seems that thus also God gives agility.

1. Likewise, as Aristotle says, walking is never without feet: therefore neither is the disposition for walking without the disposition of the feet: therefore the motion of speed is taken in the disposition of the feet, as it seems.

On the contrary of this is that

1. All will be agile in this way: therefore all will have the disposition of body and legs for agility, which is false: because those who now naturally have gross legs will also have them then, because the natural form of the members will also remain then.

1. Likewise, that agility will be caused by the merit of the will: therefore it will be manifested more in the disposition of the will than of the bodily nature.

Response. It must be said that that agility consists in the will and soul, and not in the disposition of the members.

To the first part, however, it must be said that there is agility for the motion of natural need: and from this proceed the first arguments. And there is agility of all the members together in demonstration of glory, and that the mover possesses the mobile at will: and this is caused by the disposition of the merit of the will.

And through this, the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 20 — Whether Agility Is In One Way In All The Saints

Is agility in one way in all the saints?

Fourthly, it is asked whether it is present in one way in all the saints? It seems that it is so, because

1. To each is present that which is a mobile body at the nod of the mover: and this is the whole agility and as much as it can be in corporeal nature: therefore it seems that all the saints have equal agility with all.
2. Likewise, if their local motion is considered, each of the saints will be moved in an imperceptible time: but this is the minimum time as far as we are concerned: therefore each of the saints is equally swift in motion with another: therefore they have equal agility for motion.
3. Likewise, although one star differs from another in brightness; nevertheless, the light of one comes equally swiftly from the sky to the center as that of another: but the resurrection is in this way, as the Apostle says: therefore, although they differ in brightness, they do not differ in agility.
4. Likewise, Mezeallach in the book on Orders says that every star is moved equally swiftly with every star: but that one seems slower than another, this is from the quantity of its orbit: just as the orbit of the Sun is to the Moon in a multiple duodecuple proportion, and the orbit of Mars to the orbit of the Sun in a sesquialtera, and the orbit of Jupiter to the orbit of the Sun in a duodecuple, and of Saturn to the orbit of Jupiter in a decuple sesquialtera, and to the orbit of the Sun in a tricenaria. Therefore it seems that since the resurrection of the dead will be thus, all the glorious have equal motion with others, although they differ in brightness.

On the contrary of this is that

1. The crown of the month for the showbread was interwoven, and signified the reward of the blessed: therefore since agility is a reward or part of the reward, it is interwoven: but interwoven signifies that it is held unequally: therefore agility will be held unequally in the Saints.
2. Likewise, the gifts of the soul are better and nobler than the gifts of the body: but the gifts of the soul will be held unequally: therefore also all the gifts of the body: therefore also agility.

Response. It must be said that they will be agile unequally as was lastly proven.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that although the time is imperceptible, nevertheless because time is divisible infinitely according to the increase of the power of the mover: because the swift, as Aristotle says, divides time, but the slow divides magnitude: and therefore even in imperceptible time one will be moved more swiftly than another if he wills.

To the other, it must be said that each has as much as he wills, in this that he does not will more than he has and than God wills him to will: nevertheless one does not have as much as another. And it is similar because if there are two equally just, each has as much as he wills, because he does not will more than he has: but they do not have equally, because one can be richer than another.

To the other, it must be said that this is not similar: because that motion is of illumination, and not of the illuminators: and we speak of the motion of the luminous ones themselves.

To the other, it must be said that this is because according to nature no body is moved in its own place, as the same Philosopher says, that the motion of the orb is rather the motion of the wise than of nature: for if it were moved according to nature, it would be impossible that the motion of that nature would not be moved more swiftly, just as a greater fire ascends more swiftly than a lesser. Therefore, since the stars are thus moved by the command of their mover, whether that be God or not, they can have whatever motion, although different space makes different distances of the movables. But in the Saints the whole force of motion will be from the quantity of sanctity: and since that is different, so will the agility be different.

Nevertheless, in the word of the Philosopher introduced, there is doubt, nor is this word sufficiently proven by him or by another.

Articulus 21 — Whether Glorious Bodies Will Be Moved

Whether glorious bodies will be moved?

Fifthly, it is asked whether glorious bodies will be moved?

It seems, however, that they will not: because
1. Every motion occurs on account of need: but there is no need there: therefore, there is no motion there.

1. Likewise, no place will be found in which something new is found that was not had in another: but where no renewal can be, there no motion can be: therefore, no motion can be in glorious bodies.
2. Likewise, Aristotle in VII Ethics says that every motion is on account of defect: there is no defect there: therefore, no motion.
3. Likewise, Aristotle says that to participate in goodness without motion is more noble than with motion: but the best is to be given to glorious bodies: therefore, it seems that they will participate in beatitude without motion.
4. Likewise, the most mobile of heavens, which is the empyrean, is posited not to be moved on account of the state of contemplation which is in it, to which rest is more fitting than motion: therefore, since the bodies of the saints are more noble in themselves and better ordered to contemplation, it seems that immobility ought to be given to them rather than motion.

On the contrary of this is what is said, Wisdom 1:7: "They shall shine," etc., in which, as almost all say, the just, and as sparks among reeds, the agility of the motion of the Saints is noted, which will be at the speed of light: therefore, they will be moved then.

1. Likewise, it seems less that purely spiritual creatures are moved locally than corporeal ones: and they are moved, as is proven by the motion of Angels; therefore, also corporeal creatures are moved: therefore, the Saints will be moved in the homeland.
2. Likewise, it is of the perfection of a movable thing to be moved: it is evident, however, that every animate substance having a motive power is movable: therefore, it is of the perfection of that to be moved: therefore, since all the saints have perfections in the homeland, it seems that the saints will be moved.

Response. It seems to be said that the Saints will be moved when they will, and wherever they will, without any need. For motion is twofold with respect to the end of motion: for one is to relieve need, and another to demonstrate motive power, as runners frequently run to show their ability to run, and without any need: and thus the saints will be moved, so that divine wisdom may be praised in such agility bestowed upon them. And through this, the solution to the first is clear.

To the other, it must be said that there is renewal of position at least: but it is true that nothing is found of God in one place as to the participation of beatitude, which is not found in another, although it may shine more in one than in another: but motion is made in demonstration of motive power, so that the wisdom of the Creator ordering the members to motion may be praised.

To the other, it must be said that this is understood of natural motion which is made on account of need.

To the other, it must be said that the Philosopher speaks of the good which happens to be acquired through motion: for a thing which acquires goodness through motion is not perfect, but needy. However, glorified bodies do not acquire such goodness through motion: but what they already have, they demonstrate through motion.

To the last, it must be said that this is because they do not have motive power: but if they had motive power and were blessed, it would be necessary that in their act and motion they demonstrate the wisdom of the Creator.

Articulus 22 — Whether The Motion Of Glorious Bodies Will Be In Time Or In The Now

Whether the motion of glorious bodies will be in time, or in the now?

Sixthly, it is asked, Whether that motion is in time, or in the now?

It seems, however, that it is in the now: because
1. Jacobus Benalchindi demonstrates in the book on the Diversity of the appearance of the moon that everything whose motion is equally imperceptible to the distant and the near, moves in the now: but in this way, as they say, is the motion of glorious bodies: therefore it is in the now.

1. Likewise, it is established that agility differs among the saints: but he who has lesser agility moves in imperceptible time: therefore he who has double moves in subdouble time: and he who has quadruple, in subquadruple time, and so on with others. Therefore it happens that finally someone will move in the now.
2. Likewise, the agility of the glorious is swifter than that of any non-blessed body: but the motion of non-blessed light is in the now, as the Philosopher says: therefore also of the glorious body.

On the contrary of this is that every corporeal quantum, if it moves, moves by measuring itself to the space through which it passes according to the terminus from which and to which, and it takes the first and last in space: but from the first and last in space (as the Philosopher says) is caused the before and after in time: therefore it moves in time composed of before and after: therefore it cannot move in the now.

Response. It must be said that it moves in imperceptible time.

To the last objection, therefore, it must be said that such a process is not valid, unless it would happen to arrive at a body that would have infinite agility: for this would move in the now according to the teachings which Aristotle delivers before the end of the VIII Physics: but because it does not happen to come to such a thing, therefore whatever is of greater speed will move more quickly: yet whatever will move in time, because the increase of speed is divisible into infinity, yet so that whatever moves in time.

To what is objected from the authority of Jacobus Benalchindi, it must be said that he speaks of illumination: for this happens in the now, as Aristotle wills: and the Commentator gives the reason for this, because it is not motion, but the end of motion: just as generation according to which it is only change, and not motion.

Thus through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 23 — Whether Subtlety Befits The Glorious Body

Whether subtlety is fitting for a glorious body?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, C, at the end § 1: For which reason also they are called spiritual, etc.

The inquiry is about the third gift, which is subtlety, or spirituality.

And four questions are asked. The first is, Whether subtlety is fitting for a glorious body? The second, Whether it is the same as spirituality, or what it is? The third, How great it is? The fourth, Whether it is equal in all the glorious?

To the first, it is objected thus: 1. The gross in nature does not become subtle, except through the rarefaction of matter: the human body by nature is gross: therefore it does not become subtle, except through the rarefaction of matter: but matter is not rarefied, as was proven above: therefore the human body in the future resurrection will not be subtle.

1. Likewise, the subtle is not found in bodies, except in two ways, namely by the disposition of matter, or by being well-mixable. And by mixture, the glorious body cannot be called subtle: because those bodies will not be mixable. However, by the disposition of matter, it is also not called so: because this is rare, and those bodies will not be rare, because thus they would be extended beyond their proper stature and the natural figure of the members.
2. Likewise, the Philosopher says that the subtle is the filler of parts, and of the part of parts: however, this does not suit the subtle, except insofar as it seeks a foreign boundary: but every body seeking a foreign boundary holds its own poorly: but glorious bodies hold their boundaries best, even better than natural ones: therefore glorious bodies will not be subtle.
3. Likewise, in the life of blessed Pope Gregory it is read that he was sent as an apocrisiary to refute the patriarch of Constantinople, who had taught that our bodies in the future resurrection would be thin like winds: therefore to say this is heretical: but it is clear if they are so subtle that they are called spiritual, that they are thin like winds and vapors: therefore to say in this way that the bodies of the saints will be thin is heresy.
4. Likewise, in the book on Crepuscules it is written that a subtle spiritual body cannot be actually shining or luminous: but the bodies of the saints will be shining and luminous: therefore the bodies of the saints will not be subtle.

On the contrary of this is that 1. The Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 15:44: It is sown a natural body, it will rise: but every spiritual body is subtle: therefore the bodies of the saints will be subtle.

1. Likewise, to the Philippians, as in 21:
   Refor: but he will transform the body of our lowliness, configured to the body of his glory; his body was so subtle that it entered with the doors closed: therefore, ours will be so subtle.
2. Likewise, glorious bodies are not subject to sight, unless miraculously, as is commonly said: but this cannot have a cause, except subtlety: therefore they are as subtle as air, or more.

Response. It must be said that glorious bodies will undoubtedly be subtle:
but this subtlety is different from the subtlety of the elements. For there is a twofold subtlety, namely of matter, and of rarefaction.
Matter is when a body is composed of noble subtle parts: as we say the sun is subtle, and the stars, and other ethereal bodies: and in this way glorious bodies will be subtle. In the second way, however, it is subtle, which is rarefied or subtly comminuted: and in this way they will not be subtle.

And through this the solution to the first part of the objections is clear: because all those conclude about subtlety through rarefaction, or through the comminution mentioned: and in this way it is well conceded that they will not be subtle.

Although the objections made to the contrary conclude truth, yet only the first is valid: for I do not think it should be conceded that our bodies can enter with the doors closed: and this divine body had insofar as it is divine: and the reason for this has been explained above.

To the other it must be said that they are not invisible from this, but rather because the non-glorious eye according to its non-glorious power cannot see into a glorious and blessed body, except as much as God permits.

Articulus 24 — Whether Such Subtlety Is The Same As Spirituality

Whether such subtlety is the same as spirituality?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether it is the same as spirituality, or what it is?

It seems that they will not be spiritual: because

1. That is not spiritual which has no property of spirit: but those bodies will have no property of spirit: therefore they will not be spiritual. The first is evident by itself. The second is proved: The property of subtlety is not to fill a place: and this does not pertain to glorious bodies: just as neither do other properties of spirit.
2. Likewise, if according to the Gloss which is upon the first epistle to the Corinthians xv, 44, they are called spiritual because they do not need food: therefore also the bodies of the damned will be spiritual, because they do not need food, which is inconvenient.
3. Likewise, the bodies of children in limbo also do not need food: therefore according to that Gloss, they would be spiritual.
4. Likewise, if according to Augustine, someone says that they will be called spiritual because they are subject to the spirit in all things. On the contrary: Here the bodies of the Saints obey the spirit: therefore they have the gift which is called spirituality, or subtlety. Proof of the first. In Psalm lxii, 2 "My soul thirsted for you: how many, etc." And, 1 Corinthians ix, 27: "I chastise my body, etc."
5. Likewise, in the bodies of the saints there will remain heterogeneous and homogeneous parts: therefore bones will remain there: but bones, as Empedocles said, are composed of eight parts, some of which are of fire, and others of earth: therefore they will never be spiritual if bones remain: and bones will remain; therefore they will never be spiritual.
6. But if it is said according to Aristotle and other Philosophers, that a spiritual, vaporous body. On the contrary: Such a body is not capable of figure: but glorious bodies will retain their natural figure: therefore they are not thus subtle or spiritual.

On the contrary of this is what is said, Matthew xxii, 30, that in the resurrection men will be like Angels: therefore spiritual in the body in heaven.

1. Likewise, 1 Corinthians xv, 44: "It is raised a spiritual body."

Likewise, the Gloss there says that they will be spiritual.

Likewise, Augustine in book XXII of the City of God says this: therefore it is so.

Response. According to the Gloss on the first epistle to the Corinthians xv, 44, the body is called spiritual because it does not need food. The same is also suggested according to the manner of speaking by the Apostle, because spiritual is opposed to animal: and animal is that which needs food for its sustenance. To this must be added what Augustine says in book XXII of the City of God, namely that it is spiritual, which does not contradict the governance of the spirit: from a certain ability of the body it is made, because the stimulus of lust is extinguished in it, and the form of spirituality is induced, which is subtlety thus called, as was said in the preceding problem. Hence if anyone wishes to define it, I think it can be conveniently said thus: Subtlety is the gift of the body making the body able to be moved by the spirit, from the complete removal of the fomes, and the grossness of the parts of matter.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that spiritual is here said according to the authorities introduced, not from the property of spirit, but because it is perfectly possessed by the spirit for use, nothing resisting, but in all ways obedient.

To the other, it must be said that the lack of need for food in the damned is not caused by any noble form, but rather by divine justice even among punishments containing bodies according to themselves gross and ignoble, lest the punishment in them be finished. Hence if the external containing ceased, they would not be sustained by the internal containing without food.

To the other, it must be said that children do not have this from a gift, but from the internal containing: because otherwise in them the punishment of loss would fail, which is the lack of the vision of God according to which the vision is the reward of the blessed.

To the other, it must be said that the good on the way do not have perfect obedience of the flesh to the spirit: because the flesh murmurs both from the fomes and from weakness: but this gift gives the spirit the body for use, which is rightly called possession.

To the other, it must be said that without prejudice I well concede that the bone will always be grosser than the flesh: but nevertheless with the ignoble dispositions removed, which are now, such as the excessive grossness of the parts, and indigestion, and not well mixed, it will have more the subtlety of nature: just as we say the sun is of a subtle nature, and gold is of a subtle nature, although it is more compact than any metal, because it has more subtle parts than metal, and is more subtly mixed and better digested.

And it must be noted that it is directly against the sayings of the Saints, if it is said subtle as a small body is called subtle and rare: because such a body in truth is not organic, nor can it be animated by a rational soul.

To the last I well concede that it is not called subtle in this way.

Articulus 25 — Whence This Subtlety Is Caused

Whence is this subtlety caused?

Whence is this subtlety caused?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whence is this subtlety caused?

And this question is necessary because of the diverse opinions concerning this gift.

However, it seems that 1. It is caused by the removal of fullness from matter: because it is said that the subtle is that which will pass through a mountain without dividing the mountain: and it is agreed that then glorious bodies (as they say) will move in heaven without dividing the heaven: and this could not be unless they were so subtle that they could be in the same place with any body: and this further could not be unless fullness were removed from those bodies: therefore it seems that this subtlety is caused by the removal of fullness.

1. Likewise, All ignobility will be removed from the elements: therefore also from man, and much more: but from ignobility it has fullness: therefore fullness will be removed from it: therefore from its removal it has subtlety, as it seems.
2. Likewise, Place and the placed will be proportionate: but the place of glorious bodies is the empyrean heaven: and this is the most subtle of bodies, least (as they say) filling the place: therefore so also will be the glorious body: therefore as before.
3. Likewise, Avicenna says that man therefore receives a soul which is a participant of the light of intelligence, because from natural mixture it most closely approaches the equality of heaven: but this approach with nature cannot perfect it, it must be perfected by God in glory, because then nothing imperfect will be left: therefore then we will have heavenly bodies: therefore as before.
4. Likewise, The Apostle says this, 1 Corinthians 15:40: There are also celestial bodies, and terrestrial bodies: but the glory of the celestial is one, and that of the terrestrial is another. Therefore since the celestial are said to be spiritual subtle from the removal of fullness from them, it seems that thus the bodies of the Saints will also be spiritual and subtle.
5. Likewise, This gift is meritoriously acquired through the spirit filling no place: therefore it seems that such a likeness of spirit is left in the body: therefore the body then will lack fullness of place.

On the contrary, it is objected thus: Luke 24:39, it is said: Handle, and see, for a spirit does not have flesh and bones, as you see me having. But a spirit not having fullness of place does not resist touch, which is proven by the fact that even a thin filler does not resist touch, but yields, like air. Therefore, since glorious bodies will be palpable, it seems that their future subtlety is not to be caused by this, that fullness is removed from them.

To this I say without prejudice to others, that I cannot in any way understand how a body can be a body and not fill a place: for according to all reason and philosophy I am certain that it is considered absurd by the Philosophers, who from the very quantity give to the body to fill a place, as it must according to reason. Hence it seems to me, that although it has been said by many hitherto, and even by me sometimes, that the subtlety of glorious bodies is such that they do not fill a place, because the power of filling a place is removed from them: yet it is false. And it seems to be said that they fill a place, as was proven above, and bodies have spirituality rather by the removal of the fuel and ignoble properties of matter, which are especially three causing by their removal and the position of opposites subtlety in all that is naturally subtle, of which one is the grossness of mixed parts, not obeying the mixture and continuation of the body, Another is the imperfect agent for digestion and continuation of the mixable. And the third is imperfect mixture and continuity. Hence glorious bodies will have parts subtle mixed and continued by God Himself, and best mixed to the equality of complexion. For these reasons in some way it can be understood to posit the human body as subtle: because thus flesh is said to be subtle, gold subtle, and other animate and inanimate corporeals which are noble.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the argument relies on a falsehood, namely that the power of filling a place is the grossness of matter. This reason was clear above.

To the other it must be said that it is not the condition of ignobility to fill a place: but rather it is a condition consequent to the quantity of that body, which is contained in another body as in a place.

And it must be said that the empyrean heaven therefore does not fill a place, it is not in anything: but if it were contained, it would fill a place: and therefore it does not have this from nature, but because it is not encompassed by another body: and therefore it is not necessary that its placed be conformed to it in this.

To the other it must be said that the lower orbs of the heavens fill a place, and the supposition is false, and against the Philosophers, as was shown above.

Therefore this solution is also clear to the following.

Again it must be said that it is meritoriously acquired for the body, not so that the body is changed into a non-body, and according to its nature cannot be a human body: but so that it is made spiritual in following the spirit, as a mobile obedient through all follows its mover, not retracted by any gravity of the body.

Articulus 26 — Whether This Endowment Is Equal In All Glorious Bodies

Whether this dowry is equal in all glorious bodies?

Fourthly, it is asked, Whether this dowry is equal in all glorious bodies?

It seems that it is so:
1. For to all indeed the flesh will be perfectly subjected, and none of them will need food: therefore it seems that all bodies will be equally spiritual.

1. Likewise, the defect of nature is corrected by God in the resurrection: but a certain formal defect of nature is that it cannot sufficiently make matter subtle and spiritual: therefore then it will be corrected: therefore what is natural is present equally in all: therefore subtlety will be present equally in all.

2. Likewise, in the opposite way they are equal, because our bodies are equally animal: therefore also in spirituality the bodies will then be equal.

On the contrary,
1. In no other dowry are glorious bodies equal: therefore neither in this one.

1. Furthermore, this dowry is part of the reward: but all rewards will be had differently and not equally by the Saints: therefore also this dowry.

Response. It must be said that this dowry, like others, is had unequally, as was lastly proven.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that although in all this dowry could suffice for the aforementioned acts, yet those acts do not proceed equally from habit: and therefore the acts in goodness and virtue are not equal.

To the other, it must be said that it is not a defect of nature, but a certain nature which will be exalted on account of merit, just as in other things nature is exalted: for it is not too subtle for the human soul to have a body.

To the other, it must be said that even in the opposite they are not equal: because one is more animal than another, if animality is compared to the act of animality. Or it could be said that animality in man is rather a privation and defect than a habit: and then it does not follow, if some are equal in privation, that they are also equal in habit: for those who are equal in blindness do not have to be equal in sight, if it happens to receive sight.

Articulus 27 — Whether Luminosity Can Befit The Human Body

Whether luminosity can befit the human body?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, C, at the end of §2: The bodies of the saints will also rise shining like the sun, without any defect, etc.

Concerning luminosity, which is the fourth gift, five questions are asked here, namely, whether luminosity can befit the human body? Secondly, what is that luminosity? Thirdly, how great is it? Fourthly, whence is it caused? And fifthly, whether it befits them equally or unequally?

To the first, it is objected thus: 1. No body in which an opaque nature dominates can become exceeding in light: the body of man is of this kind: therefore it can by no means become exceeding in light. The first is proved: because light is impeded by the nature of opacity. The second is written in the second book of Generation and Corruption, where it is said that in every mixed composite body, earth dominates.

1. Likewise, between a luminous and an opaque body, there is a double medium, namely, nearer to the luminous, and this is the diaphanous, which according to Aristotle, is colored by light on the surface and in depth: and it is nearer to the opaque, which is colored with white and black, and intermediate colors. However, it is evident that the body of man in the nature of matter approaches more to the opaque. Therefore, it can never be luminous, but will always remain colored. Therefore, it seems that luminosity is not its gift.

2. Likewise, Avicenna says in book VI of the Naturals, that every luminous body consists only of pervious parts: but the body of man will never consist only of pervious parts: therefore, it will never be perfectly luminous.
3. Likewise, as the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 15:41, their resurrection will be like the brightness of the stars: but according to the more probable opinion, which is of Aristotle, Avicenna, Ptolemy, and his Commentator, and Mezeallach, the bodies of the stars are not luminous in themselves, but colored: therefore neither will the bodies of the resurrected saints: therefore they will never have the gift which is luminosity.
4. Likewise, of different bodies by kind and nature, there are different properties, but celestial and human bodies are different by kind and nature: therefore their properties will be different: therefore, since celestial bodies are luminous, it is impossible for human bodies to be luminous. The first is evident in itself. The second is proved from what Aristotle says in the twelfth book of the Metaphysics, that celestial and terrestrial bodies are not in the same proximate genus.
5. Likewise, a body of one quality and property on the surface is homogeneous: but the human body is never homogeneous: therefore it is never wholly luminous.

On the contrary of this is what is said in Matthew 17:2, concerning this: His face shone like the sun: where the Gloss says thus: He did not lose the substance of the flesh, but showed the glory of the future resurrection. Therefore, the saints will then shine like the sun.

Likewise, Judges 5:31: Those who love you, like the sun in its rising, so shall they shine.

Likewise, Matthew 13:43: Then the righteous will shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father.

Likewise, Wisdom 3:7: The righteous will shine, and run like sparks through the reeds.

Likewise, 1 Corinthians 15:40: There is one glory of the celestial, and another of the terrestrial, etc.

Response. It must be said that the bodies of the saints will be luminous.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that opacity will be removed from the earthly nature through merit which shines in the will: and then the earthly nature will be full of splendor.

To the second, it must be said that this holds in the distance of bodies, which nature can make: but merit is of greater potency than nature: and therefore, with opacity removed, it makes exceeding in light, and beyond what is luminous by its nature, and has no merit.

To the third, it must be said that Avicenna speaks of a body which has luminosity from the nature of its component parts, and not of that to which it is given miraculously through merit.

To the fourth, it must be said that the stars, in truth, in my judgment, are naturally colored, but are receptive of light from the sun: and the Apostle does not speak of the brightness which they have naturally, but rather of that which they have from the sun: because in that, the bodies of the blessed will be similar to them, although they will exceed in light.

To the fifth, it must be said that this is true if the property is from the same cause: but nothing prohibits that of different bodies by kind and even nature, there be one property, one naturally, and the other through merit.

To the sixth, it must be said that this is understood of a body whose accidents flow from its substance as subject and cause: but it is not so in the light of glorious bodies, but rather splendor will be given to them by God.

Articulus 28 — What Luminosity Is In Human Bodies, And Whether The Interior Members Will Shine

What is luminosity in human bodies? And, Will the interior members shine?

Secondly, it is asked, What is that luminosity?

For in lower bodies, luminosity is the form of light altering the permeable on the surface and in depth, and terminated in depth only: but such does not seem to be the luminosity in the glorious body, because

1. Thus the glorious body would appear as luminous: and this is not true: therefore it seems that the glorious body is not luminous with corporeal light.
2. Likewise, every luminous body makes itself and other surrounding bodies actually visible: the glorious body does not do so: therefore it is not luminous with corporeal light.

If perhaps you say that luminous and most noble things are not subject to sight, as Alpetragius says: like the first noble according to the natural philosophers, and the empyrean heaven according to the Theologians: and so it is with the blessed bodies. On the contrary: The cause of this, that the light of something luminous is not subject to sight, as is rendered in the book on Twilights, is that such a luminous thing is permeable and rare: but such will not be the glorious bodies, as was evident above from the premises: therefore this does not prevent them from being seen.

1. Likewise, further it seems that they will not universally be luminous with corporeal light: because the proportion of the members to light is not one, because one is more earthy, like bone, and nail, and at least like flesh: therefore they will not be equally luminous, but less according to the earthy, and more according to the airy.
2. Likewise, the elements outside the human body will not shine equally in light: therefore neither will the members themselves inside shine equally in which the opaque or permeable elements dominate more or less.

3. Likewise, it is of the beauty of the organic body that one part is shadier than another: but whatever is of beauty is not subtracted in the resurrection: therefore there too one part will shine more than another.

Further, it is asked here, Whether the interior members will shine, like the heart, and liver, or not?

If so. On the contrary:
Every actually luminous thing, as sight proves in the sun, stars, and flame of fire, and the Philosopher says, covers bodies existing behind it: but the exterior surface of glorious bodies will shine actually: therefore it will cover the interior: therefore their luminosity will be useless.

But if they will not shine: then the body will not shine universally in all members. Moreover, this is inconvenient: because the interior principal parts ought to be in reward, just as they are principal in meriting: therefore they ought to shine more than the exterior.

1. Likewise, according to the nature of animal spirits, they ought to be lucid, and blood red, and veins white, and so of others: therefore they ought not to be equally disposed in light.

Response. It must be said that that light is a corporeal form, by which glorious bodies will be luminous.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the bodies of the Saints will have in their power to contain and emit their light when they wish, just as they have in their power to be seen and not seen by the non-glorious: but they are always seen by the glorious. And indeed some ancients said this before me, and well as I think: because according to this saying fewer inconveniences seem to follow. They have this in their power because it is caused by the merit of the will: and therefore when they wish, they are seen, and when they do not wish, they are not seen, and they alter bodies when they wish, and when they do not wish they do not alter, whether in depth, or only on the surface.

To the other, it must be said that this is true of that whose light acts according to the necessity of nature: and this is not true of the glorious body, as it seems to me.

To the other, it must be said that I well concede that that solution at least does not agree with philosophy, although some fond of fictions have sometimes given it.

To the other, it must be said that I well think it must be conceded that they will shine equally in all members to preserve proportion: and more cannot be had by force of argument.

To the other, it must be said as to the immediate preceding.

To the other, it must be said that none of the members will be shadowy, nor does the shadow of the members now seek, except because of the dishonesty of its act: and this dishonesty is not then.

To the first which is further asked, without prejudice it seems it must be said that the interior will have different light: for the blood will be like polished red gold, and the spirits lucid like light, and the nerves like polished silver, and the exterior body permeable like porous, and not like diaphanous: for to be permeable like porous is not opposed to luminous.

And by this the solution to all the questions is clear.

Articulus 29 — How Great The Luminosity Of Glorious Bodies Is

How great is the luminosity of the glorious bodies?

How great is the luminosity of the glorious bodies?

Thirdly, it is asked, How great is this luminosity?

It seems, however, that it is like the sun's: because it is said thus, Matthew 13:43: Then the just, etc., will shine like the sun.

Likewise, Apocalypse 12:1: A woman clothed, etc.: therefore it will be like the light of the sun, and the moon, and the stars.

Likewise, like a spark that light seems to be, as it is said, Wisdom 3:7.

Likewise, it seems the Apostle wants this, 1 Corinthians 15:41: One glory of the sun, etc.

In contradiction to this is what is said, Isaiah 30:26: And the light of the moon will be like the light of the sun. Therefore it seems, the light of the sun will be sevenfold like the light of seven days when man will be better, that the light of man will exceed the light of the sun more illuminated than now.

Response. It must be said that in truth it is commonly held that the sun will return to the light of the first seven days, when it shone more than now, before Adam sinned, and because of the renewal of the world it will still exceed sevenfold, and the full moon will stand: and then man who will not have the impediment of sin will still exceed the sun sevenfold in light: what, however, is true about this, I think no one knows diligently, except he who will then merit to see what will happen.

To those things, however, which are first introduced, it must be said that the Gloss on that of Matthew 17:2: His face shone like the sun, does not compare to the sun, because there is no greater glory of the resurrection, and similarly to the stars and moon: but because he did not have greater things known to men, to which he could compare.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear, except for what is said about wisdom: to which I think it must be said, that it compares to sparks because of the fervor of charity elevating the Saints as fire elevates sparks. And almost in the same way Gregory explains that of Ezekiel 1:7: Sparks as the appearance of glowing brass.

Articulus 30 — Whence That Luminosity In Glorious Bodies Is Caused

Whence is that luminosity in glorious bodies caused?

Fourthly, it is asked, Whence is it caused?

For it seems that the Philosopher says in the second book of On the Soul, chapter on vision, that every luminous or shining thing has its shining being from agreement with the perpetual higher body: therefore, glorious bodies also seem to have light in this way: but.

1. It is established that a complexioned element composed of heterogeneous parts cannot agree with the perpetual higher body, which is the fifth from the elements, and simple, and homogeneous: therefore it seems that our bodies will not receive light from this.
2. Likewise, we see that among the elements some receive light because of the parts of fire that are in them, such as the glowworm, and the scales and spine of certain fish, and even the flame of fire itself: and again it seems that this cannot be the cause of light in man, because fire does not abound in man in this way.
3. Likewise, as Avicenna says, from the parts of the diaphanous gathered according to a good mixture something shining is caused, as appears in crystal, beryl, diamond, ruby, and certain others: and again it is established that man is not gathered from such parts: therefore neither is this the cause of shining in him.
4. Likewise, we see in inferior nature that the greater the distance of bodies from the center, the more they have of diaphaneity and light: but it is established that the human body will never be freed from those things which are around the center: therefore it will never have in itself a cause of light.
5. Likewise, in the book which distinguishes the sentences of the Greeks on heaven and the world in sixteen chapters, it seems to be said that the sun has four causes of its greater light than other stars, namely the purity of its parts, the magnitude of its body, the constancy or compression of its parts in continuity, and nobility: but it is established that man will never have these four causes: therefore he will never have a cause of shining sevenfold above the sun.

On the contrary of this is that 1. The just will shine like the sun, etc. Therefore justice is the cause of light,

1. Likewise, in Apocalypse 21:23, it is said of the holy city that the brightness of God illuminated it, and its lamp is the Lamb. Therefore that splendor is divine, caused by God.

Also in Isaiah 60:2, it is said: Upon you. From which the same is taken that. The Lord will arise, and His glory will be seen upon you first.

Response. Almost all the more subtle ancients were accustomed to say concerning this question that man consists of four elements and a fifth body which is heaven: and in the resurrection, the four elements will not be in him in the act of their active and passive qualities, but only in the act of the fifth body which is to shine: and yet they say that light will come to us in the resurrection. But because this is absurd both in mathematics and also in natural philosophy, that the fifth body is mixed with a complexioned body through substance, but only through power: therefore it seems otherwise to be said, namely that all that light will be caused by the merit of the will, and therefore it is also subject to the will: for the endowments of bodies are caused by the endowments of souls: and the light of divine cognition in the soul causes brightness in the body, in which it will also be seen by the affection of the mind, just as now in glass the color of wine is known, as Gregory says on that Job 28:17: Gold or glass will not equal it.

What, however, is true about this will be inquired below.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that through the change of glory by which glorious bodies will be changed, they will receive agreement with the perpetual higher body, not however in such a way that they are changed into stars or into heaven, but that ignoble dispositions will be removed from them which are from the lower elements, and the dispositions of the higher as much as possible with nature preserved will be assumed.

To the other, it must be said that the Lord will then cut off the flame of fire, as Basil says, and will separate the shining light from the burning heat: and as for such a shining, nothing prevents the parts of fire from being more manifest in man then.

To the other, it must be said that human bodies will never be, in my judgment, transparent: because thus it would be necessary that the composition from other elements in them be destroyed. But they will be shining like porous things that shine brightly, in which their interiors are evident externally: and therefore there is not in them such a cause of shining.

To the other, it must be said that in nobility and the treading of light they agree with the sun, but not in other things.

To the other, it must be said that in nobility they agree with the higher, although not in the nature of matter.

Articulus 31 — Whether Glorious Bodies Will Be Equally Luminous

Whether glorious bodies will be equally luminous?

Whether glorious bodies will be equally luminous?

Fifthly, it is asked, Whether they will be equally luminous?

It seems that they will: because
4. Whatever things are reformed to one through similarity, are reformed equally, unless the nature of the things reformed impedes: but all glorious bodies are reformed to one, namely the body of Christ, as it is said in Philippians 3:21: "He will reform the body of our humility, configured to the body of His glory," and the nature of the reformed does not impede, because all are of the same nature: therefore it seems that they will be equal in light.

1. Likewise, this light follows the nature of the human body: but this nature agrees equally to the Saints: therefore the consequence of light is equal in them.

2. Likewise, the merit of the Saints is in the soul: therefore also the difference of merit: therefore they ought to differ in reward only in the soul: but this light is in the body: therefore in light they ought not to have a difference.

3. Likewise, in the opposite there is equality, because the damned will equally have opaque bodies: therefore also in the proposed, namely in the light of the Saints, there ought to be equality.

On the contrary of this is what is said in 1 Corinthians 15:41-42:

"The glory of the sun is one, the glory of the moon is another, and the glory of the stars is another: for star differs from star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead."

1. Likewise, the Gloss there says thus:

"Indeed, this is signified by the denarius, which all will have in common, just as eternal life itself, the kingdom of heaven itself, the glory of the resurrection itself: and yet one will shine more, another less."

Response. It must be said that the Saints will receive different clarity according to the different merit of the will.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that they are reformed to the same unequally, but similarly, not with the nature impeding the equality of reformation, but with the merit of the will impeding.

To the other, it must be said that it follows the nature of the human body as a subject, but the merit of the will as a cause.

To the other, it must be said that different merit makes a different effect both in the soul and in the body.

To the other, it must be said that it is doubtful whether the damned differ in opacity or agree: but I rather believe that they differ according to more and less. If, however, they agree, then the argument does not follow: because God is more inclined to have mercy than to punish: and therefore He bestows even in the body more abundant light for abundant merit, although He does not inflict greater darkness for greater iniquity.

Articulus 32 — Whether It Is Fitting That There Be Four Endowments In Glorious Bodies

Whether there are fittingly four dowries in glorious bodies?

After all the aforementioned beyond the Letter, it is necessary to inquire about the number of these four dowries.

It seems, however, that there is only one: because
1. Only one dowry is conferred upon the bride: therefore, since those transferring themselves according to some likeness transfer themselves, it seems also that in spiritual matters only one dowry ought to be posited.

1. Likewise, it seems that there are only two: because there are two things that can be endowed, namely the body and the soul: therefore, also two dowries.
2. Likewise, it seems that there are three by appropriation of the three persons.
3. Furthermore, it seems that there are more than four: because Anselm says thus in the Proslogion, before the end: What do you love, O my flesh, what do you desire, O my soul? There is, there is whatever you love, whatever you desire. If beauty delights, the just will shine like the sun. If speed, or strength, or freedom of the body, to which nothing can resist, they will be like the angels of God: because the natural body is sown, and it will rise a spiritual one, by power indeed not by nature. If long and healthy life, there is healthy alternation, and eternal health: because the just will live forever, and the salvation of the just is from the Lord. If satisfaction, they will be satisfied when the glory of God appears. If intoxication, they will be inebriated from the abundance of the house of God. If melody, there the choirs of angels sing to God without end. If any pure, not impure, pleasure, you will give them drink from the river of your pleasure, O God. If wisdom, the wisdom of God itself will show itself to them. If friendship, they will love God more than themselves, and each other as themselves, and God more than they themselves: because they will love Him, and themselves, and each other through Him, and He will love Himself, and them through Himself. If concord, there will be one will for all of them: because there will be no will for them except the will of God alone. If power, they will be omnipotent of their will as God is of His: for just as God can do what He wills by Himself, so they will be able to do what they will through Him: because just as they will not will anything other than what He wills, so He will will whatever they will: and what He wills cannot not be. If honor and riches, God will set His good and faithful servants over many things: indeed they will be called and will be sons of God: and where His Son will be, there they will be also, heirs indeed of God, co-heirs however of Christ. If true security, certainly they will be as certain that this or rather this good will never and in no way be lacking to them, as they will be certain that they will not lose it of their own accord, nor will God take it away from unwilling lovers, nor will anything more powerful than God separate God and them unwillingly. But what joy or how great is it, where such or so great a good is. It is clear that there are many things which the bride will perceive in eternity more in the body than in the soul: therefore, there are not only four dowries of the body.

Response. It must be said that there are only four dowries of the body, and it seems possible to assign the number of them by those intending. But a double acceptance suffices: for either the dowry of the body is taken from the part of the form, or from the part of the matter, or from the part of the composite, or from the part of that which follows the composite from form and matter, which is natural power. And in the first way indeed brightness is taken. In the second way, however, subtlety, which consists in the subtilization of the parts of matter. And in the third way impassibility. In the fourth way, however, agility. They can again be assigned and better according to motion towards God: and then either it is a dowry inclining to motion, or indicating the terminus of motion, or the motion itself. And in the first way it is subtlety. In the second way, however, it can be taken in two ways, namely the terminus in the composite, and the terminus in the form. And in the first way it is impassibility taken to the likeness of God by the change by which the Saints will be changed to glory: and according to this it is brightness: but according to the motion itself it is agility.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that this argument only proves that there is one dowry in common: but nevertheless in particular many things are given for a dowry.

To the other it must be said that this proves that man is endowed according to two: but it does not follow that his dowry is in only two.

To the other it must be said that the fourth is required which is to be consequent, namely the proper passion: because otherwise there would not be full perfection: and then there will be four dowries, as was evident in the first assignment.

To the other it must be said that Anselm rather enumerates the matters of joys in the kingdom, than dowries: because this is called a dowry, except that which is given to the bride to perfect her conjunction with the bridegroom, as was evident in the second assignment of the number of dowries.

Articulus 33 — Whether Natural Defects Remain In The Damned

Whether in the damned natural defects remain?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, D, Concerning the reprobate it is usually asked, etc.

For it seems that natural defects remain in them thus:

1. A body composed of contraries does not contain such corruptions, except by grace: but they will never have grace: therefore they will be subject to such defects.
2. Likewise, the damned have merited no good: but it is unjustly given, which is given beyond merit: therefore no good is given to them: but one of the principal goods is incorruption: therefore that is not given to them: therefore they will be corruptible in bodies from the corruption of complexion: and so as before.
3. Likewise, what is induced from sin ought not to be diminished by sin: but corruptions of this kind are induced from sin: therefore since many sins are added to original sin in the damned, such corruption of humors, which induces bodily infirmities and deformities, ought not to be diminished in them.
4. Likewise, this seems, Isaiah xiv, 41: Beneath you the moth will be spread, and your covering will be worms. And, in the same place, v. 19: As a useless root polluted, and wrapped, etc.

On the contrary of this is that every body having such corruptions will eventually be destroyed: but the bodies of the damned will never be destroyed: therefore they are not subject to such corruptions.

1. Likewise, such corruptions are from a defect of nature: for the author of nature will correct every defect of nature: therefore also that one: therefore he will not permit it in the damned.
2. Likewise, the Apostle, 1 Corinthians xv, 32, says that all the dead will rise, but only the elect will be changed into incorruption, as was held above: therefore there is no corruption in the damned.

Therefore it must be conceded that the damned will have no febrile corruption from the vice of complexion, nor defect from the vice of the composition of the body's members.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the justice of God contains their bodies in punishments: whence what is objected is true of the good, or the objection is founded upon a falsehood.

To the other, it must be said that although they have merited no good, nevertheless they have being, living, and sensing, and reasoning, which are goods: and so they have the incorrupt permanence of substance, which is good: but it is to the increase of their punishment: and therefore although it is good, it is not given to them for good, except in this way in which the good of justice is good simply, although penal evil is to the thief.

To the other, it must be said that it is not diminished as a reward of sin, but as a punishment, and this is fitting to justice: but that it would be diminished as it is a certain reward, would be inconsistent with justice.

To the other, it must be said that Isaiah speaks of the temporal punishment of Nebuchadnezzar, who was cast out of the tomb to his confusion and given to worms to be devoured: but according to the mystery it refers to spiritual, not bodily, punishments.

Articulus 34 — Whether The Bodies Of The Damned Burn And Are Not Consumed

Whether the bodies of the damned burn and are not consumed?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, "If, however, it is asked concerning the bodies of the wicked," etc.

It seems to be impossible what is said, that the bodies burn and are not consumed.

1. For the Philosopher says that every passion more intensely made casts off from the substance: but that passion is most intensely made, because the agent surpasses every passion: therefore it most intensely casts off from the substance: therefore it will eventually consume the substance.
2. Likewise, the same says that every action is through assimilation, because the agent wishes to assimilate the patient to itself: but there is action between the fire and the body of the damned: therefore eventually the fire will assimilate the body to itself: therefore it seems that it will be converted into fire.

3. Likewise, it is evident that fire moves the body: but the motion of fire is finite: therefore that motion will eventually come to an end: but no end can be unless the moved assumes the species and form of the mover: therefore at some time the bodies of the damned will receive the species of fire: therefore at some time they will be fire and not human bodies.

4. Likewise, everything receiving the quality of some agent disposing another to the species, if that quality is completed in it, of necessity it will receive the species: but the bodies of the damned receive heat, which is a quality disposing to the species of fire, and that quality will be completed in them: therefore necessarily they are changed into fire: therefore they are changed from the human species and nature.

5. Likewise, every agent dividing a physical body, of necessity will corrupt it, if the action is strengthened: the heat of fire acts by dividing the physical body of man: therefore if the action is strengthened, of necessity it will corrupt it. The first is proved from this, that no physical body is divisible into infinity without being divided from the physical form. The second is assumed: because otherwise the fire would not harm within unless it divided the bodies: and it is evident that the action of fire is greatly strengthened: therefore it will consume the substance of the bodies of the damned.

6. Likewise, the bodies of the damned are the matter of the fire of hell, either proper or alien. If proper: then the bodies of the damned are fire, because the proper matter of fire has the species of fire for its form. If alien: then it is objected thus, every alien matter of fire is transformed by fire if it acts upon it: but the fire of hell acts upon the bodies: therefore it transforms them: therefore it acts upon them by corrupting.

7. Likewise, every agent acts as much as it gives to the passive of the species: but the fire of hell acts most intensely: therefore it gives most of its species to the damned: therefore it most intensely transforms them from their proper species, that is, human: therefore they will not remain humans.

On the contrary, it is said, Apocalypse ix, 6: "Men will seek death, and death will flee from them."

Therefore it seems that they can never be consumed to death: therefore it seems that their bodies will always remain incorrupt.

1. Likewise, Bernard says that thus the damned die, that they never completely die. And from this follows the same as before.

2. Likewise, Isaiah lxvi, 24: "Their worm will not die, and their fire will not be extinguished." Therefore they will always be burned in fire without consumption.

Response. It must be said that in truth those things which are said in the Scripture are faithful and true, and must be held without doubt. But the preservation of the bodies of the damned is the justice of God in punishments: and these must be believed rather than discussed. However, lest we seem to say nothing at all, it must be known that sensibles act in two ways upon the organs of the senses, namely by the action of nature and by the action of the soul. The action of nature is with consumption and contrariety: and I think well that such cannot be in any body unless the body itself is consumed. But the action of the soul is through the reception of intention to the affection of pain or delight: and we will speak of this according to our possibility in the question concerning the senses of resurrected bodies below: and such is the action in hell, which is for the alteration of the senses, without the consumption of substance.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the Philosopher speaks of the action of nature, which is not merely an action for the alteration of the senses: and not of the action of the soul, which casts off nothing from the substance.

To the other, it must be said that there is such assimilation as there is between the sense and the sensible, that is, that the sensible species is in the sense through the intention of the one causing distress, but not through the being it has in matter.

To the other, it must be said that the motion is made to the impression of intention, and is finite, but not to the form giving being: because otherwise those bodies would be converted into fire.

To the other, it must be said that they receive the intention of quality as it is the excitation of pain and sadness from heat: but not as it is the form transforming matter to the rejection of the species and the induction of another form.

To the other, it must be said that the agent by the action of the soul does not act by dividing, as is evident in all sensible agents acting upon the organs of the senses, if the action of the soul is divided from the action of nature.

To the other, it must be said that the impious are alien matter dissimilar to the species of the agent, just as the sense in potency receives the species of the object for sadness or delight: and from this no change of bodies follows.

To the other, it must be said that it gives the species according to the action of the soul, and not of nature: and therefore it does not follow that it converts into fire. This solution is better according to reason, which can be in this matter: and therefore it must be diligently noted.

Articulus 35 — Whether The Soul Suffers In The Body, Or From The Body

Whether the soul suffers in the body, or from the body?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, E, in the middle: As the soul by whose power the body lives, etc.

For from this likeness Augustine seems to imply the previously held mode of solution.

However, that it may be better understood, two things are to be inquired here, namely, how does the soul suffer in the body?

And secondly, why to the damned body can only one mode of suffering be attributed, when there are two modes of suffering of the animated body?

To the first, it is objected thus:
1. Every agent is stronger than the patient: but no body is stronger than the suffering soul which is spiritual: therefore no corporeal thing can act upon the soul. The first of these is written by Augustine in book XII on Genesis literally: and the second, and also the conclusion.

1. Likewise, the body and soul relate as mover and moved: and the soul is the mover, but the body is the moved: but every mover acts upon the moved, not suffering from it as such: therefore the soul acts upon the body, not suffering from it as such: therefore it cannot suffer in the body, as it seems.
2. Likewise, that which is susceptible of no change, is susceptible of no suffering: but the soul is susceptible of no change: therefore it is susceptible of no suffering: therefore neither does it suffer from the body, nor from anything else. The first is evident: because every suffering is according to some change. The second is written in the first book of On the Soul, where the Philosopher refutes the sayings of Plato.
3. Likewise, that which has no contrary at all, is impossible to suffer at all: but the soul has no contrary: therefore it is impossible for it to suffer, whether in the body, or outside the body.

The contrary of this is, that

1. We experience fears and sorrows which those not having sensitive souls do not experience: therefore the soul seems to be subject to sufferings.
2. Likewise, Damascene says, that the soul sympathizes with the body, although it does not die with the body: therefore it suffers.
3. Likewise, the Philosopher wishes that in some things the motions of the body reach the soul and change it: therefore also the body impresses sufferings upon souls.

Response. It must be said that in truth it is so, and Augustine seems to determine thus, that the soul does not suffer from the body incorporeally: but with suffering made in the body, the soul punishes itself with the affection of pain and compassion.

How this is to be understood, it must be known that no motion, or passion of any affection is in the soul, unless first there is apprehension of the thing causing that passion, or affection: but apprehension through the reception of the species is sensible through sense or imagination: and therefore in the body there is no passion of pain, unless through sense or imagination: but that which is in the sense, or in the imagination of the soul, is a simple spiritual species and not a corporeal form: hence the immediate cause of pain in the soul is the spiritual intention of the saddening thing received in some power of the soul: and therefore Augustine says, that it does not suffer from the body, but from itself receiving such a species of the saddening thing.

And through this the solution to the first is clear: because although the first agent is the body, yet the proximate is the spiritual intention apprehended by the soul.

To the other it must be said, that the soul is not moved by the body as it is a body: yet the motions of the body reach it through the operation of the soul, in this way that a certain operation is to apprehend the forms of surrounding things.

To the other it must be said, that the soul taken in itself, that is, stripped from the body, naturally has no change: but in the body it is changed accidentally, namely by the change made in the body. It is changed, however, in the aforementioned way: and in this way Aristotle does not deny, but rather proves, that the soul is moved by itself.

To the other it must be said, that the soul in itself has no contrary, nor does it suffer in itself, yet insofar as it is the form and mover of the composite, it receives as contrary that which dissolves the composite: and in the apprehended species of that it is punished and grieves.

Of what is objected in the contrary, the solution is evident by itself. Yet it must be known, that although this solution is according to Augustine, it is somewhat against the sayings of Aristotle: because he does not wish that apprehending is acting, but rather suffering: and according to him it must be added, that the motion which is made through the body, materially relates to the soul, and not as an agent: but because it provides the matter of cognition, and the soul applies the form, therefore it is true what was said in the solution throughout. This also was noted above.

Articulus 36 — Why Another Mode Of Suffering Cannot Be Attributed To The Bodies Of The Damned

Why cannot another mode of suffering be attributed to the bodies of the damned?

Secondly, it is asked, Why cannot another mode of suffering be attributed to the bodies of the damned?

For it seems that either could be: because 4. The bodies of the damned are hot: but if the hot acted only by the action of the soul, and not by the action of nature, it could not be said that they were hot: therefore the hot acts in them by the action of nature. The first is proved by faith. The second, however, is evident through philosophy: because the soul is not said to be hot from the apprehension of the hot, or even from the affection of the hot: and thus the proposition is evident.

1. Likewise, If it acted only by the action of the soul: then the suffering of those bodies would be as suffering in sleep at the imagination of terrible things presently afflicting a man: and thus they would not truly suffer, but only fantastically, which is absurd, because this would generate heresy: therefore they suffer by the action of nature.
2. Likewise, If they suffered by the action of the soul and not of nature: since the action of the soul occurs equally with the thing present and absent, it would not be necessary for there to be fire where they suffer, but the imagination of fire would suffice: and this again is absurd: therefore it seems that they suffer by the action of nature.

The contrary of this is the objections previously introduced: because those necessarily seem to conclude that they do not suffer by the action of nature, or even if they suffer by both actions, namely of nature and of the soul.

Response. Without prejudice, it must be said that I think no one knows the truth of this question, except to whom God has revealed it, as is said in the following chapter from the words of Augustine. Without prejudice, however, I say that they suffer only by the action of the soul, I say by the action which is sensation: because there the organ must be actually changed, and also the species of the sensible must be made in the soul.

And how this may be, we can imagine by a likeness: as if we suppose by the impossible that the action of the soul in the qualities of touch is separated from the action of nature: for if then the hot acts on the touch, it will necessarily be present touching: because otherwise there would not be touch, and a change of the organ would have to occur: because otherwise the species would not be conveyed to the power of the soul, which is touch, and the species as contrary to the conjoined would have to be received by the soul: and yet because the agent would be spiritual, it would cast nothing from the substance, and in one way its substance would remain if the suffering remained.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that this would be true if there were not here an action through sensation: for in that which is through sensation, the body is disposed by the quality of the sensible, and is denominated by it, especially in touch: but if it were done only by imagining, which imagination does not require the touch of the present thing which causes suffering, then the objection would hold.

To the other, the solution is already clear, that a dream is not through sensation: and in this the position of this faith differs from the sayings of certain Philosophers who attributed such a dreamlike suffering to souls and sinners.

To the last, the solution is also clear, because the sensation of a thing requires experience and presence.

Articulus 37 — Whether Corporeal Fire Torments The Demons

Does corporeal fire torment demons?

Next, it is asked concerning this which is said, there, F, "It is also usually asked, Do demons burn with corporeal fire?"

However, it seems that they do not, because

1. Damascenus says that that fire is not corporeal, but of such a kind as God indeed knows: therefore they do not burn with corporeal fire.
2. Likewise, Boethius says in the book on the Two Natures in One Person of Christ, that there is no action and passion of those whose matter is not one: but in the corporeal fire and demons there is not one matter: therefore that fire does not act upon demons.

3. Likewise, every action is through contact, as Aristotle says in the first book of Generation and Corruption, and in the sixteenth of the Animals: but between fire and demons there is no contact: therefore fire does not act upon demons. Contact is of those whose extremes are together: but demons, since they are spirits, do not have extremes: therefore the proposition is established.

1. Likewise, physical contact is when each of the touching things is changed by the other: and it is established that fire is not changed by the demon.
2. Likewise, every action is between contraries; but between fire and demons there is no contrariety: therefore no action: therefore there will be no action or passion between them.
3. Likewise, that which is insusceptible to the species of the agent receives nothing from its action, and suffers nothing from it: but the demon, since it is a spirit, is not susceptible to the species of the agent, because it can never be said that a spirit is hot: therefore it receives nothing from the action of fire, and suffers nothing from it.

In opposition to this are those things which are said in the Scripture, and they suffice: because in the Scripture it is said that the lake of fire and brimstone will be corporeal fire, etc.

Response. Without doubt corporeal fire torments demons: which I hold by faith: although it is not fully intelligible, yet it can be said thus for understanding, that that corporeal fire can be taken in two ways, namely as an instrument of divine justice avenging sin committed against God: and as a corporeal element. And in the first way indeed corporeal fire has the incorporeal power of afflicting even a nature more noble than itself, provided it is under sin. In the second way, however, it does not have this. And in the first power indeed, which is given by divine justice, it acts upon the spirits of demons.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that Damascenus understands concerning the immediate afflicting, of which, as was said before, the afflicting is in the corporeal species, which is the intention received in the spirit apprehending its affliction: yet the first agent is corporeal.

To the other, it must be said that it is true concerning the agent according to the power of the element only, or according to the power of a simple natural body: but the agent in the divine power, which is the power of the instrument of divine justice for the vengeance of iniquity, is of greater power: and therefore it will act even upon that which does not share matter with it.

To the other, it must be said that contact is twofold, namely by way of definition, and by way of corporeal conjunction. And in the first way it is said to be touched which is essentially joined, and is contained present in something: and in this way demons touch fire, because they are included present in it: but not in the second way.

However, the other proofs suppose contact to occur in the second way.

To the other, it must be said that there is contrariety here to fire insofar as it is an instrument of God's justice: because thus its contrary is contrary to divine justice, just as theft is said to be contrary to the gallows or scaffold.

To the other, it must be said that in truth an intellectual substance is not properly said to be hot, but more properly said to be scorched rather than hot, unless it is said to be hot by the apprehended intention of heat: and this is improperly said, because that intention is spiritual. Or perhaps it can be said that as fire is an instrument of divine justice, it can imprint its quality on an intellectual substance. But it is better that it is not hot, but rather scorched by fire, as it is an instrument of avenging justice in punishments: because since heat is a corporeal form, it cannot be understood how it is in a purely spiritual substance: and perhaps constrained by this necessity Augustine said in the Scripture that demons have aerial bodies in fire: which, however, the Church does not hold: and therefore it must be said in the first way.

Articulus 38 — Whether The Infernal Fire Is Corporeal

Whether the infernal fire is corporeal?

ARTICULUS XXXVIIE. Whether the infernal fire is corporeal?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says,

There, F, at the end: Eternal fire, of what kind it may be, etc.

It seems this is false by reason of the first part and the second.

1. Indeed, by reason of the first part: because immediately in the following chapter it will say that it is evident that souls are to be tormented by material fire with corporeal flames: therefore it is known of what kind it is.

For the second part, however, it is said, Isaiah 14:9: Hell beneath is troubled. Therefore hell is beneath in the encounter of your coming: therefore it is in the earth.

1. Likewise, there the Gloss says that hell is a place of punishments, and it is beneath.
2. Likewise, Ecclesiasticus 24:45: I will penetrate, and inspect all the lower parts of the earth and all the sleeping. And it speaks of the descent to hell: therefore it is in the lower parts of the earth.
3. Likewise, Isidore in the book of Creatures: The moon is accustomed to set, not to rise. Therefore the impious are placed beneath the earth, lest they enjoy its light. But the impious are in hell: therefore hell is beneath the earth.
4. Likewise, Job 16:16: All my things will descend into the most profound hell, etc. There the Gloss: As to the height of heaven, this air is lower, as to the height of the air, the earth lies lower, but as to the height of the earth, those places of hell which are superior to other receptacles of hell, this place is called the most profound hell. The limbo of the fathers is beneath the earth, and still lower than that is hell, and thus again the proposition is held.

5. Likewise, all ignobility ought to retain the lowest place: but all ignobility is in hell: therefore hell ought to be in the lowest place: therefore it ought to be in the middle of the earth.

6. Likewise, contrary merits are in the Saints and the impious: but the Saints by merits ascend to the highest place: therefore the impious by the contrary ought to descend to the lowest place: but this is the middle of the earth: therefore the damned ought to be disposed in the middle of the earth.

7. Likewise, the wicked loved the earth, just as the Saints loved heaven: therefore it is equally just that they be placed in the middle of the earth, just as the Saints are placed in the middle of heaven.

On the contrary of this is that it pertains to the decorum of justice that one be punished in the same place where he sinned: but they sinned here: therefore it seems that hell ought to be here.

Response. It must be said that in this question beyond the sayings of the Saints nothing is to be said: because reason does nothing at all here, but in all things the sayings of those who received revelation from the Holy Spirit must be adhered to. They, however, say that the fire is corporeal, and hell is in the earth: and this is to be held and believed.

To the saying of Augustine, it must be said that he speaks not by asserting, but yet he himself thinks it more likely to be so than otherwise: and perhaps what was not fully revealed to Augustine was fully revealed to other Saints. And according to this, there is no contradiction in the Letter.

Or it may be said that Augustine says there is no doubt about the species of fire, but about the mode and power by which it afflicts souls: because that is very hidden.

To the other part, I concede well that it is beneath the earth, as has been proven: but the saying of Augustine is understood about the determined place, whether those places are in the center or outside the center: because even according to the poets there is doubt about this. And Isaac seems to want that sinners are pressed down beneath the sad orb, and their sins will weigh them down there. The orb of Zriséis is called by the Philosophers the left part of the orb, which is spread over the fourth part of the earth, which is supposed to be the fourth habitable part: and Isaiah seems to be of this opinion, as will be clear below.

To what is objected against, it must be said that it cannot be: because all the habitation of the Saints will then be purified: and therefore the world as to this habitation in which the Saints merited will be renewed: and therefore the fetid corpses of the damned will be cast away from it, so that justice may also be deepened in the place which is fitting for the sin of the damned, as has been proven in the objection.

Articulus 39 — Whether A Corporeal Fire Can Exist In Such A Way That It Is Not Destroyed

Whether corporeal fire can exist so as not to be destroyed?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, G, after the beginning: "We say that the spirit is held by fire," etc.

And two things are inquired, namely, whether corporeal fire can exist in such a way that it is not destroyed?

And secondly, whether it is true that this is their torment, that they see and feel the fire?

To the first, it is objected thus:

1. A place is preservative of what is placed, as the Philosopher says: therefore everything that is naturally in some place, if it is long outside its place, where it is, will be destroyed: but the fire of hell is true fire, and it has been outside its place since the beginning of the world: therefore it will be destroyed.

1. Likewise, Avicenna says in the first Philosophy, that there is no cause why this part of matter is made earth, and this part air, and another part fire, except that coldness or heat finds it in such or such a place naturally, and converts it into air or into earth: but it is evident that no coldness of the earth is as natural as that which is in the middle of the earth: therefore it will convert into earth whatever is in the middle: and consequently, it will convert the fire of hell into earth.
2. Likewise, elements are converted into each other, and are converted into the power and species of the dominant: but it is evident that in the center of the earth no element dominates as much as earth: therefore everything that is there, earth will convert to its nature and species: therefore the fire of hell will necessarily be converted into earth.
3. Likewise, Aristotle necessarily proved that as much as is given to something of the nature of a species, so much is given to it of the place of that nature and of the motion to that place: therefore, conversely, as much as is given to something of the place of some nature, so much is given to it of the species and nature of what is placed and in that place: but no place is as natural to earth as the place of the middle of the earth: therefore whatever is there will take on the nature and species of earth: therefore it will be converted into earth.
4. Likewise, no violence is perpetual, because either the thing will be freed, or it will be corrupted: but it is evident that fire is violently downwards: therefore it is not perpetually there, because either it will be corrupted, or it will fly away if the hindrance ceases: and from this follows the same as before.
5. If perhaps you say that it is not there violently, but naturally: because there is a twofold motion of fire. One which it has according to the nature of form: and that is to ascend upwards. There is another which it has according to the nature of matter: and that is sometimes downwards, and then also fire is moved downwards, because it follows its matter, just as inflamed wood is moved downwards. Against: That is not the proper matter of fire, but alien: because the proper matter of fire ascends: therefore it begins to prevail when it comes to the center: and thus again fire will perish.

Further, it also seems here that that place in capacity is not sufficient: because

1. The rarer an element is, the greater place it seeks: but fire is the rarest of the elements: therefore it seeks a place greater than all the elements: but the middle of the earth is the smallest place: therefore it seems that fire cannot be there,
2. Likewise, since that place is of the least capacity, it seems that it cannot contain a greater part of men: and thus it seems that there is nothing of what is said about that place.

How that fire can act upon souls, it has been previously treated in a similar manner, how it can act upon demons.

Response. It must be said that the fire is there in the strongest heat, to which no heat is comparable: and this is to be understood thus: Fire which is surrounded by natural cold and is in solid matter, is always gathered together, and has heat pressed and gathered more than that which is in rare matter: and such is the fire of hell.

To the first, it must be said that God Himself conserves the fire, according to which it is an instrument of avenging justice. And this is what is said in Isaiah 30:33: "The breath of the Lord, like a torrent of brimstone, kindling it."

To the other, it must be said that that fire is not naturally generated there, but rather all the ignobility of the world's matter is gathered there by divine power.

To the other, it must be said that it would follow that this would be true if the power of divine justice did not conserve that fire.

To the other, it must be said that violence cannot be done to any creature by God: because to every creature is innate obedience to its Creator: and in such a way that fire stands in the middle.

To the other, it must be said that that fire, as it is considered as an instrument of divine justice avenging sins, then the most proper matter of fire is the damned: and therefore it also most effectively prevails in them, and is not extinguished; and this is the proper consideration of its conservation.

To what is further inquired, it must be said that this is not true, except of fire considered according to the nature of the element: for that which has the power of avenging sinners seeks more the matter in which its parts stand and are gathered, so that it becomes hotter, as has been said: and therefore it seeks a narrow place.

To the other, it must be said that in the necessary amplitude hell will never be lacking: because it has expanded its soul without any limits: but yet I well believe that the damned will lie constrained and massed together in it, and this capacity of the earth's concavity is well sufficient.

Articulus 40 — Whether It Is The Same For The Damned To See The Fire And To Be Tormented In The Fire

Whether it is the same for the damned to see the fire and to be tormented in the fire?

Secondly, it is asked whether it is true what is said, that it is the same for them to be tormented in the fire as to see and feel the fire?

However, it seems that it is not:
1. For intention does not have the power to burn that in which it is present: which is evident when we see fire, because the species of fire in the eye does not burn the eye. Similarly, when we understand fire, the species of fire does not burn the intellect. And it is similar with imagination. Therefore, it seems altogether incorrect to say that it is the same for them to be tormented in the fire as to see the fire.

1. Likewise, if the intentions of the soul are only and per se not related to things, they will not move to pain or sadness, as Aristotle says: but these intentions cannot be referred to things without bodily senses, which are not there: therefore, it seems that they do not move souls to pain or sadness.
2. Likewise, sense in act does not occur except through the harmony of the complexioned: but these are not in the soul separated from the body: therefore, they do not have sense in act: therefore, nor vision: therefore, they do not see the fire.
3. If perhaps you say that it is understood of intellectual vision. On the contrary: Intellectual vision occurs through species abstracted from all consideration and appendages of matter: but such species do not transmute anything: therefore, by such vision the soul is never transmuted: therefore, it seems that it neither suffers nor grieves from such vision: and thus there is nothing that seems to be said otherwise.

Response. It must be said that this, in my judgment, is understood of intellectual vision with the presence of the thing in which the seer is held. And I say that the apprehension of fire is twofold, namely as of such a nature or element, and this does not punish: and as of an instrument of avenging justice, and thus it is apprehended as contrary to iniquity: and when it is held by the power of God in the fire, it is afflicted in it.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that intention does not burn, but rather afflicts the spirit according to how it is accepted by the presence of fire and containing the spirit, which power the fire has insofar as it is an instrument of divine justice, as has been said: just as also matter, as long as the soul is in the body, intention does not afflict: but the intention of the agent present and rushing into the body afflicts the soul, as has been said above.

To the second, it must be said that this intention is referred to the thing, namely to the fire, which presently holds and acts in the spirit by the aforementioned power.

To the other, it must be said that sense is not taken here properly: for in the soul separated from the body there is no sense, except in the root of the sensitive power: but it is taken according to the experience of affliction which is through fire, just as also demons who do not have a sensible soul feel the fire, that is, experience it, as was previously held.

To the other, it must be said that this is true of speculative intellect, but not of practical or affective, which takes as sad the species apprehended of the thing having the power to hold the spirit, and acting contrary to the spirit is made: because to that vision follows the greatest affliction.

Articulus 41 — Whether The Soul Is Shaped Like A Body

Whether the soul is shaped like the body?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, G, around the middle: To profess that the soul can have the likeness of the body, etc.

It seems to lie and to speak heresy: because
1. Tertullian was condemned for this, because he said the soul is shaped like the body, and the inner man is formed like the outer: and this seems to be expressly said here: therefore it seems here to be the heresy of Tertullian.

1. Likewise, it seems impossible: because whether the body is taken naturally, or artificially, or mathematically, the figure is always its form: and everything figured is a body: therefore if the soul has the figure of the body, it is a body.
2. Likewise, no body is the perfection of a body: but every soul is the perfection of a body: therefore no soul is a body: but figure is the terminus of a surface or body: therefore no soul has the figure of a body: therefore it says falsely in the text.

1. Likewise, there is no proof in the text: because the soul does not see such dreams, but the man: and it is not inconvenient if he sees bodily acts of himself, since he is corporeal. But that the soul does not see this, it is not hidden from anyone knowing something of natural philosophy. Moreover, if the soul were to see such things, then even when separated it would see such dreams: and it is ridiculous to say that separated souls dream.

Response. Augustine in truth does not assert this: because it is said doubtfully, and it appears more absurd and false than true. However, if someone wishes to sustain it, he could say that to have the figure of the body happens in two ways, namely by being, and by intention. In the first way, only the body has the figure of the body: and therefore Tertullian erred, who attributed the figure of the body to the soul in such a way. But by intention in the power which is called imaginary, the sensitive soul has the figure of the body when bodies are imagined, as it says in the text: and thus the text is understood: for the figures of all quantities are described formally or imaginatively.

And through this the solution to the first is clear.

To the other it must be said that figure according to being is considered in that objection, and also in the following, but by intention it is fitting to the soul.

To the other it must be said that Augustine does not intend that souls carry with them images received from things as they are in the interior senses, but rather they carry with them infections or merits contracted from such things: and these will be better explained below, and through such infections they will be subjected to punishments.

Articulus 42 — Whether Spirits Are In Non-Corporeal Places

Whether spirits are in non-corporeal places?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, G, a little before the end: Thus also in places it seems to be non-corporeal, etc.

For this seems absurd: because thus neither hell nor the empyrean heaven seems to be a corporeal place, which our faith abhors.

Response. It must be said that he does not understand concerning place according to its substance, but rather according to the act of placing: because a spirit cannot be contained corporeally in a place, but rather definitively, as Damascene says: and this is as if to be contained spiritually.

Articulus 43 — Whether It Is True That Souls Are Deprived Of Senses And Affections

Whether it is true that souls are deprived of senses and affections?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said there, G, at the end: Whence it is proven that the souls of the deceased are not only not deprived of their senses, but neither of their affections, etc.

For it seems to be false thus: 1. Those whose essential act is corrupted, they themselves are necessarily corrupted: but the essential act of the senses is corrupted in death: therefore, the senses themselves are corrupted. The first is evident through Damascene saying that nothing is deprived of its proper and essential operation. The second is evident in itself: because after death, neither does one see, nor hear, nor do any of the other things which are exercised through the senses.

1. Likewise, Aristotle in the ninth book of the first philosophy says thus: If something remains to be examined: for in some cases nothing prevents, namely that such a soul, not every soul, but the intellect: for it is perhaps impossible to accept that the sensitive soul remains in no power after the body: therefore, it is false what is said in the Letter.
2. Likewise, Aristotle in the first book of On the Soul: If indeed there is something of the soul's works or proper passion, it is possible for it to be separated: but if nothing is proper to it, it will not be separable. However, it is evident that no operation or sensitive passion is proper to the soul without the body. Therefore, no part of the sensitive soul is separated: therefore, it does not remain after death.

3. Likewise, thus: Eustratius says in the Commentary on the sixth book of the Ethics: From this it is expressly accepted that the rational soul, not by nature immediately, but by a certain other life, namely the sensitive and vegetative, which is entelechy, are inseparable from the body existing, and proper to them coming to the complexions, and with these dissolved, departing.

4. Likewise, Aristotle in the sixteenth book of On Animals says thus: If the operation of any of these principles cannot be without the body, such principles will not be without the body. For example: walking does not occur without feet: and therefore the walking power is never without feet. It follows concerning the operation of the senses, since they themselves are not operating without a bodily organ, they cannot remain without a bodily organ: therefore, with that dissolved, they themselves are annihilated.

5. Likewise, whatever requires a subject for its being, after the corruption of the subject, does not have permanence: every organic power thus requires a subject for its being: therefore, with the subject corrupted, it does not have permanence: but every power of the sensitive soul is an organic power: therefore, it seems that every power of the sensitive soul, with the subject corrupted, has no permanence.

6. Likewise, we see that with the subject weakened, every power of the sensitive soul is weakened: therefore, with it destroyed, it is destroyed.

On the contrary, it is said that 1. If something is not destroyed according to substance, no part of its substantial part is destroyed: but the rational soul is not destroyed according to substance: therefore, its substantial part is not destroyed: but this is the sensitive soul, because the Philosopher says that just as a triangle is in a quadrilateral, so the sensitive is in the rational: therefore, the sensitive soul is not destroyed after death.

1. Likewise, it is evident that in the resurrection the body will rise according to the nature of the organs: but the organs will not be without their powers perfecting them: therefore, the powers will then be: but they will not be unless they remain: therefore, the powers of the sensitive soul will remain: therefore, they are not destroyed.

2. Likewise, in the Letter, the tongue and finger are named: and it is evident that those members were not there corporally: therefore, it is necessary that the virtues or powers of the soul were there at least: therefore, they remain in the soul after death.

Response. It must be said that the virtues of the sensitive soul and the sensitive soul itself can be considered in three ways, namely in act, in being, and in root. And in the first way, they do not remain after death, namely as to hearing, seeing, and imagining, and the like. In the second way, again they do not remain: because the being of an organic virtue is in the organ: whence there is no vision in being, which is not in the eye according to habit at least: and so it is also in the other powers of the sensitive soul. In the third way, however, they remain: because the substance of the rational soul is the root of all its rational, sensitive, and vegetative powers, and from it they arise and proceed as properties from a subject. And because that remains, therefore also those powers will remain: and just as now they proceeded from it into the organs as to being and acting, so also after the resurrection they will proceed.

And through this, the solution to all is evident.

To hear and imagine is the essential act of the senses according to being accepted, and not as they are taken in the root: and it is well conceded that according to this being they are destroyed.

To all others, the mode of solution is the same.

Note, however, that some wish to introduce a new philosophy, that the soul, stripped, sees and hears and imagines, and carries with it the imaginations of the body which it receives in the body: how they prove this, it is not necessary to say, because it is rather nearly said.

To the first, it must be said that it is a derision, not a sentence of truth.

Articulus 44 — Whether Aborted Fetuses And Monsters Will Rise Again, And Whether Such Will Have Endowments

Whether aborted fetuses and monsters will rise again, and whether such will have gifts?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said,
there, H, Mlud also to be investigated, etc.

For it seems that such will not rise again: for resurrection is a certain regeneration: but regeneration is not, except of those already born: since therefore these are not born, it seems that they will not be reborn: therefore neither do they rise again.

Likewise, further it is asked, Whether such will have gifts?

It seems that they will: because
1. They will be immortal: therefore they will have the gift of immortality or impassibility.

1. Likewise, Since these are preserved from injuries, it seems that a body composed of contraries cannot be preserved from injuries except by grace: therefore it seems that such will have grace.

Response. It must be said that there is a twofold nativity, namely in the womb, and from the womb. In the womb is animation, which is here called the formation of the fetus. However, from the womb they do not have nativity. But resurrection follows the first nativity, and not the second only.

To the other it must be said that such children will not have gifts: nevertheless they will rise again in the age of thirty years.

To the objection, however, it must be said that, as I think, they can be harmed by no agent: and this with divine goodness being aware, the material bodily composition will resist in this way, as it would have resisted in Adam, if he had not committed sin: and yet he did not have the gift for it.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 45 — Whether There Are Five Receptacles Of Souls After They Are Separated From The Body

Whether there are five receptacles of souls after they are separated from the body?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, 1, Furthermore it must be known, that all souls, etc.

For it seems that these receptacles are five: because
1. According to the number and mode of merits, there ought to be the mode and number of receptacles. However, there is mortal sin, original sin, venial sin, and the merit of charity. It is evident, however, that to the first corresponds hell, to the second the limbo of children, to the third the limbo of the fathers before the advent of Christ, and now the kingdom of heaven. Therefore, some special places of receptacles ought to correspond to the fourth and fifth.

1. Likewise, there is a receptacle with darkness and sensible punishment purging, and with darkness only not purging: therefore, there is something with darkness only and purging, and with sensible only and not purging: therefore, there will be six differences of these receptacles.
2. Likewise, this air according to Peter, is a gloomy prison of demons?: therefore, it is one of the receptacles: therefore, there are more than are commonly posited.
3. Likewise, it is evident that the devil is everywhere, he is in punishments and in fire: therefore, also here in this prison: but it has been held, that that fire is corporeal: therefore, here is corporeal fire: but corporeal fire especially most hot, heats and burns nearby bodies: therefore, this fire ought to burn houses and nearby men: and this we do not see.

To this it must be said, that there are diverse receptacles of souls, and thus they are diversified. For they are either as a terminus, or as a way. If a terminus: then there are two, namely according to evil merit hell, and according to good merit the kingdom of heaven: but the terminus according to evil merit or hell is twofold, according to one's own merit, and alien contracted with nature: and to the first corresponds the lower hell of the damned, to the second, however, the limbo of children which is the upper hell: and concerning the punishment of these it is to be inquired in the second of the Sentences, in the treatise on original sin. If, however, it is according to the way: either this is from the defect of one's own merit, or from the defect of the payment of the price: because these two are required for perfect satisfaction, as noted above in the third of the Sentences. If in the first way: then it is purgatory. If, in the second way: then it is the limbo of the holy fathers before the advent of Christ.

To the first, therefore, it must be said, that mortal and venial are punished in hell because venial by accident has eternal punishment, namely on account of conjunction to mortal, as noted above in the second of the Sentences. However, the conjunction of original and venial, in my judgment, is impossible: because by omitting he will sin mortally, when he can sin venially: or even venial is not considered. You will also find this there.

To the other it must be said, that sensible punishment cannot be without darkness: because darkness follows from aversion, and sensible punishment from conversion: and therefore there is no place of sensible punishment only, just as there is no mortal sin having conversion only. Similarly, there cannot be purging darkness: because it does not make purgatory, except in him who has the light of grace, and through the punishment of sense. And it is clear from the aforesaid, that also other differences are not possible.

To the other it must be said, that this air is not a place of punishment, except comparatively, namely with respect to heaven, but it is a place of exercise: and concerning this you will find in the second of the Sentences, in the treatise on the fall of the devil.

To the other it must be said, that it does not heat nearby bodies: because as it is said, that fire acts only by the power of the instrument of divine justice: and therefore it does not burn except that which is directed by divine justice, as condemned for sin.

DISTINCTIO XLV

Divisio Textus

Nor is it to be denied, as Augustine says, etc. Here he discusses the suffrages of the dead.

And he touches on two things, namely concerning the suffrages themselves, and the consequent questions: and the second begins there, "Solet moveri questio de duobus," etc.

Likewise, in the first he introduces two things. First, indeed, he touches on whether the suffrages of the Church avail.

And secondly, concerning the pomp of funerals, there, B, Concerning the pomp of funerals, etc.

Concerning the first, in various places arise nine, which all are touched upon in Liélera: of which the first is, Whether the suffrages which one person makes for another avail? Second, Whether they avail for the deceased? Third, Whether they avail for those dying in mortal sins? Fourth, Whether they avail for those who are in purgatory? Fifth, Whether they availed for the fathers who were in limbo before the advent of Christ? Sixth, Whether they avail for children who die in original sin? Seventh, Whether they avail for the Saints in the kingdom of heaven? Eighth, Which suffrages avail more? Ninth, By whom ought they to be made?

Articulus 1 — Whether The Suffrages That One Performs Avail Another

Whether the suffrages which one makes, avail another?

To the first, it is objected thus:

1. The Apostle says, 2 Corinthians 5:10: "We must all be manifested before the tribunal of Christ, that each one may receive the things done in the body, according to what he has done." Therefore, each one will receive his own: therefore, as it seems, the works of another avail nothing; therefore, what one does does not avail another.

1. Likewise, whether the work of nature or of art is considered, the work of one is never derived into another, but always consists around its own matter: therefore, it is also thus in meritorious works, that what one does cannot be derived to another.
2. Likewise, in sins, one is not punished for another: therefore, neither in suffrages is one liberated for another.
3. Likewise, if a work is considered according to affection, it cannot effect a good habit except around the one acting: therefore, it seems that it does nothing around another person: and thus as before.
4. Likewise, what is from another, insofar as it is from another, is not worthy of praise or blame: therefore, he for whom intercession is made, from the fact that another acts well for him, is not worthy of praise or any good: but it is unjust to give to the unworthy: therefore, it is not fitting to give him indulgence from the fact that suffrages are made for him.

On the contrary of this is that
4. One satisfies for another in human judgment: but divine judgment is more mild and merciful than human; therefore, in divine judgment, one can suffrage for another.

1. Likewise, Christ satisfied for all: therefore, also the members of Christ can suffrage for one another.
2. Likewise, Psalm 118:63: "I am a partaker with all those who fear you." But it is evident that such a great Prophet would not pray in this way unless he knew it to be possible that he would obtain.
3. Likewise, Genesis 25:21: "Isaac entreated the Lord for his wife, because she was barren: and He heard him, and gave conception to Rebecca, and the merit of one is derived into another."
4. Likewise, the Gloss of Gregory says there, that the predestination of the Saints is helped by prayers. Therefore, as before.
5. Likewise, Acts 12:5: "Peter was kept in prison. But prayer was made without ceasing by the Church to God for him." The Church would not have done this unless one was helped by what another does. Therefore, as before.

Response. Without any ambiguity, it must be believed and said that prayer and merit avail another: for this is what is said in the Creed in that article, "the communion of Saints": because here it is thus understood: I believe in the Holy Spirit, namely, communicating goods in the Church.

And the Apostle, 2 Corinthians 8:13-14: "That by an equality, your abundance may supply their want, that their abundance may also supply your want, that there may be equality."

To the first, therefore, it must be said that "own" is said in two ways, namely, what I have done by myself, and what I have made my own. And in the first way, indeed, works done by me are called my own. But in the second way, also what I have done by my charity is called my own: and thus the saying of the Apostle is understood.

To the other, it must be said that nature does not operate in the form of will which communicates goods, nor art, but rather they are divided by matters: but there is one principle in the Church, which is the Holy Spirit: and He also makes common goods through the whole body which He inspires, namely, the mystical body: and this is rather assimilated to the work by which one member helps another in the organic body, than to the work of nature or art.

To the other, it must be said that sins do not have one principle nor one form, as was noted above in the distinction on penance, the question on dead and mortified works: but good works have both a common form and a common principle: because of which all good people are one body connected by charity, but not the wicked. And therefore, it is not similar concerning good and evil works.

To the other, it must be said that that help is not by way of effecting through the work, but rather by way of suffraging with the author of all good, that He may effect good in another by the merit of one.

To the other, it must be said that even in civil matters, one is both liberated and rewarded for another, although he is not made praiseworthy or blameworthy: because when something is done to him whom I love, on account of me, I understand it to be done to me.

Articulus 2 — Whether Suffrages Avail The Deceased

Whether suffrages avail the deceased?

Secondly, it is asked whether suffrages avail the deceased?

It seems that they do not: because
1. As the Philosopher says, there is no communication of the living with the dead. But for the value of suffrages, there must be communication. Therefore, it seems that suffrages of the living do not avail the dead.

1. Likewise, the dead are not of the forum of the living. Therefore, it seems that those things which are done in the forum of the living cannot avail them: but all suffrages are made among the living: therefore, it seems that they avail nothing to the dead.
2. Likewise, the dead are under necessity: therefore, it seems that the possibility of aid is removed from them: therefore, also the help of suffrage is removed from them.
3. Likewise, Ecclesiasticus 14:17: Before your death, work justice, for there is no finding food in the underworld. It seems that there is no refreshment there through suffrage.

4. Likewise, Apocalypse 14:13: Their works follow them. Therefore, it seems, since nothing is added, that nothing follows them from another's work. Therefore, they receive nothing of the solace of refreshment.

5. Likewise, Psalm 74:3: When I shall take the time, I will judge justices. But after death, God takes the time. Therefore, then He judges only according to justice. Therefore, it seems that there is nothing there of mercy through suffrages.

On the contrary, there is an entire treatise on this, which Dionysius made in the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, last chapter, concerning the holy sleepers. And among other things which are there, he thus says: For truly the prayers of the just, both according to this life and how much more after death, work in those who are worthy of sacred prayers, only the traditions of the words truly teach us.

This same thing Gregory proves in the fourth Dialogues through many examples.

Likewise, Bede in the history of the English.

Likewise, II Maccabees 12:44: For if he did not hope that those who had fallen would rise again, etc.

Likewise, in the same place, verse 48, it is said: Judas, etc., and having made a great collection, he sent twelve thousand drachmas of silver which are noted there.

Response. There is no doubt that the suffrages of the Saints benefit the deceased.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that Aristotle speaks of communication, which is in living together through the communication of contracts and societies, and not of the communication of charity, which in one body unites the dead and the living, as many as have charity: and this suffices for the value of suffrages.

To the second, it must be said that the dead who are in purgatory are in some way still of our forum, namely inasmuch as they are not at the end: but according to the fact that they are in security, they differ from those who are in the forum of the Church.

Or it may be said that not being of the forum does not impede suffrages: because the communication of charity is the cause of suffrages, and not the identity of the forum.

To the third, it must be said that there is a twofold necessity, namely the state according to the quantity of merit, and purity. According to the first mode, they are under necessity, because they will never have less merit than was the quantity of charity in time: but according to the other mode, they are not under necessity, because they can be purified from day to day.

To the fourth, it must be said that it speaks of the hell of the damned, and not of those who are in purgatory.

To the fifth, it must be said that, as is hinted in the letter from the words of Augustine, our works, as was said before, even those which we did through our merit, by this that we communicate in charity, which is the form of the work making common such works.

To the sixth, it must be said that justice is that to him who communicates with the Church in charity, the goods of the Church are communicated: and therefore that saying is no obstacle.

Articulus 3 — Whether Suffrages Avail Those Dying In Mortal Sin

Whether suffrages avail for those dying in mortal sin?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether they avail for those dying in mortal sin?

And this is to ask, Whether they avail for those damned in hell?

It seems that they do: because

1. In the text it is said that for whom they avail, they either profit for full remission, or for making their damnation more tolerable. Therefore, they profit the damned for a more tolerable damnation.

1. Likewise, Mercy exalts, as it is said, James 1:13. Therefore, judgment exalts every judgment of condemnation: therefore, it seems that from mercy some help is granted to the merits of the Saints suffraging.
2. Likewise, in 2 Maccabees 12:40, it is said that under the tunics of those for whom Judas Maccabeus prayed and offered, was found from the sacrifices of idols. It is clear, however, that to sacrifice to idols is a mortal sin. Therefore, he prayed and offered for idolaters damned in mortal sin. And it is clear that he would not have done so unless the suffrage availed them: therefore, even for the damned and idolaters, the suffrages of the Church avail.
3. Likewise, Dionysius in the authority previously introduced says that prayer avails more for the dead than for the living: but for the living existing in mortal sin, prayer is made, and often the prayer is heard: therefore, much more should prayer be made for the damned dead, if the prayer will avail them.
4. Likewise, the damned who was faithful was of the number of the Church, although not by merit: therefore, something better should be for him after death than for him who was neither by number nor by merit of the Church: but it is clear that for those who are by number and merit of the Church, suffrages avail for remission, but for those who are neither by number nor by merit, they avail nothing: therefore, for him who was by number not by merit, they avail for a more tolerable damnation.
5. Likewise, in 1 Timothy 4:8: Piety is useful for all things, even if it suffers the slipperiness of the flesh, without doubt it will be punished, but it will not perish. Either this is understood of venial slipperiness, or mortal. If of venial: then it says nothing, because this is expiable by itself, and not only by the merit of piety: therefore, it is clear that it speaks of mortal slipperiness: therefore, someone dying previously in mortal sin can be helped by the Church to full remission: therefore, much more others can be helped to a more tolerable damnation.

6. Likewise, every unjust judge would be considered who would rather choose the obstinacy of the guilty than their amendment: therefore, God also wishes the guilty to be amended: but if He mitigates the guilt and punishment through the suffrages of the Church, they are amended: therefore, it seems that He permits suffrages to avail them.

7. Likewise, man sinned remediably, not the Angel: therefore, every man ought to find some remedy in any state: therefore, also the damned: therefore, the merits of the Saints ought to suffrage for them.

8. Likewise, God is infinitely more merciful than man: but I see that man can never sin so much against man, that he would not temper the punishment if the whole Church interceded: therefore, much more at the intercession of the whole Church will God temper the punishments for the damned: therefore, the suffrages of the Church avail them.

On the contrary,
1. Dionysius says there: For which reason the high priest does not pray for the unclean here sleeping: because not only would he be averted in this by the prophetic order, and what of the hierarchs would dare proudly to be admonished by the prince of perfection. The high priest does not pray for the damned: because he would oppose the divine order in this, and would be admonished as proud by the prince of perfection, God.

1. Likewise, Maximus in the commentary there: He does not pray for the remission for sinners: because he would not be heard for them.

2. Likewise, Augustine in book XXI of the City of God: If I knew my father to be in hell, I would not pray more for him than for the devil.

3. Likewise, on that of Job 12:23: He will esteem the abyss as if aging, etc., Gregory says in book XXXIV of the Morals: The Saints in eternity recognize themselves to be more debtors to divine grace, as they see in eternity the evils punished, which they could avoid by His help. But, they say, and where is it that the saints are, if they will not pray for their enemies whom they then see burning: to whom indeed it was said: Pray for your enemies? But we answer more quickly: They pray for their enemies at the time when they can convert their hearts to fruitful repentance, and save them by that conversion. For what else is to be prayed for enemies, except what the Apostle says, 2 Timothy 2:25-26: That God may grant them repentance to the acknowledgment of the truth, and they may recover themselves from the snare of the devil, by whom they are held captive? And how will it be prayed for them then, when they can no longer be converted from the works of iniquity to the works of justice? Therefore, the same reason is why it is not then prayed for men damned in eternal fire, which is now also, that it is not prayed for the devil and his angels assigned to eternal punishment. Which is now also the reason why the saints do not pray for infidel and impious men deceased, because indeed they know those assigned to eternal punishment, they refuse before the sight of the just judge to have the merit of their prayer annulled. But if now also the living just do not pity the dead and damned unjust, when they still know that they themselves also suffer something judgable from their flesh, how much more strictly will they then regard the torments of the wicked, when they themselves, stripped of all vice of corruption, will adhere more intimately and closely to justice. It is understood that prayer avails nothing for the damned.

4. Likewise, Augustine is introduced in the text saying thus: Souls which departed from the body without faith working through love and its sacraments, such offices of piety are bestowed upon them in vain by their own.

5. Likewise, the Church commonly sings: In hell there is no redemption. Therefore, neither is there relaxation through suffrages.

Response. It seems to me that it should be said that since in hell there is a twofold punishment, namely of sense, and of the worm of conscience: as to the punishment of sense, suffrages avail nothing at all for the damned. But the worm of conscience gnaws concerning three things, namely of committed, and omitted, and that he was not deemed worthy that another should do any good for him. As to the first two, the worm is not mitigated: but as to the third, it can be mitigated, because when good is done for him, he cannot say that he was not deemed worthy that at least some good should be done for him by another.

However, below, in the following distinction, we will return to this question, and there we will dispute concerning all the opinions of the ancients, and concerning the text.

Therefore, I simply concede the authorities introduced, saying to the first, that damnation in the text is taken broadly for punishment: because thus suffrages avail for those who are in purgatory, either that they may be absolved, or that they may not be immediately absolved, but the punishment may be mitigated or shortened.

To the other, it should be said that there is a twofold mercy, namely liberating, and relaxing. But the damned do not feel the liberating, but the relaxing, and not in suffrages, but in this that they are punished less than they deserve.

To the other, it should be said that it was not as if idolothytum was found among the idolaters under the tunics of those soldiers, but rather as among those who by venial avarice took the gold which had been offered for the adornment of idols, as victors take by the right of war. And the circumstance of the text proves this to be true: and because they sinned venially, the suffrages of Judas could profit them.

To the other, it should be said that Dionysius speaks only as to the condition of the gift of perseverance: because in this the deceased in good is better than the living: and therefore what is further inferred does not avail, because the living can be amended, and not the dead, as is clear in the authority of Gregory introduced.

To the other, it should be said that from the fact that he was in the number of the Church, he obtains many other goods, namely the remission of original sin, and perhaps of many others, and retraction from other sins, and especially what is the greatest of all, the avoidance of infidelity: but I do not think that anyone has more from suffrages than another: and in the argument there is a fallacy of the consequent, as if it were argued thus, something follows: therefore, that.

To the other, it should be said that it speaks of mortal slipperiness and temporal corrective punishment, for which penance must be endured: and if it speaks of future punishment, then it speaks of venial slipperiness: and then the argument against does not avail, because although that is remitted, yet by the virtue of piety it is remitted sooner and more lightly.

To the other, it should be said that then the impious will be in a state where they cannot be amended: and then the punishment is just for them. Hence, just as it would be unjust for a judge to change a just punishment deserved by sentence, so it would be unjust then to change their obstinate will: and therefore the suffrages of the Church are not ordained for this.

To the other, it should be said that the remediability of sin avails man as to the state of amendment, which the devil never had, and not as to the state of future damnation: and this is what Damascene says that it must be known, that what is fall in the Angels, is death in men: because just as there is no return to grace for Angels after the fall, so neither is there a return to penance for man.

To the last, it should be said that if the punishment were justly declared, unless the judge would deny his justice, he would not change it for the whole world: and thus God cannot deny Himself or His justice, as the Apostle says, 2 Timothy 2:12-13: If we deny Him, He also will deny us: if we are faithless, He remains faithful; He cannot deny Himself. Therefore, He does not receive any suffrages of the Church for them.

Articulus 4 — Whether Suffrages Profit Those Who Are In Purgatory

Whether suffrages benefit those who are in purgatory?

Fourthly, it is asked, Whether they benefit those who are in purgatory?

It seems that they do not:
1. For it is the part of a just judge not to remit a punishment justly inflicted: but the punishment of purgatory is justly inflicted: therefore it ought not to be remitted.

1. Likewise, for something to act upon another, it must reach to its use: but the power of the living does not reach to the dead: therefore it seems that it does not act upon them: therefore suffrage does not avail them.
2. Likewise, they are not of the forum of the Church: therefore the works of the Church do not avail them if they are done for them.

On the contrary is everything that is said in the Letter.

1. Likewise, those whose charity is uniting in one body, have a communication of goods with each other: but the charity of the Church militant is one with those who are in purgatory; therefore there is a communication of goods: therefore necessarily goods are communicated to them in purgatory by way of suffrage.

2. Likewise, it seems less that those who are in purgatory should suffrage for the living, than conversely: and they do suffrage for them: therefore, etc. The first is proved from this, that the living are in a state of meriting a greater crown, and they are not. The second is written in the fourth Dialogue of Gregory, who says that Paschasius, when he was in hell, still performed a miracle, healing a certain one who called upon him and touched his bier.

Response. Without ambiguity, it must be held that suffrages benefit those who are in purgatory, as is said in the Letter.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that that punishment is not so confirmed that it cannot be divided to another: and therefore it can be remitted in whole or in part.

To the other, it must be said that it reaches by power, not in act, and making it reach is charity communicating all goods whatsoever are in the mystical body.

To the other, it must be said that this does not impede, as was said above in the second article of this question.

Articulus 5 — Whether Suffrages Profited The Fathers In Limbo

Whether suffrages benefited the fathers in limbo?

Whether suffrages benefited the fathers in limbo?

Fifthly, it is asked, Whether they benefited the fathers in limbo?

It seems that they did: because
1. They were not very evil, and suffrages benefit such: therefore they also benefited the fathers then.

1. Likewise, While they lived, they made themselves worthy, so that these could benefit them: therefore they benefited them.
2. Likewise, They were in a place where they were in need, and they were worthy that such things could benefit them: therefore it would have been cruel not to receive suffrages for them.

On the contrary: because
1. It is impossible for them to be purified: because there was nothing to be purified, who had nothing to be purified that is personal sin: but in such there was nothing to be purified: therefore they were not purified by the suffrages of the Church.

1. Likewise, It is not necessary to offer suffrages for one who experiences no punishment from the judge on account of himself: but such were the fathers in limbo: therefore suffrages did not benefit them.

To which it must be conceded: and the reason for this is, because they satisfied in all things that could be done by man: but nevertheless because the price for the debt of Adam was not paid, they awaited the payment of that price with happy hope, as was said in the beginning of this book, in the treatise on circumcision.

To the first, therefore, it must be said, that it is true, that they are not very evil, because they were very good, who did not need such things.

To the second, it must be said, that the dignity of the fathers in this life exceeded such need of suffrages: whence they could rather help others in purgatory, than be helped by them.

To the third, it must be said, that there is a twofold need, namely of nature, and of person. The need of nature was the impossibility of the payment of the price for the whole nature which Adam corrupted and lost: and no one could remove this need except Christ, the mediator of God and men, and in that were the fathers, and against this the suffrage of the Church was not ordained, because this was impossible for a mere man. Another need is posited of the person from personal defect and insufficiency of one's own merit: and for its aid the merit and suffrage of the Church is ordained: and in such need the fathers were not, but rather they entered the grave in abundance, and buried they slept securely until the advent of Christ, as it is said, Job 21:24 and 22.

Articulus 6 — Whether Suffrages Profit Unbaptized Children

Whether suffrages benefit children not baptized?

Sixthly, it is asked, Whether suffrages benefit children not baptized?

It seems that they do: because
1. They have only original sin: therefore, some merit should also benefit them: but this happens through the suffrages of the Church: therefore, suffrages ought to benefit such children.

1. Likewise, alien sin is less than any personal sin, however small: and personal venial sin does not obstruct suffrage: therefore, neither does alien sin: therefore, they benefit such as have only alien sin: such are children: therefore, suffrages benefit children.
2. Likewise, they can in no way be called very evil: but suffrages benefit such: therefore, they also benefit those.

On the contrary, they die without grace: but one dying without grace is imperceptible to the perception of grace, therefore they will never be able to perceive grace hereafter: but sin is never remitted without grace: therefore, their sin is not remitted on account of any suffrage.

And this must be conceded.
To the first, it must be said that as long as they are in the state of meriting, then alien merit can benefit them, and especially the merit of Christ in the sacrament of regeneration: but in another state they are confirmed: and therefore sin becomes immobile, not from the magnitude of the sin, but from the state and divine sentence.

To the other, it must be said that, as stated, sin does not cause this, but the divine sentence and state.

To the other, it must be said that it is understood of those not very evil, who while living made themselves worthy that such things could benefit them: and this those little ones did not do, who did nothing at all good or evil.

Articulus 7 — Whether Suffrages Profit The Saints In The Homeland

Whether suffrages benefit the Saints in their homeland?

Seventhly, it is asked, Whether they benefit the Saints in their homeland?

It seems that they do: because 1. The more worthy someone is to benefit from it, the more the intercession made by another for him is effective: but the Saints are most worthy: therefore the intercession of the Church is most effective for them.

1. Likewise, human piety receives intercession for increasing the inheritance of a friend or son: but love is divine piety: therefore the Church more quickly receives intercession so that the reward may be increased for them in their homeland: therefore intercessions are effective for them.
2. If you say that they do not need it. On the contrary: Their reward can increase, because it is not at its highest: therefore this can be made greater by the suffrages of the good.
3. Likewise, it is greater in natures to give the being of substance than to increase what is given: therefore it is similarly in divine matters, if someone obtains for another the first grace which gives spiritual being, he can also obtain an increase of such grace in the homeland: therefore the suffrage of the Church also has a place among the Saints.

On the contrary of this is, 4. What is said in the Letter: because the Saints who are in their homeland do not need it: therefore they are not helped by such things.

1. Likewise, the lesser does not help the greater, but conversely: since therefore the least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than the greatest who is in the militant Church, it seems that in no way does it benefit one existing in it.

And this is to be conceded: and the reason is, because they are confirmed and cannot grow even by their own merit henceforth in substantial reward.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that although they are most worthy, they do not receive the suffrage of the Church, but rather from their dignity they have that they can bestow suffrages on others.

To the second, it must be said that this is done by human piety: because none of the sons can be sufficiently endowed without needing more: but each in the kingdom of heaven is so endowed that he does not wish for more than he has, and he is confirmed in that.

To the third, it must be said that he does not need it: and this is what is said, that the substantial reward cannot grow: because although it can be greater, it cannot be greater in one who is confirmed.

To the fourth, it must be said that both fall under the merit of another in the state of the way, but after this state neither falls under the merit of another.

Articulus 8 — Which Suffrages Avail More

Which suffrages are more efficacious?

Which suffrages are more efficacious?

Eighthly, it is asked, Which suffrages are more efficacious?

1. It is said in the Text, that they are aided by prayers, the salutary sacrifice, and alms: therefore it seems that these are the principal ones.
2. Likewise, these three are rightly ordered against the sins of the spirit: because Bede says that the plagues of the spirit are cured by prayer, and those contracted from the love of things by alms: however, the sacrifice is received for debts, because Christ paid the price for us: therefore it seems that these are the principal ones.
3. But then it seems that it is stated incompletely: because the plagues of the body ought to be cured by fasting: and those are not named here: therefore, etc.
4. Likewise, it is the custom of the Church to enjoin pilgrimages of the cross especially to the Holy Land for the entire purgatorial punishment for one, or ten souls, or fewer, or more: therefore it seems that this is most efficacious for them.

Response. It must be said that in truth, according to the sayings of Gregory in Book IV of the Dialogues, souls desire nothing so much to be done for them as the salutary sacrifice. And Bede says the same in the Ecclesiastical History of the English. And then prayers and alms, and other things which the Church enjoins. Hence the Text does not touch upon all, but the principal ones.

To that which is objected concerning fasting, it must be said that fasting rather cuts off the plagues in the body of the one fasting: and because the dead no longer have to subdue the flesh, therefore fasts are not much to be done for them, but those things which have been said: for prayer is to God, and alms to the poor, in whom God is consoled and fed: and thus God, being induced, relaxes the punishments of the deceased.

To the other, it must be said that the Church does this from the power of the keys rather than by the virtue of suffrage: and therefore it then derives its treasures to the deceased, so that the faithful may be more quickly induced to devotion.

And more about this must be sought above in the question concerning Indulgences[742].

Articulus 9 — Who Are Those By Whom Suffrages Ought To Be Performed

Who are those, through whom ought suffrages to be made?

Ninthly, it is asked, Through whom ought they to be made?

It seems that it ought to be through those existing in charity: because

1. It is said, John 9:31: We know that God does not hear sinners. Therefore, if alms are given by one who does not exist in charity, or prayer is made by such a one, it seems that the suffrage is not valid.
2. Likewise, Gregory: When one who displeases is sent to intercede, the mind of the angry judge is provoked to worse. Therefore, it seems that when such persons offer suffrages, the penalty rather increases for them than diminishes.

On the contrary, according to this, it would be necessary to inquire when alms are given to the poor to pray for someone, whether they are in charity or not: and this would be difficult.

Response. It must be said that suffrage, although executively it is of the living, nevertheless as an inductive cause it is the work of the dead: and therefore I think, because according to charity the dead are informed: and therefore if it is done by one who is not in grace, it is valid: but nevertheless it would be better if it were done by one who is in grace.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that sinners are not heard praying for themselves.

To the other, it must be said that Gregory speaks in another case, when someone strives to intercede from their own confidence and their own acts, and not when they are as an instrument moved by another, as was said before.

Articulus 10 — Whether Those Who Put On The Pomps Of Funerals Sin

Whether those sin who make pompous funerals?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said,
there, B, Concerning the pomp of funerals, etc.

And it is asked, Whether those sin who make such pomp?

It seems that they do not: because
1. Holy men did this, as it is said, 1 Maccabees 12:27-28, Simon built over the tomb of his parents a building visible to others. And he set up, etc., seven pyramids.

1. Likewise, Isaiah 11:10, it is said: And his sepulcher shall be glorious. Therefore, it seems that this ought to be done even concerning the bodies of the saints.
2. Likewise, such things were done concerning the sepulcher of the Lord: therefore, they ought also to be done concerning the sepulchers of others.

Further, it is asked, Whether it is a sin to do such things for the wicked, namely, to bury them in a holy place and to adorn their sepulchers?

742. Reference to a previous discussion on Indulgences.

It seems that it is: because
1. A profane body is not to be placed in a sacred place: therefore, he sins who places it.

1. To the same point, Gregory narrates in the book of Dialogues, that a certain wicked man buried in a holy place was cast out by demons.
2. Likewise, he is more unclean than filth: and it is evident that if someone were to place filth there, he would sin: therefore, also he who places the impious there.
3. Likewise, according to the laws, only the burial of an ass is owed to the impious: therefore, they sin who bury them otherwise.
4. Likewise, Isaiah 14:20, it is said concerning the wicked king of Babylon, that he will not have fellowship with kings even in burial: therefore, as before.

On the contrary,
4. Alms are to be given to all for the sustenance of nature; but burial is a species of alms, as it is said, Job 7:24: therefore, it is to be denied to no one.

1. Likewise, a certain natural dignity is inherent in the human body: therefore, it is not to be left unburied to horror: therefore, every man, however unworthy, is to be buried.

To the first part of these objections, it must be said that the sepulchers of the good and the saints are to be adorned for the manifestation of their glory of resurrection: and therefore I well concede the things introduced.

To the OTHER part, it must be said that burial of an ass or a man is granted to every man, as the laws say: and I well concede that unless it is done for the terror, every man's body ought to be buried: for out of horror, thieves and such wicked men are not buried.

And thus the other objections introduced are understood.

Even the excommunicated are not buried in a sacred place, although they are buried with the burial of an ass because of the stench.

And through this, the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 11 — Whether The Condition Of The Rich Man Is Preferable To That Of The Poor Man

Whether the condition of the rich is better than that of the poor? And, whether it is better to make common suffrages than special ones?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, "C, A question is usually raised," etc.

For from this it seems that the condition of the rich is better than that of the poor: and this is false, because poverty is praised, and riches are blamed.

Further, it is asked, whether it is better to make common suffrages than special ones?

It seems that it is better to make common ones: because 1. Particular suffrages draw their force from charity, since charity communicates goods: therefore, the more common they are, the better.

1. Likewise, Jerome says that common things are better than private ones.

On the contrary of this is that 1. Gregory instituted special prayers for a servant and a maidservant: therefore, those are more valuable than common ones.

1. Likewise, in the Letter it says that special ones are more valuable for a more special redemption, although not for a fuller one: therefore, they are more valuable.

To this it must be said that since suffrages are by way of satisfaction for sin, and sins are proper, not common, it seems to me that special and proper suffrages are more valuable: and therefore also in the Letter it says that he who has many special ones is freed more quickly. Private ones are better with respect to amendment of sin.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the comparison is understood among those who have other things equal. And nothing prohibits the condition of the rich from being better in a certain respect than that of the poor, although simply it is the reverse.

To the other it must be said that charity is the form of every good, whether common or private: and therefore in that objection it is not proven that common ones are better.

Or it must be said that common ones are better with respect to the eternal crown, but not with respect to the amendment of sin.

To the other, the solution is clear: because the saying of Jerome is understood with respect to the attainment of the crown.

Articulus 12 — Whether The Saints Hear The Prayers Of Supplicants

Whether the Saints hear the prayers of the supplicants?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, EH, But perhaps you ask, Whether the prayers of the supplicants, etc.?

1. For it seems, if the Saints do not hear the prayers of men naturally, but only through the revelation of the word, that they are more imperfect than we: because we hear the vows of others both through revelation and naturally: however, the souls existing in purgatory do not hear, except through revelation, as it says in the Text.
2. Likewise, If they hear or perceive naturally, it is asked, what is that knowledge? For acquired knowledge does not remain in them, as was held above in the third Sentences, and they do not have the organs by which abstraction would occur: therefore it seems that the vows of men cannot become known to them by nature.

Response. It must be said without prejudice, that souls stripped of bodies have the forms of creation like Angels, and with them they speak and hear like Angels. And what this is, is noted above in the second Sentences. However, the Master in the Text does not make mention of that mode: because it is not an act of glory, nor the most sublime in the soul, but natural: but that the soul is not now in that knowledge, is because of the cognition of the senses, around which it is occupied, as Augustine says.

DISTINCTIO XLVI

Divisio Textus

DIVISION OF THE TEXT,

But it is asked here concerning the very wicked, etc. In this distinction, two questions are posed. One from intention, namely, whether suffrages benefit the very wicked? And another incidentally, namely, whether in every work of God there is mercy and truth, there, C, But how the justice of God and piety, etc.

As to the first, he says two things, namely, whether any mercy is shown to the very wicked. And secondly, he determines in the contrary direction from what was introduced, there, B, What therefore was said, etc.

However, the text of the first part is clearly disputed in the Text: for understanding which, three things must be inquired, namely, first, concerning that division which it supposes, that there are the very good, etc. Secondly, concerning the opinion of the Doctors about the very wicked. And thirdly, whether in every work of God there is mercy and truth?

Articulus 1 — Whether The Division Which The Master Supposes, Namely That Some Are Very Good And Some Very Evil, Is Good

Whether the division which the Master supposes, namely that some are very good, and some very evil, is good?

To the first, it is objected thus:
1. Every division ought to be through opposites: but the fourfold division above is held: therefore among themselves the members are at least disparate: therefore moderately good and moderately evil are different kinds of men.

1. Likewise, the fourfold difference is found in those to be judged, as will be had below: for those to be judged are perfect: and judged condemned, who are as moderately evil: and not judged condemned, who are as very evil. Since therefore these kinds of men differ in the order of judgment, it seems that here they have a difference: therefore moderately good and moderately evil differ.
2. Likewise, in morals this diversity is found: for there are infidels, whose malice exceeds every other which is only in morals: and there are infidels who at least in number are of the Church: and there are imperfect good and perfect good: and it is evident that the first are very evil, and the second moderately evil, and the third moderately good, and the fourth very good: therefore all these states differ among themselves.

3. Likewise, when it is said, "he is moderately good," either it can be inferred that he is simply, or not. If so: therefore since in this it could be inferred that he is simply good, by the same reason in another it would be inferred that he is simply evil: but it is evident that good and evil differ: therefore these simply differ. But if it cannot be inferred that moderately good is simply good: but no one is saved unless he is simply good as to immunity from all mortal sin: therefore moderately good is not saved, which is false: therefore also this is false, that moderately good is not simply good.

On the contrary of this is that
1. Moderately good is not said except by distance from good: but it cannot be distant except by the admixture of evil: therefore moderately good is mixed with some evil. Similarly, moderately evil is not said except by greater access to good: but the same is moderately approaching and moderately receding in reality, although they differ in reason: therefore these two states suppose one kind of men.

1. Likewise, in intermediate colors the same is moderately white and moderately black: therefore similarly it will be in the middle between good and evil.
2. Likewise, the same in the Letter from Augustine is attributed to each state, namely to be able to be helped by suffrages: but of whom the same attribute is, those are the same in supposing themselves to that attribute: therefore these two states are one state.
3. Likewise, in the Letter it is held that suffrages avail none unless he has made himself worthy that these can benefit him. Therefore both moderately evil made himself worthy, and similarly moderately good: but no one makes himself worthy except by grace: therefore each of these has grace: but moderately good and evil, grace being supposed in the subject, make only one state: therefore these two states are one state.

Response. It must be said that this problem ought to have been disputed before the following: because otherwise the following would not be intelligible. Hence different opinions solve differently: for those saying suffrages benefit the damned concede the first part of the objections.

For the first which is against, they say that distance from good is not through the admixture of evil, but rather through the state of imperfection of venials, as those are distant who build wood, hay, stubble, of which it was held above in the treatise on penance. And access to good in moderately evil is through goods which are said to be gratuitously given and of the kind of goods, as is unformed faith giving alms, and fasts, and the like, in mortal sin: and thus they do not make one state.

To the other they say that it is not similar concerning intermediate colors: because those are constituted through the participation of two contraries: but here it is not so: because the middle between simply good and evil is not by participation of two through different recession from the same, but through the state of imperfection, and through the act of mortal sin with the participation of goods enabling to grace.

To the other it must be said that according to them nothing prohibits the same from being attributed to different things through different reasons: and thus they say here that by reason of the good enabling to grace, suffrages avail the moderately evil for a more tolerable damnation. And by reason of the grace of the imperfect good, they avail the moderately good for a quicker absolution from penalties.

To the last they say that there is a double merit, namely of congruity and of condignity. The merit of congruity that suffrages may avail them the moderately evil have: and the merit of condignity that they may be freed more quickly through suffrages, the moderately good have. They also say that this opinion of theirs is more pious and inductive of the Church to many goods: and therefore more to be held and chosen.

On the contrary, others say, with whom I agree, that the second part of the objections truly concludes.

And to the first they say that this division is not through opposite things, but through opposite modes of the thing: for the middle modes are of the same thing, and yet of different reasons.

To the second, however, they say that the order of those to be judged is different from those to whom the Church suffrages: for those to be judged (as the Apostle says) are judged according to the difference of their works: and these are fourfold according to the kind of works: but the Church suffrages none unless whose penalty is soluble and diminishable: but it is evident that no penalty of hell is diminishable while the guilt remains according to being and quantity, which is the whole and sole cause of infernal penalty. And it is evident that guilt in them will never be diminished, since guilt is never dissolved or diminished except by grace: and they are not susceptible of grace: therefore it is evident that the Church suffrages none of the damned.

Through this also the solution to the following is clear: because the kinds of works are different, and the order of those to whom the Church suffrages is different, as has been said.

To the last it must be said that very good is said here from the state of perfection: and therefore it says excess beyond simply good. But moderately good is said from the state of imperfection, and similarly moderately evil. And if it is conceded that simply good is inferred from moderately evil: yet simply evil cannot be inferred from moderately good: because simply evil is he who has nothing of the good of grace making pleasing: but moderately evil is not said from an act or habit simply evil, but from a state to which venials are mixed, which are wood, hay, stubble.

Articulus 2 — How Many Opinions There Are Concerning Suffrages With Respect To The Damned

How many opinions are there concerning suffrages with respect to the damned?

Secondly, it is inquired about the opinions of the ancients concerning this matter.

There were indeed ancients who said that suffrages of the Church benefit the damned who are moderately evil, that is, the damned faithful.

And three modes of their opinions are found.

For Praepositivus said that a single suffrage diminishes some part of the penalty, and according to the equal of the first, it diminishes an equal part of the penalty: and thus with suffrages multiplied, the whole penalty could be removed. However, lest he should say that they are liberated, and their penalty would have an end, and thus fall into the error of Origen, he said that the penalty is suspended by the suffrages of the Church until the day of judgment, and then they will fall back into hell in body and soul together to be tormented eternally.

Others said, like the Porretani, that this diminution is geometric, so that a part of the same proportion is removed by the second suffrage, and not always of the same quantity: so if the first suffrage removes a hundredth of the penalty, the second suffrage equal to the first removes a hundredth of the remainder, and the third a hundredth of that remainder: and thus the penalty always remains, because it is divisible into infinity.

Antisiodorensis found another mode, and said that the penalty is not diminished: because with the cause remaining, the effect remains, that is, with the guilt remaining, the penalty remains: but the one sustaining is strengthened by the suffrage, so that he can more easily sustain the penalty: and he gave a likeness of this, as if a man carries a heavy burden: and when he is in weight and sweat, his face is bathed with cold water, he is strengthened to carry it better, and yet his burden is in no way lighter.

However, it is objected against the first:

1. As Gregory says, there is no greater passibility of the soul and man from eternal fire, unless it is made by guilt. With the passibility which is from guilt remaining in the same way, and with the fire acting in one way, there will always be one passion. However, it is evident that guilt remains in all the damned in the same way always immobile. Therefore, if there is diversity, it is on the part of the acting fire: but this is false, because Gregory says that it acts in one way, just as one sun acts in one way on those who are exposed to it for different causes of infirmity: and yet these do not suffer in one way. Therefore, it is evident that this opinion is false.
2. Likewise, this is against the sayings of the saints Dionysius, Augustine, Gregory, previously introduced.
3. Likewise, since nothing should be dared to be said about such matters unless it is proven by the sayings of the Saints, it seems that it was presumptuous to say such things, because they have neither reason nor authority proving them.

Against the second, it is plainly objected:

1. When two are equal in active power, but the patient is stronger and weaker in suffering and resisting the agent, it acts more on the patient which it finds weaker to resist, than that which it finds stronger: but two equal suffrages are agents, and the damned can resist the first more than the second: therefore the second removes more of the penalty than the first: and thus there is no fiction in that.
2. Likewise, let it be asked of them, why does the second, being equal to the first, remove less than the first? And they will not be able to assign a cause: therefore, since the statement is irrational, it is to be rejected.
3. Likewise, they fall into the inconvenience which they wish to avoid: because although the second diminishes similarly in proportion and not equally, yet so many suffrages can be made that the penalty will become insensible: and they wished to avoid this, because according to them something always remains of the sensible penalty.
4. Likewise, let it be asked, in what art did they learn that the penalty would be divisible into infinity: for this is false, because even a natural body is not divisible into infinity: therefore much less the disposition of the body or soul: but it has only been proven of the mathematical that it is divisible into infinity.

Similarly, it is objected against the third:

1. For souls do not receive strengthening, unless through grace making them pleasing or freely given: and it is not in the state of receiving grace: therefore there is no such strengthening.
2. Likewise, the likeness of the body does not have a place in the spirit, because the spirit does not have passibility, unless from guilt: therefore no strengthening will be made in it, unless through the alleviation of guilt: but this is impossible to alleviate: therefore no damned will receive any consolation.

However, I do not think all these are to be conceded, except in the way it was said above concerning the worm of conscience. And whoever wishes to follow these opinions or rather errors, which do not agree with the Saints, let him labor to determine these.

Articulus 3 — Whether In Every Work Of The Lord There Is Mercy And Truth

Whether in every work of the Lord there is mercy and truth?

Thirdly, it is asked whether in every work of the Lord there is mercy and truth?

It seems that not: because

1. In the work of creation neither justice nor mercy appears: because as Augustine says in the Letter, in heaven there is no misery, therefore neither is there mercy: therefore, since before the world there was no misery, there was no mercy: but neither justice, because that distributes to each according to merits: justice, however, is called truth: therefore neither mercy nor truth were in the work of creation.

1. Likewise, in the justification of the impious, truth or justice does not seem to be present, but only mercy: because God ought not to justify the impious: therefore justice does not appear there.
2. Likewise, it seems that in none of the works of God does justice appear: because justice obliges to what is due: but God is not bound by debt: therefore in none of the works of God does justice appear.
3. Likewise, in the condemnation of very evil prelates, mercy does not appear: because it is said, Wisdom 6:7: "Mercy is granted to the small, but the powerful will suffer powerful torments."
4. Likewise, according to what has been said, in the punishments of the very evil, mercy does not appear, but truth.

On the contrary are those things which are said in the Letter, and what is said in Psalm 25:10: "All the ways of the Lord are mercy and truth."

Response. It must be said that this disputation is of little value and is much prolonged in the Letter, and is resolved: and the saying of the Psalmist is expounded in three ways in the last chapter of this distinction. And at the end of the penultimate, it is said in the Letter that mercy is often taken for goodness, just as truth is for justice. And then it is easier to see: because according to which mercy is put for goodness, mercy appeared in the works of creation: truth, however, because there He produced what He foresaw from eternity shining in His truth and art, because otherwise it would have been false to foreknowledge and predestination. But if truth is put for justice: then justice is taken, as Anselm says in the Proslogion, for the decency of divine goodness: because it was just that He should manifest Himself thus.

And through this the solution to the first question is clear: and in those arguments there is deception of equivocation: because each of these is taken in different senses.

To what is objected about justification, it must be said that there mercy results principally, and also the truth of the promise: because He promised this: whence in Psalm 51:6: "That you may be justified in your words," etc. There is a Gloss: "That you may be justified in your words, by which you promised pardon to sinners." For justice is there, which is the decency of divine piety. Whence Anselm in the Proslogion: "If you spare sinners, it is just, for it befits you."

To what is asked about the punishments of very evil prelates and others, there is a solution which lies in the Letter at the end of this chapter: because there is a twofold mercy, namely liberating, and this they do not experience: and there is relaxing mercy, and this they have, because they are punished less than they deserve. And this notes "to suffer powerful torments," which do not receive diminution after they are inflicted.

The authority of James is resolved in the Letter.

But concerning all those things which are said in that chapter, "But how the just," it is expedited in the first book of the Sentences.

And concerning the last two, whatever can be doubted is expedited by the said things.

Articulus 4 — Whether There Is Eternal Life

Is there any eternal life?

Incidentally, however, by reason of what he says, there, A, shortly before the end: Thus will remain the common eternal life of all the Saints.

Here it is inquired about eternal life, and by opposition about eternal death. And concerning eternal life, four things are inquired, namely, whether it is? Secondly, what it is? Thirdly, whether it is by reason of essence or power? And fourthly, whether the damned angels and men have eternal life?

To the first, it is objected thus: In the reason of anything, one opposite falls, the other can in no way befit it: but in the reason of life beginning or created, the opposite of eternity falls: therefore, it cannot befit created life that it is eternal: but the life of man and angel is created: therefore, it is not eternal. The first is evident by itself. The second is supposed by the reason of the created, which has a beginning: and eternity is defined by not having a beginning, whence Augustine says that true eternity is true incommutability: but no creature is incommutable, as the same says: therefore, the life of no creature is eternal.

The contrary of this is, 1. What is said, John 3:15: That everyone who believes in him may not perish, but may have eternal life.

1. Likewise, John 10:28: I give them eternal life.

Likewise, it is against the Apostles' Creed, where the last article says, And eternal life.

To this, it must be said that eternal life is threefold in the best mode of being.

In one way, by the essence of life and eternity: and thus God alone, who is life above all life, and eternity above all eternity, as Dionysius says, is eternal life.

In the second way, it is said as in the object of living beings, eternal life: and thus again God is eternal life: because he alone is the object, which, exhibited as it is, moves the saints to eternal life, according to what Aristotle says, that outside the heaven there is nothing except blessed life: which cannot be true, that there would be eternal or blessed life there, except as in the object, which is not included within the orb of heaven, nor enclosed outside.

In the third way, it is said eternal life by participation of living beings: and thus the Saints have eternal life.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is not the best in the reason of life said in the first and second way: and this same participated makes the third. Whence, although the participation began, nevertheless the participated, which is called eternal life, did not begin.

To the proof, it must be said that all creatures are changeable by nature: but nevertheless, by participating in the immutable substance, they never exert their change, as Augustine says in book XII of the Confessions: and therefore, insofar as they live eternal life, they are made immutable.

Articulus 5 — What Eternal Life Is

What is eternal life?

Secondly, it is asked, What is eternal life?

It is said, however, in the book On the Motion of the Heart, that life is the continuous act of the soul in the body, but in the book of Causes, in the commentary on proposition 417, it is said that life is a procession from the first being, which is unmoved, eternal, and the first motion.

1. Therefore, it is either taken here in the first or second way. If in the first way: then it must be that eternal life is from an intrinsic principle essentially conjoined: and this is false: because it is from God: and He is not essentially conjoined to anything. If in the second way: then life is taken according to what is caused by the first life: but this is in all living things: therefore it seems that by the same reasoning it would be the principle of eternal life and natural life in all living things: and this is false.
2. Likewise, in both of these ways, Aristotle says that to live in living things is to be: but this is not true of living things with eternal life: therefore it seems that eternal life is not properly called life.
3. If perhaps it is said that life is taken according to well-being. On the contrary: According to well-being is accidental: but no accident by accident is eternal: therefore eternal life is not eternal, which is ridiculous.

If perhaps you say that it is not an accident by accident, but per se. On the contrary: An accident per se always follows the subject, therefore a man who would be in eternal life would always be in eternal life, and would never have been without eternal life: which again is ridiculous.

1. Likewise, eternity is defined by life: because Boethius says that eternity is the interminable possession of life all at once and perfect. But a thing falling under the definition of another is not denominated by it. Therefore, it should not be called eternal life.
2. Likewise, John 17:3: This is eternal life, that they may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom you have sent. Therefore, eternal life is a certain knowledge: and in this way, it is not called life in natures.

Response. It must be said that life is said in two ways, namely according to being, and according to well-being.

According to being, again in two ways, namely properly and improperly.

Properly, again in two ways: and in the first way, life is said to be the act by which the spirit is in that which it is: and in this way, the soul is said to live, and the Angel to live. In another way, it is said to be the continuous act of the soul in the body: and in this way, an animal is said to live: and in this way, all created life is exemplarily and efficiently from the first life: and thus the statement from the book of Causes is understood: because, as the Philosopher says, Every being is from the first being, so also Dionysius speaks of life, chapter 6 of the Divine Names, where he says thus: The immortality of the Angels is from the first life, and the indestructible eternal motion of the Angel is from it, and for the sake of life itself, which is above all life. In this way, the statement from the book On the Motion of the Heart is understood.

Improperly, however, life is said to be the perfection of each thing from its proper form to being, and the act which follows being: as a stone is said to be alive, and water, when it can perfect what is of the stone, and what is of the water.

According to well-being, however, life is said to be according to the well-being of the senses, and the well-being of reason. According to being in the senses, it is said to live, living delightfully and voluptuously, according to what the Apostle says, to the Colossians 3:5: Mortify your members which are upon the earth, fornication, etc. And, to Timothy 5:6: She who lives in pleasure is dead while she lives. According to the well-being of reason, it is said in two ways, namely according to the good of reason in the homeland and glory. And in the first way, it is said, to the Galatians 2:20; I live, yet not I: but Christ lives in me. And in the second way, it is said, Matthew 22:32: He is not the God of the dead, but of the living. And in this way, eternal life is taken here.

And by this, it is clear that if it should be defined, it will be the procession or act of the first life in the blessed, according to the well-being of glory or beatitude, and act.

And by this, the solution to all except the last is clear: to which it must be said that there eternal life is defined by the cause, because the immediate knowledge of God is the cause of this life according to the well-being of glory.

To what is objected that it is...

accident, it must be said that it is not an accident, but rather a natural perfection: for our nature is directed to that act which is eternal life, and glory is its disposition towards it: and in such matters Aristotle says that man is not altered, but rather perfected, especially because it is not an accident that flows from the subject, but rather from God essentially in the manner of glory vivifying us.

Articulus 6 — Whether Eternal Life Belongs To Blessed Spirits By Reason Of Essence Or By Reason Of Power

Whether eternal life pertains by reason of essence or by reason of power to blessed spirits?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether it pertains by reason of essence or by reason of power?

It seems, however, that it is by reason of power: because
1. Knowledge is eternal life: and that is only by reason of power: therefore also life.

1. Likewise, Life is not said here according to being, but according to well-being: but well-being is according to the true and uncreated good: and both of these are perceived by reason of power: therefore also life is present by reason of power, as it seems.
2. Likewise, In this way life is a movement in the spirit from God who is the first life according to the perception of glory: but this is according to which He is the highest good and the highest truth: and it is evident that this is by reason of power: therefore first.

On the contrary, it is that
1. Life always proceeds from the interior: therefore it is first in essence, than in power.

1. Likewise, Grace perfects essence before power: therefore also glory: but this life is according to the well-being of glory: therefore it is first perceived by essence, than by power.

Response. It must be said that the life of glory and also grace is first in essence. For this life, as has been said, is the act of the first life in the spirit according to the influx of glory and beatitude: and thus it proceeds from it according to which it is in blessed spirits through glory: and in this being, the spirit is first, and secondarily power.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that that knowledge is not taken externally, as interior knowledge: because it is not through abstraction, but it is of that which manifests itself inwardly in the soul through the experience of life, that is, the act in the spirit from the first, quiet, eternal life, which is essentially in the blessed spirit.

To the other, it must be said that that good is taken in two ways, namely as distinct, and indistinct. And in the first way, acting in the spirit, it is called life. In the second way, however, it is as if life of power according to the reason of the true and good. And this must be imagined thus: Let us understand the first not to be true and good, and yet through glory to be in the created spirit: still it lives blessedly in its essence in that, through this that it infuses into it the most noble life, which is through glory.

Through this also the solution to the following is clear.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Damned Live An Eternal Life

Whether the damned live an eternal life?

Finally, it is asked, Whether the damned live an eternal life?

It seems that they do: because they live without end in punishments: therefore eternally.

On the contrary, it is that

1. Eternal life is the reward of the blessed: therefore it does not pertain to the wicked.

1. Likewise, eternal life and eternal death do not pertain to the same: but eternal death pertains to the damned: therefore they do not have eternal life.

Response. It must be said that the damned do not live an eternal life, nor do they have eternal life: for to live is to have the principle of life: and this the damned do not have, but rather through separation from that principle: and therefore they are dead simply, but in a certain respect alive, namely according to the miserable life of nature.

But if it is conceded that they live, it should not be conceded that they live an eternal life: for it has been said that eternal here is said participatively. And because thus a creature participates in eternity, as Augustine says, inasmuch as it nowhere exerts its mutability, but rather has its whole life and perfection at once in one, in which nothing passes and nothing is expected in the future. And thus they do not live, except in punishments: because they are subjected to vicissitudes in them. But it is well conceded that they will not see destruction, and they will live still to the end of consumption according to the vicissitude of punishments.

But if it is found improperly said that they live an eternal life because of the lack of end in punishments, it should not be conceded that they have eternal life: because this implies possession: but no one has a mobile participation by way of possession (as has often been said above) except he who has it at will: and this the damned do not have, who desire death, and death flees from them.

To the first, therefore, it is said that it is not the same to live without end, as has already been said.

Articulus 8 — What Eternal Death Is

What is eternal death?

ARTICLE EIGHT

What is eternal death?

Then it is inquired by opposition concerning eternal death:

1. For if death and life are opposites, it seems eternal death is separation from such a life.
2. Likewise, death opposed to natural life is the separation of the soul, which is the cause of life, from the body, as the Philosophers say: therefore, there also eternal death will be separation from such a principle of life.
3. Likewise, Dionysius reproves in the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy those saying death is other than separation from life: therefore, as before.

On the contrary of this is that
1. Separation from any life is in a moment: therefore, there will be no eternal death.

1. Likewise, the eternal is unchangeable essentially, or participatively, as has been said: but in neither of these ways can eternal death be said: therefore, it is not eternal.
2. Likewise, if death is nothing but separation, and separation signifies nothing but the punishment of loss: therefore, those who are dead by eternal death have only the punishment of loss: therefore, they have no punishment of sense, which is false, since they suffer extreme heat and extreme cold.

To this it must be said that death in itself signifies nothing but separation, as was first proven.

To this, therefore, which is objected against, it must be said that death is not properly called eternal: because eternal is put for perpetual when eternal death is called: and this is similar to the eternal in the lack of an end, and not in another. And I well concede that this separation lasts without end.

To the other it must be said that the cause of separation is continuously present, which is confirmed and damned malice, and this causes the ability to suffer punishments: and therefore the suffering of punishable punishments is rather a consequence of such death than death itself: because just as with the soul departing the body withers and expires, and the departure of the soul is death, expiration and putrefaction are consequences of death, because the body is not contained by the soul; so the separation from the eternal principle of life is eternal death, and the consequence of this death is the suffering of fire, because the condemned spirit is not contained by the principle of eternal life.

DISTINCTIO XLVII

Divisio Textus

DIVISION. OF THE TEXT.

It is also customary to inquire, How will it be given, etc. Here it treats of judgment.

And it is divided into three parts. In the first, it treats of judgment. In the second, of the judge, and it begins in the following distinction. Third, of the things consequent to judgment, and it begins in the penultimate distinction of this book.

In the first of these parts, five things are inquired, namely, how will the sentence of judgment be given? Secondly, concerning the saints who will judge with the Lord. Thirdly, concerning the order of those to be judged. Fourthly, concerning the ministry of the Angels in judgment. And fifthly, whether demons preside over the wicked in hell?

And these are introduced here in the Letter in five chapters according to order.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Sentence Of The Judge At The Last Judgment Is Vocal Or Mental

Whether the sentence of the Judge in the final judgment is vocal or mental?

Whether the sentence of the Judge in the final judgment
is vocal or mental?

Concerning the FIRST, it falls to be asked,
Whether § that sentence is vocal or mental? And about this the Master also inquires in the Text.

However, it seems that it is mental: because
1. There will be a very great multitude in that place:
but a very great multitude could not hear one corporeal voice: therefore it seems that that corporeal voice is not.

If anyone says that by miraculous divine power it will be done that all hear that voice. On the contrary: Every nature and every wise operator chooses the simplest way:
but it is simpler that it be done by divine power in the mind than in speech;
therefore it seems that the sentence is expressed in the mind, not by an external voice.

1. Likewise, although in the Gospel of John, v, 28, it is said that all who are in the tombs will hear the voice of the Son of God, it is not understood of a vocal voice, but a mental one: therefore by similarity it seems that although the Gospel may say that this sentence is vocal, it should be understood mentally.
2. Likewise, above, it was held in the authorities introduced by Richard that that sentence is mental: therefore so is this one.
3. Likewise, witnesses will not testify vocally, but mentally: therefore the sentence is in the mind. The first is proved by this, that conscience will be the witnesses.

In opposition to this is that
1. The Gospel expressly says, Matthew xxv, 44. Then the king will say to those who are on his left, etc. Therefore it is to be held thus.

1. Likewise, as will be evident in the following distinction, the judge will judge in the form of a servant: but it is of the form of a man to judge by human judgment: this, however, is that the sentence be pronounced in writing, and expressed by the voice of the sitting judge after counsel or hearing of witnesses made in the ear: therefore it seems that that sentence will be vocal.

Response. It must be said that concerning this question nothing is clear to say: and yet I believe better that it will be mental rather than vocal.

To what is objected in opposition, it must be said that the Gospel speaks to the unlearned, who do not grasp spiritual things unless they are expressed by corporeal similitudes: and yet they ought to be understood spiritually, just as the voice of the trumpet, which will be in the resurrection, and other things which are expressed corporeally concerning the resurrection; about which it was held above.

To the other it must be said that he will judge in the form of a servant, so that he may be seen and recognized as judge: not for this that he may exercise judgment as a servant or man, rather he will exercise judgment according to the secrets of hearts, and this is divine judgment and not human: and therefore this argument is not valid.

Articulus 2 — Whether Some Saints Will Judge With The Lord

Whether some Saints will judge with the Lord?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said, there, B, "Not only Christ will judge," etc.

And concerning this, in this chapter, three things are inquired.

First, Whence some Saints have to judge?

Second, Concerning the manner of the judgment of the Saints.

Third, Whether other Saints in some way relate to the judgment by confirming or judging?

To the first, it is objected:

1. By what is said in Lidlera; that those who, having left all things, followed Christ, will judge with the Lord: therefore those Saints from voluntary poverty have, that they will judge with the Lord.
2. Likewise, Job 36:6: "God... does not save the wicked, and gives judgment to the poor." Therefore, as before.
3. Likewise, This seems from the manner of speaking in Matthew 19:27 and 28, where Peter alleges this merit, saying: "Behold, we have left all things and followed you: what then will there be for us?" And Christ joins: "Amen I say to you, that you who have followed me," etc. Therefore it seems, that from the poverty of spirit they have, that they will judge with the Lord.

4. Likewise, the Gloss there says: "Those who have left all things and followed Christ, they will be judges, who having lawful things, used them rightly. Therefore they will judge." From this follows the same as before.

On the contrary,

1. What Richard of Saint Victor says: "The opening of the books is the manifestation of consciences: in these books is inscribed whatever is retained by them in memory: in these books, as if inscribed, is held whatever is comprehended by them with full understanding. In other such books, human merits, in others indeed divine judgments, in those the quality of actions, in those indeed also the quality of retributions, for each one indeed carries in his conscience as if written, whence his conscience either accuses or defends him. But those who stand by divine contemplation, who read daily in the book of wisdom, as if transcribing in the volumes of hearts whatever they now comprehend with clear understanding of truth. What therefore are the consciences of those to be judged, if not certain, so to speak, actions of Scripture? Or what indeed are the hearts of those judging, divinely taught in all truth, if not certain decrees of canons? They will judge from the merit of contemplation, by which they are made examples of the canons of divine justice, and not from voluntary poverty.
2. Likewise, it is commonly said, the Apostles and Apostolic men will judge. But the Apostles were those who gave decrees of life and had authority in the Church: therefore from apostolic doctrine and life and authority in them is the judicial power: but this is not poverty of spirit as such, therefore poverty is not a proper merit by which they merit judicial power.

Response. It must be said that three things are required, in my judgment, to merit judicial power. The first is the renunciation of temporal cares, so that one may be able to study wisdom according to which the sentence of judgment is to be dictated. The second is the habit of light, justice, and wisdom, which establishes and observes judgment. And the third is the merit, which is acquired in the promulgation of that justice through preaching.

And the first of these is touched upon by the first objections, although the other two are presupposed: and for this reason the Lord says: "You have followed me." Hence Jerome says that it is imperfect to leave all things: for this even Socrates the Philosopher did: and therefore he joins what is perfect, saying: "And we have followed you."

The following is touched upon by Richard.

And the third is touched upon by the last objection.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 3 — What The Mode Of The Saints' Judging Will Be

What will be the manner of judging of the Saints?

Secondly, it is asked concerning the manner of the judgment of the Saints.

And it seems that they will not judge, except as those who show the sentence, because 1. Richard says thus: Twelve
From this expressly and judges before those to be judged open the books of their decrees and admit to the sight of the inspection of the hearts of any inferiors, and reveal their understanding in those things which pertain to the reason of judgment. Truly, while reading in such a Scripture as if decrees of canons, they find the sentence of retribution and the reason of the sentence which each one deserves. Therefore, to read such a Scripture, this will be to have received the sentence of the judge. However, this will be that apostolic men judge anyone to be judged, which is to bring the reason of the sentence to be given before their eyes. It is understood that they will not judge except as books.

1. Likewise, in the same place, a little below:
   The sentence of the judge, therefore, to have seen and understood to the inspection of his heart, this is to have learned and received the judgment. This is understood the same as before.

But against this is that this is an imperfect manner of judging: but an imperfect manner of judging ought not to correspond to the most perfect merit, which is the apostolic merit: therefore, it seems that this manner of judging does not befit them.

Response. It must be said that in truth there is more there than the manner of inspection as in a book: and this Richard signifies when he says: To bring before their eyes the word indeed of bringing signifies a certain command to those to be judged, which is equivalent to a certain proof and infliction of sentence: which is also signified in the Scripture, where it is said, Psalm 149:6, "Two-edged swords in their hands."

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 4 — Whether Other Saints Will Conduct Themselves In Various Ways

Whether other Saints will conduct themselves in one way and another?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether other Saints have themselves in any way towards judgment by confirming or judging?

It seems that they do not: because 1. It is not the same person judging and judged in any one judgment: but other Saints will be judged: therefore they will not judge in the same judgment.

1. Likewise, there is not one mode of judgment for the accuser and the accused in human judgment: but human judgment is modeled after divine judgment: therefore in divine judgment also there is not one mode of judgment for those two persons. But the same mode exists if the judged Saints will be judging in the same judgment: therefore other Saints will not judge in the same judgment.

On the contrary, 4. It is said, Wisdom 6: "They shall judge the nations, and have dominion over the peoples." And there no one is excepted: therefore the Saints will judge the nations, and have dominion over the peoples, they will judge all.

1. Likewise, Matthew 12:42: "The Queen of the South shall rise in judgment." And above, verse 41: "The men of Nineveh, etc." But the Saints are better than the Queen of the South or the men of Nineveh: therefore much more will all the Saints judge and condemn the damned.

Response. It must be said that all the Saints will judge by the judgment of approval and confirmation of the sentence, as has been proven: but not as by imposing the sentence dictated and inflicted in the light of their heart: because thus only Apostolic men judge.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that by a different species of judgment one person can be both judging and judged with respect to different things. [By different species of judgment, I mean the judgment of approval and infliction of the sentence, and the different respects of whom it is, because they will be judged by God and Christ and Apostolic men, and they will judge only the damned.

And through this, the solution to the following is also clear.

Articulus 5 — Whether There Will Be Four Orders Of Those To Be Judged In The Judgment

Whether there will be four orders of those to be judged in the judgment?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, G, "There will be four orders in the judgment."

For previously in the Text from the word of Gregory it is held that there are four orders of those to be judged.

But against this it seems that
1. It is said in the Apostles' Creed, that Christ is to judge the living and the dead: therefore all will be judged: and thus there is only one order.

1. Likewise, the same is taken from II Corinthians 5:10: "We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that each one may receive the things done in the body, according to what he has done, whether good or bad."
2. Further, it seems that there are three orders: because Richard says thus: "All will indeed be judged or to be judged: and of those to be judged, some are to be saved, others to be damned," which in that future judgment there will be only three orders.
3. Further, it seems that there are five: for there are those whose salvation is certain, not to be judged, such as infants dying after baptism: and there are those whose salvation is uncertain, to be judged: and there are those whose damnation is certain, not to be judged: and there are those whose damnation is uncertain, to be judged: therefore five orders in the judgment. Richard also posits these five orders.

Response. To all these it is resolved by distinction, saying that there is a threefold judgment, namely uniform, multiform, and omniform.

Uniform judgment is said to be of the present Church, in which it is thought of the future judgment, to which nothing is known of that judgment except the quality of the cause and retribution in general, namely because good things to the good, and evil things to the evil. But multiform is the particular judgment, which each one receives at death, which is according to quality and quantity: because one receives as much as he has merited, and such as he has merited; but not in all things, because not in the body: and therefore it is called multiform, and not omniform. But omniform is the future judgment: because such things will respond to such, and as much to as many, and in all things, because in body and soul: and therefore it is called omniform.

But concerning that last judgment, which is called omniform, it is to be said that it is considered in two ways, namely according to the cause, and according to the effect.

And if indeed it is considered in comparison to the effect: then there are only two orders and both to be judged, namely the living and the dead: saved or damned: and thus is understood the saying of the Apostle, II Corinthians 5:10, and that which is brought from the Creed.

But if it is taken in comparison to the cause: either therefore it is taken in comparison as now, or as then. And if in the first way: then there are five orders which Richard touches upon, as is evident to anyone: nor can one order in the sixth place be made by children dying in original sin, because they have nothing of their own for which they would come to the tribunal: nor do they come to the tribunal, unless having their own, or rejoicing in salvation by the benefit of the judge, like children who die after baptism.

But if it is considered as then: then there will be four orders, as Gregory says, because the merit which is the cause of judgment, then will either be excellent in good, or in evil: or moderately good, or moderately evil: and these four considerations of merit complete the four orders of those to be judged.

But if the judgment is considered according to how it will be exercised and appear in act: then there are three orders, as Luke says, because the Apostles will judge, and others will be judged all either to life or to death, because by the right sentence inflicted by the light of the Apostolic heart, they will receive either eternal death or eternal life.

And through this the solution to all the questions and many others that can be asked is evident.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Fire That Will Precede The Judgment Is Of The Same Species As Elemental Fire

Whether the fire which will precede the judgment is of the same species as elemental fire?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, D, after the beginning: For the Lord coming to judgment, etc.

For what is said about the ministry of Angels is clear through those things which are said in distinction XLII.

However, concerning that fire, six things are inquired, namely, whether it is of the same species as elemental fire? Secondly, what is its effect in the world? Thirdly, what is its effect in men? Fourthly, where will it go after its office is completed? Fourthly, whether it will bring any harm to the good? because this is spoken of in the Text. Sixthly, whether it will precede or follow the resurrection?

To the first, it is objected thus:
1. The power of fire dominating over other elements is only in its own sphere: therefore, if another fire dominates outside its own sphere, it is not of the same species as the fire which is an element: but that fire will dominate outside its own sphere: therefore, that fire will not be an element. The first is proven by Aristotle, who says that a thing in perfect form and action is in its proper place, the second is assumed from what is said in the Text and from faith.

1. Likewise, in the circular generation of elements, Aristotle proves that one element acts upon another, and never acts beyond its species: but that fire will act beyond its species: therefore, it is not an element. The second is proven from this, that it will act for the glorification of the world: which glory is much better than the form of fire.
2. Likewise, the action of elemental fire is only upon a body having matter univocal to itself: but that fire will also act upon non-univocal matter: therefore, it is not elemental fire. The first is given by Boethius at the end of the book on the Two Natures in one person of Christ: because there is no conversion of things to each other unless they have one matter. The second is written, 2 Peter 3:12, thus: The heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat. And Aristotle proves that the heaven with the elements does not have one nor univocal matter.
3. Likewise, fire does not act upon something stronger than itself according to the power of elemental fire: but that fire will act upon something stronger than itself, because upon the heaven: therefore, it is not elemental fire.

On the contrary of this is: because
1. Those which have one essential act, have one essence according to species: but the operation of that fire and the element is one natural operation: therefore, they are of one essence according to species. The second is proven: because to burn is one action according to species. And the first is written by Damascene.

1. Likewise, the water in the flood purging the world was of the same nature as other water: but there are two divine judgments, one by fire, and another by water: therefore, the second judgment will be by fire of the same species as elemental fire.

Response. It must be said that that fire will be of the same species as elemental fire.

To all the objections in this question, there is almost one solution.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that that fire, like the fire of hell, acts in a double power, namely, of the element, and as an instrument of divine justice. And in the first way, it has to burn. But in the second way, it has to be carried upwards, downwards, to the right and to the left, wherever it finds something combustible by divine justice, and to dominate it.

To the other, it must be said that it acts only by burning and disposing, and not by inducing a species: because God will induce the species, I say the species which is the glorification of the elements and the world.

However, some have said that fire enclosed in a vessel would act to induce the species of heaven: and they say this is experienced among alchemists. But this is false, and alchemy neither says nor proves this experiment.

To the other, it must be said that all creatures infected by sin have the matter of fire according to which it is an instrument of divine justice: just as it is also said of the fire of hell. And what Boethius says must be understood of fire acting in the power of its own nature only.

To the last, it must be said that as it is said in the Text, this heaven is called the heaven of the air: and this is not stronger than fire, because this is to be dissolved by it.

Articulus 7 — What The Effect Of The Conflagration Will Be In The World

What will be the effect of the conflagration in the world?

Secondly, it is asked, What will be its effect in the world?

It seems, indeed, that the fire will consume two elements:
1. For as Bede says in the Gloss on Peter: That last fire will consume two elements entirely: but it will change two into a better form.

1. Likewise, Apocalypse 21:1: From this it seems that that fire will consume three elements, namely earth, air, which is understood by heaven, and the sea which stands in the place of water. Therefore, it seems that none of the elements will remain except fire.
2. Likewise, Aristotle, at the beginning of the book says: IV Meteororum For all these materials will be for fire. Therefore, it seems that the fire will consume all three elements.
3. Likewise, this seems according to reason: for in that conflagration of the world, fire is as the agent, and the three elements infected by fire as the patients: but the patient must be changed by the agent: therefore, the three elements will pass into fire: therefore, it seems that three will be consumed.
4. Likewise, these three elements are contiguous in the place of generation: therefore, they are infected by the sins of men: but all infected things ought to be consumed by fire: therefore, those three elements ought to be consumed.
5. Likewise, the Gloss on the Epistle to the Romans 8:21 and 22, says that in a better...

The matter will change the form of the elements: but the form of the lower elements cannot be better, unless they receive the form of the higher elements: therefore the three lower will receive the form of fire: therefore the three will be consumed, and only fire will remain.

In opposition to this is, 1. What the Gloss says on the Epistle to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. 7:31, on the passage: "For the fashion of this world passeth away." Gloss: Not the substance. Therefore the elements will not lose their substance, but their form. However, it is evident that if they were to lose their form, they would lose their substance: therefore they will not lose their form.

1. Likewise, the Gloss on Apocalypse 21:1, on the passage: "The first heaven," etc., says thus: That state in which they were before, Therefore it seems, they pass according to state, and not according to substance.
2. Likewise, the Gloss on the passage: "And the sea is no more," says thus: According to the higher state. Therefore as before.
3. Likewise, the marginal Gloss there: The change of air and earth is not doubtful but that it will be through fire: but concerning water it is doubted, for it is believed to have purification in itself.
4. Likewise, in the Letter it is said that heaven and earth will perish not according to their substance, but according to their form which will be changed.
5. Likewise, from the Letter it is held that that fire will not ascend except as far as the waters of the flood ascended: therefore it will not burn the whole world: therefore the airy heaven will not entirely pass away.

Response. It must be said that in truth this is more divination than a question having any knowledge: because I think no one knows how this will be, except he who will see when it happens: nevertheless, I do not think that any of the elements will be entirely consumed.

But there is a twofold form of the elements. One is according to specific being, and thus it will remain. The other is according to the power of active and passive qualities, and that will not remain, except as the passion remains in the root of the subject which cannot come into act. The cause of this is: because the primary active and passive qualities are given to the elements for generation and corruption, which succeed each other in the world, until so many of the elect are gathered that the number is fulfilled which God foresaw from eternity to be fulfilled: and when that is fulfilled, the elements will stand in another state without mixture with each other, and without action and passion in full light.

However, there are different people saying different things about the passing of the elements. For some say that water and fire will pass: and this because these have active and passive powers in excellence: and then there will be no action and passion. Others say that air and water will entirely pass: and this, as I think, because those two existing media do not have a determined motion and state: and many motions flow in them, because water follows the change of the planets of the moon which is very swift, and air follows the orbits of the five planets, in which there is much diversity of motions: and then these will not be, and therefore they say they will be taken away. But the truth is, as I think, that they will not be taken away, but will be changed, as has been said: so that the elements will be continuously luminous, and the earth on its outer surface will be transparent like glass, and water like crystal, air indeed luminous like heaven, and fire will seem to be like the very light of heaven then.

And through this the solution of all objections made through authorities is clear: and this solution is gathered from the Gloss on Apocalypse 21:1, and 1 Corinthians 7:31, and Romans 8:21-22.

To the first argument, it must be said that all other things will be matter for fire: because fire has an active quality simply, and others in a certain respect.

To the other, it must be said that fire acts only by consuming the infection of sin, and not by inducing the form of glorification, as was said before.

And through this the solution to the last is also clear: because the glorification of the world is not according to the form of the element, but according to the form of glory which will correspond to man according to the state of the glory of the resurrection.

Articulus 8 — What The Effect Of The Fire Will Be In Human Beings

What will be the effect of fire on men?

Thirdly, it is asked, What will be its effect on men?

However, it is said in the Text, that for the wicked it will be consumption, etc.

And it seems that it is said insufficiently:
1. For it is established that after the day of judgment the gate will be closed: therefore it seems that none will remain in purgatory: therefore that fire will also purge those to be purged. But then it seems that this is impossible: because there are many who have many things to be purged: but that fire is momentary: therefore it will not be able to purge vices in a short space of time.

1. Likewise, it seems that for the good there is consumption just as for the wicked: because it will burn them and reduce them to ashes, as was previously held: therefore it is not true to say that for the wicked alone it is consumption.
2. Likewise, the elements will be set ablaze: but the mixed elements in the body of man need purgation more than those outside: therefore it will also purge those things which are in the body of man: therefore it will burn both the good and the wicked.
3. Likewise, in the Text it says that it will burn the infection of sin: but the tinder is the infection of sin: therefore it will burn the tinder: but it cannot burn this unless it sets human bodies on fire: therefore it will set human bodies on fire.

Response. I think it is true, as it has been proven, that it will set on fire the bodies of all, both the good and the wicked, so that the tinder of sin may be entirely consumed through the incineration by fire, which in others has been consumed through the putrefaction of bodies.

To the question concerning the purgation of those to be purged, it must be said that by the power by which it acts as an instrument of avenging justice, it will act upon the souls of such, and will suddenly purge them.

To the objection against, it must be said that there are three causes why it can purge suddenly. One, because it will find few things to be purged in the elements: for so many terrors and signs and persecutions will precede, that few things will remain which need to be purged by that fire, due to the fervor of present penance. The second is that the living will voluntarily endure, and the punishment of the living purges more, even necessarily, than the punishment of the dead. The third is that its heat will recover in intensity what it omits in the prolongation of time. And therefore it will be able to accomplish suddenly what the purgatorial fire does more prolongedly.

Articulus 9 — Whither The Fire Of The Conflagration Will Go

Where will the fire of conflagration go?

Fourthly, it is asked, Where will the fire go after its duty is completed?

It seems, however, that it ought to be rewarded with the Saints: because

1. It served God in the conflagration of the world. And the Gloss on the Epistle to the Romans viii, 21 and 22, says that every creature which performs duties with its labor will then be rewarded.
2. Likewise, fire is the most noble element: because Aristotle says that fire is the most subtle of the bodies of the sphere: but everything noble will be glorified with the Saints above; therefore that fire will remain above.

1. Likewise, it has properties suitable to a glorious body, namely luminosity, subtlety, and being above in place: but God will not depress the noble in the renewal of the world, but rather exalt it: therefore He will glorify the fire in a place above.

On the contrary, it is said,

1. That the Saints say it will envelop the impious: therefore it will remain in hell, as it seems.
2. Likewise, the affliction of the impious ought to be in a place suitable to the impious: but the affliction of the impious is fire: therefore it will remain in the place of the impious, that is, in hell.

I respond to this, that as Basil says on that: The voice of the Lord dividing the flame of fire*, the Lord will divide the fire, as well as other creatures, and will make the hot burning descend with the dry by that motion of fire by which it follows its matter, according as it is an instrument of judging justice to the place of the damned: and as to these two and the matter which underlies them, it will remain in hell.

And through this the solution to the last two objections is clear.

But as to the luminous, subtle, and light, He will make it ascend above, and there it will be clarified with the other elements for the adornment of man: because it is fitting that with the glorified inhabitant, his house be glorified: but man is in the world as an inhabitant, and the world as a house.

And through this the solution to the first part of the objections is clear.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Fire Of The Conflagration Will Inflict Any Trouble Upon The Good

Whether the fire of conflagration inflicts any trouble upon the good?

Fifthly, it is asked, Whether it inflicts any trouble upon the good?

It seems that it does not: because
1. It is said in the Text, that this will be the fire of the world for the Saints, as the furnace was for the three youths. But it is written of them, that the fire did not touch them at all, nor did it sadden them, nor did it inflict any trouble*: therefore, it will not inflict any trouble upon the Saints, as it seems.

1. Likewise, that fire pursues nothing except the infection of sin, as it is said in the Text: therefore, it will find nothing upon which to act in those who are without sin: therefore, it will not harm them.
2. Likewise, it acts insofar as it is an instrument of divine justice: but according to divine justice, the Saints are not to be punished: therefore, it will not harm them.

On the contrary, the bodies of the Saints who will be found alive at that time will be infected with habitual concupiscence at least: therefore, it is necessary that they be purged: but there is nothing purging except fire: therefore, they will be purged by fire.

Response. This last seems to me to be conceded.

To the first, it must be said that it is understood of this act which it will have after the judgment when it will envelop the damned: for then it will not harm the Saints, because nothing combustible will be found in them.

To the second and third, it must be said that it will find in the body habitual concupiscence which it will exterminate.

Articulus 11 — Whether The Fire Of The Conflagration Will Precede The Judgment Or Follow It

Whether the judgment of the fire of conflagration will precede or follow?

Whether the judgment of the fire of conflagration will precede or follow?

Sixthly, it is asked, Whether the judgment will precede or follow it?

It seems that it follows: because
1. Augustine says that it follows the judgment and resurrection: therefore it seems that it is so.

1. Likewise, Augustine in book XXII of the City of God asks why the fire does not consume the good? and he gives the reason: because their bodies will be impassible, to which the fire cannot harm: and that reason of Augustine would not stand if the fire preceded the resurrection and judgment: therefore it seems that it follows both the resurrection and judgment.
2. Likewise, that fire will envelop the impious, as the Saints say: but the impious will not be enveloped except after the sentence of judgment: therefore it seems that it follows the judgment.

On the contrary,
1. By burning it will reduce the living to ashes: but this will happen before the resurrection: therefore that fire will be before the resurrection and judgment.

1. Likewise, in the Letter it says that it will precede the face of the judge: therefore also the judgment.

Response. It must be said that with respect to the burning of the world it will precede, but with respect to a certain act it will follow, namely with respect to the enveloping of the wicked: for it, as Chrysostom says, will be gathered around the throne of the judge: and it is that fiery river of which it is read in Daniel 7:10, which is around the seat. And it will drag the impious with it into hell. And because of this, it is ordered by Augustine after the judgment.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Concerning the following chapter, it is treated in book II of the Sentences, in the question about the choirs of Angels, and also in the treatise on penance, in the question about purgatorial fire.

DISTINCTIO XLVIII

Divisio Textus

It is customary, however, to ask, In what form will Christ judge?

In this distinction, it treats of the judge.

And three things are asked in it by the Master, namely concerning the form of the judge, of which he touches upon two, namely the form in which he will judge, and the form in which he will raise the dead. Secondly, it is asked concerning the place in which he will judge. Thirdly, it is asked concerning the state of the blessed after the judgment.

And these are evident in order in the four chapters of this distinction.

Articulus 1 — Whether Christ Will Judge In The Form Of A Man

Whether Christ will judge in the form of a man?

Concerning the first chapter, consequently, he inquires two things.
First, whether He will judge in the form of a man?
And second, whether in a glorious form or not glorious?

And this is all that he inquires in the Letter.

However, the question begins concerning the first.

It seems that He will not judge in the form of a man.
1. For to judge is of a superior according to dignity: but the superior nature is divinity: therefore, according to divinity, judgment is fitting to Him: therefore, it is false what is said in the Letter.

1. Likewise, judgment presupposes invincible power in the judge. Hence, Ecclesiasticus 7:6: "Do not seek to be made a judge, unless you have the strength to break iniquities." But such power is only in divinity. Therefore, judgment is not fitting to Him except according to divinity.
2. Likewise, it is not of the same form or nature to judge and to be judged: but the human form will be judged there: therefore, it seems that it is not fitting to Him to judge: therefore, He will exercise judgment according to the divine nature.
3. Likewise, the power of judging descends in order from the first authority which is in God: but it is more fitting to the Son insofar as He is God, than insofar as He is man: therefore, it ought to be attributed more to God Christ according to what He is God, than according to what He is man.
4. Likewise, Aristotle in the fifth book of the Ethics says that God is the judge of the just. But inflexible justice is more in divinity than in humanity: therefore, it is more fitting to Christ to be judge according to divinity, than according to humanity.

On the contrary, it is said that
1. It is of the judge to be merciful to know by experience the infirmities of those to be judged: but this is not fitting according to divinity, but more according to humanity.

1. Likewise, it is of the same one to judge whose it is to establish the law: but according to the human form He established the law: therefore, according to the same He will judge.
2. Likewise, in the form of a servant He merited judicial power: therefore, according to the same He will have to judge.

Response. It must be said that what the Master says in the Letter are the words of Augustine, and they must be held in all respects. However, it must be understood that two things are considered concerning the judge, namely the power of judicial authority, and the form of the judge, as he is the proper judge of those to be judged. And the first indeed is fitting to Christ according to divinity, and the second is to be done in humanity. And that it is so, is evident from the words of Augustine which he introduces, where below in the same place he says: "Not that He will judge by the power of man, or that He alone," etc.

And through this, the solution to all objections is clear: because the first part only proves that the power of judicial authority is from divinity. But from this it does not follow that that form appears: because it appears in the form in which He is the judge of these, as they are men, to whom He established the law in the form of a man, so that they may be convicted of the transgression of His law, and of the evils which they have done against Him.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Divinity Can Be Seen Without Joy

Whether the divinity can be seen without joy?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, A, at the end: For the divinity cannot be seen without joy.

For it seems that this is false:
1. For it is either understood of intellectual vision or sensible vision. If of intellectual, it is false: because many now see God with natural intellectual vision, who do not have the joy of the blessed. But it cannot be understood of sensible vision: because the divinity is not seen by sensible vision.

1. If someone were to say that this is to be understood of the vision which is in the very presence of the divinity. On the contrary: Augustine says that those things which are present to the intellect are better seen: but God is now present to the intellect by His essence: therefore He is also now seen by essence: and yet joy does not arise from this: therefore what is said is false.
2. Likewise, let us suppose that the devil sees the divinity as just and judging: it is certain that he will tremble: and yet the divinity is in its justice: therefore it will be possible to see the divinity with fear and trembling: not therefore always with joy.
3. Likewise, in natural vision, the vision which extends itself becomes practical, and causes motion in the appetite, and is equally disposed to joy and sadness according to whether the thing seen is announced as friend or enemy: but it cannot be announced thus concerning the divinity seen: therefore the vision of the divinity can equally be with sadness as with joy.

Response. It must be said that this is understood of the vision through the species of glory according to which it is the object of the blessed: for no creature can perceive this species, unless according to which it is perfected by glorification.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is understood of such intellectual vision: but no one now has such, unless blessed and glorified.

To the other, it must be said that although God is present in the soul, He is not there through the species of glory, unless in the intellect perfected by glorification: and therefore what is present by essence is received in a mirror and enigma: because, as Augustine says, the gaze of the human mind is not fixed in such excellent light, unless it is purified by the justice of faith. It is said that the pure in heart will see God.

To the other, it must be said that such vision is in shadow, because the intellect does not have the species of glorification: and therefore it is also called by Dionysius the intellect of demons and perverse imagination. Whence it is clear that the objection does not hold.

To the last, it must be said that it is not similar: because in such vision motion is not made, except according to the apprehended species: and that is commonly disposed according to what is received in general. Here, however, it is received in species, as it most moves to joy in the species of glory, in which it is shown to the blessed: and thus the Letter is understood.

Articulus 3 — Whether All, Both Good And Evil, Will See The Form Of The Glory Of The Humanity Of Christ

Whether all, both good and evil, will see the form of the glory of the humanity of Christ?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, B, after the beginning: But Augustine openly says the form of the servant glorified, etc.

For it seems that this is impossible: because 1. Every vision occurs according to the power of the one seeing, and not according to the power of the thing seen: therefore also this: but a non-glorious eye does not have the power to comprehend the form of glory: therefore it is impossible that it sees the glorious body.

1. Likewise, the impious will not have eyes of greater power then than they have now: but now, although an eye is near the greatest glorious body, nevertheless it does not see it in the form of glory: therefore neither will the impious then see Christ in the form of glory.
2. To this some have sometimes said, that Christ will present himself to them in the form of glory: but they will not see him, except in a non-glorious appearance: just as he exhibited himself to the disciples as glorious, but they saw him in a non-glorious appearance, like one having a colored face and the habit of a pilgrim.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY of this is that 1. It is not the power of the glorious or non-glorious eye, that it sees the luminous under the appearance of the colored: because we now see the luminous in the form of light, and not the luminous in the form and appearance of color:

therefore it seems that even the impious will then see the luminous in light, and not in color: therefore that solution is null.

1. Likewise, the three disciples before whom Christ was transfigured saw his face in light, and yet their eyes were not glorified: therefore it seems that this is not a property of the non-glorious eye which was said.

Response. It seems to be conceded, that all, both good and evil, will see the form of the glory of humanity. And among all the ways, it seems to me that the one which says the glorious body has the power to be seen or not to be seen has fewer inconveniences, as was noted above.

To the first, therefore, it must be said, that it indeed has the power: but it has the power to be seen or not to be seen.

To the second, it must be said, that now glorious bodies cannot be seen as far as the power of the one seeing is concerned: but on the part of the thing seen, the vision can be impeded: and Gregory directly says this opinion in a certain homily.

To the other, it must be said, that the disciples saw him as he exhibited himself, namely in the color following the complexion.

But why he exhibited himself as such, Gregory gives the reason: because in their minds he was such: and therefore it was not fiction, but instruction.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Vision Of God In The Homeland Ought To Be Called Eternal Life

Whether the vision of God in the homeland ought to be called eternal life?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, B, around the middle: That it will be for them eternal life, etc.

1. For eternal life does not consist in vision, but also in love and fruition: therefore vision alone will not be eternal life.
2. Likewise, Vision is a passion and eternal life is a certain act of perpetual life in the blessed soul, as was said above: therefore it seems that vision is not eternal life.
3. Likewise, Life consists more in the motive power than in the intellective: therefore it seems that love is rather eternal life than vision.

On the contrary is what Augustine says, that vision is the whole reward.

Response. It must be said that concerning the vision of God in the homeland, what it is, and whether it is possible for a creature, and other such things, have been disputed in Book I of the Sentences, concerning that: to use and to enjoy. We enjoy known things, etc.

Here, however, it must be said that eternal life is considered in two ways, namely according to that which underlies in it, and is as it were material: and according to that which informs, and is as it were formal. And in the first way indeed vision is eternal life because of the cause which was said above in the question concerning eternal life. In the second way, however, the delight following the love of the divinity possessed is eternal life. Hence that which is the cause of eternal life is love feeding or fed in the vision possessed.

And through this distinction the solution of all objections is clear.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, C, Het as Christ is said according to the form of a servant, etc.

It must be known that all this has already been disputed in distinction XLHF, where it was asked concerning the causes of the resurrection*.

Articulus 5 — Whether Christ, Judging In The Form Of A Servant, Will Be Seen By The Good And The Evil

Whether Christ judging in the form of a servant will be seen by the good and the wicked?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, B, after the middle: In the form of a servant judging, he will be seen by the good and the wicked.

For it seems that even according to the divinity he ought to be seen with bodily eyes, especially by the good: because Augustine says thus: And through those eyes God will be seen in such a way, that he will have something in such excellence similar to the mind, by which he may be discerned in corporeal nature, which by any examples or testimonies of divine Scriptures is either difficult or impossible to show. Or what is easier to understand, God will be known and conspicuous in such a way, that he will be seen by the spirit by each of us in each, he will be seen by one in another, he will be seen in the new heaven and in the new earth, and in every creature that will then be, he will be seen.

Response. Concerning this also in the first distinction of the first book of the Sentences it is held, whether sense is converted into reason. And it must be said, that it is not: nor does Augustine say, but intends, that the corporeal creature received through the eyes in a nobler and more evident form than now, will manifest God: and thus our spirit will more easily know in the seen things than now.

Articulus 6 — Whether There Is Some Place In Which God Will Judge The World

Whether there is some place in which God will purify the world?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, D, Some think the Lord will descend, etc.

1. For it seems that He ought to sit in the air not against the Mount of Olives, but against the place of Pilate's praetorium, where He was judged: because it is fitting that He judges there, where He was judged.

1. Likewise, it seems false what he says, that the impious will remain on the earth: because the element of fire is more fitting for affliction and burning: therefore, they ought to be placed over the Saints in fire rather than on the earth.

Further, it is asked concerning the clouds in which the just will be elevated: because clouds are made by the resolution of earth and water: and then evaporation or resolution will be made by none: therefore, there will be no clouds.

Response. To dispute about this matter is more to divine than to discuss.

Nevertheless, it must be said that it is fitting for it to be as they say: and then He will sit against the Mount of Olives, to signify that mercy relaxing from that judgment is not alien: the contrary of which would be signified if He sat against Golgotha or the praetorium of Pilate.

To the other, it must be said that the fire in which the wicked will be, by the motion of its matter's pursuit, will descend downward, as was said before: and therefore I well think that the wicked will stand on the earth in fire enveloping them and drawing them into hell.

To the last, it must be said that in my judgment the cloud here is called the density of light shining from the bodies of the Saints, and these are not called clouds here obscurely, which are made from the evaporations of earth and water.

Articulus 7 — Whether At The Last Judgment The Sun And Moon Will Suffer An Eclipse

Whether in the final judgment the sun and moon will suffer an eclipse?

Then it is asked concerning what is said, E, shortly after the beginning: The sun and moon will suffer an eclipse, etc.

For it seems impossible: because the sun and moon can never suffer an eclipse at the same time: but the sun suffers an eclipse in conjunction, and the moon in opposition: therefore it is false what is said.

Response. To this it must be said that Jerome says many signs ought to precede the day of judgment, which because I do not know if they are true, I therefore do not state. But it seems this must be said, that if the sun and moon will be darkened at the same time, as Jerome seems to wish, this will not be through the natural cause of their conjunction or opposition, but rather by divine power, so that terror may be instilled in men, as Luke suggests, 21:25: And there will be signs in the sun, etc. It follows: and the moon and on the earth distress of nations, etc.

Or perhaps, because by the light of the sun and moon all things are generated and live: and then generation will cease: therefore also the defect is said to be of the luminaries.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Light Of The Sun Will Be Greater After The Judgment Than It Was Before

Whether the light of the sun will be greater after the judgment than it was before?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, E, a little before the middle: "The light of the sun will be sevenfold," etc.

For it seems that this is against reason: because the light of the sun is given to move towards the generation of lower things: therefore, with generation taken away, its light ought to be removed: it ought not, therefore, to shine more then, but less.

To this they say that the sun will be rewarded on account of the dignity of man, for whose generation it moved, so that the number of the elect might be fulfilled.

However, they say concerning the objection, that the light will no longer move towards generation, but will stand still: because it caused generation through motion. They say, moreover, that the sun shone more in the first six days before the sin of man than it does now, and then it will return to that light, and in addition seven times as much light will be added to it as it had in the first six days. However, men will be seven times more than the sun in those days, namely after the judgment. And what is true about this, no one knows except God.

Articulus 9 — Whether Then There Will Be Alternations Of Day And Night

Whether then there will be alternations of day and night?

ARTICULUS FX.
Whether then there will be alternations of day and night?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, E, around the middle: And then there will not be alternation of day and night, etc.

This seems impossible: because the earth will always give a shadow to the opposite place of the sun: and the shadow of the earth is night: therefore then there will be night.

To this it must be said, that nowhere then will there be night, except in the center of the earth: because although the sun stands with the elements and stars and moon, nevertheless so much will be added in light, that the hemisphere opposite to it will be illuminated, just as that in which the sun stands: and therefore it is said that there is not alternation of day and night.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Sun And Moon Will Provide Light To The Blessed

Whether the moon will provide light to the blessed?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there,
Ki, shortly after the middle: But it signifies those who will be in eternal beatitude, etc.

It seems false: because they will have the greatest use of light: because otherwise it would be in vain.

To this it must be said that it is understood that the use of light is not the same as it is now:
for then it will be for the admiration of the wisdom of the creator, and not for illuminating darkness, which will be none except in hell, and those are not illuminated.

Articulus 11 — Whether Hell Is On The Surface Of The Earth

Whether hell is on the surface of the earth?

Whether hell is on the surface of the earth?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said, there, a little before the end: "Lest the wicked placed under the earth in torments enjoy the light," etc.

And two things are inquired here concerning hell, namely whether it is on the surface of the earth, as Isidore seems to want here?

And secondly, whether there is any air in hell or not?

To the first, it is objected thus:
1. As Philosophy says to Boethius in the book "The Consolation of Philosophy": Ptolemy proved that only the fourth part of the world is habitable. From this it follows that the lower fourth of the earth is not habitable by humans: but it is certain that nothing is made without cause: therefore it seems that there is the habitation of the damned, since it does not seem to pertain to anything else.

1. Likewise, Isaac says that the sinner is pressed down by his sins under the sad orb, and he will be there in the greatest fire: and this is his hell. But the sad orb is the lower part of the orb according to the Philosophers. Therefore it seems that hell is there.

2. Likewise, Isaac says that the lights will not rotate, lest the wicked placed in Tartarus enjoy their light: therefore if they were to rotate, the wicked would enjoy their light: but this could not be if hell were in the center of the earth: but it is impossible that it is in another part of the world: therefore hell is in the lower part of the world.

Response. It must be said that hell is not in another hemisphere of the world. However, that it is in some hemisphere, I do not think anyone knows: because according to the philosophy of Theodosius, where he issued geometrical demonstrations about habitable places, that hemisphere is equally temperate as this one: but it is true what Ptolemy says, that there is not.

The observation of stars or eclipses of any inhabitants in those places, which has reached us, has not been seen. And this Philosophy intends to say in the book "The Consolation of Philosophy." What the cause is, in the book I of the Sentences, in the treatise on paradise, according to Augustine, is noted.

To the other, it must be said that Isaac calls the sad orb there the depths of the earth, where the damned will be enclosed in Tartarus.

From the other, it must be said that Isaac did not prove what he said, nor are they of faith: and therefore they are condemned with the ease with which they are said.

Or, if someone wishes to defend him: then it can be said that it happens in two ways to enjoy the light of the luminaries, namely according to itself, and according to effect. And indeed, according to itself, it does not happen to enjoy, even if they were to rotate, as the objection proves. But according to effect, it would happen: because as Ptolemy says, the rays of the stars are not united except in the center of the earth, as long as by their rotation they move the earth to generation: and when they will stand still, then they will no longer move: and then with respect to this effect, they will not enjoy.

Articulus 12 — Whether There Is Any Air In Hell

Whether there is any air in hell?

Secondly, I ask, Whether there is any air in hell?

It seems that there is: because
1. Nothing is void: however, it is evident that the damned do not fill that entire place, nor any gross element, nor is there fire there except in the damned: therefore it seems that air is there.

1. Likewise, Man is a breathing animal: and he cannot live by breathing any element except air: therefore it seems that air is there.

Response. It must be said that these questions are frivolous, nor can they be determined by human intellect: however, I think more that there will not be air there, but only fire, and cold, and the damned.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that that place is full of fire, and cold materials, and the damned.

To the other, it must be said that inspiration and expiration are now on account of the heat of the chest and heart, lest the moisture of the heart be set on fire from motion: but then there will not be alterable moisture: and therefore there will not be respiration. But yet I say this without prejudice.

However, how it is in the empyrean heaven will be made clear below, when it will be spoken of the senses of the glorious body.

DISTINCTIO XLIX

Divisio Textus

After the resurrection indeed, etc. Here begins the part which is about the things following the judgment.

And it has two parts, in the first of which it treats of the things following the judgment on the part of the good; in the second, of the things following on the part of the wicked.

In the first part, however, on the part of the good, six questions are introduced, namely, first about the difference of mansions; second, about beatitude; third, about the difference of the knowledge of the blessed; fourth, about the difference and equality of joys; fifth, Whether beatitude is increased after the judgment; and sixth, Why souls resume bodies, since they can have beatitude without them?

And these are evident in the beginnings of the chapters of this distinction in order.

Concerning the first chapter, three things are to be inquired, namely, what is a mansion? Second, What is the cause of the mansion? And third, Where is the mansion?

Articulus 1 — What A Mansion Is

What is a mansion?

To the first, it is objected from Lidfera where it says that mansions are the differences of rewards.

For it seems this is false: because
1. Mansion, according to its name, signifies something of a house; however, reward, according to its name, signifies nothing of a house: therefore, the definition is unsuitable, because it ought to be given according to the name.

1. Likewise, one thing being in one way, will be the reward of all: but one thing being in one way, does not have a difference: therefore, that which will be the reward for all, will not have differences of rewards: but it will have differences of mansions, as the Gospel of John says, xiv, 2: In my Father's house are many mansions. Therefore, it is granted that mansions are not the difference of rewards.

2. Likewise, in lower things, a mansion is said to be a place prepared for the habitation of men, in which they are defended from infestations and the intemperance of the air: therefore, since it is said according to translation in heaven, it seems that in this way it is also in heaven. And this is proven false in many ways. First indeed, because there are no infestations there: however, a man's mansion is built against infestations. Secondly, because one mansion in lower things is of many, but in heaven in no way: therefore, a mansion is not taken there by similarity to this.

3. Likewise, one mansion of one man has many distinct places, namely a dormitory, cellar, refectory, and suchlike: but in heaven there is nothing of such: therefore, it is not well said to be a mansion, as it seems.

4. Likewise, of one always changing, there is no mansion: but in heaven the blessed always change themselves: therefore, there is no mansion of them. The first is evident by itself. The second is proven from this, that they are continually illuminated in new ways, and ascend higher in the contemplation of God, as Dionysius suggests.

Response. It must be said that mansions are in heaven in the house of the Father. For the joy of that beatitude is considered in two ways, namely as the joy of infinite good: and thus the finite enters into it: and in this way, it is called a house surrounding us on all sides, and overflowing in measure, as it is said, Matthew xxv, 21: Enter into the joy of your lord. In the second way, it is considered as participated according to the proportion of our merit: and thus it is called a mansion, because that participation is according to the manner of any merit: and because there are many such participations, therefore in one house there are many mansions.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that Augustine speaks of the thing of the mansion, and not of the name: because the thing is the same as the difference of reward, although the notion of the names of mansion and reward is diverse.

To the other, it must be said that although God is in one way, and thus is a house: nevertheless, the Saints are not in one way in the participated: and thus on the part of the participants, mansions are distinguished.

To the other, it must be said that the translation is well and fittingly made: because although there are no intemperances there, nevertheless they would be, unless there were a mansion: and it is like a holy mansion, so that there are no tempests of the air there.

To the other, it must be said that one mansion is not commensurated to many according to quantity and convenience, but one house can be of many. However, from the commensurated mansion, the translation to the heavenly mansion is taken.

To the other, it must be said that those distinct places are called or said to be mansions: and that in which they are distinguished has the likeness of a house.

To the other, it must be said that although the Saints receive a new revelation, nevertheless they do not change the state of their lot in beatitude: and to that state alone corresponds the mansion.

Articulus 2 — Whether All The Blessed Have Distinct Mansions

Whether all the blessed have distinct mansions?

Secondly, it is asked, What is the distinction of a mansion?

It seems that it is a different act: because
1. A mansion corresponds to merit: but all merit is in acts: therefore a different act makes a difference of mansions.

1. Likewise, in the damned evils there is nothing distinguishing except the act of evil merit: therefore by opposition also in the good there is nothing distinguishing mansions except the act of good merit: therefore as before.

2. Likewise, it is said of every Saint:

There is none found like him.
It is evident, however, that this is not understood of the essence of virtue, as the holy Doctors say, but of its use. Therefore it seems that according to the use of virtue each differs from another: but according to such a thing a mansion must be distinguished, because the mansion of each one differs from another: therefore it seems that according to the use of virtue it is distinguished: but the use of virtue is a meritorious operation: therefore according to the meritorious work the mansions are distinguished.

1. Likewise, no good is unrewarded: it is evident, however, that this is understood of a good work: therefore the differences of rewards are according to the difference of works: but these are the mansions, as it is said in the Letter: therefore according to works the mansions are distinguished.

On the contrary of this, it seems that it is according to nature: because
1. Angels, as the Master says in the second book of Sentences, are distinguished according to nature: but the mansions of men are according to the mansions of Angels: therefore the mansions of men have to be distinguished according to the natural grade.

1. Likewise, Matthew 25:15: He gave to each according to his own virtue. Where it is evident that he speaks of the goods of grace, before which there are none except natural ones: therefore the gifts of grace are given according to the virtue of nature: and the gifts of glory are gifts of grace: therefore the gifts of glory are distinguished according to the gifts of nature: therefore also the mansions.

Likewise, on the contrary of both of these, it seems that it is according to the quantity of charity: because

1. This is distinguishing, to whose height a higher mansion responds, and to whose lower a lower mansion: but this is only according to charity: therefore the difference of mansions is taken according to the difference of charity.
2. Likewise, the quantity of all merit is according to the quantity of charity: therefore the quantity of reward: therefore also the difference of mansions. The first is proved: because as the Saints say, not having more works, is of greater merit, but having a greater root of charity.

Response. It must be said that charity and the quantity of charity distinguish mansions, as was ultimately proven.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that merit is not in acts, except according to the quantity of charity: because the substance of merit is not of the one having a greater work, but from the greater charity of the one working, as is taken from the first epistle to the Corinthians 13:1 and following, where it says that if I do not have charity, the rest profit me nothing, even excellent works.

To the other, it must be said that in evils it is not similar: because evil works are not united in any one form as good ones are: and therefore also the mansions in hell are well distinguished according to works, but not in the house of the heavenly Father.

Concerning this, however, how evils do not have any one form, you will find noted in the second Sentences.

To the other, it must be said that this makes the difference of accidental reward, which is in the quality and multitude and magnitude of works: but the difference of mansions is considered according to the substantial reward.

To the other, it must be said that everything is rewarded with a substantial or accidental reward.

To the first objection on the contrary, it must be said that mansions in Angels are not formally distinguished according to nature: but nature places a natural disposition for this, and the formal is perfected by the gift of grace and glory. And this is also noted on the second Sentences.

Moreover, it must be said that this donation is by way of congruity, and not by way of debt: and therefore it cannot be further inferred that a mansion is distinguished according to it, but rather according to the quantity of that which among the gifts of God is most noble, which is charity.

Articulus 3 — How And Where The Mansions Are Distinguished

How and where are the mansions distinguished?

Thirdly, it is asked, Where are the mansions distinguished?

And it seems that it is in purgatory: because 1. There are different punishments there: therefore also of mansions.

1. Likewise, of those who are in purgatory, charity is different: but the difference of charity is the cause of the difference of mansions: therefore of those who are in purgatory, the mansions are different.
2. Likewise, in the limbo of children there is a perpetual habitation: therefore it seems that there are different mansions there.
3. Likewise, everyone has his own there: and they themselves are diverse: therefore also the habitations are diverse.
4. Likewise, in the limbo of the fathers there was different charity and different merit: therefore different mansion, as it seems.

Response. It must be said that the difference of mansions is only in the hell of the damned, and in the heaven of the saints.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that mansion by its name signifies a perpetual habitation: and this is not in purgatory.

And by this, the solution to the following is also clear.

To the other, it must be said that since children have only original sin, and that in as much as it is propagated alien from the fathers, the children do not have this difference of mansions in limbo.

To the same, it must be said that this only makes a material multiplication of mansions: and such is not sought here.

To what is objected about the limbo of the fathers, the solution is clear from the aforesaid: because it was not a perpetual habitation.

Articulus 4 — What The Clarity Of The Soul Is

What is the clarity of the soul?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said, there, A, shortly before the end: To have now, is to see life, etc.

For two things are inquired here.
First, it is asked, What is the clarity of the soul of which it speaks in the Text?

And secondly, What is it to see in species? of which mention is also made in the Text.

But the rest can be inquired here in the first of the Sentences, and above in the preceding distinction concerning the vision of God in the homeland.

It is objected, however, to the first as follows:
1. By seeing, nothing is made clear: therefore clarity is not vision, as it seems to say in the Text.

1. Likewise, Clarity in the body consists in the light penetrating and illuminating the substance of the body, and not in the vision of the light: therefore similarly the clarity of the soul consists in some spiritual light: and thus it is nothing of what it says concerning vision.
2. Likewise, The soul is of itself obscure in two ways, namely from sin, and from this that it is from nothing and changeable: therefore it needs a double glorification, if it ought to be made blessed: but neither of these is removed by vision: therefore the clarity of the soul in no way consists in vision.
3. Likewise, In Angels there is another clarity, than the vision of intelligence: therefore also in the soul there will be.

Response. I well concede, that clarity will be in the soul even in substance, as the objections prove: but what is said in the Text, is said by cause: because through vision the clarity of wisdom is received, which penetrates the whole soul by glorifying: and its imagination is, as if someone by seeing the light, would draw it into himself through the eyes, which having entered into him would make the whole clear.

And through this the solution to all the objections is clear.

Articulus 5 — What It Is To See Through A Species

What is it to see through a species?

Secondly, it is asked, What is it to see in a species?

For to every intellect information is required: therefore to the intellect of God: therefore, if God is to be seen by the intellect, it is necessary for the species of God to be in the intellect as a form in a subject, and as a certain passion of the soul in the intellect: therefore it seems that God is not seen through the species which He is, but through a species received from Him.

If you say that certain things are in the soul by themselves, like God, and the intellect itself, and suchlike: - and in those things such abstraction is not required. On the contrary:

1. The Philosopher says that the intellect understands itself, as it understands other intelligibles: but it understands others through abstraction: therefore also itself.
2. Likewise, according to the Philosopher, it is one thing to be in the soul as a part in the whole, and another to be in the soul as the understood in the intellect. For in the first way, what is in the soul is not necessarily understood, but in the second way it is necessarily understood. Therefore it does not follow that those things which are in the soul by essence are necessarily understood. Therefore that solution seems to be nothing.

On the contrary of this is that it is impossible to receive a universal species of that which has none: but God has no universal species: therefore it is impossible to receive His universal species: therefore nothing is in the intellect from Him, as it seems, because the species received by the intellect is universal.

Response. It must be said that in the book III of the Sentences there are many things about this. Here, however, noted in the treatise on faith, it can be said that God in the homeland is otherwise in the soul, and otherwise on the way and in all things: because in the homeland He is in the intellect filling the whole soul with the light of glory, and infusing eternal life into it, according to which He is the object of beatitude, as was said above: and under that clarity the soul is immediately converted into God, not receiving anything from Him other than what He is: but in this way united to Him in one spirit it will understand Him: and therefore for this intellect the formal assimilation of a species is not necessary when He is substantially present.

To the point of both Philosophers it must be said that they speak truly of the material intellect, which goes from potency to act: nor can anything other than what they say be understood, provided that a man knows what he says or understands. But in the homeland it will not be so: for there the uncircumscribed light of the deity, which is God Himself, is united to the agent intellect, and thus it is poured out substantially over the whole soul and fills it: and in this way the soul will be full of God Himself who is its beatitude. And this is what the Philosophers obscurely said, that: if the soul after death were to be united to the first mover, this would be by reason of its prosperity. And through this the solution to all objections is clear.

Articulus 6 — Whether Beatitude Is Well Defined By The Philosopher

Whether beatitude is well defined by the Philosopher?

Then it is inquired concerning what he says, there, B, It is also customary to inquire about beatitude, Whether all wish for it, etc.?

And for the understanding of this chapter, two things are inquired, namely, what is beatitude?

And, Whether all wish to be blessed, as it seems to prove in the Letter?

To the first, however, let the definition of Aristotle be set forth first, which is contained in the first of the Ethics thus: Happiness or beatitude is an act or operation according to the perfect virtue of the soul. It is objected: because it does not happen that the virtue of the soul is perfect on the way, since perfect is that to which nothing is lacking: therefore it does not happen that anyone on the way is happy or blessed.

1. Likewise, according to the same Philosopher, as he seems to say, no one seems to have perfect virtue, unless he has nothing delaying in himself or in another: but no such one is found in this life: therefore no one is found blessed in this life. The first is proved from the proofs which are in the first of the Ethics, where he says, the blessed do not need external things, and rejoice in the fortunes of descendants and the like.
2. Likewise, the perfection of the soul is not in one virtue nor in the subject: because one swallow does not make spring, nor does one beautiful day make summer: but beatitude, which is an act, is an act of one thing, as the Commentator says: therefore beatitude is not according to the perfect virtue of the soul.
3. Likewise, as is taken from the tenth of the Ethics, perfect virtue cannot be according to an unnatural habit or operation, nor even according to a common habit and operation: therefore when the Philosopher says that happiness is an act according to perfect virtue, it cannot be understood of the common habit of virtue: therefore it seems that he ought to have specified this. The first is proved: because in perfect virtue and operation, which is happiness, the human good is sought as human: and this is not according to an unnatural habit, nor even according to the common habit which is held from the genus: because that is common to us with beasts: and this is not human as human: and thus the proposition is clear.
4. Likewise, if happiness or beatitude is an act or operation, as Aristotle and his Commentator say, then no one is blessed according to habit: but this seems difficult to some, because it is said, Blessed is the man who fears the Lord. And, Blessed is the rich man who is found without blemish. And, Blessed are the poor in spirit. And so of others. All of which are according to habit, and also according to acts not human, as is to fear, to hope, and the like.
5. Likewise, one is not said to be blessed having one virtue however perfect: but one act is the act of one virtue: therefore beatitude is not one act, unless of one virtue: therefore it is not according to the perfect virtue of the soul, but rather according to perfect virtues: nor is it an act, but rather many actions and operations: and thus again it seems inconveniently defined.
6. Likewise, the perfection of each nature is according to how it attains and communicates the operation of a superior nature as much as possible: therefore also the perfection of the soul is according to how it communicates the operation of superior natures, which is angelic or divine: therefore in such an operation happiness was more to be placed than in the perfect virtue of God. The first is proved from Dionysius and Aristotle. For Dionysius calls the contact of the inferior nature to the summit of the superior in the Celestial Hierarchy. Aristotle, however, speaking of contemplative happiness in the tenth of the Ethics, says that it is the highest and most acceptable to the gods, which they themselves exercise, as is the contemplation of theorems, as those who have marvelous delights exceeding all others in firmness and purity: and thus the proposition is clear.

But Boethius seems to define otherwise, saying that beatitude is a state perfect with the aggregation of all goods: but a state is not an act: therefore one of them defines badly: because one places it in the genus of act, and the other in the genus of state.

1. Likewise, that which is Boethius' seems inconvenient: because beatitude is something one: but nothing one is made from the aggregation of all goods: therefore beatitude is not a state, etc. The first is clear by itself and from the sayings of the Commentator on the first of the Ethics saying that beatitude is one act. The second is proved from this, that all goods are not of one genus, nor of one species, as Aristotle says: and therefore they are not gathered to constitute one.
2. Likewise, even according to this definition, no one would be blessed in this life: although Scripture seems to say this.
3. Likewise, the Philosophers said that in this life there is beatitude among many perfect in moral virtue, and perfect in contemplative virtue.
4. Likewise, Aristotle in the first of the Ethics reproves Solon the Athenian, because he said that beatitudes are after death. Therefore the said definition is inconvenient.
5. However, Augustine says in the Letter that he is blessed who has all that he wills, and wills nothing badly. Therefore beatitude is a habit, in which all that a man wills are had, and no one will will anything bad in it. But against this again it is objected: because in this life no one has all that he wills: therefore he is not blessed.

If perhaps it is said that he is blessed now, and miserable now. Against this: Bernard thus says: Moreover, misery and happiness cannot be together. Therefore if someone is miserable, he is by no means blessed.

1. Likewise, as grace making one pleasing is to guilt, so happiness is to misery: but grace never suffers guilt with it: therefore neither does happiness suffer misery with it.
2. Likewise, opposites cannot be together: therefore no miserable person is blessed: but every man on the way is miserable: therefore no man on the way is blessed: the contrary of which the Saints say.

Solution. To solve these, it must be noted that beatitude is said in many ways, and not equivocally, but according to prior and posterior. It is said according to the state of perfection of the way, and according to the state of perfection of the homeland.

According to the state of the way, it is said in three ways, namely properly, broadly, and by cause.

Properly, however, it is said in two ways, namely according to moral virtue, and according to intellectual virtue: and therefore Aristotle in the Ethics makes two books on happiness: for he made the first on moral happiness, and the second on intellectual happiness. Moral happiness, however, is still said in two ways, namely according to its being and according to its maximum potential. According to its being, happiness indeed is an act according to the perfect moral virtue of the soul. The understanding of which definition according to the Commentator is this: The virtue of the soul is nothing but the virtue perfecting the soul in acting: but since the soul is the same as the mind, as it is taken there, the perfect virtue of the soul will be the perfect virtue of the mind: and this is what places the soul in the highest: this, however, is the virtue of prudence in such sufficiency that it suffices to rule itself and others. Aristotle, however, proves that prudence cannot be perfectly had according to a perfect act, unless all other moral virtues are had, as is read in the sixth of the Ethics. Therefore the perfect operation of prudence supposes the perfection of all other moral virtues: because prudence rules and orders all. And this understanding is easy to elicit from the Commentary, if one diligently inspects it. If, however, it is taken according to its maximum potential, this happiness will then be in the greatest good of man, the operation of prudence not impeded: this good, however, is the good of the people, not only of man, or of the city, with impediments removed which are three, namely the impotence of power, and poverty, and misfortunes of dangers, or of death in oneself or in friends. And thus the Commentary says that it is translated from Greek, that power and riches and the fortune of friends serve to happiness organically. And Alpharabius in the Arabic commentary says that impotence and poverty and the misfortune of a descendant sadden happiness, and thus impede the best act of the blessed. And this is easily gathered from the letter of Aristotle, if one diligently investigates it, and not according to the false notebooks of some who corrupted that book rather than explained it. For contemplative happiness is said in two ways, namely according to being, and according to its maximum potential. And according to being, indeed, it consists in the perfection of the act of speculative intelligence with the delight of contemplation which has no contrary, as is expressly proved in the last chapter of the book X of the Ethics: the perfection, however, of speculative intelligence is especially in the speculation of simple substances and of the first substance. According to its maximum potential, however, it has the aforementioned speculation with the removal of impediment within and without: and thus moral virtues contribute to contemplative happiness, and the abundance of externals, and a solitary and free place, and the like. And for this reason Averroes says in the commentary that it is the happiness of hermits.

Broadly, however, beatitude or happiness is said, according to what consists of desirables: because nothing can move the appetite except according to this true or shadowy species of some of those things which beatify, as will be evident through the authorities of Augustine and Anselm in the following article of the question: and thus all men wish to be blessed, although they do not seek beatitude where it is, as will be evident below.

By cause, however, beatitude is said in three ways, namely commonly, properly, and most properly. Commonly, beatitude is said by cause to be everything that is a cause of beatitude to be obtained, like the fear of God, mourning, and the like. Properly, beatitude is said by cause to be the more excellent acts of merit, as it is said in Matthew 5:3: Blessed are the poor in spirit, etc. Most properly, according to cause, beatitude is said to be perseverance in every good merit and excellent according to act: and thus beatitude is taken from Basil on the beginning of the Psalter, where he thus says: Blessed is the man who does not go, not who goes: for he who still lives in this life cannot yet be beatified because of the doubtful outcomes of life. He who, having fulfilled all that is commanded, has completed the end of peace with works of justice, this one can now be beatified without any discrimination or ambiguity. Why then does he say again, Blessed are the immaculate? For he does not bless those who have walked, but those who walk in the law of the Lord. Therefore I think that those who work what is common good, in that very thing that they work, they embrace beatitude, and both they and their work merit the praise of beatitude. Yet those who have begun to flee evil, and have turned away from sin once or twice, are not immediately to be called blessed, unless when they can in all things, either in words or in deeds, flee evil so that they are never apprehended by it, and adhere to good.

Beatitude, however, according to the state of the homeland, is to adhere to God, and in Him to have all that is desired: and thus beatitude is defined by Boethius.

With these things established, it is easy to respond to the objections.

For it must be said to the first, that the perfection of the way can be had on the way, and to some things, although not to all, as to moral happiness, or contemplative happiness, although not to the happiness of the homeland.

To the other it must be said, that this was said of happiness according to its maximum potential: and this perfection can be had according to the mode of the way.

when someone is powerful in honors, and decently abounds in external things: and rejoices in the fortunes of friends, perfectly operating according to the virtue of the soul, as has been said, in the good of the people which is the kingdom, in which the people is contained and governed in moral or civil good, etc.

To the other it must be said, that happiness is one act: but other things work towards it necessarily or organically, as has been said: and therefore the Philosopher says, that it is not in one, nor is it acquired suddenly.

To the other it must be said, that there Aristotle speaks of the perfection of contemplative happiness, which is according to the act of that virtue, which perfects man, not as man is, but as something divine exists in him, that is, intellectual contemplative, and especially that virtue is wisdom, as he proves there: but the definition introduced is of moral happiness, which is a certain potency towards intellectual happiness, as the Commentator says. And this is thus specified by this, that it is called the act of the virtue of the soul: because the soul is only human, as was evident above in the explanation of the definition.

To the other it must be said, that it is well conceded, that someone is not called happy according to habit properly speaking: because, as the Philosopher says, if someone were said to be happy according to habit, according to half of life he would not differ from a sleeper.

And to the proof the solution is evident through the distinction placed above: because in those authorities happiness is taken according to cause, and commonly, and not properly.

To the other it must be said, that many things are required for virtues as serving and assisting towards happiness: and yet it itself is one act.

To the other it must be said, that it is true of contemplative happiness: but moral is taken in human acts, which do not agree with a superior nature, as Aristotle proves in the tenth book of the Ethics, where he shows the four cardinal virtues to be human, not divine: and therefore civil happiness cannot be taken in this way.

To the other it must be said, that Boethius defines happiness according to the manner of the homeland.

To this which is objected against, it must be said that happiness is only in the genus of act, and the summit of that act is called a state, and state is taken according to that manner in which anything when it is at its summit, is said to have a state.

To the other it must be said, that the congregation of goods is not necessary in happiness, like mixables in a mixture, or essentials in a composite from them: but rather they are like things pertaining to the state of the highest act according to contemplation: which summit cannot be, if something is lacking to perfection which delays or saddens the happy, as Boethius himself proves there.

To the other it must be said, that happiness is taken equivocally or according to analogy: and therefore in the argument there falls a fallacy of equivocation.

To the other it must be said, that this Solon was a legislator and praetor of the Athenians: and he said that civil happiness is hindered by the misfortunes of the dead: and for this he is reproved by Aristotle, because it is false. But he is not reproved for this, that he said some happiness is after death.

To the other which is objected by Augustine it must be said, that he does not define the happy, but introduces the proper passion of the truly happy: because he who is truly happy, has all that he wills, and wills nothing badly, as will be shown in the following problem.

If however some definition is conceded: then through the aforementioned it is evident, that the argument made to the contrary is not valid.

To the other it must be said, that true happiness and misery cannot be in the same: but happiness according to cause, or commonly called happiness of the way, well endures misery with itself.

And through this the solution to the two following is evident, which proceed in the same way.

And note, that others say entirely otherwise, but it is not to be cared for.

Articulus 7 — Whether All Wish To Be Happy

Whether all wish to be blessed?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether all wish to be blessed?

It seems that they do: because 4. Dionysius says in the book On the Divine Names, that all things desire the good and the beautiful: and on account of that, they do whatever they do. Therefore, all men wish to be blessed.

1. Likewise, Anselm in the book On the Fall of the Devil: From a certain advantage, it is evident that happiness, which every rational nature desires.
2. Likewise, [in the same place, a little below: All wish well for themselves, and do not wish ill for themselves.
3. Likewise, Augustine in book II of the Confessions: There is a certain defective species, and shadowy with deceiving vices. For pride imitates loftiness, when you are one above all, God most high. And ambition seeks honors and glory, when you alone are to be honored above all and glorious forever. And cruelty wishes to be feared for power. But who is to be feared, except one God? from whose power can anything be snatched away, or withdrawn, when, or where, or by whom can it be? And the flattery of the wanton wishes to be loved: but nothing is more charming than your charity, nor is anything loved more healthily than that most beautiful and luminous truth of yours. And curiosity seems to desire the pursuit of knowledge, when you know all things supremely. Ignorance itself and foolishness are covered under the name of simplicity and innocence, because nothing simpler than you is found. But what is more innocent than you, since your works are hostile to evils? And sloth seems to desire rest. But what certain rest is there except in the Lord? Lust wishes to be called satisfaction and abundance, yet you are the fullness and unfailing abundance of incorruptible sweetness. Thus Augustine introduces there. Therefore, nothing moves the appetite, except insofar as there is something of the species of the beatifying in it.
4. Furthermore, Augustine, in the same place:

All perversely imitate you, who make themselves far from you, and exalt themselves against you. But even so, by imitating you, they judge you to be the Creator of every creature, and therefore there is no way to depart entirely from you. From this it is taken that every man desires the likeness of God: and for the sake of that, he does whatever he does: but only such a species blesses: therefore, every man desires happiness.

1. Furthermore, Nothing desires anything except under the aspect of something desirable: but there is no aspect of the desirable, except the species of something beatifying:

therefore, nothing desires anything except under the aspect of the beatifying: therefore, whatever it desires, it desires happiness in some way.

2. Furthermore, The opposite of what every desirer flees, every desirer desires: but what every desirer flees is that which makes miserable: therefore, every desirer desires the opposite of that which makes the desirer miserable: but this is what makes blessed or happiness: therefore, every desirer desires happiness,

On the contrary of this is,

1. Augustine in book II of the Confessions who says thus: I loved my own defect, foul soul, and leaping away from your firmament into destruction, not desiring anything of beauty, but desiring disgrace. From this it is taken that it is possible for a man to desire disgrace, and not anything of beauty: therefore, he desires that which makes miserable; therefore, happiness is not always desired.
2. Furthermore, Augustine, in the same place: I plucked those apples only to steal. For having plucked them, I threw them away, having feasted only on iniquity, in which I rejoiced enjoying. For even if any of those apples entered my mouth, the crime was the seasoning there. From this the same is taken as before.
3. Furthermore, In all the arguments introduced in the Letter, there seems to be a fallacy of accident, as is clear when it argues, To live blessedly is to live according to the virtue of the soul: but every man wishes to live blessedly: therefore, he wishes to live according to the virtue of the soul. And so with other reasons, which even to one slightly knowledgeable seem to be of no value.
4. Furthermore, In the Letter, he seeks the cause of error: and it seems in this to agree, that all know happiness and desire it, but do not seek where it is: and therefore error falls into their works. However, this seems to be nothing especially according to him: because if they know it, then they know the true and uncreated good: therefore, they know where to seek happiness: and thus his reasoning is null.

Response. It must be said that the first part of the authorities and reasons must be held: and not only that every man desires happiness, and for its sake does whatever he does: but also, as Dionysius says, everything that desires, and everything that is, and even that which is not in act, but is in potency, desires to be in the beautiful and good beatifying things.

This, however, must be understood in this way: Happiness can be considered in two ways, namely in essence, and in the aspect of the beatifying, which are in some way in it. If indeed it is considered in essence: then it is twofold, namely created, and uncreated. Of the uncreated, Basil says over the beginning of the Psalter thus: There is indeed one first and true and proper happiness, just as there is one good which is God, as Paul also mentions saying:

Awaiting the blessed hope and the coming of the glory of the great God, and our Savior Jesus Christ. For in truth that is the blessed light, which is also the only good, to whose help all things look, which all desire, which is the only immutable nature, the unperturbed life, where no sorrow will approach, in which there is no change, which no confusion will happen, the perennial fountain, the unfailing grace, or the treasure of knowledge.

But created happiness is that of which it was previously spoken, both according to the state of the way, and according to the homeland. If, however, happiness is considered in the beatifying themselves or in their aspect: then each beatifying thing has an imitation of uncreated happiness: and from this which is exemplified by it, it has the power to move the appetite: and thus everything that is, desires happiness, according to which it is exemplified by the first happiness: and this is what Anselm says in the book On the Fall of the Devil thus: I say now happiness, From this it is expressly clear that not happiness with justice, but which all even the unjust wish. For all indeed wish well for themselves. Except for this, that all nature of good is divided into two goods, and two contrary evils are said in use: one good is what is called justice, to which the contrary evil is called injustice: the other good is, which seems to me to be able to be called advantage, and to this evil is opposed disadvantage. But justice indeed not all wish, nor do all flee injustice: but advantage not only every rational nature, but also everything that can feel, wishes, and avoids disadvantage. For no one wishes, except what he thinks in some way advantageous. In this way, therefore, all wish well for themselves, and do not wish ill for themselves, as has been said.

To the same effect is what Basil says over the beginning of the Psalter thus: Unskilled men, while they are ignorant of the blessed nature, and love, sometimes think to be blessed, which are to be said of no moment, namely riches, or health of the body, or glory of honor: of which nothing at all is good according to its nature, not only because it easily suffers change into contraries: but because they are by no means to be believed to be good, which cannot make good those who possess them. For who has been made just by wealth? Who chaste by health? On the contrary, indeed, sometimes they have provided the opportunity to sin to those who did not know how to use health or wealth properly.

This is more clearly evident through the authorities of Augustine introduced in book II of the Confessions. Therefore, in this way, all wish to be blessed, not only all men, as both Philosophers and Saints prove.

Therefore, it must be said to the first objection that is against this, which Augustine below solves what in that theft having the shadowy species of the beatifying he desired, thus saying:

Did it please to act against the law, at least by a fallacy, because by power I could not, to imitate captive freedom by doing with impunity what was not allowed, with a dark likeness of omnipotence? as if he were to say: So it is. Whence it is evident, that the first seeking he said, and the motive to the act of theft was the likeness of omnipotence, which has some aspect and species of the beatifying.

To the other objection, it must be said that Augustine disputes against the position, and his argumentation is more to the man than to the reason. However, the position was threefold, namely that happiness is the virtue of the soul, and that it is pleasure, and that it is God; and all those posited that happiness is that according to the intention of the beatifying, and according to being at the same time, and according to this their reasons proceed well. If, however, the intention of happiness and the thing supposed by happiness are taken differently: then the fallacy of accident occurs, as has been said.

And through this, the solution is clear both to the Letter and also to all that was asked.

Articulus 8 — Whether One Of The Blessed Knows Something About God Which Another Does Not Know Whether one of the blessed knows something about God that another does not know?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, CG, "It is also customary to ask, whether someone knows something about God," etc.

It seems that he speaks falsely: because
1. According to the saying of blessed Dionysius in the Celestial Hierarchy, illuminators are superior to inferiors: but this could not be unless the superior knew something about which the inferior did not know: therefore, since the beatitude of men is according to the beatitude of angels, a more meritorious man knows something about God that a less meritorious man does not know.

1. Furthermore, it seems that the argument he makes in the Text is not valid: because from the fact that someone sees more, it does not follow that he sees less, unless the less follows from the greater: just as one who knows metaphysics, it does not follow from this that he knows geometry, although this is less than that: therefore, similarly, it does not follow, if God shows Himself to them as three and one and they know this, that because of this they see all other things.
2. Furthermore, what pertains to beatitude that he says men see? For this does not seem to be unless it is the highest good: therefore it seems that they do not see in Him all unless because He is the highest good: but the superiors see many other things: therefore they do not have equal knowledge.
3. Furthermore, in earthly intellects it is so, that the clearer and more subtle comprehends more: therefore also in the superiors it will be so: therefore they do not have equal knowledge, as it seems.
4. Furthermore, in the Text it is said that they differ in mode: and it is asked, what is that mode? For it seems that all see in one mode, because all immediately and through the species: therefore it seems false what he says in the Text.

Response. It must be said that what is said is understood concerning things pertaining to beatitude: and this is knowledge through the species which succeeds faith with respect to all articles: for in other things they will have, and have, different knowledge, as the first objections prove, and also one from himself differently, because successively more is revealed to him of the secrets of divine knowledge.

From the argument that he said in the Text, it must be said that through this he proves that nothing will be hidden from them concerning things pertaining to beatitude. And it is an argument from the lesser: just as it seems less that the greatest and most difficult is revealed, than any other lesser things pertaining to beatitude: but the greatest is revealed: therefore any other is revealed.

And through this the solution to all is clear.

Articulus 9 — Whether Joy Is Well Defined By Augustine

Whether joy is well defined by Augustine?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said, there, D, It is also usually asked, Whether in joy there are disparities, etc.

And two things are inquired, namely, what is joy? And, Whether it is equal in all?

To the first, let the definition of Augustine be taken, who says that joy is the diffusion of the mind in the conception of good: joy, since it is in the genus of passion,

1. It seems that it does not pertain to the intellectual nature, because passion according to Aristotle is something that is brought upon or inflicted upon the sense and the sensitive soul.
2. Furthermore, to be diffused does not pertain except to the material and passible: therefore it does not pertain to the intellectual nature, such as an angel, or the rational soul: therefore joy ought not to be attributed to them, as it seems.
3. Furthermore, delight is also attributed to the blessed: and it is asked, In what does joy differ from delight? It seems, in nothing: because delight is the diffusion of the mind in the conception of good: therefore it is the same as joy.
4. Furthermore, since according to Augustine and Boethius there are only four natural passions, namely joy, sadness, hope, and fear, and yet delight can be reduced to others, it is evident that it will be reduced to joy: therefore it is the same as it.
5. Furthermore, it is in the conception of present good inferring the passion of good: similarly joy: therefore joy and delight are the same in reality.

Response. It must be said that joy is quite suitably defined by Augustine.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is a spiritual passion, and thus it well pertains to the spiritual nature, as Aristotle proves against Plato who said that all delight was generation in the sensitive soul: and he shows that there are certain spiritual passions simple and of the simple, such as the delights of contemplations, such as that the diameter is asymmetrical.

To the other, it must be said that to be diffused by the extension of spirits, and the elevation of subtle blood, pertains to the passible nature and the power which operates in the organ: but thus the spiritual nature is not diffused, but metaphorically, when it is spiritually extended into all the differences of good.

To the other, it must be said that the difference is in the reason of the names: because joy arises from delight: for delight (as Aristotle proves in the X Ethics) is the flourishing of nature in the operation of its own and natural habit not impeded: but joy is the manifestation of that in the delight of the conceived good: and thus it is clear that joy arises from delight, as its effect: and this difference the names themselves also show.

To that which is objected, it must be said that the objection is founded upon a false understanding of that which delight is diffusion: because that diffusion is its effect.

To the other, it must be said that it does not follow, if it is reduced to that, that it is the same as it: because it is not reduced to it except as to a cause, and not as existing of the same essence.

To the other, it must be said that from this it is not proven, except that they are of the same; and this is true. But it does not follow that they are the same: because they are of the same in a different mode.

Articulus 10 — Whether There Is Equal Joy In All The Blessed

Whether in all the blessed there is equal joy?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether there is equal joy, as it says in the Text? It seems that not:

1. For it is natural that joy is not equally intense concerning another's good as concerning one's own: but grace and glory do not take away nature, but perfect it: therefore it seems that even in the homeland joy is more intense concerning one's own than concerning another's: therefore his reasoning by which he proves in the Text that there is equal joy is worth nothing.
2. Furthermore, there is no equality among Angels (as Dionysius wishes) with another: therefore neither among humans: therefore there will not be equal joy either.
3. Furthermore, it is false that concerning all things about which one rejoices, another also rejoices: because one does not perceive what another perceives: therefore since one rejoices about what is perceived, not about what one rejoices, another also rejoices.

Response. It must be said that I see no true reasoning here, except that which he lastly introduces in the chapter, namely that it is equal on the part of the object, not on the part of the subject, namely because it is about the equal, because all rejoice about one and the same.

To the first objection, it must be said that here he considers joy on the part of the rejoicing subject: and there it is well conceded that there is not equal joy.

To the second, it must be said that in dignity and perception of gifts all are unequal as to the mode of perceiving: because one sees more clearly than another, and therefore rejoices more intimately: but on the part of the object of joys there is no inequality, because the highest good presents itself equally to all.

To the other, it must be said that they perceive the same, although the mode is not the same on the part of the perceiver.

Articulus 11 — Whether The Beatitude Of The Saints Will Be Greater After The Judgment Than Before The Judgment

Whether the beatitude of the Saints will be greater after the judgment than before the judgment?

Whether the beatitude of the Saints will be greater after the judgment than before the judgment?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, E, After these things it is usually asked, If beatitude, etc.

For it seems false: because
1. However pure and clear the body may be, it is more ignoble than the soul: but the more noble is hindered by the more ignoble when joined; therefore it seems that the soul will be hindered by the body: therefore its joy will be diminished after the resurrection: and the contrary of this is said in Lidlera.

1. Furthermore, in the book of Causes it is said, that every power, the more it is united, the more it is infinite: but the power of the soul is more united outside the body than in the body: therefore more infinite: therefore outside the body it is perceptive of more and greater joys than in the body.
2. Furthermore, when it is joined to the body, it is joined to potency: but every form is the more depressed, the more it is joined to potency; therefore since the soul is a form, it is depressed when it is united to the body: therefore as before.
3. Furthermore, the separated soul, as such, has a greater suitability to simple and therefore spiritual light than the soul united to the body: but among more suitable things there is greater joy: therefore it seems that the separated soul rejoices more in conjunction with God than when united to the body: therefore its joy is not increased by union with the body, but rather diminished.

Response. It must be said that the increase can be understood extensively as concerning more things, or intensively. And in the first way, I concede that it will be increased. However, in the second way, it does not seem that it is increased, unless in the way which he will say in the following chapter, namely that with the natural desire by which it depends on the body being quieted, it will be more strongly turned in intention to the contemplation of God.

Therefore, to the first, it is said through Augustine, that the high adhering to the low in its substance is not harmed: but that is much elevated by humility: whence the body in that state is elevated by the glorified soul to glory: and then in no way does it retard, as above in the gifts of the glorified body it is expeditious.

To the other, it must be said that the intellect is not a bodily power even when the soul according to its substance is united to the body, and through it the soul is capable of God: and therefore since it is not united, it is not multiplied in organs: and therefore in no way is it limited or obscured.

To the other, it must be said that this is true when the soul follows the body, and this is on the way: but then the body follows the soul to formality and spirituality: and therefore it will not retard it.

To the other, it must be said that the intellect is not joined to an organ: and therefore even when the union is made, the suitability remains, as has been said.

Articulus 12 — Whether The Soul Again Desires To Be United To The Body

Whether the soul again desires to be united to the body?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, E, shortly after the beginning: If anyone is moved by what need, etc.

For according to this it seems that the more noble desires the less noble: but this is against nature, as Aristotle says.

To this, however, it must be said that Aristotle speaks of the appetite for perfection: because that is always in the less noble with respect to the more noble: and in this way the soul does not desire the body, but rather as a companion of sufferings and merits, so that it may perceive consolation and retribution with it.

DISTINCTIO L

Divisio Textus

Here arises a question from the premises, etc. Here, in the last distinction, it is discussed concerning the state of the wicked after judgment and resurrection.

And the Master inquires three things, namely, whether the damned sin in hell? And secondly, concerning the outer darkness. And thirdly, how do the blessed and the damned relate to each other?

And it is clear that the first is in the first chapter, the second in the second, and the third in the third.

However, three things are to be inquired by reason of the first chapter, namely, whether the damned sin in hell? Secondly, whether the demons sin? Thirdly, whether the damned can will anything good?

Articulus 1 — Whether The Damned Sin In Hell

Whether the damned sin in hell?

To the first, it is objected thus:
1. Every disordered movement of a rational nature is sin: but in hell there are disordered movements of rational souls: therefore, also in hell sin occurs.

1. Furthermore, the more obstinate the will, the more it sins in this life: therefore, obstinacy does not diminish sin, but increases it: but the damned do not differ from the non-damned in terms of the power to sin, except in obstinate will: therefore, the damned sin more than the non-damned.
2. Furthermore, God does not compel them to evil, nor does nature: therefore, neither from God nor from nature, but from freedom proceeds their disordered act: therefore, it seems that they sin just as the non-damned.
3. Furthermore, if someone makes a necessity for themselves to sin through an illicit act, in the second act they are not excused, but deserve double curses: but in this way the damned have procured necessity for themselves: therefore, they are not excused by obstinacy, but deserve double curses.
4. Furthermore, the state of the damned should not be better than that of the non-damned: but if they could not sin, that state would be better than this one in which they can sin: therefore, it seems that they can sin.
5. Furthermore, a cause is assigned by the Saints, that Lamech sinned more than Cain: because seeing his punishment, he did not correct himself: therefore, he sins most who, having experienced his own punishment, is not withdrawn from sin, that is, from disordered will: but such are the damned: therefore, they sin most.

On the contrary of this is that
1. No guilt extends beyond the sentence of condemnation of the same guilt: but the damned have received the sentence of their damnation: therefore, beyond that, guilt does not extend: therefore, neither do they sin in hell.

1. Furthermore, evil and sin (as Augustine says) are ordered by divine justice, because otherwise something disordered would remain in this world: but what is ordered must have a state and end beyond which it does not progress: therefore, the sin of the damned must also receive an end: but that end cannot be more fittingly imposed than in death, when the order of condemning justice begins: therefore, they do not sin beyond in hell.

Response. It must be said that evil men or souls do not sin in hell, as the objections ultimately prove.

To the first, it must be said that a disordered act is sometimes as punishment, sometimes as guilt. In free will, it is as guilt: but in obstinacy from the condemnation of justice, it is as punishment, and thus it is in the damned.

To another, it must be said that obstinacy is said in two ways, namely, an immovable will from a conceived evil out of the pertinacity of malice alone, and an immovable will from a conceived evil out of confirming justice. And in the first way, it does not excuse, but accuses. But in the second way, because it is so that divine justice has ordained, that whatever the free will finally wills, it cannot be turned away from that by death: and therefore the evil are not turned away from the conceived evil: and therefore it is said, Ezekiel 30:27: "They have descended to hell with their weapons, and have placed their swords under their heads, and their iniquities were upon their bones," not as guilt.

To another, it must be said that divine justice causes this obstinacy, but the impious as a meritorious cause: just as divine justice causes death by inflicting it, but the impious have summoned it by their hands and words. And it is similar to how a thief first voluntarily handles another's property, and when condemned, for the demonstration of the judge's justice, he is immovably bound upon his neck, so that he is separated from it even unwillingly.

To another, it must be said that this is understood of those sins of which one leads into another, like drunkenness into fornication or homicide. But here it is not so: because the immobility of the will is caused by the infliction of punishment.

To another, it must be said that there is no place for amendment, as it says in the Letter: and therefore the punishment experienced there does not aggravate.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Demons Sin In The Lower Regions

Whether demons sin in hell?

Secondly, it is asked, whether the same reasoning applies to demons?

And it seems that it does: because

1. Damascene says that it must be known that what is a fall in Angels, this is death in humans: because just as Angels after the fall are not susceptible to repentance, so neither are humans after death. Therefore, it seems that on account of this obstinacy, the sin which they now commit should not be imputed to them.

1. Furthermore, the demon is condemned by the Lord in whole, and man in part, namely in the soul: if therefore condemnation causes, that sin ought not to be imputed to man, much more it follows that it ought not to be imputed to the demon.

1. Furthermore, he cannot correct the will: but what cannot be otherwise does not have praise or blame, as Tullius says: therefore it is unjust, as it seems, if this were imputed to him as sin.

On the contrary, the author of evil ought not to be in a better condition than the one persuaded in evil: but I see that man is already persuaded in evil by the demon, and such sin is imputed to man: therefore much more ought it to be imputed to the demon.

To this it must be said that each part has opinions for itself: and in the second Sentences more is found about this question than here. However, the way of those saying that they sin until the day of judgment, when they will receive final condemnation with respect to greater punishment and imprisonment, seems safer: and then they will no longer be able to sin.

To the first, it must be said that it is not similar: because man after death does not receive time by chance, but this time is given to the demon, in which he may exercise the elect: and therefore in that time sin and also punishment increase for him. From the saying of Damascene, nothing else is understood except that in this they are similar, that they are insusceptible to repentance.

To the other, it must be said that he does not yet have final condemnation, as man has final condemnation in soul and in body, although according to the other part man does not yet endure punishment.

To the other, it must be said that although he cannot correct the state of his confirmation in evil, nevertheless each singular act is voluntary for him: and therefore he is blamed.

Concerning this mode of confirmation, you will find a better statement in the third Sentences than here.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Damned Are Able To Will Any Good

Whether the damned can will any good?

Thirdly, it is asked, whether the damned can will any good?

It seems that they can: because

1. Evil, as Dionysius says, is involuntary and uncaused and unfruitful and sluggish: therefore, since they will something, and this is not evil, and it is good or evil, it seems that they will nothing except good.

1. Furthermore, that which is absolutely and in itself a privation can move no appetite: but evil in itself and absolutely is a privation: therefore it can move no appetite by itself: therefore neither the appetite of the damned: therefore it seems as before, that they will good.
2. Furthermore, nothing desires its own destruction: but evil is the destruction of every thing: therefore nothing desires evil: therefore neither the damned: therefore as before.
3. Furthermore, Dionysius says in the book On the Divine Names, concerning demons, that they desire to be good and best, to live, and to understand: but the damned are not more obstinate than demons: therefore they desire good: and thus the proposition is held.

On the contrary of this is,
1. What Bernard says in the Canticles concerning the damned: In eternity he will not obtain what he wills: and yet he will endure perpetually what he does not will. He wills the iniquity which he committed while living in the age.

1. Furthermore, a will obstinate in evil can will nothing except evil: therefore, etc.

The response to this is, that their will is twofold, namely natural and deliberative. However, the natural has rather an actual velleity: but the deliberative proceeds into act.

Therefore it must be said, that by natural will they will good, and by deliberative will they will evil: and this solution is according to Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names. Others, however, here propose another distinction, which has been set by us upon the second of the Sentences.

To the first, therefore, it must be said, that Dionysius does not speak of that which is evil in the interior or exterior act, but of malice itself, that is, of evil insofar as it is evil: for this is truly involuntary, as Aristotle proves in the third book of the Ethics. But this can in no way be voluntary.

And through this the solution to the following is clear: because it is not pure privation.

Furthermore, it must be said that destruction is consequent to the appetible just as in mode: because he who fornicates does not intend to diminish the natural good in himself and to destroy the gratuitous: and yet both of these follow from the fornication which he commits: and thus it is there, that the appetite falls upon the act, and destruction follows.

To the dictum of Dionysius it must be said, that as he himself says, he speaks of the will of demons according to, not the nature of evil, but insofar as they are, they desire good and best, just as every nature desires good insofar as it is.

Articulus 4 — Whether In Hell There Will Be Perpetual And Outer Darkness

Whether in hell there will be perpetual and exterior darkness?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, B, Here it can be asked, Why those darknesses, etc.

For the understanding of this chapter, three things are inquired, of which the first is concerning the exterior darknesses. The second is, Whether the damned are entirely outside of God, as it is said in the Text? The third, however, is, Whether they hate God, as again in the Text it seems to be proven through the Psalm.

Concerning the first, it is objected thus:
1. Every creature serving God merits some clarity from Him: but the place of hell and fire have served God from the beginning of the world: therefore they merit some clarity from God like other creatures: therefore there will not be perpetual and exterior darkness there.

1. Furthermore, Fire which gives light to something does not make complete darkness: but the fire of hell gives light to something: therefore it does not make complete darkness. The first is evident by itself. The second Gregory writes in book IX of the Moralia upon that: And eternal horror inhabits there. Although there the fire does not shine for consolation, yet it shines for greater torment, for the reprobate will see each of their followers with them in torment by the illuminating flame, those whom they sinned for love of: so that those who loved their life carnally against the precepts of the Creator, might also be afflicted by them inwardly in the increase of their damnation. Therefore, it is to be believed that the fire which torments in darkness preserves light for torment.
2. Furthermore, Nothing seems without light: but in hell the damned will see each other and their punishments: therefore it seems that there is light there: and therefore there is not a lack of interior and exterior light, as it seems to say in the Text.

Response. It must be said to this, that the disposition of that place is perfectly known only by God, and those who are there: but we in this world cannot fully know, except only as much as we have received from those who have received revelation about this.

Therefore, it seems it must be said according to the sayings of Gregory, that that place is simply dark, and in a certain respect luminous. However, it is simply dark: because the flame which is there and the fire, simply obscures, and does not shine except for greater torment, and not for anything else. Hence in this the fire serves God, that it does not show all things with its obscure light, but only those which exaggerate torments: and this is what Gregory says a little before the aforementioned authority in book IX of the Moralia thus: Therefore it becomes for the wretched. And there, a little before: death without death, end without end, defect without defect: because both death lives, and the end always begins, and defect does not know how to fail. Because therefore both death is similar and does not extinguish, pain torments, but in no way does it flee fear, flame burns, but by no means does it dispel darkness, as far as can be gathered through the knowledge of the present life, the punishments do not have order: because they do not hold their quality in all things. In a horrendous manner then will be pain with fear for the reprobate, and flame with darkness. These things being compared to what was previously introduced, it is clear what was said.

To the first, therefore, it is said, that those creatures are glorified in this in their natural way: because they obey the justice of God, and those qualities are most precious to them, by which they can most perfectly accomplish these things, like immense opacity, and excessive heat, and excessive cold, as it is said, Wisdom 5:21: He will sharpen hard wrath into a spear, and the world will fight with him against the senseless. Thus God will arm the creature in vengeance of enemies: just as on the contrary the creature which will be in the higher places with the good, receives qualities for glory, which are fitting to the beatitude of the Saints, like light, rest, and such things.

The solution is evident through the distinction introduced.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Damned Are Wholly Outside God

Whether the damned are entirely outside God?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether the damned are entirely outside God?

It seems, however, that they are not: because
1. God is everywhere: therefore nothing is outside Him. Augustine: Because he withdraws from you, where does he go? from you placid to you wrathful. Therefore no one is outside God.

1. Furthermore, God is in all things containing all in being: therefore He is in the damned: therefore they are not entirely outside Him.

Response. Much has been said about this in the first book of the Sentences: it must be said, however, that God signifies providence, as Dionysius says in the book On the Divine Names. Providence, however, signifies care and the influence of benefits: and because He does not influence benefits, but punishments to the damned, therefore they are said to be outside God. And this solution (as I think) is according to the intention of the Letter.

It could also be said that with respect to the wicked, the damned are outside God: because they do not consent to Him in any way, but with respect to dominion they cannot escape Him.

And in the first way, it speaks in the Letter. In the second way, however, the objections proceed.

And through this, the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Damned Hate God

Whether the damned hate God?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether the damned hate God?

It seems that they do not: because
1. Dionysius says that all things love the beautiful and good which is God.
Therefore, even the damned.

1. Furthermore, Augustine says that whatever can love, loves God.

Response. It must be said to this that God can be considered in two ways, namely absolutely, and under justice judging according to merits. In the first way, indeed, nothing hates God, but in the second way the damned and demons hate Him.

And through this the solution to the objections is clear.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Evil Have Knowledge Of The Things That Are Done Here

Whether the evil have knowledge of those things which happen here?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, C, Furthermore it is accustomed to be asked, If the souls of the righteous, etc.

And two things are inquired here.
First, concerning the evil, Whether they have knowledge of those things which happen here?
Second, concerning the good, Whether they themselves have knowledge of those things which happen here?

To the first, it is objected thus:
1. No knowledge ought to be taken away from the evil, which contributes to the accumulation of damnation, but the knowledge of those things which happen here contributes to the accumulation of damnation: therefore it ought not to be taken away from them. The first is evident in itself from the sayings of Gregory previously introduced. The second is proved thus: For either the things which are here are prosperous or adverse. If prosperous, they are punished more from the abandonment of them. If adverse, they are punished more from the care which they have concerning their own, because it is said here in the Text that they have care of their own: and thus the proposition is established.

1. Furthermore, the soul separated from the body either has the mode of understanding which the angels have, or the natural mode of man. If in the first mode: therefore it understands through forms concreated to it which are the ideal forms of the whole universe and the whole course of nature, therefore just as an angel knows absences and distances through place by those forms, so also the soul. But if it understands in the mode of man, it is evident that that cognition does not even apprehend present things except through abstraction and operation of bodily organs: therefore that soul does not even know present things before the resurrection, which is false: therefore it remains, that it knows in the first mode: and then it follows, that it knows those things which are done here.

If perhaps you say, that this mode is proper to the good angels, and not to the evil. On the contrary: This mode is natural: therefore it is common to the good and the evil: and this is supposed from the disputes on the second Sentences.

If perhaps you wish to say, as some have fabricated, that the soul departing from the body carries in its sensible part sensible forms, and by means of those forms uses senses after death. On the contrary: It is evident, that sensible forms are only in the organ of the body, as all Philosophers say, nor does the sensible power of the soul receive them except mixed and united to the body, because in this way also the motions of the body reach it: but the soul after death carries no organ with it: therefore nor a form, which is only in the organ of the body: therefore this fiction is nothing.

1. Furthermore, let it be granted, that it carries such forms with it: it is evident, that they lead only to particulars, of which they were forms: therefore through them they can know nothing else: therefore they do not know those things which are done here now: therefore it is evident, that this mode is impossible and entirely lacking in reason.

On the contrary of this is,
4. What is said, Job 14:21, concerning the evil dead thus: Whether his sons are noble or ignoble, he will not understand.

1. Furthermore, Gregory says on the same in the Gloss: Just as the souls of the dead living do not know in what place they are, so the dead who lived carnally do not know how the life of those placed in the flesh is disposed after them.
2. Furthermore, Augustine in the Text seems to wish, that the rich man knew concerning his brothers indirectly and through conjectures, namely because he neither saw them in hell with him, nor even in rest with Lazarus. Therefore from the Text, it is not held, that the evil know those things which are done here.
3. Furthermore, Aristotle says, that the deeds of the living do not change the dead, whether misfortunes or good fortunes. Therefore it seems, that they do not come to the knowledge of them.

Response. It must be said without prejudice, that the evil dead could naturally know the present things which are done here, just as demons, if it were permitted to them: but according to the sayings of the Saints it is not permitted to them. And the cause of this can be; because even the good of interior natural cognition they deserved to be obscured in them. But that demons are now permitted to know, this is done by reason of the exercise in which they are here useful to the good through temptations.

And thus the response to all is evident except the first, to which it must be said, that that knowledge would not directly be a cause of punishment to them: whence greater is the punishment of the obscurity of the natural habit which they received from creation.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Good Have Knowledge Of The Things That Are Done Here

Whether the good have knowledge of those things which happen here?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether the good have knowledge of those things which are done here?

It seems that they do: because
1. In them, such a natural habit is not obscured: therefore, since nothing would impede except this, it seems that the good know all present things whenever they wish.

1. Furthermore, the Saints are prayed to by those who are here: and they would be prayed to in vain if they did not hear, nor know our necessities: therefore it seems that they know them, and by the same reasoning, all other things.

On the contrary, it is
4. What is said in Isaiah 63:16: "Abraham did not know us, and Israel does not acknowledge us." However, it is certain that Abraham was good. Therefore, neither do other good ones know those things which happen here.

1. Furthermore, Augustine understands the same:
"The dead, even the Saints, do not know what the living, even their children, do."

Response. I do not see how the good do not know those things which happen here, provided they wish to know.

However, concerning the opinion of Augustine, it seems to be said that Augustine speaks of the mode of knowledge, or because they pretend not to know, except as much as God wills to assist them.

Articulus 9 — How It Is Understood That The Rich Man In Hell Had A Tongue

How is it understood that the rich man in hell had a tongue?

Then it is asked, concerning what is said there, D, If anyone should ask, How is it understood, etc.

1. For since it has been disputed above concerning the remaining of the sensitive soul of men after death, it remains here to be asked, what is called the tongue of the rich man, since it is evident that he did not have the tongue of flesh there?
2. Furthermore, why does he rather ask for his tongue to be cooled than another member?
3. Furthermore, what is the tip of the finger of Lazarus, and what was the drop of water which he requested?

And it must be said that the tongue is called the power of the soul, which perfects the tongue for the power of taste and the motion of speech, as Gregory says.

To the other it must be said, that according to Gregory, the sin of the rich man was gluttony, and loquacity which is the companion of gluttony: and therefore he grieved for the tongue above the other members.

To the other it must be said, that by the finger is made a showing, and the finger of mercy signifies a showing: but the tip of the finger signifies the extreme mercy liberating from depravity which will not be there.

And the drop of water signifies a small refreshment, which the damned do not obtain in the pit where there is no water.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Good And The Evil Will See One Another

Whether the good and the evil will see each other?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, E, It is also accustomed to be asked, Whether, etc.

However, it seems that they ought always to see each other: because
1. From this the evil are tormented more, as it is said, Wisdom 5:2, Seeing they shall be troubled with terrible fear, etc. And, Micah 7:10: My enemy shall see, and shall be covered with confusion. And, Psalm 112:10: The sinner shall see, and be angry: he shall gnash with his teeth and pine away.

1. Further, after the day of judgment the evil ought rather to see the good, than conversely: because it is more harmful to the evil in the sight of the goods of others: and this befits the state of the damned: but it is of a good and well-ordered heart to be harmed in the evils of others: therefore, the sight of the punishment of the evil, since the good are most excellently disposed, by compassion their beatitude will be obscured.

Response. It must be said, that as it is said in the Text, before the judgment both see others, and after the judgment only the good see the evil: because not even then will they be deemed worthy to see the good.

From the aspect it must be said, that then they will be so burdened by punishments, that their intention can be turned nowhere else than to the punishments: and therefore the thought of the rewards of the good in heaven will be closed to them.

To the second it must be said, that then nature will be glorified, so that it can neither suffer nor sympathize: for to sympathize is not of a perfect nature, but rather of an imperfect and passible one, and that is a good disposition.

However, such a confirmation of nature is said to be chaos in the Text, which is established between the good and the evil.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 11 — Whether The Blessed See All Things That Are Done In Creatures

Whether the blessed see all things which are done in creatures?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, G, a little before the middle: Because they see the brightness of God, nothing in the creature, etc.

However, two things are asked. The first is concerning the truth of what is said. The second is concerning the senses of the glorious body, namely concerning sight, and others which the Saints will use in the homeland.

For the first seems false: because 1. All see the brightness of God: yet one does not see what another sees: therefore not all see all things which are done in creatures.

1. Furthermore, according to this, one would not illuminate another, and this is false.

Response. It must be said that vision is taken in two ways, namely on the part of the object, and on the part of the medium through which there is sight. On the part of the object, he who sees the brightness of God does not see all things, but sees as many as God wills to manifest to him. However, on the part of the medium, there is nothing which he who sees the brightness of God does not see: because God is the medium sufficiently demonstrating whatever is created or uncreated.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 12 — What Are Said To Be The Feet And The Head Of The One Sitting Upon The Throne

Who are called the feet and head of the one sitting upon the throne?

These things concerning the feet of the one sitting upon the throne, etc.

This is taken from Isaiah. And although it is otherwise expounded by blessed Dionysius both in the Celestial and in the Ecclesiastical hierarchy, here, however, the head and feet are understood as certain hidden things of divinity: the head as eternal, and the feet as the hidden judgment of subsequent works. And they are the intermediate works of creation and recreation, both in the mediator and in the sacraments: and that is indeed a brief epitome of the whole book of Sentences, in which it is concluded to the praise and glory and honor of our Lord Jesus Christ, to whom with the Father and the Holy Spirit is honor and glory for ages of ages. Amen.
