To the other, it must be said that this is true according to which one is converted with being: and I well concede that those terms when placed with an adjunct, predicate the nature of that in divine things - but when placed absolutely in the masculine gender, they are substantivized, or adjectively referred to persons. By this the solution to the following is also clear.

To the other, it must be said that it is different in white, etc., because one and one are from the act of form generally accepted in every being: but white and suchlike say a determined species: and therefore numerical terms are not equivocated according to their application to different things: because measure does not take its reason from the measured: for otherwise it would not be the same number by which we count dogs and men: but it takes diversity from the different reason of measuring, like a bushel and a yard: but because number in every species of quantity is simpler, therefore it does not take diversity of reason from the measured, but it can be appropriated to one genus, which is not appropriated in another: and therefore absolutely said one, one, one, are of one reason: and yet one is referred to person, and one to essence, when taken absolutely for the reason previously stated.

Articulus 5 — Whether Unity Or Numerical Terms Are Predicated Univocally Of Essence, Person, And Notion

Whether unity or numerical terms are predicated univocally of essence, person, and notion?

Then it is asked, whether it is said univocally that one is of essence and of person?

It seems that it is so: because

1. It is not said equivocally simply, but by prior and posterior of Creator and creature: but between essence and person there is no prior and posterior: therefore it is said in both from the same: therefore univocally.

1. Likewise, either there is one unity of essence and person, or two. If two: therefore essence and person are two, which is false: therefore it remains, that it is one.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

1. When it is said, the Father is one, the sense is, that is, distinct by notion: but when it is said, essence is one, the sense is, that is, undivided in itself, and divided from others: therefore it is not said by one reason that essence is one, and person is one.

1. Likewise, one is undivided in itself, and divided from others: therefore if the Father is one, he will be divided from others, which is false: because the Son is in the Father, and conversely.

2. Likewise, one and being are converted: therefore by the same the Father is one by which the Father is father: therefore by paternity he is one: but the divine essence is not one by paternity, but by itself: therefore it is not said according to one reason, but equivocally, as it seems.

To this it must be said, that it is said by one reason, and not equivocally: for it is unity abstracting from this one and that, and that is of one reason in any one: because although it is from diverse forms, yet it is abstracted from them by one act according to reason which is to determine, and to finish, and to distinguish: and therefore a stone is one by its stoneness, and fire is one not by stoneness: and yet one is not said equivocally: because just as stoneness distinguishes a stone, so woodenness wood, and therefore unity from both is of one reason: and therefore in this respect it could be said, that unity when it is said of essence, it says unity of essence, and when it is said of person, it says unity of person: and although essence is distinguished by itself, person however by property, yet unity will not be of diverse reason. But if unity is considered according to supposit, then it will be entirely of one reason, but said by prior and posterior in essence and person.

And according to this it must be said to the first, that although there is not prior and posterior according to the thing between essence and person, yet there is prior and posterior according to the reason of understanding.

To the other it must be said, that there is one unity in reality, and not in the reason of understanding, if unity is taken in the being of that which is one, and not abstracted from it: and therefore something agrees with one which does not agree with another.

From the other the solution is clear from what was said before.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Father And The Son And The Holy Spirit Can In Some Way Be Said To Be One

Whether the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit can in any way be said to be one?

Whether the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit can in any way be said to be one?

Then it is asked, Whether the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are one?

It seems that they are: because
1. They are one eternal, and the term "eternal" does not divide the notion of one: therefore, I can infer separately: therefore, the Father and the Son and the Spirit are one.

1. Likewise, if by reason of the substantiation of that which is eternal, three are one eternal, why not similarly by reason of the substantiation of the term "one," the Father and the Son are one.

Solution. It must be said that it is not to be conceded except with an adjunct subject, from which the term "one" receives the substance which it proves of several together.

To the first, it must be said that although it does not divide, yet it determines its signification to the nature in which the Father and the Son are united.

To the other, it must be said that the term "one" signifies that which follows essence and person: and whatever is distinct, whether it is distinct essentially or personally: and therefore in the masculine subject it does not imply something special in which the union of the Father and the Son is understood: this, however, the term "eternal" or "immense" does not do.

But if it is said that according to this we could concede, three are being: it must be said that some concede this: but the term "being" signifies nature more than the term "one": because "one" names by way of disposition applicable to anything, but "being" by way of subject and nature.

Articulus 7 — What It Is To Be Distinguished In The Divine

What is it to be distinguished in the divine?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, G, "When, however, we say, the persons are distinct," etc.

For here begins the second part of the distinction, in which he touches upon what the notional terms, distinct, discrete, trinity, signify. And according to these three in order, there are here three chapters: and all these are clear, if it is understood what it is to be distinguished and discerned.

Therefore, distinction in the divine is an act following the notion, insofar as it is a personal property: for thus one person is distinguished from another. Discretion, however, is the same according to the order and number of persons, which is in the divine: for discrete things are numerable. But confusion is the composition of those things which are numbered together, disordered: and in the divine, it signifies the acceptance of the same under different names, as Sabellius used to say. Alienation, however, signifies a cutting off by the removal of one from another, as Arius used to say.

Articulus 8 — Whether It Is Well Said That God Is Triune And One; And Whether The Trinity Is The Unity Of Three

Whether it is well said that God is triune and one: and whether the trinity is the unity of three?

Whether it is well said that God is triune and one: and whether the trinity is the unity of three?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said in the last part K: "Trinity indeed is manifold and numerable: because trinity is the unity of three."

1. For it seems to be contrary, that the Father is the unity of three, because He is the essence which is the unity of three: therefore the Father is trinity.

2. Furthermore, since it is said that trinity is numerable, why is it not said that God is three, or two: since everything numerable according to some species of number is numerable.

3. Likewise, when it is said, God is triune and one: either the term "God" supposes the essence, or the person. If the essence: therefore the essence is triune, which is false. If the person: therefore some person is triune and one, which is false: therefore it seems it should not be conceded that God is triune and one.

But on the contrary: In the hymn it is sung, "The machine of the whole world is governed by the triune and one."

Solution. It must be said to the first, that in the argument there falls the fallacy of accident: just as if it were proceeded thus, Socrates is every animal, because animal is one in which all animals are united. However, some say that when it is said, trinity is the unity of three, it is the etymology of the name: but concerning this we have spoken above, because although according to the name it implies essence directly, yet according to the signification of the thing it is conversely: and therefore trinity is three united in one essence.

To the other it must be said, that God is not numerable: and if trinity is said to be numerable, this is understood of a certain number, namely of notions and persons, and not simply: nor does this number exclude the simplicity or unity of essence, but rather solitude and singularity.

To the other it must be said, that this is true, God is triune and one: and the term "God" supposes the essence in the supposit in common: and therefore by reason of the essence it is fitting to Him to be one, and by reason of the supposits to be triune, supply, to be.

DISTINCTIO XXV

Divisio Textus

Furthermore, it must be considered, with this name, person, etc.

Here begins the second part in which the Master approaches the consideration of the person which is numbered with numeral words. And thus this distinction is divided into two parts: in the first of which he presents the reasons and opinions of those saying that the person in singular and plural always signifies substance. In the second, however, he presents his own opinion, that in the plural, from the time of the response of the faithful to the question, what three? it does not signify essence, but the substance which the Greeks call éxderasw, there, H,

It must be known, therefore, that this name, person, etc.

In the first part, he presents four chapters, in the first of which he raises the question. In the second, he presents the reason set above from the authorities set above, there, B,

For the person, as Augustine said above. In the third, he presents the reason taken from the nature of the interrogative word, there, C, It can also be shown otherwise, etc. In the fourth, he presents the opinion of those following these reasons, there, D, To some it seems, that by the name of person, etc.

Articulus 1 — What A Person Is According To The Definition

What is a person according to the definition?

Two questions arise before the Letter, namely, what is a person according to the definition? And, whether it is univocal in divine and created persons?

To the first, the definition of Boethius is set forth: A person is an individual substance of a rational nature in the book on Two Natures in One Person of Christ. Another definition is given by Richard in his fourth book on the Trinity thus: We call a person someone distinguished from all others by a singular property. Also, below, in the same place: A divine person is the incommunicable existence of the divine nature. Also, below, in the same place: A person is an existing by itself according to the singular mode of existence of a rational nature. Another is given by the Masters, namely, A person is a hypostasis distinct by a property pertaining to dignity.

However, it is objected against the first: because 1. The Master says that that description of Boethius does not apply to divine persons.

1. This is also shown by reason thus: Whatever is not of a rational nature is not a person: God is not of a rational nature: therefore, He is not a person. The first is evident by itself. The second is proved by the fact that rational is a divisive difference of animal: but God is not an animal, because He is not a body: therefore, He is not rational.
2. Also, when it is said, of a rational nature, nature is taken in some community: but this community is contracted in a person by what it adds: therefore, a person in addition relates to nature: therefore, it is composite, which is false, since in divine things the person and nature are of the same simplicity.
3. Furthermore, when it is said, substance, essence, person, nature: why did he not say that a person is an individual substance of a rational essence or substance, as of nature?

If perhaps you say that a person is of the same simplicity with nature, and adds nothing: because it is not said as being of the essence of the defined which falls obliquely in the definition, as when it is said snub or snubness is the curvature of the nose, and lame is the curvature of the leg, only one is said: because what falls obliquely there is not of its essence. If, I say, you say thus. Against:

1. It is otherwise in the definition of substance, and otherwise in the definition of accident, as the Philosopher says in the seventh book of Metaphysics, because in the definition of substance accident is not received, but in the definition of accident it is necessary to receive the subject, either determined, as in a proper passion, or undetermined, as in others. Therefore, when a person is defined, it is either defined as a supposed substance, as Boethius expressly says that a person names a supposed substance, or it is defined as a common or proper accident: because there is no middle to give, if it is defined in the first way: therefore, nothing is placed in its definition that is not of its essence in some way: and of a rational nature is placed in its definition: therefore, it is of its essence in some way. But if it is defined as an accident: then mention of the subject ought to be made in the definition, which again is false.

2. Also, the Commentator, in the same place, says that those things which fall obliquely in the definition of accidents are in the place of differences specifying the accident: and those which are in the direct, are in the place of genera: and this is evident: for when snubness is said to be the curvature of the nose, by the term curvature it does not differ from lame, because both are curvature, but by the term nose: therefore, what falls obliquely in such definitions is the subject around which the essence of the defined accident is per se. If therefore it is similar to what is brought forth as similar, rational nature will denote the subject around which the person is, which is false.

3. Also, either rational nature is of the substance of any person, or not. If it is of the substance: then the objection seems to proceed. If not: then it relates to it accidentally, which again is false.

4. Also, Boethius, seeking the definition of a person, divides substance by rational and irrational, and universal and particular: therefore, the term rational nature in the definition contracts, as a constituting difference: and thus it will be of the intellect of the person.

5. Also, rational nature is predicated directly of any person: for Socrates is a rational nature, and Gabriel is a rational nature, and the Father is a rational nature: therefore, it is either predicated as an accident, or as a substance: not as an accident as is evident to anyone: therefore, as a substantial predicate: therefore, it is of the intellect and reason of the subject: and I thought no one would doubt this: therefore, the first reason seems to follow, because a person seems to be of greater composition than rational nature.

Further inquiry is made about what it says substance: for either substance is taken there for essence, or for hypostasis. If for essence: therefore, essence is individual: but individual denotes distinction, which it places around substance: therefore, this distinction is placed around essence: therefore, essence is distinguished, which is false.

Also, if a person is an individual substance, three persons are three individual substances: because with the multiplication of the defined, the definition will necessarily be multiplied: if therefore a person says essence: therefore, three persons will be three individual essences, etc., which is heresy.

Also, if it says hypostasis: then what is added, individual substance, seems superfluous. To this can also be added that Boethius, seeking this definition, divides substance into universal and particular, and contracts by what he adds individual, because universal substance is not a person: therefore, it seems that substance stands in the place of what is as second substance: but this is not hypostasis: therefore, substance is not the same as hypostasis.

Also, Boethius says that the Greeks do not call ὑπόστασις, except an individual of a rational nature: therefore, hypostasis is the same as a person: and if substance were the same as hypostasis, the same would fall in the definition of itself.

If perhaps you say that substance signifies essence, but supposes a person: and what I say individual is added to it for the explanation of the supposit, which is implicitly in it: as when it is said, God the Father generates, the term God signifies essence, and supposes the person of the Father because of the term generates: because it belongs only to the Father: and yet the term Father is not added superfluously: because it explains the supposit, which was implicitly in the term God. If, I say, you say thus. Against:

1. According to this, the term substance supposes a person indeterminately, and signifies essence: and then I ask, What makes it suppose thus? for when God is said absolutely, it does not suppose a person, but signifies and supposes essence: but it can be drawn from the notional adjunct because of the mode of signifying, because it signifies concretely to suppose for a person.
2. If you say that the term individual compels to suppose: then it is objected as before, that it will stand for common substance which is essence, and the term individual does not restrict it except by placing its thing around it: therefore, distinction is placed around the divine essence.
3. Furthermore, the mode of signifying is not the same in the term God, and in substance: for we do not concede that substance generates, although we concede that God generates God: therefore, it does not properly stand for a person as the term God: and thus that solution seems unable to stand.

Further inquiry is made, What does individual predicate? For it either says only negation, as some say, or it says something positively. If it says only negation: since then negation alone constitutes nothing, and restricts nothing, it seems neither to constitute a person by that, nor even to restrict substance. But if it says something positively, namely individuation by something distinguishing, then it relates to substance by addition: and thus a person will be composite.

Other definitions do not need to be disputed: because their doubts will be evident from the solution of these.

I say therefore without prejudice, agreeing with some before me, that if the property of the thing which is a person is considered, a person is more properly in divine things than in creatures. But if the use of the name which is a person is considered, I say that according to that definition of Boethius it does not apply to divine things, unless it is explained thus, that substance is existence, as Richard says, as explained above, and individual says distinct by property, and rational nature is placed for intellectual divine. And in this way, I respond to the objections.

To the first, it must be said that the Master regards the use of those names which are placed in the definition of a person, and not the thing which is a person.

To the other, it must be said that rational is said commonly, and properly. Commonly as it is primarily and secondarily in divine, angelic, and human nature: and then rational nature is discriminative of true and false, and good and evil: properly, however, it is taken as Isaac says, that reason begins in the shadow of intelligence, because intelligence receives in the deiform intellect. Reason, however, inquiring, and studying, and discoursing (as Dionysius says) has acceptances because of its greater obscuration, and therefore it falls in the definition of man: and it is a divisive difference of animal. It is true, however, that Gregory in the Homily of Epiphany calls an Angel a rational animal: but this is explained elsewhere, that it is called an animal not from the nature of an animal, but rather from the power of an animal, as Dionysius seems to want, because it has the power of discriminating sensibles and rationals.

To the other, it must be said that in truth the entirely simple can have no definition: but it is simple, as simple: and it is simple, as not simple: simple as simple, like being, and essence, and the like, in whose definition nothing can be placed that would not be posterior to them according to the intellect, and of which they would not be predicated without conversion. Simple, however, as not simple, is what is indeed simple in reality, but nevertheless according to the mode of understanding has something prior: and such is a person, and the rest which we define in God. Hence I well concede that rational nature is of the intellect of a person, as being of its essence.

But if it is asked, Why is it placed obliquely? It must be said that as Dionysius says, a person names a supposed substance, and that in creatures has some diversity of the thing to na-

...in the divine, however, there is diversity according to the mode of understanding, not according to the thing: and this diversity is conveyed by the oblique which is transitive.

To the other, it must be said that nature places a relation to the thing of nature: because the thing of nature is in two ways: namely, as subject to the thing, and as constituted by it. However, the person is the thing of nature, but substance and essence do not imply such a relation: and these are fittingly placed in the definition.

From the opposite, I concede well that it is not similar concerning the definition of an accident: because there is no definition of an accident except in a certain respect: but a person is not defined thus, but rather a rational nature is something of the person either in reality, as in lower things, or in the mode of understanding, as in higher things.

To what is further inquired about substance, what does it signify? It must be said that substance is said in four ways. For sometimes substance is said as opposed to accident: and according to this, it names the nature of the first category, or the thing which is common to the first substance and the second, preserved in both: but this substance is nothing other than a being existing per se, by reason of that which is to exist per se, opposed to accident, which is a being existing in another, as Aristotle takes substance in the first philosophy in book IX, at the beginning, where he says: It has been said about being to which other categories of being are attributed, where it has been said about substance: for many things are called beings according to how they receive the definition of substance, such as quality, and quantity, and others which are said in this way. Secondly and thirdly, substance is said by the divisive parts of this, namely first and second, according to which we call the first from the act of standing under the second and accident: but the second from the act of standing under the first and accident, which also subsisting is fitting to it by reason of the first in which it has being, and not by reason of itself: as is clear, when it is said, white man, the white refers to the man by reason of the supposit which is the first substance, and not by reason of the signified which is the second. In the fourth way, substance is said to be the whatness of each category: and some call this the logical substance: as Aristotle says: If someone, having placed a cubit magnitude, were to say that what is placed is a bicubital magnitude or quantity, he says what it is, and he says how much, and he signifies how much: and if, having placed whiteness, he were to say that what is placed is color, he says what it is, and he signifies quality. Therefore, we can say that substance signifies substance in common, or that it is placed for hypostasis. If we wish to speak in the first way: then we will say that although it signifies substance, it does not, however, suppose it, but supposes for hypostasis.

To this, however, it is asked, What compels it to stand for hypostasis? It must be said that of itself it can stand for either, namely for the common nature which is as the second: and for hypostasis which is as the first substance, and by the adjunct of the individual it will stand for hypostasis, although it signifies substance: and this seems to be the intention of Boethius, because in this way he seeks the definition.

To what is further objected, that according to this essence will be individual: it must be said, that it is not: because an adjective does two things concerning the substantive to which it is joined: for it restricts it, and places its thing around it: as is clear, when it is said, white man: for we say that man has signification and supposition: and it is not necessary that the adjective places implication around both, but around that of which it is first an accident, and this is the supposit: and consequently, the man is not restricted in signification, but rather in supposits. Thus I say here, that substance signifies substance in common, and the adjective regards it according to that to which distinction per se is fitting, which is conveyed by the individual: and therefore it places distinction in the supposit: and therefore it is also clear why the individual is not superfluous: for substance would not have that by which it is drawn to stand for an incommunicable supposit, unless the individual were added.

To what is proved, that substance of itself says supposit, and the individual explains: I concede well, that it does not seem true to me, as the objection proves.

To what is objected, that by multiplying the defined, etc. I respond, that I do not know what prohibits, that in this sense we can say three individual substances of rational nature: because substance stands for supposit: and this fits well into plurality, because distinction (as has already been held) is not placed around the essence which is the signification of substance. But if we wish to say that substance signifies hypostasis, as some Masters say: then we will say that the addition of the individual is not superfluous: because although hypostasis is a distinct supposit, it does not, however, import the reason of distinction in the name: and this reason of distinction is signified, when it is said individual. Just as when it is said, God the Father generates, the God says the supposit of the word which imports the notional act of the Father: nor is Father added superfluously, because it says the reason by which the supposit is referred to such an act, which is signified by the property of the Father, when it is said, God the Father.

To what is further inquired about the individual, without prejudice I say, that it is understood positively: for the negation consequent to the position leaves the positive before itself.

To what is objected against, it must be said that by reason of affirmation separation of it from common substance is not expressed, but by reason of negation: and therefore it is named by negation, when it is said individual substance, so that it is the same as incommunicable substance.

However, the other definitions of Richard are all given by comparison to that which individuates the person. And the first says this in common according to what is fitting to God, Angel, and man. The second, however, only divine. The third seems to correct the definition of Boethius, that it is better said existence than substance. The fourth says the subject of the person, and the property in common. However, the definition of the Masters is given by comparison to morals or civil matters, according to whose likeness the name is generally transferred to individuals of rational nature.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

Then it is asked concerning what is said in the fourth chapter of the first part, there, D,

The Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are three persons, that is, they are three having in common what is person, etc.

These said that person signifies nothing but essence, and supposes the same, and connotes distinction sometimes one, sometimes many. One, as when it is said, the Father is form, that is, by itself one: for there by the term "one" essence is supposed and signified: and by the term "by itself" distinction is connoted. However, many distinctions, as when it is said, the Father and the Son are persons, that is, they are one, and distinct from each other.

But it seems that from this opinion heresy follows thus: This person is the Father: here according to these there is no demonstration except of essence: and the essence of the Father is the essence of the Son: therefore the person of the Father is the person of the Son, which is false and heresy: and therefore this opinion is not to be adhered to. But according to what was said above, it must be said that person signifies a substance supposed with property, as Dionysius says.

Divisio Textus

Then take the second part of the distinction which begins there, E, It must be known therefore, that this name, etc.

For this part is divided into three: in the first of which the Master touches upon the signification of this name, person, according to his opinion. In the second, however, the expositions of authorities in which numerical words are placed, or noting distinction with this name, person, according to that opinion, there, J,

Now let us examine, Whether according to In the third he proves, the same reasoning, etc. that person in divine matters makes a threefold understanding, there, L, in the end: From the aforementioned it is gathered, etc.

In the first of these there are four chapters, in the first of which he presents the opinion, that it signifies substance and hypostasis. In the second he applies proof, there, F,

The sense of the Ethics is aided, etc. In the third he responds to the question of the heretics made by what thing, according to that opinion, there, G, To this however that they In the fourth he excuses what they say, etc., he had said three things, there, If, Let it not move you, etc.

Articulus 2 — Whether Person Is Univocal In The Divine And In Creatures

Whether person is univocally in the divine and in creatures?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether it is univocally in God and in the creature?

It seems, however, that it is not: because
1. Richard says that in God persons are distinguished by the property of origin only: but in angels by natural properties, not of origin: but in humans in both ways. Therefore, it seems that person agrees in a threefold manner with a threefold rational nature.

1. Likewise, nothing is univocal to God and creature, as has often been proven above: person agrees with God and creature: therefore, not univocally.

BUT on the contrary, it seems that univocally: For nothing prevents however much distant things from participating in the same common reason of negation, as God and stone not walking: but the perfection of person consists in negation, namely the individual which is ultimate, and person is completive: therefore, it seems that it agrees univocally.

Further, if it is conceded that it agrees by prior and posterior, it is asked, To which does it agree by prior? It seems that it agrees prior to the creature: because in it all things are found according to the property which are placed in the definition of person: but it is not so in God who is altogether simple: therefore, it agrees prior to man.

Solution. I say without prejudice, that it agrees by prior and posterior: and indeed the thing is prior in God than in inferiors, but according to the use of the name it is prior in inferiors.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that person, insofar as it abstracts from this and that mode, to the distinction of the divine person remaining under the same nature, the personal distinction in inferiors is referred: because as was said above, that they are distinct one in nature or diverse in nature, this does not make for the reason of person, but only to exist solely by itself according to the mode of rational nature: and therefore it is more truly person in the divine, where it is not divided from another, but distinguished, than in inferiors.

To the other, it must be said that it is true that nothing is altogether univocal, nor is it simply equivocal that which is found in the creature and in the Creator.

To the other, it must be said that the individual is not simply negation, like not walking, in God and in stone: and therefore it is not similar: and yet some concede the conclusion because of the argument.

To what is further asked, the solution is clear from what was said before.

Articulus 3 — Whether In The Divine There Is Any Other Commonness Than That Of The Divine Nature Or Essence

Whether in the divine there is another commonality than that of the divine nature or essence?

However, here arises a doubt concerning what is said in the first chapter, there, E, at the end:

When therefore we say three persons, etc., where it does not signify the essence, that is, the divine nature which is common to the three persons, but the subsistences.

For this seems false:

1. For there is no commonality in the divine except of nature: but person is common: therefore it signifies nature.
2. Furthermore, Person is common, and nature is common either by the same commonality or by another: not by another, because nothing else in the divine is common to the three: therefore by the same; therefore it signifies essence. If perhaps you say, that it is common in reality, and is common in reason: and person is common in reason, and essence in reality. On the contrary: Either something underlies reason, or nothing. If nothing: then it is empty and vain. If something: either it is nature, or another: and from there proceed, as before.

Furthermore, the Master seems to imply, that person signifies one thing in the plural, and another in the singular: and this is impossible, because the plural only duplicates its singular, and does not vary the signified.

Solution. It must be said according to what was said above, that there is no commonality in the divine except essence: but from that many are signified consequently, as was noted above in distinguishing: and I well concede, that those following commonalities are commonalities of reason.

To what is objected against this, it must be said that something in reality corresponds to reason: because it is really signified, when it is said, three persons are one God: otherwise, commonality of substance is said differently by the term God, and differently by the term are, and differently by the term these or persons: and although there is one commonality of nature imported in all, yet not under the same mode of signifying: because in the term persons it is imported as in supposits, and in the term are in the relation of supposit to nature, and in the term God as in common nature according to reality: and this was determined above: and therefore in one falls plurality, in another not.

To what is asked concerning the opinion of the Master, it must be said that he is not of that opinion, but rather, that person signifies the subject substance, as was proved above: but he intends, that although it signifies it, it does not yet suppose it, because in its intellect it encloses the incommunicable imported by the term individual, which falls in its definition: and that he places concerning the supposit, and not concerning the signified, as was said in the question concerning the definition of person: and therefore he intends to say, that in the plural it places number concerning the supposit, and not concerning the signified: for its supposit is signified by subsistence, or hypostases, as was said above in the question concerning the four names.

Articulus 4 — Whether In The Divine It Can Be Admitted That There Are Three Beings

Whether in divine matters it can be admitted that there are three beings?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, F, Three beings, etc.

For Anselm says in the Monologion, that essence, to be, and being differ, just as light, to shine, and shining: therefore being is nothing but essence being; but three are one essence: therefore they are one; therefore not three beings.

Solution. Beings can be held participially: and thus it is conceded, three beings, that is, three who are; because thus in itself it encloses the thing of its verb with this name; and thus the Master understands. But if it were taken nominally, then it would have a calumny. But then it must still be said that it can be taken according to the mode of signifying, because it says concretively: and then it is referred again to the persons: namely, in such a way that the term three is substantive, and the term beings is active. But if it is taken absolutely for essence, and is substantive, the expression will be false: although someone might say that being is general, and can be referred to the person and to the nature equally: and then there will not be the same reasoning concerning almighty, or eternal, or other: but nevertheless the art of directing oneself in such expressions is noted above.

Articulus 5 — Why It Is Well Said, Of The Same Essence, And Not Of The Same God; Why Each Person, And Not Each God; And Why It Cannot Be Said, Three Persons Of The Same Essence

Why it is well said, of the same essence, and not of the same God: why each person, and not each God: and why it cannot be said three persons from the same essence?

Then it is asked concerning what is said in the second chapter F, towards the end: Augustine... says three persons are one essence or of the same essence, not from the same essence, etc.

For the reason of this is asked.

1. Similarly, why do we say, of the same essence, and not of the same God are the three persons: since the term God and essence say the same thing?
2. Likewise, we well say, each person, although person signifies substance: yet it is not said, each God: and the reason for this is asked.

Solution. It must be said that when it is said, from the same essence, the preposition from implies a cause, and especially a material one: and since essence does not relate thus to persons, therefore that is not accepted.

To the other it must be said that essence signifies nature by way of form: and therefore although it is the same in reality with persons, yet it differs in the mode of understanding, just as one is from whom it is: and this diversity in the mode of signifying is implied in the oblique, when it is said, three persons of one essence: however, God does not say as by which it is, but rather names deity in him who has it: and therefore it says, as one is in common: and therefore such diversity in the name in the mode of signifying is not implied.

To the other it must be said that person says supposit: and that is multiplied in the divine: and therefore the distributive expression finds there the matter of its distribution. However, God names substance concretely, and not supposit, unless perhaps from an added notional term: and therefore it does not allow a distributive sign to be joined to it.

Articulus 6 — It Is Asked Concerning This Question, What Three, And What Three Things

It is asked concerning this question, What are three, and what are three things?

Then it is asked concerning the third chapter, G, there, To this, however, which they say, etc.

For it seems that nothing was asked except the essence because the hypostases were certainly presupposed with their properties in the word of John, when he said, Father, Word, and Holy Spirit: therefore, concerning them, it was not asked: since therefore there is nothing more in the persons, except the essence, it seems that the essence was asked. But on the contrary: This also was certainly presupposed in the word of John, when he said, And these three are one: therefore it seems that nothing could be asked, and thus the question was useless.

Solution. Without prejudice, I say that the question was useless: because the whole faith was expressed in the word of John, as the objection proves. However, it should be noted that the term "what" sometimes seeks a definition or part of a definition: and sometimes seeks a subjective part of the nature or common essence: as when it is said, what is man? it is answered a rational animal, or an animal. Or when it is asked, what swims in the sea? it is answered a fish. For in the first way the essence is rendered, and in the second the subjective part: and in this way it could ask, what subjectively were the three, that is, that some substantive would be answered which would be said in common of them, insofar as they are many: and because person signifies a subject substance, as was evident above from the words of Boethius, therefore the faithful admitted the question, and answered that they were three persons.

Articulus 7 — Whether We Can Concede There To Be Three Substances, Or Three Hypostases, As Three Persons

Whether we can concede that there are three substances, or three hypostases, just as there are three persons?

Then it is asked concerning the fourth chapter H, where it says: "Do not be moved, that we said three things."

For Damascene says that the three persons agree in reality, and are distinguished by reason: and in lower things it is the converse, in which by reason it is considered what is one, but in reality what is divided.

Solution. This was solved above in the first distinction: for he does not wish to say that the persons are distinguished by reason alone: but he calls reason relation, because the nature of relation consists in a certain comparison: nor does he intend that the nature of lower things is one only by reason, but that in a certain respect it is one, and simply a certain plurality, because according to the being of nature: therefore he says that it is one by reason.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

Now let us examine, etc. This second part is divided into three chapters. In the first, he shows how it is said, "one is the person of the Father, another of the Son," etc. In the second, he shows how it is said, "the Father is another in person," there, K, Then. In the third, he explains, it is asked, etc., how it is said, "another is the person of the Father," etc., differently than he had done in the first chapter, there, L, In this way also indeed, etc.

However, here arises the question, whether we can say, "there are three substances or three hypostases," just as we say, "three persons"?

And it seems that we cannot: because substance signifies nature, and hypostasis is the same. Likewise, there is one substance of the three: therefore not three.

Solution. It is easy to respond to this according to what has been predetermined: because substance, due to the ambiguity of the name among the Latins, is not received in the plural; however, among the Greeks, it seems that "hypostasis" is in place of "person": and therefore they are called three hypostases; and although sometimes it is found, as by Augustine and Anselm, "three substances," substance is taken from the act of subsisting, and for hypostasis.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

Then note concerning the last part of the distinction which begins there, L, around the end:

From the aforesaid it is gathered, etc., that the three acceptations of person are thus taken, that person signifies a substance subject with a property: and therefore for the sake of the signified the first signification of it is taken, which is essence: for the sake of the supposit or subject the second is taken, which is hypostasis: for the sake of the property the third.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

Then it is asked concerning what Jerome says: There is absolutely no degree in the Trinity, etc.

For this seems false: because it was said above that there is order in the divine? Therefore degree.

And it must be said that it does not follow: because degree implies a distinction by inferior and superior; however, order of nature does not posit that one is prior to another, but that one is from another: and beware lest you concede that there are degrees in the Trinity: because some concede this by positing an extraneous signification.

DISTINCTIO XXVI

Divisio Textus

§ 11. DIVISION OF THE TEXT.

Now concerning the properties of the persons, which frequently, etc. Here begins that part which is concerning the properties distinguishing the persons.

§ 12. And it is divided into three parts. In the first the Master determines concerning all the properties, whether proper or appropriated, whether befitting God from eternity or from time. In the second, he determines concerning the comparison of the persons to one another according to properties of this sort: and this begins below, Dist. XXXII, there, A, Here arises a question deduced from the aforesaid. In the third, he treats of the comparison of the properties to the essence and the person, there, Dist. XXXIII, A, After the above it is necessary to be considered and inquired more intimately, etc.

§ 13. The first of these is further subdivided into three. For there are appropriated properties befitting the persons from eternity: and he treats of these first. There are also appropriated properties befitting God from time: and he treats of these secondly, below, Dist. XXX, there, A, For there are some things which from time of God, etc. There are also properties appropriated to the persons not properly, yet befitting them from eternity: of which he treats thirdly, there, Dist. XXXI, A, Moreover it must be considered, since the three persons are coequal to one another, etc.

§ 14. The first of these is further subdivided into three: in the first of which he determines three personal properties in common. In the second he determines a property of the Father which is of a person, not personal: and this begins in Distinct. XXVIII, there, A, Moreover it must be considered, that not only three, etc. Thirdly, he determines a property of a person, not personal, which is commonly of the Father and of the Son, but not of the Holy Spirit: and this begins, below, Distinct. XXIX, there, A, There is besides another name, noting a multiple relation, etc.

§ 16. Further, the first of these is subdivided into two. In the first he determines concerning the three personal properties exactly as they are signified by proper names. In the second exactly as they are signified by other names, there, Dist. XXVII, A, Here it can be asked, Whether the properties which Hilary posited, etc.

§ 17. Moreover this distinction is divided into two parts: in the first of which he determines concerning the name hypostasis, for the reason that properties are referred to the hypostasis. In the second, he determines concerning the properties, there, B, Now concerning the properties of the persons, etc.

Articulus 1 — What Hypostasis Is

What is a hypostasis?

§ 19. Here it is asked, What is a hypostasis, and whether it is in the divine [persons] by the same ratio as in lower things, and how it relates to the essence, and also how it relates to the person, and whether it remains through the intellect, abstracting personality from the person, or not?

§ 20. To the first one proceeds thus: 1. Here in the Text Jerome says, that a hypostasis, according as we say three hypostases, is a perfect subsisting person: for this is gathered from the Text.

§ 21. 2. This Boethius also seems to say in the book On Two Natures in One Person of Christ thus: Far more significantly calling the individual substance of a rational nature by the name of ὑ όστασις. Therefore according to the use of the Greeks ὑπόστασις is the individual substance of a rational nature: therefore it is the same as a person. But against this: Hypostasis falls into the definition of a person: because the definition of a person is posited above, that it is a hypostasis distinct by a property pertaining to dignity.

§ 22. 3. Moreover it is objected more strongly, Hypostasis speaks either of something absolute in the divine, or something respective. If absolute: therefore it speaks of the essence: but this is not distinguished: therefore hypostasis is not distinguished, which is false: because even according to the Saints and the Masters hypostasis is distinguished by a property. But if it speaks of a relation. Against this: Relation in the divine is distinguishing: therefore hypostasis is distinguishing, not distinct, which again is false, as the Master says below, because the Father does not just express a property, but a hypostasis distinct by a property: therefore it seems that hypostasis can in no way signify anything in the divine.

§ 23. 4. If perhaps you say, that it expresses first substance, whence also it is the same as ὑπόστασις among the Greeks, and first substance among the Latins, as Boethius says. Against this: that first substance is an absolute being: but in no absolute being are the Father and the Son distinguished: therefore in hypostasis they are not distinguished, which is against the Saints.

§ 24. 5. Also, If they were distinguished in some substantial thing, something would be substantially in one which would not be in another, which is a heresy.

§ 25. 6. Also, They are more separated in lower things, which are separated through the whole hypostasis, than those which are separated through a "by which it is" [quo est] only, or through a "that which is" [quod est] only. Pro-bation. Let it be that some are united in a quo est, and not in a quod est: these are separated in part of their essence, and not in the whole. Let it also be that some are united in a quod est, and not in a quo est: these also are not separated except in part of their essence. But those who have separated hypostases, are separated in the whole. Therefore it seems, that if the hypostasis of the Father and of the Son in the divine is another, that this would be a greater otherness, than if they were others in nature alone: and this argument proceeds, if hypostasis speaks of an individual substance: therefore it seems, that the Father and the Son are not distinguished in hypostases, unless hypostasis speaks of a property alone.

§ 27. Solution. It is difficult here to avoid an inconvenience. Yet it can be said, that the name hypostasis can be considered in two ways, namely according to that which the hypostasis is, and according to what is signified by the name. And if it is considered according to that which the hypostasis is, then it is true that it is the same as a person. But if it is considered according to what is signified by the name, then it speaks of a distinct thing not determining the ratio of the distinction: whereas person speaks of a distinct thing by determining the ratio of distinction in common: while Father and Son speak of a distinct thing by determining the ratio of distinction in species.

§ 28. Therefore it must be said to the first, that Jerome here attends to the thing, and not to the ratio of the name.

§ 29. To another it must be said, that Boethius speaks of the use of the name among the Greeks, the ratio of which use was assigned above in the preceding distinction.

§ 30. To that which is objected against it, it must be said that hypostasis falls into the definition of a person: not that it is less according to the thing, but because it expresses less according to the mode of signifying by the name.

§ 31. To another it must be said, that hypostasis expresses a suppositum relatively: and therefore hypostasis is relative and to another: and therefore in hypostases the persons are not one, but rather in essence. And if the reason for this is asked, I say without prejudice, that it is otherwise in the divine than in lower things: because in lower things relation is an accident, and preserves the nature of both: and according to what relation is, it is to another: but according to what is an accident, thus it is in a relative only. However, in the divine, relation is relation, and not an accident, but rather substance: and therefore there is no relative accident there, but the very suppositum of the relative is really relative by itself: and nevertheless the substance is being through itself, in the way in which we call substance a suppositum. But taking substance in this way, namely for a perfect suppositum, which is "who" or "someone": in the divine the persons do not communicate in substance, but are distinguished: and the suppositum in this way is to something, and substance in itself perfect: and these are not repugnant in the divine, as has already been shown. Whence I well concede, that in all things which are simply absolute, the persons agree, and are one: nevertheless from this it does not follow, that in a substance of this sort which is a suppositum, they are one: because I do not see how the heresy of Sabellius does not follow from this.

§ 32. To another it must be said, that this is true, that that which hypostasis expresses, it expresses by the mode of a first substance not determining a distinguishing property from its name: but this substance is the substance of a relative, although it does not express it by the mode of a relative or of a relation: and it is not, according to the mode of understanding, the substance which is common to the three, although it really is that: and therefore that substance is distinguished.

§ 33. And as to what is objected, that the same thing according to the mode of understanding cannot be distinguishing and distinct. It must be said, that this is true: yet the same thing in reality can be distinguishing, and distinct, and not distinct: because essence and person and relation are the same in reality, and relation is distin-guishing, and person distinct, and essence not distinct.

§ 35. To another it must be said, that if the persons were distinguished in some simply absolute substantial thing, then it would be true that they would not be one in all things: but the substantial thing which is a hypostasis, is not simply absolute: for it is related, expressed through the mode of an absolute, and therefore it cannot impede the unity of the persons in essence.

§ 36. To another it must be said, that it is otherwise in lower things than in higher things: because hypostases in lower things differ through matter and form and through composite substance: but hypostases in higher things are distinguished through the mode of existence, as was said above: and that mode of existence is signified as a relation, and as in a relative: and according as it is signified as a relation, thus it causes notions in the divine: but according as it is signified in a relative, thus it is distinctive of hypostases.

§ 37. But if you ask, Whence comes the distinction of hypostases in which there are relations, namely whether they have a distinction other than through relations, it will be determined below in this question.

Articulus 2 — Whether Hypostasis Is In The Divine In The Same Respect As In Lower Things, And Whether It Is More Truly In Lower Than In Higher Things

Whether hypostasis is in the divine by the same ratio as in lower things? and, Whether it is more truly in lower things than in higher things?

§ 39. Secondly it is asked, Whether it is in the divine by the same ratio as in lower things?

§ 40. But it seems that it is not: because in lower things although the distinction of a hypostasis is known by properties which are not found in another, nevertheless it is not caused by them, but rather by this matter and this form, according to what is said, That by which a thing is moved to be one, is matter: but matter and form are principles of substance: and this "something" is a composite substance. But in the divine the distinction of hypostases is not caused thus: because Damascene says that the three persons are the same in all things, except ingeneration, and generation, and procession: and Augustine says, that they are the same in all things, except that which is to another. Therefore distinction in higher things is caused by properties.

§ 41. But against: Every property according to the intellect is subsequent to the subject whose property it is: relations in the divine are properties of hypostases: therefore according to the intellect they follow them: therefore hypostases according to the intellect are distinct before properties. The FIRST is proven from the saying of Boethius in the commentary on Porphyry, who says, that although a property always follows the subject: yet because it is not from things constituting being, it is from the generation of accidents: but it is true, that it is a flowing accident from the principles of the species, and therefore always and everywhere follows the species. But the SECOND is supposed by the saints.

§ 42. Further it is asked, Whether hypostasis is more truly in higher things, or in lower things?

§ 43. It seems, that in lower things: because where the distinction is truer, there the ratio of hypostasis is more truly preserved, provided it is in a rational nature: but the distinction through substance is truer than through property: therefore the ratio of hypostasis is truer in lower things, than in higher things.

§ 44. Against: Ephesians 3:15: From whom all paternity in heaven and on earth is named. Therefore from there the name of hypostasis and person comes here: therefore it is more truly there: and this was shown above in the question concerning the generation of the Son [103].

§ 45. Solution. I say without prejudice, that hypostasis has distinction from one thing in higher things, and from another in lower things, just as the objection proves: because in higher things there is no distinction except in properties, and not in the essence which may be signifiable as a quo est, nor even as a quod est: for the three are one essence, and the three are one God: but it is true, that the three are not one "who", or one "someone": because "who" and "someone" express supposita.

§ 47. But to that which is objected against this, I say that although property according to itself, according to the intellect, is after that whose property it is: nevertheless in the divine it is not so: and this happens because in the divine a property is not only in the ratio of a property, but rather it has in some way the act of a constitutive difference with respect to the person: for the property is constituting the person: I do not say, that it is a difference, but as to this it has an act similar to it, and therefore through the intellect it is prior; and therefore the distinction of hypostasis according to the mode of understanding, is before all generation, as a cause before what is caused. But local motion in this or that which has progressive motion, is after the generation of this or that.

§ 48. To that which is asked further, it is easy to respond: because the thing is more truly in higher things, but the name is more truly preserved in lower things: just as we also said concerning person.

§ 49. To the objection it must be said, that division is not of the ratio of hypostasis, but rather the mode of existence whether in unity of substance, or in diversity, as was said above.

Articulus 3 — How Hypostasis Relates To Essence

How does the hypostasis relate to the essence?

Thirdly it is asked: How does the hypostasis relate to the essence?

It seems, moreover, that the essence is part of its understanding [de intellectu ejus, i.e., included in its concept]:

§ 1. For an essential predicate is part of the understanding of the subject, just as animal is part of the understanding of man, and man is part of the understanding of this man: but when it is said, "this hypostasis is God," or "the divine essence," it is an essential predication and in the nominative case [in recto]: therefore this is part of the understanding of hypostasis.

§ 2. Furthermore, Hypostasis [Ὑπόστασις] is said from that which is 'hypo' [ὑπό], which is 'under', and 'stasis' [στάσις], which is 'position': therefore it is supposed [placed under] to something: but there is the same notion of subject and supposit, insofar as the word 'under' is concerned: therefore hypostasis signifies that which is placed under a common nature: therefore the common nature is in it: therefore it relates to the nature, as that in which the nature is and is understood.

§ 3. Again, the Philosopher says that he who says one thing in a certain way says many things: because he says those things which are in it in act through the intellect: but superior things are in act in inferior things, and inferior things in potency in superior things: since therefore hypostasis is incommunicable, yet the common nature is understood in it in act, and the same notions apply to person: therefore it seems that both hypostasis and person signify the common [nature] in this mode.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Every inferior thing in which its superior is actually understood, relates to its superior by addition, and is of greater composition than it: hypostasis and person do not relate by addition to a superior: therefore they are not of greater composition than it: therefore they do not relate to the essence as an incommunicable inferior.

§ 2. Again, if hypostasis added something: either this would be the same as that to which it is added, or diverse. If the same: then it would not be added, because the same is not added to itself. If diverse: then it would necessarily introduce composition, which is a heresy, because nothing composite is in God. If perchance you say, as is commonly said, that what is added is the same in reality [re], but diverse in the mode of understanding, On the contrary: To this mode of understanding, either something responds in reality, or nothing. If nothing: then it is empty and vain, as Boethius says. But if something responds in reality, then the same thing follows as before. If you say that it is not empty and vain, because it is not referred to existence [ad esse]: just as the Philosopher says that there is no falsehood on the part of those abstracting, because it is not referred to existence: and thus he says that it is not a falsehood when demonstrating a line to be one-foot long, which is not one-foot long. This is nothing: for this is not the understanding of the Philosopher: nor indeed did any Philosopher ever understand this, that the understanding of a thing which can in no way be referred to a thing, is not empty and vain: for although the demonstration by which I demonstrate that a straight line touches a sphere, cannot be referred to the existence of a quantified thing which is wooden or leaden: yet I refer it to the reality which is the nature of quantity: and although I might demonstrate concerning a non-one-foot line that it is one-foot long, yet I refer it to the reality which is the line understood through that which I have drawn in the continuum: but this mode of understanding can in no way be referred to the reality of which it is. If perchance you say, as some say, that this is the mode of understanding through the name [per nomen]: this is nothing: because it is not asked here concerning the common signification of a name, but rather concerning the divine reality which is signified in the name.

If perchance on account of this it is said that it adds nothing to the essence. ON THE CONTRARY: Whatever things are altogether the same, whatever is said of the one, is also said of the other: but of the essence it is said that it is one in reality: therefore the same will be said of the hypostasis.

Solution. It must be said without prejudice, that the essence is signified in the hypostasis, as a common nature is signified and predicated in its inferior: not that in divine things there is universal and particular, but because there is communicability there, as the reasons introduced first prove.

But as to this which is asked, Whether it adds anything? It seems to me that it does not add in reality, but in the mode of understanding, which mode of understanding is really signified, when it is said, "the hypostasis is distinct," or "the hypostasis is incommunicable." Hence it must be said that although it cannot be referred back [retorqueri] to reality in every mode, yet it is referred back to reality in some mode. And that this may be understood, the opinion of the ancient Doctors concerning this must be noted, because that something is added to another is known in two modes, namely because it makes a composition, or because it belongs to it what does not belong to another; and in inferior things it is in both modes: for this and this make a composition, and it belongs to this [particular thing] to be incommunicable and distinct in individuating features, which does not belong to man in himself: but in divine things there is only the other [the second mode], because the added thing does not induce composition, for the reason that it is really the same, but it induces a diverse supposition, as the ancients say, and well, as it seems to me: because with one supposed, the other is not supposed, for the reason that something belongs to one which does not [belong] to the other: for it belongs to the hypostasis to be distinguished, and to generate, and to be numerable by such a number as is in divine things: none of which belongs to the essence. And the author of this invention was Praepositivus. Through this, therefore, the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 4 — In What Way Hypostasis Relates To Person

How does the hypostasis relate to the person?

Fourthly it is asked: How does the hypostasis relate to the person?

§ 1. It seems, moreover, that it is as the distinguishable to the distinct: because

§ 1. The definition posited above includes distinction in itself, when it is said: "A person is an individual substance of a rational nature"

However, hypostasis does not include in itself a made distinction.

1. Furthermore, the Master often says that properties are in hypostases: but they are not in them except as in distinct things: therefore, hypostases without properties are distinguishable.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. In divine things, nothing is in potentiality: therefore, there the distinguishable and the distinguished are the same: therefore, hypostasis and person are the same.

1. Likewise, Damascene says that in all things they are the same except for unbegottenness, begottenness, and procession: therefore, whatever is before this is of the unity of essence: therefore, if hypostasis is before this, it is of the unity of essence: but this is false: therefore, hypostasis has the understanding of property: therefore, it is the same as person.

Solution. It must be said that in divine things nothing is in potentiality as the objection proves: and therefore hypostasis according to reality is person: and I further concede well that with hypostasis supposed, person is supposed: because whatever is fitting to person is fitting to hypostasis, namely to be distinguished, to be begotten, to beget, to proceed, and all such things.

However, it is true that it is signified differently by the name hypostasis, and differently by the name person. And to understand this, it must be noted that in lower things there are four, namely the thing of nature, subject, supposit, individual, to which also in rational nature a fifth is added which is person: and we understand the thing of nature as composed of matter and form, or what is and by which it is, in nature and under common nature, and this is this something in nature. However, supposit adds to the thing of nature a relation to common nature, to which it is supposed as incommunicable. Subject, however, as the Philosopher says, is a being complete in itself, an occasion for another to exist in it: and this has a relation to accident, although it is not in the understanding of its name the habit of accident: and this is called by Aristotle substance, and by the Greeks ὑπόστασις. However, individual is having individuating accidents. Person, however, in rational nature signifies incommunicable according to mode, except only the understanding of composition, which is not in divine things. However, four are found posited by the Saints, namely the thing of nature which Hilary posits, and supposit, and hypostasis, and person: for individual and singular are not properly in divine things. And the thing of nature will be in divine things here, who, or someone in divine nature: however, supposit by relation to common nature: hypostasis, however, by relation to property: but person is hypostasis distinguished by property.

To what is objected first, it must be said that it does not follow from this that they are distinguishable: but it follows from this that they imply in the name a relation of the distinct to the distinguisher, which relation the name person does not imply, but rather it implies the distinct itself insofar as it is distinct: just as when I say, this heaven is heaven, the term this heaven implies the relation of matter to form, as the Philosopher says: yet it does not follow that that matter was ever without form according to nature.

To what is objected against, it has already been answered.

To the other it must be said, that (as has been said) the distinguished in divine things in my judgment according to understanding is after the distinguisher: therefore that objection does not proceed: and yet it does not have in itself the understanding of property, but rather of relation to the distinguishing property.

Articulus 5 — Whether By The Intellect Hypostasis Remains With The Property Subtracted

Whether by the intellect the hypostasis remains with the property subtracted?

Whether by the intellect the hypostasis remains with the property subtracted?

Fifthly, it is asked, Whether by the intellect the hypostasis remains with the property subtracted?

It seems that it does: 1. For the Father has from the same that he is someone, and that he is Father: or not from the same. If from the same: but the Son also is someone: therefore he has from the same as the Father: for someone and someone in that which is of this kind, do not have difference: but the Father has by paternity that he is someone: therefore also the Son, which is false: therefore not from the same he has: therefore separated by the intellect paternity from the Father, he is still Father someone, and Son someone and Holy Spirit similarly: but he is not someone, unless hypostasis: therefore hypostases remain abstracted from personality.

1. Likewise, Everything that falls in the definition of another, can remain with that separated from that which adds it in whose definition it falls: hypostasis falls in the definition of person: therefore with that separated which adds person, hypostasis still remains: but it adds only property: therefore with the property separated, hypostasis still remains.
2. Likewise, When I say distinguishing and distinguished, I say two: but of two any one is separable from the other, which is not in the reason of it: but distinguishing is not in the reason of the distinguished according to that which it is, although perhaps it is in the reason of it according to that which it is distinguished: therefore when hypostasis says distinguished according to that which it is, it seems by the intellect to remain if properties are separated.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Persons do not have number except made by relations: therefore with relations removed there remains only unity: therefore not hypostasis, because hypostasis is numbered in the divine. The first is proved by Boethius, who says that essence contains unity, but only relation multiplies trinity. And by Anselm in the book on the Procession of the Holy Spirit, who says that three in all things there are the same, where the relation of opposition does not distinguish: and therefore the conclusion follows.

1. Likewise, No intellect distinguishes anything in any nature, unless it has some principle of diversity, or division, or distinction: but in the divine there is no principle of distinction except the relation of opposition: therefore with that principle ceasing, nothing is distinguished in the divine. If perhaps you say that hypostasis remains distinct by itself from another: this is the most open heresy of Arius: because then there would be three substances divided by that which they are substances, and by this there would be three gods. But if you say that hypostasis remains, but cannot be numbered, but remains in the reason of some one. Against: That one, either it will be the same in number in all persons, or different. If the same: then three would be one hypostasis, which is false. If different: therefore property essentially divides it, as division is made in inferiors, which is false.

Solution. Speaking without prejudice I say, that personal property cannot be abstracted from the person, so that something remains: for neither nature remains, nor hypostasis: and this is thus proved: Abstraction can only be in two ways, namely of the universal from the particular, or of form from the matter in which it is, or from that in which it is as in matter. If we speak of abstraction in the first way, then the common is abstracted from the incommunicable, and not conversely: because the abstracted is simpler than that from which abstraction is made, and also something cannot be abstracted from another in which it is only by potentiality, but in which it is by act: whence since superiors are in inferiors in act, and are simpler than them, they are abstracted from them, and not conversely: and therefore with individuation or singularity abstracted from this man, nothing remains of this man. And in this way abstraction of the common nature from divine persons cannot be made: because nothing is simpler than nature than person, nor is it universal to that, but as the same, unless perhaps you wish to speak broadly of abstraction, as you say it is abstracted: because it can be understood without persons, as Jews and Pagans understand it. But if we speak of abstraction of form from the subject in which it is, again this cannot be done in the divine: because properties in the divine do not have a subject or suppositum before them, but rather they are the suppositum, as paternity and Father, and so of others: although indeed with the suppositum Father paternity is supposed, yet property properly speaking is nothing in the Father, so that the "in" notes diversity of property to the substance of the same. But this is true, that something belongs to property, which does not to hypostasis, namely to distinguish: and something belongs to hypostasis which does not belong to property, namely to be distinguished: whence properties according to which they are signified by themselves, are not signified as things, but rather as reasons of persons: persons however according to which they are signified in themselves as things: for paternity in the divine is rather the reason of the Father than a thing: and I say this, as they are taken by abstracting words: therefore when by the intellect (as the objection proves) property is before hypostasis, as distinguishing it, and its being is to be distinguished, and nothing else, it is necessary that with property removed, nothing remains of hypostasis. But it is not so in inferiors: because being in inferior hypostases is not being of the distinguished only, rather it is being of a certain nature and substance subsisting in itself, not needing property for it to be, but for it to be known. But it is not so in the divine: because if hypostasis had from something to be hypostasis, and from another to be distinguished, it would be necessary that in being hypostasis by substance absolutely said one of the persons would be distinguished from another, as in inferiors: and this was the heresy of Arius. Whence it is necessary to say, that from the same it has to be hypostasis and to be distinguished.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that from the same the Father has that he is Father, and that he is someone. And if you say, that the Son is someone, I say that the "someone" is not common to them by one intention, but rather by the proportion of one relation to diverse: because the Father is someone by the relation of hypostasis to his property, and the Son is someone by the relation of his hypostasis to his property: and these relations make a common proportion, or proportionality, which is still a lesser community.

To the other it must be said, that hypostasis falls in the intellect of person, not as diverse in reality, as has been said, but as the same not in the same way signified by the name: and therefore that objection does not proceed.

To the other it must be said, that when it is said, distinguishing and distinguished, according to the reason of understanding two are said, yet one is not separable from the other because the distinguished does not have being of the distinguished except from the distinguishing: and this has already been said: because this is its being according to hypostasis, although it is not its being according to nature: because in nature it is not numbered, nor is hypostasis numerable: whence hypostasis as hypostasis is in the divine, and being of the distinguished, although in the name it imports a relation to the distinguishing, and not distinction.

But if you object, that with paternity not understood, still the Father is someone, because unbegotten: this is nothing because it will be shown below, that unbegottenness is not a personal property, but rather of the person: and he is not someone in any nature except from the distinguishing of personality, that is, by making personality. Whence the Father would then be unbegotten, as the divine nature is unbegotten, and not from a property distinguishing from another person of the same nature, but rather as an attribute of his nature distinguishing from other things which are not with him in the same essence.

The reasons however brought forward in the contrary, seem to me necessary: although some in this article say otherwise, as is clear to one inspecting their writings.

Divisio Textus

Now concerning the properties of the persons, let us see, etc. This part in which the Master discusses the properties is divided into four parts:

In the first part, the Master shows that three personal properties belong to the three persons. In the second part, he shows that those properties do not belong accidentally, there, C, Wherefore it must be known, not entirely. In the third part, the Master shows that, etc., according to which sense filiation and procession or gift are said to be personal properties of the Son and the Holy Spirit, there, D, Here it is asked, How it is said to be proper to the begotten God, etc. In the fourth, he determines certain doubts concerning this, there G, Here it can be asked, Whether the Father, or the Son.

From this, the sentence is clear, because the Letter will be explained in the disputation.

Articulus 6 — Whether There Is Relation In The Divine

Whether in the divine there is relation?

Here, however, three things are to be inquired, the first of which is about relations. The second, about notion. The third, about property.

Concerning relation, two doubts arise here before the Letter, namely whether there is relation in the divine? And secondly, whether it alone multiplies the Trinity?

To the FIRST it is proceeded thus: 1. Relation either signifies some being, or only a notion. If it signifies some being in the divine: either it is the same as substance, and nothing more: or it is something more. If it is only substance: then to be relative is the same as to be substance: therefore, to the distinction of the relative follows the distinction of substance, which is the heresy of Arius. But if it is something more, and in that more the persons are distinguished: then the person is of greater composition than substance, which again is heresy. But if relation is only a being in notion: then they differ only according to notion, which are distinguished by relation. Divine persons are distinguished only by relation. Therefore, they are not distinguished except according to notion, which is the heresy of Sabellius.

1. Likewise, there are two things in relation if the thing is posited to be. One is what is an accident: and the other is what is respect. Either, therefore, with respect to neither, or with respect to one. If with respect to both remains in the divine, or with respect to neither, or with respect to one. If with respect to both: but every accident requires a subject: therefore, it is necessary to posit a subject to be in the divine, which was disproved above. If with respect to neither: then there will be in the divine only a notion, and from this follows the heresy of Sabellius as before. If with respect to one or with respect to accident, or with respect to respect. If with respect to accident, it follows again that there is composition in the divine. If with respect to respect: but in this way (as Boethius says) it is assisting: therefore, in the divine there are relations assisting extrinsically: and thus relations will not be God: therefore, it seems, that relations are not in the divine.
2. Likewise, in lower things we see, that the simplest things are distinguished and denominated by themselves: just as unity is one by itself, and differs from a point, since therefore in infinity any person is simpler than unity, it seems that it refers to another by itself, and not by relation.
3. Likewise, although relations are not properly terms of motion, yet they are not born except through motion, for there is no father except he who has begotten from his substance: in God however, nor in persons is there any motion: therefore, it seems, that neither are there relations.
4. Likewise, God is more distant from a creature, than one person from another: but by itself without real relation it is distinguished from a creature: therefore, it seems, that also by itself one person is distinguished from another.
5. Likewise, in lower things it is sometimes found, that the relative according to its substance is relative. For a creature is referred to the Creator: either by itself, or by a relation which is not itself. If in the first way: the proposition is held. If in the second way: then with the relation separated from the substance of the creature, it is no longer referred to the Creator, which seems false: therefore in the substance itself there is still a relation, either the same with the substance, or another: and thus it will go on to infinity: therefore, it is necessary, that according to substance it is referred.

1. Likewise, that relation by which a creature is referred to the Creator, is a creature: therefore it is also referred: either by the same relation which it is, or another: and thus it proceeds to infinity, as before: therefore something is referred substantially in lower things: therefore much more this is fitting for divine persons because of greater simplicity.

2. Likewise, matter by itself (as some say) is referred to form. For if you say, that by means of potency it is referred: that potency, either is matter, or form, or composite, or substance, or accident. It is clear that it is not matter: because thus matter would be of matter. Nor form because thus form would be before the first form. Nor composite, as is clear by itself: because the first composite is from first matter and first form. Nor substance, as is clear by itself: because it would be form, or matter, or composite: and this is disproved as before. Nor accident: because matter is not susceptible of accident, except through substantial form, as in many places is proven in Philosophy: for the advent of accident is the motion of the subject to the subject: and therefore what is moved according to accident, must be actually being: therefore matter itself by itself is potency to form: otherwise also form would not be immediate to matter, and thus from first matter and first form there would not be truly one: all of which being inconvenient, it seems that matter by itself is referred to form: therefore much more person is referred to person because of greater simplicity.

But against this it is opposed in many ways Thus:

1. The Father has relation to the Son either by itself or by something else according to the mode of understanding. If by something else: then I have the proposition: because this will be relation in the Father. If by itself only: but when it is said, the Father breathes the Holy Spirit, there also the Father by itself has relation to the Holy Spirit by the same notion: therefore in the same way the Father generates the Son, and breathes the Holy Spirit: therefore the Holy Spirit is the Son: because they are the same according to notion, which are in the same way from the same: but this is inconvenient: therefore it is necessary to posit relations also beyond the understanding of persons in the divine.

1. Furthermore, Generation is in the divine, and only spiration. Either therefore these are referred to the hypostasis by the same notion, or by different. If by the same: therefore generation is spiration: because those acts are the same, supply, at least, which are referred by the same notion to the agent: but this is false: therefore they are referred by different notions to the Father: therefore it is necessary to posit different relations corresponding to these acts.
2. Likewise, as Richard says, persons are distinguished by the property of origin, and by property alone, and by property and origin: in God however they are distinguished by the property of origin: the property of origin is that which determines the mode of existence: but that is nothing but the relation of origin: therefore in the divine it is necessary to posit relations, as it seems.

Solution. I say relations are in the divine, as the last reasons prove, and now I speak of relations which are persons, and in persons according to the mode of understanding: because although speaking really relation is nothing in the person in the divine, yet according to the mode of understanding it is distinguishing in the distinct, and the person being supposed, relation is not supposed: and thus we posit in one person multiple relations.

To that therefore which is first objected, it must be said that relation signifies a being of respect which is to another, and that is the same with substance: yet it is not supposed, the substance being supposed: and therefore to its distinction does not follow the distinction of substance: for what in lower things makes diversity of thing, this in the divine makes diversity of supposition. And there is an instance to the argument: the person is entirely the same with nature: but there are multiple persons: therefore multiple natures: for the theological category is changed, and thus there occurs the fallacy of figure of speech, or even of accident: because although they are the same, yet not everything that is fitting to one is fitting to the other.

To the other it must be said, that relation in the divine does not preserve the nature of accident, as the Master proves in the following part of this reading: and the reason for this was said above: because it is not taken up in the divine by reason of genus, but by reason of the difference which it adds to generation: nor does it follow that it is assisting: because when in lower things relation has two, namely the nature of accident, and what is to another: in the divine it is turned into substance with respect to the nature of accident, like all other things which name accident, and are predicated of God: and therefore relation which is in lower things is in the relative, and makes it be referred to another, in the divine it is relative according to substance, and makes itself be referred to another: and therefore it is not extrinsically assisting only.

To the other it must be said, that the simplest things are distinguished by essential or substantial distinction: but relation does not imply such a distinction in the divine, but rather three are one in essence. Hence if we say a point differs from a point in that one is a beginning, and the other an end, and unity from unity of the same genus in the simplest, we will still posit distinction according to relations. So it is in the divine: because, as will be clear in the following article, nothing is composed from what is added to it by respect of relation, but it still remains simple as before, provided only the respect of relation is added to it.

To the other it must be said, that relations are otherwise in the divine, and otherwise in lower things: in the divine indeed they are the relations of modes of existence, but in lower things they are caused by modes of existence: and this is because relations are distinguishing, and according to understanding before rela~ tives: and this was clear in the preceding question about hypostasis: but still in the following distinction there will be a question about this: and therefore it is not substantial to relation that it is constituted from motion, but it happens to this relation or that.

To the other it must be said, that greater difference causes greater distinction: and therefore God is essentially distinguished from creatures: but from the supposit of the same divine nature the supposit of the same nature cannot be distinguished, except by the smallest distinction: and this is not essential, because that is the greatest, but rather the distinction of relation: and therefore by relation it is necessary to be distinguished.

To the other it must be said, that I well concede, that something is referred to another by itself, like the Creator and the created relation itself: but I do not concede this about substance, or another creature. And to the object it must be said, that if the relation of the creature is separated from the substance of the creature itself, it will no longer be a creature, nor will it be referred to another: and this is not inconvenient according to understanding: for Boethius says in the book on Hebdomads, that those things which are not separated in act, are well separated in understanding: for it is well understood that a stone is not created. And if you object, that first not understood, the second is not understood: it must be said that this is true of the first as first and the second as second: and it is not true of the second according to what it is: for this is well intelligible without dependence on the first.

To the other it must be said, that I do not believe this to be true, that matter by itself according to what it is, is referred to form: because I do not say potency which is privation, is entirely the same with matter: but I say it is the order of matter to form. And if you say: Either it is matter , or form, etc. It must be said, that this does not hold: because potency is a being in a certain respect, and not simply: hence just as motion, which is the exit from potency to act, is defined by potency to act, because it is existing in potency and in act: so I say, that potency has something of the notion of matter if it is referred to that of which it is, and something of form if it is referred to that which it is. And therefore also it does not follow, that form is not immediately united to matter: because potency is not reduced except to the being of matter and form. Although all these things were conceded, still it does not follow that person by itself would be referred to another person, for the reason already stated: because by themselves some things can be essentially distinguished, but not personally in the same nature existing: because they have less distinction, than essential,

Articulus 7 — Whether Relation Alone Multiplies The Trinity

Whether relation alone multiplies the Trinity?

Secondly, it is asked, whether relation alone multiplies the Trinity?

It seems that it does not: because
1. The divine persons are of the highest perfection: however, relation among beings is not a being of the highest perfection, but rather less than any other being having being: therefore it seems that relation ought not to distinguish the Trinity.

1. Likewise, a being whose existence is towards another is posterior to a being whose existence is towards itself. Proposition. Given that nothing is towards itself, nothing will be towards another: but it is not converted: therefore a being in itself is prior to a being towards another: but the first being ought to distinguish the first of all, if it is distinguished by any being: since therefore the persons are in the first, it seems that they ought to be distinguished by an absolute being.
2. Likewise, substance is not caused by a being which is reduced to it as to a subject, but rather it causes it: but relation in divine things is reduced to the person as that of which it is: therefore it does not distinguish it, nor does it make it according to the mode of understanding in personal being.

Likewise, if relation multiplies the Trinity, as Boethius says, it multiplies it by the being which it has: however, it has only a respective being: therefore it gives it only a respective being: but by this it is not substantially: therefore the divine persons will not be substantially subsisting, which is the heresy of Sabellius: therefore it seems that the Trinity is not distinguished by relation alone.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

1. Of beings, one is substance, another is accident: and substance is truer than accident.

Likewise, of accidents, one is an absolute being, and another is a respective being: and the respective is less than the absolute: because it is born and removed without any change of the subject, as is clear from Boethius: for a boy who is born, through the year according to the diversity of his growth, will make many likenesses, disparities, equalities, inequalities, which are in no way changed according to that kind of change: therefore relation has the least of being: therefore its multiplication most fittingly suits the multiplication of the most simple: but this is God: therefore among all categories nothing so fittingly multiplies the Trinity as relation.

1. Likewise, Avicenna in the first Philosophy says that the addition of relation makes nothing composite.
2. Likewise, let there be something simple, as God is, it has the relation of the first to the second, and the relation of cause, and many other relations.
3. Likewise, this is clear in unity and point: which although they are simple, yet there are diverse reasons of relations in them: therefore relation makes nothing composite: therefore its multiplication most fittingly suits the most simple.

1. Likewise, among relations some are simpler than others: for some are immediately relative, as those which are according to the mode of origin, as cause is referred to the caused, and conversely: but not so the similar and equal: because those are founded upon an absolute being, as upon quality: and in the same way different are dissimilar and unequal: therefore since relations of origin are founded upon nothing except upon the existing itself, they are simpler than others: therefore they most fittingly suit the divine persons because of the highest simplicity.

And this must be conceded, that in the number of genera nothing so suits as relation, and in the species of relation nothing so suits as the relation of origin, by which one is from another, and by this it is distinguished from it.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that whatever is in divine things is most perfect: for when we refer the predications of inferiors to the divine, we reject all imperfections: and therefore that relation is an imperfect being is not referred to the superiors, but rather that which is not varying in the simplest essence, and it is most perfect inasmuch as it is in divine things, although it is imperfect in itself.

To the other it must be said, that this is true, where being towards another is as the nature of an accident: but this is not in divine things, as was previously held: rather relation in that part takes the predication of substance.

To the other it must be said, that it must be conceded what Augustine says, that in all things the Father and the Son are one, except in that which is towards another: yet that being towards another encompasses that which is to be a true suppositum, and to be a true person: because these in divine things are not repugnant.

Articulus 8 — What Notion Is, And In What It Differs From Relation

What is a notion, and in what does it differ from a relation?

Then it is asked about the notion, namely, what is a notion, and in what does it differ from a relation?

1. Boethius says, however, that a notion is a simple concept of the mind: but such is only a universal purified from matter and the appendages of matter: therefore it seems that a notion is the same as a universal.
2. Likewise, the Master wishes that a notion is that by which a person is known: but by relation a person is known: therefore it seems that relation is a notion.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. A relative is that whose being is to have another: therefore it is not definitively a relation of one person: but a notion is given to one person: therefore relation is not a notion.

1. Likewise, there is some notion which is not a relation, such as "unbegotten," which seems to sound a negation: therefore it seems that not every notion is a relation in the divine.
2. Likewise, in lower things the notion of a thing is not abstracted from that by which the thing is what it is: for that which is the formal principle of being a thing is also the principle of understanding it: therefore it seems that notions in the divine ought more to be taken from the part of essence than from the part of persons.

Solution. It must be said that relation and notion differ according to the intentions of the names: because, as the objection proves, a notion is that by which a thing is known: but relation is that by which it is referred to another. However, in the divine it is not taken entirely according to the definition of Boethius: because in the divine there is no universal. And furthermore, the notion of persons is not taken from the common of persons, but rather from the proper: and this...

§ 1. ...this occurs because what is common is not a principle for understanding what is proper. Hence, since the persons, under the ratio of persons, are known by their own proper features, it was necessary to adopt notions that cause them to be known on the part of proper features, and not on the part of what is common. Through this, the solution to the first and the last objection is evident.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that relation and notion are sometimes the same in the supposit, yet according to the intentions of the names they are not the same; and therefore, according to supposits, they are not interchangeable, because ingeneration [innascibility] does not signify a relation except speaking broadly, just as Augustine says below, that a negation is in the same genus as its affirmation. Through this, the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 9 — What The True Properties Are In The Divine, And How They Differ From Relations And Notions

What are truly properties in the divine things, and how do they differ from relations and notions?

§ 3. Next, it is inquired concerning property.

§ 4. 1. For the Philosopher says that a property is what belongs to all, to it alone, and always. But here, a property does not belong to all, because what belongs to the Father does not belong to the Son; therefore, it seems that those things assigned here are not truly properties.

§ 5. 2. Furthermore, Boethius says that a property is among those things consequent to the species. But above it was proved, in the question concerning hypostasis, that the properties of the persons are, through the intellect, prior to the hypostases, even though in reality they are always simultaneous. Therefore, it seems that they are not properties, but rather substantial forms.

§ 6. 3. Furthermore, it seems that not all of them are properties, because there are some that belong to many, such as principle or active spiration, which belongs to the Father and the Son; therefore, that is more common than proper.

§ 7. Next it is inquired: In what do properties differ from relations and notions?

§ 8. And it seems that they differ in nothing. 1. For in divine things, nothing is posited by the Doctors except three things, namely notion, person, and essence; therefore, everything that is in divine things is reduced to one of these. But properties cannot be reduced to the persons, nor to the essence; therefore, they are reduced to notions. Therefore, it seems that a property and a notion are the same thing.

§ 9. 2. Also, there are certain things found in the persons which do not constitute the persons themselves, just as innascibility does not make the Father to be the Father. Since, therefore, properties constitute the number of the persons, it seems that things of this kind are not properties.

§ 10. Solution. It must be said that the understanding of a property is to belong to one alone, and always. And therefore, whatever is found in a person that belongs to one alone and always, this is a property of the person. From this it is evident that none of the properties is essential, because what is essential is common, and belongs to all.

§ 11. To the first, therefore, it must be said that the Philosopher assigns property to the species; and because a species is said of many and is in many, therefore it is necessary that this property belongs to all the supposits of the species, and to the species alone, and always, because it always follows the essential principles of the species. And just as essential things do not abandon the thing of which they are essential, neither does that which immediately follows from them. But the Saints assign property to the persons, and not to the common nature; and therefore it is not necessary that these proper things belong to all.

§ 12. To the next it must be said that although the Philosopher in the Topics seems to say that a property is sometimes from things prior by nature, nevertheless in truth the essence of a property is always from things posterior. For if it is said, "man is an animal capable of learning," that which is prior by nature there than man contributes more to the goodness of the property than to its essence, because Boethius says that although a property always accompanies the subject everywhere, nevertheless, because it is not among those things constituting it, it is of the genus of accidents. But property is not taken in this way in divine things, and there is a dissimilarity in two respects. First, because by the Philosophers a property is assigned to the common nature, which is the species, and not to the incommunicable hypostasis; whereas in divine things, a property is assigned to the incommunicable, and not to the common nature. Another dissimilarity is that a property in lower things does not constitute that of which it is a property, but rather is constituted by it; whereas in divine things, according to the ratio of understanding, it is the reverse. And therefore, the property of the Creator and of the creature are not entirely of the same ratio.

§ 13. To the next it must be said that we do not posit substantial forms in divine things for two reasons. One of which is because a form composes, but a property does not make an essential composition, because it is not of the essence; hence, the name of property transferred to divine things does not indicate essential composition. Another reason is because a substantial form is the form of a part, which is matter, whereas property is the name of a perfect thing. And therefore the name of property is more fitting for divine things than the name of form.

§ 14. To the next it must be said that properties differ from relation according to name, and sometimes also according to supposit. According to name, because a relation is toward another, whereas a property only respects that of which it is a property. According to supposit, because what is common to many can well be a relation, but it cannot be a property properly speaking; just as common spiration is a relation of the Father and the Son to the Holy Spirit, yet it is not a property. And similarly, innascibility is a property, and not a relation, except by taking relation broadly, as will be determined below.

§ 15. To the next it must be said that there is a difference in properties, because some are called "personal" by Praepositinus, and some "properties of a person" only. Personal properties are those by which, according to the ratio of understanding, persons are constituted and denominated, such as paternity, filiation, and passive spiration. But properties of a person are those which are found in persons in such a way that they belong to one alone, such as innascibility in the Father.

§ 16. And from these things it is evident that a personal property and a property of a person relate as superior and inferior, because every personal property is also a property of a person, but not conversely. But a property of a person and a relation relate as intersecting terms [exceeding and exceeded], because a certain relation is a property of a person, such as paternity, and a certain one is not, such as common spiration; and conversely, a certain property of a person is also a relation, such as filiation, and a certain one is not, such as innascibility.

§ 17. Furthermore it is evident that a personal property and a relation relate as inferior and superior, because every personal property is a relation, but not conversely; for common spiration is a relation, yet not a personal property.

§ 18. Also, furthermore it is evident that both the property of a person and a personal property relate to a notion as inferior and superior, because every property, whether of a person or personal, is a notion; but not conversely, because common spiration is a notion, and not a property. But a relation relates to a notion as an inferior to its superior, because every relation is a notion, and not conversely, for the reason that innascibility is a notion and not a relation, unless taking relation broadly, as has been said.

§ 19. Also, furthermore from this it is evident, according to the more common opinion which is defended by almost everyone today, that there are five notions, namely: innascibility, paternity, filiation, common active spiration, and passive spiration. There are, however, four relations: paternity, filiation, common spiration, and passive spiration. There are also four properties of a person: innascibility, paternity, filiation, and passive spiration. But there are only three personal properties, namely: paternity, filiation, and passive spiration.

Articulus 10 — Whether In The Divine There Are Finite Or Infinite Relations, And All Are Assisting

Whether in the divine things there are finite or infinite relations, and whether they are all assistant?

§ 20. Next it is inquired concerning that which he says in the Text, ch. B: It is the proper of the Father alone, not because he himself is not born, etc.

§ 21. 1. For this seems false, because below he will say that innascibility is a property of the Father on the grounds that it belongs to the Father alone; therefore, the property of the Father is that which belongs to the Father alone; therefore, it is the property of the Father because he himself is not born; and he denies this here.

§ 22. 2. Also, from what he says here, it seems to be accepted that there are three properties, and no more. And if you say that this is understood of personal properties only, which the Master determines exclusively here and in the following distinction, it at least seems that relations are infinite, thus: Whatever is generated without any mutation of the person and accidentally from the habitude of another to it, is multiplied according to those habitudes in which a relation is thus generated. Therefore, it is multiplied according to the habitudes of others to it. The first premise is posited by Boethius in the book On the Trinity, and by Avicenna in the First Philosophy. Thence I proceed further: the habitudes of others to any of the beings are infinite, and they come and go continuously; therefore, there are infinite relations in any being; therefore, much more so in God, who holds Himself more immediately to any being than any created being to another.

§ 23. 3. Also, it seems that there were also infinite relations in God from eternity. For the habitude of one to another makes a relation; but one holds Himself to another according to every attribute from eternity, which is why they are called equal, similar, the same, and the like. Therefore, since such attributes are infinite, such habitudes seem to be infinite, and thus from eternity there were many relations.

§ 24. 4. Also, from eternity there were in God the rationes [reasons/accounts/ideas] of all things, which cannot equally be called rationes except through a respect to things to be created. Therefore, those rationes were from eternity in Him and were infinite. Therefore, there are not only three.

§ 25. 5. If you say that those do not constitute the persons, but these do. On the contrary: A respect of greater diversity is toward things diverse in hypostasis and nature, than a respect to things distinct in hypostasis only and not in nature. But the first respect does not distinguish the persons; therefore, neither does the second.

§ 26. Furthermore, it seems that relations of this kind existing from eternity in God were assistant, and were not God. And these are the objections of Gilbert de la Porrée and Simon of Tournai.

§ 27. 1. For either the Father is God by that by which He is the Father, or by another. If by the same: but He is God by the essence, by which the Son is also God; therefore the Son is the Father. Or thus: He is Father by paternity; therefore by paternity He is God; and since the Son is God, the Son is God by paternity, which is incongruous. If by another: then there is something in God which is not God, but another; and then I have the proposition, that the relation assists God, and is nothing in Him.

§ 28. 2. Also, in the Posterior Analytics, this is posited as immediate: Substance is not quantity; therefore, by a similar reasoning, this as well: Substance is not relation, because the most general genus in both, for its own sake and not for another's, is removed from the first most general genus. Therefore, relations even in divine things predicate nothing in the divine things.

§ 29. 3. Also, Boethius expressly says this, that a relation predicates nothing in that of which it is a relation, but it assists it, and says how it holds itself to another. Therefore, it seems that relations assist, and are not God.

§ 30. 4. Also, Richard of St. Victor says that relation is not so much a genus of being, as a being sprinkled in every genus of beings; therefore, it seems that it is more a ratio than any nature, because nothing in reality is sprinkled in every genus of being.

§ 31. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Augustine said above that if God is not great by that greatness which He Himself is, but by participation, then His greatness is greater than He is. Therefore, by a similar reasoning, if the Father is not Father by that paternity which He Himself is, His paternity is greater than He is.

§ 32. 2. Also, it is objected more strongly: Porretanus posits that his relation is either some being in divine things, or nothing. If it is something: then it must be a substance, or an accident. If an accident, it will be in some subject, and that will be a composite varied by the accident; all of which are absurdly understood of God. If it is a substance, then I have the proposition: that it does not assist, but the relative itself is the substance. If, however, it is nothing: then since the persons are distinguished by nothing except solely by that which is toward another, as Augustine and the Catholic faith say, the persons are distinguished by nothing. But what is distinguished by nothing, is entirely nothing; therefore the persons are entirely nothing but names alone, which is the heresy of Sabellius.

§ 33. 3. Also, whatever is distinguished only by an assistant from without, that is not distinguished from another by itself. The divine persons are distinguished by a relation assisting only from without to their hypostases, and by themselves; and this again is close to the heresy of Sabellius.

§ 34. 4. Also, that which is assistant to God from eternity, is either a created being, or uncreated. If created: then it was created from eternity, which is a contradiction of the intellect, because the created has an opposite ratio to the eternal. If uncreated: therefore it is God, or two gods, or even created things, or there were infinite ones, which is false.

§ 35. But if you say, as some moderns say, that relation is a mean between being and non-being, for the reason that it is the ratio of a thing, and not a thing; nor is it even the ratio of a thing absolutely, but it is the ratio of the comparison of a thing to another thing. On the contrary: This ratio either posits something in the thing outside the mind of the one reasoning, or nothing. If it posits something: then I have the proposition, because then it will be a genus of being, and not solely a ratio. If nothing: then its ratio is empty and vain. And what is more difficult, from this it follows that the divine persons, which are distinguished by nothing except by that which is toward another, differ only by reason alone, and are not really distinguished. And because Sabellius said this, he was condemned as a heretic.

§ 36. 5. Furthermore, in the Preface the Church sings: And in the persons property, and in the essence unity, and in majesty equality is to be adored. If therefore the property in the persons is to be adored as God, it will not be an assistant adhering only extrinsically.

§ 37. Solution. It must be said that the opinion of the followers of Porretanus is both false and heretical, and was condemned by Pope Alexander at the Council of Reims. Hence we say neither that infinite relations existed from eternity, nor that relations assist, nor that relations are nothing. But we confess that four relations exist from eternity, and that these are God; and that relations even in lower things are something, and exist in [them], and are present [to them]; whereas in higher things they neither are present to nor inhere in them, properly speaking, but are the relative things themselves, as was determined above.

§ 38. To the first, therefore, it must be said that there are certain relations really existing in both relatives in lower things, such as those which are generated by the mutation of both, like all relations of origin. And these relations express the truest mutual respect toward each other, and they always demand diverse hypostases in which they reside, like father and son; for there is never a father in lower things except by his own mutation, nor ever a son by the mutation of another but by his own. But certain others are indeed always said convertibly and toward each other, but they are not necessarily generated from the mutation of both, but of one only; and those are the ones that are not simple, but are founded upon another being of quantity, or quality, or something else of this sort, such as similar, equal, right, left, and the like. And there are some relatives which are neither said by the relation of both convertibly, nor are generated by the mutation of both, such as knowledge and the knowable, and one and many, as Dionysius and the Philosopher say, and like Creator and creature. For it does not follow that if knowledge is toward another, the knowable must also be toward another according to that which it is; nor does it follow that if the knower is mutated, the knowable is mutated. Hence, because relation spoken of in the first mode has the truest and solely most simple being of relation, that relation, with mutation removed from the relatives, is transsumed [applied] into divine things, as we said before. And if you object to me that in lower things every relation is founded in another being, since it is an accident, and the being of an accident is to inhere—I answer that I do not understand it to be founded in another being in this way, but rather to be founded in another as in a cause, not in a subject. Just as the Philosopher says that one in substance makes the same, and one in quantity makes equal, and one in quality makes similar, even though both (namely equality and quantity) are founded in one subject which is substance. However, in this way nothing is subordinated in which there is paternity, or filiation, or any relation of origin, because origin is according to the substance of the hypostasis; and therefore such a relation has an immediate order to the originating or originated hypostasis.

§ 39. It must be said, therefore, to the first, that Master Hugh seeks nothing but personal properties only, which are relations, although they are not the sole ones.

§ 40. To the next it must be said that the relations which really exist in the relative according to origin are not infinite, as has already been shown. But the relations that do not arise from origin, but from the mutation of another, in my judgment are not real relations in both, but in one only, and in the other there is the ratio of correspect and not the reality [res] of relation. And this ratio is not empty, because it is founded in the habitude of a real respect in the other of the relatives.

§ 41. To the next it must be said that the habitude of one to another according to attributes is not a habitude properly, but a unity of distinct things. And that does not import another real relation, except of distinct things under that one; and therefore, since the distinguishing relation is only fourfold, there will be no more than four relations from eternity. Similarly, equal and similar, by reason of that in which there is similitude and equality, do not signify a relation, but the ratio of equals and similars; and then they import the same four relations by distinguishing, as was said above.

§ 42. To the next it must be said that the respect of the eternal rationes is a ratio, and not a reality diverse from God. And if you ask: In what was that ratio? I say that ratio in three ways is spoken of, namely: in the aptitude of the thing about which it is (and thus it is in potency); and in the reason of the created reasoner; and in the reason of the Creator. In the first and last way, a ratio could be from eternity, because it posits nothing other than God; but in the middle way, no. Hence, from this nothing can be proved.

§ 43. To the next it must be said that in some respect, there is a greater distinction in a relation respecting a diverse being in nature and hypostasis, than to one distinct in hypostasis only; and in some respect, it is not true. For if the greater distinction is that which is founded upon a greater (that is, more distinct) thing, thus it is true; but the relation does not make it so, but rather becomes so from it. If, however, it is called a greater distinction from a more distinguishing relation, it is not true, because nothing distinguishes so much as that which is according to origin; for concerning that, Anselm says that neither does the intellect grasp, nor reason permit, that opposite respects could be in the same supposit.

§ 44. To the next it must be said that by that reality He is Father by which He is God, but not by that ratio and mode of understanding. This mode of understanding in the divine things is not nothing, but rather is really signifiable, since with deity posited [supposed], paternity is not posited; as when, speaking really, we say: "paternity distinguishes, and deity does not distinguish"; and then the objection does not proceed, as is self-evident to anyone.

§ 45. To the next it must be said that, as was held above, God is great without quantity, yet not related without relation; for according to something relation can be transferred into divine predication, whereas quantity cannot be transferred. And the reason for this was stated there, and let it be sought there.

§ 46. To the next it must be said that Boethius intends that it predicates nothing absolute insofar as it is a relation, because in this way it is a certain habitude to another. However, according to that which it is, it predicates something in the relative in lower things, and is the relative itself in higher things.

§ 47. To the next it must be said that Richard does not speak according to how it is a certain nature divided against other beings, but according to its supposit and cause. For it is caused in some way by all genera of beings; but nevertheless, it is a certain nature divided against every being.

Articulus 11 — How And With Respect To What The Notions In The Divine Differ, And Whether The Several Properties Which Are In One Person Differ In That Person

How and with respect to what do notions differ in the divine things? And, do multiple properties which are in one person differ in that person?

§ 48. Next it is inquired concerning what he says there, ch. B: He briefly assigned these three properties of the three persons, etc.

§ 49. For from this it seems that notions differ according to properties.

§ 50. And it is inquired: By what difference? 1. For in divine things there is no difference, except what is according to origin, that one is from another. But such a difference is not in the notions, because one is not from another; for paternity never produces filiation.

§ 51. 2. Furthermore, this is false: "Paternity generates," but this is true: "Paternity distinguishes." Therefore, it seems that they do not differ in the divine things.

§ 52. Furthermore it is inquired, which is more difficult: Whether multiple properties which are in one person differ in that person?

§ 53. 1. It seems so, because since they are only in that person, if they had no difference in that person, they would simply have no difference at all.

§ 54. 2. Furthermore, this is false: "Innascibility in the Father is paternity in the Father." Therefore, since a removal or negation of one from the other is not made except by reason of diversity, it seems that those properties in the person in which they are, have diversity.

§ 55. 3. Also, whatever has number in something, it is necessary that it has distinction in it. But we say that three properties, or relations, or notions are in the Father, and two notions are in the Son; therefore, in the Father and the Son those notions are distinguished.

§ 56. But on the contrary: As the persons hold themselves to the essence, so do the notions to the person. But the persons are not distinguished in the essence, but are one; therefore the notions are not distinguished in the person, but are one, as it seems.

§ 57. Solution. It must be said that the notions are distinguished by themselves; for the principles by which things are distinguished, are distinguished from each other by themselves, just as man and donkey differ by specific differences, and those differences themselves do not differ by other differences, but by themselves.

§ 58. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that distinction according to origin is twofold, namely, to that which is from an origin (or is the origin), and to that which is the ratio of the origin. And in this second way, distinction according to origin is referred back to the distinction of notions; and through this the solution to the second is also evident.

§ 59. To that which is further inquired, it must be said that notions are only in the persons, and they have distinction in them.

§ 60. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the persons are not so united in the essence that they are one person, but rather they are one essence; and therefore they are called one [neuter], not one [masculine]. So also the notions are not so united in the person that they are made one notion; but they are made one person, which nevertheless is not composed of them, just as the essence is not composed of the persons. But it is true that notions are not called one on account of the unity of the person in which they are, because the word one [unum] in the neuter gender refers back to the essence. Hence, the notions are not one on account of the person, but on account of the simplicity of the essence. From the person, however, they do not have distinction, nor even unity; because they are distinguished by themselves, and insofar as they are referred to notional acts.

Whether, with the person posited, the notion is posited?

§ 61. Next it is inquired concerning that which he says, there, ch. B: They denote relations which are not accidental to God, but are in the persons themselves from eternity, etc.

§ 62. 1. For it seems that from this it follows that with the person posited [supposed], the notion is posited: for whatever things are entirely the same in reality, with one posited, the other is posited.

§ 63. 2. Furthermore he says this, that the notion is the substance, but the notion is more immediately ordered to the hypostasis than to the essence; therefore it seems that this notion in the person is proper and immediate. But the person generates; therefore the notion does as well; and thus it seems that with the person posited, the notion is posited.

§ 64. 3. Also, faith is not as determined in the number of notions as in the number of persons, and those who say that notions in the divine things are nothing besides the persons are not condemned; therefore it seems that according to the Catholic faith, notions are nothing besides the persons; therefore, with the person posited, the notion is posited.

§ 65. But on the contrary: Whatever things hold themselves in such a way that with one posited, the rest is posited, in those things whatever is attributed to one is attributed to the other. But it is not so concerning notion and person: because the notion distinguishes and is not distinguished; whereas the person is distinguished and does not distinguish. Therefore, with the person posited, the notion is not posited.

§ 66. We concede this, saying to the first that although person and notion do not differ in reality, nevertheless they differ in the mode of understanding; which mode is really signified when it is said, "the notion distinguishes," and "the person is distinguished." Hence, for one to be posited when the other is posited, identity of reality does not suffice; but it is necessary in addition that this be present: that whatever belongs to one, belongs to the other.

§ 67. To the next it must be said that although the notion is immediate to the person, and the person to the substance, such that there is no intermediate predicate by which the persons participate in the notion or the essence, nevertheless this does not suffice for the one to be posited when the other is posited. But it is necessary that the one be immediate to the act and attribute of the other; just as generating is the act of the person, and this does not belong to the notion or the essence. And therefore when one proceeds thus: "the notion is the person; the person generates; therefore the notion generates," the fallacy of accident occurs, for the reason that an extraneous element is assumed, which does not belong [to it] according to the ratio of understanding.

§ 68. To the next it must be said that although some say notions do not exist, they refer this to the respect according to which they are abstractly signified. But if they were to say that nothing distinguishes the divine persons, this would not be Catholic. And therefore it is necessary that notions be posited in some way, either implicitly or explicitly; and then not everything that belongs to the notion belongs to the person; and thus, with one posited, the rest is not posited.

Articulus 13 — Whether There Are Only Three Notions In The Divine

Whether there are only three notions in the divine things?

§ 69. Next it is inquired concerning that which he says: It is also shown to be a property of the Father, that He has a Son, etc.

§ 70. For here occurs the question concerning the number of notions. For above it was proved that they are finite, and they are in the persons, and they are not assistant. But it seems that there are only three, and this is the common objection:

§ 71. 1. For every notion is some one of the three persons; but the persons are not multiplied except by three; therefore neither are the notions.

§ 72. 2. Also, one person as a person cannot be known except in one way, just as it itself only has being in one way. Since, therefore, a notion is for the cognition of the person, it seems that there are no more than three notions.

§ 73. 3. Also, the property of origin in the divine things makes the persons. But each thing is known in the same way in which it is constituted in being according to the ratio of understanding; therefore, it is known by the property of origin. But the property of origin in the divine things is only threefold, namely: he who is not from another; he from whom another is by generation; and he who is from another by spiration. Therefore, it seems that there are no more than three.

§ 74. But it seems that there are six, because: 4. Anselm says so in the book On the Procession of the Holy Spirit: Furthermore, there are six differences of the Father and the Son arising from these names, namely: to have a father, not to have a father, to have a son, not to have a son, to have the Holy Spirit proceeding from Himself, not to have the Holy Spirit proceeding from Himself. Since, therefore, six are enumerated here, and besides there is innascibility which is not touched upon here, it seems that there are seven notions.

§ 75. 5. Also, we have one notion [for Him] who is not from another; therefore we will have another [for Him] who is from another; and [for Him] from whom another is; and [for Him] from whom none is; and [for Him] who is from another, from whom another is. Therefore it seems there are at least six notions.

§ 76. 6. Also, it seems that there are no more than three: because innascibility is in one, but it seems that paternity and filiation are one: for the road from Thebes to

[...like the road to] Athens, which is from Athens to Thebes: therefore, by a similar reasoning, the comparison of the Father to the Son is the same in essence as that of the Son to the Father: but 'paternity' names the comparison of the Father to the Son, and 'filiation' conversely: therefore paternity and filiation are the same. By the same reasoning, active and passive spiration are the same: therefore there are only three notions.

§ 7. Again, it seems that there are only two: because a negation makes nothing known: since therefore innascibility is a negation, it seems that it is not a notion: and paternity and filiation and active and passive spiration are two (as has already been proved), it seems that there are only two.

Solution. To this it is easy to reply, by supposing that three things are required for this itself to be a notion of a person. For 'person' is a name pertaining to dignity, as was determined above: therefore it is not known except by a property pertaining to dignity. I say therefore that it must pertain to dignity, and express that dignity specifically, and be a principle of knowing the person: since therefore 'not to be from another' does not belong except to one alone, it is clear that what it states specifically, it also states as a dignity: because 'not to be from another' is a dignity, and it states a formal reason of knowing: and therefore innascibility is a notion and a dignity of the Father, because in the order of nature two persons cannot 'not be from another'. But 'to be from another' does not determine specifically, and in general, it does not state a dignity: and therefore it is not a notion but something consequent upon a notion. Likewise 'that from which another is', although it states or seems to state a certain dignity, nevertheless because it does not determine specifically, it does not define the notion of a dignity: and therefore it is not a notion. But 'to be from another' by generation is of a dignity, because it imports an equality and communication of nature, and likewise 'to be from another' by spiration: and therefore those declare notions. Likewise, 'that from which another is' by generation, and 'that from which another is' by spiration specify the principle of knowing, and therefore they also import a dignity. Therefore the notions are five only, namely: 'he who is not from another', which states innascibility; 'that from which another is' by generation; and 'that from which another is' by spiration; and 'he who is from another' by generation; and 'he who is from another' by spiration.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that although any notion is of some one of the three persons, it does not however follow that there are only three: because they do not take their number from the persons, but rather from themselves, according as by them the persons are divided differently in personal being, and their dignities are known.

To the next it must be said that the property of origin is manifold, according to the relation of before and after, and it is not merely according to the number of those things which are originated by those properties.

To the next it must be said that Anselm calls the differences 'distinctions of persons', according to those things which commonly or properly follow the persons: just as 'not having a son' is a certain common thing, from which no dignity is known: hence he does not intend there to prove the number of notions.

To the next it must be said that 'not to be from another' states a dignity and does so specifically, whereas 'to be from another' does not state it in this way: and therefore it is not similar.

To the next it must be said that some concede that argument. But it must be said otherwise, that just as in an action there is that which is an accident, and according to this it is in the agent: and there is that which is the action, and according to this it is from the agent in the patient: so it is in a relation: hence paternity is in the Father, and according to what is toward the Son, so it is still in the Father with respect to the Son, and conversely of filiation: and therefore a relation according to what it is, is only in the relative which it denominates, although by respect its correlative is co-understood: and therefore a relation according to what it is, is not in the middle. Hence the road from Athens to Thebes is not similar: because that, according to what it is, is in the middle: but it is similar concerning the comparison of Thebes to Athens, and conversely: because the termini of the road, although they are compared to one another, nevertheless differ according to what they are: and the same goes for paternity and filiation. For active and passive procession the reasoning is completely the same: and therefore those relations differ.

To the next it must be said that it is not absolutely a negation, but posits something in the Father, as will be clear below. Or let it be said that negations make something known, as was proved above. But the first solution is truer.

Articulus 14 — Whether It Is Lawful In Divine Matters Without Sin To Hold Different Opinions And To Speak About The Notions, Since Some Posit More, Others Fewer

Whether it is permitted in divine matters to hold different opinions and speak differently concerning the notions without sin, since some posit more, some fewer? And, whether a false opinion makes a heretic?

Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at D: Here it is asked how 'proper to the born God' is said, etc.

Here two things must be determined, namely: how did anyone dare to posit notions in divine matters, especially since it seems that Doctors contradict one another in a matter of faith? And secondly, what is required for gratuitous filiation?

To the first one proceeds thus: § 1. One says there is no property or notion, another posits infinite ones, another five, another three: but some of these are contradictorily opposed, namely that there is no notion, and that there is some notion: therefore one of them will be false: but a lie, as Augustine says, which is in the doctrine of faith, is the greatest of all lies: therefore it seems that such diversity of opinions cannot be without mortal sin.

§ 2. Again, it was held above that nowhere does one err more dangerously than in the matter of the Trinity: since therefore this error is in the matter of the Trinity, it seems to be the most dangerous.

§ 3. If you say that Scripture has not determined it: and therefore there can be opinions concerning this. It is asked, what is called Scripture? If the canon of the Bible is called Scripture: just as it does not determine five notions, so too it does not determine that there are three persons: therefore there could also be diverse opinions concerning this: which is false: because one who asserted that there are not three persons would be reputed a heretic. But if the canon of the Fathers is called Scripture, it seems plainly false: because below we shall have that Augustine names and posits the notions.

To this it must be said that on account of the difficulty of the matter, those holding diverse opinions here not out of presumption, but out of reasoning, are excused: because a false opinion does not make a heretic, but rather the presumption of assertion and defense, as the Master says below.

To the first therefore it must be said that they do not contradict in reality when saying that there is no notion, and saying that there are some notions: because those who say there is none, posit that the persons are distinguished by themselves, and thus implicitly they posit the notions, but not distinct from the persons except according to intention: because it is impossible to posit the distinguishing and the distinguished to be the same by intention. But those who posit the notions do not say they differ in reality from the persons, but by supposition and mode of understanding. Nor is it a lie: because they do not speak with the intention of deceiving, but rather opine that which they believe to be true. But he who says what is not true and thinks it to be true, does not lie, as Augustine says.

To the next it must be said that the number of notions refers to the number of persons: and therefore it does not have a special article of the Creed, and therefore there is not as much danger there as in another matter which is expressly determined by the Fathers.

To the next it must be said that although Augustine names notions and properties, he nevertheless does not show how they are distinguished from the persons: and he does not determine whether they are as notions, or only in what is known by them, or whether they are to be posited in themselves: and therefore there can be opinions concerning that.

Articulus 15 — What Is Required For Gratuitous Filiation

What is required for gratuitous filiation?

What is required for gratuitous filiation?

Next it is asked, what is required for gratuitous filiation in general, which the Master here seems to touch upon as threefold, namely by making or creation, and by re-creation, and by external generation, etc.

But because many things have been said about this elsewhere, let them be sought there: for there it was disputed concerning the filiation of adoption, and filiation by nature and the grace of union, and by making. This alone is to be noted here, that although other things are made according to the exemplar which they have in the divine mind, nevertheless God is not properly called their father, nor are they sons: because a son is one who has the image of the maker in another way, like man, and Angel.

But those things which are said in the following part by the Master are plain enough through those things which were treated concerning the Holy Spirit.

Here it can be asked whether the properties which Hilary, etc.

Here begins that part in which the Master determines concerning the same three personal properties which have been discussed, insofar as they are signified by other names. And it is divided into four parts: in the first of which the Master touches upon other words in which the same properties are signified under another mode of signifying. In the second he touches upon how these properties distinguish the persons inseparably, there, at D, For those properties, each to each, to each, etc. In the third he touches upon how certain persons are signified by other names with the same relations, especially the person of the Son, there, at E, Here it is not to be passed over, that just as Father and Son, etc. In the fourth he touches upon how, by essential names posited for personal ones, the same persons and properties are also expressed, there, at H, Here it is asked, when it is said God from God, etc.

In the first of these there are three chapters: in the first of which he raises a question. In the second he resolves it, there, at B, To which without prejudice, etc. In the third he assigns the reason for the solution, there, at C, Yet it does not seem to us to be entirely the same, etc.

DISTINCTIO XXVII

Divisio Textus

Articulus 1 — Whether It Is The Same To Have Begotten The Son And To Be Father

Whether it is the same to have begotten the Son, and to be the Father?

A question arises here first concerning the Master's intention: Whether it is the same to have begotten the Son, and to be the Father?

§ 1. And the Master introduces one argument in the Text that it is not the same: because if it were the same, whatever one applies to, the other would apply to: but it applies to the divine essence to be the Father: therefore it applies to the divine essence to have begotten the Son, which is false.

§ 2. Against this it can be objected thus: It is not the same if baptism is performed in the name of the begetter and the begotten, and in the name of the Father and the Son: for if it is performed in the name of the begetter and the begotten and the gift, it is not reputed as baptism: but if it is performed in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, it is reputed as baptism: therefore it seems that they do not signify the same thing.

§ 3. Moreover, the Master says in the third chapter of this part that when 'Father' is said, a hypostasis is signified with a property (otherwise, paternity): but when 'begot' is said, nothing but the property is signified: therefore the same thing is not signified, as it seems.

§ 1. But on the contrary it seems that this is false: 'the essence is the Father', just as this: 'the essence begot': for if the essence is the Father, it is the Father only of the Son: therefore this is true: 'the essence is the Father of the Son': therefore it follows further that the essence begot the Son, and that the essence is said relatively, and that it is distinguished: all of which were denied above: therefore it seems that the Master's proof is worth nothing.

§ 2. Again, if those properties are other than these, then by the same reasoning they are also other when it is said: 'The Father is distinguished from the Son', and 'is related to the Son', and 'produces the Son': therefore there would be very many relations: therefore it seems that they are entirely the same.

Solution. It must be said to this that they are the same in reality under another mode of signifying. But this mode of signifying is diverse on account of three things: the first and principal of which is what the Master touches upon in the Text, that 'Father' and 'Son' and 'Holy Spirit' are names of hypostases and properties: but 'to be begotten' and 'to beget' are names of properties only. The second reason is: because since 'father' signifies the property concretively, and 'to beget' concretively, the mode of concretion is diverse: for when 'white' is said, the subject with whiteness is signified, because that is the substance of the name: but when 'to become white' is said, an inhering accident without a subject is signified, and this is because an act has in itself a substance, as that from which it is: and although it is in some substance according as it is an accident, yet because it is signified as an act, a substance of this kind in which it is, is not signified in it: and therefore it is signified as not enclosing a subject and substance in its significate. The third is: because 'to beget' and the like signify properties in general, and not in species: for it does not follow if something begets something that it is its father: nor if something is begotten that it is its son, as we have determined from Augustine. Having held these, the initially introduced arguments are to be conceded.

To that however which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that when it is said 'the essence is the Father', the locution is twofold from the fact that 'Father' can be taken adjectivally, and thus it is false, and in this sense it is disproved: or substantively, and in this sense it is conceded by the Master, that is: the essence is he who is the Father.

To the next it must be said that multiplication cannot be made beyond the three personal properties: because verbs of this kind, 'to distinguish', and 'to refer', and the like, signify rather that which follows from the properties than the properties themselves, and do not specify them. Therefore, since a genus adds nothing above the species, and is not counted along with it, verbs of this kind are not called special notions: however, note that the followers of Gilbert of Poitiers, positing infinite notions, conceded those objections.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Father Is Father Because He Begot, Or He Begot Because He Is Father, And Whether The Properties Determine The Persons, And Whence The Determination Comes

Whether the Father is Father because he begot, or begot because he is Father? And, whether the properties determine the persons, and whence does the determined come?

Next it is asked concerning what he says in the second chapter B, He is always Father, because he always begot the Son, etc.

For it seems from this that he is Father because he begot: therefore according to the rationale of understanding, to beget is prior to being the Father.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Only a distinct person begets: for there are no acts except of distinct particulars: therefore the begetter is a distinct person: but he is not distinguished except by paternity: therefore the Father is prior to generation according to the mode of understanding: and thus he is not Father because he begot: but rather he begot because he is Father.

§ 2. Again, let us separate by intellect the property from the persons: either therefore something remains, or nothing. If nothing: then I have the proposition, that the properties make the persons: and thus he begot because he is Father. If something: either that is the essence alone, or something else. If the essence alone: then the arriving property determines the essence, and is posited concerning it, which was disproved above, and will again be disproved below. If something else: either this is distinct in the persons, or not. If distinct: then in the divine there is something distinct before the distinguishing principle according to reason: because nothing distinguishes except the property, and we have posited that not to be. If that is not distinct: then it is the essence: because nothing is indistinct in the persons except the essence, and from that it follows, as before, that the notions are posited concerning the essence, and that they determine it, which is false.

§ 3. Again, in the second part of this distinction the Master says that the properties determine the persons: and it is asked, whence comes the determined? For we clearly see whence the undetermined in the persons comes, namely the essence: and we clearly see whence the determining principle comes, because this is the property. But the third, which is the determined, since that cannot remain if the property is removed, it is asked, whence does it come? For it cannot be said that this, according to the mode of understanding, is the property: because then the determining and the determined would be the same according to the intellect, which cannot be.

§ 4. Again, some object: Either he begets because he is Father, or because he is God, or because he is God the Father, or because he is innascible, or because he is the spirative principle: for it cannot be considered in more ways. If he begot because he is God: then since the Son is God, he too would beget, which is false. If he begot because he is Father: this is against Anselm in the book On the Procession of the Holy Spirit: because he says that it is ridiculous to say that on account of the relation of the Father the whole divine essence is in the Son. Hence Anselm says in the same place that he begets because he is God: and he spirates because he is God. If because he is God the Father: this cannot be, since the grace of neither belongs to him, as has already been proved. Again, in the Text it seems to be said that he is rather God the Father because he begets, than conversely that he begets because he is God the Father. But if because he is innascible: this does not seem to be so: because thus he is not compared to the Son, but rather to a principle before himself by privation. But if because he is the spirative principle: then he would rather spirate than beget. Moreover, since the Son is the same principle, the Son would also beget. Therefore it seems that it is in no way appropriate for him to beget.

Solution. It must be said without prejudice, just as we also said above in the question concerning hypostasis, that in divine matters it is otherwise than in lower ones: because in lower ones relations are only relations, and they are born from mutations. In divine matters, however, they are not only relations, but also properties, and they even have a certain act similar to a constitutive difference in that they constitute the persons: and therefore in higher matters relations are prior to notional acts according to the intellect, as the objections prove: and the saying of Augustine which he mentions here, must be referred to the relations according as they are only relations: because it is true that the Father is not referred to the Son insofar as he is a person constituted in himself, but rather because he begot him.

To this which is asked further: If the notions or properties are separated, whether something remains, or nothing? It must be said, in my judgment, that nothing remains except perhaps the essence which is common in the persons, not as determined by the properties.

And to what is further asked: Whence comes that which is distinguished, since it does not remain? It must be said, as above, that the distinguishing principle, according as it is distinguishing, is only in the distinct: and the distinct, according as it is distinct, is only in the distinguishing principle. In divine matters, however, properties are not taken as certain beings, but only according to the act of distinguishing: nor hypostases as certain beings absolutely divided by substance, but only as divided by relation (ad aliquid): which nevertheless in divine matters is not an accident according to reality, but substantial: and therefore when one is posited, both are posited: and when one is removed, both are removed: and thus the solution to all that is asked about this is clear.

To that which is further asked, whether he begets because he is Father, etc. I say that he begets because he is God the Father: and when Anselm says that he begets because he is God, he touches only on part of the cause: because the power of begetting is from the nature in the Father, but the act and property belongs to the Father.

To that which is objected to the contrary, the solution is already clear: because it has been shown that because he is Father, he begets: and not because he begets, is he Father. There are some however who say that he begets because he is innascible, because thus he seeks a companion to whom he may communicate his delights. But they, saving their peace, do not understand the question: because when it is asked whether because he is Father, or conversely, it is asked about the formal reason of the begetter as he is a begetter, and not why he begets.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the text

Next it is asked about what the Master says in the second part of this distinction, there, For those properties, each to each, etc.

For this seems false: because the incommunicable does not have to be determined, but rather the common and universal: therefore it seems that since nothing is common except the essence, that it has to be distinguished and determined.

To this it must be said that there is a common as universal, and this has to be determined and distinguished according as it is contracted to this or to that: there is also a common by the whole reality, that is, which as a whole belongs to each of its supposits, and this does not have to be determined, but is rather the hypostasis, which is not common except by reason, as was proved above.

Articulus 3 — What Word Is

What is the word?

Next it is asked concerning the third part of the distinction, there, at E, Here it is not to be passed over, etc., where he says that 'word', and 'image', and 'begetter', and the like, declare the same hypostases and notions which 'Father' and 'Son' and 'Holy Spirit' declare. But because enough has been said about 'begetter' above, and there will be a treatise on 'image' below, let five things be asked here concerning the word, namely: What is the word? And, what things are appropriate to the word? What is it for the highest spirit to speak? Whether it is an essential word just as it is sometimes 'to speak'? And, to the similitude of what word in lower things is it said?

CONCERNING THE FIRST one proceeds thus: § 1. Augustine says in Book IX of On the Trinity: The Word which we now intend to discern and intimate, is knowledge with love: but knowledge is not said personally: therefore it seems that neither is the word: this is against what is determined here.

§ 2. Again, Augustine, in the book of Eighty-Three Questions says that in Greek Logos signifies both word and reason in Latin: but in this place, In the beginning was the Word, we better interpret it so that it signifies not only respect to the Father, but also to those things which were made by the Word as operative power. Since therefore operative power is essential, and not only personal, it seems that the word is not always the Son.

§ 3. Moreover, a word is called the expression of a concept in the heart of the speaker, that is, of the one intuiting by the intellect: and this is not always loved knowledge, as Augustine says in the same place, in Book IX of On the Trinity: therefore it seems that it is badly defined by loved knowledge. For Augustine says that we disapprove of the knowledge of some things.

§ 4. Again, a word is about the thing of which it is, and is declarative of it: since therefore the speaker manifests himself, it does not seem to declare a personal distinction in the same way: and thus it is not appropriate to the Son.

§ 5. Again, why is this, that the born Son is expressed in the canon by 'Word': since 'Son' speaks more of a distinction and personal perfection in a common nature, than 'Word'?

Solution. It must be said that Augustine defines the word according as it is manifested in an image in which a word proceeds from the mind, just as the Son from the Father, as is said in the Psalms: My heart has uttered a good word. And because equality is not perfect, as Augustine says, except when the mind speaks itself, and then it is always knowledge with love: because it speaks itself as great as it is: and it loves itself as great as it is: and therefore then the word is always with love.

To the first therefore it must be said that knowledge is said in two ways, namely as art or wisdom, and this essentially applies to the three: but it is appropriated to the Son. Knowledge is also said of the speaker, as proceeding from the speaker which is as manifesting the speaker, and not as possessed by the speaker himself as a form of a knowable thing: and this is said personally, because that is a word which is said relatively: and Augustine intends this one.

To the next it must be said that Augustine in the book of Eighty-Three Questions takes the word according as it notes an effect in a creature, and consequently signifies essentially and personally, or the essence in the person: and therefore it is not to the point: because Augustine intends that in the Gospel it signifies in both ways, namely personally when it is said, In the beginning was the Word: but essentially by connoting a notion, when it is said, All things were made through him, namely the Word, and without him was made nothing that was made.

To the next the solution is clear through what was said before.

To the next it must be said that a speaker does not manifest himself except in that it proceeds from him: and the procession itself speaks of a personal distinction. For in this, as Damascene says, the word of God abounds from our word, just as the spirit of God from our spirit.

To the next it must be responded through the word of Chrysostom in the second homily on John, where he says thus: The Evangelist called him the Word: for because he ought to teach that this Word is the only-begotten Son of God: so that no one might suppose a passible generation, anticipating by the appellation of 'Word', he destroys every pernicious suspicion, showing both that he is the Son from him and impassibly. From this it is gathered that the Saints wish the word to be that which immaterially proceeds from the speaker, completely manifesting the speaker, in that it has in itself neither more nor less than the speaker.

Articulus 4 — What Are The Things That The Saints Attribute To The Word, And With Respect To What They Are Taken

What are the things which are attributed to the word by the Saints, and according to what are they taken?

Secondly it is asked, what things are appropriate to the word?

And let four authorities be taken on this, namely of Jerome in the Helmeted Prologue, where he says thus: Logos in Greek signifies many things: for it is word, and reason, and computation, and the cause of each thing, through which individual things are which subsist: all of which we rightly understand in Christ.

Again, Damascene says that the Word of God is subsisting in itself, elective, and operative, and omnipotent.

But Basil says thus: To the Son of God are attributed sense, wisdom, virtue, light, word: sense, by which all things are known; wisdom, by which all things are disposed: virtue, by which all things are perfected: light, by which all things are declared: word, by which all things are enunciated.

Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names, says that God is called word: because he is the bestower of wisdom and intellect, as having the causes of all things in himself, as taking and walking through all things, as more simple than every simplicity. Since therefore there are so many diversities of the Saints concerning the attributes of the Son, which all belong to him according as he is the word, and not according as he is the Son: it is asked, according to what are they taken?

§ 1. Again, since the Son is called Word by that by which he is the Son, as will be clear below, it is asked whether he himself can be called many words, just as 'many reasons' and 'many ideas' are well said?

§ 2. Moreover, since reason is said here as the reason of a thing, and not the reason of a ratiocinating act, because that is not appropriate to God, insofar as it is composite, proceeding from one to another, according to what mode does computation belong to him? For that seems to consist in a certain finite actual multiplication, and thus it is repugnant to the simplicity of the word, as it seems.

§ 3. Moreover, that it is the cause of each thing, this does not seem to be appropriated to the Son, but rather to the Father to whom power is attributed, since every cause sounds more of power than of word.

§ 4. Again, those things which Damascene says do not seem to be proper, but essential to all the persons, or able to belong to none: for to subsist in itself, and to be operative, and omnipotent, do not belong more to one than to another, and thus they are not proper to the Son. But to be elective, since there is no election except of the unknown, as the same Damascene says, does not seem to belong to anyone: for nothing is elected except about which there was first inquiry and counsel: and counsel is had about the doubtful or unknown.

§ 5. In the same way all the things which Dionysius says seem to belong equally to all.

§ 1. Solution. It must be said that the statement of Jerome explains the multiplicity of the name according to Greek usage, although all can be turned back to the Son: and this is true, that they revert to him, according as he himself is the Word. And there is a twofold consideration of the Son insofar as he is the Word, namely according as it is taken notionally only: or according as it is taken notionally, connoting the essence through a respect to creatures. In the first way, he is called Word. In the second way, it can be taken in three ways, namely in the rationale of an end which is an exemplary form, and thus it is called the rationale of a thing (ratio rei). In the second way, in the rationale of a formal exemplar, and thus it is called computation (supputatio) on account of the respect of exemplars to the number of the proportion of the existence of things. In the third way, according to an efficient cause through an exemplary form, and thus it is called the cause through which things subsist. Nor is this unfitting: because an exemplar ad extra has these three things in itself, namely that it is an end, and that it is an exemplar, and that it is operative, insofar as it is of the practical intellect: and the exemplar of a chest holds itself thus in the artisan who makes the chest.

§ 2. Damascene, however, as it seems to me, does not intend to assign the property of the Word insofar as he is the Word, but those things which show in him the perfection of the person in comparison to our word, which is imperfect, and an accident of the intellect. But this perfection is in two things, namely in substance, and in power. In substance he touches upon it, when he says "subsisting through himself," just as it belongs to a person to subsist. For Boethius says that subsistence is that which is in itself and through itself, and needs nothing [else] for this, that it be. In power, however, in two ways, namely natural, and that which is for a work ad extra. The natural is expressed through the fact that he calls it "elective," as if potent from the proper election of the will at its pleasure. Ad extra, however, the power is either indeterminately complete before the work, and thus he is omnipotent: or in the work, and thus he is operative. And I well concede that this belongs to any divine person, as showing personal perfection in it.

§ 3. But this which Basil says is turned back to the Son according as he is the Word connoting a respect to creatures, and an effect in creatures: and therefore it does not belong from eternity to the Son, except according to habit, and not according to act. Therefore it is to be noted that the word belongs to the practical intellect, according to how it is taken by Basil: and thus it has something of cognition, and something of work. But according as it has something of cognition, that is in two ways, namely absolutely, or ordered to another. If to another: then it is the word by which an enunciation is made: because this operates in us. If absolutely: either it is by the mode of a principle for cognizing, and thus it is the light, by which all things are declared to us. Or by the mode of the cognized: and this is in two ways, namely simply, or in order to God: and in the first way it is sense, in the second way wisdom: because, as he himself says, wisdom consists in order. But if it has work: then it is ultimate power which is supreme.

§ 4. The division of Dionysius, however, is taken entirely according as the word connotes a respect to creatures, and connotes an effect in them. But this effect is attended to in two ways, namely according to the proper and immediate act of the word: or according to that of which or concerning which it is the word: for the proper act of the word is to give wisdom and intellect through interior hearing, just as Psalm 84:9 says: I will hear what the Lord God will speak in me: and thus he is the bestower of wisdom and intellect. But if it is taken by comparison to the thing concerning which it is: this happens in three ways, namely as in a cause, as in an effect, as in a property of the first cause ruling the effect. In the first way, it is having the exemplary causes of all things in itself. In the second way, seeing all things. In the third way, it is simpler than all simplicity: because, as the Philosopher says, it rules all things by penetrating, except that it be commingled with them.

§ 5. To the next it must be said, that the Son cannot be called multiple words: because a word is properly the word of the speaker as principally of a principle: but a rationale (ratio) has its intention not from him from whom it is, but rather from the part of that concerning which it is: and since this is manifold, it admits plurality. Nevertheless, the Son is not properly said to be multiple rationales, but to have multiple rationales: and although he himself is that which he has, nevertheless the mode of understanding is diverse.

§ 6. To the next it must be said, that computation does not have multiplicity on the part of the one computing, but on the part of the creature: and therefore that multiplicity does not impede simplicity, just as the multiplicity of ideas does not.

§ 7. To the next it must be said, that he is the cause through which things subsist, and this is formal, which belongs to the exemplar: and there is the cause by which they are, and this is the efficient which is attributed to the Father.

§ 8. To the next it must be said, that elective is not so called from election according to what is exquisitely sought from counsel, but rather from the liberty of the chooser, namely because he does and posits that which he wills.

§ 9. To the next the response is evident through the division.

What is it for the supreme spirit to speak?

Articulus 5 — What It Is For The Supreme Spirit To Say

What is it for the supreme spirit to speak?

Thirdly it is asked, What is it for the supreme spirit to speak?

§ 11. 1. Anselm, however, says that to speak in the heart is nothing other than to intuit by cogitating. And Damascene says that the rational is divided into an interiorly disposed discourse, and a proffered one: and that the interiorly disposed discourse is a movement of the soul occurring in excogitation without any enunciation. But this kind of speaking does not signify the procession of the word from the speaker. Therefore it seems that this speaking does not belong to the Father speaking and generating the word, for the proper act of the word is to give wisdom: but rather it is taken in likeness to exterior locution.

§ 12. 2. Moreover, excogitation does not seem to belong properly to the supreme spirit: because cogitation is co-agitation, and has a certain collation and composition: therefore it does not belong to him.

§ 13. But if you say, that this speaking is to intuit by seeing, it seems that this speaking would belong to him even without the Son. For let us posit that the persons are not in the mode in which the Church distinguishes them; still, God, by seeing through the intellect, intuits himself: therefore he speaks himself according to these definitions of speaking.

§ 14. If perhaps you say, that it has a likeness to our exterior speaking: just as Damascene seems to mean, that the word is manifested in the drawn spirit [breath], which becomes its vehicle, and the matter in which it is formed and figured. Against this is what is said in the Gloss of Bede on the beginning of John, and in book XV of On the Trinity by Augustine, who intend that he who can see the word of the mind, not only before the corporeal voice, but even before the images of voices interiorly, can weigh some likeness of the uncreated Word.

§ 15. Solution. According to the intentions of the Saints, God's speaking is in likeness to interior diction, and it is to intuit himself by cogitating or seeing: but nevertheless, to speak differs from to understand oneself, and to cognize oneself: for to understand oneself signifies nothing but the conversion of the intellect upon itself: to cognize oneself is to hold or have a notion of oneself within oneself: but to speak oneself is to manifest oneself through something proceeding from oneself, which is similar to the one understanding himself: just as our word manifests our concept.

§ 16. To this, however, which is objected concerning cogitation, it must be said that cogitation is properly not in God: but cogitation is posited for the conversion of himself upon himself: not that conversion is even properly there, because conversion also signifies composition: but that he is cognized by seeing himself as he is.

§ 17. To the next it must be said, that in my judgment, "to speak" is equivocal to natural being and personal being: for I do not see how it could be said that God, the persons not being understood, could not speak himself, and manifest himself: indeed it even seems an impotence if he cannot: but this speaking will be essential, and a word personally proceeding from him does not respond to it: but to speak, which is to manifest oneself in a personal word similar to oneself, only belongs to the Father, and the word only to the Son.

Whether "word" is sometimes said essentially, just as "to speak"?

Articulus 6 — Whether Word Is Sometimes Said Essentially, As Saying Is

Whether "word" is sometimes said essentially, just as "to speak"?

Fourthly, that is asked on account of which the whole question was raised, Whether "word" is sometimes said essentially, just as "to speak"?

§ 19. It seems, however, that it is: because 1. Anselm says that the Father speaks himself, and each of the others: and the Son and the Spirit speak themselves, and each of the others: either therefore they speak themselves perfectly, or imperfectly. If imperfectly: then they are impotent to speak themselves. If perfectly: since a word responds to perfect diction, there will be some word spoken by each of them: but this will not be except the essence, or whichever person: therefore "word" can be called the essence, and whichever person.

§ 20. 2. Also, Either the Father can speak the Spirit in that he is the Holy Spirit, or not. If so: I have the proposition, that the Holy Spirit will be the word of the Father perfectly manifesting the speaker in that he is the speaker. If not: then he will be more impotent than us.

§ 21. 3. Also, In lower things we can speak all things, so that by whatever word we manifest our concept: therefore this more belongs to the supreme spirit: therefore it seems that "word" is not said in one way.

§ 22. 4. Also, Let us posit that the persons which faith posits do not exist, I ask, whether God would still speak himself, or could speak? If he speaks: either he can perfectly manifest himself by diction inasmuch as it is of himself: or not. And thence the process is as before.

§ 23. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Augustine here in the Letter frequently says, that by that he is called the Word, by which the Son: but to be the Son does not belong to the essence: therefore neither does to be the Word.

§ 24. 2. Also, Anselm says, that I see a certain wondrous and inexplicable thing, that each one speaks himself, and any of the others: and yet there is but one word.

§ 25. Solution. To this must be forenoted the statement of Anselm before the end of the Monologion, where he says thus: "Certainly the Father and the Son and their Spirit are not three speakers, although each single one is a speaker: nor are there many things which are spoken, since each one speaks himself and the other two." And below: "Just as his is knowledge and intelligence: for so it is to know and understand, that it is nothing other than to speak, that is, to intuit as present what he knows and understands: for it is necessary that just as the individual Father, and the individual Son, and their individual Spirit is knowing and understanding, and yet together these three are not multiple knowing and understanding ones, but one knower and one understander: so each individual one is a speaker, nor yet are all three together speakers, but one speaker." Here it is liquidly evident that since these three are spoken by themselves and by each other, there are not multiple things which are spoken. What is spoken there except their essence? If therefore that is only one, there is only one thing that is spoken.

§ 26. From this it is evident, that "to speak" is said essentially, and personally: and therefore I say without prejudice, that "word" is taken in three ways. In one way, according as it is converted with the dictum manifesting the intellect of the speaker: and thus it will be said generally with respect to any speaker. In another way, according as it adds upon this the procession and personal distinction from the speaker: and thus to speak only belongs to the Father, and to be the word only belongs to the Son: and thus it is taken properly by the Saints. In a third way, according as it adds upon these two a respect to creatures: and thus it signifies the persons, and notes the essence. And in the first way each one speaks himself, and anyone speaks another. In the second way only the Father speaks only the Son. In the third way God speaks all creatures, according to what is said, He spoke, and they were made, that is, he generated the word in which they were that they might be made.

§ 27. Through this the solution to those things which are objected first is evident.

§ 28. To the next it must be said, that there is only one word: because the divine essence does not make a number with anything that is in divine things: but nevertheless it is not spoken in one way, but in three ways, as is already evident.

To the likeness of which word in lower things is the word in divine things said?

Articulus 7 — According To The Likeness Of Which Word Among Lower Things Word Is Said In The Divine

To the likeness of which word in lower things is the word in divine things said?

Fifthly and lastly it is asked, To the likeness of which word is it said?

§ 30. For Augustine distinguishes in book IX of On the Trinity a fourfold word, speaking thus: "For in one way words are spoken which hold spaces of time in syllables whether they be pronounced, or cogitated: in another way everything which is known is called a word, impressed on the soul as long as it can be proffered from memory and defined, although the thing itself displeases: in another way when what is conceived in the mind pleases." Therefore the word is fourfold, namely twofold with syllables, namely cogitated, and pronounced: and twofold impressed on the soul of a pleasing thing, and of a non-pleasing thing. Damascene, however: "The word is the natural movement of the intellect according to which it is moved, and understands, and cogitates, like its light and splendor." "Again, the word is that which is internal and is proffered in the mind." "And again the word is the angel [messenger] of intelligence." But on John a threefold word is intimated, namely of the heart which is in the concept itself before the images of voices are meditated, and the word which has the image of a voice, and the word of the voice. The Masters also distinguish a threefold word, namely of the thing, of the voice, and of the species of the voice.

§ 31. There is also the word of the speculative intellect, and of the practical intellect.

§ 32. And it is asked, With which of these words does it agree more?

§ 33. To this it must be said, that almost all these divisions are referred to the same thing: for what Augustine calls the word with syllables not pronounced, this is the same as what Damascene in the second division posits as enunciated in the heart, and what in the third division is posited to have the image of a voice, and in the fourth is said to be of the species of the voice, and not of the voice, namely when the heart meditates the species of voices in which it expresses its intention. But what Augustine calls the enunciated word, this is the same as what Damascene in the second division calls an angel, that is, a messenger of intelli-gence, and what in the third division is called the word of the voice, and similarly in the fourth. But what Augustine calls the word impressed on the soul, that is, a pronounceable notion without the species of a voice, and without a voice, that is, which before a voice is proffered, is with the one meditating or cogitating, this is what Damascene in the second division calls the movement, or light of intelligence: and in the third division it is called the word of the heart, and in the fourth it is called the word of the thing, because there is nothing more in that word than the thing spoken: but it is not so in the others, where there is more than the thing spoken: because [it is] either the species of the voice, or the voice itself. But it is true that Augustine subdivides this into a placid notion, and into a non-placid notion: which the others do not do.

§ 35. It must be said therefore, that the eternal Word can be considered in three ways, namely according to the eternal procession, and thus it most agrees with the word of the heart: which is evident, because concerning that Damascene says in the same place: "Indeed the first word is the natural sprout of the intellect, always springing from it naturally." But the Word in the flesh, this is the word having a likeness with the word of the voice: because just as that has more than the thing spoken, so the Son has more than the Father from the assumed flesh, in which he was manifested to us. And this Augustine says in book XV of On the Trinity and on John.

§ 36. TO THE LAST, however, it must be said, that the word illuminates and operates: and as to the act of illuminating it agrees with the speculative word: whence, Ecclesiasticus 1:5: The fount of wisdom is the word of God on high. But as to the operative act it agrees more with the word of the practical intellect. But as to both at once it agrees with the word of intelligence extending itself from speculation into practice, that is, operation.

Whether the Son is called the image of the Father? and,

Articulus 8 — Whether The Son Is Called The Image Of The Father

Whether the Son is called the image of the Father? and,

Whether the Holy Spirit is the image of the Son? and, What is called an image?

§ 38. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, at the end of chapter E, A son is said relatively, also relatively is said a word and an image, etc.

§ 39. 1. For "image" belongs to the whole Trinity: therefore it is not said relatively.

§ 40. 2. Also, By that he is called word, by which [he is called] son: therefore the rationale of word, son, and image is the same. And this is false, since Damascene says, that the Son is the image of the Father, and the Holy Spirit is the image of the Son: and the whole Trinity is called an image.

§ 41. To this it must be said, that "image" sometimes signifies the representation of an operating principle in diversity of essence: just as the image of the emperor is in the gold solidus, as Augustine says: and thus it signifies one essence in three persons. But sometimes it is called the image of a principle in the same essence expressing itself in a similar according to nature, and that image in all things equals that of which it is the image, and thus only the Son is called the image of the Father.

§ 42. To the first it must be said, that by the same rationale by which there is a personal relation, the Son is called word and image, but not by the same rationale of the name and of the mode of signifying: for he is called son insofar as he is a thing of nature through the act of nature which is generation: but he is called word insofar as he is the manifestation of all the interior things of the Father, which are the inmost things of the heart, and therefore the word is said to be eructated from the heart: but he is called image in representation, as it were, of exterior things: because he is another from him, just as he himself from the Father, as Richard says.

§ 44. To the next it must be said, that the Spirit is called image, not because he proceeds as an image, but rather as a gift, but according as image signifies the essential likeness according to which anyone is called the image of another. But Damascene does not put force in this, that an image is called as if exemplated by another, but only in essential similitude and equality.

Whether only the Son is called God from God?

Articulus 9 — Whether The Son Alone Is Said God From God

Whether only the Son is called God from God?

§ 46. Next it is asked concerning the last part where he says: For not both together are God from God, but only the Son is God from God, namely from the Father, etc.

§ 47. 1. For according to this it seems that the Holy Spirit is not God from God, which is false: and Augustine contradicts this above, where he expressly says, that the Holy Spirit is God from God, and the Son is God from God.

§ 48. 2. Also, When it is said, the Holy Spirit is God from God, and the Son is God from God: either they are the same God from God, or another God from God. If the same: then the Son and the Holy Spirit are not one and another. If diverse: then they are not one God: both of which are false.

§ 49. To this it must be said, that the Holy Spirit is God from God just as the Son is: and the word "only" does not exclude anything except the respect of the Father: and the rationale for this is, because exclusion is of the opposite: but when "God from God" is said, the proper notion of the Son is not signified, but rather the common one, which is to be from another: but in this it is not opposed to the Holy Spirit, but to the Father only: therefore nothing is excluded except the Father.

§ 50. TO THE NEXT it was already responded above, that neither the same, nor another, but the same in essence, and distinct in person: and the rationale for this was said there.

DISTINCTIO XXVIII

Divisio Textus

Moreover it is necessary to consider, etc. Here the Master begins to treat of the non-personal properties of the persons, which are two, namely innascibility, which is of one person: and therefore he acts concerning that first in this distinction: and concerning the common principle, namely active spiration, by which the Father and the Son are the principle of the Holy Spirit, which is the property of two persons: and concerning this he acts in the second part, there, Moreover there is another name, etc., in the following distinction.

§ 52. But this distinction is divided into four parts: in the first of which the Master investigates the rationale of innascibility. In the second, he introduces Ambrose arguing the novelty of the name, since it is not read in the Scriptures, there, D, But it is not proper to be silent on that, etc. In the third he asks, Whether it can be said by the same intellect that the Father is not the Son, by which it is said that the unbegotten is one thing and the begotten another? there, E, Moreover it is usually asked, etc. In the fourth and last he asks, Whether only the Son is called begotten wisdom just as only he is called image and word? there, F, It is also to be known, that just as only the Son, etc.

§ 53. The first of these is subdivided into three. In the first it is proved that the unbegotten is in the predicament of relation, and that it is the same as not begotten, or not son. In the second it is asked, Whether only the Father is called not begotten, just as only the Father is called unbegotten? there, B, Therefore it is usually asked here, etc. In the third, the name of the notion by which the Father is called unbegotten is determined, there, C, But if you wish to know, etc.

§ 54. But note here, that above, Distinction XIII, chapter E, Now it must be considered, since the Holy Spirit is not begotten, etc., three questions were determined concerning innascibility, which can be brought here, namely in how many ways it is said, and how it is a notion of the Father alone, and how it belongs to the Father and the Son and also the divine essence. Therefore what was determined there, let it be supposed here.

If the unbegotten is a notion, whether there are more notions than five?

Articulus 1 — Whether, If Unbegotten Is A Notion, There Are More Notions Than Five

If the unbegotten is a notion, whether there are more notions than five?

§ 56. But here two other questions occur before the Letter, namely, If the unbegotten is a notion, whether by the same rationale there are more notions than five?

§ 57. And secondly, Whether the unbegotten could be a notion, even if there are not more notions than five?

§ 58. To the first it is proceeded thus: 1. If both negation and affirmation make a notion, since any person could become known in four ways, there will seem to be twelve notions of the three persons. Proof. For it belongs to the Father not to be from another by generation, and not to be from another by spiration. Similarly it belongs to the Son not to be from another by spiration, and to be from another by generation: from whom another is by spiration, and not from whom another is by generation. Similarly it belongs to the Holy Spirit to be from another by spiration, and not to be from another by generation: from whom another is not by spiration, and from whom another is not by generation. Therefore it seems, that the notions are twelve, if "not to be from another by generation or spiration" is a notion of the Father.

§ 60. 2. Also in the first letter of the first chapter we have,[104] that the Father differs from the Son by the authority of generation, and he also differs by the property of innascibility. From this I conclude two conclusions: of which the first is, that to per se make a person differ from a person is the rationale for why a notion and property is posited in divine things: since therefore the Father differs from the Holy Spirit, because he is not from another by spiration, it behooves that inspirability is also a notion of the Father with respect to the Holy Spirit. The second is, because since in divine things there is no difference except according to the opposition of relation, if the Father differs from the Son by innascibility, there is in the Son an opposite relation corresponding to that which is innascibility: and thus the Son has three notions, namely nascibility, filiation, and active spiration. If perhaps you say, that in the Son one follows upon the other: because it follows: he is the Son: therefore he is born, but it is not converted: but a genus with a species in the same does not make a number. This is nothing: because something becomes known by the mode of one born, which does not become known by the mode of a son, as Augustine intimates in book II of this volume.[105] Since therefore this is a notion in divine things, which makes known, nascibility will be a notion of the Son.

§ 61. 3. Also, Relations in divine things are rationales or properties distinguishing person from person: therefore those which say such oppositions, and can belong to the Trinity, those are properties: but "not to be from another" and "to be from another" have such an opposition in divine things: therefore they make two properties.

§ 62. 4. Also, "To be from another by generation" and "not to be from another by generation" again make such an opposition: therefore those also make two: and thus there will be four.

§ 63. 5. Also, "To be from another by spiration" and "not to be from another by spiration" also make two: and thus there will be six at least. If you say, that by negating the superior, the inferior is also negated: and thus "not to be from another" negates also "not to be from another by spiration," and "not to be from another by generation": and thus those do not make notions. This seems to be nothing: because according to this "not to be from another" will be the notion of the Father: and this is posited by no one, but rather innascibility is posited as his notion. But it is certain, that one species of emanation being negated from someone, the other is not necessarily negated: whence since the innascible or unbegotten negates only "to be from another by generation," it behooves that the Father still becomes known in another way, by which he himself is also not from another by spiration.

§ 64. 6. Moreover, According to this response, although the superior being negated, the inferior is negated: not only the superior being posited is the inferior posited: therefore it seems, that in the other persons there ought to be affirmative notions, namely "to be from another": and thus to the Son and Holy Spirit one notion belongs in common.

§ 65. 7. Also, Boethius says, that only relation multiplies the trinity, but essence contains the unity: therefore between things which have no opposition of relation, those will be the same, or in the same: but "to be from another by generation" and "to be from another by spiration" have no relation of opposition:

therefore they belong to the same: and thus the Son who is from another by generation, is also from another by spiration: and similarly the Holy Spirit: therefore there are more notions.

§ 67. 8. Also, There is one notion in which the Father agrees with the Son, although the Son is from the Father: therefore there ought to be another notion in which the Father agrees with the Holy Spirit and another in which the Son with the Holy Spirit: for otherwise they would not seem to be sufficiently distinct: for the Father alone is distinguished from the Son alone, and the Son alone from the Holy Spirit alone, and the Father and Son together from the Holy Spirit alone: therefore also the Father and Holy Spirit together from the Son alone, and the Son and Holy Spirit together from the Father alone: and thus it seems, that there ought to be many notions, if there are notions other than personal ones, as the Master says here.

§ 68. Solution. It must be said, as was supposed above, that the notions are only five, and the relations four, and the properties of a person four, and the personal properties three, just as was proved above. For a person as a person, only becomes known through that which sounds the dignity of nature: for a thing of nature becomes known in one way, and an individual in another, and a person in another. For a thing of nature as a thing of nature has to be discerned through the act and rationale of nature, according to which we say, that a thing of nature is that which is produced by an act of nature, that is, by an act by which the nature is communicated to its hypostases or supposits: and that act in divine things is twofold, namely to generate, and to spirate: but through either act the thing of nature becomes known in two ways: because the thing of nature is begotten, and the thing of nature is generating: and the thing of nature is spirated, and the thing of nature is spirating: yet there are not four divine things of nature, because to be spirating does not have an opposition to being generating, nor to being begotten: and therefore necessarily the generator and the begotten are one principle of spirating. An individual, however, properly is not in divine things, but becomes known through individuating principles. A person, however, only belongs to a more worthy thing of nature: and therefore a person as a person, does not become known except by a property of dignity or habitude.

§ 69. We say therefore to the first, that "not to be from another by generation" does not posit an absolute dignity according to the order of nature which is in divine things: and to understand this, it is to be noted that in every nature in which an order of nature is posited by which one is from another, and not one prior to another, it is necessary to posit a principle of that order. I do not say a beginning: because a beginning more respects a principle of duration than an order of nature. Therefore if it is necessary to posit a principle, it behooves that that principle become known by some notion: but a principle since it does not have a prior, cannot become known by an affirmation prior to itself: therefore it is necessary, that it become known by a negation: therefore it will become known by "not to be from another according to the order of nature." But whether "not to be from another" posits nothing, or posits something, will be determined in the following article of the question. Therefore it is evident, that by whatever special negation being posited, the principle of the whole divinity according to the order of nature will not become known in this mode as a principle: and thus it is evident, that "not to be from another by generation," and "not to be from another by spiration," are not notions of the Father, nor can they be. But that same principle, which is the principle of this order of nature, must become known: I do not say from the posterior part, because there is no prior and posterior there, but from that part by which another is from him: and this according to genus does not posit dignity, but sometimes indignity: but in species it posits dignity in the act in which nature is communicated, just as generation is, and just as spiration is: therefore from that part there will be the notions of the Father, paternity, and active spiration. But supposing the same order of nature, that which is from a principle according to the general mode of being from another, does not become known as a person, but in the special mode in which by specific virtue...

of the difference it is shown that a worthier nature is given to Him: and those acts are generation, and spiration. Therefore, to be from another through generation, and to be from another through spiration are notions of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Just as in lower things, to be from a man does not communicate a nature worthy to constitute a person, because what is from a man is sometimes an unworthy thing; but to be from a man through the generation of a man communicates the nature. However, not to be from another through generation, and not to be from another through spiration (as has already been proven) do not constitute, nor do they make known any dignity of nature. And thus it is clear why there cannot be twelve, but only five notions of a person as a person.

§ 2. To another it must be said, that a difference of distinction does not simply make a notion of a person, but a difference of distinction of a person as a person. But a principle not from a principle can be made known in the manner of a person in three ways, namely, regarding what is prior by negation: and I well concede that unbegotten does not mean there the negation of a special emanation, but of the general "not being from another": the reason for which was determined above: and thus the first question ceases. In another way it is made known with respect to those of whom it is the principle, and by one notion to one, and by another to the other, according as there are two acts of communicating a worthy nature, namely generation, and spiration: and this has been determined above.

§ 3. To another question the solution is already clear: because nascibility, or being from another, does not of itself express a notion of a person as a person: because not everything that is born from something receives a nature of dignity from it: nor does everything that is from something receive a nature of dignity: but everything that is a son by nature receives the nature of the dignity of the generator. Thus also the spirative power produces nothing but what is similar to itself in nature. And therefore nascibility is not a notion: and through this the solution to the following is clear.

§ 4. To another it must be said, that not being from another is the same as being unbegotten, as was proven above: and therefore those six revert to five: because not being from another through generation does not posit the ratio of a principle in the order of nature: nor even not being from another through spiration: but not being from another simply. And therefore they cannot be notions of anyone: for they do not state the ratio of a principle in the order of nature, nor the ratio of the reception of a worthy nature, as do generation and spiration.

§ 5. To another it must be said, that innascibility according as it befits the Father alone, and not the Holy Spirit, is the same as not being from another, in this way by which not being from another makes known the principle of the whole godhead.

§ 6. To another the solution is clear through what has been said, and similarly to the following.

§ 7. To another it must be said, that although to be generated and to be spirated are not opposed relatively, nevertheless the one spirated and the one generated are opposed relatively. Because I well concede this according to what was said above, that the Greeks err, and therefore how they themselves distinguish the Holy Spirit from the Son, I do not labor to determine here: because it seems to me to be impossible that one is not the other, if between them there is no opposition of relation, as was determined above. And therefore the Father and the Son are one in spirating, and the Holy Spirit is distinguished from both.

§ 8. To another it must be said, that there cannot be a notion in which the Father agrees with the Holy Spirit, and another in which the Son agrees with the Holy Spirit: because in that by which the Father would communicate to the Holy Spirit, an order of nature would be denoted, and thus it would be necessary for there to be some fourth from the Father and the Holy Spirit, which was disproved above, and thus there would be a multitude into infinity: and similarly it would be necessary that there be another according to that notion in which the Son would agree with the Holy Spirit: and thus there would be two proceeding from the Holy Spirit.

§ 10. Moreover, that in which the Father would agree with the Holy Spirit would not have an opposition to the Son: therefore the Son would also agree with them in it: therefore that notion would already agree with the three, and thus it would be common to the three: and nothing is common to them except essence: therefore that notion would already be said of them according to essence: and therefore that argumentation does not proceed. Whence it is clear, that innascibility is a notion, and that there are only five notions.

Articulus 2 — Whether Innascibility Is A Notion Of The Father

Whether innascibility is a notion of the Father?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether innascibility is a notion of the Father?

It seems, however, that it is not: for innascibility is either explained negatively or privatively. If negatively, on the contrary: Negation by itself certifies nothing: therefore negation cannot be a notion, because a notion is that which makes known. But if it is explained privatively, multiple inconveniences follow: one of which is that privation implies imperfection: and according to this, a person of dignity would be made known through imperfection, which is inconvenient. The second is because privation leaves aptitude: and thus the innascible Father would be apt to be born, but would not be born, which again is false. The third is because privative opposites occur around the same thing: therefore, nascible and innascible must occur around the same person according to the order of nature: but nascibility belongs to the Son: therefore, innascibility would also have to occur around the Son, and not around the Father: therefore, it seems that innascibility is not a notion of the Father.

If perhaps you say that negation makes known, as Rabbi Moses the Egyptian says in the book called "Guide of the Perplexed": especially in divine matters. And Augustine confirms his statement, saying that if you cannot know what God is, you have nonetheless accomplished not a little in knowledge if you know what He is not. On the contrary: According to this, one negation does not sufficiently notify. For if I say, God is not an element, leaving that God is something, this negation does not make knowledge of God according to the doctrine of that Philosopher: because there are still many other things that are not an element, and also are not God: therefore, it is necessary to add more restrictive negations: for the more universal that which is denied, the less common the negation is: and the more particular that which is denied, the more common the negation is: for Socrates is not verified of more things than not man, or not animal. Therefore, it seems that here too it is necessary to add more negations before sufficient knowledge of the principle of the order of nature is had.

Further, it is asked what more touches the proposed matter, Since the notion of a principle is not of the principle being not from another absolutely, as was proven in the preceding question, why is it not said by the general name of the Father's notion to be not being from another, but by the special one which is unbegotten, which sounds the same as not being from another through generation? If perhaps you say that generation and spiration are ordered, and according to the order of nature generation is before spiration, and with the prior denied, the second is denied, but not conversely: this is nothing: because this was disproven above, where it was shown that the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Son already born, nor not born: because both are eternal, and neither places the order of the prior to the other, nor even the order of cause: by this it is said that the Father is unbegotten, it is not understood as unprocessible, or in another way not being from another.

If perhaps you say that generation is to being, and spiration to well-being, and with the emanation according to being denied, the emanation according to well-being is denied: this is also heretical and false: because spiration in divine matters takes the substance of the Holy Spirit, and being, and well-being: and there well-being is the same as being. But it is false, because nothing prevents me from not being from someone through being, and yet my well-being depending on him: just as my well-being can be from a king, although I am not the king's son. Therefore, it seems that this solution is not suitable.

Solution. Without prejudice, I say that innascibility is a notion of a principle not existing from a principle. Hence it must be understood that it is a negation founded upon being: for negation is otherwise of first things, and otherwise of subsequent things: just as if I say, man is not an animal, man is not a donkey: the following negation is caused by the opposition or disparity of predicate and subject: which disparity is caused by opposite differences constituting the predicate and subject: and therefore that negation has something prior to it in which it is founded, which is not entirely the same as those of which it is a negation, but is prior to them. But when I say the first which has nothing before it, the negation is founded upon the nature of the first, which is not prior to the first, because nothing is prior to the first, but it is the first itself: and therefore it cannot be explained by affirmation, as another negation. For if I ask and say thus: man is not a donkey, you will say that it is true. If I ask further, Why is this? you will say, because he is a rational animal, and rational animal and irrational are removed from each other by opposite differences: and thus you cause the negation by an affirmation which is prior to the negation, and is prior to the negated. But if I say the first before which nothing is, you say that this is true. But if I ask, Why is this true? you say, because the first is the first: and indeed you posit an affirmation which is prior to the negation, but you do not posit an affirmation prior to that of which it was a negation, because the negation was of the first: therefore, that cannot be made known by affirmation: and thus it is made known by negation, as Augustine says here.

I say, therefore, that innascibility is not to be explained privatively, but negatively: but it is twofold, namely in genus, and outside genus. Therefore, if the negation denies all that is in the genus of principle, then innascible will be the same as not being from another principle according to the order of nature. But if it only denies what is in its opposite in genus, then it was said above that it would also belong to the Holy Spirit according to the words of Jerome placed by the Master there, and explained by us.

As for what is objected, that negation does not make something known: it must be said that this is true per se, and of negation outside genus: but such a negation is not that which falls in the notion of the first, and of the principle.

To what is further asked, Why is it said innascibility, and not existence from another? it can be said if it pleases, that although generation and procession do not have the order of prior and posterior, or of immediate and mediate, as was proven above, yet they have the order of nature, by which the proceeding is from the begotten: and this is evident in the image because love does not proceed from the mind unless knowledge is supposed, which is loved, and loves: and therefore Richard says that love tends into another. And Gregory that charity cannot be less than between two: and therefore with generation according to the principle removed, spiration is also removed.

And therefore, non-being from another through generation, when it removes the generative principle, also removes the spirative principle, because it would not breathe love except with him whom it begot: however, it is not conversely so: and this is very much against the Greeks. For from this it is necessarily concluded that the Holy Spirit is from the Son, and that the Son has this from the Father, just as if the Father were spirated from another, it would necessarily be required that that other begot another with whom the Father would breathe.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear: because although spiration and generation do not have the order of prior and posterior, cause, or nature, or dignity, or time, yet they have the order of nature, which is in the divine, so that the begotten is the principle of the spirated: and thus the spirated according to this order posits the begotten spirating: if therefore the Father were spirated, it would be necessary for another to be begotten from another father. Therefore, when by opposition the unbegotten denies that the same is spirated, and not conversely: this is the reason why it is said unbegotten, and not unspirable.

But if it is asked, Why does it not say with the general name "unprocessible," so that both are simply removed? It must be said that the Father is a principle not from a principle according to the order of nature: and therefore in its notion it is necessary to express the reason of this order, according to which it is not from a principle: however, the reason of this order is not expressed by a general name, but by a special one: therefore the negation ought to be in the special, which nevertheless according to the order of nature is the principle of another act, just as the begotten of the spirated.

But if it is asked, Whether the Father could breathe the Spirit without the Son? this has been solved above.

Articulus 3 — Whether Innascibility And Paternity Are One Notion Or Two

Whether innascibility and paternity are one notion, or two?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, A, He designates another notion than Pa. For this seems false: because

1. Innascibility in the Father seems to be the same as paternity: for a property either constitutes the person, or the person is made known through it: but the person of the Father is sufficiently made known and constituted by the property which is paternity: therefore innascibility is either the same in the Father, or it is superfluous.
2. Likewise, In divine things nothing is distinguished except by the opposition of relation: but there is no opposition of relation between paternity and innascibility: therefore they are the same notion according to reality.
3. Likewise, Innascibility seems to say nothing except a certain comparison of the Father to the privation of a prior principle: but such a comparison adds nothing except negation: therefore since negation causes no difference, it seems that it does not express another notion than paternity.
4. Likewise, In divine things there is no number except from hypostasis: therefore properties are not numbered except from the number of hypostases: therefore all properties of the same person are one according to what they are in it: therefore innascibility in the Father does not differ from paternity in the Father.
5. Likewise, In the Son, nascibility is not another property from filiation: therefore it seems that neither in the Father is innascibility another from paternity.

Solution. It must be said that innascibility is one notion in the Father, and paternity another: because the distinction of notions is according to the mode of making known the person as person, that is, according to the reason of dignity: as was said above, in the order of nature it is necessary for the principle to be not from a principle: and that is made known in every thing which is a principle not from a principle: therefore there will be one mode of making it known from that part by which it is not from a principle, and another from that part by which it is a principle, and one mode is not the other. From that part by which it is made known as not from a principle, innascibility is the notion. From the other part it is made known according to the reasons by which it is the principle of the whole divinity: but this is by generating and spirating: and therefore there will be two notions of the Father, one paternity, and the other common spiration.

To the FIRST, therefore, it must be said that innascibility is not superfluous: because by paternity the Father is sufficiently made known in the reason of principle: yet he is not sufficiently made known inasmuch as he is not from a principle: and this belongs to him personally, and pertains to the dignity of the person, according to which in the order of nature the Father himself is posited as a principle not from a principle.

To the second it must be said that really nothing is distinguished in divine things except by the opposition of relation, that is, that the distinction makes a thing per se being and subsisting: and thus a notion is not distinguished from a notion, but rather according to the mode of supposing and attributing, as was said above.

To the third it must be said that it does not express a comparison of paternity, but of that which is the Father according to that reason by which he is a principle not from a principle: hence that reason proceeds from falsehoods.

To the fourth it must be said that there is no number of distinct things in divine things, except of persons only: nor does a notion in divine things have distinct being outside of persons, and it is numbered according to the reasons of making known and attributing. Yet I say well that relation and notion is a thing in divine things, although it is not numbered outside the person: but its diversity is made known according to the diversity of the mode of signifying in attributing, as was said above.

To the fifth it must be said that nascibility according to the same reason makes the Son known, according to which filiation makes him known, namely according to which he is from a principle in the order of nature: and therefore nascibility and filiation are not a different notion in the Son: but not according to the same reason does innascibility and paternity make the Father known, according to which in the order of nature he is a principle not from a principle: and therefore in the Father innascibility is a notion in another mode, and paternity: just as in the Son filiation is another notion, and common spiration: because the Son is not made known through them according to one reason, according to which he is referred to the order of nature, as a principle from a principle.

Articulus 4 — Whether, With Paternity Not Understood, The Father Would Be A Who, Because He Is Unbegotten

Whether, with paternity not understood, the Father would be someone, because unbegotten?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, A, It is not to say unbegotten, which is to say Father, etc.

1. Therefore it seems that, with paternity not understood, still the Father would be someone, because unbegotten: therefore this is false which seems to be proven above, that with personality abstracted from the person, the hypostasis does not remain.
2. If perhaps you say that it is so in the Father, but it is not so in others. On the contrary: Because by the same reason it is not the same to say Son, and spirating: therefore with filiation not understood, still the Son will be someone, and thus the hypostasis of the Son remains.
3. Likewise, This is proven by another reason. It is well conceded, This one is begotten: therefore he is from another: but it is not converted: therefore to be from another by understanding is prior to being generated: therefore it can be understood without that: therefore with filiation not understood, still it is understood to be from another: but this does not pertain except to hypostasis: therefore with personality abstracted, hypostasis is understood, which was denied above.
4. Likewise, Augustine says, and it is held in the Letter, that it is one thing to be the Father, and another thing to be Father: for it is not the same, is Father, and Father is: and is Son, and Son is: but the Father is by the same by which the Son is, because the Father is essence: and the Son is by the same, because in divine things whatever is, is essence: therefore it seems that to be hypostasis according to understanding depends on essence: and with notion not understood, still essence is: therefore since to be hypostasis is from essence, hypostasis in divine things can be without the notion existing.
5. Likewise, The absolute is in all things before the relative: but it has been often held above, that person is absolute: therefore also hypostasis: because since there are two things of the understanding of person, namely hypostasis and property, the being of the absolute cannot have person from property: therefore it remains that it has from hypostasis: therefore hypostasis is absolute: therefore by understanding it is before the relative.

Solution. We still persist in this that with property not understood, neither is hypostasis understood nor does it remain: because we do not see how the heresy of Arius, or the heresy of Sabellius, is declined, if by understanding hypostasis is posited before property: and this has been sufficiently proven above.

Wherefore we say to the first, that with paternity not understood, etc., that this can be in two ways: for paternity is a relation, and a personal property: and paternity can be not understood as it is a relation, because it can be understood as not begotten not having a Son: and thus it is true what Augustine says. But the order of nature is destroyed: for the Father has no order of nature to the Son except by reason of paternity. Wherefore thus with paternity not understood it is true that the hypostasis of the Father remains, and not of the Son: because the order of nature is destroyed by which one is from the other. In another way it is the property constituting the person in personal being: and since negation does not constitute, the understanding of unbegottenness will not constitute the Father: and in this way with paternity not understood, the Father will not be someone: and hypostasis is removed, with the property taken away.

To the other it must be said, that although spiration is a notion of the Son, yet it is not his personal property: and therefore spiration according to the reason of understanding presupposes filiation for itself, as it is a personal property: for it cannot spirate unless the person is constituted: and this is done through filiation.

To the other it must be said, that this follows in those things in which the universal is abstracted from the particular, and the simpler from the less simple: and yet according to being it is conversely. Wherefore when it is said, this one is begotten: therefore he is from another: our understanding is not stopped upon being from another, but passes on to generation, because that determinately fixes the understanding: for a thing is not taken in the universal except in potency: wherefore the understanding seeking the nature of the thing and being, does not rest in the universal: and therefore according to the being of the person, to be from another, is after to be from another through generation, and after to be from another through spiration: and according to the thing it is the same, and not simpler than those: because such abstraction cannot be done in divine things, as was proven above: and if it were in divine things, it would be only according to reason, and according to being it would be conversely.

To the other it must be said, that it seems to me well to be conceded, that hypostasis has a relation to essence, and a relation to property: and from the relation to essence it has being, and similarly property: because all being in divine things, is of essence, and from essence: but yet the number and being of hypostasis, that is, that hypostasis is hypostasis, it has from the property on the part after: because by number and by being hypostasis as hypostasis depends on property.

To the other it must be said, that hypostasis is not absolute, as was proven above: because if it is posited as absolute, the heresy of Sabellius, or of Arius, follows inevitably, as it seems to me: but it is said to be relative in two ways, namely as the reason of relation, and thus the relative is notion, and relation or property: and as that which is said to something, and this is the suppositum of relation, which is hypostasis. And if it is asked, Whence comes this suppositum, since it does not remain with the relation removed? It must be answered, because it is posited with the relation posited as it is distinguishing: otherwise relation is not posited in divine things. Yet the argument is not valid: because relation is manifold, as was said above, namely simple, and composite. And simple is according to origin: and some of those arise from change, as cause and caused, and father and son in lower things: and these presuppose their supposita according to understanding. Some are for the being of the suppositum constituting it, by which posited the suppositum is posited: and therefore some say not badly, as it seems to me, that these properties carry their supposita with them: and therefore these relations are according to the reason of understanding before their supposita.

Articulus 5 — Whether Begotten And Unbegotten Signify A Being In The Same Predicamental Genus

Whether begotten and unbegotten signify being in the same category?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, A, around the middle: "Moreover, the negative particle does not cause that which is said relatively without it, etc."

1. For this seems false: since it does not have an order to the category except through the coordination of predicables, if the coordination of predicables is denied of it, the category is denied of it (as it seems): but the coordination of predicables is denied of it, because the proper predicate of the category is denied of it, such as begotten, or the proper subject of some genus: therefore it seems that begotten and unbegotten do not signify being in the same category.
2. Likewise, whatever is in a category is in it as the most general, or as a subaltern, or as the most specific, or as an individual. However, unbegotten signifies none of these, because it perfects none of these through negation: therefore it seems false that begotten and unbegotten are in the same category.
3. Likewise, nothing has an order to diverse genera in one and the same way: but unbegotten is said of relation, and not relation: therefore unbegotten does not signify being in a category determinately.
4. Likewise, relation and non-relation do not differ except by the negative particle which is added to the other: therefore, according to the reasoning of Augustine placed here, they are in the same genus: but whatever is in a genus, the most general is predicated of it: therefore the genus of relation is predicated of non-relation: therefore non-relation is relation, which is impossible: therefore what Augustine says here is false.
5. Likewise, according to this, there would be two most general in any category: for non-relation is not of lesser commonality than relation: and this again seems ridiculous, and against the authority of the art of categories.

If perhaps you say that it is true that the name of the category is denied when it is said substance non-substance, relation non-relation, quality non-quality, and the like. On the contrary: because the negation, the more it is joined to the less common, the more common it is: if therefore the negation is more common according to the scope of predication, it causes that it cannot remain in the same category with the affirmation, much more does the less common negation cause this, as it seems.

The true solution to all these arguments is one: because when it is said non-begotten, or non-substance, or any other negation, the negation can be considered for the sake of negation: and thus, since negation is non-being, it does not fall into any genus, nor is it ordered to any genus. Or it can be considered by reason of the negated thing: and thus the negation is necessarily ordered to the affirmation preceding it according to understanding, as we said in the first article of the question, and thus non-substance is reduced to substance as to a genus, and non-relation to relation as to a genus: for just as privation is not known except through habit, and division through composition: so negation in this way is understood through affirmation. Hence the Philosopher says that in non-being, being is understood, and altogether in affirmation negation: and in this way he says that the straight is the judge of itself and of the oblique: for by the straight we know both it and the oblique.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that by reason of the negated thing, the order is left, although not by reason of the negation.

To the other, it must be said that that proposition is false, but it is true of those directly ordered in the category: for there are some in the category as predicates and subjects of the same category, and some are in it according to reduction: and this in two ways, namely as principles, like matter and form to substance, and point and unity to quantity, and the like. However, some are reduced, like those about which judgment is made through them: and thus privations and negations are reduced to a genus: because they are known through the habit of the genus.

To the other, it must be said that that reasoning proceeds from the part of the negation, and not from the part of the negated thing.

To the other, it must be said that it is not necessary that the genus of the category be predicated of those which are in the category in any way through reduction to it, but only of those directly contained in it.

Through which the solution to the following is also clear: because it does not make the most general, but is reduced to the same as the habit of affirmation.

Articulus 6 — Whether Innascibility Can Be Predicated Of Paternity; And Whether Paternity Is Innascible; And Whether The Essence Is Innascible

Whether unbegottenness can be predicated of paternity? and, Whether paternity is unbegotten? and, Whether essence is unbegotten?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, A, towards the end: Just as the son is referred to the father, and not the son to the non-father: so the begotten must be referred to the begetter, and not the begotten to the non-begetter.

1. For it seems that although paternity is not the same notion as unbegottenness, as Augustine says here, because by paternity the Father is referred to the Son, in the begotten, however, to the non-father: nevertheless, it seems that one is predicated of the other, so that it is said, paternity is unbegottenness. For whatever things are united in the same in the divine, cannot have opposition of themselves: paternity and unbegottenness are united in one hypostasis: therefore they do not have opposition: therefore one can be predicated of the other, so that it is said, paternity is unbegottenness.
2. Likewise, although the attributes of the divine nature differ according to the reason of understanding, when goodness and divine wisdom are said: nevertheless, because of the simplicity of that in which they are, one is predicated of the other: and we say, divine wisdom is divine goodness: therefore similarly, since paternity and unbegottenness are united in the Father, not as diverse things, but according to the mode of understanding, it seems that because of the simplicity of the person one is predicated of the other: and we can say, paternity is unbegottenness.

3. Likewise, it follows well, the Father is not the Son: therefore paternity is not filiation: therefore similarly by opposition, the unbegotten is the Father: therefore unbegottenness is paternity.

Again it is further asked, Whether it could be said, Paternity is unbegotten?

It seems so: because paternity is the Father: and the Father is unbegotten: therefore paternity is unbegotten.

Likewise, the Father is not begotten; and not begotten is the same as unbegotten, as is clear from the text: therefore paternity is unbegotten.

Again it is asked, Whether essence could be said to be unbegotten?

It seems so: because essence is not born, nor from another: therefore it is unbegotten.

Solution. It must be said that one of these notions is predicated of the other: and it cannot be said, Paternity is unbegottenness: just as it cannot be said, the reason for knowing the Father insofar as he is not from a principle, is the reason for knowing insofar as he is the principle of the Son: and just as it cannot be said, the relation by which the Father is referred insofar as the Father is not from a principle, is the relation by which the Father is referred to the Son: for a notion takes its being as a notion from the reason for being known, and a relation takes its being as a relation from the reason for being referred.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that paternity and unbegottenness do not have any opposition according to any genus of opposition, but they have disparity, according to which they are taken as notions and relations, not according to which they are taken as the thing which is the Father, or the person of the Father, or the divine essence: for this, that they are united in one person, does not confer upon them the reason of one notion, nor the reason of one relation: just as in lower things, from this that whiteness and music are united in Socrates, it is not conferred upon them to be one quality, but one quale.

To the other, it must be said that it is different concerning the attributes: because they do not retain their own mode of predicating, but they take the predication of substance: however, relations retain their own mode of predicating, and therefore by those proper modes of referring and predicating they differ from each other.

To the other, it must be said that it follows well: but there is a double cause: for not only is the cause of this the distinction of supposits, but also the diversity of relations: and one of those causes is preserved in the properties which are in the same person: for it does not follow, if the concrete is predicated of the concrete for the sake of the subject, that the abstract is predicated of the abstract: whence it does not follow, white is musical: therefore whiteness is music.

To what is further asked, Whether paternity is unbegotten, and essence unbegotten? It must be said that each is double, from the fact that the term unbegotten can be held adjectively, and thus it is not to be conceded, because thus unbegotten would be predicated inherently of each: or it can be held substantively, that is, the unbegotten is the Father: and thus each is to be conceded.

Articulus 7 — Whether Origin Also Can Be Called A Notion

Whether origin can also be called a notion?

Next, it is inquired concerning what is said in the words of Hilary, chapter C, "Property, namely in each one of origin and innascibility," etc.

Therefore, it seems that origin expresses a property: however, it does not express filiation, because from origin is also the Holy Spirit and has origin: therefore, it seems that there are more notions than five.

Solution. Origin is simply understood according to emanation to being: such an origin is called generation according to the account of the name: and therefore it is placed here for the passive generation of the Son, although according to the name it expresses something more common than generation.

Articulus 8 — Whether An Accident Can Be Separated From Its Subject

Whether an accident can be separated from its subject?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says:

That nevertheless the relative is not an accident, because it is not mutable, etc.

However, this does not seem to follow: because there are many accidents in lower things which are not changed, like an inseparable accident.

To this, however, some say that an accident is compared to a subject in two ways, namely, proximate and remote:

and although it is sometimes separable from the proximate and immediate, yet it is separable from the remote: as having three angles equal to two right angles, although it is not separated from a rectilinear triangle, yet it is separated from a figure or triangle simply: because a triangle which has one side arcuate can have three greater than two right angles.

Otherwise, it can be said, and perhaps better, that an accident is compared to something as to a subject only, and from that it can always be separated: it is also compared to something as to a subject and cause, and to that which falls in the definition of it, and from that it is not separated: but this is not from the nature of the subject, but rather from the nature of being and definition.

Articulus 9 — Whether Image Is Said Relatively; And Whether The Son Alone Is Said To Be Image

Whether image is said relatively? and, Whether only the Son is called image?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said in the last part, there, F, It must also be known that just as only the Son is called word and image, etc.

For from this it seems that image is said relatively. And this does not seem so:

1. For image, as Hilary says (and it is placed below), is the indistinct and unique likeness of a thing to a certain thing to be known and imagined: but this seems to agree both to the Son and to the Holy Spirit: although the Son and the Holy Spirit agree in no notion: therefore it cannot express a relation.
2. Likewise, Damascene says that the Spirit is the image of the Son: therefore it seems that it does not express a relation.
3. Likewise, of two similar and two equal things, each is equal to the other, and similar to the other: therefore, since image posits only similarity and equality, it seems to refer to both one and the other: and thus both the Father is the image of the Son, and the Son of the Father. Perhaps you will say that the Son is the image because he proceeds as begotten: but the Holy Spirit does not proceed as begotten, but as given: but what is given by someone does not have the notion of similarity from this that it is a gift: but what is born, from the very notion of its procession, has the notion of similarity. On the contrary: Above we had that great is he who gives such a gift as himself.

Furthermore, it is not permitted for us to say that the Holy Spirit is not equal to the Father: nor is it permitted for us to say that the Holy Spirit is not similar to the Father: therefore, since from these two an image is made, it seems that it is not permitted for us to say that the Holy Spirit is not the image of the Father and the Son.

1. Likewise, you will say that the Son has from the notion of procession that he is an image, and not the Holy Spirit: either it is understood according to the general notion of procession, or specifically in divine things. If in the first way: this is nothing: because thus it is not asked about persons, because by the same reason you could say that the Holy Spirit by reason of procession is an accident: because what proceeds generally by way of love is an accident, and not a person. But if the procession is considered in divine things: then the reason is worth nothing: because the perfect unity and likeness of nature is communicated to the Holy Spirit by spirating, just as to the Son by generating.

Furthermore, that reason is only according to reason, since we seek the thing and the reason of the thing: therefore it seems that this is nothing.

If for this reason you wish to say what we said above, that image posits agreement with externals, namely figure and color: and therefore it is referred to the Son according to the property which is as if extrinsically present in this that another is from the Son, just as from the Father, but not from the Holy Spirit, and that is the reason of Richard. On the contrary: According to this, among the Greeks the Son would not be the image of the Father: because they do not posit the Holy Spirit to proceed from the Son.

Solution. Augustine says in the book On the Ten Strings, that the image of a king is otherwise in the son, and otherwise in a solid gold: because in the son it is by nature, in solid gold it is impressed in an extraneous nature: and he wishes to distinguish between this that the Son of God is called image, and that man is said to be according to the image. And therefore it seems to me that three things concur to the understanding of image, namely first that it is in another, because nothing is an image to itself: and therefore since the Father is referred to nothing before himself according to the order of nature, he cannot be called image: and therefore Hilary says below, that the Son is referred to the unbegotten, and that in this way the Father is called the head of the Son. The second is that it leads to one only: for there cannot be an immediate leading imagined into two, as they are two: but a mediated one can, namely that it first leads into one, and consequently into another: hence the Father as he is other than the Son in person, cannot have an image which equally leads into his person, and into the person of the Son: and therefore the Holy Spirit cannot be an image, who according to the order of nature is referred equally to both: nor can he even have two images, even if it were posited that the Holy Spirit proceeds from him alone, as the Greeks say: because those images would be assimilated according to one reason, and thus in themselves they would have no distinction. The third is that it perfectly fulfills: and this agrees to the Son and the Holy Spirit equally, although not for the same reason: because to the Son by reason of filiation, which in its reason posits this fulfillment by the act of nature, because it is generation: but to the Holy Spirit it agrees by spiration which has in its reason the spirative act which is the act of love: and by this it is clear how only the Son is called image.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that image according to the mode of understanding posits more than similarity and equality, as has been said: and by this it is also clear to the third.

To the other it must be said that Damascene does not attend in the image except to that in which the fulfillment of the image is noted: and this is the unity of substance: and therefore he calls the Holy Spirit image.

To the other it must be said that nothing prohibits saying that the Son by reason of procession has the similarity of nature, and the Holy Spirit has the same, but it does not fall into the reason of his procession, because he does not proceed as begotten, as has been said above from the words of Augustine.

To the other it must be said that Richard attends to the sign of the image: because namely the Son is one from one: and the sign of this is that from him and from the Father is another: and

Then his reason attends through that sign according to which it is of the understanding of the image.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Word And Native Wisdom Are The Same; And Whether In The Word There Is Always Understood A Reference To The Creature; And What Saying Adds Over Understanding

Whether the word and wisdom born are the same? and, Whether in the word is always understood a relation to the creature? and, What does saying add over understanding?

Then it is asked about what is said, there, F, Let us take it to be said when the word is spoken, as if it is said born wisdom, etc.

Therefore, it seems that the word and wisdom born are the same.

On the contrary: An ordered and perfect word does not proceed except from a wise one according to wisdom: but the Son is the word to whom nothing is lacking: therefore, he proceeds from wisdom: therefore, proceeding from the speaker, he receives wisdom from the wisdom of the speaker. For we had above, that the good begot the good, and the wise begot the wise: therefore, it seems according to the order of nature the word places wisdom before itself.

But against this is what is said, Ecclesiasticus 1, 5: The fountain of wisdom is the word of God in ex. Therefore, the word is pouring out wisdom: but whatever is poured out from something, is posterior to it by understanding: therefore, wisdom is posterior to the word.

Further, it is asked here, Whether in the word is always understood a relation to the creature?

For this seems so, because
1. All things were made through him?: therefore, all things were in him from eternity life and light: therefore, since life and light place a relation to creatures, the word also places the same.

1. Likewise, the Word is the art of the Father: but art (as Augustine says) is full of the reasons of all living things. Therefore, since those reasons place a relation to the creature, it seems that also the word in which those reasons are.
2. Likewise, Anselm says, that with the same word the Father speaks himself and every creature; therefore, it seems that the relation of creatures is in the word.
3. Likewise, He spoke and they were made. On that Augustine says, that is, He begot the Word in which they were to be made. And he says on Genesis, that it is not to be believed, that the Father spoke as many times as it is put, God said, in the text of the letter > because he begot one word alone, through which he made all things. As also Job said, xxxiii, 14: God speaks once, and does not repeat the same a second time,

But on the contrary: When it is said, the Father speaks himself, no relation is placed except to the Father alone: therefore, when the generation of the word is expressed there, it seems that the word does not necessarily place a relation to the creature.

Further, it is asked here, what does saying add over understanding?

And it seems, that nothing. For Anselm says, that for the highest spirit to say is to behold by thinking: but this all happens by the act of the intellect: therefore, it seems, that it adds nothing: and thus to say and to understand are the same.

Likewise, If the cogitative power does not suit God: this is nothing: because then I will place there by seeing, and then I have the proposition.

Again then I ask, What does seeing say different from beholding? For if they say the same, then one is superfluous in the definition of the word which Anselm places. But if they do not say the same: either they refer to the same intellectual power, or to another. If to the same: then it seems, that they say one act: and thus one is superfluous. This also seems by the reason of the name: because intuition is the same as sight: therefore, to see by seeing is the same as to see by seeing: and there is an abundance of this word, intuition, as it seems. But if you say, that they refer to another power: therefore, to say is not the act of the intellect alone, nor is it a simple act, but composite.

If for this reason it is said, that to say is the same as to understand.

On the contrary: Understanding is an essential act: therefore, also to say, which is false. Moreover, it seems that to say in divine things does not suit the intellect: because the intellect in the image is referred to the Son: therefore, when the Son is called the word, it is necessary that the mind in divine things, which is attributed to the Father, speaks and not the intellect.

Solution. To the first it must be said it seems, that the word does not always place a relation to creatures, but sometimes places a relation to the speaker alone, according to which it is taken only notionally not signifying the divine essence by relation to the creature, as was held above in the preceding distinction. Hence when it is asked, Whether according to understanding it places wisdom before itself? It must be distinguished, that there is a twofold wisdom: eternal, and created: and it is agreed, that it pours out created wisdom by relation to creatures, according to which it is an art full of the reasons of all living things. But eternal wisdom is essential. And I well think, that according to the reason of understanding that is before, in the way we say the essential before the notional and personal in divine things, not in reality, but by a certain reason.

also the solution by the distinction made earlier.

To what is further asked, it must be said according to some, who (as I think) well say, that to say adds according to the reason of understanding over understanding three things: of which one is, that understanding only says the assimilation of the intelligible to the intelligent, and therefore has only a comparison to the object which does not proceed from the intelligent itself, but rather remains in it and is united to it: but to say says a comparison to the object which is said, and to a certain effect which it produces: and that is the word or saying which proceeds from the speaker. The second is, that both indeed, namely understanding, and saying, sound a certain manifestation of the understood and said: but there is a difference in mode: because understanding manifests to itself and within, but saying manifests as if to another and outside: and therefore in saying personal distinction is more noted: hence we say, that to say notes a notional act, but understanding never, but is always essential. The third is, that to say also sometimes notes an operative power to those things which are made in the word, but understanding never: and therefore it is not said, He understood, and they were made: but He said, and they were made.

To what is asked about the definition of Anselm, I well think that to behold by thinking is not as properly said as by seeing. And what is asked, whether they say the same act? It must be said, that yes: but according to this mode in which we defined to say by those two, we will say that although they say the same act, not however in the same mode of signifying: and therefore it is not a redundancy: and seeing is taken there as it suits the acting intellect which does not see by receiving something, but rather by emitting light from itself: for this suits the procession and generation of the Son. Therefore, this emission of light is said by seeing: but to behold is to fix the sight with diligent consideration: and this suits the perfect assimilation of the word to the speaker, so that namely all things are in the word, which are in the speaker, to such an extent that it seems he spoke another himself, as Anselm says in the Monologion, and Augustine at the beginning of the seventh on the Trinity, that the Father speaking the word, spoke another himself: for he would not have perfectly spoken himself, if something were less in the word than in himself, not that he personally begot himself, but because by speaking he begot one most similar to himself.

To the other it must be said, that although in the image it is so, that there is mind, intellect, and will, yet in divine things these are not so: because the Father is not the mind of the three or memory, nor the Son the intelligence of the three, nor the Holy Spirit the will of the three: but these are essential in divine things: and therefore to say properly suits the paternal intellect, according to which to say is taken notionally.

Articulus 11 — Whether, As It Is Said, The Word Is The Same As Native Wisdom, So It Can Be Said That The Holy Spirit Is Proceeding Goodness

Whether, as it is said, the Word is the same as begotten wisdom: thus it can be said, that the Holy Spirit is proceeding goodness?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, in the same place, F, the Son is the Word, the same as begotten wisdom, etc.

1. For by the same reasoning it seems it can be said, that the Holy Spirit is proceeding goodness.
2. Likewise, if "begotten" indicates a notion, as Augustine says, and wisdom the essence, just as the Father is the essence which the Son has begotten, thus it seems the Father is wise with begotten or generated wisdom, since wisdom denotes the essence, as Augustine says: and this is false.

Solution. Concerning this, it is treated below in the Letter: and therefore here it can be briefly said to the first, that there is not the same reasoning concerning goodness and wisdom: because goodness only indicates the object of charity, but wisdom in some way according to the reasoning of the name indicates that which is the Word, as it is saying the Father, and all created things: and therefore wisdom can more receive the notion of the Word, than goodness of the Holy Spirit.

To the other it must be said, that although wisdom is essential, nevertheless begotten wisdom at the same time is drawn to the notional: just as also the Master explains in the Letter, that the same is begotten wisdom and begotten wise: and therefore the Father cannot be said to be wise with generated wisdom: nor does this follow: he is wise with the wisdom which is the Son: therefore he is wise with generated wisdom: because the "what" is changed into "to something."

DISTINCTIO XXIX

Divisio Textus

There is moreover another name, indicating a multiple relation, etc.

Here the Master determines concerning the common spiration which is neither a property of the person, nor personal, but a notion and relation.

However, this distinction is divided into three parts: in the first of which he shows the commonality of this name, principle. In the second, how the Father and the Son are the principle of the Holy Spirit, there, C, Then in the same book he continuously shows, etc. In the third he inquires, Whether they are one principle by notion, or diverse? there, D, The Father and the Son are one principle, etc.

The first has three chapters: in the first of which he says that principle is said in three ways, as is clear in the Letter. In the second he shows that it is said personally from eternity, but essentially to the creature it is said temporally, there, B, The Father from eternity is the principle of the Son, etc. Then he determines, from which sense all things are said to be from God as from a principle, there in the middle of chapter B, When therefore we have heard all things are from God, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Principle Is Univocal In Its Three Accounts, Namely Notional, Personal, And Essential; And Whether The Father Is Said To Be The Principle Of The Son, And The Father And The Son The Principle Of The Holy Spirit, Univocally

Whether the principle is univocal in its threefold consideration, namely notional, personal, and essential? And, whether the Father is called the principle of the Son, and the Father and the Son the principle of the Holy Spirit univocally?

Here, however, before the Letter, two things are to be inquired: of which the first is, Whether the principle is univocal in its threefold consideration?

Secondly, Whether it is first said by the intellect essentially or personally?

To the first, it is proceeded thus:
1. The eternal and the temporal are not univocal in one: but in the Letter we have, that the principle of creatures is from time, but of persons from eternity: therefore they are not univocal in one: therefore the principle said notionally, personally, and essentially, are not univocal.

1. Likewise, the principle said to creatures and to persons is not founded upon the same respect, or of one reason: because one is of essence, and the other only of person: therefore the principle which is caused by such is not of one reason.
2. Likewise, if they were of one reason, it would be necessary that they unite in some one nature existing in them: and this is not true, because essence is not the principle of the Holy Spirit, although essence is the principle of creatures.
3. Likewise, to create, to breathe, and to generate are different acts by reason: therefore it seems that they do not agree in one reason of principle: because the reason of principle is taken from such acts.

Further, it is inquired for the sake of the first part, namely that it is said the Father is the principle of the Son, and the Father and the Son the principle of the Holy Spirit, whether it is said univocally?

And it seems that it is not: because
1. To generate and to breathe are not univocal acts: therefore neither is the reason of principle which is taken from such acts.

1. Likewise, the principle of the Son and the principle which is the Son, it is impossible that they are of the same reason in the divine: because the principle of the Son can never be the Son, but he himself is the principle of the Holy Spirit: therefore they are not of the same reason.
2. Likewise, they do not name the same notion: therefore they are not of the same reason, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Basil says that to receive is common to the Son with every creature, but to have by essence is proper: but what he receives causes the reason of principle: therefore the reason of the principle of the Son and of the creature is according to something common: therefore univocal. By the same reason, the principle by which the Father and the Son are the principle of the Holy Spirit will also be univocal.

1. Likewise, the multitude and paucity of supposits do not make an equivocal term: but the principle of creatures agrees to three, the principle of the Holy Spirit to two, and the principle of the Son to one, therefore it seems that they differ only in more and fewer supposits: therefore the principle is not equivocal in those significations.

2. Likewise, species with genus does not make equivocation: therefore when the principle is said commonly, and specified by generating, breathing, creating, it will not have equivocation in those species.

3. Likewise, for the sake of the notional principle it is objected, that the relation will not be equivocal, as it seems, provided that it is univocal upon which it is founded: but the principle by which the Father is the principle of the Son is founded upon the act of nature by which the Son receives essence from the Father, and in the same way the Holy Spirit receives the whole essence as the Son: therefore the principle seems to be said univocally.

Therefore, it must be said that the principle can be taken in two ways, namely from the common reason of receiving from another: and this is common to the eternal principle and the temporal by prior and posterior, as Basil intimates: and that is univocal to generation and spiration, not by univocation of genus or species, but of proportion: this proportion is founded upon this commonality, that just as the Son has essence from another and not from himself, so neither does the Holy Spirit, and conversely. But if the reason of the principle is taken from the special mode of receiving, namely by generation, spiration, creation, then it will be said in three reasons of three: and by this the solution to the whole is now clear.

To the first, it must be said that although nothing is univocal to the temporal and the eternal, yet something is analogous by the analogy often determined above: and this is equivocal in that it can induce a sophistical place, which is equivocation: but it is not equivocal by chance and fortune, but according to prior and posterior said: and this intimates Basil's saying that to receive is common to the Son with every creature, but to have by nature is proper, who alone is from the nature of the Father.

To the other, it must be said that the respect in the common analogy is one, as has already been said, by which it is determined to receive this and that in common.

To the other, it must be said that they unite in the common reception by the said analogy.

To the other, it must be said that that reason proceeds from the reason of the principle from the special mode of receiving said, and that is not univocal.

To what is further inquired, it must be said that those reasons induced all proceed from the principle said from the species, and not from the common in genus or proportion: and it is true that it is not of one reason to the Son and to the Holy Spirit.

To those which are objected on the contrary, it must be said that Basil does not attend to receive except in the community of analogy, and not in the community of univocation.

To the other, it must be said that it is not only the multitude and paucity of supposits, but also by another and another reason said of them, according to which the reason of the principle is taken from the special act.

To the other, the solution is now clear by the things said in the beginning of this solution.

To the last, it must be said that although each receives, yet they do not receive by the same reason, nor by the same act: and upon that the relation is principally founded, and not upon nature, as the objection supposes.

Articulus 2 — Whether, According To The Notion Of Understanding, A Principle Said According To Essence Is Before A Principle Said Notionally, Or Conversely

Whether according to the reason of understanding the principle according to essence is said before the principle notionally said, or conversely?

Whether according to the reason of understanding the principle according to essence is said before the principle notionally
said, or conversely?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether according to the reason of understanding the principle according to essence is said before the principle said notionally, or conversely?

And it seems that what is said essentially is before: because

1. According to the reason of understanding, essence is before person: therefore what is said essentially is before what is said personally.
   The first is proved by what was held above, that person is from essence as if formally, and not conversely.

2. Likewise, In every nature in which there is an order of nature, nature is before that order according to the reason of understanding:
   but the principle of creation is of nature, and the notional principle is of the order of nature:
   therefore the principle of creatures is before the principle said personally.

3. Likewise, The absolute is before the relative: because, as was said above by Augustine, every relative is also something else, and otherwise it would not be relative, because otherwise it would be necessary that relation be founded on nothing: therefore since the principle of creatures is of those said absolutely, because of essence, and the principle said personally is of the relatives, the principle said essentially to creatures will be before the principle said personally to the person of the Son and Holy Spirit.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. From eternity the Father is the principle of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, but in time is the principle of creatures: and the eternal is before the temporal: therefore the principle said notionally is before the principle said essentially.

1. Likewise, Anselm wishes that the procession of persons is the cause of the procession of creatures: and this also Augustine intimates, when he explains that, God said, let this or that be made, that is, the Word begot in which it was to be made.

Solution. To this it is easy to solve:
because a similar question was held above concerning the power of generating, and the power of creating. And it must be said that the principle said notionally is before the principle said essentially to the creature simply, but in a certain respect it is conversely: because if the principle is taken from relation alone, or from that in which is the relation, namely essence, then from eternity

God is the principle of creatures, and this is the principle in a certain respect and not in act: and thus the first reasons proceed.
But if it is taken in the true reason of principle, it will be taken from act: and thus the reasons made in the contrary proceed.

Articulus 3 — According To What Account Principle Is Taken When It Is Said, The Father Is A Principle Without Principle, Either Essentially Or Notionally

According to what reason is the principle taken, when it is said, the Father is a principle without principle: either essentially, or notionally?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, at the end of chapter A, Therefore the Father is a principle without principle, etc.

1. It is asked, According to what reason is the principle taken, when it is said, the Father is a principle without principle: either essentially, or notionally? If essentially: therefore it will be taken in the same reason, when it is said, the Son is a principle from a principle: and thus he will have an essential principle: therefore either in such a way that he is from the essence, or in such a way that his essence has a beginning like a creature: and both are heretical: therefore the principle is not taken essentially. But if it is taken personally: therefore it will be taken in the same way, when it is said, that the Holy Spirit is a principle from both principles: and this again is false, because the Holy Spirit is the principle of no person. But if you say, that it is taken differently, when it is said of the Father, that he is a principle not from a principle: and differently of the Son, when it is said, that he is a principle from a principle: and differently of the Holy Spirit, when it is said, that he is a principle from both principles: this is nothing: because since this is the assignment of a certain division, there will be no division unless the principle is taken in one reason.

1. Likewise, When the Father is said to be a principle not from a principle: either the principle negated and affirmed is taken in the same way, or not. If in the same way: therefore just as he is not from a principle generating and spirating, so he will be the principle of both the Son and the Holy Spirit, because a term once posited is not to be used equivocally: and this is false. But if in different ways: then he speaks without art.

In the same way, it is objected concerning this, the Son is a principle from a principle: and this, the Holy Spirit is a principle from both principles.

The solution to this is light, if the aforementioned in the two prior questions are considered. And it must be said, that the principle is taken in the common reason of analogy. Hence when it is said, the Father is a principle without principle, it is taken without principle in a common way, and to be a principle in a common way: and similarly of the Son: for it suffices for the truth of the proposition, that it is verified in one way of him: just as if in one way a man is white, he is white. Thus in one way being from a principle, he is from a principle and not without principle: and in one way being a principle, he is a principle: but it is not so in negatives: and therefore the argumentation which some make is not valid, the Son in one way is not from a principle, because he is not from a principle creating, and in another way is from a principle generating: therefore it can only be said not from a principle as from a principle.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Father And The Son Are One Principle Of The Holy Spirit, Or Several

Whether the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit, or several?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

The Father and the Son are the principle of the Holy Spirit, etc.

Therefore, either they are one principle, or several. If several principles: this is denied in the Literal in the last and penultimate chapter of this distinction. But if they are one principle.

Against: 1. Whatever things are numbered, receive number from supposits: but the Father and the Son are said to be several supposits, therefore when the term "principle" is placed in those supposits, it necessarily receives plurality and thus the Father and the Son are several principles of the Holy Spirit.

1. Likewise, if they are one principle: either one which is the Father, or one which is not the Father. If one which is the Father: therefore the Father and the Son are the Father, which is false. If one which is not the Father: therefore the Father is not the principle of the Holy Spirit, which again is false: therefore in that they are one principle of the Holy Spirit.
2. Likewise, either principle signifies essence, or notion, or person. If essence: therefore it would also pertain to the Holy Spirit, which is false. If notion. Against: One property in number does not pertain to distinct supposits: but the Father and the Son are distinct supposits: therefore they are not determined by one notion. If person: then the Father and the Son will be one person, which again is false: therefore in no way are the Father and the Son one principle.

Furthermore, if they are one principle, what unites them in the reason of principle? for nothing unites persons in the divine except essence: therefore it seems that they breathe the Holy Spirit, insofar as they are one in essence: and this Anselm expressly says. But since the Holy Spirit is one in essence with them, it follows from this that he himself breathes the Holy Spirit: and this is false.

Solution. It should be noted that concerning this there are five diverse opinions.

Some say that when it is said, the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit, that the term "one" signifies the unity of essence. And they rely on the authority of Anselm. And to the argument which is made against, they respond that it signifies the unity of essence not simply, but in the persons of the Father and the Son as they relate in one way to the Holy Spirit whom they breathe: and although it is the same essence in the Holy Spirit, it is not compared to the same, because not to the same reason of principle: and they must say that principle signifies the reason which is the reason of the act of breathing according to what is in the Father and the Son, and they are one in essence. And this opinion is not very irrational, although some reject it because it does not seem to be well understood in the exposition, which is here set forth.

Others say that the term "one" here signifies the unity of agreement, and not the unity of essence, or person, or notion: and therefore the sense is, the Father and the Son are one principle, that is, they are one principle: so that "one" is taken almost adverbially. And this is nothing: because the unity of agreement does not make one notion in number: but it is evident that one notion in number is that by which the Father and the Son breathe the Holy Spirit, as is shown in the treatise on the Holy Spirit.

Others say that "one" denotes only a sign of union in love, so that the sense is, the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit, that is, the Holy Spirit is a sign, that he is from them insofar as they are one: because just as from the same insofar as the same, there is only one: so one insofar as one, is not from diverse insofar as they are diverse: and this was introduced by Simon of Tournai.

The fourth say that "one principle" is a name specially invented for this, so that by it is expressed the mode of existence of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son: and therefore it does not require a plural number because of the distinction of supposits: because it is invented so that by it is expressed the mode of existence of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son: and therefore it does not require a plural number because of the distinction of supposits, because it is invented for this that it signifies the unity of notion in two supposits. But if from these is asked the reason for the invention of this name rather than another, then they must return to the question: and therefore among all this opinion is the least probable.

The fifth say, and this pleases me more, that it signifies the unity of notion in two supposits united in nature, and in the spirative or principative power of the Holy Spirit.

And according to this it must be responded.

To the first, that the term "principle" determines the person of the Father and the Son, not in that they are distinct, because the reason for their distinction is not the reason why the Holy Spirit is from them: because paternity expresses the common reason by which the Son is from the Father, and filiation expresses the reason why the Son relates to the Father: but it is determined by the principle which is in them as the spirative power: and because in that the Father and the Son are one, therefore it cannot draw the number of the principle denoting that from the plurality of supposits. And it is similar, as if we suppose Paul and John to be one in essence, and diverse in persons, but to be something from them insofar as they are one: for that will not be predicated of them plurally: because although it agrees with their supposits to do that and not with the essence, nevertheless the reason for that is not taken from the reason of their distinction. And so it is here: because it is fitting for the Father and the Son to breathe the Holy Spirit, and the act itself which they breathe is only of the supposits: nevertheless because the reason for the act is not taken from the reason of their distinction, therefore it is not necessary that the name which denotes the reason of that relation takes plurality from the plurality of supposits.

To the other, it must be said that they are one principle which is separately the Father, and which is the Son: because the reason of the principle is not from the distinction of the Father and the Son. And if further it is inferred: therefore the Father is the Son: it must be said that this does not hold: but it follows: therefore the Father and the Son are one principle, or the Father and the Son are in the same reason a principle, or the Father is a principle in the same reason in which the Son is, and conversely. For when it is said the principle which is the Father, the article denotes the implication and determination of the supposit, and the supposit of the Father is not the supposit of the Son. But when it is said one principle, only the unity of the reason of the act in them is denoted, according to which the Holy Spirit proceeds from them, without such determination of this or that supposit in which they are distinct.

To the other, it must be said that it expresses the unity of the notion. To the objection against, it must be said that one notion does not agree with distincts as they are distinct, but insofar as they are one in spirative power, and that is one in number in them: for the power of breathing expresses the nature in the Father and the Son as by the virtue of which they have that they breathe, and the principle expresses the reason of the act: just as also the power of generating and the Father, as we said above.

Articulus 5 — Whether Just As The Father And The Son And The Holy Spirit Are Called One Creator, So The Father And The Son Can Be Called One Spirator

Whether just as the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are called one creator, so the Father and the Son can be called one spirator?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said in the second part of the distinction, there, To the creature there is one principle, just as one creator.

1. For by similarity it seems that also the Father and the Son are one spirator to the Holy Spirit.

Likewise, they are one in spirating: therefore, one spirator.

1. Likewise, they are not called one principle except by reason of spiration: therefore, it seems that they are rather one spirator than one principle.
2. Likewise, principle denotes order to act and the reason of the act: therefore, if they are called as spirator: therefore, just as they are called one principle, so they ought to be called one spirator.
3. Likewise, the act of spirating is one in them: therefore, since spirator is a verbal noun, denoting the exercise of that act, they are and are called one spirator.

ON THE CONTRARY:
They are two who spirate: therefore, they are two spirators: however, it does not follow, they are two who are principle: therefore, they are two principles.

Solution. It must be said that the Father and the Son are not one spirating, nor one spirator, but two spirating and two spirators. And the cause of this is: because participles and verbs and all verbal nouns take the mode of signifying from the verbal act, either with time or without time signified, and however essential some things are, when they are signified in the mode of act with time, they take plurality from supposits, as is clear when it is said: I and the Father are one, where the substantive verb signifying essence falls into plurality: because it cannot be understood how from three supposits one act proceeds with time signified as in the verb or participle it is signified. And therefore we say that the Father and the Son are many who spirate, and many spirating, and many spirators. But it is true that this last has less of propriety than the first two:

however, because spirator is a verbal noun, therefore also predicated of diverse supposits it is treated in plurality.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that it is not similar: because creator denotes the act of essence or substance, and not of the supposit which is person, in this mode of taking person by which faith distinguishes persons: but spirator denotes a personal act.

To the second, the solution is clear from what was said before.

To the other, it must be said that principle denotes order to act by this that it denotes the reason of the act which is notion: but spirator denotes the exercise of that act.

To the last, it must be said that although the act is one, it is not however signified as one, when it is referred to many supposits: and this happens more in the verb and participle: and also in the verbal noun it happens, although less by this that it is abstracted from time.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Father And The Son Are The Same Principle Of The Holy Spirit

Whether the Father and the Son are the same principle of the Holy Spirit?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said in the third part, there in the middle of chapter C, "Relatively to the Holy Spirit they are one principle."

For it is asked here according to this, Whether the Father and the Son are the same principle of the Holy Spirit?

However, it seems that they are, because

1. Unity in substantial things makes the same: therefore, since the principle does not belong to the Father and the Son accidentally, as is often proven above, it seems that since the Father and the Son are one principle, they are the same principle of the Holy Spirit.
2. Likewise, unity not multiplied makes the same: but here the unity of the principle in the Father and the Son is not multiplied: therefore it makes the same: therefore they are the same principle of the Holy Spirit.

3. Likewise, the same and different divide being: therefore they are either the same principle or different: but it is clear that they are not different: therefore the same.

ON THE CONTRARY:
That identity will either be substantial, notional, or personal. It is clear that it is not notional: because if it made identity in distinct persons, then also notional diversity would make diversity in the same person, and thus the Father would be different from the Father in three ways, and the Son would be different from himself because of the two notions he has: both of which are false. But if it denotes personal identity: then the principle would posit persons: and we could not say that the Father and the Son are one principle, which is denied in the Letter: because according to this the Father and the Son would be the same person. But if it denotes identity of essence, then it would also belong to the Holy Spirit.

Solution. It must be said that it is not conceded by the Masters that the Father and the Son are the same principle of the Holy Spirit: because this name "same" due to the included article is distinctive of the supposit, and would denote identity of supposit in the Father and the Son.

TO THE FIRST, therefore, it must be said that in substantial things in which there is unity in every respect in supposit, essence, and notion, that unity causes the same, but not in those in which there is not unity in every respect.

To the second, it must be said in the same way, that although that unity is not multiplied by reason of notion, yet it supposes many in the supposits: and therefore it cannot cause the same.

To the third, it must be said that the same and different follow being and divide it where they are attributed for the sake of the same: but here it is not so: for the same regards the supposit, and therefore it does not agree: and in this sense it would indeed be different: but different properly regards essence: and therefore again it does not agree, as was held above. But in inferiors in which the unity of supposit follows the unity of essence, and conversely, and the diversity of essence the diversity of supposits, and conversely, in respect of the same they can be attributed: and therefore there they divide being.

Articulus 7 — Whether For The Notion By Which The Father And The Son Are Called The Principle Of The Holy Spirit, We Do Not Have A Proper Name

Whether the notion by which the Father and the Son are called the principle of the Holy Spirit does not have a proper name?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says in the last part where he says: If indeed it is asked, what is that notion which he notes there as principle? We do not have its name, etc.

It seems that he speaks falsely: because we call it common spiration.

Furthermore, why is it that there is not a proper name for that notion, as there are names for others?

Solution. It must be said that it could not have the name of a property, because it does not pertain to one alone. Similarly, it could not have the name of a relation, because a relation is founded upon one supposit: but this upon two: and since every notion is by the mode of an adhering form, although in reality it is substantial, therefore the name of a property, as it is in two, since every form is in one, will be repugnant to the imposition of names: and therefore this in both is not named.

Likewise, we can say that just as the Holy Spirit, because he is common to the Father and the Son, has a proper name which is common to both, so also because he proceeds from both, the procession ought to be assigned by a common notion.

Articulus 8 — Whether, If "Principle" Signifies A Notion, We Can Say "Principle" Of A Principle

Whether the principle signifies a notion, whether we can say principle of a principle?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

It is not paternity itself or filiation: rather a certain notion which is of the Father, etc.

Here two things are asked, of which the first is, If the principle signifies a notion, whether we can say principle of a principle.

The second is, Why God is not called fivefold from five notions, and the Father is not called threefold from three notions, and the Son twofold from two: just as God is called threefold on account of three persons?

To the first it is proceeded thus:
Above it was held, that we can only say this of that with essential names: but we can say principle of a principle: therefore principle does not signify a notion, as the Master expressly says here.

Solution. It must be said, that principle is taken in three ways, namely commonly to the essential and personal. Likewise, commonly to the procession of the Son and the Holy Spirit. And specially to the special procession of the Holy Spirit. And in the first way alone can principle be said of a principle, and not in the second: because thus it is essential when it is taken commonly. Hence that objection does not proceed.

Further it is said, that principle is said with respect to the creature, and this is essential: and with respect to the person, and this is notional: and according to the first it is said here principle of a principle, and not in the second way.

Articulus 9 — Why From The Quinary Of Notions God Is Not Called Quinary

Why is God not called "quinus" from the quinary of notions?

Secondly, it is asked, Why is God not called "quinus" from the quinary of notions?

It seems that it ought to be so: because 1. Just as the number of persons relates to the essence, so the number of notions relates to the person: but the unity of essence does not exclude that God is called "trinus" because of the three persons: therefore the unity of the person of the Father does not exclude that the person of the Father is called "trina," and the person of the Son "bina," and God "quinus."

1. Likewise, there are five notions: therefore there is a quinary of notions: and there is also the unity of essence. Therefore, since the unity of essence and the ternary of persons suffice for the concept of "trinus," the same unity with the quinary of notions will suffice for the concept of "quinus."
2. Likewise, it follows well, there is a quinary of stones: therefore there are five stones. Therefore it similarly seems to follow, there is a quinary of notions in the divine: therefore there are five known: but five known are five persons: therefore there are five persons in the divine.
3. Likewise, nothing is numerable in the divine, unless it consists in plurality: but that which is absolute does not consist in plurality: therefore only that which is towards another is numbered: but this is only the notion: therefore only notions are numbered: therefore it seems that it ought to be called "quinus" rather than "trinus."

Solution. It must be said that in no nature does a property as a property make the number simply which is of supposits, unless by effectively constituting persons: and this is done only by a personal property: and therefore three properties in the divine only make the number: and three hypostases are numbered in the way that number can be in the divine.

To the FIRST, however, some respond that innascibility and principle are as if parts of paternity, and are one in the Father. And this is absurd, that one notion is a part of another, since the number of them is taken from the modes of being known, or of referring, as was held above. Although all five notions in essence are one which is essence, they are not, however, one notion: hence this is nothing. But it must be said that the notions are distinct: yet the person is not called "trina" or "bina" from them: because a notion does not make a number unless it is personal, and it is not numbered, but rather the hypostasis: and therefore the number of the notion has less of the concept of number than of persons.

To the SECOND it must be said that five notions do not make five persons which are fitting to be numbered under essence: because a notion does not signify an existing per se perfect, and distinct in itself, like a person, but rather signifies an existing in another according to the mode in which that in which it is, is known: and many such modes can agree to one supposit.

To the other it must be said that it does not follow: just as it does not follow, there is a quinary of modes of being known of stones: therefore there are five stones. Nor does it follow, there are five modes by which this is known or referred: therefore there are five known: because in many ways one and the same can be known and referred.

To the LAST it must be said that it proceeds from falsehoods: because a hypostasis which is not absolute is enumerated in the divine: and to this number is properly attributed, and not to the property, or notion.

DISTINCTIO XXX

Divisio Textus

For there are certain things which are said of God from time, and are fitting to Him temporally, etc. Here begins that part in which it treats of those relatives which are fitting to God from time.

However, this part is divided into two parts: in the first of which he determines concerning those things which are fitting to God temporally. In the second, however, he resolves the question which he deferred in Distinction XVIII, last chapter, Whether the Holy Spirit, when He is said to be given temporally, is referred to Himself: and this begins in the last chapter of this distinction, there, C, Here the question proposed above can be resolved, etc.

In the first part, four things are determined according to the four chapters which are introduced here: of which the first is that certain things are fitting to God temporally. The second, however, is the solution of the objection, whether He is the lord of time from time, there, B, But here someone will say, etc. In the third, he resolves the question, Whether according to this, that something is said temporally of God, something happens to God? there, B, §2: How then will we obtain, etc. In the fourth, he specifies concerning certain things fitting to God temporally, such as refuge, salvation, father, lord, and suchlike, according to which He is called ours, as was determined above: and this begins there, in the middle of chapter B, §3: How also is He called our refuge? etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Something Is Said Of God Temporally

Whether something is said of God temporally?

Here first arises the question, whether something is said of God temporally, or not?

It seems that it is not:

1. For every predication is either per se or per accidens: however, a predication per accidens is in two ways, namely, either because the nature of the predicate is accidental, or because it agrees by the grace of another, as it agrees with a figure to have three angles equal to two right angles, or with an isosceles. If therefore the temporal is predicated of God: either it is predicated per se: and then it always agrees: because whatever agrees per se, always agrees: therefore these are predicated from eternity: therefore what is also predicated only from time, is predicated from eternity, which is false. But if they are predicated per accidens: either in the first way, and then an accident is in God, and from this many inconveniences follow, namely first, that He is composite, because an accident is not present except in a composite. Secondly, that He is changed per accidens. Thirdly, that something is in Him, which is not Himself. Fourthly, that He is not the first: because the first is altogether immobile: and many other things which are easy to conclude from this.

If perhaps it is said on account of this, that they are predicated per accidens, according to which an accident is agreeable by another: that other will either be inferior, or superior: just as

I see, that having three angles equal to two right angles is accidental to a figure, and accidental to an isosceles: indeed to an isosceles, because it does not agree with it by its own grace, but by the grace of a superior which is a rectilinear triangle: however, to a figure, because it agrees by the grace of an inferior: and whatever will be said, it will be absurd: because genus and species and suchlike are not in God. Nor can you say, that it agrees by the grace of one attribute, and not by the grace of another: because by the grace of essence it agrees with Him to create.

1. If perhaps on account of this you would want to say, that it is predicated by cause. Against: There is a different predication when it is said, the day is the sun shining upon the earth: and another when it is said, the sun by shining makes the day: because when it is said the sun shining upon the earth, it does not follow: therefore the sun is the day: but when it is said, the sun by shining makes the day, the act of the sun is predicated. Similarly, when it is said, God is creator, it seems to be predicated here what is only in God, and His proper act not agreeing with another: therefore it is not predicated according to cause.

Likewise, When it is said, the day is, etc., I can infer: therefore the day is from the sun shining upon the earth: if therefore the predication is similar, when it is said, God is creator, it seems that I can infer: therefore the creator is from God: and this is false: therefore those are not predicated of God by cause.

1. Likewise also, according to the grammarian, verbal names ending in or signify the relation of the substance of the agent to the act: since therefore to create is the proper act of God, which cannot even be communicated by any creature, it is not predicated by cause only of God as creator, but rather by essence.
2. Likewise, What is predicated by cause, signifies that which does not agree with the same of which it is predicated by its own essence: as if I say thus, digestion is completion by natural and proper heat from opposing passions, I cannot infer, that natural heat is digestion: therefore if similarly the predication were by cause, we could not infer, that God is creator.
3. Likewise, In all other efficient causes I see, that there is not predication according to cause, but rather by inherence, when they are said of those which denote the proper act of that cause: therefore also here the predication is by identity according to inherence: since therefore they cannot agree thus, it is clear that nothing seems to be said of God from time.
4. Likewise, What is predicated of something, is either convertible with the subject, or of the nature of the subject, or agreeing per accidens: therefore if these are predicated of God, either they are predicated convertibly, and this is false, since they do not agree from eternity: or as beings of the nature of the subject, that is, of God of whom they are predicated, and this again is false, because thus they would be prior: and this is false, because they are posterior, since they do not agree from eternity: or per accidens, and this again is false, since nothing is accidental to God.

If on account of this it is said, that nothing from time agrees with God. Against this is all that is held in the Letter, Solution. It must be said, that many things from time agree with God, as it is said in the Letter: nor are they predicated in one way: but some are predicated by cause, as salvation, which is to be explained according to Augustine, that is, from Him is my salvation: and thus also it is said my hope, and my patience. However, some, as Damascene says, are said, which predicate the relation to those from which they are distinguished, as creator, shepherd, father, and suchlike: for since authority tells us what suchlike predicate, because the relation to those from which they are distinguished, and here we have that according to relation they are said of God, we cannot deny that they are predicated of Him, and not according to cause. And this seems absurd to me, that it is said in the same way God is our creator, and our salvation, or our hope.

To what is first objected, it must be said that suchlike predicate as to what it predicates, is of per se agreeing, that is, substantially, because it predicates the substance of God: however, as to the mode of signifying or predicating, it predicates it as having itself to another which it brought into being, and this is not placed in the substance of God itself, but rather in the dependence of the thing which it brought into being to itself: because indeed suchlike dependence is not to be understood by our intellect, unless we also understand the relation of God to the creature, therefore according to intellect we name the essence in that relation. If you ask, whether something corresponds in reality? it must be said that yes, namely that most true action, by which He brought the creature into being: which although it is that substance, yet it is not signified in the same way: and that mode of signifying is imported in the name.

To what is asked, Whether it is a predicate per se agreeing, etc. I say, that it agrees per se, that He Himself is creator: because it agrees with Him alone: yet it is not necessary, that it always agrees: and this is because it names the agent cause by intellect and will: and therefore although it agrees with Him alone, and by the grace of His essence and omnipotence, yet it is not necessary that it always agrees.

Some however say, that it agrees per accidens, and they distinguish a twofold per accidens, namely that which is an inherent accident, and that which agrees by the grace of another which is extraneous, because it is not present on account of itself: and thus they say, that it agrees with God to be creator by the grace of the connoted in the creature, and not by the grace of itself. But this I do not dare to say, that something agrees with God not by the grace of itself: because rather it agrees with the connoted to be by the grace of the divine essence, than conversely. Hence it seems to me to be said in the first way, that suchlike words signify the divine essence with relation in the mode of signifying to which the act of the first agent is subject: which although it is the same in substance with God, yet it is different in the mode of signifying, and it agrees with Him by the grace of the agent's power. Nor yet does it follow, that it agrees from eternity: because that relation which it imports with the essence, our intellect does not finish without the creature to which it relates. Hence although it has itself in one way from eternity, and does not create in mode as to itself, yet the creature is created in mode, and before it is not created: and this happens on account of the wisdom predestining and preordaining the exit of creatures into being. Hence it does not follow, that it always agrees: because it is otherwise in voluntary things, and otherwise in those which act beyond intention and will by nature alone.

But what is said, that suchlike are predicated according to cause, although some say this, yet it does not seem reasonable to me: and therefore I concede those things which are brought forward to disprove this.

To the other it must be said, that although in other efficient causes it is predicated inherently that which denotes the act of the cause, yet it is not so in the first cause: because its act is its substance, although it is not signified in that mode, but in relation to the effect: which relation does not denote change in the cause, but in the effect, as will be clear below: and in the cause it denotes nothing, because it denotes the act which agrees with the person, as to create, which does not agree with any created.

To the other it must be said, that it is not predicated according to conversion as to always, but it is well predicated according to conversion as to only: because it agrees with God alone to be creator. If however it is asked, Why not always? It must be said, that the work of God is the will of God according to the act producing the willed: and that indeed is from eternity, as then it is produced, although the thing is not produced from eternity: and since this name creator names the producing act itself, therefore it does not agree from eternity, and it adds nothing except relation to the effect, which indeed is the relation of God in our intellect, founded upon the agent's power or act: and therefore the intellect is not void. Hence it does not avail, it predicates the essence of God: therefore it agrees from eternity: because it does not predicate the essence absolutely, but in the relation of the agent cause according to act, as has been said.

Articulus 2 — Whether These Names, Creator, Lord, King, Etc., Predicate Some Accident In God

Whether these names, creator, lord, king, etc., predicate some accident in God?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

They are said relatively according to accident, not that it happens to God, but that it happens to creatures, etc.

For it seems that they predicate an accident which happens to God: because

1. An accident is, as the Philosopher says, that which can be present and not present in the same: but to be a creator can be for God to be and not to be: therefore it seems that these belong to God by accident.
2. Likewise, when it is said creator or lord, this accident of the relation of cause, or of the supposition of dominion, is in something: either in God, or in the creature. If in God, I have the proposition, that some accident is in God. If in the creature: but to whomever the relation which this name creator imports and which lord imports belongs, there it belongs to be creator and lord: therefore the creature is creator and lord of the creature, which is false: therefore it seems that it is necessary that it be posited to be in the creator.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. A simple form cannot be a subject: but God is a simple form: therefore he cannot be a subject: therefore in him there is no accident.

1. Likewise, an accident belongs only to a composite: therefore if an accident is in God, he is composite: and from this follow all absurdities, which also in the first article of this distinction are concluded.

Solution. It must be said that these names do not predicate an accident by proper predication, but by consequence: for it was said above that they predicate the essence in relation to the effect in the creature: whence that added relation consequently leads to the effect. And this is the accident which is consequently understood from their relation, namely the dependence of the creature on God according to the coming into being: or according to supposition, as lord: or according to kingdom, as king: for this dependence is in the effect, and not in God, although it is signified in a certain relation to that which depends on him: and therefore the variation of the creature from non-being to being brings about the name: and therefore the Master says that it names an accident, because it happens to the creature, and not to God.

To the first it must be said that it does not belong to God to be present, or not to be present: because it is implied there that it is present as an accident: but it can be signified in relation to that which sometimes is, and sometimes is not, because of the dependence of the created on him, and because of the act by which he brings forth into being: and from this he himself is not changed who from eternity holds himself in the same way: but rather that which holds itself to him to which he is, as to himself dependent, is named by such a name.

To the other it must be said that this relation is in our intellect, and posits in God the essence signified in such a way, yet it does not posit anything new: for there are certain relatives, to whose coming and going the change of the other extremes suffices, as we said above: and if they are named from the relation by which they hold themselves to their correlatives, the relation posits nothing in them except the relation existing in reason alone: yet more still is here, because the divine act: which although it is essence, as was said, yet is not signified in the same way, just as also predestination which is only of future things because of the relation imported by the preposition.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Aforementioned Names Signify The Essence Or Something Else

Whether the aforementioned names signify the essence or something else?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, "This relative appellation from time is to God."

Further, it is inquired here, what do names of this kind signify? For they either signify the essence, or towards something. If the essence alone: therefore they are fitting to Him from eternity. If towards something, since these are not fitting from eternity, as the relations of the persons, something is added to God.

Likewise, this rule is true which the Doctors give: Every name signifying an effect in the creature signifies the divine essence: therefore it seems that they signify the essence, and nothing more.

Solution. It must be said that here the Doctors are diversified in three ways. Some say that in a name there are two things, namely, that to which it is imposed, and that from which it is imposed: and names of this kind, as to that to which they are imposed, signify the essence: but as to that from which they are imposed, they signify a relation to those by which God is distinguished, or the divine essence: and therefore for the sake of that...

they are not said from eternity. But against these it is objected: because from whom this name "creator" is imposed, it is the act of creating: and that does not belong except to the creating God: and if "creator" sounds in habit or power, and not in act, the proposition is more easily held: because power and such habit do not belong except to God. Therefore, some wish to amend the solution of these: and they say that such names, both with respect to that to which they are imposed, and with respect to that from which they are imposed, signify the divine essence, but on account of the connoted they do not belong from eternity: and this is laughable, that "creator," "king," and suchlike, are imposed from the divine essence, since these names altogether suggest something else, as Damascene says, that they signify the relation of those from which the essence and God are distinguished. And therefore the opinion of Damascene pleases me, that they signify the essence under such a relation to inferiors: which relation is founded in the relation of the thing to itself, and in the act by which it brings forth or governs them. Hence creation holds itself on the part of the creature: but the act of creating is in God, and is the same as Himself, because it is His will that it then be done: and in such a relation the name is imposed: and therefore although it signifies the essence, it does not, however, belong from eternity, because such a relation as a relation was not from eternity, although the essence was thus disposed from eternity: and therefore it is well conceded, that they say such names are relative with respect to that from which they are imposed.

Articulus 4 — Whether Time Can Be Said To Have Begun

Whether time can be said to have begun?

Whether time can be said to have begun?

Then it is asked concerning what is said in the second part, there, B, "It does not take from time to be the lord of time."

From this it seems that time began: and this seems to be against certain philosophers. For the Philosopher says in VIII Physics, that Plato alone generated time, and says it began with the heavens: and he says this reproaching Plato. And if it is said that he speaks falsely, what will be answered to his arguments thus?

1. Whatever is always taken in its beginning and end according to substance, it never begins nor ends: time or times are always taken in their beginning and end according to substance: therefore it never begins nor ends. The first is evident by itself: because a thing beginning is not taken in its end, but a thing ending is not taken in its beginning. The second is proven from this, that of time nothing is taken except the now which is its substance: and that is the beginning and the end: according to the past indeed the end, and according to the future the beginning: therefore before any now there was time, and after any now there will be time.
2. Likewise, if it began: either it began in itself, or in another. If in itself: therefore it was before it began. If in another: therefore it was in that, which again is absurd.
3. Likewise, either it began in the divisible, or in the indivisible. If in the divisible: therefore since before that there was a part of the divisible, and it was not, before the beginning of time, namely the beginning time, there was time, which is false. If it began in the indivisible: therefore divisible time was in the indivisible which cannot be understood. But if you say that the beginning of time was the beginning of the now itself. Against: Either it began in itself, or in another. If in another: then it was in another: and this is either of time, or of eternity, because the age was not before time. If of time: then time was before the first time. If of eternity: therefore time was in eternity as measuring its beginning: and this is false, because eternity measures nothing variable: therefore it seems that in no way did time begin.

Solution. I say agreeing with the last argument, that the beginning of time was in its indivisible which is now.

To that which is objected, that then it was in the indivisible: it must be said that it does not follow, since it is successive: but it follows that it was continuous after this, and from this it is one: because its continuation began from that: for although time is not in the now, yet it is well continued to the now and from the now, just as a line from a point and to a point.

To the first which seems to prove that time did not begin to be: it must be said that the Philosopher speaks of the time which is adjacent to the first movable: because this is a passion of circular motion: and therefore in that there is nothing to be taken which is not the beginning and the end: but in that which is adjacent to rectilinear change, there is to be taken the now which is the beginning and not the end: and thus we posit that times began: and this is not contrary to the saying of the Philosopher. How time is said in many ways, it was noted above.

To the other it must be said that it began in its now, as has already been shown, because we take it to be adjacent to motion or change as if rectilinear: and although the age is simpler than time, yet the age began from time, because the exit of the age into temporal and variable being is according to reason.

Articulus 5 — Since These Names, Servant, Creature, And The Like, State A Real Relation, Whether In The Creator Some Real Relation Corresponds To Them

Since these names, servant, creature, and similar, signify a real relation, whether in the creator some real relation corresponds to them?

Since these names, servant, creature, and similar, signify a real relation, whether in the creator some real relation corresponds to them?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said in the third part, there in § 2 cap. B, How then shall we obtain nothing according to accident said of God, etc.

For here, for the understanding of all that has been said, it must be asked, since such names, servant, and creature, signify a real relation: whether some real relation corresponds to them in the creator, or nothing?

For it seems that it does correspond. 1. For the Philosopher says in the Categories and in Book V of the Metaphysics, that relatives are of two modes: for some are towards something, to which this very being which they are towards another they are: but some are said towards something, and sometimes they are not so towards something, that both are towards the other: but one is towards the other, and not conversely except according to saying, as one and many, and knowledge and known, and measure and measured, and suchlike. Those which are towards something in the first mode, in both relatives they posit a real relation: and therefore they are said to be convertible, and posited they posit, and removed they remove themselves equally. Since therefore such are, lord servant, king subject, creator creature, it seems that in both such a relation is signified.

1. Likewise, Either both relations are posited in the creature, when it is said, creator creature, or both in God, or one in God, and the other in the creature. If in the first mode: then it seems, that the creature has a double relation to the same, which is impossible.

Likewise, According to this opposite relations according to the same are in the same, which is more impossible: because opposites in act as opposites, in no way are or can be in the same. If in the second mode, the same follows: and furthermore the proposition is held, that some relation from time is in God. Therefore it remains, that it is in the third mode: and thus to the relation of the creature in the creator something corresponds according to the thing.

1. Likewise, Of which neither is intelligible without the other, one of them posited in one, it is necessary the other be posited in the other, if they are opposites: thus however all relatives said to be convertible are: therefore if the relation of the creature is posited in the creature, it is necessary the relation of the creator be posited in God.
2. Likewise, Does not God act more truly than any creature, as Augustine says? for that which pertains to the category of action, is proper to him alone: therefore it is possible to signify the agent itself under relation to the act.

3. Likewise, God creates this thing: but every action is in act, as in matter: therefore it seems, that the thing subject to the act and sustaining the act, has a real relation, and by the same reason the agent.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 4. All such relations said to be convertible, and not always agreeing, are caused by change: but God is immutable: therefore in him such names do not signify real relations.

1. Likewise, Every such relation is an accident: therefore by inhering it makes composition: and this again does not befit God: therefore such names do not signify a real relation.
2. Likewise, Every such relation makes dependence in the relative: but it is absurd, that God depends on the creature: therefore it does not signify a relation in him.
3. Likewise, Every such relative is fitting to be determined externally: but it is absurd that we say God can be determined by a creature, even as to something.
4. Likewise Dionysius says, that in causes and caused we do not receive reciprocation: therefore they are not said to each other, as it seems.

Solution. To this I say, as before, that such names name the divine essence under the relation to the creature, which relation in God posits only the act, which is the same with the will and substance of the agent: and the dependence which is added, is in our intellect, and not in God. And this is done because our intellect takes real dependence in the creature, which as real dependence it cannot understand, unless it also posits a relation in the cause, which will not be entirely in vain, because it is supported by the act of the cause, although it does not signify an accident in God: and for the sake of that relation the names have their connotations in the creature.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that in truth such relatives are said to be convertible, not that in both there is a real relation, but because it is according to the aforementioned mode of understanding.

To the other it must be said, that really in God a relation is posited for the sake of the act, although it does not really signify an accident in him, but something to be from him which depends on him according to the thing, and not conversely except according to the mode of understanding.

To the other it must be said, that we posit a relation by the mode of understanding in God, which however signifies nothing adventitious, and in the mode of understanding it is according to which something is related to God the agent thus or thus.

To the other it must be said, that God acts without change of himself per se, and per accidens: and therefore really the signified does not arise because of the relation of another to him, as has been said.

To the other it must be said, that when it is said, God creates, there is not an accident according to the thing mediating between the agent and the act, but rather the very new existence of the thing without any created becoming is said: and therefore although the word denoting the act has matter in the expression and subject, as when it is said, the soul is created, yet according to the thing it has none at all, because there is no becoming there: but the act as it is in the agent, is nothing other than the will according to the act of existing the thing now, which will from eternity is related according to one mode.

But to what is objected against, it must be said that such relatives do not always require change and real relation in both relatives, as is clear in double and half. For let there be two cubits: and one is changed by the cutting of one cubit, now it is made half, and it will be subdouble, and the other double, without change of itself: although double and subdouble are said to be convertible, and thus we can say of creator and creature: and those relations which thus note relation according to intellect only, from the fact that something is related to something not changed, were called by Gilbert of Poitiers assisting, and to predicate nothing in that of which they were said. Yet we can say, that the intellect positing them in God is supported by the act of creating, and governing, and ruling.

But it must be said, that not every such relation is an inhering accident, as has been said: nor even in the creature is this true, as was clear in the example of double and half.

To the other it must be said, that the creator of himself does not have dependence, but rather by such a name is signified the dependence of another to him: as king is a relative, and yet signifies that others depend really on him, and similarly lord.

To the last it must be said, that to be determined according to the name, is a determination which our intellect needs, not because our intellect imposes a name under such a relation.

Articulus 6 — Whether These Names, Lord, King, Etc., Belong To God From Eternity

Whether these names, lord, king, etc.,
are fitting to God from eternity?

Whether these names, lord, king, etc.,
are fitting to God from eternity?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said in the last part of this part, there, in § 3 cap. B, "Ste et pater noster esse incipit," etc.

1. For it seems that such names can be fitting from eternity: for it is said lord, as Ambrose says, by the power of restraining the subject creature: and this is fitting from eternity.
2. Likewise it is inquired, Why is it not distinguished in such things, that they signify in act and habit, as in others, as is gift, and suchlike? For from eternity God has the aptitude of creating, and the habit of giving: therefore it seems that in some sense they are fitting from eternity.

3. Furthermore, These are fitting in eternity, as he himself says, Exodus 11, 15: God of Abraham, God of Isaac, God of Jacob:... this name is mine forever. And why are they not fitting from eternity as in eternity?

Solution. It must be said to this in my judgment, as Augustine says here, that these are not fitting except from time: because they do not regard habit, but act: for relations as such follow acts, not aptitudes, as is clear: for from this a thing is not said to be subdouble to another, that it can be subdouble. And if it is sometimes found that lord is fitting from eternity, I believe it is taken improperly. However, creator, since this is the name of an agent according to act, is not fitting except from time: and through this the solution to the first two is clear.

To the other it must be said, that the creature will indeed remain without end, although it did not remain without beginning: and therefore since such things connote effect in the creature, they are not fitting from eternity, but are fitting in eternity.

Articulus 7 — Whether God Is Called Lord Of Time From Time

Whether God is called the lord of time from time?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, in the 4th chapter B, Hz these things are openly shown, etc.

1. For it seems that he is also the lord of time from time: because time is one of the created things: therefore just as he is the lord of others from time, so also of time: and this is against the things said above.
2. Likewise, if to any coming forth of a creature into being time corresponds, then also to the coming forth of time into being time corresponds: and thus there will be time of time: and this is nothing to say.
3. Likewise, it seems to be the lord of time from eternity: because thus says Boethius in the book of the Consolation of Philosophy: Who orders time to go from eternity.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
Eternity is created: therefore its coming forth into being was measured by time: therefore eternity is from time, and not time from eternity, as Boethius seems to say.

Solution. It must be said that of time there is not time, nor measure of measure: and therefore although time as it is adjacent to change, is coeval according to the thing, yet it is the measure of others: and thus it is before according to reason: because that coming forth was never in becoming, but in the demonstration of the creature now first, before which now of the creature there was nothing.

To the other it must be said, that the coming forth of time into being did not have a measure: because really it was not before time.

To the other it must be said, that eternity began in the eternal things, namely in the empyrean heaven and in the angels: and therefore according to reason it is from time to measure its coming forth into being.

But what Boethius says, must be understood of time and eternity, as they now are: because thus eternity measures temporal things: and time goes, that is, flows from eternity: and this notes from eternity. But it may be said more lightly, to place eternity for eternity, and the preposition to note order and cause: so that the sense may be, Who orders time from, that is, after eternity: and to go from eternity, to create exemplarily from it: because as the Philosopher says, what is eternal to the eternal, this is eternal to the eternal, and time to the temporal.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is Related To Himself, Since What Is Given Is Related To The Giver

Whether the Holy Spirit is referred to Himself, when the given is referred to the giver?

Then the question is asked concerning the last part of the distinction, there, "Here the question proposed above can be solved," etc.

For it seems false to say in the Text: for it concedes that the given is referred to the giver, and that the Holy Spirit gives Himself, and yet is not referred to Himself: and it concedes that the appellation of the given is referred to the giver: and He Himself is the giver: therefore He is referred to Himself, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said that to be referred according to the appellation of the gift not simply, but to the giver, is to be referred in a certain respect: and the Master well concedes that in such a way the Holy Spirit is referred to Himself in a certain respect: but to be referred to Himself is to be simply referred to Himself: and this he intends to deny in the Text, as is clear to one examining diligently.

DISTINCTIO XXXI

Divisio Textus

Furthermore, it must be considered, since there are three persons, etc.

Here begins that part in which the Master touches not on what is proper, but on what is appropriated. And it is entirely contained in this distinction, which is divided into three parts: in the first of which the Master touches on what such words as "similar," "equal," mean, upon which certain appropriations are taken. In the second, he touches on three appropriations to the persons according to the assignment of Hilary, there, C, "Therefore it must not be omitted here." In the third, he touches on what the illustrious man, etc., appropriated according to the assignment of Augustine, there, G, "It must also be known," etc.

The Master himself in the Letter divides the first part into two: in the first of which he inquires whether "similar," "equal," and suchlike are said relatively or according to essence. In the second, however, he determines what similarity and equality signify, there, B, "We also say the same about similarity," etc.

And through this the meaning is clear.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Master Here Determines Well Concerning Appropriations

Whether the Master here determines well concerning the appropriated?

However, two questions arise here before the Letter: one of which is, Why does the Master place here a treatise on the appropriated?

Secondly, In what respect is the reason of appropriation considered?

However, it seems that it ought not to be placed here. 1. For all these names are essential: therefore they ought to be determined among the essentials.

1. Furthermore, equality was treated above: therefore it seems superfluous to be repeated here.
2. Likewise, Equal and similar are not placed here among the appropriated: therefore it seems that they ought not to be treated in this treatise, which is about the appropriated.

Solution. The appropriated derive their reason from the proper: just as the accidental derives its reason from that which is per se: and just as that which is for the sake of another derives the reason of cognition from that which is for its own sake, and therefore the treatise on the appropriated is to be placed immediately after the treatise on the proper.

To the ARGUMENT, it must be said that they are not so essential that they do not, through the reasons of their names, place an approach and proximity to the proper, and therefore they are joined with them.

To the other, it must be said that similarity and equality are taken in two ways, namely according to that in which there is equality and similarity: and this is essence, as was said above: and according to the reason of the name which more approaches the reason of one person than another: as he will say below, that equality is in the Son and similarity. And some Saints say that according to something it is in the Son, and according to something in the Holy Spirit: and in this way it is taken here in the treatise on the appropriated.

Through this also the solution to the following is clear: because in the first way he treated of them above, and in the second way he treats of them here.

Articulus 2 — By What The Rationale Is Considered In Appropriations, And Whether, With No Proper Term, Something Can Be Appropriated

Concerning what is the reason considered in appropriated things? And, whether, with the proper not existing, something can be appropriated?

Concerning what is the reason considered in appropriated things? And, whether, with the proper not existing, something can be appropriated?

Then it is asked, In what manner is appropriation made?

It seems, indeed, that there is none. 1. For eternity, image, and use are essential things equally pertaining to one and to another: therefore, no appropriation is made concerning them.

1. Likewise, whatever things agree according to property are not said of all: but these are said of all: therefore, they are not appropriated.
2. Likewise, that which is appropriated to someone is that which always agrees with him and not with another, but these agree with all: and similarly unity, equality, and concord: therefore, they are not appropriated.
3. Likewise, it seems that by the contrary, the proper ought to receive the appropriated: as Augustine says, that power is to the Father, because the elders fail, lest it be believed that He fails: wisdom to the Son, because the younger are foolish, lest it be believed that the Son is unwise: goodness to the Holy Spirit, lest it be believed that He is a spirit of wrath: therefore, it seems that eternity agrees not with the Father, but with Him who is from the beginning, and image with Him to whom it less agrees, and use with Him who is less for use: and thus all seem to be assigned inappropriately.

Likewise, it is asked, If with the proper not existing, there is or can be something appropriated?

It seems so: because 4. God will still be eternal, and one, and wise, and powerful, and good: therefore, since these are appropriated, it seems that with the proper not existing, they still remain appropriated.

1. Likewise, these appropriated things are not appropriated by us: for this appropriation is not made only with respect to our intellect, but also in the very significations of these things the reason of appropriation is imported: because otherwise one would not be appropriated more to one than to another: therefore, since such appropriated things have always been in God, even with the proper not existing, they would still remain, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: The proper falls into the reason of the appropriated: therefore, with the proper not existing, there will not be the appropriated.

Furthermore, if the appropriated is that which approaches the reason of the proper, it is necessary to presuppose that reason according to which there is an approach: but this is the reason of the proper: therefore, it is necessary always to suppose the proper before the appropriated.

Solution. It must be said that the appropriated can be taken in two ways, namely according to matter, and this is according to that which is appropriated: and according to form, that is, according to the reason of the appropriated as such. In the first way, I say that it is without the intellect of the proper. In the second way, however, never: because the appropriated is nothing other than, according to the agreement of thing and name, to have some approach more to the proper of one person than of another: and therefore the Master says below, that eternity signifies the notion of the Father which is innascibility: not because the thing of eternity agrees only with the Father, but because according to the agreement of reason it approaches the Father, as will be clear below when it is asked about each. And through this the solution to the first is clear.

To the other, it must be said that the proper and the appropriated are not the same: just as image and to the image are not the same: and not the same for its own sake and for the sake of another: for the preposition notes a certain approach of that which is remote: hence the removal notes that they are not truly proper: but the approach notes that through some reason not of the thing, but of the property of the thing, they agree with the proper of one person more than with the proper of another.

To the other, it must be said in the same way, that according to the nature of the thing it is indeed common, but by the grace of property there is an agreement with the proper: just as eternity is indeed common to the three: yet because the eternal is without beginning the principle of others, through this it agrees with Him who is the principle not from a principle more than with Him who is the principle from a principle.

To the other, it must be said that appropriation is not simply made by the contrary: but the explanation of appropriation is sometimes made by the contrary accidentally, and for the exclusion of error: and this Augustine intimates in the very words, and it will be had below.

To the other, it must be said that with the proper not existing, there would not be the appropriated according to the reason of the appropriated: although perhaps it would still be in the reason of the essential attribute, as is clear from the distinction previously posited.

And through this the solution to the last is clear.

Articulus 3 — Whether Likeness And Equality Are Said Relatively Or Of Themselves

Whether likeness and equality are said relatively, or to themselves?

ARTICULUS TI.

Whether likeness and equality are said relatively, or to themselves?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said in the Text: Just as similar, so also equal is said relatively.

1. For this does not seem so, since likeness, as it is said in the Text, is nothing other than indifferent essence in three. But indifferent essence is said to itself: therefore it seems that likeness and equality are said to themselves.
2. Furthermore, if these speak of relation, what relation do they speak of? If any of the personal ones, it would be necessary that they belong to those persons alone: and this is not true, as was held above, and it is held here, that there is one likeness and equality of the three.

Solution. Above: many questions were asked about this. And it must be said as there, that these names, similar, and equal, are said relatively, connoting essence when they are taken concretely: and they denote in their supposits indeterminate relations of their relatives: and this is clear when they are explained. For the persons are similar, being distinct, having the same essence according to attributes signifying quality according to the mode of understanding: such as wisdom, goodness, and the like. However, the persons are equal, being distinct, having the same essence according to the reason of virtual quantity, such as power, virtue, and being everywhere, and the like. However, when they are signified abstractly, then they signify the essence considered in the aforementioned way, and connote the persons obliquely: for likeness is indifferent essence according to attributes signifying quality in three: and equality is indifferent essence according to attributes of quantity in three: and through this the solution to all that can be asked is easily clear.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that when indifferent essence is said, two things are said, namely essence which does not signify relation, and indifferent which supposes the persons related to each other, in which the indifferent essence is.

To the other, it must be said that they speak of relation indeterminately: and through this they require distinct supposits which are referred to each other.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Name Of Likeness Posits Something In The Divine

Whether the name of similarity posits something in the divine?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, Whence to some it does not seem unlearned to say that the name of equality or similarity does not posit something, etc.

1. For this seems expressly false: because if similarity is indifferent essence, then it posits indifferent essence: and this is to posit something.
2. Likewise, in lower things these names posit something: therefore, since in higher things they posit substance, in lower things quality or quantity: and substance is more truly being than quality or quantity: therefore it seems that they more truly posit in higher things than in lower things.
3. Furthermore, if you say that they signify negation: because thus it is explained, the Son is equal to the Father, because neither greater nor lesser: then by the same reasoning every predicate which is said of something through essence or through accident posits nothing, because from that follow the removals of opposite predicates and those disparate from the same subject: as when it is said, man is an animal, it follows, therefore he is not a stone: and when it is said, man is white: therefore he is not black: and this is false: therefore it is necessary that they posit something.
4. Likewise, it is known per se, that negation is not first in the intellect: therefore that negation by which it is said, the Son is neither greater nor lesser, is founded in some prior affirmation: therefore in that affirmation they posit something.
5. Likewise, it seems that similarity and equality are the same in the divine: because each is explained for indifferent essence in the three: therefore since they are the same which are of one definition, similarity and equality will be the same.

6. Furthermore, Augustine said that to equality pertains the question by which it is asked, why, of what kind, or how much it is?

To the origin indeed, who, of whom it is: therefore to the same pertains quality and quantity in the divine: but indifferent quality causes similarity: therefore in the divine, similarity and equality are the same.

1. Likewise, it seems that these two are the same as identity: because one in substance makes the same: but everything that of itself speaks quality or quantity in inferiors, is turned in the divine into the predication of substance, as Boethius says: therefore they predicate substance, and thus make identity in the divine, and not similarity or equality.

Solution. It must be said that they posit in the divine, and must be explained positively. And those things which the Master says in the Text are negations consequent to the opposite comparison which is according to more and less: and the Master does not intend to say, except that they do not posit something different from substance, as they do in inferiors: for as it is said in the first of Euclid: Equal is that which, being supposed to something, neither exceeds nor is exceeded. And this exposition by negation happens to the equal insofar as it is first in the genus of proportions, because as Boethius teaches, all inequality arises from equality, and is reduced to it: because equal is taken according to one in the proportions of quantity, and so it is with similar in the comparison of qualities: although properly in those there are not signifiable species of comparison, as species of proportions in quantity are signified. And through this the solution to the first four is clear: for it has been shown what the Master intends in the Text, and whence the consequent negation comes more in these than in others.

To that which further seems to prove that in the divine similarity is equality, and conversely: it must be said that although indifferent essence causes both, it is not considered in both according to the same mode of questioning: because in similarity it is considered according to the indifference of the attributes of wisdom, and goodness, and others, which according to the mode of speaking say quality. In equality, however, it is considered according to the attributes saying virtual quantity in the eternity of duration, and the magnitude of existing everywhere, and the power of operating.

To another it must be said that what is such not simply, but according to something considered, pertains to the question of quality, according to which the attribute saying quality is a virtue ordered to act, just as science by its virtue makes one consider, and according to the power to know is the faculty of considering well or badly: and in this respect it makes equality, but in itself it makes similarity.

To another it must be said that all those attributes are substance: but according to this the reason for distinguishing between attributes is not taken, as was proven above: but rather according to the mode of understanding: for thus in inferiors the Philosopher says, that if someone with a bicubital magnitude placed, should say that what is placed is to be quantum, he says what it is, and quantum signifies what: so also in superiors when it is said, God is substance, God is wise, it is indeed said what in both, but it is not signified in the mode of understanding: and therefore for the sake of certain attributes the persons are said to be one, and for the sake of certain similar, and for the sake of certain equal: and I think, that they ought not to be said the same: because it was held above, that the Father and the Son are not the same God and this because the same has in itself an article, which determines the suppositum which is the person: and therefore since they are not the same suppositum, they will not be the same God, it also has in itself the unity of substance, and for the sake of this it could well be said: but it cannot be said, that they are another, or different God.

And from this also further the solution of the question is clear, which could be asked, why one in substantial attributes in divine persons does not make the same, as one in qualitative makes similar, and in quantitative makes equal? There are, however, those who distinguish this, the Father and the Son are the same God, from the fact that the same can be masculine and substantive, and thus false: or neuter and quasi-adjective, and thus true: but this distinction has neither art nor reason: because the same is neither by voice nor by signification an adjective, but signifying and discretive of substance.

Moreover, if it were of the neuter gender, it would be incongruously added with this name, God, which is masculine: just as it is incongruously said, the Father and the Son are this God.

C. On the sentence of Saint Hilary, where he shows the properties in the Trinity of persons.

Therefore it is not to be omitted here, that the illustrious man Hilary, assigning the properties of persons, says in the Father is eternity, species in the image, use in the gift: which words are of such difficulty, that Augustine labored greatly in their understanding and explanation, as he himself says thus: he shows in book VI on the Trinity: Someone when he wished to briefly insinuate the properties of each person in the Trinity: Eternity is, he says, in the Father, species in the image, use in the gift. And because a man of no small authority in the treatment of Scriptures and assertion of faith stood out (for Hilary placed these in his books), having scrutinized the hidden understanding of these words, that is, of the Father, and of the image, and of the gift, of eternity, of species, and of use, as much as I am able, I do not think he followed him in the vocabulary of eternity, except that the Father does not have a Father from whom he is: but the Son is from the Father, so that he may be, and so that he may be coeternal with him. For the image, if it perfectly fulfills that of which it is the image, is itself equal to it, not that to its image: in which image he named species. I believe because of beauty, where there is such congruence and first equality, and first similarity differing in no thing, and in no way unequal, and in no part dissimilar: but responding to the identity of that of which it is the image: where there is first and highest life, to which it is not other to live, and other to be: but the same and first and highest intellect, to which it is not other to live and other to understand, but the same this is one as a perfect word, to which nothing is lacking: and a certain art of the omnipotent and wise God, full of all reasons of living and immutable things: and all are one in it, as it is one from one, with which one: there God knows all things which he made through it.

D. On the Holy Spirit why it is called use?

There is, however, an ineffable complex of the Father and the image, which is not determined without enjoyment, without charity, without joy. Therefore that love, delight, happiness, or blessedness (if indeed it is worthily said by any human voice) was briefly called use by him, and in the Trinity is the Holy Spirit not begotten, but the sweetness of the begetter and the begotten, pouring forth with the largeness and abundance of the unbegotten all creatures according to their capacity, and in themselves they are infinite. Whoever sees this either in part, or through a mirror in an enigma, let him rejoice knowing God, and give thanks. But whoever does not see, let him strive through the piety of faith to see, not through blindness to calumniate: because there is one God, but nevertheless Trinity. Behold, you have how the words of Hilary previously mentioned are to be taken, although they are of such profundity, that even with the exposition applied, human sense can scarcely in any way understand them: since even the explanation of them, which Augustine here issued, has much difficulty and ambiguity in itself.

E. That according to this exposition the properties of the three Persons are not distinguished there.

For according to the aforementioned exposition, the three properties previously assigned are not distinguished here, but the hypostases themselves are shown to be distinct from each other. However, by the name of eternity the same property seems to be designated, which this name notes, unbegotten. But let us see what it is that he says:

The image if it perfectly fulfills that of which it is the image, is itself equal to it, not that to its image. For he seems to say, that the Son who is the image of the Father, is equal to the Father, not the Father to the Son: since both the Son is said to be equal to the Father in Scripture, and the Father to the Son: but the Son has this from the Father that he is equal to him, but the Father does not have it from the Son: and yet the Son is fully and perfectly equal to the Father, that is, the image to that of which it is the image.

F. Why Hilary is said to have assigned the properties of persons in the aforementioned words, when there are not expressly properties there?

Therefore Hilary is said to have assigned the properties of persons in the aforementioned words, because he placed the relative names of persons, namely of the Father, of the image, and of the gift, which are said relatively of the persons, and note the properties by which the persons are distinguished. For thus the Holy Spirit is said to be a gift relatively, just as a gift. However, he did not signify the properties themselves by the other three names, according to the aforementioned exposition of Augustine, except by the name of eternity alone, by which he did not wish paternity itself to be understood, but that notion by which he is said to be unbegotten.

Articulus 5 — Why Eternity Is Appropriated To The Father

Why is eternity appropriated to the Father?

Then inquiry is made concerning the second part where it says, there, C, "Therefore it must not be omitted here, that the illustrious man," etc. And three questions are asked: the first of which is, Why is eternity attributed to the Father? Secondly, Why is the image attributed to the Son? And thirdly, Why is use attributed to the Holy Spirit?

To the first, it proceeds thus: 1. Whatever name is said equally of the three, is not attributed specially to any one: but we say in the Athanasian Creed: "Eternal Father, eternal Son, therefore eternal Holy Spirit": thus eternity is not attributed specially to any one.

1. Likewise, above it was proven the coeternity of the persons equally: and there, that if the Father is eternal, that also the Son is eternal: therefore it ought not to be specially referred to the Father.
2. Likewise, coeternity according to the mode of understanding signifies a space not intersected, as Isaac says, which is a measure extrinsically adjacent to a being enduring without variation and end. Thus also Dionysius says, that eternity is ancient and invariable and universal in measuring: but this equally pertains to all: therefore it is not specially attributed to the Father.
3. Likewise, if we take according to the definition of Boethius, that eternity is the possession of interminable life all at once: again it equally pertains to the three: therefore it is wrongly attributed to one, namely the Father.
4. Likewise, inquiry is made concerning the solution which some propose, that it signifies the essence which is common to the three but connotes the notion of the Father, and therefore it is attributed to the Father. And they wish to have this from, the words of the Master below, where he says, that it says the same notion as unbegotten.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Whatever says the essence and connotes the notion of one person, on account of this that it signifies both, cannot be said of all: just as "is sent," and "proceeds temporally," and the like: therefore if eternity in its understanding encloses the notion of the Father, it will not be said of the other persons, that they are eternal.

1. Likewise, I cannot say, that the Son is the divine essence, and unbegotten: therefore since eternity is as valuable as essence and unbegotten, I will not be able to say, that the Son is eternity or eternal.

Solution. It must be said, that eternity is not proper to the Father, neither per se, nor by connotation of his notion: but it is appropriated, because in its reason it more approaches the Father's property which is unbegottenness, than to the property of another person: and this is thus evident: Eternity is the possession of interminable life. But what is interminable, is a principle not from a principle: which although it essentially pertains to all persons, yet according to some reason the Son has a principle, and the Holy Spirit has a principle: but the Father in no way: therefore the reason of eternity more approaches the Father's property, than another's.

And through this the solution to all objections is evident. They err indeed who say it connotes the notion of the Father: because a word connotes that which it encloses in its understanding with the principal signification: and in this way the attributes of the persons are not distinguished, as has been said.

Articulus 6 — Why Image Is Appropriated To The Son, And Why The Son Is Called The Species Of The Father

Why is the image appropriated to the Son? and,
Why is the Son called the species of the Father?

Why is the image appropriated to the Son? and,
Why is the Son called the species of the Father?

Secondly, it is inquired concerning the image which is appropriated to the Son: and because above the reason was shown clearly enough why the image properly belongs to the Son, from that it can also be sufficiently elicited why the image, essentially said, is appropriated to the same: because, namely, it has a reason approaching that which is proper to the Son.

Here, however, the question remains concerning the two definitions of the image, which are touched upon in the note of Hilary, which is assigned here in certain books: of which the first is this:

1. The image is of that thing to which the imagined species is indifferent: but the indifferent species is of the Father: therefore the image is of the Father: not therefore of the Son, for the Son is the indifferent species of the Father.
2. Likewise, What does the term "imagined" say? If it is the act of imitating, as is commonly said: therefore the image is of the thing which the image imitates: but this is the prototype, as Damascene says, or the exemplar, as is commonly said. Therefore it seems that the exemplar should be placed as proper to the Father, and not eternity in this ternary which Hilary places: because otherwise it would not correspond to itself.
3. Likewise, Why is the Son called species? For species is either taken as in logic, or as in natural things, or as in spiritual things. If in the first way: then species is predicated of many numerically different things: and this does not belong to the Son. But if in the second way: then species is the form giving being and reason: and this again does not belong to the Son. If in the third way: then the Son would be the reason according to which the Father formally knows, and thus would be wise with begotten wisdom: which again is false, as will be proved in the following distinction. If you say that here species is called beauty, as Augustine seems to say in the Letter. On the contrary: The beauty of the image is rather from the superaddition to the image, as is the charm of color in the commensuration of parts in members and color, than in the figure of the image itself: since therefore these are of goodness and grace which are superinduced to the spiritual image by the Holy Spirit, it seems that beauty more belongs to the Holy Spirit than to the Son.

4. Furthermore, Everything that is placed in this definition belongs to the Holy Spirit: for the Holy Spirit is the indifferent species of the Father and the Son: therefore it is the image, and species ought to be appropriated to it.

Further, it is inquired concerning the second definition: The image is of a thing to a thing imagined and an indiscrete likeness.

1. For since the image is sometimes smaller, and sometimes larger, as is evident in the statues of idols and saints, it does not seem to be of a thing to a thing equated.
2. Furthermore, Since there is discretion in all those in which there is an image and exemplar, for the image is not of itself, it seems that it wrongly says indiscrete.
3. Likewise, Since the image is to a thing equated, it rather seems to be a quality than a likeness.

Further, it is inquired, By what reason is species appropriated to him who is thus an image? For there is no beauty except from substance: and thus it seems there is one species of the three, just as there is one essence of the three.

Solution. It must be said that the two definitions which he touches upon in the Letter are diversified in that one is of the image according to which it is from the exemplar: for thus it has an indifferent species with that: just as wax with the figure of a seal, from this that according to impression it is from the seal. But the other is given of the image, according to which it is to the exemplar into which it leads: for it leads into that by this that it is an imagined and equated likeness to it.

To the first, it must be said that when it is said, The image is of that thing, etc., the term "image" is constructed with "of that thing," in the relation of efficient and terminus together: because the image is from that thing, and to demonstrate that thing: and therefore it does not follow that it is that thing: because there is no construction in the relation of subject to form: just as when it is said, the image of a statue or of bronze.

To the other, it must be said that the term "imagined" says the act of imitating: and yet the reason of the exemplar is not attributed to the Father, because it does not belong: but the reason of the principle to the image. For the image is not necessarily made from the first exemplar efficiently, just as the idol of Peter or Aesculapius is made by an artisan: but the image in divine things is from that of which it is the image, as from a principle: and because the reason of the principle is not imported in the exemplar, but in eternity, as was previously held: therefore eternity is attributed to the Father.

If, however, it is objected that the reason of the principle is also diminished, because it does not import imitation: just as the exemplar saying imitation does not say principle: and thus neither belongs to the Father by comparison to the image. It must be said that it is not true: for the reason of the principle is imported by eternity, and the mode of principiating by the image, because the image does not have an absolute understanding, but a relative one: and therefore from the image the exemplar is understood, but the principle is not understood: so that both may be understood in the Father, eternity is expressed in the Father, and the exemplar is co-understood in the image.

To the other, it must be said that the species which is appropriated to the Son (as Augustine says) is the same as beauty: and according to reason the convenience is only in the Son: and this because of the reason of his emanation which is generation: because he receives the species and form of the Father, as the form of nature and substance. But the Holy Spirit receives the essence proceeding as a gift, which by its reason does not say form, and species of that from which it proceeds: and therefore although that which is species is in the three, yet the reason of species and beauty says more access and convenience to the proper of the Son, than of any of the others. To the other, the solution is evident from what has been said.

To what is objected concerning the second definition, it must be said that in statues there is not a perfect representation, because there is not a proportionate quantity: here, however, the image is defined as fulfilling and perfectly representing that of which it is the image.

To the other, it must be said that it is not understood here of the indiscretion of the person, but rather of the indiscretion of convenience in that in which there is an image: for if in that convenience it were discerned, then it would be incongruent, and it would not be an image.

To the other, it must be said that the image says quality concerning the said quantity: and therefore it is rather called likeness than equality, so that by reason of that which is quantity, it equals: and by reason of that which it places concerning quantity, it assimilates.

To what is further inquired, Why species is attributed to the Son or to the image, it has already been solved in the prehabited.

Articulus 7 — Why Use Is Attributed To The Gift Or To The Holy Spirit

Why is use attributed to the gift or to the Holy Spirit?

Thirdly, it is asked, Why is use attributed to the gift?

1. For use is that which is assumed into the faculty of the will, to refer to another: but the gift or gift of the Holy Spirit is not referred to another, therefore it seems that use does not belong to it. If you say that it belongs to it by effect: because it makes good use of the other gifts: this is nothing: for when what is appropriated to the Father and the Son belongs to them from eternity, what is appropriated to the Holy Spirit will not correspond directly, unless it also belongs from eternity.
2. Furthermore, in the Letter Augustine says that the love of the Father and the Son, or delight, or happiness, or beatitude, is called use by Hilary: but these belong from eternity: therefore also use.

Solution. It is easy to solve here: because to use has been defined in two ways above, namely to use of the way, and to use of the homeland. For to use of the way is that which has come into use, to refer to another by which it is to be enjoyed. But to use of the homeland is what falls into the definition of enjoying, as Augustine said above, that to enjoy is to use with joy, not yet of hope, but already of the thing: and according to this the Father and the Son use themselves: and use in reason approaches love and delight which is the Holy Spirit: because such use is made only by love and delight.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Son Is Rightly Called The Father's Art

Whether the Son is rightly called the art of the Father?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, at the end of chapter C, "A certain art of the almighty and wise God full of all reasons of living things," etc.

1. For whatever someone knows, he knows by his art: if therefore the Son is the art of the Father, the Father knows by the Son.
2. Likewise, in the text it says: "He knows"; therefore the Father is wise by the Son whom God begot all things which He Himself made through that art, as it seems.

Solution. These reasons would conclude well if art and intellect and wisdom were properly said of the Son, and not appropriately. Hence it is true that the Father knows all things in His art and in His intellect: yet it does not follow that He knows by the Son, because there is one art of the three, and one intellect of the three, just as there is one essence of the three: but intellect and art and wisdom signify a relation and approach to the Son, according to which He is the Word, more than to the Father or the Holy Spirit: and therefore it is more appropriated to the Son than to the others.

Articulus 9 — Why Unity Is Attributed To The Father

Why is unity attributed to the Father?

Then it is inquired about what is said in the third part, there, G, Mlud also needs to be known, that of the same, etc.

And three things are inquired: the first of which is, Why is unity attributed to the Father? The second, Why is equality attributed to the Son? The third, Why is the connection of equality and unity attributed to the Holy Spirit?

To the first, it proceeds thus: Dionysius suggests in the book On the Divine Names 2, that one is said in six ways. For he says thus about one: One is the cause of all things in an inescapable manner: for nothing of existing things is not participating in one. And by this, he suggests the one which is the principle of beings, and it is converted with being, according to which we say that one and being are principles transcending every genus. And he adds again about unity, saying: Every number participates in unity: and by this, he seems to suggest the unity which is the principle of number, because unity is potentially every number. Then in order, he sets forth four other modes, saying thus: For there is no multitude not participating in one: but those things which are many in parts are one in whole: and those which are many in accidents are one in subject: and those which are many in number and powers are one in species: and those which are many in species are one in genus. Therefore, in these six ways, one is said: so that one is always said in some way as form. He sets forth another seventh mode of one which is according to efficient cause, saying thus: Those which are many in processes are one in principle. Again, he sets forth another, namely the eighth mode according to the universal cause of all, saying thus: There is not that which is the cause of all one of many one: but before every one and multitude, determining. Therefore, to these modes, the modes of one are reduced: so that six are taken from form, and two from efficient cause in general or universal, which is the first cause. However, it is evident that unity does not pertain to God except in the last mode. Since therefore that mode pertains equally to the three persons, it does not say specially appropriated to the Father.

Furthermore, it is further inquired about the division of Dionysius, Why does he not set forth one according to matter, as he sets forth according to efficient and form?

Likewise, the efficient does not cause one, nor many in the thing: because it is outside the thing: therefore it seems that nothing is said one according to the efficient.

Likewise, the Philosopher sets forth one perfect: and this is not touched here.

Likewise, one is set forth per accidens in three ways, namely accident and subject: or two accidents in the subject, as grammatical and white in Socrates are one: or two accidents in a third accident, as musical and white in the coming are one: and this is not touched here.

Solution. It must be said that about one and unity, the principal intention is not here:

but as much as suffices here for understanding why unity is attributed to the Father, it must be noted that unity of itself has three things, when properly taken, namely indivisibility, and privation, and the notion of principle. For unity is both indivisible, and is first, and is the principle of number: and in these three, the notions of the Father are akin to it: because division is twofold, namely in itself, and to go out from another by division: in itself, as quantity is divided: to go out from another by division, as the caused is divided from the cause: and according to the notion of approximating to the Father, it does not pertain to be divided in itself, nor to any person: but in some way, the Son and the Holy Spirit go out from the Father, not by division, but by distinction. However, the Father is not from another: and therefore by this that he is not from a principle, he places the suitability to the notion of one.

Likewise, unity is first: and the first is before which nothing is: and therefore it is attributed to the Father by reason of innascibility.

Likewise, unity is the principle making number from its substance repeated: and by this, it suits the Father by reason of the authority of generating and spirating, who from his substance not repeated, but remaining the same, produces the Son and the Holy Spirit: and by this, it is clear that according to the second mode, unity is taken which is appropriated to the Father. It can also be taken according to the first mode: because the principle is not from the principle, in which all things are united which go out from it: as is the Father, as is proved in the note which is placed here, and begins:

If anyone the unbegotten, etc.

And by this, the solution of all things objected about this that unity should not be attributed to the Father is clear.

To that which is inquired about the division of Dionysius, it must be said that it is the best: because he makes a special treatise in the same chapter about the perfect: however, it can be reduced to one in the third mode said, which is one in whole: because the Philosopher says,

I say the whole and perfect the same. However, every one per accidens is reduced to one in subject, for there is no accident to accident except in subject: and although materially this can vary in many ways, nevertheless all are reduced to one in subject. Similarly, one in continuity is reduced to one in whole: because both of those have multitude in the potentiality of division of parts.

But what is objected about causes, it must be said that although the thing is not one, or many from the efficient cause: I say nevertheless, that the first multitude is caused by the distinction of the efficient cause and effect: and therefore also in some things, number cannot be found except by the distinction of cause and caused, as in intelligences according to those who posit intelligences as separate substances, and one under another according to the orders of the movers of spheres. Or it may be said that there is an efficient cause as efficient only, and there is an efficient cause with the notion of exemplar: and that second is sometimes in which those things which are of one exemplar are united: but this is not the intention of Dionysius, but the first: because the principal unity according to him is less than the unity of genus.

If however it is inquired, According to what is division taken? It can be said that one is said simply, and according to something: and if it is said according to something, then it will be one by that which is outside one: and this is the efficient cause in general, or universal: and thus two modes are taken, namely the eighth, and the seventh. If however it is said simply one: either per se, or per accidens. If per accidens: then it is the fourth mode. If however it is said per se: either from the form which gives being, or from the form which is unity itself. And if from the form which is unity itself according to which it is denominatively predicated of number, thus it is the second mode. If however from the form which gives being: either it is taken as principle, or as determining and distinguishing in this being or that. If in the first mode: then it is one converted with being: and thus it is the first mode. If in the second mode: either it gives being to nature: and thus it is the third mode.

because in that the form of the whole is compared to the material parts, to which being is given according to nature by the form itself. Or as it gives being of reason: and this is either the whole being, and thus it is one in species: or it is as part of being, and thus it is one in genus.

But if it is asked, Why does Dionysius, when he touches upon one in species, say that there are many in God in number or in power? For a multitude whose unity is species is not different in power only, but in number, as it seems: which is also evident through the specific definition which Porphyry gives, that species is what is predicated of many differing in number alone. It must be said that it is more simply and absolutely caused by the division of matter, as we said above: but the multitude in separate substances and Angels is by the number of what is, and the number of that is known by the distinction of powers. Therefore, since the supercelestial essences are divided into three, namely into substance, power, and operation, we know the number through operation and power in a different proportion of power relating to substance in this and that Angel: and therefore he posits the multitude of power with the material multitude. Whether, however, Angels differ in species or not, is another question.

To that which is objected concerning the material and final cause, it must be said that the final is consequent to the perfect thing: and therefore one is not taken from it. But in the material, one and many are in potency. Therefore, since one follows being, it follows the form as giving being, and the efficient as making being.

Articulus 10 — Why Equality Is Attributed To The Son, And Also Likeness

Why is equality attributed to the Son, and also likeness?

Secondly, it is asked,
1. Why is equality attributed to the Son, when it has been determined above that it belongs equally to the three?

1. Likewise, if I am equal to you, it follows well that you are also equal to me: therefore, by a similar reasoning, the Son is equal to the Father, and the Father is equal to the Son.
2. Perhaps you will say, as is commonly said, that the notion of equality begins in the second, and not in the first: because every proportion and comparison presupposes that to which it is proportion and comparison: and therefore, since the Father is not from another, the notion of equality does not extend to the proper notion of the Father. On the contrary, because according to this, equality should also be appropriated to the Holy Spirit, as to the Son.
3. Furthermore, you seem to say something false: for in geometry you often make demonstrations supposing that the same angle is equal to itself: therefore equality seems to be in one.
4. Furthermore, since likeness also begins in the second, presupposing that to which it is similar, why is likeness not appropriated to the Son as equality is?

Solution. It must be said that equality is attributed to the Son by reason of the image, to whose notion the proximate reason of equality approaches: for it follows, if it is an image, that it is equal, and it is not converted.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that common equality has been determined above, by reason of that in which equality is: and this is the indifferent essence, and thus it is attributed equally to the three. However, if the reason of the name is considered, it is more closely related to the image than to the other.

To the other, it must be said that this follows by reason of that in which equality is, which is in me and in you: but nevertheless the reason of equality begins in that in which equality is made, not in that in which there is first so much quantity; and therefore, since the Son has indifferent virtual quantity from the Father, but the Father is not from another, equality is more closely related to the Son than to the Father.

To the other, it must be said that the solution is good. To that which is objected against, it must be said that the Holy Spirit is indeed equal, but here it does not have the reason of equality by reason of emanation: because by the name of gift it is not necessarily signified something equal to the giver, as by the name of image and son it is signified equal by nature.

To the other, it must be said that equality does not happen to one angle as one, but rather as it is referred to different ones to which it is understood to be added or subtracted: and by reason of those different ones it is said to be equally added or subtracted.

To the last, it must be said that likeness says agreement in a diminished way. For however much it agrees with another, it will be similar: but it will not be equal unless it agrees in so much quantity of power: and consequently it must agree in the whole essence.

Articulus 11 — Whether To The Holy Spirit Ought To Be Attributed The Concord Or Connection Of Unity And Equality

Whether to the Holy Spirit ought to be attributed the concord or connection of unity and equality?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is attributed to the Holy Spirit, the concord or connection of equality and unity. For a nexus is among the connected: but the Holy Spirit according to the order of nature is from the Father and the Son: and therefore in naming it is expressed.

Solution. As was evident above, the Holy Spirit is the nexus proceeding from the Father and the Son, through this that it is the love of both, that is, from both: for love does not proceed only from the lover, but also unites the lover with the beloved: and by the grace of that union it is called a nexus by Augustine.

To the objection on the contrary, it must be said that it is a nexus as if by a force binding, and that can be over the connected, and it is among those which it connects as a medium: but the nexus by which the Holy Spirit is called a nexus, not by force but by the sweetness which emanates from the lovers, sweetly binds: and therefore by the order of nature it is from both of the connected: and in the naming of persons by the Church it is expressed after both.

Articulus 12 — Whether The Father And The Son Can Be Called One

Whether the Father and the Son can be said to be one?

Whether the Father and the Son can be said to be one?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said in the Text, there, I, Me it ought to be said, that the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are rightly said to be one, etc.

For it seems that they ought to be called one absolutely: because

1. One is one essential, since every one is from form: therefore the Father and the Son are one, just as one nature.
2. Likewise, when I say, one God, if one denotes distinction, as the Master says, then it would draw this term, God, to stand for the person: and then the expression would be false for each person: therefore it seems that the Father and the Son are not one God.
3. Likewise, this white and this musical in Socrates differ more than the Father and the Son. The reason. For they differ by whiteness and music, which are absolute beings: although they agree in the subject. However, the Father and the Son are not distinguished by something absolute: therefore since I can say, this white and this musical with Socrates pointed out, is one, so that one is substantivized, it seems that much more I can say, the Father and the Son are one: and this is denied in the Text.

Solution. It must be said that it cannot be said, the Father and the Son are one: and the reason often stated is, because one in the masculine signifies a formed being, which pertains to the notion of person: but in the neuter an unformed being, which pertains to essence: and therefore neither adjectively nor substantively can it be said. The Father and the Son are one: and through this the solution to the first and second is clear.

To the other it must be said that distinction is signified in two ways, namely as conceived, and as exercised: as the Sophists say concerning negation, when it is said I deny, thus, negation is signified as conceived, which does not have the act of negation: and therefore the proposition in which it is placed is affirmative: as when it is said, I deny the world to have been from eternity. However, negation is signified as exercised, which has the act of negation, and therefore makes the speech negative, which is signified when it is said, I am not a donkey, no one is a lion, no man is a stone, and the like. Similarly, in divine matters certain names signify distinction implicitly, like numerical terms: but some as conceived, like distinct, related, and the like: but some as exercised: as when it is said generating, or generated, and the like. And those alone draw this term, God, and certain others signifying substance to stand for the person: and therefore we cannot say, the Father is another God than the Son, or a distinct God from the Son, but one God with the Son, and God generating God the Son: for since other and distinct signify only the concept of distinction, they place that concept around the form signified in this name, God: and therefore the expression is falsified.

Articulus 13 — Whether Paul And Apollos, And The One Who Plants And The One Who Waters, Can Be Called One

Whether Paul and Apollos, and he who plants and he who waters, can be said to be one?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said there, in the middle of chapter I, Paul and Apollos, who both were men, and thought the same, etc.

1. For it does not seem sufficient for them to be called one, because they are men, and one subjects: because such unity simply leaves plurality: therefore they are not simply called one.

Likewise, if you say that they are united in the indivisible spirit: this is nothing: because this makes one Spirit, as it says in the Letter, and it is not absolutely one. But here it is said simply, that he who plants and he who waters are one.

1. Furthermore, it seems to be a convenience even in the pleasing of evil: can we say from such pleasing that they are one? It is evident that not: therefore neither here are Paul and Apollos one.
2. Likewise, sometimes the good disagree among themselves, and each is moved well and meritoriously: therefore it seems that they cannot be said to be one from consensus.

Solution. It must be said that Paul and Apollos are said to be one in nature, nature taken in a certain way, and not simply. For there is a nature from which the first sprouting sprouts, and thus faith in the first founders of the Church was in the reason of nature: and it is still in those preaching the faith, as such a nature: and in that nature Paul and Apollos were united: and this understanding is taken from the Gloss there: because it wishes that they were one in nature in planting and watering: and I well concede that that solution is nothing, which says those are one which are united in the indivisible first by consensus and love: for they are not one unless something is added, namely one, like one spirit, or one heart, and one soul, and the like.

To the question, however, whether those consenting in something can be said to be one, or something one, like spirit, or heart, and the like? It must be said that they cannot. For their consensus is in that which does not unite in something, but rather is divided according to what is held by them.

Furthermore, it must be said that the Saints can well dissent in what is willed, but in the form and end of willing they do not dissent: because each wills what he wills out of charity, and for God, even if they sometimes will different things, just as the Angels in heaven.

Articulus 14 — Whether, Given Two Unbegottens, It Would Follow That There Are Two Gods; And, Whether The Son Is The Head Of All, And The Head Of Christ Is God; And, Whether All Creatures Are Referred To God

Whether, with two unbegotten posited, it would follow that there are two Gods? And, whether the Son is the head of all, and the head of Christ is God? And, whether all creatures are referred to God?

Then it is asked about the notes placed here by Hilary: and first about this: "If anyone unbegotten," etc.

For this is introduced for the purpose that through it is proven that it properly belongs to the unbegotten to be one.

1. But what he says, that with two unbegotten posited, it follows that there are two gods, seems not to follow: because relations do not distinguish essence, but only persons: but when two gods are said, this would be through the division of essence.
2. Likewise, unbegottenness is a negation rather than an affirmation, as was held above: therefore from the multitude of that, a multitude of gods does not follow.

Moreover, it is asked about what is said in this same note, that the head of all is the Son, and the head of Christ is God?

1. For when it is said that the head of all is the Son, it is understood as the head through conformity of nature, or through deity. If in the first way: then the Son is not the head of all.
2. Furthermore, then the head would be taken equivocally in the following word: because through humanity Christ is the head of all men, or at least in humanity: and in this way, his head is not God the Father. But if it is understood through deity, in this way the Father does not seem to be the head of the Son: because he is not greater than him: but the head implies the notion of height and degree. If you say that it does not imply degree, but principle. Against this is what is held in the Letter at the end of the same note, where it says that to one God all things are referred by this degree and this confession.

Moreover, it is still asked about what is said in the same note: For thus to one unbegotten, the beginning of all through the Son we refer all things.

For it seems that the immediate relation of the creature is to two, namely the Son and the Holy Spirit: because both were sent to bring back the rational creature, and thus the immediate relation of two is to one: therefore the order of nature is not preserved: because in no order are two equally referred to one: because it would happen that those two would not have order in themselves: and this cannot be in anything in which the order of nature is posited.

Solution. It must be said that Hilary spoke subtly and well here. For as we said above, in every order of nature it is necessary to posit the principle of that order, from which others, and itself not from another, and from which another which is from another, and from which none: because otherwise the order of nature would not stand, and there would be disorder: and therefore if two unbegotten were posited, there would be two who are not from another from whom others. Since therefore they would not be distinguished in properties, since each would be a principle not from a principle, it would be necessary that they differ by essence, and thus there would be two gods: and this is the intention of Hilary.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that notions do not divide: but the order of nature would require this, as has already been shown. Through this also the solution to the following is clear,

But what is further asked, it must be said that the head is taken according to deity in both cases, and does not imply degree in the Father with respect to the Son, but only principle: but it posits principle and degree with respect to nature: and this degree Hilary understands.

To what is further asked, it must be said in my judgment, that there is not an immediate relation of two to one according to the order of nature, and therefore it is clear that the Greeks err: whence the Spirit sent converts into himself and into the Son, and the Son into himself and into the Father: and there the relation to another ceases. But nevertheless one conversion is into three, according to what is first taken in the order of essences: and thus Hilary does not speak, but commonly according to what conversion is made both into the first essence and into the relation of persons to each other. For the person who is from another refers into it by the order of nature what it has from it.

Another note of Hilary begins below, and that one perhaps seems expressly, etc.: it should fall at the beginning of this distinction in which it is treated of the similar and equal. But the intention of Hilary is to speak against the Sabellian heretics, who are also called Patripassians, because they say that the Father suffered in the Son: and he says that Sindeus first said that the three persons were three by substance, and by consonance one: and therefore the Arians said three substances, and not to be one being except in the consonance of will: and he says that this was not the intention of the Fathers to assert heresy, but to exclude the error of Sabellius, who eludes the number of notions, that is, falsifies the number of persons, saying the same in substance and person to be the Father when he willed, and when he willed the Son, and when he willed the Holy Spirit. Whence they intended that substance be taken from the act of substance for subsistence and person: and consonance would not say only conformity of wills, but unity of essence and connection, which is the Holy Spirit: and therefore consonance which imports both was more conveniently said than unity of essence, which only imported the other.

But in other things, the Letter is manifest by itself.

DISTINCTIO XXXII

Divisio Textus

Here a question arises derived from the aforementioned, etc. Having dealt in the preceding treatise with the properties, here it is discussed the comparison of the persons to each other according to those properties, and the comparison of the properties to the persons and the essence. And therefore it is divided into two parts: in the first of which the comparison of the persons to each other according to those properties is shown. In the second, however, it is asked how the properties relate to the persons and to the essence: and this begins in the following distinction XXXIII, there, A, After the aforementioned, it is considered internally, etc.

However, this distinction is divided into four parts: because in the pre-discussed it was said that the Spirit is the connection of the Father and the Son, therefore it is asked here in the first part, Whether the Father and the Son love each other with the Holy Spirit, or through the Spirit.

However, because this is conceded, it seems by similarity to be conceded that the Father is wise with the begotten wisdom: and therefore in the second part it is asked about this, there, C, Furthermore, it must be diligently investigated, etc. However, because this is not conceded, therefore in the third it is asked, Whether there is only one wisdom in the divine or several? there, F,

After these things it is usually asked by some, In the fourth, however, it returns to the first question, showing it to be insoluble, there, H,

Furthermore, it must be diligently noted, etc.

From these the sentence is clear.

Articulus 1 — Whether These Are True, The Father Loves The Son With The Holy Spirit, And The Father And The Son Love Themselves With The Holy Spirit

Whether these are true, the Father loves the Son with the Holy Spirit, and the Father and the Son love each other with the Holy Spirit?

However, a question arises concerning this expression: the Father loves the Son with the Holy Spirit, or the Father and the Son love each other with the Holy Spirit: which, although it has been disputed above, nevertheless, due to the diversity of opinions, must be touched upon here differently than above.

However, it seems to be true: because, 1. In a certain letter to blessed Bernard, Hugh of Saint Victor says thus:

If the Holy Spirit were called love, then by a similar reasoning (just as also of your heart, just as the Holy Spirit is called the love of the Father and the Son, who, I ask, could deny that you love with the Holy Spirit, that is, with your love? the same intention) the Father and the Son love each other with the Holy Spirit, who is their love.

1. Likewise, in the same place: If you rightly say to love with the love that proceeds from you, why should the Father and the Son not rightly be said to love with the love that proceeds from them? The Son loves with the Holy Spirit. Hence Master Hugh adds, in the same place: And it seems he says this because the question is solved, which they think insoluble, which they say and write is insoluble.
2. Likewise, in the same place: If the Holy Spirit is the love of both, why is it not said that the Father loves with the Holy Spirit, that is, with his love? why is it not rightly said that the Son loves with the Holy Spirit, that is, with his love?
3. Likewise, in the same place: The human mind is not love, but love proceeds from it: and therefore it does not love itself, but with the love that proceeds from itself. But the Father is love, and the Holy Spirit is his love: and therefore the Father loves with himself, and loves with the Holy Spirit: he loves with his own love, he loves with his love.

4. To this there are also the authorities of Augustine here, and above, in distinction X, introduced, and the authorities of Jerome, which lie above in the letter.
5. This also seems by reason: because with every love someone loves, and something is loved: but the Holy Spirit is most truly love: therefore with it someone loves, and something is loved: but it is not love, except of the Father and the Son: therefore with the Holy Spirit the Father and the Son love.
6. Likewise, as Master Hugh says, why is it feared to concede this: the Father and the Son love each other with the Holy Spirit? If because of what follows, that they are with the Holy Spirit: this does not follow: because neither in lower things, nor in any nature, does the lover receive being, or love from the very love by which he loves: but rather by loving, love proceeds from him, and being is received from the lover: therefore it seems, that it ought most properly to be conceded.

And if you say, that it is feared because of the similar: because it follows, that he would be wise with begotten wisdom: this is nothing: because it is evident, that wisdom according to the mode of understanding does not proceed from the wise, but into the wise from the thing about which there is wisdom: but all love proceeds from the lover, as was also shown above: therefore fear is feared where there is no fear, as it seems.

1. Likewise, the Holy Spirit is love and affection not only properly, as Augustine says, but also appropriately. Let us take therefore according to which he is charity or love properly: I ask, if this charity is perfect, or not? It is evident, that it is: therefore it elicits the most perfect act of loving: not unless in him whose charity it is: therefore the Holy Spirit in the Father and the Son elicits the act of affection: just as therefore you love with the affection of virtue, so it seems, that the Father and the Son love with the affection which is the Holy Spirit.

If perhaps you say, that there is a double charity in the divine, namely essential, and personal. Essential makes to love in the Father and the Son, but personal does not. Against: Personal is not more imperfect than essential: since therefore the perfection of affection is in this that it elicits an act, personal can elicit that act, just as essential, as it seems.

1. Likewise, In the image as knowledge is distinguished from the mind, so love from both: and yet I can say, the mind knows with the knowledge it generates, and loves with the love that proceeds from it: therefore it seems that similarly it ought to be conceded in the divine.
2. Likewise, the Father in his personal word says the Son, and says all things, as Anselm says: therefore it seems, that just as with the word he says all things, so it can be conceded, the Father and the Son love with the Holy Spirit.

If perhaps you say, that when it is said, the Father says all things with his word, the word connotes an effect in the creature, by reason of which it can be the principle of saying: but when it is said, the Father loves, nothing is connoted: and therefore it cannot be added with the Holy Spirit, because authority and the reason of the principle would be noted with respect to itself. Against: According to this, this will be true, the Father and the Son love us with the Holy Spirit: and since that loving is being, just as that by which they love each other, it seems the same inconvenience follows from that and from this: therefore it seems, that properly and from eternity it is true, the Father and the Son love each other with the Holy Spirit.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: If for this reason it is said, that it is true, there are many reasons in opposition, one of which is in the letter, namely that

1. To love is to be: if therefore he loves with the Holy Spirit, he is, or they are with the Holy Spirit: and this is absurd.
2. Likewise, To love is to will the good, and one is the will of three, and one good of three: therefore one affection of three: but that is not from the Holy Spirit: therefore it cannot be said, that they love each other with the Holy Spirit.
3. Likewise, Goodness is attributed to the Holy Spirit: therefore since the Father and the Son are not good with the goodness of the Holy Spirit, it seems that similarly they do not love with the affection which is the Holy Spirit.
4. Likewise, In no other notion is one person denominated from the property of another: but when it is said, the Father and the Son love, etc., the love determines the Father and the Son, since it is the notion of the Holy Spirit: therefore it seems, that falsely: it is necessary therefore, that it stands essentially the love.

Solution. It must be said, that here there are many opinions, as is gathered from the writings of the Doctors. There are some who say all such expressions are false, and retracted in their similar. Hence just as the Father is not wise with the wisdom he begot, so he does not love with the affection that proceeds from him. The second say, that it is true, but not proper, and they reduce it to propriety: the Father and the Son love, etc., that is, with the affection which is essentially said, but is appropriable to the Holy Spirit. Hence the ablative, with the Holy Spirit, according to them stands there as proper, by reason of which appropriation is made just as it is improper to say, the Father knows with the Son, because he knows with the knowledge which is appropriable to the Son.

Against these two opinions it is objected thus, that not only Augustine, but also other Authors not only posit this that the Father and the Son love each other with the Holy Spirit, but also many Philosophers prove: and Augustine introduces a reason which is held here in the letter, and above.

Furthermore, If according to appropriation it were fitting only to the Holy Spirit the affection by which the Father and the Son love each other, then it should not be removed from the Father and the Son: but it says here, that not otherwise and similarly, that one of the two is the affection by which each is joined: therefore because these opinions preserve unity with their own gift, as in the bond of peace: they directly contradict the words of the Saints, therefore more and more learned do not hold these opinions.

However, there are third who follow Simon of Tournai, who say that it is true and proper: but when it is said, the Father and the Son love each other with the Holy Spirit, the ablative is constructed in the designation of a sign, so that the sense is, the Father and the Son love each other: and the sign of this is, that one Spirit proceeds from them commonly. Against these, however, it is again objected: When it is said, these two friends love each other with the love that proceeds from them, the ablative is constructed formally, and in the relation of a formal cause: therefore similarly here when it is said, the Father and the Son love each other with the Holy Spirit, or with the love which is the Holy Spirit, it is constructed in the relation as if of a formal cause.

To this, however, they say, that it is not similar in lower things and in the divine: because in created love according to the intellect there are two things, namely that love is, and that it is the form of the will not existing by itself. As to the first, love proceeds into the beloved, and in this respect the similarity holds. As to the second, it has the relation of form to the lover, and in this respect it does not have similarity, because the Holy Spirit does not inform the Father and the Son: but is a person in itself and according to itself one and distinct. Thus they solve the objection made above, namely that with every love someone loves and something is loved: and if the Holy Spirit is love, that the Father and the Son love with the Holy Spirit. For they say, that it is understood of love which is the form of the lover, and love proceeding, but not of love distinct personally from the lover: hence they say, that with the Holy Spirit the Father loves nothing formally. Thus they also solve to the other, namely that if charity is perfect, it elicits the act of loving in him whose charity or affection it is said to be. For they say, that this is true of charity which is perfect as a form, not of that which is perfect as a person, for with this the Father and the Son do not love, except as a sign of affection, and not formally and thus therefore it is clear how the opinion of Tournai is preserved.

But the fourth opinion is of Auxerre, and concedes all those objections, saying that the ablative is constructed in the relation of a quasi-formal cause. And against that opinion it is objected thus:

1. Everything that is as a form, is resting in that of which it is the form or quasi-form, and does not have being distinct by itself: therefore if the Holy Spirit to the Father and the Son loving each other is as a form, he is resting or quasi-resting in the Father and the Son, and does not have being distinct by itself: but this is false and heretical, because the Holy Spirit is a distinct person existing by itself.
2. Likewise, If it is as a form, then it is as a perfection of the loving Father and the loving Son: therefore the act of loving the Father and the Son have from the Holy Spirit: just as the act following the form, is had from the form of which it is that act: and this again is impossible, since the Father and the Son have nothing from the Holy Spirit.
3. Likewise, Form according to reason is before the act of which it is the principle: therefore love is before loving with love: but this is false, because by loving proceeds the love which is the Holy Spirit, just as by generating proceeds the Son: therefore it seems impossible, that it is constructed in the relation as if of a formal cause.

To this, however, preserving that opinion, it can be said, that there is an interior form, and an exterior form. Interior as that which confers being if it is substantial, or which confers well-being or in some way being if it is accidental. Exterior, however, is twofold, namely containing and terminating the thing, as place: and to which the thing is made as a paradigm or exemplar. And in none of those ways is that ablative said to be constructed in the relation as if of a formal cause, but it is as a form which has the act of form, and falls from the act of cause: for when I say, formal cause, I say two things, namely causality, and this has influence over that which is caused: and I say moreover form, and this has many acts, namely to give being, to give reason, to terminate, to unite: and in this last act the Holy Spirit is as a form of the Father and the Son, namely because he unites the Father and the Son, not effectively (for this is impossible), but as that in which they are united, and this is imported by the ablative.

And by this the solution to all those objections is clear: because those are taken from the part-

...the form according to which the act has others, and according to which it is a cause, and not from that act alone which is to unite in something.

But there are others who concede all these things and introduce a fifth opinion, namely that in truth when it is said, "The Father and the Son love each other by the Holy Spirit," the ablative is constructed in the reason of effect, and not of form or sign: and this seems to be the opinion of Master Hugh of Saint Victor in the letter on the procession of the Holy Spirit to Blessed Bernard, where he says thus: "That the Father is said to love by the Holy Spirit is not so understood, that the Holy Spirit exists as the author and origin of the love which the Father is, and loves what he loves by choice: but that the Father breathes forth that love by which the Son is loved, and the Holy Spirit is, and exists as its author and origin. Therefore, the Father is said to love by the Holy Spirit: not that he has love through him, but that he exhibits it: not that he receives love from him, but that he himself bestows it." This is what Hilary and Augustine say here, that the Father operates through the Son not because he receives anything from the Son, but because he is the author and origin of the power operating in the Son.

But it seems to be against this, that when it is said, "The Father operates through the Son," or "by the Son," an effect is noted in the creature into which the work passes: but when it is said, "The Father loves the Son by the Holy Spirit," or conversely, no effect is noted into which love passes, but rather it is signified to pass into the Son, or conversely into the Father, when it is said the Son loves the Father by the Holy Spirit. But to this those who hold this opinion say, that although in this expression, "The Father loves the Son by the Holy Spirit," the ablative is the matter of love in the expression, yet it is not so in reality, but rather the Son as well as the Father signifies the substance or person from which the act proceeds: and therefore in reality the Holy Spirit is the terminus of that act: because there is a double communicability of the superior nature, as was said above, namely by generation and spiration which is imported by love: and therefore just as when it is said, "The Father speaks by the Word," it is noted by the Word not the reason of speaking on the part of speaking, but rather as if the effect of the act: so when it is said, "The Father and the Son love each other by the Holy Spirit," the matter of the word is noted as if the effect by the Holy Spirit.

But because this mode of speaking is most foreign, therefore I think, as was said above, that the ablative is constructed in the relation of the existing from the principle which has the act as if of form in uniting, and this opinion is then the sixth, and it encompasses two, namely the fourth and the fifth. And it is similar when it is said, "The Father speaks all things by the Word": for by the Word it is said to exist from the principle through the act of speaking, that is, as if the effect of the speaking: and moreover it says the reason of those things which are said in the Word, which nevertheless are not said in the Word, except by the speaking of the Word. Thus here it must be said, that the Father and the Son love each other, so that the "each other" is held reflexively: for then considering the Word insofar as it is notional, it is principled that which is supposed in the reality of the ablative, and it is as if the effect of the Father and the Son loving. But because the mode of procession must also be considered, because it proceeds as true love connecting, therefore then the accusative "each other" becomes the matter of the word into which it passes. And this is explained above, and all other things, namely what the word says, whether essence or notion: and if notion, which notion: and if it says spiration, why in its place this word "spirates" cannot be put, so that it would be said, "The Father and the Son spirate the Holy Spirit by the Holy Spirit": and many other things which were touched upon above.

According to this opinion, therefore, which more agrees with the Saints, it must be said to the first, that we well concede all those reasons which prove that which is undoubtedly posited by the Saints, and is proved and explained, as is clear from the words of Master Hugh. But nevertheless care must be taken not to draw too much from those reasons. For when it is objected, that by all that which is truly love, someone loves something, it must be said, that by that as a form resting in the subject, it is not necessary, but as an effect having the act as if of form, it well agrees in the divine.

To the other it must be said, that it must not be conceded, that the love which is the Spirit elicits the act of love in the Father: for that proposition does not hold, except in those whose nature is perfect to the act in itself, because they need a habit perfecting the act: but it is not so in the divine: and therefore personal love is produced by the notional act of love of the Father and the Son, and according to the reason of understanding it does not elicit that act, but emanates by that act.

To the other it must be said, that essential love also does not properly elicit in God, but is the same with God. But that personal love does not also elicit, is not from imperfection, but rather from perfection, because it is a distinct person, and not a form perfecting the operative power which is the will.

To the other it must be said, that it is not altogether similar concerning the image: because knowledge and love are accidents: and therefore the mind loves with love which is form and accident. But in the divine it is not so: but each person is distinct, needing nothing, although all persons are one in essence.

To the other it must be said, that the Father speaks by the Word, as was said above: because it is consigned with the creature with respect to which the Word is the reason of speaking on the part of the thing said, although it does not have the reason of principle on the part of the speaker. Nevertheless it is not altogether similar in love, as was also touched upon by objecting to the contrary.

To that which is objected against, it must be said that although to love is to be, yet it is signified in another way, namely as a notional act: nor does the ablative relate to the verb in the same relation as it relates to the preceding nominative and the following accusative: because to the verb it relates as effect, or as if effect: but to the extremes of the verb which are signified by respect to the oblique, it relates in the relation of connection, as was said before: and therefore it does not follow, that they are from the Holy Spirit: but it would follow, if the ablative were constructed in the relation of efficient cause with the verb.

To the other it must be said, that there is one will: but notional love adds above the will a notional act of the person: whence this love is not the same as to will good to someone.

To the other it must be said, that goodness is attributed to the Holy Spirit: but it is not a notional act by which the Holy Spirit is signified as proceeding and connecting: and this is all clear above.

To the other it must be said, that this word, "loves," does not say denomination from the property of the Holy Spirit: but rather, since love can be signified in five ways, as was held above, it says here a notional act which is with respect to the Holy Spirit, and does not denominate the Father and the Son by the notion of the Holy Spirit, but rather it says common spiration, under another reason to be said.

Articulus 2 — Which Of These Are More Proper, The Father And The Son Love In The Holy Spirit, Or Through The Holy Spirit, Or With The Love Which Is The Holy Spirit, Or With The Love Which Proceeds From Him

Which of these are more properly, the Father and the Son love by the Holy Spirit, or through the Holy Spirit, or by the love which is the Holy Spirit, or by the love which proceeds from Him?

Which of these are more properly, the Father and the Son love by the Holy Spirit, or through the Holy Spirit, or by the love which is the Holy Spirit, or by the love which proceeds from Him?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, A, If the Father or the Son is said to love through the Holy Spirit, etc.

For here it seems to concede that the Father and the Son love by the Holy Spirit, and through the Holy Spirit, and by the love which is the Holy Spirit, and by the love which proceeds from them. And it is asked, which of these are more and less properly?

Again, when it is said, the Father and the Son love themselves by the Holy Spirit, and it cannot be said, they are referred by the Holy Spirit, or they breathe by the Holy Spirit: it is asked, with which words the ablative alone is received, or the preposition with the case? For we say that the Father and the Son are united and connected by the Holy Spirit, and suchlike.

Again, since it is conceded by the Saints that the Father and the Son are connected and united by the Holy Spirit, and suchlike: it is asked, whether it should be conceded that the Holy Spirit connects and unites the Father and the Son? For this seems to be conceded from the conversion of passive into active.

To this, without prejudice, it can be said that that ablative when it is placed by itself has less impropriety than when it is placed with a preposition: because the preposition implies some mode of causality, since it has been sufficiently proven above that the ablative falls under the notion of causality: yet it is in no way conceded that the Father and the Son love themselves by the Holy Spirit: because the preposition denotes a cause as a quasi-efficient principle: but this is received and placed in the text, the Father and the Son love themselves through the Spirit, although it is less proper than this, the Father and the Son love themselves by the Holy Spirit: because the "through" when joined to the case, which is of a distinct or diverse supposit from the direct, which is placed in the same expression, as the Prepositivus says, denotes the notion of a principle in the matter of the case, as, the Father operates through the Son, and similarly this, They love through the Holy Spirit. But this is most proper, the Father and the Son love themselves in the Holy Spirit: because that preposition "in" denotes the union of connection, and the agreement of bond. This, however, is more proper, They love themselves by the love which is the Holy Spirit: because love more properly signifies the thing connecting, than the Holy Spirit: and therefore this, They love themselves by the proceeding love, is less proper, because the "proceeding" draws the love, so that it says to be from them, and not to be uniting.

To the other it must be said that the "they love" indeed says the same notion as "they breathe," but it says in another mode of signifying. However, "they are referred" says a relation to another: and therefore it does not receive the determination of the ablative, as "they love" does: and the full reason for this is sufficiently noted above.

To the other it must be said that all verbs denoting union in the principal mode of signifying, as "they love," "they connect," "they unite," "they delight," and suchlike, receive the determination of the ablative, which implies that union: but not others, as "they are referred," and "they are distinguished," and the reason for this is clear from what was said before.

To the other it must be said in my judgment that active are not to be conceded: because then causality would be carried in the subject of the active verb: but passive are conceded, and the action of that passion is not placed in the matter of the ablative simply, but in a certain way, namely through the act of uniting, as was said.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Father Is Wise With Begotten Wisdom, And Whether The Father Knows Himself In The Son Or In The Word

Whether the Father is wise with begotten wisdom? and, Whether the Father knows Himself in the Son or in the Word?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said in the second part, there, C, Furthermore it must be diligently investigated, etc.

For it seems that the Father is wise with begotten wisdom.

1. For above there was a proof of the coeternity of the Father and the Son through this word of the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 1:24, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God. Augustine says, the Father was never without power, and without wisdom: therefore the Son is coeternal with the Father. From this it is taken that the Son is the wisdom of the Father: but every wise one is wise by his own wisdom: therefore the Father is wise with begotten wisdom, since the Son is begotten.

1. Likewise, above in the words of Augustine, where he proves the Trinity of persons, he says,

He saw that without wisdom he is not, and therefore he understood him to be a foolish heretic: to have wisdom, which is begotten from him. Therefore the Father is wise with begotten wisdom.

1. Likewise, immediately before this reading, in the words of Augustine where he says: This is one as a word through Therefore Perfect, to whom nothing is lacking: and a certain art of the omnipotent and wise God, full of all reasons of living and immutable things: and all are ONE in it, as it itself is one from one, with which one: there God knows all things which he made through it. Therefore the Father knows in the Son all things which he made: therefore he knows through the Son, and is wise with begotten wisdom, as it seems.
2. Likewise, Augustine in book XV of On the Trinity: Therefore God the Father knows all things in Himself, and knows also in His Word: but in Himself as Himself, in His Word however as that which is of all those things which are in Himself. They know each other, the Father and the Son: but the Father by begetting, the Son by being born. And all things which are in their essence, and in their knowledge, and in their wisdom, each of them sees simultaneously. The Father knows by begotten wisdom: and thus the proposition is held.

But against this the Master objects in the Letter.

Solution. It must be said that the Father is not wise with begotten wisdom, nor in begotten wisdom. For when it is said, the Father is wise with begotten wisdom, by those ablatives a relation of form to the wise Father is imported, and thus being is imported: because being wisdom and being essence are the same in the divine: and therefore that is false. Similarly, when it is said, the Father is wise in begotten wisdom, so that the determination in begotten wisdom is referred to the participle wise, and not to the Father, then it is noted that he has the reason of his wisdom in the Son: and this again is not true: whence also that is false. However, when it is said, the Father knows all things in the Son: and when it is said, the Father knows all things in the Son, so that under the distribution the Father does not fall, but the Holy Spirit, and the Son, and the created, with respect to which the Son is the principle: it seems to me that it can be conceded: because something is known in something in two ways, namely as in the habit of knowables, which, I say, habit informs the wise: and thus it is not conceded. In another way, having knowledge of some principle according to every mode by which it can influence over those of which it is the principle, we say we know all things in that principle to which or of which it is the principle: and yet it does not follow that we receive anything from that principle. Let the true opinion of the Philosophers be supposed, who posit the movers of the spheres, and let the first mover influence over the mover of the sun's heaven: but the mover of the sun influences over all generated and corrupted things, and sufficiently: then it will be true that the first mover knows all things, which as in principle are in the mover of the sun in itself, and knows all created things also in the mover of the sun: and yet it receives nothing from it, but rather by knowing thus it confers: for every intelligence, as the Philosopher says, knows that which is within it, by that which is its cause, not by that which it receives something from it. Thus therefore we say the Father knows all things in the Son, of which the Son is a sufficient principle, by the fact that he begot him in the reason of such a principle. And this is the understanding of the three authorities lastly introduced. And this certain ancient Doctors of this city wished to say, saying that this word of Augustine, the Father knows all things in the Word, of which the Word is: is double, from the fact that this determination in the Word, determines the word knows, or knows, on the part of the knower, and thus it is false: or on the part of those of which there is knowledge, or science, which are the matter of the act of the word into which it passes, and thus it is true, because the Son is a sufficient principle of the known, not however a principle of the knowledge.

But if you ask, Whether it must be conceded that the Father knows Himself in the Son, or in the Word? For it seems that yes: because in that which is manifestative of something, that which is manifested in it is known: but the Word is manifestative of the speaker: therefore the Father speaking is known in the spoken Word: therefore it seems that the Father knows in the Son.

To this it must be said that I think it must not be conceded. For although Augustine says that the Father by generating the Son, spoke Himself another: yet it is commonly glossed that Himself another stands there for most similar to Himself: for the Son cannot be the reason that the Father knows, although he is the reason that he is known by someone, as he himself says: Father, I have manifested your name to men! And by this the objection is solved: because the Word does not manifest so as to give knowledge to the Father, but rather by receiving from him, it manifested to others. Therefore it must be considered in all such things, that with respect to those of which the Son is the principle, and a sufficient reason for knowing, such expressions are conceded, the Father knows all things in the Son, of which the Word is, and the like.

And note that some simply deny these expressions: and say they are retracted in a similar one to itself, when Augustine retracted this, the Father is wise with begotten wisdom. But presumption seems thus to impose silence on the words of the Saints.

To that therefore which is first objected, it must be said that Augustine speaks there of the wisdom which appropriately belongs to the Son: but this is unbegotten, or not begotten, and essential: for although in that which is wisdom, it does not conclude the Son to be, yet in that which is appropriated, it concludes that with the non-existence of the proper, there will not be something appropriated: therefore from the destruction of the consequent, with the appropriated posited, the proper will be posited.

By this also the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Father Is Wise With Begotten Wisdom, And Whether It Can Be Granted That The Father Is Wise In The Son Or Is Wise Through The Son, Just As It Is Granted That The Father Knows In The Son

Whether the Father is wise with begotten wisdom?
and, Whether it can be conceded that the Father is wise by the Son, or is wise through the Son:
just as it is conceded, the Father knows in the Son?

Whether the Father is wise with begotten wisdom?
and, Whether it can be conceded that the Father is wise by the Son, or is wise through the Son:
just as it is conceded, the Father knows in the Son?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, C, at the end: From these it is clear, that the Father is not wise with begotten wisdom, etc.

For this seems false: because the construction of the formal cause is noted in the ablative: and the Father has no cause.

Solution. This objection is worthless: because by such a construction the mode of causality is not noted, except in the mode of understanding through the name, and not in reality.

But note, that this is a useful question, Why according to Augustine, in every construction as if formal, is being referred?
Because that construction speaks of the relation of form to subject only: and since form gives being in some way simply, or in a certain respect, in divine matters it is always taken as being simply, because every such mode of predicating is converted into substance: but in the construction which is of efficient cause it is not so, because that sometimes has relative predication.

But it is asked, Whether it can be conceded, the Father is wise by the Son, or is wise from the Son, or is wise through the Son; just as it is conceded, the Father knows in the Son?

To this it must be said, that it cannot: because the habit of construction is not similar, but rather the cause of knowledge is imported with respect to the Father: and since the Son is not the principle of any of those things which are in the Father, it must not be conceded.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Son Is Wise With Unbegotten Wisdom

Whether the Son is wise with unbegotten wisdom?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said:

After these things it is usually asked by some, etc.

For it seems that the Son is also wise with unbegotten wisdom:

1. For He is wise with essential wisdom: and essential wisdom is unbegotten wisdom: therefore He is wise with unbegotten wisdom.
2. Likewise, the Son is unbegotten essence: and to be is to be wise: therefore He is wise with unbegotten wisdom.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY!

Hilary says: He has nothing except what is born, therefore the Son does not have it: and the admiration of the honor of the begotten is in the honor of the begetter: unbegotten wisdom.

Likewise, Unbegotten is a property of the Father: therefore it does not pertain to the Son.

Solution. It must be said that although unbegotten is said in many ways: and in one way it pertains to essence, and to essential things: nevertheless, in the usage of the Saints it is taken for the property of the Father: and therefore we have above, that it does not pertain to the Holy Spirit, nor even to essence: and therefore it must not be conceded that the Son is wise with unbegotten wisdom. For as it has been held above, although wisdom is an essential name, nevertheless it can supposit a person from what is notionally adjoined to it: and therefore unbegotten wisdom is the Father, and begotten wisdom is the Son.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that wisdom by itself is essential: but with an adjunct it is essential drawn to supposit for a person.

To the other, the solution is clear in the same way by saying there.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Son Is Wise Of Himself, Or Through Himself

Whether the Son is wise by himself, or through himself?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said there: "The question is usually asked, Whether the Son is wise by himself, or through himself?" etc.

It seems that neither of these should be conceded: because all things which the Son has, he has from the Father, and through the Father: therefore not through himself.

Solution. It must be said that the distinction given in the Text is reasonable. For that which is through itself is opposed in two ways, as is gathered from two considerations of the third book of the Topics: for the Philosopher says that that which is through itself is more to be loved than that which is through another. And from this it is taken that through itself and through another are opposed. He also says the same, that that which is through itself is more to be loved than that which is through accident. And from this it is taken that through itself is opposed to that which is through accident: and according to this, this distinction proceeds, that the Son is wise through himself, according to which "through itself" is opposed to that which is through accident: but not wise through himself, according to which "through itself" is opposed to that which is through another as its principle. But in no way should it be conceded that the Son is wise from himself, or operates from himself: because "from himself" is not opposed to that which is through accident, but only to that which is from another.

Articulus 7 — Whether We Can Grant That The Son Operates Through The Father, And One Person Through Another, And Every Agent Short Of God Is Weak

Whether we can concede that the Son operates through the Father, and one person through another, and every agent besides God is infirm?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

Let him be infirm not acting from himself, unless he acts from God.

1. For from this it seems that everything which does not act from God as the same essence to itself is an infirm agent.
2. Furthermore, when it is said: the Father acts or operates through the Son, it is customary to say that the "through" denotes in the Son to exist from that principle by which it operates through him: and some call this subauthority. And the reason for this is asked.

Likewise, the three are equally immediately referred to the work: therefore it seems that no one operates through another.

1. Likewise, if it is a sufficient reason that the Father operates through the Son, because the Son is from him: then also by the same reason we can say that the Father and the Son operate through the Holy Spirit, because the Holy Spirit is from both: and this is not found.
2. Likewise, just as the preposition in inferiors sometimes denotes subauthority in the casual adjunct to it, as when it is said, the king operates through the bailiff: so conversely it sometimes denotes authority, as when it is said, the bailiff operates this through the king, because he cannot do it by himself: therefore it seems that in some sense also in divine matters we can concede that the Son operates through the Father: and this is not found.

Solution. It must be said that the Father operates through the Son, as Master Hugh of Saint Victor says, thus saying in a certain letter to Bernard: Without doubt what the Son acts, the Father acts, from whom he receives to act and to be able to act. But that he is said to operate through the Son is not so understood, as if the Son is the author and origin of the power which the Father is, and which he wills he operates: but that the Father is the origin of the power, which the Son is, and which operates for the good pleasure. Thus therefore the Father operates through the Son, because to him as to the principle is referred the power and work by which the Son operates.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that it is well conceded that every other agent besides God is an infirm agent, either because it needs an instrument and motion, as the movers of the heavens which the Philosophers posit, who cannot influence except through the body, and through its motion: or because they are also deficient in themselves, as the elements, and the elemented which are generated and corrupted acting in each other. But God remaining stable by his power acts all things: and therefore he alone is the perfect agent.

To the other it must be said, that the "through" denotes a cause moved by another cause, and especially in the genus of efficient cause, or formal, and not of material or final, as striking through a stick, and the like. The sun also acts through heat, and the universal through a more particular form: and therefore because the Son by appropriation is the power and exemplary wisdom of the made things, this preposition's relation in the work of the three is more fitting to him than to another.

To the other it must be said, that it is not said of the Holy Spirit: because although he has the operating power from the Father and the Son, it is not appropriated to him, but rather the end and the good which is the containment of the work in being, and good: and therefore the Father and the Son operate more in the Holy Spirit containing their work, than through the Holy Spirit.

To the other it must be said, that the preposition "through" never denotes authority in its casual, if it is different from the thing of the preceding nominative, unless improperly. Hence when it is said, the bailiff acts through the king, it is resolved, that is, through the king's power which is in him. Hence the relation of the king to the work is not denoted there by this that he has from the bailiff, or by himself, but rather the conjunction of his power with the operating bailiff: and since such are improper, they are not extended into divine predications, and therefore this is not received, the Son operates through the Father.

Articulus 8 — Whether There Is Only One Wisdom Of The Father

Whether there is only one wisdom of the Father?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said there, F, After these things it is usually asked by some, etc.

For it seems that not: because.
1. By the same reason by which the Son is wise with begotten wisdom, likewise also the Holy Spirit is wise with proceeding wisdom, and thus there is unbegotten wisdom, and begotten wisdom, and proceeding wisdom, and essential wisdom.

1. Furthermore, Wisdom is said of wisdom: therefore it seems that distinction falls between wisdom and wisdom: and thus there are multiple wisdoms.

Solution. It must be said that, as the Master says in the Text, these objections are evident to all, and they do not hold in divine matters: because such names, wisdom, God, and certain others indeed signify the divine essence, but by the grace of the adjunct they suppose for the person: and therefore distinction falls there by the grace of the supposit, and not by the grace of the signified: and therefore just as it does not follow, God of God: therefore there are different or two gods: so it does not follow, wisdom of wisdom: therefore there are two or different wisdoms: but it follows: therefore in divine matters there are two or more who are one wisdom, and one God: and through this the solution to the second is clear.

To the first it must be said that the Spirit is wisdom: but it is not conceded that it is proceeding wisdom: because wisdom is not appropriable to love, but rather to the speaker and the word: just as in the image wisdom is referred to knowledge and mind, and not to will.

DISTINCTIO XXXIII

Divisio Textus

After the aforementioned things are considered internally and subtly, etc.

Here the Master compares the notions and persons to the essence in which they are. And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which the Master shows that the notions are in the persons and essence by identity. In the second, however, he shows that the persons are compared to the essence by the identity of essence, and this in the following distinction XXXIV, there, A, "To the aforementioned it is to be added," etc.

This distinction is divided into two parts: in the first of which the Master shows that the notions are the persons in which they are, and the notions are also the divine essence. In the second, he introduces the reasoning of certain heretics in opposition, and resolves it, there, D, "However, some deny this," etc.

In the first part, he does three things: the first of which is that he proves the properties to be in the persons, and to be the persons. Secondly, he shows the same from the nature of divine simplicity, there, B, "And when concerning simplicity," etc. Thirdly, he concludes from those that the properties are also the divine essence, there, C, "For that the property is also the divine nature," etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether It Is Lawful For The Properties To Be Signified By An Abstract Name, As Paternity

Whether it is permissible for properties to be signified by an abstract name, such as paternity?

However, the first question arises here, Whether it is permissible for properties to be signified by an abstract name, such as paternity, and the like?

However, it seems that it is so: because
1. What is signified in a general abstract manner, can also be signified in a specific manner: it is said, however, in the preface of the Trinity: And in the persons, property, since property is a name expressing its thing in the abstract: therefore, this is permissible in the specific.

by notions it happens, that it is said paternity, filiation, and the like.

1. Likewise, in divine things, properties are in the manner of accidents in lower things: but such are signified abstractly: therefore, also in divine things they can be signified abstractly.
2. Furthermore, some things agree with them according to which they are understood by themselves, as to distinguish, and to make relatives, and the like: therefore, in this manner without the hypostases in which they are, they can be signified: since therefore signified without hypostases, they cannot be signified except abstractly, it seems that it is permitted for us to speak of properties in an abstract manner.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. In lower things, that which is not predicated denominatively, but according to substance, does not have an abstract, as man, and animal, and rational, and the like: but that which is predicated denominatively only, as white, whiteness, and the like: but in divine things nothing is predicated according to denomination and accident:

therefore nothing is permitted there to be signified in an abstract manner.

1. Likewise, that which is signified in an abstract manner is said in a simpler manner than that which is taken concretely: but nothing in divine things is simpler one than another: therefore one ought not to be signified as abstract, and another as concrete.

2. Likewise, the abstract notes that there was composition in the concrete from which it is abstracted: but in divine things nothing is composed: therefore nothing is permitted to be abstracted.

Solution. It seems to be said, that according to the thing nothing is abstract in divine things. For a double necessity compels us to signify something in an abstract manner both in essential and notional things. In essential things, as when we say, essence, wisdom, deity, divinity, substance, and the like. In notional things, as when we say paternity, filiation, relation, property, and the like. One of those necessities is chiefly the mode of attributing: because when we say, the Father is referred to the Son, and is referred to the Holy Spirit: unless we were to say that relation is something, it would be necessary that the Father would relate to the Son and the Holy Spirit in the same way: and this is not true. Likewise, when it is said, hypostasis is distinguished, and property distinguishes, we attribute to hypostasis what we do not attribute to property: for this reason compels in some way to signify property, which is not signified as person: and this cannot be except by abstracting.

Another reason is the instance of heretics in disputation: because they compel us to discern in the intentions of names: and since our intellect is material, and cannot grasp the simple except by way of composition, as it is accustomed in lower things, it grasps in the same way in higher things, not indeed saying a composed thing, but discerning among those things which are the same thing, according to modes of attributing and supposing: because I would well concede this, that unless there were something in which our intellect, signifying one without the other, were founded, it would be empty and vain: but it is founded in diverse attributes, which are referred to hypostasis and property, as has been said.

I say therefore to the first, that in divine things the whole being is from the being of essence: and although there is no accident in divine things, nevertheless property in that which is in another, not being by itself, is signified as able to be understood without it: and therefore it is abstracted. But thus it is not in substantial things: because from those is substantial being: and therefore they cannot be abstracted as denominative: because with them abstracted, the subject would not remain.

To the other it must be said, that nothing there is simpler abstract than concrete: nor therefore is abstraction made, but rather that it is signified to have a different supposition from that from which it is abstracted: and this as to the mode of understanding, which in the thing places nothing except as much as has been said, namely supposing diversely with diverse adjuncts.

To the other it must be said, that composition is not noted to have been, but rather to be signifiable in another way: because in divine things, as has already been said, one is not separated from another as being of one nature from being of another nature, as accident from subject: but it is made as an indication of diverse attribution, namely that something is said of one, which is not said of another, and conversely.

Articulus 2 — Whether A Notion Is Something In The Person, And Whether It Is The Person Itself

Whether a notion is something in the person, and whether it is the person itself?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said there, in the middle of chapter A, How would they be, if they were not in them? and how would they be in them, if they were not the persons themselves? etc.

From this, indeed, two things seem to be held, namely, that a notion is something in the person, and that it is the person itself.

Against the first, however, it seems to be objected thus:

1. The property of relation is caused by motion: but in divine persons there is no motion: therefore in divine persons there is no relation.
2. Furthermore, In what manner of speaking is a property indicated to be in a person, or hypostasis? It is evident, that it is only as an accident in a subject, according to the reason of understanding.
3. BUT on the contrary:
   The subject according to the reason of understanding is before the accident or property: because it falls in its definition, as the Philosopher says in the seventh book of the first Philosophy: but it has been proven above, that a personal property according to the mode of understanding is before the hypostasis: therefore it is not in the person as a property in a subject.

Furthermore, it seems that it is in it as a form in a subject: because a form gives being: and similarly a personal property makes the person, as has been proven above. But on the contrary: A form is either substantial or accidental. Not substantial: because that is not in a subject as a subject, because a subject, as the Philosopher says, is a being complete in itself, an occasion for another to exist in it: but rather it is in matter as its act and perfection: thus, however, a property is not in a person. But if it is as an accidental form: then it will be according to the intellect after the hypostasis, and not before: but this has been refuted.

If for this reason it were said, as Prepositivus said, that a property is not in a person, but is the person. Against this seems to be what is said here in the Letter, that in persons there are properties, no one dares to deny, since authority openly proclaims:

And in persons property, and in essence unity.

Against the other part, namely that a property is the person, it is objected thus:

1. If a property is the person: then any property which is in a person, is predicated of that person: therefore, since common spiration is a certain relation, it is predicated of the person: therefore, common spiration is a person. Either therefore it is a person being from another, or not being from another. If in the first way: then it is not the Father, which is false. If in the second way: then it is not the Son, which again is false: therefore it seems that some notion is a person: and the same reason applies to all: therefore no notion is a person, as it seems.

2. Likewise, In lower things the simplest are distinguished by themselves: therefore, since divine persons are most simple, it seems that they are distinguished by themselves: and from this it is concluded, that not only are notions not persons, but that notions are nothing at all.

3. And this Prepositivus conceded, and said that there were no notions except in the manner of speaking: as when it is said, I ask your clemency, that is, I ask you, the clement one: thus he said, let property be adored in persons, that is, the person who is properly the Father, or the Son, or the Holy Spirit. But against this are certain reasons already touched upon in part, and solved above: because from this it seems to follow, that since the Father is a simple person, and no property is in him, that he would relate in the same way to the Son and to the Holy Spirit: and it would be the same to say, the Father generates, and the Father spirates. But to this he said, that it is the same, but the connoted things differ: for he said, that although the Father signifies only the person, yet it connotes something, namely the existence of the Son: and similarly the giver. But because this position has been abolished, and it seems not to agree with the words of the Saints, therefore it does not seem to be consented to.

Therefore, the solution will be, that we say properties are in persons, and persons, as the Master here says: in persons, however, as diverse from them in the mode of understanding and attributing: but the persons themselves, as the same in reality existing with them, as also with the essence: because whatever is in God, God is.

To the first, therefore, it must be said, that it is otherwise with relations which are according to the mode of existing and the order of nature, and with those which are accidental: because the former in divine things are before the thing, as has been noted fully enough above, and they are not caused by motion and change except accidentally: because if change in lower things could be abstracted from the mode of existing by which one is from another, they would be caused by the mode of existing without motion: and therefore it happens that they are caused by motion. In divine things, therefore, where there is no motion, they are caused by the mode of existing alone, or rather they make by distinguishing the mode of existing, as has been held above, insofar as they are personal properties.

To the other it must be said, that the mode of speaking in, is reduced to that mode by which a property is in that of which it is a property, to which it confers distinct being: and therefore it is partly as a form, partly as a property, and partly as the same signified in another way: as a form, because it confers personal being: as a property, because it distinguishes: as the same signified in another way, because it is the person, and yet as the reason of its distinction from another person of the same nature: and therefore this mode of speaking in, cannot be perfectly reduced to one mode: because the comparison of earthly things to God, as Hilary says, is none: but from many it is necessary to gather that which is in one: and when many have been gathered, they will not yet perfectly represent.

And through this the solution to all that is objected concerning the first part is clear.

As to what is objected concerning the second part, it must be said that a property is the person: and this is because of the simplicity which requires this, that whatever is in the person, is the person itself: just as whatever is in God, God is, as the Master says in the Letter.

To what is objected against this, it must be said that common spiration is a person being from another, because it is the Son: and it is a person not being from another, because it is the Father: and this is not inconvenient.

But if from this someone were to object: therefore it is being from another, and not being from another: therefore affirmation and negation are verified of the same. It must be said according to the Doctors, that this is double, spiration is being from another, from the fact that the term being can be held adjectively, and as referred to its substantive to what I say spiration: and thus both are false, namely, spiration is being from another, and spiration is not being from another: and they do not differ by affirmation and negation, since both are affirmative: and it is signified in the affirmative, that spiration is proceeding from another, and this does not happen, as will be proven below: because although a property is a person, yet the person supposed is not supposed by the property. In the negative, however, spiration is signified as distinct by the property of innascibility: and this again does not agree: because a property distinguishes, and is not distinguished. But if the term being is substantive: then the affirmative is true, namely, spiration is being from another, that is, he who is from another, because he is the Son: and the negative is similarly true, spiration is not being from another, that is, he who is not from another, because he is the Father who is not from another: and they are not opposed by affirmation and negation, as is evident per se.

To the other it must be said, that although the simplest are distinct, nevertheless nothing prohibits there being reasons for distinguishing in them: just as in every simple except the first, simplicity is one thing, and the simple itself is another: and thus although divine persons are most simple, nevertheless nothing prohibits according to the mode of understanding and attributing to accept the reason of their distinction, and that is the notion, because the notion as distinguishing signified, is understood as the reason of the person rather than understood as some thing.

To what is further objected concerning the opinion of Prepositivus, and of certain others, it seems to be conceded. For against Augustine it is expressly, that the Father signifies only the hypostasis, but connotes the Son: just as creator signifies only the essence, but connotes the effect: because we have had above, that these names, Father and Son, do not signify only hypostases, but also properties.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Properties Are The Divine Essence

Whether properties are the divine essence?

Whether properties are the divine essence?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, "For indeed the property is also the divine nature," etc.

And two things are asked here: of which the first is, Whether properties are the divine essence?

The second is, Whether essential adjectives, said in any way, are said of notions, or not?

To the first it is proceeded thus:
1. Whatever is in God, God is: but property is in God: therefore God is: therefore property is the divine essence.

1. Likewise, If it were not the divine essence, and yet in some way it were in the divine essence, then it would make a composition of diverse things: and this does not suit the most simple: therefore it must be, that it is the divine essence.
2. Likewise, Every mode of predicating by accident in divine things is changed into substantial, even in relation, as was held above: because although relation in that which is relation retains its proper mode of predicating, yet relation as an accident does not remain in divine things: therefore, since in comparison to essence and person property has no comparison except as an accident, from that part it takes substantial predication, and thus property will be substance.
3. Likewise, If property were not God, nor God were property by simple conversion: therefore it would be better, or worse than it: but not better, because nothing is better than God: nor worse, because nothing worse than God can be in Him.
4. Likewise, If it were not God, it would not be said to be adored as God: which is against the song of the Church, when it says: "And in the persons property, and in essence unity, and in majesty equality is adored." Therefore it remains, that properties are the divine essence.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. To distinguish and not to distinguish are contradictorily opposed: therefore they do not suit that which is entirely the same according to the thing: but one suits the notion, the other the essence: therefore essence and notion are not entirely the same according to the thing.

1. Likewise, If essence is property: either in that which is essence, or by another. If in that which is essence: therefore whatever suits property, suits also essence, which is false. If by another it is given: If you say, that in that which is person. On the contrary: In the following distinction it will be proved, that person is not other than essence.
2. Furthermore, According to this it would seem that person is more immediate to essence than property: and thus person according to intellect would be before property, which above is disproved.

Solution. It must be said without doubt, that property is the divine nature and essence, as the reasons first induced prove.

To that which is objected first on the contrary, it must be said that to distinguish and not to distinguish are opposed contradictorily according to mode, but not that they require a diverse thing, but a diverse mode of signifying suffices for it: and that mode is really signified, as when it is said, property distinguishes, essence is not distinguished in divine things, as often said above.

To the other it must be said, that essence is property, not inasmuch as essence, but inasmuch as it is most simple: and I well concede, that it is not to posit mediate and immediate in divine things, except according to the mode of understanding: and then according to that mode it is allowed that person is closer to essence than property, not however from this it happens, that essence is property, because it is person: but rather from this that it is most simple, as it says in the Letter.

To that which is objected, that if it suits by the grace of another, that it suits by accident, it must be said that it does not follow: because we do not say, that it suits by another, but rather by the same signified in another way: and such by another is in divine things said another by the mode of supposing and attributing, and not another according to the thing.

Divisio Textus

Then it is inquired concerning what is said there, "D, Extrinsecus affixe sunt": and thus to prove by reasons, etc. For here four reasons of the heretics are set forth, as the Master says: of which two are set forth in this chapter, and in the following chapter the response is set forth. The third, however, is set forth in that chapter, "F, Ceterum hereticorum," etc., and it is responded to in that, "G, Quorum audaciae." The fourth is set forth in that, "resistentes," etc., "H, Sed forte queras, Cum he." And in the same is set forth "proprietates," etc., the response. Afterwards, to these four they apply authority, "I, Verwmtamen." And it is set forth "re nondum desistunt," etc. The response, at the end of the same chapter: "Nos autem aliter ista intelligenda," etc.

And in this is the end of this distinction. °

Articulus 4 — Whether In The Divine, Essentials Signified In Whatever Way Are Predicated Of The Notions

Whether in divine matters, essentials signified in any way whatsoever, are predicated of notions?

Secondly, it is asked, whether essentials signified in any way whatsoever, are predicated of notions?

However, it seems that they are not: because we do not say that paternity creates, although we do say that paternity is the divine essence. Likewise, we do not say, Paternity is wise. Likewise, we do not say, it does not distinguish: nor do we say, Paternity is incarnate: nor do we say, Paternity is triune: since all such things express essential adjectives.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

1. I see that certain notional things, like paternity, are said to be immense, uncreated, and suchlike: and these adjectives are essential: therefore, essential adjectives are said of notions.

1. Likewise, just as notional adjectives relate to notions, so do essentials to essence: therefore, according to a transmuted proportion, just as notions to essence, so essentials to notional things: but notions are predicated of essence, and conversely: therefore, essentials of notional things.

Solution. It must be said that essential adjectives can relate in four ways, by which they are not predicated of the notion, namely if they are essentials by way of essence, if they are essentials appropriated to the person, if they are essentials co-understood with the person, and fourthly, if they are essentials by way of divine act. Essentials by way of essence are, as not distinguishing, not signifying relation, and suchlike. Essentials attributed to persons are those which are said concretely: because they signify essence in persons, as wise, powerful, and suchlike. Hence it is foolish to say that paternity is wise. However, essentials co-understood with the person are as triune, incarnate: and therefore we do not say, paternity is triune, that is, one of three: just as we say, essence is triune, that is, of three. However, essentials by way of act are as creates, governs, and suchlike: because it is not said, paternity creates, or governs the world. However, all other things can be said, and especially negatives, as immense, uncreated, and suchlike.

And through this, the solution to all objections except the last is clear.

And concerning the last, it must be said that the transmuted proportion does not hold in all things, but only in proportionals: and those are diverse: and therefore when the proportion is changed, then it does not hold in this process: because the notion relates to essence as the same to it, but the notional does not relate to the essential in this way, because it differs from it in the mode of attributing. And there is an instance: just as animal relates to some animal, so man relates to some man: therefore, by permutation, just as animal relates to man, so some man relates to some animal: but this is false: because animal and man relate as superior and inferior, but some man does not relate as superior to some animal, but rather conversely: because it follows some man is: therefore some animal is: and it does not hold conversely. Therefore, a proportion of this kind does not hold in things that are simply diverse, such that one is not part of the other.

But if it is asked concerning those four conditions, why they make an exception in substantial adjectives?

It must be said that although essence is a property, yet the modes of signifying have a certain opposition: and from there comes the first condition.

Similarly, with the person supposed, the notion is not supposed: and from there the third is drawn: because then something agrees with one, which does not with another.

Likewise, the notion is signified in the abstract, and as being in another: and therefore those things which express as existing per se personally do not agree with it, as wise, good, and suchlike: and from there the third is drawn. Also, it is not the notion's to act, but the person's, and from there comes the fourth reason for exception.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Divine Relations Are Attendant, As Gilbert Of Poitiers Said

Whether divine relations are assisting, as Gilbert Porretanus said?

Because this error is said to have been of Gilbert Porretanus, whom, however, as it is said, he retracted and condemned, humbly acquiescing to the councils of Saint Bernard, in the council of the Bishops of Reims: therefore these reasons are to be considered more diligently.

Therefore, two things in this chapter are founded upon this, that relations or properties in the divine do not predicate something that is inherent, but that is affixed externally in comparison to another: and this is proven by two reasons leading to the impossible.

The first is this: Let it be granted that a property is inherent to a person: since nothing is inherent to a person unless it is entirely the same as the person itself according to reality, the property itself will be entirely the same with the person according to reality: but whatever is entirely the same as a determinate thing does not determine it, but is determined with it: therefore the property does not determine the person, but is determined with it. And this is the first reason. But the property determines the person: therefore it is not the same with the person: since nothing is inherent to the person, unless it is the person itself, because otherwise it would be composite, the property cannot be inherent to the person: therefore it adheres only as affixed externally.

The second reason also leads to the impossible and is founded upon this, that the principle of uniting and distinguishing is not the same: but the essence is that by which the divine persons are united: however, the property is the essence, as you say: therefore the property is that by which the persons are united: therefore the property will not be distinguishing, which is false: therefore the property is not the essence, but affixed externally. Nor can it be said that here is an accident: because nothing there is extraneous to another, nor differing in any way according to reality. From this it is clear upon what these reasons of Gilbert are founded.

But if perhaps you would want to say that this foundation is false, namely that the distinguishing relations are affixed only. Against this, it can be objected in this way first: because Boethius says this, that relations are affixed, and predicate nothing in the relative: therefore by the place from authority it is so. Furthermore, the authority is proven in this way: Whatever can come to a subject and be removed from it without any change of the subject, from the comparison of another to it: that is nothing in the subject, but assists it in comparison to another: relation comes to the subject in such a way: therefore it assists in comparison to another, and does not predicate anything in the subject. The first is proven thus: Let it be granted that something comes to a subject that is inherent to it without its change: therefore that subject has what it did not have before: therefore it is otherwise disposed informally than before, the subject remaining actually being: therefore it is altered: but it was posited that it is not changed. The second is proven thus: With the man remaining in the same way, someone is made now right, now left: and these are called relations, therefore, etc.

If perhaps you say that it is well proven from this that they are not inherent, but not that they assist as affixed externally. Against: Whatever is in no way of the intrinsic things essentially or accidentally, and yet is taken in something, another being taken in another, that must be assisting externally: relation is in no way of the intrinsic things essentially or accidentally, and yet is taken in this, another being taken in another: therefore it is affixed, or assisting, or adhering externally. The first part of the first is already proven above, namely that relation as far as its nature is concerned, is in no way of the intrinsic things essentially or accidentally: because if one were of the intrinsic things, all would be. The second part is proven by this rule of relatives, that it does not happen that one of the relatives is taken definitely without the other: therefore relation is always taken to be inherent to this, in some way extrinsically taken: therefore it places nothing in this, but rather in another the comparison of that to this, and in this the comparison of this to another. The second is evident from the antecedents.

If perhaps you would want to say that this relation according to this does not suffice for the distinction of persons, because thus in themselves the persons would be nothing: again it can be objected concerning Gilbert thus: Whatever is not distinguished by something absolute, but by that which is to another, only that suffices for the distinction of relatives: the divine persons are thus distinguished: therefore the distinction of relatives suffices for them. The first is per se known. The second, however, is often had above from Augustine.

These, therefore, as far as I can estimate, are what moved Gilbert more in the first reason here introduced.

In the second reason, however, he seems to suppose two propositions, without which the reason is worth nothing, namely that the uniting and distinguishing are not entirely the same, but differ in something: and that what is said according to intellect alone is not the cause of the distinction of the thing. And he wants to have the first proposition as per se known:

because if you wanted to disprove it, as some of the moderns have labored, the absurdity is easily shown: for they bring us three examples, the first of which is, that differences which are diverse in themselves, are united nevertheless in the indivisible potency of the genus: and this immediately appears to be nothing by three reasons: because although the genus in the nature of the simple universal is indivisible, yet it is divisible in potency: however, the essence which unites the persons is in no way divisible. The second reason is, that differences are not one in the genus, unless they are beings in potency, but not in act: however, the persons are existing according to act in one essence. The third reason is, because differences coming to the genus divide it according to being: however, persons coming to the essence do not divide it according to being: therefore there is nothing of what you say.

Therefore others say that this union is as rays of different stars are united in the same point of earth or air: or lines terminated at the same point. But this is nothing: because being terminated at the same point does not confer one being to the lines, nor even to the rays.

Again, others seek to subtilize, and say impossibilities thus: Let us suppose one line is divided into two: these two lines are together: therefore they have the ends together: therefore in the same: therefore they are terminated at the same point: therefore they are united in that: and yet they are distinct. Or, if you would say that one is terminated at another point than the other: therefore the point would be contiguous and continuous and consequently would be a point, which is refuted in the beginning of the sixth of the Physics: but this is absurd. For from this many inconveniences follow: Let it be granted that the line is thus divided: therefore two lines proceed from the same point drawn in the same direction, which are diverse: and this is against the fourteenth proposition of the first of Euclid. Let us suppose, that those two lines before they are drawn to another point, cut a third line: therefore since they are together, making no breadth, they will make right angles around themselves, or equal to two right angles: therefore those two lines drawn from one point, making two right angles around themselves, or equal to two right angles, are diverse: and the contrary of this is said by the Theorem: If two straight lines from a point of one line which they cut, go out in different directions, which make two angles around themselves either right or equal to two right angles: those two lines are directly joined to each other, and one line: and for example let the line divided be A B, but cut Cc D.

Again, Gilbert could destroy this in another way thus: Let the line be divided in the aforesaid way, and yet converge at the same points: and let another line be drawn from the first point of it in a continuum, and from the point of that let another divided line be drawn, as the first to the end of the first divided line: so that a triangle is enclosed: therefore according to this from the point of one undivided line which is ze f, to the same point a four straight lines can be drawn: which is impossible: because thus a line would be in a line, and an indivisible in an indivisible.

Furthermore, it is also proven according to nature: because just as between two points there is a line, so between any two lines there is a surface: therefore between those conterminal divided lines there would be a surface: and two straight lines would contain a surface, which is against the last proposition of the first of Euclid, which is this: Two straight lines enclose no surface.

But if it is asked, How then is the impossible solved by which it is proven? It must be said according to him, that the line on the part which is the terminus, is not together: because a terminus with a terminus is never together, because to be together is to have the ends in the same: however, the line is the terminus of the surface, not by this that it is terminated at a point, but according to this that it is indivisible according to breadth: whence it cannot be in length together with another line: but on the part by which it is terminated, it has...

the ultimate: and therefore it can be together with another: because two lines are terminated at the same point, and are together in that: and therefore it is clear that he assumed falsely when he said: If a line is divided, that those two lines would be together in length: because this is impossible: but rather they will not be together, but will intercept a finite surface if they are with a third, or infinite if taken in themselves. With these things established, it is clear upon what Gilbert was supported in the first position.

His second position is this: What is said according to the intellect alone is not a cause of difference in reality. And from this he wants to have that if property and essence differ in the mode of understanding alone, that the distinct persons will be only according to the intellect: and this is the heresy of Sabellius. However, he can argue in this way: because that difference which is according to the mode of understanding alone, either can be posited in reality in some way, or not. If not, I have the proposition: because nothing makes a real difference. But if it can be posited, let it be posited, and then there will be a real difference, and Gilbert's proposition is obtained, because properties really differ from the divine essence.

Considering this, some moderns say that such a learned man did not err: and they bring forth reasons by which they prove that it is permissible to have diverse opinions in divine matters. But because this heresy was condemned from the mouth of its author in the council of Reims, therefore it is objected against thus: A relation is either something in the relative, or nothing. If he says, that it is something: therefore in every relative there is something, which is truly relative: because I speak of those relations which according to being towards another are in both of the relatives: therefore the proposition is obtained, that the relation is inherent, not adherent. But if you say, that it is nothing. Against: it is either something, or nothing. If nothing: therefore neither absolute, nor relative: therefore distinct persons by properties, are not distinct by anything.

If you say it is something; it will either be substance, or accident: not substance: therefore accident: therefore it inheres in something, as in a subject, and thus it must be posited that it is inherent: and since in divine matters nothing is inherent according to accident, it must be posited that in divine matters substance and essence is as to this that it has of the nature of accident, and has another mode of predicating as to this that it adds over accident respect: and this is against Gilbert. Much has been disputed about this above: and therefore let that suffice.

Solution. Clearly it can be responded to the objections of Gilbert: by saying to the first, that it is false, that relations in divine matters do not predicate something that is inherent, but that it is affixed in comparison to another: unless force is made in this that it is inherent, because the preposition notes diversity: but we take inherent by the mode of understanding, and not by diversity of the thing: for in relation it is to consider the nature of accident, and according to that it does not posit respect except to the substance which is the subject of other genera: and as to this relation, like other genera, changes its mode of predicating: and thus the property itself is the person in which it is, and consequently the essence in which the person itself is. It is also in the same to consider what it is towards another: and thus it retains its proper mode of predicating: and indeed then by that which is substance, but it does not predicate nor signify substance: because, as Augustine says, and it has been held above, that which signifies substance, is not said relatively to another: and Boethius, attending to this alone, says it is affixed extrinsically.

To the other it must be said, that the property is the same with the person which it determines as to the comparison of the subject, and of that which is inherent, as has already been said: but because the property in reality had more than inherent, because it had to another being which made it to be relation, and this it retains really in divine matters: therefore the person being supposed, the property is not supposed: and therefore the property is distinguished, and the hypostasis or person is distinguished. And if you object: therefore the person is composite, it is already clear that what you say is nothing: because it is not composed in that which is towards another, but in that which is inherent: but from that part by which it is inherent, its mode of predicating is converted into substance, and it is made the same to it: and therefore it does not induce composition: although it is really signified to be in the person, when it is said, the Father is distinguished by his property from the Son: and that consideration is very notable, that nothing makes composition with another, except by this that it is inherent, and not by this that it is to another being. And therefore those saying relations are converted into substance as to inherent, and remain as to another being, save the truth of the relations: and yet they induce no composition: and this Gilbert ignored, not considering except the second, and not the first.

To the other it must be said, that relations are not only affixed, as has been said, but beings themselves substance.

To the fourth of Boethius it has already been responded.

To the other it must be said, that there are many kinds of relations as has been held above: but the relations which are in divine matters according to the mode of existing make the very distinct: and therefore there they have also more solid being, than in lower things, as has been shown above.

To that which is further objected, it must be said, that relation is taken, with another certain thing which is outside, being taken: but relation by that which is accident and in divine matters substance, is not so taken: and therefore it is insufficiently considered by this the nature of relation.

To the other it must be said, that persons are distinguished by that which is towards another: yet so, that also the hypostasis which is substance, is towards another: for these two do not conflict in divine matters, as has been held above in the question of hypostasis, at the beginning of distinction XXVI.

To that which is further objected about suppositions, it must be said that uniting and distinguishing are the same according to the thing which is substance, and are not the same in the mode of predicating which relation has from that part by which it is not compared to substance, but to outside, as has been said: and therefore from this the solution of all those things which were objected from the first supposition is clear.

To the similar things induced I well concede, that they are worth nothing: for they do not show how properties and persons are united in one, nor how they are one.

To that which is objected from the second supposition, it must be said that this difference is not so understood that it cannot be signified in reality: but it is not signifiable in this way that it does not make a difference: by that which is inherent, it makes no difference, as has already been held: therefore from that part it is not really signified: but from that part by which it is towards another relatively, I can say, that essence is not really towards another, and person is really towards another: therefore the intellect founded in that, and attributing something to one which does not belong to the other, will not be empty and vain.

And thus the solution to the whole difficulty which is objected from the positions of the Pictavian is clear.

Articulus 6 — In What Manner The Properties Are In The Essence

How are the properties in the essence?

Then it is asked concerning what is said in that chapter: "Moreover, the wickedness of heretics," etc.

1. In which is posited another argument of Gilbert, that if a property is in the essence, and every property is in one and the same essence, and in whatever the property is, it denominates that: therefore the same thing is the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit.

By reason of this argumentation, it is asked, How are the properties in the essence?

However, it seems that they are not in it: because 2. In whatever they are, they determine and distinguish that: but the essence is neither distinguished nor determined: therefore the properties are not in it.

1. Likewise, In what way would they be said to be in it? Not as in a subject, because thus they would make a composition: nor otherwise, as it seems: therefore they are not in it.

Solution. It is easy to solve according to what has been determined. Therefore, it must be said to the first, which is extracted from the letter, that there is no denomination unless where the nature of an accident is preserved. However, that is not preserved in the divine: rather, they are turned into substance in that comparison in which they have the nature of an accident in lower things.

To the other, it must be said that they do not determine except by what they have: but they do not have opposition except by what they are towards another: and with that comparison, they are not referred to the essence, but to the outside, it is clear that they do not determine the essence, but the person which is compared to that person which is distinguished from itself.

To the other, it must be said that the mode of saying "in" is according to reason alone:

because in reality it is the same, but by reason of the name it is as existing in another, and not by itself: but substance according to the reason of the name is conversely.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Notional Terms, According To The Mode Of Understanding, Stand More Closely Toward The Hypostases Or Persons Than Toward The Essence Itself, And Whether By Reason Of This Nearness Personal Adjectives Are Said Of The Notions

Whether the notionals, according to the mode of understanding, are more closely related to the hypostases or persons than to the essence itself? And, whether by reason of this closeness, personal adjectives are said of the notions?

Then it is asked concerning what the Master says in the following chapter, where he solves this reasoning, there, G, "It is not so entirely in the divine substance," as in the hypostases themselves, etc.

For from this it seems to follow that the notionals, according to the mode of understanding, are more closely related to the hypostases or persons than to the essence itself.

It is asked whether by reason of this affinity personal adjectives are said of the notions?

However, it seems that they are; because:

1. Certain essentials are said of the notions, which are more distant from them, as was previously proven: therefore it seems that much more are personals said of them.
2. Likewise, both, namely person and notion, are incommunicable: therefore what is said of one is also said of the other.
3. Likewise, person and notion are the same immediately according to the intellect: therefore what is fitting to one is fitting to the other.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. The Father generates and spirates: therefore if personals are said of the notionals, paternity generates and spirates, which is nothing to say.

1. Likewise, person is distinguished: therefore notion is distinguished.

Solution. To this it must be said that personals are not said of the notions: because personal adjectives as such either belong to the person in itself, as being distinct: and then they cannot belong to the notion due to the opposite mode of signifying, because notion is signified as the reason distinguishing, not as a thing distinct existing by itself: or personals are those by which a person emanates from a person, as generates, spirates, which signify a personal act: or they are said adjectively of persons, as they are generating, spirating, according to which those participles are held adjectively: and then they cannot belong to the notions: because notion is not signified as acting, but rather as the reason of the agent in that act: for acts are of hypostases and individuals: and in such a way notion is not signified. But if they are adjectives signified notionally, again they do not belong: because then they express the reason how one person proceeds from another.

One paternity is not the Father, if the Father is held adjectively: because it follows that he would have begotten the Son: nor is filiation the Son for the same reason, as was said above, that this is false, essence is the Father, if it is held adjectively: however, the person is predicated of the property when the name of the person is held substantively, just as it is predicated of the essence: and just as this is true, essence is the Father, that is, essence is he who is the Father: so this is true, paternity is the Father, that is, paternity is he who is the Father: but the person is not predicated except of its notion, as was previously held.

To what is objected against, it must be said that essentials are predicated of them because of the identity of the subject and of what is signified in it: but personals do not express the relation of the subject, but rather the relation of the distinct and acting: and therefore they are not predicated: but persons are predicated, which imply the same relation of the subject.

To the other it must be said that although they agree in that both are incommunicable, yet they differ in the reason of incommunicability: just as Socrates and the individuating principles of Socrates are incommunicable: one as that which is incommunicable, the other as making the incommunicability in him: and therefore it is not necessary that what is fitting to one is fitting to the other.

To the other it must be said that person and property are immediate according to the thing, but not according to the mode of signifying: and therefore they are predicated of themselves really: but it is not necessary that whatever is fitting to one is fitting to the other: but it is true that whatever is fitting to one by this that it has a comparison to it as to a subject only, this is also fitting to the other: but this is not to be referred, to be distinguished, to be generated, and the like.

Articulus 8 — Whether Personal Adjectives Are In Some Way More Closely Related To The Notions Which Agree With Them Than To Others

Whether personal adjectives are in some way more closely related to the notions that agree with them than to others?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, G, Therefore although paternity and filiation are in the divine essence, etc.

1. For it can be doubtful whether personal adjectives are in some way more closely related to the notions that agree with them according to reason, as generation to paternity, than to filiation or spiration? For then it seems that those personal adjectives can agree with such notions.
2. Likewise, Paternity, and this word, generates, say the same, as all the Doctors teach; therefore, since the same is predicated of itself, it seems that I can say, paternity generates.

Likewise, Paternity is Father: Father generates: therefore paternity generates, it seems that it proceeds from immediates: because the immediate property is person, and the notional act is immediate to the person: therefore the person can be the medium for concluding the notional act from the notion.

1. Likewise, When it is said, generates, nothing is of the understanding of the word except the supposit and the act: the supposit can be predicated of the notion, but the act is the same with the notion: therefore on neither side is it impeded: therefore I can say, as it seems, that paternity generates.

ON THE CONTRARY:
1. If paternity generates, therefore because it is Father: then much more does the essence generate, because it is Father, and from it the Father has the power of generating, in the way it is said to be a cause without which not, because unless the divine essence were, it would not have the power of generating: but this is false: therefore also that.

1. Furthermore, Generation is an act of nature and substance, as Damascene and Hilary say: but the notion does not signify as substance, but as being in another.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that no distinctive act of person agrees with the notion, nor any adjective in whatever way signified, provided it is a personal adjective, as was previously held: and the closeness of that reason cannot cause this, because that is not the cause of identity, but rather the relation of the subject to that which is in it, as was previously said: because in that relation simplicity causes identity: but that the notion does not have to the act, but rather the notion signifies the reason according to which such an act agrees with the acting person, as paternity is the reason why the Father generates.

To the other it must be said, that although it is the same in reality, it is not, however, signified as the same: and therefore it is not the same in attributing and supposing.

To the other it must be said, that although generates does not say more in the thing said, it does say more in the mode of speaking: because it says the supposit, not as being per se only, but as the substance from which the act proceeds, and in that comparison it does not agree with the notion entirely. Similarly, it says the notion as act, and not as a disposition resting in the agent, as it is the reason of the act: and therefore again on that side it does not entirely agree.

Articulus 9 — How These Words Of Augustine Are To Be Taken, "Not That By Which The Father Is, He Is Substance"

How these words of Augustine are to be understood, "Not in that the Father is, is He substance."

How these words of Augustine are to be understood, "Not in that the Father is, is He substance."

Next, note concerning the final solution by which the master resolves the authority of Augustine introduced by them, namely this: "Not in that the Father is, is He substance: not in that the Word is, is He substance."

For the objection of the Pictavian and the solution of the Master are founded upon the duplicity of that proposition. For "in that" signifies a cause as if formal, as Augustine says.

Therefore, when it is said: "Not in that the Father is," it can be a negation of the cause "is substance," as if formal: and thus the proposition is true, and it holds the understanding of the Master, which is true, and is Augustine's. Or, it can be a negation under causality, so that causality is the negation, as the sophists say: and thus the proposition is false, and it supports the Pictavian. And in the first way, the sense is, "Not in that the Father is, is He God," that is, paternity is not the quasi-formal cause by which the Father is God, but deity: and this is true according to the reason of understanding. In the second way, the sense is, "In that the Father is, this is the cause that He is not God": because then separation falls between that by which the Father is and God: and thus paternity would not be God, as Gilbert said.

DISTINCTIO XXXIV

Divisio Textus

To the aforementioned, it must be added that certain men of perverse understanding, etc.

Here begins the second part, in which a comparison is made of the person to the essence, namely whether they are the same or different.

And it is divided into four parts: in the first of which the Master shows there is no diversity between the person and the nature. In the second, he provides the reasoning for how power, wisdom, and goodness are appropriated to the three persons, there, F, &z. In the third, concerning the aforementioned, etc., he provides the reasoning of this name 6poosstos, there, I, Mte it must not be omitted. In the fourth and last, he provides the reasoning, etc., of the metaphorical sayings about God, and he provides the epilogue of this treatise on the Trinity.

The first of these is divided into two. In the first, he shows the person to be the essence. In the second, he provides the reasoning why three persons are said to be of one essence, and not of one God, there, E, Here it must be considered, since God is, etc.

In the first part, there are three things, namely the proof of the question, and for solving the same, the introduction of the error by the authority of Hilary, there, § 2 cap. A, And this is testified by Tertio, the testimony of Hilary is set forth, etc., the solution of the same authority, and the demonstration of the truth, there, B, Some say this not understanding, etc.

And from these, the sentence is clear.

Articulus 1 — Whether Person Is Essence, Or Not, As Gilbert Of Poitiers Said

Whether the person is essence, or not, as Gilbert Porretanus said?

However, here arises the question of Gilbert, to whom this error is attributed, although Porretanus later corrected himself, Whether the person is essence?

However, it seems that it is not: because

1. In no nature are affirmation and negation simultaneously verified of the same: if therefore the person is essence, person and essence are the same in reality: but the person is incommunicable, while essence is communicable: therefore it is true to say of the same in reality, that it is communicable and not communicable, and common and not common, and proper and not proper, and distinct and not distinct, and related and not related, and all such things: since therefore this is impossible, it seems that it is impossible for the person and essence to be entirely the same in reality. If perhaps you say that according to something one agrees with it, and according to something else the other: then it follows that the same there is one and the other, and thus it would not be entirely the same.

1. Likewise, in divine things remain two categories, of which neither passes into the other, namely substance, and relation: but no two categories exist except by the fact that one is not the other: therefore relation is not substance: the person is relation, because the Father is to the Son: therefore the Father is not divine substance.
2. Likewise, essence in some relation is related to the person: either therefore as entirely the same, or as differing in some way. If as entirely the same: therefore the Father is entirely the same as essence, and the Son is entirely the same as essence: but whatever things are united to the entirely same are the same, they are the same among themselves, as the Philosopher says: therefore the Father is the Son: and this reasoning seems to be implied in the Text, namely that this led Gilbert to say this.
3. Likewise, the Philosopher says that if we bring even the slightest difference, we will show that it is not the same, at least we will show that it is not entirely the same: but we say essence is common in reality, but we say the Father is proper in reality: therefore a real difference is found: therefore person and essence are not entirely the same.
4. Likewise, the common conception of the mind is that different hypostases cannot entirely participate in the same reality: because, let it be granted that they are entirely the same: therefore they agree in that which is entirely the same: therefore since this is in all, it makes entirely the same: and thus there would not be multiple hypostases: therefore this is true, that different hypostases will not entirely participate in the same: however, the three divine hypostases have one nature or essence: therefore essence is not the same in itself.
5. Likewise, the Philosopher says that from the first substance there will be no predication at all: but, as was held above, the person is as the first substance: therefore it is not predicated of anything: therefore neither will it be predicated of essence, so that it is said, the divine essence is the Father.
6. Likewise, we have often had that the Father is divine essence, and that there is construction there according to the formal cause: therefore the divine essence is related to the hypostasis, as form to the formed. But between those there is opposition of cause and caused: since therefore cause and caused are never the same, essence and hypostasis will never be the same. However, here Gilbert introduces, or can introduce, the sophisms of Prepositivus, which we have set forth above. For let it be granted that essence is person: then this will be true, essence is the Father: but the Father is the Father of someone: and not unless of the Son: therefore essence is the Father of the Son: therefore he begot the Son.

Likewise, he is the Father of someone: not unless by paternity: therefore paternity inheres in essence: therefore it determines it.

Often it is objected according to the sayings of blessed Bernard on the Canticles.

1. For Gilbert says on the book of Boethius on the Trinity; Deity by which God is, not which God is. Either therefore something is greater, or equal, or less than God. It is clear that it is not greater. If however equal. Against: Equal does not make itself equal: because it is not powerful in itself: therefore this deity does not make God. If less: therefore God degenerates, becoming God through that, which again is absurd: therefore deity is he who is God: therefore it is hypostasis and person.
2. Likewise, if it is not the same: therefore the person is composed of that, and of some other: therefore it is not simple, which is heretical.
3. Likewise, every composite is resolvable into its components as prior and simpler than itself: therefore God would be resolvable into other things prior and simpler than himself, and thus neither would he be first nor simple, which is absurd.
4. Likewise, every composite has its being from another or from others: therefore God would already be the creation of another God prior to himself, which is false.

Solution. It is clear to anyone that the last arguments are necessary, and the previously introduced ones are sophistical: and seeing this later, Gilbert corrected his statement, in which also, as will be said, he first had a sound sense, although he uttered incautious words.

Therefore it must be said and simply believed, that for the sake of the simplicity of God, being and what is, and essence and person do not differ in him in reality: however, they differ in the mode of supposing and attributing.

But if you ask, Whence this happens, since it is entirely the same in reality, that different things are attributed? It must be said that that simplicity removes composition by removing diversity from those things which are united in the same in it: and if those diverse things remained, then they would make composition like form and matter in composition: but although it thus removes composition, yet it does not remove the truth of each of them, as we said above about the attributes. For although the wisdom of God is the same with the substanding due to simplicity, nevertheless the wisdom of God is most truly wisdom: otherwise, there would be something in the wisdom of God that would not be in the essence of God. Thus, this simplicity of person does not remove the truth of hypostasis, nor the truth of nature: and therefore it remains communicable.

And through this, the solution to the first is clear: because although person and essence are the same, nevertheless each retains those things which are of its own proper reason: and thus contradictories are not referred to the same in that reason by which it is really reason, because really the incommunicable pertains to the person, and really the communicable pertains to the nature, and so with others.

To the other, it must be said that the modes of predicating do not remain there because relation is an accident, for in this respect it passes into substance: but because it is towards another, and this is proper to the person, not hindered by simplicity: because simplicity does not remove the truth of nature, but only the diversity of the communicable and incommunicable which are in the same.

To the other, it must be said that this argument would hold if they were entirely the same: so that one by the power of its nature and identity of reason would be the same with the other: but they retain diverse reasons, because truly the incommunicable is one, and truly the communicable is the other: and therefore with the reason of that which is incommunicable, the Father is opposed to the Son relatively: and similarly the Son by the reason of that which is incommunicable, is opposed to the Father relatively: it does not follow that one is the other, but only that it is the same with itself in substance. And we can imagine something similar to this in a point and unity: for let us suppose a point by that which it is, to be united to unity by that which it is: and yet each retains the property of its nature: we say that the point with unity is entirely the same in substance and essence: and yet it is opposed to it in relation to the continuous: because unity has a relation to the discrete: and then it follows that having a relation to the continuous, it is entirely the same in substance with that having a relation to the discrete as such. However, that similarity fails, as all earthly similarities do.

To the other, it must be said that by making force in difference, the proposition is true: but because essence is common, it posits rather agreement than difference: just as if we prove animal to be a genus, and to be the genus of man, by this we prove more that it is man, than that it differs from man: and if it were simple, we would prove by this that it is common to man, also that it is the same as man: whence that nature is communicable does not posit the cause of difference, but rather of unity and agreement with all persons in which it is.

To the other, it must be said that it is not a common conception of the mind, unless in the nature in which the "what it is" differs from "that it is": and in that it is necessary to multiply "that it is" according to being, according to which hypostases or "what it is" are multiplied: but in divine things it is not so: therefore it is not necessary to conceive that there. To that by which it proves, the solution is clear from what was said before: because although simplicity makes the identity of person and essence: it does not remove the truth of each: and therefore as to the reason of person which is real, because it is truly of property and hypostasis, those hypostases are still many.

To the other, it must be said that this is nothing: because from the first substance there will not be predication according to the coordination of predicables in a genus: and this is what the Philosopher intends to say: but that it is not truly predicated of anything, he does not intend: but in divine things it can also be predicated of the common, as we showed above where this question was treated.

To the OTHER, it has already been solved above many times.

Does the person of man differ from nature according to the reason of intelligence?

Then it is inquired about this which he says, there, D, around the middle: "We do not, however, deny that some distinction is to be had through the reason of intelligence," etc.

For either something underlies this reason of intelligence, or nothing. If nothing: then it will be empty and vain. If something, then there is a difference according to the thing, and not according to reason only.

To this it must be said, that something responds in the thing. Hence it must be noted, that in lower things when the common nature is in the supposit, it is signified in two ways according to the thing, namely as diverse when it is said, nature is simple, and Socrates is composite: and it is signified as something suitable to it which does not suit Socrates, as when it is said, that it is predicated of many, but Socrates of one or of none. In divine things, however, nature cannot be signified as diverse from the person, because it is the same: yet really something suits it, which does not suit the person, and conversely: and therefore the Doctors say, that with nature supposed, the person is not supposed, and upon that is founded the reason of intelligence.

And note, that from this place is drawn that much common saying, that it is distinguished according to the reason of intelligence.

Articulus 3 — Whether It Is Lawful To Say, "Three Persons Are Of One Essence"; And "Three Persons Are The Essence," As "Of One Essence," And "One Essence Of Three Persons"

Whether it is permissible to say, the three persons are of one essence: and the three persons are essence, as of one essence, and one essence of three persons?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, Here it must be considered, since God is the divine essence, etc.

For when it is said, the three persons are of one essence, it seems to denote the indivisibility of the nature's being in the three persons: since therefore God and deity are the same in the divine, it seems that by the same reason it can be said, that it is of one God: and this he denies in the Text.

1. Again, Can it be said, the three persons are of the essence, as of one essence?

It seems so: because there is made a comparison of the formed according to the reason of understanding to the form, just as in that when it is said, the three persons are of one essence.

1. Again, Can it be said, one essence is of three persons, or the essence of three persons: just as it is said, the three persons of one essence?

It seems so: because just as it is to compare the person to the nature, so conversely the nature to the person: and thus one can be said in the same relation in which the other is said.

However, It seems that none of those can be said: because they are oblique transitives and denote diversity: and since there is no diversity between essence and person, it seems that comparison ought not to be made except in the direct, so that it is said, the three persons are one essence.

Solution. It must be said, that it can well be said, the three persons of one essence, so that the construction of the oblique with the direct is in the designation of essence: or better, as we speak from the proper, in the designation of the simplicity of essence in the three. Yet it cannot be said, of one God due to the different mode of signifying essence in this name, God, and in this name, essence: because in the abstract it is signified as a nature which is the form of something, but in the concrete it is signified as standing by itself, and not as the form of something: and therefore the transition of the oblique is not preserved according to the reason of understanding, when it is said the three persons of one God: just as also in inferiors it is said, the three persons of one human nature, yet it is not said of one man, except by possessive construction.

To the other it must be said, that when the oblique is constructed in the designation of essence, there must be two genitives, or one having the force of two, as a woman of excellent form, or a man of bloods, or a man of disgrace: and therefore it is not well said, the three persons of essence: because the same relation of construction is not preserved.

To the other it must be said, that it is well said, one essence of three persons, and essence of three persons: but not in all is the same relation of construction preserved: for when it is said, the three persons of one essence, the construction of the oblique imports two things, namely the relation of the form to the formed, and the designation of the simplicity of the form: but when it is said, one essence of three, or essence of three, only one is imported: and therefore also one direct suffices, where previously two obliques were required, of which one would import designation, and the other form: just as grammarians say of these two, a woman of excellent form, and the excellent form of a woman: because the relation is varied: and therefore by changing the oblique into the direct, and conversely, the construction is changed, so that I can say, the excellent form of a woman and the form of a woman: and yet we do not thus say, a woman of excellent form, and a woman of form.

To the last it must be said: that by the oblique is noted the transition according to the reason of intelligence, which does not posit diversity of person and nature, but rather the truth of each.

Articulus 4 — Whether Power, Wisdom, And Goodness Make The Highest Good

Whether power, wisdom, and goodness make the highest good?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, From the aforesaid it is evident, etc.

For there he says that power, wisdom, goodness make the highest good: and this does not seem so: because the highest good is that to which nothing is lacking that has the nature of good: but it is not true that every nature of good is comprehended under these three.

Solution. It must be said that in the perfection of these three all good is contained: for every good is either of nature, or superadded. But perfect and omnipotent power is never except in a perfect and omnipotent nature. But the superadded, either are according to the intellect, and then they are reduced to the true: or according to the affection, and then they are reduced to the good. But other things are not simply good, such as corporeal and sensible things: and therefore in the perfection of these three consists the highest beatitude.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Appropriation By Which Appropriated Things Are Attributed To God Is Made Only Through Us And By Us

Is the appropriation by which things are attributed to God made solely by us and from us?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, G, "Therefore the prudence of sacred eloquence took care to do this," etc.

1. For from this it seems that appropriation is made only by us and from us: but this is inconvenient, because if we did not exist, wisdom would still be appropriated to the Son: therefore it seems that it is not true that the prudence of sacred eloquence did this.
2. Likewise, if there is no other reason for appropriation except through connotation to created things, then eternity and unity should not be appropriated to the Father: because those belong from eternity, and do not belong through connotation.
3. Likewise, in 1 Corinthians 1:24, it is said, "Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God." Therefore power is appropriated to the Son: but power is the ultimate of potency: therefore potency is appropriated to the Son: not therefore to the Father, the contrary of which is said in the text.

Likewise, it is asked concerning what some say, that such appropriations are not made by us: and for two reasons, namely for the avoidance of error, and the expression of truth: and they say that power is attributed to the Father for the avoidance of error.

But on the contrary: If no diversity occurs in the mode of understanding except for the avoidance of error: then it seems that among those not erring we can say that power is attributed to the Father, and not appropriated: but this is false: therefore there is something on the part of the thing why it is appropriated.

Solution. It must be said that appropriation can be considered in two ways: according to aptitude, and according to act. According to aptitude, it is on the part of the thing, as was said above: for one attribute has a closer relation to one person than to another: and therefore it is appropriable to that one. However, according to act, appropriation is made by men skilled in sacred Scripture, for various reasons, namely to avoid error, or to express truth, and for this reason to show more the reason of distinction in properties: and the two preceding causes must always suppose the third: because unless there is unity in the thing, appropriation would not be well made.

And through this the solution to the first two is clear: because the Master supposes a greater convenience of the reason of power to the property of the Father than to another person.

To the other it must be said that power is attributed to the Father for three reasons: two of which are on the part of the Father's property, and one on our part. One is because power is a principle, as the Philosopher says. For active power is the principle of transmutation into another, according to what it is another: but the principle according to the first reason approaches more to the principle not from a principle, than to the principle from a principle. The second reason is because there is no wisdom unless power preexists, and there is no perfect goodness unless it presupposes wisdom and power: just as the Son is from the Father, and the Holy Spirit from both. The third reason is taken from the text on our part: for although virtue is in the genus of power, it nevertheless adds something by reason of which it belongs to the Son, namely the ultimate of power: and because the Father works the world through the Son, and redeems the world through the Son, the Son himself is in whom the greatest things of the Father's power are fulfilled: and therefore virtue is attributed to him.

To what is further asked concerning the causes of appropriation, which some posit, the response is now clear: because it was shown above that the true cause of appropriation is that this or that attribute approaches more to the property of one person than another. Other things that could be objected were touched upon above in distinction XXXI.

Articulus 6 — Whether By Transference All The Names Of Creatures Can Be Attributed To God; And Conversely, Whether The Names Of God Can Be Attributed To Creatures

Whether by translation all names of creatures can be attributed to God? And conversely, whether the names of God can be attributed to creatures?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, K, Furthermore it must be known, that in the assignment, etc.

For there, by touching upon the reason of translation, he teaches to attend to similarities:

1. However, since every creature is a vestige, it seems through this that from every creature a translation is made to God, so that God is called by the name of all creatures.
2. Likewise, Dionysius says that He is all-namable.
3. Likewise, Dionysius: In Him it is necessary to affirm the positions of all. Therefore, from all a translation is made to God. But this seems to be nothing, so that God is called devil, wolf, toad, and the like.
4. Likewise, it seems that all names are said of God translatively: because it is not properly univocal, when it is said, God is life, and the soul is life: therefore by translation.

5. Likewise, it is asked, whether from nobler creatures a translation is made, so that God is called seraphim and cherubim? This does not seem so: because it is nowhere read in Sacred Scripture.

6. Furthermore, it also seems that translation is made conversely from God to creatures, as the Psalm 81, 6 says: I have said: You are gods, etc.

Solution. It must be said that this question is for the most part determined above. Therefore, it must be said that translation is made from all things which preserve and express nature without vice and harm of deformity: hence from the devil it cannot be, because it is the name of a deformed nature: and similarly from the frog, and toad, because it is the name of a nature with properties of deformity and harm.

And if you object, that God is said to be signified by the serpent? It must be said that the serpent imports something good through cunning and wisdom: and also the serpent in itself has the medicine of poison, for its flesh is effective against poison: but not so the toad, or another vile unclean thing. Hence Augustine says that the fox is never taken in a good signification, because it expresses deceptive cunning: but the wolf is sometimes taken in a good signification, as Benjamin is said to be a ravenous wolf.

And from this the solution to the first three is clear: because the word of Dionysius is understood of those which do not sound deformity of themselves.

To the other it must be said, that not all are said translatively: and the reason is said above.

To the other it must be said, that from nobler and from inferior things a translation can be made: but it is not made, as Dionysius says, from nobler things, lest there be an occasion of error, namely lest those noble things be thought to agree by property: and also because they are not so known to us: but translation is made from more known things, and those are sensible to us.

To the other it must be said, that translation is not in those which participate the same by prior and posterior: hence from God a translation is not made to us, but rather that which is in God first, this is in us later similar to that, and properly is in us: but the similarity which is required in translation, is a similarity not according to the thing, but according to the agreement of the properties of the thing.

DISTINCTIO XXXV

Divisio Textus

And since we have discussed above, etc. Here begins the part which is about the knowledge of the Trinity and unity, as it is considered in those things which make the sufficiency of the cause for the procession of creatures from it, which are knowledge, power, will: for to act, nothing more is required than to know, to will, and to be able.

However, it is divided into three parts according to the three aforementioned. In the first, it deals with knowledge. In the second, with power, which begins in distinction XLI, there, A, Nane. In the third, it deals with omnipotence, etc., will, which begins in distinction XLV, there, A, Now concerning will, etc.

The first of these is divided into two parts. In the first, it deals with knowledge in general. In the second, however, it descends to the species of divine knowledge, which are predestination and reprobation: and this begins in distinction XL, there, A, Predestination indeed is concerning salutary goods, etc.

However, the first, which is about knowledge in general, is subdivided into three. In the first, knowledge is shown both according to the distinction and property of names, and as to those things which are in it, as concerning which it is. In the second, however, it is shown conversely, how God is in all things made and created by Him: and this begins in distinction XXXVI, there, A, £¢. In the third, however, the Master shows that it has been demonstrated in part, etc., the dispositions of knowledge more than the knowledge itself, namely whether it imposes necessity on things, or can be deceived, or increased, and the like? and it begins in distinction XXXVI, there, A, Now therefore returning to the proposed, etc.

Furthermore, the first is further divided into two. In the first, it shows the intentions of names, and in general, how it is concerning objects, because concerning all eternal and temporal things. In the second, however, it shows how it is different to be in the knowledge of God, and to be in nature, and how it is differently concerning good and evil objects, and this begins in the following distinction XXXVI, there, A, It is usually asked here, etc.

However, this distinction is divided into three parts. In the first, it determines generally concerning all the names by which divine knowledge is accustomed to be signified. In the second, however, it raises a question which arises from the determination and distinction of names, namely whether the knowledge of God would be in God, if there were no future things? there, B, Mie. In the third, it principally shows what ought to be considered, Whether knowledge, etc., objects of knowledge according to the general declaration, there, D, Knowledge or wisdom not only, etc.

From these, the sentence is sufficiently clear, and will be clear in the disputation.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Knowledge Of God Is Univocal With Our Knowledge, Or With The Knowledge Of Angels

Whether the knowledge of God is univocal with our knowledge, or the knowledge of Angels?

Whether the knowledge of God is univocal with our knowledge, or the knowledge of Angels?

Here, before the Letter, a double doubt arises. One is, Whether the knowledge of God is univocal with our knowledge, or that of Angels?

The second is, Whether the knowledge of God is universal or particular, or in act or in habit?

For it seems that it is univocal, not said by prior or posterior, thus:

1. An efficient cause acting according to the form of the efficient produces an effect univocal with the cause, as fire produces fire, man produces man, and the like: but the knowledge of God is the efficient cause of our knowledge, and acts according to form: therefore it seems that our knowledge, which is effected by His, is univocal with His knowledge. The first is evident per se, the second is proved by the authority of Origen saying: God is called wise and knowing, according to which He fills us with wisdom and knowledge.
2. Likewise, no exemplar is equivocal with the exemplar in the form of the exemplar: the knowledge of God is the exemplar of our knowledge, and our knowledge is exemplified: therefore it seems that our knowledge is not equivocal with His. The first is because it seems that it is equivocal in form, since even in matter it disagrees, then the exemplified will not be in any way similar in species with the exemplar, and thus it is not more exemplified by it than by something disparate from it: therefore it must be univocal in form. The second is evident by what Dionysius says in the book on Divine Names: Praising the wisdom of God exceedingly, we say that it is the cause of all mind and reason and all wisdom and prudence.
3. Likewise, this seems by a likeness: for a seal impresses nothing except what is according to the species of the figure in itself, and nothing else is received in wax: therefore, since the created mind is like wax, and the wisdom of God is the seal, it seems that we receive wisdom of the same species with His, although the subject is not of the same nature: just as neither is the wax in which the impression is made, and the copper impressing.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Nothing is univocal with the Creator and creature: therefore neither is knowledge. The first is often proved.

1. Likewise, the knowledge of God is the cause of things, as will be shown below; but our knowledge is caused by known things: therefore these knowledges are not of one nature.
2. Likewise, knowledge, like every other form, inheres according to the power of the subject: because a nobler subject is of nobler knowledge, even among men: therefore, since God infinitely exceeds every created mind, His knowledge also infinitely exceeds ours: therefore it will not be of one nature.

Solution. It must be said according to blessed Dionysius in the book on Divine Names, that the knowledge of God is not univocal with our knowledge, nor even with the knowledge of Angels: how this is, let it be taken from his words. For he says thus about the knowledge of God: Supersapient and all-wise, the cause of sense, and wisdom itself per se, and the substantiating of all and particular. That is, the knowledge of God is of things as substantiating and wisdom and cause of all of which it is, whether it be whole or universal, or part or particular.

Therefore it is evident that by knowing Himself as the cause of all, He knows both Himself and all other things universally or particularly existing.

But about the knowledge of the Angel he says thus, in the same place: The virtues of angelic minds have simple and good intellects not in divisible parts or from divisible, or sensible or diverse reasons gathering divine knowledge, nor from any common to these at once. But existing clean from all material multitude, they intellectually and immaterially uniformly understand the intelligibles of divine things. The sense of these words is that Angels do not receive knowledge by beginning from created things, which are many and divided and material: nor do they receive by diverse powers, as by proper sense, and common, and imagination, and memory, and the like: nor do they come from some common as universal to the knowledge of those sensibles which are with us, but deiformly by something similar to the divine mind given and impressed to them from creation. But yet that knowledge is not the cause of being, nor does it know by this that it is a cause, since an Angel is not the creating cause of anything.

But about the knowledge of man he says in the same place, thus: Rational souls have senses indeed diffusively and in a circle going around the truth of existing things, and failing from unitive powers in divisible and very wide variety. This is, that the rational soul receives knowledge: but the rational is collative: and therefore it begins from many in which by comparing it is diffused, and is led around in a circle around the truth of existing things. And this can be understood thus: because the first light to which the examination of truth is made, is in the soul itself the agent intellect, and from that it begins by placing it around the signs and causes of things, so that it may receive the probable, or necessary, and what is received it reduces to the intellect: and thus in the intellect the circle is concluded, according to which sometimes it receives the caused from the cause, and sometimes conversely: therefore he says circle.

From these it is evident that neither of the knowledges of creatures is univocal with the knowledge of the Creator: but each imitates it as much as it can: and therefore it is said by prior and posterior, in the way that was said above, that first it is in God, and from Him, and to Him, as much as possible in the Angel and in man.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that it is a cause acting according to species in two ways, namely to matter proportioned to the same species, as an agent and generating univocally, as fire produces fire, and man produces man: and thus God does not cause: because to the divine essence no receiving matter can be proportioned. It is also a cause acting according to form and species to a nature not proportioned to the same species, as the sun acts on air, or another diaphanous receptive of light: and yet the light received is not of the same nature in the sun, and in the air, but it is more ignoble and more diffused and more obscure in the air than in the sun: and in this way God acts in such attributes which are communicable to creatures, as wisdom, life, essence, and the like. Hence it does not follow that what is received is univocal with that from which it is received.

To the other it must be said, that the exemplified imitates as much as it can, more in the Angel, and less in man as long as he is on the way: and because it approaches more to this than to another, it is not said to be more exemplified of this than of another.

To the other it must be said, that it is not similar about the seal and wax: because although wax is not matter proportioned to the natural form of the seal, yet it is matter proportioned to the form of art which is engraved in the bronze, and therefore it can receive the form of the same figure: but the mind of the Angel and of the soul is not proportioned to the divine essence, nor to knowledge as it is divine: and therefore it must receive in an inferior way, as the nature of this inferior state requires.

Articulus 2 — Whether Divine Knowledge Is Universal Or Particular; In Act, Or In Potency, Or In Habit

Whether divine knowledge is universal or particular? In act, or in potency, or in habit?

Whether divine knowledge is universal or particular? In act, or in potency, or in habit?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether divine knowledge is universal or particular, or in act, or in potency, or in habit?

It seems, however, that it is universal, or in the universal.

4: For knowledge is said to be in the universal, which is of something as it is in its universal, not compared to this particular or that: but no cause is more universal than that which is the cause of all: therefore to know through it, is to know through the most universal: but God knows by knowing it: therefore His knowledge is most universal.

1. Likewise, that knowledge is most in the universal, which is through that in which nothing of the properties of the thing is found: but God is the cause in which nothing of the properties of the thing is found: therefore He knows most in the universal. The first is evident by itself. The second is proved by this, that the properties of one thing cannot be found in the same with the properties of another thing: since therefore God is the cause of all: either the properties of all must be in Him, which is absurd: or none of the properties of anything, which is true, and then the proposition is held.
2. Likewise, to know in species, is to know in the universal: and to know in genus, is to know more in the universal: and to know in the most general, even more: and to know in being which is the principle of the most general, even more: therefore to know in that which in simplicity exceeds all said, is most to know in the universal: but God knows through that, because through Himself: therefore, etc.
3. Likewise, to know in the universal, is to know in that which is not a proper medium to conclude that: and the more it is receded from the proper medium, the more the thing is known in the universal: but it is most receded from the proper medium in that through which nothing however common caused can be concluded of necessity: therefore to know through that, is most to know in the universal: but this is God. For God is a certain cause of all, but nothing caused is necessarily concluded through Him: therefore to know through Him, is most to know in the universal: but He knows through Himself: therefore, etc.

ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Knowledge in the universal is imperfect knowledge, in which a thing is known only imperfectly and in potency: but the knowledge of God is the most perfect of all knowledge: therefore His knowledge is not knowledge in the universal. For the first. Things in their universals are only in potency, for with the animal posited, man is not necessarily posited: therefore they cannot be known in their universals except in potency: and thus the first is evident. The second is evident by itself.

1. Likewise, to know in the universal, is to know what is determinable by something added, so that it becomes knowledge in its proper nature: but the knowledge of God is in no way determinable: therefore His knowledge is not in the universal.

Then it is asked, Whether it is knowledge in the particular?

It seems, however, that it is so: because
1. To know in the particular, is to know the proper nature of the thing: but God knows the proper natures of all: therefore His knowledge is particular knowledge, as it seems.

1. Likewise, if to know in the particular is to know through the immediate related to the proper nature of the thing, since God is more immediate to every thing than anything else, it seems that by knowing through Himself, He knows in the particular.

ON THE CONTRARY:
Knowledge in the particular and proper nature, varies according to the diversity of those from which the proper nature is.

of each: but the science of God is unchangeable: therefore it is not science in particular, as it seems.

Further, it is asked, Whether His science is in potentiality, or in habit, or in act?

1. It seems, however, that it is sometimes in potentiality: for Gregory Nazianzen says that the thought of God is the work of God: therefore before the work there is no thought in act, and after it is in act when the work is: therefore it was in potentiality, as it seems: and since in God thought and science are the same, it seems that the science of God is sometimes in potentiality.
2. Likewise, We do not say that God does all that He can do: therefore the operative power of God is in potentiality to other things which will never come into act: therefore similarly on the part of the intellectual power it can be posited in potentiality with respect to something knowable, which God will never know: and thus there is nothing inconvenient, as it seems, to posit the divine intellect to be in potentiality sometimes.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: If it is possible that it is in potentiality, and goes out into act: therefore it will go out from potentiality to act: but this is a kind of alteration: therefore it seems that God can be altered by a kind of alteration.

1. Likewise, Whatever is in potentiality, by the fact that it is in potentiality, falls short of perfection: therefore if the divine intellect according to science is in potentiality, it falls short of perfection and will not be supremely perfect.
2. Likewise, Whatever is in potentiality, by that very fact something nobler and better can be thought: therefore if the divine intellect is in potentiality with respect to something, something nobler and better can be thought by it. The first is proved by the word of the Philosopher in IX of the first Philosophy, where he says that act is nobler and better than potentiality. But that the conclusion is inconvenient is proved by Anselm in the Proslogion saying that God is a better good and greater than can be thought.
3. Likewise, There are reasons against this from the Philosopher: because if it were in potentiality, since nothing being in potentiality brings itself into act, it would be necessary that His intellect would have another intellect more divine than itself, that is, nobler,
4. Likewise, Since nothing being in potentiality goes out into act unless composed with itself, it would be necessary that it would be composite.
5. Likewise, Since everything moved is wearied from the labor of motion, unless moved circularly and by nature in some way, it would be necessary that doctrine and discipline and consideration would induce weariness and corruption in Him, which is most absurd: therefore His science is never in potentiality. If perhaps you say that this last reason of the Philosopher is not necessary. On the contrary: Let local motion be excepted, and let us speak only of alteration: it is evident that the altering form is present according to the power and nature of the subject: therefore if this form is not present and ought to be present, it is necessary that the principles of the subject be otherwise disposed: because it cannot be that the same being disposed in the same way is naturally apt to receive something, and to be without it in a proximate disposition: therefore it is necessary that such alteration in some way varies the principles of the substance: therefore it induces weariness and pain: because whatever removes the principles of distance, and makes them differ in various ways, this is laborious and painful.

Further, it is asked, Since it cannot be in potentiality, whether it is in habit?

It seems, however, that it is: because 1. We will have below that His science is the cause of things: therefore if it were always in act, it would always cause things: but it does not always cause things: therefore sometimes it is in habit.

1. Likewise, Every science which is through the species of knowables is habitual science: the science of God is such: therefore it is habitual. The first is proved thus: Habit is nothing other than the order of the species of knowable things in the knower: but God, as is said here and in the following distinction, has in Himself the species of all knowables.

2. Likewise, Augustine in the book On the Good of Marriage says that habit is that by which one can act when the time is: therefore since God can always consider when He wills, He has the habit of science: therefore His science is science in habit.

3. Likewise, Doctors frequently use this expression, that the Lord can say dominion in habit, or in act: and in habit it is fitting for Him to be Lord from eternity, but in act from time: therefore to posit science in habit in God does not seem to be inconvenient.

But on the contrary: 1. Going out from habit to act, as the Philosopher says in II of the Soul, is altered in some way: but God is in no way altered: therefore His science does not go out from habit to act: therefore it is not in habit.

1. Likewise, Habit is something diverse from the one having it: therefore it does not befit God: because in God nothing is diverse from Himself.

2. Likewise, Habit is for the perfection of a power which of itself cannot or cannot readily go into act: but such a power is not the divine intellect: therefore it does not have habit: therefore neither science in habit.

Therefore it is further asked, If He always knows in act?

It seems, however, that He does: because 1. The most perfect in anything is to be attributed to God: but science in act is the most perfect of all sciences: therefore it is to be attributed to Him.

1. Likewise, Science in act is through that which is actually present to the intellect: but God is always present to Himself: therefore He always knows in act, because He knows only through Himself.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: Given an efficient cause, the effect always follows: but the science of God is the efficient cause of creatures: therefore to the science of God in act there always follows the production of the known in act. The first is known per se. The second is proved from this that the science of God is not speculative, but practical: but that existing in act is always joined to work: therefore the proposition is established. Since therefore He did not know all things in act from eternity (as is held at the end of this distinction), it seems that all things, not only the world, would have been from eternity, which we clearly see to be false, because neither I nor you have been from eternity. Therefore it seems that God in no way has science, since He neither knows in universal, nor in particular, nor in potentiality, nor in habit, nor in act.

Solution. It must be said that as the Commentator says on XI Metaphysics: The science of God is neither science in universal, nor in particular, nor in act: because these differences of science are of that science which takes the science of one from the preknowledge of another, which is as a principle and sign of that: and this does not befit divine science: and therefore such differences of universal and particular do not befit it.

To that therefore which is first objected to prove that He has science in universal, it must be said that God is a universal efficient cause, but not predicable and determinable to essence: and from such a universal it is not said to know in universal: because in an efficient universally acting, which is not proportionate to the made, neither is the thing known in universal, nor in particular: just as the cause itself is neither part of the essence of the thing as genus, nor its own essence or nature.

To the other it must be said that to know through that in which there is nothing of the properties of the thing, is not to know in universal, but rather to know through that in which there is nothing of the properties in act, but it has all properties in potentiality: and this universal is not God: and therefore it is clear that the science of God is not in universal.

To the other it must be said that it is indeed true that God does not fall under a principle, nor under a genus: but this is not because He is something more universal than being or genus, for this is impossible, because nothing more universal than being can be thought: but this is from His simplicity, as was proved above. But that objection proceeds as if God is outside the community of being by way of universal scope.

To the other it must be said that God is not a medium for concluding something necessarily with respect to us who do not know the proportion of the caused to Him: but to Himself He is a sufficient medium of knowing, who knows every influence which He influences into the caused in whatever way it is from Him: but if something is not from Him, this will be privation: and that is known by Him in habit, as will be clear below: nor is that being, although it leaves being which is subject with aptitude to habit: yet this does not make in universal because as it is habit, to know a thing in universal, is to know a thing in that in which it is in universal as species in genus, or caused in remote cause, not restricted, but restrictable.

To that which is further asked, Whether His science is science in particular? It must be said that it is not: because science in particular is the science of a thing from those things which are of the proper nature of the thing: but God does not know thus, but through Himself.

To the first therefore it must be said that it is not sufficient to know in particular to know the proper nature of the thing, but it is necessary to know from the properties of the thing: and this does not befit God.

To the other it must be said that God is not immediate to the natures of things as existing from the proper nature of something, but incommiscibly and immaterially, as Dionysius says, and distinct from every nature of things.

To what is further asked about another division, namely whether science is in potentiality, or in habit, or in act? It must be said that the science of God is in no way in potentiality, or in habit, but always in act, as the objections induced to this necessarily prove. For to be in potentiality, it is necessary that the intelligent has a possible intellect, and that is material and imperfect of itself, and in no way fitting to the divine nature. Similarly, there is no habit except of the possible intellect, for the intellect by which it is made all things, is related to the habit of knowing as matter to form: and since the possible cannot be in God in any way, habitual science cannot be in God in any way. Whence it remains that it is in act, and always acting, receiving nothing, and having nothing which He is not.

To the first therefore which is induced to prove that His intellect is in potentiality, it must be said that the thought of God is improperly taken: because to think is of the ratiocinative power, and causes collative science which Dionysius calls discursive discipline: but by Gregory thought is posited for simple practical intelligence: and it is true that this suffices for work, according to which the work is: but from eternity this intelligence according to act stands in this that not from eternity, but then when the world began, Angels and others were brought forth: and therefore before the work worked, and after, and in itself, it behaves in the same way: therefore it is never changed from potentiality to act.

But if you say the objection proceeds from the work working, and not worked: it must be said that this is false: because that is the essence of God: for essence and power and operation in God are the same: and therefore before that no potentiality can be posited: and how this is, will be clear in the solution of the last article.

Moreover, it must be said that in God there is only active potentiality: and that is not in potentiality with respect to the worked, but rather the worked is in potentiality with respect to it, and it in act: but the operation of the power from the power itself, neither is distant in God nor differs: and therefore in no way is it in potentiality to it.

To that which is further induced, that He knows in habit, It must be said that this does not follow, as will be clear below, from this that science is the cause of things, that science in act makes that the caused thing is with the cause, but rather the opposite follows.

To the other it must be said that to know through species or ideas, does not make habitual science, unless those forms or ideas are forms perfecting the intellect to act: as the objection made to the contrary well proves: and therefore that reason proceeds from the insufficient because it should be added, it is science through a species diverse from the knower himself which perfects his intellect to act.

To the other it must be said that Augustine defines habit as perfecting the power and expediting to act: but God in all His power is perfect and expedited through Himself.

To the other it must be said that habitual in the discourses of Doctors does not sound habit, but rather something similar to habit, namely not connoting act effected in the creature, just as one having habit does not necessarily act, but acts when he wills.

To that which is objected against the last, it must be said that this does not follow in the first cause: which is clear in this way: for the first cause is without measure distant from the caused: therefore the caused in no way can be assimilated to it: therefore neither in eternity.

Moreover, The cause is that to whose being another follows: therefore it is necessary that the caused follows: therefore it will not be coeternal with the cause in being: because it is caused according to its being.

Whence to the argument it must be said that the first cause is related in one way to all its known things from eternity, and it from eternity is ordering the exit of the known: and from eternity your idea and mine are ordered and determined to this that now you go out into being, and similarly I. But there is no determination of the divine intellect to this that it be made from eternity: but He in Himself from eternity determined that then or then it be made. Therefore it does not follow, if His science is the cause of the thing, and His science is from eternity in act, that creatures are made from eternity. And it is similar: just as if we posit the determination of my practical intellect now to be to some work which will be done by me after three years, and my intellect stands continuously, that then it will be done and not before: and my understanding that it be done then, is a sufficient cause for the production of the thing: then indeed my intellect in all prior time will be in act sufficiently causing that thing, and yet the thing will not be except after three years are completed.

And by this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 3 — Whether There Ought To Be A Proper Treatise On Knowledge, Power, And Will; And, In Virtue Of What Those Three Are Taken

Whether there ought to be a proper treatise on knowledge, power, and will? And, upon what are these three taken?

Then it is inquired concerning those things which are around the Letter, and first concerning this which he says, there, A, however, some species demand a special treatise, etc.

For it seems that this is not true: 1. For these are essential appropriable to persons: therefore, with others among the essential appropriable, they ought to be determined, and not in a special treatise.

1. Likewise, since the knowledge of the cause pertains to the knowledge of the caused: and these are causes of creatures, it seems if they demand a special treatise, that with creatures they ought to be determined in the second book of the Sentences, which the Master does not do.
2. Likewise, what is called a treatise? For he himself in his Prologue says, he divides this whole book only into four treatises: therefore, since this according to him is contained in the first book, it is contained in the first treatise: therefore, it does not have a special treatise.
3. Furthermore, it seems the Master errs in the execution of these three: for since power is before wisdom and will, he ought first to execute concerning power than concerning wisdom: and he does the contrary.

4. Likewise, power is the attribute of the Father, and wisdom of the Son, as was held in the preceding distinction: therefore, according to the order of nature which is in the persons, it ought to have been determined first concerning power than concerning wisdom.

Here it is inquired concerning the sufficiency of these three.

1. For it seems that the number abounds over those things which are required for causing: because these three suffice for an imperfect agent who is an artisan man: therefore, for the most perfect agent fewer are required: therefore, it seems that this ternary abounds superfluously.
2. Likewise, we see that nature acts more perfectly than practical intellect: and this is evident in the works of alchemy: because alchemical gold does not gladden the heart, nor is it so producible by hammers without cutting, as gold which nature produces.

Furthermore, in many things art falls short of nature: therefore, since God is the most perfect agent, his action will be more similar to the power of nature than of art: but for the operation of nature, only power is required, and not knowledge, and will: therefore, the treatise on knowledge and will does not pertain to this treatise, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said that although they are essential appropriable, yet the knowledge of them cannot be determined from the same principles entirely, from which the knowledge of others is determined: for others are determined through the relations of persons to each other, or through the unity or simplicity of essence: but these must be determined through the intention of the cause: because these speak of dispositions from which it is inclined to cause the creature. And if you object, that according to this, above they ought to have been placed among those things which agree from time, it must be said that it is not true: because these do not agree from time, but rather they speak of those attributes by which those things which are from time proceed from God: and so they are before time: and those things which agree from time are not before time, but after according to the reason of understanding.

To the other it must be said, that with creatures they do not fall into the same treatise: because from the principles of creation and creature they cannot be determined, but they have their own determinations fitting from eternity: nor does every cause with the caused fall into the determination of the same science or book, but only that which is proximate.

To the other it must be said, that a treatise is here called a special part of the same knowable determinable through other principles: just as God according to those things which agree to him from eternity and temporally, is the matter of this first book: and therefore that which is concerning those things agreeing to him from eternity, is of the science of the first book: but yet it is called a special part, because it cannot be determined by the principles previously had.

To that which is further objected concerning the order of execution, it must be said that these three which he touches here are considered in two ways, namely in themselves, or in relation to work. Considered in themselves it is true, that power is before knowledge and will: but in relation to work, knowledge is as directing, and power as executing: and so power is operating after knowledge and will.

But if it is asked, Why does he execute concerning will after power? It must be said, that operating power is not in all ways joined to will, although in none is it against will: because the will of God speaks of inclination to the good which is from him: but power is efficient to being: and since being by its intention is before good, it is determined concerning power before will. Others say, that with respect to objects knowledge is more common than power: because knowledge is of goods and evils, but power is of goods only: but they do not give the reason why power is before will. Through this also the solution to the following is clear.

To that which is further inquired, it must be said that the number of these three is abundant: for these are of the perfection of the first cause: which is thus proved: The first cause either acts by necessity, or by intention, having the reasons of its works. If by necessity: then it will be bound by the necessity of nature to act, and it will be imperfect, ignorant of the reasons of its work, which is absurd. But if it acts by the freedom of will: either it will have the reasons of the work, or not. If not: then it acts imperfectly: because the Philosopher says, that even art ignorant of the reasons of the work, but only operating, is less honorable than that which knows the reasons: just as architecture is more honorable than the usual: therefore it is necessary, that it knows and wills. But that it can, no one doubts.

It must be said to the first against this objection, that in these the distance of the perfect agent from the imperfect is not considered, but rather in this that the inferior agent has these three as diverse in itself, and from itself, and that it acts through an instrument: but God has these three the same in himself: because knowledge is power, and conversely: and the same to himself, because he is his own power and his own wisdom: and he acts without an instrument through himself. Whence he is the most perfect agent.

To the other it must be said, that although nature is a more perfect cause in acting than art, yet nature does not have this insofar as it is proximate, but from the influence of the first mover: for specific forms (as the Philosopher seems to want) are from the influence of the heavens upon proximate moving and acting causes. The influence of the heavens is from the influence of the first mover. And therefore it is necessary, that nature receiving falls short of it. Therefore it receives the power of operating, and not knowledge and will, because it is not a rational and spiritual nature: whence that nature does not have these three, is not of perfection, but of defect from the first mover.

Whether the Master enumerates well and sufficiently the parts of knowledge, and according to what they are taken?

Then it is questioned concerning the division of names which he places, there, A, concerning knowledge, foreknowledge, providence, disposition, predestination, will, and power, etc.

For it seems he enumerates incompletely, since below he also treats of reprobation.

Furthermore, it is questioned, According to what is the multiplication of these names taken?

Solution. To this it must be said that from what has been stated, it is sufficiently understood how knowledge, power, and will are taken. Concerning the others, however, there can be a threefold multiplication: of which one and the first is according to how they relate to each other, and one adds upon another. Therefore, the habit of practical intellect can be considered in itself, or in comparison to another. If in itself: then it is called knowledge. If, however, in comparison to another, which is added to it as contracting it: either it is according to the reason of the medium through which it is insofar as it is knowledge, and then it will be called the same as wisdom, because wisdom is knowledge through the highest cause which is difficult for man to know, as the Philosopher says: and concerning wisdom, it will be treated below. It can also be contracted through disposition to act: this disposition either notes the order to be to act, and then it is foreknowledge or providence, which is the same, which note the order to be according to precedence to the effect: or the disposition can be on the part of that which is joined to the act: and this according to the order of things to the end, or to each other, and then it is disposition: or according to conserving the thing itself, and then it is providence: or especially to those things which are rational, and then it is predestination.

There can also be multiplication according to those objects which are simply knowable, or determined in some difference of time or being. If in the first way, then concerning them is knowledge which is of eternal, and temporal, and present, and past, and future things. If, however, they are knowable contracted: either this contraction is through the difference of time, or through the species of being. If in the first way: either commonly, or specially. If specially: then it is predestination with respect to the good of grace and glory, and the creature ordered to grace and glory. If commonly: either with respect to the thing in itself, and thus it is foreknowledge: or with respect to the order of things, and thus it is the eternal disposition concerning future things. If, however, it is through the species of being contraction: then it is providence, which predetermines perfection according to being and remaining.

Or thus: Knowledge is either with respect to the knowable as it is with the knower only, or as it is something placing around the known. If in the first way: either with the order of the knower to the known, or absolutely. If absolutely: then it is knowledge. If with order then it is foreknowledge. If, however, something is placed around the known: either commonly, or specially with respect to the more worthy creature. If commonly: either it is with respect to being, and then it is disposition: or with respect to well-being, and then it is providence, which signifies care for the well-being of things in the governance of God. If, however, it is specially with respect to the more worthy creature: then it is predestination. Other modes can also be found, but they are not necessary.

To the objection, however, it must be said that reprobation has something, with respect to which there is no divine operation, as the fault of the reprobate: and therefore among those in which the practical knowledge of God is determined, it ought not to be enumerated.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Knowledge Of God Is Eternal And Immutable

Whether the knowledge of God is eternal and immutable?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says:

Here it must be considered, etc.

1. For whatever is in God is eternal: but the eternal is immutable and necessary: therefore, it seems that by no position made can it be changed: and thus, given that nothing will be future, if before the position He was foreknowing, even afterwards He will be foreknowing.
2. Likewise, knowledge depends on the knowable, and is said relatively to it: therefore, given that there is no knowable, it follows that there is no knowledge: therefore, the Master says nothing in solving this question, that given that nothing will be future, then there will not be foreknowledge, but the knowledge by which God foreknows future things before they happen still remains.
3. Likewise, just as there is knowledge of future things, so there is of present and past things: therefore, since God is signified especially with respect to future things according to which He foreknows, His knowledge ought also to be signified by some special name with respect to past things, and by some with respect to present things, and thus it would be said that He has memory of past things, and speculation of present things, as it seems, which is false: therefore, He ought not to be called foreknowing.
4. Likewise, in our intellect there is incomparably less simplicity than in the divine intellect: but the intelligible of our intellect, because of simplicity, is not here and now, but everywhere and always, as the Philosopher says: therefore, the divine intelligible will also be abstracted from all difference of time: therefore, it ought not to be signified by a name importing the difference of future time, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that what is in God is eternal and immutable: but nothing prohibits it from being in one relation and reason and another, according to which something is related to it in one way than another: for as Avicenna says in the first Philosophy, from the fact that something is referred to something, nothing is composed or changed: because however much something is taken as simple and immutable, by the very fact that it is first said, it is posited as relative, and yet from this it is not composed nor changed. Hence, although the knowledge of God according to what it is, is immutable: nevertheless, it is signified by one relation and another, according to how it is related to the future, or is not related to it: and therefore the Master speaks well.

To the other, it must be said that the knowledge of God does not depend on the knowable: but rather the knowable, which is the creature, depends on the knowledge of God, as on a cause: and therefore in divine things the contrary happens to what the Philosopher said. For the Philosopher says that knowledge is referred to the knowable, but not conversely of necessity: for knowledge posits the knowable, but it is not converted: but in the knowledge of God the knowable is referred to knowledge, and not conversely: because in lower things knowledge is caused by the knowable, but in God the opposite: and therefore, with the knowable not existing as created, or even not being future, the knowledge of God is not destroyed: because it receives nothing from the knowable, but rather causes the knowable.

To the other, it must be said that knowledge of the present is concomitant with the thing, and knowledge of the past as such follows the thing: and none of these befits God, but only the knowledge preceding the thing befits Him, just as the eternal cause precedes the temporal caused: and therefore it is not called the memory of God or present contemplation, but only foreknowledge.

To the other, it must be said that what is known by God is altogether timeless, nor is the difference of time posited concerning the known, according to what is in the knowledge of God, but it is posited concerning the being of the known thing: because this is related as following knowledge, according to which the caused follows the cause: and therefore with respect to that it is called foreknowledge.

Articulus 6 — Whether This Name, Creator, Signifies The Divine Essence

Whether this name, creator, signifies the divine essence?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, C, Nevertheless creator is said relatively, so that it does not signify the essence, etc.

1. For this seems to be against the rule of the Doctors, that every name said of God connoting an effect in the creature signifies the divine essence.
2. If perhaps you say that it signifies a respect to creatures. On the contrary: Respect to creatures is also signified by prescience: therefore if one does not signify the essence, neither does the other: or if one signifies, so does the other.

Solution. It must be said, as above, that creator, as Damascene says, signifies the relation of God to those things from which he is distinguished: and that relation supposes the essence, as around which it is posited: and the understanding is not false on account of the act of creation, although it does not signify a relation really inherent from time: and therefore the Master says that it does not signify the essence.

To the other it must be said that prescience in the principal signification from which the name is imposed gives to understand the divine essence: because it imports the essence not hathe quality of relation, except from the composition of the preposition: and therefore the Master says that it signifies essence, and not creator.

Articulus 7 — Whether There Are Ideas In The Divine Mind

Whether in the divine mind there are ideas?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, There, Therefore all things are said to be in God, etc.

For here arises the question concerning ideas, about which for the understanding of the following we inquire four things: of which the first is, Whether there are ideas in the divine mind? Second, Whether in the reason of speculative or practical knowledge? Third, Whether there is one idea, or many? Fourth, Whether there are ideas of all things in God, or not of all?

To the FIRST it is proceeded thus:
1. Augustine says in the book of Seventy-Three Questions: Ideas are the reasons of things. From this it is taken, that they are stable and immutable, which are contained in the divine intelligence. And since they neither arise nor perish, according to them, however, the form is said, all that which can arise and perish! Ideas are, and for what they are, and where they are: and therefore this authority is very notable.

1. Likewise, in the same place: All things are created by reason: nor by the same reason man, as horse: for this is absurd to think. Therefore, each is created by its own reasons. But these reasons are not to be thought to be except in the mind of the creator: for he was not beholding anything placed outside himself.
2. Likewise, Augustine in the book of Retractions: Nor did Plato err in this, because he says there is an intelligible world, etc. For Plato called the intelligible world the very eternal reason, by which God made the world: which whoever denies to be, it follows that he says God made what he made irrationally.
3. Likewise, in the book of the City of God he says: Plato posits ideas: and whoever denies them, he does not doubt to be unfaithful: because he denies the Son of God.
4. Likewise, Boethius in the book of the Consolation of Philosophy says:

You lead all things from the supreme example, beautiful most beautiful [himself]
Bearing the world in mind...

1. Likewise, to the Hebrews XI, 3: By faith we understand the worlds to be framed by the word of God, so that from invisible things visible things were made. But there ideas and reasons of the archetypal world in the mind of God are said.
2. This is also proved thus by reason: It is established, that God does not act by the necessity of nature, as was held before: therefore he acts by intellect: but every agent by intellect has with itself the reason of the work and the exemplar, or it is ignorant of what it does: therefore since God knows what he does, he has with himself the reasons of all his operables: and these are called ideas: therefore he has ideas with himself.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. More is opposed by that which is in diverse essence, than by that which is distinct, remaining in the same essence: therefore with respect to that which is in diverse essence, there is greater opposition in God, than that which is in God among those things which are of the same essence: but the respect among those things which are of the same essence, makes in the divine the distinction of persons: therefore the respect to that which is of diverse essence, will make a diversity of essences, since it is of greater opposition: but such is the respect of ideas: therefore ideas in God will make a diversity of essences, which cannot be: therefore there are no ideas in God.

1. Likewise, Every diversity which is in causes and caused, it is necessary that it be reduced to one principle of the universe, because otherwise there would be many principles: but more one principle is that which is one in essence and reason, than that which is indeed one in essence, but many in reason: therefore it is necessary, that this be taken as one in essence and reason: therefore in it there are no ideal reasons.
2. Likewise, we see this in the principles of nature: for every diversity which is in proper natural qualities, is reduced to the first active and passive qualities, namely the differences of the elements, hot, cold, moist, dry: but the multiple diversity of the action of those qualities is reduced to the diverse motion of the heavens, less diverse, however, than is the action of the elements: but the diversity of the motion of the heavens, since it is multiple, is reduced to the number of the movables which are eight or nine, and the diversity of these again is reduced to the first mover: therefore it is necessary, that the first into which all reduction is made, be one in reason, and according to the diversity of reasons it moves: and this being given there will not be ideas: therefore ideas are not, as it seems.
3. Likewise, If there are ideas, for what are they? For it is superfluous in the cause, that which is not for the production of the caused, as it seems: but the diversity of generated and corrupted can be caused otherwise, according to what the Philosophers say, that the nature of the sphere is not to make uniformity in those things which are in one nature and of one reason. But the nature of the sphere having many stars, is to make diversity of figure and form in generated and corrupted. But the nature of the sphere of the moon is to move water according to diverse position into diverse mixture, so that the mixed may be continuous, because pure earth does not make continuation, but comminution. But the nature of the sphere of the sun is to move fire to the emission of heat moving and digesting and maturing the continuous mixed. But the nature of the spheres of the five other planets is to move the air, because there are many motions in the air, because those planets are of many diversities in motions of declination, and involutions, and descent, and ascent, and station, direction, retrogradation, and the like. Therefore, since from that diversity the diversity of forms is sufficiently caused, as it seems, the position of ideas is superfluous.

Solution. It must be said, that without doubt even speaking philosophically it is necessary to posit ideas, as Augustine says: because otherwise it would follow, that God without reason by which he would know the world, created the world.

Therefore it must be said to the first objection, that relation does not diversify, except by that which it has of the nature of opposition: for the logicians say, and it is true, that it is argued otherwise from relatives insofar as they are relative, and otherwise from opposed relatives insofar as they are opposed: for insofar as they are relative, being posited they posit themselves, and being removed they remove themselves: but by that which they are opposed, it follows that one is not the other: and therefore in persons in which there is relation really, it is true that they are distinguished, and are removed from each other. But the intellect of God to created things is a relation according to reason, but of created things to him according to reality: and therefore the creator essentially indeed differs from created things, but respect from respect does not: because between respect and respect there is no opposition: and therefore by that relation God is only one principle, as will be clear below: and those respects in him do not have distance, or opposition, or diversity, although they are signified plurally: because they are to diverse things.

To the other it must be said, that all diversity without doubt is reduced to one essentially and in reason with respect to itself: but it is not the principle of the universe and diversity, unless it is referred to diverse things: and therefore those reasons with respect to respects are multiplied on the posterior part, namely according to what they are on the part of creatures ordered to him, but on his part not, because he by himself is the cause of each caused: and so still it is left to be an idea in the reason of those respects to created things.

To the other it must be said, that I well concede this, that such reduction is in natural causes: but that does not remove the immediate respect of each to the first: for the first is not such, as some erring Philosophers said, that it has immediate influence over the first movable, and not over others: but it immediately influences all, and also through others it influences: and on the part of that respect by which it influences the being of each, the ideal reason is posited.

To the other it must be said, that the necessity of ideas is: because the diversity of stars and images and proportion of positions from the motion of the spheres, would never make diverse form, unless it were influenced by God who is the principle of the universe: and also the received reason of form could not influence, unless God more immediately influenced, as it is held, John v, 17: My Father works until now, and I work. And therefore it is necessary to posit ideas, which are the reasons of those forms.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Ideas Are In The Divine Mind In The Notion Of The Speculative Knowable Or Of The Practical

Are ideas in the divine mind in the manner of speculative or practical knowledge?

Are ideas in the divine mind in the manner of speculative or practical knowledge?

Secondly, it is asked whether there are ideas in the manner of speculative or practical knowledge?

It seems, however, that they are only practical: because

1. Ideas are for making: therefore they are exemplars of things to be done: such things, however, belong to the practical intellect: therefore ideas are according to the manner of practical intelligibility.

1. Likewise, Augustine above called them reasons, saying that man is formed by one reason, and horse by another: therefore they are in God as practical, and not as speculative.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
God has speculative knowledge of the world: for it is not sufficient that He knows how to make the world, unless He also knows every nature of the world: therefore it seems that it is necessary to posit ideal reasons in that manner.

Solution. It must be said that ideas imply a relation to the thing, and therefore they are properly speaking according to the practical intellect.

To what is objected in the contrary, it must be said that God has all knowledge both of Himself and of the world: but nevertheless, because the speculative intellect, insofar as it is speculative, posits nothing concerning the thing, therefore from that part it does not have an ideal relation. However, the practical intellect posits the reason it has within itself concerning the work, according to what the Philosopher says, that the health which is in the animal, or in man, is the health which is from the health that is in the soul of the physician: wishing by this to prove, as the Commentator says, that the first mover is in some way the form of those things which are formed by it. If you say that although the speculative intellect posits nothing concerning the thing, yet it receives from the thing: and therefore from that part it has ideas: this is false in God: but it is true in us: because our knowledge is caused by things, as was held above: but God, by understanding Himself, understands all things: and the multitude of ideas is not from His part, as will be made clear later, but is only understood from the relation of the ideated things to Him: and the speculative intellect is not as properly ideal in God as it is speculative, as the practical is according to what it is practical. It is, however, true that God contemplates Himself as the principle of all things, and thus in some way as exemplar and cause: and therefore some say that He understands Himself as an idea.

Articulus 9 — Whether In God There Is One Idea Or Many

Whether in God there is one idea, or many?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether in God there is one idea or many?

1. And it is argued from a certain consideration which is in the second of the Topics, and only one which is this: If someone were to say that knowing is understanding, it must be considered in one and many if they differ: for if they differ, this is not that. However, it is established that the idea is the divine essence, because nothing is in God except God: therefore, since the essence and idea are the same: and the essence is one, there will be only one idea: for if there were many ideas, according to the consideration introduced, the essence would not be the idea.
2. Likewise, in the soul it is such that the power of understanding is not entirely simple, because it is born to have many reasons: therefore, if the intellect of God had many ideas, it would not be entirely simple, which is false: therefore, there are not many ideas.

3. Likewise, if there are many: either in reality, or in reason. If in reality: then it follows that more things than three were from eternity, which is heretical: because there were no things from eternity, except the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, who are three things, as Augustine says in the book on Christian Doctrine. But if they are many by reason alone: but Boethius says that a reason is empty and vain, which cannot be placed around a thing: therefore that reason will be empty and vain. And if you say that Boethius's statement is contrary to the Philosopher's, who says that there is no falsehood in abstractions: and some gloss this, because abstraction is not placed around a thing, and thus we can understand something that is not in the thing. On the contrary: there would be falsehood in abstractions if they abstracted what can neither be nor be abstracted by definitive reason, like flesh from lead, or bronze: for flesh is never found in lead, or in bronze: but a circle and a straight line are found in one reason in different materials in species: and therefore it can be abstracted from each of them, because none of those materials falls into its definition. But it is not so here: because nothing can be given around whose definition or being you place the reasons of many ideas.
4. If you say that plurality is caused by things related to God, as causing through intellect. On the contrary: Temporal things are: but the temporal is not the cause of the eternal: therefore things do not cause many reasons to be in God.
5. Likewise, before things existed, there was no relation of many to God: therefore then they did not cause such plurality of reasons: and thus these reasons were not from eternity, as it seems, but only one idea: therefore plurality would be more in things than in ideas, which is against Augustine in the book of Eighty-Three Questions, who says: Let it not be that we place the reason of those outside God! It signifies them to be plural in God.
6. Likewise, if things cause unity and multitude in ideas: since unity and composition and necessity and contingency are also consequent to things, it seems that ideas also receive unity and composition, etc., from things: which is false, since Augustine says that they neither arise, nor perish, nor change, but are stable.
7. Likewise, if the multitude of created things is the cause of the multitude of ideas: therefore the multitude on the part of things is pre-understood to the multitude of ideas: but the multitude of created things is from time, and the multitude of ideas from eternity: therefore that which is from time is pre-understood to that which is from eternity, which is impossible: therefore it seems that ideas are in no way many.

ON THE CONTRARY:
1. If this is conceded, it will be against the statement of Augustine introduced above, that God does not form man and horse by one reason.

1. Likewise, the reasons of a thing are proper to the thing itself: but in proprieties there is difference and multitude: therefore it seems that proper ideas and reasons are many. If you say that God has ideas only of universals, as some have said, and does not have proper ideas: from this follows the heresy that He does not know things properly, but only commonly: which was disproved at the beginning of this distinction: because God knows through an idea: and of what there is no idea, there is no cognition in the divine mind, or it is known as a privation, as the Master will say below about the cognition of evil.

Solution. It must be said without prejudice, that an idea is considered in three ways, namely according to what it is, and thus it is the divine essence and divine intellect, and it is one alone. Likewise, it is considered in comparison to the one understanding through the idea, or operating, and thus again it is not many, but only one: because the one understanding is one indivisible. Thirdly, it is considered in relation to the works themselves of which it is the idea, and thus it has plurality on the part of respect to them. Hence, in my judgment, it is better said to be the idea of many, than many ideas. Dionysius gives an example of this in the center of a circle, which is the principle of lines going out to the circumference, and also of the circumference, because the whole circumference is generated from it, and is moved from it, as the wise say: and it indeed is one according to what it is: and if we suppose in it to be both the mover of the circumference, and to move through the lines going out, just as from the axis the spokes move the circumference in a wheel, the center in comparison to the whole motion is one: but in comparison to the lines by which the motion of the whole is made, it is in the reason of many, and it is rather one of many than many: but nevertheless the respects will be in it according to the relation of many to it. Hence it is properly signified when it is said that it is in itself one of one mover receiving many diversely: but this multiplicity of respects is caused by those things which are outside it, and therefore it is not multiplied in itself. By a similar understanding of this kind, let us understand the immobile nature of God causing and moving the whole wheel of the world: by the lines going out let us understand the individual created things, by which the succession of created things, as if by circular generation, the world is moved: and let us then say that that immobile first, is one principle, yet of many going out from it: and let us say that an idea names, not the thing itself according to what it is, but rather its respect to that of which it is the principle: and since that respect is multiplied according to the multitude of those principled, it follows that ideas are many and reasons: but nevertheless that there are not many intellects, or moving principles.

Therefore, let it be said to the first, that that consideration is understood of those in which one is placed as the same to another absolutely, whether essentially, or accidentally in an absolute (which pertains to the book on accident) is signified: as if it is said that man is an animal, it follows that many men are many animals: and if it is said that man is white, it follows that many men are many whites. But in relation it is otherwise: because it is multiplied by that which is outside the relative as to the respect in which it is necessary to gather that which is referred to it: and therefore it does not follow that if the essence is the idea, that just as there is only one essence, so there is only one idea.

To the other, it must be said that it is otherwise in the soul: because the soul has received forms, which are caused by many, and therefore many making comparisons in it. But in God it is not so, as has already been seen: because He is the cause through His knowledge, and through His intellect: and therefore there is only diversity of respects, and not of species, or forms: and therefore no composition is induced in Him: because, as shown above, from relation alone nothing is made more composite than it was before, especially in those relatives in which real dependence is not in both of the relatives, but in one only, as it is in the idea and the ideated.

To the other, it must be said that there is multitude by reason alone, and even less, if it can be less: because there is multitude by reason, and multitude in reality, and there is multitude of reason above the thing. Multitude by reason alone is multitude of what is signified together from the signification of another: as for example, if I am white, and you are black, and you become white, without any change made in me, there are here many similars: and the plurality which is imported by the term similars, is signified together by the relation of you to me, not by my relation but by my correlation to you: because with one similarity placed in you, it is necessary to signify another in me: which however is not caused by anything that has come to me. This multitude is even more directly in the center of a circle, which is the principle of lines: for with the lines signified plurally, it is necessary to signify the plurality of respects of the center to them: and thus there is multitude of reason signified together in ideas: and therefore perhaps it is frequently found among the Saints, that they say ideas signifying plurality only together, and they do not say, or rarely say many ideas, importing plurality by the principal signification of this word which is many. But the plurality of the thing is sufficiently clear. Similarly, the plurality of reason which is placed around the thing.

To the objection therefore that is made against it, it must be said that the temporal is not the cause of the eternal, because creatures do not cause the eternal: but nevertheless the eternal can be signified together in some way with the temporal, and be made known in some reason with the temporal, in which it is not signified or made known as it is eternal: and therefore that reason is not empty and vain, since it is placed around the thing in some way, namely not considered in itself, but as it is made known through the comparison of the temporal to it: for this suffices for the intellect to be preserved.

To the other, it must be said that although things in themselves and in their proper being are not from eternity: yet in potency they are from eternity. And if you ask, In what potency? I say that in the potency of the efficient cause. But if you object, that according to this they are not many, and therefore they are not referred as many to ideas. It must be said that things according to what they are there, are not many: yet as they are signified to be going out, they are as many, and thus as many they are referred to their ideas according to which they go out: and in this the multitude signified according to reason is caused, which is the least of all pluralities: because the things themselves are in potency, and the respects in potency: and the signified together plurality is only of reason signified together, and not of the thing signified.

To the other, it must be said that one and many follow being in itself, whether it is signified in cause, or in potency, or in effect: and diversity, and opposition, and composition, and mutability, and materiality, and necessity, and contingency, do not follow things according to what they are in themselves in any way, but rather according to what they are created after not being: because the creatable is changeable, and the changeable is composite, and diverse, and opposed to another, and so on with others: and therefore they cannot be transferred to things signified in cause, as one and many: yet it does not seem to me to be said that there are many ideas, although we say ideas signifying together plurality: and if we were to concede that there are many ideas, we would not have to concede many or diverse ideas because of this: because any difference suffices for plurality, but not for multitude: the sign of which is that we say in the divine persons there are many, but not many properly speaking.

To the other, it must be said that to pre-understand the multitude of creatures happens in two ways, namely as of existing, and thus it is false: or of going out from the cause, and thus it is true, that the temporal is pre-understood not as temporal to the eternal: because the eternal indeed cannot be caused by the temporal, but insofar as it is signified with it, it can receive some reason of signifying together, which is not signified without it.

Articulus 10 — Whether In God There Are Ideas Of All Things, And Especially Of Prime Matter

Whether in God there are ideas of all things, and especially of prime matter?

Then it is asked, whether in God there is the idea of all things, and this especially on account of prime matter: because

1. If an idea is the reason of form, it does not seem to have a relation except to form: therefore not to matter, as it seems.
2. Likewise, an idea is a principle of knowing: but everything that is known, is known by form: therefore it seems that there is no idea of matter.

But on the contrary.
Whatever is created has an ideal reason in the divine mind, or of the Creator: prime matter is created: therefore it has an idea in the mind of the Creator. If perhaps you say that prime matter is known through form: this is nothing, because we inquire about that knowledge by which it is known through itself.

Furthermore, it is absurd to say that you say God takes knowledge of one thing through another, as we do: because then there would be something of which He would have knowledge only accidentally, and not through itself, which is false: therefore He knows prime matter through itself.

If perhaps you wish to say that privation is not separable from matter: because through itself it is potency to form, as some say. Against this there seem to be three inconveniences: the first of which is that something is below the first in its potency. The second is that privation is not known by God except through habit, as the Master will say below. Since therefore the potency of matter is privation, it does not have its own idea in which an idea is formed. The third inconvenience is as before, that matter is known by God through another, and not through itself in its own nature.

Solution. Without prejudice I say that God knows matter and makes it immediately through the idea of matter. For although according to Boethius and Avicenna, those things which are only in potency, like matter, or always mixed with potency according to the succession of itself from potency to act, like motion and time, or mixed with potency to that which is contrary to the act in which they are, like the void and the infinite, are not fully intelligible by us: nevertheless they are known by God with full intellect: and therefore I say there is an idea, the species of the efficient, which it imitates as much as it can in effect. Some things imitate it according to potency only, like prime matter: and some according to act mixed with potency in succession, like motion and time: or in rest, like the void or the infinite: but some by reaching to a determined form in act not mixed with a nobler or ignobler, like creatures which are determined in mode, species, and order of their proper nature.

And by this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 11 — Whether Creatures, Once Made, Became Known To God In Another Way Than They Were Known As To Be Made

Whether creatures were known to God in a different way when made than they were known to be made?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, BE, I do not dare to say that they were known to God in a different way when He had made them, than in that way in which He knew them to make them, etc.

For it seems that this is false: because 1. Each thing is related to being as it is related to truth. But truth simply is known in a different way and is better known than truth in a certain respect: therefore, being simply is better and in a different way known than being in a certain respect: but creatures from eternity before they were made were only in a certain respect, namely in the potentiality of the efficient and exemplary cause: therefore, they were known only in a certain respect: and afterwards they are known simply: therefore, they were known in a different way when made than they were known to be made.

1. Likewise, either God knows those things which are from eternity simply, or only in a certain respect. If in a certain respect: therefore, His knowledge was imperfect, and afterwards it was perfected. If simply, and things were only in a certain respect: therefore, He knew otherwise than they were: therefore, He was deceived, which is false.

2. If perhaps you say, as Augustine and Anselm say, that things are more truly in God than in themselves: because in Him they are life and light, as Augustine says, and creative essence, as Anselm says: in themselves, however, they are evening or darkness, and mutable: and therefore they are more truly known where they more truly are. On the contrary: The truth of a thing is from the form of the thing: but the form giving the proper being of the thing was never in God: therefore the truths of things were never in God: therefore a thing is not more truly in God than in itself.

1. Likewise, the truth of the nature of this thing is not from that which is common, namely to itself and another, but from its own proper form: because in the common it is only in potentiality, but in its truth it is in actuality. Since therefore in God it is not in its own proper, but in common to itself and another: and it is not in Him in actuality, but only in potentiality: it will not be truly in Him: therefore it will not be more truly in Him than in itself.

2. And because there is doubt about this, let the very words of the Author be taken as they lie. Augustine says in book XI of the City of God, thus: Angels know the creature itself better there, that is, in the wisdom of God, as in the art by which it was made, than in itself: and therefore they know themselves better there than in themselves. For they were made, and are other than He who made them. Therefore there as in enduring knowledge, but in themselves as in evening. From this it is taken, that Angels also know themselves better in God than in themselves: and they do not know themselves better, unless where they are better and more truly: therefore they are seen to be better and more truly in God than in themselves. Anselm, however, in the Monologion says thus: It is not doubtful to anyone that created substances are much otherwise in themselves than in our knowledge: for in themselves they are through their very essence, but in our knowledge not yet their essences, but their likenesses. Therefore it remains that they are so much more truly in themselves than in our knowledge, as they are more truly somewhere through their essence than through their likeness. Since therefore it is also established, that every created substance is so much more truly in the Word, that is, the intelligence of the Creator, than in itself, as the creative essence exists more truly than the created essence, how will the human mind comprehend what kind of saying of God that is, and that knowledge of God, which is so far superior to created substances, if our knowledge is so far surpassed by them, as their likeness differs from their essence? From this it is taken, that things are more truly in God than in themselves, which seems to be against what was previously proven.

But still against this it can be objected, 2. When it is said, the Creature is in God: either it is understood of the creature which is, or of the creature which is not. If of the creature which is: since it has nothing in the genus which is not in some of the species, all species of creatures could be inferred universally, because the predicate is rendered equally to the subject by reason of all: therefore the donkey is in God, and man is in God, which is false. But if of the creature which is not. On the contrary: When it is said, the Creature is in God, the term creature supposes the verb of the present tense: therefore it is restricted to stand for the present: therefore the creature supposes there for that which is predicated presently: and it was said, that it supposes for that which is not: therefore it is simply false, the Creature is in God.

1. Likewise, the word of Augustine seems to imply an impossibility, namely that he knows equally and in the same way those things which are, and those things which are not. For God knows those things to be which are: and in the same way He knows those things which are not: therefore He knows those things to be which are not: which is impossible: because if He knows, then it is true what He knows: and thus it is true that those things which are not, are: and this is contradictory to be verified at the same time about the same.

Solution. Without prejudice it can be said, that when it is said, Creatures are better and more truly in God than in themselves, that there the comparison is made of the double being of the creature: and this must be simply taken abstracted from this being and that, in which the comparison is made. And to understand this, let us distinguish the fourfold being of the creature, namely the first in its own nature. The second in the reason of nature which is abstracted from that which is in its own nature. The third which is of nature in the exemplar of the first cause existing, and not simply. The fourth is that which is common to all these, which is the being of the creature existing in whatever way. I say therefore, that in the sayings of the Saints the third being is compared to the first, and the second according to the reason of the fourth: because every comparison is in something common to both of the compared: but the excess of the comparison is not according to the same in which the comparison is, but according to the compared: and therefore the third being according to that which it is, exceeds the first and second: and this is plain which the Saints intend, when they prove that it is more truly there, because there is the creative essence. However, the comparison is not made, so that both of the compared are referred to the being of the creature in nature, as that which is according to something and simply is referred: for it must be referred to the same if the comparison is to be made in that: and therefore this is not attended to. Whence that the creature in itself is simply, and in God according to something, this does not contribute to the proposition according to the intention of the Saints: because the comparison is made here in the reason of the common which is the fourth being, which extends itself to being simply and according to something: and the excess is noted according to the truth and nobility of the compared to each other, as we said before.

Others say thus, that the being of the thing is one thing, and the thing being is another: and they concede, that the being of the thing is more truly in God than in itself, but not the thing. But then still the same question will be about the being of the thing: for the being of the thing is never called by anyone except by which the thing is that which it is: and thus to the being of the thing follows the thing being, although the being of the thing and the thing being itself are not the same. Whence it is necessary to return to the superior solution, as it seems to me.

But if we wished to solve according to the man, and not according to the intention of the Saints, we would say that when it is said the thing is better and more truly in God than in itself, that there is a double expression from the equivocation of that which is better and more truly: for if the term better is an adverb, the sentence is false. But if a noun, it is true: because the thing in God is God, who is more true than the creature: and then the objection would cease: but nevertheless this is not the intention of the Saints.

To the other it must be said, that God from eternity knows all things simply, and not according to something: but He does not know all things from eternity to be simply: for when it is said, He knows all things simply from eternity, the term simply is referred to the act of the word as it is referred to the suppositum, not as it passes over the appositum: whence in the object a sophism is made from composition and division.

To the other it must be said, that the truth of the thing is twofold, namely absolute which is in the thing itself, and that is the indivision of act from potentiality: and it is the truth which Anselm defines, which is rectitude perceptible only by the mind, and that is in the thing in comparison to the highest rectitude, which is the measure of others: and this is true when the thing is to that, to which it is in the mind of the creative wisdom: but nowhere is it so true as there. And from this it does not follow that the thing is in nature, but only to be in whatever way.

To the other the solution is clear from what was held in the preceding question: because there it was shown, that the idea is appropriated from relation: and therefore every thing is in the divine mind as in its own idea, although the mind itself is common to all.

To the authority of Augustine introduced for the opposite part, it must be said that without doubt in the divine mind, in which the thing is only according to something, it is better known than in itself. And to understand this it must be noted, that there is a twofold according to something. One is in which the thing is indeed according to something, but it itself is the whole and perfect intention of the thing, as is the species received from the thing in the intellect: for the thing is not in the intellect except according to something, and yet that is the perfect intention and reason of the thing: and therefore in that it is perfectly known. Another is according to something, which is in it according to something, as according to part, or according to potentiality: and in that it is not known except according to that which it itself is not the reason and perfect intention of the thing, but of the part or potentiality of the thing. Thus therefore it is clear how the thing is according to something in the idea, which since it is life and light penetrating the innermost of the thing, it illuminates better for knowing than any intention can do, which is abstracted from the thing itself: and this is the intention of the words of Augustine, and Anselm: and therefore they name that diurnal from full light, or matutinal from growing light, knowledge. But that which is in its own nature, which is through form mixed with matter and privation and potentiality, and consequently wrapped in darkness, they call evening knowledge.

To that which is secondly objected against the saying of the Saints, it must be said that when it is said, the creature in the Creator or in God, is God or the creative essence, this determination is referred, in God or in the Creator, to the suppositum before it provides the suppositum to the verb: and therefore before the difference of the present signified in the verb, it is extracted outside its own reason to stand for that which is according to something and not simply: and then the verb coming has the present confused as it is fitting to that suppositum: and therefore that division does not proceed, either for the creature which is, or for the creature which is not.

To the other it must be said, that when Augustine says, that in the same way he knows those things which are, and those things which are not, he does not intend, that his knowledge in the same way passes over the known when they are and when they are not, because this is impossible, since thus opposites are placed around the same, as the objection proves: but he intends, that on the part of the knower there is the same mode, because he receives nothing from them: and therefore whether they subsist to his knowledge, or not, through the proper being of the creature nothing is changed in him.

Articulus 12 — Whether All Things Are In God Life And Light; And If So, Whether In The Notion Of The Speculative Or Of The Practical

Whether all things are in God life and light? And if so, whether in the reason of the speculative or practical?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, E, "All that was made is said to be life in Him," etc.

For this also seems by what Augustine says above the beginning of John: "Behold how I can, I say to your truth: the ark in work is not life, the ark in art is life, because the soul of the artificer lives in which all these things are before they are brought forth. Thus the wisdom of God according to which all things were made contains all things before it fabricates." Let Augustine be granted, it is false to suppose in his similar induction: for the species in the intellect neither lives nor is life, but is an accident of the intellect itself.

Likewise, it is asked whether they are life and light by reason of the speculative intellect or practical?

For it seems that by reason of the speculative: because light properly belongs to it: therefore, when light is joined with life, both should be referred to the speculative.

Against this again it seems that 1. Evils follow the speculative intellect in God, yet it is not said that they are life in Him.

1. Furthermore, since wisdom, power, will, say those things which are required for creating a creature: it seems that things existing in the cause are rather in it as power, wisdom, will, than as life and light. If you say according to what is commonly said, that power, wisdom, will, are not communicated to creatures going forth, but light and life: this is clearly false, because not all created things live and shine. If you say that these are communicated to creatures according to their genera, which are corporeal and spiritual: because some corporeal things live, and all spiritual things: and some corporeal things shine, and some spiritual things. Against: When all things are said to be in God as life and light, this is not understood according to genera, but also according to species and individuals: therefore it seems that in species and individual it ought to participate in those.

Again it is asked, if all things are in God as life and light, whether it should be conceded that all things in God live and shine?

1. It seems so: because life by itself always flows into life, and light by itself always into light: since therefore in God there cannot be anything but life by itself and light by itself, it seems that they live and shine.
2. Likewise, it seems that they should rather be called being and true and good in the first cause, than life and light: because being and good and true and one are among the first participated from God: but life and light are not generally participated, since Dionysius says in the book On the Divine Names, that life does not extend beyond the life of plants.

Solution. It must be said that all things are in God as life and light, and this according to the property of the cause, and not according to the property of the caused: for this belongs to the creature not in itself, but according to what is in the first cause. Life, however, is the act and continuous spirit in what is or in the body. In the cause, however, life is taken according to what is a continuous act, which is the cause of the continuity of being, according to what the Philosophers said about the motion of the heavens, that it is something immortal and without rest, as a certain life existing by nature in all things: and therefore this being belongs according to the relation to the cause of all, according to which it is the cause by creating and disposing through ideas the continuation of the whole nature: for we do not posit the motion of the heavens as the first cause of the continuity of being and diversity of species, but rather the perpetuity of God through practical knowledge causing both being and diversity and continuity in itself: and in this respect, it is called the life of the whole nature. Therefore, as Augustine says in the book On the City of God, some Philosophers called it the soul of the world, governing and moving the world by motion and reason: although they were reprehensible in this, that they called the Creator who is the life of nature (because He moves continuously and contains) the soul and not the Creator of the soul. In this way, therefore, the creature is said to be life in Him, because it is the idea moving the world by motion and reason into the continuity of generation. Light, however, is according to the reason of the idea, according to which also the Philosophers posited two things, namely that it moves by motion, and in this respect it belongs to it to be the life of nature: and by reason, and in this respect it belongs to it to be light. The creature, however, going forth from Him does not participate in these: because they do not belong according to what goes forth, but according to what is in the reason of remaining in Him, as has been said.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that what Augustine says is true, because the idea of the ark in the mind of the artificer is life in this way, because it is moving and light for making the ark: nor is the idea an accident, because in every intellect there is a double species, namely of the thing, and of the species. For the intellect, as the Philosopher says, is the species of species, just as the hand is the instrument of instruments: and this is especially true of the agent whose light is the species of all intelligibles, because through it simple intelligibles are made: and this species is not an accident, but a moving life in the practical intellect, and contemplation in the speculative. And in this respect, Augustine speaks truly.

To what is further asked, it must be said that the first and proximate relation of the creature, as life and light, is in the practical intellect, because that life and light being, is the cause of continuity in the whole nature by the fact that it is the principle of the whole created being: but yet it also understands things speculatively: but in this way it is not properly said to be life and light, but only light can be said.

To what is objected, it must be said that light is the ruler of work in the practical: and this belongs to the operative idea: and therefore light pertains to the practical, just as to the speculative.

To another, it must be said that power, wisdom, and will, do not say that which is proximate to the going forth of creatures: because that which is proximate is in some way the reason of the creature, as it is the idea: and therefore since every relation is always in the proximate according to the reason of the creature related to the cause, they are not called power, wisdom, and will, but rather life and light, which are fitting to the idea, as has been said.

To another, it must be said that it is not to be conceded that all live and shine: because when life and light are verbally signified, then the creature is noted as a substance from which the act of life and light goes forth: and this does not fit: because as has already been said, these belong to the creature according to what it is the creating idea, not according to what is signified by actual being: for nothing acts unless it is actual: and therefore the creature cannot then be said to live and shine.

To another, it must be said that being and good and true and one flow from the Creator upon the creature universally: and therefore they not only belong to the creature according to what is remaining in the Creator, but also according to what is in itself: and therefore they do not say so.

Furthermore, although being is indistinct, yet true, one, and good, say certain distinctions: and because the creature in the Creator is not in distinct being, therefore again it does not fit.

Articulus 13 — Whether Creatures Are Called Beautiful According As They Are In The Act Of Existing, Or According As They Are In The Divine Mind

Whether creatures are said to be beautiful according to that which they are in the act of existing, or according to that which they are in the divine mind?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, "The beauty of the field is with me," etc.

For as Tullius says, beauty consists in commensuration: it is evident, however, that to be commensurated and proportioned does not belong to a creature except in the act of existing: therefore it does not belong to it according to that which it is in the mind of the Creator.

To this it must be said, that beauty is called the proportion of the exemplar, not in such a way that I say the Creator is proportioned to the creature, but because each thing proceeds from its own ideal reasons: and therefore things are then said to be beautiful in the Creator on account of the removal from those things which disfigure, such as the two privations, namely because it is after nothing, and therefore the creature is changeable, and that privation which is in matter and materiality and mutability and composition: for all these disfigure the being of the creature, and they follow from privation, just as diversities follow from negation, and diversity from composition, and mutability from one to another: for these the creature does not receive from the Creator, but they occur in it, from the fact that it is brought forth into being after it was nothing. Whence also the Manichean, not seeing how these follow from privation, posited that these were from the God of darkness. But that it is so as has been said, is taken from Boethius in the book "The Consolation of Philosophy," who thus says:

"You lead all things from the supreme example, most beautiful one bearing the world in mind, and forming with a similar image."

Articulus 14 — Whether To Be In God Is To Be In The Knowledge Of God; And, Why, Just As Ideas Or Reasons Are Said To Be Many, Are Sciences Or Wisdoms Not Said To Be Many, Or Words Many; And, How Paradigms, Exemplars, Ideas, And Reasons Differ

Whether in God to be is to be in the knowledge of God? And, why, just as ideas or reasons are said to be many, sciences or wisdoms or words are not said to be many? And, how do paradigm, exemplars, ideas, and reasons differ?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

In God are all things, or with God, or with God, or in Him life, etc.

However, it is doubtful if to be in God is to be in the knowledge of God, as is hinted here.

Likewise, it is asked, why are ideas or reasons said to be many, and not wisdoms or sciences or many words?

Likewise, when I say paradigms, and exemplars, and ideas, and many reasons? By what is the difference of these attended to as to the name?

Solution. It must be said, as was held above, that the plurality of ideas or reasons is rather consigned by respect to things, than signified in that which is idea, or in that in which is idea. Therefore, wisdom, and art, and science, since they hold themselves more on the part of the wise and the divine essence, than on the part of the things about which they are, because wisdom, art, and science, denote habits resting or situated in the soul: it is clear, that they cannot be signified plurally. And similarly, the word does not denote a relation except to him whose word it is: but idea and reason and exemplar do not thus: and therefore they have a consigned plurality.

To the other, it must be said, that paradigm is said from "xapa" which is "near," and "deype" which is "teaching," as if teaching by that which is near, as is the form of wood in the figure of a shoe: and therefore because ideas are outside, they are called paradigms: and therefore Boethius calls the forms which are in matter, images of those, because the image imitates: therefore he calls those forms, because they remain outside, and are forming. Species also are sometimes called according to how they are referred to knowledge. However, exemplar is properly to whose likeness something is made by respect to it, and not by extension over it: whence ideas are called exemplars according to which the craftsman of nature regards them in themselves, when he produces the forms of nature. Idea indeed is said from "idos" in Greek, which sounds the first form, just as "hyle" sounds the first matter: and because those powers are and remain outside, therefore ideas are said by respect to form. However, reason pertains to the end: because from the end is taken the name and reason of the thing, as the Philosopher says. And therefore by respect to the end of the work are called reasons those which are in the divine mind.

DISTINCTIO XXXVI

Divisio Textus

It is customary here to inquire, Since all things are said to be in the knowledge of God, etc. Here begins that part in which it is asked, Whether it is the same to be in knowledge as to be in the essence of God, or in God? And there it is inquired about the diversity of the objects of divine knowledge.

It is divided, however, into three parts. In the first, he touches upon how it is to be in the knowledge of God, or foreknowledge. In the second, he touches upon how good and evil are known by God, there, B, After the aforementioned it is asked, In the third, because the knowledge of God, etc., is causative of things, he shows how it is the same to be in God and in the knowledge of God, which is to be from him and through him and in him: and how it is different, there, D,

Therefore, let us diligently examine, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Being Of All Things In God Belongs To Power Or To Wisdom Or To Will, Or To All Of These

Whether all things being in God pertains to power or wisdom or will, or to all these?

To understand the solution of the Master which he presents in the first chapter that contains the first part, it is necessary to inquire into two things, namely, whether all things being in God pertains to power, or wisdom, or will, or to all these?

Secondly, in what these three differ: being in God's knowledge, and being in God knowing, and being in God?

To the first, it proceeds thus:

1. Nothing is in God according to its own nature except God Himself. Therefore, it remains either that nothing is in God absolutely, or that it is present according to power: not, however, according to the power of matter, because He is not the matter of anything: therefore, according to the power of the efficient cause, everything that is said to be present will be in Him: therefore, not according to wisdom and will.

1. Likewise, there is to consider a cause actually acting, and to it corresponds an effect in act: and there is to consider a cause able to act, and to it corresponds the possibility of being caused. Since, therefore, from eternity things were in God, not according to actual being, but according to the fact that they could be made, they were in God: but to this corresponds the power of the cause: therefore, as it seems, things are in God with respect to power.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY, it seems that with respect to wisdom: because

1. Things are in God through idea and reasons: but ideas and reasons are ordered to wisdom and intellect: therefore, things are in God according to wisdom.
2. Likewise, Augustine said above that the Son is the Word of the Father, and the art full of the reasons of all living things. Since, therefore, living reasons and those which are life and light have an order to intellect and to wisdom, it seems that things are in God with respect to wisdom.
3. Likewise, this seems from the intention of the Master: because here in the treatise on divine knowledge, he determines how things are in God: therefore, it seems that by reason of knowledge they are in God.

But it seems again, that by reason of will:

1. For Damascene says that creation is the work of will: since, therefore, it belongs to Him to produce the creature, in which the creature itself is, it seems that the creature is in the will.

1. Likewise, in every voluntary motion and work, the principle is will: since, therefore, things are in God as in their principle, it seems that they are more in God by reason of will than of wisdom or power.

Solution. It must be said that since things are in God as life and light, and this by reason of practical intellect, three things are necessarily supposed, namely, knowledge of operables, and power ordered to work, and will of the work. And therefore it must be said that, properly speaking, things are in God knowing, able, and willing their production: however, they do not place a formal respect except to knowledge: and therefore the Master intimates that they are in God with respect to knowledge. For there are three things in a thing as it proceeds from the artisan, namely, the operation or production of the thing, and being, and the reason of the thing operated or to be operated. And since the thing with respect to operation is referred to the artisan, it is then proximally according to reason referred to power, and with respect to the being of the thing it is proximally referred to will which contains being and gives it, because as Dionysius says in the book On the Divine Names: Good is diffusive of itself and being. But if it is considered with respect to reason, then it is exemplified by the art of the artisan, and its relation will be to wisdom. Therefore, the Master, seeing that the operation of the thing and being are neither in God nor from eternity, but only reason: says that things are in God with respect to wisdom, which corresponds to the reason of the thing. However, if the whole is considered which is required for the production of the thing, and being, and reason, then things are in God knowing, and able, and willing: and thus it is clear to respond to the objections while preserving the intention of the Master.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that when we say God does not act actually, but potentially from eternity, it is not understood of power which is divided against knowledge and will, but of power in common: and therefore that objection is solved.

To the other, it must be said that power corresponds to that which can be with respect to the becoming of the thing: but not with respect to the reason according to which the creature was from eternity in the Creator.

To those which are objected concerning wisdom, it must be conceded.

To that which is objected concerning will, it must be said that will, according to the reason of understanding, is the first mover: yet in the will itself there is not the reason of the work according to which the creature is said to be in God. Hence Damascene intends that creation is the work of will, to which will moves, and not nature as to the generation of the Son.

To the other, it must be said in the same way, that the creature can be referred to will as to the motivating principle for it to be brought forth and to exist: but not as to that in which is properly the exemplary reason of the creature.

Articulus 2 — Whether To Be In God As Knowing Is The Same As His Knowledge

Whether being is the same in God knowing, and His knowledge?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether being is the same in God, and in God knowing, and in knowledge:

It seems, however, that it is so: because (as all Philosophers will)

1. Knowledge is nothing other than the assimilation of the knower to the thing known through the reason of the known and the species: therefore, there is nothing in the knowledge of God, of which the reason is not in God knowing: and this is being in God: therefore these three are the same, namely being in the knowledge of God, and in God knowing, and in God.

1. Likewise, Augustine says in book XV of On the Trinity that to know is to hold the knowledge of a thing within oneself: therefore, similarly, to know is to hold the knowledge of a thing within oneself: but it is the same to be in the knowledge of God as for God to know some thing: just as it is the same to be in my knowledge as for me to know some thing: therefore, to be in knowledge is to have the knowledge of a thing within oneself: but whatever knowledge is within the knower, that according to that knowledge is in the knower: therefore, these two are the same, to be in knowledge and to be in the knower: therefore, they are the same if they are referred to God, so that it is said to be in the knowledge of God and to be in God knowing.

2. Likewise, nothing is to be in God, except the reason of the knowledge of a thing being in Him: and this was to be in the knower: therefore, the third is also the same with those two.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Evils are in the knowledge of God, as it is said here in the letter: yet they are not in God: therefore, it is not the same to be in God and to be in the knowledge of God.

1. Likewise, whatever in any way has the reason in the knower speculatively or practically, this is in the knower: but they are not in God (as it is held at the end of this distinction) except those of which He is the author: therefore, it is not the same to be in God as to be in God knowing: because not all things which He knows speculatively will God operate, or will He be their author.

Solution. It must be said that these three relate as superior and inferior: because whatever things are in God, are in God knowing, and in the knowledge of God: but it is not converted. For those things are properly said to be in God, which are in Him as life and light, in the manner which was explained above: but in God knowing are those things which He knows speculatively or practically. However, in His knowledge are those things which He knows per se or per accidens, like evils which He knows, as Augustine says, because He does not find them in Himself: and because they are deformed by the art which He Himself is.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the knowledge of a thing is in two ways, namely of that which is known per se: and concerning this, what is objected is true. It is also known per accidens, as privation, and to that there is no assimilation, but it is known through its opposite: as the Philosopher says, that the straight is the judge of itself and of the oblique: we know the straight by the straight and the oblique itself: and therefore it is not entirely the same to be in knowledge in any way, and to be in God knowing: because for being in knowledge, assimilation of the knowable to the knower is not required, but for being in the knower it is required.

To what is further objected, that those things are in God, of which the reasons are in the knower: it must be said that it is not true: but rather those things are in Him, of which He is the operative cause. However, He does not operate all things of which He has knowledge: because He has knowledge of many eternal things which He does not operate, and He has knowledge of many things which He will never operate, so that multitude is referred to attributes: for if they are said to be in God, there will be an equivocal mode to being a creature in God, as is evident to anyone by itself.

To the other, it must be said that to know is to hold knowledge within oneself in any way, either per se or through another: and therefore it does not follow what is later inferred, that the reason of that is in Him who knows: because sometimes it does not have reason, but is known through its opposite: and therefore God knows evils well, and evils are in His knowledge: yet it does not seem to be conceded that they are in Him knowing, or in Him.

Articulus 3 — Whether God Knows And Cognizes By One Or By Many

Whether God knows and understands by one, or by many?

Whether God knows and understands by one, or by many?

Then it is inquired about what is said, there, A, He chose us before the foundation of the world.

For this seems to imply in Him the distinction and multitude of things: and therefore a very grave question must be asked here, about which almost all the ancient Philosophers hesitated against the divine intellect. For since choice is the choice of some things from others, there seem to be diverse things in the divine intellect: and therefore it must be asked, Whether He knows by one or by many? and if He knows by one, Whether He knows only one or many? and if He knows many, Whether His intellect passes over those many or not?

However, other articles of this question, namely whether He knows particulars, or infinites, and universals, and composites, we will place below in their proper places.

To the first of these, it proceeds thus: 1. One in the notion of one is not a principle of knowing except one: therefore if God knows by one, it seems that He knows only one, which will be proven false below.

1. If perhaps you say, that that one is the reason of many and of all: therefore it is false that He knows by one and in the notion of one: but He knows one by one which is in the notion of many. But on the contrary: That reason which is the reason of many: either it is understood in such a way that it itself is the reason of all: or that in it is the reason of all. If in the first way: then that by which He understands, is the reason of all: therefore one and the same is the reason of all, which is not intelligible, because all things that are, are of very distinct reasons.

Furthermore, it is heresy to say that God is the reason of all: because the reason of a thing is something of the thing. Hence God according to this would be something of all things, which is false: therefore it is not understood in this way that the reason of all, that that by which He understands, is the reason of all.

1. Therefore if it is so taken, that in it is the reason of all, On the contrary: That reason of all, either is one, or is many. If many: then again I have the proposition, that He does not understand all or many by that one, but rather by those many reasons. If however it is one, the same impossibility follows as before, that some one is the reason of all, which no wise person concedes.

If however you say, that that by which He understands, is indeed one in itself, but in relation many, as was said above about the plurality of ideas. On the contrary: Since therefore from eternity God understands by that one, from eternity such a relation will stand: therefore it is necessary in some way from eternity to be the extremes of the reason. However, the extremes of those relations: either are things existing in the potentiality of the efficient cause, or existing in their proper forms. If in the first way. On the contrary: According to that potentiality things are indistinct: therefore the relation to them existing thus, is a relation to the indistinct: therefore it will not cause a distinct cognition of the thing: therefore God does not know things distinctly, but only in the potentiality of the cause, which is an error, because thus His knowledge would be most imperfect. If however from eternity they are in their proper forms, to which the relation is made: this cannot be except in one of two ways, namely either that things are in nature from eternity: and this cannot be according to the Catholic faith: because thus the world would have been from eternity: or that the forms of things are without the things themselves to which the respect is made: and then since they cannot be except in God, nor can there be many relations to them unless there are many, three inconveniences follow: one of which is, that the forms of things are in God, and are not the medium by which they are known by God. The second is, that there is plurality in God besides the plurality of respects. The third is, that the ideas of things are in God as known, and between the ideas and the knower there is something medium by which God knows, which is multiplied in things by relation to the ideas. Therefore it seems impossible that God knows by one, which is in the notion of many: nor again does He know by one in the notion of one: therefore in no way does He know by one.

1. Likewise, It is one thing to know that a thing is, and another what a thing is: just as one question is why, and another question is what. Either therefore God from eternity knows what a thing is, or not. If not, and now He knows: therefore it seems His knowledge is received from things, which is absurd among all even the Gentile Philosophers. If however from eternity He knows what a thing is, and this is not known except by the proper reason of the known thing, He has with Him the proper reason of the thing: but the proper reasons of things are many: therefore He does not know by one, but by many, as it seems.
2. Nor can you here evade as some wish to evade, that you say, that by knowing Himself to be the principle of all and each He knows all: for by knowing the efficient principle of a thing, I can still be ignorant of the proper reason of the thing: because that is not received from the efficient, since the efficient is nothing of the being of the thing, and the proper reason states the being of the thing. Hence He can thus by knowing Himself, know the thing to be: but He cannot have the proper knowledge of the thing from that.

3. Likewise, The similitudes induced by the Saints do not seem to be valid. For let us suppose the center in a circle to have the reason of a principle to the whole circumference, and to all lines going out to any point: by this you still do not have, that the center knows what the circumference is in its proper reason, or what the lines are: but it will know only that the lines are and the circumference, but it will not know what they are, unless it has in itself the proper reasons of the circumference and of the lines: both of which are impossible to agree with the center: therefore the similitude induced is worth nothing, as it seems.

4. Likewise it seems, that nothing prohibits the divine intellect from being indeed one, and yet not understanding by one: namely, that in it result the reasons of all, and they are in it: just as we see, that in a mirror result the images of diverse things, and the mirror itself receives no multitude or composition by this: therefore it seems, that it is posited without reason, that He understands by one.

If for this reason it is said, that He understands by many, and not by one. On the contrary: Many in one intellect cannot be understood to be without diversity from the intellect itself, and without composition. If therefore God understands by many, He has in Himself, and from Himself diverse things, and in His intellect: inducing composition. However, the first is proven by a self-evident proposition, that whatever things are diverse among themselves are not the same to any one: if therefore the many things which are in the divine intellect, are diverse and many, they are not the same with the intellect itself of the first, that is, of God, and they make composition in Him, which is absurd.

1. If perhaps you wish to say, that these reasons proceed, as if He understands by another, when He understands by none but Himself. Hence there is nothing to ask, whether He understands by one, or by many? because neither by one, nor by many: because He understands by Himself: and there is nothing in Him as a medium of understanding. On the contrary: At any point marked on a line it is possible to use it as two, namely as a beginning, and as an end. Therefore since God is simple, either He understands so that He uses Himself as one, or as two. If as one: either this is only as understanding, or as that by which He understands only, or as understood only: and whichever is given, there will be in His intellect the privation of the other two. For if He uses Himself as He is considered in Himself as intellect, then He understands only in potentiality, and thus He will be (as the Philosopher says) as if He were sleeping, because the sleeping person understands in potentiality: and it will not be most noble. If however as that by which He understands, this is nothing: because that by which He understands, cannot be taken as in itself only, but in relation to the understanding and the understood. The same follows if He uses Himself as that which is understood, because then He understands others.

Likewise, When I say, God understands by Himself, there necessarily three things are signified according to the reason of understanding: otherwise it is signified then as supposing for the verb, and otherwise by the ablative "by Himself," and otherwise as that into which the act of understanding passes: therefore in the divine intellect a medium of understanding is taken according to reason: and this whether it is the same, or different, the reasons induced above hold about it. However, it seems, that it is necessarily different: for matter never coincides in the same with the efficient, and form: since therefore the intellect itself to that by which it understands, is as matter to perfection, it seems that it is never the same to it: therefore if there is in God something by which He understands, it will not be the same with His intellect, as it seems.

Likewise, This was the reason why the Philosophers were compelled to posit an agent intellect: because the same cannot be the intellect, and that by which it understands, for nothing acts upon itself to perfection: therefore it seems, that that by which God understands, is not the same with His intellect.

Solution. Without prejudice it must be said, that God understands by Himself, as He is the species, and idea of all intelligible, and every reason of the known and light. And this is thus proven: In us there is a double intellect, namely agent, and possible, and a third is made when the possible is led into act. However, if I ask, What leads it out? You say, that the agent. And if I ask, By what does it lead out? You say, that by the species of the thing. If indeed I ask, What makes the species of the thing to be in the notion of the simple, and abstract, and intelligible? You say, that the light of the agent: just as the light of the sun acts upon colors to sight: therefore it remains, that the light of the agent intellect is the act of every intelligible: just as the light of the sun, the act of every color. Let us therefore suppose the light of the agent intellect to be of infinite power: then it follows, that with nothing taken it will perfect the possible in every act of intelligibles, and besides that it receives some species by which it perfects it: because the agent then in the possible, the agent will be the species according to that which it is, and the act of simplicity and intelligibility in it. Thus however we posit the divine intellect, not only acting in things something, as form, but acting the things themselves according to substance: therefore He is the species of every thing: and thus by knowing Himself, He will know all that is, as the saints say.

Therefore it must be said to the first question, that He knows by one only which is Himself, and He is the reason and ideal species of all. Hence I well concede, that He is the reason of many.

To that which is objected against, it must be said that nothing prohibits one in one way relating to all, although not all relate to it in one way, from being the reason of knowing all: but there is not one reason of all, stating what a thing is: and this is not negatively: because we posit, that God is immediate by essence, presence, and power, to the thing, and to every part of the thing. However, that which is objected, that it is not the reason demonstrating what it was to be, I well concede, and I say, that multitude is by relation, as was supposed above.

To that which is objected on the contrary, it must be said that it is not necessary, that the extremes of relation are in act: otherwise it is about the relation signified in that which is according to reason only, and otherwise it is about the relation of that which is in nature. For if I say, These are contradictory, it is impossible that relation is posited between extremes being in nature, because one of the contradictories is non-being. Similarly when I say, this is the reason of knowing, the reason posits relation to that which is, or was, or will be: and therefore it is not necessary, that that reason of relation is posited about the existing, unless in potentiality ordered to the production of things in the future: and that is well in God.

To that which is objected, that that potentiality is indistinct: it must be said, that it is true, that things are not distinctly existing in potentiality: because they are not distinguished except by their own: but just as reason is distinguished, so also is potentiality, namely to the future and this and that, of which the reason is God: and this does not compel, that this and that is, except according to the potentiality of the future: because there is not in God potentiality only, but the potentiality of this and that which are future to which there is from eternity the relation of ideas, because God foresaw them in Himself, according to which He is the reason of those things which He was going to make: and this does not make the things to be substantially distinct, but distinct in cognition only, from the fact that the reason of cognition is referred to them.

To that which is objected against this that He does not understand by many, I well concede: but He understands by one related to many which are in a certain way, namely according to potentiality and foreknowledge, as was said.

To that which is objected, that it is one thing to know that a thing is, or that it will be: and another to know what a thing is: it must be said, that God knows both: nor yet is there a reason which states what a thing is: because He is as a paradigm, according to which is exemplified what is the being of a thing: and therefore by Him is known what a thing is; just as by the form of the thing, and definition, and more certainly for so much: because He is more intimate to the thing than even the form is intimate to the formed: for He does not have only relation to the thing as efficient, but as efficient, and paradigm, and end: and thus He is the efficient principle of knowing any thing.

To another it must be said, that it is indeed true, that by knowing Himself to be efficient, it is not a sufficient reason why He knows the thing: but by knowing Himself to be efficient, and exemplar, and end: for from these is taken every reason of knowing, because He is not matter: and from matter there is no reason of knowing, unless it is taken with form: and thus it is clear, that those who say well say, that by knowing Himself to be the principle of all He knows all.

To another it must be said, that no similitude in the whole can represent the divine. Hence the similitude induced by Dionysius, represents according to part: but by eminence it must be referred to the Creator: because He is both the principle and reason and end of all things which are from Him.

To another it must be said, that the divine intellect cannot be posited in such a way in which diverse things result as in a mirror: because in a mirror for things to result in it, diverse things are required, at least four: of which one is receptivity, and that is from glass or metal placed polished in which is made an equal and smooth surface. Another is that it is terminated like glass extinguished by lead on the other surface, and metal or stone from a solid and dense terrestrial mixture. The third however is the process of light into it: because otherwise the form would not be impressed according to the natural, or the ray would not be reflected according to the perspectival. The fourth however is the direct and proportional opposition of the mirror to that which is impressed. Hence it is clear, that composition is multiplicable in the mirror, but none in God: hence it cannot be posited thus.

To that which is further asked, it must be said that He understands by Himself: but I well concede, that it is in a double notion, namely of the understanding, and of that by which He understands as if formally.

To that which is objected, that that by which understanding is made is not the same with the intellect: it must be said that this necessarily concludes concerning the possible intellect. However, in God we posit no such, but universally agent: and therefore He understands by Himself: for He understands as agent, and in Himself He understands as He is the exemplary species of all things.

And by this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 4 — Whether God Understands Only One, Or Several, Or All Things

Whether God understands only one thing, or many, or all?

Whether God understands only one thing, or many, or all?

Secondly, it is asked whether He understands only one thing, or many, or all?

It seems, however, that He understands only one thing: because 1. He understands only Himself, as the Saints say: since therefore He is not many, it seems that He does not understand many.

1. Likewise, if He understands many things, He will be the reason for many things either sufficiently or not sufficiently. If sufficiently: therefore He can be the middle in a demonstration to conclude all things, which is false: because nothing can be concluded by positing God as the middle in a demonstrative syllogism. But if He is an insufficient reason for knowing: therefore He, in knowing Himself, knows things imperfectly, which again is false: therefore it seems that He does not know many things, or all, but only Himself.
2. Likewise, if He knew other things besides Himself, since the knower is perfected by the known, He would be perfected by things other than Himself, and thus would have another intellect more divine than Himself: which also the Philosopher in the second book of Metaphysics considers inconvenient.
3. Likewise, since all things besides Himself are vanity, if He knew other things besides Himself, He would know things more vile than Himself: and this also according to the common opinion is vile, because it is more expedient to be ignorant of viler things than to know them.

Solution. Here is an error very close: because if we understand God to understand only Himself, He would be more imperfect than us, because we understand ourselves and other things. But if we say He understands all things, it seems His intellect is composed of diverse things: and therefore a middle way is to be chosen, so that we say He understands all things, but by Himself, not receiving anything from all things or from any one thing:

but rather understanding to cause all things according to the being of nature and reason.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that He understands only Himself, if "Himself" is in the ablative case: but if it is in the accusative case, then He understands Himself and all other things by the fact that they are in Him as life and light.

To the second, it must be said that God cannot be the middle in a syllogism: because it is of the essence of the conclusion if it is a propter quid saying, and it is proportionate to the thing concluded, and the reason of the thing enters into the substance of the conclusion, none of which is fitting to God: yet He is a sufficient reason for knowing with respect to Himself, not to us, by the fact that He is the exemplary reason of the thing, and immediate, and present to every thing.

To the other, it must be said that this holds only in an intellect receiving from a thing, which is not the agent of the thing, but is acted upon by the thing itself: such, however, is not the divine intellect, as has been said: but He is the agent of all things, and the exemplary reason of them.

To the other, it must be said that nothing prohibits a more noble being from understanding a viler thing, provided it receives nothing from it, but rather confers upon it even that which it is: for thus no pollution follows in the noble. But in us it is otherwise: because we understand by receiving from the thing: and therefore we are frequently polluted by the intellect of vile things, because the proneness to move us to concupiscence is joined to such things understood in us, which would not happen if we, in understanding them, were the agents, and they did not in some way act upon us to understand in act.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Intellect Of God Has Any Transition Over Things From One To Another

Whether the intellect of God has any transition over things from one to another?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether the intellect of God has any transition over things from one to another?

It seems indeed that it does:
1. For everything that understands some extreme by means of something, it is necessary that it comes from the means to that extreme: however, God understands all things by Himself as a means or through Himself as a means: therefore, it seems that He transitions from Himself to created intellects.

1. Likewise, this seems to be signified in the expression where it is said: God understands all things by Himself: for it is constructed differently with the verb "all things" and differently with "by Himself."
2. Likewise, He does not understand all things without understanding this and that: therefore, it seems that He transitions from one to another according to the order and number of intellects: therefore, there is a certain transition in the divine intellect.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY!
Every transitioning intellect has something prior and posterior: however, nothing is prior and posterior in the intellect of the eternal God: therefore, the divine intellect does not transition from one to another.

Solution. This last point must be conceded without any ambiguity: and although we cannot signify it in speech due to the composition of our intellect, nevertheless, the intellect of God is indivisible, and indivisibly is of Himself, and of others, and of many, and of all, and of each singularly: and this is due to the universality and infinity of His power in understanding: and therefore it cannot be signified by us in speech.

And through this, the solution to the first two is clear: because they proceed as if we posit the intellect of God as ours, which we do not intend, but because we cannot speak otherwise about Him.

Articulus 6 — Whether Evils Have In God A Species Or An Idea, Or Are Known Insofar As They Are Discordant From Art; And, Whether They Are Known By God According To The Speculative Or The Practical Intellect; And, Whether Evil Is In God Life And Light

Whether evils have in God a species or idea, or are known inasmuch as they discord from art? and, Whether they are known by God according to the speculative or practical intellect? and, Whether evil is in God life and light?

Whether evils have in God a species or idea, or are known inasmuch as they discord from art? and, Whether they are known by God according to the speculative or practical intellect? and, Whether evil is in God life and light?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

After the aforesaid it is asked, Since all things are said to be in God, etc.

And specifically the Master asks here about evils: and his solution is, that evils do not have in God a species or idea, but are known inasmuch as they discord from art: and all the Doctors acquiesced to the solution of the Master.

But on the contrary it is objected thus: 1. To know something through its opposite, and not through itself, is to know by accident: but accidental knowledge is weak and infirm knowledge: therefore it ought not to be attributed to God, to whom all better things are to be ascribed.

1. Likewise, Evil is not pure privation, but has something of good: as Dionysius says, that evil is nothing other than a particular good: therefore it seems, that that which has being, either is not from God, which is rash to say: or if it is, it will have an idea in God: therefore that which is evil, has an idea in God: therefore it is not known only through the opposite.
2. Likewise, When I say fornicating, I do not only say defect, but also an act proceeding from the power of free will: but that act is something: therefore either it is from God, or from another principle: not from another principle, because there is no other principle: therefore from God: therefore it has an idea in God, because we will have in the last part of this distinction, that everything which is from God, has an idea in God.

But Then it is asked, Whether that act is life and light in God?

However, it seems that it is not: because in itself it has nothing of the dispositions of life and light. But on the contrary: Things are not life in God except on account of the idea: but these have an idea: therefore they are life and light in God.

Further it is asked concerning the solution of some here saying, that evil is known by God according to the speculative intellect, and not the practical. For this seems to be against reason because

1. Of opposites there is one science, and one power: if therefore good is known by God according to the practical, in the same way evil will be known.
2. Likewise, The true abstracts from good and evil: for there is true good, as God to be: and there is true evil, as you to be a sinner: but every true is known by God per se, not by accident: therefore true evil will be known by God per se, not by accident: and thus there is nothing that the Doctors say, that evils are known by God by accident.

Solution. To this it can be said according to the common solution, that evil is known by God by accident, and according to the speculative intellect and not the practical. And this is thus proved concerning the first part: For although evil has a subject, yet that subject is not separable from it except according to the intellect alone: and therefore its subject is not referred to the cause except conjoined with deformity: but conjoined with deformity it cannot be referred except to free will as to a cause, and not further to God: therefore evil does not have an idea in God: for God does not influence the act with deformity, but the act alone, and deformity falls into it from the defect of free will. Concerning the other part it is proved thus: because (as Priscian says) proherctic words desire the infinite...

Therefore, as I know how to make a house, and I do not know the house. Hence, if God knew evil with operative knowledge, He would know how to make evil, and could make evil, and would make evil: all of which are false. It is clear, therefore, that since they cannot say, He knows how to make evil, but only that He knows evil, that this is speculative knowledge, and not practical, because speculative words do not desire an infinitive denoting work, but rather an active in which the act of the verb passes: and thus the solution of the Doctors is proven with respect to both parts.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that when it is said, God knows evil per accidens, the term per accidens refers to the verb on the part of the matter of the act: and this is on the part of the known, and not on the part of the knower: and therefore it denotes a defect in the known, and not in the knower.

To the other, it must be said that the act insofar as it is an act, is from God, and has an idea: but not the evil act insofar as it is evil, but in the species of the act itself evil is known: because it is a voluntary act deficient from good. And through this also the solution to the following is clear.

To the other, it must be said that it is not to be conceded that evil has an idea in God, nor that it is life in God, nor that it is from God: but the act according to the intellect separated from deformity, will no longer be evil: and therefore according to that which is thus, it can be life in God and have an idea: but from this it does not follow that evil is in God, as has already been shown.

To that which is further objected concerning the solution of the Doctors, it must be said that evil and good which are ordered to the doing of the knower, are in him according to the practical: and this indeed is in us, but not in God: and therefore evil does not have praxis in the cognition of God, unless we would say that reprobation is with respect to evil: but this will be inquired below.

To the other, it must be said that there is the truth of the sign and there is the truth of the thing. The truth of the sign abstracts from good and evil: and this God knows well per se: and this has an idea in God: but in the truth of the thing evil is not true, since it is the corruption of the species itself from which it ought to be true in reality: hence it rather fails from form than has form: and therefore it is not true.

Articulus 7 — Whether God Knows Diverse, Composite, Material, Contingent, And Temporal Things

Whether God knows diverse, composite, material, contingent, and temporal things?

Then it is asked concerning this which says:

He has always known all things, both good and evil, even before they were made, etc.

For here it can be asked, Whether He knows diverse, and composite, and material, and contingent, and temporal things?

1. For it is not of the simple as simple to know diverse things as diverse: but God knows by one simple [act]: therefore it seems that He does not know diverse and many things.

2. Likewise, Composition cannot be understood without composites, nor complexity without complex things: whence then does God know composite and complex things?
3. Likewise, Materiality is a cause of knowability, not of intellectual cognition: since therefore the senses do not have means by which to apprehend material principles, whence will God know them?
4. Likewise, Human knowledge is more imperfect than God's: and since in it there are only necessary things, not contingent ones: therefore much less in the knowledge of God: therefore God, as it seems, does not know temporal nor contingent things.

Solution. It must be said with Dionysius, that He knows composite things simply, and diverse things by unity, and material things immaterially, and contingent things by necessary knowledge, and temporal things timelessly, but with knowledge always standing: and how this may be, let it be pre-understood in us that there is a double form in which a thing is known, namely of abstraction which the speculative intellect uses, and of composition which the practical uses in knowing: for since (as Avicenna says in the first Philosophy) the speculative intellect is only receptive, and from the body and known things, it cannot use anything in knowing except the form of abstraction: because a thing is known only through that which is the nature of the thing: and this is not in us, but must be taken from the thing itself: therefore it is that it abstracts from the thing itself. But since it is not joined to the thing except through bodily organs, in which the form of the thing is first impressed, therefore it must also later receive from the body: and thus the reason of Avicenna's saying is clear, that the speculative receives from things and from the body, placing nothing concerning any of those. But the practical uses forms of composition: and the cause of this is that the practical is productive of the thing: but a thing is not made through that which it already has, but rather through the form which it does not have: and since it is not in the thing, it will be in the maker: therefore he will place it concerning the thing, and will not receive anything from the thing itself. Thus also it seems not to receive from the body, but to place the motive power in the nerves and muscles for the operation drawing out the form of art in external matter. And to the likeness of this form of composition are the ideas in the divine mind, not received from things, but making things: they make things by drawing them out of nothing: and therefore from that nothing every defect arises, and this negation of one from another, from which diversity is caused, and consequently composition, and contingency, which are founded in mutability and materiality. Thus therefore temporal things in their idea are timeless, but they receive temporality from nothing: and composite things in their idea are simply one, and complex similarly, and so of others: therefore referred to that idea, which is a sufficient reason for knowing all things, as has been said, all things are indeed known most perfectly: and yet simply, compositely, immaterially, timelessly, and in the mode of necessity.

But if you object, that one idea is in itself, and nothing after which things flowed into being, causes nothing at all: but the defect from the perfect which is nothing, falls into those things which are after it: but we see diverse things formed and perfect, and many creatures: what then causes that multitude? I say, that two things cause it: one as becoming, the other as making. Becoming is matter next to nothing, and flowing into being after nothing, as Augustine says: and therefore because it is imperfect in many ways, it is not itself according to one part of itself receptive of all perfection: and therefore that it may have the reason which it can have at once, it was necessary for it to be divided according to acts: and thus multitude was introduced on the part of the becoming.

Likewise, According to every part of itself it is not receptive of all perfection which it is born to have: therefore it was necessary to have succession in forms: and thus mutability and contingency were introduced. And thus it is plainly clear, how diversity and mutability and composition are caused from nothing, after which matter which is near to nothing, and strives towards some being, flowed into being. But on the part of the maker there is wisdom in number, weight, and measure, disposing all things: because it gives form to matter and the parts of matter by order and proportion: and this is what Plato said, that according to the merit of matter from the giver of forms all forms are given.

And through this the solution to all questions except the last is clear.

And To this it must be said, that our knowledge is caused by the thing, and therefore it varies according to the thing: which if it is necessary, and in a necessary mode, that is, through a necessary medium, it is knowledge itself: otherwise, it is either opinion or doubt. But the knowledge of God is through ideas making things: and therefore it follows the conditions of the knower and not of the known, as was said before: and since the knower himself is not subject to contingency, his knowledge will always be necessary, even concerning contingents.

Articulus 8 — Whether God Knows What He Will Do, What He Has Done, What He Can Do And Will Never Do, And Finally Things Actually Infinite

Whether God knows what He is going to do, what He has done, what He can do and will never do, and finally infinite things in act?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, "And hence it is, that only good things are said to be in God, not evil," etc.

For it is asked, if those things are in Him as life which He Himself is going to do? If this is said: then past things do not seem to be in Him as life, since He is not going to do them, but has done them. If this is conceded, it will be against what was previously denied, that according to this He is differently disposed in knowing towards the past and the present.

It is also asked concerning those things which He will never do, but nevertheless can do, whether they are in God as life and idea?

1. And it seems that they are not: because as the Saints say, an idea is with respect to the ideated: therefore what will never be ideated does not have an idea in the divine mind.
2. Likewise, His knowledge (as will be had below) is the cause of things: therefore if He has an idea of something, it will be caused, and it will be of future things: therefore from the destruction of the consequent, if something will not be, it will not be known by God, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
It is true that God can do more things than He does: therefore He knows that He can do more things: but He knows all that He can do, because He knows His entire infinite power: therefore He knows more things than He does: and not except by idea: therefore some things have it in His mind which will never be.

Here also the question has a place where it is asked, whether God knows infinite things in act?

It seems that He does: because
1. Augustine says in the book "The City of God," that the philosophers have proven the species of numbers to be infinite: and he says that numbers, however infinite, are nevertheless infinitely known by that knowledge, concerning which prophecy says that His knowledge is without number. Therefore it seems that He knows infinite things in act: but infinite things in act He will never do: therefore He knows those things which He will never do.

1. Likewise, His power is not limited: therefore it is always towards more things than any sum can be taken: and He knows His entire power: therefore He knows infinite things in act.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
When I say infinite in act, according to the notion of the infinite, it is understood in two ways, namely infinite in act to the created intellect, or infinite in act simply. If infinite to us: then it is not a question: because He knows more things than we can think. But if infinite simply. On the contrary: Infinite in act simply is always beyond the one receiving it according to its greater part: therefore God receiving it as infinite in act always leaves it according to its greater part to be outside Himself, which is absurd, because thus God would not comprehend His own knowledge.

But if you say that the intellect of God is infinite in act, and therefore comprehends that infinite. On the contrary: If the intellect of God is infinite in itself, it is most imperfect, which is absurd: for it is not infinite to God, but to the creature, because it is not limited by the creature.

Furthermore, let it be granted that it is infinite simply, still it cannot be said that the infinite includes the infinite: because whatever will be included and comprehended, that will immediately be limited, and another will exceed it: therefore it is nothing that is said, that God knows infinite in act, because infinite in act is nothing.

Likewise, the infinite is not found except according to the mode of quantity. Therefore let the infinite be taken in virtual or potential quantity, and in dimensional quantity which is continuous, and in discrete quantity which is number.

I return therefore to the first. If I say infinite in power, I have not said infinite in act, but only in potentiality, namely because it is not to assign what it can do to such an extent, without taking more in which it can: and that which is to be taken is not taken in act, but in potentiality. But if the infinite is taken in the continuous, I cannot take by addition, since it is to take a quantity to which nothing can be added according to reason: as is a circle. Therefore it must be that the infinite is taken according to division in that, so namely that the divided part is not as an aliquot part, but according to the reason of the whole divisible is taken: for then nothing is taken so small that it is not divisible into two equal parts: therefore also this is infinite with respect to taking the divisible: and this is in potentiality: therefore it is only in potentiality. Likewise, I will take in number in which there is infinite by addition not division: because it is to take in it the indivisible in act, as is unity, but it is not to take a sum to which unity cannot be added, constituting another species of number: but unity is addible only in potentiality: therefore also infinite is only in potentiality: therefore nothing is infinite in act: therefore God does not know infinite in act.

I answer. It must be said to the first, that God knows the past in the same way when it has passed, as He knew when it was future: and it is life in Him: for it is not for this reason said to be life in Him, that it is or is not: but because it is an idea moving to the containment and permanence of the universe's being, as was previously explained in the preceding distinction. For although He is not going to do the past, nevertheless He is its author: and this suffices for an idea.

To the other it must be said, that God knows what He is never going to do: because He knows Himself, and He will never make Himself: but something which is not Himself, which He is not going to do, He does not know, except in this way in which we say He knows evils.

And therefore now it is solved to the following by saying, that such things do not have an idea in Him: because it is not an exemplar except to something exemplified related: and such things do not have this kind of relation, but are only known in the power of the operator.

To the objection on the contrary, it must be said, that God knows His entire power, and He knows that He can do more things than He does: but by this He knows nothing except Himself according to that power.

And if you object, that He knows what He can do: I say that He knows those things as they are, namely in their possibility, and not in execution to work: and from that part in which they are in potentiality, they are not other than Himself, but from that part in which they are disposed to explanation to work: nevertheless I well concede, that He knows Himself to be able to do some things which if He did, they would not be the same with Himself: but it is not in those things which He will not do, to take the known which is not Himself.

To that which is asked concerning the knowledge of the infinite: I say without prejudice to some saying otherwise, that I cannot see how the infinite is in act: or if it is posited to be, I do not see how it can be comprehended even by the infinite: nevertheless I do not say that God is infinite to Himself. Hence I say, that God knows the notion of the infinite in this way in which it is in potentiality, and not in that in which it is in act: because thus it is nothing: and in this way the infinite according to theology indeed is in three, as has been proven, although according to the natural philosopher it is in only two: because no natural power is infinite except perhaps according to succession in moving: and this also according to nature only: although the command of God can impose an end to the mover, and to the motion, and to time.

Others say differently, distinguishing in God a threefold knowledge, namely of simple knowledge, of vision, and of approbation: and they say, that by simple knowledge He knows what He is not going to do as infinite: but by speculative knowledge of vision He knows what He is not going to do, yet whose species is with Him: but by knowledge of approbation He knows what He is going to do, and this has an idea. By this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 9 — Whether The Knowledge Of God Is Well Divided Into Knowledge Of Approval And Simple Knowledge

Whether the knowledge of God is well divided into the knowledge of approbation and simple knowledge?

Then it is asked concerning what he says there, "Because He knows them in such a way that He also approves and they are pleasing," etc.

Here the Master seems to imply a double acceptance of knowledge, namely, simple knowledge and the knowledge of approbation.

However, it seems false: because
1. The knowledge of approbation adds upon the knowledge of simple knowledge: therefore it is signified that there is composition in God, which is false.

1. Likewise, it seems to be diminished: because there is the knowledge of reprobation by which evil is known: therefore it seems he ought also to have posited that.
2. Likewise, it seems not to be the solution which some give, that he did this because evil is not in God: for this seems false: for the Prophets read in the book of eternity, and they read the evils and sins of the peoples: since therefore it is not read unless written, it seems evil is in God.

Solution. It is easy to solve this: although the knowledge of approbation adds something, because it adds affection according to mode, yet it adds nothing according to reality: because affection in God is the same in reality with vision.

But one must beware here of the solution of some which is false, saying that it adds nothing that is in God, but that it adds what is from God: since evil is not from God. For this is false, and against what is said, Genesis 1:31: "God saw all things," etc. Where Augustine says, what He had made that there is signified the vision of approbation, by which it pleased Him to make, it pleased Him that they remain. Pleasing, however, is in operation, and not from Himself.

To the other it must be said, that the knowledge of reprobation adds nothing that is in God upon the knowledge of simple knowledge, and therefore it is not enumerated as diverse with it: but the cause of reprobation is outside God and not in God.

To the other it must be said, that it is not yet proven that the mirror of eternity in which the Prophets read is God Himself, although some say this, and perhaps falsely. And if this is conceded for the sake of argument, then it must be said that they did not know evils as written there, but as discordant from the book. Hence, by this that they did not find individual virtues and works, they received revelation by the power of the mirror, that contrary things were in them: yet I rather believe that they did not see God, but received revelation from God of good and evil deeds.

Articulus 10 — Whether It Is The Same To Be In God, And From God, And Through Him; And To Be, Live, And Move In Him

Are being in God, and from God, and through Him the same: and is being in Him, living, and moving the same?

Are being in God, and from God, and through Him the same: and is being in Him, living, and moving the same?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

Therefore, if we diligently examine, etc.

For it seems that this is not true: because 1. The Gloss explains on Romans 11:36, as

From Him, and through Him, and in Him pertains to the persons actually causing the creature. Hence it says that "from Him" is attributed to the Holy Spirit on account of the containing goodness. But when it is said, "All things are in God," this is not said by reason of the containment by which creatures actually exist, but by reason of the idea by which they are in God from eternity: therefore it seems that "in" is taken equivocally: and thus it is not the same to say.

1. Likewise, Acts 17:28 says that in Him we live, and move, and are. Therefore, since we are in Him from eternity, we are moved and live in Him from eternity, which is false.
2. Likewise, if we are said to live in Him from eternity, because in Him we live: then it seems that we are said to be moved in Him from eternity, because in Him we move: and essentially in Him, because in Him we are, which is false: therefore it seems that these three are not the same, namely, to be in God, and to be from Him, and through Him, and to be in Him, to live, and to move.

John 1:3-4: All things were made through Him, and without Him was made nothing that was made. In Him was life, and the life was the light of men, etc.

Solution. It must be said that in part of the signification, being in God and in Him is the same, as it is enumerated with from Him, and through Him: for being in God says two things according to the reason of understanding, namely, to have the idea, and to be God the author of the idea of that idea: and as to this last, "in" is taken.

In the same way, it must be said to the other, that God in comparison to created things is taken in three ways, each of which in itself supposes the preceding. The first is to be in God, as in a cause only. The second is to be in God, as in a cause actually causing. The third is to be in God, as a cause actually causing and ruling and containing. And the first mode does not posit the creature to be: but the second posits the creature to be now first: the third, however, supposes it existing in perfection. Hence in the first mode it is said, What was made, in Him was life and light. In the second mode, From Him, and through Him, and in Him are all things. In the third mode it is said, In Him we live, and move, and are. And thus it is clear how these modes enumerated here differ.

To the other it must be said that this is false, that we are said to be life in Him, because in Him we live: but rather since every substance is divided into three, namely, being, power, and operation, those three are touched upon being in God ruling and containing, when it is said: We live according to the power of life, and we move in operation, and we are according to essence: from Him, however, is said on account of the power of the Father, through Him on account of the wisdom of the Son, and in Him on account of the goodness of the Holy Spirit.

Articulus 11 — Whether Things Are In God By Reason Of Person And Not Of Essence Or Notion

Are things in God by reason of person, and not of essence, or notion?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

Furthermore, it must be known that although there is indicated a distinction of persons, etc.

For from this it seems to be taken that things are in God by reason of person, and not by reason of essence, or notion. This is also proven by another reason: because that is in God, of which He Himself is the author: but authority and work belong only to the person, because all acts are of particulars, and not of nature.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Let us suppose the persons do not exist, yet God will be the author of the creature: therefore, since He knows all things which He works, in Him will be all the reasons of His works: therefore this belongs by reason of nature, and not by reason of person.

1. Further, it seems that this belongs by reason of notion: because Augustine and Anselm say that by His Word He says all things which He makes. But the Word is the Son alone. Therefore, since in the Word are the reasons of creatures, it seems this is by reason of notion, and not of nature.

Solution. It must be said that by reason of nature the reasons of things are in God.

To the first, it must be said that to create is an act of the person, insofar as the person is an individual substance of rational nature: and this person would still be God, even if He were not Father and Son and Holy Spirit. Hence that objection does not prove that it belongs to persons thus distinguished as faith distinguishes.

To the last, it must be said that this belongs to the Son appropriately, and not properly, just as to be the wisdom and art of the Father, as was shown above: and therefore it does not remove that it belongs to the substance per se.

F. That not all things which are from God are also of Him: but conversely.

It must also be annexed here, that not all things which are said to be from God, ought also to be said to be of Him. Because, as Augustine says in the book On the Nature of Good: "From Him" does not entirely signify "of Him." For what is of Him can be said to be from Him: but not everything that is from Him can be said to be of Him, because it is not of His substance. For heaven and earth are from Him, because He made them: but not of Him, because not of His substance. Just as if a man generates a son, and makes a house, the son is from him, and the house is from him: but the son is of him, the house, however, is of earth and wood, not of him.

Articulus 12 — Whether It Is The Same To Say "From Him" And "Of Him"

Whether it is the same to say, from him, and about him?

Then it is inquired about this which he says, there, F, This does not entirely signify from him, what about him, etc.

For it can be doubted whence this arises, since from and about seem to always denote the relation of cause?

I respond. It must be said that this preposition from is more general in signifying origin than the preposition about: for from sometimes denotes origin and not coessentiality, as we say, we have peace from the king: sometimes it denotes order in the same substance, as when it is said, from morning becomes midday: for the same thing now which was substantially morning becomes midday, although it passes in the notion of morning, and remains in the notion of now and substance: sometimes it denotes order only, as when it is said, from the games comes Olympia, that is, after that. However, about always denotes origin with consubstantiality: and this is the cause of the statement.

DISTINCTIO XXXVII

Divisio Textus

And since it has been demonstrated in part, etc. Here begins the part in which the Master shows how God is in creatures as a cause in the caused essentially, presentially, and potentially.

However, it is divided into two parts: in the first of which the Master shows God to be everywhere and in every thing. But since to be in a place, it follows to be moved through place: and to be in a thing, it follows to be changed according to the thing: therefore in the second he shows God to be immutable with place or thing changed, namely there, I, Since the divine nature is truly and essentially in every place, etc.

The first is divided into three. In the first, he determines the modes by which God is everywhere, and explains those which can be explained. In the second, he raises questions following from his determination, there, C, But you ask, where did God dwell, etc. Thirdly, he returns to the explanation of the first mode according to the opinion of some, who indeed spoke truly, but nevertheless insufficiently, there, F, From the aforesaid it is clear, that God is everywhere wholly by essence, etc.

In the first there are still four chapters, in the first of which he simply states the modes by which God is in things. In the second, he proves by authority that God is in all things essentially, presentially, potentially. In the third, he proves him to dwell specially in the Saints. Fourth, to know the mode of inhabitation, he refers to those things which have been determined above concerning the mission of the Holy Spirit.

From these the sentence of the first part is clear.

Articulus 1 — Whether God Is Everywhere And In Every Thing

Whether God is everywhere, and in every thing?

Before the Letter, four questions arise here, namely whether God is everywhere, and in every thing?
Secondly, Whether it is the same to be everywhere, and in every thing?
Thirdly, Whether it is the same to be everywhere, and in every place, and to be anywhere?
Fourthly, Whether it is fitting for Him to be everywhere from eternity, or not?

TO THE FIRST, it is proceeded thus:
The world is: therefore God is everywhere conserving the world. In the following prosarium. Let the world be taken for the whole universe of creatures, so that none is excepted. Thus: It is conserved in being: therefore there will be one conserving the world: but every conserving is in the relation of cause to the conserved: since therefore cause and caused are not the same, the world and the one conserving the world will not be the same: therefore the one conserving the world will not be the world, nor anything of the world: but it is conserved everywhere: therefore the one conserving the world, which is neither the world nor of the world, will be everywhere: this is none other than God: therefore God will be everywhere.

Perhaps you will say, that He conserves through the influence of some power which is not Himself: for as we see, that the generator not only influences the generated with the species, but also influences the dispositions of matter by which it resists subsequent alterations: thus God can do. On the contrary: It will be of the same to give being, and conservation in being: because what gives being, also gives the consequences of that being. I therefore inquire about that power influenced by the first: for it is evident, that it has being in the conserved and from the first: therefore either it conserves itself, or it is conserved by another. It is evident, that not by itself: because thus the same would be cause and caused: therefore by another. Therefore either that is created, or not. If created: then it will go on to infinity; therefore it must be said, that that conserving is God: since therefore conservation is everywhere, and the conserving God will be everywhere.

1. Likewise, From everyone who knows what God is (as Anselm says) it is posited that God is something greater than can be conceived: therefore either He will be posited within every thing only, or outside only, or within and outside simultaneously. If within only, or outside only, it follows that He is something terminated: therefore He is not greater than can be conceived: because something greater than Him can be conceived: therefore it remains, that He is within all things, and outside all things, and above all things, and below all things: therefore He is everywhere.
2. Likewise, Gregory says, that all things which were made, were made from nothing, and would tend to nothing unless the hand of the Omnipotent contained them. But it is evident, that they were made from nothing everywhere: therefore everywhere it is necessary for the container to be present: therefore the container itself is everywhere.
3. Likewise, Damascene: Whether according to power, or according to goodness, or according to wisdom, or according to time, or according to place, it falls short of perfection, it will never be God: but to fall short of perfection according to place, is not to be everywhere: therefore God...

since it lacks in no perfection, it will be everywhere.

1. Likewise, the power of preserving itself in being is a power of no neediness: therefore, it is of God alone: since therefore every thing is from something, and needs that from which it is, that power of preserving itself cannot be given to any creature: therefore, to no place, nor part of the world: therefore, it is from God Himself immediately: therefore, God is everywhere conserving the world.
2. Likewise, let it be granted that God gives the world the power of preserving itself, still it is necessary that that habitual power be received from the world and from God: but between every receiver and received there is a certain essential connection, unless it is a receiver through an influence which is carried through some medium: therefore, it is necessary that everywhere the part of the world conserved spiritually touches God, or there will be some medium: but it is evident that there is no medium, because between the one bringing forth a thing from nothing and the thing brought forth there cannot be a medium carrying or acting: therefore, it is necessary that God be present everywhere.
3. Likewise, it is assumed by all, and it has been proven in the premises, that every creature has an exemplar in God, and that every nobler thing is to be attributed to God: because it is held according to the reason of imitation to the eternal exemplar. From this I proceed thus: This creature is here: therefore here is to take place and located and the filling of place and salvation and containment of the located: and another creature is elsewhere, and the same are to be taken in it, and thus of each. Let us see therefore what is of nobility in each thus taken: it is evident that it is not the distinction of nobility, because that follows diversity and the partibility of matter: but containment and filling and salvation in every place and located are of nobility: therefore these are had from the exemplar. Therefore, let the distinction which is of ignobility be removed, and let what is of nobility be attributed to God, it follows that God is everywhere in every place and located filling and containing and saving: therefore God is everywhere.

4. Likewise, let us consider the universal being, and that universal which is most universal, for it is the universal essential likeness of many: but this can be according to species according to the reduction to one of those which differ by matter only, and it can be according to genus one in the reduction to one of those which differ in species and being, and according to analogy and proportion to one in the reduction of effects to one cause which has it according to itself, but others from it: but it is evident that this last is most universal: therefore, it is evident that every universal is in many and of many: I ask therefore, What of those is of nobility, and what of ignobility? I propose that it is of ignobility to be in many. For by this the universal is contracted and dies and is corrupted: according to being it is contracted to the being of the particular, and is destroyed, because with the first destroyed, it is impossible for any of the others to remain. I propose however, that to be of many is of nobility: because the universal by that has the scope of predication, and that it is everywhere and always, especially taken in the third way, because this is common to God and creature: therefore the universal according to this is exemplified from the divine being: since therefore according to this some universal is in every thing and everywhere, much more God, because it is necessary that every exemplified thing fails from the first exemplar.
5. Likewise, the first of all causes influences more on all others which are simply second, although in the order of nature some are first: but I see that the primary in the order of nature remains essentially and presentially and potentially in all seconds, although it is contracted and determined in them, and this is of ignobility: and therefore also some Philosophers said that unity is the first form which by its iteration constitutes all other forms: therefore, with what is of ignobility removed, the first of all causes will be in all others essentially, presentially, potentially. If perhaps you say that this is not true, that the first cause in the order of natural causes is in the second: it is evident that you speak falsely: because to be, to live, to sense, are formal causes ordered in nature: and being is in life, and life in sense, and the sensitive in the intellective in all those ways: and thus continuous matter is in matter having contrariety, and this in the mixed, and this in the complexioned, this again in the composite with distinct organic members.

These reasons suffice for the proof that God is everywhere, because some deny this, who are called philosophers: and they bring these reasons in the contrary:

1. It is nobler to make works permanent without an artificer, than permanent in the presence only of the artificer: for it is said, Deuteronomy 32:3-4: "Give magnificence to our God. The works of God are perfect," etc. Therefore, His works remain, even with Him separated from them.

2. Likewise, this can be done by a lower artificer, like a carpenter: therefore much more by a higher one.
3. Likewise, we see nature do this: because the generator not only influences the species or makes it, but also the dispositions by which it is conserved from those altering to the corruption of the species: therefore, God also does this.
4. Likewise, he is weak in the kingdom who cannot govern unless present: therefore this will also be more a sign of weakness in God, if He cannot contain creatures unless present.
5. It can also be objected more strongly thus: The celestial virtues, which are most efficacious, do not conserve immediately, nor act, but through the mediation of the elements: therefore it seems, since God is more similar to nobility than ignobility, that He also acts thus.
6. Likewise, if God is everywhere essentially, presentially, potentially: therefore He operates all things: therefore it seems that no nature has its own operation: and this is against Damascene, who says that every nature has its own operation. And this is also against all the sciences of the Philosophers.
7. Likewise, what is objected about the order of causes does not seem to hold, because it holds only in essential causes: but in efficient causes it does not hold, for in these the first efficient cause is not in the second by essence or by presence, but by power only: but it is true that with the first not moving, motion will be taken away from all others, but God is the efficient cause of things, not formal, nor material.

Solution. It must be said that the first reasons conclude the truth.

And to these last it must be said that what it says, "It is nobler to make," etc., is simply false: and this is necessarily proven thus: Every conserving thing is from some cause which is before the thing itself, whether it is efficient, or formal, or material: but in the work of God, when He makes things, nothing precedes the work except Himself alone: therefore His work which is conserved will not have conservation except from Him: and whatever is in Him, is Himself: therefore it will not have conservation except from Him essentially conserving, that is, that He is essentially present conserving.

Hence, that a lower artificer makes something conserved in being, is because there is something preceding his work, which of itself conserves the form impressed by the artificer: and if it were not so, it would not be conserved. And an example of this is if he impresses the form of a seal in some matter not having beforehand the power of conserving, as if a seal is impressed on water, the form is not conserved except in the presence of the sealer, and with the sealer removed it is destroyed: and thus it is also with nature, whose work is preceded by matter, although art and nature operate the form in matter in different ways: because as the Commentator says on the ninth book of the Metaphysics, nature makes the form from matter, by this that it transmutes the matter from the form it previously had: but art does not properly make from matter, but in matter, because it removes the form from the matter it previously had: and by this the solution to the three following objections is evident.

To the other it must be said that the celestial virtues move according to the diversity of their position to different things: and therefore they have motions of declinations, ascensions, and descensions, and occultations, and preventions, and oppositions, and the like: and therefore it was necessary for them to be distant from the matter of generable and corruptible things, so that they could move all thus in different ways: and all these except the sole mover are of imperfection. For if they could do it in one way, and not with so many motions, they would be nobler: since the Philosopher says that a thing is better which has goodness in one motion, than that which has it in many motions: hence it is not necessary that God in this be assimilated to them.

To the other it must be said that this would be true if we posited only one cause: but we say that the first cause is immediately present to all, so that they can have their own works and their own causes. And if you object that in the same genus of causality there are not two immediate causes of one thing, it must be said that these are not of the same genus: because God is not commiscible with the thing, and therefore does not take away from it its own nature. To what is objected about the king, it must be said that this is true in those things which are situational: because by this is known the power of it to extend beyond its essence: hence as much as in these from this a greater and nobler power is proven, so much is proven to be a more contracted and ignoble essence, which does not follow its power. But God has all things most noble: and therefore it is necessary that the essence be commensurate to the power, since neither is limited by any place.

To the other it must be said that it is true that efficient causes in nature are ordered: and they do not touch each other except through the influence which one has over another: and this is of imperfection, as has already been said: because the essence has diminution from the power: and therefore this is not to be attributed to God.

Articulus 2 — Whether It Is The Same For God To Be Everywhere And To Be In Every Thing

Whether it is the same for God to be everywhere, and to be in every thing?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether it is the same for God to be everywhere as to be in every thing?

It seems, however, that it is not: because 1. The Philosopher says that the nature of place is marvelous: therefore it is more marvelous for something to be in a place than to be in a thing: therefore in God it is not the same to be in a place and for God to be in a thing.

1. Likewise, Not every thing is a place: therefore to be in a place and to be in a thing are diverse: therefore also in God it is not the same to say God is in a place and God is in a thing.

2. Likewise, When it is said God is in things, only the relation of cause is implied: but when it is said God is in a place, more is implied, because the nature of containment: therefore they are not the same, as it seems.

3. Likewise, Let us suppose there is no place, and yet there are celestial spirits: then it will be true that God is in every thing: yet it will not be true that God is in every place: therefore they are not the same.

4. Likewise, These two modes are converted upon themselves, God is in things, and all things are in God, as is held from the premises, and from those things which are said here: for every thing which is from God is in God, and God is in that thing which is from Him: but I cannot thus say, God is in every place: therefore every place is in Him: therefore it is not the same mode of understanding, and the same connotation here and there, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. In the Text it is held that it is the same for God to be everywhere as to be in every located thing.

1. Likewise, In what sense is it said that God is everywhere? For either this is said properly, or through cause. If properly, then the properties of place are referred to Him. But these are the properties of place, to contain, to terminate, to preserve: none of which is fitting to place in comparison to God. Therefore this is said only through the causing and conserving cause: but in the same way it is said to be in every thing: therefore it is the same for God to be in every place and in every thing.

Solution. In my judgment, it is not the same for God to be everywhere and for God to be in every thing: just as the relation of cause through the essence of causing and conserving the thing to the conserved is not the same, and the relation of place to that from which it has the power of containing the located: for when it is said, He is everywhere, or in every place, God is noted to be in the place as holding the place in being, and giving it the power of containment: but God does not give the power of containment to every thing in which He is, but He gives it to those things which are proper to His conservation.

Therefore it must be said to the FIRST and SECOND, that the Master does not intend that those two are the same, but that one follows from the other: because if He is in every thing, since place is a thing, it follows that He is in every place: but yet a different relation is implied in the preposition here and there.

To the other it must be said, that God is said to be in things as causing and conserving through the presence of His essence and power: but beyond this a special effect is added, when it is said to be in a place, namely because He gives the place to contain the located and to preserve.

To the fourth it must be said, that the properties of place are not referred to Him except as to a cause: and yet, as already said, something else is connoted when it is said, God is in a place, and God is in a thing.

Articulus 3 — Whether It Is The Same For God To Be In Every Place, And Everywhere, And Wheresoever

ARTICULUS

Whether it is the same for God to be in every place, and everywhere, and wherever?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether it is the same for God to be in every place, and everywhere, and wherever?

It seems that it is so: because

1. Each of these terms expresses the whole in a place: therefore it is the same that is expressed by each of these terms.

1. Likewise, by each of these terms the same is connoted, because the place has being and the power of containing from God existing in it: therefore it seems that in all these the same is expressed.

ON THE CONTRARY:

1. Anselm says that in every place is that which is commensurate with any place: but God, since He is indivisible, is not commensurate with any place, and yet He is everywhere, as Augustine says: therefore it is not the same to be everywhere and to be in every place.

1. Likewise, God is wholly everywhere: yet He is not properly said to be wholly in every place, because He is not extended by spatial magnitude, as Augustine says: therefore it is clear that these two are not the same, as it seems.

Solution. To this, without prejudice, it must be said that, considering subtly, they are not the same. For there is a comparison to ubi, which is not a comparison to place properly speaking: just as the comparison of the first movable is to ubi through motion, although it is not compared to place: because it is neither in place, nor moved in place properly speaking, except as the Philosopher says near the end of the sixth Physics, that it is moved in place according to form, and not according to subject: and this more indicates a relation to ubi than to place. Hence, to be in every place expresses the whole of place with the distinction of place and the relation of the located to the place. But everywhere expresses the whole of ubi itself, not so expressly importing the distinction of the parts of ubi, and of that which is in place to the located. And we can take a likeness of this. For just as it is in distributed universals, so also it is in distributive signs. However, I can consider the universal as a simple essence, or as a nature capable of being multiplied, or as a nature already actually communicated, multiplied, and distinct: therefore it expresses the simple essence of ubi itself or nature: but the syllabic addition which is added, adds communicability: but by saying wherever, distinct multiplication by parts is added, and thus it also expresses being in every place. Hence, this is less improper, God is everywhere, than this, God is wherever, or in every place: yet both are found among the Saints.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that although each of these terms expresses the whole in place: yet it is not expressed in the same mode of signifying: and therefore they are not equally improper expressions.

To the other it must be said, that the same is noted in all, but with greater and lesser distinction.

Articulus 4 — Whether It Belongs To God From Eternity To Be Everywhere And In Every Thing

Whether it is fitting for God to be everywhere from eternity, and in every thing?

Fourthly, it remains to be asked, Whether it is fitting for Him to be everywhere from eternity, and in every thing?

It seems, however, that it is so: because 1. Whenever there is a relation of the caused to the cause, then there is also a relation of the cause to the caused, or perhaps prior: but because of the relation of the caused to the cause, all things are said to be in God from eternity: therefore much more because of the relation of the cause to the caused, God will be said to be everywhere from eternity, and in every thing, as it seems.

1. Likewise, If to be everywhere says nothing but to give the power of containing in every place, since from eternity He is able to give such power, He will be said to be everywhere from eternity.
2. Likewise, If because of the power of conserving He is said to be in every thing, since from eternity He has such power, it seems that from eternity He is in every thing.
3. Likewise, From eternity He is in every thing that is, because He is in Himself: therefore from eternity He is everywhere, because to be everywhere is to be in every thing that is. If perhaps you say that it is equivocal for God to be in every thing that is from eternity, and for God to be in every thing. This is nothing: because one reason is universal in all past, present, and future things: and it would be one even in eternal things, if from eternity there had been another: therefore to be everywhere or in every thing is not said equivocally in those.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: When it is said, God is in every thing, the extent of the divine essence is signified, which is its magnitude, as was held above: and the effect of conservation in being is signified: but that effect was not from eternity: therefore neither was God in every thing from eternity. If perhaps you say, as some wish to defend, that this is true, God is everywhere from eternity: but not this, God is in every thing from eternity. On the contrary: When it is said, God is everywhere, here similarly the effect is connoted which is the conferring of place, so that it may have the power of containing: but this effect was not from eternity: therefore this is false, God was everywhere from eternity.

Solution. In my judgment, both are false: and this namely, God is in every thing from eternity: and this, God is everywhere from eternity, as the last reasons prove.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that God is not said to be in things in the same way as things are in Him: because when things are said to be in God Himself, by this the existence of things is not posited: but when He is said to be in things, things are posited to actually exist because of the connoted effect: whence this proposition, whenever there is a relation of the caused to the cause, etc., is understood of the caused existing in the nature of the caused, and not in the nature of the cause: otherwise it is false.

To the other, it must be said that God is not said to be everywhere or in things from the power of conserving, but from the act.

To the last, it must be said that this is true, that from eternity He is in every thing that is, because He is in Himself: but it does not follow: therefore from eternity He is in every thing: and there is a fallacy of the qualified to the simple: for in the first, the term "thing" is restricted by the implication placed around it to stand for eternal things only, and afterwards it is inferred as if it were held absolutely for all.

Articulus 5 — Whether God Is Well Said To Be In Things In Five Modes

Whether God is rightly said to be in things in five ways?

Then it is questioned concerning those things which are said in the Text: and first concerning this which is said, there, A, He is present, potentially, essentially in every nature, etc.

It seems that this is nothing to be said: because
1. Either these modes are taken on the part of God who is present, or they are taken on the part of the creature in which He is present. If on the part of God: since He is related in one way to everything that is, it seems that there are not five modes as determined. But if on the part of the creature: this seems insufficient:

because that which operates in one creature does not operate in another: and thus there will be infinite modes, and not only five, as is touched upon here.

1. Likewise, when it is said, God is present through grace: either this adds something on the part of God, or it only denotes an effect connoted on our part. If in the first way: then God is related to things in a deformed manner, which is heretical: because thus He would be multiform. If in the second way: then with respect to Him it is the same to be present through essence and through grace: and thus it is not a special mode.
2. Likewise, the relation is of the caused to the cause, just as of the cause to the caused: therefore, since in one way things are in God only, it seems that in one way and not five God is in things.
3. Furthermore, what is it to be present, potentially, essentially God in things? If you say, as it seems to imply in the Text, that this is because essence is from His essence, and the power of the thing from His power: then the third cannot be adapted unless you say that the presence of the thing is from His presence: but this is nothing: because not every thing is present to itself, since to be present to itself implies self-knowledge.

Likewise, let us circumscribe the power of the thing and the presence: then the power of the thing will not be from the power of God, nor the presence from the presence: and yet God will still be in the essence of the thing essentially, present, potentially; therefore, that solution is nothing, as it seems.

1. But if you say that these are taken according to the attributes of the persons: this again seems to be nothing. Let the attributes themselves be considered: then essentially it can be appropriated to no person. And if you say that power is attributed to the Father, and presence to the Son by reason of knowledge: then the attribute of the Holy Spirit is not found.

Likewise, with the persons circumscribed, God would still be in all things essentially, present, potentially.

Likewise, the Father is in all things essentially, present, potentially: and similarly the Son, and similarly the Holy Spirit: therefore these do not pertain to the persons, as they are distinguished by proper or appropriated attributes, but insofar as they communicate in the divine essence.

Solution. It must be said without prejudice, that these modes by which God is in the creature can be varied in three ways. In one way on the part of the connoted thing: because according to what is in the exemplar, so it flows into the exemplified, namely that the essence of the thing is from the essence, and the species of the thing from the presence: which species flows from the idea which is the species in the divine mind, and the power of the thing is from the power, as is implied in the Text below. In another way, we can say that in God five are taken, namely substance: or essence apart from the understanding of the persons, and three persons, and the fifth which is essence in the person. We can therefore say that to be in things essentially is taken according to the essence considered in itself. But to be in things through power is taken according to the attribute of the Father, which is power. But to be in things present is taken according to the attribute of the Son, which is knowledge. But to be in the Saints through indwelling grace is taken according to the attribute of the Holy Spirit, which is goodness. But to be in the man Christ through union is taken according to the essence in the person, because the essence in the person is incarnate.

But if you object that if the persons are not understood, God will still be in things essentially, present, potentially. It must be said that if the persons are not understood, the attributes of the persons will still remain: and through them it will be the same: because the essence is still before power, and the three, namely wisdom, power, and goodness, will make the essence create creatures, and gratify the rational: and thus that acceptance is still preserved.

But if we wish to speak more subtly and more to the point, we will say that the simpler something is, the greater its scope: and that which is at the end of simplicity encompasses all things: therefore, to be God everywhere essentially is caused by simplicity: and this Augustine says in the Text. But the Philosopher says that the subtle is penetrative of parts, and of the part of parts. But nothing is more subtle than the most simple: whence the Apostle says to the Hebrews 4:12, that the word of God is living, and effective, and more penetrating than any two-edged sword: and reaching unto the division of soul and spirit, of joints also and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. And it follows, v. 13: All things are naked and open to His eyes. Therefore, presence is from penetrating subtlety, so that neither intrinsically nor extrinsically anything is hidden from the thing. Similarly, the first has to influence all power over all following: and with the power of the first abstracted, it is abstracted from all others: because the Philosopher says that without the first mover none of the secondaries moves. Let us say therefore, that two act under God: purpose or free will, and nature: and by comparison to nature He is present essentially, potentially, present: and they are reduced to simplicity, subtlety, and pure reason of moving according to the cause taken by reason of understanding. But to purpose it is compared as elevating it above nature: and this does not happen except through grace, and therefore in that it is through indwelling grace: and because purpose is also nature, therefore it has the three modes presupposed by which it is in nature. But the mode by which it is in the man Christ is special and miraculous.

Having these, it must be answered to the first, that these modes are taken on the part of both, namely God and the creature. And what is objected, that God is related in one way to everything that is, it must be said that this is understood in such a way that He is related in a mode not varied by essence, or by something added to Himself: yet He is not related in the same reason of exemplar to everything that is, as is easily evident to anyone.

To the other it must be said, that when it is said that He is present through indwelling grace, another connoted thing is noted which more elevates nature, and another reason of exemplar is noted, namely of good will, because the Spirit is given with His gifts, although He is not other than He was before, yet He is given for another than He was previously held: if however it must be conceded that He was previously held: for they do not have the Holy Spirit in whom He is essentially, present, potentially: and although one does not add another thing above another, yet it adds another mode of signifying, which suffices in divine things, as has often been said.

To the other it must be said, that although the relation of the caused to the cause as to being present is in one way, yet it is not so conversely: and this happens because the cause does not need the caused: and therefore it suffices to signify that the caused was in the cause only: but the caused needs the cause much more, and therefore that respect is reduced to more modes by which the cause is in the caused because of the need of the caused.

To the other it must be said, that I well concede that that solution solves less well.

To the other it must be said, that if they ought to be taken according to the attributes of the persons, it seems to me that it should proceed as we said at the beginning of the solution: because unless someone wishes to expound forcibly, he will not be able to reduce the mode which is essentially to be present, to another person.

And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 6 — Whether God Is In Things In Many Modes, As One Way In The Temple, Another In Heaven, Another In The Soul

Whether God is in things in many ways, as differently in the temple, differently in heaven, differently in the soul?

Whether God is in things in many ways, as differently in the temple, differently in heaven, differently
in the soul?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, A, towards the middle: Whom he himself as the most beloved temple, etc.

For it seems that God is in things in many ways, and in heaven differently than in the temple, and in this differently than in other places, and in the just soul differently than in others.

Solution. I well concede that God is in different things in many ways, and it can thus be said (as the Saints say) that God is in heaven, as in which the works of his glory shine forth: in the world, however, as creator and governor: in the Angel, as savor and adornment: in the Church, as the father of the family in the house: in the faithful soul, as the bridegroom in the bridal chamber: everywhere, however, essentially by conserving and sustaining, potentially by presiding and governing, presentially by knowing: by grace, however, inhabiting in the just: by efficacy in the sacraments: by mystery and sign in the dove, and breath, and fiery tongues:
as in the place of propitiation in the temple: whence, Genesis 28:16: Truly the Lord is in this place. And, there, verse 17:
How awesome is this place! This is none other than the house of God, and the gate of heaven.
By union, however, in the whole Christ: but to the soul alone in hell, to the body alone in the sepulcher. And in many other ways which anyone, if he thinks by himself, can find.

Articulus 7 — Whether God Is Everywhere And In All Time; And, Whether It Must Be Granted That God Is Here, Or There, Or Elsewhere Than Here

Whether God is everywhere, and at every Time? and, Whether it must be conceded that God is here, or there, or elsewhere than here?

Whether God is everywhere, and at all times?
And, Whether it should be conceded that God is here, or there, or elsewhere than here?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, A, towards the middle: Hilary most openly teaches that God is everywhere.

For it seems that this is false: because
1. Either it is understood properly that God is everywhere, or by metaphor. If it is said properly, it seems not to be fitting: because Anselm says in the Monologion that nothing is in place and time, unless it follows the laws of place and time: but God does not follow the laws of place and time, since He is not measured by anything as being at rest, nor as in motion: therefore God is neither in place, nor in time.

1. Likewise, Anselm, in the same place: Therefore, in no place or time is the supreme essence said to be: because it is contained by nothing else at all: therefore it is clear, that it is not properly compared to place. But if you say that it is compared to place by metaphor. On the contrary: Let the properties of place be taken, which are to contain, to preserve, to circumscribe, to terminate, to be immobile in itself, but to be moved locally by it and from it: none of these can be fitting: therefore it seems that by metaphor the nature of place does not fit God.

Likewise, Anselm in the Monologion: If the manner of speaking would allow, it would be more fittingly said to be with place, or with time, than in place or in time: for more is signified to be contained when it is said to be in another, than when it is said to be with another: therefore it is clear that the properties of place cannot be transferred to God.

1. Likewise, if it is said to be everywhere, or in place, because place is present to Him, as Anselm says, and He is present in every place: then it seems that this also fits others, just as matter is absent from no place, but is present to all places: and thus this will not be fitting to God alone.
2. Likewise, the Philosopher says in the fourth book of Physics, that we would not seek place, unless there were motion: since therefore no motion fits God, it seems that no place fits Him.
3. Likewise, to whomever the nature of something is repugnant, to the same the universality of that nature is repugnant: as if a man is not a donkey, he cannot be every donkey, although perhaps the converse of the proposition is not true, that to whomever the universality of something is repugnant, to the same the nature of that which is distributed is repugnant: but to God (as has already been shown) the nature of place is repugnant: therefore also everywhere, which says the universe in place, will be repugnant to Him, as it seems.

4. Likewise, since there is a double place, as the Philosopher says, namely place as a vessel, and place as place. Place as a vessel, as the ship is the place of the sailor. Place as place, as the river is the place of the sailor's navigation: will both be transferred to God, so that it is said to be everywhere, because it is in place in both ways mentioned? If it is said that yes. On the contrary: Place as a vessel is moved, and what is placed in it is transferred, as wine in an urn: therefore God is transferred from place to place, and creatures are transferred in Him. But if He is in place which is place as place: then He Himself is moved from place to place, which is heresy, which in the following part of this distinction is disproved. But if you say that He is neither such a place, nor is in such a place: then it follows inevitably, that He is not everywhere: and this is denied by the Saints in the Letter.

Further it is asked, Whether it should be conceded that God is here or there, or here or elsewhere, or elsewhere than here?

However, it seems that yes: because
1. As Anselm says in the Monologion, not because He is present to this place, therefore is He prohibited from being present to that or that place or time simultaneously and similarly. Therefore it seems that He is here and elsewhere, and elsewhere than here.

1. Likewise, Anselm, in the same place: For He is in no way prohibited or compelled by the law of places or times to be or not to be somewhere or sometime, which in no way encloses His being within place and time: but God does not enclose His being within place: therefore He is not compelled when He is here, not to be elsewhere: therefore He is here, and elsewhere than here, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
Here and elsewhere indicate the distinction of place, and elsewhere than here indicates the comparison of place: but the distinction of places posits the distinction of what is placed, since in no genus are two places simply simultaneously and at once of one number of things: but such a distinction does not fall into God: therefore it seems that such things should not be conceded.

Solution. I say without prejudice, because when it is said that God is in place, and what is placed in place, the relation of this preposition "in" is taken equivocally: which is thus proved. There is one comparison of spiritual things to corporeal things according to being in, and another of corporeal things to corporeal things. For if I say, wine is in the bottle, it is a comparison of corporeal to corporeal by being in: and therefore in such things those are most properly said to be in which are in as what is placed in place, the relation of place to what is placed is understood there: and the containment which the preposition imports is posited around that to which something is in: and to be contained and to be terminated is posited around that which is in. But when a comparison of spiritual things to corporeal things is made, the whole contrary is made: as when it is said, the soul is in the body: for then the containment which the preposition notes is posited around that which is in, and to be contained and to be terminated is posited around that to which it is said to be in. Similarly therefore when God is said to be everywhere or in every place (because now I do not make force between those two, because above the difference is shown) here a comparison of spiritual to corporeal is made: therefore the spiritual will be the containing, and yet it will be said to be in: and the corporeal will be the contained, and yet it will be said that something is in it. But if you ask, what is the reason, that the containing is said to be in, and the contained is said to which another is in? I say, that every containing in being is intrinsic, because they do not contain in being the external things of a thing except by intrinsic containings in being: and therefore when the spiritual contains in being, it is necessary that it itself be signified to be within. Thus therefore we say God is everywhere, and in every place, by this that He gives being to place and the containing power: and therefore Boethius and Anselm who thus explain, that He is everywhere, because He is present to every place, do not say the whole, but part of this predication, God is everywhere.

According to this therefore it can be answered to the first objections: because we can say, that most properly and more than properly in this way it is said that God is in every place, and also metaphorically: because in this it agrees with what is placed that it is in, because it fills the place of this kind with containing power and the nature of place: but not as what is placed, because then it would not be metaphor, but property.

To the other it must be said, that Anselm intends, that He is neither included nor measured by place and time.

To the other it must be said, that matter is not thus present to place: because it does not have distinct being in place: but the first termination is through form, and through that it is referred to place: because the Philosopher says, that the same is the motion to form, and to place.

To the other it must be said, that place as immobile to which and from which motion is made, is sought because of motion: but place as surrounding and defining only, is not sought because of motion: because the Philosopher says, that even to mathematicians place must be given, which however are abstracted from motion and from matter: and therefore that reason does not compel.

To the other it must be said, that to whomever the nature of something is repugnant, according to which its nature is repugnant to it, according to the same mode the universality of that nature is repugnant to it. But to be in place according to the inherence of where, which is signified when it is said to be in place, is repugnant to God, because He is not circumscribed by place: but to be in place causally fits God, and in this way it also fits God to be everywhere.

To the other it must be said, that nothing prohibits, that God is in both places in the manner mentioned: because from this it does not follow, that He Himself is changed, as is clear from what was said before.

To that which is further asked, in my judgment it can be said, that these expressions are less proper, as the objection proves: but because this is found in the Letter below, that He is wholly elsewhere, and Anselm says this, these expressions must be received: but then what is ignoble must be separated, so that distinction and discretion signified are not referred to God. However, that is most improper, God is elsewhere than here, because in such a comparison, the adverb is accustomed to note the relation between the affirmation of a thing in another place, and the negation in this place: whence of the absent we say, that he is elsewhere and not here, unless a conjunction is added coupling thus, God is elsewhere also than here: for then by the grace of coupling which wishes to note coupling among similars, it would be noted to be in both places, and to be absent from neither.

Articulus 8 — Whether It Belongs To God Alone To Be Everywhere; Then It Is Asked About That Which Is Said There

Whether it is fitting for God alone to be everywhere?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there,

Whether it is fitting for God alone to be everywhere?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there,

A, towards the end: Why is it everywhere, which is proper to divinity, etc.

1. For it seems that this is false by what is held in the first of the Posterior Analytics concerning the universal, that since it is of all, and always, and is everywhere: therefore it is not proper to God, because what is proper is that which is fitting to one and only one.
2. Likewise, the Gloss on that of Psalm 147:15: His word runs swiftly: says that swiftness is everywhere, not only in horses or men. But if you say that the universal is everywhere not simply, but in each of its particulars: and this is to be everywhere according to its scope, which nevertheless does not encompass all. Against this, let us take the universal which is from the reduction of all effects to the first cause: for this universal will be everywhere, and always: because it is of God and every creature: therefore it is not proper to God.
3. Likewise, let us suppose there is one sole substance: therefore that substance will be in all in which God is: therefore it is not proper to God.
4. Likewise, let us suppose there is one sole man: his soul will be in the whole body wholly: and there is no place except of the body: therefore it is everywhere like God: because with such a supposition made, God also then will not be in more.
5. Likewise, let us suppose that one body is of such dimension, that it fills the whole concavity of the circle of the world, that body will be everywhere, as it seems: therefore this is not proper to God.

Solution. It must be said that these and all other such sophisms are solved by the fact that the term "everywhere" is taken equivocally, when it is said that a universal or some common thing is everywhere, and God is everywhere. For that which is referred to place is distinct. But that which is referred as to a subject or suppositum is referred to that in which it has being in nature and is undivided from it: and in this way the universal is everywhere, and always: but God is in the first way, because He, distinct from all, is in all, giving to place the power of containing by which it is place, and to the located the power of filling by which it is located.

To that which is objected, that one sole substance is posited: it must be said that it will not be said to be everywhere, but in one sole place: because although there is no place more than this, yet there can be more things in which it is not: but there cannot be things in which God is not: and this is the true solution. It can also be said that even then it is not wholly everywhere: because it is not wholly in the whole place, and in each part of the place: but God is thus everywhere.

To the other it must be said, that the soul does not have a comparison to the body as to place, but as to matter and mobile; and therefore the supposition is false in the argument.

To the other it must be said, that even if there is one such body, this will not be wholly in each particle of place: and therefore the instance does not hold.

Articulus 9 — Whether To Be In By Grace Is To Be In Simply, Or Only In A Certain Respect

Whether to be present through grace is to be present simply, or only in a certain respect?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there,

In the Saints indeed He dwells, in whom He is through grace.

1. For it seems from this that to be present simply is said to be present through grace: and to be present essentially is said to be present in a certain respect to God: for it is to dwell in someone, where He remains simply: but not to dwell, where He does not remain, except in a certain respect.
2. Likewise, Where someone dwells, someone remains there: therefore it seems, that if He does not dwell, that He passes: and thus God would pass from those in whom He is commonly through essence, presence, and power.
3. But on the contrary: The being of a thing and well-being, are as simply and in a certain respect: therefore since through this that God is present essentially, presentially, potentially, He gives being: but through this that He is present through grace, He gives well-being, it seems that to be present essentially, presentially, potentially, is to be present simply: but to be present through grace, is to be present only in a certain respect.

Solution. It must be said, that to be present through grace, says simply, and nobly to be present.

To the first, it must be said, that to be present through grace supposes to be present commonly: and it is a perfection with respect to it on the part of the creature to be perfected, although not on the part of God perfecting.

To the other, it must be said, that the dwelling which is implied through grace is not opposed to transience, but is said from the rest of the will effectively: because namely it makes the will of the Saints through grace remain and rest in itself: and this does not make to be present in a common way.

To the other, it must be said, that although to be present in a common way gives being, nevertheless it does not give being except naturally: and this is not complete with the best completion: and therefore it is better to be present through grace than only in a common way: nevertheless I do not say, that to be present in a common way, says to be present in a certain respect: because both are to be present simply, although they do not connote equally good effects.

Articulus 10 — Whether It Is The Same To Be In Essentially, By Presence, And By Power

Whether it is the same to be essentially, presentially, and potentially present?

Whether it is the same to be essentially, presentially, and potentially present?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, B, around the middle: Thus also God, since He is in all things essentially and wholly, etc.

For it can be asked, Whether it is the same to be essentially present as to be presentially present and potentially present?

For if it is the same: then it seems that it would have sufficed to say essentially present, and it would not have been necessary to add presentially and potentially. However, it seems that it is the same according to Boethius, Anselm, and Augustine, who explain one for the other, and through the other.

Further, it is asked, Whether it is better for the creature to be in God, or for God to be in the creature?

1. However, it seems that it is better for the creature to be in God: because this is eternal, but the other is from time.
2. Likewise, the creature in God is the creative essence, but the creator in the creature leaves behind the created essence: therefore it is nobler and better for the creature to be in the Creator, than conversely.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
Everything simply is better than something according to a certain respect: but the creature in the Creator is only according to a certain respect: however, when the Creator is in the creature, He has being simply: therefore it is better for the Creator to be in the creature, than conversely.

The solution is to say that questions of this kind are of little value.

To the first, I concede well that it is not the same: and how these modes vary is sufficiently clear. To what is objected against, it must be said that the Saints explain one through the other, by the fact that one follows from the other: for to be presentially and potentially present, it follows to be essentially present: because otherwise in God nature would be more contracted than power, as was explained above.

To the other, it must be said that there is no comparison: because to be present is said equivocally: because the creature is in the Creator only according to a certain respect, namely according to the idea, as a cause in a cause operating through intellect: but the Creator is in the creature containing and preserving and filling: and therefore it is of no value.

But if you ask, What is better and truer for the creature to be? To this it was solved above in distinction XXXV.

Articulus 11 — Whether God And The Holy Spirit Are In The Devil And The Damned, And Can Be With The Wicked And The Just

Whether God and the Holy Spirit are in the devil and the damned, and can be with the wicked and the unjust?

ARTICULUS XI,
Whether God and the Holy Spirit are in the devil and the damned, and can be with the wicked and the unjust?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, B, around the middle: But the wicked, although they are there where he is, who is absent nowhere, etc.

1. For if God is in all things: therefore he is in the devil and in the damned: and since the Holy Spirit is everywhere and in all things, the Holy Spirit will be in the devil and in the damned, which even the hearing of the faithful abhors.
2. Furthermore, it seems that God is with the wicked: because Augustine says thus in the book of Confessions: You were with me, and I was not with you: and he speaks of himself as he was in a state of wickedness.
3. Likewise, according to the customary mode of the habit of this proposition, it seems that it cannot be said that God is with the just: because it is thus given as a rule, that the preposition, with, denotes such an association: and it places principalship in the ablative to which it serves: whence we say, that the soldier is with the king, and not conversely: therefore it seems that the Saints are with God, and not he with the Saints, nor he with the impious.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that God is in all things: yet there are certain names which speak of a thing according to what it is substantially, but under deformity, such as the devil, fornication, and the damned: and in such things it ought not to be said, God is, unless a determination is added, namely that God is in the demon insofar as he is by nature, and similarly in others. Although in some way it is said that God is in the demon, yet it ought not to be conceded that the Holy Spirit is in the demon: because the Holy Spirit is present through inspiration and holiness: and therefore it properly belongs to him to be present through grace: and if it is said to be present in others, a determination ought to be added, that the Holy Spirit as God is in all things.

To the other it must be said, that with is said in many ways: for sometimes it denotes simple association, and thus God is in all things, and all things with him, unless by the name itself they speak of a separation of society, such as the demon, and fornication, and suchlike: but sometimes it denotes association and principalship in the ablative, and then the Saints are said to be with him, and not conversely, as the objection proves. But sometimes it denotes association and cooperation: and thus God is said to be with the wicked because of presence, and not the wicked with him, because they do not cooperate with him: but thus he is said to be with the Saints, and the Saints with him.

Divisio Textus

But if you ask, where did God dwell before the Saints existed?

Here begins the second part of the first part of this distinction: in which the Master raises three questions against the determinations in order in three chapters: one of which is, where did He dwell before the world? Secondly, he excludes the error of those saying that the soul so filled the body that entrance was not open to God, and they were the Tertullian heretics, who said that God was of human form, and the soul also of human form: and to have a head in the head of the body, and feet in the feet, and so concerning others: and this begins, there, D, It must also be seated, because as Augustine says, etc. In the third, he inquires, How does He dwell in some not knowing Him, and in some knowing Him He does not dwell, there, E, That also is marvelous, etc.

Articulus 12 — Whether God Is In Himself And Dwells In Himself; And, Whether It Can Be Conceded That God Is Nowhere, And That He Is Elsewhere Than In Himself

Whether God is in Himself and dwells in Himself? And,
Whether it can be conceded that God is nowhere, and that He is elsewhere than in Himself?

Whether God is in Himself and dwells in Himself? And,
Whether it can be conceded that God is nowhere, and that He is elsewhere than in Himself?

A doubt arises, however, whether God is in Himself, or dwells in Himself?

1. It seems, however, that He is not: for prepositions are transitive: therefore they require diversity: but God has no diversity in relation to Himself: therefore He is not in Himself.
2. Likewise, the Philosopher says that all posited that nothing is in itself: therefore neither is God in Himself.

Further, it is asked whether this should be conceded, that God is nowhere?

It seems that it should not: because the contrary is in the Letter, where Augustine says that no one dares to say that God is nowhere. But on the contrary: What is not properly in any place, that is nowhere properly: God is not properly in any place: therefore He is nowhere properly.

Likewise, it is further asked whether it should be conceded that God is elsewhere than in Himself?

It seems that it should: because He is in all creatures, which are not Himself: therefore He is in others than in Himself: therefore He is elsewhere than in Himself.

Further, it is asked whether it should be conceded that He is in another than in Himself?

And it seems that it should: because He is in the stone: therefore He is in another than in Himself.

Solution. It must be said that God is in Himself.

To that which is objected against, it must be said that for the transition of the preposition, the diversity of the mode of understanding according to attributes suffices, so that it is said to be in Himself, according to which He is called the heaven of God, and God completing the heaven: for thus He is heaven according to which He contains Himself, so that nothing of Him is outside Himself: but the contained is that which is God, which is within His majesty, and the ambit of essence adequate to Him.

To the other, it must be said that nothing is in itself in one and the same way accepted: because thus the same would be the container and the contained, and by the same reason.

To that which is further asked, it must be said that this should not be conceded, God is nowhere: because as said above, it is proper to God to be everywhere: and therefore in this way it does not befit Him by translation that is to be present and to be in place and located, giving to place to be and to contain, and to the located to fill and to be: whence the objection made above supposes a falsehood: but this is true, that it does not befit Him to be in place as a located body seeks place.

To the other, it must be said that that should be conceded: because the comparative adverb places a comparison between those things which are equivocal: because there is not the same relation of the preposition when it is said God is in Himself, and when it is said to be in all things, as is clear from the aforesaid. And if there were the same relation, it would seem to be noted that He is elsewhere, and not in Himself: and this is false.

To the other, it must be said that I would well concede this, God is in another and in Himself: but not this, God is in another than in Himself: and the cause of this has been said: because comparison seeks a univocal reason in the compared: and that is not here. Moreover, it seeks one negative, and the other affirmative. Whence it seems to follow that He would not be in Himself, if it were said to be in another than in Himself: as it is in others, when it is said, Socrates is elsewhere than in Paris, or Socrates is in another thing than in the Church, or than he is himself.

Articulus 13 — Whether God Is Well Said To Dwell With Himself And To Be With Himself

Whether God is rightly said to dwell with Himself, and to be with Himself?

Whether God is rightly said to dwell with Himself, and to be with Himself?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said there, C, towards the end: He dwells with Himself, and is with Himself.

For the Gloss says upon the beginning of John 1:1: The Word was with God, as one with another: therefore it seems that the term "with" denotes personal or substantial distinction: but God is not thus distinguished from Himself: therefore it is not properly said that He is with Himself.

Solution. To this it can be said that the Gloss at the beginning of John does not take personal distinction from the force of the preposition, but from the property of the Son which is signified there, when it is said, the Word: and therefore when the preposition is taken without those in divine matters, it does not denote such distinction: hence it ought to be explained here as if negatively thus, with Himself, that is, not outside Himself, or with another.

Articulus 14 — Whether A Spirit, Both Created And Uncreated, Can Be Said To Be In A Place; And, Whether Two Spirits Can Be In The Same Place

Whether a Spirit, both created and uncreated, can be said to be in a place? And, whether two spirits can be in the same place?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said there,

It is said, unless most foolishly, that the Holy Spirit does not have a place, etc.

1. For it seems from what is said here, that nothing prevents being in the same place except a body to a body, because two bodies cannot be in the same place, as the Philosophers prove: therefore, according to this, two created spirits can be in the same place. And if two: therefore infinite, or all, because there is no greater reason for two than for infinite: but this is denied by all commonly.

2. Likewise, if two created spirits cannot be in the same place: either this is because they are spirits, or because they are created. If because they are spirits: therefore the spirit which is God, and the spirit which is the soul, cannot be in the same place, which is false. But if because they are created: therefore the soul and the body, since both are created, cannot be in the same place, as it seems, which again is false: therefore two spirits can be in the same place.

3. Likewise, spirits and body are of greater composition than spirit and spirit: if therefore spirit and body can be in the same place: therefore much more two created spirits will be able to be in the same place, as it seems. If it is said that God and a created spirit are in the same place, but two created spirits cannot be in the same place because of confusion: this is unreasonable: because a greater distinction is required of the created to the uncreated, than of the created to the created. If therefore the created with the created cannot be in the same place because of confusion, much less will the created be able to be with the uncreated in the same.

Furthermore, nothing seems to be said, that a spirit is in a place:

1. For the Philosopher says in the fourth book of Physics, that we do not have one difference of a point and the place of a point: since therefore an Angel, or any other spirit, is more indivisible than a point, because it does not have position in the continuum which a point has, it seems that no Angel is in a place.

2. Likewise, place and time are quantities: therefore place is the boundary of the located, and not within, as is evident per se: therefore outside: therefore it is necessary that something is bounded to it contained within itself: therefore the contained will have a boundary of the same reason and quantity with it: but such a boundary is only of a quantified body: therefore nothing is in a place except a quantified body: therefore not an Angel.

3. Likewise, we can speak of place in two ways, namely mathematically, and naturally. If we speak mathematically, then it will be the center of the place and the located, and they are joined to the common boundary of the particle lo-

...[lo]cated, to which also the parts of the place are joined, as Boethius says in his commentary on the book of Categories. But in this way we cannot say that an Angel or a spirit is in a place. If, however, we speak of place physically, then place will be locating in itself by reason of some nature which it has, through which it inclines the located thing in itself in motion: just as we see a light thing ascend upward, because its species is generated and preserved there; and a heavy thing descend downward, because of the fact that it is generated there; and so again it is ridiculous to say that created spirits are in a place.

§ 4. Also, everything that determines a place for itself, determines it to an equality with itself: but nothing is equal to another, unless there is in it the same rationale of quantity that is in the other: but an Angel is not so related to a corporeal place: therefore, etc.

§ 5. Also, how great is the place of an Angel? For if it is of some quantity, then it cannot be in a smaller [place], which is false: therefore it seems that it is not in a place. If perhaps you say that it is in a place accidentally, namely by an assumed body, just as the soul is: we are not asking about this here. If however you say that it is in a place by the definition of its work, namely that its work is in this place, and not in another: according to this, God also is defined in a place, because His work is here, and not elsewhere, which is false: therefore this is not the reason why an Angel is said to be in a place.

§ Solution. It must be said that things are said to be in a place in many ways. For certain things, in themselves and according to their nature, need a preserving and containing place, such as all generable and corruptible things; and this for two reasons: of which one, and the principal one, is that the extremities of such things are determined by acting and suffering contrariety; and unless there were an extrinsic containing preserver, on account of the continuous containing of those very passions they would have a flowing away and destruction in their extremities.

§ And if you ask, whence does place have this property, that it preserves the located thing, since even the extremity of the locating body has contrariety, and so by fighting it seems rather to corrupt than to preserve? It must be said that that place which is as a locating vessel, has this from the influence of place simply [speaking]. Now place simply, insofar as it is preserving, is only twofold, namely simply up, in contact with the circumference of the sphere of the moon; and simply down, which is to be in the center, which has a nature of preserving from the whole sphere, by which it is equally regarded always. Another reason is that any thing is weaker in its extremities than it is in its internal parts; and therefore nature determines a container for it in its extremities. Speaking of place in this way, motion is to a place, and from it: and nothing is in a place, except what is generable and corruptible; nor is anything moved from it, nor to it, except what is movable by a rectilinear motion: and the sphere of the moon and all superior things are in no place in this way.

§ In another way we can speak of place insofar as it is mathematical space, as Boethius seems to mean: and thus it has the property of containing, but not preserving; because its containing will only be to encompass extrinsically; and in this way we say that all bodies are circumscribed by place, except the ultimate sphere.

§ In a third way we speak of place insofar as there is a distance of position in it, even if it does not include: and in this way we say that even the ultimate sphere is and is moved in a place according to form, and not in subject, as the Philosopher says at the end of the sixth book of the Physics. And the commentary explains that this is according as they are designated in the circumference of the circle of altitude. For in them a diverse altitude is taken according to position, although the whole subject of the sphere always remains in the same place: for as the Philosopher says, the circulation according to form taken from A is not the same as that which is taken from B, or C. In none of these ways is a created spirit said to be in a place.

§ In another way we speak of place accidentally, when we say, "While we are in a place, the accidents and forms that are in us are in the same place"; and thus again we do not say that an Angel is in a place: because thus it would always assume a body when it was in a place. But we say that an Angel is in a place definitively, and by the definition of its work: because namely the work, neither on the part of the efficient cause, nor on the part of the effect, is referred outside the place in which it is consequently; therefore the operating substance is understood to be within this place; and this is what Damascene says, that it is here in such a way that it is not elsewhere.

§ Having these things, the answer to all of that which was asked secondly about the place of an Angel, except the last point, is clear.

§ And to this it must be said that, although the work of God is defined on the part of the work worked [i.e., the effect produced], and upon what God operates, such as a man or a soul, nevertheless the working work [i.e., the operation itself] is not defined: because this is the substance of God, and it is everywhere, just as He is. But the works of an Angel are defined in a place both on the part of the operating substance, and on the part of the worked work, and on the part of that upon which or about which it operates; and place is not referred to it according to a greater or lesser quantity, but as defining, that is, distinguishing from another place.

§ To that which is first asked: Whether two spirits can be in the same place? I concede with the Doctors that they cannot; and this on account of the confusion of operations, not on account of the resistance of their nature to a corporeal place, because they do not fill it.

§ To what is objected against this, it must be said that God's working operation can neither be confused, nor discriminated: it cannot be confused, because it itself is the distinct essence of the operator, mixable with nothing; but it cannot be discriminated, because it is not referred to this place, so that the distinction of place is posited on the part of its operator, as in other things that are created: but rather it relates in one way to any place whatsoever, although places and located things do not relate in the same way to Him operating in them: and through this the solution to all the objections is clear, except to this one: whether they are impeded insofar as they are spirits, or insofar as they are created. And it must be said to this that they are impeded insofar as they are created spirits: because thus they have a limited essence, which cannot be referred to a work in every place.

Divisio Textus

§ Division of the Text

From the aforesaid it is clear that God is everywhere, etc. This is the third part of this first part, and it has three chapters: in the first of which he shows that a certain unintelligible thing is contained in these words: and this is understood as regards the spiritual things which God operates in any creature, which surpass human powers to know. In the second, he posits the diminished exposition of certain [people], there, G, Certain men, however, immense, etc. In the third, he poses a certain question, Whether He can be defiled by the filth of those in whom He is? there, H, It is also usually asked by the same ones, etc.

Articulus 15 — Whether Little Children Pertain To The Temple Of God

Whether infants belong to the temple of God?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says: Infants belong to the temple of God, etc.

For this does not seem so: because infants do not know.

§ And to this it must be said that it belongs to them through the sacrament, not from the use of grace, but from the habit [of grace]: and he calls this a gift of the Holy Spirit, not a use, because there cannot be a use unless the use of free choice exists.

Articulus 16 — Whether God Can Be Said To Be In A Place

Whether God can be said to be in a place?

Now a doubt arises concerning the first, because God does not seem to be in a place, but rather to be a place, by the fact that He contains and preserves, and the motion of hearts and of Angels is toward Him.

§ But to this it must be said that He Himself is called a spiritual place by reason of those properties: but He is said to be in a corporeal place in another comparison, which was stated above.

Articulus 17 — How God Is In All Things And Is Not Defiled

How is God in all things and not defiled?

It could also be asked, what is the cause that the soul is affected by the passions of the body joined to it, but is not defiled: while solar rays are neither affected, nor defiled, but only touch positionally; but God is neither affected, nor defiled, nor does He touch positionally, but is in all things?

§ And to this it must be said that the natural union between the soul and the body is the cause of being affected; but the fact that it does not have common matter with the body out of which it is made, this is the cause that it is not defiled. But rays are neither united, nor do they have one matter in the genus of potentiality to motion and to mutation: but nevertheless they are determined by position in themselves, if they are bodies; or accidentally, if they are not bodies: and therefore they do indeed touch, but they are neither affected, nor defiled. But God is neither united by nature, nor does He have matter, nor position: therefore He is neither affected, nor defiled, nor does He touch positionally: yet He attains by His essence, presence, and power powerfully from end to end as regards effect, and disposes all things sweetly as regards the participation of good, and gives to each according to its capacity.

Articulus 18 — Whether It Is The Same To Be In A Place And To Be Local; And, How They Belong To God, To The Created Spirit, And To The Body

Whether to be in a place, and to be local, are the same? And, how do they apply to God, to a created spirit, and to a body?

Whether to be in a place, and to be local, are the same? And, how do they apply to God, to a created spirit, and to a body?

A doubt arises, Whether to be in a place, and to be local, are the same?

§ Now it seems that they are: because § 1. To be local is nothing but by the relation of place to the located thing: and this relation is implied when it is said, "this is in a place": therefore it seems that these two are the same.

§ 2. Also, to be in time is to be temporal: therefore since place is an extrinsic measuring quantity, to be in a place is nothing but to be local.

§ Also, to be in time is to be measured by a certain part of time, as the Philosopher says: therefore to be in a place will be to be measured by place: similarly therefore, since every such thing is local because it is measured by place, to be local and to be in a place will be the same.

§ 3. Also, since place is not a substance, it will be an accident: but an accident denominates that of which it is an accident: since therefore place is not an accident except of the located thing, as it seems, it will denominate it: but that denominative is implied by "local": therefore it seems that to be in a place and to be local are the same.

§ 4. Also, whatever is in a place, is located in a place: but whatever is located in a place, is local: therefore whatever is in a place, is local. The first is self-evident. The second is proved: because to be local is attributed to nothing except through the fact that it is located in a place. But to the contrary is everything that is held in the Text: because God is in a place, and yet He is not local in a place.

§ Solution. It must be said that to be in a place, and to be local, are not the same: because to be in a place belongs by priority and posteriority and equivocally to three things, namely to God, to a created spirit, and to a body: for if we say that God is in a place by taking the rationale of the saying from the property of place, then God will be in a place equivocally, and an Angel, and a body: because God is in a place by giving being to the place and the power of containing; but a created spirit will be in a place posteriorly, because namely it is so in one that it is not in others; whereas a body will be essentially in a place to which we assign a beginning, a middle, and an end according to place. If however we take the property of the located thing, when we say that God is in a place: then it does not belong to God properly to be in a place, but by a transferral, which transferral is made from the property of the located thing by which it fills the place: because God fills spiritually, not making distance like a body, nor distinguished in a place like a spirit: but through the fact that He is not lacking in influencing being to the place and to the located thing and all the powers of both. But to be local, according to Anselm in the Monologion, is to follow the laws of place: and the laws of place are to terminate the located thing by distinguishing and containing extrinsically, so that nothing of the located thing is outside the place: and this law is followed both by a created spirit and by a body. Another law is to circumscribe according to parts of distance and of power: so that a part of the located thing is in a part of the place, and the whole in the whole: and this law is followed only by a body, but nevertheless differently, as was held above through a distinction. Now place still has other laws, namely to preserve, to be immobile unless perhaps accidentally, to have connaturality with the located thing, and the like: of which laws we have no need here.

§ To the first therefore it must be said that this is true, that the laws of locality, so to speak, are only from the relation of place to the located thing: but the relation of place, as has been held, is not the same to everything that is said to be in it: nor is it true that everything that is in a place is as something located in a place: for what is located properly is nothing but a body; although nevertheless a created spirit is in a place definitively, and is not located, nor local, except in a qualified sense, as he says in the Text.

§ To the next it must be said that this is false, that to be in time is to be temporal: because the Philosopher says that to be in time is said in many ways: for the 'now' is in time, as the substance of time; and the 'before' and 'after' in time, as the parts of time; and the 'much' and 'little' in time, as passions: but this is true, that to be in time as in a measuring thing, is to be temporal: and similarly I well concede that to be in a place as in a measuring thing, is to be local: but through this it will not be held that to be in a place in any way whatsoever is to be local.

§ To the next it must be said that place is an accident not existing through its essence in the located thing, but in the locating thing: for place, according to its essence, is the surface of the body encompassing and including another body: but even if it were to denominate the located thing, it would not be necessary that it denominate the being that is in the place: because to be in a place and to be located are not the same, as has been held.

§ To the next it must be said that this proposition is false, "Whatever is in a place, is located in a place," unless it is understood of that which is in it primarily and essentially.

Articulus 19 — Whether The Divine Essence Is Entirely Non-Local And Incircumscriptible And Immovable

Whether the divine essence is entirely non-local and uncircumscribable and immobile?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, I, § 2: Therefore the divine essence alone is entirely non-local and uncircumscribable, etc.

For this seems false. For Augustine says to Orosius that God moves Himself without place and time.

§ Also, Dionysius, in the book On the Divine Names, speaks of processions appropriate to the good, by which God moves Himself and proceeds into everything that is, according to the analogy of each one to participate in His goodness.

§ Also, Habakkuk 3:13: You went forth for the salvation of Your people. And such things are often found in sacred Scripture, that He goes forth in the Saints, and walks in the Saints: and many other objections concerning this can be found above where immutability is disputed.

§ Solution. It must be said with Boethius that He Himself remaining stable gives all things to be moved: and wherever it is read that He moves Himself, or proceeds, or walks, it must be referred to the effect, because He makes the Saints proceed in Himself, or creatures advance, or walk; or to an assumed creature.

Articulus 20 — Whether Every Change Happens In Place Or Time

Whether every mutation occurs in place, or in time?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, In these two ways, namely in place or in time, mutation occurs, etc.

For these two ways seem to have been taken entirely without art: because

§ 1. There is no motion of time: because time is not a motion, nor a subject of motion, but rather a property: therefore not everything that is moved, is moved in time.

§ 2. Also, time intrinsically is a passion of local motion, to which it is referred as an accident or property, and as a number and measure: but it is not referred to other motions, except as a number and measure: therefore it ought not to be divided against local motion.

§ 3. Also, time is divided into parts which are taken in local motion, such as months, and days, and years: but it is not divided into parts which are taken according to parts of the motion of alteration, so that one part of time is said to be as great as this part of alteration or augmentation: therefore it seems that he is saying nothing.

§ Solution. It must be said that Augustine here takes motion broadly, according as motion is distinguished from the potentiality of the mobile thing, which relates to motion in any way whatsoever.

§ And so that this can be better understood, it must be said that motion is distinguished in a twofold way: namely, on the part of the mobile thing, according as we say that one motion is from non-subject to subject, and another is from subject to subject; and sometimes it is distinguished according to the terminus to which the motion is directed, and in which there is nothing more of the motion: as when we say that there are six species of motion, namely generation, corruption, alteration, augmentation, diminution, and mutation according to place. But on the part of the subject it is further distinguished in a twofold way: as when we say that there is motion according to potentiality to 'where' [location] only, and there is motion according to potentiality to 'where' and to form: to 'where' only, as in the heaven; to 'where' and to form, as in elements and elemented things. In this way motion is distinguished here, when something is said to be mobile according to place, and something according to time: because there is something which has potentiality to 'where', like every body as much as it is in itself: and I say this on account of the empyrean heaven, which some posit as immobile: but a certain thing is mobile according only to the potentiality of the vicissitude of some form in it: and that time which is the measure of this vicissitude, is by nature and intellect prior to local motion and prior to the time which is the measure of it, as we proved above: and thus all the objections cease. But of what sort that time is, and whether continuous or not, should be inquired there.

Articulus 21 — Whether God Is In All Things Not Enclosed, And Outside All Things Not Excluded; And, How God Is Said To Be New And Old

Whether God is in all things not included, and outside all things not excluded? And, How is God called new and ancient?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, 1, towards the end: He Himself is more interior to every thing, because in Him are all things, etc.

For from this place is taken that saying, that He is inside not included, and that He is outside not excluded. And it seems to be impossible that He should simultaneously be inside, and not included, and the like.

§ But it must be said that this is said for the reason that He does not follow the laws of place, nor is He in a place as a located thing, but rather as the presence of His substance influencing being and power and operation to all things: and since it is not possible to accept any thing outside of which there is not another, therefore He will not be inside in such a way that He is not outside, and so for the others.

§ Now "more ancient" speaks of the duration of eternity, but "newer" speaks of the novelty of effects and influences: because in Himself He is not to be called new, because new is that which as regards its beginning is near; and Scripture says, that there shall be no recent God in you; and we held above that He is not new. Or He can be called new on account of the novelty and recency of His power, which He had from eternity.

Articulus 22 — Whether An Angel Is Moved According To Place

Whether an Angel is moved according to place?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says: But concerning the mutation of place, or according to place, a great [question arises] among the inquirers, etc.

For here falls the question of the motion of an Angel, which I divide into three parts, so that its difficulties may be more elucidated.

The first will be, Is it moved according to place? The second, How is it moved according to place? The third, Whether its motion is in time, or in the 'now'?

§ To the first it is proceeded thus: § 1. The Philosopher before the end of the sixth book of the Physics, posits arguments for the fact that what is indivisible according to quantity is not moved, of which one is this:[106] Nothing moved through place traverses in a space first what is greater than itself, rather than what is less, or equal: therefore if an indivisible is moved through space, it first traverses what is less, or equal, rather than what is greater: but it is impossible to traverse what is less, because thus something would be less than the indivisible: therefore it will traverse what is equal: but what is equal is indivisible: therefore it takes up the space by indivisibles: but there are in any given space infinite indivisibles: and it does not happen to traverse infinites in a finite time: therefore in however long a finite time it will not be moved through a space of one palm, or half a palm: since therefore an Angel is indivisible, it seems to be immobile according to place.

§ 2. Also, let an Angel be moved from A to B: it will traverse therefore the space which is in the middle: but whatever is moved, is partly in the terminus from which, and partly in the terminus to which: but what is partly and partly, is divisible according to quantity: therefore the Angel would already be divisible according to quantity, which is false: therefore it is immobile.

§ 3. Also, the Philosopher says that a motion of an indivisible would only be if time were composed of 'nows': but time is not composed of 'nows': therefore there is no motion of any indivisible.[107]

§ 4. Also, let it be granted that it is moved through space: therefore in a lesser [time] it will be in a part of the space, than in the whole: therefore however small a space is taken, in a lesser space will be that which is moved slower than it: but to every mobile according to place it is [necessary] to determine in space what is equal to it: therefore in an indivisible space which is equal in the divisible thing, it is possible for something to be in a part of the space, when that [former] thing is in the whole: therefore the indivisible is divided, which is impossible: therefore an indivisible is not moved.

§ If perhaps you say, as they commonly wish to evade this, that the Philosopher is speaking of an indivisible which has position in a continuum: because this is somehow connatural with space: and therefore these arguments hold for it; but an Angel is not indivisible in this way: and therefore they do not hold for him. Against this: Either these arguments conclude concerning an indivisible according as it has position in a continuum, or according as it is an indivisible only, or according to both. If in the first or last way: therefore according to this a unity could be moved: because it does not have position in a continuum, nor is it an indivisible having position in a continuum: and this has been denied by the Philosophers even more than that a point could be mobile: therefore it is clear that that solution is nothing.

§ Also, it is strange, if the force is in this, that a point has position in a continuum, that the Philosophers have taken no argument from this to prove that an indivisible is not moved: but all arguments are brought forward from the rationale of indivisibility.

§ 5. This same thing is proved by common arguments thus: Every motion is on account of indigence: but an Angel, especially a blessed one, has no indigence: therefore he is not moved.

§ 6. Also, no act is naturally owed to anyone, unless he has within himself the potentiality for that act: but motion is a certain act: therefore it is not owed to anyone, except to one in whom there is potentiality for that act: but we cannot say how there is within an Angel potentiality for natural rectilinear motion: because thus he would be heavy or light: therefore if there is within him potentiality for motion, it will be processional [i.e., walking, flying, etc.]: but potentiality for that motion is completed in organs which are feet, or wings, or fins in swimming things, or rings in reptiles, all of which it is an abuse to posit in an Angel: therefore he is not moved.

§ 7. Also, in everything that is moved, the mover is one thing, and the moved is another; therefore if an Angel is moved, the mover will be one thing, and the moved another: and it is either impossible or difficult to find these two in an Angel: therefore it seems that he is not moved.

§ 8. Also, in everything that is mobile locally except only circular motion, there is also potentiality for all or certain other motions, and especially for generation: but it is not so in an Angel: therefore he is not mobile according to rectilinear motion, which is to descend from heaven, and ascend, and the like.

§ 9. Also, no naturally mobile thing is mobile to contrary places, and [to] the place of incorruptible and corruptible bodies. The truth of this is clear: because no naturally mobile thing is moved both upward and downward, and no voluntarily mobile thing is moved to a place contrary to its nature, but to a place in which its nature is preserved: hence flying things are not moved upward into the fire, or to the place of the sun; nor do swimming things go out onto dry land: therefore if an Angel is mobile, he will not be moved except to a place agreeing with his nature: and that is the empyrean heaven in the genus of bodies: therefore he is never moved to us on earth.

§ 1. But against this are the authorities of all the Saints, especially of Damascene in book I, chapter 17, where he says thus: An Angel indeed, by the velocity of his nature, and because he readily and swiftly passes through, is said to operate in diverse places.[108] If therefore he passes through, therefore he is moved.

§ Also, the same: They are immediately found everywhere wherever the divine nod commands, by the agility of their nature. Many other things are also easy to adduce, and certain sufficiently explicit ones are held here.

§ 2. But by reason it is objected thus: Nothing having a power in no way multiplicable in a medium and not existing everywhere according to its essence, can operate except where it itself is: an Angel is such a substance: therefore he does not operate except where he himself is. Proof of the second premise (because the first is self-evident): an Angel is a substance defined in a place, as is proved here in the Text.

§ Also, an Angel has the power of an intellectual substance of which the medium that is between heaven and earth is not susceptible, because this is an inanimate body. From thence it is proceeded thus: an Angel does not operate except where he is: but he operates in diverse places not simultaneously, but successively, as Damascene says: therefore he is in diverse places successively: but this is to be moved through place, or a consequent of local motion: therefore an Angel is moved locally.

§ Solution. It must be said that Angels are moved locally, as the Saints say, whatever may happen concerning the sayings of the Philosophers.

107. Aristotle, Physics VI.

§ To the first, however, which is objected to the contrary, I say that it is indeed true that an indivisible of whose very being is indivisibility itself, is immobile according to place, nor does it have a place: because, as the Philosopher says, we find not a single difference between the place of a point and the point itself.[109] That indivisibility is also of the being of a unity and of a point, is clear from this, that each according to its being, is the principle and terminus of a quantum: and this could not be unless indivisibility were of the things constituting them according to their rationale, and therefore they are also defined by the rationale of indivisibles: as when it is said, "a point is that which has no part": but an Angel, although he is indivisible according to quantity, nevertheless that indivisibility is a consequent of his being, and is not called his essence: and therefore he can have motion according to another consideration of his being, namely insofar as he himself is a spiritual substance, whose power overcomes every prohibition: and this Damascene calls the velocity of his nature:[110] for he overcomes the distance of space, so that his motion is not proportioned to space; and he overcomes the distance of time, so that his motion is not proportioned to time, nor is it measured by time; and he overcomes the resisting thick and thin, so that his motion is through every plenum, whether thin or dense, as if it were a vacuum, with nothing resisting the mover or the moved, and we say that this motion is above nature, not against, or below nature: and through this the solution to the first three arguments is clear.

§ To the next it must be said that it seems to me that that solution does not solve [the objection]: because without doubt that is not the intention of the Philosopher which that solution pretends.

§ To the next it must be said that motion is not always on account of indigence, but sometimes it is for the demonstration of power, as runners frequently run; and sometimes it is for the showing of obedience, as a soldier in no way indigent joyfully accepts the occasion to move himself in the service of the king, in which there is sometimes neither an indigence of the king nor of the soldier, but the king gives the occasion to the soldier, and the soldier shows his obedience. We could however say that it is on account of our indigence, or for meriting the glory which they received before merit.

§ To the saying of the Philosopher, however, it must be said that he does not intend [to speak] of supermundane motion, but of natural and processional [motion].

§ To the next it must be said that such a power was given to an Angel in the creation of his nature.

To the next it must be said, that this is true of natural and progressive motion, and not of that which belongs to supermundane substances.

To the next it must be said, that in an Angel there is the moving will: and that which is the Angel, is the moved: just as in an animal the soul is moving, and the body is moved: and therefore it has a diversity of mover and moved: for the form can be the mover, and the matter the moved, as in ascending fire: and this accidentally: because fire existing in act as fire, is not outside its place except accidentally: and the substantial form can complete this potency by ascending, to which [form] potency is given on account of indigence, although the act is sometimes exercised without indigence.

To the next it must be said, that this is understood in those things in which the same motion is toward form and toward place, as in heavy or light things: because in those the mover is the generator, or that which does not prohibit or does not remove an impediment: just as a stone descends, which is upon a column once the column is removed. But in an Angel there is no such motion, as is evident from what was said before: since, as can be gathered from the Philosopher in book VIII of the Physics, the generator and the mover according to place are the same: for by the fact that the generator gives its form to the generated thing, it also gives it all the accidents consequent upon that form: and the chief among those accidents is local motion: and therefore if some thing is generated outside its place, on account of something detaining it, once the detaining thing is removed, it is moved per se to its place, which motion however is from the first generator, which gave it its species and the accidents consequent upon the species.

Articulus 23 — Whether An Angel Is Moved According To Place By Passing Through Space

Whether an Angel is moved according to place by passing through a space?

§ 1. Secondly it is asked how it is moved according to place: namely whether by passing through a space, or not?

And it is objected thus: 1. Everything that passes from extreme to extreme: either passes through a medium, or remains in one extreme and generates itself or something similar to itself in the other, or is simultaneously in both extremes. But it is certain that the second and last modes are impossible: for an Angel does not generate another Angel, nor is an Angel here and there, because if that which is there is outside because it is here, the Angel would be outside itself, which is impossible: nor can it be said that it is everywhere, because this has already been disproved, and the contrary is said in the Letter: therefore it does not come from this place to that except by passing through a space.

1. Moreover, Damascene says that when it is on earth, it is not in heaven. Either therefore it comes by passing through, or not. If not passing through: and when it is here, it is not there: it is necessary that it be generated here. But if by passing through: then I have the proposition, that it passes through a medium.

If perhaps you say that it is moved in the manner of our intellect: because it is [concerned] with this which is beyond the sea, and immediately with this which is in Cologne, or another city, without passing through all the media: this is nothing: because we are not asking about the motion of an intelligence through intelligibles, which is not a motion of substance, but a turning of the intellect upon that which it has within itself: and because each is conjoined to the intellect without a medium, namely that which it thinks of existing beyond the sea, and that which it thinks of existing in Germany, therefore it can turn itself upon this and that, without passing through media: but we are asking about the motion of an angelic substance, which comes from place to place: whence it is clear that this answer is nothing.

If perhaps you wish to say, that the distance indeed is a distance, but it is not a distance to it, as some say, and give an example: just as if between heaven and earth there were a vacuum, then the center would be immediate to the circumference. Against this: That vacuum: either leaves a distance of place but deprived of any localized thing: or it posits nothing. If you say that nothing, then what you say is nothing: because there will be neither distance, nor circumference, nor center, nor anything: but if it leaves a distance between the extremes, then you posit a falsehood, that the center would be immediate to the circumference.

1. Moreover, It seems impossible that there is a distance, and it is not a distance to it: because what simply is, can be compared to nothing in respect to which it is not: for the Philosopher says, That which in itself is a substance, in respect to nothing and in nothing can be an accident: and what is something in act, in respect to nothing can be nothing in that act.
2. Moreover, Let there be two termini, namely A and B, and let the Angel be moved from A into B. And let AB be divided at C. Then I proceed thus: The motion of the Angel is into B: therefore in the whole of B it will rest after motion, and will be in "having been moved" (in motum esse): therefore it is necessary if it is moved, that it be moved in C: but C is the middle space: therefore it is moved in the middle: therefore it is false what you say, that the distance is not a distance to it.
3. Moreover, Whatever is in something in which it first is in "having been moved", is necessarily taken before this in "being moved" (in moveri), but an Angel when it is on earth, is taken as in that which first is in "having been moved": therefore whatever is of the space before this in it, is as in "being moved": therefore it is moved through a medium.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Everything that is moved through a medium, is partly in the terminus from which, and partly in the terminus to which: an Angel is moved through a medium, as you say: therefore it is partly in the terminus from which, and partly in the terminus to which: but everything of such a sort is divisible: therefore an Angel is divisible, which is openly false.

1. Moreover, Everything that is moved through a medium, would sooner be in the middle than in the extreme: therefore an Angel would sooner be in the middle than in the extreme, which is false: because Damascene says that they are immediately found wherever the divine nod commands.

SOLUTION. Speaking without prejudice I say, that it passes through a medium, and that the medium is a distance, but not to it, because by its power of moving it overcomes it. And this we can see through a similitude. For the Philosopher says before the end of book VIII of the Physics, that every infinite power, just like magnitude and multitude, excels every finite thing: and therefore he demonstrates there, that if there were an infinite moving power, it would move the motion which it infuses into the movable thing in a 'now': but we cannot say that the power of an Angel is simply infinite, just as we do not say its essence is infinite: but we say it is not finite in proportion to any corporeal moving power: and therefore if an infinite corporeal power would overcome the distance of a space, much more shall we say the power of an Angel overcomes it: and therefore I say, that it passes through the space indivisibly: and the whole space is made for it as one indivisible thing: because its motion is according to will: for it was said above, that the movable thing itself is that which has the transit of its motion in its will, and equally in its power towards the remote or towards the near. We concede therefore the first reasons proving that it passes through a medium: although it passes through it as one indivisible thing in respect to the moving power.

But to this which is objected against this, that it is not a distance to it: I respond, that it is indeed always a distance, but it does not cause it to be distant concerning motion, on account of the victory of the moving power: and this well happens in many things, as has already been said of an infinite power moving through a distance, which necessarily overcomes the medium by the velocity of motion.

But to this which is objected, that there is a motion from A into B, and let it be divided at C: I say that it has no place here: because such demonstrations have no place except in those motions only, in which the power of the mover and the quantity of the movable thing and the distance of the space are proportioned: but this is not so here, and therefore it has no place.

But if you raise a strong objection, that according to this it will be simultaneously in "having been moved", and "from which it is moved", and in "being moved", as the second objection proves: I say without prejudice this is not true: since "simultaneously" is taken according to the rationale of those things which are said to be simultaneous: for mathematical things are said to be simultaneous according to place in one way, between the ultimates of which there is no medium: and natural things are said to be simultaneous in another way, as those whose ultimates act and suffer upon each other. Similarly also it is said to be simultaneous in time or measure in another way: and therefore I do not say that an Angel is moved in time, as will be evident in the following article, but its motion is in a 'now': and I can say, which seems more probable to me, that "from which it is moved", and "through which it is moved", and "in which it is in having been moved", are three 'nows' following each other: and then no absurdity follows: because then it will not be simultaneously "being moved" and "having been moved": and it is then possible to assign a 'now' in which it is moved, and a 'now' in which it rests: and yet those three do not make a quantity unless perhaps a discrete one, which has no medium: and nothing is required to be proven, except perhaps only this, that 'nows' can follow each other in the motion of an Angel, as will be proven in the following question. And through this the solution to the first objections is evident.

To that which is objected to the contrary, I respond that that objection and the following do not hold in that which by the power of moving overcomes the distance of the medium.

Articulus 24 — Whether The Motion Of An Angel Is In Time Or In The Now

Whether the motion of an Angel is in time, or in a 'now'?

§ 1. Thirdly it is asked, Whether the motion of an Angel is in time, or in a 'now'?

And it seems that it is in time: because 1. Every motion has a prior and posterior, as its essential parts: every prior and posterior is in time: therefore the motion of an Angel is in time.

1. Moreover, Every motion is of the number of successive things: but every successive thing has its being in parts, of which one is after another: therefore the motion of an Angel has such a being: but everything that has such a being, is in time: therefore the motion of an Angel is in time.
2. Moreover, Avicenna says in his Sufficientia, that motion is the exit from potency to act in continuous time, not suddenly: therefore the motion of an Angel is also of this kind: therefore it is in time.
3. Moreover, Aristotle in the third book of the Physics: Motion is the entelechy of that which exists in potency according as it is in potency: therefore motion has a being mixed with potency. Either therefore it has act and potency in respect to the same thing, or in respect to diverse things. If in respect to the same thing: therefore according to the same thing there is potency and act, which cannot be: therefore it is left that these two are in respect to diverse things: the act therefore will be according to what is the way into act, because a way into something, attains that into which it is the way: and the Commentator says this on book III of the Metaphysics, that motion is called a being, because it is a way to a true being; and potency will be according to what is from another certain thing which it casts off: but to cast off and to receive are not simultaneous, but in respect to diverse parts of time: therefore it seems that no motion can be in a 'now'.
4. Moreover, Let it be granted that it is in a 'now': but suppose another stronger Angel is moved over the same space: therefore since the swift one divides time, it will be moved through that space in less than a 'now': therefore it is to take less than an indivisible, which is impossible: therefore as before.
5. Moreover, Against what was supposed above, it is objected thus: The Philosopher says that between any two indivisibles of any genus it is possible to take a composite in the same genus: and this is written in the commentary on book VI of the Physics: although it is also hinted at from the text of the book, that between two points is a line, and between two lines a surface, and between two surfaces a body: for since there is no terminus without something terminated, it is necessary that this be true.
6. Moreover, Between two 'nows' there is time: and so it is in every continuum: therefore it is impossible to take three 'nows' in which no medium falls between, as it seems.
7. Moreover, The Commentator subtly proves in book VI of the Physics that in every motion there is a certain division of the movable thing and of the space, thus: Let a motion > out of A be granted: therefore in the whole of A it will rest: and let a place proximate to A be taken which is B: therefore into B that which is carried through the space is moved: but everything that is moved, is partly in that from which, and partly in that into which: therefore that which is carried, is partly in A: therefore by moving into B it intercepts partly of place A, from which the motion is: therefore between A and B there is a place: and so it is always to be taken: therefore it is necessary that every motion be divisible by the division of space: therefore the time measuring it is also divisible: and thus no motion happens to be in a 'now', nor do any 'nows' follow each other, as it seems.

But against this some object thus: In those things in which there is no medium, in these 'to become' and 'to have been made' are simultaneous: but in simple generation there is no medium: therefore it happens simultaneously in it 'to become' and 'to have been made', and 'to be mutated' and 'to have been mutated': and they call simple generation the generation of a substance, which is between opposites by contradiction in which there is no medium: and this indeed they say, but do not prove: nevertheless they adduce it as a similarity, so that they may prove an Angel simultaneously 'to be moved' and 'to have been moved'.

But for them it can be objected thus: As being simply is to being in a certain respect, so generation simply is to generation in a certain respect: but being simply is opposed to non-being simply, and being in a certain respect is opposed to non-being in a certain respect: therefore since generation in a certain respect is from non-being in a certain respect, as white from non-white, which nevertheless is something: generation simply will be from non-being simply, and thus generation is a mutation out of nothing: but between nothing and something there is no medium: and 'to become' is not distanced from 'to have been made' except through a medium: therefore in every transmutation of substance 'to become' and 'to have been made' are simultaneous, that is, in the same 'now': much more therefore can this be in the motion of a spiritual substance.

But this seems a marvelous philosophy which agrees with no Philosopher, but rather all concordantly say two things opposed to these: of which one is, that nothing by nature becomes from simply nothing. The other is in book VI of the Physics, that 'to become' and 'to have been made' are never simultaneous: for what becomes, is not: and what has been made, is: it follows therefore that the same thing is, and is not: unless perhaps you answer so absurdly as to say that in substances what becomes is: which is completely ridiculous: because in substances this is more true, "What becomes is not", than in accidents, since in accidents something of the extreme is in the becoming itself, in substances absolutely nothing: because substantial form is not more and less, like accidental form. Therefore others say, that there is a difference between a 'now' and an instant: because a 'now' is the indivisible of time which is its substance. But an instant is what is taken between two times, as if what stands upon (instat) from the side of our signification. And it is true what they say, that between any two 'nows' there is time, but not between any two instants: because if I signify time at one instant, nothing prohibits you from being able to signify it at the proximate instant following that in time: and therefore they say an Angel is moved in an instant, and not in a 'now'. But this does not agree with truth: because accepting 'now' thus, there are not two 'nows' in the whole time, but one only; just as that which is carried, is one in the whole time, and one in the whole motion.

Besides, the philosopher Averroes assigning the difference between the continuum of a line, and the continuum of time, says that it is possible to take two points in the continuum of a line, but not in the continuum of time, which does not remain, nor has position in its parts: and therefore if what they say were true, what the Philosopher says would be nothing: therefore it is left, that the Philosopher intends that between any two 'nows' there is time, according as a 'now' is terminating motion: but also between any two moments or 'having-been-mutateds' of motion it is: and thus it is taken in the signification of an instant predicted by them: therefore the solution is not valid.

SOLUTION. It seems to me as was said above, that time in sacred Scripture is said in many ways: and it seems that that which has no relation to the motion of the heavens, as to the cause of its motion and rest, that that is not in the time of the motion of the heavens, as numbered in a number, or measured in a measure. For the philosopher Rabbi Moses says that every motion of this nature is reduced to the motion of the heavens, which caused this nature to be moved: but it is certain that the motion of an Angel cannot be reduced to the motion of the heavens as to a cause: therefore it will not be in the time of the heavens as in a number and measure. But another time which is taken besides the order of movable things to one cause of motion, is in the movable thing itself as in a subject, and differs for each movable thing. And therefore, just as we take the continuity of time and discretion and substance in that which is a property of the motion of the heavens: discretion, because it numbers by the two which are prior and posterior: continuity from the space through which the motion is, because in no discrete place is the movable thing taken, but as through anything in which it is like a flowing place by renewing the site of continence; and substance, by the fact that that which is carried, is one in the whole motion: so we must consider in this part the nature of time itself according to the nature of the motion and the movable thing. But it is certain that the Angel moved, that is, who is carried, is indivisible: and thus the same thing which is adjacent to it, is indivisible: but it is not commensurated with the place through which the motion is: therefore "before" and "after" is not taken in place: since therefore the prior and posterior in motion would be from those things, its motion will not have a prior and posterior. The distance of space also is overcome by the power of the moving force: therefore space will not make a continuous motion for it. It remains therefore (as we have said) that there are only as it were three indivisibles of its motion: or one adjacent to it, yet taken three times, which is the same thing, namely, according as it is in the place from which, and in the place through which, and in the place to which the motion is: and nothing will continue this number of these 'nows': now therefore it is plain to answer the objections.

For to the FIRST five it must be said, that those propositions do not hold, except in physical motion: but the motion of an Angel is not physical, as is already evident, nor ordered to the physical.

To the next it must be said, that if the motion of an Angel is from A into B, it is impossible that A and B be divided by the motion at C: because the whole space interjacent to an indivisible motion is as one indivisible: but in an indivisible, indivisibles are not divided, but divisibles whose termini are indivisibles: and therefore that reason concerning the motion of an Angel does not hold.

To the next two it must be said, that this is not true except in a motion which has continuity from space, and continues time by its continuity: and it has already been shown that this does not belong to the motion of an Angel.

To the solution of the others who say that the "being moved" of an Angel and "having been moved" are simultaneous, it must be said that if they speak the truth, that truth is not intelligible: for although they say one is simple, nevertheless it is in a twofold ratio: and insofar as it is the end of the past, they say it is adjacent to the motion of an Angel: and insofar as it is the beginning of the future, they say it is adjacent to that which is "having been moved". But against this is, that although it may be in a twofold ratio, nevertheless it is not in a threefold ratio: and we take in an Angel a terminus from which, and through which, and into which: whence that solution is not well intelligible. But the proof by which they prove their statement is entirely false and absurd: because this is impossible, that "to become" be with "having been made", and "to be mutated" with "having been mutated": the reason for which the Commentator renders upon book VI of the Physics, saying that generation and corruption are not mutations made accepted per se in nature nor are they ever separated from alteration: and therefore generation is the end of a motion which is alteration, and corruption similarly. For it is said, and it is true, that motion has a twofold end, namely of the same genus which is "to have been moved", and of another genus which is in alteration: just as generation is corruption: and in local motion of a luminous body the illumination of a directly opposed diaphanous body: for the illumination of a house to every part opposite the candle follows the motion of the candle, and the illumination of that horizon whose ascendant is the degree in which the circle of that altitude is signified follows the motion of the sun according to the circles of altitude. Whence it must be said, that since generation is corruption, it is conjoined to alteration, and the thing is corrupted at the instant in which it is "to have been generated": because this is the end of that motion and mutation: and this well happens, that the motion is to a 'now', although not in a 'now': just as a line is to a point, although not in a point or from points.

To the FIRST argument therefore it must be said, that generation simply is not of being in universal, but is of being simply, that is, of a substance to which is subjected non-being simply, that is, non-being, which is not simply with the nature with which the composite is a being simply, and in potency non-being simply, but in a certain respect: but in generation in a certain respect, being simply is subjected through substantial form, and non-being in a certain respect, that is, according to the privation of that into which the generation in a certain respect is: for since in all of nature the generation of one is the corruption of another, it is necessary to give being to the corrupted thing through substantial and accidental form, and this is subjected to physical generation, according as every generation is with action and passion, and from contrary into contrary: whence according as it is a generation of substance only, thus according to the intellect matter itself only is supposed to the mutation: but according as the generation of one is the corruption of another, matter with the substantial form as receding is supposed: but according as it is generation with action and passion, matter is supposed with the receding form, and the contrary accidents and properties of that form: and so it always is in nature: and therefore we ought not to say that "to become" and "to have been made" are simultaneous, and "to be corrupted" and "to have been corrupted" are simultaneous: but "to have been corrupted" and "to have been generated" can be simultaneous in respect to diverse things, namely according to the ratio of end and beginning, and "to be corrupted" and "to be generated" simultaneous in respect to diverse forms, namely the receding and the arriving.

But it must be NOTED, that concerning this question on account of its difficulty there are many opinions, some of which are held as heretical now by moderns. For certain philosophers explaining the Old Testament concerning the missions of Angels, such as Rabbi Moses, and Rabbi Elieser, and Rabbi Joanna, said that Angels are moved, but all powers obey them according to a nod: and therefore by the effect of those obeying powers they say they are moved, and not otherwise: and this (because it is contrary to Sacred Scripture) is a heresy. There were others who said that an Angel is simultaneously in several places, and this is its "being moved", and even in all if it wishes: and this also is held for a heresy, since it has a definite substance according to the sayings of the Saints, and cannot be in several places simultaneously. There are others who say that its motion is by its will, and it is moved in a 'now' if it wishes, and it is moved in time if it wishes. Others say that not in a 'now', but in an imperceptible time, which is to be moved suddenly: and therefore it seems to us that it is moved in a 'now'. Others say that it is moved in one 'now' according to two ratios: and therefore its "being moved" and "having been moved" are simultaneous. And others say otherwise, such that there are not two perfectly concordant in this question.

Articulus 25 — Whether In One Spiritual Place Two Spirits Can Be Without Constriction Of Themselves

Whether in one spiritual place two spirits can be without mutual constriction?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning this which he says: If there were many spirits here, they would not thereby constrict the place, etc. For this seems to be against Damascene saying thus: But an intelligible place is where it is understood, and an incorporea nature is where it doubtless is, and operates, and is not corporeally contained, but is understood. Thence I proceed thus: As a corporeal place is to a body, so an intelligible place is to a spirit: in one corporeal place diverse bodies cannot be without constriction: therefore in one spiritual place diverse spirits cannot be without mutual constriction, as it seems.

Besides it is asked next to this, What is called an intelligible place by Damascene? For if some intelligible nature is said, as is God, or an Angel. That does not seem right: because one Angel is not the place of another Angel, since it is not a terminus including it: similarly the Master will deny below that God is a place, and in a place properly, since He is not a corporeal nature. But if an intelligible place is called a place in which an intellectual nature is: then it seems an intelligible place and a corporeal place are the same, and there is no distinction between a corporeal place and a spiritual place, as it seems.

SOLUTION. It can be said, as was held above, that things are in a place in many ways: and that place is said in many ways: for there is place properly, and there is place said by some translation from the property of a place. A place said by translation from the property of a place can be a spiritual nature, as the Philosopher says in book III of On the Soul. Well indeed do those who say, namely the Philosophers, that the soul is the place of the species of a thing, because it is not wholly intellective, and is not species in act, but in potency. And place is taken there from the property of a place, which is to save, because the species have an incorruptible being in the intellect: just as in corporeal nature a thing is saved in its proper place: and because the motion of species is to the possible intellect, and they rest in it, and are moved by it existing immobile. Similarly we can say that God is the intelligible place of an Angel: and in the following chapter Bede says that Angels run within God, wherever they are sent, because He contains them and encompasses them with the ambit of His containing power. But place is properly said in two ways, namely definitively and circumscriptively: and of both it has been said above. But the intellectual place is said definitively by Damascene from its relation to an intellectual nature, which is an Angel: and therefore it is divided against the corporeal, because the corporeal is said from relation to a corporeal nature contained per se or accidentally in it: just as we say accidents are in a place, which are situal in a place. And through this the solution to the whole except the first is evident,

To WHICH it must be said, that the Master here takes a place which has corporeal continence: for since a spirit does not fill, it can be in the same place with any body: and one will not constrict another: but it is not so of an intelligible place, which is taken from the relation of a place to an intellectual nature defined in it, which is determined to a place by its work: for it is impossible for one such relation to be made to two Angels: and therefore it is impossible for two Angels to be in the same place.

Articulus 26 — Whether Angels Are Circumscriptible

Whether Angels are circumscriptible?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning this which he says in the following chapter N, Created spirits in a place... are in a certain way local and circumscriptible, etc.

1. For he seems to be contrary to himself: because above he had said they are not circumscriptible.
2. Besides, that is said to be circumscribed in a place, whose parts are copulated to the terminus of the place, so that its beginning is in the first part of the place, and its middle in the middle, and its ultimate in the ultimate: but Angels are not in a place in this way. If perhaps you wish to say with Gregory and Damascene, that created spirits are corporeal in comparison to the uncircumscribed Spirit, and therefore...

they are circumscribed by place. This does not seem so: because just as that which is substance in itself cannot be an accident with respect to anything, as the Commentator says on the book of Physics, so that which is spirit in itself cannot be a body with respect to anything.

Solution. To this it can be said with Damascene, that Angels are said to be and are circumscribable in a certain way, and not simply. For thus Damascene says:

Angels are circumscribable: for when they are in heaven, they are not on earth: and when they are sent by God to earth, they do not remain in heaven. Here it is posited to be defined by place. It could also be said, as Damascene, that circumscribable is said in three ways, namely that which is comprehended by place or time or comprehension: and thus an Angel is said to be circumscribed, not by place or time, because it is not exceeded by time, but is comprehended according to what comprehension is taken from Augustine in the book On Seeing God to Proba, that we comprehend that of which we look around the limits: just as everything existing of definite essence is comprehended. And in none of those three ways is God said to be circumscribable.

To the other it must be said, that spirit is in no comparison said to be body: but not everything corporeal is body: because it is said to be corporeal from the property of body, and it is said to be corporeal from the nature of body. Indeed, corporeal from the property of body can be an Angel, because it agrees with body in the definition of place, namely to be here and not elsewhere, and in circumscription by comprehension: but it is not corporeal from the nature of body: and because those properties of body are more evident compared to an Angel to God, therefore the Saints say that in comparison to God, Angels are corporeal.

Articulus 27 — Whether One Wisdom In Number Can Be In The Minds Of Different Persons

Whether one wisdom in number can be in the minds of different individuals?

Then it is asked concerning what is said in the following part, O, there, But rather as

From this, indeed, some wish to hold that one wisdom in number is in the minds of different individuals. And therefore their arguments must be set forth, so that it may be seen whether this is in two wise men, one of whom is greater in body than the other, etc.

1. The first is this: If it is not one in number, but in species: then Augustine's example is not valid, because God, existing the same in number, is in all places.
2. Likewise, if they are the same in species only, and different according to number: since two according to number are something more than one, it seems false to say Augustine, who says in the Letter that two wisdoms are not something more than one alone.
3. Likewise, that man is an animal, is a true statement known by many: therefore it is either the same truth, or different in the minds of different individuals. If the same, I have the proposition. If different: then it will be common to all those truths: and thus it is a common statement, and not singular: and thus the proposition in which it is stated that man is an animal, is necessarily common, and not singular, which is false.
4. Likewise, when man is said and understood by different individuals: it is either the same understood, or different. If the same, I have the proposition: because since the truth of complexes is from the understanding of incomplexes, it will also be the same truth in complex propositions and statements among all. If it is not the same: then this which I say, man, is common to those: and thus it will not be the most specific species, but a subordinate genus.

5. Likewise, the more powerful the agent, the more its effect will be similar to it: if therefore a form existing in matter, in which it has a more ignoble being than in the intellect, can generate something similar to itself, such that it is the same to it according to existence: much more a form existing in the intellect, in which it has a more noble being, will generate something existing from itself the same to it: as if I could see your thoughts, they would generate themselves in my mind in the same number.
6. Likewise, being in the intellect and intellect agrees more than being in matter and intellect: but the same in number can be in matter, and in intellect: therefore much more the same in number can be in intellect, and intellect.
7. Likewise, if they are not one in number, it will happen that Angels will be ignorant of many more truths than they know: for each will know those which are in his own mind, and will be ignorant of all those which are in the minds of others, which are much more: and this is inconvenient.

These are their arguments. But against them, it can be objected thus:

1. Aristotle says, that if forms are absolute from the things of which they are (as Plato said), then nothing will be known through them: therefore if the form which is in the soul is other than the form which is in the thing, the thing will not be known through it: but the thing is one from whoever knows it: therefore that by which it is known, will be the same to it: but whatever are the same to one and the same, they are the same: therefore also the species existing in the souls of all who are of the same things, will be the same: and this is the proposition: because knowledge consists of those species.
2. Likewise, in those things which are without matter, the intellect and what is understood are the same: speculative knowledge, and what is speculated, are the same: but in every intelligible (as the commentary explains) the intellect is the same, whether matter: therefore in every intelligible the intellect and what is understood are the same, and speculative knowledge is the same with what is speculated. Hence it follows, that the species in the soul is the same as the species outside in matter: but whatever are the same to one and the same, they are the same: therefore also in the minds of all speculative knowledge is the same in number.
3. Likewise, in the book On the Soul, the one who understands according to act is entirely the thing understood. From this position deduced as before, it seems to follow the same.
4. Likewise, whatever power is to some act, itself reduced to act, has that act the same in number to which it was, and not in species: but the intellect is a power to the species of things understood: therefore itself reduced to act, has the act of the thing the same in number, not in species: therefore the same form in number is in the intellect and in matter: and deducing as before, it follows that the knowledge of all is one in number.

The first of the last argument is evident by itself. The second is written in the third book of On the Soul, where Aristotle thus says: The sensitive part of the soul, and that which can be affected by sciences, are of this power: this indeed, that which falls under science: that indeed, the sensible. But it is necessary that either the things themselves, or the forms in the soul be: but the things themselves are not in it indeed, for the stone itself is not in the soul, but the species. Therefore the soul is like the hand: for the hand is the instrument of instruments: and the intellect is the species of species, and the sense is the species of sensibles. And he intends, that things according to nature are not in the soul, but forms both according to intellect and according to sense, as is clear in the exposition of the commentary.

5. Likewise, the objection of the commentary to the same is thus: Whatever is separated from here and now, and other things contracting to the individual, is the same among all, because it is everywhere and always: but every intelligible is separated from here and now, and other individuating things: therefore it is the same among all, and everywhere and always: therefore the speculative intellect is the same in all souls.

Behold the reasons which are added to the reasons of those, and seem stronger than those previously set forth.

But on the contrary, it is objected thus: 1. The Philosopher says, that knowledge is an act and quality of the soul, and a habit denominating the soul: and Augustine confirms this above, where he proves the nature of the soul to be changeable, saying that it is one thing to be wise, another to be inert: but one accident cannot be in different subjects: therefore it cannot be, that one knowledge in number is in the souls of different individuals.

1. Likewise, it will happen according to this that the same truth in number is known and forgotten, which can be considered inconvenient.
2. It can be objected more strongly thus: Let it be granted, that the substantial form of the thing which is in the soul, is in the thing, and conversely: I ask, in what way is it in itself:

either indeed as in matter, or in a perfectible power, or in any other way whatsoever. If you say in the first way, as the Philosopher seems to want. Against: Every form gives being and act and the reason of the power which it perfects: therefore the intellect receives being and reason from the form of a donkey or goat, which is absurd. But if you say, that it is otherwise in itself: since therefore no form can be without a subject, it will be in something as in matter: because Aristotle says in the eighth book of Metaphysics, that for this reason the Philosophers thought matter to be the substance and alone, because without it subsisting, nothing of the others subsists: therefore it is necessary to posit, that the donkey is in the soul through matter and form, which is denied by the Philosopher.

1. Likewise, of two acts or more different in species or genus, there is nothing susceptible at the same time: but the intellect is susceptible of all forms at the same time: therefore it does not receive them as they are substantial the same in number as they are in the thing.

2. Likewise, every form is inherent, whether it is substantial, or accidental: and if it is not inherent, it is not: therefore if the same form is in the soul which is in the thing itself, it is inherent in the soul as a form: but it does not have from matter and accidents, that it gives being and reason to matter outside, but from itself: therefore since it is in the soul by itself, it gives it being and reason: therefore the intellect understanding a donkey, is a donkey, and so of others, which are ridiculous.
3. Likewise, all Philosophers agree in their metaphysics to place knowledge in the category of quality, namely Avicenna, Algazel, and Aristotle, their master, and also Augustine in his Predicaments.

Solution. It must be said in my judgment, that the species which are in the soul, are not the same in number with the forms of things outside: nor is one knowledge the same with the knowledge of others. Hence there is deception in the arguments previously introduced. For it is to consider the species in the soul in two ways, namely in comparison to the soul in which it is: and thus it is an accident and passion existing in the soul, according to which the Philosopher says, that voices are signs of passions which are in the soul. It is also to consider it inasmuch as it is the intention of the thing: and thus since it is one thing, it is one intention among all: and if that intention is numbered on the part of those intending through it to the thing, there are as many as there are intending through it.

To that therefore which is first objected, it must be said that Augustine's example holds on the part of the intention constituting knowledge, according to which it is numbered on the part of the thing, because thus it makes the thing known.

To the other it must be said in the same way, that in this way speaking two knowledges will be the same.

To the other it must be said, that this and the following compel little: for it is not said to be a singular statement from this that the species of the statement in the soul is one, but on the part of one intention of the thing in this soul and that: for thus nothing would be singular: for Socratity is not one in the senses of all, and yet it is singular by the singularity of the thing which it determines. And by this the solution is also clear to the following. But that it is true, is clear: because nothing is a genus to those things which add nothing over it: and similarly it is not a species to those things which add nothing over it. But the intention of man in common receives nothing added to itself in my soul and yours and his, and therefore it is not made common by these, nor is it common to them, but remains singular, as before.

To the other and to the following it must be said, that those arguments proceed from falsehoods: but falsehood is supposed in this, that the form in matter generates the same to itself by existence, since the Philosopher expressly says to generate it in a similar species, because the same in individual and the same in number cannot remain. In the following also falsehood is supposed, in this namely, that the same species in number is in the soul and in matter outside: and how this is, will be clear below.

To all those which are objected from the words of the Philosopher, that it is said the intellect according to act is the thing understood, and knowledge and the known are the same according to act: this is well true as far as this that both are in act from one act which is the species of the thing. For if I ask you, what makes the matter of the thing in act, you will say that the species of the thing. And if I ask you, when the intellect receives the thing in the intellect, what makes it be in act, you will say again, the species of the thing: therefore they are the same in act, because from the same act which is in the thing, it is according to being, in the intellect however according to which it is a separate intention: and thus it is clear, that the being of the act itself is not the same, although it is always the act of the same, namely of the thing: but in one as the intention of the thing, and in the other as giving being to the thing: and therefore they are not the same in number: and this the Philosopher intends. Others however say, that this is not understood except in intellectuals separated by being, as is an Angel, and the like: but because they say false, therefore it is not to be cared for: for this is not the intention of the Philosopher: and if it were, he would say false: because in those it is less true than in others.

To the argument of the Commentator it must be said, that he takes the intention on that part by which it is compared to the thing of which it is the reason and intention: and thus it is clear what he says: because thus it is numbered by the number of the thing, and not by the number of those intending through it: as was said before.

Articulus 28 — Whether It Should Rather Be Said That God Is Somewhere, Or That Other Things Are In Him

Whether it should rather be said that God is somewhere, or that other things are in Him?

Afterwards, it is inquired concerning what is said there, O, at the end: In Him are all things rather than He is somewhere, etc.

1. For it seems to be contrary to itself: because before it was conceded that God is wholly here, and is in a place, and that place exists.
2. Furthermore, it seems to be against Augustine what is said that an Angel is moved, and not God, since Augustine says that an Angel is not moved through place.

But to solve this is easy according to what was previously held, so that it may be said that God is not somewhere, according to which somewhere can participate in the distinction of place concerning the located, because thus it would remove from Him that He could not be in other places, and that God is not properly a place, but by translation from some property of place.

To the other, it must be said that Augustine (as is determined in the Letter) says that an Angel is not moved locally: because he does not measure himself by space, as was held above:

but it cannot be denied catholically that Angels are moved, since canonical Scripture says this, and not only when they have assumed bodies: as Zechariah said: The Angel who spoke in me.

Articulus 29 — Whether God, In Doing Something Which He Did Not Do Before, Is Changed

Whether God, by doing something which He did not do before, is changed?

Then it is asked concerning this: To this, however, it is usually opposed, etc.

For it seems that God is changed by this, that He does what He did not do before: for action is in some way in the agent: and this action of this thing was not from eternity.

But this has often been resolved: because, as it has been said, in the agent there is the will that it be done in this way, and this has remained from eternity unchangeably in one way.

Articulus 30 — Whether A Thing Is Conceived To Be Filled By God Before Matter By Form, And Place By The Thing Located

Whether a thing is conceived to be filled by God before matter by form, and place by the located?

Afterwards, it is asked concerning what is said there, P, towards the end: Similarly, it ceases to be in those in which it was before, etc.

For prime matter is something of beings, and it relates to form, and therefore it is said to be empty; and it relates to God, and in this respect again, unless it has God in itself, it will be said to be empty: and again, place is said to be empty with respect to the located unless it has it. Therefore, it is asked, which of these fillings is prior according to the reason of understanding?

1. It seems that it is that of matter to form: because that is according to essential dependence, but the others are not.
2. Likewise, Form fills matter by being essentially united to it: but the others are not essentially united to it.

But on the contrary: It is necessary that with matter existing, place is containing matter: because of which even Hesiod posited the first filling to be of place: therefore, the filling of the located is prior to the filling of matter.

But on the contrary: As soon as place and matter are posited, God is posited in them as containing and preserving: therefore, it seems that this is first.

Solution. I concede the last reason: for first there is the filling by God, and secondly the filling by form, and thirdly the filling of place according to the reason of understanding: which is thus evident. The giver of any being and containing is prior to the giver of this distinct being: but God gives any being and contains, form however gives distinct being: whence a thing is first filled by God, and first depends more on God filling, than matter on form. But that the filling of matter by form is prior to the filling by the located is evident: because form is something of the thing filling, place however is nothing of the located.

Likewise, Form is only in matter:

but a thing is not in place except through form and matter.

To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that that dependence is not for matter to be matter, but for it to have actual and distinct being through form: and although this is essential, yet it is not prior: because essential being does not make first, but rather first being according to the order of the present and containing cause. Through this also the solution to the second is evident.

To what is objected concerning place, it must be said that unless we say space is place, as some said who posited a vacuum from bodies, yet not separate, place is not necessarily pre-understood when body or corporeal matter is understood: and therefore that objection proceeds from a falsehood. Nor is that opinion true, that place is the distance of space, as is proven among the Philosophers: but place is the extremity of some body surrounding in itself some body: and thus every body is in place.

DISTINCTIO XXXVIII

Divisio Textus

Now therefore returning to the proposed matter, let us persist in the undertaking, etc. Here begins that part in which the Master determines certain properties following divine knowledge, such as not being able to be deceived, being a cause, and not being able to be increased.

And therefore it is divided into two parts: in the first of which the Master determines, Whether divine knowledge is the cause of things? and, Whether it can be deceived or not? And in the second he inquires, Whether it can be increased? which begins in the following distinction XX XIX, there, Furthermore it is accustomed to be asked, Whether the sentence of God, etc.

The first is divided into two. In the first he inquires, Whether the knowledge of God is the cause of things? In the second, Whether it can be deceived? there, And, To this however which was said above, etc.

The first of these has three parts. In the first he proves that it is the cause of things. In the second, he objects to the contrary, there, B, If it is so, it is therefore the cause of all. In the third, however, he determines the matters, etc., there, D, This therefore which seems to be a contradiction, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Foreknowledge Of God Is The Cause Of Things

Whether the foreknowledge of God is the cause of things?

A doubt arises here, whether the foreknowledge of God is the cause of things?

And it seems that it is so: 1. For whatever things are such that one precedes another, and with the former posited the latter is posited, and with the former removed the latter is removed: these are related as cause and caused. The foreknowledge of God is related in this way to that which He knows, which is antecedent to that, and with it posited the thing in the future is posited, and with it removed the thing is removed: therefore, the foreknowledge of God is the cause of things. The first is proven by induction in all things.

If perhaps you say that Augustine solves this by the example of the memory of past things: for it follows, if you remember something, that it necessarily was: although your memory is not the cause of the past. This solution is nothing: because still those are related as cause and caused: but the past precedes the memory and causes it, and therefore that consequence holds from effect to cause: but the foreknowledge of God precedes things in the future: therefore, it seems that it is their cause.

1. Likewise, the production of all future things pertains to nature taken broadly, so that it also includes the accidental cause, which is chance, or purpose taken broadly, and includes fortune: since therefore nature does nothing unless God operates more immediately: nor does free will unless God operates the same more immediately, God will be the cause of all future things: but He is not the cause operating by the necessity of nature: therefore by art and knowledge: therefore the knowledge of God is the cause of all future things.
2. Likewise, in an artisan it is so, that practical knowledge is the cause of the work: therefore also in God it will be so.
3. Likewise, He knows this future: therefore it will be of necessity: either it follows, or it does not. If not: then the opposite of the consequent can be verified with the antecedent, namely something not being future, which nevertheless God knew to be future: which cannot be: because as Boethius says in the book of the Consolation of Philosophy, this would not be knowledge of future things, but a fallacious opinion: therefore it seems this follows necessarily.
4. If indeed you say that it is true by necessity of the consequence, and not of the consequent. This seems to be nothing said: because we see in all things in which the antecedent is by its nature conjoined to the consequent always, and it is necessary in itself that it causes not by necessity of the consequence only, but also of the consequent: as when it is said, if man is, animal is: but it is true, that where the antecedent is contingent in itself, there it is not caused except by necessity of the consequence. However, this antecedent God foreknows all future things is necessary in itself, and always posited. If therefore its relation to the consequent is necessary, it seems the consequent has necessity of the thing, and not of the relation only.
5. Likewise, it is conceded by all, that the knowledge which God has is the most noble of sciences, and is the goddess of sciences, as the Philosopher says: but the most noble of sciences is knowledge through a necessary cause, and especially the most simple and highest cause, and which the knower knows himself: therefore God knows through that: therefore His knowledge is the cause of the known: therefore His knowledge is the cause of the future thing.

6. Likewise, as the known is related to knowledge, so the future is related to foreknowledge: but the known is caused in itself by knowledge, as was held above in the Letter: especially that which is known per se, as whatever is not evil: therefore the future is related in this way to foreknowledge: therefore the future is caused by its foreknowledge.

7. Likewise, the instance which the Master puts concerning evils seems to be worth nothing, because the knowledge of evils is not through a proper cause: for evil does not have a cause and is reduced to an accidental cause in that it is known through the cause of the habit: as we say a doctor knows sickness: therefore it seems, since the knowledge of God is the knowledge of all future habits and knowledge through a cause, that it ought to be conceded that His knowledge is the cause of all, although not in the same way, as it seems.

8. Likewise, all knowledge is either through a cause, or through an effect, or through a sign. But if through a sign: then it makes a fallible opinion, and as Boethius says, it is impious to posit this in God. Therefore it will be either through a cause, or through an effect. But not through an effect: because God knows through Himself, and He is not the effect of any known thing: it remains therefore, that it is through a cause. But it is not a cause except with respect to the known: therefore the foreknowledge of God is directly said to be the cause of the future thing.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Let it be granted that it is a cause: it will be either mutable or immutable. If immutable in causing, it will follow that everything caused by it happens immutably: and thus every contingent thing will be necessary, which is false.

1. Likewise, He knows that He can do things which He will never do: therefore His knowledge is not a necessary cause of things.

2. It is objected more strongly thus: Nothing preceding another, placing none of its properties around it, is the cause of it: the foreknowledge of God precedes future things, so that it places none of its properties around future things: therefore it is not a necessary cause of future things insofar as they are future. The first is proven by this that from a necessary cause there is a necessary effect, and from a contingent cause a contingent effect: and thus necessity and contingency are placed around the effect by the cause. The second is proven from this, that foreknowledge is eternal, immutable, and timeless: and we see all opposite dispositions around the effects of future things.

Solution. Without prejudice I say, that foreknowledge, as also the knowledge of God, is the cause of certain future things, and is not the cause of certain others. For the solution of some saying that the knowledge of God is not the cause of some things does not please me: because the knowledge of God can be twofold, namely of simple knowledge, and of approval: because simple knowledge does not imply an order to the future, according to which it is of those things which can be but will not be: and therefore with respect to those it cannot be taken as foreknowledge. Here, however, it is more asked if foreknowledge is the cause, than if knowledge is the cause? Hence it seems to me, that it is the cause of some things, and not of others: yet it has an order of precedence and certainty to all, as will be clear below: as Augustine says, Of all things which are naturally and preserve nature and do not corrupt it, foreknowledge is an operative and productive cause: but of evils it is not a cause: yet it preordains and foresees them: but it is true, that the necessary and absolute contingent of the thing is in no way caused by it, but rather by proximate causes, whose dispositions the effect follows.

But if it is asked, Whether the foreknowledge of God is universally the cause of future things? I concede well with others, because there are future evils, of which the foreknowledge of God is not the cause: just as neither is art the vice against art, which nevertheless art foreknows and corrects. Thus, therefore, with the question understood, whether it is universally the cause of future things, it can be responded to the objections.

To the first, by saying that it proceeds from the diminution of those things which are required for the cause of a thing: for it is required that there be precedence in time or duration, or in the order of nature: and a relation of one to another is required, and efficiency or constitution of the following by the causality of the preceding is required: and that last is lacking in foreknowledge and the foreknown. And the instance is, that if you suppose me to know future contingents: for it follows: If I know the future, it will be: because otherwise my knowing would not be knowing, but opining: and then my knowledge precedes and has order to that which is inferred from it: and yet it will not be entirely the cause, but rather it is caused by another cause which is free will. And similarly foreknowledge from nothing which operates under it removes the reason of causing: and therefore something is done by those things which operate under foreknowledge, which is not done by it.

To the other, it must be said that nothing existing can be made in the future of which God is not the cause and foreknower: but some defect as evil can occur in the future of which indeed He is foreknower, and not cause, because it occurs from the defect of the second cause, and not of Himself, as has often been said above.

To the other, it must be said that even in art, art is not the cause of vice, but can foreknow it: just as art working in knotted wood knows that the wood does not obey the beauty of the image to be impressed: and yet it does not make that defect, but it happens from the defect of the wood. But for this reason there is a difference, that in the power of free will it is to remain in defect, or to obey the artisan in perfect beauty: and therefore divine knowledge foreknows both, but makes only one.

To the other, it must be said that when you say, God knows this or foreknows: therefore it will be of necessity: I say that if there is a necessity of consequence, it follows well because of the order of foreknowledge to the foreknown. But if it is a consequence of necessity or of the consequent or of the thing, which is the same: I say that it does not follow, neither in the good of which foreknowledge is the cause, nor in the evil of which it is not the cause.

To what is objected, that the antecedent is necessary by necessity of the thing, and not only of position, we could say that when it is said, God foreknows this, that this proposition on the part of the foreknown still depends on the future: and therefore it does not take everything in the foreknower alone, and therefore it must have the necessity of position, so that namely that will be future which He foreknows: and thus all Doctors commonly say: and therefore it is false what is posited as true. If, however, we would wish to say otherwise, we could concede that this antecedent is necessary in itself, God foreknows what is future: and yet in the consequent there is not caused necessity of the consequence, and not of the thing: and this for the reason that when the consequent is caused by the antecedent, so that it gives it the cause of the thing and necessity, it must have not only a necessary order to it, but also give it being and its properties and dispositions: and this the first cause does not do to any caused thing: and this happens for two reasons: of which the first is, because no caused thing can receive the properties of the first cause because of its infinite distance and nobility above every caused thing. The other cause is: because those contingent caused things are essentially caused by some proximate contingent causes, from which the mode of causality is not removed by the first cause through its influence over the caused thing, and therefore in that it does not follow, that if the cause of this effect is necessary, that the effect is necessary and immutable. And it is similar as if the approach of the sun in the oblique circle is a necessary cause of generation, yet it is not necessary for generation to occur: because there can be an impediment on the part of proximate causes, as in a place of perpetual cold: and therefore the Philosopher says concerning these non-proximate causes, that someone about to walk will not walk, and Ptolemy in the Centiloquium, that a wise man will rule over the stars: because the proximate causes are disposed by contrary dispositions: and therefore it is clear that the first cause does not posit absolute necessity, but of order: or not of the consequent, but of the consequence through foreseeing.

To the other two it can be absolutely conceded, that the foreknown which is naturally is caused in that mode of causality which has been said, by foreknowledge.

To the other, it must be said that the instance of the Master is good, because it has been proven above, that God does not know evil except by speculative knowledge: and therefore it is not reduced to a habit which is deprived in God Himself, but rather which is deprived in the cause which is free will and the evil act, of which thus conjointly God is not the cause: and therefore God has no efficiency towards evil: but He sees from afar by accident, just as privation is seen: and it is true, that in this way through a deficient cause in act it is known: but this is not God, but rather free will: but free will thus deficient in act God knows through Himself.

To the other, it must be said that the knowledge of God is through the cause which is Himself: but it is not necessary because of this, that it is the cause of the known: because the known sometimes has no cause except a deficient one, as has often been said.

Articulus 2 — Whether Any Truth Was From Eternity Besides God

Whether any truth existed from eternity besides God?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, A, around the middle: God did not know these from any time, etc.

1. For since every truth is known by God, and nothing is known unless it is true, it seems possible to prove that some truth or many truths existed from eternity: but nothing is known by God unless every truth: therefore every truth is known from eternity by God: but whatever is known, is true: and whatever is true, is: therefore every truth is from eternity, as it seems. If perhaps you say, that each thing is related to being as it is to truth, and not conversely: whence since all things were not from eternity, not all things will be true even from eternity. On the contrary: Nothing is known unless it is true: and all things are known from eternity: therefore they are true from eternity: but being is pre-understood to truth as cause to effect: therefore all things were from eternity, as it seems.
2. Furthermore, Augustine seems to prove the soul immortal in this way: because if that which is in it is incorruptible, and cannot be without a subject, its proper subject will be perpetual: but truth is eternal, and is in the soul, as in a subject: therefore the soul is immortal and perpetual. But that truth is eternal, he proves thus: Either it is true that truth is from eternity, or not. If it is true, I have the proposition. If not: then the contradictory is true, namely that truth was not from eternity. If the contradictory is true, something is true: and if something is true, truth is: therefore with truth posited not to be from eternity, it follows that truth is from eternity. Similarly, it is concerning the destruction of truth, if it can be destroyed: for either truth will endure without end, or not. If not: let the opposite be granted, and then with truth destroyed, something will be true: and not unless by truth: therefore to truth not being, it follows that truth is: therefore it is perpetual before and after: and so it seems that with respect to it, foreknowledge cannot be posited.
3. Likewise, if at the beginning of the world, when the world began, I say thus: the world was, it is evident that it is false: therefore the contradictory was true, the world was not: therefore something was true before the world. The same follows concerning the instant of the inception of any thing which begins.
4. Likewise, this proposition, the world will be, or the world is going to be, is true, either it is true from eternity, or not. If so, I have the proposition: because then it follows that many truths were from eternity. If not: then the contradictory is true, namely the world is not going to be: but what is not going to be, will never be in any present or past: therefore it was never true, this, the world is, or the world was, which is false: therefore it is evident that the first is true, the world is going to be: and similarly Socrates is going to be. But since all these are true from eternity, as it seems, the knowledge of God will not be before them, and so it will not properly be called foreknowledge with respect to them. However, it has sometimes been conceded that many truths are from eternity which are not God.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
Every opposition is concerning some same and one thing, to which it is reduced as to the subject of which it is: therefore if such a reduction follows, this proposition is not true: therefore its contradictory is true: it is necessary to say that the opposition of contradiction is from eternity: but since it cannot be in itself, it is reduced to some one thing, as to matter: therefore it is also necessary to posit that from eternity: but there is nothing concerning which every opposition is, except prime matter: therefore prime matter will be from eternity: for prime matter is subjected in everything which is per se a subject, as a certain Philosopher says: but this is heresy: therefore also that from which it follows, namely that there are many truths which are not God from eternity. Nor can anyone say that those truths are only relations: for the relation of opposition is only in opposites: therefore if there is a relation, the subject of the relation will be: and so it is necessary for the propositions themselves to be from eternity, which is false.

Solution. I do not think it is catholic to say that many truths were from eternity, which are not God.

Whence I respond to the first, that whatever is known is true, that proposition is true of a twofold knowledge, namely of that which is the cause of the known, and of that which is caused by the known. And when it is conceded of that which is the cause of the known, because the knower is an agent through intellect and will, it does not further follow that whatever is true, is: because when it was said, whatever is known is true, the known was not posited except according to the condition of the knower, and not according to the property of the nature of the known: and so it is clear how that process is impeded. If it is true of the knowledge which is caused by the known, there truth follows being, and knowing follows truth as effect to cause: and in that the process does not hold: because such knowledge is not from eternity.

To the objection of Augustine it must be said, that it is a sophism, nor does he assert, except in this way in which enunciable truth is posited in the divine mind only: for thus there is only one truth, which however is of many through relation to them, as we said above concerning ideas.

Therefore it must be said, that just as privation is not understood except through habit, so negation is not understood except through affirmation: and therefore no affirmative being accepted, no negative will be accepted. Whence I say, that this is false, truth was from eternity, for two reasons, namely because there was no proposition: and because the composition does not hold by reason of determination: and when it is inferred, therefore the contradictory is true: I say, that it does not follow unless a proposition is supposed: but that is not, because it is impossible for the negative to be first: and therefore since before this, truth was not from eternity, no affirmative can be accepted, it will not be accepted: and therefore it has no contradictory, with such a position made.

Similarly I say of this, the world was, and of its contradictory, and in the same way of all others.

But concerning what is asked of this, the world is going to be is true, whether it was true before the world? I say that it was not: because there was no proposition: for if there is nothing before the world, nothing can be subjectible and predicable before the world: therefore there could not be a proposition: because from what a thing is, or is not, according to Aristotle, speech is said to be true or false. However, if it is asked concerning the thing and not concerning the truth of the proposition, I well concede, that the world was going to be, and that the world could be: but this is referred to ideal reasons, and to the power of the efficient cause.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Knowledge Of God Is Caused By Things

Whether the knowledge of God is caused by things?

Whether the knowledge of God is caused by things?

Afterwards, it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, C, Origen however on the epistle to the Romans, etc.

For here Origen seems to want that the knowledge of God is caused by things: otherwise, the causal conjunction which he posits would not denote any relation.

To this, it is also opposed thus:
1. Whatever is, which neither in itself nor in any of its causes has immutability, that is not known in itself nor in any of its causes, unless it is: the contingent of the future is such: therefore it is not known, unless when it is. The first is proved thus: Let it be granted that it has immutability in some of its causes: therefore, when that cause influences over that caused thing, according to which that caused thing is in itself, there will be immutability also in the caused thing: and thus it would no longer be contingent, which is against the position. Nor is there an instance concerning generated flowers and plants and the sun: because the sun does not influence over them according to an immutable order, but rather according to a diverse mode: for the act of the sun before it comes to them is mixed with contingent and mutable powers: and those influence contingently: and therefore even if the sun had intellect, it could not know the caused thing unless the caused thing existed.

1. Likewise, whatever follow each other necessarily, either both are from the same cause, or one is from the other: but foreknowledge and the foreknown thing follow each other: therefore either both are from the same cause, or one is from the other: but both are not from the same cause: therefore one is from the other: therefore since foreknowledge is not always the cause of the foreknown, the foreknown will sometimes be the cause of foreknowledge or knowledge, as it seems.
2. Likewise, God knows me to read, it follows well: therefore I read. I ask therefore, whence the place? It seems that it is not from the cause: because it also follows, God knows me to lie: therefore I lie: and it cannot be the place from the cause: therefore it will be from the effect, as it seems: therefore the thing is the cause of knowledge.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. The most noble knowledge is attributed to God: but the most noble is through the cause: therefore His knowledge is not caused by anything.

1. Likewise, if His knowledge were caused, since His knowledge is His essence, His essence would be caused, which is false.
2. Likewise, since His knowledge is eternal, but the known is temporal, it follows that in His knowledge the temporal would be the cause of the eternal, which is false.
3. Likewise, it cannot be said that it is a cause without which not: because even that is nobler than the effect: but nothing is nobler than divine knowledge.

Solution. I say that Origen does not intend concerning the cause of the thing, but concerning the cause of the consequence: and that is taken from the effect to the cause, just as conversely.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that the knowledge of God surpasses all knowledge: for although an artisan pre-conceives the form of the whole work, and does not receive it from the work, yet many things happen contrary to the work from the making of instruments, and the inequality of matter, which he cannot know except through the effect: but the highest artisan in this surpasses all knowledge, that He foreknows all that He will do, and whatever will happen to Him from the mutability and defect of secondary causes which operate under Him: because otherwise His knowledge would be imperfect. Whence it is clear, that the accepted similarity from the sun and other agents is not similar, because an artisan cannot know the outcome of his work in act and its event: but God knows this whole due to infinite power in knowing.

To the other, it must be said that it is true, that those follow each other: but this is for the sake of the order of knowledge to the known, and conversely: and not for the sake of causality, as was said before.

To the other, it must be said that in divine things the place is generally from the convertible, but in some things the place is from the cause: for it is otherwise in divine things, and otherwise in human things, due to the diversely spoken knowledge, as was held above.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Foreknowledge Of God Imposes Necessity Upon Things

Whether the foreknowledge of God imposes necessity on things?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, To this, however, which was said above, namely that the foreknowledge of God cannot be deceived, etc.

This is a very general question: for it has a place in faith, and prophecy, and foreknowledge, whether namely they can be deceived? And it is disputed by the same reasons.

1. However, it seems that it imposes necessity on things: because Boethius says thus in the last of the Consolation of Philosophy: If therefore it seems that foreknowledge can be twisted otherwise than things foreseen, the foreknowledge of the future will no longer be firm, but rather an uncertain opinion: which we consider it impious to believe about God. It imposes necessity on the thing.

Likewise, there: But if with Him, and there are many other things there about this. The most certain source of all things nothing can be uncertain, the event of those things which He has firmly foreseen is certain.

1. Likewise, Anselm in the book on the Harmony of Foreknowledge and Free Will says thus: If anyone considers the understanding of the word properly, by this very fact that it is said to be foreknown, it is pronounced to be future: for nothing is foreknown except what will be, because knowledge is only of truth: wherefore when I say that when God foreknows something, it is necessary for it to be future:

it is the same as if I say, If it will be, it will be of necessity. It is a certain true conditional, whose antecedent is verified without the consequent: therefore it is necessary: therefore also this, If God foreknows something, it will be of necessity: therefore foreknowledge infers necessity.

1. This also is held in the Letter, from Augustine, that it is impossible for the foreknowledge of God to be deceived; therefore it seems that it imposes necessity on the thing.

This also seems to be able to be proven by reason thus:

1. When it is said, God foreknows this future: therefore it will be of necessity: either it follows from the necessity of the consequent, or not. If it follows, I have the proposition. If it does not follow: therefore it can not happen: therefore it can be given that it will not happen: because given the false and not impossible, what happens will be false, and not impossible. But if it will not happen, and God foreknew it: therefore He is deceived in foreknowing, which is against the Letter.
2. Likewise, When it is said, God foreknew this, this is true from eternity: but nothing of contingents is eternal: therefore this proposition is not contingent. If therefore a contingent follows from this, a contingent can follow from a necessary: let it therefore be contingent to be otherwise, then the opposite will be verified with it, which cannot be: therefore the antecedent infers the necessity of the consequent.
3. Likewise, this is true of the past, God foreknew this one would sin: therefore it is necessary: therefore for God to have foreknown this, is necessary: but what is known as necessary, is necessary in itself, or it will be badly known: therefore it is necessary for this one to sin.
4. Likewise, This one to sin is foreknown from eternity: but the thing is not from eternity: therefore if this proposition is changed, that change will not be on the part of the thing: therefore it will be changeable on the part of the knower: but this is impossible, as is held from the Letter: therefore neither on the part of the thing, nor on the part of God is it changeable: therefore it has necessity, as it seems.

But against this are the inconveniences of Boethius, that prayers perish, and the just is made as the impious: because all things will be of necessity: and now sins will not be sins, and chance perishes, and free will perishes, and nothing will be contingent: all of which are false: therefore foreknowledge does not impose necessity on foreknown things.

The solution of this question is to be taken from Boethius and Anselm.

Boethius determining it says thus:

For I will answer that the same future, when it is referred to divine knowledge, is necessary: but when it is considered in its own nature, it seems entirely free and absolute. For there are two necessities. One simple, as it is necessary for all men to be mortal. The other of condition, as if you know someone is walking, it is necessary for him to walk: for what one knows, that cannot be otherwise than known: but this condition does not at all contract that simple necessity: for this necessity is not made by its own nature, but by the addition of condition. Therefore these futures, when referred to the divine intuition, become necessary by the condition of divine knowledge: but considered by themselves, they do not cease from the freedom of their own absolute nature. Boethius to this, that if the necessity of condition is understood, then these are truly: what He foresaw, will happen of necessity: if God foreknew this one to sin, he will sin of necessity, and the like. But if absolute necessity is understood and by itself and according to its own nature considered in itself, then all are false.

Anselm also intends to say this by other words saying thus: Necessarily every future is future, but by a following necessity which compels nothing, when future is said of a thing not always necessary, although it is future. To this that there is a certain necessity of the nature of the thing, and this follows the thing in itself: but there is a necessity of position which follows the thing from this that it is posited to be future in this way or not future: and that because it follows the relation of the thing rather than the thing, it is said to compel nothing.

To the same returns what the Masters say, that there is the necessity of the consequent, and the necessity of the consequence: and it is well conceded, that the foreknowledge of God causes the necessity of the consequence, but not of the consequent.

Having this, it can be answered to the first, that God indeed foreknows all things, and also operates those things which are naturally so: but because they do not take on the properties of their causality, therefore nothing prohibits them from being contingent and changeable in themselves: and that in those changeable things the knowledge of God can be certain, this is not from this that it takes away their changeability, but rather from the infinite power of foreseeing wherever that which is changeable turns: and by this the solution is also clear to all the authorities subsequently introduced.

To the first objection by reason, it must be said that when it is said, God foreknows this: therefore it will be of necessity: it does not follow from the necessity of the consequent, and the cause of this has been said: but it follows from the necessity of the consequence, and because the necessity is of the relation of the antecedent to the consequent, therefore although the opposite of the consequent in itself is possible, yet to the antecedent it is impossible: and therefore if the opposite is posited now destroying the antecedent, it follows, if that will not be, that God never foreknew it.

To the other it must be said, that this indeed is true from eternity, God foreknew this one would sin if he sins: yet the known depends on the future: and therefore it takes necessity not simply, but in a certain respect, namely as it falls under knowledge: but this is only the necessity of condition, and not absolute: and in this way the opposite of the consequent is not verified with the antecedent.

To the other it must be said in the same way, that although that as to the fact of foreknowing is of the past, yet as to the act which is signified to go forth from the known, it depends on the future: and therefore on that part it can be absolutely contingent, although it has conditional necessity.

To the other it must be said, that although this one to sin is foreknown from eternity, yet on the part of the thing it can depend on the future: and therefore on that part it can be contingent, as has been often said.

And these concerning this distinction.

DISTINCTIO XXXIX

Divisio Textus

Furthermore, it is customary to inquire, Whether the knowledge of God can be increased or diminished?

Here begins that part, in which the Master inquires, Whether the knowledge of God can be increased?

And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he determines that it cannot be increased. In the second, however, he objects to the contrary, and resolves, there, B, etc. Here it is opposed by some thus, etc.

The text of the first part is evident by itself.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Knowledge Of God Can Be Increased

Whether the knowledge of God can be increased?

A doubt arises concerning the first part, namely, whether the knowledge of God can be increased?

It seems, however, that it can: because
1. Of any knowledge, the knowable things can be increased, that knowledge can be increased, at least materially: but the knowable things of divine knowledge can be increased: therefore, the knowledge itself can be increased. The first is evident by itself. The second is assumed from the text: because the works of God are knowable, and those can be increased.

1. Likewise, the knowledge of God is according to rational ideas: but ideas are created by the ideata, as was held above by Augustine: if therefore some new things can be created, new ideas can be in God: but through ideas there is knowledge: therefore it seems that the knowledge of God can grow, even on the part of ideas. If perhaps you say that God knows all things of the same species by one idea, and thus with multiplication made in the individual, it does not follow that multiplication is made in the ideas. This is nothing: because if ideas are not determined to individuals, God would not know singulars except in the universal and in potentiality, and this is false, as will be said in the last chapter of this distinction.
2. Furthermore, it is not inconvenient to say that God can make new species which He never made, and new worlds having nothing similar with this one: therefore, since those cannot be made without ideas, there will be an idea of those in the divine mind: and thus according to ideas, it seems that the knowledge of God can be increased.

If perhaps you say that an artisan makes one house and another, and all by the same art: and similarly God can make by one idea. On the contrary: although an artisan can make all houses by one art, yet he cannot make a hexagonal, square, and round house by one species, nor does one species of house know one house to be distinct from another: therefore, since God makes a difference by form and property, or can make many such, and discern one from another, it seems that His knowledge can also be increased according to ideas.

1. Likewise, knowledge and the known are relative, so that knowledge is referred to the knowable: therefore, since relatives are multiplied, with one of the relatives multiplied, if the knowable things can be increased, much more can the knowledge itself.

But on the contrary is what is objected in the text: because

1. The knowledge of God is the essence of God: therefore, if knowledge can be increased by that which is, the essence itself can also be increased according to ideas.
2. Likewise, nothing eternal is increased or diminished by the temporal: but the knowable things which can be made, all are temporal: therefore, they neither increase nor diminish the eternal knowledge of God.
3. Likewise, it can never be that the caused increases or diminishes the cause, but rather conversely: but the knowledge of God is the cause of all things that are made: therefore, it is neither increased nor diminished by them.

Solution. It seems to me, as the Master says, that the knowledge of God can neither be increased nor diminished.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the things that are known can be increased, but they cannot be increased except by the knowledge operating those many things, and thus by the very fact that we posit the knowable things to be able to become many, we posit the knowledge from eternity to have been of many operable things: and thus it would not be increased from the fact that many things would be made: and thus the Master will solve below in the following part of the reading: just as it cannot be understood how the caused is increased with respect to number, and the reason of cause and causality is increased from that: so it cannot be understood that from the known the knowledge of God is increased, because by that very fact it is presupposed to have been of that as a knowing and causing cause.

To the other, it must be said that more ideata can be made than are made: but by the very fact that they are made, they are posited to have ideas: and therefore from those the number of ideas is not increased, which is not a number simply, as was said above.

But if you ask whether the knowledge of God can be of more things than it is? This I well concede: but it does not follow from this that it can be increased: because to be of more things posits only the potentiality for there to be more, which more things, however, if they were, or were posited to be, would be presupposed to have been in divine knowledge, and thus would induce no variation in the knowledge itself.

...is said, that knowledge is increased, it is signified that to a knowledge already existing in some quantity, according to the things known, something new is added, which it is wicked to say concerning the knowledge of God: therefore it itself cannot be increased, but it can be of more things, from which it would not be increased if they existed: for since the most excellent must always be attributed to God, it is necessary to assign to Him a knowledge even greater than can be understood: and this is that which cannot be increased either in itself or according to the things known.

Articulus 2 — Whether God At The Same Time And By The Same Knows And Understands Many Things

Whether God simultaneously and by the same knows and understands many things?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, A, around the middle: Each of them sees simultaneously, etc.

From these, two things seem to follow, namely that God knows many things and understands many things simultaneously and by the same, and that He Himself knows mutable things immutably.

Against the first it is objected thus: § 1. The Philosopher says: We can know many things, but understand very little: therefore it seems that one intellect in act is only of one thing.

§ 2. Also, it is impossible for one act to be terminated at diverse terms simultaneously and at once: but to understand is one act: therefore it cannot be terminated simultaneously and at once at diverse terms. Nor does it seem that this can even be understood: because no similar thing is found: for one line in one part cannot be terminated at diverse points: therefore neither can it be understood how it is possible to be done: therefore it seems that it is necessary for the intellect to pass from here to there and from there to here, the contrary of which is said in the Letter.

ON THE CONTRARY: James 1:17, it is said: With whom there is no change, nor shadow of alteration: therefore there is no alteration in the intellect of God, nor can there be: therefore He understands many things by one and the same, and simultaneously, and in act: because it was proved above that His intellect is always in act.

Solution. It must be said that there is no passage in the intellect of God, as the last reason proves: but He understands Himself by one and the same mode having the being which it is, and simultaneously.

To the first and second objects, it must be said that this is true in all those things in which the acts differ from the essence of the agent: but not so in God: whence His act which is to understand, is His essence: and just as His essence is the species and cause of all things, having itself in one mode, so also is His act: and therefore the similes brought forward are not valid: but nevertheless that is more express concerning the center and the lines going out from it, as we expounded above.

Articulus 3 — Whether God Knows Changeable Things Immutably, And Knows Opposites In The Same Way

Whether God knows mutable things immutably, and knows opposites in the same way?

To the second we proceed thus: To know mutable things immutably is to know mutable things otherwise than they are: but to know any thing otherwise than it is, is to be deceived: therefore it seems that if God knows mutable things immutably, He Himself is deceived in them.

Here also falls the question concerning the knowledge of opposites, whether He knows them in the same way?

It seems that He does: because § 1. He knows a thing in the same way when it is, and when it is not: but for a thing to be and not to be, are opposites according to affirmation and negation: therefore He simultaneously knows contradictories, as it seems: therefore much more so other opposites.

§ 2. Also, if He knows a thing as it is, it is necessary that He knows it under the differences of time: therefore He knows that I will read when I am going to read, and knows that I have read when I have read, and knows that I read when I read: but everything that falls under the difference of time is mutable: therefore God knows the mutable temporally and mutably, as it seems. But if you say that He does not know things temporally, it follows from this that He would have no knowledge of a thing when it is and when it is not, but would know things indistinctly and confusedly: and this is imperfect, and not to be attributed to God.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Every reception is according to the power of the receiver, and not of the received: knowledge is a certain reception, as the Philosopher says: therefore it is according to the power of the receiver, and not of the received: but God, knowing, is immutable: therefore His knowledge is immutable.

§ 2. Furthermore, in the Letter this is denied: therefore it seems that His knowledge is not of mutable things mutably.

Solution. It is easy to solve this according to what was said above, namely that the word 'mutably' [ly mutabiliter] can determine the verb on the part of the matter over which the knowledge passes, and thus God knows mutable things mutably, and temporal things temporally, and opposites in opposite ways: or it can refer to the verb by comparison to the knower, and thus He knows mutable things immutably, and temporal things intemporally, and opposites in one simple way.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that He is not deceived: because even among us the knowledge of mutable things on the part of the knower is immutable, because the formal concept of mutable things is immutable: but since the formal concept is the intention of a mutable thing, the mutability of the thing is known through that intention when it is referred to the thing to which mutability happens. And the cause of this is because by the fact that it is immutable, it is not referred to the thing, but is referred to it according as it is the formal concept and intention of the thing which is mutable: and thus it is clear how in all things the mutable is known immutably.

To the other it must be said that God knows opposites by one thing, which is the formal concept of the thing whether it is or is not: because to Him a thing cannot pass away, but always remains in the same mode, yet His knowledge does not pass over the thing in the same mode: or, to speak more faithfully, the thing is not compared to Him in one mode: and therefore He knows the thing to be when it is, and He knows it not to be when it is not, from the fact that the thing is compared to being or to non-being: and this is more about the knowledge of complex things or enunciables, concerning which it will be inquired later.

To the other it must be said that He intemporally knows all things which fall under the difference of time: and this is so because the difference of time happens to a thing according as it is in its proper being, and not according as it is in God through an idea. But that He is certain in knowing things distinctly, this is because He not only knows the thing, but also any composition and division of the thing with any thing or from any thing: and this incomplexly and incompositely, as will be said below.

And if you object that our intellect is not thus of a complex thing as of an incomplex thing. The response is that this is so because our intellect through its substance is not its own intelligible, nor does it give the mode to the intelligible, but rather receives from it, and therefore it is varied according to it: but it is not so of the divine intellect, which is that by which He understands, and it gives to the intelligible both to be in itself, and every composition and division.

Articulus 4 — Whether God Knows Actually Infinite Things

Whether God knows infinite things in act?

Whether God knows infinite things in act?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, A, towards the end: The Father and the Son with the Holy Spirit simultaneously know and see all things.

For there can still be a doubt, although it was dispatched above, whether God knows infinite things in act?

It seems that He does: because § 1. To any finite thing addition is possible: but to the knowledge of God no addition can be made: therefore it itself is infinite.

§ 2. Also, Augustine in book XII of The City of God says that the species of numbers, infinite in themselves, are not infinite to the knowledge of Him whose knowledge has no number. Therefore it seems that He knows infinite things in act.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Whatever is known, is rendered finite by the comprehension of the knower, especially if he knows perfectly: therefore if God knows the infinite, He by knowing renders it finite: therefore it is not infinite absolutely.

§ 2. Furthermore, the infinite in itself cannot be understood how it could be finite to another: therefore neither will it be finite to God.

§ 3. Also, the species of numbers are not infinite in act, but in potency: if therefore God knows them to be infinite, He knows what is not, which is impossible.

To this some say that knowledge is threefold, namely of intelligence, of vision, and of approbation: and the knowledge of intelligence is that by which a thing is understood simply. But the knowledge of vision is that which passes over things according as they are or are not under the difference of this composition or that. But the knowledge of approbation is that which is of goods of which God is the author. But against this it is objected: That knowledge which is called intelligence is either rendered finite by the ideal formal concept of the intelligible, or not. If you say yes: but to every idea there corresponds an ideated thing, or can correspond: therefore to that idea which is of the infinite, an ideated thing corresponds, or can correspond: therefore the infinite can be in act: which I cannot understand, if it is true.

Also, if you say that that idea is not for this purpose that an ideated thing can be brought forth under it, but that God may cognize the infinite by it. On the contrary: Either He cognizes it as it is, or otherwise. If otherwise, He does not have true knowledge of it. But if as it is, since it neither is nor can be except in potency, the intelligence will only be of the infinite in potency: and concerning this we do not contend.

Solution. It seems to me that the infinite in act is always imperfect, nor is it in God, nor in nature: but I readily concede that God cognizes the infinite as it is finite.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is impossible for any addition to be made to God: because He is something greater than we can think: which is not understood dimensionally, or in multitude, since He is solely one and simple: but because no good can be thought of, but that He is it, and more than can be thought of: but the infinite is nothing of good and perfect, but rather imperfect: therefore it is not understood thus: because, as we said above, it can also be understood how the infinite includes the infinite: yet there are many things which we think of, which are not God: nor is this a mark of imperfection, but of perfection: and His knowledge is infinite in this way: because nothing can be thought of or be, which if it were, would not be in His knowledge, and in the mode according to which it is in His knowledge: because He by understanding Himself to be able to do infinite things, understands infinite things according as they are infinite in potency.

But TO THE SOLUTION brought forward I respond, that either I do not understand what is posited, or intelligence speaks only of the relation of the intellect to the thing, according as it is in whatever way, namely in potency, or in an ideal formal concept having a comparison to that which will be in act, as was expounded above.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Knowledge Of God Is Of Enunciables

Whether the knowledge of God is of enunciables?

Whether the knowledge of God is of enunciables?

Afterwards it is inquired concerning this which he says in the second part, there, B, His knowledge is only of those things which are, or were, or will be, etc.

For according to this it seems that His knowledge is of enunciables.

Which is also proved otherwise: because § 1. Since many things are enunciables, unless God knew them, He would not know all things which are, or will be.

§ 2. Also, otherwise His cognition would be more imperfect than ours: because I not only know you, but I also know you to be, and to read if you are reading, and the like: therefore it seems that God also knows the like.

§ 3. Also, God not only knows subjects, but also knows to be in them all predicates which can be in them: therefore He knows complex things and enunciables, as it seems.

§ 4. Also, otherwise it would follow that He would not know the Antichrist to be future, or Caesar to have been, which is absurd.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. He does not know except through an idea, but an idea is not of complex things: because there is no complexity in God: therefore it seems that He does not have notice of enunciables.

§ 2. Also, the soul, on account of its simplicity, is not simultaneously except of one thing: therefore since God is more simple, He will not be according to His intellect except of one thing: therefore He will not be of complex things, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said that the intellect of God is of complex things incomplexly: for complex things are to be referred to a simple thing, and that to God, which He not only knows as it is simple, but in every complexity which can happen to it from composition, and thus by one thing which is the formal concept not only of being, but of all aptitudes, He understands all complexities and compositions.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is otherwise concerning our intellect and His: because our intellect is not the cause of the thing or of the composition of the thing, but by receiving from things it cognizes things: and therefore since the thing is diverse, the same cannot be received from diverse things, and therefore the intellect will be composite: but His intellect is the cause of every thing and the formal concept of every thing, and therefore through one thing which is the cause and formal concept, the thing can be understood, and the composition of the thing with another thing: because the idea is not the formal concept of the thing in itself, but in the composition of all things and division which it can have essentially or accidentally.

And from this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 6 — Whether Now God Can Know Or Foreknow, As He Could Have Known Or Foreknown From Eternity

Whether God can now know or foreknow, just as He could have known or foreknown from eternity?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says: Thus He can now know or foreknow, just as He could have known or foreknown from eternity.

§ 1. For this seems false: because in our knowledge it follows that if I can know something which I do not know, my knowledge is varied.

§ 2. Also, if I can know something now, it does not follow from this that I had known it before: therefore it seems that these consequences do not hold in God.

Solution. It must be said that it is not similar: but just as the knowable thing is related to our knowledge, so His knowledge is related to the knowable thing. Whence just as in us it follows, there is no knowable thing: therefore there is no knowledge: so conversely it follows, in God there is no knowledge: therefore there is no knowable thing: and just as in us these two are incompossible , namely that I should have knowledge of some knowable thing, and that that knowable thing should not be: because immediately upon my having the knowledge, it follows that that knowable thing is, because my [knowledge] is not effected except by that knowable thing: so in God these two are incompossible, that something should be and that the knowledge of it should not be: because the knowledge of God is the cause of it: and because it is not a cause except from eternity, it follows that from eternity it is the cause of it: and therefore in God to be able to know now and to be able to have known from eternity are the same: and these two are incompossible, that something should happen now, and that He Himself did not know it from eternity: although each according to itself is possible, because one is implied in the other: and when it is posited that something is which will never be, it is posited by consequence that God always knew it, from this, because His knowledge is the eternal cause or prevision of it. And upon this sense the Master proceeds.

Articulus 7 — Whether It Must Be Granted That God Can Know What He Previously Did Not Know Whether it is to be conceded that God can know what He previously did not know?

Afterwards it is inquired concerning this which he says: Therefore He cannot newly or from time know or foreknow anything, etc.

For it is inquired, whether it is to be conceded that God can know what He previously did not know?

And it seems that He can: because § 1. This is hinted at in the last part of the following opinion which he brings forward, that God can know more things than He knew, because it can pass over more things.

§ 2. Also, some object: God can now create what He does not create, and create more things than He creates: therefore similarly He can know more things than He knows.

ON THE CONTRARY: Since knowledge is referred to the knowable thing, if He can know what He previously did not know, it seems to follow that He can have a knowledge which He previously did not have: and this is for God to be altered from imperfect knowledge to perfect.

Solution. It seems to me that it should not be conceded.

But to that which is objected concerning the Letter: I say that he does not intend that some things can happen over which the knowledge of God passes in a new mode, but he intends that some things can happen, over which there would have been knowledge from eternity. And thus He would not know except what He previously and from eternity knew.

To the other it must be said that it is not similar concerning creation: because that posits nothing in God, but in the thing outside: but knowledge is in the knower himself, and therefore the knowledge of a new thing cannot advene to Him without His variation: because that new thing would posit an ideal formal concept in God, which, unless it had been in Him from eternity, posits a variation concerning Him.

Articulus 8 — Whether God Can Know More Things Than He Knows

Whether God can know more things than He knows?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says: Also it is said by some that God can know more things than He knows, etc.

But it seems that this opinion is true: because § 1. More things can be than are: but the knowledge of God, as is held in the preceding chapter, is only of those things which were or will be or are: therefore He can know more things than He knows.

§ 2. Also, He knows whatever He can make: but He can make more things than He makes: therefore He can know more things than He knows.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. God knows whatever He can make: and He cannot know more things than He can make: therefore He cannot know more things than He knows.

§ 2. Also, in eternal things to be and to be able are the same: therefore if He can know more things than He knows, then He also knows more things than He knows, which is impossible.

Solution. In my judgment this composite proposition is false: God can know more things than He knows, just as the Master previously distinguished. And as to what this opinion says, that His knowledge can pass over more things than it passes over without mutation: I understand it thus, that this is because, positing that there be more things, it follows that He had known more things from eternity. And concerning the sun, which some posit for a simile, it is not similar: because in the sun there is no formal concept of cognizing those things over which it shines: which if it were in the sun, it would not be possible for the sun to pour forth the light of intelligence over those things of which there would be no formal concept in it: and thus it is also in God. Whence since He does not receive the formal concepts of intelligibles anew, it is necessary that He has them with Himself from eternity. And through this the solution to the first is clear.

To the second it must be said that He can make more things than He makes, but not know more things in this mode than He knows, except as to be able to know and to be able to have known from eternity: and if more things are posited to be, it is supposed by implication in the supposition, that He knew them from eternity, as was said above.

D. Which seems contrary to that sentence in which it was said above, that God always and simultaneously knows all things.

But to that which was said before, namely that God always and simultaneously sees all things, what Jerome says in the exposition of Habakkuk seems to oppose: It is absurd, he says, to reduce the majesty of God to this, that He should know through single moments how many gnats are born, or how many die, how great is the multitude of fleas and...

...of flies, or how many fishes swim in the waters, and the like. Let us not be such foolish flatterers of God, that while we thrust His providence down even to the lowest things, we are injurious to ourselves, saying that the providence of the irrational and the rational is the same. Here Jerome seems to say that God does not have knowledge or providence of those lesser things: but if this is so, then He does not know all things simultaneously and always. Let us therefore know that this was said in such a sense, that it denies that God knows those things alternately or particularly, nor did He thus cognize them through diverse moments of times, just as through various moments some of them fail, some begin. Neither does He provide for them and other irrational things in the same manner as for rational things. For is there (as the Apostle says) care for oxen by God? And just as there is no care for oxen by God, so neither for other irrational things. Yet Scripture says, that He has care of all things. Therefore He has providence and care universally concerning all things which He founded, so that each one has what is due and suitable to it. But He has special providence and care concerning rational things, to which He handed down precepts, and prescribed for them the law of living rightly and promised rewards. He does not have this providence and care concerning irrational things. And therefore the Apostle says, that there is no care for oxen by God: yet He provides for and cares for all things, that is, He governs all things, who makes His sun to rise upon all, and gives rain*. Therefore God knows how great is the multitude of fleas, gnats, and flies, and fishes: and how many are born, or how many die: but He does not know this through single moments, rather simultaneously and at once all things. Neither does He know thus, that He has the same providence of irrational and rational things, that is, that He provides in entirely the same mode for irrational and rational things. For to rational things He both gave precepts, and delegated Angels for their custody.

Articulus 9 — Whether God Has Knowledge Of Singulars

Whether God has notice of singulars?

Whether God has notice of singulars?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says last, there, D, But to that which was said before, etc.

For it seems that God does not have notice of singulars: because § 1. Boethius says that it is universal while it is understood, singular while it is sensed.

§ 2. Also, every intellect is of universals, as the Philosopher says: because the intellect is simple, and it is necessary that the intelligible be simple: but nothing of singulars is simple: therefore nothing of singulars is present to the intellect.

§ 3. Also, the Philosopher in XI Metaphysics proves that it does not understand anything other than itself, because otherwise its intellect would become vile in vile things, which it is better to ignore than to know: therefore it seems that He does not have notice of singulars.

ON THE CONTRARY: For according to this there will be more things ignored by Him than known.

Also, Boethius in book V of The Consolation of Philosophy:

To Him looking upon all things from on high /No earthly masses resist: /Night does not stand in the way with black clouds. /What are, what were, and are to come /He discerns by one stroke of the mind: /Whom, because He alone looks at all things, /You could call the true sun.

Solution. It must be said with the Master, that God knows all things small and great.

And to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that there is an intellect abstracting form from the thing, and it is necessary that this be purified on account of the materiality which it has in the thing outside, and that is our intellect. Another is the intellect having forms or ideas compositionally as exemplars with the thing, and those are of the universal or of the particular, in such a mode that it is abstracted from neither, and therefore they are not repugnant to the simplicity of the intellect: because the intellect has them with itself, and such are the ideas and forms under which the Angels understand.

To the other it must be said that the Philosopher understands this of the intellect abstracting from things because it is necessary that it take away the conditions of matter from that which it abstracts, and assimilate it to itself. But it is not so of the intellect which is for making the thing through the form of composition: for that has a simple form with itself, which is not determined to this or that by the conditions of matter, but through a relation to this or that: and through it the universal and the particular can be understood, and the universal in the particular, according to the diverse relation of the thing to that form.

To the other it must be said that the Philosopher does not intend that it understands nothing other than itself, as was expounded above: but he intends that it does not understand through anything other than through itself, because by understanding it receives nothing from things. But how His intellect does not become vile, was dispatched above.

DISTINCTIO XL

Divisio Textus

But predestination is of salutary goods, etc.

Here begins that part in which the Master determines concerning divine knowledge according to its species.

And it is divided into two. In the first he determines concerning the species of foreknowledge which are predestination and reprobation. But in the second he touches upon certain questions concerning foreknowledge and knowledge, commonly consequent upon the knowledge of God considered according to genus and considered according to species, which begins in the penultimate chapter of the following distinction XLI, there, F, Furthermore it is necessary to consider, whether all those things which He once knows, etc.

But the preceding is still divided into two. In the first he determines the species of foreknowledge, which are predestination and obduration. But in the second he inquires, whether they have any cause in the predestined, or the foreknown? And this begins at the beginning of the following distinction, XLI, there, A, But if we inquire the merit of obduration, etc.

This distinction is divided into two parts. In the first he touches upon predestination, in the second reprobation, there, D, And since predestination is the preparation of grace, etc.

In the first part he does five things: of which the first is, that he touches upon what things predestination is about. Secondly, he shows that the number of the predestined is certain, there, B, None of the predestined seems, etc. Thirdly, it is objected against sophistically, there, B, §2: But to this some object, etc. Fourthly, he objects more strongly, there, C, Nevertheless they still insist, etc. Fifthly and lastly he solves, there, C, §2: In the solution of this question, etc.

But the sentence is manifest of itself, because the Letter is plain.

Articulus 1 — To Which Attribute Predestination Ought To Be Reduced, Namely To Power, Wisdom, Or Will

To which of the attributes predestination ought to be reduced, whether namely to power, wisdom, or will?

But here, before the Letter, eight things are to be inquired: of which the first is, to which of the three attributes predestination can be reduced, whether to power, or to wisdom, or to will?

Second, what it is in reality and by definition? Third, whether it is of a being, or of a non-being? Fourth, whether it is eternal, or temporal? Fifth, whether it is solely of a creature, or also of another? Sixth is, whether it is of every rational creature, or solely of man? Seventh is, whether it is of every man, or of certain men only? Eighth and last, whether predestination is multiplied according to single predestined persons, or all the predestined are in one, namely in Christ?

Therefore let it be inquired first, Whether it is of power, or wisdom, or will or goodness?

But it seems that it is of knowledge: because § 1. The Master above, at the beginning of distinction XXXV, posits predestination among the names by which knowledge is signified: therefore it is reduced to knowledge.

§ 2. Also, to destine is only in the mind of the one proposing: but to propose is to pre-conceive concerning doing something: but conception is according to the intellect foreknowing the work: since therefore predestination is such a pre-conception, it seems that predestination falls under knowledge.

§ 3. Also, in whatever genus the superior is to something, in the same is the inferior which is received under it: but foreknowledge is in the genus of knowledge: therefore predestination, which is under foreknowledge, as was held above,[111] will be in the genus of knowledge.

But on the contrary it seems to be in the genus of power: § 4. Because, as is held here, predestination is the preparation of grace: but preparation is an act of power: therefore also predestination, as it seems.

§ 2. Also, predestination is eternal, and let this be supposed here, because it has to be proved below: but the predestined are not from eternity, except in the potency of the efficient cause: therefore it seems that predestination is reduced to power, because it is of the power of the efficient cause.

Similarly it seems that it is ordered to the will: § 1. Because it is defined through the will: for Augustine says that predestination is the will or purpose of having mercy.

§ 2. Also, grace and glory which are effects of predestination, are indicative of goodness: but goodness is a disposition of the will: therefore also predestination.

§ 3. Also, 1 Timothy 2:4: Who om-

§ 1. ...[om]nes homines vult salvos fieri, etc. [112] However, the will for salvation is from predestination: therefore it seems that predestination is ordered toward the will.

§ 2. SOLUTION. It must be said that predestination is in the genus of effective or practical knowledge, and thus it has something of knowledge and something of will: and because these incline a potency toward a work, therefore it also has something of the act of a potency. But that which belongs to practical knowledge gives it its being; whereas that which belongs to the will and to potency is in it by way of a property, according as the will concerns what is known practically, and according as the operating potency extends itself through the work to do it: and therefore the first reasons are to be conceded.

§ 3. To that which is objected concerning potency, it must be said that this belongs to predestination as if consequently according to the ratio of intelligence, namely because such knowledge is directed toward a work.

§ 4. To that which is objected concerning the will, it must be said that such knowledge is always conjoined to the will: but nevertheless predestination rather takes its name from the side of knowledge than from the side of the will: and nothing prohibits something, according to diverse things that are in it, from being ordered under diverse genera.

Articulus 2 — What Predestination Is In Reality

What is predestination in reality?

§ 5. Next it is asked what it is? And this is divided into two, namely, to ask first, What is it in reality? and second, What is it by definition?

§ 6. TO THE FIRST one proceeds thus: 1. It seems that predestination is something created, and not God: because when I say, "this man is predestined," I say something by signifying passively: therefore I signify that this is from another in him: but such a mode of signifying does not befit God, because He has nothing from another: therefore the predestination of the predestined is not God.

§ 7. 2. Moreover, nothing that is God denominates this person as predestined: therefore predestination is not God.

§ 8. 3. Again, action and passion are beings which have opposite respects to each other: which is evident from their definitions when it is said, "action is that according to which we say that we act upon that which is subjected"; and "passion is the effect and inference of action." Therefore they do not apply to the same thing, nor can they be in the same thing. Since therefore God is the one predestining, He Himself will not be the predestination by which this or that person is predestined: therefore since predestination belongs to the predestined, predestination is not God.

§ 9. 4. Again, when it is said, "God creates," the reality of the verb which is creation, is the same as the eduction from nothing into something: but this eduction, as a form, is in what is educed: therefore it is in the creature, and not in the Creator: therefore similarly predestination will be in the predestined, and not in God: therefore really it is not God.

§ 10. 5. Again, it seems absurd that God should be called the reprobation of the damned. Since therefore predestination posits no more in the creature than reprobation does, it seems also that predestination is not God.

111. See above, dist. XXXV.

§ 11. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Nothing is from eternity except God alone: but the predestination by which all those who will be saved are predestined, is from eternity: therefore it is God.

§ 12. 2. Again, when it is said, "predestination is the purpose of having mercy," nothing falls in the nominative case in the definition that is not God. Similarly when it is said, "the preparation of grace in the present and of glory in the future": for preparation is God preparing, since God as agent is His own action: but grace and glory fall there in oblique cases: therefore it seems that the predestination of the predestined is God Himself.

§ 13. SOLUTION. Speaking without prejudice, I consent to the last two reasons, that predestination, according to that which it is in reality, whether it is taken from the side of the one predestining, or from the side of the predestined, is always God. For if it is taken in that which is predestination, it posits nothing in any time: and if it sometimes has an effect in the predestined one with respect to whom it is, this happens to it from the side of the connoted effect. It must be known, therefore, that predestination is as it were a mean between God predestining and man predestined, and predestination itself denotes the habitude of God proposing to save toward saving: and therefore predestination is not posited in the predestined one, according as he exists as diverse from God in his proper nature, but according as he is in the knowledge of the Creator: but according to this that he is there, it was proved above that he himself is the creative essence, and not a created nature: therefore that which it thus posits concerning him, is not distinguished from the divine essence, but is the divine essence itself, and the respect to the thing which God will work in the future is co-understood.

§ 14. IT MUST BE SAID therefore to the first, that when it is said, "predestined," it is not signified there passively except as to the mode with respect to us, and not according to reality: for the sense is, that this man is foreseen to be saved, and the word "foreseen" does not posit anything according to reality outside the one foreseeing, although it posits a respect as to something, which in the future will be other than God, about which the effect of predestination will be. Hence for such a mode of signifying actively or passively the diversity of reason is sufficient which is between the one foreseeing and the foreseen, not in itself, but in the ideal reason in which it was from eternity.

§ 15. To another it must be said, that predestination is not formally in the predestined: because it does not denote a form whose being would be absolutely terminated in him, but rather a respect toward saving, for which it suffices that it be in a qualified sense, namely in idea, so that such a form is signified in him.

§ 16. To another it must be said, that the one predestining and the predestined are not related simply as active and passive according to nature, but only according to some mode of signifying in which the dependence of the one to be saved upon the Savior is noted according to reason, that is, of an efficient cause, and not conversely.

§ 17. To another it must be said, that it is not similar: because when it is said, "God creates," this does not belong to God except from time: hence it names not only a respect to the creature, but also an effect in the creature, and that can essentially be the reality of the verb, although it is from God: but when it is said, "God predestined Peter or Paul," nothing is noted except a respect to the creature, which is fitting from eternity, and therefore it posits nothing outside of God.

§ 18. To another it must be said, that in my judgment it is not absurd that God should be called reprobation: for in reprobation only two things are said, namely the foresight of iniquity, and the preparation of punishment: and each, which falls in the nominative case in the definition of reprobation, names the divine essence with a respect to that which falls obliquely in that definition, namely iniquity and punishment: of which the first does not posit its proper species in God, but the second does have a species there. Hence I do not reckon it absurd that God should be called the reprobation itself by which the iniquitous are reprobated.

Articulus 3 — What Predestination Is By Definition

What is predestination by definition?

§ 19. TO THE SECOND one proceeds thus, and many definitions of predestination are posited: for we have one here in the Letter [of Lombard] in the last chapter of this distinction: "Predestination is the foreknowledge and preparation..." "...of the benefits by which whoever are liberated are most certainly liberated" .

§ 20. Another is Augustine's in the book On Faith to Peter: "Predestination is the preparation of a gratuitous donation" .

§ 21. Another is Augustine's in the book On the Predestination of the Saints: "Predestination is the purpose of having mercy" .

§ 22. Again, "Predestination is the destination of someone to an end."

§ 23. Again, the Masters posit another: "Predestination is the preparation of grace in the present and of glory in the future."

§ 24. But it is objected against the first: because 1. Predestination does not seem to posit a preparation that adds something above foreknowledge: for since there are three things: the divine essence, and the respect to the creature, and the effect in the creature: foreknowledge denotes the first two, and not the third: but preparation also denotes the same two, and not the third, because since preparation is from eternity, it does not denote the effect in the creature: therefore it seems that the one adds nothing over the other: therefore one is superfluously conjoined to the other.

§ 25. 2. Moreover, benefits are manifold, not all of which fall under the ratio of sanctifying grace: which nonetheless liberate from some evils: is predestination therefore of these? It seems not: because we do not say that there is a predestination of the scourged, although it is said, 2 Maccabees 6:13: "Not to suffer sinners to act according to their own judgment for a long time, but straightway to apply punishments, is a sign of an extreme benefit" .

112. Aristotle, De Anima, III.

§ 26. 3. Again, Damascene says that God does not compel to virtue, nor persuade to vice . Therefore it seems that predestination does not most certainly liberate.

§ 27. 4. Again, the most certain mode is the mode of demonstrative necessity: but predestination does not have this mode in liberating, because it does not take away liberty from free choice: therefore it seems that predestination does not most certainly liberate.

§ 28. Similarly it is objected concerning the second, which is said to be "the preparation of a gratuitous donation." 1. For a thing is not said to be prepared when it is not, except in an efficient cause, as is evident: for when it is said, "a house is prepared," it is not understood to be prepared by the fact that there is an artisan who is knowledgeable and powerful, but rather when the wood is hewn and the parts of the house are erected: therefore similarly the preparation of a gratuitous donation is not except when free choice is already prepared to receive, and when grace is infused: but these are not from eternity: therefore the preparation of a gratuitous donation is not from eternity: but predestination is from eternity: therefore it is poorly defined by preparation.

§ 29. 2. Again, a gratuitous donation is that which is given without merits, because a gratuitous donation is nothing other than that which is given gratis: therefore it seems that according to that definition it would only be of the first grace, and not of glory, or of subsequent grace which is given after prevenient grace: which is contrary to the last definition.

§ 30. Similarly it is objected concerning the third. 1. For predestination is from eternity: therefore it seems that it is not caused by anything temporal: but misery is temporal: therefore it seems that predestination does not regard the state of misery, except accidentally: therefore it is not the purpose of having mercy, as it seems, except accidentally: therefore predestination should not be defined by this.

§ 31. Again, according to this it would not apply to all who are nevertheless predestined, such as the Angels and Christ: for no misery was alleviated in them.

§ 32. Again, man would have been predestined even if he had not sinned: and yet no misery would have been taken away from him.

§ 33. 2. Moreover it is asked, whether it is understood of the misery of fault or of the misery of punishment, or both? And it seems that it is of the misery of fault: because it used to be said that predestination necessarily posits final grace, but this relieves only fault and not punishment. But on the contrary: Grace and glory remove punishment and fault: but predestination is the preparation of grace and of glory in the future: therefore it seems that it is understood of both miseries.

§ 34. In the same way it is objected concerning the following, that "predestination is the destination of someone to an end." 1. For if the end unto which the destination is directed is posited there, it necessarily presupposes the principle of the same destination, and the medium through which the destination is: what therefore are those?

§ 35. 2. Again, since to destine is equivocal to proposing and sending, it seems rather to be taken for proposing, than for sending. PROOF: For no one is sent except he who is: but he who is not is predestined: therefore to predestine is not to destine someone, but rather to destine something beforehand in purpose, just as it is said, 2 Maccabees 6:20, concerning Eleazar, that he destined not to admit illicit things for the love of life . This also seems so through John Damascene, where he calls predestination predetermination but predetermination belongs rather to one premeditating than to one pre-sending someone into something.

§ 36. 3. Again, if predestination were the destination of someone into something else, it would not be called the preparation of grace and glory: because grace and glory are not directed to something: but rather it would be called the preparation of the Angel or man who is directed.

§ 37. Finally it is also objected against the last one: because 1. Present grace and glory in the future denote something in time, whereas predestination denotes nothing in time.

§ 38. 2. Again, Damascene says that providence and predestination are of those things which are not in us, or in our power but glory in some way is in our power through grace, for it falls under merit, which is in our power: therefore it seems that predestination is not of grace and glory?

§ 39. Moreover, since there is a single definition for a single thing, it is asked: According to what are the assigned definitions taken?

§ 40. SOLUTION. It must be said that predestination is defined as to something of itself in all those definitions: and because there are many things in it, therefore many definitions are given. For predestination can be defined in itself, or according to some state of being predestined. If in itself: then it has in itself a remote genus, and the coarctation of that genus through the act of the operating cause, and its effects. Or also the name of predestination can be attended to. I say therefore that the first is given through the remote genus which is foreknowledge, and is contracted through the act of the operating cause, and the proximate effect which is the benefits most certainly liberating. The second, however, considers only the act of the operating cause and the effect. But the last considers the proximate and remote effect, which is effected mediatingly by another: because grace in some way effects glory. But the third is given according to the state of the predestined person who is in misery, such as man after sin. The fourth is the reason explaining the name of predestination. And through this the solution to the last objection is evident.

§ 41. To the first, however, it must be said that although predestination does not denote an effect in the creature, yet by the mode of signifying it adds something above foreknowledge: because foreknowledge of itself does not posit causality toward the foreknown, but preparation denotes the sufficiency of causality toward the act and effect.

§ 42. To another it must be said, that predestination is not properly except of grace, and of glory, and other things are indirectly operating toward liberation, such as by satisfying, or humiliating, or merely rendering: but grace directly works liberation, which makes one worthy of eternal life, and directs into the kingdom: hence also other benefits are common to the predestined and the non-predestined, but not final sanctifying grace: and therefore it is evident that this is the effect of predestination.

§ 43. To another it must be said, that predestination does not compel to virtue, but nevertheless it finally produces it in the one freely accepting and willing: because although he is not forced to accept it, yet it will inevitably incline the will to accept it.

§ 44. To another it must be said, that in foreknowledge and predestination there is not the certitude of demonstration: because they are not causes through which salvation can be inferred by necessity of the reality, but by necessity of consequence only, as we said above concerning the infallibility of divine foreknowledge, and again it will be shown below, when it is asked concerning the certitude of the number of the predestined.

§ 45. To that which is objected concerning the second definition, it must be said that it is otherwise in a created artisan, and the uncreated artisan: because the created artisan does not produce matter, but only prepares it, receiving it from outside. But God both produces that which is necessary for the work, and operates by preparing in it. For there are three things, namely art, nature, and God. Art operates upon matter by impressing the species of art, not by giving to matter a conservative power of the form which it impresses, as is evident in the figure of carving, which the stone retains not from a power that it receives from the artisan, but by the power which it has from nature. But nature gives the form and things conserving the form: for when the generator gives the form and by transmuting the matter from the form which it previously had, and from the accidents and powers which it previously had, by giving the form, it gives all the accidents to the composite from that form which conserve the form in matter. But God does the whole, and matter, and form, and properties: and therefore sufficient preparation is in Him alone knowing, being able, and willing even before He acts: but it is not so in matter, and still less in art: hence the simile which was brought forward as a simile was not similar.

§ 46. To another it must be said, that some say with Damascene, that predestination per se is only of grace, and of glory consequently, and not primarily, because it is given to our work which is in our power. But it can better be said, that Damascene speaks truly: but then predestination is of three things, namely of grace, and merit, and glory. And grace indeed is not in our power, such that it is from us according to what it is, although we can work something toward it, namely by doing what is in us. But merit is not in our power insofar as it is meritorious, because this is from grace: but nevertheless it is from our power in another way, namely because the meritorious act is from us: for free choice gives the act, and grace informs it. But glory is not in our power according as it is abundant beyond merit: for it is related to that which is in our power, by the fact that it is given to meritorious acts: and this is not in all, because in infants the effect of predestination is not work, but grace and glory only.

§ 47. To that which is objected concerning the third, it must be said, that it can well be said that this definition regards the state from the side of the predestined, which God foresees: and that by this definition predestination does not apply to all the predestined, but only to fallen man. Or if we wish to extend predestination generally, then we say that misery in the definition does not regard a misery that is in the predestined, but which would be if there were not the effect of predestination: for mercy precedes by showing mercy, lest he fall into misery: and with this misery an Angel would be miserable and also human nature assumed in Christ, if it were separated from the grace of union, or had not then been assumed: and the definition has no doubt.

§ 48. TO THE LAST which is objected against that definition, it must be said that it can well be understood of both miseries according to order, so that first fault is removed through grace, and punishment through glory.

§ 49. To that which is objected against the following definition, it must be said that in truth the end of destination, and the medium, and the principle are there. But the principle is the purpose, and the preparation of grace is as it were the medium which is set out in the course that is in time, and glory is as the end: and therefore this destination begins from eternity, and is directed through the time of the whole course, again into eternity.

§ 50. To another it must be said, that destination is understood to fall into the ratio of predestination in both ways. In one way by reason of the purpose of the one destining, and in another way by reason of the direction. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that although no one is destined except him who is, nevertheless he who is not in his proper nature can be predestined, although he is in God's knowledge: because the preposition compounded with the verb notes the precedence of eternity to time.

§ 51. To another it must be said, that preparation is understood in both: but God prepares by electing those whom He directs, and He prepares for them the goods by which they become fit for direction: however, the effect of grace and glory alone is expressed, because those denote the medium and end of the direction, which predestination, signified in the abstract, imports.

§ 52. To that which is objected against the last definition, it must be said that the preparation of grace and glory does not posit grace and glory according to act, but only from the side of the preparer: and therefore it does not follow that predestination has anything from time.

§ 53. To another the solution is evident through the aforesaid.

Articulus 4 — Whether Predestination Is Of Being Or Of Non-Being

Whether predestination is of a being, or of a non-being?

§ 54. Thirdly it is asked, Whether predestination is of a being, or of a non-being?

§ 55. But it seems, that it is of a being: because 1. It is said, Romans 1:4: "Who was predestinated the Son of God in power." There Origen posits such a text: "Who was predestinated in power": and he says upon that in the Gloss: "Destination is of him who is" . Therefore it seems that predestination is of a being.

§ 56. 2. Again, predestination is preparation: but preparation is of a being: therefore also predestination.

§ 57. 3. Again, election is, when two things are proposed, the pre-opting of one, as Damascene wills therefore election is of a being: therefore also predestination: because predestination is only of the elect.

§ 58. 4. Again, predestination is only of what is known: but what is known is a being: therefore predestination also is of a being.

§ 59. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Ephesians 1:4: "He chose us in him before the foundation of the world": but before the foundation of the world we were not: therefore predestination does not seem to be of a being.

§ 60. 2. Again, predestination is eternal: but the predestined are not from eternity: therefore, etc.

§ 61. 3. Again, it was held above from Augustine, that they are elected who are not: neither does he who elects err, nor did he elect vainly: therefore it seems that it is not of a being.

§ 62. SOLUTION. It must be said that predestination, as predestination, is not of a being simply, but of a being in a qualified sense, that is, in divine knowledge, as has been frequently expounded.

§ 63. TO THE FIRST, however, it must be said that predestination indeed is only of a being: but predestination denotes an order of precedence to the predestined one, and therefore it can be of a non-being: and Origen does not contradict this. But if you say that he takes destination and predestination for the same thing: then I respond, that destination thus written does not posit a being simply, but in a qualified sense in divine knowledge.

§ 64. To another it must be said, that preparation is not posited here except according to habit with respect to the sufficiency of the preparer, and not with respect to the act which posits grace in the creature.

§ 65. To another it must be said, that election does not posit here except those existing in a qualified sense, namely in the knowledge of the elector: and pre-opting is of those whom He knows will receive grace well, and will use it well: yet they are not posited to be absolutely.

§ 66. To another it must be said, that the known in us posits a being prior in nature or in time: but in God it is conversely: because His knowledge does not depend on a being as on a cause, but rather conversely a being depends on it, because it is caused by it.

Articulus 5 — Whether Predestination Is Eternal Or Temporal; And, Whether It Puts Something In Time In The Predestined

Whether predestination is eternal or temporal? And, whether it posits anything in time in the predestined?

§ 67. Fourthly it is asked, Whether it is eternal, or temporal?

§ 68. But it seems to be eternal: because 1. It is a species of foreknowledge: therefore since foreknowledge is eternal, predestination itself will also be eternal.

§ 69. 2. Again, it has been proved that it itself is God predestining: but nothing is God except what is eternal: therefore predestination is eternal.

§ 70. 3. Again, the purpose of having mercy denotes only what is eternal: therefore since predestination denotes the purpose of having mercy, it will be eternal.

§ 71. ON THE CONTRARY: Nothing eternal is defined through what is temporal: predestination is defined through what is temporal, because through grace and glory: therefore it is not purely eternal.

§ 72. Next to this it is asked, Whether it posits anything in time in the predestined?

§ 73. But it seems that it does: because, on John 1:47 et seq., the Gloss says that it was better for Nathanael to know both natures in Christ, than to be predestined . Since therefore the comparison is between univocal goods, and the knowledge of the two natures in Christ was a temporal good, it seems that it posits something temporal in the predestined.

§ 74. Again, it seems false what the Gloss says, because even a wicked and damned person can know both natures in Christ: therefore since predestination is only of those to be saved, as is held in the Letter [of Lombard], predestination seems to be something better than the knowledge of the two natures in Christ. If perhaps you say, that this is so, because predestination posits nothing in the predestined, whereas knowledge posits something. Against: According to this there can be no comparison: because of that which is not, there is no comparison to that which is.

§ 75. Again, at least it posits final grace: and that is something, and is better than the knowledge of the two natures in Christ.

§ 76. SOLUTION. It must be said that predestination posits nothing in the predestined for the present, but leaves final grace as an effect: yet it always denotes a respect to the predestined, although it does not necessarily connote an effect for the present: and therefore of itself it is eternal, and not temporal: for the effect, which is grace and glory, falls obliquely in the definition of predestination, and they are nothing of the essence of predestination, although they are those things toward which its respect of causality is noted.

§ 77. And through this the solution to the objection is already evident: because an eternal thing denoting a respect to a creature can well be defined through that creature, provided that it falls obliquely in its definition.

§ 78. To that which is further asked, it must be said that it posits nothing of itself in the creature, nor does it posit the predestined creature to be, but nevertheless it denotes a respect toward it.

§ 79. To this, however, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that according to the intention of the Gloss two things are compared to a third taken per se, and this according to state, and not according to personal grace or personal good: for predestination runs in the Old Law, and the Law of Grace, or the Law of Christ: but the knowledge of the two natures in Christ through the presence of the Redeemer, was only in the New Law: and therefore the knowledge of the natures does not exclude predestination, but rather leads to it through the effect of grace: and therefore comparison is made of the grace of the New Law, which shows the grace to which we are predestined, to the state in which we were nothing but predestined to grace, and did not possess it, that is, the grace of redemption, through which our grace is worth whatever it can be worth, as the Master says in III Sentences . And thus the Gloss is clear.

§ 80. And through this the solution to the following objections is also evident.

Articulus 6 — Whether Predestination Belongs to the Rational Creature Alone, or Also to Another

Whether predestination is of the rational creature alone, or also of another?

§ 81. Fifthly it is asked, Whether it is of the rational creature alone, or also of another?

§ 82. But it seems that it is also of another: because 1. This is said in the Letter [of Lombard] at the beginning of the reading, that predestination is of saving goods, such as are virtues, and grace, and glory, which are not rational creatures.

§ 83. 2. Again, Augustine says that punishments are predestined for the wicked: therefore it seems to be of the good and the bad, the rational and the irrational.

§ 85. Again, it seems that there is no predestination to glory: because he who is predestined is always predestined: but it is certain that he who is destined to something, when he is in it, is no longer predestined, just as the Saints existing in glory do not have any further end to which they may be destined: therefore if glory were their ultimate end, they would not be predestined when they are already glorified, which is false, because they are always predestined: therefore it seems that predestination is not.

§ 86. SOLUTION. It must be said to the first, that predestination is taken in two ways, namely commonly, and properly. Commonly it denotes the foresight and preparation of a mansion only, not determining this mansion or that: and thus punishments are said to be predestined for the wicked. Properly it denotes the foresight and preparation of a mansion, and the cause of the mansion, just as grace is the cause of the mansion. Hence Augustine upon that, "I go to prepare a place for you" says that He predestined the mansions. But in this way it is still taken in two ways. For predestination is spoken of as of whom, or who is predestined: and it is spoken of as through what, and as toward what. In the first way it is only of the rational creature. In the second way it is of the goods by which the rational creature is liberated, and toward which it is directed. And through this the solution to the first part of the question is evident.

§ 87. To another it must be said, that predestined can be taken participially and nominally. If participially: then even with glory already obtained someone is truly said to be predestined, because concerning the past it will be true to say that God predestined him. But if it is taken nominally, and is as it were a verbal noun: then still the glory which he obtains can be considered in two ways, namely in itself according as it is the end of predestination: and thus he will not quite properly be called still predestined. Also, the continuation of glory and its immensity from the side of the object in which glory is can be considered, which cannot be finished: and thus the blessed continually enter glory, and can still be called predestined.

§ 88. And through this the solution to the following part of the question is evident.

Articulus 7 — Whether Predestination Is of Every Rational Creature, or of Man Only; And, Whether Christ Is Predestined

Whether predestination is of every rational creature, or of man alone? And, whether Christ is predestined?

§ 89. Sixthly it is asked, Whether it is of every rational creature, or only of man?

§ 90. And it seems that it is not of the Angels: because 1. Predestination is the preparation of grace in the present and of glory in the future: but in the Angels, according to some, grace did not precede glory: therefore it seems that they were not predestined.

§ 91. 2. Again, if predestination is the purpose of having mercy, it seems not to befit the Angels, in whom either misery never was, or if it is in them, it is irremediable, as in the demons.

§ 92. 3. Again, to be destined belongs to one who is distant: but one distant as to the act of contemplation is only one using a mirror and an enigma but an Angel does not use a mirror and an enigma, but sees face to face: therefore neither does the name of predestination befit him, as it seems.

§ 93. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. No sanctifying grace is possessed by a rational creature which is not prepared and foreseen by God: since therefore the standing Angels received grace, it was prepared and foreseen for them: and these two fall under another predestination: therefore they are predestined, as it seems.

§ 94. 2. Again, no one receives the mansion of beatitude for whom the mansion itself is not foreseen and prepared: therefore since an Angel received the mansion, it was prepared and foreseen for him: therefore he was predestined to it from eternity, as it seems.

§ 1. Further, it is asked next to this, Whether Christ is predestined?

§ 2. It seems that he is: According to Romans 1:4: Who was predestined the Son of God in power, according to the spirit of sanctification, by the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ from the dead.[113] Moreover, Augustine and Ambrose say this. Moreover, Origen says in the same place, "He is destined who is." Therefore it seems that not only was he predestined, but also that predestination, which was from eternity, belongs to the person.

§ 3. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. To the eternal, no antecession [i.e., priority or preceding] can be noted: the Son of God is from eternity: therefore with respect to himself no antecession can be noted. But predestination notes an antecession to the one predestined: therefore it does not belong to the Son of God. If perhaps you say that it belongs to him as to his human nature which was not from eternity: this seems to be nothing: because predestination properly belongs to the person, and not to the nature: hence we say that Peter and Paul are predestined, not their souls or bodies.

§ 4. Furthermore, Augustine expounds this concerning the person, and not the nature.

§ 5. 2. Also, let it even be granted that it is understood concerning the nature, it still seems not to belong to him: because in Book III of the Sentences it is said that grace was natural to that man: therefore it seems that the nature had no antecession to grace, neither in order nor in time: therefore he was not destined to grace.

§ 6. 3. Also, He was always a comprehensor [i.e., one who has attained the beatific vision]: therefore he was always full of glory: therefore he was never destined unto it.

§ 7. Solution. It must be said that predestination belongs to every rational creature, both of men and of Angels, and it is also of Christ the man insofar as he is a man; such that a distribution is made for the genera of individuals, not for the individuals of genera. But this I well concede, that a rational creature is not related to predestination in only one way: rather, man has the antecession of eternity to his person and nature, and an order of nature to grace, and a state of the way [i.e., earthly pilgrimage] progressing in grace to glory. The Angel, however, indeed has an antecession of eternity to his person and nature, and an order of nature to grace —according to some in nature only, according to some also in time—but did not have the distance of a way from grace to glory: though according to some he did have the distance of a way from confirmation, which was the complement of glory and the perfection of beatitude. Christ, however, did not have the antecession of eternity to his person, but to one of his natures, nor an antecession of nature to the grace of union or to the habit of his soul, nor even a distance of a way between grace and the glory of his soul in himself, but only in his members: in himself, however, he had the distance of a way between grace and the glory of his body. And thus it is clear how the things that pertain to predestination are found by priority and posteriority in the predestined man, the Angel, and Christ.

§ 8. To the first, therefore, it must be said that grace in the Angels, according to all, preceded glory as to confirmation, although not as to the habit of glory.

§ 9. To the next it must be said that mercy preserving from misery is saved in the Angels and in man according to the first state, as was said above.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that distance is manifold, namely in the mode of contemplation and in the way of progressing to beatitude. In the first way he had no distance, but in the second way he did, if beatitude or a part of beatitude is called confirmation.

§ 11. To that which is further asked concerning Christ, it must be said that predestination belongs to the person in the nature, and not according to himself: and thus all the sayings are saved, namely of Origen, Ambrose, and Augustine: because then it is with respect to the person, and it belongs to him with respect to the person to be destined into nature and grace simultaneously and glory. However, it does not belong to him to be so predestined [in himself]: but with respect to the nature alone it belongs to him to be predestined into the grace of union: whereas with respect to the person in the nature it belongs to him, as Augustine says, to be preordained into the grace of reconciliation, so that the preordination is referred to the person, not as the grace of the person, but as the grace of the nature.

§ 12. To THE OBJECTIONS, however, it must be said that although predestination is of the person, nevertheless it is not necessary that the grace of the person belong to him, but rather the grace of the nature.

§ 13. To the next it must be said that grace is said to be natural to that man, not because it is his nature, but because it is for his being a person: hence predestination also properly refers to the supposit of the man insofar as he is this man.

§ 14. To the next it must be said that although there was no distance of a way for grace from the habit of glory, there was nevertheless in some respect in the body and in the soul: and in the body as to the glory of the body, while in the soul as to the fact that before death he co-suffered with the body, whereas after the resurrection he did not: and in Book III of the Sentences the Master says that Christ merited for himself impassibility in the soul and immortality in the body.

Articulus 8 — Whether Predestination Is of All Men, or Only of Certain Ones

Whether predestination is of all men, or only of some?

§ 16. Seventhly it is asked, Whether predestination is of all men, or only of some?

§ 17. It seems, moreover, that it is of all: because 1. The Apostle says, 1 Timothy 2:4: Who wills all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of his name. Therefore he prepared grace and glory for all: because preparation (as was held earlier) is only from the will of the one preparing.

§ 18. 2. Also, Anselm says that there is no cause why certain ones do not have grace, because God was unwilling to give it: but rather, because while he extends it, they are unwilling to receive it: therefore it seems that, on his part, he prepared it equally for all.

§ 19. 3. Also, James 1:5: If any of you lacks wisdom, let him ask of God, who gives to all abundantly, and does not reproach. Therefore he is prepared to give to all. Also, to the Romans 10:12: The same is Lord over all, rich unto all who call upon him.

§ 20. 4. Also, the Eternal, as Anselm says, encloses within itself all time and all things that are in time: just as the present time encloses in itself every place, and all things that are in place: therefore it relates equally to all temporal things: since therefore predestination is eternal, it seems that it relates equally to all.

§ 21. 5. Also, Dionysius says, and also the Philosopher, that the first relates equally to all things: but not all things relate equally to it.

§ 22. 6. Also, Apocalypse 3:20: Behold, I stand at the door and knock. Therefore it seems that he prepared for all.

§ 23. ON THE CONTRARY: Many are called, but few are chosen. Since therefore election belongs to the one predestining, he rejects some, and predestines others.

§ 24. Also, Baruch 3:27: These the Lord did not choose.

§ 25. Also, Malachi 1:2 and 3: Jacob I have loved, but Esau I have hated. And here many things can be adduced concerning this.

§ 26. Solution. It must be said that predestination is not of all, but only of some, namely of those prepared for grace and glory. What the reason for this is, must be determined in the following distinction, where it will be asked, Whether predestination has any cause?

§ 27. To THE FIRST, therefore, it must be said that according to Damascene, this is understood concerning the antecedent will, and not the consequent. For the antecedent will is that which does not have a relation to, nor posits an effect toward our cause, that is, toward our merits: for the will considered thus produces nothing except toward salvation. But the consequent will is that which is from our cause, according to which, by foreseeing malice, he reprobates some, and elects others, that they might use grace well.

§ 28. To the next it must be said that this is true with respect to him: because otherwise we would not be culpable for not receiving grace: but predestination does not signify only the will to give, but also the preparation of grace for those whom he foresaw will wish to receive it: hence it signifies a relation to the receiver. Therefore, although the will of the giver is one with respect to all, nevertheless his relation to the receiver and the non-receiver is not one, and predestination names this relation. It is clear, therefore, that predestination does not relate in only one way.

§ 29. To the next it must be said that this authority speaks of the apposition of grace in the present: for that is denied to no one congruously asking for it.

§ 30. To the next it must be said that this is true of eternal things which are taken as eternity is a measure excelling all time: but it is not true of eternal things related to certain temporal things: and predestination signifies such an eternal thing, and therefore it is not related in one way to all.

§ 31. To the next it must be said in the same way, that when a relation is not adjoined, the first is related in one way to all things: but if a relation to this or that, in this way or that way, is adjoined, it is not true: and the same mode of solving applies to the following points.

Articulus 9 — Whether Predestination Is Multiplied According to Individual Predestined Persons, or All the Predestined Are in One

Whether predestination is multiplied according to the individual predestined persons, or are all the predestined in one?

§ 33. Eighthly and lastly it is asked, Whether predestination is multiplied according to the individual predestined persons, or are all the predestined in one?

§ 34. It seems, moreover, that we are all predestined in Christ: because 1. The Apostle says to the Ephesians 1:4, that he chose us in him, that is in Christ, before the foundation of the world: since therefore election belongs to predestination, it seems that he predestined us in him.

§ 35. 2. Also, to the Ephesians 1:10, he says that in him he restored the things that are in the heavens and the things that are on earth: and he restored nothing which he did not foresee and prepare from eternity: therefore it seems that he also predestined in him all the things restored: but all the predestined are restored: therefore all the predestined are in him, as it seems.

§ 36. ON THE CONTRARY: Predestination is the preparation of grace, etc.: but by one preparation Christ and Peter are not prepared: therefore neither is there one predestination. But concerning this it has been sufficiently said elsewhere, namely in Book III of the Sentences.

§ 37. Solution. It must be said that we are not predestined in Christ absolutely, but as to something: for there is formally gratifying grace, and as to this we are not predestined in Christ: because our grace was never essentially in Christ. There is also the grace expediting our grace to act with respect to the fact that it can avail us, and as to this we are predestined in Christ: because, as the Master says in Book III of the Sentences, our penance would not avail us, nor our works, unless Christ had satisfied for us: and thus the inducted authorities are understood: and through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 10 — Whether Predestination Can Be without Foreknowledge; And, Why Reprobation Is Rather Called Foreknowledge than Predestination

Can predestination be without foreknowledge? and, Why is reprobation called foreknowledge rather than predestination?

§ 39. Next it is asked concerning those things which are said in the Letter of the first chapter, A, where it says: That it cannot be without foreknowledge, etc.

§ 40. For this seems to be false: because they are species of knowledge divided by opposition, in that foreknowledge is said to be of evil things, but predestination of good things.

§ 41. FURTHERMORE I ask, Why did reprobation retain the name of the genus rather than predestination?

§ 42. Solution. To this it must be said that here in the Letter, foreknowledge is taken as a genus to predestination and to foreknowledge strictly accepted: and thus it is true that predestination is not without foreknowledge.

§ 43. To the next it must be said that reprobation with respect to foreseen iniquity does not signify any causality or effect in God: but predestination adds this, and the notion by the added difference contracts the genus: but reprobation does not, and therefore it retains the name of the genus.

§ 44. And if you object that it adds causality to punishment, it must be said that punishment is not prepared from the will in the same way as glory: rather it is prepared by respect to our work, and God does not will it except by a consequent will.

Articulus 11 — Whether Both the Counting Number and the Counted Number of the Elect Are Certain; And, Whether One Written in the Book of Life Can Be Blotted Out from It

Whether both the numbering number and the numbered number of the elect are certain? and, Whether one written in the book of life can be deleted from it?

§ 46. Next it is asked concerning this which he says in the second chapter B: None of the predestined seems able to be damned.

§ 47. For there he touches upon the number of the elect, concerning which it must first be asked, Whether both the numbering number [i.e., God's knowledge] and the numbered number [i.e., the individuals themselves] of the elect is certain? Secondly, By what certainty is it certain? Thirdly, Whether one can take the crown of another? because he seems to say this in the Letter.

§ 48. To THE FIRST one proceeds thus: 1. Upon that passage of Luke 5:6: Their net was breaking, the Gloss says: Not as many enter from the Jews, as are predestined to life. Therefore it seems that the numbering number and the numbered number can be diminished. Therefore by the same reason it can also be increased.

§ 49. 2. Also, Deuteronomy 1:11: May the Lord add to this number many thousands. The Gloss there says, To this number, namely the one pre-defined in the knowledge of God, by which he knows who are his. Therefore to that pre-defined number something can be added: therefore it seems that it is not certain.

§ 50. 3. Also, Job 34:24: He shall crush many, and innumerable ones, and shall make others to stand for them. The Gloss of Gregory there says: As some fall, others are allotted the place of life. Therefore it seems that at least the numbered number is not certain.

§ 51. 4. Also, Apocalypse 3:11, upon that text, Hold what you have, etc., the Gloss says: As some fall, others are sub-inducted into their place.

§ 52. 5. Also, Exodus 32:31 and 32: Either forgive them this trespass, or if you do not, delete me from your book which you have written. Therefore someone is deletable from the number of the predestined: therefore the number can be changed.

§ 53. 6. Also by reason the same is proven thus: Posit any designated number you wish, and let one of them be existing now: either he is of free will or not. If not: then he cannot merit, nor demerit: therefore he will not be in the kingdom of heaven on account of merit: therefore he is not of the number of the predestined, and this is contrary to the premise. If, however, he is in a state of flexible free will: therefore he can transgress. Let him transgress therefore, since when a possible is posited nothing impossible follows: and if he transgresses, it is possible for him to die in such a state. Let him die therefore, still nothing impossible ought to follow: but then it follows that the number of the predestined is diminished: therefore it is possible for the number of the predestined to be diminished.

§ 54. 7. In entirely the same way it is proven that it is possible for it to be increased. Let someone from those who are not included in that number be posited to exist now: he has free will: therefore he can do what is in him: and by doing this, God will inevitably give him grace.

Let us posit therefore that he dies in that grace: it is established that he will be saved: therefore the number of the predestined can be increased.

§ 55. ON THE CONTRARY: There is nothing of all future things which, according to number and species and matter and supposit, God ignores: therefore he himself knows how many and who will be saved: therefore it is impossible that an addition or subtraction could finally be made to the number of those to be saved: therefore it is impossible for anything to be added or subtracted to the number of the predestined.

§ 56. FURTHERMORE, let us inquire concerning the reasoning of certain ones saying that an addition or subtraction cannot be made to the number by which God numbers the predestined, but rather to the numbered number: for they say that God numbers more and fewer without variation of himself in the same way that a unit numbers a greater or lesser multitude, according to what the Philosopher says generally, that number is a multitude measured by one.

§ 57. But this seems impossible: because 1. It is absurd to attribute fallible and imperfect knowledge to God, and that knowledge is imperfect which does not know all things even in their proper supposits, by which things are distinguished from one another: therefore God already knows personally all who are to be saved.

§ 58. 2. Also, Whatever he knows is infallible, as was held in the preceding questions: therefore it is impossible for addition and subtraction to be made to it, and thus the numbering and numbered number is certain to him, even regarding the persons.

§ 59. Solution. Without prejudice I think it must be said that the number before God is certain in both ways: namely both formally according to discrete quantity, and materially as to the supposits of those who are numbered: because otherwise divine knowledge would be fallible and imperfect. And I say that just as he is certain in two ways as to the number, so too he is certain in two ways as to the one numbering: because in predestination there are two things, namely the knowledge of so many, and the will of so many: and the will looks to something in our work, because he wills as many as will make good use of the grace to be given by him, and no more: and if more were to make good use of grace, then from eternity he would have willed more, and now he would will more.

§ 60. Therefore to the first it must be said that that Gloss is understood of a specific case, and not universally: and the sense is: Not as many enter from the Jews then, that is, in the primitive Church, as are the Jews to be saved universally in the whole time of the world: because many will enter at the end of times, when they will see themselves deceived by the Antichrist.

§ 61. To the next it must be said that that Gloss is understood concerning the pre-definition of present justice: for that number is certain, and yet it is increased, and it is diminished from day to day: because there can be more and fewer: although even that is certain to God.

§ 62. To the next it must be said that Gregory speaks of present justice, which makes a place of life, not absolutely, but as to the condition of the state as it is now.

§ 63. To the next it must be said that this is also understood concerning the crown of temporal justice: but below this will be more fully inquired into.

§ 64. To the next it must be said that it is not so understood that someone who is inscribed by the provision of final grace should be deleted from the book: but Moses was speaking from an impossible supposition. As if he were to say: Just as it is impossible that you delete me, so it is impossible that you do not forgive the trespass: or he said this concerning the election of glory which is owed to a leader, which would not be had if he had not been the leader of the people: and not concerning election absolutely.

§ 65. To that which is objected through reason, it has already been frequently answered: because if you posit any predestined person now, I say that it is possible for him to sin and to die in sin: but if he were to die thus, he never was predestined; for these two are possible: a predestined person can sin, and a predestined person can die in sin. However, these two are impossible: this person is predestined, and he died in sin: just as these two are: this person dies without final grace, and he was foreseen to die in final grace. Hence when it is said, "A predestined person can die in sin," it is conceded on account of the power of free will: but nevertheless this power can never be reduced to act: because then contradictories would be verified simultaneously, namely "this person is foreseen to die in grace finally" and "this person is not foreseen to die in grace finally": because God foresees whatever happens: and through this the solution to the following argument is clear, because it is similar to this one.

§ 66. To that which is further asked concerning that opinion, it must be said that if it is correctly understood, it is true: for it calls the one number the divine foreknowledge preparing grace: and this indeed is one, and does not receive variation from the things themselves which are predestined, nor is it properly iterated in all the predestined: but rather the predestined are referred to him thus numbering through various effects of grace. Nevertheless, because that number does not signify the divine essence absolutely, but according to the signification of preparing knowledge, and this posits a respect to the thing: if the thing is always taken under that respect, it is impossible for that numbered number not to be certain: but if the numbered thing is considered in itself, then it can be of the number, and it can not be, on account of the flexibility of free will. It is not, however, so understood that the knowledge of God should pass over someone to be saved, and that he not be saved.

Articulus 12 — With What Certainty the Number of the Elect Is Certain

By what certainty is the number of the elect certain?

§ 69. Secondly it is asked, By what certainty is the number of the elect certain?

§ 70. 1. For certainty is a species of truth which is immutability or necessity in truth: but all truth is the truth of a thing: therefore it seems that if the number of the elect is certain, it is certain by the certainty of the thing, that is, by the quantity of those to be saved.

§ 71. 2. Also, we see the truth of a thing, and we see the truth of a sign: and we see that the truth of a sign is from the truth of the thing, and the necessity of the sign is from the necessity of the thing: and we use the term "thing" generally, according to how it is in simple and composite things: just as the Philosopher also says, From the fact that a thing is or is not, speech is true or false: and he calls the being and non-being that of composition or division. Since therefore knowledge is the assimilation of the understood thing, the truth of knowledge will seem to follow the truth of the thing: therefore both certainty and necessity follow the necessity of the thing, and contingency follows contingency, as it seems.

§ 72. 3. Also, when it is said, "God's knowledge or predestination is true": it is understood either concerning the truth of the thing, or concerning the truth of the sign. It seems that it is not concerning the truth of the thing: because the truth of a thing is not referred further to signify something else, nor is it properly about another. But when we say, "God's knowledge is certain," or "God's predestination is true," that is referred to a thing further on: therefore it has the truth of a sign, and not the truth of a thing. From this I argue further: The truth of a sign, in its genus and species of truth, follows the truth of the thing: the truth of predestination is the truth of a sign: therefore it follows the truth of the thing in its genus and species of truth. If this is granted. On the contrary: The thing itself is entirely contingent: because it is entirely under free will. Proof: Because this entire universal which is contingent in its singular particulars by whose grace the predicate is attributed to it, is also contingent in the universal: but this universal proposition, "all the predestined are to be saved," is contingent in its singular particulars, and by the grace of the singulars the predicate is rendered: therefore the universal itself is contingent: for this man and that man are contingently related to salvation, and again the attainment of salvation is participated in by singulars, and not in the universal by all, such that it is by none: therefore it seems that this entire proposition is contingent: "every predestined person will be saved." From this I argue further: No contingent number is certain: the number of the elect is contingent, as has been proven: therefore it is not certain by any certainty.

§ 73. Solution. It must be said without prejudice that the number of the elect is certain by a certain certainty of immobility or a kind of necessity, which above we called consequent or respective necessity: because the reasoning is the same here, and in the case of the foreknown.

§ 74. To that, however, which is asked, By what certainty is predestination certain? I say that just as in the case of foreknowledge, so also of predestination there is a certainty in some respect having agreement with the certainty of a principle. This can be seen as follows: God's predestination is the cause of grace in free will, and God's foreknowledge is in some way a cause: and because each is an eternal cause, it is necessary that it be immobile. But because the effect is temporal, therefore it cannot take on the properties of the cause: and therefore the cause remains necessary, and the effect contingent. Therefore, as to the fact that it is a cause, it has the truth of a principle: but as to the relation of the contingent effect to it, it has a similitude with the truth of a sign, because it does not infer except from a supposition: just as when a sign is posited the signified is posited, and when the signified is posited insofar as it is such, the sign is inferred, and not absolutely. Hence it must be said that it is otherwise in knowledge caused by a thing, and in knowledge which is the cause of a thing: because in knowledge caused by a thing, the knowledge receives its truth from the thing, and the species of truth which is contingency or necessity: hence it can also sometimes not receive the species, although it receives the genus of truth, because that which is necessary can be known contingently. But the knowledge which is the cause of a thing receives nothing from the thing, but the thing receives from the knowledge: and it receives indeed truth, but not the species of truth, because God knows temporal and mutable and contingent things immaterially and in a necessary mode: and therefore those inducted reasons do not diminish the certainty on the part of God predestining, but they show that each of the predestined in himself is contingently related to being predestined, and to being of the number of the elect.

§ 75. To that, however, which is objected, that the truth of knowledge is referred to the thing, it must be said that this is true: but it is referred as to that about which it is, not from which it is as from a cause: and therefore it does not follow the species of the truth of the thing: and if it is said to be a sign, this will not be absolutely, but as to an agreement with a sign: because when posited it posits the thing, on account of the relation of the knower to the known, because in all things the knowledge and the knowable have some proportion, whatever that might be. And through this the response to the whole can be clear.

Articulus 13 — How This Authority Ought To Be Understood Where It Is Said, "Hold What You Have, Lest Another Take Your Crown"

How ought this authority to be understood which says, Hold what you have, lest another take your crown?

§ 77. Thirdly, It is asked concerning this which he says at the beginning of chapter B, Hold what you have, lest another take your crown.

§ 78. From this Augustine argues that the number of the elect is certain, saying: If another does not take it unless this one loses it, the number of the elect is certain. But according to this it seems that only the numbering number is certain, and not the numbered number: and this is contrary to what has been said, because thus God would have imperfect knowledge.

§ 79. Furthermore, the same difficulty arises concerning one and concerning all: for either God is certain in his knowledge concerning this predestined person, that he knows whether he will be saved, or not. If not: then he is ignorant of some future things: because one or the other of them is immutably future, that he will be saved, or he will be damned. But if he is certain, since the reason is the same concerning anyone, the premise is concluded, that he has certain the numbered number of those to be saved: and thus what Augustine says seems to be nothing.

§ 80. Also, it is understood either concerning the crown of present justice, or concerning the crown of final justice. And in the first way: this does not seem to be so: because that [present justice] is destroyed on account of a subsequent sin, and is not given to another: for when present justice is dead, there is no crown of it. But if concerning the crown of final justice: this seems even less so: because that is not given except to him who merited it, and who was foreseen to have it: if therefore it is of this sort, no one is foreseen to have it except him: therefore it is not given to another.

§ 81. Solution. To this it can be said that Augustine quite congruously proves from that authority that both numbers are certain: and the sense is: If another does not take it, unless this one loses it, etc., that is, if this one does not lose it another will not take it: so that in this the possibility for loss is noted on the part of the predestined person, yet not loss according to act, according to how he stands under predestination: and similarly the possibility of taking it is noted on the part of the non-predestined person, but not the act of taking it, according to how he is under the relation of foreknowledge. For just as was said, both numbers are certain: but the Lord speaks of the possibility of free will according to how it is considered in its own faculty.

§ 82. To this, however, which is asked, Whether it is understood concerning the crown of present justice, or of the glory of beatitude? It must be said that either can quite probably be sustained; but it is commonly said that it is understood concerning the crown of present justice: and another takes this, while a work done by others of the mystical body avails him: and this one who sins, dies. But if concerning eternal...

[that another's] crown be received: this is understood thus, that another receives [it] while the saints and the blessed rejoice concerning this: because the Holy Spirit wrought such works through him, to whom nevertheless they ultimately contributed nothing: for thus the Saints will glory in eternity concerning every good work done in charity by anyone whatsoever.

Articulus 14 — Whether One Predestined Can Be Damned, and One Foreknown Saved

Whether the predestined can be damned, and the foreknown saved?

Then it is inquired concerning what he says there, B, § 2: To this, however, they object, etc.

For that objection seems not to be valid, nor even the solution which he later posits by distinguishing that it can be understood de re (of the thing) or de dicto (of the statement), when it is said, The predestined can be damned: because

§ 1. If whiteness were inseparable from some subject, we would not distinguish this [proposition], it is possible for a white thing to be black, on the basis that it could be de re or de dicto: just as we do not distinguish this [proposition], it is possible for a swan to be black: because whether it is de re or de dicto, it is always false. In the same way, since predestination is a form or relation inseparable from the predestined, the subject of predestination will never be in potency to a form contrary to predestination: but this is damnation: therefore it seems that this is impossible in every way, The predestined can be damned.

§ 2. Also, an eternal relation is disposed in the same way whether the thing to which it is directed exists or does not exist, and exists in sin or in grace: but predestination bespeaks an eternal relation, as was established: therefore that relation is immovable, however the thing may vary: but while that immovable relation exists, there can never be damnation: therefore it seems that it is impossible for any predestined person to be damned, whether it is taken de re or de dicto.

§ 3. Also, if this were possible: then it would be possible that the predestined become foreknown [i.e., to damnation]: therefore one foreseen for eternal life would be foreseen for eternal death: which can in no way be, because then there would be great deception in the divine foresight.

§ 4. Also, the Gloss seems to say this on Psalm 68:29: Let them be blotted out of the book of the living: where it says this: "This is not to be understood as if God writes someone whom He later blots out." Therefore, since no transmutation of foreknowledge occurs, it seems completely impossible both de re and de dicto that the predestined could be damned.

ON THE CONTRARY: The First Cause does not remove causality from any of the secondary causes: for we see with our own eyes that nature operates contingently, temporally, and materially, although God operates toward the same thing immutably and immaterially: therefore neither in the will does He remove the causality of the will: therefore the effect of damnation and salvation still depends on free choice: therefore it is not necessary that one or the other come to be determinately.

Solution. It must be said that predestination does not infer necessity, except that of a condition, as was previously established: for nothing prevents, as Boethius says, that something compared to diverse things has in itself possibility and necessity, not of the thing, but of consequence.

Hence to the first it must be said that predestination does not inhere absolutely in a thing, but in a thing compared to another: and besides, in the manner in which it inheres, it does not remove the potency for the contrary: because it does not remove the flexibility of free choice: but it is not so when it is said, a swan can be black. For that term, swan, expresses the subject equally and the cause for whiteness with an impossibility for the opposite, and leaves no potency for the opposite form.

To the next it must be said, that the eternal relation behaves in the same way: but the thing can behave toward it in many ways: and therefore, since the subject exists with the potency for the contrary, it has some possibility for the contrary.

To the next it must be said, that that objection proceeds in the composite sense: for it is well conceded, that one foreseen to be saved, insofar as he is such, will not be damned, otherwise foresight would be deceived.

To that which is objected concerning the Gloss, it must be said that God blots out no one. But nevertheless Scripture does not remove the possibility of damnation, as was said before.

Articulus 15 — What Is Understood by the Implicit Condition When It Is Said, "The Predestined Must Necessarily Be Saved"

What is understood by an implicit condition, when it is said, It is necessary that the predestined be saved?

Afterwards it is inquired concerning what he says there, B, around the middle: For the understanding of the implicit condition makes truth in the statement, and impossibility in the truth. For what does he call an implicit condition? Also, it does not seem true what he says, because no truth is impossible: therefore nothing makes an impossibility in the truth.

Solution. To this it must be said, that by implicit condition he understands the hypothesis of predestination in the predestined, namely that predestination is always implied concerning this one: so that the proposition is de dicto, and not de re, when it is said, it is necessary that the predestined be saved: or, if this one is predestined, he will necessarily be saved: because then the understanding of this condition implying predestination concerning this one, and including the mode of necessity, makes truth in the statement (de dicto), that is, in that proposition, according to how it is de dicto, and not de re, and consequently it makes an impossibility in the truth, because it makes a truth impossible to be otherwise: and this is what he intends.

And through this the solution to the objection is evident.

Articulus 16 — Whether It Is Necessary That the Predestined Be Saved

Whether it is necessary that the predestined be saved?

Then it is inquired concerning what he says there, But they still insist, etc.

For the reasoning seems to be necessary: since § 1. The Philosopher says, that with a major premise of necessity, and a minor of absolute inherence (de inesse), a conclusion of necessity follows thus: Every A must necessarily be B: every C is A, or some C is A: therefore every C or some C must necessarily be B. Similarly this, Every predestined person must necessarily be saved: Peter is predestined: therefore Peter must necessarily be saved. If perchance it is said, that the Philosopher's statement is understood of simple inherence (de inesse simpliciter), and not of inherence as of now (de inesse ut nunc): for it does not follow, Every man must necessarily be an animal: some white thing is a man: therefore some white thing must necessarily be an animal: for here the minor is of inherence as of now. On the contrary: The minor is this, Peter is predestined: but this is true concerning the past: therefore it is necessary according to the thing, although the mode of necessity is not added: therefore it is of simple inherence, and not of inherence as of now, as it seems: therefore the conclusion follows, that Peter must necessarily be saved.

§ 2. Also, it is necessary that one who is presently predestined was always predestined and will always be predestined: someone is presently predestined: therefore he always was and will be predestined: but he who always was and is and will be predestined, cannot be damned: therefore he who is presently predestined, cannot be damned: therefore again the minor premise was of simple inherence: and thus the conclusion followed.

§ 3. Also, the solution that the Master posits in the Text does not seem to be a solution, namely that God now could, and can [do] whatever He could from eternity, and differences of time do not remove or add anything to His power: but He could from eternity not have predestined this one who is presently predestined: therefore He can also now bring it about that he was never predestined, and thus he who is presently predestined could have not been predestined, and can presently not be predestined: and if he can presently not be predestined, he can be damned: therefore he who is presently predestined, can be damned. This is the Master's solution in the Text, and the reason of the solution.

§ 4. And it seems to solve nothing: since we are asking what God has done concerning this one whom we now posit to be predestined, and not what God can do.

§ 5. Also, although God could from eternity not have predestined him, because then predestination was not supposed in him, nevertheless because it is already supposed to be, He cannot bring it about that he was not predestined: because otherwise contradictories would be verified concerning the same thing, namely that this one was predestined from eternity, and this one was not predestined from eternity: and similarly these two, this one was foreseen from eternity to be saved, and this one was not foreseen from eternity to be saved: and this one from eternity is going to be saved, and this one from eternity is not going to be saved: and many other incongruities which follow: therefore it seems that that solution which he posits in the Text is null.

§ 6. Also, although the power of God in itself does not have anything past or future, but behaves in the same way: nevertheless power signified with a connotation does not behave in the same way to every time, nor to all things; but when it is said, God predestined this one, demonstrating any predestined person, or definitely supposing him, power is signified with the determination of the direction of this one to salvation and the foresight of the salvation of this one: since therefore this does not behave in one way, what the Master says in solving seems to be nothing.

Therefore others come saving the Master's solution, and saying that in the syllogism posited beforehand, namely, every predestined person must necessarily be saved: this one is predestined, etc., the minor is of inherence as of now and of the contingent, as they say. Hence just as Aristotle expounds this doubly, Every A is contingently B: but everything which is contingently A, is contingently B: and thus it does not posit absolute inherence, but contingent inherence: and everything which is A, is contingently B, and thus it posits absolute inherence: so they wish to expound this, This one is predestined, so that the sense is, this one who happens to be predestined: and then the conclusion does not follow, that this one will necessarily be saved. But that solution has no reason among all solutions: because although that concerning the contingent is expounded doubly by Aristotle, nevertheless that concerning absolute inherence is not expounded doubly: but this, This one is predestined, is of absolute inherence, and not of the contingent.

If perchance you say, that it is of inherence contingently, it will still be against this solution, that it cannot be expounded doubly.

Also, if it is of inherence contingently, it happens that it does not inhere after it has inhered: therefore for this one, after he is predestined, it happens that he will not be predestined: which is impossible according to all: since there was never a mutation of those relations concerning the notions which "predestined" and "foreknown" import: therefore it is evident that that solution does not solve.

Therefore again others come and object to the proof of the minor premise posited above, namely that when it is said, This one is predestined, this is a certain true fact in the past: therefore it is necessary: and they say that this does not follow, because the counterexample to that statement is manifold: for if it is negative concerning the past, it will not be true: just as that the Antichrist was not is not necessary, because it can be falsified. Also, if it is affirmative and with a universal sign, they say that it is not true: just as that every animal was in Noah's ark is not necessary. Also, if it is a past dependent on the future, again it is not true: just as here when it is said, This one is predestined, this one is foreseen to be saved, the salvation of this one is still of the future: and therefore they say, that that proof by which it is proven to be of simple inherence and not as of now, was not valid: and this solution has many who consent to it. But that it is null is easily proven thus, first concerning the counterexamples which they bring: because they are sophistical and do not object. For the first is nothing to the proposition: because the rule is given concerning words and deeds: and these are named in the Text: but negations are neither words nor deeds. Moreover the second counterexample is absolutely false: because if a universal affirmative true of the past is posited, it will be necessary just as a particular one. Moreover the third counterexample upon which the whole solution rests is completely null: because if I say thus: I thought about the future Antichrist, this is of the past by reason of the act imported through the verb, although the object or matter of the act is dependent on the future: and since truth is in the composition of the verb, the truth of the statement will be judged according to the time considered (or, consignified) in the verb: but this is past: therefore the truth of this statement will be judged of the past, and it will be a necessary proposition: since if I thought about the future Antichrist, it is impossible for me not to have thought it. But if you wish to object otherwise and say, when it is said, The Antichrist was future, this is of the past and true: and yet it can be falsified, because the Antichrist can not be: and if he will not be, he was not future: then this counterexample will not be to the proposition: because in this proposition, The Antichrist was future, nothing is posited as said or done in the past, but only the order of the future to past time is enunciated there. But when it is said, This one is predestined, there it is posited that the vision of God is directed upon the salvation of this one: and if it is directed, it is impossible that it is not directed. But it is true, that it would be a counterexample, if nothing were imported in this proposition, This one is predestined, except the order of the future to past time: and it is not true, as was already evident.

Therefore there are again others, and they say, that in this, This one is predestined, nothing follows by reason of pastness: because if we remove the past, still the same thing follows: which can be evident thus, God presently foresees this one to be saved, or God presently predestines this one: and if this is posited to be true, still the same thing follows as before: therefore by reason of the past it cannot be inferred that that [proposition] is of simple inherence, or of inherence by necessity: hence if this is contingent, God foresees this one to be saved, this also will be contingent, God predestined this one to be saved: and if this is contingent, this one is predestined [praedestinatur], this also will be contingent, this one is predestined [est praedestinatus]: the reason for which is, because pastness is posited concerning an eternal divine act, to which it belongs only in the mode of signifying with respect to us: and therefore just as these are compossible, God predestines this one, and can not predestine [him]: so these two are compossible, This one is predestined, and can not be predestined. But on the contrary: Although eternity in itself posits no precedence and futurity, nevertheless the order of eternity to temporal things of necessity posits after and before, and prior and posterior. But when it is said, This one is predestined, eternity is not posited as it is signified in itself, but rather its relation to a temporal thing:

therefore it necessarily posits having been prior with respect to that temporal thing: therefore by reason of that a necessity will be caused, just as also in a past word or deed, and much more so.

Moreover, let it be that the necessity of salvation follows from the present: as when it is said, This one is predestined, with this it is impossible for this to be verified, This one is foreknown [to damnation], or this one will not be saved: because when it is said, This one is predestined, this is the same as he is foreseen to be saved, and salvation is prepared for him, and he will die in final grace, and he will use the grace given to him well: with all of which it is impossible for their contradictories to be verified: therefore it seems that none of those solutions is fitting.

Solution. Without prejudice it must be said, that here one must exclaim with the Apostle, to Romans 11:33: O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God! How incomprehensible are his judgments, and how unsearchable his ways! We say however by asserting two things, namely that no one is compelled to sin, or to do good, and that God in His knowledge cannot be deceived: and therefore we must return to the prior solution, and say that the major premise is twofold, namely that it can be composite or divided: whether de re or de dicto, namely, every predestined person must necessarily be saved: and if the minor is assumed in the composite sense thus, someone is predestined, or this one is predestined, the inference will not be valid, except with a reduplication thus: therefore this one insofar as he is predestined, will be saved of necessity: since if some predicate agrees per se with a middle term like salvation to the predestined, and is assumed under the middle term, the conclusion does not follow per se, except with a reduplication of the form of the middle term concerning it: just as, Every white thing necessarily scatters vision: the horse is white: it does not follow: therefore it necessarily scatters vision, except insofar as "white" is reduplicated: and in this way the aforesaid argumentation does not infer [its conclusion]: hence it is evident, that it proceeds in the divided sense.

But to this that is inquired concerning this [proposition], This one is predestined, whether it is of simple inherence, or of inherence as of now? It seems to me that it must be said, that if he is predestined, that is, if this is posited, then it is of simple inherence: but nevertheless it does not follow, that he will necessarily be saved: and the cause of this was determined above: because although predestination is a necessary order to salvation, nevertheless it does not remove from the subject the potency of the contrary order which is rooted in the flexibility of free choice: but other forms posited concerning a subject do not do this, as was said above.

It must be noted however, that certain Masters say regarding the above-disproved solutions, that if they can be defended, they are easier than this solution.

Others also say, that the knowledge of God behaves in the same way to more known things and to fewer, and to diverse and opposite things: and therefore they say, that the knowledge of God remains invariable in the same way, if one foreseen to be saved is not saved, as if he is saved: and if more are saved than were foreseen to be saved, and if as many, and if fewer: and I cannot understand this solution, for the reason that foreknowledge and predestination do not express knowledge on the part of the knower only, but connote a relation to this one and to that one determined in number. However anyone can choose for himself an opinion from these which are more pleasing to him.

And since predestination is the preparation of grace, etc. Here begins the second part of this distinction, in which he treats of reprobation: and it is divided into two parts. In the first he touches upon its cause. In the second he touches upon its effects, there, D, § 2: Therefore just as God's predestination properly is foreknowledge, etc.

But a doubt first occurs concerning what he says in the beginning, there, And since predestination is the preparation of grace, that is, divine election, etc.

Articulus 17 — Whether It Befits God To Choose

Whether it befits God to choose?

For it is inquired concerning election, Whether it befits God to choose?

And secondly, What is election? And thirdly, Whether election according to the reason of understanding is before predestination, or after? Fourthly, For what is it? Fifthly, Of what is it?

Concerning the FIRST it proceeds thus: § 1. Damascene says, that election does not fall onto God: because the divine nature is not possible [i.e., susceptible] to ignorance: therefore it seems, that it does not befit Him to choose.

§ 2. Also, to choose is, when two or more things are proposed, to prefer one to another: therefore election is of things behaving dissimilarly: but the eternal will of God behaves similarly, because as it is said, I Timothy 2:4: He wills all men to be saved therefore election does not befit Him.

§ 3. Also, eternity is further removed from corrupt nature than any temporal thing: but the state of innocence if it had persisted, would have made all good: therefore there would not have been election: therefore since eternity is further removed, election is repugnant to eternity, as it seems. But that there would be no election if the state of innocence persevered, Augustine seems to say, saying, that if all were good or bad, there would be no election.

§ 4. Also, there is no distance of one from another, where all are the creative essence: but from eternity they were not anything except in the divine mind, in which all are the creative essence: therefore there was no election from eternity, because all election is of things behaving dissimilarly.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. To Ephesians 1:4: He chose us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and unspotted. Therefore it seems, that there is election.

§ 2. Also, John 13:18: I do not speak of you all: I know whom I have chosen. And in many other places.

§ 3. Also, distinction from the mass of perdition is not made without election: since therefore He distinguishes no one whom He did not foresee from eternity would be distinguished, election befits God from eternity.

Solution. Election is spoken of in many ways. For election is called the act of reason following counsel and inquiry and deliberation concerning things to be done, and this election only befits a nature which is subject to ignorance: and Damascene removes this election from God.

Another is election positing only discernment in the chosen, and not inquiry and doubt in the chooser: which election is the separation of that which is known to be good or future good, from another which is known to be evil or future evil: and this is eternal not temporal election which befits God: and through this the solution to the first is evident.

To the next it must be said, that the antecedent will of God prior to our work behaves similarly: and this will does not have a connotation in us, except the rational nature alone which He gave us: and this in all is ordered to eternal life and salvation. But there is another consequent will which posits the relation of foreknowledge to future good or bad merit: and that is of things behaving dissimilarly, and it befits it to prefer one to another.

To the next it must be said, that the eternal insofar as it is eternal, is further removed from the state of corruption than the temporal state of innocence: but as regards the foresight of sin and merit, it is more certified concerning those that will behave differently to grace: and therefore it more befits Him to choose: for to election neither is conjoined substantially, namely neither the more removed from the state of corruption, nor the less removed: but only the certification of those that were to behave dissimilarly to grace.

Nor is this true that if there had been no sin, there would not have been election: for although there would not have been an election of the good from the bad, there would nevertheless have been of the more good from the less good: and this is what Augustine says: If all things were equally good, the divine beauty would not be manifested in the highest good.

To the next it must be said, that in the knowledge of God not only all [persons], but all things also behave similarly: but the knowledge of God is not only of them as they are there: because as they are there, one is not better than another, but all are one highest good: but the knowledge is also of them as they are future, as was very often said above: and as regards this election falls among them.

Articulus 18 — What Is Election

What is election?

Secondly it is inquired, What is election?

§ 1. But Damascene says, that to choose is when two or more things are proposed, to prefer this to those. But the Gloss says, on Romans 8:1 and following, that the number of the elect is certain. Therefore election seems to express final grace. But against this seems to be the election of Judas among the twelve, as the Lord says, Have I not chosen you twelve? and one of you is a devil?

§ 2. Also, Romans 8:30: Whom he predestined, them he also called. But to call also expresses through an interior cry the separation of one from another: what then is the difference between calling, and election?

§ 3. But if you should say, that calling is temporal: hence the Gloss on the same passage says, that to call is to help knowledge concerning faith. Then I ask, What is that help? For it is either a grace freely given [gratia gratis data], or making pleasing [gratia gratum faciens]. If freely given: then that is given to many, which cannot be: because it follows, in the same place, Romans 8:30, that whom he called, them he also justified. But if it is grace making pleasing: this does not seem [correct], because that already precedes justification. Therefore it seems, that it could only be eternal election.

§ 4. Also, between the application of grace which justifies, and eternal predestination there seems to be nothing except the election of one from another or separation, so that it is discerned to whom grace is to be applied, from another to whom it is not to be applied: since therefore calling precedes justification, election seems to be the same as calling.

Solution. It can be said, that election according to its notion is not the same as calling. For calling is not divided by the Saints except in three ways, namely the calling of non-being to being: and this is of creation, according to what is said, Romans 4:17: Who calls those things that are not, as those that are. And calling through interior grace, according to what the Gloss says, Romans 8:30, that to call is to help knowledge concerning faith. And thirdly to call through exterior preaching, as is said, Matthew 4:19: He called them, namely Peter and Andrew saying: Come after me, and I will make you to become fishers of men. Hence no mode of calling befits the eternal. But election is not accepted by the Saints except in three ways, namely for the eternal foresight of separation, and for the separation which is made through the application of grace in the present whether it is final or not: and through election to a principate or apostolate or dignity. Of the first, Ephesians 1:4: He chose us in him before the foundation of the world. Of the second, John 15:16: You have not chosen me: but I have chosen you, and have appointed you, that you should go, and should bring forth fruit, etc. Of the third, John 6:71: Have I not chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil? And it will be evident, that one of these dividing [members] is eternal. It can therefore be said, that election does not look except to final grace separating according to the purpose of the chooser, and not ours: but calling is to exit, namely so that we exit from the mass of perdition, and thus it looks to interior grace with the motion of our reason discerning faith and grace: and thus it differs in two things, namely both in this that it is temporal, and in this that it has the motion of reason conjoined to itself, because properly nothing is called except that which uses reason: but it agrees in a third, namely that it posits final grace, just as also election when it is taken properly. It could also be said, that they differ not in object, but in the rationale of the object: since election generally taken is of the final good: but calling is of that which uses reason toward the final good.

And through this the solution to the first two is evident.

To the next it must be said, that that help is understood of the help of grace making pleasing: and it is grace informing free choice so that it consents more quickly to the motion of faith, and it does not precede justification in time, but in nature, just as also the motion of faith: and thus it is evident how it is between eternal election, and justification which it precedes not in time, but in nature.

And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 19 — Whether Election According to the Notion of Intelligence Is Before Predestination or After

Whether election according to the reason of understanding is before predestination, or after?

Whether election according to the reason of understanding is before predestination, or after?

Thirdly it is inquired, Whether election according to the reason of understanding is before predestination, or after?

But it seems, that it is before: because

§ 1. One is not chosen into the kingdom, unless separated from the mass of perdition: therefore predestination presupposes election to have been made. But on the contrary: Dilection according to reason seems to follow predestination. PROOF: Dilection is of the good: but one is not good except through grace: and grace is from predestination: therefore also dilection: but election follows dilection, because He does not choose except those whom He loves: therefore election also follows predestination: for what is prior to the prior, is prior also to the posterior.

§ 2. Also, Ephesians 1:4 and 5: He chose us in him before the foundation of the world, who hath predestinated us unto the adoption of children through Jesus Christ unto himself, according to the purpose of his will therefore the purpose of the will is the reason for election: therefore it is prior to it according to the reason of understanding: but the purpose of the will is predestination: therefore predestination is prior to election, as it seems.

Solution. It seems to me it must be said, that election taken absolutely precedes predestination, as the first reason says, and dilection spoken of simply precedes both: and this is evident thus: Dilection inclines to separate one from another, and to love unto the end of salvation: therefore dilection precedes election, and election predestination on the part of the lover and chooser and predestinator. Similarly dilection is of the good: but election is of the finally good: but predestination is of the finally good, and directed to the end of salvation: and thus it is evident how the object of one adds to the object of the other: and thus again dilection is prior to and simpler than election, and election than predestination.

To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that that dilection of which he objects, is dilection from present justice, not eternal dilection.

To the next it must be said, that the Apostle does not intend that predestination is the reason for election in itself, but rather conversely: but he means to say, that it is the reason for election on the part of the effect which is the application of grace, because the cause of that is nothing but the purpose of God. Hence, Romans 9:11 and 12, he says on the contrary: That the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of the will it was said to her: That the elder shall serve the younger where it is expressly implied, that election is the reason of the purpose or predestination.

Articulus 20 — For What Is Election

For what is election?

Fourthly it is inquired, For what is election?

But it seems, that it is for manifesting the reason of divine goodness: because Augustine says thus in the book City of God: God dispensed well, so that He would not damn all, nor liberate all: for if all were liberated, what is owed through justice would lie hidden: if all were damned, what grace bestows would lie hidden. Therefore it seems, that the optimal dispensation of God's goodness is manifested through election.

§ 1. But to the contrary: Because then the rational creature seems to receive some advantage from the fall.

§ 2. Solution. It is not difficult to respond to questions of this kind, nor is it useful to dispute them for long. Because election can be made on account of many things: yet it is made, in my judgment, for the showing of justice which is revealed in the subsequent use of free choice, when the elect spontaneously adheres to grace, and the non-elect spontaneously turns away from grace.

§ 3. To the authority of Augustine it must be said that Augustine rather shows the optimal mode of ordering wisdom than its goodness, although both appear there.

§ 4. To the other it must be said that an advantage is not acquired from the fall of the person [per se], but per accidens, insofar as through grace the fall is ordered to the good: just as the Gloss says on Romans 8:28, upon that text, "We know that to them that love God, all things work together unto good, to such as, according to his purpose, are called to be saints" the Gloss says, "Even falls."

Articulus 21 — Whose Is Election

Whose is election?

§ 5. Fifthly and lastly it is asked: Whose is election?

§ 6. Now it seems to be of all, because: 1. The grace of God is lacking to no one, provided one wills it: therefore He elects all.

§ 7. 2. Also, Saul was elect, and Judas was elect. And if you say that this was the election of present justice. To the contrary: Let us posit that they died in grace; therefore they will now have final grace; therefore they are truly elect. But if you say that foreknowledge posits in them a future final sin, and this cannot stand with final grace. To the contrary: It has already been established that election, according to reason, is prior to predestination: therefore the necessity of the consequence which is from predestination does not infer the necessity of election: and thus it seems to belong to some who are not finally good.

§ 8. But to the contrary: Election posits final grace: therefore it cannot be except of those who are finally good.

§ 9. Solution. It must be said that election posits final grace.

§ 10. But to that which is first objected, it must be said that although grace is equally present to all of us, we nonetheless do not bear ourselves equally to it, and the respect of grace to us is not one [and the same], as was said above.

§ 11. To the other it must be said that election, according to the reason of intelligence, follows foreknowledge taken generally: because otherwise it would not know whom or for what it was electing: but it is true that it precedes predestination: and from it [predestination] it receives the necessity of condition, as has been frequently disputed above.

Articulus 22 — Whether Predestination Is the Cause of the Bestowal of Grace; And, Whether It Is a Necessary, Contingent, Common, or Proper Cause

Whether predestination is the cause of the apposition of grace? and, Whether it is a necessary, contingent, common, or proper cause?

§ 12. Next it is asked concerning what he says in this chapter, D, § 2: The effect of predestination is the apposition of grace, etc.

§ 13. 1. For if predestination is the cause of the apposition of grace: will it be a necessary cause, or a contingent one, or a common one, or a proper one, whether it be necessary or contingent? It seems that it is necessary and proper: but when such a cause is posited, the effect is always posited: since therefore predestination is from eternity, the apposition of grace will also be from eternity, which is false: therefore it is not necessary and proper.

§ 1. But if you say that it is a common necessary cause: then through something added it can become proper: therefore that [added thing] is either temporal or eternal. If temporal: then it will be created and prepared by predestination: and I ask concerning it, whether its predestination was its necessary and proper cause, or not? If not: then again something must have been added: and again I ask concerning that, and this will go on to infinity: therefore that first temporal thing will have predestination as its necessary and proper cause. Since therefore that thing intervenes between predestination and the apposition of grace, it seems that the apposition of grace occurs when that thing is added to predestination: but that thing is added from eternity, because its predestination is a necessary and proper cause: therefore the apposition of grace is from eternity.

§ 2. Also, according to this it follows that something temporal would be from eternity, which cannot be: therefore that added thing is not temporal. But if it is eternal: yet an eternal thing added to an eternal thing makes nothing but an eternal thing: therefore from eternity predestination is the necessary cause of grace: therefore the apposition of grace is from eternity, which is false.

§ 3. But if it is said that it is a contingent cause, whether proper or common, two absurdities will follow, namely that there is something contingent in God, and that grace will be caused by predestination by no necessity, either of consequence or of the consequent; and this is false.

§ 4. 2. Also, if it is a cause, it will only be a voluntary cause: but every will is related to opposites: therefore it seems that it is no more the cause of the apposition of grace than of non-apposition.

§ 5. 3. Also, if it is a cause: it is either a material, or formal, or efficient, or final cause. It is evident that it is not material: because there is no matter in God. But if it is called efficient. To the contrary: Predestination is not without foreknowledge: but foreknowledge is according to ideal forms: therefore it has to be reduced to the formal [cause]. But to the contrary: The will of God is the efficient cause of the things willed: but the predestination of God is according to His will: therefore it is an efficient cause.

§ 6. Solution. I say that it is a necessary and proper cause: but this is twofold, namely that which demands something in the other as a disposition; and that which demands nothing, because the dispositions are presupposed in the matter, just as fire is the proper and necessary cause of ignition: yet ignition does not follow in ice, because a contrary disposition is in the matter: nonetheless we would not say that this is because fire is a contingent or non-proper cause of ignition: because a contingent cause is one which lacks something of the necessities for causality, or which lacks something for proportion to the effect. So it can be said that God or predestination is a necessary cause, not by a necessity of coercion, but by a necessity of unfailingness with respect to itself, and this according to habit: because according to act there is not always the caused effect and the necessary disposition in the rational creature for the reception of grace, which is the effect of predestination. And through this the solution to the first is evident.

§ 7. To the other it must be said that it is a voluntary cause, but determined to the willed object: for this does not remove liberty from the will. Hence an undisposed will is of opposites, but one disposed through the conception and determination of the willed object is directed to one thing, and can be turned away from it. But it is not so in God: because His will is not changed from one willed object to a contrary willed object, because this belongs to imperfection and defect, as is determined in Book II of the Sentences.

§ 8. To the other it must be said that it can be reduced to three causes, namely the efficient with respect to the will, and the formal exemplary with respect to foreknowledge, and the final with respect to the disposition of the will: because it is His will for the sake of which He apposes grace.

§ 9. And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 23 — Whether Hardening Is an Effect of Eternal Reprobation; And, Whether God Is the Cause of Reprobation

Whether obduration is the effect of eternal reprobation? and, Whether God is the cause of reprobation?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning the following phrase where it is said: Obduration seems in some way to be the effect of eternal reprobation.

§ 2. For this does not seem so: for every effect has something of causality from the cause: therefore God would now be some cause of sin: and I reckon this impious. But if you say, as he seems to say in the Text, that God is the cause by not imparting grace: this seems to be nothing: because Anselm says that the reason why this man does not have grace is not because God does not want to give it, because He extends grace to all: but rather because he does not want to receive it: therefore He is not the cause by not imparting, since He imparts to all insofar as it depends on Him.

§ 3. If perhaps you say that God is a cause just as the absence of a sailor is the cause of the endangerment of a ship, but his presence [the cause] of its safety: this again is nothing: because Augustine says that God is present to all: just as light is even with the blind, although the blind are not with the light. But if the sailor, insofar as it depended on him, were always present to the ship, he would never be said to be the cause of the endangerment of the ship, but always of its safety, and the endangerment of the ship would always be caused by something else. But if you say that He is the cause of obduration, just as nature is the cause of rest, namely by not moving: this is still more absurd: because nature is the cause of rest per se, and of motion for the sake of rest, as is proved in Book V of the Physics: therefore it is clear that it would be heretical to attribute this to God.

§ 4. Solution. It must be said that in no way, neither per se nor per accidens, is He the cause of obduration: as has been necessarily proved, as it seems to me.

§ 5. But to the saying of Augustine which is in the Text, it must be said that it is to be glossed concerning permission, that is, He permits them to be obdurated, from the fact that they do not want to receive the grace that is always prepared for them: yet He orders the obduration to many goods, lest it be entirely unseemly: and with respect to this it is said, "The Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh, etc." , so that causality toward obduration is not denoted, but permission: while causality is retorted to the ordering of the obduration into the goods which are elicited from the obduration by God, even against the will of the obdurate one.

DISTINCTIO XLI

Divisio Textus

But if we seek the merit of obduration and mercy, etc.

§ 6. In this part the Master inquires whether predestination has any cause. And it has four parts: in the first of which he shows that it does not have a cause in itself: but obduration has a cause on the part of the effect, whereas predestination has a cause neither in itself nor on the part of the effect. In the second, he posits an objection to this, whether the foreknowledge of merits can be the cause of predestination, there, B, Yet some have opined, etc. In the third, he posits an objection against what was determined, and solves it, there, C, Yet to these it seems to be contrary, etc. In the fourth and last he posits the heresy of some, which had its origin by reason of inquiring into this profundity, there, D, But many seeking to render a reason concerning this profundity, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Predestination Can Be Helped by the Prayers of the Saints

Whether predestination can be aided by the prayers of the Saints?

§ 7. But for the understanding of the first part one must ask three things: of which the first is, Whether predestination can be aided by the prayers of the Saints? Second, Whether predestination falls under merit? Third, Whether the foreknowledge of merits is the cause of predestination or reprobation?

§ 8. To the first one proceeds thus: 1. In Genesis 25:21, it is said: "Isaac besought the Lord for his wife, because she was barren: and He heard him, and gave conception to Rebecca": although it was nonetheless predestined that Isaac was to have seed through Rebecca.

§ 9. 2. Also, in the same place Gregory says that predestination is aided by the prayers of the Saints.

§ 10. 3. Also, Augustine advises that prayer be made for those to be called, because it may have been thus predestined, so that they are not called except through the prayers of the Saints. Many similar things are found from the Saints.

§ 2. 4. Also, through examples, we see Paul converted at the prayer of Stephen, and the Centurion (as Bernard says) at the prayer of the Lord: therefore one can merit first grace for another: but it is less to persevere in received grace than to receive grace: therefore one can merit even final grace for another: but having final grace is convertible with being predestined: therefore he can merit predestination for him.

§ 3. 5. Also, James 5:16: "Pray for one another, that you may be saved" but being saved and being predestined accompany each other: therefore predestination is acquired through prayer.

§ 4. BUT TO THE CONTRARY: 1. The prayer of the faithful is temporal, but predestination is eternal: but the eternal is not caused by the temporal: therefore predestination is not caused by the temporal: therefore predestination is not caused by the prayer of the Saints.

§ 5. 2. Also, nothing caused by another essentially is equally prior to that which is its cause and posterior to it: the predestination of someone is equally before the prayer of the Saints and after it, because it is from eternity: therefore predestination is not caused by the prayer of the Saints.

§ 6. Solution. It must be said that predestination can be considered in two ways, namely [that] of purpose and of preparation: and this is essential to predestination. And on that part it cannot be aided by the prayers of the Saints. It can also be considered on the part of the effect, which is grace apposed in the present: and this can be aided by the prayers of the Saints: and in this way the reasons first introduced proceed.

§ 7. But to the reason introduced [about meriting], it must be said that someone can merit first grace and perseverance in it for another: but it does not follow from this that he can merit predestination for him: because although having final grace and being predestined are convertible according to subjects [supposita], they nonetheless do not signify the same thing, nor are they the same essentially, because persevering in grace finally expresses nothing but something temporal, but predestination expresses something eternal, namely the purpose and preparation of grace from eternity, which does not fall under merit: and therefore that reason does not proceed. And through this the solution to the following [reason] is also evident.

§ 8. Now as for those things which are objected to the contrary, it is clear that they do not conclude concerning the effect of predestination, but rather concerning that which is essential to predestination, which is eternal.

Articulus 2 — Whether Predestination Falls Under the Merit of the Predestined, So That Someone Merits Predestination for Himself

Whether predestination falls under the merit of the predestined, such that someone merits predestination for himself?

§ 9. Secondly it is asked: Whether predestination falls under the merit of the predestined, such that someone merits predestination for himself?

§ 10. It seems that it does, from a similarity in the opposite: because, as is said in the Text, 1. We find the merit of obduration: therefore there also seems to be some merit of predestination.

§ 11. 2. Also, he who gives an occasion for loss seems to have given the loss: therefore much more he who can do something whereby he may have grace and persevere in it, seems to be able also to merit and work something toward his own predestination: but if someone does what is in him, he himself will have grace, and can persevere in it: therefore he can also be predestined.

§ 12. 3. Also, one having grace in the present merits eternal life: but eternal life is a greater good than being predestined: therefore he can also merit that he be predestined.

§ 1. 4. Also, if predestination is repugnant to merit: this will be either on the part of itself, or on the part of the effect, or on the part of the end. Not on the part of itself: because in itself it is God predestining, and all the Saints merit God. Not on the part of the effect either: because many merit grace to be given to them by the Lord, which having been given, their grace increases. Nor on the part of the end: because that is glory: and glory indeed falls under merit.

§ 2. 5. Also, below Augustine says that in some sinners there precedes something by which they are worthy of justification, and in others [something] by which they are worthy of obduration: therefore it seems that predestination falls under merit.

§ 3. 6. Also, on John 1:47 and following, the Gloss says that it was better for Nathanael to know both natures in Christ than to be predestined and to remain under the shadow of death or of the law: but the knowledge of both natures in Christ falls under merit: therefore also being predestined, which is a lesser good.

§ 4. BUT TO THE CONTRARY: 1. Every merit is after the effect of predestination, which is the apposition of grace: but predestination as a cause precedes the effect of predestination: therefore every merit is after predestination: therefore it is not the cause of predestination.

§ 5. 2. Also, every merit is temporal: but the temporal is not the cause of the eternal: therefore, etc.

§ 6. 3. Also, grace falls under some merit: but that merit will be an act informed by grace, because every merit is an act informed by grace: but it does not inform an act unless it is possessed: therefore grace is possessed before merit: therefore it is not acquired through merit, but is possessed so that merit might be present. If therefore the effect of predestination does not fall under merit, much less does predestination itself.

§ 7. Solution. It must be said that predestination falls under merit neither with respect to its proper effect, nor in itself: for the proper effect is final grace given in the present: and before first grace there is no grace through which anyone could merit, but someone can merit an increase of grace: but this is not the essential effect of predestination.

§ 8. It must be said therefore to the first, that it is not similar: because through ourselves we can sin, and thus be the cause of our obduration, because this is an impotence rather than a potency: but from ourselves we cannot merit, but only from the grace of God: and therefore obduration has a cause in us, but predestination does not.

§ 9. To the other it must be said that although man can work something toward having grace, he nonetheless cannot be the cause of grace: because his work is nothing but as a disposing cause in the subject, which disposition of itself does not even suffice to remove the contrary act, although it habilitates to the good through good acts: and thus he is not the cause, but God alone.

§ 10. To the other it must be said that this is to merit an increase of grace and not first grace, or predestination: and although having eternal life is a greater good in genus than being predestined, nevertheless predestination, by reason of its antecedence to the meritorious work, does not fall under merit, although eternal life falls under it: for the cause why it does not fall under merit is not because it is a better or a lesser good, but because it is not ordered to merit.

§ 11. To the other it must be said that by reason of the eternal antecedent to merit, predestination is repugnant to merit. For although it is God, nonetheless the mode of signifying is not the same: and therefore it is not necessary that if one falls under merit, the other also falls under merit. Yet even by reason of the effect which is first grace, it is repugnant, as was proved by objecting to the contrary.

§ 12. To the other it must be said that very improperly are the words of Augustine taken which are posited below. For Augustine speaks of works done in mortal sin, which are of the genus of goods, and he says that the sinner habilitates himself to grace through this, so that the Holy Spirit may more quickly illuminate the heart of the man: and this makes them worthy, that is, congruous with a certain congruity of gratuitously given grace [grace gratis data], for the reception of grace: and on the contrary, he who falls from vice to vice, is abandoned, so that he who is in filth may become still more filthy: and therefore he is called unworthy for grace, that is, less congruous.

§ 2. To the last it must be said, as above, that in Nathanael there was a comparison of the state of the New Law to the Old Law in which the shadow was, as has been said.

Articulus 3 — Whether the Foreknowledge of Merits Is the Cause of Predestination

Whether the foreknowledge of merits is the cause of predestination?

§ 3. Thirdly it is asked: Whether the foreknowledge of merits is the cause of predestination and reprobation?

§ 4. And it seems that it is, first through authorities, then through reasons.

§ 5. 1. For the Gloss says: "Grace having been subtracted, Esau was justly reprobated": but justice is a rendering for merits: but there were no merits except in foreknowledge: therefore merits in foreknowledge were the cause of reprobation.

§ 6. 2. Also, the Gloss, in the same place: "Esau was reprobated through justice itself": and from this follows the same thing as before.

§ 7. 3. Also, in the same place, the Gloss of Ambrose: "I will give grace to him whom I know will return to me with his whole heart after error." Therefore the foreknowledge of conversion is the cause of the collation and preordination of grace: therefore it is the cause of predestination. Whence he adds: "This is to give to whom it should be given: for pearls are not to be given to swine, nor what is holy to dogs." [114]

§ 8. 4. Also, in the same place: "What did He hate in Esau, but original sin? What did He love in Jacob, but the gratuitous gift of mercy?" Now it is evident that it does not speak of the sin that was [presently there], because in this Jacob and Esau were similar: and therefore if He hated one on account of this, He ought to have hated the other: because concerning similar things (as Boethius says) the judgment is the same: therefore it seems that this is to be referred to foreknowledge: and thus the foreknowledge of merits is the cause of predestination or of reprobation.

§ 9. 5. Also, in the same place: "God gives grace to him whom He knows will devotedly serve Him and obey His commandments": now it is evident that it does not speak of the grace of present justification, because that is often given to one who abuses it: therefore it speaks of the grace of predestination: therefore it is from the foreknowledge of merits.

§ 10. 6. Also, Origen on Numbers 5: "God, from the purpose of the heart which He foresaw for Himself, before they had done anything good or evil, said, in Malachi 1:2-3: 'I have loved Jacob, but Esau I have hated.'" Therefore it seems that the foreknown purpose of the heart of those twins was the cause of the predestination of the one, and of the reprobation of the other.

§ 11. 7. Also, the same seems to be the case in Genesis 18:17 and following, where the Lord says to Abraham: "Can I hide from Abraham what I am about to do, especially since he is to become a great nation...? For I know that he will command his children, and his household after him, to keep the way of the Lord, etc." [115] Therefore the foreknowledge of merits is the cause why He predestines some and not others, as it seems.

§ 12. And this is proved by reason: because

§ 1. 1. The will, as Damascene says, is rational, and if it is not rational, it is not will: since therefore the wills of showing mercy and not showing mercy are in God, those wills will be rational: therefore they will proceed from reason according to the reason of intelligence. But there is no reason which does not discern why it should be given to one and not to another: therefore it seems that God discerns this: but this cannot be done except by foreknown merits: therefore the foreknowledge of merits is the cause of predestination or reprobation.

§ 2. 2. Also, no election of a wise man is of those things which have no distance [i.e., difference]: but the most wise God from eternity elected some, and reprobated others: therefore it was necessary that they differed in some way: but they could not differ from eternity, except in the foreknowledge of merits: therefore it seems as before.

§ 3. 3. Also, it belongs to a wise man never to determine anything in the will, unless he foresees as much as he can, what end and outcome it can attain in reality: since therefore God is supremely wise, He never determines the will of reprobating or showing mercy, except from the prefinition of future merits which foreknowledge foresees: and thus again the same follows as before.

§ 4. 4. Also, by a similarity, if an earthly king must elect attendants and soldiers, as much as he can, he inquires beforehand of what custom and character they are, and whether they are faithful or not, so that from past things he may learn what he ought to presume about future ones: and if he could foresee future things, he would elect from future things more than from past things: therefore since God sees future things, it seems that He predestines and reprobates from the foreknowledge of future merits.

§ 5. 5. Also, if a father of a family knew which of his sons would dissipate the inheritance, and which would conserve it, he would distribute the inheritance to his sons according to the foreknowledge of their future acts: therefore it seems that since God can do this, He Himself elects according to the foreknowledge of merits.

§ 6. 6. Also, it is objected more strongly thus: It would seem to be cruelty in God, if He were to make such a man, and immediately reprobate him in whom no cause of future reprobation were seen: since therefore there is no cruelty in God, He reprobates from the prevision of merits.

§ 7. 7. Also, a wise artisan does not make a vessel useful for nothing: since therefore the reprobate are useful for nothing, it seems that they ought not to be made by God.

§ 8. If perhaps you say that predestination cannot be from merits: because every merit is from grace, and thus grace, which is the effect of predestination, precedes every merit; therefore merit is rather from predestination, than conversely. That seems to be nothing: although this solution is written in the Text: because a similar thing cannot be said concerning reprobation: for there penalty is not prepared except for our work, which is from us, not from God.

§ 9. Also, although merit is from grace, and grace is not from us, nevertheless, as Augustine says in the Text, both of these are ours on account of the consent of free choice, and thus that foreseen consent can be the cause of the predestination of some, and dissent the cause of reprobation: whence it is clear that this solution does not solve the doubt of the question.

§ 10. But against this it is objected thus: 1. Of the first cause there is no cause: but the will of God is the first cause: therefore of the will of God there is no cause: therefore neither is the foreknowledge of anything the cause of the will. And that the will is the first cause is proved thus: The practical intellect is not a cause except through the will: because it does not move except through the will: therefore the first reason of causality rests with the will. If perhaps you should say that the will is the efficient [cause], and future merits hold [the place of] the final cause, as some have said: this is very absurd: because it is a physical axiom that nothing does anything for the sake of something less worthy and baser than itself: but future merits are less worthy than the will of God. Similarly the Scripture says, that "for the sake of

§ 1. Himself He has created all things" therefore it is left that there is no cause of the predestining or reprobating will.

§ 2. 2. Also, foreknown merits are future: therefore if they were the cause of predestination or reprobation: either this is because they are foreknown merits, or because they are future, or because they are foreknown as future. If in the first way: this cannot be: because as foreknown, they are only in the ideas, and do not differ by the differences of good and evil: and therefore there would not be made a discernment of the predestining and reprobating will. But if because they are future, or because they are foreknown as future: then by reason of futurity, in which they ought to take the difference of good and evil, they would be referred to predestination or reprobation: therefore the temporal under the temporal reason of futurity is the cause of the eternal, which is impossible: because just as time flows from eternity and aeviternity, so does the temporal from the eternal.

§ 3. Solution. It must be said with Augustine here in the Text, that predestination and reprobation do not have any cause. But it must be distinguished, that cause is manifold, namely efficient, and formal, and final, and material: and indeed it does not have an efficient cause, nor a material, nor a formal, nor a final one. But the end is twofold, namely the end of intention, and the end of the work: and I call the end of intention that which is intended by the efficient [agent], just as beatitude is intended by the one working well: whereas I call the end of the work that at which the work terminates: and this is sometimes temporal: just as going to Matins terminates at receiving the established offerings: and receiving sacred orders terminates at having a prebend: and such a thing adjoined to the end can be the reason of the work, yet it will not properly be the final cause, because the final cause is that which quiets the intention per se and entirely. Similarly it must be distinguished in predestination, that something there is eternal, such as the purpose; and something is determinable to time, such as the collation of grace. And on the part of the eternal it has neither a final cause nor a reason, properly speaking: because a reason also in some way elicits the work, but future merits in no way elicit the purpose of God. However, on the part of the effect in which predestination and reprobation are determinable to time, they have the reason of merit, though not a final cause. But because it is difficult to respond to the Glosses introduced, therefore one must respond to each individually.

§ 4. It must be said therefore to the first, that Esau was justly reprobated for two reasons. One is what Anselm says, that whatever God wills is just: whence we could say that justice there is called the equity of the divine will. The other reason is, so that justice there may mean the debt of penalty to fault, and reprobation may be posited for obduration or condemnation, as the Master said in the last chapter of the preceding distinction.

§ 5. To the other it must be said in the same way.

§ 6. To the other it must be said that the knowledge of merit expresses there the reason of the collation of grace, not the cause of predestination: nor does it speak there of predestination according to itself, but of the effect determinable to time.

§ 7. To the other it must be said that this Gloss has a special difficulty, and I think that original sin is not there called a habit only, because in that Esau and Jacob were similar: nor is Esau taken there for a little child, but for a nation, and Jacob similarly. Whence the original [sin] in Esau is the fomes [tinder of sin] related to the gaping toward concupiscence in the nation not to be liberated through Christ, because it refused to consent to the grace of redemption accomplished through Christ. But in Jacob, [it is] the gaping toward grace in the faithful people who will consent to Christ, through whose redemption the grace of that people is expedited for meriting: and this grace is called the gratuitous gift of mercy. These [words end here]

§ 1. ...however, they are the reason for hatred not on the part of eternal reprobation, but on the part of the preparation of punishment, and from another aspect, the reason for the conferring of grace.

§ 2. To the next it must be said, according to the aforesaid, that the Gloss touches upon the reason for the application of grace, and not the cause of predestination. The reasons do not touch [upon this], except that the will...

§ 3. To the next it must be said that Origen touches upon the state of two peoples, and their diverse relation to liberating grace: and that diverse mode can be the reason for the liberation of some, and the damnation of others.

§ 4. The same solution also applies to the following authority from Genesis 16:17 and following.[116]

§ 5. To that which is objected by means of reason, there is one solution for all, namely that that will of God is not irrational on the part of the effect and the thing willed: and this has already been conceded, although in itself it has no cause.

Articulus 4 — Whether, Just as the Will of God Is as a Cause in Predestination, So Also It Is in Reprobation

Article 4. Whether, just as the will of God stands as a cause in predestination, it also stands thus in reprobation?

§ 7. Next, it is inquired concerning those things which are in the Text, at C, However, it seems to be opposed to these things, etc.

§ 8. 1. For it seems to follow from the determination of the Master, that the will of God stands not only as a cause in predestination, but also in reprobation, since this was denied in the preceding distinction, in the last chapter.

§ 9. 2. Also, foreknowledge of the foreknown also seems to be the cause of damnation. For Augustine says in the book City of God that if the Church knew of some who were foreknown to eternal death, it would pray for them no more than for the devil: therefore it seems that it is necessary that they be damned.

§ 10. 3. Also, I infer thus: This man is foreknown: therefore he will be damned: and I ask, from what topic is the argument drawn? It cannot be from the effect: because the foreknowledge of God is not caused by future things, for then a temporal thing would be the cause of something eternal, and God's knowledge would depend upon future things, which is absurd. Therefore the topic is from the cause: therefore God is the cause of the iniquity of the damned, which is false. Therefore there is no relation there of the inferred to the inferring, and yet the argumentation holds, which is incongruous.

§ 11. SOLUTION. It must be said that God is in no way the cause of iniquity, but He is the efficient, not the meritorious, cause of damnation.

§ 12. To the induced authority it must be said that it carries no necessity except the immutability of the consequence, and not the necessity of the thing, as has frequently been said above: because foreknowledge does not remove the faculty of free choice: and therefore, together with it, the potency for the opposite is always present.

§ 13. To the next it must be said, as above, that the relation of this argumentation is one thing when it is said, This man is foreknown to sin: therefore he will sin: and another when it is inferred thus, This man is foreknown to be damned: therefore he will be damned.

§ 14. For in the first argument the topic is not from the cause or from the effect, but from a convertible term supposed by hypothesis: for one of these follows upon the other, and conversely, this man will sin: therefore he is foreknown to sin: therefore he will sin: and yet neither is the cause of the other. In the other argument, however, the topic is from the cause: because God is indeed the efficient cause of damnation. One is posited to follow the other, as is objected. But if you object that, if the topic is from a convertible term, then one posited according to being posits the other, and when one is, the other is. It must be said that this is not true: because the reason for their convertibility is not that one is from the other, as from a cause, as man and capable of laughter: but only because the knowledge which is had of it follows the fact, and is not caused by it.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Knowledge Of God Is Changeable

Article 5. Whether the knowledge of God is variable?

§ 16. Next, it is inquired concerning the last part of this treatise which begins there, at F, Furthermore it must be considered, whether all those things, etc. In which the Master touches upon whether a mutation of knowledge and foreknowledge falls upon God?

§ 17. And first he determines concerning the mutation of foreknowledge, secondly concerning the mutation of knowledge, there, at G, But concerning knowledge we speak otherwise, etc.

§ 18. The Master concedes in the Text that God foreknew something which He now does not foreknow: and it does not follow that He has changed, but rather that the foreknown thing has changed.

§ 19. But concerning this a question arises: because foreknowledge speaks of a relation of God's knowledge to future things: but this relation is in something: not unless in the knowledge of God. Therefore, when the relation is varied, some mutation has been made in the knowledge, as it seems.

§ 20. But this was solved above, by showing that a relation is varied when one of the extremes is varied, without any mutation of the other: and therefore the Master speaks the truth, that this posits a mutation only in the known thing, and not in God the knower.

116. Romans 8:28.

Articulus 6 — Whether God Knows All Complexes, Such as Propositions and Enuntiabilia That He Once Knew

Article 6. Whether God knows all complexes, such as propositions, and enunciables which He once knew?

§ 22. But a doubt arises concerning the second part.

§ 23. And it is divided into three parts, of which the first is, Whether God knows all complexes, such as propositions, and enunciables which He once knew? The second is, Whether those complexes are always true, as some have said? The third is, Whether by the First Truth all things are true which are true, as some others have said?

§ 24. To the first, one proceeds thus: 1. God knows whatever He knew. Proof. Whatever knows through something that relates in one way to being and to non-being in all time, that is not changed in its knowledge. But God knows through ideas that relate in one way: therefore He is not changed in knowing.

§ 25. 2. Also, a knowledge which relates in one way is more noble than that which relates in various ways: but the more noble in any genus is to be attributed to God: therefore His knowledge is of such a kind: therefore He knows whatever He knew.

§ 26. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Aristotle says in the book of the Posterior Analytics that knowledge is corrupted in three ways, namely by the corruption of the knower, and by the corruption of the knowable object, and by intervening oblivion: but it is evident that things known by God are changed and corrupted every day: therefore there will be a mutation on the part of the knower according to knowledge.

§ 27. 2. Also, He knows whatever He knew: and whatever is known, is true: therefore whatever God knew, is true. But He knew that you would be born: therefore it is true that you will be born, as it seems: which is false, because you have been born.

§ 28. 3. Also, a passage in the thing, even without oblivion and mutation of the knower, varies the knowledge, as the Philosopher maintains: since therefore such a passage frequently occurs on the part of things, the knowledge of God seems to be varied.

§ 29. If perhaps you should say that in those arguments there falls the fallacy of figure of speech and of accident: God knows whatever He knew: but He knew that you would be born: therefore He knows that you will be born: from the fact that a what is changed into a how (a mode of being). Against this: I take this proposition, Whatever proposition God knew, He knows, or whatever enunciable: but He knew this proposition, Socrates will be born, and this enunciable, Socrates is to be: therefore He still knows it. And whatever is known, is true: therefore this is true, Socrates will be born, and it is true that Socrates is to be born, which is false: therefore He does not know whatever He knew.

§ 30. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. God's knowledge receives nothing from things: therefore when things are varied, it itself is not varied, but remains stable.

§ 31. 2. Also, nothing eternal is varied according to the variation of temporal things: God's knowledge is eternal: therefore it is not varied according to the variation of temporal things: therefore whatever God knew, He still knows.

§ 32. SOLUTION. It must be said that if we were to follow for a moment the ancient opinion of the Nominales [Nominalists], we would say that God knows whatever He knew: and then we would say that a proposition or enunciable which is once true, will always be true. But a numerically one enunciable is not to be resumed except with respect to the same time, as when it is said, that the world will be is true: that is true by reason of eternity anteceding time. But if it is now resumed, it must be resumed by reason of the same time: but this is not signified now as future or present, but it is signified as past: therefore it is signified by this, that the world was is true, and that the world would be then, and that it was now, is also one enunciable and true by reason of the same time, but it signifies in diverse modes. And this is plainly extracted from the Text: because the Master solves it thus. And by holding that opinion of the Nominales, it is plain to respond to the objections. But because this is not probable, that the world will be and the world was are one enunciable, because the Philosopher proves in the Categories that one statement without any mutation of itself, but by the mutation of the thing, is susceptible to contraries: because from the fact that a thing is or is not, the statement is true or false: therefore it seems to me that they are two enunciables, the world will be, and the world was, and one is true, and the other false. And it seems to me that, speaking of complexes, God does not know whatever He knew, on account of the passage and transmutation which is on the part of things: nor do I place force in that solution, that a what is changed into a how: because it seems to me to be an evasion. But how God by simple knowledge knows both composites and complexes, has been determined above.

§ 33. To that, however, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that this posits no mutation in God, but only that the knowable objects relate otherwise to His knowledge than they previously related. Hence His knowledge passes over the thing otherwise when it is, and otherwise when it is not.

§ 34. To the next it must be said that the most noble knowledge is that which, without mutation of the knower, knows concerning each thing in the mode just as it is: because to know in one mode, whether it is or whether it is not, posits confusion in the divine knowledge and an imperfection, and therefore such knowledge is not to be given to God: and therefore it must be posited that that other mode of knowledge passing over the thing when it is and when it is not, posits a mutation in the knowable object and the known.

§ 35. To that which is objected again lastly to the contrary, it must be said that although He receives nothing from things, nevertheless He posits a respect towards them, and that respect is varied when the thing is varied.

§ 36. To the next it must be said that the eternal is not varied in itself, but for a respect to be varied which is in time, is nothing incongruous, as has frequently been seen above.

Articulus 7 — Whether Enuntiabilia Are Always True

Article 7. Whether enunciables are always true?

§ 38. Secondly it is inquired, Whether enunciables are always true?

§ 39. It seems that they are not: because 1. From the fact that a thing is or is not, a statement is true or false: therefore a proposition or enunciable which is sometimes true, is not always true.

§ 40. 2. Also, according to this Aristotle would have said nothing, when he says that a statement is susceptible to contraries according to the mutation of the thing.

§ 41. But the reasons of Anselm are against this. For truth is a rectitude perceptible only by the mind, namely when a thing does that which it received from the First Truth that it should do: as the sign that I sit, or that I am sitting, signifies this, whether I sit, or not. Therefore it seems that in whatever mode the thing is varied, it itself always preserves in signifying a rectitude perceptible only by the mind. Therefore it always preserves truth: therefore what is once true, is always true, because the same reasoning applies to all others.

§ 42. SOLUTION. According to Anselm it must be distinguished that in signs there is a twofold rectitude, namely to do that which it received from the First Truth that it should do, and to do that for the sake of which it received it from the First Truth. Just as this statement, that I sit, received from the First Truth that it should signify that I sit, whether I sit or not: and it received it for the sake of this, that it should signify that I sit, while I am sitting: and should not signify it, while I am not sitting. Because any sign received to signify for the sake of this, that it signifies what is to be, and what is not to not be: and not that it signifies to be what is not, or conversely.

§ 43. It must be said therefore that the first truth is in the sign, according to the rectitude which it has in signifying: but the second is in it, according as the thing signified is equated to it. And thus in the second a twofold rectitude is supposed, namely of the sign, and of the thing: but in the first only one of them. Now the sign has the first in that it is a sign: and therefore that is inseparable from it. But it has the second insofar as it is equated to the thing of which it is the sign; and therefore that is mutable, as the thing is rendered: nevertheless according to Anselm who considers subtly, the curvature is more from a defect of the thing, than of the sign. And therefore Anselm says that truth is inseparable from the sign: just as to burn or to heat is inseparable from fire.

§ 44. With these established, it is plain to respond to the objections.

§ 45. For to the first two it must be said that they proceed concerning the second truth which is caused by the thing being equated with the sign, and it is well conceded that that is mutable.

§ 46. To those which are objected to the contrary, it must be said that all proceed according to the truth spoken of in the first mode.

Articulus 8 — Whether All Things That Are True Are True by the First Truth

Article 8. Whether by the First Truth all things are true which are true?

§ 48. Thirdly it is inquired, Whether by the First Truth all things are true which are true? And we speak of truth spoken of in the first mode.

§ 49. It seems that they are: because 1. Anselm says in the book De Veritate: Do you think that there is anything anytime, or anywhere, which is not in the Supreme Truth, and which has not received from there what it is insofar as it is, or that it could be other than it is there? And he responds that it is not to be thought.

§ 50. 2. Also, in the same place: Whatever truly is, insofar as it is, this is what is there: and you can conclude absolutely that everything which is, truly is: therefore because it is no other than what is there.

§ 51. 3. Also, nothing is incommutable except the First Truth: the truth of wood is incommutable: therefore it itself is the First Truth.

§ 52. 4. Also, in the same truth is one sign in which another is, since all things are what they are in the First Truth: therefore all things are true by one truth, as it seems.

§ 53. 5. Also, according to this that they are in the First Truth (as Anselm says in the Monologion), they are that which truth itself is: but truth itself is true by eternal truth: therefore every sign is true by eternal truth, as it seems.

§ 54. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. The truth of a sign is in the sign, as a form in a subject. If therefore a sign is true by the First Truth, the First Truth will be the form of many signs, which is heretical.

§ 55. 2. Also, in those in which there is no one reason of signifying in number or species, it is impossible for there to be one rectitude in number or species: therefore it is impossible for them to have one rectitude: but rectitude is truth, as Anselm says: therefore it is impossible for all things to be true by one truth.

§ 56. SOLUTION. Anselm does not intend all things to be true by one truth, except in a certain respect, namely exemplarily, and effectively: and this is true. Because the exemplar of the rectitude of signifying is one: and God is the cause of truth wherever there may be truth. And therefore that truth which is in signs can be considered in two ways, namely according to the procession from the exemplar into the sign: and thus the truth is one in Him from whom it proceeds, but not one by the unity of that into which it proceeds. Just as lines proceeding from the center to the circumference are united by the unity of the center, but are discerned by the diversity of the arcs upon which they fall on the part of the circumference: and therefore formally and essentially they are many truths: but exemplarily and effectively they are one.

§ 57. To the authorities of Anselm it must be said that he does not understand things to be the First Truth essentially, but exemplarily: and thus he also understands things to be in the First Truth: since he himself is speaking of things which exist in their proper natures.

§ 58. To the next it must be said that truly incommutable is nothing but the truth and essence First which is God: but the incommutability of the content in being is the incommutability of the sign, because an existing sign which is contained in being by God, cannot not signify: it can however not be a sign, and thus not signify.

§ 59. To the next it must be said that this is not true, except speaking exemplarily.

§ 60. To the last the solution is plain through the aforesaid.

DISTINCTIO XLII

Divisio Textus

Division of the Text. Now it must be treated concerning the omnipotence of God. Here begins that part which is concerning omnipotence.

§ 62. And it has three parts according to a threefold consideration of omnipotence. For it can be considered according to those things by which it has to be defined: and thus it is treated in this distinction. It is also considered according to the property which belongs to it according as it is rooted in the divine essence, which is that it cannot be limited and bounded in its ability: and thus it is treated in the following distinction 43, there, at A, Some however glorying in their own sense, etc. It can also be considered according to the mode by which it goes out into an operation: and thus it is treated in distinction 44, there, at A, Now that remains to be discussed, etc.

§ 63. This distinction is divided into three parts. In the first he posits that by reason of which it is called omnipotence: because through that it has to be defined. In the second he removes certain things, which declare impotence, from divine potency, there, at B, But it is inquired, How it is said to be able to do all things, etc. In the third, concerning the determined things, he objects and solves, there, at E, Here therefore to those considering diligently, the work of omnipotence appears according to two, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Omnipotence Belongs to God; And, Whether He Acts with His Whole Power in His Omnipotence

Article 1. Whether omnipotence belongs to God? and, Whether He Himself acts by His total power in His omnipotence?

§ 65. Now five dubitable matters arise around the beginning: of which the first is, Whether omnipotence belongs to God? The second is, Whether it is proper to God to be omnipotent, or whether this can also belong to others? The third is, By reason of what that is in the essence, according to the account of the intelligence, does this follow the proper divine essence? The fourth is, What corresponds to it in the creature? The fifth and last is, Whether it is equated to the will and to knowledge, or is it broader?

§ 66. To the first one proceeds thus: 1. The Philosopher says in the fifth book of First Philosophy, that active potency is a principle of transmutation into another, insofar as it is another: [117] therefore every active potency supposes something upon which it acts. But God who creates, supposes nothing, but makes the whole: therefore He does not have an active potency. Now it is evident that He does not have a passive one: therefore it seems that He has none.

§ 67. 2. Also, every potency is towards another, because it is towards act: therefore something is of greater perfection than any potency: but nothing is of greater perfection than God or anything which is in God: therefore there is no potency in God, as it seems.

§ 68. 3. Also, let it be granted that there is a potency in Him: either it is conjoined to act, or not. If so, since a work accompanies a potency conjoined to act, it seems that a work always accompanies that potency. But the potency of God is from eternity: therefore the work will also be from eternity. But if you say that it is not conjoined to act: therefore it is conjoinable to something, which is not in it: and thus it is mutable, and perfectible by some perfection, which is false.

§ 69. 4. Also, in nature nothing is in vain: therefore much less in God. But the Philosopher says that if in nature there were some active potency to which no passive potency responded which would be completed by it, it would be in vain in nature: because some agent could enact some act, which nothing could receive.[118] Therefore it seems that if there is omnipotence in God, that it is necessary to posit some passive potency which receives every act of His: and this cannot be: therefore omnipotence seems to be in Him in vain. But nothing is in vain in Him: therefore, etc.

§ 70. 5. Also, we find in God a threefold mode of acting, namely natural, animal, and a quasi-artificial act. For we say that God generates, and God spirates: and in these there is the communicability of nature according to the distinction of hypostases: and we say that God knows, and wills, and the like: and these are quasi-animal acts: and we say that God creates, and governs. But no act is present without a potency: since therefore potencies are defined by acts, there will seem to be a threefold potency in God.

§ 72. 7. Also, in superior things we say that God can generate, and always generates, as was held above: and we say that God can know, and always in act knows and is aware: why then can we not say thus, God can create, and always creates? For it seems that it ought to be said: because whatever potency is less perfect before the act than in the act itself: hence since nothing imperfect falls into Him, He seems always to create.

§ 73. Also it is inquired next to this, Whether He Himself acts these threefold acts by His total power?

§ 74. It seems, however, that He does not: because when it is acted by the total power, the act equates to the power, so that that which is the object of the power is as great as the power itself. For the Father generates as much as He Himself is: therefore as much as His power is: and similarly He spirates. Similarly when He understands Himself, He is as intelligible as the intellective power. Therefore since the created thing is not as great as the creating power itself, He seems not to act in that action according to the total power, but according to a part.

§ 75. ON THE CONTRARY: If He acts according to a part, then the power is divisible: and this cannot be, since it is entirely simple.

§ 76. SOLUTION. It must be said that God is supremely powerful: such that He alone is truly powerful, whose power has nothing of infirmity intermixed.

§ 77. To the first, however, it must be said that His power is truly active, and no other: because, as Augustine says, the predicament of action truly belongs to God alone, because He acts without His own motion and passion.[119] But regarding what the Philosopher defines as active potency, such that it supposes that upon which it acts, it must be said that that is not of the essence of the definition of potency, but happens to it insofar as it is in an imperfect nature. But of the essence of the definition of potency, there is no more than that it is a principle of transmutation: and according to this it belongs to God, whose power transmutates non-being into being, and being in potency into being in act, and being in act into something better. Hence every transmutation is from that which in no way is transmutated and moved, as from an acting and moving power.

§ 78. To the next it must be said that a certain potency is towards another, which is the act, which is in the agent of the act, although as an act it is from it: and of such a potency it is true that it is more imperfect before the act than in the act itself, as is an understanding potency before the act, and universally what is in habit or potency before it proceeds into act. There is also a certain potency which is not in potency before the act, except according as the act is an effect, not something adventitious to the operating potency: and thus the power of God with respect to certain things is in habit, namely because the operated work does not immediately follow, although in that work nothing new comes to the power: for just as God is His power, so He is His action, as the Philosopher proves. Hence it is clear that He is not of greater perfection after the act, and when He is already in act, than before.

§ 79. To the next, some say that the power of God can be compared to a twofold act, namely to an interior one, and an exterior one. The interior they call such as to understand, and to will: and thus it is always in act. The exterior they call such as to create: and thus it is not always in act. But this solution does not solve the reasoning.

§ 80. Furthermore, when God creates, He does not act by an exterior action: because as Psalm 32:9 says: He spoke, and they were made: He commanded, and they were created.[120] And Augustine says that He creates by His Word, namely by speaking the Word. And Gregory Nazianzen: First indeed God thought up the heavenly essences: and His thinking was His work. Therefore it is clear that creation, according as it is in the Creator, posits nothing extrinsic.

117. Aristotle, Metaphysics, V.

§ 81. And therefore it must be said that all His potency is always in act, but not in an act which is an effect: since the effect cannot be at the same time with the acting potency. And of this an example has often been posited above: because God's operative knowledge and power and will, that something be made, are the efficient cause in the creature, since it is wisdom ordering and positing in created things the order of time and dignity and nature. Hence from eternity God knew and willed and said in the Word, that this should be made now, and that then, and this of this nature, and that of another. From this however no mutation is posited in God.

§ 82. To the next it must be said that nothing is in God in vain: but nevertheless it is impossible that His active potency have some passive potency responding to it, which could receive as much as that can enact: for it is not for this, but rather for the showing of the divine perfection. For it is impossible that it be demonstrated in a created effect: but it is demonstrated, according as it is infinite in the generation of the Son, and the procession of the Holy Spirit: and therefore it is not idle. But if it were for creating, according as it is infinite, and it were not demonstrated in creating, then it could be called idle.

§ 83. To the next it must be said that generation, and spiration, and understanding, and willing are not properly called acts: because nothing is enacted there. But if act is taken broadly and improperly, then it must be said that the power of God is considered in two ways, namely in comparison to the essence in which it is as in a root, and in comparison to the act. And according to the first mode it is not a power, except one. In the second mode, however, it will be varied according to the act, as was said above, where also certain things can be found which are dismissed here, namely whether power is predicated univocally of the power to generate and to create, and whether there is one power of the three according as it is the power to generate, and which is prior according to the account of intelligence, the power to generate or to create, and certain other things.

§ 84. To the next it must be said that it is otherwise in inferior things: because those powers are not founded in one essence, as in superior things: because all things which proceed from the first are multiplied, and are compounded, and receive exemplated in many what in the simple first is in one. For I well concede that the power of generating more respects nature, as nature is the principle from which the first pullulating thing pullulates, and the power of understanding and willing is according to relation to a spiritual nature turning back upon itself, as the rational soul does, which is exemplated by that power. But the power of creating by which it quasi-produces ideal accounts into ideated things, is more represented in mechanical art by the power of operating on artificial things. But all these in divine things are one, although there is a distinction in the account of the attributes.

§ 85. To the next it must be said that we do not say, God always creates according to act: because the act of that power is understood as the effect. Nevertheless I well concede that that power is never prior to the act which is to will and to know when and how it should be made: for this is the action of God which is the same as Himself, as has frequently been said.

118. Aristotle.

§ 86. To that which is further inquired, Whether He Himself acts by His total power in His omnipotence? It must be said that He does: but the enacted thing cannot be enacted infinitely, and just as the power is infinite: and this is because it is a certain thing enacted in a diversity of essence from the agent Himself: and therefore it is necessary that essences be finite: and since potency follows essence, the potency will also be finite: although God acts by His total power, as far as concerns Himself. There is also another reason: because wisdom limits the act itself, that is, that which is enacted: and thus, so that there may be a more perfect beauty which results from the grades of limited essences.

§ 1. But whether anything can be made better than it is made will be clear below in [distinction] 4.

Articulus 2 — Whether Omnipotence Is Proper to God Alone

Whether omnipotence is a proper attribute of God alone?

§ 2. Secondly, it is asked whether omnipotence is an attribute proper to God alone, or not?

It seems that it is not. 1. On Colossians 1:22, regarding the text, He has now reconciled in the body of his flesh through death, etc., the Gloss says as follows: "If as mortal and dead he can reconcile, now as glorious and immortal he can do all things." But it is evident that this is attributed to Christ according to his human nature; therefore, to be able to do all things does not belong to the divinity alone.

§ 3. 2. Also, on that same text, 1:20: To reconcile all things. The Gloss: "He can do all things through himself, so that nothing is excepted which cannot be provided through him." From this, the same is held as before.

1. Also. Omniscience belongs to divine perfection just as omnipotence does; and since the soul of Christ had the knowledge of all things, it seems that it also had omnipotence.

But because this was investigated in the third book of the Sentences, let it therefore be asked: whether this belongs to faith?

§ 4. But it seems that it does. Matthew 17:19: If you have faith like a mustard seed, you will say to this mountain, 'Move from here to there,' and it will move. And it follows: Nothing will be impossible for you: therefore all things are possible: therefore faith can do all things, as is also said in the text of Mark 9:22 therefore it seems that this does not belong to God alone.

Also, since the working of miracles is communicated to faith, and in a certain way the ability to do all things, it is asked whether this is by uncreated power operating on account of faith, or by created power? If uncreated: then it does not seem to belong to faith. But if created: then I ask, why is this given to faith rather than to charity, which is more perfect than faith?

119. Augustine, De Trinitate, V, c. 8.

§ 5. If on account of these authorities it is said that omnipotence can belong to something other than God. On the contrary:

1. Among all power, the highest power is to be able of itself: but this cannot belong to anything that is from another: therefore it seems that omnipotence belongs to God alone.
2. Also, to create is an act educing something from nothing: but nothing is not proportioned to being: therefore it is an act unproportionable to any created power: therefore it cannot belong to a creature.

§ 6. Solution. It must be said that omnipotence is an attribute proper to the divine nature alone. And regarding what is objected through the two Glosses concerning Christ according to his human nature, it must be said that it is understood of the person in the human nature: and this person is indeed omnipotent just as the Father is. Concerning this, however, very many things are found on the third book [of the Sentences], where it is also resolved how the knowledge of all things is given to him, but not the power of all things.

§ 7. To what is further asked about faith, it must be said that when it is said that all things are possible for the one who believes, the distribution is accommodated only for those things above nature which serve for the demonstration (e.g., to transplant into the sea, and it will obey you) and proof of faith: because faith is in a certain way proved through miracles. But certain things show the ultimate infinity and immensity of power, such as creating the world from nothing, or conjoining the divine nature with the human in one person: and these I do not think are subject to faith.

§ 8. To the next objection, it must be said that faith raises a human being to omnipotence, which is an article of faith, and which proves the whole faith: but this is not the case with charity: because charity does not regard anything but the good as its object: nor does it seek to be proved, but rather to inhere: and therefore this is more congruent with faith.

§ 9. To the next, it must be said that in the way faith works all things that prove it among the people for whom signs are necessary, it can be said that a created power flowing into faith from uncreated power does this, so that the primary power of operating is the uncreated power, and under it operates the created power of faith.

Articulus 3 — It Is Asked, Since Every Proper Attribute Is Among the Things That Follow the Essence, as Boethius Says, by Reason of That Which Is in the Divine Essence or Substance, Whether This Omnipotence Follows the Divine Essence; And, Whether Immutability or Omnipotence More Immediately Follows the Divine Essence

It is asked: since every proper attribute is among those things following upon the essence, as Boethius says, by reason of what is in the divine essence or substance does this omnipotence follow the divine essence? And, whether incommutability or omnipotence more immediately follows the divine essence?

120. Ps. 32:9.

§ 10. Thirdly, it is asked: since every proper attribute is among those things following upon the essence, as Boethius says, by reason of what is in the divine essence or substance does this omnipotence follow the divine essence?

§ 11. It seems that omnipotence follows the essence insofar as it is not from nothing.

1. For the first defect impeding perfect ability is due to the fact that the creature is from nothing: therefore it seems that the opposite is the cause of the opposite: therefore not to be from nothing will be the reason for production from nothing.
2. Also, it will be held below that omnipotence belongs to God insofar as he can do all things that he wills, and suffer absolutely nothing: but to suffer all things is according to vertibility and mutability: therefore, by way of opposites according to the cause of immutability, to be able to suffer nothing will be the case: but the reason of mutability is entirely to be from nothing, as Damascene says: therefore to suffer nothing is according to the fact that it is not to be from nothing, as it seems, that is to be omnipotent: therefore omnipotence follows not being from nothing, as it seems.

§ 12. ON THE CONTRARY: Omnipotence is determined through the will, as is often held in the text [of Lombard], because the Lord is called omnipotent because he can do all things that he wills to be done: therefore it follows the will: therefore it does not immediately follow not being from nothing.

Also, two proper attributes cannot follow the same thing according to the same respect in a substance: but incommutability follows not being from nothing, as was proved above: therefore omnipotence does not follow that.

§ 13. Further it is asked, which of these follows the divine essence more immediately, incommutability or omnipotence? It seems that it is incommutability: because

1. Augustine says that true incommutability is true eternity: therefore incommutability follows the ratio of eternity: but this belongs to the essence itself enduring always: therefore incommutability also: but omnipotence is determined toward acts: therefore this does not follow as immediately as incommutability.
2. Also, incommutability refers to nature: but omnipotence refers to acts and objects that are outside the divine essence: therefore omnipotence seems not to be from God immediately, as incommutability is.

§ 14. ON THE CONTRARY: Incommutability is communicated to someone, such as the blessed: but omnipotence to no one, not even to the man Christ: therefore omnipotence is more immediate than incommutability.

§ 15. Solution. It must be said that omnipotence is a proper attribute of the divine substance, and it follows the perfection of the essence in which someone is. For although in God there is nothing according to reality that distinguishes that which is (quod est) and that by which it is (quo est), nevertheless there is a difference there between that by which it is and who it is (quis est), which is the person, not indeed according to a real difference, but according to a difference of reason. Whence, just as the Philosopher says in the book De Anima that form is in the ratio of a threefold cause, namely formal insofar as it gives being and nature, and final insofar as it is intended by the efficient cause, and efficient insofar as after perfection in being it is converted into a principle of acting: so we can say according to the understanding's reasoning in divine matters, that omnipotence follows the substance or essence insofar as in the person it is converted into a principle of acting, and this follows the perfection in being which the person gives, speaking quasi-formally, or to that which is called who it is or what it is. And I readily concede that it does not follow the essence from that part by which it is not from nothing, except remotely, but rather incommutability follows it from that part. Whence I readily concede that true incommutability follows the essence more immediately than omnipotence.

§ 16. Therefore it must be said to the first objection that it is true that an imperfection of power follows the creature from the fact that it is from nothing, but not immediately; rather, by means of the vertibility which immediately follows that.

§ 17. To the next, it must be said that suffering nothing follows the perfection of the essence, insofar as it has nothing of matter or of the properties of matter. And this is according as that which is does not differ from that by which it is, and conversely: and this does not immediately follow not being vertible, but remotely; but rather, not being vertible follows not beginning from a turning [i.e., from change or creation from nothing].

§ 18. To what is objected concerning the will, it must be said that omnipotence is not determined by the will except on the part of the object which is freely chosen, and this also applies to any other power to which an object is proportioned and which cannot operate otherwise.

§ 19. To what is objected on the contrary, it must be said that incommutability, as was proved above by many authorities, is communicable to no one: but incommutability according to act, not according to potency, is communicated, just as power is, although not omnipotence, just as neither is true incommutability.

Articulus 4 — What Corresponds to the Divine Omnipotence on the Part of the Thing

What corresponds to divine omnipotence on the part of the thing?

§ 20. Fourthly, it is asked: what corresponds to it on the part of the thing?

And it seems that nothing does: because 1. Everything that is in a creature seems to be being, or true, or good: for these are among the primary things: but being does not correspond to power, because power is prior to being: and the true corresponds to knowledge, and the good to will: therefore it seems that nothing corresponds to power.

§ 21. 2. Also, just as what acts in actuality relates to being in actuality that is produced, so power acting relates to being in potency that can be produced: but what acts in actuality produces the first created being: therefore power acting produces no created thing: therefore nothing in the creature corresponds to power.

1. Also, power extends to those things that will never be: therefore it does not necessarily connote anything in the creature.

If this is conceded, that nothing in the creature corresponds to it to which it may be referred.

On the contrary: 1. Every name said of God that connotes nothing in a creature designates the essence alone: power is such a name: therefore it designates the essence alone, as it seems: therefore it seems that whatever can be said of the essence could also be said of power, which is false.

1. Also, according to this, what was held above would be false, where the Master says that these three demand a special tract: because they are said of God in respect to creatures.

§ 22. Solution. It must be said, as above, that neither power, nor knowledge, nor will connote an effect in the creature: because if this were so, they would not belong to God from eternity; rather, they signify the divine essence with respect to the creature. And I readily concede that power regards possible being proportioned to the power of the maker, and proportioned to being made, not that it is proportioned to the power of the maker in quantity, so that it is as great as the power: but it is proportioned according to the decency of the operator. And how this is so will be inquired below in the question, What God can do, and what he cannot do? But that possible being is not posited to be except in the power of the maker, just as the knowable is not posited to be except in an idea or in potency, and the willed only in potency. But this being in potency is not absolutely nothing, although it is nothing in actuality, or in a proximate cause which is the matter or form of a thing.

§ 23. And through this the solution to the first three objections is clear. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it does indeed signify the essence, yet it posits a respect to being in potency to be created: and therefore not everything that is said of the essence applies to it.

Articulus 5 — Whether the Divine Power Is Equal to the Divine Knowledge

Whether divine power is equated to knowledge?

§ 24. Fifthly and lastly it is asked: whether power is equated to knowledge?

It seems that it is not: because knowledge is of good and of evil, but power is only of good: therefore knowledge extends to more than power.

§ 25. ON THE CONTRARY: Knowledge being posited posits power, and not conversely: therefore power extends to more and is prior to knowledge: for it follows, he knows: therefore he can know; but not conversely.

Also, it seems that power follows the will: because

1. Thus it is said, Wisdom 12:18: For power is present to you when you will. Therefore the will is prior to power.
2. Also, Anselm in the book Cur Deus homo says that in all those having power and will, power follows the will: such as I can walk if I will, I can speak if I will, and the like: therefore it is thus also in God: therefore the will is prior to power.
3. Also, Luke 5:12, on the text, Lord, if you will, you can make me clean: Ambrose says: "The will of God is power." But because in the following distinction very many things are held concerning this in the text, let these therefore suffice.

§ 26. Solution. Above, the order of these three was disputed, and let those points be presupposed here.

But it must be said that power is considered in three ways. In one way, as it is the genus of all powers however designated, and thus it is not toward an act, but it follows [i.e., is a broader category applicable to] knowledge and will and any other power, as a genus to a species: and in this way power precedes the will and knowledge: and Richard says that from power is knowledge, and from knowledge and power is love. In another way, power is spoken of as compared to a work indefinitely: and in this way we say that God can do many things by his absolute power which he neither does nor will do. In a third way, power is spoken of as regulated by operative art, and executing what is pre-conceived by wisdom and willed by the will: and this is only of those things which will be, or have been, or are.

§ 27. Also, knowledge is taken in two ways, namely for speculative knowledge which is of both good and evil, and for the knowledge of approbation which is of good only.

Also, the will is also taken in two ways, namely as it is the general mover of all faculties and powers to act, as it is said, I understand, because I will; I eat, because I will; I walk, because I will.

I say therefore that power spoken of in the first way precedes the other two: but in the second and third ways it does not. And knowledge spoken of in the first way precedes power spoken of in the second and third ways. And the will in the second way is spoken of in relation to the willed object, which is good: and spoken of in this way, it is equal with power spoken of in the second and third ways. And knowledge spoken of in the second way is equal with power and will taken in the ultimate way.

And from this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 6 — Whether God Can Do Every Impossible Thing, Both Per Accidens and Per Se

Whether God can do every impossible thing, both per accidens and per se?

§ 28. Next it is asked concerning those things that are said in the text [of Lombard], there at A, How God is truly called omnipotent: whether because he can do all things, etc.

For it seems from this that he can do impossible things. Which also seems true for several other reasons.

1. For it is impossible for nature that something be from nothing: and yet God can do this: therefore he can do the impossible.

§ 29. 2. Also, nothing and something are more distant than something and something: therefore it is a greater distance for something to be made from nothing than for something to be made from something: but he makes something from nothing every day in the creation of rational souls, and he did so in the whole world: therefore much more can he make something from whatever is something, such as a contrary from a contrary, and a disparate from a disparate, and a habit from a privation, and conjoin relative opposites.

1. Also, nature successively makes one contrary from another well enough, and an opposite from an opposite: since therefore God infinitely exceeds the power of nature, he can make opposites to be true simultaneously.
2. Also, God shows certain things in his work which are of greater power than those, such as the union of God and man: for God and man are more distant than man and donkey: therefore if he could make it so that someone is simultaneously God and man, he can make it so that someone is simultaneously man and donkey.

§ 30. 5. Also, two substantial forms that have contrary properties and differences are more distant from the same matter than two accidental forms: but he conjoined substantial forms, such as created and uncreated, and mortal and immortal, etc.: therefore he can conjoin accidental ones, however distant, such as white and black, and other opposites, as it seems.

1. Also, it is more impossible that an act of a power be conjoined with a contrary habit remaining in the power, than that contrary acts should be present on account of diverse and contrary habits: but God did the first, when he made a Virgin remaining a Virgin to give birth: therefore he can also do the second, namely that someone be simultaneously blind and seeing, and that he see and not see.

§ 31. 7. Also, Luke 1:37: No word will be impossible with God: it is evident that he excepts nothing: therefore it seems that all things are possible for him. Also, Mark 14:36: Abba, Father, all things are possible for you.

1. Also, we see that through the Saints he does things impossible for nature to do, such as those we call miracles: therefore it seems that through himself he can do those things that are impossible absolutely speaking.

Also, there is no boundary to infinite power: therefore it is not bounded by the impossible: therefore it can do every impossible thing.

§ 32. Further it is asked concerning what is said, that God cannot do the impossible per accidens.

For this does not seem so: because 1. The impossible per se is more impossible than the impossible per accidens: but he can do the impossible per se, such as a Virgin giving birth, making a dead man live, and the like: therefore much more can he do the impossible per accidens.

1. Also, in the impossible per accidens, nothing causes the impossibility except pastness: and this already is not, because the Philosopher says that the past is not: but in the impossible per se, the cause of impossibility is an opposition which is: therefore since non-being resists the operator less than an opposed being, it seems that he could more easily do the impossible per accidens than the impossible per se.

§ 33. Also it is asked concerning what Jerome says: Although God can do all things, he cannot make a virgin from one who is corrupted.

For this seems entirely false: because 1. Only two things are required for virginity, namely integrity of body and purity of mind. But it is evident that God can do the first, as Jerome himself also says; and penance which restores to integrity can do the second. Therefore much more can God. Therefore he can make a virgin from one corrupted: and this was impossible per accidens: therefore he can do the impossible per accidens.

1. Also, he can do the impossible per se, such as making a woman from a rib, and a calf from a trunk, as Anselm says, and a dragon from a rod, and conversely: therefore he can do the impossible per accidens, and the impossible per se.

§ 34. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Augustine says on Genesis that God cannot nor does operate anything contrary to the causal reasons which he primitively inserted into nature: but impossibilities are contrary to these reasons: therefore God cannot do impossibilities.

1. Also, no artisan from the same art has the power of operating opposites, because thus the same thing would be the rule of opposites and in one way, which cannot be: therefore neither can he make opposites according to one art of operating: but it is evident that this natural course is patterned upon the divine art: therefore to do contrary to this course is to operate contrary to the eternal art: but to operate contrary to the art is to operate contrary to wisdom: since therefore God cannot do anything contrary to his wisdom, God also can do nothing contrary to the course of nature.

§ 35. 3. Also, One building, and another destroying, what utility is there in either? [121] If therefore the power of God is most ordered, and he built the machine of the world usefully, just as he cannot have useless power, so he cannot act contrary to the natural course, as it seems.

1. Also, Augustine against Faustus: "The proposition by which we say something has been is true for this reason, because that of which we say it has been, already is not: God cannot make this proposition false, because he is not contrary to the truth." From this it is gathered that God cannot do the impossible per accidens.

§ 36. Also, in the same place: "God, the creator and founder of all natures, does nothing contrary to nature, just as he does not act contrary to himself: therefore it seems that God could do nothing contrary to nature, just as he does not act contrary to himself:" therefore it seems that God does nothing contrary to nature.

Also, in the same place: "God never does anything out of power to uproot the institutes of his own reason:" but it is evident that he would uproot them if he operated contrary to the reasons instilled in nature: therefore he can do nothing contrary to nature.

§ 37. Solution. It must be said, in my judgment, that possible being is the object of divine power. But since every object ought to be proportioned to that power of which it is the object —just as the true as a sign is proportioned to opinion, and the true through a cause is proportioned to the intellect and to knowledge, and so it is in all others—so too it is necessary that possible being be taken as proportioned in some way to the power operating and making it. Now, it can be proportioned in two ways, namely to the making of the maker, and to the being made of the thing to be made; that is, in comparison to the maker, and in comparison to the matter and to the thing which is made. In the first way, conditions are placed around it which do not weaken the power of the efficient cause, and do not ennoble it less: such as that it does not induce deterioration in him, such as dying, sinning, eating, and the like, concerning which it will be treated in the second part of this reading; and if these are not found in the possible itself, we say God can do it. But the proportion to being made is such that it does not simultaneously have opposition, since I certainly think that the power of God which is infinite could indeed make opposites simultaneously; nevertheless, I do not think that they can be made simultaneously: since being made is proportioned to the potency of matter and of the created being. But making is proportioned to infinite power. And thus it seems it must be conceded that God can do many things by his power which nevertheless cannot be made in creatures, because of the impediment of opposition and confusion: opposition, as in opposites; and confusion, as in the unions of forms differing in species, such as that the same thing be a human and a donkey, and the like.

§ 38. These things being seen, it is easy to answer the objections.

For it must be said to the first objection that although nothing and something are more distant than contrary opposites or privative opposites, nevertheless they are not more contrary in creation, because in that they are not posited simultaneously in the same thing, but according to order: and therefore there is neither contrariety in being made there, nor contrariety in making: but nevertheless this is shown to be impossible for nature, and not absolutely.

§ 39. To the next it must be said that a contrary being made from a contrary, presupposing a subject or transmutable matter, is not a matter of great power, because nature also does this: and therefore this does not show omnipotence in God. But that contraries should be simultaneously in the same thing according to the same respect, this is contrary to being made, and therefore it is not attributed to the operating power.

121. Ecclesiasticus 34:28 (Vulgate 34:28).

§ 40. To the next it must be said that although God infinitely exceeds the power of nature, nevertheless he does not make contraries and opposites to be simultaneously: not because he is powerless to do this, because he indeed has the power of educing both simultaneously: but because they cannot be made simultaneously.

§ 41. To the next it must be said that God and man are distant without proportion: and therefore the uniting power was an infinite virtue in one of the united parts, namely in the divine nature. But in other things that might be united, an infinite virtue could not be posited in one of the united parts, but rather a repugnance would be found: and therefore others cannot be thus united, although God could unite them.

§ 42. To the next it must be said that substantial forms are more distant according to comparison to matter (because one matter is not simultaneously possible for two substantial forms) than accidental forms in a genus: but they are not more distant than contrary accidental forms in the ratio of contrariety: because between those there is a repugnance and the destruction of one by the other, and therefore they are not united, nor can they be united.

§ 43. To the next it must be said that there is some potency to giving birth in a virgin remaining a virgin, but it is bound: and although it is not released to act except by corrupted virginity through a natural release, nevertheless it could be released to act by a power that is above nature while the bond remains; and therefore that act is not contrary to the potency, although it has a difformity with the bond of virginity. But contraries and privatively opposed things destroy one another when posited: and therefore it is contrary to their ratio to be able to be simultaneously: and therefore a blind man remaining blind cannot see, even by a miracle: but a virgin remaining a virgin can give birth by a miracle: because in the blind man the whole order to sight is removed, but in the virgin an order to giving birth is posited, although the potency is bound.

§ 44. To the next it must be said that nothing is impossible for God to make, which does not imply impotence: but toward being made, not all things are possible with God.

§ 45. To the next it must be said that that argument is not valid—if he works miracles through the Saints, that he could do certain impossibilities, that is, incompossibilities, through himself—unless it is referred to making, and not to being made: but it follows that he himself through himself, and not from another, can do greater things out of proportion to these, provided they are compossible: for incompossibilities in being made are opposites, the positing of one of which destroys the other, and conversely.

§ 46. To what is further asked about the impossible per accidens, it must be said with Augustine and Jerome that the impossible per accidens cannot be made, and therefore God is not said to be able to make it.

§ 47. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the impossible per se is taken in two ways. First, as that which does not have potency to another from the fact that a repugnant form is present in it: as we say that it is impossible for a human to be a donkey, or to be made a donkey. And from this is not removed the potency by which any creature can be made whatever God wills, such as a calf from a trunk, or a donkey from a human. In the second way, the impossible is that which arises from the impossibility of two opposites. The impossible spoken of in the first way is itself twofold, namely according as something with a disparate form is compared to another nobler form, as a trunk to a calf: and this is not repugnant to the order of wisdom, although it is repugnant to nature, because it is the form of this particular thing. And according as something is compared to a less noble form, as when it is said to be impossible for a human to be or be made a donkey: for that is repugnant to the order of nature, because the rational is not ordered to the irrational as to a more perfect thing, but rather conversely: and it is also repugnant to the order of wisdom. Whence I say that all these impossibilities are not possible to be made: but when it is said that God can make them, one is more elongated from his power than another: yet nevertheless, in each of them, matter is presupposed in the ratio of obedience; but in the impossible per accidens, matter is not posited, because it yields into non-being, and therefore that is more elongated from divine power.

§ 48. Whence to the argument it must be said that the impossible per se is more impossible than the impossible per accidens: this proposition can be understood in three ways. First, regarding the ratio of the impossible, and thus it is false: because the ratio of the impossible is spoken of from privation, and a privation does not admit of more and less: whence in this way every impossible thing is equally impossible. In a second way it can [be understood]...

§ 1. ...understood with respect to distance from the potency of obedience: and thus again it is false: because the impossible by accident is more distant than the impossible per se. Thirdly, it can be understood with respect to repugnance to being, which is imported from the fact that it is impossible, and thus it is true: because the impossible per se is more repugnant to being than the impossible by accident: because the impossible by accident could have been, whereas the impossible per se never could have been, nor can be, nor will be able to be, even though God is always able to do it.

§ 2. Through this, the solution to the following is also clear: because although the past is not, from this very fact there follows a greater distance from the potency of obedience.

§ 3. To that which is asked concerning the saying of Jerome, it must be said that Jerome does not deny that she can be restored in mind and body with respect to the state of immunity from fault: but the past cannot not have been past, according as that which has been said or done can no longer be taken up: but now she is a virgin, because now she is intact, but not because she was never corrupted.

§ 4. To the other, it must be said that it was not in the rib, as Augustine says, that a woman should be made from it, but rather that she could be made from it: and in this nothing is signified except the potency of obedience, about which inquiry will be made later.

§ 5. To those arguments which are objected to the contrary, one must respond similarly, by saying that He does not work against the rational principles which He implanted in nature: but He implanted twofold principles, namely seminal ones which are unfolded through the work of nature, and also through the work of good and bad Angels, sometimes with greater speed than through nature: just as Augustine says that the operation of the magicians was natural with respect to the seminal order, but not with respect to the act: and He also implanted certain causal rational principles of obedience, which He does not unfold except in miracles sprung up through time, since every thing has the potency of obeying the command of the Creator: and against these He works nothing, but operates according to them by supernatural operation.

§ 6. To the other, it must be said that potency considered absolutely is more general than is practical art or science: and therefore that objection does not proceed, except concerning an executing potency, and not concerning potency considered absolutely. But whether He can work against His wisdom will be clear in the following distinction.

§ 7. To the other, it must be said that He would not destroy it if He worked other things or things opposite to these: because by positing other things these are not destroyed: but by positing opposite things, it follows that these were not works: therefore they will not be destroyed: because whatever course of nature He Himself had given, that would be natural.

§ 8. To the following arguments the response is clear through those things that have been said.

Articulus 7 — Whether and How God Can Do All Things

Whether and how God can make all things?

§ 9. Next, inquiry is made concerning this which he says there, "God can indeed do all things, but He does not do except what is fitting to His truth, etc."

§ 10. For it is asked, What are truth and justice called here? For truth is in words and in deeds, and whatever He would make, would have truth: therefore it seems that this is not the reason why He makes these things, and not others.

§ 11. Also, it is most just that He should make whatever He willed: therefore it is not more just that He should make these things than others.

§ 12. Also, what is it that Augustine says in the text: "God could make all things simultaneously, but reason prohibited it"? It seems no reason prohibited it: because Augustine himself on Genesis says that He made all things simultaneously. And, Ecclesiasticus 18:1: "He who lives forever created all things simultaneously." Therefore no reason prohibited this, as it seems.

§ 13. Furthermore it is asked, What is that reason? For it is either created or uncreated. If created: then it cannot prohibit the Creator, whose power nothing resists. But if it is uncreated: then it seems that something uncreated prohibits an operating power, and thus there would be contrariety in God, which is false.

§ 14. Solution. It must be said that truth and justice are to be referred here to the eternal preordination concerning things to be made: for this is the first truth in which all things to be made were life and light, before they were in themselves, so that truth is called art, and predetermining wisdom, and justice is that which befits the one predetermining the work: because it is fitting that He does not change, nor however would it misbeseem Him if He did that thing: but change would misbeseem Him if He were to come from one predetermination of things to be made into another, led as if by repentance concerning the first.

§ 15. To that which is asked about reason, it must be said that "reason" here denotes the created order of nature proceeding from the uncreated ordering reason: and that order prohibits all things from being simultaneous.

§ 16. To that which is objected, that all things are simultaneous, it must be said that he does not understand "simultaneously" here according to the mode by which all things are simultaneously in the formal and material principles of nature, but simultaneously by a simultaneity of all individuals in the same time: because in this way the whole work of nature would perish, which is through succession and generation, and the qualities of the elements would be useless, since they would not act toward generation and corruption, and the motion of the heaven would be useless, and the whole order of nature would perish: and for this reason He did not make all things simultaneously, although He could have done this.

Divisio Textus

§ 25. "Here it is to be diligently considered, etc." Here begins the third part of this distinction, in which the Master gathers up those things concerning which divine omnipotence is considered, and he objects in the following chapter F to the contrary, and solves in the third, chapter G, and in this the distinction is finished.

Articulus 8 — Whether God Can Walk, Speak, Sin, Die, Be Deceived, Become Wretched, and Be Conquered

Whether God can walk, speak, sin, die, be deceived, become miserable, and be conquered? Whether God can walk, speak, sin, die, be deceived, become miserable, and be conquered?

§ 17. Next, inquiry is made concerning this which he says there at B, "For He cannot walk, or speak, etc."

§ 18. For I infer thus: 1. God can do all things: therefore He can walk and speak. If it does not follow: therefore to walk and to speak speak of impotence: and this is false, because they speak of potency and dignity: therefore it seems that these things ought not to be excepted.

§ 19. 2. Also, it is objected concerning the following which is to sin. For the Philosopher says that the potency of the depraved is to be chosen: therefore He Himself can do depraved things, because nothing of choiceworthy things is lacking to Him: therefore he seems to speak falsely.

§ 20. 3. Also, he himself in chapter C enumerates four things which God cannot do, namely die, be deceived, become miserable, and be conquered: and it is asked, according to what are those taken?

§ 21. Solution. It must be said that God cannot walk, nor speak: and this is because, since this verb "can" [potest] is prohaeretic [i.e., indicates choice or capacity applied to an action], if it were joined with an infinitive signifying the act of that potency, that act would be understood to be compared to the subject of this verb "can", as to that in which the action is present, just as when it is said, "I can build": whence, since a comparison of this sort is understood here, the proposition is false.

§ 22. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that walking and speaking indeed do not bespeak impotence, but they are not exercised without impotence: because to operate with bodily instruments belongs to imperfection: and therefore the Master says that by reason of that which belongs to potency in them they are not removed from the divine power: because God can make a walking, and a speaking, that is, so that someone walks.

§ 23. To the other, the response was made in the second book of the Sentences, that the potency of the depraved is not choiceworthy insofar as it is of the depraved: but the potency of the depraved insofar as it is free, is choiceworthy: and this is shown, because it is not obligated by the necessity of nature to the good, as the potency of fire to burn. And that which the Philosopher says, that God can do depraved things, must be understood materially, that is, He can do certain things which currently are depraved, which however if He Himself were to do them, would not be depraved.

§ 24. To the other it must be said that of those four, certain ones indicate a defect in being, certain ones in well-being: in being, as to die: in well-being, as the others: and then to be deceived is referred to a defect of the cognitive potency, but misery to the potency of affect, but to be conquered to resisting another in both, namely in intellect and in affect.

Articulus 9 — Whether the Simply Possible Is Said According to Inferior Causes or Superior

Whether the possible is said simply according to inferior causes, or superior ones?

§ 26. But here there arises a question, upon which all the preceding depends: Whether the possible is said simply according to inferior causes, or superior ones? § 27. Now it seems that it is according to inferior causes: because 1. The possible follows that in which potency for becoming is first found: but this is matter: therefore it seems that the possibility and impossibility of something becoming or not becoming follows matter and the disposition of matter.

§ 28. 2. Also, unless the possible were said according to inferior causes, nothing will be impossible: because "no word shall be impossible with God."

§ 29. 3. Also, Aristotle in Physics II reprehends those who posited chance and fortune in the heaven, on the grounds that in perpetual things there is ordered necessity: therefore much more so in eternal things: since therefore for a possible to become is for it to be possible not to become, it seems that the possible is not according to superior causes, but inferior ones.

§ 30. 4. Also, the necessary and the contingent are taken according to inferior causes: because otherwise all things would be necessary: therefore it seems that the possible is too.

§ 31. 5. Also, the Commentator on the ninth book of the First Philosophy says: Nothing is in potency in anything, except what can be educed from it by one natural mover: therefore it seems that the impossible is not said except according to natural causes: therefore not according to superior causes.

§ 32. But if this is conceded, ON THE CONTRARY: 1. 1 Corinthians 1:20, on that text, "Has not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?" the Gloss says: "The wisdom of this world judges as impossible what it does not see in the natures of things. God made this foolish by declaring possible what it judges impossible": therefore the possible simply is said according to superior causes.

§ 33. 2. Also, if the possible were not said except according to inferior causes, then this would not be true: "Before the world was, it was possible for the world to be." Also, this would also be impossible: "It is possible for a rational soul to be made": because it does not have an inferior cause. Also, this would not be possible: "It is possible for this man to be justified." Also, concerning a blind man who has been illumined it is true that he now sees: therefore since any act posited as now, infers a capacity for the act before this now, it will be true that before he was illumined, it was possible for him to see. Also, a Virgin gave birth: therefore it was possible for a Virgin to give birth: either one must say that all those things are impossible: or one must say that the possible is said according to superior causes.

§ 34. Solution. In my judgment it must be said that the possible is always posited concerning something: and according to the form and matter of that concerning which it is posited, a judgment must be made about it: for things are not in potency in the same way: therefore the possible said concerning them will not be said in the same way: but the possible is in that which becomes in comparison to the efficient cause which has it to make it. Now some name as possible a matter with a disposition contrary to that which is said to be able to become: as when it is said, a blind man can see, and a virgin can give birth. Whence it seems to me that such things should not be called possible before the act: because the potency and the act are given to them simultaneously. But some are ordered according to the potency of becoming only under divine power, as it is possible for the world to be made, and it is possible for an Angel to be made, and every created thing is possible: and in these no possibility is supposed except that of obedience to the will of the Creator, not with anything disposing to the contrary: and therefore those are conceded as possibles of the efficient potency only, although "possibility" is less properly called the potency of the efficient cause, but more properly it is called a complete power [potestas completa], whereas possibility is called the imperfect potency of matter, and potency is common to both.

§ 35. Therefore it must be said to the first objections, that those arguments well conclude concerning the possible which has potency with a disposition of matter: because they are not in potency to anything contrary to the disposition and form which they have: and if it comes to be simultaneously, potency and act are conferred upon them by a superior power.

§ 36. To those things which are objected to the contrary, it must be said that in such things nothing ordered to the contrary of that which becomes is supposed, when it is said, "this man can be justified," and "the heaven and an Angel can be made," or "a rational soul," although concerning the soul there is another reason than concerning the others. But when it is said, "a blind man can see," and "a virgin can give birth": it seems to me that they are false, because by virtue of the noun concerning which the potency is posited, a disposition and necessity to the contrary of that which is said to be able to become is signified. Whence such things posited in act do not infer their potencies before the act in past time: because before the act they had no potency for that act.

§ 37. To the Gloss, it must be said that worldly wisdom judged such things impossible for God, and in this it was foolish: because nothing is impossible for Him. However, some feel differently, saying that the possible and the necessary are varied according to the sciences: whence they say that the possible in nature is said according to inferior causes, but in theology according to superior causes. But this does not seem right: because what is possible simply, is possible everywhere, and the same holds for the necessary and the impossible.

Articulus 10 — Whether Omnipotence Can Belong to Others Than God; And, Whether It Is Common to the Three Persons; And, Whether It Can Belong to the Blessed

Whether omnipotence can belong to others besides God? and, Whether it is common to the three persons? and, Whether it can belong to the blessed? Whether omnipotence can belong to others besides God? and, Whether it is common to the three persons? and, Whether it can belong to the blessed?

§ 38. Next, inquiry is made concerning this which he says in the last chapter, there, "But perhaps you will say, Neither does the Father give to the Son, etc."

§ 39. For from this it seems that to be able to do all things could belong to another than God, even if he has that power from another.

§ 40. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. If some proper attribute follows a certain substance by reason of some principle which is in another substance, if that principle is incommunicable, the proper attribute will be incommunicable: but omnipotence follows the divine substance by reason of the perfection of being in this hypostasis, as was held above: therefore unless that perfection is communicable, omnipotence will be incommunicable: but that is incommunicable: therefore omnipotence too.

§ 41. 2. Also, if he could do all things, then he could also create, which is false, because to create is an act of infinite power, since being and nothing have no finite proportion, and whatever is created is educed from nothing.

§ 42. Also it is asked further, Whether omnipotence is common to the three persons, just as the essence in which the power is rooted?

§ 43. And it seems that it is: because 1. All essential attributes are common: therefore power is too.

§ 44. 2. Also, if there were not one power of the three, one would have something of the essential attributes that another would not have, which would take away equality from them.

§ 45. BUT ON THE CONTRARY to the first it is objected thus: The perfection of beatitude consists in perfect power, and perfect knowing, and perfect goodness, because all goods are reduced to those: but perfect power is nothing but omnipotence: therefore it seems that omnipotence is communicated to all the blessed.

§ 46. Also against the second: because the Father can generate the Son: but the Son cannot: therefore not whatever the Father can do, the Son can also do, as it seems.

§ 47. Solution. It must be said that power is communicable: but omnipotence in no way, just as the first two arguments prove.

§ 48. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that there is perfection in the highest degree, and this does not belong except to God alone: and there is perfection according to the possible mode of a glorified creature, and this perfection is what beatifies the blessed.

§ 49. To that which is further asked, it must be said that there is one power of the three, and similarly omnipotence.

§ 50. To that however which is objected to the contrary, it has been disputed and answered above.

DISTINCTIO XLIII

Divisio Textus

DIVISION AND EXPOSITION OF THE TEXT.

§ 51. "Certain men glorying in their own sense, etc." This distinction, in which the Master inquires into the infinity of divine power, is divided according to those things which those who strive to disprove the infinity of divine power object. Now there are three, as is said in the Text, namely verisimilar reasons, by which they object first. Secondly, fabricated causes are posited, by which they object, there, D, § 3: "They also add saying, God does or leaves aside nothing, except by an optimal and reasonable cause, etc." Thirdly, they object through authorities perversely understood, there, E, "But to these those scrutinizers who, etc."

§ 52. Now there are three chapters in the first part: in the first and second of which, namely A and B, the Master introduces two verisimilar arguments, of which the first is this: God cannot do except what is just and good to be done: but whatever is just and good to be done, all that He does, because otherwise He would be convicted of omission: therefore whatever He can do, He does: therefore He cannot do more than He does. The second is this: God cannot do except what justice demands: but justice does not demand to do except what He does: therefore He cannot do except what He does.

§ 53. But in the third chapter C, the Master solves these two arguments: and the intention of his solution consists in the distinction of this proposition, "God cannot do, except what is just and good to be done." For in this locution there is posited this verb, "can" [potest], which has the force of amplifying, and it is posited concerning God as powerful: and this which I say, "is just and good to be done," falls under this verb, "can," as the matter in which the act of that power which the verb copulates is terminated: therefore the locution is twofold, namely that it can be understood that it first falls under the verb having the force of amplifying before it is restricted by the verb "is" [est], to a present "just and good": and then the word "is" [est] will not copulate the present time, but a confused time, corresponding to potency: and then it is true under the sense which the Master posits, "God cannot, etc.," that is, He cannot do except what would be good and just, if it were done. If however on the contrary "just and good" is understood to be restricted first by the verb "is," to a present good and just: then the locution is false: because then it would follow that God could do nothing, except what now is just and good to be done.

§ 54. There is entirely the same solution in the second and third argument, which he posits in the same chapter C, § 2. And it has two branches, of which the first is this: God cannot do, except what is fitting: and it is not fitting to do, except what He does, because otherwise He would omit it: therefore He cannot do except what He does. The other branch is: Either He ought to leave aside what He leaves aside lest He do it, or not. If yes: but He can do nothing which He ought not: therefore He can do nothing which He does not do. If no: therefore He leaves aside something of what is owed, which is false. And the Master applies the same solution which was posited before: and adds, that this verb, "ought" [debet], sounds badly concerning God: because He is not obligated except perhaps by a promise. Now this error is said to have been that of Master Peter Abelard.

§ 55. Also, it is to be noted that some solve these objections otherwise through the equivocation of potency, saying that when it is said: "God cannot do except what He does," if it is understood of potency conjoined to act, the locution is true: but if of absolute potency, it is false. But this solution does not dissolve it: because the objection proceeds concerning potency simply.

§ 56. Through this therefore the dissolution and sentence of the first part is clear.

Articulus 1 — Whether the Power of God Is Infinite

Whether God's power is infinite?

§ 57. Now three doubts arise here, of which the first is, Whether God's power is infinite, as he seems to suppose in the Text?

§ 58. The second is, Whether it can be limited to an act, or not?

§ 59. The third is concerning this which he says in the Text, Whether it extends itself to other things, than what it is good and just to be done in a work? that is to ask, Whether He does some things, which it is neither good nor just to be done? § 60. To the first one proceeds thus: 1. Hilary says: "What is impossible for man to understand, is possible for God": but it is impossible to understand the infinite: therefore according to power He Himself is infinite.

§ 61. 2. Also, Hilary: "It is a small thing that God can do what He wills, nay rather He can do what He says: for it belongs to perfect power that the nature of the maker can do that which the speech of the speaker can signify."

§ 62. 3. Also, Basil: "God can do more, than you could cogitate."

§ 63. 4. Also, on that Psalm 118:81 and 114: "And in your word I have super-hoped": the Gloss says: "God's power is above everything that man can understand."

§ 64. 5. Also, Damascenus says that the infinite is that which is circumscribed neither by place, nor by time, nor by intellect: but God's power is circumscribed by none of these: therefore it is infinite.

§ 65. 6. Also, God's power responds to His essence: but His essence is infinite: because it is not limited to anything, on the grounds that it has neither a beginning, nor an end: therefore His power too.

§ 66. 7. Also, every virtue (as is said in the Book of Causes) the more it is united, the more it is infinite: but His is maximally united: therefore, etc.

§ 67. 8. Also, even the Philosophers say that the mover of the heaven is of infinite power, because it moves with an infinite motion and in infinite time: therefore it seems that much more so will God be of infinite power.

§ 68. 9. Also, if He is of finite power, He is limited to something: therefore that thing is finite: therefore a greater than it can be cogitated: therefore God is not greater than can be cogitated, which is disproved by Anselm: therefore it seems that God is of infinite power.

§ 69. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Nothing in every way infinite is perfect, as the Philosopher says: but He is in every way of infinite power: therefore He is in no way of perfect power. If perhaps you should say that the saying of the Philosopher were not true, it is proved thus: Every perfection is either an end, or from an end: but it is certain that God does not have the perfection of power from another end: therefore He Himself is perfect, because He is essentially the end according to power: but no end is infinite, because it would limit nothing if it were infinite: therefore it has been proved that the infinite is the most imperfect thing: therefore it does not belong to God, neither according to essence, nor according to power.

§ 70. 2. Also, we find in natures a finitable infinite, and this is an imperfect perfectible: for on that part by which it is finitable, it is perfectible: and on that part by which it is infinite, it is imperfect like prime matter: therefore if something is infinite in no way finitable, that will be more imperfect than the most imperfect thing: if therefore God in essence or in power is an infinite in no way finitable, He Himself will be more imperfect than all things.

§ 71. 3. Also, the infinite is a passion of the continuous or the discrete: but to God there is neither the continuous nor the discrete: therefore, etc.

§ 72. 4. Also, it is a condition of material potency: therefore it does not belong to God, or to His power.

§ 73. 5. Also, the more noble is always to be attributed to God: but the end is more noble: therefore it is better that His power be called an end, than that it be called infinite.

§ 74. Solution. It must be said that the infinite is said in multiple ways. For it is said negatively, so that it is said "not finite": and thus we have said above, that if one insists on the word, God is an infinite, that is, not finite: and a point is infinite, and a form, and a place, and everything that is an end, and in no way is it limited: yet God otherwise than other things: since God is not limited in three ways, namely by a defining intellect, whose task is to define, in that it circumscribes the whole thing through the terms of the thing's essence: and thus God alone limits Himself, because nothing of Himself escapes His intellect: and thus God comprehends Himself, because otherwise His intellect would be less than Himself: whence to Himself He is not infinite. But in this way He is not limited by any other intellect, nor by place, however much there might be in expansion whether in reality or in intellect, even if as many many worlds as possible were posited, God is not limited by them, but rather limits and contains them, as was said above. Nor is He limited by time: because the "now" of His eternity in enduring excels the time before and after. But in another way "infinite" is said according to the definition of the Philosopher in Physics III, that the infinite is that of which to one taking parts there is always something outside to take: and this can be said in two ways, namely according to passive potency, and thus it is in the continuous and discrete: and according to active potency, and thus it is in the sole power of God: so that it is said, since just as the infinite in the continuous is considered according to a division which does not stand still at the parts within the continuous, so the infinite in an active power is that the power does not stand still in any supposed effect according to magnitude and according to multitude.

§ 75. Therefore it must be said to the first, that that objection does not proceed except concerning the infinite according to passive potency, and not active: because an active power does not receive any perfection from an act, but rather through the act it gives perfection to others. Nor however do we say that God is infinite, such that He is not an end: but rather by the limitation by which an end is called limited, God and His power and whatever He is, is the most limited of all things: and the same solution applies to the others.

Articulus 2 — Whether the Power of God Can Be Limited with Respect to Acts or Not Whether God's power can be limited to acts or not?

§ 76. Secondly it is asked, Whether God's power can be limited to acts, or not?

§ 77. But it seems that it cannot: because 1. Nothing infinite can be limited on that part by which it is infinite: but it was held that God's power is infinite toward acts: therefore it cannot be limited toward acts.

§ 78. 2. Also, Master Hugh of St. Victor says: "Just as time does not equal the eternity of God, nor does place equal His immensity: so neither does sense equal His wisdom, nor virtue His goodness, nor a work His omnipotence." Therefore it is not finitable to any work.

§ 79. 3. Also, we see that the infinite insofar as it is in the continuous is never finished, because its act is always mixed with a potency for a further act of the same account, as the Philosopher says: therefore neither will omnipotence be finished, because always with any effect taken the reason of the power of the agent is still left over further.

§ 80. 4. Also, if it is finitable, let it be finished in an instant: therefore after that it is not powerful: but that which could do both this and more would be more powerful: therefore God is not more powerful than can be cogitated, which is false.

§ 81. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. God's power does not extend itself beyond God's wisdom: therefore the power is as great as the wisdom: but the wisdom is the full art of all the living rational principles: but those principles are of those things which are, and have been, and will be: therefore they are finite: therefore the power is finite too, as it seems.

§ 82. 2. Also, Hugh of St. Victor says that power is executing, and wisdom is disposing: but He does not dispose infinite things: therefore neither is power in executing toward infinite things: therefore it stands still.

§ 83. 3. Also, whatever God can do, that can become: and let this be given: but whatever things can become, can be posited to be, and it will not be inconvenient: because if a false and not impossible thing is posited, what happens is false and not impossible: let it be therefore, that they are in act: therefore more things cannot then become: therefore neither can God make more things: therefore His power stands still.

§ 84. 4. Also, every creatable thing can be posited as created: therefore then there will not be anything more creatable: therefore neither can God then ali-

§ 1. [whether God is able] to create anything more: therefore His power will come to a standstill.

§ 2. Solution. To this, some say that power has a twofold act, namely, that which is to make, and that which is to have been made [i.e., the effect]. Therefore, a power which is infinite, in whatever way it is said to be infinite, can be posited in the act which is to make, but it cannot be posited in the act which is to have been made: because the infinite is never in being, nor in having been made. But it can be said better and more technically that there is a certain power to an act which is simply an act, and there is a certain power to an act always mixed with potency to the same act in species or in number. Therefore, a power which is to an act simply, can be posited in that act in such a way that nothing of the potency remains toward that act, or toward one similar to it in species—just as the combustible [passes] into being combusted, because what is combusted cannot be further combusted or burn. But a power which is to an act that is always mixed with potency toward a similar act in species, is a power which is toward an infinite act, whether the power be spoken of passively or actively. Hence a continuum will never be posited as so divided that it is not still divisible according to the same ratio of division by which it was divided. Therefore, God can never be posited to have acted or to have made so many things that He does not still have the power of operating, just as before.

§ 3. Conceding, therefore, the reasons first introduced,

§ 4. It must be said to the first objection raised to the contrary, that executive power is that which measures itself to the art of things to be made, but not absolute power: and this was explained above.

§ 5. To the next, the same solution applies.

§ 6. To the two following, it must be said that an infinite creatable is in the power of the agent, just as the creating [act] is; and therefore it is evident that it cannot be posited in any act without potency still remaining.

Articulus 3 — Whether God Has Done or Can Do Things That It Is Neither Good Nor Just To Do; And, Whether He Can Do What Is Unjust, Either Beside or Against Justice; And, Whether He Can Damn Peter and Save Judas

Whether God has made or can make some things which are neither good nor just to be made? And, Can He do the unjust, or besides or against justice? And, Can He damn Peter and save Judas?

§ 7. Thirdly, it is asked: Whether He does or can do some things which are neither good nor just to be made?

§ 8. It seems that He can: because 1. On that passage of Ezekiel 20:39: If... you pollute my holy name, etc., the Gloss says: "What He thought to do by justice, He did not do by clemency" . Therefore, it seems that He did something which was not just to be done.

§ 9. 2. Also, on Jeremiah 2:2: I have remembered you, pitying your youth, etc., the Gloss says: "The merciful God is prepared to save through mercy those whom He cannot save through justice." Therefore, it seems that He does many things which are not just.

§ 10. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. On 2 Timothy 2:13, concerning the verse: He cannot deny Himself, Augustine says: "Since He is just, He cannot deny His own justice, for thus He would deny Himself."

§ 11. 2. Also, justice in God is the same as His power. Therefore, if He can do nothing except from power, He will be able to do nothing except from justice.

§ 12. 3. Also, He can do nothing except justly: this is conceded by the Master [Peter Lombard] in the Text. Therefore, doing justly and being able to do are the same. Therefore, He can do nothing except from justice, as it seems.

§ 13. 4. Also, let it be granted that He does something apart from justice: therefore that deed will not be just. But he who does what is not just, is unjust. Therefore, it seems that He would be unjust, which God forbid.

§ 2. ALSO IT IS ASKED: If it is granted that He can do what is not just to be done, must it be granted that He can do the unjust, or besides or against justice?

§ 3. FURTHERMORE, certain curious men ask: Can He damn Peter and save Judas?

§ 4. It seems that He can: because by the prayers of the blessed Gregory, Trajan was recalled to life; but it is certain that Trajan was damned, since he was a pagan. And if he lived afterward, he could have done penance, and thus be saved. Therefore, He can save the damned; therefore, by the same reason, He can damn the glorified.

§ 5. SOLUTION. It must be said that God can do what is not just to be done, if the phrase "what is not just to be done" falls under the amplification of power imported by the word "can," as we distinguished above.

§ 6. To the first, therefore, it must be said that justice is spoken of in many ways, as has been said elsewhere. But in that Gloss, justice is called the strict rendering of a debt for merits. Yet in another way, justice is spoken of concerning the essence of divine goodness, and thus clemency is not without justice. Hence it does not follow that if in this work justice is not preserved according to the aforementioned rationale, it is in no way preserved in it.

§ 7. To the next, it must be said in the same way, that it speaks of the justice of a debt for the merits of the Ninevites, and not of justice absolutely spoken of in any way whatsoever.

§ 8. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that there, justice is called the equity of the divine will, which God never forsakes or denies.

§ 9. TO THE NEXT, it must be said that although justice and omnipotence are the same in their subject [supposito], they nevertheless differ in their connotations. And therefore something belongs to one which does not belong to the other.

§ 10. To the next, it must be said that according to the aforesaid, it is clear why it is conceded by the Master that God can do nothing except justly; and similarly that conclusion, "therefore He can do nothing except from justice," which is twofold by the same twofold distinction.

§ 11. To the next, it must be said that if it be granted that God does something which right now is not just (because it is not, nor will it be), it does not follow on account of this that it would not be just: because by the very fact that He does it, it is just. Hence these two are incompatible: that God does what He does not do, and that this thing is not just; nevertheless, each of them is possible taken in itself. And this is so because in the one, by the intellect, the opposite of the other is included: for in this—that God does what He does not do—it is included that God can only act justly, and by that very fact whatever He does is just.

§ 12. To the next, it must be said that God can do nothing unjustly or besides justice, because this posits an indecency and a contrariety to the honorable, and this does not fall into God. But a mere negation, when it is said that which is not just, does not posit anything, but removes that which is just at present, and consequently leaves the power for it to be just if it were done by God, by the same rationale by which what He now does is just.

§ 13. TO THAT which is asked, Whether He can damn Peter and save Judas? It must be said that He certainly can by His absolute power, but not by His power related to the order of wisdom.

§ 14. To that which is objected concerning Trajan, it must be said that this was done by dispensation to manifest the glory of God: for he who is finally damned can in no way be recalled to the state of those to be saved.

§ 1. D. The third reason of theirs.

§ 2. They also add other things, saying: "God cannot do except what He ought; but He ought not to do except what He does. For if He ought to do other things, then He does not do everything He ought; but if He does everything He ought, and cannot do except what He ought, therefore He cannot do except what He does.

§ 3. "Also, either He ought to omit what He omits so as not to do it, or He ought not. If He ought not, He does not omit it rightly. But if He ought to omit it, therefore He ought not to do it. But if He ought not, nor is it fitting, it does not behoove Him to do it; and if it is neither fitting nor does it behoove Him to do it, therefore He cannot do it. Therefore He cannot do except what He does; nor can He omit that which He does, because He ought to do it; and what He ought to do, He cannot omit." But as it seems to me, this word "ought" (debet) holds poison. For it contains a manifold and convoluted understanding, and it does not properly apply to God, who is not a debtor to us except perhaps by promise; but we are debtors to Him by our commission [of sins]. But that the poison may be evacuated, distinguish the sense of the word: "God cannot do except what He ought," that is, except what He wills, is false. For thus He Himself can be said to "ought" to do something, because He wills it. But if it be said, "He cannot except what He ought," that is, He cannot [do] except that which, if He were to do it, would also perfectly befit Him, it is true.

§ 4. They also add, saying: "He does or omits nothing except by the best and most reasonable cause, although it may be hidden from us, according to which it behooves Him to do and omit those things which He does or omits. For the reason is with Him, by which He does these things and omits those; which reason is eternal, and always remaining, besides which He cannot do or omit anything. Therefore, with that remaining, He cannot omit what He does, nor do what He omits; and thus He cannot do except what He does." And to this we respond, determining the ambiguity of the expression. For when it is said, "the best reason or cause is with God, by which He does all the things He does, and omits those which He omits," it is indeed true; because in Him there is a most equitable and most upright will, by which He does and omits what He wills, against which He cannot act, nor besides it can He act. And certainly He would not act against it, nor besides it, if He were to omit those things which He does, or do those which He omits: but with the same reason and cause remaining, He could have done other things, and omitted these. Although, therefore, the reason is with Him, by which He does these and omits those, nevertheless He can, according to the same reason, both omit what He does, and do what He omits.

§ 2. They also add: "There is a reason for Him to do what He does, and not other things; and He cannot do except what there is a reason for Him to do, and thus He cannot do except what He does. Also, there is a reason for Him to omit what He omits, and He cannot not omit what there is a reason for Him to omit; and thus He cannot not omit what He omits." And to this we say that the expressions are ambiguous, and therefore to be determined. For if, when it is said, "He cannot do except what there is a reason for Him to do," you understand that He cannot do except those things which are reasonable, and those which, if they were done, would be reasonable, the sense is true. But if you understand that He cannot do other reasonable and good things, except those which He wills and does, the understanding is false.

§ 3. Also, they append another thing, saying: "If God can do otherwise than He does, He can therefore do what He did not foreknow; and if He can do what He did not foreknow, He can operate without foreknowledge; because He does everything which He foreknew He would do, nor does He do anything which He did not foreknow. But if it is impossible for anything to be done besides His knowledge, therefore everything which is foreknown must necessarily be done: therefore for something else to be done than what is done, is by no reason possible; therefore nothing can be done by God except what is done." But this question concerning foreknowledge can easily be determined through those things which were said above, when foreknowledge was treated.

Expositio Textus

§ 4. They also add, saying, etc. Here begins the second part, in which he [the Master] posits their contrived causes; and they are called contrived causes because they are feigned by the mind, and are not true.

§ 5. Now there are three, of which each is posited with its solution in one chapter in order. The first cause which they posit is this: God cannot do anything unless a reasonable cause preceded that work: because as it is said in Job 5:6: Nothing upon earth is done without a cause; and Plato in the Timaeus: Nothing comes to be whose origin a legitimate cause has not preceded. But there is no reasonable cause except of those things which are done; because if it were of other things, God would be negligent, in that He would not do those things which reason demands to be done: therefore He can do nothing except what He does. And this proposition: "God can do nothing of which a reasonable cause or reason has not preceded," must be distinguished, as was said before in the earlier reasons.

§ 6. The second reason taken from a contrived cause is this: God cannot do except what there is a reason for Him to do: but the reason is that these things be done which are done, and not others; therefore He cannot do except those things which are done and not others. And the first premise must again be distinguished as before; and this reason is in the second chapter following.

§ 2. The third reason taken from a contrived cause, is in the third chapter D, § 5. And it is this: God cannot do except what He foreknows He will do; but He does not foreknow He will do except what He does; therefore He cannot do except what He does. And again the first premise must be distinguished as before.

Articulus 4 — Why God Did Not Work Miracles Among Certain People

Why did God not work miracles among certain people?

§ 3. Now to these things, those investigators, etc. This is the last part, in which they introduce authorities to confirm the same thing, and it is easy.

§ 4. But here a question is raised concerning that which he says, there: Why miracles were not done among certain people, etc.

§ 5. For it seems that there is a twofold inconvenience there, namely, that miracles [lit. powers] were displayed to those who did not care, and this was casting pearls before swine; and they were withdrawn from others, to whom they would have profited.

§ 6. But To this it must be said that God's judgments may be marveled at, but not discussed: because the judgments of God are a great abyss; and this solution is in the Text, and is truer than all the rest.

§ 1. However, the Gloss in the same place says that He did not display them to the Tyrians and Sidonians because He knew many of them would not believe, whom He spared lest their sin be increased out of contempt for the miracles; and He knew that those who, if they had done penance, would not remain in penance. But He displayed them to the people of Chorazin and Bethsaida, who were of the Jews, to whom it was fitting first to speak the word of the kingdom of God, so that the Apostles, being despised by them, might then turn to the Gentiles without reproach, and their damnation might appear more just, and the law might be shown to be fulfilled by Christ. And all these are solutions of fittingness; but the one which is posited in the Text is the true one, namely, that now we do not know, but in the light of the face of God we shall see.

DISTINCTIO XLIV

Divisio Textus

§ 2. Now that remains to be discussed, etc. In this distinction, the Master investigates the mode of omnipotence on the part of the work.

§ 3. And there are three questions here, of which the first is: Whether He could have made the universe better than He made it? And the Master concedes this.

§ 4. The second question is: Whether He could have made this which He made, in a better way than He made it? And the Master concedes this, there, at C, After these things it must be considered, Whether in another way, etc.

§ 5. The third is: Whether God can now do whatever He could ever do? And this begins there, at D, Furthermore it is wont to be asked, Whether God, etc. And the Master concedes this also.

Articulus 1 — Whether God Could Make Things from Eternity; And, Whether He Could Have Made the World Earlier Than He Made It Could God make things from eternity? And, Could He make the world earlier than He made it?

§ 6. Now concerning the first, three questions arise, of which the first is: Whether He could make things from eternity?

§ 7. The second: Whether He could make better things than He made?

§ 8. The third: Whether the good of order itself which is in the universe, could be better?

§ 9. To the first, one proceeds thus: 1. Certain Philosophers proved the world to be eternal: therefore it seems at least that it could have been from eternity.

§ 10. 2. Also, we see this in many effects which essentially come to be from a certain cause: and yet the cause does not precede them except in nature, and not in duration—just as Augustine himself says concerning the sun and illumination, and the example is given above. Therefore it seems that it could also be thus in the case of the world.

§ 1. 3. Also, Boethius seems to mean this in Book V of the Consolation of Philosophy, saying that eternity is not before the world by some space, because it is itself simple.

§ 2. 4. If perhaps you say that a creature could not be from eternity, lest time, which is co-understood with the creature, be made equal to eternity, and the creature to the Creator. This seems to be nothing: because Boethius proves that this does not happen, even if the world is posited to be from eternity; for times would still be successive, and the creature variable, as he himself says: therefore the creature is still not equaled to the Creator.

§ 3. 5. Also, a sufficient cause, lacking nothing for acting, always acts, or it is idle, as it seems. But God from eternity was a sufficient cause for making or creating the world. Therefore, He created the world from eternity, or He was idle. But idleness does not fall upon God. Therefore, it seems He created the world from eternity.

§ 4. 6. Also, if He could not from eternity, and afterwards could, it seems that He was changed in His power: therefore He could at least do it from eternity.

§ 5. 7. Also, Boethius says: Whom no external causes compelled to fashion. Therefore He does not depend on anything outside Himself. Therefore, whatever He can do, He can do from eternity. Therefore, He could make the world from eternity.

§ 6. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Whatever God could make from eternity, could be made from eternity. Therefore, if God could make the world from eternity, the world could be made from eternity. Against this: A created thing is that which has being after nothingness; but an eternal thing is that which has no beginning. Therefore, no created thing is eternal.

§ 7. 2. Also, to have a beginning of existence according to duration, and not to have it, are contradictorily opposed. Therefore, they will not belong to the rationale of one and the same thing and according to the same respect. But to have a beginning of duration is of the rationale of a created thing: therefore, not having a beginning of this sort cannot belong to it.

But it would belong to it if it were from eternity: therefore the world cannot be from eternity, as it seems.

§ 8. But then it is asked further alongside this: Whether He could make it earlier than He made it?

§ 9. And it seems that He could: because eternity has no limit [lit. end] before it. Therefore, however much "before" is taken into infinity, it always remains distant. Therefore it seems that it could be made earlier: and yet it would not be from eternity.

§ 10. If perhaps you say that eternity has no "before," and therefore the question is null, because there is no prior and posterior in that which is simple. Against this: Whenever a creature is made, time is simultaneously made with it. But this is now less than seven thousand years. I ask, therefore, whether it could have been eight or ten thousand? It seems so, because nothing is impossible for God. Therefore it seems that He could make it earlier than He made it.

§ 11. Also, although eternity does not have a part, both a "before" and "after," nevertheless it is itself unfailing from eternity, and differs from the temporal and the aeviternal with respect to unfailingness. Therefore, something can be prior and posterior under it: and then the first reason stands, that God could make the world earlier than He made it.

§ 12. But then I proceed further thus, by anteriorizing into infinity: therefore the world could have been made infinitely before it was made. But to be made infinitely earlier is to be made without a beginning. Therefore, it could have been without a beginning of duration; therefore, eternal. For Boethius says that a single moment has a proportion to whatever space of time is finitely accepted.

§ 13. ON THE CONTRARY: It is certain that infinite time can never be traversed. Therefore, if the world had begun an infinite time before, it would never be possible to arrive at this day in which we now are. But this is false. Therefore, the world could not be made infinitely before it was.

§ 1. SOLUTION. In my judgment, it must be said that when it is said, "God could make the world from eternity," this is twofold, from the fact that the term from eternity can determine this verb could [i.e., He had the power from eternity], and thus it is true; or it determines to make it be infinite [i.e., making an eternal world], and thus it is false. For I well concede that it belongs to the rationale of a created thing not to be from eternity, nor to be able to be made so. For when it is said, "God can make the world or all things," we said above that a possible being which is related to power must be taken in a twofold proportion: namely, to the making [active power] and to the being made [passive potency]. But when it is said, "God can make a created thing from eternity," the created thing which is under power has neither proportion, because it is neither fitting for the Maker that a thing made be equaled to Him in anything; nor can this be made due to the condition included within it.

§ 2. To the first, therefore, it must be said that those Philosophers who proved this, erred, and they did not suppose anything to be created out of nothing: rather, they said the incorruptible parts of the world are from eternity, and the corruptible ones are conserved in being unto infinity through mutual action and passion. But supposing that things are created, it is impossible to posit along with this that they were from eternity. Whether it is necessary that creation exist, has to be investigated at the beginning of the second book.

§ 3. To the next, it must be said that this is true in those things in which action is by a necessity of nature, seeking nothing outside in order to cause—like a luminous body which demands nothing in order to emit light. But God does not cause in this way, because all things would agree with Him in form, just as light agrees in the light of the illuminator. However, it is true that certain gentile Philosophers said this, that an intelligence is a ray of the first cause, and the heaven a certain ray of the intelligence; and thus further they strove to prove things to be from eternity. But this is frivolous, and easily disproved, as will be clear elsewhere.

§ 4. To the next, it must be said that eternity does not precede by a space of distension (which is properly space), because it is itself simple; nevertheless, it precedes by duration of being, and by cause, according as duration is called the unfailingness of being: and this is what Boethius intends.

§ 5. To the next, it must be said that I well concede if we were to posit time not to have a beginning, that time would still not be eternity: because eternity is standing simultaneously, whereas time would be no less successive than it is now; nor would the creature be co-equaled to the Creator in all things, but it would nevertheless be equaled in this, which is not to have a beginning in enduring being. And this very thing I say is impossible. Hence Boethius speaks there from a hypothesis of the false—namely, what would follow if the world were posited to have been from eternity.

§ 6. To the next, it must be said that God always could; but the thing could not be made from eternity; and therefore nothing follows concerning idleness. Because it belongs to a wise agent to consider not [only] what he himself can do, but what can be done in the thing; and not only this, but also what can be done fittingly for himself, and usefully for the things made.

§ 7. To the next, it must be said that no mutation falls into Him: because He always holds Himself in one way, although things hold themselves in diverse ways in Him. And an example of this has often been posited concerning the divine will and intellect. Hence, the fact that the thing is not from eternity is because it could not be made so; which He Himself always, in one uniform way, could make.

§ 8. To the next, it must be said that His power does not depend on the work on account of this, but rather the work depends on His power: but nevertheless, because the work is of another essence than Himself, therefore it cannot have that perfection which His power has, but will fall short of it. And this indicates the imperfection of the work, not the dependence of the efficient cause.

§ 9. But if you object that God's works are perfect, as it is said in the Canticle of Deuteronomy ; I respond that they are perfect in their own genus, but not with the perfection of the divine essence, which would be demanded for it to be able to be equaled to the power of the efficient cause.

§ 2. But to those things which are objected to the contrary, it seems to me they must be conceded.

§ 3. TO THAT which is asked further, Whether He could make it earlier than He made it? It seems to me a foolish question: because given that "earlier" is taken for some number of years, the very same question results as there is now. For I readily concede that God could have caused the world to have already stood for a thousand thousand years: and if He had done this, we would still ask the same thing as we do now. And therefore the question is void, since it has been shown that it could not be eternal, because this is against the rationale of a created thing.

§ 4. But to this which it objects, that by anteriorizing to infinity it seems to take away the beginning of duration; I say that this is false: because however much "before" you accept, it is finite: and nothing remains with respect to the infinite except the potency of accepting [more]. In eternity, however, there is per se no beginning, and in act it has no beginning. Hence time indeed would then be principated [have a beginning] according to act, but able to have a further beginning [earlier still], yet not able to be without a beginning, because it is posited to be created.

§ 5. BUT TO THIS which it objects, that if time were posited as infinite in this way, it would never be possible to arrive at this day; we can concede the conclusion, because it is in our favor. But because he proves it sophistically, it must be said that if we were not to posit time as infinite, as certain Philosophers did, we would [nevertheless] posit it as infinite by the succession of the motions of heaven. And this infinite is unfolded through aliquot parts, which are the hour, day, month, and year; and in this infinite it happens that one can take determinate parts, but it does not happen that one can come to an end or a middle of the whole duration. Hence one easily arrives at this or that day, but this day is no part which, being taken a number of times, would measure the whole succession, because then the infinite would be posited as finite. But nevertheless, we do not posit time to be infinite by the succession of motions in this way: because time began, and similarly motion, and both will also be finished, as was said above.

Articulus 2 — Whether God Could Have Made the Things That He Made Better

Could God have made better those things which He made?

§ 6. Secondly, it is asked: Whether He could make better things than He made?

§ 7. And it seems that He could not: because 1. Dionysius says that it belongs to the best to produce the best. [122] Therefore it seems that He created each and every thing in the best state it could have.

§ 8. 2. Also, Plato: "Furthermore, because He was best, envy was banished far from Him." [123] Therefore, He gave to each thing as much as it could receive of His goodness. But this means not being able to do better. Therefore it seems that He could not make things better than He made them.

§ 9. If perhaps you say that He made it best in this way, because He made each thing in every goodness of which it was susceptible. Against this: He Himself gave the capacity, and He also filled it; therefore, since He is best, He gave each thing the maximum capacity, and filled it. Therefore, simply speaking, it seems that He could do nothing better than what He did.

§ 10. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. It is certain that prime matter is capable of the noblest form. Therefore God could have given to every part of matter that form which is the noblest, so that the whole universe might be informed by a rational or intellective soul. But that which is animated by a rational soul is better and nobler than a stone.

therefore He could have made a better stone than He made.

§ 2. Also, there is no capacity of any creature that is not finite: therefore God could have made it greater: but if He had made it greater, it would be capable of a better good. Therefore something better would be given to it than it presently has: because otherwise there would not be a right proportion of capacity to that by which the capacity is filled, which would not befit the wisdom and goodness of God. Therefore He could have made individual things better than they are.

§ 3. Also, the Master proves this by two arguments in the text, which are evident to one who inspects them, and he concedes this.

Solution. This question only asks about the goodness of individual things in themselves. And therefore I say that it can be understood in two ways, namely concerning the goodness of things that are in themselves supposed in their proper natures and genera: or concerning things existing in the power of the Creator alone. If it is understood concerning things existing in themselves: then it can still be understood in two ways, namely concerning the goodness following the substantial being of each thing, or following its well-being and accidental being: and if it is understood in the first way: then I say that no thing could have been made better than it was made, although God could have made it better. And this is because then the capacity of the material and formal principles of each thing is supposed: and with those being supposed, concerning the substantials nothing better could have been made from those principles than was made. But if it is understood in the second way, namely concerning accidental being, or well-being, I say that it could have been made better and worse, just as things are continuously changed into better and worse. But if the question is understood concerning things not supposed except in the power of the Creator: then I say that they could have been made better and worse in both substantial and accidental being according to His will: and in this way the Master takes the question in the text.

And through this the solution to the first two is clear: because the words of Dionysius and Plato are understood concerning the bringing forth of things into substantial being from those principles of nature, which presently exist and are supposed to exist in the seminal causes in the works of the six days.

To the other one it must be said that God gave that capacity, but He did not give the maximum that He could give. And if it is asked, why is this? I say that from wisdom He did not dispose to give a greater one, and He did not will to give a greater one: and why He did not will it, I am ignorant of, but He Himself knows. But it is true that this given capacity, with respect to substantial being, could not be filled better: because, as Plato says, forms are given according to the merits of the matter: and therefore to a nobler matter a better form is given, and to each thing a form according as it is capable, as Avicenna says: and he posits a simile in the sphere of fire, which heats only a certain matter less proportioned to its species; but a certain more proportioned matter it heats, and dissolves, and makes to shine: but another maximally proportioned matter it heats, dissolves, illuminates, and ignites. And thus it is also concerning God the giver of forms, that He fills all things in substantial being according to their capacity, some with the form of an element, some with the form of a mixed body, but some with a vegetative soul, and some with a sensible soul, and some with a rational soul, according as they recede more from the act of contrariety to the temperament and uniformity of complexion: because in this they approach the nature of heaven, as he himself says: and through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 3 — Whether God Could Have Made Better the Goodness That Results from the Order of the Universe Than He Made

Could God have made the goodness that results from the order of the universe better than He made it?

Thirdly, a more difficult question is asked, namely whether the goodness that results from the order of the universe, God could have made better?

It seems, however, that He could: because § 1. Between those things that are infinitely distant, there can be infinite degrees higher than the inferior, and inferior to the superior: but God and the highest creature, whatever it may be, are infinitely distant: therefore between God and an Angel there are infinite degrees capable of being filled with ordered goodnesses: but if those were made, the world would be ordered more closely to the best, which is God Himself, than it presently makes it: therefore the goodness of the order would be greater than it presently is: for whichever among the goodnesses of order more closely attains to the highest good, that one is better and greater.

§ 2. Also, it was possible for God to whom nothing is impossible to make the first and last in the universe better, just as first matter, and an Angel: concerning which Augustine says in book XII of the Confessions, that first matter is near nothing, and an Angel near God: therefore the middle things will also be better: therefore the whole universe will be better, and the order better: therefore also the goodness resulting from the order will be better.

123. Plato, Timaeus, 29e.

If perhaps you say that the world is like a cithara, in which if one string is stretched to a better sound, it indeed has a better sound in itself, but that better sound disturbs the whole harmony, and therefore brings more confusion and evil to the cithara than it has in itself: so also if this thing were made better than it is, it would confound the other things ordered to it. On the contrary: let only the temperament of the cithara be considered, I ask whether the cithara can have a better harmony, if all the strings, and not only one string, are made better? It is established that it can: therefore God could have made any creature better, and not only one without the other, than He made it: therefore then the order would be better and the harmony sweeter, as it seems.

§ 3. Furthermore, the Master expressly says this in the text, and reckons the opposite to be a heresy.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Upon that text of Genesis God saw all the things that He had made, etc.: the Gloss says that they were good in themselves, and they were very good but in the universe they were the best: but nothing can be made better than the best: therefore nothing better can be made by the goodness of this universe, nor could it.

§ 2. Also, the universe is of such great goodness that even that which is evil in itself confers completion upon it; therefore since nothing better could be made than that which even ordains evil into good, it seems that nothing better could be made than the universe.

§ 3. Also, Augustine: You have made two things, O Lord: one near You, and the other near nothing. Therefore a greater and wider order of goodness could not even be thought of, as it seems, than from nothing to near God: therefore it cannot be made better.

§ 4. Also, he who says "the universe" excepts nothing: therefore no goodness is lacking to the universe: but nothing can be made better than that to which nothing is lacking in goodness: therefore nothing can be made better than the universe.

Solution. Without prejudice I say that the universe can be considered in three ways, namely as it is supposed in being, and as it is supposed in the power of the efficient cause alone: and in some things supposed to be, and in others posited to be in the power of the efficient cause alone. If it is supposed in being: then it seems to me that in these things that are, a better natural harmony could never be made than was made: and this according to the goodness of nature, and not according to accidental goodness or the goodness of grace: because what better thing can be thought of than that the generable and corruptible are reduced to the motion of the oblique circle, and of those things that follow the oblique circle and have to be reduced to the uniform motion of a difform movable, and that this is reduced to a uniform mover uniformly behaving itself always and toward all things? Similarly, that the evil of one is ordained to the good of another, just as the corruption of one to the generation of another, and the persecution of a tyrant to the patience of virtue, and the probation of faith, nothing better can be made, with these things existing, as it seems. But if the whole world is supposed only to be in the power of the efficient cause: then it seems to me that He could have made a better world, and better ordered: just as a cithara with all other strings, or placed otherwise by an artisan knowing infinitely the contemperations of harmonies. But if it is posited in the third way, namely partly to be in reality, and partly in potency, as if we posit heaven and motion, and asses and earth to exist, and nothing more except in the divine mind and divine power: then it seems to me that without the confusion of the harmony of the world the remaining things cannot be made better with respect to substance than they were indeed made, although in nothing do I restrict the power of God who can always do what He wills: but I speak of being made: and I say this because an ass has a twofold goodness, namely in itself, and of comparison: and in comparison to a horse the ass is vile, but compared to a man it is still viler and less good: therefore if all other things were made better, the ass would be made less good with the goodness of comparison than it ought to be, and thus the harmony of the universe would be disturbed. But only in the middle way, namely that the thing is in the divine power alone, does the intention of the Master proceed in the text.

It must therefore be said to the first, that the degrees of beings are not taken in this way, because thus the world would always remain imperfect: but they are taken according to the participable goodnesses of God, such as to be, to live, to sense, to understand, to be incorruptible, to be a cause, and the like: and thus the universal order is filled: because those things that are participable from the attributes of God make the degrees: and those are filled in three ways, namely in the goodnesses of grace, just as all things are to man, and man to grace, and grace to God through Christ: and in the order of evil to good: and thus there could not be a closer order with these things existing.

But all the following objections proceed concerning the universe supposed in the power of God alone, and in this way they are conceded.

But to those things that are objected to the contrary, it must be said to the first three, that they do not proceed except concerning this universe which is supposed to be in the nature of things: and in this way what they conclude is conceded.

To the other it must be said that it is one thing to speak of this universe, and another of the notion of the universe according to the name. For this universe does not have many things which it could have if God willed: but the notion of the universe according to the name has all things: and concerning this nothing is asked here: hence that objection does not contribute to the proposition.

Articulus 4 — Whether God Could and Did Not Will, or Willed and Could Not, To Make a Better World

Whether God could and did not will, or willed and could not make a better world?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says in the text, there, A, For if He willed and could not, He is weak, etc.

For this argument does not seem to be sufficiently solved by the Master.

Hence it must be said, as was said above, that it is one thing in that which can be equalized by nature, like the Son and the Holy Spirit: but another in that which is of a diverse essence, because this cannot be equalized even however much it grows. And the simile of this is: if a finite line is taken, and a point is augmented by points: then the point can be augmented to infinity, and yet it will not be equalized to the line nor proportioned to it. So it must be said that the augmentation of created goodness respecting uncreated goodness is like the addition of a point: and therefore however much it grows, it will neither be proportionable, nor will it be equal.

But if you object that it is not similar: because a point is indivisible, and by indivisibles it cannot grow, because indivisibles are not quantified, and therefore it is not augmented: but created goodness is quantified, and therefore if it is added to infinity, it will be equal to the infinite. It must be said that in all those goodnesses always with the added thing there is also added the rationale of distant infinitely: because whatever it will be, it will be a created good: therefore whatever it is, it will be distant without proportion: and therefore it will never become proportionable and never equal: nor is this envy, but rather the order of wisdom: because envy is with respect to those things that can be equalized or at least proportioned, as Gregory says upon that text of Job Truly anger kills the foolish, and envy slays the little one.

Articulus 5 — Whether Christ, the Blessed Virgin, an Angel, and Adam Could Have Become Better Than They Were Made; And, Whether Christ Belongs to the Universality of the Works of God; And, How It Is Understood That the Blessed Virgin Is Exalted above the Choirs of Angels

Whether Christ, the Blessed Virgin, an Angel, and Adam could have been made better than they were made? and, Whether Christ is of the universe of God's works? and, How it is understood that the Blessed Virgin is exalted above the choirs of Angels?

Whether Christ, the Blessed Virgin, an Angel, and Adam could have been made better than they were made? and, Whether Christ is of the universe of God's works? and, How it is understood that the Blessed Virgin is exalted above the choirs of Angels?

Next it is asked concerning the second part of this reading, there, After these things it must be considered, Whether by another or a better, etc.

Moreover, a question occurs here concerning certain optimal things, as concerning Christ, and the Blessed Virgin, and an Angel, and Adam, whether they could have been made better?

Let it therefore be asked concerning Christ, Whether He Himself is of the universe, or not?

It seems, however, that He is: because § 1. Thus says the Apostle You are the body of Christ, and members of member. And in the same place the Gloss says: Members of member, that is, of the head, which is a member: it is established, however, that the head is of the universality of the members: therefore Christ is of the universe just like the other members.

§ 2. Also, Hilary says above: Christ is therefore the head of all: therefore it seems that He Himself is of the universe.

§ 3. Also, whatever is less than that which is of the universe, that is of the universe more than that: Christ is less than something that is of the universe, because He was made a little less than the Angels, who are of the universe: therefore as before.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Christ is constituted over all the works of the hands of God: therefore He Himself is not of the universe of works, as it seems.

§ 2. Also, whoever is the cause of the whole good of the universe, cannot be something of the universe: but Christ is the cause of the whole good that the universe has: therefore, etc.

Further it is asked, Whether Christ could have been made better?

It seems, however, that He could: because His soul was created: therefore His goodness was finite, just as His essence: therefore it could be greater.

Also, His body was created: therefore by the same reason the goodness of His body could be greater.

ON THE CONTRARY: John The Spirit is not given to Him by measure: but what is not by measure, is immense: and what is immense, cannot grow: therefore the goodness of Christ could not grow.

Further it is asked, Whether the Blessed Virgin could have been better?

It seems that she could not: because § 1. Anselm says that it was fitting that that Virgin whom the Father chose to be the mother for His Son, should shine with that purity than which a greater under God cannot be understood: therefore it seems that she could not grow in goodness.

§ 2. Also Augustine says: You have made two things, O Lord: one near You, and the other near nothing. Therefore an Angel was near to God: but we sing the saying of Jerome concerning her: You are exalted above the choirs of Angels to the celestial kingdoms. Therefore she is nearer than the near: but nothing can be understood to be able to approach further by growing: therefore she could not be made better.

§ 3. Also, under God united to man nothing is closer than to be materially the same as the united one: but the matter is taken from her: therefore she is the closest: therefore she cannot be better.

ON THE CONTRARY: A creature is simple: therefore it is of finite goodness: therefore it can be understood to grow: and what you can understand, God can make, and much more: therefore she can be made better.

Further it is asked concerning an Angel. § 1. Because it seems better, what is more glorious: but it seems more glorious to advance to beatitude by struggle and merit, than without them: therefore it seems that man was made better than an Angel.

§ 2. Also, it is in the text that a nature that can sin is better than that which cannot sin: therefore a state possible for sin is better than a state impossible for sin: and the same follows as before.

§ 3. Also, from this it follows that the weaker a state is and having greater occasions for sinning, provided it does not have necessity, the better it is: and these things are frivolous, and concerning them it has been asked elsewhere: hence these suffice here.

Solution. It must not be conceded that Christ is of the universe, but over the universe.

To that therefore which is first objected, it must be said that by the very fact that He is said to be the head, He is signified to be over all things: but He is said to be a member not of all things, but of the Church with which He has a conformity of nature, and not just any member communicable to others, but rather that which is eminent over all, and flows the motive and sensible spirit into all, as was said upon the third [book of Sentences]. Through this also the solution to the following is clear.

To the other it must be said that Christ is not made less than the Angels except by dispensation and relatively, namely in that He assumed a passible nature. But because that nature is united and not bare, therefore also in it He is over all things, and not orderable with all things.

To that which is asked further, it has been sufficiently discussed as much as I could in the third [book]: yet here it can be said that if we consider Christ united as He is in the truth of reality, then the grace of man is conjoined to the infinite good, and with respect to this that He has union with it in being, by which union nothing can approach more to the highest good, and thus He cannot grow nor be made better: and in this way the Spirit is given to Him not by measure. But if simple grace not reaching to union were considered, which consideration is only according to the intellect: then He could grow, and the grace would be finite.

And through this the solution to those things that are objected concerning Christ is clear: because the objections proceed in those two ways.

To that which is further asked concerning the Blessed Virgin, I certainly think that whatever a pure creature capable of God can perceive, all this was communicated to the Mother of God: and in that consideration the reasons first adduced proceed. But the divine power is not restricted, so that He could not have made a capacity greater than that of a man and an Angel, and then grace also could grow: and in this way the reasons to the contrary proceed: and therefore the solution to them is also clear.

Yet it must be noted that although she is said to be exalted above the choirs of Angels, and above the choirs of Archangels there is nothing except the divine altitude: nevertheless she is not exalted to equality with the divine altitude: because as was said before, the distance is beyond measure: and therefore although she is higher than all the Angels, yet she still is distant from the divine dignity without a measure of proportion.

To that which is further asked concerning man and an Angel with respect to the state of struggle, it must be said that it is goodness relatively, namely according to the more laudable: and concerning this only those reasons proceed. There is also goodness absolutely which perfects according to a nobler act and a higher degree: and concerning that it does not hold: and therefore speaking with respect to this, concerning the power of God alone, each could have been made better, just as the Master also concedes in the text.

Articulus 6 — Whether God Can Always Do What He Could

Whether God can always do what He could?

Next it is asked concerning the last part of this distinction which begins there, D, Furthermore it is usually asked, Whether God, etc.

It seems, however, that God can always do what He could:

§ 1. For everything not now able to do what it could, is either changed in its power, or its power depends upon another which is changed: but God's power is neither changed in itself, nor depends upon another: therefore He can now do whatever He once could.

§ 2. Also, whatever behaves always in one way, can always do the same thing: but God behaves always in one way: therefore He can always do the same thing.

But to the contrary are the instances that lie in the text.

Solution. It must be said that the Master seems to have been of the opinion of the Nominalists. Hence the solution of the Master consists in this, that one power is always signified, which is referred to the same thing, although it is signified in a diverse mode of signifying in a verb or adverb pertaining to time. Hence he says that it is the same power by which He could create the world, and by which He could have created the world: and his solution is clear in the text. But it seems to me to be said more truly and more probably that there is power considered absolutely, and this is always the same: and there is power conjoined to an act, and this is determined according to the mode of signifying to the thing which is referred to it: and the rationale is not the same in that relation: and by this He cannot now do whatever He could, nor does this posit a mutation in Him, but in the thing into which He has power.

To the first therefore it must be said that His power does not on account of this depend upon the thing, but rather from the fact that the thing depends upon it, there arises a diverse habit of relation of the thing to the power, and conversely, by which the thing is related otherwise to the power before it is made, and when it is being made, and when it has been made.

To the other it must be said that although God behaves in one way toward things, yet things do not behave in one way toward Him: and from those habits there are made diverse relations, by which the power is signified diversely.

But above we have shown that it is not unfitting for the eternal to receive from the temporal some mode of signifying.

DISTINCTIO XLV

Divisio Textus

Now concerning the will of God something according to our sense, etc.

This tractate concerning the will is divided into two parts. In the first the Master treats of the will of God according to itself, and according to comparison to the things willed. In the second, concerning the comparison of our will to His will: and this begins at distinction XLVIII, there, B, That also must not be passed over.

Further, the first is divided into two. In the first, he treats of the will of God and the thing willed. In the second, he treats of the mode of fulfillment of the divine will in distinction XLVII, A, there, For the will of God is always efficacious, etc.

The first is further subdivided into two. In the first it is treated of the will and the division of the will according to itself. In the second, he posits certain doubts about the things willed of the divine will, below, at distinction XLVI, there, A, Here arises a question, For it has been said, etc.

This distinction is divided into two parts: in the first of which he treats of the will of God according as it is the first cause of all creatures. In the second, he posits a distinction concerning the multiplicity of the divine will, there, F, Here it must not be passed over by us, etc.

The prior is further subdivided into two: in the first of which he treats of the will according to comparison to the one willing. But in the second he treats of the same according to comparison to the things willed, of which it is the cause, there, D, This therefore supremely good will, etc.

The prior of these has three chapters: in the first of which he says that the will of God is the divine essence. In the second, he raises an objection against this, and responds to it. But in the third he confirms his saying.

And through this the meaning is clear.

Articulus 1 — Whether There Is Will in God

Whether there is will in God?

However, three doubts occur here, before the text, of which the first is, Whether there is will in God? The second, What is His will? And the third, concerning the introduction or location of this tractate concerning the will.

To the first it is objected thus: § 1. Every appetite is significative of indigence: but in God there is no indigence: therefore there is no appetite. The first is proved by this, that appetite is moving toward that which is not had, as the Philosopher says. The second is evident per se. Thence further it is objected thus: No appetite is in God: every will is an appetite: therefore no will is in God. The first is established from the prior syllogism. The second is proved in the third book of De Anima, where appetite is divided by will, and desire which is the appetite of the sensible soul.

§ 2. Also, Augustine in the book De Libero arbitrio: The will is a rational motion, presiding over sense and appetite: but it is established that in God there is neither sense, nor sensible appetite, because Augustine speaks of that: therefore neither is there will.

§ 3. Also, every will is for pursuing something, or fleeing it: but God neither pursues nor flees anything: therefore He wills nothing: therefore as before.

§ 4. Also, the will is a rational power, having itself to opposites: but God has Himself in one way: therefore, etc.

§ 5. Also, the will is a contingent cause of things: but God is a necessary and always standing cause: therefore God does not have a will, as it seems.

§ 1. But to the contrary is what is said in the text.

§ 2. Also, the Apostle says According to the purpose of His will. And, in the same place According to the counsel of His will. And in many other places.

§ 3. Also, by reason: An agent by intellect is better than an agent by the necessity of nature, since the first knows the reason of the work, but the second does not: but God is the most noble agent: therefore He is an agent by intellect: but He does nothing of such things except what He wills, and when He wills: therefore God has a will.

§ 4. Also, the most free thing in a rational nature is the will: therefore it is both the best and most noble: therefore it is to be attributed to God.

§ 5. Also, the Philosopher in the XI of First Philosophy says: Will is His action: and therefore wakefulness, and sense, and intellect, are very voluptuous: and hope, and remembrance are on account of these. And he intends to show that to God must be given a will, which is always in act, and is His action: because for God to act is nothing else than for God to will that this be done: just as also for us the will always conjoined to the thing willed is the best, and voluptuous, as are wakefulness, and sense, and intellect according to act: and the sign of this is that hope and remembrance do not have voluptuousness except in relation to those.

Solution. It must be said that will is in God even prior to than in us, and more properly.

But to the first it must be said that of the will something is by accident, and something is per se. But per se it has four things; of which one is concerning nature, namely that it is of a rational nature, and in reason: as Aristotle and Damascene say, that every will is rational: and if it is not rational, it is not will. The second is that it is the most free thing of a rational nature: and this is its property: for it has one liberty from the proximate subject in which it is, that is, the nature of an intellectual spirit, which is not the act of a body as fixed to an organ: and therefore it is not obligated to matter or its appendages. It has another liberty from itself, according as it is a power able to accept an object, or not accept it, because it operates spontaneously. The third is its comparison to the good: because the will is always of the good, and especially of the highest good which all things desire, as the Philosopher says: and this highest good would not bring joyousness to God, unless He were its will: and this is what the Philosopher excellently touches upon in VII of the Ethics, where he says according to the translation which is from the Greek: Therefore for him whose nature is simple, always the same operation will be the most delectable. And so it is, because God always delights with one and simple delectation. For not only is motion an act, that is, a perfection and complement, but also immobility and delectation are more in rest. But the fourth and last is that the will is also the cause of all things which are made as if by an artisan. For the Philosopher says in VI of First Philosophy, that the principle of all artificial things is the will: but God operates by the mode of an artisan, and by the mode of the necessity of nature.

Therefore to what he first objects concerning the will, it must be said that this is true in an indigent nature: since as Aristotle says in VII of the Ethics, just as in God immobility is voluptuous, so in an indigent nature motion is because of the malice of indigence: but God rests in the eternal good, which is wholly within Him. And these are the words: Transmutation is the sweetest of all things according to the poet Homer, because of a certain malice: just as an easily transmutable man, who is malicious, and a nature which needs transmutation, for it is neither simple nor modest.

Through this the solution to the three following is also clear.

To the last it must be said that this does not belong to the nobility of the will, that it can do evil, because this is not to be able: but it follows upon a created unconfirmed will from defect, because it flowed into being after non-being: but that it has power for opposites contradictorily, namely that it can do this, and can cease from it, and can do another: for this power shows that the will itself is obligated to nothing: and this well belongs to God, who is obligated to nothing.

Articulus 2 — What Is the Divine Will; And, Whether It Is the Same as the Essence of God

What is the divine will? and, Is it the same as God's essence?

Next it is asked, What is the divine will?

It seems, however, that it is not the divine essence: because § 1. Whatever things are the same, every thing that is attributed to one, can be attributed to the other: but there are many things in the will, which are not in the essence: such as all created goods which are in the will of God containing and willing them, yet not all things are in the essence: therefore the will and the essence are not the same.

§ 2. Also, whatever things are altogether the same, the same thing added to both still does not makes them diverse, but they remain the same. If, therefore, the will of God is the essence of God, and the will for this is the essence for this: but the will for this exists, indicating a created man: therefore God is the essence of this, which is false.

§ 3. If perhaps it should be said that the will differs from the essence, not in itself, but in what it connotes. On the contrary: It does not belong to the ratio of the will that it connotes something: for I can say, God wills himself to be three and one, and wills to generate the Son: and nothing outside God is connoted. Therefore it seems that this is not substantial to the will, that it connotes something: therefore it seems that the will of God is not the essence of God.

ON THE CONTRARY: Whatever is not the whole of what it has, is not simple: the will is had from God, and he himself is not his will: therefore God is not simple, which is false.

Solution. It must be said that the will is the essence of God: but it differs in its mode of signifying, as has been shown quite often above concerning the divine attributes: and therefore the first objection is invalid.

To the next it must be said that it is true, where that which is added to both, is added under the same ratio in which they are the same. But this does not happen here: but rather when "the will for this" is said, the word "this" expresses the object of the will according to a ratio of understanding which differs from the essence: and therefore it is not necessary that it be the essence of this. And it well follows thus: Intellect and will are the same in reality: but really the intellect of God does not differ from the will of God: therefore really the essence of God and the intellect are the same.

To the next it must be said that the will of God does not always connote a willed object outside, or even a relation to a willed object outside, because it is eternal, and with respect to eternal things: but it always differs from the essence in its mode of signifying and understanding, because as was proved above, substance, will, and intellect are not synonyms.

Articulus 3 — Whether in This Place the Treatise on the Will of God Is Well Situated

Is the treatise on God's will well situated in this place?

Thirdly, it is asked about the situation of this treatise in this place.

§ 1. The will of God is his action, as was held in the authority from the Philosopher introduced above: but nothing is more immediate to the effect than the action drawing it out: therefore the will is most conjoined to the work: therefore it comes after power and wisdom.

§ 2. Again, the will seems to antecede power and knowledge: for everyone who operates through the will first wills, and afterwards by his knowledge orders the work, and by his power executes it: therefore it seems that the treatise on the will should have been first, and on power last.

§ 3. Again, Master Hugh of St. Victor: "Will moves, wisdom disposes, power operates." Therefore the will is first.

§ 4. Again, Dionysius says that the good is diffusive of being. But to be diffusive of being is through creation: therefore the first thing inclining towards creation is the good, which is a disposition of the will. But everything inclining has something inclinative towards the work: therefore that inclinative thing which is inclined by the will is more immediate to the work: but this is the executing power: therefore it seems that the will is before power.

ON THE CONTRARY § 1. For if the will, as the text says, is the whole first and proximate cause of things, it seems that the will should be determined in the same book as the things themselves, that is, in the second book of the Sentences, and not here.

§ 2. Again, power according to its ratio abstracts from the will: for it follows, "the will is: therefore power is"; but not conversely. Therefore power is prior in nature to the will:

therefore the will is related by addition to power according to the ratio of understanding. But the more determined every cause is, the more proper and conjoined to the effect it is: therefore the will is more immediately conjoined to the work than power.

Solution. It must be said, as was said above, that power is considered in many ways, and so is the will. However, the will which is treated here is the will related to the willed object and conjoined to it: and this is the sufficient cause for creatures to exist: and therefore it is the cause operating and drawing out things.

To the second, it must be said that that objection proceeds concerning the will taken in another way, namely that of which it was said above that it is the mover of the other powers: and this is not compared to the willed object.

To the next it must be said that that authority is understood in the same way.

To the next it must be said that the statement of Dionysius rather argues for the fact that it is the immediate cause: because as Augustine says, and it was held above, "Because God is good, we are: and insofar as we are, we are good."

And what is objected further does not hold, except in those agents in which the will is not a sufficient cause: for there the will operates through other powers affixed in the members, as through instruments. But in God it is a sufficient cause for everything he wills: and therefore it is not necessary that it incline any other powers.

To the first on the contrary it must be said that it is not necessary on account of this to place the treatise on the will in the second book of the Sentences, because the science of the cause does not have to be determined in the same book as the caused thing, except only in those causes which are proximate to the caused things, and whose nature and property the caused thing itself has in itself. And this is evident: for although the stars are the causes of the generation of various things, yet the natures and motions of the stars are not determined in the book on the generation of animals or plants, but what is determined therein is concerning proximate causes univocal with the caused things themselves. And the will is not such a cause of creatures: and therefore it is not to be determined with creatures.

To the last it must be said that this is nothing to the point: because this does not object concerning power related to the work, which is divided against the will among those things required for the work, but rather concerning power which is a genus to everything that can do something by knowing, or willing, or operating.

D. That the supremely good will of God is the cause of all things that are naturally: whose cause is not to be sought, because it has none, since it is eternal.

And so this supremely good will is the cause of all things which naturally are made, or have been made or will be made: which is preceded by no cause, because it is eternal. And therefore its cause is not to be sought. For he who seeks its cause seeks something greater than it, since nothing is greater than it. Hence Augustine in the book of Eighty-Three Questions: "He who seeks why God willed to make the world, seeks the cause of God's will. But every efficient cause is greater than that which is effected. But nothing is greater than the will of God. Therefore its cause is not to be sought." The same in the book Against the Manichees: "If any say, 'Why did it please God to make heaven and earth?' It must be answered to them, who desire to know the will of God, and seek to know the causes and will of God, that the will of God is itself the cause of all things that are. For if the will has a cause, there is something that precedes the will of God: which it is wicked to believe. He therefore who says, 'Why did God make heaven and earth?' It must be answered to him, 'Because he wills.' For the will of God is the cause of heaven and earth: and therefore the will of God is greater than heaven and earth. But he who says, 'Why did he will to make heaven and earth?' seeks something greater than the will of God: but nothing greater can be found. Let human temerity therefore restrain itself: and let it not seek what is not, lest it not find what is." Behold, by these authorities it is openly insinuated that there is no cause of the will of God: and therefore it is not to be sought.

Divisio Textus

And so this supremely good will, etc. This part has three chapters. In the first of these, he indeterminately shows that the will is the cause of all things. In the second, he shows that it does not have a cause, but is first. In the third, he shows what things it is the cause of, namely of those things which are as facts, and those are permanent things: and of those things whose being is in becoming, as those which he calls motions: in which certain other things are also understood, as will be evident in the disputation.

Articulus 4 — Whether the Divine Will Is a Cause

Is the divine will a cause?

Concerning the first chapter three doubts arise, of which the first is: Whether the will is a cause? The second is: Whether it is the cause of all those things which are subject to God's power? The third is: Whether it is a proper or common cause, a contingent or a necessary one?

To the first it is objected thus: § 1. Augustine in book VIII of The City of God says thus: "This is the reason why we prefer the Platonists to the rest, because while other philosophers wore out their talents and studies in seeking the causes of things,[124] and what might be the mode of learning and living: these, having known God, found where the cause of the constituted universe was." But it is established that the light of perceiving truth is attributed to wisdom, while the font of imbibing happiness is attributed to the goodness of the will: therefore the cause of the constituted universe is referred to power: and thus power is more the cause of the universe of creatures than the will is.

Again, a little before this, in the same place: "Whatever philosophers have sensed these things concerning the supreme, good, and true God, that he is the effector of created things and the light of things to be known, and the good of things to be done, that from him we have both the principle of nature, and the truth of doctrine, and the happiness of life: we prefer all these to the rest, and confess them to be nearer to us." But again it is sufficiently evident that the light of things to be known, and the truth of doctrine, are referred to knowledge; while the good of things to be done and the happiness of life are referred to the goodness of the will: therefore that he is the effector and principle of nature is referred to power: therefore power is the cause of things more than the will, as it seems.

§ 2. Again, if the will is the cause of things, what kind of cause will it be? It is established that it is not a material cause, because God is the material cause of nothing. Similarly, it will not be a formal exemplar cause: because this is attributed to wisdom. It cannot be an efficient cause either: because power operates and effects. Therefore it will be only a final cause: and so it ought not to be called the efficient cause of things, but rather power.

But against this is what is said in the text.

Solution. To this it must be said that the will of God, which signifies the divine essence with respect to the willed object, and connoting an effect, is the cause of created things: because that is the will that a thing be made, and this is the sufficient action of God for everything that is made to be made.

To the sayings of Augustine in the book The City of God, it must be said that he speaks according to the vestiges of God found in creatures, in which in some way the Trinity of the operator shines forth. But the will of God is not operating without knowledge, and therefore in what is operated by the will there shines forth a vestige of knowledge. Nor is the will operating without the ratio of power, and therefore a vestige of power shines forth in the work. Nor is it operating without the intention of the supreme good, and therefore a vestige of the supreme good shines forth in the work. Nevertheless, the entire work depends on the will in order to be made: and the vestiges of the others shine forth for the reason that they are not separated from the operating will.

To the next it must be said that it itself is the efficient cause: but its disposition, which is goodness, is the final cause.

And as to what is objected concerning power, that according to this it will not be a cause, it must be said that power according to the ratio of power does not suffice for a thing to be made: because when someone is able and knows, then the complement is the will so that he makes it, and it is made. And therefore power is efficient, but not determined, and as a proper and sufficient cause according to its ratio.

Articulus 5 — Whether the Will of God Is the Cause of All Things That Are Subject to His Power; And, Why God Is Not Called Omniwilling, as Omnipotent and Omniscient

Is the will of God the cause of all things that are subject to his power? And, why is God not called omnivolent, just as he is called omnipotent and omniscient?

Secondly it is asked, whether it is the cause of all those things which are subject to power?

It seems that it is: because § 1. God can only do good things, for the reason that to do evil things belongs to impotence: but the will of God is for every good: therefore it is for all those things concerning which there is power.

§ 2. Again, God can do nothing except what he wills himself to be able to do: therefore everything he can do, he wills himself to be able to do. But no one unless foolish wills himself to be able to do evil: therefore God, since he is supremely wise, wills himself to be able to do good only: therefore he can do good only and wills it: therefore power and will are concerning the same thing.

§ 3. Again, as knowledge is related to the true, so is power to the good: but knowledge is of every truth, and only of truth: therefore power is of every good, and only of good. And God wills every good: therefore he wills by his will everything which he can do by his power.

§ 4. Again, God can do nothing which cannot be done with him as author. But what can be done with him as author is good: therefore whatever he can do is good, and he wills it all: therefore he wills all that he can do.

ON THE CONTRARY: "All whatsoever God willed, he made in heaven and on earth," etc. If therefore power is of all those things of which there is will, he made in heaven, etc., all whatsoever he could make: and this was proved above to be false.

FURTHER it is asked, if God is called omnipotent because he can do all things, and omniscient because he knows all things, why is he not called omnivolent? For it is said in the text, nothing is done against his will.

If perhaps you say: because evil things are done which God does not will. ON THE CONTRARY: We have one sign of the will concerning the evil that is done, namely permission: therefore even this is subject to the divine will.

SOLUTION to the first objections, there is one solution, because it is founded on the same thing: namely that it should be said that when it is said "God can do all things," or "God can do good things," that which falls under power is amplified to a being possible to be, which will never be made, which however God could and can make. But the will is related to that which was, or is, or will be, as is said in the text. And therefore although both are with respect to the good, they are nevertheless not of equal scope in the good: because one looks to the good in potency, but the other to what was, or is, or will be in act.

To that which is asked further, why is he not called omnivolent? It must be said that the reason is touched upon well enough in the objection.

And to what is objected to the contrary, it is said that permission is not a sign of the will that God wills this which is done by him who does evil, but that he wills something concerning it, as will be said below. But omnipotence is referred to possible being, or future, or being in act, or past: and the will is referred only to what was, or is, or will be: and therefore he is not omnivolent as he is omnipotent, nor omnivolent as he is omniscient.

Articulus 6 — Whether the Divine Will Is the Common or Proper, Necessary or Contingent Cause of All Things

Is the divine will a common or proper, necessary or contingent cause of all things?

Thirdly it is asked, whether it is a proper or common cause, a necessary or contingent one?

It seems that it is common, because: § 1. That is common from which the being of the caused does not follow. But the being of the caused does not follow from the will of God from eternity: therefore the will of God is a common cause.

§ 2. Again, it seems that it is contingent: because Augustine says: "What by the will is done, is not done out of necessity: but what is done and not necessarily, is done contingently: therefore what is done by the will is done contingently: therefore the will is a contingent cause."

ON THE CONTRARY § 1. A common cause is one needing something in order to cause: the will of God needs nothing: therefore it is not a common cause.

§ 2. Again, every common cause is determinable by something addible to it: the will of God is determinable by nothing: therefore as before.

Again it seems that it is not contingent. Every contingent thing is mutable: for Aristotle says: "What is contingent to be, is contingent not to be." But God in power and knowledge and will is altogether immutable: therefore his will is not a contingent cause.

Solution. This question was noted above in the question: Whether predestination has a cause? And as was said there, the will is a determined and proper cause of all things. But it does not follow that if it is from eternity, the effect is from eternity: because this is impeded on the part of the order of wisdom, and on the part of the caused thing, to the ratio of which belongs that it flowed into being after non-being: and through this the solution to the first is clear.

To the next it must be said that it itself is not a contingent cause: but of the contingent and the necessary it itself is the necessary cause. But necessity is multiplex, as was distinguished above: and in God simple necessity well falls, which is immutable, which sounds neither of coercion nor of obligation.

To the saying of Augustine it must be said that he is speaking of the will of the creature and not of the Creator.

Articulus 7 — Whether the Will of God Has a Cause

Does the will of God have a cause?

Then it is asked concerning the second chapter of this part where he says, there, D, around the middle: If the will has a cause, there is something that precedes the will of God, etc.

For the will of God seems to have a cause.

§ 1. For every will of a wise person proceeds from a rational cause: and this is to the praise of one acting wisely: since therefore God is supremely wise, and acting wisely, it seems that there is a rational cause for his will.

§ 2. Again, Ephesians 1:3[125], on that verse, According to the purpose of his will, namely God's: the Gloss says that the will of God is from reason.

§ 3. Again, above, in the prologue of this book, the Master said that this is the cause of all errors, that the will is not subjected to reason: therefore since God is absolved from all errors, his will is ruled by reason.

§ 4. Again, according to this it would be easy to demonstrate everything through a cause, and to solve all queries, by saying, "God wills this, and you ought not to seek another cause."

ON THE CONTRARY: In us it is thus, that the ratio of our will is the willed object, because the willed object is a mover according to its ratio or that of the good, and therefore our will depends on the willed object. But the willed object of the divine will is caused by the will itself: therefore it is not the ratio or cause of the will: therefore from that part it does not have a cause. On the part of the willer, however, the will is the same as the substance: therefore also from that part it has no cause: therefore simply there is no cause of the divine will.

Solution. It must be said that neither in foreknowledge, nor outside foreknowledge does the will of God have any cause: but nevertheless it can have a ratio at which the will is terminated according to act. And what the difference is between a cause and a term or ratio, was said above in the question on the cause of predestination.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the will of God is always a rational cause: but it is never from a rational cause: because this is not understood except of those agents whose will is changed by the willed object and is caused. And this, as was proved, is not the case in the will of God: because in such wills the willer depends on the willed object: and he is said to be of rational will because he wills rational things and rationally.

To the next it must be said that the Gloss says that it itself is rational for the reason that it is a ratio unto itself: because it cannot be unjust, for nothing is more just than that this should be done which God wills: because he wills nothing but good: because by that very fact every good is good, because God wills it.

To the next it must be said that it is understood of the will of man, which is not the ratio of the willed object, but rather takes its ratio and cause from the willed object, and not of the will of God in which there is the total contrary.

To the next it must be said that the will of God is not a cause which is a middle term of demonstration, and already that is not sought in the solution of doubts: but rather there are sought causes connatural and coessential to the effect: and those it is difficult to find.

Divisio Textus

Here it is not to be passed over by us, etc.

Here begins that part which is about the distinction of the will. And it has two parts: in the first of which he divides the will of good pleasure [beneplacitum] and the will of sign. In the second, however, he divides the will of sign into five: and this begins there, G: But sometimes according to a certain figure of speech, etc.

Articulus 8 — Whether the Divine Will Is the First Cause of All Things

Is the divine will the first cause of all things?

Then it is asked concerning what he says in the third chapter, there, E: The will of God is the first and supreme cause of all species and motions, etc.

§ 1. For if it is the first, it is not lawful to seek another before it: and if it is supreme, and supremely sufficient, it is not lawful to seek another after it. Therefore it seems that everything that the philosophers searched out in natural, mathematical, and very many other causes is superfluous. Similarly too, the original texts of the Saints, who render many other causes of the divine works, are superfluous.

But if you say that this is the vanity of the philosophers, and has no truth: this is a wonder, that a vanity having no truth still stands and has not been disproved.

§ 2. Again, according to this it seems that nature also does nothing, nor is powerful to operate anything; because the sufficient cause of all things is the will of God: therefore heat does not burn, but the will of God burns: and man does not speak, but the will of God speaks, and so in all things: and this is ridiculous, as it seems.

§ 3. Again, this seems false which he says, that monstrous and natural things are made by the will of God alone: since natural things have determined causes, and monstrous things are reduced to the defection and superfluity of matter, or the disproportion of the informative virtue to the matter, as the philosophers say, or the inordinate division of the seed: therefore they are not made by the will of God alone.

§ 4. Again, the defect of the luminaries [i.e., eclipses] has determined causes, discovered and written from the proportion of the motions of the sun and moon according to the return to the head or tail of the dragon [the lunar nodes], and according to the proportion of the motion of the head and tail, and the motion of the latitude of the moon, and the proportion of aspect according to the circles of altitude in which conjunction or prevention or opposition occurs, and according to the distance of the latitude of the climate: therefore it seems that the cause of all these has been subtly investigated.

Solution. Without prejudice I say with the Lord in the Gospel of John, 5:17: My Father works until now, and I work: and therefore all whatsoever the will makes, God makes more in nature and will: but he himself operates as the immediate universal cause. And this is wonderful:

125. Actually Ephesians 1:5, "secundum propositum voluntatis suae."

because one cause is immediate to each thing at the same time, and yet universal to all: and if other causes operate anything, they receive it from the will of God operating and containing and moving them. But nevertheless they move not according to the divine properties, because they cannot reach those: but according to their own proper properties and forms and quantities, and it was lawful for the philosophers to seek those, just as it still is. And Augustine speaks here of certain philosophers who excluded the will of God from the works of nature, saying that he can only move the first mobile thing whatever it may be, while other things are moved in various ways according to their distance from him: and those who followed vanity, passed into vanity, and their foolish heart was darkened, just as Cicero, who denies that there is foreknowledge, so that he may establish chance and fortune and the republic; and the Commentator [Averroes] on the Physics and Metaphysics, who denies that God immediately operates in everything, so that he may establish for each its proper action according to the proper nature it has.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 9 — Whether the Will of Good Pleasure Is Multiple, as the Will of Sign

Is the will of good pleasure multiplex, just as the will of sign?

A doubt arises concerning the first, whether the will of good pleasure is multiplex, just as the will of sign?

It seems that it is, because: § 1. Will is distinguished according to willed objects: but God wills many things by the will of good pleasure, because he wills all the good things that are done: therefore it seems that it itself is multiplex.

§ 2. Again, in the text we have that it is good, and well-pleasing, and perfect. These three differences, however, do not belong to it except according to that which is referred to diverse willed objects: therefore it seems that it itself is multiplex.

§ 3. Again, the knowledge of God is distinguished according to the modes of knowable things, so that some is called simple knowledge, and some of good pleasure, and some absolute foreknowledge: therefore it seems that the will of good pleasure also receives such a distinction.

Solution. To this it must be said that this will receives a multiplicity, as the Master distinguishes in the text. And this is the cause: because on its own part it has but one thing, which is the divine substance: and on the part of all willed things there is one end, which he wills in all things, and this is God himself and his goodness and justice. From other things, however, it has neither unity nor multiplicity, because they are outside it: and it does not depend on them, but rather the reverse.

And through this the solution to the first is clear, which proceeds concerning a will whose end is the willed object, and which depends on the willed object as upon an end and cause.

To the next it must be said that these are said of the divine will according to its effect: because, namely, it makes approved the good of the precept, and the well-pleasing of counsel, and the perfect of supererogation: or because it quiets our will in his own according to the conjunction of the good, and according to the property of the good which is the sweetness of fruible goodness: in which the delighted will rests: and this is the well-pleasing, because the well-pleasing is that in which the will is fed and satiated in the conjunction of all goods: for this is perfect, in which nothing is lacking.

To the next it must be said that it is not similar concerning knowledge: because knowledge respects things according to the order and distinction of good and evil, in which it is: but the will is referred to things in one way, namely under the ratio of the good, because it is the cause of things, not caused by things.

Divisio Textus

DIVISION OF THE TEXT,

Sometimes indeed according to a certain figure of speech, etc.

This part which is about the will of the sign has four parts. In the first, he sets forth signs in general. In the second, he discusses three together, at the place, H, however I believe. In the third, about precept and prohibition, etc., two together, at the place, L, also permission. In the fourth and last, he sets forth almost an epilogue, at the place, M, therefore what has been set forth above, etc.

Articulus 10 — Whether the Divine Will Is Mutable

Is the divine will mutable?

Then it is asked concerning what the Master says, there, F: It neither receives multiplicity, nor mutability, etc.

For it seems to be mutable: because § 1. Gregory says on that verse of Isaiah 38:1: Give charge concerning your house: that the Lord changes his sentence, and not his counsel. But the sentence is expressive of the will: therefore he changes his will.

§ 2. Again, at least the will of sign seems to be mutable: because sometimes he commanded something, which he afterwards revoked; and he said something, which he revoked: as is plain in Abraham, and Nineveh, and Hezekiah.

§ 3. Again, he willed Caesar to be at sometime, and now he does not will it: therefore the will is changed.

§ 4. Again, he did not from eternity will the world to be, but to be going to be [fore]. But now he wills the world to be, but not to be going to be [fore]: therefore the will is changed, as it seems.

§ 5. Again, the will has a relation to the willed object: therefore when the willed object is changed the will is changed, because when one of the relatives is changed, the other is also changed.

ON THE CONTRARY: The Master said above in the text that the will is not spoken of relatively. Similarly it was held that it does not depend on the willed object, but conversely: therefore it is neither multiplied, nor mutated by willed objects.

Solution. It must be said that no will of God is mutable, neither the will of good pleasure, nor the will of sign: for although the will of sign is granted to be multiplex from the multiplicity of things signified (because multiplicity can be attributed to God through a cause, but not mutability, because it sounds of infirmity and impotence which God neither has in himself, nor has as a cause: but it falls in from the defect of creatures).

To the first, therefore, it must be said that Gregory calls the sentence a prophetic enunciation, which concerns inferior causes, and is enunciated through a respect to them: and because those are mutable, that sentence is also mutated, but not the counsel, because the counsel is the eternal disposition concerning things to be done.

To the next it must be said that the will of sign is immutable: because the will of God is always signified in one way, although the thing signified is varied, because the will is not always concerning it. But whether even then the sign is false, or not, will be determined below.

To the next it must be said that just as the Master said above concerning knowledge, that it is the same with respect to past, present, and future things, provided that it is the same knowable object: so it must be said here, that the same willed object is that Caesar is, and that Caesar was. But for Caesar to be in the past, and for Caesar to be again now, would not be the same will: and the reason for this was assigned twice above.

To the next it must be said in the same way: because the will that the world is going to be, and is now, is the same: but on the part of the willed object a diverse time has approached.

To the next it must be said that the will speaks of a respect to the willed object, as the objection proves: nevertheless, according to the things said above, this respect does not posit a real relation added to the divine essence: but it posits a real one in the thing, and according to a ratio of understanding in God: and this is what the Master understood above, when he said that the will is not spoken of relatively.

Articulus 11 — Whether There Are Only Five Signs of the Divine Will

Whether there are only five signs of the divine will?

A doubt arises concerning the first part about these signs:

§4. For these signs signify that that concerning which they are, is the will of good pleasure. However, since frequently it is not so, these signs seem to be false and deceptive.

§2. Likewise, they seem to be more than five: just as there is good and better, so there is evil and worse: therefore, just as with respect to good we have a precept and counsel which is of the better, so with respect to evil we ought to have a prohibition and dissuasion of the lesser evil, which is venial.

§3. Likewise, Dionysius says that good is from one whole and sole cause, but evil is in every way from the corruption of any circumstance: therefore, evil is of greater division than good: but we have three with respect to good, namely precept, counsel, and operation: therefore, we ought to have more than three with respect to evil: and thus again there will be more than five.

§4. Likewise, between good and evil there is an indifferent medium: therefore, it seems, since this often happens, that with respect to that there ought to be some sign of the will.

§5. Likewise, the vain and idle are not properly evils: therefore, they ought to have a special sign.

§6. On the contrary, it seems that they ought to be fewer: for fulfillment and permission regard all things, whatever are done, evil and good: therefore, those suffice, as it seems.

§7. Likewise, when he dealt with wisdom, he did not give a sign of wisdom, nor signs of power when he dealt with power: therefore, neither ought he to have given signs of the will.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that these signs do not signify that the will of God is always concerning that about which the signs are set: but either concerning this, or something about this: and this especially in permission: and therefore they are not false signs: because from the very malice, which is done with God permitting, it is determined that that is not subject to the will per se, but by occasion, inasmuch as some good is occasioned from it. But in others, the sign is that the will is concerning the same thing about which there is a sign, although sometimes it is not concerning the same: and thus then again it does not fail, because it does not deceive: for God then wills our will to be concerning that which is signified, until by another sign revealing the will of God, it is revoked, as was done in Abraham.

To the other it must be said, that although there is good and better, and evil and worse, yet evil of itself signifies that which all ought to flee from by intention, and if it happens, to amend: and therefore it regards a common prohibition made to all. But it is true, that in that mortal evil is prohibited directly, but venial evil indirectly: but good according to its differences does not so commonly regard all: and therefore it has different signs on account of different states.

To the other it must be said, that evil is of a broader division by way of corruption: because it is generated from the corruptions of many, for any corrupted circumstance induces evil: but good requires the integrity of all together. But because for the diversity of states good is of a broader division, and according to this the signs are multiplied, because evil in whatever way it is done, regards only one state which is to be fled from, but not so good.

To the other it must be said, that the indifferent as such is not among those concerning which there is a sign, except of operation: because signs are given according to the differences of those things which corrupt or order in morals and grace.

To the other it must be said, that the vain and idle are reduced to evil prohibited indirectly.

To the other it must be said, that science in its object does not regard diverse reasons, because in all there is one reason of the true. Similarly, neither does power in its own: because it could only be a possible being: but it is not so with respect to good of which there is goodness, because there are differences of good with respect to different states: and there are also corruptions of good, which ought to be prohibited from happening: and if they happen, they ought to be ordered so that they are not disgraceful.

But if it is asked, By what are these signs taken?

It can be said, that on the part of the signified they can be taken thus: because either the sign is good, or evil. If good: either it has a sign with respect to its being done in the future, or with respect to itself in the present. If in the first way: either it is that to which all are bound, and then it is counsel. But if it is in the second way: then it is operation, because God works all our works in us, as it is said, Isaiah 26:12. But if it is with respect to evil: either future, and then it is prohibition: or present, and then it is permission.

On the part of the rational creature to whom these signs are given, they are taken in this way. The sign is either with respect to the detestable, or with respect to the desirable. If with respect to the detestable: either that it may not be done, or of what is done. In the first way it is prohibition, in the second way permission. If with respect to the desirable: either that it may be done, or of what is done. If that it may be done: either according to the state of perfection, and thus it is counsel: or according to the common state, and then it is precept. If with respect to what is done, then it is operation. And these five are contained in this verse:

He commands, and prohibits, permits, counsels, fulfills.

Articulus 12 — Whether There Is Counsel in God

Whether there is counsel in God?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, H, "Therefore, however, precept," etc.

For it seems that counsel is not present in God: because Damascene says that counsel is of the ignorant; but God is ignorant of nothing.

Solution. To which it must be said that "I counsel" is said from "I give counsel" and "I seek counsel." In the first way, it signifies an abundance of counsel, and thus it pertains to God: and then the counsel of God is the predetermination of certain better goods, so that appetite may arise in those. However, counsel taken in the second way is of the ignorant: and in this way, it does not pertain to God, and Damascene speaks of this.

Exposition of the Text

Then it is asked concerning what he says there, "Either by allowing them to happen, or by doing them himself." For from this it seems that there are only these two signs: because, as he says here, these encompass all things that happen.

And it must be said to this, that it follows well if a sign were given only with respect to the present deed, but it is also given with respect to the future: and then the other three also have a place.

Articulus 13 — Whether God Rightly Commanded Abraham To Sacrifice His Son

Whether God rightly commanded Abraham to sacrifice his son?

Then it is questioned concerning this which is said there, "He commanded Abraham to sacrifice his son, yet did not will it," etc.

1. For it seems that He ought not to have commanded it.

Likewise, why did He test him? For it is evident that the Lord Himself well knew how great was the virtue of Abraham: hence it was not necessary to test him for His own sake.

1. Likewise, it seems that Abraham was not bound to obey Him, because He commanded him against Himself. For Augustine says that God cannot act against the seminal reasons which He implanted in prime matter, because otherwise He would act against Himself: therefore, much less can He act against the reasons of natural law, which He implanted in the human heart: but natural law says that an innocent son should be spared: therefore, against this he ought to have believed nothing, but rather to have thought that it was an angel of Satan transformed into an angel of light.

If you say that He who established it dispensed it: this is nothing, because if He first implanted it well, then there was no reason for dispensation afterwards: but if He implanted it badly, then by believing the natural law in the human heart, He erred, which is inconvenient.

Likewise, Augustine wills, and also the Philosopher, that certain things are so conjoined with evil that they cannot be done well: and among these is to kill the innocent, and especially an innocent son: therefore it seems that Abraham ought in no way to have believed that this was from a good God, and thus he ought not to have obeyed.

Likewise, God did not will this, as was evident from the outcome: therefore, if he had obeyed, he would not have done the will of God: therefore he would have sinned: to what end then did He command it?

Solution. Some say here that God commanded the son to be offered, but not to be killed: and this could well be done, with the natural law preserved. But this is nothing: because it is read that he carried fire and a sword in his hands. Hence it is evident that he intended to kill, as is sufficiently held from the text. And therefore it must be said here as concerning the taking of the goods of the Egyptians against the will of their owners, and the taking of the harlot by Hosea according to blessed Bernard in the book on the Dispensation of the precept and rule, that evils by the power of God are separable from evil ends, and conjoinable to good ends, as this, namely that Abraham wished to kill his son by command as a sign of the future redemption to be made by the killing and sacrifice of Christ, in which the whole Christ is offered, but the human nature only signified by the ram is killed, and the divine as Isaac is freed: and in the harlot of Hosea, in which lust is not intended, but the dismissal of the Synagogue and the calling of the Gentiles is signified: and the taking of the vessels of Egypt in the figure of the despoiling of the sciences and virtues of the world in the service of Christ: and then those things can be commanded by God alone, to whom such separation of ends and conjunction is possible.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that God commanded this to show him as tested to Himself, so that he might presume more of himself, which is good for the humble, and to show others an example of obedience.

To the other it must be said that such things are of the precept of natural law, conjoined to their ends: but separated from others, and conjoined to others, they are not: and then God does nothing against the reason which He implanted: for they are not against it, but are conjoined to others: for to offer a son to killing, so that future liberation may be shown through the killing, is not against natural law.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

DISTINCTIO XLVI

Divisio Textus

Here arises a question. For it has been said, etc. Here the Master raises doubts concerning the determinations in the preceding distinction. And it is divided into two parts. In the first, he objects concerning the will of good pleasure, proving that sometimes it does not have effect. In the second, he introduces two opinions on this matter, whether it is good for evil to occur, or not? And this begins there, D, Therefore since it is established that all good things which happen, etc.

In the first part there are three chapters: in the first of which he introduces authorities in which there seems to be an objection against what was previously determined. In the second, he determines one authority taken from the Gospel. And in the third, he determines another introduced by the Apostle.

Divisio Textus

And therefore, since it is established that all good things that happen, etc.

Here begins the second part, and it is divided into two parts. In the first, the Master raises a question and follows one opinion responding to it, namely, of those saying it is good that evils happen, and good that evils exist, and that God wills evils to happen and evils to exist, but does not will evils. In the second, however, he presents another opinion to which he himself seems to consent, because he pursues it more extensively: and it is also more wholesome and sound, there, F, Those indeed who say, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether the Will of Good Pleasure in God Can Be Impeded by Anything

Whether the will of good pleasure in God can be hindered by anything?

A doubt arises here, whether the will of good pleasure can be hindered by the things that have been said?

It seems that it cannot: because
1. He has done all things whatsoever He willed. Likewise, who resists His will?

1. Likewise, by reason, the will of God is the cause of the willed, as was previously held; therefore, since it is not a contingent cause, but a necessary one, it cannot be changed: therefore, neither can it be hindered.
2. Likewise, foreknowledge which is with respect to evil does not have causality towards it, yet by necessity of consequence it cannot be deceived in that which is foreknown: therefore, much less the will of good pleasure, which is the predetermined cause of the willed.

1. But on the contrary is what is objected in the Letter, that He wills all men to be saved: yet not every man is saved.
2. Likewise, the will of itself is towards opposites: therefore, it seems that it is not the necessary cause of anything.

Solution. And it must be said that the solutions of the Master concerning the authorities introduced revert to two modes, one of which is that when it is said: As often as I willed, that is, as often as I willed to gather your children, that is, some of your children, so often your will did not consent to me, but nevertheless could not hinder. The other concerning the Apostle: Who wills all men to be saved, etc., that is, all who are saved, are saved by His will, and against it or without it, none.

Another solution of this second authority is that it is a suitable distribution for the genera of individuals, and not for the individuals of genera: because He wills some to be saved from all, namely from the circumcision, from the uncircumcision, from the prelates, from the subjects, from the rich, from the poor, etc.

But because these solutions seem to leave that the whole salvation depends on the will of God, and nothing on our will by consenting and cooperating, therefore it seems more to be said with John Damascene, that God wills with antecedent will, and not consequent: and both are the will of good pleasure. But when it is said antecedent will, it is understood as the will which is the divine essence, connoting effects ordered to salvation on the part of nature and grace: as is the bestowal of rational nature which could recognize the good, and seek the recognized, and find the sought from the largesse of the highest good, and adhere to the found: such an order of salvation is in all men. Similarly, on the part of grace, the mission of the Redeemer, the payment of the price for all as to sufficiency, the establishment of laws ordering life: for he who ordained these, willed all men to be saved: and this is called antecedent, because it precedes in these both our consent and our work.

But another is consequent which is of the willed ordered to our work, as the will of retribution whether for good or for evil: and by this He does not will all to be saved, because it would be contrary to justice: and therefore Damascene says that this second depends on our cause.

Our masters of the time say the same with Damascene in two other ways. Some thus, that God wills every man to be saved as to Himself, but not as to the present or future deeds of man from eternity: and this returns to the same. Others say the same with more subtle words, namely that there is a double will, namely absolute which is simply and absolutely compared to the willed which is willed per se and not through another: for just as then the knowledge of God is compared to every truth, and power to every possible being by the power of the efficient, so the will per se will be of every good and not unless of good: and in this way He wills every man to be saved. There is another will depending on the foreknowledge of merits, not as from a cause, but as from a concomitant reason, as we said above: and by this He does not will every man to be saved: and this also returns to the same.

To that therefore which is objected by reason, it must be said as above, that the will of God does not have the necessity of coercion, but of immutability from the order of cause to the caused, that is, of will to the willed: and this does not take away freedom from it, but rather confirms it, as has often been explained above.

Articulus 2 — Whether It Is Good That Evils Be Done or That Evils Be

Is it good that evils happen or that evils exist?

Here arises a doubt concerning the question itself, Whether it is good that evils happen or that evils exist?

And it seems that it is so. 1. By many authorities which lie in the Letter.

Likewise, Boethius in Book V of the Consolation of Philosophy: The divine power is good, therefore if to God all evils are good: evil is good, it simply seems that evil is good: therefore it is good that it happens.

1. Likewise, Augustine in the book of Confessions: You, Lord, to whom nothing is evil, nor to your entire creation: because there is nothing outside you that can break or corrupt the order you have established. Evil is not evil to God, and it is not evil to the entire creation: for since it is outside God, it cannot break the order God has established: and since He is the best, nothing can corrupt the best, but rather adorns it: because it makes goods more commendable: therefore since it harms nothing, and contributes adornment, as is held from these words, it is good that evil happens.

2. Likewise, Apocalypse 22:14: He who is filthy, let him be filthy still: the Gloss says: Because it could be objected that it would be evil to prophesy to the wicked, since they would be punished more severely from it: it is said to him not to cease for this reason: because it is just that he who is filthy, let him be filthy still. But what is just, as Augustine says, is good: therefore it seems that it is good that evil happens.
3. Likewise, it is good in every way to punish guilt, because in this the beauty of divine justice results: but guilt is a certain punishment: therefore it is good that guilt happens, and that evil happens. Whence Augustine in the book of Confessions: You have commanded, Lord, and it is so, that every disordered appetite is a punishment to itself. It is placed in the Book of Sentences in the Letter, that between the first apostasy and the last sin, all sins are guilt and punishment: since punishment is good, it seems that it is good that all those sins happen.
4. Likewise, every ordered thing is good to be and to happen: evil is ordered, as is held in the Letter by Augustine in the Enchiridion: therefore it is good that evil happens and exists.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. It is not good to happen: what does not happen from the best, as from a cause and author: but evil does not happen from the best as from a cause and author: therefore it is not good that evil happens.

1. Likewise, evil is the corruption of good: but nothing corrupting good is good to happen: therefore as before.
2. Likewise, every active infers its passive, and conversely: therefore if it is good that evil happens, it is good to do evil: and this is against the Apostle saying: Let us not do evil that good may come: whose damnation is just.
3. Likewise, it is not evil for good to happen: therefore it is not good for evil to happen.
4. Likewise, what is evil, its generation is evil, as Boethius wants in the Topics: therefore for evil to happen is evil: therefore not good.
5. Likewise, every moral good is principally good from the end: but evil is the corruption of the end: therefore for it to happen is evil: therefore not good.
6. Likewise, evil in deeds is only from happening, because this is the cause of evil in the soul, because from an evil act a bad disposition and bad habit and guilt remain: therefore if it is good that evil happens, all things that follow from evil happening will necessarily be good: which is absurd.

Solution. It must be said that the Master introduces two opinions: of which the first is false in my judgment, but the second is true. For I think that this is absolutely false, it is good that evil happens or exists: and this similarly, God wills that evil happens or exists: because it is converted with the other: for if God wills every good, and whatever He wills, is only good: if it is good that evil happens, God wills that evil happens, and conversely. But if it is determined thus, that evil happening is an occasion for good, for which reason evil is permitted to happen: then it will be true: or, as Jerome will say below, that evil happening is some good, as the evil of Judas benefited us, not insofar as it is evil, but insofar as it is an occasion: then it can be conceded with such an added determination. But speaking absolutely, I think that all are false, as the second opinion says: and if such propositions are found absolutely posited by the Saints, I say that they must be understood with determination.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that evil in itself is good for the divine virtue: for this is determined: because in it is shown in what it is good: and that good is not placed in evil happening as in a subject, but only as in an occasion, and in the divine virtue, as in a subject: because it makes the virtue shine, as in Pharaoh: for it is necessary that everything that opposes the divine virtue also serves it, as Gregory says. For when he does not want to do the will of God freely, it is necessary that he be subjected by force to the punishing justice.

To the other, it must be said that it is understood in the same way: because to God it is not evil what He does, but an occasion of the good of the beauty of justice: but Boethius places only one occasion of good: Augustine, however, places three: for one good is occasioned which is the beauty of justice: as from robbery the beauty of the judge's justice is occasioned, while the thief appears on the gallows. Augustine touches upon another comparison of occasion, when he says that even to the entire creation it is not evil. Because it is an occasion of double good, namely because it shows goods more commendable, because contraries placed next to each other shine more. And it is also an occasion of utility: and this still in two ways, namely in the one doing evil, but after the deed, and not when it is done: as one who is negligent, and from the sin perpetrated is pricked, and becomes fervent and humble. And secondly, in others: and this in many ways: for some are made cautious from the fall of this one, as Horace says: For your matter is at stake when the neighbor's wall is on fire.

Some, however, are made merciful, compassionate to him, and praying for him. Some, however, by the tedium of life which is mixed with so many evils, sigh for the eternal: as Psalm 119:5 says: Woe is me, that my sojourning is prolonged! I have dwelt with the inhabitants of Cedar, that is, with sinners. Some, however, are moved to zeal, as Psalm 73:3 says: I was envious of the wicked, seeing the peace of sinners. The patience of some is also exercised, and virtue is tested: as through tyrants martyrs are tested. And in other ways also which are easy to find. Although it is good that these happen, it is not good that evil happens, because it is not the cause of these, but only the occasion.

To the other, it must be said that that from Apocalypse 22:11 is difficult to solve: but as far as I can understand, justice is twofold, namely retribution for merits: and thus it is not just that he who is filthy, let him be filthy still: just as it is not just that he who steals, let him steal still: but it is just that he be hanged, and he be condemned. Another justice, however, is from the congruence of negligence: so that because God gave time for repentance, and he negligently delays to convert to the Lord, it is just that he be abandoned by God: from which it follows that he who is filthy, let him be filthy still. And therefore I do not think that what is said, it is just, notes the order of becoming filthy, and still being in filth, except through a medium: for the immediate order is noted to be abandoned by God: from which it further follows that he is overcome by sins, and becomes filthy still: and thus also from the justice which is from the congruence of negligence, it does not follow except accidentally. But if it is still conceded that it is just, it does not further follow that it is good: because good does not denote such an order as just: for just regards the general order of guilt to punishment, and restitution to merit: but good denotes the perfection which is from the end absolutely. Nor is it valid, everything that is done justly, is done well: and everything that is just, is good, and that is done justly, and is just: therefore it is done well, and is good: because when I say, that it is done justly, it is done well, there justice is placed in the ordaining, and similarly goodness: and when it is said, that it is just, it is good, it is understood in that which is of this kind, that is, according to the relation to the ordaining: but when it is said, this happening is just, just is not placed around this except accidentally and externally: and therefore it does not follow that it is good except with determination, as was said before.

To the other, it must be said that sin in that it is sin, is not punishment: whence sin has a double comparison to free will, namely as it is free turned away from the unchangeable good by its own will, and thus sin and evil proceed from it. It is also compared to it as it is bound and drawn by the necessity of concupiscence and the fomes and custom and induced evil habit: and thus in some way it is a punishment following sin: and this is not to be punishment simply, which is inflicted by God or which simply orders guilt, but only in a certain respect, namely justice which is from the congruence of negligence of conversion, as was said above: and this seems to be what Gregory intends when it is said, Sin which is not erased by repentance, by its weight soon draws to another.

To the last, it must be said that evil is ordered: but the good of that order is not placed in it, but rather in another: and therefore it does not follow that by the goodness of the order it is good to be or to happen, but rather, that some good of the order is elicited in another outside it from its happening or being.

Articulus 3 — In What This Goodness Is Placed When It Is Said, "It Is Good That Evil Be Done"; And, Whether It Is Good To Do Evil; And, Whether It Can Be Conceded, "It Is Good That Malice Be Done"

In which this goodness is posited, when it is said, Is it good for evil to happen? and, Is it good to do evil? and, Can it be conceded, It is good for malice to happen?

Then it is asked concerning what they say and concede, there, H, For those who say that God wills evils to be or to happen, etc.

And two things are asked according to these: of which the first is, In which this goodness is posited, when it is said, It is good for evil to happen?

The second, however, is, Into what as into the willed does the will pass, when it is said, God wills evil to happen or to be.

Concerning the first, it proceeds thus: Every note of composition notes the inherence of the predicate to the subject: therefore, when it is said, It is good for evil to happen, it is noted that good inherently is to that which is evil to happen: however, it is evident that it does not inhere as a form in the subject, nor essentially, nor even accidentally, nor as the same: therefore it does not inhere: therefore that expression is false.

However, if you perhaps say that that good is posited to inhere in the doer: this is nothing: because the doer of evil by the very fact that he does it, becomes evil: therefore good through evil happening is not posited in him. However, if it is said that it is in him to whom evil is done: this is not general in every evil, as in fornication, for there both the agent and the patient become evil: therefore it would not be generally true according to this opinion, that it is good for evil to happen.

Likewise, it is further asked according to this opinion, Whether it is to be conceded, that it is good to do evil? by this that the passive infers its active, and conversely.

Likewise, Whether it is conceded, that it is good for malice to happen? For it is evident and in the letter of the preceding chapter it is held, that neither is conceded, that it is good for evil to be, or that God wills evil.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that according to this opinion goodness is predicated of evil happening, or of evil being, not according to inherence, but by occasion: because every other in-

The understanding of this opinion seems to me false. And then it must be noted that a cause per se has influence over a cause or causality. However, a cause per accidens causes in some way, although not per se. As it is said, Polycletus is per accidens the cause of the statue, or a white man is the cause of the statue, if the sculptor is called Polycletus and is white. But occasion is a medium between a cause per accidens and chance and fortune. For chance does not have causality, although it happens to reach an end: as a horse leaving a house which is later burned is saved by chance, and would not be saved unless it left. However, occasion does not have causality of itself, but per accidens it becomes some cause, not per accidens that it is inherent in it, but that it is compared to something else. And therefore it is less direct than a cause per accidens, because that causes per accidens what is inherent in it, which it makes. However, it is more than chance, because there is an intention towards the good in the one ordering and in the one who turns it into good: whence that good is placed as in a subject in the one to whom it is ordered in the occasion of good: and this according to act sometimes: and sometimes according to potency, as when no one is conscious of evil: but sometimes potency is placed in the maker from the order of the preceding state to the subsequent, as we said before. Hence when it is said, "Good is to make evil," the sense is, to make evil is or can be the occasion of some good according to the order to another who uses evil for good.

To the other it must be said that that opinion would not concede this, "Good is to do evil," because to do does not imply a comparison except to the doer: and in that no good is occasioned, but rather evil.

To the other it must be said that this would be even less conceded by this opinion, "Good is for malice to be done," because malice only implies privation: and this of itself is not ordainable, but by the grace of the subject it is passively and not actively ordered.

Articulus 4 — Into What, as into the Willed Object, Is the Will Noted To Pass, When It Is Said, "God Wills Evil To Be Done or To Be"

In what way is the will noted to pass over into the willed, when it is said, God wills evil to be done or to exist?

Secondly, it is asked, In what way is the will noted to pass over into the willed, when it is said, God wills evil to be done or to exist?

It seems, however, that it passes over malice: 1. For every will passes over into the willed: but when it is said, God wills evil to be done, this willed is referred to the will by reason of that which is evil. Therefore, evil is the reason of the will, because every willed is the reason of the will willing it.

1. Likewise, when one thing is willed by someone, the willed or its conjunction becomes convertible by necessity, unless the will is foolish. But evil being done is conjoined with doing evil, and with malice inseparably: therefore, if the will is wise and choosing, it will pass over one, it will also pass over the other. And it does not avail, it seems, if you wish to insist, by saying that words pertaining to the act of the soul are indeed of one, and not of the other, although they are conjoined: because that will does not proceed to the willed, but it is that of which Aristotle says in the book of the Ethics, that even of impossibilities there is a will: and this by some is more accustomed to be called velleity than will.

2. Likewise, Augustine says, and this authority is placed here, that it is good for evil to be done: and this God wills, because otherwise He would not permit it.

If perhaps you say that God permits: and this is by the will of sign, and not of good pleasure. On the contrary: Neither beyond the will of good pleasure, nor against it, is anything done: because nothing is done, as Augustine says, which does not proceed from the inner court of the highest Emperor: therefore it seems that He wills it by the will of good pleasure.

1. Likewise, when I say thus: God permits, this word, permits, predicates the divine essence as willing: therefore it predicates the divine will which is God: therefore the will of good pleasure: and thus by the will of good pleasure He wills all that He permits: therefore the will of God seems to pass over malice, as over the willed.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Evil, in that it is evil, does not move, nor can it move any will: because every willed is either good, or an apparent good: therefore much less will it move the divine will.

1. Likewise, God hates evil, and evil displeases God, and God punishes evil: but no one wills that which he hates, and which displeases, and which he punishes: therefore God does not will evil to be done.
2. Likewise, Ezekiel 18:23: I do not will the death of the sinner. And he speaks of the death of sin: therefore He does not will evil to be done: because this is the death of the sinner.
3. Likewise, God is the author of that which He wills: if therefore He wills evil to be done, He Himself is the author of evil.
4. Likewise, Anselm says that the power of doing evil is neither freedom nor a part of freedom: therefore it is of ignobility: therefore much more the will of evil: therefore it is not to be attributed to God.

Solution. It must be said in my judgment that this is false, God wills evils to be done: and if it is found among the Saints, it must be determined thus, God wills the good which is elicited from the evil done, on account of which He permits evil to be done: and in this sense this opinion concedes, and otherwise, as I think, it is false.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the will of God does not pass over evil, as over the willed: because that expression is improper, and evil is not subjected to the will as evil, or as it is in being done per se, but as it is the occasion of the good elicited. And then still the will of good pleasure is not referred to it, but to that which is subjected, and to the occasion is referred the sign of the will which is permission.

To the other, it must be said that this is not true even in one wisely willing, unless that which is said to be willed is per se willed: but this is not here, as has already been said.

To the other, it must be said that when it is said, God permits this to be done, the divine essence is not predicated as will only, but also a relation to malice is noted: and therefore permission is not the will of good pleasure, because good pleasure does not posit a relation except to good: and therefore here (as we have said) in one is placed the sign, and in the other the will: for the sign is placed in the preceding, but the will in the consequent by occasion.

To the other, it must be said that those things which proceed from the intellectual court of the highest Emperor, from Him being in one way, do not proceed in one way according to themselves: and therefore with respect to some things there is permission, and with respect to others elicited from them there is will.

DIVISIO TEXTUS,

Those indeed who say by the will of God, etc.

Here begins the second opinion which is divided into three parts: in the first of which the arguments introduced by the preceding opinion are resolved. In the second, however, the reasoning proving this opinion to be true is set forth, there, K, If anyone therefore diligently, etc. In the third, he objects sophistically, and resolves, there, N, Now it has been sufficiently shown, that with God as author, etc.

However, in the first solution there are four chapters, of which the first is about the distinction of negative expressions with words expressing the will or non-will of God. The second, however, is about the solution of the words of Augustine. The third is about a certain distinction of good given by Jerome. The fourth, as a conclusion from the aforementioned, is about how and to whom evils are beneficial.

Articulus 5 — What Difference There Is Between These Propositions, To Be Unwilling For This, And Not To Will This, And To Will That This Not Be Done

What is the difference between these propositions: to not will this, and to not want this, and to will this not to happen?

For the understanding of the first chapter, it is asked what the difference is, according to this opinion, between to not will this, and to not want this, and to will this not to happen?

Likewise, it is asked whether all things that are said to happen, whether good, indifferent, or evil, proceed from the will, or are against the will of God according to this opinion?

And to this it must be said that when it is said, "I do not will," such that the negation is included by composition with the verb "I do not will," then it does not negate the will composed with it, but only refers to the willed object: whence the sense is, "I do not will this to happen," that is, "I will this not to happen." However, when the term "I do not will" has the declension "I do not will," "you do not will," "he does not will," etc., all that are declined from it have the same force. Whence when it is said, "he does not will this to happen," the expression is twofold, from the fact that the term "he does not will" can be in the force of the word, and then the will remains not negated, but the willed object: and it can be in the force of the sentence, and then the will is denied to be about this.

From this it is understood that these are equivalent: "I do not will this to happen," and "I will this not to happen," and one infers the other. However, these two: "he does not will this to happen," and "he wills this not to happen," relate as superior and inferior: because this, "he wills this not to happen," refers to this, "he does not will this to happen," but it is not converted, because this, "he does not will this to happen," has two senses of its truth, of which this, "he wills this not to happen," has only one. Therefore, this opinion says that God does not will evils to happen, according to which the term "does not will" is in the force of the sentence: and therefore it does not follow, if someone infers: therefore he wills evils not to happen, because he does not will that either: because if the will is denied of one, it is not for this reason affirmed of its opposite.

To the second question, therefore, it must be said that not all things that happen, happen with God not willing, or willing: but with willing or not willing, such that the term "not willing" is in the force of the sentence: and therefore this opinion is good, because it avoids all inconvenience.

Articulus 6 — Whether Evil Is Expedient For The Universe, And Contributes To The Completion Of The Universe

Whether evil is expedient for the universe, and contributes to the completion of the universe?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said in the third chapter of G, there, "God judged it better to make good from evils," etc.

For from this it seems to follow that evil is expedient for the universe, and contributes to the completion of the universe.

1. And this seems to be accepted here in Latéera in three expressed authorities: and a certain Gloss of Origen on that Numbers xxii, 20, where it is said, "God came to Balaam at night," etc., says thus: It is to be noted that the wisdom of God has disposed all things, so that nothing is idle, good or evil: yet He does not make malice, which, having been found by others, He does not prohibit, although He could prohibit it: however, He uses it for necessary causes: for through the wicked themselves in whom malice exists, He tests those who strive for glory: for if malice were destroyed, there would be nothing to oppose virtues: but virtue, if it had no contrary, would not shine forth.
2. Likewise, on the words of the Apostle, to the Romans viii, 28, the Gloss says that God uses the wills of men to incline them wherever He wills, whether to good or to evil.
3. Likewise, no good should be lacking to the universe: but the good of comparison of good to evil so that it may shine forth is a certain good: therefore it should not be lacking to the universe: but this cannot happen unless evil exists: therefore evil contributes to the completion of the universe.

ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Dionysius says that evil is disordered: therefore, since it does not make the good of order, it does not seem to contribute any good: for it would contribute the good of order if it contributed anything.

1. Likewise, the Philosopher says that white is unmixed with black: therefore, the whiter is more unmixed with black: therefore also the better will be that which is more unmixed with evil: and thus the universe will be better if there were no evil in it.
2. Likewise, since evil is the privation of good, it deprives the universe of some good, which would be present if evil did not exist: therefore, if evil did not exist, many goods would be in the universe, which now are not: and thus the universe is less good because evil exists, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said, as the Masters say, that some reason of good would be lacking to the universe if evil did not occur: and concerning this reason, it has already been said above: and thus they concede that it is good for evils to occur, because this is the occasion of some good.

To what is objected on the contrary, they say that it is not similar in good and in other privations: because the good that is taken away from one is conferred to another: and they bring forward for themselves that, "Take away from him the mina, and give it to him who has ten minas," and that, "Hold fast what you have, that no one may take your crown." And therefore nothing is lost of good in the universe, although it is lost in this one. Moreover, it is added from this, that evil is some reason of good: and therefore they say that it is good for evil to occur, and that it contributes to the completion and adornment in that it adds more reasons of usefulness or expediency, and the adornment of justice. But this solution either I do not understand, or it seems entirely false: because it is evident that the same in number which one loses, another does not receive, nor does the universe itself, but rather it perishes from the universe: the same in species and perhaps another had it before, and just as another could receive it. However, the reason of good which is elicited from evil by the reason of usefulness or expediency or the adornment of justice indeed has: but it seems strange to me if the good per se, and the good of joy, which would be in the universe of goods, could not compensate for that good of comparison which is elicited from evil: and therefore it seems to me that speaking per se evil does not contribute to anyone, nor to the universe: but it is true that it contributes to good to allow evils to occur: because if evils are not allowed to occur, then there is necessity for good, and then the reason of praiseworthy good and virtue would perish, and the reason of reward would perish: but allowing evil to occur does not posit on the part of God, except the free power of doing what He wills, which nevertheless can be inclined to evil: and this power is not evil, because even according to the Philosopher the power of the wicked is to be chosen.

To what is objected first by the sayings of the Saints, I say that they speak of evil, supposed, which is true, that with the universe mixed with goods and evils, nothing better could be made from evil than that it be ordered into good: and thus those things which are said in the Letter are understood, and that original Gloss.

To the other it must be said that all those things are true of evil already posited in being or occurring: but if it were not, the universe would be better than it is now.

To the other it must be said that still the good of comparison would remain according to the degree of good and better: and if that reason of good did not remain, then I say that a better one would remain, by which it would be compensated.

To the other it must be said that Dionysius says this by syllogizing to the inconvenient, and not by asserting: or if it is introduced assertively, then he speaks of the use of evil posited in being or occurring: and not of the comparison of the universe to being good in whole, and to being evil in some part of the universe.

Articulus 7 — With Respect To What The Division Of The Goods And Defects Which The Master Enumerates In The Text Is Taken

Upon what is based the division of goods and defects which the Master enumerates in the Text?

Then they inquire about what is said in the third chapter, there, "H, For there is something which is good in itself," etc.

Although this should be discussed more in the second book of the Sentences, where it deals with the differences of the good, yet it can be asked here,

Upon what is based this division of goods and defects which he enumerates here?

And it must be said that a moral act has a double comparison to the agent, namely, as to the intending agent and proportioning his work to the matter: and thus a good work proceeds both in itself and for the one doing it because of the intention, and because it is done by the agent proportioning to the due matter. But others arise from particular defects. For if it fails on the part of the intending agent, when the intention is to do a good work, and faith directs the intention, as Augustine says, that work will be good in itself, and for the one for whom it is done, but not for the agent. However, if it fails on the part of the matter proportioned to the work, then it will be good for the one doing it, and in itself, but not for the one for whom it is done. But if it is deficient in itself, then it fails for the agent who wills this badly and intends badly: yet a good occasioned from it is elicited.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

If anyone therefore, etc.

The Master here presents three reasons, confirming this opinion from the sayings of Augustine. The first is that God would be the source and author of evil: because He would be the author of something by which man becomes worse, who is His work. The second, which is placed in the second chapter L, is that evil is done by man in whom there is a deficient cause of evil, and not by God. The third, which is placed in the third chapter M, is that God cannot be the cause of tending towards non-being: but he who does evil tends towards non-being.

Articulus 8 — Whether A Good Can Come From Evil To Someone Doing Evil

Whether to someone doing evil, good can result from evil?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said in the fourth chapter, there, I, For to such, as Augustine says in the book On Correction and Grace, etc.

For from this it seems that to someone doing evil, good results from evil.

1. And this Damascene seems to say expressly, that sometimes the Lord permits a man to fall, so that coming to his senses afterwards, he may adhere to good more fervently and strongly.

2. Likewise, Augustine: I dare to say that it is useful for the proud to fall into some open sin, from which they may displease themselves who, already pleasing themselves, have fallen. This is also said here in the Letter, and it was said before this.

ON THE CONTRARY

1. Good is not evil to anyone: therefore evil is not good.

1. Likewise, Do not do evil, and it will not seize you.
2. Likewise, It would not be useful for a sheep to be thrown into the teeth of a wolf, so that afterwards it might flee its teeth more strongly: therefore by similarity, neither is that useful.

Solution. I say in my judgment, that the whole is understood concerning the utility of occasion, and not per se: and this utility appears more from the aftermath: and therefore then first is the occasion of good: and therefore when evil is together in the doer, there is no occasion, but from the aftermath, when it is in detestation: and thus I understand the authorities introduced.

Articulus 9 — Why God Permits Evil To Be Done, If He Is Not The Author Of Evil

Why does God permit evil to occur, if He is not the author of evil?

A doubt arises concerning the first point, Why does God permit evil to occur, if He is not the author of evil?

For either He permits it justly, or unjustly. Not unjustly: therefore justly. On the contrary: Therefore justice, either that which is the rendering according to merits, or that which is the fittingness of His goodness or will or power. Not in the first way: because that justice ought to inflict punishment for sin, not permit it to be added by sinning. Likewise, not in the second way: because no equity agrees with evil. Likewise, nor in the third: because in the opposite His goodness and beauty shine forth more.

1. Likewise, in the text it says this is a place from the lesser. A wise man does not do that by which his work becomes worse: therefore neither does God. And this is not true: because just as this place is from the lesser, a soldier can capture an army, therefore also a king, is by affirming: thus a place from the lesser according to Boethius infers only by affirming.
2. Furthermore, it seems false what it says. For wisdom is opposed to ignorance, not to knowledge: therefore a wise man can sin in himself and in his work.

Likewise, the Philosopher in the Ethics says, that there are some who, fleeing to reason, seek to philosophize and to be good, just as the sick who indeed listen attentively to doctors, but do nothing of what is to be done: and just as they will never have a well-cured body thus cured, so neither will they have a soul thus philosophizing: therefore Augustine supposes falsely in the process.

Likewise, the Philosopher says, that knowledge contributes little or nothing to virtue: therefore the wise can sin.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: Seneca proves, that disturbance does not fall upon the wise: because one is not disturbed except concerning virtue: and no one can take that away unless it wills itself: and then it will not be wise: therefore every wise person is perfect in virtue: therefore he does not do that by which his work becomes worse.

Solution. It must be said, that God permits evil to occur, with justice fitting to His equity and goodness: because if He did not allow it, the reason for praiseworthy and rewardable good would be removed, as was previously held.

To what is objected against, it must be said that from the opposite there would not be such fittingness: because the reason for praiseworthy virtue would perish, and goods would be done as if by necessity: and therefore that permission does not regard evil except accidentally, because not for itself, but for another, namely that it may be commendable.

To what is further inquired, it must be said that that reason is from the greater: but the thing from which it is inferred is lesser: and this is intended.

To another it must be said, that the wise is called from knowing, and objects hold concerning that: and the wise is called from the savor of practical and honorable things, and concerning this is understood the saying and reason of Seneca.

Divisio Textus

Now it has been sufficiently shown that evils do not occur with God as the author, etc. Here begins the last part, in which there are three chapters: in the first of which the Master presents a sophism, as is evident in the Letter. In the second, however, he responds, and in the third, he approves the second opinion among the opinions first introduced.

Articulus 10 — Whether One Doing Evil Tends Toward Non-Being

Whether the one doing evil tends towards non-being?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said in the following chapter, there, M, "Indeed, he who works evil tends towards non-being," etc.

1. For it seems according to this, that sometimes the one doing evil arrives at non-being: for nothing tends towards that to which it can in no way arrive.
2. Likewise, being is not opposed to evil: because the evil exist, and demons exist, and the good and the best (as Dionysius says), inasmuch as they are, desire to be, to live, and to understand. Therefore, it seems that the one who does evil does not tend towards non-being.
3. Likewise, if evil is said to tend towards non-being because it corrupts natural good: since natural good is finite, it seems that sometimes it can be so corrupted that nothing remains of it.

4. Likewise, it does not seem true what is said, that God is not the author of tending towards non-being: because it is said, Deuteronomy 32:39: "I will kill, and I will make to live": but whom he kills he makes tend towards non-being. Likewise, Jeremiah 10:24: "Correct me, O Lord, but in judgment, not in your anger, lest you reduce me to nothing." Therefore, it seems that he reduces something to nothing, and thus is the author of tending towards non-being.

Solution. The first part of this distinction is to be treated in the second Sentences, where a special treatise on this is placed. However, as pertains to the present treatise, it must be said that evil causes tending while it is intended: evil, however, is intended as privation, and not as habit: and therefore it is not intended by approach to something, but rather by recession from good: that recession, however, is infinite in the potentiality of removal and division from natural good, as will now be evident: and therefore it will never return to nothingness by the corruption of evil.

To the other, it must be said that there is a twofold being, namely the being of nature by which the nature itself is in itself: and this is not corrupted by evil of fault: but evil of punishment is contrary to it: because Augustine says that punishment is not evil, except because it is contrary to good nature. Another is the being of natural good: and this consists in the proportion of rational nature to grace, and consequently to glory: concerning which Boethius says in V of the Consolation of Philosophy, that being is that which retains order and preserves nature. And this evil corrupts: because evil is nothing other than the corruption and privation of that: and the worse it is, the more it causes distance from good: therefore it corrupts, because corruption is the habitual distance of order in good.

To the other, it must be said that natural good, although it is essentially finite, as every created essence, is nevertheless potentially infinite, just as every continuum is divisible into infinity, because no division divides it from the matter of being and the form of the continuum: and therefore it remains again divisible. Thus the good of nature, because no corruption removes the reason and form of natural good, but only makes it less proportionate to the good of grace and glory, and thus it always corrupts more.

To the other, it must be said that death is not determined to God as to a meritorious cause, but as to a judge inflicting it: but here it speaks of tending to evil by merit and the corruption of good: and in this way death is not the corruption of good, but rather the corruption of natural being, and by reason of punishment, not of evil of fault.

Articulus 11 — What Truth Is

What is truth?

By reason of the sophism considered, it is asked here about truth: first, What is it? Second, In how many ways is it said? Third, about its conversion with the good and being and one. Fourth, Whether it is eternal or not? Fifth, Whether it is simple and immutable?

Sixth and lastly, Whether all things are true by one and the first truth?

To the first, it can be objected thus: Anselm says in the book on Truth, that truth is rectitude perceptible only by the mind. Augustine in the book on True Religion, that the true is that which is. Hilary, however, says that the true is manifestative or declarative of being. Avicenna says in the first philosophy that truth is understood to be absolutely inherent in singulars, and is understood to be eternal, and is understood to be the disposition of speech and intellect which signifies the disposition in the external thing when it is equal to it. For we say, this expression is true, and this sentence is true. From this it is gathered that singulars have a certain truth, which is a thing, as Augustine says: according to which we also say, this is true gold, and this is a true donkey, and this is a true man: and that there is eternal truth, which is the necessity and cause of all truth: and that there is truth of speech according to which we say, this enunciation is true, or this enunciable is true: and that there is an adequation of things and intellects, as when we say, this intellect is true, referring this to the concept of the intellect about the thing as it is.

Therefore, inquiry is made about the first definition. 1. For rectitude is a passion of the continuous as form: but truth is intelligible: therefore it seems that the genus of rectitude does not belong to truth.

1. Likewise, the straight is that whose middle does not depart from the extremes: therefore it has extremes and a middle: therefore it has parts: but some truth is indivisible, like the first: therefore it seems that that definition does not generally apply.

Similarly, it is objected about the second.

1. The true is that which is: therefore from the conjugates, truth is the entity of the thing: therefore its being and what it is are the same: therefore it itself is what it has: and this belongs only to God: therefore all truth would be God, which is false: therefore the definition is null.
2. Likewise, being is that which is: and the true adds over being, because otherwise they would be synonymous: therefore the true is something more than that which is, as it seems.

Inquiry is also made about the third: For each thing is declared and manifested by that by which it is: but being is from essence as from a formal cause: therefore it seems that essence is declarative of being, and not truth or the true.

In the same way, it can be objected about that which Avicenna hints at in the last part of the authority introduced, that truth is the adequation of speech and what is said, or intellect and what is understood: for it sometimes happens that the sign is not adequate to the signified, as Anselm says, and yet there is truth in the sign.

Solution. It can be said that truth is taken in many ways, as will be clear in the following question: but Anselm defines truth according to its relation to the first truth: so that the first truth is said to be truth per se, while others are said to be truths by comparison to it: and then the rectitude of which Anselm speaks will be called the proportion or comparison of each thing to that which is in the first truth: but this inflexible rectitude is the first truth itself, which is always equal to that to which it is: and according to the descent from it, it is in others.

To what is objected, it must be said that it is a fallacy of equivocation: because the due of justice is also called rectitude, and many other things.

§ 1. To the other objection it must be said that the first truth is the principle, middle, and end: and these are the same in reality itself, although they differ in notion. And it is the principle according to the intellect of the powerful or power; the middle according to the notion of wisdom through the notion which is life and light; and the end through goodness: and all things that are true under it are called both right and true according to that respect in which their means (such as the ideated things) are more or less continued with their extremes, that is, with the principle from which they come forth through creation, and the end to which they are determined by the creator herself, who directs their order to herself. And this is what Anselm says, that each thing is true when it is in this and for this which is in the first truth; just as a measured thing is said to be truly measured when its principles, means, and ends are continued with the measuring thing.

§ 2. To another objection regarding Augustine's definition, it must be said that the entity of a thing, or that which is, is taken in two ways: either in itself, or as a supposed nature of some sort. And thus, as I think, it would not be well said that truth is the entity of a thing, or that the true is that which is. Entity is also taken according to the mode of determination to a species: and thus truth is the entity by which a thing truly is, and the true is that which truly is. But if entity is taken insofar as it is supposed by the name "entity," then in truth entity would be the first creature, according to what the Philosopher says, that the first of created things is being (esse), and nothing else is created before it; and "that which is" will be said to be that which has being (esse), which is the act of entity or essence thus understood. But if "that which is" is taken insofar as it implies some determination regarding being (esse), then it is not drawn to a species: and then it truly is, because each thing truly is when it is drawn to its proper species from a determinate nature, just as we say "true gold" and "true color" and "true body" and "true science." And this seems to be the meaning of "that which is": because that which is, is that which truly is in nature. And thus it is clear that truth and entity are not altogether the same. And this will be more evident below.

§ 3. To another objection it must be said that if the true is taken generally, insofar as it is convertible with being, it does not need to add any nature; but it adds some respect, and that suffices for them not to be synonyms.

§ 4. To another objection it must be said that that Philosopher considers the true only as it is caused by a thing, and therefore according to the Philosopher truth is not in a sign except according to a relation to the thing, nor even in the intellect: and therefore he says in book VI of the First Philosophy that one statement is false of another. Anselm, however, takes the truth which is in a sign from the proportion to the first truth, which it imitates as much as it can; and because that does not depend on a thing, it is therefore not changed when the thing changes. And this will be explained below.

§ 5. The previously held definitions are taken such that the first is given about truth which is said by priority and posteriority of created and uncreated truth. The second is given in comparison to a thing generally. The third in comparison to a thing related to the intellect by which it is apt to be known. The fourth is about the truth of complexes, which is in a sign, and the compounding intellect.

Articulus 12 — In How Many Ways Truth Is Said

In how many ways is truth spoken of?

Secondly it is asked, In how many ways is truth spoken of?

§ 6. Anselm seems to posit the truth of a sign, and the truth of a thing: and to divide the latter into the truth of a thing according to species, and the truth of actions, according to what is said in John 3:21: "He who does the truth comes to the light, that his works may be made manifest, because they are done in God." And of the devil, John 8:44: "He was a murderer from the beginning, and he stood not in the truth:... he is a liar, and the father thereof." But the truth of a sign is divided by him according to the division of signs, of which some are given, such as a voice, a circle, and monks' signs, and the like; and some are natural, as smoke is a sign of fire, and the like.

§ 7. Therefore it is asked, whether truth is said of all these modes univocally, or by priority and posteriority? And whether there are more modes than those enumerated?

§ 8. It seems, however, that it is by one notion. For the same divided thing, to which one notion applies according to all dividing parts, is said univocally of all those dividing parts; truth is such a divided thing; therefore it is said univocally of all of them. The first is proved by this, that to be said univocally is to be said by one name and notion. The second is written by Anselm, who says that it belongs to both created and uncreated truth to be a rectitude perceptible by the mind alone.

§ 9. But against this is what is commonly objected, that there is nothing univocally common to the created and the uncreated; but truth is created and uncreated; and created truth is not true in one way, but some as a sign, and some as a thing, and the like has other differences in being true; therefore truth is not univocal in all of them.

§ 10. Furthermore it is asked, whether truth is said in still more ways?

§ 11. It seems that it is: because we speak of the truth of human nature, which does not seem to be included [in the preceding list]; therefore there are multiple truths.

§ 12. SOLUTION. It must be said according to the Philosopher in books IV and VI of the First Philosophy that in all things said by analogy, there is always one thing supposed, which is said primarily and per se to be that analogical thing, and afterwards all other modes are taken according to a proportion to its notion. For example, "healthy" is said according to analogy of an animal, and urine, and food, and medicine: therefore "healthy" is supposed to be said properly and primarily and per se of an animal, but in all other things according to a proportion to something else: hence the health which is in an animal is in a certain way the same as the health which is in urine, and food, and in others: but it is in an animal as a form of the equality of humors; whereas in urine it is as indicative, not of being in the urine, but of being in the animal whose urine it is. Behold, the health which is in the animal and the urine is numerically the same: and so it is of the others. But this is true, that this proportion is analogically diversified on the part of the things proportioned to that one thing: because the notion of indicating in urine, and the notion of preserving in food, and the notion of causing in medicine, are not one notion, but they are compared to one numerically: and therefore they are united in it, and denominated by it, because it is the end. And the same is in all other things said analogically, although it appears less in some. Thus therefore Anselm means to say that there is one rectitude supposed per se and primarily, which is never bent from the extremes: and in all others there is a rectitude imitating this as much as it can, in that it rightly does what it ought, equating by a certain mental extension the means of its rectitude with the principle from which it is, and the end for which it is: and this is found in a thing when it is what it ought to be, and in an action when it does what it ought, and in a sign when it does what it ought, and so of others.

§ 13. To the objection that it is said by one notion, it must be said that it is said by one notion according to analogy, and not one in genus and species. Nor is it sufficient for some divided common thing to be said univocally of its dividing parts that it be said by one notion taken in any way whatever: but it is necessary that it be one, as of one genus, or of one species.

§ 14. Are there more truths than those mentioned by Anselm? It can be said that all can be reduced to those. Because the truth which is in virtue is reduced to the truth of action, according to what the Philosopher says, that regarding the true which is in words and deeds, the mean indeed is a virtue: but the doing which is toward the greater is pride, and he who has it is called proud: but that which is toward the lesser is irony or derision. And according to what we call the truth of human nature to be, which belongs to the nature of man, whether he is on the way or in the homeland after the resurrection: that too is reduced to the truth of a thing from its nature and form.

§ 15. And note that although Augustine says in the book On True Religion that the false is what imitates something and does not perfect it, nevertheless it is not properly called false except in opposition to the truth of a sign. For the false, the vain, the mixed, the unstable, and the undue are opposed to the true said in manifold ways. For instance, to the true in an enunciation the false is opposed according to what Aristotle says, that the false is what is not compounded, or is impossible to be compounded, as a contingent false, and an impossible false; and according to what we say, that an imagination is false, or the common sense, or a definitive statement, when it signifies otherwise than it is in reality. But the vain is opposed to the truth which is in words and deeds pertaining to life: and thus we say that vain is what imitates something and does not perfect it: and Augustine calls it false, just as we call a false coin what imitates a true one and does not complete it, and the like. But the mixed is opposed to the true which is true in species: as we say false gold, which is mixed with another metal, although it is not properly called false, but mixed. Unstable, as we say the before and after are not the truth of time, but the "now" itself, because the before and after do not remain, whereas the "now" remains one in the whole motion: and this is what Augustine says, that truth is founded in the permanent. And in this way we call successive beings true less truly than permanent beings: and among the successive, those are less truly beings which are destroyed according to substance and being, like motion; and more truly those which indeed perish according to being, but remain in substance, like time. But the undue is chiefly opposed to truth according as it is a certain rectitude exemplated by the first truth, for nothing diverges from it unless it is that which does not do what it ought to do from the first truth.

Articulus 13 — Whether The True Is Convertible With Being, The One, And The Good, And Whether The Intellect Of Negative Enunciations Can Be Reduced To Being

Is the true convertible with being, one, and good? And, can the intellect of negative enunciations be reduced to being?

Thirdly, it is asked concerning the conversion of the true with being, and one, and good.

§ 16. It seems that it is not convertible: for that which is only in the soul is not convertible with that which is in the soul and outside: but the true is only in the soul: therefore it is not convertible with being, which is in the soul and outside the soul.

§ 17. The first proposition is evident by the notion of convertible things. The SECOND is proved by the word of Aristotle at the end of the sixth book of the First Philosophy, where he speaks thus: "For the false and the true are not in things like good and evil: so that the true is like the good, and the false like the evil: but in the cognition." And he means that good and evil are absolute differences of being, and of what truly is in nature: but the true and the false are not, but are caused by the dividing and compounding cognition. But there is no cognition concerning simple things and concerning that which is. And this is evident if one inspects the exposition of the comment.

§ 18. Also, a little after that: "Let us therefore now dismiss being which is as it were by accident, and which is as it were true: for the cause of one of them has no definition, namely the accident, and the cause of the other is cognition: and both are in a diminished genus of the genera of being, and they are not of those things which signify the essence of being: and therefore let them be dismissed." Therefore it is proved that truth and the true are only in the soul, and that it is itself incomplete being: therefore it is not convertible with being, as it seems.

§ 19. Also, in book VI of the First Philosophy he says that truth is the end of speculative intelligence. And since there is no end there outside the intelligence, it will be inside the speculative intelligence: and thus the same follows as before.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 20. 1. In the Categories Aristotle says: "In that a thing is or is not, a statement is true or false." But on account of which each thing is such, that thing is more so. If therefore a statement is true on account of the thing, the thing will be more true: therefore truth will be primarily in the thing.

§ 21. 2. Also, as essence is to being, so truth is to the true: therefore by permutation, as the true is to being, so essence is to truth, and conversely: but every being is true, because Augustine says that the true is that which is: therefore every essence is truth: therefore essence and truth are the same, as it seems.

§ 22. 3. Also, in the first truth three things are posited upon one creating substance, namely unity, truth, goodness: therefore it seems that even in the inferior things flowing from the first cause, these are found founded upon any essence whatsoever, namely unity, truth, goodness: therefore it seems that these four are convertible: being, one, true, good.

§ 23. 4. Furthermore, it seems that these are also altogether the same: for either they are altogether the same, or not. If they are the same, then I have the proposition. If not: then they differ. But nothing differs except what comes forth from one common thing through dividing differences: therefore it is necessary for these to have some common thing in which they agree; but this common thing will be prior and simpler than them, which is impossible, since nothing is prior to being, and especially essence. Similarly, these four are said by all to be primary simple things, which are convertible among themselves: therefore nothing is prior to them. It is left, therefore, that these are entirely the same.

FURTHERMORE, it is asked here concerning the intellect of negative enunciations, how are they reduced to being?

§ 24. For some negative statement seems to posit absolutely nothing, and yet is true: therefore the true is not universally caused by being, nor is it convertible with being. For example, if I say thus, "Caesar is not a man": for this (as some say) posits nothing. And if it is doubted concerning that, I posit this, "A goat-stag is not a fligax" [i.e., a meaningless term], or "A chimera is not a goat-stag," which neither according to its extremes, nor according to its composition, seems to suppose any being: therefore it seems that neither is this universally true, that the true is convertible with being; nor this, that as each thing has itself toward being, so it has itself toward the true; nor this, that in that a thing is, or is not, a statement is true or false.

§ 25. SOLUTION. To this, without prejudice, it can be said that these four are convertible when taken concretely, namely being, one, true, good, in the nominative (in recto), namely that a being is good, and true, and one, and so of all. But if they are taken abstractly, I do not believe that they are according to right predication, except in God, but not in creatures: because I do not believe that this is true, "essence is truth," or "goodness," or "unity." This, however, is improper, "essence is true," and "truth is a being," and "goodness is true": yet this is more improper, "essence is a being," or "good," than these, "truth is a being," or "truth is one." The reason for this is thus evident through the Philosopher in the Book of Causes, who says that the first of created things is being or essence, and no other creature is before it: therefore there is not something in which essence is founded, like that around which a thing becomes, as the form of some subject: and therefore also according to the order of nature, essence in the notion of essence cannot be except created from nothing. But all other things (as the Commentator says there) are made by information around the essence: and he gives an example of the good, which according to the order of nature prefixes to itself the intellect of the essence in which it is. Therefore it is clear that essence speaks its notion as founded upon nothing, and prior in all things. Hence, speaking thus of essence, it will not be said to be truth itself, but "of truth": because truth is posited around it: and it will not be said to be goodness, but "of goodness." But of unity there is another reason, which will be evident below.

§ 26. But if you ask, why is it not called true and good, since truth and goodness are posited around it?

§ 27. I say that, speaking of a simple essence, it cannot be said that it is not understood as informed according to its notion. Hence Boethius in the book De Hebdomadibus: "That which is, has something besides that which it is: but being (esse) has nothing admixed." In the same way truth will not be called essence, but "of essence," properly speaking. It is the same way concerning goodness. However, according to the supposits spoken concretely, they are convertible: because whatever is, is a being, true, good, and one.

§ 28. But if you ask, whether one has itself from an addition to the other?

§ 29. I say that if an addition of another nature is understood, just as form and matter are of another nature, and substance and accident are of another nature, then one does not add upon the other. But if an addition is understood according to a notion of respect to the attribute of the first cause, then one adds upon the other a notion of respect, because then essence will be said to be flowing from the first essence, truth flowing from wisdom, and goodness flowing from goodness: and therefore every being is true, and one, and good; every true is a being, and one, and good, and so of the others. But nevertheless, abstractly speaking, they are not convertible, properly speaking.

§ 30. To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that the true is spoken of in multiple ways. For the true is called from truth, which is a disposition of being generally flowing from the first cause: and this is not only in the soul, but also in the thing. There is also specially the true, which determines the composition into which there is the consent or dissent of reason: and this is the true, which is only in an indicative statement, and in a certain way is in the enunciation, and in a certain way in the thing, and in a certain way in the soul alone. In the enunciation it is as in a sign: and therefore Aristotle says that the signification of incomplex things does not of itself signify either true or false. But in the thing it is as in a cause: but in the soul it is as in the maker of the note of composition, which the truth of the proposition determines: for when I say, "the swan is white," the predicate indeed belongs to the subject without a medium according to reality, for there is no medium by which whiteness is made in a swan: but nevertheless it cannot be signified thus by the intellect: and therefore the intellect saying one thing of another interposes a note of composition: and therefore the Philosopher says that it is only in the soul as in completing that which the truth determines into which the consent of reason is. And therefore because the composition can be made in many ways, therefore such a true is not determinable through the reality of any predicate per se. Nevertheless, it is referred to being according to causality. And he is not speaking there of the true which is the general disposition of being.

§ 31. To what is objected concerning the Categories, it must be said that when Aristotle says, "In that a thing is or is not, etc.," the word "is" ought to be taken according as it means the being of composition or division: and this is what some say, according as it means being, and not essence: for the being of composition is the non-being of division; but essence is of the subject or predicate taken absolutely. And then again he does not speak of the true which generally disposes being, but of the true which is the cause of the true, into which there is the consent of reason or § 32. To the other it must be said that the proposition is true: but when it is permuted, the permutation does not happen by reason of the same habitude which was before: and this can be seen thus: for when it is said, "As essence is to being, etc.," a comparison is made of each abstract to its concrete, as of a form to that whose form it is: and in this there is a similar habitude: but when it is permuted and it is said, "therefore as the good is to that which is, etc.," then the comparison is made by reason of the identity of the supposit: and this well is between the true and the good, but it is not between essence and truth by the reason previously introduced: and therefore that permutation is not valid.

§ 33. To the other it must be said that that argument well concludes that these four must be in every created being, which flows from the first being thus disposed: but because the created being is not able in totality to imitate the simplicity of the first cause, therefore those things which are predicated there of themselves in the nominative both abstractly and concretely, those in inferior things are predicated concretely of themselves in the nominative, but abstractly in the oblique, as was said above.

§ 34. To the other it must be said that these are not the same: nor nevertheless do they have one thing in which they are united as in a prior thing, and from which they proceed through a difference. For this is not general in all things, but only in those which proceed from one as from a genus. But those which are from one as by analogy to one, do not have this: for there the first through itself relates to all subsequent things and is in them, although it differs from them: and the cause of this is, because the notion of the difference by which it differs from the others, makes it to be prior. But in others which proceed from one genus, the notion of the difference is the cause to itself, so that it is coeval with the others from which it differs: and therefore it must have something prior from which it proceeds, just as those from which it differs. Hence it must be said that essence itself is ordered as prior to truth and goodness: and yet it differs from them.

§ 35. To what is further objected concerning the truth of negatives, I say without prejudice that every truth of an enunciation, whether affirmative or negative, is reduced to being: and this is proved in this way: for it is certain that before any intellect of a negation, one must take an affirmation, since a negation is not intelligible, just as neither is a privation, except through the habit: if therefore an affirmation is reduced to being, it is necessary that a negation also be founded in being. Hence this proposition, "Caesar is not a man," is true, and it enunciates that what is not, is not: which negation however refers to a composition regarding being, although not simply, but in a certain respect (secundum quid). Similarly when it is said, "a goat-stag is not a fligax," or "a chimera is not a goat-stag," there is there in the extremes a respect to being according to parts, and in the whole to being in opinion: and this suffices for the being about which an enunciation is made, since it is not necessary that everything which can be enunciated be a ratified being in nature, since the Philosopher says, "It happens to be enunciated that what is, is, and that what is not, is, and that what is not, is not: and concerning those things which are outside present time." Similarly it happens to deny everything that anyone has affirmed, and to affirm what anyone has denied. And therefore it is clear that this is true, that as each thing has itself toward being, so it has itself toward the true: for what is in opinion, is not simply non-being: and similarly what is in the notion of preterition, is not simply non-being: and again what is future in the potency of matter, is not simply non-being.

Articulus 14 — According To What Order The One, The True, The Good, And Being Relate To One Another

According to what order do one, true, good, and being relate to one another?

§ 36. But if it is asked, According to what order do one, true, good, and being relate to one another?

§ 37. It must be said that according to the Philosopher, before all things are being and one. For the Philosopher does not posit that the true and the good are dispositions generally accompanying being: nor is the division of being according as it is being, through the true and the good. Because the Philosopher does not consider being according as it flows from the first being, both one and wise and good, but he himself considers being according as the intellect rests in it, resolving the posterior into the prior, and the composite into the simple, and according as it gathers all things by priority and posteriority: and therefore he does not determine concerning the true and the good through this mode, but concerning the good which is the end to which motion is directed: and therefore he says that not even one demonstration in mathematics is through the notion of the good.

§ 38. And therefore thus considering these things generally, as the Saints considered them, we will say that among these, namely essence and being, is first in nature, around which as a substratum to itself the others are posited. But unity and one follow essence through indivision: and therefore unity does not posit any real disposition around it, but only the intellect of a privation, namely of indivision, and therefore it is proximate to essence. But the true implies a relation to a form at least exemplary, through which it has a notion of manifestation: and therefore Hilary says that the true is the declarative of being: for there must be in anything some principle of understanding, through which it is ordered to the intellect. But goodness and the good imply a respect to an end outside, from which the thing is, and toward which it is: for because He is good, we are: and insofar as we are, we are good. And how this may be, was expounded above in the first distinction. I say this, however, because these are posited by the Saints as primary and in everything: and although in some we find the form and the end inside, nevertheless not in all, nor in the primary things.

Articulus 15 — Whether Truth Is Eternal

Is truth eternal?

Fourthly, a difficult question is asked, which we also touched upon above, Whether truth is eternal?

§ 39. And what was said above I will not repeat here: but it can be objected thus:

§ 40. 1. In divine things there are found properties and persons which are distinguished from one another: and this is true from eternity, "The Father is the Father": and this, "The Son is the Son": and this, "The Holy Spirit is the Holy Spirit": and negatively, "The Father is not the Son," "The Father is not the Holy Spirit," and "The Son is not the Holy Spirit," and the like. If therefore the extremes of these enunciations are many from eternity, it seems that from eternity the truths of those enunciations are many: therefore there are many truths from eternity.

§ 41. 2. Also, it is objected concerning other propositions, in which there is not as much force, as "The Father is God," and "The Son is God," and the like, in which by reason of one of the extremes the composition expresses something indistinct: and those stand less in plurality than the higher ones.

§ 42. Also, God from eternity knew you would be, and I would be, and an ass would be, and so of individuals: therefore each of them is true from eternity. The PROOF of this: because nothing is known unless it is true, and especially by divine science: but my future being, and yours, and so of others, are many: therefore God knew many things from eternity: and He knew nothing except true things: therefore many true things were from eternity: and nothing is true unless it be true by truth: therefore many truths were from eternity.

§ 43. If perhaps you say that this does not follow:

because, as Anselm says: The creature in the Creator is the creative essence, and things from eternity in God were not as many, but one: and therefore there were not many true things from eternity. On the contrary: this is conceded, God from eternity knew all things; and this similarly, God from eternity knew many things, and also knew the plurality of many things: but He knew nothing but true things: therefore He knew many true things. For although God's knowledge is not caused by the thing known, nevertheless there cannot be knowledge of this or that which God knows from eternity just as He does now, unless that and this are in some way supposed to be. For otherwise, if knowledge in no way regarded the knowable, then this statement would be verified just as much of an ass as of a man, God from eternity knows that a man will be, because he will be, which is false. Therefore, it is necessary to suppose the knowable to be in some way in knowledge: therefore, many true things and their truths will be from eternity.

Further, it is asked next to this, Whether truth itself is eternal?

§ 1. And Augustine seems to prove this in the book of Soliloquies as follows: Let it be granted that truth at some point began. Then thus: That truth has begun is true; and it is not true except by truth: therefore truth was, even [the truth] that did not begin.

§ 2. Also, if truth began, this is true, truth will begin, even before this instant in which truth will begin: therefore truth will be even before truth begins.

§ 3. Also, posit that it is not eternal: therefore this is true, that truth is not eternal; and it is not true except by truth: therefore truth was from eternity. The same is proved, if it is granted that it can cease.

If perhaps you were to say that Augustine is speaking about uncreated truth, and not about the truth of a thing or of a created enunciation.

§ 1. On the contrary: because then it proves nothing: because he wishes to prove the soul immortal through this, that truth cannot perish; and since it is not in a subject except in the soul, it is necessary that the subject of truth be immortal. Now it is clear that the soul is not the subject of uncreated truth, in such a way that it would be saved in the soul itself as in a subject, but rather it is essentially, presentially, and potentially in the soul, just as in any other created being.

§ 2. Furthermore, he gives an example concerning the truth of enunciables: therefore he does not understand [it] of uncreated truth, as it seems.

§ 3. Also, he says, in the same place: Upon the perishing of a chaste person, chastity does not perish, and upon the perishing of a true thing, truth does not perish. But in God neither truth nor the true perishes: therefore it is clear that he is not speaking about this.

§ 4. Also, Augustine says in the same place that no one judges anything to be true without it, namely without truth. But it is clear that we do not judge true things by the first truth, but by the truth which is the rationale of true things;

Also, from this truth another argument is extracted which is this, namely, suppose that truth were not: then either something will be intelligible, or not. If not, this will be incongruous, since there are still many things: because, as Boethius says, if it is momentarily understood that the first good does not exist, there will still be white things, and other things of this kind. Therefore, similarly, if the first truth and other truths are understood not to exist, there will still be other things: and the intellect is naturally apt to understand them: therefore they will be intelligible. But on the contrary: No one judges the true except through the rationale of truth: therefore, if that does not exist, judgment perishes: and all intellect is through the judgment of truth: therefore understanding perishes if truth does not exist: but this is incongruous: therefore the first truth and simple truth cannot even be thought not to be, in such a way that there would remain any understanding in any intelligible nature.

If, again, you should wish to say that this is true of the first truth. On the contrary: The first truth is indeed in all things, but nothing is denominated by it: for when we say, this thing has an essence, we do not understand [it] of the divine essence: therefore when we say, this true thing is true, it will not be true by the first truth, although the first truth is in it: therefore when Augustine says that upon the perishing of a true thing truth does not perish, he does not understand [this] of the first truth, but of created truth, as it seems.

But on the contrary: Anselm says in the book De Veritate: When I said in my Monologion, when was it not true that something was going to be? I did not say it as if this statement, which asserted that something was going to be, had been without a beginning; or that this truth was God: but since it cannot be understood that when this statement existed, truth was lacking to it, so that through this, because it is not understood when this truth could not exist (if there had been a statement in which it could exist), it is understood that that truth was without a beginning, which is the first cause of this truth [126]. From this two things are taken, namely Anselm's excuse for what he was said to have said, that the truth of enunciations was from eternity, and that [such] truth is not eternal.

§ SOLUTION. It must be said that no truth is eternal, except uncreated truth: and because it is one and simple, therefore that truth alone is from eternity.

As to what is first objected, it must be said according to what was said above, where it was shown that although the essence and the property and the persons are undivided, nevertheless all being that is in divine things depends upon the essence. For the Father is the essence, and the property has no being except [as] the essence: and therefore although the properties are distinguishing, nevertheless they do not make anything but a plurality of persons, and not a plurality of truths of the persons; but there is only one truth of the three, just as there is one essence.

But if you object concerning enunciations and propositions: I say that such composition and complex is not in divine things, but in our intellect composing and dividing, as the Philosopher maintains. For he says in Book III of De Anima that the understanding of indivisibles is found in those things in which there is no falsity, nor even the truth of an assertion; but where there is the false and the true, there is already a certain composition of concepts [127]; and this is especially true in divine things. Hence such enunciations by way of compositions must be reduced to simple things; and then those things will be the persons, whose plurality does not effect diverse truths, but one.

To the other it must be said that I readily concede that God from eternity knew what He knows now, and that from eternity He knew many things, and from eternity all things, and that He knew that you would be, and me, and so of others; and that these things from eternity are true in His mind. But from this it does not follow that there are absolutely many true things from eternity, or many truths from eternity. And to understand this, it should be noted that when it is said, God knows all things or many things from eternity: I readily concede, as was proven here and above, that knowledge posits the knowable according to some mode, and not absolutely; and it posits the distinction and plurality of knowables relatively, and not absolutely. For because the knowable depends on knowledge, just as an effect upon a cause whose rationale is the cause itself, just as the rationale of the artifact is in the artisan: therefore the sense is, God knows this or that future thing from eternity, that is, the rationale of this or that is in God, according to which He sees this and that. Hence I readily concede that the rationales of many true things are in God from eternity. And this statement, there are many true things in God from eternity, is not to be conceded so properly: because when it is said 'many true things', a distinction of plurality on the part of the things is implied there more than when it is said 'many rationales'. Now things, as they are in their cause, are not distinct, although their distinction is known, for the reason that the rationale of the distinction is also in the cause relatively, as was said before. And this statement is in no way to be conceded, that many truths are in God from eternity, because truth is spoken of as an abstraction , and it pertains to the essence: just as also the knowledge by which things of this kind are known, although it is of many things, is not nevertheless many, but only one. From this it is further evident that much less is it to be conceded when it is proposed absolutely without determination thus: 'many true things are from eternity', and 'many truths from eternity'. For as was said above, when it is said 'the true in God', or 'truth in God', or 'the creature in God', by the determination the term to which it is joined is drawn outside of its own rationale, and is posited to be only relatively, as in a cause which is efficient and intelligent.

As to what is further asked, whether truth can be destroyed, and whether it began? I say that he is speaking either of the first truth, or of created truth. If of the first, I readily concede that it cannot perish, and it did not begin.

But if you ask whether it can be understood not to be? I say that there is a double sense to that question: for either it is understood thus, that it is posited not to be, and this very thing is afterwards to be understood, so that the act of understanding passes over onto it: and I say that this is impossible. PROOF: because judgment is not made except according to the rationale of truth: therefore it would be necessary for the first truth to be posited after it is posited not to be: hence this is repugnant to what was posited.

To that which is objected concerning the good, which Boethius posits not to be, it must be said that it is not at all similar: because the good is the perfection of the affect, and without it the intellect is well perfected. But this is true, that just as in the intellect understanding perishes if the first truth is not supposed, so on the part of the affect loving perishes if the first goodness is not supposed: because if the first goodness does not exist, there will not be any good patterned after it: and since every good is good through relation to it, there will not be anything good: therefore nothing will be the rationale of love in the affect, just as nothing will be the rationale of judgment in the intellect, if the first truth does not exist by the same rationale. That question can also be understood [in the sense] that it is posited simultaneously that the intellect and truth do not exist, and this can be posited per impossibile. But if it is asked about created truth, I say that it began and does not cease, but it would cease unless it were contained by the first truth.

But if you object thus: If it began: therefore it is true that it sometimes was not. I say that it well follows: because it was not from eternity, provided that force is not placed on 'sometimes' as signifying time, but it is taken transumptively so that it signifies the order of eternity to time: because now it is true to say that 'sometimes' from eternity there was no truth, and afterwards there was.

But if you infer from this: therefore before it began, it was true to say that truth will be: I say that it does not follow: because nothing was true before this by created truth, neither this nor that, nor was there a proposition, nor an enunciable, as was said above in the question on the same topic.

126. Aristotle, Metaphysics, Book VI (Epsilon).

But if you infer thus: Truth was not from eternity, or it was from eternity: this is a division by contradictories. I say that this, 'truth was not from eternity', is not the contradictory of that, unless the negation refers to the whole, and negates 'from eternity': and then the negative is true, and the affirmative is false.

TO THE OTHERS the response is sufficiently evident through what was said above.

As to what is further asked concerning the understanding of Augustine: I say without prejudice that Augustine intends to prove the immortality of the soul from the immortality of created truth, but not from its eternity. And this is evident thus: Those things which are through creation from the first truth, are also out of nothing; and therefore just as they have something by which they are mutable, so they have something by which they approach immovable truth as much as they can: some indeed in the singular, such as incorruptible substances; but some in an universal rationale, such as those which are abstracted from motion and the matter in which they have their being and mutation, and in this way the rationale of truth is in the soul, as in a subject, and it has mutability according to what is a creature, but it does not have mutability through being, because it is removed from that in which it has being: and this is what Augustine says, that upon the perishing of a true thing truth does not perish, that is, the rationale of truth. Therefore, since truth so called cannot be destroyed, although it began: because its rationale remains, and it does not remain except in a subject which is the intellect, it is necessary that the intellective soul be perpetual and immortal. And this I think is the opinion of Augustine. Others say that he argued thus, by proving the soul to be capable of the first truth: because nothing capable of it is mortal, therefore it follows that the soul is immortal.

But if you ask whether it is possible for created truth to perish? I say that yes, if God so willed, but not absolutely. But if you ask that it be posited, and then infer: therefore that truth has perished is true; therefore something is true, and true by truth; therefore truth is or will be after it has perished. I say that if we posit that there is no true thing and no truth, this will not be true: 'that truth has perished is true', for this is repugnant to what was posited. And if you say that this is incongruous according to the Philosopher: because it happens to enunciate that what is not, is not. I respond that it is a great incongruity, but from your hypothesis this follows: therefore it is not incongruous in a disputation: and through this the solution to the whole is also evident.

Articulus 16 — Whether Truth Is Simple And Immutable

Whether truth is simple and immutable?

Fifthly it is asked, Whether truth is simple and immutable?

But it seems that it is not simple: because § 1. Boethius says that everything that is, has its being as one thing, and that which it is as another; and the First is excepted, in which there is no 'this and this' . Therefore it seems that truth is not simple.

127. Augustine, De vera religione.

§ 2. Also, Avicenna says that that from which something can be negated, is composite and not simple: but many things are negated of truth: therefore it is not simple.

§ 3. Also, Boethius says that in every simple thing to be and that by which it has [being] are the same: but in truth it is not the same, as was proven earlier: because it itself is not an essence, although it has an essence: therefore it is not simple.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: Truth is among the first dispositions of being: therefore it does not have anything prior from which it may be composed: therefore it is simple.

If you say that it is a creature, and thus is from another: this is nothing: because the efficient cause does not make a thing to be composite, since it is extrinsic to the thing.

FURTHERMORE it is asked, Whether it is immutable? And it seems that it is: because § 1. Anselm says that the truth of a sign is in the sign, whether the thing exists or does not exist; because 'that I am sitting' signifies that I am sitting, whether the thing is so or not: therefore it does what it ought: therefore it is right: therefore true.

§ 2. Also he says that the truth of a sign remains, whether the sign is or is not: and he proves this thus: Let it be granted that the sign is not; either it is right for the thing which does not have a sign to be signified, or not. If not: therefore if a sign is given to it, that sign does not do what it ought: therefore it will not be right: therefore also not true, which is false. But if it is right to be signified, that rectitude will be something, either of the sign or of the signified. Not of the signified. PROOF: because when it is said, this is right to be signified, it is understood that the signification is signified: therefore that is the rectitude of the sign, because otherwise the rectitude of the sign and of the signified would be one, which cannot be: therefore the rectitude of the sign remains, [even] when the sign does not remain: therefore it is immutable.

FURTHERMORE, it seems that the truth of a thing is also immutable: because what mutability falls into this truth: 'a rectilinear triangle has three angles equal to two right angles'; or into this: 'two and three are five'? It seems that none does.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Psalm 11:2: Truths are diminished among the children of men . But a diminution is a certain mutation.

§ 2. Also, Augustine says that sometimes truth in the intellect is less, and sometimes greater, and sometimes equal to the intellect: these are certain mutations.

§ SOLUTION. It must be said that truth is the first form in its genus, just like goodness, unity, and entity, although they have an order, as was said before: and therefore I do not believe that any of them is composed of that which is (quo est) and being (esse), according to which is means a certain being in itself, into which the being that is the act of the essence is diffused. But I readily concede that truth in itself has several understandings, because it has the understanding of essence obliquely, as that of which it is; and it has its own understanding, and therefore it is not equivalent to God in simplicity. And I think the same should be said of every form which is first in its genus.

But if you object, saying that essence is a being, and truth is true, unity is one, and goodness is good. I say that all these indeed are found in Augustine in the book De Trinitate, where this is also found, 'whiteness is white, and blackness is black'; which nevertheless the Philosopher denies: and therefore it is evident that Augustine is speaking improperly. For the concrete is noted to be posited about the abstract. Nor is what is commonly said valid, that first intentions reflect upon themselves. For whence is this obtained? Because this is contrary to reason: and the authority does not state what the custom of some has introduced: because the most simple things can least of all be signified as subjects with respect to the very forms which they signify. Hence it is well found that unity is that by which any thing is one.

But if you say that Augustine says so: I say that he says that unity is one, and goodness is good: but not that the first [forms] are reflected upon themselves. Thus, saving Augustine, it must be said that just as being, which sounds of concretion, is said of the abstract insofar as it is the first understanding, and of concretes by composition: so it is in the other firsts. But the expressions are improper: for when it is said, 'essence is a being', it is the same as if it were said, 'essence is essence': and then no composition or concretion out of that which is (quod est) and that by which it is (quo est) is noted. And similarly when it is said, 'truth is true', it is the same as if it were said, 'truth is truth', and so of the others.

And through this the solution to what is asked concerning the simplicity of truth is evident.

To what is asked concerning immutability, it must be said, as was said before, that truth has some immutability through the fact that it is patterned after the first truth which is absolutely immutable: but it is not absolutely immutable, insofar as it is out of nothing.

As to the objections of Anselm, I readily concede the first, distinguishing concerning a twofold truth: because the sign which is an enunciation has a certain truth of composition: and this is effected by the thing, and it is mutated when the thing itself is mutated: and therefore the Philosopher says that one and the same statement, by a mutation of the thing, is susceptible of contraries, namely of truth and falsity . It has another [truth] in the rectitude of signifying, according to what it is in the genus of signs: and this is not mutated when the thing is mutated, and of this Anselm speaks.

But as to what he further speaks of concerning this, whether it remains when the sign does not exist, and he seems to prove [that it does]: I do not consent, except according to one mode which will be manifested in the following question. To his argument I respond thus: When he says, 'When the sign does not exist, it is right for the thing to be signified': I say that it is true by the rectitude of the aptitude of the thing to consignify, or to have a sign: and this rectitude does not posit any rectitude to exist except in potency, and it will be reduced into act when it will have a sign. To that which he objects, however, that it cannot be the rectitude of the thing: because the thing ought to be signified by that rectitude, and the signified and the signifying cannot be the same: I say that it cannot be the same in the same way, but the rectitude of the thing is essentially signifiable, and therefore it is naturally apt to have a sign, and this habitudo is posited when it is said: 'It is right for the thing which does not have a sign to be signified.' And thus it is evident that the argument is not valid, unless it be made in this way: 'It is right to be signified': and every right thing has the exemplar of its signifiability in the first truth, by which it is regulated and declared in the first light: for thus it is true that that rectitude always remains, because that is the first truth, as will be evident below.

To what is asked concerning the truth of certain things impossible to be otherwise. I say that such things have an immutability of comparison, and not absolutely. For the truth of this, 'a rectilinear triangle, etc.', has immutability from the fact that the subject posits the cause of the predicate: for a rectilinear triangle supposes that any exterior angle together with the interior angle is equivalent to the two [interior angles] opposite to it, and the exterior together with the interior is equivalent to two right angles: and therefore necessarily the interior together with the two opposites is equivalent to two right angles: and so it is in other mathematical things. But this immutability is of a certain kind according as they approach more closely to the first truth, and through the fact that they are simpler than those things which are in matter through being, which are doubly mutable, namely through being, and insofar as they are creatures.

To what is objected in opposition, it must be said that truth is diminished in that this is diminished in the natural good under truth, and not otherwise, unless we speak of created truth according to its being, not according to its rationale.

Articulus 17 — Whether All True Things Are True From The First Truth Formally

Whether all true things are true formally by the first truth?

Lastly it is asked, Whether all things are true by the first truth?

And here two things are asked, of which the first is, Whether they are formally true by the first truth? The second is, Whether effectively?

To the FIRST one proceeds thus: § 1. Augustine says in the book De Vera Religione: All things which are created by the eternal God consist as fabricated through His truth. Therefore they would not consist, if they did not consist through truth: therefore truth is the form containing them in being, and it is in them as a form.

If you say that this is true of an exemplary form, which is outside the thing, and this is indeed the divine truth. ON THE CONTRARY: If I speak thus: 'The animal is healthy, and the urine is healthy', I do not predicate a different 'healthy' of the urine and of the animal, although these two are related to health in a different way: therefore, since truth is said by priority and posteriority of the divine and the created, those things which are true in creatures do not signify another truth than the uncreated one, but they signify it in a different way: and it still returns [to this], that all things are true by one single truth.

§ 2. Also, Anselm objects that the time of all temporal things is the same: because it is in one uniform and simple motion, which is the cause and measure of all motions: therefore, since the first truth is incomparably simpler, and is in God who is the cause of all things, it itself will be numerically one for all true things.

§ 3. Also, the good is spoken of in two ways, namely by essence, and by participation: and when it is participated, nothing else is participated than that which is good by essence: for otherwise what Augustine says in the book De Trinitate would be nothing: 'A man is good, a face is good, this and that is good: take away this and that, and you will see the good of every good' [128]. Therefore by similarity truth will be twofold, by essence and by participation: and then each true thing will participate in only one truth numerically.

§ 4. Also, the good is essentially in every creature, and similarly truth, and God. But it is clear that He, as good, is the exemplary cause of all good things: and as truth, the exemplary cause of all true things. Now for an exemplar, nothing else is required for it to be the intrinsic form of a thing, except that it be in it. For in this it differs from that which is truly a form: because the exemplar is outside and the form is inside. Therefore, since the first truth has both, namely that it is an exemplary form, and it is internal in every true thing, it itself seems to be the form of every true thing.

§ 5. Also, 'a body is colored', 'a body is composite', and 'a body is true', all these have an exemplar in God. But it is clear when it is said, 'a body is colored', that color is not in God, but the exemplar of color. Similarly neither is composition in God, but the exemplar of composition. Therefore since it approaches more closely when it is said, 'a body is true', there is something there beyond the first exemplar: but what is beyond the exemplar, is the internal form of the thing. Therefore it seems that the first truth is the formal truth of the thing which gives being to the true thing.

§ 6. Also, when it is said: 'The world will be', 'the world was', and 'the world is': supposing that as each thing relates to being, so it relates to the true, it will not be true in past and future things, except relatively, namely according as they have causes in nature or matter. But in the present there is being absolutely. If therefore in this one, 'the world will be', the divine truth is predicated: and in this one, 'the world is', created truth is predicated, uncreated truth will be predicated of that which is not absolutely true, and created truth of that which is absolutely true: therefore divine truth will be relative with respect to created truth, which is incongruous: therefore in the present the divine truth will be predicated, especially since the present is verified for the sake of the same thing with respect to which it was called future.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Hilary says that upon the perishing of water, the truth of water perishes. Therefore it is not true by the first truth, because that does not perish.

§ 2. Also, every thing seems more false than true in comparison with the first truth: because Augustine says in the book De Vera Religione that what is false is what imitates something, and does not fulfill it [129]. But every created true thing imitates the first truth, and does not fulfill it. Therefore it is more false in comparison with it, than true.

§ 3. Also, there is not the same measure of duration for the created and the uncreated, but for the uncreated it is eternity, and for the created aevum or time: therefore neither is there the same measure of truth, as it seems.

§ 4. Also, since the true is that which the thing is, if the first truth were participated in every true thing as a form, the first truth is the being of all things, which is false.

§ SOLUTION. It must be said that it happens in two ways to speak of the true in comparison with truth: since as was said above, truth is said by priority and posteriority according to Anselm's distinction of the first truth and others: and in all such things, as the Philosopher maintains, the respect of proportion to the first remains in the secondary ones; and therefore if we speak thus,

Then the first truth will be in all true creatures, as in those individuating it, and imitating it as much as they can: and in this way, it will be as a certain measure, to which each thing that is called true is measured, as we said before: and this is the understanding of Anselm. And this is evident in the examples he gives of time, which is of all temporal things, and of the ell to various cloths. But if a comparison is made of the true to the form giving being to the true, by which form it has being in its truth, as every form in its formed thing: then I say that truths are multiplied according to the number of truths, and each has its own truth, and in this way the true is caused by the thing, and the truth of composition by the relation of the composed, and the truth of division by the relation of the divided: and in this way, the Philosophers inquire about the true. According to these, therefore, it is easy to respond to the objections.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that from that authority it is not held, except that truth is the exemplary cause, to which created truths are proportioned.

To what is objected against it, it must be said that things are not said to be true in that relation alone, but rather because they have some truth, which they imitate as much as they can: and if this truth were not, they would not have the reason of proportion. In this way, it is not in urine: because in urine there is not held the health, which is proportioned to that health which is in the animal, but it has something indicating it, like the digestion of humors, and the like. And this is because analogy to one is not said in one way, but in many ways. For it is said necessary per se, and necessary per posterius: and yet although necessary per posterius regards proportionally the necessary said per prius, there is in some way some necessary formally in that which is proportioned to the necessary said per se: and thus the Philosopher understands what he says in IX of the first philosophy, that each thing is measured by the smallest and simplest first of its kind: as motion by motion, and units by unit, and men by man, and so of others. For generally in all things, which by prior and posterior approach to the reason of one.

To the other, it must be said that it is not similar concerning time and temporals, if we speak according to the comparison of the true to truth in the second way, but in some way it is similar speaking in the first way: but it does not follow from this, that that one truth is the form of all truths, but the rectitude to which they are proportioned: just as neither is time the form of all temporals, but the number by which they are numbered.

To the other, it must be said that this is false, that the uncreated good essentially informs created goods: but rather they are said to be good by the form of created good, which nevertheless is further proportioned to the uncreated good, as we also said about the true and truth.

128. Augustine, De Trinitate, VIII, 3.

But to the saying of Augustine, it must be said that he does not mean that by abstracting from this good and that, the uncreated good remains in itself, but it remains in the reason of good, as in a sign the exemplar shines: and this which he says, "You will see," is understood as the good of every good, of the vision which is of the first goodness in that which proportionally approaches to it. To the other, it must be said that God is in all things essentially and presentially, but not as the form of the thing: because it is further required, that as a part, and that condition fails: therefore it is evident that it is not the form. To the other indeed, it must be said that the exemplar of all is in God: but nevertheless not all can be referred in him, so that they are first essentially in him, and later in the creature, but only the mystical. But the others which are symbolic are not so referred. And the difference of goods according to my ability has been explained above. And therefore it is evident that those which are mystical have more: because they are exemplarily and essentially first in God, than in creatures: but the others only exemplarily. And therefore it is evident that that objection proceeds from diminution.

To the last, it must be said that this proposition, "the world will be," was not true, because neither was the proposition before the world: and this was shown above, unless it is posited in the divine mind: and if it is posited there, then it was previously answered to that above, where it is asked, "If truth is from eternity?" But if no force is made in this: then it will be said that in the past by reason of pastness eternal truth is not posited, nor even in the future by reason of futurity, but by reason of order to the present time: for eternity precedes time. And therefore such words do not predicate temporal motions, as Augustine says, when they are referred to the divine. And then it is evident that the argumentation does not follow: because it proceeds as if the future and past were taken by reason of the imperfection of time.

Articulus 18 — Whether Every Truth Is From The First Truth Efficiently

Whether every truth is efficiently from the first truth?

Secondly, it is asked whether every truth is from the first truth? And this is the intention of the Letter.

However, it seems that it is so: because
1. The Philosopher says that from the fact that a thing is or is not, a statement is true or false, and this was conceded above. Since therefore truth is founded in being, and every being is from the first being, every truth will be from the first truth. But against this is what the Master objects in the Letter thus: That evils happen, therefore that evils happen, is true: from the first truth, as from an efficient and exemplary cause.

But if you say according to some, that truth is twofold, namely of the complex and the incomplex, and the truth of the thing: it is understood by the saying of Augustine who says that every truth is from the first truth, concerning the truth of the thing, and the truth of the incomplex sign, but not of every truth of complexes. Against: Every truth which is in the complex is reduced to the incomplex and their relations. Similarly, every truth of the sign is reduced to the truth of the thing, as to a cause. But it is evident that if the effect is from God, it is necessary that also the cause is from God, and conversely. Therefore, with the truth of complex things being from God, it is necessary also that the truths of complex signs are from God, and conversely.

Therefore, others come by solving differently, saying that there is a multiple composition or division, namely of position, and privation, and negation. Of position, as when it is said, Peter is a man, or a man is an animal. Of privation, as when it is said, Peter is blind. Of negation, as when it is said, Peter is not a man, a man is not a stone, or a tragelaph is not a fligax, and the like. But again this is worth nothing: because although privation is nothing in itself, yet it leaves being, and according to this it is referred to being: and concerning the truth of negatives it was shown above: it is that it is reduced to being. Let us suppose, however, that every being is from the first being. Therefore also the truth which is founded in being.

But if perhaps you wish to solve, as the Master says in the Letter, by the instance of argumentation, as when I say thus: Let it be that you say a man is a donkey: and therefore I who hear this, say thus, I hear you speaking: your speaking is true: therefore I hear the truth. It does not follow, rather I hear falsehood: and this happens because the medium is varied in the first and in the second. For when it is said, I hear you speaking, the act of hearing passes over this which I say, you speaking, for the sake of the attribute only, namely speaking. But when it is said, your speaking is true, it is not said to be true of this which I say, you speaking, by reason of the attribute, but by reason of the coherence and composition of one with the other. Hence when it is afterwards inferred, therefore I hear the truth, the conclusion does not follow: because it is signified as if the act of hearing passes over your speech, by reason of the truth of some statement which you say: and this cannot be, because it was posited that you say falsehood, namely that a man is a donkey.

However, the Master's example is, by which he infers this instance, God prohibits theft from happening: theft happening is true: therefore God prohibits the truth. Yet, it does not follow: because in the first the act of prohibition does not fall except by reason of the suppositum over the following statement, and not by reason of coherence or composition. But when it is said, theft happening is true, it is regarded by reason of composition and coherence: and therefore the conclusion does not follow. If, I say, you wish to solve with the Master. Against: When it is said, This one steals, the proposition is true: either the truth is founded in the subject and the act composed with it without deformity: or in the composition with deformity. If in the first way: therefore with deformity separated, the statement will still be true, which is false: because if deformity is separated from the act, this statement will be false, this one steals, or this one sins, or this one does evil. Therefore, the truth regards the composition of deformity with the act in the subject. But this composition is really something: and I am silent about the sign, because the Master insists on this: therefore this composition is from the first being: therefore its truth is from the first truth, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said that it is one thing concerning the truth of the sign, and another concerning the truth of the thing: because as was said above, everything that is in any way, it is right to signify, and this is not evil: and therefore that truth of the sign which it has insofar as it is a sign, is always from the first truth: but because it ought to measure further the truth of the thing, so that there would be an adequation of the sign and the signified, this adheres to the being of privative composition and false: just as the figure of the human body, which is a sign of the soul and life, adheres to the dead body: for then privative being and false are deflected from the rectitude of the sign.

But if we speak of the truth of composition according to the thing: then I say, that truth is reduced to the first truth, just as its entity is reduced to being: for not every being reverts to the first being as to its entire and immediate cause, but only the perfect being: for there are other agents under God, such as nature and will. Hence just as there is a composition of something with a deformed act, so it is caused: but it is a composition deficient on the part of the deformed act: therefore it is immediately reduced to a deficient cause, which is a truth deficient from the first truth, and it is free will. However, whatever of being is in that truth of composition, reverts to the first truth. And the example of this was placed above, that God in such composed truths is, as a virtue influencing motion in the leg, which equally influences both in the straightness of one leg and in the curvature of the other leg: and therefore whatever of gait is in limping, is reduced to the virtue influencing motion, because from it is the whole, but of the defect of limping nothing is from it. So whatever of being and truth is in such compositions, is from the first being and truth, but nothing of the defect: and according to which the truth of the thing is only what we speak of, that also fails, where being fails. And according to this response it does not follow that evil is from God, or that evil happening is from God.

But if you ask, In what is the truth of the sign founded? I say, that in the universal thing, and that is indeed from God, as was said before.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 19 — Whether Every Truth, By Whomsoever It Is Said, Is From The Holy Spirit

Whether every truth, by whomever it is spoken, is from the Holy Spirit?

Whether every truth, by whomever it is spoken, is from the Holy Spirit?

Then it is questioned concerning what the Master says in chapter O, there, "Truth, by whomever it is spoken, is from the Holy Spirit."

For this seems false, since many truths are evil.

Likewise, there is truth in mathematics, for which the Holy Spirit is not required, as it seems.

Likewise, since truth is attributed to the Son, and not to the Holy Spirit: why does he not say that truth is spoken by the Son rather than by the Holy Spirit?

Solution. It must be said that according to the Gloss, it is not understood generally, but concerning truth pertaining to piety, which is to say 'in heart, mouth, and deed': because Anselm says that the saying of the deed is more powerful than that of the mouth; and he gives the example of someone in a garden from whom it is asked which herbs are poisonous and which are healthy: who judges by word the poisonous ones by calling them healthy, and eats others which he calls poisonous: because he speaks more by deed than by mouth.

Therefore, it should be said according to this, that to speak is to manifest, and to speak truth is to manifest truth: and this manifestation is perfect when it is obscured by no part: and this is not done unless truth pertaining to piety is spoken according to the affection and demonstration of the deed. And this is said according to the Gloss, and thus the objections cease.

But for the sake of the disputation of the curious Masters, it can be otherwise satisfied, that this is understood of every truth insofar as truth is manifestative of the being of anything whatsoever: and then we will say that nothing is said thus manifesting from which the inspiration of the Spirit is abstracted, as Augustine says in the book Soliloquies, and it was placed above in 2, that in every understanding of truth it is necessary for the illumination of the Spirit to be present, which the Philosophers have called the illumination of intelligence: because every judgment of truth is according to the rule of the first truth. And then generally it is true.

To the first, therefore, it must be said, that how the truth by which evil is said to be done is true as from the first truth, was explained in the preceding question.

To the other, it must be said that although the Son is truth, yet it does not pertain to him to manifest truth by inspiration: because this is to teach inwardly, and this pertains to the Holy Spirit, as Christ says, "He will teach you all truth: and He will announce to you things to come." Some, however, force this in what the Apostle says, "No one can say: Lord Jesus, except in the Holy Spirit." Because he adds the cause as if moving, and says the containment as if truth is contained in the Holy Spirit, although it does not move the speaker. But this seems frivolous: because the authority of Ambrose explaining the saying of the Apostle places it from the Holy Spirit. But it is true that it is not necessary, for one who speaks truth in this way, to have the Holy Spirit, as is clear from the aforementioned.

Certain things, however, useful for this, were noted above.

DISTINCTIO XLVII

Divisio Textus

Indeed, the will of God is always efficacious, etc.

In this distinction, the Master returns to the proposition, showing the will to be efficacious. And it is divided into three parts: in the first of which he proves the proposition through the words of Augustine. In the second, he explains against which will something can be done, and against which nothing, there, B. In the third, as we said above, the will of God is understood in different ways, etc. However, he makes a summary of the said things, there, C.

From the aforementioned, it is clear, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Will Of God Is Always Efficacious

Whether the will of God is always efficacious

Here arises the doubt, Whether it is true what is said, that the will of God is always efficacious?

It seems, however, that it is not.
§1. Let us suppose someone is predestined: it is certain that the good pleasure of God is that he be saved. I ask, therefore: either this person can sin by free will, or not? If so: let it be supposed he dies immediately in that sin: then indeed he will be damned, and the will of God is hindered.

§2. Likewise, evils happen as we see every day: either therefore by the will of good pleasure, or against the will of good pleasure. If by the will of good pleasure: then God wills evils: and he who wills evils has a bad will: therefore God according to this could have a bad will, which is absurd. But if against the will of God: then the proposition is held, because then the will is hindered.

§3. Likewise, it is more noble and more powerful, against which nothing is done and nothing besides it, than against which nothing is done and something besides it: therefore the will of God would seem more noble, if nothing were done against it, and nothing besides it: therefore it seems that evils ought not to be said to be done besides it, as the Master says in the Book in solving the aforementioned reasoning.

§4. Likewise, Genesis 44: I am. If therefore this is of the power of Pharaoh: without your command no one will move hand or foot in all the land of Egypt of man, so that nothing is done besides it, much more is it of the power of the divine will.

Solution. This is easy to determine, if what has been previously held is recalled to memory, because it must be conceded that evils are done besides the divine will, as the Master says, and in the last authority it is taken without for against.

To the first, however, it must be said that if this one is predestined, the will of good pleasure is for salvation, and without doubt he will be saved: and yet he can well not be saved, but it is not compatible with the will of good pleasure, that he die in sin, although it is possible in itself, and this has been shown above.

To the second it must be said, that there is a will considered in itself, and from this proceeds the said reasoning: and there is a will governing others, and it is of the nature of that will, that it does not compel those things which are under it, lest it take away their own nature from them: because otherwise the reason for praise and virtue would be destroyed, as has been said above: and thus besides that will something can be done.

Articulus 2 — Whether Evil Is Ordered Or Disordered

Whether evil is ordered, or disordered?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, A, around the middle: So wisely sought, etc.

For by this he means that evil is orderable: and this does not seem so, because

1. Evil is the corruption of order: and whatever corrupts order is disordered: therefore evil is disordered.
2. Likewise, nothing is so well ordered that evil does not corrupt it: therefore it seems that it is contrary to order.
3. Likewise, every good is determined according to the reason of order, because it is ordered to another, or order is to it as the first good to which that is ordered: therefore it is ordered to that: therefore it seems that everything ordered is good, but evil is ordered, therefore evil is good, which is false.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: Augustine in book XI of the City of God speaks of the order of the universe, which is distinguished by certain antithetical interpositions of evil: as Ecclesiasticus says, God created all things double: one against one, and two against two, and against evil good, and the like. Likewise, Isaiah 45:7: I am the Lord creating light, and making darkness: creating evil, and making good. And Augustine introduces the example of music, in which harmony is sometimes made by the interposition of silence. Therefore also evil, sometimes interrupting good, contributes to the beauty and harmonious composition of the universe.

Solution. It must be said that evil, considered in itself and by itself, has neither order, nor cause, nor intention, nor will, as Dionysius says: but it is unfruitful and sluggish: yet compared to another, it has an order which is not placed in itself, but in another with respect to it: just as the beauty of white next to black is not placed in black, but in comparison to black in white: and in this way Augustine speaks, and the authorities introduced proceed. However, the reasons introduced here proceed in the first way.

And in how many ways good is elicited from such has been explained above in the preceding distinction.

Articulus 3 — Why Nothing Can Be Done Against Permission, And Yet Something Is Done Against Precept And Counsel And Prohibition

Why can nothing be done against permission, and yet something is done against precept and counsel and prohibition?

Then it is questioned concerning this which is said in the second part, there, B, around the beginning:

By His permission, all evils are done, etc.

For it is doubtful why nothing can be done against permission: and something is done against precept, and counsel, and prohibition.

1. For permission, since it is with respect to evil, is more distant from the will of good pleasure than precept or counsel, which is with respect to good: therefore, less ought to be done against precept than against permission.
2. Likewise, on that of Psalm 104, 37: He brought them out with silver and gold, the Gloss says that sometimes the same is precept and permitted: therefore, if something is done against precept, something can also be done against permission.
3. Likewise, according to that Gloss, precept and permission seem to be one sign: therefore, they are not five, as was said above.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that nothing is done against permission, as we said above: because it is joined to the work as operation: hence this is not because it is with respect to evil, but by reason of the existence of the work: and therefore it is not necessary that it be so in precept or counsel with respect to which there is still freedom of doing or not doing. Hence that objection does not put the cause for the cause: because it is not the cause that nothing can be done against it due to proximity to the will of good pleasure or distance.

To the other, it must be said that the same according to the same and with respect to the same cannot be precept and permitted, but with respect to different things, namely as permitted with respect to those who carried away out of avarice: and precept with respect to those who out of obedience. And through this, the response to the following is also clear.

However, it must be noted that permission is said in four ways, namely with respect to and this is properly called concession, as in 1 Corinthians 7, 25: Concerning virgins, I have no commandment of the Lord, etc., on that, But if they do not contain themselves, let them marry: and on that, Whom she wills, let her marry, only in the Lord: the Gloss says that he permits virgins to marry, that is, he grants. It is also said that God permits what is not prohibited, and it is with respect to venial evil, as on that, Be angry, and sin not, the Gloss says that he permits what is of necessity. It is also said to permit what is not punished with temporal punishment, although it is punished with eternal, as in Matthew 19, 8, a bill of divorce is permitted to be given to wives due to the hardness of their hearts, as the Lord says. Fourthly, it is said to permit what is not impeded, and yet it is restrained since it is evil: and this is only the permission sign of the divine will.

DISTINCTIO XLVIII

Divisio Textus

It must also be known that sometimes the will of man willing the same thing is evil, etc. In this last distinction, he discusses the conformity of our will to the divine will.

And it is divided into three parts: in the first of which the Master touches upon the measure of conformity in general. In the second, however, the manner of conformity in the passion of Christ, there, B, "That also is not beyond—". In the third, however, he shows how we ought to have the same disposition in the passions of the Saints, which God wills, there, E, "If indeed it is asked, Whether in the same way it is to be felt about the passions and martyrdoms of the Saints?"

Articulus 1 — Whether It Is Possible For Us To Conform Our Will To The Divine Will

Whether it is possible for us to conform our will to the divine will?

Here, however, five doubts arise first: of which the first is, Whether it is possible for us to conform our will to the divine will?
Second, In what does that conformity consist?
Third, however, If that conformity is in many things, whether one sometimes excludes another, or all can be together?

Fourth, however, Whether all are bound to conformity, or not?
Fifth and last, Whether we are bound to conform in the willed, which does not agree with us to will: but nevertheless we know that God wills it?

To the first, it is proceeded thus:
1. There is no conformity of infinite distances: the will of God and the will of man are infinitely distant: therefore there can be no conformity between them.

As the heavens are exalted above the earth, so are my ways exalted above your ways, and your thoughts. Therefore also the will from the will: therefore there is no proportion or conformity.

1. Likewise, on Psalm 32:1: "Rejoice, ye just, in the Lord": the Gloss says: As much as God is distant from man, so much is the will of God distant from the will of man. From which follows the same.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Whoever shall do the will of my Father who is in heaven, he is my brother, and sister, and mother. Therefore we can conform in the willed.

1. Likewise, on that Psalm 32:1: "Praise befits the upright": the Gloss says: The upright are those who direct their hearts according to the will of God, which is the rule of our will.

Solution. It must be said that there is a conformity of perfect assimilation, or of determined proportion: and in this we cannot conform. There is also conformity in something, which is conformity imitating the perfection of His will in the willed and the form of willing and the end, and in this we can conform to Him. And through this the solution to the first is clear.

To the second, however, it must be said that Isaiah speaks of the wicked, whose hearts had willed and causes of willing in earthly things, with which God did not agree: because they did not seek nor will heavenly things.

To the other, it must be said that this is true of conformity according to the homeland: because in that we cannot, nor even in that which is of perfection, although we can imitate according to our possibility.

Articulus 2 — In What The Conformity Of The Divine Will And Ours Consists

In what does the conformity of the divine will and ours consist?

Secondly, it is asked, In what does this conformity of wills consist?

However, it seems that it cannot be in anything. 1. For in created wills there is no conformity except in the willed, which is the reason of the will and the cause and object: but in divine matters, the will is not caused by the willed, but rather the reverse, as was held above: therefore it seems that there can never be conformity in the will.

1. Furthermore, let us grant that it is in the willed: in the text it is proven that this is not meritorious conformity: but only about that is the question: therefore conformity is not considered in the one willed.
2. If perhaps it is said that there is conformity in the end of the will, which end is willed by God: so that man wills what He wills, for something that God wills. Then if someone were to will to steal in order to feed the poor, he would conform his will to the divine will: because God wills the poor to be fed, for which he wills to steal: therefore it seems that neither in the reason of the will, as the first argument proves, nor in the willed, nor in the end of the will can this conformity be.
3. If perhaps you say that we ought to will something that we know Him to will. Still, it must be insisted: because I know Him to will what He operates: and yet I can will it demeritoriously, as is in the text from the example of the two sons at the death of the father.

Finally, it is asked, To which will ought we to conform ourselves, whether to the will of the sign, or to the will of good pleasure?

It seems, moreover, that [we ought to conform] to the will of good pleasure: because.

§ 1. There is greater conformity to the will which is will simply speaking [simpliciter], than to that which is only in a qualified sense [secundum quid]: but the will of good pleasure is will simply speaking, while the will of sign is so in a qualified sense: therefore, there ought to be conformity to the good pleasure.

§ 2. Again, sometimes it concerns that which God does not will: therefore, we would then be conformed in a qualified sense, and deformed in will simply speaking.

ON THE CONTRARY: No one can will except what is known: the will of good pleasure is unknown to us: therefore, we are not bound to be conformed to it in the will of good pleasure.

MOREOVER it is asked: To which sign ought we rather to be conformed?

It seems, moreover, that [we should conform] to the precept: because we are obliged to precepts: therefore, since we are also obliged to conformity of will, conformity will be according to the precept.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. A prohibition also obliges: therefore, we are bound to conform to it.

§ 2. Again, an operation declares and shows the good pleasure of God, because whatever He operates, concerning this is His good pleasure: since therefore the greatest conformity is that of good pleasure, we are most bound to conform ourselves to the will of operation.

FURTHERMORE, it is asked on account of certain people: Are we bound to conform ourselves in will to the will of sign which is permission?

It seems that we are: because if God were to unwill [nollet], that which He permits would not happen: therefore, it ought to please us, as it seems: because otherwise we do not harmonize with His will.

Solution. It must be said that there is conformity in a qualified sense, and conformity simply speaking. Conformity in a qualified sense is in the willed object [volito] alone: and this alone is neither demeritorious nor meritorious: because it consists solely in the matter of the will, and a material principle is open to opposites, and can be informed in any way whatever, whether well or badly. But conformity simply speaking is according to two modes, namely by the perfection of the way [viae], and the perfection of the homeland [patriae]: and by the perfection of the way in two further modes, namely of sufficiency, and of abundance. The perfection of sufficiency is in two things, namely in the form of willing, and the end of the will, and not necessarily in the matter, but sometimes yes, and sometimes no. Now I call the form of willing charity: so that out of a similar charity I may will whatever I will, out of which God wills that which He wills: and the end of the will is that for the sake of which it is, such as the glory of God to which all our will is referred. These two suffice even with a diversity of the willed object, as is clear in the text concerning the example of the good son. But the perfection of the homeland is according to four modes, so that one wills the same thing, and from the same form, and on account of the same thing, and what God wills him to will: and the first is as the matter concerning which the will is, the second as the form, the third as the end, the fourth as the effective motive.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the will is not considered in this regard: because this is a property of the divine will, according as it is the cause of creatures: and in this mode it is not compared to us.

To the other it must be said that this reason touches only upon that conformity which is in a qualified sense, and not simply speaking.

To the other it must be said that in this there is no conformity: because God does not will that we do evil for the sake of good.

To the other it is also conceded, that there is no conformity except in a qualified sense and imperfectly.

To that which is further asked, I say without prejudice, that because we do not know the good pleasure of God, it suffices if we are conformed to the precept and the operation: but if we were to know the good pleasure, I well concede that we would be more bound to be conformed to it.

To what is objected concerning prohibition, it must be said that it consists rather in nilling [nolente] than in willing: and therefore in it there is no conformity simply speaking.

To what is objected concerning permission, it must be said that, as has been established, God does not will that which He permits: but it happens beyond [praeter] the will of God: and therefore with respect to it there is no conformity. And some say the contrary of this on account of the objection made: and this I reckon an error.

Articulus 3 — Whether, If In Several Things There Is Conformity Of The Divine Will And Ours, One Excludes Another By Repugnance

Whether, if there is a conformity of the divine will and ours in many things, one excludes another through repugnance?

Thirdly it is asked: If that conformity is in many things, as has already been established, whether one excludes another as if through repugnance?

And it seems that it does: because § 1. In the Gloss on the words of the Apostle to the Romans 5:9, a threefold willing is distinguished, namely of nature, of grace, and of vice: but according to the willing of vice it is certain that no conformity is considered; nature, however, is not repugnant to God: therefore according to it there can be conformity: and similarly grace is always conformed. Nevertheless, we see in Christ that one seems to exclude another, when He said, "Not as I will, but as Thou wilt" .

§ 2. Again, there are in us four modes of wills, namely nature, and the deliberative will, and the will of grace, and that which is the will of reason as it is nature: and this is proved in the third book of the Sentences, distinction 17 . But it is certain that deliberative reason is sometimes repugnant to nature in the willed object. Therefore it seems that if there is conformity according to one, there cannot be according to another.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. It is said in the text that it matters much what is congruous for a man to will, and what is congruous for God to will: therefore, God wills us to will what is congruous to us according to nature: but these are natural things, such as the preservation of life, and the like: therefore in these we are bound to conform ourselves to His will: therefore that conformity is not excluded by the will of reason or of grace.

§ 2. Again, God operates in nature in a twofold way, namely according to the natural course of propagating things according to the seminal causes which He inserted into nature, and He operates above nature through the power of miracles: and the one is not contraried by the other, because Augustine says that He cannot act against the causes which He inserted into nature: therefore, similarly, since He has inserted in us the will of nature, He Himself does not demand any conformity of will which excludes it.

§ 3. Again, we see that He Himself commanded this, that we should relieve the needs of the poor: therefore we are bound to do this: therefore we are bound to will that they not be poor: and yet we know that He Himself wills them to be poor, because otherwise they would not be poor: therefore it seems that conformity consists in many things, of which one does not exclude another.

§ 4. Again, often God commands one thing, and operates another: since, therefore, these are signs to which we are chiefly bound to conform our will, it seems that conformity does not consist according to the same thing, but according to diverse things, of which one does not exclude another.

Solution. To this I say without prejudice, that conformity is considered according to diverse things. But just as it is in nature, that diverse movers are referred to the same mobile object in diverse ways, but all follow one which predominates: so it is in diverse conformities of diverse wills, that all follow one conformity, and yet each retains its own proper movement of conformity: as, for example, the first mover in the first mobile body has nothing but one simple movement: but in the second, the second mover has the movement of the first from East to West, and in this it is conformed to the first: and it has a proper movement from West to East, in which it does not discord according to the intention of the movement, although in the movement of the stars it seems to have something proper: because it moves with that movement as the first mover impresses into it the desire of causing the mixture of elements for generation: and there cannot be a mixture, unless with two movements moving against each other, one is forced to go into the other: and this is the cause of the movement of the latitude of the stars and planets from North to South, and from South to North. Therefore, in the intention of moving there is conformity: because even in their proper movement the second movers do not have a movement except that which the first mover impresses and flows into them. So I say, that there is in man a twofold will following God's will moving us, namely the will of reason, and the will of nature. The will of reason is conformed in a threefold way if it can be, namely in the willed object, in the form of willing, and in the end. But the will of nature is conformed in this, that it is congruous for us to will it, that is, what God wills us to will, as the Master says in the third book of the Sentences , and its movement is not excluded, although the movement of reason orders and dominates it: for it would seem impious and cruel, and against the congruity of human nature, that concerning ourselves and others we should will cruel things, such as that men suffer, and be poor, and be afflicted, and that those useful to the Church should die when they are dying, and the like. Hence I believe that we are bound not to will this by human piety, although we commit them to the Lord according to the will of reason.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that in Christ there was both conformities: for He willed not to die by the will of nature: and God the Father willed Him to will this: and thus He was conformed: and this conformity here is called according to human congruity. And He willed to die according to reason. And these are not opposed: just as also in higher things there are diverse movements, yet not opposed, but all are conformed in the intention of the first moving principle, which influences moving to all others.

To the other it must be said, that the will of nature never of itself is repugnant to the will of reason, although sometimes it is about the contradictory: but under reason it shows what is congruous to it, and what God wills it to will: for if it were to begin to rebel against reason, since the latter is upright, it would no longer be the will of nature, but of vice: just as if an inferior mover were to wish to impede a superior one from moving.

Articulus 4 — Whether All Are Bound To Conform Their Will To The Divine Will

Whether all are bound to conform their will to the divine will?

Fourthly it is asked, whether all are bound to conform their will to the divine will?

And concerning this two things are asked: of which the first is, whether all are bound simply speaking to conformity? But the second, whether they are bound to that special conformity which is in the willed object?

To the first it is objected thus: § 1. All are bound to be upright: but they are not upright unless they are conformed, as the Gloss introduced earlier says: therefore all are bound to be conformed in will.

§ 2. Again, all are bound to the precepts of charity: but charity makes friends: therefore all are bound to be friends. But

Tully says in the book on Friendship, that it belongs to friends to will the same thing therefore all are bound to this, as it seems: therefore they are bound to be conformed in will, as it seems.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Some are obstinate, and some, what is more, are damned, who cannot conform their will: therefore they are bound to the impossible. But if you say that they are absolved by obstinacy and damnation: then they bear profit from their malice, which is unfitting.

§ 2. Again, someone, while he is sinning, cannot conform: therefore he sins by a double sin, both because of the act of sin which he does, and because he does not conform his will to the divine will.

Again, someone is bound continuously to conform himself, if he is bound: therefore as long as he does not conform, he continuously omits [to do so]: therefore he continuously sins, as it seems.

TO THE SECOND it is objected thus, and they are the common objections of all, from the Gloss on that of Psalm 100:4: "A froward heart did not cleave to me": which says that

§ 1. "He has a froward and distorted heart, who does not will what God wills" therefore when we know Him to will something, we are bound to will it.

§ 2. Again, God cannot will anything but what is just and good: but we are altogether bound to be just and good: therefore we are bound to will what He [wills], because not unless conformed in will can we be just and good.

ON THE CONTRARY: If I had one will, and you were to will the contradictory, those two wills would be discordant: therefore similarly, with God willing one thing, and you the contradictory, they are discordant wills: and yet Augustine in the text praises him who wills the contrary of that which God wills: therefore we are not bound to conformity in the willed object.

Furthermore it is asked, whether there can be contrarieties between God's good will, and man's good will?

It seems that there can: because § 1. Two brothers had contrary wills, as is said in the text: therefore that which is contrary to the will of the other, is also contraried to every will conformed to that one: but God's will is conformed to him who is bad: therefore the good brother's will is contraried to the divine will.

§ 2. Again, when God wills something, it is good and holy, because He Himself willing this is His goodness: therefore he who does not will this, is contraried to the goodness and justice and holiness which is God Himself: and yet he is good because he is praised by Augustine: therefore two just and holy wills can be contrary.

§ 3. Again, an intellect dissonant from the first truth, is contrary to the first truth: therefore a will dissonant from the willed object of the first goodness and will [is contrary to it]: but such is the one which Augustine praises in the text: therefore they are contrary, and yet good and praiseworthy.

Solution. It must be said that all are bound to the conformity of the way, as was said before: and this is for an upright heart to be directed, namely to the form and end of the divine will, and to will what God wills us to will. However, as to that which is objected concerning Tully, it must be said that it is understood thus, that it belongs to friends to return to one willed object through the intention of the end, and not always of the matter.

To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the obstinate can lay aside their obstinacy, and then conform: and therefore they are not absolved from the obligation. But the damned are not in a state of conforming themselves: and therefore because they did not conform themselves when they could, it is inflicted upon them in perpetuity also to be able to do nothing unto repentance, and therefore they report a loss, not a profit: for it is an intolerable loss to be unable in perpetuity to be conformed.

To the other it is said commonly, that affirmative precepts oblige always, but not for always [semper, sed non ad semper]: and therefore the sinner does not always omit while he sins: but he omits while he actually thinks that he ought to prepare himself for the grace of conformity, and does not do it.

To the SECOND it must be said, in my judgment, that we are not bound except in the mode stated above, namely that our will ought to follow without resisting [non resultando]: yet we can have our own [will] in a movement that does not resist: and this is what some say fittingly enough, that the will ought to be conformed, but a conditioned velleity, namely if God were to will it to happen otherwise, can be not conformed: and this velleity by which we would will another thing if God so willed, some call an imperfect will. And the sayings of all revert to the same thing.

To the other it must be said, that the will is not just from the willed objects, but from the mode and end of willing: and therefore it is not necessary that there be conformity altogether in the willed object.

To that which is further asked, to all except the last there is one solution, namely that conformity in someone is not considered with respect to the material principle alone, but with respect to the form and the end: and therefore those wills which do not concord in matter, nor even discord, because one follows the other, and they have the same forms and ends, are concordant: but those which are conformed in matter, and have diverse and contrary forms and ends, are deformed.

To the LAST it must be said, that it is not similar concerning the intellect and the will: because the true is the whole cause of the intellect according to the species of speculation. But the willed object is not so related to the will: rather it is necessary that the form and end be present, as was said before.

Articulus 5 — Whether We Are Bound To Conform In The Object Willed Which We Know God Wills, Yet It Does Not Befit Us To Will This

Whether we are bound to conform ourselves in the willed object which we know God wills, but yet it is not congruous for us to will this?

Fifthly and lastly it is asked, whether we are bound to conform ourselves in the willed object which we know God wills, but yet it is not congruous for us to will this?

It seems, however, that we are not. § 1. Micah 2:11: "Would that I were not a man having the spirit, and rather spoke a lie." Behold, he desires what is congruous for him to will: because it is congruous for no one to will the destruction of his own nation and of his own people, which he had prophesied: and thus he knew that God willed it, and yet by willing he desires the contraries.

§ 2. Again, Jeremiah 28:1ff: when Hananiah, a certain false prophet, was prophesying that the city was not to be handed over into the hand of the king of Babylon, although Jeremiah knew that the Lord willed the contrary, out of human compassion he said: "Amen, the Lord do so": the Gloss there says: "He desires that to happen which he falsely states God to will" .

§ 3. Again, if the Blessed Virgin willed Christ to suffer torment, then she was a wondrous mother, since she so grieved, that of her it is said, Luke 2:35 [Albert cites 2:33]: "And thy own soul a sword shall pierce." Therefore we are not bound to will what is not congruous out of human piety for us to will, even when we know God to will it, because we see Him fulfilling this.

§ 4. Again, the Saints bewail the sins of men, even though they know that God wills them to be in sins, as some say: but no one wills this which he deplores.

§ 5. Again, let us suppose it has been revealed to me concerning someone that he is to be damned; I still ought to pray for him and out of my will: therefore I ought to will him to be saved.

§ 6. Again, let us suppose my own damnation has been revealed to me: if therefore I will myself to be damned, I will to sin: and this is against conformity: therefore by doing contrary to conformity, I will be conformed, which is absurd.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. If I am not bound to will what I know God wills, then I can will the contrary: therefore also do the contrary: therefore I can without sinning act against His will, which is false.

§ 2. Again, Augustine says that he is impious to whom divine providence is not pleasing: but providence is concerning all willed objects: therefore those ought to be our willed objects, and to please us.

Solution. It must be said as before, that our will ought to follow, but yet it can have something proper to itself. And through this the solution to the first two is clear: and there is no deformity: because God wills us to will this. Through this also the solution to that which is objected concerning the Blessed Virgin is clear.

To the other it must be said, that it is founded upon something false: because God never willed the sin of anyone: but all sins happen beyond the will of God, as was proved before in the text of the preceding distinction.

To the other two it must be said, that they are foolish positionings: because such a revelation does not take away the freedom of choice: therefore neither is there a returning to God's faculty. Hence no one is so revealed to be damned but that he can be saved: and I reckon it foolishness what some say, that in such a case he would not sin who willed himself to be damned, and another to be damned: for this is altogether contrary to the order of nature and of grace and of reason, that one should will himself to be separated from God. Hence in my judgment God does not will us to will this: nay rather, He wills us to will the contrary by every will of nature and of reason and of grace.

Articulus 6 — Whether All The Saints, And Especially The Blessed Virgin And The Apostles, Willed The Passion Of Christ

Whether all the Saints, and especially the Blessed Virgin and the Apostles, willed the passion of Christ?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there at chapter D, "From which the question is solved," etc. For it seems that all the Saints willed the passion of Christ: because all were expecting the redemption: therefore they desired the death of Christ.

Again it is asked, whether the Blessed Virgin and the Apostles willed it?

Solution. According to what was previously held, this is no question [i.e., this poses no difficulty]: because the Master well determines in the text, that all willed the end of the passion, and the passion itself referred to the end, but not the passion simply speaking: because this would be against that which is congruous for us to will, namely the punishments and death of an innocent and the best man. Thus also is it to be judged concerning the passions of the Saints. But in comparison to the agents and killers, in no way ought we to will it: because neither did God so will it, as is held in the text.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Demons Persuaded The Jews Who Were Crucifying Christ Concerning His Passion

Whether the demons persuaded the Jews who were crucifying Christ to His passion?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says in the last chapter E, there, around the end: "Because they did by a bad will the very thing that God by a good will willed to be done," etc.

For it can be asked, whether the demons persuaded this, or not?

For it seems that they did not: because § 1. Matthew 27:19, on that verse, "Have thou nothing to do with that just man": the Gloss says that just as the devil initiated death through a woman, so also now he willed to impede the death which is the cause of life through a woman . Therefore it seems that they did this by their own malice, and not by the persuasion of the demon.

§ 2. Again, Peter was called Satan, because he willed Christ not to die: but he was not Satan by nature: therefore by a similitude of will: therefore Satan did not will Christ to die, as it seems.

§ 3. Again, no one wills that by which his empire is destroyed: but through the death of Christ the empire of the devil was destroyed: therefore the demons, since they are most astute, did not will this.

But against this is what the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 2:8: "Which none of the princes of this world knew: for if they had known it, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory." And one Gloss expounds this of the demons therefore they persuaded Him to be crucified.

Solution. It must be said that at first they persuaded it, but afterwards when they sensed the efficacy of His deity through the joy of the Saints and the congruity of the time and of prophecy, they grieved, but could not revoke it, for the reason that then human malice willed to perpetrate the decree of the Father concerning our redemption accomplished through Christ: to whom is honor and empire for ever and ever. Amen.

LIBER II

PROLOGUS

Prologue

D. ALBERT THE GREAT, BISHOP OF REGENSBURG, ORDER OF PREACHERS, COMMENTARIES ON THE SECOND BOOK OF SENTENCES. PROLOGUE.

I saw the Lord sitting upon a high and elevated throne: and the house was full of His majesty: and those things which were under Him filled the temple. This word is read in Isaiah, vi, 1: and from it is drawn the material of this Book.

For by this which is said: I saw, the intellect of the Author is noted: because this he could not know, except by the Spirit teaching.

But by this which is said: the Lord, the exclusion of errors posited in the beginning of this Book in the first distinction is noted. For by this is signified one Creator and ruler of the world: not as various erring ones said that there are diverse and various principles.

But by this which is said: Sitting upon a high and elevated throne, a double superior creature is noted. For in the word a double elevation of the throne is noted, when it is said high and elevated. Therefore, one throne which is high, is the angelic nature, in which as on a throne the Lord sits: as the Psalm Lxxix, 2 says: Who sits upon the Cherubim. Whence also it is said in this vision, because the Seraphim stood above it. And again, Your throne, O God, is forever and ever. Concerning this high throne is the first part of the Book, after the proemial part in which the Creator of all creatures is determined, who is called in the beginning of this word, as we said. Another throne elevated, as if outside the matter and impressions of corruptible and generable things which are under the sphere of the moon, elevated. For that does not have height as the first, but properly elevation: because it, which from the common matter of all bodies was made by the Creator, thus in its form is perfected, that neither in place, nor in motion, nor in impression, it agrees with the lower. And therefore it is said, Isa. LXvi, 1: Heaven is my throne, but the earth is the footstool of my feet. This is also what the Philosopher says in the first book of On the Heavens and the World, that all the ancients agree in this, that heaven was the seat and habitation of God.

But by the following word: The house was full of His majesty, another part of the visible creature is taken, which is from the matter of generable and corruptible things: because the house is this world, which is entirely filled with creatures indicating the majesty of God, by this that all proclaim: He made us, and not we ourselves. And concerning this part both of the superior and inferior creature is treated in the second part of this treatise: so that the proemial part contains one distinction. But the first part of the executive part, which is about the high throne, which is the angelic nature, continues from the second distinction which begins there, About the angelic up to the twelfth which begins there, thus nature, etc. These about the angelic. In the second, however, which begins there, it is determined about the condition of nature, etc. the superior and inferior corporeal nature: which as to the superior is signified by the high throne, as to the inferior by the majesty filling the house, that is, the world, and lasts up to the sixteenth distinction which begins there, These things having been discussed, etc.

In the second part of this word the third part of the treatise is noted. For by this which it says: Those things which were under Him, etc., the special subjection of man to God and the inferior state is noted. For as Augustine says: God created the angel near Himself, but the matter of corruptible things near nothing, which also the material world follows from it: and He placed man in the middle between Himself and the world: so that it might serve Him, and all this might yield to the good of man.

By this which it says: Those things which were under Him, it notes the inferior state of man, and the order to obey. But by the consignification of time in the word: Were, the imperfection of obedience is noted, by which he fell: because that word consignifies the imperfect past, whose act is not completed to the present, as of the perfect past. But by the temple is noted the corporeal and spiritual paradise, in which as in a temple for the conversation of holiness and experience man was placed. For it is called a temple from templor, aris, which is a word we do not have in use, except in its compounds, as contemplor. And this is what is said in Genesis: He placed man in the paradise of pleasure, to work, and. And Augustine explains it about the work of experience, by which in creatures he might keep that which the Creator uses.

But by this which is said: They filled, the propagation of generation is noted, which in blessing the first parents received, when it was said to them: Increase and multiply. And concerning these things is treated from the sixteenth distinction to the end of this Book.

And by this the material, and division, and mode of proceeding is clear.

OF THE SECOND BOOK OF SENTENCES OF PETER LOMBARD, ON THE CREATION AND FORMATION OF CORPORAL AND SPIRITUAL THINGS, AND MANY OTHER THINGS PERTAINING TO IT.

DISTINCTIO I

Articulus 8 — Whether The Number Of Men To Be Saved Is According To The Number Of The Fallen Angels, Namely Whether The Number Of Men To Be Saved Makes The Tenth Order

Whether the number of humans to be saved corresponds to the number of falling Angels? namely, Whether the number of humans to be saved makes a tenth order?

§ 13. Then it is inquired concerning this which he says last, there, G, It is also to be noted, that the tenth order is read to be concerning humans, etc.

§ 14. For from this it seems that the number of humans to be assumed corresponds to the number of falling Angels: and this is what certain authorities seem to say. On that Psalm 44:17, You shall make them princes, the Gloss says: "He chose the poor to exalt to the orders of heaven, which are made from humans and Angels." [130]

§ 15. Also, on that, Every place that your foot shall tread, etc., the Gloss says: "If I shall have been able to conquer the devil, if I shall have merited that the Lord crush him under my feet, consequently I will have his place in the heavens." [131]

§ 16. Also, in the same place, "He shall not have his place, who does not tame all the motions of anger."

§ 17. Also, to this are those things which the Master says in the Text from Gregory and Augustine.

§ 1. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Angels excel humans in natural [endowments]: therefore it seems that [they do] also in grace: therefore humans cannot arrive at the state of Angels: therefore it is necessary that they make a tenth order.

§ 2. 2. Also, let it be that the Angel had not fallen (as Anselm says), human beings were foreseen for glory: therefore they would be saved: therefore then, as it seems, they would not have entered into the place of the falling Angels: therefore they would make a tenth order.

§ 3. 3. Also, humans will have bodies: therefore they will be less noble in this respect than a wholly spiritual substance: therefore the same place and order of beatitude is not fitting for them: therefore it is necessary to constitute a tenth order.

§ 4. 4. Also, this seems to follow from the Gospel of Luke 15:8 et seq., where the human is signified by the tenth drachma, which would not be unless they made a tenth order.

§ 5. 5. Also, no wise person coordinates those things which are not of the same order according to nature: but a human and an Angel are not of the same nature: therefore neither are they of the same order according to nature: therefore they are not to be coordinated in glory, as it seems.

§ 6. 6. Furthermore, the Blessed Virgin at least seems to make a special order: because she is exalted above all the choirs of Angels to the heavenly kingdoms, according to Jerome.

§ 7. SOLUTION. As for one part of this question, namely how many are taken up, there is no one who can answer, except Him alone to whom the number of the elect to be placed in supernal felicity is known: but nevertheless the Master touches upon two opinions in the Text. But the third is of those who say that as many virgins will be taken up as there were falling and standing Angels, and of others as many as there are all others: and what is true concerning this, no one can prove.

§ 8. To the other part of the question, namely whether a human makes a tenth order? It must be said that it is tenth in number, and thus makes a tenth, as the Master says: and [whether] it is tenth in degree, and thus it will never be a tenth.

§ 9. TO THOSE THINGS which are objected to the contrary, it must be said that although Angels excel in natural [gifts], they nevertheless do not [necessarily excel] in grace: because grace is given according to the quantity of merit and preparation, not according to natural [gifts] alone.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that [a human] would not make a tenth in degree: because the fact that he supplies the place of the falling ones, this is not the cause of the creation of the human: but this happens by accident, namely because he fell. Nevertheless he would have been saved, and exalted in glory according to his own degree, and not into the ninth degree, if he had not fallen.

§ 11. To the next it must be said that it is called the tenth drachma with respect to number, and not with respect to making a tenth degree.

§ 12. To the next it must be said that some have said (I know not why, since no reason persuades this) that humans will be in the aqueous heaven, and Angels in the empyrean: but this is nothing: because our bodies will then be ennobled beyond the nobility of the empyrean: and therefore there is no objection concerning the body: and through this the response to the third is also evident.

§ 13. To the last it must be said that the Blessed Virgin has a special degree: but she does not make an order: because an order sounds of a multitude in one common degree: but to her this is special on account of the dignity of the Son.

Divisio Textus

It follows, God said: Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together into one place, etc. Here it is treated concerning the final distinction about which the Master determines three things, namely, how the distinction was made, and where the waters were gathered, and why the seas are called in the plural.

Concerning the first, however, three things can be asked: of which the first is about the sufficiency of the works of distinction. The second, concerning the plants, whether they pertain to distinction or to adornment? The third, concerning harmful plants from moisture and form, such as thorns and poisonous ones, whether they were made then or not?

130. Ps. 44:17 (Vulgate).

Divisio Textus

The proemial part is divided into two parts according to the two works of the wise man, namely, not to lie about what he knows, and to be able to manifest the unknowing: but first the Master excludes errors concerning the principle of the universe, and secondly shows the exit of all creatures in their kinds from one principle, there, C, around the middle: Therefore let us believe in the things, etc.

The first of these is subdivided into two: in the first of which the Master specifically excludes the error of Plato: but in the second the error which they say is of Aristotle, there, B, towards the end: Aristotle, etc.

Likewise, the prior has three parts: in the first of which he shows how by the word of Moses the error is excluded in general: and the errors of others. But in the second he shows what it is to create, and what creation is: and distinguishes it from making and operating, there, AS § 2: And to create properly, etc. But in the third he returns to the proposition, showing what is understood when God is said to make something, from, B, Nevertheless it must be known, etc.

Here questions arise: and first concerning the triple exposition of that which the Master sets forth as the foundation of his whole intention, namely, in the beginning God created heaven and earth.

Articulus 1 — In How Many Ways That Authority, In The Beginning God Created Heaven And Earth, Is Expounded

In how many ways is that authority expounded: In the beginning God created heaven and earth?

In how many ways is that authority expounded:

In the beginning God created heaven and earth?

There is indeed one exposition, that is, in the Son who is the beginning, God created heaven and earth, that is, the higher and lower, that is, the visible and invisible.

Another is, In the beginning of time God created heaven and earth, that is, the angelic and corporeal nature.

However, concerning the first thus: 1. Beginning sounds power: therefore it is more appropriate to the Father than to the Son.

1. Furthermore, if appropriation is made, it is either made by reason of the act, or by reason of the name of the beginning, or by reason of the preposition: because there are no more there. However, it is clear that not by reason of the act: because the act of creating is common to the three persons: therefore. Likewise, not by reason of the name: because the beginning said essentially, as it is taken here, is also common to the three. Likewise, it is either the beginning in the reason of the first, or in the reason of the proximate. If in the reason of the first, then it is more fitting to the Father than to the Son: because the Father is the beginning not from a beginning, but the Son is the beginning from a beginning. If by reason of the proximate, On the contrary: Thus it seems to fit the Holy Spirit: because goodness, as it is held below, is the cause inclining to act according to the act. Likewise, not by reason of the preposition: because that names containment, and this fits the Holy Spirit, as it is held in the Gloss on the words of the Apostle to the Romans 11, 36, on that: From him, and through him, and in him. That in him, it says because of the Holy Spirit: therefore by reason of that it is not appropriated to the Son.

2. If you would say, that the Father works through the Son: and this is signified, when it is said in the beginning to create, that is, in the Son, or through the Son. On the contrary: According to this, this is true, the Father creates through the Son: but the Word creates, according to which it is active, and in the agent being is signified, it is clear that it signifies essence: therefore creation is a divine action of essence. Hence it proceeds thus: Creation is essence: therefore to create is to be: just as essence and being differ: so creation and creating differ. Hence further: To create is to be: the Father creates through the Son: therefore the Father is through the Son: which is false: therefore this was not to be conceded, the Father works through the Son, or creates through the Son.

3. Again, Why did he not say: The Father creates through the Son, if he intends this: since he would have said this more easily than that?

4. Likewise, If through names a middle cause (as almost all say) which fits the Son, why did he not say: Through the beginning God created heaven and earth, just as he said: In the beginning God created heaven and earth?

It is also objected against the second exposition which is, In the beginning of time he created, etc.

For it seems this is false > because 1. Time (as Boethius says) is the measure of the motion of movables: but there was no motion in the beginning, because every motion (as the Philosopher says) is from subject to subject, nor can anything be moved that is not in act, because motion follows form, and not before it (as the Philosopher says): therefore neither was time from the beginning: therefore not all things were made and created in the beginning of time.

1. Likewise, the mobile is naturally before motion: and since time is a passion of motion, this also is naturally before time: therefore the mobile which is matter and heaven was not made in the beginning of time, but rather time was made after the mobile itself.

However, it could be inquired here, In what did time begin? but about this according to my ability it was said in the first book of Sentences.

It is also objected against the third exposition which is, that before all things God created heaven, that is, the angelic nature: and earth, that is, the matter of the four elements. And I will object few things: because according to those this question will have place.

However, it is objected: 1. As the Philosopher says, the first of created things is being, and there is no other creature before it: therefore the angelic nature and prime matter are not first, as it seems.

1. Likewise, Ecclesiasticus 16, 1: He who lives forever created all things together: therefore not first Angels, and prime matter of the elements.

Solution. It must be said, that all these expositions are fitting, and they establish this proposition in firm truth; so that by it every error can be excluded. For the first which says the cause, excludes every error positing multiple principles. However, the second which posits the beginning of time and temporals, excludes the eternity of the world, and matter, and exemplars, and atoms, and void, about which it will be said below. However, the third which posits Angels created with bodies, excludes the subtle error of the Philosophers, which few consider, namely, the eternity of intelligences, and the extension of the influence of intelligences to the creation of lower things: and this will be declared.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that appropriation is made from the order of words: because there God is said, whose is the authority of the beginning; and it is subsequently inferred, that the Spirit of God was carried over the waters: therefore it is consequent that by the beginning the Son is understood, so that the whole Trinity is indicated to us in its works (as Augustine says).

It can also be said, that the beginning sounds a double cause, namely efficient, and in this respect it would more fit the Father, and it sounds exemplary in which the sensible world is, and in this respect it more fits the Son, who is the wisdom and art of the Father. And by this the solution to the first is clear.

To the other it must be said, that appropriation is made by reason of the order of words: which although not all are expressed here, yet they are placed in Genesis: however, the act according to which it says the exit of the idea from the idea in the agent through the intellect also in some reason fits the Son, in which it does not fit others.

To this, however, which is objected concerning the Holy Spirit, it must be said that both fit the Son by the mode of containment pre-receiving only in the ideal form, namely, by the mode in which the end contains in the perfection of goodness.

To the other it must be said, that when it is said, God creates, creation is signified to be in God in act: but it is not in reality except according to reason only, as it was said in the first book of Sentences, and it signifies not only the divine essence, but moreover the relation to those by which it is distinguished, and it connotes the effect in the creature: and for the sake of these it is not true, that creation is only essence, and nothing more: and therefore to create is not to be. Whence that sophism does not proceed.

To another it must be said, that it could not be conveniently said, The Father creates through the Son: because the Son signifies only the relation by which he is referred to the Father, and does not signify as the principle from which being created flows: but this the name of the principle imports.

To the other it must be said, that through names some containment, and thus the Son would not be signified except as power: but in names a double relation of the principle, namely, as from which and as in which containing, in this way in which the artifact is contained in the art: and therefore it is better said in the beginning, than through the beginning.

To what is objected against the second, It must be said that time is not taken here as the measure of motion, but broadly as it says the measure of movables and mutables in being proceeding from nothing. And the modes by which time is taken according to my opinion by the Saints, I placed in the first book of Sentences.

To the other it must be said, that the mobile is naturally before motion, which is its property: but according to nature it is not before its mutation to being: and to that mutation we say time measuring is adjacent.

To what is objected concerning the third, It must be said that the objection is solved: because first is said in two ways, namely, according to the reason of form and simplicity, and according to the order of substance in being. According to the reason of form and simplicity nothing is before being: because all things are in some way related by addition to being, even one, and true, and good, as it is shown in the second book of Sentences. But according to the order of substance in nature and being, the opinion of all Philosophers is, that the first intelligence is the first caused by the Creator of the universe. But what they call intelligences, we call Angels: and then that exposition stands, because creation rather regards being, than the order of simplicity. However, in abstraction it is made through the intellect.

If, however, it is objected, that then it is not a fitting exposition according to this with respect to the other part, namely, concerning the earth: It must be said, that indeed: because even according to the Philosophers matter is posited first before anything is made from it.

To the other it must be said, that he understands all things together in created matter, and not in distinct forms: however, about this it will be inquired below in the works of the six days, when the opinion of Augustine will be compared with the opinions of other Saints.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Error Of The Manichaean Who Posited Many Principles Is Well Refuted By The Master In The Text

Is the error of the Manichaean, who posited multiple principles, well refuted by the Master in the Text?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said there, A, Moses... refuting the error of certain ones who opined that there were multiple principles without a principle.

This error, however, is of Plato, which the Master places in the Text, and because in some way he turns all things back to one principle, it seems disputable against the Manichaean, who posited multiple principles according to the same genus of causality, namely, according to the reason of the efficient cause, which error he proved thus:

1. Good and evil are opposed: therefore more good is more opposed to more evil, and simply good is simply opposed to evil: because if more follows upon more, and simply follows upon simply: but simply evil is the principle of evil: therefore there is a principle evil and of evil.
2. Likewise, the Philosopher says in the second of the first Philosophy, that there is a standstill in causes, and they do not proceed to infinity: just as everything hot is reduced to what is per se hot, and so with others: therefore it is necessary, since some cause of evil is found, because the will (as the Saints commonly concede) is reduced to a cause of evil, which is simply evil: therefore there is something per se evil, which is the principle of evil.
3. Likewise, just as accidental being is reduced to per se being, and to everything that is accidental something per se corresponds: so being said by participation is reduced to something that is said by essence, and what is said by essence corresponds to it. However, multiple evil is said participatively; as an evil man, and an evil soul, and an evil act, and an evil habit: therefore something is per se evil that corresponds to it, as it seems, this is, the principle of all evil: just as good said by essence is the principle of all good said by participation.
4. Likewise, nothing that is the same in the same way is the principle of contraries: but good and evil are contraries: therefore they do not flow from the same principle.
5. Likewise, no good makes its work worse: but by evil the work of good becomes worse: therefore evil is not from good: therefore a principle of evil will be given to it, as it seems.
6. The same objection is made concerning spiritual and corporeal, corruptible and incorruptible things, which do not seem to be from one principle, in no way receiving variation: therefore it seems that evil is the principle of corporeal things, and good of spiritual and incorruptible things. For the Philosopher says at the end of the first Physics:

The other part of the contradiction is multiple, therefore it seems that they are not imagined to be from one principle, namely, matter, with some intellect pretending to it.

1. Likewise, John 8:44: He was a murderer from the beginning, and did not stand in the truth, because there is no truth in him: when he speaks a lie, he speaks of his own, because he is a liar, and the father of it.
2. Likewise, some Philosophers could not reduce moving principles to one: but they posited mixture to be matter, and strife and friendship as moving.

3. Likewise, Matthew 12:33: Either make the tree good, and its fruit good: or make the tree evil, and its fruit evil. And there Rabanus says, that evil always proceeds from an evil root: but the root denotes the principle of evil: therefore it is necessary to posit a principle of evil.

And it is not difficult to bring forth many similar reasons.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Evil sounds like the privation of good: therefore evil universally is the privation of good universally: but the good that all desire is being, as a certain Philosopher says: therefore evil universally is deprived of all being: therefore it is not: and what is not, is the principle of nothing: therefore evil is not a principle.

1. Likewise, to restrain evil is of the genus of good power: but good power is something good: therefore it does not lack universal good: therefore it has the power of restraining and universally destroying evil: therefore it will destroy it: because it is good itself to destroy and restrain.
2. Likewise, if the soul is from a good principle and the body from an evil one, it ought to seek release from the body: now, however, it most firmly seeks communication: therefore it is from the same principle, as it seems.
3. Likewise, this seems marvelous, that a good principle, as if obeying evil, as soon as the evil organic body is, makes the soul itself to be infused: but it is absurd that good and evil agree in acting: therefore there is no evil principle.

Solution. It must be said that the heresy of the Manichaean never had a defender in science: because it never had a rational position, which could even seem probable to one slightly literate.

Hence it must be said to the first, that this is worth nothing, because good substantially per se is substantially good, and that does not have an opposite.

Moreover, evil does not receive intensity to any term, since it is privation: but rather by recession from good: and therefore although there is something worse than evil, there is not, however, a supreme evil than which nothing could be worse: because the recession from good is potentially infinite.

To the other it must be said, that evil does not have a cause, but is a defect incidentally. Hence that reasoning is founded upon a falsehood.

To the other it must be said, that evil is said nothing participatively, but rather privatively: for it is evil because it does not participate in good, which it is naturally apt to participate in.

To the other it must be said, that this is true of the first agent and by necessity of nature, but not of the agent by will and intellect, for this can make evil and good.

To the other it must be said, that God is not the author of fault, whence his work is worse because that is first: and this is sufficiently proven in the first book of the Sentences.

To the other it must be said, that this is false: because spiritual and corporeal things can be from the same agent by will and choice: but I concede well, that privation is not from him: because privation is nothing.

If, however, it is objected, because privation seems to be something: because the Philosopher posits it as a principle. It must be said, that it is not any essence in itself, which is privation, but it leaves the subject with an order to form: and therefore privation is the cause of potency; because nothing is in potency except through privation of that to which it is in potency.

To the other it must be said, that the philosophers did not posit strife and friendship as moving from outside, but within in the mixture of contraries: for friendship and love are in the act of the mixed mean, but strife in the extreme mixable opposites.

To the other it must be said, that the evil tree does not here name a principle, but the will under evil: and this in that which is of this kind is not a cause, except of an evil act. In the same way, the good tree names the will under grace. And then neither is posited as the first principle. And this is the intention of Rabanus.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Error Of Plato, Who Posited Three Principles, Is Well Refuted By The Master, And Whether Matter Is Eternal

Is the error of Plato, who posited three principles, well refuted by the Master? And, is matter eternal?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says:

For Plato thought there to be three principles, etc.

Here indeed arises the question concerning the error of Plato. For it seems that Plato did not suitably posit matter as eternal, nor the exemplar. And because the error of Plato concerning matter supposes two things, namely, that it is eternal, and that it is one for all: initially we will inquire three things, namely, Whether matter is eternal? And secondly, Whether it is one for all? And thirdly, concerning the exemplars which Plato posited.

TO THE FIRST, it is proceeded thus: 1. Every becoming, since it is an accident, must be founded in some subject: creation is a becoming: therefore, to be created must be founded in some subject. But every notion of a subject that is subjected to motion or change is the notion of matter: therefore, matter is presupposed before creation, and before every becoming. That matter is subjected in becoming and changing is taken from the Philosopher in the first book of Generation and Corruption, who says that hyle is primarily and per se the subject of generation and corruption: if therefore matter is always posited before creation, it is never created.

1. Likewise, every operation of one making something is terminated at this something, and never at matter and form by themselves alone: creation is the act of making something: therefore, it is never terminated at matter, but at this something which is composite. The first is proven in the seventh book of the first Philosophy by many reasons: the second, however, is supposed from the Letter in the following chapter. Hence thus: Creation is upon this something first: but every this something is composite, and presupposes its components according to nature: therefore, matter is before any created thing, and before creation.

2. Likewise, the work of the first agent is most perfect: but matter is most imperfect: therefore, it is necessary that it is not the work of the first agent, but is presupposed before: therefore, matter is from eternity.

3. Likewise, whatever is before every becoming and after every corruption, itself neither becomes nor is corrupted: matter is such: therefore, it is neither made nor corrupted. The proposition concerning matter, because the first is evident by itself: Every becoming is from matter, and every corruption is into matter: but from which there is becoming is before becoming, and into which there is corruption is after corruption: therefore, matter is before every becoming, and after every corruption: therefore, it neither begins nor ceases. And upon this reasoning the Philosophers relied.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 4. If it is from eternity: either it was under form, or by itself alone. If in the first way: Every composite is preceded by its components: matter under form is composite: therefore, its components precede it: therefore, there is something before that which is eternal, which is false. If however...

without form it was. On the contrary: Thus it is only in potentiality, and what is only in potentiality is not: therefore, prime matter was not from eternity.

1. Likewise, Nature in operating is more perfect than art, because art gives form without transmutation of matter, and nature with transmutation: therefore, since the first in the potentiality of operating surpasses both, it is necessary that it draws out the whole matter from nothing.

2. Likewise, an agent in lower things acts through form, and has something of potentiality mixed in, because it is composite, and therefore cannot act except by drawing out form: but God is an agent who is wholly form, having nothing of potentiality: therefore He will act not only form, but also matter.

Solution. It must be said that matter is not eternal, although many Philosophers have posited this, and we will pursue their reasoning more in their opinions below. Therefore, it must be said to the first, that creation does not denote an act or passion which is intermediate between God acting and that which is drawn out from non-being: but rather a relation consequent to that which now first is from nothing, and before was not: and then the objection ceases plainly. And the reason for this is: because it is of a perfect agent to act not by an intermediate action, in which a thing is first in becoming than in being. However, there are others who say otherwise, namely, that to be created is to become, and that becoming is an accident: and yet it is not something in a subject, but is in something as in a cause: but I do not understand this, that an accident has being, and is not in a subject, unless this is by divine miracle. Others say, that to be created is to become, and is simultaneous with being, and is co-created with the created thing: whether this is true will be inquired below. A clearer way is, that truly creating is nothing other than to make a thing be after it was not without an intermediate change.

To the other it must be said, that this is true of a composite agent, in which there is something of potentiality that does not act, as is nature and the artificer: because in them there is no principle of acting except form, and therefore they do not act except by producing form upon matter, and therefore their action necessarily always terminates at the being of the composite. But it is not so with the Creator in whom there is nothing in potentiality, and therefore He acts the whole according to His will. This response will oblige us below in the questions concerning the errors of Aristotle to a more difficult question: because from it seems to follow the eternity of the whole world, as will be clear below.

To the other it must be said, that this is of little value, since the most perfect agent does not act by necessity of nature, but by will and wisdom: but the perfection of wisdom consists in order according to the best mode of the universe: and this is to make an incomplete being, which is all form in potentiality, and none in actuality: because otherwise it could not be referred to the whole universe.

To the other it must be said, that matter is not before all becoming, if becoming is said to be the action of creating: because with that nothing is except to make by His command a thing now be after it was not of it either in potentiality or in actuality, that becoming does not presuppose any potentiality to itself: because it is not properly becoming, since all becoming is between two terms of which one is privation and the other form, and above one numerically subject under privation and form, whether according to the being of privation and form, as has been held. But from that reasoning nothing more can be concluded, except that prime matter does not enter into being through generation, nor does it depart from being through corruption, and this indeed is most true, and in this sense matter is proven to be ungenerated by the Philosopher, and it is conceded to be true by all understanding the truth, and in no way does it oppose the inception of matter through creation.

Articulus 4 — Whether It Is True What Plato Supposed, That There Is One Matter Of All Things

Whether it is true what Plato supposed, that the matter of all things is one?

Whether it is true what Plato supposed,
that the matter of all things is one?

Then it is secondly inquired about this which Plato supposes, that the matter of all things is one.

For it is proven that he supposes this from the following: otherwise he would have to give a fourth principle, which would receive certain exemplars from the craftsman, with the same necessity with which he posits matter with respect to forms. And it seems that he posits well:

1. For nothing is made by the craftsman that is not this something perfect in nature (and we speak of those things which are in nature by themselves): but it is necessary that this something has something by which it is, and something by which it is this something: therefore it is necessary for him to posit matter by which it is this something, just as form is posited for it by which it is.

2. Likewise, every form is common of itself, and this is proven from the fact that those things which are of one species, which is the ultimate substantial form, do not differ except by matter and the dispositions of matter: therefore there is no thing which has from that by which it is, that it is this something: therefore it is necessary that it has from matter. Since therefore all things which truly are in nature, are this something, all things which truly are communicate in matter.

3. Likewise, it is impossible that the same thing is the principle of communicability and incommunicability. But when I say heaven, I say form: and when I say this heaven, I say matter under this form: and so it is in Angels, and in all other things: therefore in all things incommunicability and singularity is on the part of matter, and communicability and community on the part of form. Since therefore it is to be accepted that the universal and particular are in everything that truly is in nature, it seems that for all things which truly are in nature, one matter is posited.

4. Likewise, it is evident that a proper passion is not found outside its proper subject: to subsist and to sustain is a proper passion of matter: therefore outside of matter it is not found, and by the grace of matter it is fitting for anything: but this is fitting for Angels, and the soul, and heaven, the element, and the elemented: therefore in all things there is one matter, as it seems. The first is evident by itself. The second is proven from this that each thing is fitting for that in which it is first found: but to subsist and to sustain is not fitting for form first, because it inheres and is sustained: nor even for the efficient cause, and this is evident by itself: nor even for the end, because it also inheres and is sustained: therefore since it is of something to be, it remains that it is fitting for matter, and thus the proposition is held.

If you say that these reasons conclude in no way: because even when I say, this whiteness, I say incommunicable: and when I say, whiteness, I say communicable:
and again I say, that the genus is determined in the species and sustains the difference as potency to act: and yet I do not say that in any of these there is matter. That is nothing:
because it is objected concerning those things which truly are:
this whiteness in nature will not be this whiteness, unless because it is in this subject as in matter. And this is evident: because if it is abstracted, it will be conjoinable to many, and thus common. Similarly, the instance concerning the genus is not to the purpose: because we speak according to being in nature: the species however is not this something, but rather a certain quality: yet because of that which is said to sustain the difference as potency to act, the genus is in the place of matter, as the Philosophers say, although no genus is truly matter.

1. Likewise, the Commentator on the eleventh book of the first Philosophy says, that this is matter which is in being beyond every form.
From there it proceeds thus: Every form distinguishes from something: therefore everything distinct is formed. But if the universal distinguishing is abstracted from beings, there will remain only the common which is matter. But it is evident that the distinction of all beings can be abstracted: therefore in all beings remains one and truly what is matter: therefore the matter of all things is one.

1. Likewise, the Philosopher says, that the same in number and the same in matter, are the same and do not differ: but everything that is in nature, is this something and one in number: therefore it has matter: but every secondary matter is reduced to primary matter as (the Philosopher says) all liquefiable things into quicksilver, and quicksilver into water: therefore the primary matter of all things is one, as it seems.

ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Matter is known and determined by potency and motion or changes,
For the Philosopher says before the end of the first Physics: But natural substance is not knowable through analogy. Just as to a statue bronze, or to a bed wood, or to other things having form, unformed matter relates before it receives form: so it relates to substance, and this something which is: analogy is not one in all: one in all.

If you say that this is the opinion of Aristotle, and he does not speak of primary matter, but rather of secondary which is not one in all. On the contrary: Primary matter is the primary potency to being in act in nature, because we speak only of that: but no potency is knowable except through act and motion: for the Philosopher says, that motion indicates potency, and its reason is:
because potency is only of that which is not had, and this is not acquired except through motion: therefore of that which there is not one motion or of one reason in kind to act, of that with another there will not be one matter.

But it is evident, that there is not one motion of spiritual and corporeal things, and corporeal and incorporeal things: therefore there is not one matter of them.

1. Likewise, Boethius says expressly in the end of the book on the Two Natures in one person of Christ: For every nature in corporeal substance relies on no foundation of matter:
   but there is no body to which matter is not subject.
2. Likewise, in the same place, Because another thing relies on the foundation of matter as a body, another does not need a subject of matter at all as incorporeal: it can in no way happen that a body is transformed into an incorporeal species.
3. Likewise, in the same place, There is no matter in incorporeal things. Of this, however, elsewhere more things have been disputed: and therefore these here suffice.

Solution. It was never the opinion of the great Philosophers, that the matter of all things is one. And if it is objected concerning Plato in the book of the Fountain of Life, I respond that with me those books have no authority at all: because they do not proceed from the proper discipline or natural science. For he who in nature neglects the reasons of motion and sense, since all nature is of sensible and mobile things, prepares himself to deceive himself and others. Hence I say not only that there is this something, which is from matter and form, but that which is from potency and act.
Because with me every cause of potency is privation, and that which does not underlie privation in any way, there is no potency: and as much as it underlies privation, so much it has of potency and no more: and therefore the Philosopher says that of generable and incorruptible things there is not one matter, nor one genus:

although of both there is matter and genus, but not of one reason. Because potency to place or where, and potency to form is not of one reason: just as neither motion to where, and motion to form.
Boethius confirms this statement in the book on the Two Natures in one person of Christ.
But of spiritual things which are this something, there is no matter in my judgment: but in them there is that which is, and by which it is: of which neither is ever separated from the other, so that that which is says this something which truly is in nature, by which it is says the principle of understanding and subsisting itself in such being: and of this there is no potency to motion or change, except equivocally with others which are moved and changed: because it is known among the wise, that in that way through knowledge and ignorance there are not properly motions and changes.

According to this, therefore, I say to the first, that I well concede, that this something says substance: but I do not call this matter, nor is it matter.

By the same I respond to the following: because it is not this matter which makes this something only, but of that which is that which is in spiritual things.

By that the solution to the following is evident.

To the other it must be said, that to subsist and to sustain are not said univocally of all sustaining and subsisting things, and this alone is lacking to that reason, that if it had it, it would be concluded necessarily that the matter of all things is one. And in this also the Author of the Fountain of Life fails: for not in one reason does that subsist which is in being by itself, and in no way in potency to motion, with that which is always in being, but in potency to where: and with that which is in potency to being, and where. And this is because in the natures of things it is not taken according to logical intentions, but rather according to the being of the thing itself, as he wills.

For this (in my judgment) was the cause of controversy between Plato and Aristotle, that he wished to follow the reasons of universals, and from those sought the principles of things.
Aristotle, however, not so, but from the natures of things sought the principles of things.

To the other it must be said, that if the forms of things were separated by the intellect, the same subsisting thing would not remain, but two, or three. Hence it must be noted, that it is one thing to resolve the particular into the universal, and another to resolve a thing into its principles of being: and then the principles will not be the same which are always in being and never in potency to being, and those which are in potency before being: and then it is not concluded, that there is one matter.

To the last it must be said, that one in number and matter are one, this cannot be generally true, nor is it generally said: because at least there is an instance concerning God who is one in number, yet is not one in this or that matter.
Hence I understand this of those things which are individuated by matter. Hence another Philosopher says, that in those things which are not from matter and do not have matter, number is only through cause and caused. Yet I do not approve of that statement in whole, as will be evident below: because all Philosophers err generally in the position of Angels. But we say, that numer in such things is from that which is the principle of distinction and incommunicability or singularity.

Articulus 5 — Whether Plato Well Posited The Exemplar To Be One Principle, And In What Plato Erred

Whether Plato rightly posited the exemplar as one principle, and in what did Plato err?

Thirdly, it is questioned concerning the exemplars which Plato posited.

For this does not seem absurd: 1. For above in the first book of the Sentences it was said that Plato posited ideas in the divine mind, as Augustine says in the book of Eighty-Three Questions: whoever denies these, denies the Son of God to exist: therefore it seems that this position is not inconvenient.

1. Likewise, Boethius in the preface of the first Arithmetic says thus: It is established, however, that the knowledge of numbers, the creator God of this human structure had the first exemplar of his reason, and to this joined he constituted whatever by fabricating reason, to find harmony by numbers of assigned order. This cannot be understood by mere mathematical number: therefore it is necessary that it be understood of the ideal number which preceded all ideated things.
2. Likewise, whatever form is potentially in prime matter, it is necessary that it preceded according to reason in the first mover, since in him is the archetypal world: therefore to posit the exemplar in this manner is not inconvenient.
3. Likewise, Boethius in the third book of the Consolation of Philosophy:

Whom external causes did not drive to fashion the work of flowing matter: but the inherent form of the highest good, free from envy. Since all things from the supreme leader's example, the most beautiful himself bearing the world in mind, and forming with a similar image: you command perfect parts to complete perfectly. It is therefore clear that exemplars are to be preferred to inferior things: therefore in this Plato did not err, as it seems.

If you say that he erred in this, that he did not posit exemplars in the divine mind, but outside God himself: this would be against Priscian, who in the smaller volume says that he posited ideas in the divine mind before they proceeded into bodies: therefore it seems that he erred in nothing.

But against this is that Plato posits ideas for two reasons, namely, for the principle of knowledge, and for the principle of generation, and to the first part his reasoning proceeded thus:

1. There is no knowledge except of incorporeal and universal things, which knowledge is in all things: therefore all things are in incorporeal and universal things.
2. Likewise, the sciences of things are not one: therefore the principle concerning them is not one - therefore it is necessary to posit a multitude of ideas according to genus in species. It is established, however, that to posit ideas in this way as having been from eternity is heresy: therefore Plato erred in positing exemplars or ideas.
3. On the other hand, he erred: because he reasoned thus, Nothing acts beyond its species: but to be a man and a donkey is beyond the species of the first qualities of agents and patients: therefore it is necessary to give those forms another agent of the same species with them: therefore the idea of a donkey makes a donkey, and the idea of a man makes a man, and so with others.

4. Likewise, nothing comes into act except through that which is in that act: everything that is generated comes into act according to form: therefore through something that is always in that act: but this is not found in matter: therefore it is necessary that it be posited outside matter. And thus again it seems to follow that it is necessary to posit one man outside matter in ideas, who generates others, and a donkey, and so with others. And therefore Aristotle imputes to him that he posited a third man, and a third donkey: because he posited one in the ideas, and another mathematical one conjoinable with material things, because mathematics are by being in matter: and therefore he said that the composition of all things is from incorporeal and corporeal, and this also seems to touch in the beginning of Arithmetic: and the third which is singularity. It is therefore clear that this is heresy: therefore Plato errs in the position of exemplars.

Furthermore, what compelled Plato to posit matter, and the craftsman and the exemplar, and not the end?

For the craftsman is reduced to the efficient cause, the exemplar to the form, and matter is posited by its proper name. It seems, indeed, that the efficient principle and prime matter can be reduced to the same. And that is the error of David of Dinant, and he objected thus:

1. Whatever things are, and in no way differ, they are the same: God and prime matter are, and in no way differ: therefore they are the same. The first is clear. The second is proved by the nature of simplicity: because in simple things there is no difference: and those which have no difference, in no way differ.
2. Likewise, Being abstracts from every distinct being: but the efficient and matter have distinct being: therefore, with the distinguishing abstracted, what remains is the same which is in both: therefore the same underlies the efficient and matter: therefore they are reduced to the same, as it seems.
3. Likewise, Abstraction is only of form: therefore that which remains after all forms is the same in all. It is established, however, that being through the intellect is before every determined being: therefore before the created and uncreated: therefore the same is in the created and in the uncreated: but this has been proved to be matter: therefore it seems that the craftsman and matter are reduced to the same, and this the most foolish one conceded, who never understood anything truly and well: and therefore he said that prime matter and God and will or mind were the same, and nothing was the principle of the universe except that, although it is the most indivisible and imperfect of all.
4. And he said this was signified in the temple of Pallas, in whose superstition it was written: Pallas is whatever was, and he said Pallas is whatever is, and whatever will be: whose veil no man ever could reveal to man. Prime matter, and its veil to be form, and many revealed this veil up to the forms of the Creator and the created, and the efficient and form: and no one revealed the veil, and by revealing proceeded further except himself, because he alone revealed in all. Although in this he also lied, because he received this error from others: for I found this error written in a very ancient book in a certain monastery in Germany, and that book was inscribed to a certain Alexander the Greek.

But against that error it is objected thus:

1. It is impossible by the intellect that the same be the first maker and the first made: but every second form of matter is made: therefore it is necessary that it have a maker before it. If therefore to be Creator, or to be God, is the form of matter: it is necessary to posit another maker. The first is proved thus: If the first maker is made: but to be made before it is, is in potency: therefore the first maker before it is, is in potency.
2. Likewise, Nothing is a maker except what is actually acting: nothing actually acting except being in act: therefore the first maker is the first agent in act, and the first being in act and prior to what is in potency being: but in potency being is not actually being: therefore the first being in act is not actually being: therefore contradictories are verified of the same.
3. Likewise, If the first maker and the first made are the same: therefore the same makes itself: but what makes itself and suffices for itself to this, always makes itself: therefore the first maker always makes itself: therefore it is always in becoming: therefore it is never in being: therefore never in making: therefore if the first maker makes itself, it never makes itself. And because it is foolish to seek reasons against madness which no one ever said according to Philosophy, therefore these suffice.

Solution. It must be said that Plato undoubtedly errs in the manner of positing exemplars, and this in four ways: one of which is that he thought the knowledge of God, like that of others, was caused by them, and to be forms in God distinct from the intellect of God: which Aristotle disproves in the first book of Metaphysics. Secondly, because he thought that they were not only in God, but also with him generating beings according to nature in their own forms. And he posited them to be from eternity with God: because he did not see how proximate causes could bring forth any form which was not of their species. Thirdly, because he said not only to be so, but also that mathematical things are under those which are abstracted from natural things, and are the principle of knowledge in those who have knowledge of things: if this is true which he said, to learn is to remember. If indeed he posited learning to be receiving discipline, that was not held. Fourthly, because he posited that those forms remain in corporeal things, even when the particulars in which they are are destroyed: because the being of particulars is one thing, and the being of those forms is another. And these are gathered from various books of Aristotle who imputes these to him: and it also seems to be extracted from the Timaeus, as is clear to one inspecting the chapter on the gods of gods.

Let us therefore say to the first, and the four following, that to posit ideas in that way is true and holy: and the reason how they are posited is explained in the first book of the Sentences.

But to the arguments proving his error, it must be said to the first, that when it is said that knowledge is only of universals and incorporeals, this is understood according to reason, and not according to being: but he took it according to being. For the reason of a corporeal thing is incorporeal which is taken through those things which are of the species, and not of matter.

To the other it must be said, that the sciences of things are not one, if things are taken in part: but nevertheless the sciences in the cause of all through that cause are one and the same, and thus the knowledge of God about all things is one and the same, as was disputed in the first book of the Sentences.

To the other it must be said, that this is false, Nothing acts beyond its species: but it is true what the Philosopher says, that every generation is from the convenient: because between the agent and the act there is a proportion of active and receptive or passive power: hence the agent in the seed of man or another is threefold: elemental, specific, and celestial: and to these virtues joined to the agent is the formative power of the seed. The elemental is as the heat of fire directing and dissolving, the moisture continuing and mixing, and the dry terminating and shaping, the cold however holding and coagulating. The specific however is: because the seed has in itself the power of the soul of man, and the seed of another has in itself the power consequent upon it from this that it is the seed of such a species or such. The celestial however is as the force of the sun, or the moon, and other planets, and stars: and from these the active is proportioned to this form, or that. The passive however is proportioned in receiving: because not anything is receptive of any form, but proportionate to itself by virtue and temperament of complexion, and composition of dissimilar parts if it is from dissimilars: and therefore exemplars posited outside matter are of no use, as the Philosopher says, for generation: because if they do not touch, they do not act: and no transmutation follows: therefore neither generation.

To this however which is asked, What compelled Plato to posit the craftsman, and matter? It must be said, that Plato saw well, as the last arguments prove, that matter and the efficient never coincide in the same according to the thing: and since he saw that the first efficient has nothing of potency, nor is it composite: he thought that although in itself it could not be impeded from act, yet it could be impeded from the defect of the recipient of its operations. Since therefore form is in some way in the efficient, he saw well that it could in some way give it from itself. But because nothing is in potency to itself, potency was not in it: and therefore it could not produce it from itself, as it seemed to him, and therefore he gave it to itself from eternity. And this reason compelled all Philosophers to posit matter as eternal. But the deception is in this, because they proceed as if God acts by necessity of nature: because then without doubt it would be impeded if it did not have into what to imprint its actions. But we posit that he acts by command, and thus brings it forth from nothing. And with this position made, nothing impossible follows which all Philosophers feared. But they saw well that the end follows according to the being of that of which it is the end: and therefore no one posited it as a principle.

To the other however which is objected concerning the error of David of Dinant, it must be said that it is most foolish and ridiculous: because nothing differs so much from anything, as God and prime matter: since both are simple in their own...

in a way, because they are not of one nature simply: and they differ from each other as all first things differ from one another, as we said in the first book of the Sentences.

To the other it must be said, that being which abstracts from every being, does not abstract from the first efficient cause: because nothing is simpler than that: but this is the being which he himself is, and others have being in proportion to him: and therefore that reasoning is null.

Likewise, created being which abstracts from every created being is not said univocally of every created being: therefore in this way by a double impediment that reasoning does not proceed, that something is common, as prior, to the first efficient cause and to prime matter.

And from this the solution to the following is clear: there is a double separation or abstraction, namely, of form from matter, and this belongs only to composites, and of intention from that of which it is the intention: and this belongs to all, and indicates no composition. For nothing is so simple, whose intention is not abstracted by the intellect when it is understood: yet this abstraction is not made from the created and the uncreated: because before the uncreated there is nothing at all: and therefore the being which is abstracted is not univocal, but said according to proportion of the uncreated and of others, as is often found said in the first book of the Sentences.

To the last it must be said, that this was not the intention of the Poets veiling Pallas: but this which Augustine said, that they saw God, but did not fully know him: as it is held in Acts 17:23, that the Apostle passing by saw an altar on which was written, "To the Unknown God": because he cannot be sufficiently known. And he, as Bernard says on the Canticles, is the being of all things, not material, but causal. But the veil signified ignorance of him, and distance from human knowledge. Or if it is said, that those idolaters erred, it is not inconvenient, since they erred in many things.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Definition Of Creation Which Says, To Create Is To Make Something From Nothing, Is Good

Whether the definition of creation, which is stated as,
To create is to make something from nothing, is good?

Whether the definition of creation, which is stated as,
To create is to make something from nothing, is good?

Then it is inquired concerning this which says,
A, §2: To create properly is to make something from nothing, etc.

And three things are inquired, namely, concerning this definition of creation. And secondly, Whether creation is an act communicable to another?
And thirdly, Whether it is miraculous or natural to create?

To the first, thus it is proceeded:
1. To make is posited in the definition of that which is to create: if therefore to make is to act, and to create is to make, creation will be an action:
but action (as it is held in the book of the Six principles) is according to which in that which is subjected, we are said to act: therefore something is subjected to creation in which it acts:
therefore creation supposes a subject which is matter, which above is denied.

1. Likewise, Every making is in something as in a subject: creation is making: therefore it is in something as in a subject. But everything which is in a subject presupposes that subject according to nature:
   therefore again creation seems to presuppose a subject.
2. Likewise, Creation itself is either created, or uncreated: it is evident that it is not uncreated, because thus it would have been from eternity: therefore created.
   But everything created is created by some creation:
   therefore there is creation of creation. If this is granted, this necessarily will proceed to infinity: because concerning the creation of creation a similar question arises, and thus further infinitely.
3. Likewise, Creation is the creation of the created: either therefore it is understood as construction in the notion of the subject, when it is said creation of the created, or in the notion of the term. If as the subject, Against:

Creature is that which is made through creation:
therefore creature signifies the made of creation.
But the made is the terminus of making: therefore the created signifies the terminus, and not the subject. If this is conceded, Against:
Every made precedes making: but that making is created, and not Creator: therefore something created precedes every created, which is false.

1. Likewise, That making, since it is an accident, is in some subject: and thus again
   it returns that it is necessary to presuppose matter in which it is, which is not created:

therefore it seems that it is more fitting to say that creation is nothing.

Solution. It must be said that to create is to make something from nothing, in the manner in which to make is fitting to God. For the Master says in the Text concerning God, that for Him to have willed is to have made: because His will is sufficient for all things. And therefore it seems to me to be said, that just as He does not operate presupposing a subject for Himself, nor presupposing an instrument: so there is no intermediate action between God acting, and between the creature made: but His making is the complete will for this that the thing may be which now is not, or was not before: and this acting signifies to create: and not according to the thing does it signify more a relation than an action, but according to the notion it signifies this more as acting.

But if it is objected, that relation follows its extremes, and thus creation is after the creature, it must be said that this is true of a certain relation: but of the relation which is according to the action of God creating it is not true. And through this the solution to the first is clear.

To the other it must be said, that this making is nothing other than the made being after nothing, which was never in making. And therefore in the very made beginning now first to be, that is, which now is, and was not before, there is making, as in a subject, and it is co-created to it: and therefore it is not necessary to presuppose a subject for it.

To the other it must be said, that creation itself is co-created creation, and not by another creation, but by itself. Nor does the objection proceed, unless we were to grant that there is a making of which the creature is the terminus: and this we do not concede, as is clear from what was said before.

To the other it must be said, that the notion of the terminus here and the notion of the subject is one, and therefore this: because creation does not signify the motion of making according to the thing, but according to the notion of existing, namely, according to which something is after nothing: and in that notion the creature is as the terminus, according to which it posits the making of God: and it is as an accident to the created, and then it signifies the property of relation, and then the creature is as the subject. But nothing prohibits the same to be constructed in diverse relations, according to which it is diversely understood. And through this also the solution to the following is clear.

Articulus 7 — Whether Creation Is Communicable To Another

Whether creation is communicable to another?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether creation is communicable to another?

And it seems that it is: because
1. It is greater to make a pious person from an impious one than to create heaven and earth: but making a pious person from an impious one is communicated to another: because it is done through the sacraments and prayers of the Saints: therefore, creation can also be communicated to another.

1. Likewise, the Master says in the Third Book of Sentences, and in the fourth treatise on the Power of Baptizing, that God could confer upon some thing the power to create something, but not itself: therefore, etc.
2. Likewise, some Philosophers posited that intelligences create souls, and one intelligence another: just as the first creates the second, and the second the third, and so on: therefore, it seems that it can be communicated.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. It is not the act of any agent that is in some way in potency to make anything except a form in a composite. Proof: because according to that which itself is in potency, it cannot act: but all things that are below God are in some way in potency: therefore, they make only a form in a composite: therefore, they do not create. And this is also evident in nature and art, which always make presupposed matter.

1. Likewise, between pure being and pure non-being, there is no proportion: therefore, an infinite distance: therefore, it is of infinite power to bring something forth from nothing. But nothing is of infinite power, except that which is of infinite essence: but nothing is of infinite essence, except God: therefore, nothing can create even the smallest thing except God.

And this seems to be conceded.
To the first, therefore, it must be said that grace in the justification of the impious is not created except by God alone: but to the disposition of the subject, the merit of the Saints or the sacrament can operate: just as even the rational soul is not created except by God, but nature can operate to prepare the body for it.

To what the Master says, it must be said that he speaks of operation through will or prayers, that is, that something would be created at the will of the creature or prayers: yet not through the creature itself, as operating by its own power, or by a power joined to it: because that also would be created: since all the gifts of God, except the Holy Spirit, are created and of finite power.

To the other, it must be said that it was not, I think, the intention of those Philosophers to say that Angels were creators, but rather that they were illuminators of those things which were under them, and in some way movers: and therefore they intended to express the order of Angels to souls, and that they cause them in well-being, and not in being: thus also Alpharabius says that the soul is an instrument of intelligence, to which it communicates from the light of its splendor.

Articulus 8 — Whether To Create Is A Work Of Miracle

Whether to create is a work of miracle?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether to create is a work of miracle?

It seems, however, that it is: because 4. All operations either fall into nature, or art, or miracle: it is evident, however, that to create does not fall under the other two: therefore it falls under miracle.

1. Likewise, Chrysostom says that the work of the divine will alone is a miracle: however, creation is the work of the divine will alone: therefore.
2. Likewise, Gregory at the beginning on Ezekiel distinguishes prophecy into that which is of the present, and of the past, and of the future: and his example which is of the past is that Moses knew the beginning of the world: and this is what this text says, that inspired by the Spirit of God, In the beginning God created heaven and earth: if, however, it is so: therefore it appears above our faculty of knowing: however, this is a miracle, as Augustine says, namely, that which is arduous and unusual, which appears above the hope and faculty of the one admiring: therefore it is miraculous, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: The work of creation is for the restoration of the nature of the world: however, by a miracle nature is not restored: because a miracle rarely happens, but nature always happens in one course: therefore it seems that it is not a work of miracle.

Likewise, it is asked according to this, Why does he say: We grant that it is a work of will, not of nature: since to create is common to the three: and whatever is fitting to the three, is fitting to them by the grace of nature, as it has often been proven in the Beginning of the book?

Solution. It must be said that creation is properly a divine work. However, it seems miraculous to us, because we cannot do it, because it does not lie under the demonstration of reason: and therefore even the Philosophers did not know it, unless perhaps someone from the sayings of the Prophets: but by demonstration no one ever investigated it. Among some indeed certain probable reasons are found: but they do not prove sufficiently: and thus the first reasons proceed. For I well concede that it is miraculous to us, and appearing above our faculty.

To the other it must be said that it is for the restoration of nature, but not from the natural part: and therefore it is miraculous. For just as the illumination of the blind restores the nature of the eye in this one, and the restoration is miraculous, but sight is natural: so creation restoring the whole nature is miraculous, but the operation of the created is natural.

Moreover, it must be said that it is called a work of will according to which it is divided against the generation of the Son, and the procession of the Holy Spirit: because will is with respect to the willed which is in some way outside the nature of the one willing: but nature is with respect to those things which are within.

And this has been sufficiently discussed in the first book of Sentences, where it is asked.

Articulus 9 — Whether To Make And To Create Are The Same, Or Whether One Extends Further Than The Other

Whether to make and to create are the same, or one is in more than the other?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said there, A, § 2: "To make indeed not only," etc.

1. For according to this it seems that to make is in more than to create or to operate: therefore something is common to the work of the creature and the Creator, which seems inconvenient.
2. Furthermore, what is the difference between to make and to operate?

Solution. It must be said that if these are properly considered, then to make implies motion, as the Master says in the Text, and thus properly belongs to nature which acts with motion and with change, according to what is said in the book "On the Six Principles": because every motion will be established in action, and every action in motion; however, to operate will be only of the will or intellect in mechanical and voluntary things, but to create is of God. But if these are considered broadly, then in a certain way to make is common, and its species will be to create and to operate: however, sometimes to operate is also taken commonly.

In conclusion, it must be said that there is not something common univocally: because to make is not said univocally of the making of God and of the creature.

Articulus 10 — Whether Aristotle Determined Sufficiently That The World Is Eternal, As Is Imputed To Him

Has Aristotle sufficiently determined the world to be eternal as is imposed?

Has Aristotle sufficiently determined the world to be eternal as is imposed?

Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, B, § 2: Aristotle indeed posited two principles, etc.

Here, in order to know the opinion of Aristotle, it is necessary to inquire into two things. First, whether Aristotle has sufficiently determined the world to be eternal as is imposed upon him? Second, concerning the nature of the two principles, which he is said to have posited from eternity here by the Master.

Since we have treated this matter elsewhere, we will take a shorter path here, and we will present seven ways which Rabbi Moses collected in the second collation of the book "Guide of the Perplexed" 1, and we will see how much they can conclude.

The first way is from the nature of the motion of the circles, and it is at the beginning of the VII Physics, and it is collected in four arguments.

The first is that the authority of all the ancients agrees in this, that the motion of the heavens did not begin, except for one, namely Plato. And this argument of the ancients is founded upon two propositions. One is that the motion of the heavens is the principle and cause of all things that are moved and come to be after they were not.

The second, however, is that whatever is the first principle of all making and beginning of all things, that this neither was made nor began: because otherwise it would go to infinity.

And these propositions are easy to prove: but because they are conceded by almost all intelligent people, therefore let us proceed from them thus: Whatever is the principle and cause of all making and beginning, it itself neither was made nor began: the motion of the first mover is the principle of all making and beginning: therefore it neither was made nor began.

Another argument along the same way is leading to the impossible. For let it be granted that it began: either therefore it began as Empedocles posited, or it began as Anaxagoras posited. Empedocles posits that the motion of the universe of substance begins many times, and ceases many times: because he said that the material principle is a mixture of all things, and the movers were two, namely strife and friendship: and with friendship moving, diverse mixtures and contraries come together into the act of one generated by chance and fortune: and therefore by this chance the heaven was made, and this the earth, and so of others. Whence is that which he said there, the heads of the Germans being without necks, which were later distinguished by strife and friendship. Strife, however, moves according to him, when contraries are resolved in the corruption of the generated: and he said this happens many times, even according to the whole universe: as it is said of him, that he posited this to happen in the great year which is called the Empedoclean year, and consists of thirty-six thousand years, as they say (but this is not authentic but fictitious), because the motion of the fixed stars, which is the motion of the eighth sphere, according to Ptolemy is over the poles of the circle of the signs from the West to the East, in a hundred years, according to the division of the circle, in the three hundredth degree one, and it is completed in thirty-six thousand years according to the division of the circle into three hundred and sixty parts, which are called degrees. Anaxagoras, however, posited all things to be mixed, except the agent intellect, and that motion began only once by the agent intellect in the mixture making distinction, and making the mobile and its first motion. Therefore both of them agree in this, that motion began from the defect of the mobile: because the mobile was not always, therefore its motion was not always, but began. But they differed in this: because one posited two movers not always in the same way, namely Empedocles, strife, and friendship. The other, namely Anaxagoras, posited one mover and in one way, but that it does not always move due to the defect of the mobile.

And against this Aristotle objects thus: If motion was not always: either this was because the mobile was not, and therefore there was not motion, as both of them said: or because even if the mobile was, nevertheless it was not moved, because the mover was not in one way disposed to it always: as Empedocles alone said. If in the first way: therefore the mobile had to be made first, which was not without a change of itself to being: therefore it was changed to being, or to the form of its species. But every change is caused by local motion: therefore local motion was moving to the being of the first mobile: therefore local motion was before the first local motion began, which is impossible: therefore it did not begin in this way. If however it began in the second way, then there was the mobile and the mover: but it did not move, because it was not disposed to motion: therefore it had to be disposed: but to be disposed is to be altered: therefore it was altered. And whatever is altered, is moved by another first motion causing the alteration, which is local: therefore again it follows that motion was before the first motion: which is impossible: therefore motion did not begin.

The third argument or way is from the nature of time taken there: because time is a passion of motion, and nothing of time is to be taken except the now: but the now is always a middle between the past and the future: therefore before any now, the past is to be taken: and after any, the future is to be taken; therefore it never began, and it will never cease: therefore neither motion, since time is a passion of motion: therefore neither the mobile, since motion is a passion of the mobile.

The fourth argument is to this that it is not destroyed by the same reason: because the same inconvenience would occur, namely, that after local motion there would be motion, due to the alteration or corruption of the mobile, or of the movers: because it does not fail unless the mover or the mobile, or both, are otherwise disposed.

These four arguments are found at the beginning of the VIII Physics.

The second way also goes to both, namely, that motion neither began nor ceased: and it is by the reason of matter, and it is placed at the end of the first Physics thus: Let it be granted that matter began to be. But whatever began to be, is moved and changed to being, and is not changed except from privation and upon matter: since therefore the being of a thing precedes its becoming, and becoming places matter upon which it is, matter will be before it begins to be matter, which is impossible: therefore it did not begin. In the same way it is proved that it does not cease. Because everything that is corrupted, is corrupted into matter: therefore it is in matter after the nature is corrupted, which is impossible: therefore matter is ungenerated and incorruptible: therefore also the world according to its first principles.

The third way is collected from the nature of the heavens, whose matter is removed from generation and corruption: as all reasoning people agree, that for this reason it is the place of God incorruptible. And this is founded upon three arguments: one of which is, that everything that is generated, is corrupted in a determined time. The second is, because the heavens are not corrupted, nor otherwise disposed from the first time of the consideration of the Philosophers. The third, that with the heavens remaining, its motion is, and the whole world remaining. From these it is argued thus: Everything generated is corrupted in a determined time: the heavens are not corrupted in a determined time: therefore the heavens are not generated: therefore they did not begin. Since therefore it produces by its motion animals and plants, and is as a certain life to all existing things, even the generation of inferiors did not begin. And this is drawn from the end of the first Heaven and World, and it is proved in many ways there.

The fourth way is not of Aristotle, but is of some of his Greek Commentators, such as Alexander, and Themistius, and some Arabs, such as Averroes, and others, and it is this: Nothing began to be which was not previously in possibility: but every possibility is in matter: therefore nothing began to be, which does not go from potency to act: therefore it is moved: and thus before the first motion there will be motion, which is inconvenient: therefore the world did not begin.

The fifth way is of the same: If the Creator now creates, and before this did not create, he is in potency to creating. But nothing in potency being, extracts itself from potency to act: therefore the Creator has another more noble than himself who extracts him from potency to act, which is inconvenient: therefore he created the world from eternity, and it did not begin.

The sixth way is of the same: because every agent by will, now acting, and before not acting, needs one of two things, namely, either removing the impediment of its action when it wills to act, if there is something that prohibits: or awakening the will, when it now wills, and before this did not will. And they prove this by a likeness in us acting something by will. But both of those are absurd to believe about God: because to one it follows that he is impotent, and to the other it follows that he is otherwise disposed and changeable: therefore he did not begin to create.

The seventh way is taken from the same: and yet it is founded upon certain propositions of the first Philosophy, namely that the order of the first mover to motion is his substance and his will. Therefore just as his substance never failed him, so motion and the mobile never failed him. The first, however, is proved from this: because whatever is in God, God is, since he is simple.

Whence also those who wonder open their mouths against the faith, saying: What is the cause that he created the world yesterday, and not the day before, or a year before?

To the same, the Doctors bring many arguments: but I will present two, namely, that of the infinite mover is infinite motion: God however is an infinite mover: therefore infinite is the motion: and it is not infinite in speed: therefore it is necessary that it is infinite in time. And this is founded upon the end of the VIII Physics, and upon certain propositions of the penultimate chapter of book XI of the first Philosophy. The second is that the same disposed in the same way, always does the same: therefore from eternity he moved as now.

Likewise, certain authorities of Catholic Doctors seem to say this. For Boethius says in the fifth of the Consolation, that it suffers the condition of time: although that (as Aristotle judged of the world) neither ever began to be, nor will cease, and its life is extended with the infinity of time: yet it is not such that it is believed to be measured by eternity. Therefore it seems, that the world and time did not begin: and yet it does not follow that they are eternal.

The same, a little below: Whence not rightly those who when they hear that Plato saw the world not having a beginning of time, nor about to have an end: in this way they think the world made by the creator to be coeternal. For it is one thing to be led by an interminable life, which Plato attributed to the world. Another thing is to have the whole presence of an interminable life at once, which is manifestly proper to the divine mind. Nor should God be seen as older than created things by the quantity of time, but rather by the property of a simple nature. From this it is taken, that not by a duration having any progressive quantity was God before the world, but by the property of a simple nature, as a cause having the whole effect present to himself. In this authority also another difficulty is, namely, that he says according to Plato time did not begin: since this opinion was not of Plato, but of Aristotle: Plato however said time began with the heavens: as also appears in the Timaeus.

Likewise, some object thus: God creates the world by goodness: but from eternity he is good: therefore from eternity he creates.

Likewise, it is not necessary, that a cause precedes its effect by the quantity of duration: as appears in two examples of Augustine, namely, of the foot in the dust and the footprint: for the footprint would be eternal, if the foot in the dust were eternal.

Likewise, of the ray upon the rising and the elevation of the sun. For the day is made by the sun ascending over the hemisphere: and yet it is not after the sun's ascent: therefore even if the Philosophers concede that God is the principle of the whole world, as all concede, it is not necessary to posit because of this that the world began.

But against this are arguments, of which we will also examine the power of inferring, for this reason lest the simple be confused by the unbelievers, if perhaps they incautiously propose them.

1. The stronger way is, that if God is the cause of the world and the heavens, and intelligible by him, and whatever is under him (as the Philosophers say) either he is the cause of their substance, so that they have from him substance and substantial being: or according to some accident or property only. If in the first way, it proceeds thus: Whatever receives substance from something, and is not always in becoming, it is necessary that it sometime begins: therefore not from eternity: therefore all things began according to substance. If however they do not receive substance from him, as from a cause, then not all things are reduced to one, as to one principle of the universe's being: and this is against them, who in their metaphysics multiply prove, that all things are reduced to one, as to the principle of the universe's being. And this says

, and Alexander in a certain letter says, that it is the opinion of Aristotle and all the Philosophers.

If however you say, that it is true, if these things are made: but I say, that their being is becoming. Against: The heavens and the intelligence which is first among those which the Philosophers posit, are complete in themselves with the greatest completion: therefore from the same universally becoming is removed: because this is imperfect: therefore it is necessary, if they are a cause, that they are sometime caused.

If you say, that the first cause is an intelligence altogether simple, and acts by the necessity of nature, like light, and its act is the first intelligence after it, and after the act of that is the third intelligence, and those are not equally simple with the first intelligence which is the cause of all; then necessarily I will have the proposition, that all things began.

And to see this more clearly, let us see the opinion of the Philosophers. For they say, that the first intelligence because nothing of it is potential, produces only the intelligence which is after it and of the first order among movers. That indeed is proved to be distant from the first cause which is not composite, by this that it returns upon its essence, because it understands itself: and so it is composite, and has something of potency, which is the understood, and something of the splendor of the first, which is the intellect and of the nature of the universally acting intelligence: and therefore that intelligence can produce two things, namely, the orb which it moves, and the intelligence of the second order: and therefore because the first orb flows according to causality from the intelligence of the first order, it is moved by one motion only. The second intelligence, however, again becomes more composite, than that which is of the first order among the caused. And therefore from that part by which it is in potency it produces the second orb, which is moved by two motions: and from that part by which it is in it the nature of the universally acting intelligence, flows from it the intelligence of the third order, and so on to the sphere of the moon, cu-the law of the mover produces the understanding of the said order, which irradiates upon rational souls.

But that this whole is absurd is easily proven. For it is asked, Whence comes the matter which is in potentiality to the intelligence of the first order, since it is not possible for motion in place and will not be assigned. Likewise, it is asked, Whence comes the matter deformed in the parts of the heavens, so that some are stars pervious, some similarly, some otherwise naturally to the intelligence of the second order? and again it is not assigned. Likewise, it is asked, Whether that matter, namely of the heavens and stars, is one matter according to nature, or diverse? If one: therefore it has one motion, since Motion indicates the nature of matter even according to the same Philosophers. But if diverse: therefore it does not flow from one simple intelligence according to the order which they posit: therefore it is clear that the position is null. For they posit that from one simple there is only one double: and from that somewhat double two are caused, according to the order of nature, and not two matters of one caused. If you say, that it is not proven, that there are two matters according to the nature of the stars, and of the heavens, this is nothing: because it is already presupposed by them that motion indicates matter, and it is known, that the motions of each heaven, and its star, or its stars, which are in it, are diverse.

1. Likewise, Another way seems to me strong against that position, namely, because every diversity must be reduced to some one principle according to the aforementioned Philosophers: just as the elemented to the elements, and to their places: and places to the orb: because what is nearer to the heaven, will communicate with it in splendor, and subtlety, and color because of motion: and according to distance from it they thicken and condense. But we see in the second heaven the greatest diversity: which is the eighth heaven, and is called of the fixed stars.

Therefore I ask, What is the principle of this diversity, that in one place some stars are near and many as in the Galaxy: but in another there are more and distant, and greater and lesser of diverse effects? For either this is from the principle acting and ordering them: or from chance and fortune: or it is the principle itself. But if in the first way: either that principle does this by necessity of nature, as fire burns, or by choice. If by necessity of nature: since that principle is intelligence, it must be that intelligence would be more multiple than the mixed: because the mixed is less composed than the composed from diverse parts in form, as flesh, and bone: and heaven, and diverse stars. But if it does by choice and wisdom, then it is concluded for our faith, that God does it as He wills, and when He wills, and not from eternity. But if it is by chance, Aristotle does not say this: because he wills, that nothing happens by chance except what rarely happens: but in the higher things there is always one mode: therefore nothing happens there by chance. But if it were by itself a principle, then many forms would be the first principle, which is false: therefore it remains, that God acts and does it by free will, as He wills, and when He wills: therefore eternity is not concluded. And these reasons are collected from the Philosophers, namely Moses, and others.

1. Many introduce another, and it is this, that nothing is infinite in act, neither in magnitude, nor in multitude. Therefore let it be granted, that the world had no beginning, then it follows that there were infinite revolutions before this revolution, and infinite deeds before this deed which now is: but it is not possible to traverse the infinite: therefore it would never happen to come to this deed which now happens, and up to this day which happens in the present revolution: but this is false: therefore the world began at a determined time. And this reason is introduced by the Commentator on the seventh of the Physics, And he says, that speaking of his law, he objected it to the Philosophers, and strives to dissolve it as much as he can: and yet he cannot avoid saying that infinite things preceded in revolutions and deeds, but per accidens: because revolutions are distinguished with respect to us, and preceding deeds do not have a substantial order to this deed: and therefore he concedes, that infinite deeds per accidens well precede that which now happens: because thus by substantial order there is no passage through all those up to this. And it is quite clear, that the solution is weak.
2. Likewise, Many object, that in no way is a creature comparable to the Creator: therefore neither in duration: therefore it ought not to be without a beginning of duration, as God is.

But let these suffice here: because all other places where Aristotle said otherwise about this have been inquired: and it has been shown what can, and what cannot be concluded from them.

Solution. Without doubt nothing is more probable even according to reason, than that it began, as Moses said, and this is to be held by faith. But it is impossible, that it began by motion and generation: or ceases by motion to another form, or corruption to another matter: and this alone those reasons, which are Aristotle's, prove: whence they conclude nothing against faith.

And by these the solution to all those things which have been brought up to the fourth way, which is not Aristotle's, but of the Commentators who without doubt introduced heresies, is clear. And to that it must be said, that this is false. Nothing begins to be unless it is first in potentiality. But it is true in those things which begin to be by generation with matter supposed. But of created things which begin by the will and choice of the creator, it is false: unless the possibility of the creator's power is understood: but this is improper: because nothing properly according to the Philosophers is in potentiality according to the efficient cause, but according to matter ordered in some way to that form to which it is said to be in potentiality: because the Commentator gives the rule on the ninth of the first Philosophy, that nothing is in potentiality in another, unless it is drawn out of it by one mover: as an idol in bronze in potentiality, because it is drawn out by the art's mover: and bronze in quicksilver and pure and pure sulfur, because by the heat of the sun in the bowels of the mountain the mineral is drawn out of it, and so of others.

To the fifth way it must be said, that it is an instance of the universally acting intellect in us, which sometimes extracts intelligible species, and sometimes not: without it being in potentiality. If you say, that the intellect acts universally, but phantasms are not always present: and therefore that it does not always understand them, this is not from its defect, but from the absence of that in which it acts, I do not make force of this: because whether it is so, or otherwise, that proposition has an instance: and I say, that in God it does not conclude who acts when He wills, and is not in potentiality.

To the sixth way it has been answered in the first book of the Sentences, because the will of God is determined from eternity that it be of this, and that it be done now, or then: and therefore it needs no one removing an impediment: and yet it is not new according to the things willed.

To the seventh it must be said, that although the substance of God is His will, and conversely, and by His substance He moves: yet one is connotative of will, and another of substance: and therefore that reason is weak concluding nothing.

To the ADMIRATION it must be said, that they are more to be mocked who seek against the art handed down by them: because the question being solved the same question remains. For let us suppose, that the world lasted a thousand years, or however much as now: still the same is entirely asked.

To another it must be said, that of the infinite mover moving according to infinite power, there must be infinite act: but of the mover by choice and will there is motion as long as he wills, and as long as he wills.

To another it must be said, that the same being in the same way, which is the reason of diverse things by exemplar and ideas can produce diverse things according to those reasons: but this word is said of the moved body which causes by necessity of its essence and its motion, and of that the proposition is true.

To the authority it must be said, that he does not intend, that God did not precede the world by eternity: but that He did not precede by duration which is properly divisible quantity: because every such quantity is caused by the quantity of the body. Whence if there were not continuous quantity of space, motion would not be continuous, nor even time. And from this it is clear that they err marvelously who say that the age, which is in the simple not according to some space, is continuous quantity. But Boethius speaks from hypothesis explaining the definition of eternity: because even if time were interminable, still it would not be all at once and perfect, and thus it would fall short of eternity: because it would be distant from simplicity by motion, and from perfection at once: because it would descend into infinite succession of time.

To another it must be said, that by the property of simple nature it notes the eternity by which God precedes the world.

To another it must be said, that God is good from eternity: yet it does not follow, that He creates from eternity, unless goodness would create the world substantially and not voluntarily.

To another which is objected about similars, it must be said that they do nothing to the purpose: because those act by necessity of nature: but God does not, but by free choice of will.

Divisio Textus

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, C, §2: Let us therefore believe of the created things, etc.

Here begins the second part in which the Master touches upon how creatures proceed from God.

And it is divided into five parts: in the first of which the Author treats of the cause of the existence of the universe in general. In the second, he treats specifically of the cause of the rational creature in kind, there, D, And because its blessedness does not avail. In the third, specifically of the mode of creation, there, H, And as it was made. And in the fourth, he treats specifically of the creation of the rational soul, and why it is joined to the body, there, K, So it can also be asked, With greater, etc. In the fifth, he finishes the proemial part, and connects himself to the following treatise, there, L, From the premises it appears the rational creature, etc.

Articulus 11 — Why It Is Imputed To Aristotle That He Said Two Things Were From Eternity, Namely Prime Matter And The First Mover, And What Are Those Three Things That Are Imputed To Him

Why is it imputed to Aristotle that he said there were two things from eternity, namely, prime matter and the first mover? And, what are those three things that are imputed?

Secondly, it is questioned concerning the nature of the principles that are imputed to him.

1. For what is said here is not found in his books that have come to us. However, at the end of the first book of the Physics, he posits three principles of nature, namely, matter, form, and privation. And this is neither false nor heretical: because motion cannot have fewer principles. And he speaks there only of such principles in general. However, the third thing that is imputed to him is not found.
2. Furthermore, there seems to be a contradiction in the text: because he says that he posited two, and exemplifies with three.
3. Likewise, since Epicurus (as is held in histories) also erred in positing the eternity of the world, why is that error not touched upon here?

Solution, that Aristotle in truth does not say this, that there are three or two principles of the world. But he proves that two did not begin through motion, namely, prime matter and the first mover: and therefore it is imputed to him that he said two are from eternity. And when two are said, then the principles of nature essentially constituting nature are touched upon: as matter and form: because privation does not constitute, but is cast aside through motion to form. However, when a third is said, then the first mover is said or touched upon.

To the other, it must be said that Aristotle seems to say a third in the eleventh book of the Metaphysics, where he says thus: The first principle of all things is neither moved substantially nor accidentally, but moves: and makes the first motion eternal.

To the other, it must be said that Epicurus posited the void and atoms: and he did not say that he did not posit.

Articulus 12 — What Is The Cause Of The Being Of The Whole Universe

What is the cause of the creation of the entire universe to be?

What is the cause of the creation of the entire universe to be?

A grave question arises concerning the first, about the flow of all created things from God, and this question holds the fruits of this entire science, if it could be well investigated.

1. It seems, however, through the Letter, that nothing is caused in created things except through the act of creation: because it says thus: Let us believe: therefore there is no other cause: therefore the cause of created things, celestial or terrestrial, visible or invisible, is nothing but the goodness of the Creator, etc., so there are no natural causes.
2. Likewise, causality which is removed from superior causes cannot belong to inferior ones: but the making of natural things is removed from Angels, who are the movers of the spheres, as many Catholics also say: therefore it is also removed from the motion of movables, and from the motion of inferior causes. The second is subjected in the Letter in the following, namely, that Angels do not make things, although they minister. The first is proved from what Aristotle says in the VIII Physics, that if the first movers do not move, motion will also cease in the second: because it descends in order from the superior to the inferior.
3. Likewise, some further subject thus: Whatever makes something, does not bring it from potentiality to actuality, except through that which is in act: therefore it is necessary that the maker and the made be in act of the same species. In that act, however, there is nothing in the seed of this generated, nor is there anything in the stars in act of that generated: therefore it is necessary that the specific form be given through creation.
4. Likewise, an accident does not make a substance: but the first qualities which are in matter are accidents: therefore they do not make the substantial form. Nor does anything move and transmute matter, except that: because nothing touches matter, except that: therefore it seems that it cannot be induced by them. Since therefore there is nothing else in the made, except God alone who is everywhere, it seems that every form is given by Him through creation.

5. Likewise, nothing acts beyond its own species: the powers of the first qualities and of the stars act in this generable matter: therefore not beyond the species. However, man or donkey is not of their species: therefore they do not act the form of a donkey, or of a man, or of another: therefore it is necessary that it be brought forth into being through creation. The first is proved from this that every action is from a form, and therefore does not exceed it. The second is evident by itself.

6. Likewise, it seems to follow from that which is held, John 5:17: My Father works until now, and I work. And, John 15:5: Without me you can do nothing. And, John 1:3: All things were made through him, and without him nothing was made. And, to the Hebrews 1:3: Upholding all things by the word of his power. Through these and others which we had above in I Sentences from Augustine, that because the Philosophers could not see God, it was permitted to the vanity of the Philosophers to seek proximate causes.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Damascene says that there is nothing which does not have its own operation: therefore it seems that every thing operates something.

1. Likewise, the same says that if a thing does not have its own operation, it also does not have its own nature: and the Philosopher says the same in the first Ethics, that every thing has some operation according to its nature: therefore it seems that not only God is to be said to make the whole.

2. Likewise, according to philosophical reasons, from one simple thing there is only one immediately: and from one which is in itself possible, and has necessary being from the first, there can be two: one moved, and the other not moved: therefore it seems if this is true, that he does not immediately operate all things.

3. Likewise, we see that with the sun approaching, those things which are around us, the vegetative things emit flowers: and with it approaching more, their moisture is directed into cooking and ripening, and in the state of color they are dried and sweat out so that they become suitable for eating: therefore other bodies of animals and of men are changeable in their bodies, and in seeds for generation, and so of others: therefore it seems that both the superior and inferior act some forms.

4. Likewise, Job 36:33: Do you know the order of heaven, and will you set its reason on earth? therefore the order of heaven operates something in nature: because its reason cannot be set on earth.

5. Likewise, it seems that God made the orbs and elements with moving powers in vain, if there were only matter, and in no way would they act forms, and according to this nature would be more imperfect than art: because art makes some form: but nature none according to that saying: If all forms are created by God. Which because they are absurd, it cannot be said that the act of creation is terminated to any form.

If you say that nature operates the form by bringing it forth from matter, and God, and more immediately God than nature: this seems to be nothing, because

1. Two according to the same reason of causality do not order to the same equally immediate, because each would act one per se: and thus there would be two in act, and not one. And this is the objection of the Commentator on VIII Physics.
2. Likewise, one would be superfluous: for if both are equally immediate, neither receives causality from the other: therefore one does not depend on the other: therefore the other is superfluous.
3. Likewise, it is impossible for two agents differing in species and genus to have an act that is one in species per se: but God and the efficient cause of something proximate, whatever it is, differ in species and genus, and each acts per se: therefore it is impossible for their made or act to be one: therefore it is false that both act equally immediately.

Solution. The opinions of both the Philosophers and the Doctors of Sacred Scripture concerning this question must be noted.

Note therefore, that the opinion of the ancient Philosophers who were before Aristotle is divided into four ways: and all supposed two propositions, which being ill-understood were for them the source of error. One of these is, that from nothing nothing comes. The other was, that everything which brings something from potentiality to actuality is similar to it in act according to species. Therefore the Epicureans first came saying: If from nothing nothing comes, it is necessary to suppose matter, and its place, and therefore they posited the void and atoms. Likewise, if a thing does not come into act except through that which is in act: since no thing is in act before it is made, it follows that no thing has a true substantial form: and generation is nothing but the congregation of atoms, and corruption the disgregation of the same: and the forms which seem are from the order of atoms in the composed congregation; so round sharp atoms constitute fire, and broad square ones earth, and so of others. And its defenders were Democritus and Leucippus.

Others because of the same propositions said there are only mixtures of elements, and in a certain ratio bone is constituted, and in a certain flesh, and so of others: of which nothing is truly form: but strife and friendship moving them agree. And the follower of that opinion was Empedocles.

Others saw things truly have forms, and because they did not see that they could be brought forth from potentiality, but if they were made when they were not before, it would follow that something would be made from nothing, they conceded all to have been from eternity in matter actually, but hidden: and then a thing is made, when its form begins to be discerned, with others obscuring it divided from it. And they posit all things to be in all, and the elements to be infinite: because every homogeneous thing in parts is an element according to them. And this opinion was defended by Anaxagoras. And if it is asked, What discerns the forms which were hidden? they say that the intellect acting pure and unmixed.

The fourth because of the same cause posited the forms of all things to be threefold, namely, eternal generating, and mathematical which are the principle of sciences, and particular generated. And this was held by Plato and prevailed until the time of Aristotle. The science which was held of this opinion is from a certain ancient Philosopher, named Pythagoras.

Those however who proceed by the way of Aristotle, and strive to expound him, like Alexander, and Avicenna, and Averroes, and others, are diversified into two parts: and they agree in one, and differ in two. For Avicenna and almost all others concede this, that that which is in potentiality does not come into act, except through that which is always in act. And Averroes and some others with him deny that: but they also differ in this that Avicenna supposes, that every form is given by an intelligence from which all forms flow, and that it is full of forms, and has influence over nature, when through the motion of the heaven and proximate causes the matter is prepared: and also has influence over the possible intellect in us; and every form is an irradiation of its splendor. And he calls this intelligence the intelligence of the tenth order: because he supposes, that there are nine first caused by order before the elements and elemented, namely nine spheres, and ten intelligences. And how this is proved, would be very long. But Averroes does not agree with him in this: because he says Aristotle feels, that all forms are in potentiality in matter, and all are drawn out from it by proximate movers, according to the communication of triple power, namely elemental, and of the heaven, and formative power in the seed, as was said above: and this is more probable.

Our Doctors however have two ways, namely, that all forms are created, and that the act of creation completes every motion of nature, and that nature does nothing except preparing the matter. And this opinion is defended by few. The second is, that God operates in nature and with it, in that he gives it to be and to operate and contains it principally in itself: and that his operation is not separated from the work of nature, so that he acts in one part, and nature in another. And this is more probable. And I think, that it is true. According to this it must be said, that after the works of the six days nothing new was created: because creation supposes nothing. Propagation however supposes the work of nature: and I well concede, that this is ordered, so that the diversity of the inferiors is carried into the motion of the heaven diversely approaching and receding to the inferiors because of the diversity and obliquity and rectitude of the circles, and this again diversity in the movers from the posterior of the movers to the first up to God, whose power and essence is not separated from anything up to the last, which is so moved that it in no way moves. And thus universality consists in him, as in its source and heart: because the whole flows from him, and is contained by him, and is governed, and is turned back into him.

And this is the cause that Augustine says, that his goodness is the cause of all, and does not exclude because of this secondary causes, which have no power of causing except from him containing.

To the other it must be said, that Angels are said not to be creators, but they are indeed causes through the motion of many natural things.

To the other it must be said, that this proposition is false: Nothing comes into act except through that which is in act, and it was responded to above, unless perhaps it is said that the exemplary reason by which that which is made, is in the divine mind its act: but this is said improperly.

To the other it must be said, that an accident as an accident does not make a substance: but according as it is a natural property of the element joined to the celestial power, and to the formative power in the seed it indeed makes the substantial form, by transmuting the matter from which it is drawn out.

To the other it was responded above how something acts or does not act beyond the species.

To all the authorities introduced it must be said, that they do not intend to show except that God principally acts, by whom withdrawing his action, none of those would act or remain in being. And this is true according to the Philosophers.

Articulus 13 — Whether The Soul And The Angel Agree In Species Or Differ In Species

Whether the soul and Angel agree in species, or differ in species?

Whether the soul and Angel agree in species, or differ in species?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, D, And he distinguishes it in this way, so that a part would remain in its purity, etc.

Because indeed he says part, it seems that the angelic nature is a part of the nature of the soul;

1. And this cannot be, unless they are of the same species: therefore it seems that the rational soul and Angel are of the same species.
2. This also seems for another reason. For there is one species of those whose ultimate constitutive difference is one: but the ultimate constitutive difference is one, namely, rational: therefore it seems that the soul and Angel are of the same species. The first is evident by itself. The second is taken from the Letter: because he says both natures are rational.
3. Likewise, Gregory says that man is every creature: because he is with stones, lives with trees and plants, feels with beasts, and reasons with Angels: therefore man and Angel agree in the ultimate constitutive difference.
4. Likewise, the impression of the image is the same (as Gregory says) in the rational soul and in Angels: therefore one species.
5. Likewise, those whose perfection according to grace and glory is one, they are the same in species: but the perfection of rational souls and Angels according to grace and glory is one: therefore they are in one species. The first is proven from this that different perfect things are not proportioned to the same proportion. But it is evident that perfections are given according to the proportion of the perfect. The second is evident from that Deuteronomy xxxii, 8, according to the translation of the Septuagint: He set the boundaries of the peoples according to the number of the sons of God.

6. Likewise, the active and possible intellect in us is more distant than the active intellect and Angel: but the most noble of the soul is the active intellect, which does not make a difference in species with the possible: therefore much more will it make the same species with the active intellect in the Angel.

If you say that the intellect of the Angel is deiform, but the intellect of Man is not: because this one is brought from potency to act, but not the intellect of the Angel which has concreated species, Against: Perfect and imperfect according to the same form do not vary in species: because otherwise a weak eye and a strong one would be of different species, which is false: therefore it seems that this does not impede.

If you say that the Angel is not unifiable to the body, the rational soul is so: this seems first false, because -

1. The Philosopher says that the intellect is the act of no body.
2. Furthermore, Union is a certain relation which according to nature follows the being of its extremes: but what follows being (as Boethius says) is of the accidentals: therefore neither does it constitute species, nor does it diversify the constituted.
3. Likewise, it is separable from the flesh: therefore it seems that this does not make them to be of different species.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. To whom there is some nature common according to species, to them it is common what follows that nature in as much as it is itself. If therefore to the soul and Angel there is one nature according to species, they will also have common consequences of that nature. But the consequences of the angelic nature (as the Master says below) are four, namely, subtlety of essence, perspicacity of intelligence, and personal discretion, and free will. But it is evident that personal discretion, nor even the perspicacity of angelic intelligence agrees with the soul: therefore they are not of the same species.

1. Likewise, whatever are of the same species, are of the same order according to nature, or injury would be done to the other: therefore if the soul and Angel are of the same species, they are of the same order according to nature. The proof of the first: because any part of fire is upwards, and any frog in the swamp. The second is assumed from the hypothesis. Thus: The soul and Angel are of the same species: therefore of the same order: therefore if the Angel is upwards before the face of God, there also according to nature will be the soul: and if the soul is downwards unifiable to the body, there also will be the Angel, which is false: therefore the soul and Angel are not of the same species.

Solution. It must be said that the soul and Angel differ in species: and how this is to be understood must be noted, that in the whole potential the parts of species are distinguished according to the order of power in more and more: and therefore just as rational says the species of the soul beyond sensible.

according to what is in the brute, in which the sensible is as a species: although in man it is as a potency, like a triangle in a tetragon: thus the intellectual constitutes a species beyond the rational species, although the rational is in it according to the reason of potency. And this is known through the act and medium of understanding: for the intellect of Angels is without collation and inquiry, and is perfected by the forms of the universal order of natural causes in the first instant of their creation: but our intellect is not perfected except by collation and inquiry: and therefore it is in shadow with respect to that, and it does not have species except those accepted for the perfection of knowledge. And this is what Isaac says in the book of Definitions, that reason is created in the shadow of the intelligent, and the sensible soul in the shadow of the rational soul, and the vegetative in the shadow of the sensible soul, and the orb in the shadow of the soul, and the elements in the shadow of the orb: because the perspicacity of intelligence is without collation and inquiry, and therefore its setting with the remaining cognition of the true simply is the power of reason which inquires and collates. And this Dionysius calls discursive sciences, or disciplines: because by collating they run from one to another. And he does not say that the Angel has such sciences, but simple deiform ones. And where reason falls, so that there is no acceptance of the good and true simply, but as now in material and sensible appendages, there begins the power of the sensible soul: and again in the setting of that and the retention of natural motion only, it induces the vegetative: and again the simplicity of the soul inasmuch as it is the first under that induces the orbs, and so of others.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that it is a part according to the remote genus, and not according to the species.

To the other, it must be said that the ultimate constitutive difference is not one as has already been shown, but adds a degree that varies the species.

To the other, it must be said that by the saying of Gregory, agreement is posited only in the genus: and this is clear by this, that the sensible in man and brute are not of the same species: since it is in the brute as form and specific difference, but in man as potency only.

To the other, it must be said that weak and strong do not diversify the species, but other and other names, as has already been shown.

To the other, it must be said that union is founded upon the nature of the soul: because it naturally depends on the body, and this is clear: because in comparison to the body, it is defined, and therefore it does not say only relation, but also specific difference: but because the ultimate specific differences are frequently unknown to us, therefore we name them by convenient signs, and sometimes by two more remote differences joined we describe one.

To the other, it must be said that although it is separable, yet still by proportion it has unibility to the body: and when it is separated from the body, it is not separated from unibility.

K. Why is man instituted in such a way that the soul is united to the body?

It is also customary to ask, Since the soul seems to be of greater dignity if it had remained without the body, why is it united to the body? To which it can first be said:

Because God willed it, and the cause of His will is not to be sought. Secondly, it can be said that God willed it to be united to the body in order to show in human condition a new example of the blessed union which is between God and the spirit, in which He is loved with the whole heart, and is seen face to face. For the creature would think it could not be united to its Creator with such proximity as to love and know Him with the whole mind, unless it saw the spirit, which is the most excellent creature, so lowly, that is, to the flesh which is from the earth, united in such love, that it cannot be constrained to wish to leave it: as the Apostle shows, saying: We do not wish to be unclothed from the body, but to be clothed over: by which it is shown that the created spirit is united to the uncreated Spirit with ineffable love. Therefore, for the example of the future society, which was to be perfected between God and the rational spirit in its glorification, He joined the soul to bodily garments and earthly dwellings: and made the clay material to vegetate to life sense: so that man might know, because if God could join such disparate natures of body and soul into one federation and such great friendship, it would by no means be impossible for Him to elevate the humility of the rational creature, although far inferior, to the participation of His glory. Therefore, because for the example of the rational spirit it was humbled in part to the companionship of the earthly body: lest perhaps it might seem too depressed in this, Divine providence added that afterwards with the same glorified body it might be elevated to the companionship of those who remained in their purity: so that what it had received less from the dispensation of its Creator, it might afterwards receive glorified by His grace. Thus, therefore, our Creator God, disposing rational spirits by various lot according to the judgment of His will, established for those whom He left in their purity a dwelling above in heaven: but for those whom He associated with earthly bodies, a habitation below on earth: imposing on both a rule of obedience, so that those might not fall from where they were, and these might ascend from where they were to where they were not. Therefore, God made man from a double substance: composing the body from the earth, but making the soul from nothing. Therefore, also souls are united to bodies, so that serving God in them they may merit a greater crown.

L. After the sacrament of the Trinity, it is to be treated of the tripartite creature, and first of the more dignified, that is, the Angelic.

From the foregoing it appears that the rational creature was distinguished into Angelic and Human: of which one is wholly spiritual, that is, Angelic: the other is partly spiritual and partly corporeal, that is, Human. Since therefore it is to be treated of these, namely, of the spiritual and corporeal creature, of the rational and of the non-rational: first it seems to be treated of the rational and spiritual, that is, of Angels: so that our reason may intend from the contemplation of the Creator to the knowledge of the more dignified creature: then it may descend to the consideration of the corporeal, both of that which is rational, and of that which is not rational, so that the sacrament of the uncreated Trinity may follow the tripartite creature, and the document of those things concreted and contingent to it.

Articulus 14 — Why The Soul Is United To The Body, Since It Would Have Been Of Greater Perfection For The Soul To Have Been Without The Body

Why the soul is united to the body, when it would have been of greater perfection for the soul to be without the body?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, K, It is also accustomed to be asked, When of greater, etc.

For the first reason of the Master seems to be nothing: because if he had not united the soul to the body, the same reason could be assigned altogether.

Solution. It must be said that the third cause is good, and other causes can be assigned, namely, so that through the mediation of man, corporeal nature could participate in God, which it could not do by itself: because otherwise the whole universe would not be referred to God. Because just as man has in the soul the vegetative, sensitive, and rational, which are all the grades of life: so according to the body he has elements, and mixtures, and complexions, and compositions, which are all the grades of corporeal matter: and therefore through the mediation of man all things are referred to God.

Another cause is: because the rational soul is naturally perfected through sense, although after death it will have another perfection: and therefore according to the order of nature it ought to be united to the body.

DISTINCTIO II

Divisio Textus

Concerning the angelic nature, therefore, these things are first to be considered, etc. Here begins the executive part, and above it is divided.

However, the first part, which is about the simple spiritual nature, is divided into two: in the first of which it treats of things pertaining to its nature; in the second, however, of those things which pertain to its distinction through aversion and conversion, and this begins in distinction V, there, A, After this consideration leads to inquire, etc.

The first of these is further subdivided into two: in the first of which it treats of extrinsic things, namely, what they are like in substance, and in natural powers, and in habits they are made, and this begins in the following distinction, there, A, Behold it has been shown, etc.

However, this distinction is divided into two parts: in the first of which it shows when they were created; in the second, however, where, and this begins, there, F, Now it has been shown, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Angel Was Created Before Or After The Ages, Or Is One With The Other Four Coevals

Whether an Angel was created before or after the heights, or is one with the other four coevals?

This question first arises concerning the time of the creation of Angels.

It seems, indeed, that they were created before other things:

1. For thus Hilary says: It is not a great thing that before heaven and earth God the Father begot our Lord Jesus Christ, since even the Angel is found to be more ancient than the creature of heaven and earth: it is not one of the coevals.
2. Likewise, Damascene: Some say that before every creation they were begotten, as the theologian Gregory says. First indeed God conceived the heavenly and angelic powers, and His conception was His work. Others, however, after the first heaven was begotten. But since all confess before the formation of man, I agree with the theologian Gregory. For he said that the intellectual substance was first created, and then the sensible, and then that which is from both, namely man.

1. Likewise, it seems to be proven by reason thus: Whatever substance is related to other created things as foreknowing their coming into being before they come into being in their own nature, it is necessary for it to precede all others in creation. But the Angel is such a substance related to other created things: therefore, the Angel preceded all others in creation. The first is evident by itself. The second is taken from Augustine, who thus explains, "let it be," and "he made," and "it was made," so that the first refers to the Word, the second to the knowledge of Angels, the third to the existence of the thing in its own nature.
2. Likewise, Augustine: You made two things, Lord: one near You, and the other near nothing: it is near the Word. But to be near the Word is to be near the cause of the coming forth of creatures into being: therefore, since it has the power of knowing, it will know them in the Word before they come into being: therefore, it precedes their being in their own nature.
3. Likewise, a substance moving towards the being of another substance and influencing it, it is necessary for it to exist prior to that whose being it moves and upon which it influences: Angels (as the Philosophers say) are substances moving towards the being of the elements and the elemented, and influencing the being and motion of the spheres: therefore, it is necessary for them to exist prior to the elements, and the elemented, and the spheres; therefore, they ought to have been created first, as it seems.
4. Likewise, to the one simple thing, that which is least of composition and of no quantity is more akin than that which has the composition of quantity and the termination of contrariety: but the Creator is one simple thing, the Angel is of least composition, because according to the Philosophers it has no composition except of the possible insofar as it understands itself, and of the necessary insofar as it flows from God and understands Him: but the spheres have quantity and potentiality to place, and the elements contrariety: therefore, the Angel is more akin than corporeal things: therefore, it also flows from Him first.

If you say that this does not follow: because all things flow equally. On the contrary: the Creator is related in one way to everything that is: therefore, on His part there is no difference: but if there is a difference, it is on the part of the creatures being related differently to Him: therefore, it seems that the efflux should be determined according to the order of the creature, and not according to the order of the Creator.

1. Furthermore, the order of creation should correspond to the order of nature: but nature orders the mover before the moved, and the incorruptible before the corruptible, and the spiritual before the corporeal, and the simple before the composite: therefore, since Angels are incorruptible, spiritual, simple movers, it seems that they were created before all others.
2. Likewise, Plato seems to say this: O gods of gods, whose maker and Father I am. Thus he infers: I, etc. Of these I will make the seed, and I will hand it over to you: it will be yours to carry out equally. For this seems to be understood, that they have influence on the being of the generable: therefore, they ought to have been before all things, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. On the part of God creating, there is no difference in the exit: therefore, since the creature was not before creation, on its part also no order could be taken: therefore, there is no reason for it to be made sooner or later.

1. Likewise, we see that the rational soul, which is the mover and perfection of the body, is not made before the body, but after its organization: therefore, if Angels are the movers of the higher bodies (as some say), they ought to have been made after them similarly.
2. Likewise, Moses intends to refute the errors of various people concerning the beginning of the creation of the world. But it was the error of many that God created the world through Angels: therefore, to refute this, they ought not to have been created before, but either with the world or after it. Hence Damascene: Whoever says that Angels are the creators of any substance, they are all of their father the devil. For creatures coming forth are not creators. But the maker, provider, and sustainer of all is God, who alone is uncreated.

Solution. It must be said that Angels were made not in duration, but in the order of dignity before corporeal creation. And to understand this, Augustine's distinction from the Confessions must be taken, that one thing is said to be prior to another, namely by eternity, as God precedes all things: by dignity or choice, as the better and nobler is preferred to the less noble or useful, and in this way the fruit precedes the flower: by origin, and in this way sound precedes song, because modulation in sound makes song: and by time, and in this way the flower precedes the fruit.

Therefore, to those things introduced from Hilary and Damascene, and to those things introduced in the Letter, because wisdom is the first of all created: it must be said that they speak of the priority of dignity, not of duration or time.

To the other, it must be said that that priority of understanding a thing to be made, even according to Augustine himself, does not posit a priority of duration, but of the order of nature: and thus Augustine solves it, so that knowing a thing to be made does not posit in act the knowledge before the existence of the thing: but simultaneously with the thing itself, it posits its thought, that is, of every thing to be made as far as it is from the order of the causing cause, and I can have, namely, the knowledge of the thing made, when it is already made.

To the other, it must be said that even the Angel is not immediately near the Word except in the order of nature, and not of time in the order of the exit of creatures.

To the other, it must be said that that reasoning proceeds from the opinions of the Philosophers, and is founded partly on doubtful propositions, partly even on false ones according to our faith. For it is doubtful who is the mover of the heaven. Ptolemy, and Albatenius, and Albumasar, and all astronomers say that the heaven is moved by the will of God, and this is our confession. But Aristotle and all natural Philosophers say that it is moved by an intelligence, as the desiring is moved by the desired, and whether Angels serve God in the motion of the spheres, or not, is uncertain to us: however, we hold most certainly according to the holy Fathers, that not all are occupied around the motion of the heavens, even if there were as many heavens as there are stars, as some of them presumed to say: because it is handed down to us that some assist, some minister around us: however, that some even move the heaven, it seems according to the exposition of one saint by that word of Matthew, XXIV, 29: And the powers of the heavens shall be moved. For Bernard in the book to Eugene explains this about Angels.

But whatever may be about the doubtful things, to the reasoning introduced it must be said that even according to the Philosophers who posit that opinion, the reasoning is not valid: because they do not understand the order of time, but of nature: just as the matter of the element is prior to the element, yet it never lacked the element, nor the elemental qualities themselves.

To the other, it must be said that that also does not conclude except about the order of nature, or dignity, and not of time.

To the other, it must be said that the order on the part of the created does not impede, because the creature was not: and also because the degree of dignity does not infer the order of time, as in many things it has already been evident, because otherwise the soul would precede the body in time. By this the solution to the following is evident.

To the other, it must be said that it does not intend that they are prior to other created things, but that He gave them the power of moving the stars for the propagation of nature: but the order of creatures the Creator Himself instituted.

Articulus 2 — Whether There Is One Matter Of All Spiritual And Corporeal Things

Whether there is one matter of all spiritual and corporeal things?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, C, "He who lives forever created all things at once."

For by this two things are held, namely, that all things are at once in their proper species: and concerning this will be that question about the opinion of Augustine. And another exposition is that he created all things at once in matter, and from this it is left that the matter of all things is one in number.

1. And this also seems to be by that of Job, 40:10: "Behold Behemoth, whom I made with you." But Behemoth by nature is an Angel: therefore an Angel is of the same matter with man: therefore with flesh and bones.
2. Likewise, of spiritual and corporeal substances there is one genus: because otherwise there would be more categories than ten: therefore, since that genus is not vain, it will have something corresponding in reality: and it is certain that it is not form, because the form is not one of corporeal and spiritual things: therefore their matter is one.
3. Likewise, this seems to be said by Porphyry: because he wills that genus is in place of matter.

Other things that can be objected to this were moved in the preceding distinction.

On the contrary is what Aristotle says in the XI of the First Philosophy, that of corporeal and incorporeal things there is not one genus. And the Commentator explains that genus is taken there for matter: therefore much less of corporeal and spiritual things is there not one genus.

Likewise, Averroes on the II of the Metaphysics says: "It must be known, however, that genus is not matter, but is a general form: but it agrees with matter in that it sustains difference in constituting species, and in that difference is potentially in it."

Solution. It must be said, as Boethius wills, that of spiritual and corporeal things there is not one matter, as we said above. Because also according to the Philosophers, spiritual things or intelligences which we call Angels, indeed have a composition of the possible and the necessary, which parts our Doctors call "that which is" and "by which it is": and Boethius seems to call "that which is" and "being." Because that possible is never in potentiality, nor can it be; but because it depends on another, namely on the first cause, therefore in itself it is said to be possible: and because it particularizes and divides that by which it is, which of itself is common, like every form. Hence the incommunicable and communicable make in the Angel a composition: and this is signified when it is said, "Angel" and "this Angel."

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the authority of the Saints is not entirely adduced: because they adduce that all things were made at once in matter or likeness, like the soul of man with Angels: because they have a certain likeness in the genus of nature.

Likewise, I say that Scripture intimates that not of all corporeal things is there one matter: because it says heaven and earth were created. For if heaven were of the common matter of all others, it would not have been necessary to say except one of them, and it would have sufficed.

To the other it must be said that this is a vile sophism: because there is a double form, namely, of matter which is part of the essence: and that is not predicated of the composite, because (as Avicenna says) form as form does not have that it is predicated of that of which it is the form: but it has this inasmuch as it is a form consequent to the whole composite according to its whole being: and this is the species of which Boethius says that it is the whole being of individuals. And it is a form consequent to the composite according to part of being, and this is genus: and this form places a likeness essentially in the whole or in part of the essence: and this corresponds to it according to being, or thing, and matter.

To the other, the response is clear by the saying of the Commentator.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Empyrean Heaven Is A Body, And Why The Philosophers Did Not Know It

Whether the empyrean heaven is a body? And, why did the philosophers not know it?

Then it is inquired about this which he says, there, F, It has already been shown when the angelic nature was created, etc.

For here falls the question about the empyrean heaven: and we will inquire three things about it, namely, whether it is a body? And granted that it is, whether it is movable, or uniform, or not? And granted that it is not movable, whether it has an order according to some influence on the other lower orbs?

To the first, it is proceeded thus:

1. Everything that is moved in place per se, is in place: everything that is in place, is surrounded by another body: therefore everything that is moved locally per se, is surrounded by another body: the ninth sphere is moved in place per se: therefore it is surrounded by another body: therefore it is necessary to posit a tenth body: and this we call the empyrean heaven.
2. Likewise, before every multiform, a uniform must be posited: but the ninth sphere is multiform, since it has right and left: therefore it is necessary to posit another uniform body before it, and this we call the empyrean.
3. Likewise, that which has the best perfection without motion, is before that which has it with motion: and that which has it with one motion, is before that which has it with multiple motions: but the ninth heaven has perfection with one motion: therefore before it, there will be posited another body, which has it without any motion, and this we call the empyrean heaven.

4. Likewise, it is necessary that the universe be perfected in its ultimate by something perfect: but everything that is moved is imperfect: therefore it is not perfected in something that is moved, unless in some unmoved body: therefore that will be posited: but this we say is the empyrean.
5. Likewise, the saints say expressly, and this is a stronger reason why we posit it: because namely the holy Fathers who knew the Father of heaven and heaven better than others by the revealing Spirit, have handed this down to us.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Place and the placed are of the same nature: because the Philosopher wills that the same is the motion to place and to form, and the same mover: but the placed in the empyrean heaven is only a spiritual substance: therefore the empyrean ought to be a spiritual substance, not a corporeal one.

1. Likewise, place is that to which there is motion: but the motion of the Angel is towards God: because Augustine says, What in bodies is weight, this is in spirits love: and the love of the Angel tends towards God: therefore the empyrean heaven, which is the place of Angels, is God.
2. Likewise, Bede says, that within God and they run out wherever they are sent: this is held the same.
3. Likewise, place is containing and preserving of the placed: but this with respect to the Angel does not agree except to God alone: therefore the empyrean which is the region and place of Angels, is God himself and not some body.

Furthermore, it is asked, if the empyrean heaven is a body, why did the philosophers not know it, who have examined the natures of all bodies, especially if the reasons previously introduced have some necessity, as it seems to many: for since they are natural and not founded upon faith, they could see them just as we do.

If you say, that the Lord did not wish to reveal this to them, this is nothing: because He revealed His invisible things to them through reasons, which was greater.

Solution. It must be said with the holy Fathers, that the place of the blessed is the empyrean, and a body separated from the volatility of the world, and not investigable by reason: because whatever is known about heaven, is known through sight, or motion: and the empyrean is subject to neither. But other principles compel us which I will place in the following article of the question.

All the previous reasons which seem strong to some, are founded upon false propositions among the philosophers of this world.

For the major in the first proposition is, because whatever is moved in place per se, is in place per se, and this proposition is shown false by the Commentator on the sixth of the Physics before the end, where Aristotle speaking against Zeno says, that the first mobile is moved in place according to form and not according to subject: and the Commentator shows there by necessary reasons, that the gloss is bad which some said, that it is moved according to part and not according to whole: because parts are not moved per se, but per accidens by the motion of the whole. Likewise, because the whole cannot be moved unless all its parts are moved: whence he says, that nothing prohibits something from being in place per accidens, and being place per se, and being moved in place per se: and this is because motion does not depend on place. But these are of another business. From this it is clear, that that reason does not necessarily conclude the empyrean heaven to be, and to be a body: but other principles must be sought.

The following reason is founded upon this: Before a multiform body is a uniform body: and this is impossible among the philosophers: because a spherical body moved is not reduced by the Philosopher to a uniform, except as an intelligence is uniform: whence it is impossible for such a body to be: because it would already be of the perfection of the order of intelligence.

The third reason is founded upon this, that before a moved body is a movable body: and this is also impossible: because the greater perfection than a body can have according to nature, is itself being always conjoined to its operation which is circular motion, or simple motion, or multiple and manifold.

The following reason is ridiculous: because immobility in a body of ultimate perfection is according to nature.

The following reason is good and compels, and its compulsion will be evident consequently: because we find other principles from which it will not be sophistically proven that body to be.

To what is objected against it, it must be said, that this argumentation would hold, if the Angel were in place per se: but that place is not given to him except by congruence: because among other corporeal things it is more noble, and therefore it more congruently fits a more noble nature.

To the following it must be said, that the spiritual place of the Angel is God: but the place of habitation by congruence is the empyrean heaven: and many things have been noted about this in the first book of the Sentences: If the Angel is in place, or is moved in place, and how and in how many ways he is in place: and therefore I will omit all those here: and there it was also said if two or more Angels are in the same place, and how large is the place of the Angel.

To what is further asked, why did the philosophers not know?

It must be said, that Bede in the Letter solves this excellently: because from the volatility of the world, if it were not secret in this way, we indeed would perceive one star to be more or less distant than another through the diameter of the stars more or less: but we cannot distinguish the number of stars, spheres, and heavens: whence because that is neither subject to sight, nor investigated through the reason of motions as the ninth is, therefore it is not known by the philosophers. For the ninth, although it is not subject to sight, yet by the necessity of motion it is proven, as Alpetragius proves quite conveniently: and to that below in the works of the six days we will still place reasons.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Empyrean Heaven Is Immobile And Uniform Or Not

Whether the empyrean heaven is immobile and uniform, or not?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether it is mobile and uniform, or not?

And it seems that it is uniform: because

1. In the text it is said that it is called fiery not from burning, but from splendor: therefore the whole shines with light, as it seems: therefore it is uniform.

1. Likewise, the empyrean heaven is the region and place of contemplation: but those who contemplate are wholly in the light: therefore by congruence the place assigned to them ought to be full of light.
2. Likewise, light expands the sense in external things and gladdens the heart: therefore, since it is assigned by congruence to the blessed spirits, it ought to be wholly luminous and uniform.
3. Likewise, the closer one becomes to God through contemplation, the more one is removed from divided multitude (as Dionysius says) and approaches the one: therefore the congruous place will also be posited as uniform: because otherwise it would not correspond according to proportionality.
4. Likewise, this is what is sung: Eternal light will shine upon your Saints, O Lord. And it was prefigured in that word of Exodus where the children of Israel dwelt, there was light.

1. Likewise, Psalm 88:16: "Lord, they shall walk in the light of thy countenance."
2. Likewise, 1 Timothy 6:16: "Who dwells in inaccessible light." Since therefore this light is diffused among the blessed in the place of contemplation, it is fitting by congruence that this place be luminous.
3. Likewise, Hell, the place of the damned, is a place assigned to perpetual darkness: therefore by opposition, the empyrean heaven, the place of the blessed, is assigned to perpetual light.

That the empyrean heaven is immobile is thus proved:

1. Fruition is a withdrawal from all motion and imperfection: since therefore the empyrean heaven is the place of those enjoying, it is itself removed from all motion, and of most peaceful quiet.

2. Likewise, every motion is on account of need, even the motion of the heavens according to the Philosophers: therefore since there is no need whatsoever in the place of contemplation, the empyrean heaven is immobile.

These, however, are the proper principles from which the holy Fathers posited the empyrean heaven to be, and immobile, and full of light.

BUT AGAINST the first part it is objected thus:

1. The nature of fire is not noble, and rather is given in the torments of the damned: therefore from its nature the empyrean heaven ought not to be.
2. Likewise, a shining luminous thing (as Avicenna says) must have constant parts. And this is proved, because stars eclipse each other, and cover each other due to the constancy of parts in them, which another part of the subtle orb does not do: and stars shine, and other parts of the orb do not shine: therefore if the empyrean heaven is luminous, it seems to be subject to sight, and not to be subtle and simple.

Likewise, it is objected against the other part, namely, because it would seem to be of the fastest motion.

1. For Alpetragius says, and posits it as a common understanding of the mind, that the closer a body is to the first mover, the faster it moves: but among all bodies none approaches the first mover as the empyrean heaven does: therefore none is of such fast motion as it.
2. Likewise, every quantum is necessarily in potentiality to place: therefore it is mobile: because potentiality to place causes mobility, at least insofar as the orb is in potentiality to place: but in perpetual things being and being able are the same: therefore the empyrean heaven, since it is quantum, is moved.

Solution. It must be said that the empyrean heaven is in no way moved, and in no way is deformed.

To what is first objected, it must be said that it is not called fiery from the nature of fire, but from the congruence of the property of light, and from names known among us.

To the other it must be said, that it is always called shining from the nature of the most simple luminous thing, and I well concede, that it does not shine so as to project rays visible to us: because this does not suit the excellence of its simplicity. For the splendor of light is said in many ways, namely, of the light of the wisdom of God, and of angelic intelligence, and of the most simple body, and also of the dense body subject to our sight, and in these ways it is said more and less properly, and so much less properly as they are distant from the first.

To the OTHER part it must be said, that the whole is immobile, and the proposition which is introduced is understood of the approach which is according to the access to the mover as the mover is: and thus it is not here: because that body does not compel us to seek and posit anything except the state of the blessed in glory, and not the generation and motion of lower things.

To the other it must be said, that quantity by itself does not cause potentiality to motion, unless something else is added: and this is clear: because abstract things have quantity, and yet they are immobile: but the potentiality to place will cause the addition of a natural property inclining to achieve something possible through motion, and a mover joined to it.

Wherefore a certain Philosopher says, that five things are necessary for the orb to be moved: of which the first is that there be some good and best not joined to it by substance. Second, that it desires to be joined to it by natural desire. Third, that it is possible to achieve it through motion. Fourth, that it has a mover joined to it. Fifth, that it continually acquires what it desires: because thus its motion is perpetuated. Some, however, add the disposition of the mobile according to the right, whence motion arises, and according to the left through which rotation is made. But the Philosophers pronounce doubtfully about this: and whatever may be about this, it is clear that from quantity it does not have a natural order to motion, nor does it by itself cause potentiality to place.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Empyrean Heaven Has An Order Of Influencing Over The Other Spheres, And Whether The Sun Illuminates The Empyrean Heaven

Whether the empyrean heaven has an order of influencing over other spheres? And, whether the sun illuminates the empyrean heaven?

Thirdly, it is asked, whether it has an order of influencing over other spheres?

And it seems that it does: because

1. Whatever is first in any genus, influences over the second: but the empyrean heaven is first in the order of heavens: therefore it influences over the second.

1. Likewise, since right and left are in the second, it is necessary that they are caused by something: not, however, by the mobile itself of which they are: therefore they are caused by the empyrean heaven, as it seems.

Here it is asked, since stars and the sun are luminous above as below, and the luminous projects rays from its center everywhere, whether the sun illuminates upwards the place of Angels in the empyrean heaven?

It seems that it does: because the sun emits rays by necessity of nature: therefore it emits to every part wherever the center of its perspicacity goes: but this is to every part: therefore it illuminates upwards.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY is what is said, Apocalypse 21:23: That city has no need of the sun, nor the moon, to shine in it: for the glory of God has illuminated it, and its lamp is the Lamb.

Solution. It must be said that it is secret to us concerning this heaven which the holy Fathers have not handed down: nevertheless, if it is said that there is a twofold state, namely, of the generation of the elect to complete the number of the predestined, and to the order of this state is placed the order of the movable spheres: and another is the state of rewards in another age resting in contemplation, and to complete the order of this the empyrean heaven was created: it does not seem to me inconvenient, and then we say that the tenth heaven does not have influence over the ninth, because it is placed in another order, and therefore it is also not disordered and useless. And this is also the reason (as I think) why it will not be renewed on the day of judgment, nor rewarded further than it is rewarded now: because that state does not grow nor is amended, unless perhaps in accidental reward, not substantial.

To the other it must be said that right and left (as the Philosophers wished) are taken according to differences of position not simply, but according to what is ordered by motion to attain that which it intends from the influence of the splendor of intelligence. And this is clear from this, because otherwise that part which is right would sometimes be in the West. And again from this, that the right of the planets and the circle of signs is on the left of the first orb, as the Philosopher wishes in the second book of On the Heavens and the World, if anyone looks subtly there.

This again is clear from this, that the right in any heaven is twofold, and similarly the left, as Ptolemy says in his Quadripartite. For the right aspect is from the East to the middle of the heaven, and the left is from the middle of the heaven to the descending sign which is the West: and again the right is from the West to the angle of the middle earth, and again the left from the angle of the middle earth to the angle of the ascending sign which is the East. This again is clear from this, that in the eccentric orb and epicycle there are different rights and different lefts. And again from this, that the orb of the moon has another right according to the center of the epicycle, and another according to the point of the elevation of the apogee in the deferent, and a third still according to the point of the head and tail of the dragon which its circle makes from the intersection of the equant. And because some are ignorant of these, therefore they say marvelous things about the right and left of the heaven. Hence right and left are not caused in the heaven from the empyrean heaven, but rather from the disposition of God as we believe, or from the order of God and the influence of intelligence, as all the Philosophers say.

To what is further asked, whether it is illuminated by the sun, or stars, I say that I do not know: but I affirm this from the Apocalypse, that it does not need illumination: and if it is illuminated, this is for the well-being of congruence. And this has testimony from Saint Basil on that: "The voice of the Lord cutting the flame of fire." For Basil says that the cutting of the flame of fire is so that the light of fire is given upwards to the elect, and the heat downwards to the reprobate. For it is fitting that the light of the whole dwelling flows to the good of the glory of the inhabitant, and the horror of the opacity of the whole world to the place of the damned, so that thus is verified that of Wisdom, 5:21: The orb of the earth will fight with him against the senseless.

Articulus 6 — Whether In The Empyrean Heaven There Is Any Vocal Praise, By Which The Morning Stars Are Said To Have Praised God

Whether in the empyrean heaven there is some vocal praise, by which the morning stars are said to have praised God?

§ 51. Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, F, near the end: When the morning stars praised, etc. [132].

§ 52. For from this it seems, that the praise is vocal: because this is also hinted, Isa. 6:3: They cried one to another. And in Revelation 14:11: And they have no rest day and night, etc. And it is easy to collect many other things to this point.

§ 53. BUT AGAINST: 1. Damascenus says, that they pass their counsels to one another without speech uttered by voice.

§ 54. 2. Also, Gregory: The voice of Angels in the praise of the Creator is in the very admiration of intimate contemplation.

§ 55. 3. Also, Voice does not seem to be able to be made without breathed air broken and struck: but since such things are not there, it does not seem that vocal praise can be there.

§ 56. 4. Also, The praise of the mind is nobler than of the mouth: therefore it seems, that that is going to be there.

§ 57. 5. Also, Uniformly of the blessed there is one mode of praise: but to Angels according to their state vocal praise does not befit: since therefore the beatitude of men will be like that of Angels, it seems that vocal praise also does not befit men.

§ 58. Solution. Concerning this the sentence of the holy Doctors is doubtful, and I rather think, that either there is no vocal praise there, or if there will be, it will not be except in demonstration of the power of the praiser, so that in this the beauty of wisdom may be shown which so ordained the organs that they could burst forth into such a voice. when the morning stars gave praise together, etc.

§ 59. And according to this it must be said to that which is objected concerning breathed air, that I well think that it will not then be through that mode in which it is now, but rather through sounds modulated in the nature of the body of the orb of the empyrean heaven: and we say, that there is no corruption of nature nor ignominy there, if it is struck, and a glorious tongue is formed into a voice: but rather it is more glorious, if the glorious voice of the praise of the Creator is formed in it.

§ 60. To the others the solution is clear: because they do not prove except by a mode of congruity, and that congruity can be attended to which is of the mode of wisdom in the use of ordained organs.

§ 61. And note, that Angels are called morning stars insofar as in them preexisted the morning knowledge of the light of this world in the exit of all creatures into being. For a star [sidus] is called from the sideration and brightness of a star: because, as Isidore says, it is considered by sailors observing them. And stella (star) is called from standing [stando]: because when the orb is moved it itself is not moved in the same way, as the Astronomers say, but also has another motion: or because according to Aristotle it is not moved except by the motion of its circle, and not through itself. But an astrum is called a great star, or rather one constellation, like the Pleiades, or Hyades, which are named constellations, or the Dog which is a black star shining in the foot of Orion.

Articulus 7 — What The Heaven Of The Trinity Is

What is the heaven of the Trinity?

§ 63. Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, Here it is usually asked, If in the empyrean heaven, etc.

§ 64. And two things are asked here concerning the heaven of the Trinity, namely, what it is, and what is in it?

§ 65. But it seems, that the heaven of the Trinity is a body.

§ 66. 1. Whatever things are truly posited in one division of one common thing, are of one genus: but the heaven of the Trinity is posited by the Saints with other heavens in the same division: therefore it is of the same nature as other heavens: but other heavens are a body: therefore the heaven of the Trinity is a body, as it seems.

§ 68. 2. Also, Everything to which differences of position befit, is a body: differences of position befit the heaven of the Trinity: therefore it is a body. The FIRST is clear through itself. The SECOND is proven through the saying of Lucifer, who says: I will ascend into heaven therefore he was above the empyrean heaven: but being above speaks of position.

§ 69. BUT AGAINST: 1. Anselm says that God is greater than can be thought: therefore nothing encompassing Him is posited: therefore neither a corporeal heaven.

§ 70. 2. Also, Damascenus says, that He is infinite for this reason, because He is circumscribed neither by place, nor by time, nor by intellect: therefore He is not a body.

§ 71. Solution. It must be said, that the heaven of the Trinity is not a body: but is the same as the sublimity of God, as the Master says in the Text. Note however, that heaven expresses three things of its ratio, namely, the sublimity of nature and of place and of dignity, and containment from the fact that it encompasses all things, and it expresses a place of highest rest and delight. Therefore God will be called the heaven of the Trinity according as He Himself by the sublimity of active power most nobly encompasses and contains Himself perfectly, and all other things, and supremely rests in Himself and is delighted.

§ 72. To the first therefore it must be said, that the common element in which the common [genus] of the heavens is taken, is a commonality of proportion and analogy from such properties as have been stated, expressed rather than from things dividing the nature of the ninth heaven: and therefore the objection does not proceed.

132. Job 38:7.

§ 73. To another it must be said, that this which in corporeal things is position, this in spiritual things is order: and therefore he signified the order of dignity rather than a position by the word of ascending.

Articulus 8 — What There Is In The Heaven Of The Trinity

What is in the heaven of the Trinity?

§ 75. Secondly it is asked, What is in the heaven of the Trinity?

§ 76. But it seems that God is not in it: because

§ 77. 1. The Philosopher says that nothing is in itself: therefore since the heaven of the Trinity is the same as God, it seems God is not in the heaven of the Trinity.

§ 78. 2. Also, The Philosopher says in the book On Heaven and Earth, that outside heaven there is neither place, nor time, but a blessed life: therefore it seems since God is a blessed life, that He ought rather to be said to be outside heaven than in heaven.

§ 79. 3. Also, Christ according to his humanity seems to be in the heaven of the Trinity: because thus it says, Psal. 18:7: His going out is from the end of heaven: and his circuit even to the end thereof. But it is certain, that the egress was not through the laying down of deity, but through the assumption of humanity from the heaven of the Trinity: therefore the return was to the same, and thus according to humanity He is in the heaven of the Trinity.

§ 80. 4. Also, This Stephen says, Act. 7:56: Behold I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God. Psal. 109:1: Sit thou at my right hand.

§ 81. 5. Also, It seems that the Blessed Virgin is in the heaven of the Trinity. For it was held above, that the empyrean heaven immediately as it was made, was filled with holy Angels: and this is not understood of the filling of a place, just as grain fills a sack, but rather of the distinction of orders in beatitude: but concerning the Blessed Virgin it is read in the epistle of Jerome On the Assumption of the Virgin, that she is exalted above the choirs of Angels to the celestial realms. Since therefore the choirs of Angels fill all the altitude of the empyrean heaven, it seems that she is exalted beyond the empyrean heaven, and beyond that there is nothing except the heaven of the Trinity: therefore it seems, that she is exalted into that.

§ 83. Solution. We say, that in the heaven of the Trinity there is nothing except God the Trinity, the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit: because to be in the heaven of the Trinity is to be in the equality of the eminence of God.

§ 84. To the first it must be said, that nothing in one mode of signifying is contained in itself. But although God and the heaven of the Trinity are the same, nevertheless they differ according to the mode of signifying, and that diverse mode of signifying suffices for the transition which the preposition denotes.

§ 85. To another it must be said, that this is said of the corporeal heaven, not the spiritual, which is the heaven of the Trinity: and the Philosopher wishes to say, that the blessed life is neither included, nor excluded by place, as was said in the first book of the Sentences: nor is it said to be outside heaven as in a place, but rather in an object which is not included by heaven.

§ 86. To another it must be said, that the person of the man Christ is in the heaven of the Trinity, but not the human nature, but rather in the better goods, and the disposition of this is greater and not more sufficient. And what the right hand of the Father is, is noted below.

§ 87. To that which is objected concerning the Blessed Virgin, it must be said that she is not exalted in place beyond the distinctions of Angels, but in dignity, and order. And this is clear thus, because in the heaven of the Trinity is the beatifying only, and this is not included in the empyrean heaven, but in that of the Trinity: and there is the beatified only, and this is included in the order of the distinction of Angels: and there is the beatified working toward the redemption of others to be beatified through reparation, and this is where human nature is united, to which the Blessed Virgin is subjoined, for the reason that from her that nature was accepted: and those two natures pour forth light upon all other blessed ones. And concerning Christ it is certain through that Revelation 21:23: The lamp thereof is the Lamb. Concerning the Blessed Virgin it is understood through that Revelation 12:1: And a great sign appeared in heaven: a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and on her head a crown of twelve stars. This woman is the blessed Virgin and mother: clothed with the sun, that is, with the dignity and brightness of her Son who is called the sun: the moon under her feet, that is, the militant Church still subject to monthly defects, fallen before her feet to postulate indulgence: a crown of twelve stars is the universality of all the blessed, which is proven: a crown is a circle, and signifies the circle of signs: and to the circle of signs every star which is in heaven is reduced through the twelve images which are called signs: and therefore through the twelve stars all the blessed are signified, who are on her head like a crown: because they receive light from her, and into her all the Saints pour back this which they have of dignity and grace under Jesus her Son, and under God.

DISTINCTIO III

Divisio Textus

§ 88. DIVISION OF THE TEXT.

Behold it is shown where the Angels were soon as they were created. Here the Master begins to treat of intrinsic things pertaining to the first state of the creation of Angels.

§ 89. Now it is divided into three parts, according to the three questions which the Master touches upon here. The first is about the natural properties of Angels. The second is about the habits of grace or malice, asking, Whether they were created in grace, or in malice, or in neither, or not? And this begins in the fourth distinction, there A, After these it is to be seen, Whether, etc.

§ 90. The first of these contains three particles: in the first of which he treats of those things which are naturally attributed to the angelic creature. In the second he treats of the difference of Angels in participating in those attributes, there, B, Here it is to be considered, etc. In the third he posits their agreement according to equality in other things, there, C, And just as in the aforesaid, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Angel Exists, And Has An Order In The Universe

Whether an Angel exists, and has an order in the universe?

Whether an Angel exists, and whether it has an order in the universe?

Three questions occur before the Letter, of which the first is: Whether an Angel exists? The second: What it is according to its nature? The third: Whether an Angel is the same thing that the Philosophers posited as an intelligence?

Therefore, to the first it is objected thus: § 1. Aristotle says in Physics VIII , that if of two composed things one is found by itself, it is necessary that the other also be found; and although the Philosopher himself intends this concerning the composition of a mover and a mobile, nevertheless the Commentator says that this is also true in mixed things, as is evident in mead: for since water is sometimes found by itself, it is necessary that honey also sometimes be found by itself. But in the lower realm we find corporeal substance by itself, and substance composed of the corporeal and the rational incorporeal: therefore it is necessary that rational incorporeal substance also be found by itself. Now, this we call an Angel: therefore Angels exist.

§ 2. Again, everything that is moved is moved by something; the heavens are moved: therefore they are moved by some mover. But since the heavens are incorruptible according to their nature, it is necessary that they be moved by a separate incorruptible substance, and this some call an Angel.

But because those are the arguments of certain people and are entirely worthless, as will be clear later, therefore, using Catholic principles, let it be objected otherwise thus:

§ 1. The wisdom ordering the going forth of creatures into being completes the grade of beings in all things. Since, therefore, there is something above the rational of a more perfect power short of God and communicable to a creature, the ordering wisdom will complete that, and the intellectual nature is more perfect than the rational, as was clear above in the question concerning the difference between the soul and an Angel: therefore wisdom will make it. Now, that is called an Angel by the sacred Expositors: therefore the Angel exists.

§ 2. Again, Aristotle says near the beginning of De Animalibus VIII , that nature completes the grades in all things; for it does not immediately transfer itself from a marine swimming thing to making a stepping thing, except through all intermediaries: for it makes a certain thing that dwells in the sea and seeks food on land, and a certain thing that dwells on land and seeks food in the water, and so concerning others. But Wisdom is much more ingenious: therefore it seems that it completes all grades. Therefore, after the uncreated spirit, which is neither circumscribed by place nor defined by place, whom we call God, He does not immediately make a body: but in the order of nature He makes a created spirit, not circumscribed by place, but defined by it: and this we call an Angel: therefore Angels exist.

§ 3. Again, in creatures there is found one thing near to nothingness which is prime matter, deficient in all form, as Augustine says therefore it is necessary that something be found near to God. But this cannot be a body, nor a composite of body and spirit: therefore it is a simple spirit: and this we call an Angel: therefore the Angel exists.

§ 4. Again, the good is communicative of itself; therefore it communicates being in all ways in which it can be communicated. But we see that it is communicated through the intention of nature, and it is communicated through the intention of cognition in symbols and figures, as to men having sense and a rational intellect: therefore it is necessary that there be something to which that is communicated, namely, through intuitive intellect openly, or else the order of the creating wisdom would not be complete.

But if you should say that the first truth and goodness is not communicated to us in symbols except from sin, and not from nature, that is plainly false: because before Adam had sinned, the Lord God took the man and placed him in the paradise of pleasure, so that he might work and guard it. Augustine says that he ought to have read God in the works of nature. Moreover, He would otherwise have given us sense uselessly.

ON THE CONTRARY: There is nothing in the universe that does not have an order to another: as is clear, that the higher things are movers, and the lower things are mixable by their motion, and the generated things are moved and mixed. Therefore, if Angels exist, it is necessary that they have an order: because there are many more Angels than there are motions, and mobile things, and stars of the heaven.

If you say that they are ordered to the ministry of the elect. On the contrary: If there were no sin, we would not need their ministry: therefore this was not the reason for their creation.

If you say that they are ordered to assist God, this does not seem to be the case, because God does not need their assistance. Therefore it seems that Angels do not have an order in the universe: and whatever does not have an order in the universe, does not exist: therefore Angels seem not to exist: and therefore, perhaps, some have said that there is no Angel whatsoever.

Solution. If it is permitted to prove through the authorities of the Canon and the Bible in this disputation, Scripture abounds regarding this in many ways from the New and Old Testament. But we have undertaken this disputation against certain modern Philosophers who hold erroneous views about Angels.

Therefore, I well concede that the first two arguments are ridiculous in this matter: because the statement of the Philosopher is understood concerning composites from a distinct mover and a distinct mobile, of which one does not have being in the other like form in matter, just as the moving heaven is a moved thing, or something else, and the moved earth is a non-mover: therefore there will also be a non-moved mover. But the statement of the Commentator is understood concerning things mixable by their substance, when they are divided, and could be divided. For if the proposition is taken generally, it is necessarily proved that the soul of an ass is separated immortal: because a body is found by itself, and a composite from a body and the soul of an ass: therefore the soul of an ass exists [by itself], which is a heresy. Hence it does not hold in those things which are composed like form and matter, and whose separation from each other removes the ratio of the conjoined thing: because a body separated from a soul does not have the ratio of a conjoined body.

To the other, however, it must be said that it is insanity: because we will never deviate into this error of saying that Angels are necessary for the motion of the celestial spheres, although we do not deny that they can move them; but their number and the reason for their creation do not depend upon that.

To the last it must be said that there are two orders of the world: one according to the state of generation, and the other according to the state of beatitude and grace. In the first state the Angel does not have a necessary order, but in the second, because in their lots and grades the rewards of graces are distinguished.

Articulus 2 — What An Angel Is By Definition

What is an Angel by definition?

Secondly, it is asked, What is an Angel?

And John Damascene gives this definition: An Angel is an intellectual substance, always mobile, free in choice, incorporeal, ministering to God, receiving immortality according to grace, not by nature.

But this definition seems to be open to criticism in the tenth book of First Philosophy because

§ 1. Of the corporeal and incorporeal there is not the same genus: therefore much less of the corruptible and incorruptible. If therefore corporeal things are in the genus of substance, incorporeal things are not in it.

§ 2. Again, whatever things are in some genus, their participation is through one mode of the principles of that genus: therefore if the Angel is in the genus of incorporeal substance, they will participate in the same way. And this is false: because if certain people say that Angels are from matter, nevertheless they say that matter and the matter of corporeal things are of a different mode.

If you say that substance is predicated of them by priority and posteriority. On the contrary: A genus is not predicated of those things which are in the genus by priority and posteriority, but a principle can be predicated of principled things by priority and posteriority. If therefore substance is predicated by priority and posteriority of the corporeal and the Angel, the Angel is not in substance as in a genus. But on the contrary is the fact that Porphyry posits the first division of substance by corporeal and incorporeal: therefore, since a difference added to a genus makes a species, it seems that incorporeal substance is in the genus of substance.

Again it is objected concerning the second particle, namely, intellectual:

§ 1. For spiritual or incorporeal is more a difference touching nature, and intellectual touching more the power: therefore it ought to be defined by incorporeal or spiritual rather than by intellectual.

§ 2. Again, why does he not posit rational, since this is more common, and more common differences ought principally to be posited near the beginning of a definition?

Furthermore, it is objected concerning what he says, Always mobile.

For this seems in no way fitting:

§ 1. For according to the Philosopher, that which is always mobile is maximally imperfect: therefore if the Angel is always mobile, it will be maximally imperfect according to its nature.

§ 2. Moreover, it is understood either concerning motion according to place, or according to will, or according to nature. That it is not according to place is evident: because it is not always moved according to place. Moreover, some of them are never sent: therefore they are never moved: and yet they are Angels. If according to will, this again does not seem so, because only some were moved according to will, and others were afterwards confirmed in what they will: therefore they are not always mobile. If in the third way, this is absolutely false: because then it would behoove them to be altered and generated according to substance, which is absurd; therefore they are not always mobile.

Furthermore, it is asked concerning what he says, Free in choice.

§ 1. For since other things accrue to it, such as personal distinction and simplicity of essence, why did he not posit those just like this one?

§ 2. Again, what is not equally participated by those having a common nature ought not to be posited in the definition of that nature, because otherwise equivocation would occur. But to be free in choice is not equally participated by Angels: therefore it ought not to be posited in the definition of an Angel. The first part is evident in itself. The second will be written immediately in the Letter in this distinction.

It is also objected concerning what he says, Incorporeal.

§ 1. For Damascene says in the same place that with respect to God they are only corporeal, but with respect to us they are incorporeal. Therefore, if it belongs to them respectively to be corporeal and incorporeal, whichever of the two is accidental to them, not defining the Angel substantially.

§ 2. Again, what in itself is a substance can be compared to nothing with respect to which it is not a substance. If therefore Angels in themselves were incorporeal, they can be corporeal with respect to nothing: but they are incorporeal.

Concerning the following point which he says, Ministering to God, it is objected: because since demons are Angels, it is not fitting for them to minister to God: therefore the definition is not convertible.

Again, concerning the last point which he says, Receiving immortality according to grace, not by nature.

For this seems false: because

§ 1. Nothing is naturally mortal except what is composed of contraries, as the Philosopher says, and this on account of the mutual action and passion of the contraries, and also on account of their motion toward contraries, because the light part in a mixed body strives upwards, but the heavy downwards, and thus they will sometimes separate, and corruption will occur. But it is not thus in an Angel: therefore it is not mortal according to its nature.

§ 2. Again, the Philosopher also seems to wish in the first book of De Coelo et Mundo that the heaven is immortal, which nevertheless is a body: therefore much more will Angels be immortal by nature.

§ 3. Again, it is not fitting to say that demons have grace, and yet they are immortal: therefore immortality does not accrue by grace, but by nature, as it seems.

§ 4. Again, nothing dies or is corrupted unless by something stronger acting upon it. But nothing short of God is stronger than an Angel: therefore nothing will corrupt it: therefore by nature it is immortal, as it seems.

Solution. It must be noted beforehand that this description of an Angel belongs as much to the good as to the bad, and below, in the second question concerning Angels, we will lay down one that belongs to the good Angels only, and in the following treatise concerning motion, we will lay down another that belongs to the bad Angels only.

Therefore, this definition which belongs to the good and the bad has substance for its genus, and adds six differences from other things which are in the same genus. That he therefore says, Intellectual, distinguishes it in my judgment from other animated substances, such as the vegetative and the sensible. But that he says, Always mobile, distinguishes it from the first substance which alone is immobile by nature. But that he says, Free in choice, distinguishes it from those things which do not have free choice, such as animals. But that he says, Incorporeal, distinguishes it from bodies, such as the heaven and the elements. But that he says, Ministering to God, distinguishes it from man who ministers to himself on account of indigence, to which the Angel is not subject: and this with respect to act. But that he says, According to grace, distinguishes the Angel from those things which are subject to corruption, because through grace and the benefit of creation they received the benefit of immortality. Some, however, say that ministering to God is not posited there except by occasion of the good Angels: and I do not think this is true: but according to the nature of an Angel, every act of his is ordered to the ministry of God. And it is not thus in the works of men.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the Philosopher does not speak there of a predicable genus according to some common ratio, but of a genus which is a primary subject or matter: because otherwise it would be false.

To the other it must be said that it is not necessary, for some things to be in one genus, that they be from the same principles of that genus, but that there be in them a proportion to one ratio of principles. And this is well saved in Angels; because in them it is possible to find active and passive potency, although it is not possible to find matter and form, as will be clear later. For Aristotle says: In every nature it is possible to find something by way of potency, and something by way of act. For an Angel is in a certain way a potential being through the possible intellect, and is a being in act through the agent [intellect].

To the other it must be said that intellectual separates from more things than incorporeal, because it separates from the rational soul according as it is strictly taken: whereas incorporeal does not separate from it, but from corporeal substance, with which the rational soul communicates.

To the other it must be said that rational, as Augustine and Isaac say, is not the proper difference of an Angel, but rather of man and the rational soul.

To the other it must be said that always mobile is said by choice or will; and always is added so that it may be understood that this belongs to it of itself in every state of its being, even if it is not moved through grace: and thus the objection ceases.

To that which is objected concerning what he says, Free in choice, it must be said that two among the attributes are referred to the substance according to nature, namely, subtlety of essence and personal distinction: and therefore they cannot be taken in place of differences: because differences are taken on the part of the act or the form: but perspicacity of intelligence is posited in the first difference, and free in choice is posited here.

To the other it must be said that as to the habit of the power which is free choice, it is not by priority and posteriority: but rather by things ordering to the act: and this will be more discussed below. Hence it suffices to say here that in one way it receives more and less, and in another way it does not.

To that which is objected concerning the other difference, it must be said that an Angel is absolutely an incorporeal substance: and that it is said by Damascene and Gregory to be a body, is not said on account of the nature of a body, but on account of a property of a body, which is to be contained and defined by a place: and therefore those two objections are sophistical.

To that which is objected concerning the last point, it must be said that in my judgment he calls grace there a gift given with nature. For every created nature, insofar as it is brought out of nothing, would tend into non-being, if the hand of the omnipotent God did not hold it together: and by this hand I understand nothing other than the will, for a nature separated from contraries to remain in being: for in that He removed it from contrariety, He willed it to remain incorruptible. And Plato seems to mean this in the Timaeus , who says that they are indeed dissoluble by nature, but remaining by the will of the Creator: although this is better understood of the planets, which Plato thought to be fiery, and therefore corruptible by nature.

And through this the solution to the first three is clear: because the Philosopher speaks of another mode of mortality and immortality.

To the last it must be said that there is no stronger agent except God, and He does not destroy what He has made: but Damascene calls nature the defect which is in any created thing from the fact that it went forth into being after there was nothing of it.

Articulus 3 — Whether Theologians Call Angels Those Separate Substances Which Philosophers Call Intelligences

Whether the Theologians call Angels those separate substances which the Philosophers call intelligences?

Thirdly it is asked, Whether we call Angels those separate substances which the Philosophers call intelligences, as some contentiously presume to defend?

It seems that we do: because; § 1. Avicenna says thus, that intelligences are what the common people and the speakers in the law call Angels. § 2. Again, Algazel says this same thing before the end of his Metaphysics. § 3. Again, Rabbi Moses says this in the second collection of the Guide for the Perplexed therefore it seems that they understand this.

§ 4. Again, the Philosophers posit intelligences as separate substances, and we call Angels separate spiritual substances: therefore we intend to say the same thing by Angels that they do by intelligences, as it seems.

§ 5. Again, an intellectual substance does not have anything before it in the order of the universe according to the Philosophers except the first cause: and we say the same concerning Angels: therefore it seems that we intend the same thing by Angels that they do by intelligences.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. No Philosopher ever posited that intelligences are moved locally, but rather they write that they are immobile. We say an Angel is a messenger, because it is frequently sent moved locally: therefore we do not understand the same thing.

§ 2. Again, every Philosopher positing intelligences says that they move the heavens, as the desired object moves the desirer: but we do not say this of Angels: therefore, etc.

§ 3. Again, all Philosophers agree in this, that the number of intelligences is in one of three ways, namely, either according to the number of the mobile spheres, or according to the number of motions, or according to the number of stars which are in the mobiles: but we repute all these things absurd concerning Angels: therefore, etc.

§ 4. Again, every Philosopher positing intelligences says that one is the cause of another in the order of nature, not of time: but we say none of these things concerning Angels: therefore, etc.

Now it might be that someone says that I do not understand the Philosophers speaking of intelligences. But to this I answer that it is true that I understand little; but it is not uncertain to me that this is the intellect of the Philosophers speaking of intelligences. And what is certain to me is that anyone saying that Angels are intelligences, and are moved locally, or even immediately move the heavens, and not only as a desired object moves a desirer, that he never knew the nature of an intelligence, nor understood the Philosophers speaking of intelligences. For they posit only one single intelligence which is a necessary being, and from its splendor and its possible [aspect] which never fails it, as they say, it brings forth an intelligence of the first order; and from that, according to the orb and with the soul of the orb, an intelligence of the second order; and from that the third orb and an intelligence of the third order, and so on up to the intelligence of the tenth order, which is the mover as a desired object of the sphere of active and passive things, which is brought forth from the distinction of places under the orb of the moon, whose intelligence's splendor they say is every form of the matter of generable and corruptible things, and the form of the possible intellect. And all these things we repute erroneous when said of Angels.

And therefore I consent to this part, that an Angel is not the same thing that the Philosophers said an intelligence is, nor do I even say that they are intelligences, as is found below in the question concerning the works of the fourth day, and concerning the heavens: because it seems to me that this cannot be posited Catholically.

To the first three it must be said that those Philosophers speak according to their own intentions: but we do not posit Angels to be thus.

To the other it must be said that we separate Angels by a different separation than they separate intelligences. For they posited that they were not conjoined to matter, nor had material forms, but simple universal ones which are the rational principles of the heaven's motion: but they determined the intelligence to a determining mover who receives the species from the splendor of the intelligence, and moves its heaven to the attainment of that mobile species so that it may be produced in being. But we repute this foolishness, who say that God causes and disposes the world according to His will, and we separate all Angels from matter, and from a determination to a mover and to the motion of any body: but they direct their intention to God alone through contemplation, and to us through ministry.

To the other it must be said that the order of the universe according to the Philosophers is entirely other than according to us. Because they posit the order from one, that from that which is necessary and one, nothing can [proceed] except one which is possible and necessary: possible indeed in itself, and necessary from the first. And from that which is two, two are brought forth, namely its heaven, and another intelligence, as we said above; and the heaven [is brought forth] through motion, and by which a part approaches something and recedes from something is the principle of diversity; and from the part of the intelligence other intelligences are also brought forth. But we posit the order thus, that the corporeal and spiritual exist simultaneously from one agent in accordance with the liberty of His will, and not by nature and necessity, as they posit. And we say that the Angel is first after God not in the order of cause, but in the order of status and dignity.

Articulus 4 — Whether An Angel Is A Simple Substance

Whether an Angel is a simple substance?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says there at A, And indeed four things seem to be attributes to Angels, etc. And five things are asked: of which four are concerning those in order which he enumerates, but the fifth concerning all in common.

Therefore it is asked first: Whether an Angel is a simple substance?

It seems, however, that it is not: § 1. For the Philosopher says: Everything that is one in number, is one through matter. But an Angel is one in number: therefore it is one through matter, as it seems. But nothing has matter unless it has form: therefore an Angel is composed of matter and form.

§ 2. Again, Boethius in the beginning of his book De Trinitate This is truly one which depends on nothing, in which there is no number. And he intends this concerning God alone: therefore everything that is a 'this something' [hoc aliquid], in nature is said to have number: and thus it is composite.

§ 3. Again, Boethius, in the same place: A simple form cannot be a subject. Therefore if an Angel is a simple form, it cannot become a subject: but it is the subject of grace, and of knowledge, and of many other things: therefore it is not a simple form. And it is certain that it is not simple matter: therefore it is composite.

§ 4. Again, Boethius, in the beginning of the book De Hebdomadibus [133], saying: What is it to have something besides that which it itself is: but being has nothing admixed to it. Therefore an Angel is not simple being, since it can have something besides that which it itself is: because it itself is not whatever it has: therefore being in it is one thing, and that which it is [quod est], is another: therefore it is composite.

§ 5. Again, Boethius, in the same place: Whatever is this 'something', has one thing by which it is, and another by which it is something. But it is certain that an Angel is a 'this something': therefore it has one thing by which it is, and another by which it is a 'this something': therefore it is composite.

§ 6. Again, the Philosopher, in the beginning of the book De Anima [134] maintains that matter is not a 'this something', nor even form, but the composite: therefore since an Angel is a 'this something', it seems that an Angel is composite.

§ 7. Again, in everything in which it is possible to receive the universal according to nature, and the particular, in that thing there is composition: for the Philosopher says, when I say 'heaven', I say form: when I say 'this heaven', I say matter. Therefore since according to nature it is thus said 'Angel', and 'this Angel', composition seems to be supposed in it.

§ 8. Again, Avicenna says that every form is common of itself: therefore if it is individuated, this is not unless upon something which is the foundation of being upon which it is founded. But it is certain that the nature of an Angel is individuated in this Angel: therefore there is a foundation upon which it is restricted: therefore it has matter and form.

§ 9. To this some have wished to say that there is a composition from the nature of the universal and particular form, just as the Philosopher says concerning the heaven, When I say 'this heaven', I say matter: when I say 'heaven', I say form, and they call this logical composition. And there is a composition from that which is (quod est) and by which it is (quo est), and they call this metaphysical. And by these two compositions they say an Angel is composed. But there is a third composition which is from form and matter, which is physical composition: and they say this does not belong to an Angel.

And it seems strange to me if those who say this understand what they say: for every essential composition of what is not a subject and an accident is from some essential form. But that can only be the form of the whole, or a part of the whole. For example, 'man' and 'this man' has a composition: for there is a universal form consequent upon the whole composite, as a certain Philosopher says: and therefore it can also be predicated of that whose form it is. But if it is not such, then it is necessarily the form of a part: thus the form is the form of a nature, and that is the other part of the composite, and it is not predicated of the composite: since, as Avicenna says, a form does not have that which can be predicated insofar as it is a form, but rather insofar as it is the form of the whole, being in a certain way the same as that of which it is predicated. Therefore it seems that the division of that composition is only twofold: because 'that which is' (id quod est) is the same as the particular; and 'by which it is' (quo est), or being (esse), is the same as the universal nature.

Again, I say thus: If there is there the form of the whole, it is necessary that it flows from the whole; therefore it presupposes composition in that whose form it is, as it seems.

§ 10. Again, of those things which are in a genus, there are the same principles of participating in that genus. But Angels are in the genus of substance: therefore they will participate in the genus by the same principles by which other substances participate in it. But these are form and matter: therefore Angels are from matter and form, as it seems.

§ 11. Again, Philosophers say that all intelligences which are short of the first cause are composed of possible being and necessary being. But possible being is the being of matter: therefore it seems that they are from matter and form.

§ 12. Again, in De Anima II, the Philosopher says that in every nature there is potency and act: therefore also in an Angel. But potency and act are form and matter: therefore an Angel is from matter and form.

§ 13. Again, whatever belongs to many things and not by itself, and belongs to something by itself: it is necessary that it belongs to all of them by grace of that alone which is in all of them: just as because having three angles belongs to the isosceles, the equilateral, and the scalene, and not by itself, and to the rectilinear triangle by itself, it is necessary that it belongs to them by grace of the nature of the triangle which is in them. Thus, 'to stand under' [substare, be a subject] belongs to many things, because to all substances: and not by itself, because Boethius says that a simple substance cannot stand under. Again, it belongs to matter, and by itself: because it cannot be reduced to anything prior. Therefore to all things to which it belongs to stand under some form, it belongs to them by grace of the matter which is in them: but this belongs to all Angels: therefore all Angels are from matter and form, as it seems.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Augustine says that the soul is a simple substance: therefore much more so the Angel: therefore it is not composite.

§ 2. Again, the Master says here that simplicity of essence is an attribute of an Angel: therefore an Angel is simple, as it seems.

§ 3. Again, a point is simple, and yet has position in a continuum: therefore much more so is an Angel simple who is indivisible, such that it does not have position.

§ 4. Again, the propositions of Boethius by which it is proved that an Angel is not simple do not seem to be valid: because every form is simple: and yet I can say that there is whiteness, and this whiteness. Again, I can say that this whiteness is this...

something [a "this something"], and yet it itself is simple: therefore "this something" does not imply composition: therefore the reasons previously adduced do not seem to be valid.

§ 2. Solution. My opinion has always been that an Angel is composed of essential parts, but not of matter and form: because I do not say that matter is the first principle of the composition of substance in general, but of moved substance: and therefore where there is no potency to motion, I do not say that there is matter unless matter is taken very broadly and improperly. For it seems to me that the Philosophers do not speak of matter unless it is under some privation. However, I well say that if it is called a foundation, that then it is [composed] of matter and form: because the Philosopher says in book VII of the First Philosophy [Metaphysics] that the foundation [subject] is neither "how much", nor "of what sort", nor any of the other predicaments. But Boethius in the book On the Two Natures in the One Person of Christ does not call matter thus, nor do the natural Philosophers, nor does the Mathematician speak of matter in this way.

§ 3. Yet there are some who say that matter varies in three ways, namely, that some is determined by substantial form alone: and according to this we say that matter is part of a substance, even though it is never in potency to the substance of which it is a part, as in perpetual things. Some, however, is determined by substantial form and quantity, and is never in potency to being, but is in potency to "where" [location], as in the heaven. And some is determined by substantial form, quantity, and quality, as the matter of generable and corruptible things. Therefore, when it is asked, "Whether there is one matter of corruptible and of perpetual things?" It must be said that it is not one: because thus says Boethius and all the Philosophers: for the reason that it is not called one by reason of the subject alone, but also by reason of potency: and potency is not of one ratio in them. In the same way, when it is asked, "Whether there is one matter of corporeal and incorporeal creatures?" It must be said that it is not one: because although the first foundation in itself is one, nevertheless the matter is not one. Because matter names a potency which is not of one character [ratio] in those things which are moved according to place, and those which are immobile according to place, unless perhaps definitively [by definition]. And I well agree with this opinion, and especially because of this: because it seems impossible that some property should be in diverse things which is not in them by grace of some common substance: but a property common to many, both spiritual and corporeal things, is to stand under and sustain a form. Therefore it is necessary to posit a common substance which is in them: and this, in my judgment, will not be called matter, but a foundation. Another reason is the one adduced above in objecting, that of those things which are in the same genus, it is necessary that there be one common habitude to the principles of that genus: but it is manifest that the indivisible principles of a genus, the subject, are the foundation, and the being of the substantial form. And through this the solution to all the things which are adduced is clear: because they do not conclude concerning matter absolutely, but concerning this foundation which is a part of substance and founds being: since, as we said above, matter will not be predicated of them except equivocally, as is clear in the ratio of potency.

§ 4. To the first, however, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that Augustine is speaking of the simplicity of individuality, and not of the simplicity of the being itself which is a "this something."

§ 5. To the other it must be said that the Master calls simplicity the elongation from matter and materiality which causes ignobility and dullness, and he does not speak of simplicity by privation of composition.

§ 6. To the other it must be said that a point is simple by privation of the division of a continuum: but an Angel is not called simple by that simplicity, because he has no relation to a continuum, but rather in the aforesaid manner.

§ 7. To the other it must be said that if we are speaking of this whiteness according to its being, then it is not "this whiteness" except through the fact that it is in this matter. But if you speak of this whiteness insofar as it is a certain terminated form consisting within its own constituent differences, then its intellect [understanding] is absolute, as Avicenna says: but then "this whiteness" and "whiteness" do not imply the universal and the particular, but rather the universal differing in its consideration [ratio], namely considered in itself, and as terminated under its essential differences. Whence it is clear that Boethius speaks truly, if a "this something" is taken according to being: and so the saying of Boethius is understood.

§ 8. And from this it is again clear that an Angel, since he is a "this something", is without doubt composed of a foundation and the being that is founded in it: and I say this for this reason, because potency is not properly posited [in him] except perhaps to act: because the Philosopher says, "In perpetual things, to be does not differ from to be able" [Metaphysics IX]: for the reason that this "to be able" was never without "to be", and potency is said equivocally in them [perpetual things] in relation to other things which are in potency to a "where" or to a form.

Articulus 5 — Whether A Personal Distinction Belongs To The Angels, So That Each One Is A Person

Whether personal distinction is fitting for Angels, such that each one is a person?

§ 9. Next it is asked concerning personal distinction. For it seems that personal distinction is in an Angel as in God and man. 1. It is determined through the proposition laid down earlier as a principle, that if some attribute [passio] is present in several things, it is necessary that it is present in them by reason of some common substance to which that attribute per se belongs: personal distinction is present in God, in men, and in Angels: therefore it is necessary that it is present in them in a common way. But it is present in man and in God through the ratio of the order of nature proceeding or emanating from one: therefore it is present in an Angel in this way, as it seems: which is false, since one does not produce another by generating or spirating.

§ 10. 2. Also, Master Richard of St. Victor says that personal distinction is either by origin alone, as in God; or by property alone, as in Angels; or by property and origin together, as in man. And from this many inconsistencies seem to follow, one of which is that personal distinction seems to belong to man through more things than to an Angel. And since personal distinction was one of the assigned causes of inassumptibility in Book III of the Sentences, it seems that man was less assumptible than an Angel, which is not true.

§ 11. 3. Another is: because whatever things differ by a property alone, differ only accidentally, because every property is of the genus of accidents, as Boethius says: but the personal distinction of Angels is only by a property alone: therefore Angels differ only accidentally, which is impossible. Therefore distinction in them is not by a property alone.

§ 12. Solution. It must be said that, as Richard says, a person is a being existing per se alone according to a certain singular mode of existence of a rational nature, as was explained in Book I of the Sentences: and therefore because every Angel exists per se alone in the mode of his existence in an intellectual nature, therefore each one is a person, and personal distinction belongs to them.

§ 13. Therefore to the first it must be said that personality is in God, in Angels, and in men, by prior and posterior [analogically]: and this was proved in the first book of the Sentences. And therefore a convention of proportion is sufficient, by which this common attribute may be referred to the three natures: and they say that this is the supposit of a rational creature, because this is found in God, Angel, and manand therefore it is not necessary that the mode of distinction be one, as the objection seemed to prove.

§ 14. To the other it must be said that Master Richard generally touches upon the things making and showing personal distinction: for in divine things the relation of origin makes it, but in human things the individuation over this matter, and in Angels the individuation of the being of the Angel's nature over this foundation. And the argument does not hold: "Man is distinguished by more things than an Angel: therefore he is more distinct in person." And there discrete quantity is changed into the mode of continuous [quantity] through intension. Nor is it true that personal distinction impedes assumptibility: but rather because a person is never a person, like a man, unless first it is a person in potency, and afterwards becomes a person in act: and therefore before it becomes in act, since it does not yet have its own singularity, it can be assumed into the singularity of another: and this is not so in an Angel, whose singularity was never in potency.

§ 15. To the last it must be said that in truth properties show the singularity of a person and do not make it: but the foundation makes it, particularizing being, and individuating being itself per se over itself. But because in Angels this is remote from knowledge, therefore we know it by properties: just as also in logic, matter dividing and contracting a form makes the individual: but nevertheless it is known by a collection of individuating traits.

Articulus 6 — Whether A Naturally Inborn Reason Belongs To The Angels, On Account Of Which There Are In Them Memory, Intelligence, Will

Whether naturally implanted reason is fitting for Angels, on account of which there are present memory, understanding, and will?

§ 16. Thirdly, it is asked concerning naturally implanted reason, on account of which memory, understanding, and will are present.

§ 17. 1. For either reason is taken here for cognitive reason, or for practical reason which is divided against the irascible and concupiscible. If in the first way, then it seems that will is not present on account of it: because will is not present according to speculative reason. If in the second way, then it seems that it also contains free choice within itself: therefore there will only be three attributes: because free choice is a faculty of reason and will; of practical reason, I say, not speculative or theoretical.

§ 18. 2. Moreover, it is asked how memory is present in Angels, since according to the Philosopher memory per se belongs to the primary sensitive part? But an Angel does not have the part which is the sensitive soul.

§ 19. 3. Also, memory is determined with a difference of time: but the pure intellect abstracts from all time: since therefore the intellect of an Angel is pure, it does not seem that memory is fitting for Angels.

§ 20. 4. Also, since the intellect in us is divided into the intellect by which it becomes all things, which is called possible, and the intellect by which it makes all things, which is called agent, and the formal intellect which is speculative or acquired: is the intellect under these differences in Angels? It seems not: because their intellect was never in potency, but always perfect: but the possible intellect is that which is in potency to act: therefore an Angel does not have a possible intellect. But if you say this, then it follows that he also does not have an agent intellect: because the agent is what perfects the possible, by abstracting forms and placing them in it: since therefore the form is placed in it from the beginning of creation, it seems that he never needs an agent: since therefore there is nothing superfluous in an Angel, it seems that he has neither an agent nor a possible [intellect].

§ 21. 5. Moreover, what is the difference between intellect and understanding [intelligentia]?

§ 22. 6. Also, it is shown concerning the will, because it is a part of free choice as appears from its definition: therefore it seems that free choice would be superfluous.

§ 23. 7. Moreover, it seems that by reason of these three an Angel is to the image [of God], just like man. But on the contrary: concerning man alone in creation was it said: Let us make man to our image and likeness.

§ 24. Solution. It must be said to the first, that reason is not taken for a spiritual potency, but rather for the higher part of the spirit, which is suited by nature to be carried to God through the habit of the true and the good impressed upon it naturally from God: as was also said in the question concerning the image of man in the first book of the Sentences. And therefore there is no point to the question, "Whether it is taken there for cognitive or practical?" But reason is taken in this way in the Gloss on Psalm 4:7: The light of thy countenance, O Lord, is signed upon us: for there the Gloss says that the image is threefold: of creation, of re-creation, and of likeness: and this was explained in the first book of the Sentences. And the image of creation, as the Gloss says, is reason, and reason is taken for the purer part of the mind, which contains memory, understanding, and will.

§ 25. To what is objected concerning memory, it must be said that memory is taken here as it is accepted by Augustine, which is not only of past things, but also of present and future things, that is, which abstracts from every difference of time: and it implies nothing but a treasury of the knowledge of natural habits toward those things which are naturally known, and naturally loved: such as the true and the good that is God, and the true and the good that the mind itself is. Hence the act of this memory is not to reflect upon that which it previously knew or saw: but rather its act is to know: and this "to know", as Augustine says, is nothing other than to hold the knowledge of a thing with oneself. And that act is not "to act", but rather to hold the habit which is called knowledge: and through this the solution to all the things objected concerning memory is clear.

§ 26. To what is objected concerning understanding [intelligentia], it must be said that here it is taken as it is a part of the image: and then the act of understanding according to Augustine is to intuit itself in the present knowledge which it has, or to intuit God in the knowledge of the true and good of God which it has with itself. And in this way it always intuits itself and God: because that intuiting does not mean being actually considered, but rather the thing whose knowledge it is being objected [presented] to itself in the light of knowledge: and this always happens in one way. And therefore Augustine says that the soul always understands itself, but does not always discern and think about itself: because it is always objected to itself in the light of the knowledge which is naturally impressed upon it, which is "to see" or "to understand"; but it does not always discern itself from other known things, which is "to think", as Augustine says: and the same applies to an Angel.

§ 27. But to what is asked, "Whether an Angel has a possible and an agent intellect?" It must be said that "possible" is named from potency with privation, and in this way he does not have a possible intellect, and in this way the objection proceeds. But "possible" is also called that which is the subject in which the species of knowable things are founded, and in this way he has a possible intellect perfected from the beginning of his creation, and an agent [intellect] illuminating over the possible: and through this the solution to those things which are objected concerning the differences of the intellects of the Angel himself is clear.

§ 28. To the other it must be said that according to the Philosopher the act of the intellect is accustomed to be called understanding [intelligentia], and [so is] a separate intellectual substance moving the movers of the spheres. But intellect is called by them the potency of the rational soul, or of an Angel, which receives species individuated from matter and from the conditions of matter. But Richard of St. Victor says that understanding [intelligentia] is called the intellect of divine things, as of God; whereas intellect is of other things, namely when it is referred to understanding worldly things: but it is taken here by the Master for the intellect of Angels, which is simpler than the human.

§ 29. To what is objected concerning the will, it must be said that an Angel has a will: and although will falls into the definition of free choice, nevertheless it is not free choice, as will be clear below, where this will be asked about: because free choice receives something from reason, and something from will: and therefore it is called a faculty of both: although nevertheless it is a determined potency in itself.

§ 30. To what is objected, "Whether man or Angel is to the image of God?" It must be said that an image is so called from imitation. Therefore the imitation of the image can be considered with respect to the unity of essence in the three persons only: and thus an Angel is to the image of God, just as man is: and also by simpler potencies, and even by a simpler essence, he expresses the unity in the Trinity. But if the ratio of imitation is considered with respect to the unity of essence in the three persons, and the order of the nature of the persons, then man will be to the image, and not the Angel: because man has three potencies in one essence: and also man has the principle of his whole genus and of his nature, just as in the Father is the principle of the whole deity: and this is not in an Angel.

§ 31. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 7 — Whether Free Choice Is An Attribute Fitting To Angelic Nature, And Whether It Is Also In Angels And Men According To One Reason

Whether free choice is an attribute fitting for the angelic nature? And, whether it is also in Angels and men by one ratio?

§ 32. Fourthly, it is asked concerning free choice. For this does not seem to be a natural attribute: because natural things are not lost: but the flexibility of free choice is lost: therefore it is not an attribute of nature. The first is self-evident. The second is proved from the fact that those confirmed either in good or in evil cannot be bent to opposite acts.

§ 33. But on the contrary: In both it was flexible into whatever it wished: therefore according to one ratio.

§ 34. Also, it is asked, "Whether free choice is in Angels and men by one ratio?"

§ 35. But it seems not: because Damascene says that our free choice freely inquires and freely takes counsel: but these are not fitting except for a doubting and ignorant nature: since therefore the intellect of an Angel is deiform, it does not seem that these are fitting for his free choice.

§ 36. Solution. It must be said that free choice is fitting for Angels by nature: but its freedom is not flexibility to good and to evil: because flexibility to evil, as Anselm says, is neither freedom, nor a part of freedom: but it is free in doing what it wishes, namely, that it is not bound to one act, like a natural agent power, and that it is not impelled to the necessity of an act such that it could not abstain if it wishes: and this freedom always remains with an Angel, to whatever he turns himself. But that he is not inclined to evil when he is confirmed in the good, this is not from coercion, but from a spontaneous immobility in the good, which is confirmation: and similarly, that he is not inclined to the good after confirmation in evil, this is from spontaneous obstinacy, the cause of which will be asked below.

§ 37. Through this the solution to the first is clear.

§ 38. To what is further asked, "Whether free choice is said univocally in Angels and in us?" It must be said that it is saidby prior and posterior [analogically]: because in Angels it is freer than in us: because they do not forsake liberating rectitude. But in us it is freer than in the damned. And concerning this it will also be asked below in distinction 35, which is entirely about this. Nevertheless it can be said of us and of others by one common ratio, namely the free faculty of doing what one wishes.

Articulus 8 — Whether Four, Or Only Three, Or More, Are Attributes Of Angelic Nature

Whether four, or only three, or more are the attributes of the angelic nature?

§ 39. Fifthly, it is asked concerning all these in common.

§ 40. But it seems that there are only three attributes, because:

§ 41. 1. In the following chapter the Master enumerates only three, saying that the first consideration is of substance, the second of form, the third of power. Indeed, a person is a substance, wisdom is a form, choice is a power: therefore it seems that there are only three.

§ 42. 2. Also, it seems that there are many more: because ingenuity is fitting for every Angel, as are the irascible and concupiscible: and so it seems that there are many more.

§ 43. 3. Also, it seems that there are only two: because the Commentator [Averroes] on book XII of the First Philosophy says that separate substances, on account of their simplicity, have only two potencies, namely intellect and will: therefore it seems that there are only two attributes.

§ 44. Also it is asked, "According to what are these attributes taken?"

§ 45. Solution. It must be said to this universally first, that there are two things in an Angel: his substance considered in natural being, and the potencies consequent upon and perfecting that substance to act. Substance considered in itself is either taken from the side of "that which is" (quod est), and thus it is personal distinction; or from the side of "that by which it is" (quo est), and from that side it is subtlety, or simplicity of essence. But the potencies to act: either according to order unto God, or according to order to works. Unto God is the naturally implanted reason, and in that is memory, understanding, and will; but unto works is free choice.

§ 46. Therefore to the first it must be said that the Master comprehends under substance the two things which are comprehended according to substance, although he expresses only one.

§ 47. To the other it must be said that ingenuity is the same in substance with reason, except that it sounds of a power receiving knowledge through the innate force of reason.

§ 48. To the other it must be said that the Commentator there divides only potencies, not essential attributes.

§ 49. To what is objected concerning the irascible and concupiscible, it must be said that they are not properly in Angels, except equivocally: because they are properly parts of the sensitive power. And if they are said equivocally to be in an Angel, then it must be said that they are reduced to the will, or to free choice, which seems truer to me.

Articulus 9 — Whether In The Four Attributes Of Angelic Nature Angels Admit Of More And Less, And Are Intensified And Remitted

Whether in the four attributes of the angelic nature Angels admit of more and less, and are intended and remitted [intensified and relaxed]?

§ 50. Next it is asked concerning what he says: Here it is to be considered, whether in spiritual substance, etc.

§ 51. For here the Master says that Angels receive more and less in these things: and this does not seem so: because § 52. 1. Whatever things follow a species insofar as it is a species, just as a species does not receive more and less, so those things do not receive more and less, as it seems.

§ 53. 2. Also, this seems so in individual cases: for that one is not simpler than another seems so, because whatever things name a thing as in its terminus do not admit of intension and remission, nor more nor less: but simplicity names as in a terminus: therefore it does not receive more and less.

§ 54. 3. Also, all simplicity removes composition: but among composite things, one is not more composite than another, because privations are neither intended nor remitted; therefore neither is simplicity.

§ 55. 4. Also, of indivisibles, one is not more indivisible than another: but simplicity posits indivisibility: therefore it seems that one is not simpler than another.

§ 56. 5. Also, the same seems true concerning personal distinction: because if they differ in that, then that difference will be notable between the highest and the lowest Angel. But on the contrary: By the same personal distinction by which the highest is distinguished from the lowest, conversely the lowest is distinguished from the highest: therefore they do not admit of more and less, as it seems.

§ 57. 6. Also, concerning the perspicacity of remembering or understanding or willing, it seems that it does not admit of more and less: because if this diversity is in them according to the intellect, it is necessary to reduce it to some principles causing it, just as in us the speed of ingenuity is reduced to the hot moving well, and to the moist easily movable; and the goodness of memory into the dry not easily deletable, and the dry retaining, and such things. But it is manifest that we do not find such principles in an Angel: therefore it seems that all are of the same perspicacity.

§ 58. 7. In the same way it seems concerning free choice: because this freedom is only from coercion, from sin, and from misery, as will be held below: and it is manifest that all have those freedoms: therefore in free choice they do not admit of more and less.

§ 59. Solution. It must be said that in three attributes Angels admit of more and less: but I cannot see how they admit of more and less in the fourth, namely in personal distinction: and therefore I concede the argument made for this.

§ 60. But to the first I answer, that although these things follow the common nature in Angels, nevertheless they are founded upon the nature according to its being which it has in the Angel: and because its being is not one, therefore also those things are not in one way. And it is similar concerning ingenuity among us, which follows the human nature according to the being which it has in this man, and in that one: and therefore it is not in one way. But if they followed the common nature according to itself, as having three angles follows a triangle, I would well concede that they would not receive more and less. And this solution does not state the cause.

§ 61. Otherwise it can be said, that these attributes are considered in comparison to the common nature, and thus they do not receive more and less: and in comparison to act, and thus they do receive it. And this solution is less good.

§ 62. To the other it must be said that simplicity in an Angel is not said except relatively [secundum quid]: whence also the Master in the Letter [Lombard's text] sometimes explains it by the subtlety of essence, sometimes by tenuity: but it is true that where simplicity is said absolutely, there the thing is named in its terminus: and this is not except in God alone.

§ 63. To the other it must be said that this is false, that all simplicity removes composition absolutely: but it is true that it removes some [composition], namely that which is from quantitative parts by the quantity of mass: although it leaves the composition of essence, and of subject and accident, and that which is from virtual parts. And therefore it does not imply an omnifarious privation of composition.

§ 64. To the other it must be said that of indivisibles, in that they are indivisible, one is not more indivisible than another: but they can be divisible by another ratio through the intellect of parts, although they are not divided by effect [in reality]. And in that ratio one can be more indivisible than another, just as God is more indivisible than an Angel: and in other things this is also easy to see.

§ 65. To the following [argument], it seems to me it must be conceded.

§ 66. To the other it must be said that diversity in the perspicacity of remembering and understanding in others is reduced to the same principles: but not in us: because in us the conditions of opposite complexions thrive in memories and in ingenuity: because melancholics [thrive] in memory, and sanguines in ingenuity. But in Angels memory is nothing but the holding of the knowledge of the simple mind, and understanding is the intuition of the thing in that knowledge: and therefore they are reduced to one principle: and this is in them the diversity in the subtlety of essence: for this is followed by the fact that some have simpler forms, and some less simple ones, as will be determined below.

§ 67. To the other it must be said that even if all are free from coercion by nature, they are not nevertheless equally unimpeded to act: because better natural endowments are more unimpeded to act. And similarly grace equally frees all from fault, because the least grace leaves no fault behind, and this is freedom as to the terminus from which (a quo); but they are not equally free as to the terminus to which (ad quem): because a lesser grace does not equally enable to act as a greater one. And it is the same way concerning glory with regard to liberation from misery, and in comparison to the act of glory. But nevertheless here the Master speaks only of natural freedom, which is from coercion: because he treats only of the natural endowments of Angels.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Angels Who Were More Subtle By Nature Were More Perspicacious In Wisdom, So That Grace Is Proportioned To Nature And Thus Was Given To Them, Or According To The Striving Of Free Choice

Whether the Angels who were by nature more subtle, were by wisdom more perspicacious: such that grace is proportioned to nature: and thus it was given to them, or according to the effort of free choice?

§ 68. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, B, towards the end: For those who by nature are more subtle, and by wisdom more perspicacious, etc.

§ 69. It seems this is false. 1. For let us suppose that one who has lesser natural endowments prepares himself amply: since therefore God regards our effort, it seems that He infuses more of grace into him.

§ 70. 2. Also, let us suppose that someone having grace with lesser natural endowments devotes himself all day to good works, and another with better endowments does not: it is manifest that God the just rewarder rewards his labor by increasing grace to him, and not to the other: therefore grace does not respond to natural endowments alone, as the Master seems to say.

§ 71. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Matthew 25:15: He gave to each according to his proper power. And the Gloss says: that is, according to the capacity of natural endowments.

§ 72. 2. Also, let it be granted that it does not fulfill nature : therefore something which is apt to receive it remains empty, which is impossible, since Dionysius says that God's goodness diffuses itself over all intellectual faces, according to the proper analogy of each one.

§ 73. 3. Also, in Psalm 144:16: Thou openest thy hand, and fillest every animal with blessing.

§ 74. 4. Also, grace is in free choice, as Augustine says, like a rider on a horse, and an agent in act: but these are always proportioned: therefore the quantity of gratuitous gifts is according to the quantity of natural endowments.

§ 75. 5. Also, in Angels one cannot reduce the diversity of grace to any diverse preceding thing, except to the diversity of natural endowments: because no effort or merit preceded, especially according to those who say the Angel was created in grace: therefore at least in Angels grace was given according to the distinction of the natural degree.

§ 76. Solution. It must be said that it is not generally true that grace is proportioned to nature, as the first objections prove. But nevertheless I think this is true in Angels: because I am of the opinion that they were created in grace, as I will subsequently show: and therefore I concede the last objection. But nevertheless those who are of the opinion of the Master can say that in an Angel some preparation preceded the reception of grace, which God also regarded. And through this the solution to the last is clear.

§ 77. Therefore to the first it must be said that the Gloss there calls the capacity of natural endowments both the natural potency and the effort of it, according to what we say, that whatever precedes grace in us belongs to natural endowments.

§ 78. To the other it must be said that the least grace fulfills nature and superabounds. But the proof of this is that the least grace elevates nature above itself. And therefore that objection is not compelling: because a vacuum does not remain on account of this, namely, that He does not confer a greater grace. But in the authority of Dionysius, analogy is taken with respect to natural goods, and not with respect to gratuitous goods: and this is clear to one diligently inspecting his book.

§ 79. To the other it must be said that by that [animal] is named the desire gaping for grace: and it is not gaping except through preparation as much as it can.

§ 80. To the other it must be said that free choice is the horse: but through exercise and preparation it is made more apt to have a better rider, and according to this the proportion is taken.

Articulus 11 — Whether It Belongs Equally To All Angels That They Be Immortal

§ 2. Whether it belongs equally to all Angels that they are immortal? § 3. For it seems that it does not belong to them equally that they are immortal: because it was held above, that immortality belongs to them through grace, and not through nature. § 4. But to this the solution is that it belongs to them through nature and grace: because that grace, as was expounded above, is nature. § 5.

Divisio Textus

§ 6. Division of the Text § 7. DIVISION OF THE TEXT. § 8. "That too seems worthy of investigation, etc." Here begins the second question on the creation of the Angels, namely, whether they were created in grace, and malice, or not? § 9. And it has four parts: in the first of which he introduces the opinion of those who say all were created simultaneously: some in grace, some in malice. In the second, he introduces the opinion of others saying that none of them was created in grace, but all good by the goodness of nature, there, F, "But to others it seems, etc." In the third, he objects against the former opinion, and expounds the authorities which seem to favor it, there, G, "And therefore Augustine rooting out the opinion, etc." In the fourth and last, he asks about the natural knowledge, and natural love of the Angels, there, I, "Here it is usually asked, What wisdom, etc." § 10.

Articulus 12 — Whether All Angels Were Created In Grace, Or In Simple Nature

§ 12. Whether all Angels were created in grace, or in simple nature? § 14. Whether all Angels were created in grace, or in simple nature? § 15. Now three questions arise concerning the first, the first of which is, Whether all Angels were made in grace or in the simple goodness of nature? § 16. Second, Whether the Author of all good could make an Angel, or anyone evil? § 17. Third, Whether, although not malice itself, He could nevertheless have made one existing in malice, as the first opinion which he introduces seems to want? § 18. TO THE FIRST one must proceed chiefly by means of authorities: because concerning the state of an Angel our reason falls short. § 19. Therefore it seems, that all, both those who fell, and those who stood firm, were created in grace. § 20. 1. For Anselm says in the book De Casu diaboli, thus: "Those Angels who preferred that 'more' which God did not yet wish to give them, rather than to stand in the justice in which they had been made, with that same justice judging

§ 21. [them], they by no means obtained that on account of which they despised Him, and they lost the good which they held: therefore all were created in justice." § 22. 2. Also, the same, in the book Cur Deus homo, at the beginning of the book: "It is certain that rational nature was made for this purpose, that it should choose and love the supreme good above all things, not for the sake of anything else, but for the sake of the best. For if for the sake of another, it loves not it, but the other. But it cannot do this unless it is just. Therefore, so that it might not be rational in vain, it was simultaneously made just and rational for this purpose." Behold, here is simultaneously held both the authority, and the reason for the authority. § 23. 3. Also, Ibid., "As long as by choosing and loving it does what is just, for which it was made, it will be miserable: because it will be needy, not having what it desires against its will, which is exceedingly absurd. Wherefore rational nature was so made, that by enjoying the supreme good it would be blessed." From this it is gathered, that it was also made blessed. And yet this will be discussed below. § 24. 4. Also, Augustine in book XIII of the Confessions: "Blessed creature which knows no other thing, since nevertheless itself would be another thing, except by your gift, which is borne over every mutable thing: as soon as it was made, it was raised up without an interval of time in that calling by which you said, Let there be light, and light was made. For in us time is distinguished: because we were darkness, and we are made light: but in that [creature] as it was said, what would it be unless it were illuminated: and thus it was said, that it was not first superfluous and dark: and thus it appears that it always was light: not that it might be otherwise, and being converted to the unfailing light it was light. Let him who can, understand. Let him who cannot, pray that he may receive from God." Behold, from this authority two things are gathered, namely, that they were created in grace and beatitude, and the solution to what is usually objected, that by the formless heaven the nature of the Angel is understood: because he says, that that distinction is made, so that the cause of conversion may be noted, not an interval: because the Creator converts it by calling it, and not it itself. § 25. 5. Also, the same, in book XII of the Confessions: "The teacher of your servant (namely Moses) when he recalls that in the beginning you made heaven and earth, is silent about times, is silent about days. For doubtless the heaven of heaven which you made in the beginning, is some intellectual creature, although by no means coeternal with you the Trinity, nevertheless greatly a partaker of your eternity, restrains its mutability because of the sweetness of your most happy contemplation, and without any fall from the time it was made, by clinging to you, exceeds every rolling vicissitude of times." From this again it is evident, that from the time it was made, it is in grace, in beatitude, and in contemplation. § 26. 6. Also, Augustine in book XII of The City of God: "Indeed, in no way according to any space of time were those spirits previously darkness, whom we call Angels: but as soon as they were made, they were made light: they were not merely created thus, that they might be in whatever way, and live in whatever way: but also illuminated, that they might live wisely and blessedly. From this illumination certain Angels turned away: and therefore they did not obtain the excellence of a wise and blessed life, which without doubt is none other than eternal life." From this authority it is evident, that he even reputes it absurd that the Angels were not created in grace. § 27. 7. Also, Augustine, ibid., "He who created the Angel with a good will, was simultaneously forming its nature, and bestowing grace: for never is it to be believed that the holy Angels were without a good will and chaste love." § 28. 8. Also, Augustine in the book On Rebuke and Grace: "Even if the Angels were blessed before they fell, there was nevertheless something to be added to their beatitude if they had persevered, until they should receive the fullness of supreme beatitude as a reward of their abiding."

§ 29. 9. Also, Augustine in the book De Fide ad Petrum: "God created the Angels eternal, and implanted in them the faculty of knowing and loving the deity: whom He so created, that they themselves might love Him." § 30. 10. Also, Ibid., "Angels and men, by the fact that they were made rational, received by divine gift the eternity and beatitude of God in the very creation of their spiritual nature, so that if they unceasingly clung to the love of their Creator, they would simultaneously remain eternal and blessed: but if by the proper choice of their liberty they strove to do their own will against the command of their Creator, beatitude would depart from the contumacious according to their demerits." § 31. 11. Also, Augustine on Genesis According to the Letter says, that that creature is always day: because in it not the withdrawal of superior light, but the distinction of inferior knowledge makes morning and evening: therefore it is not to be said that it was created without grace. § 32. 12. To the same point there are three arguments: For God always offers Himself in one way just like the sun: therefore since there is no obstacle, He always pours forth the light of His grace: but in the first instant of the creation of the Angel there was no obstacle: therefore He infused grace into him. § 33. 13. Also, If they were created before grace, I ask, whether they were moved by will or intellect deliberating, or not? If not, then when they were able, they were idle. § 34. Moreover, It is a fiction to say, that they were not moved. If they were moved, that act could be informed by charity: therefore God informed him in whom He found no obstacle. § 35. Moreover, What would be the cause that He created them indifferent? It cannot be said that they might merit grace, because no one merits first grace: therefore there would be no cause: for it cannot be said, that He did this so that grace might be distinguished from nature, because it can be distinguished in many other ways, and could be: therefore it seems to be a fiction, that they were created without grace. § 36. BUT AGAINST: § 37. 1. Augustine on Genesis According to the Letter said thus upon that: In the beginning God created, etc. "The beginning of the creature is insinuated as still having the formlessness of imperfection: but a commemoration of the Son is made, who is also the Word, by the fact that it is written, God said, let there be: so that by the fact that He is the principle, He might insinuate the beginning of the creature existing from Him still imperfectly: but by the fact that He is the Word, He might insinuate the perfection of the creature called back to God, so that it might be formed by clinging to the Creator." From this it is gathered, that the creature was first made formless, and afterwards formed. § 38. 2. Also, Ibid., "The creature, although spiritual and intellectual or rational, which seems nearer to that Word, can have a formless life: because just as it is not the same thing for it to be as to live, so neither is the same thing for it to live as to live wisely and blessedly." From this the same thing is gathered as before. § 39. 3. Also, Ibid., "From Him from whom the spiritual creature exists that it may be and live, to Him it is turned, that it may live wisely and blessedly." § 40. 4. To the same point it is objected by reason: because the state of the way is prior to the fatherland: therefore the state of nature must also be prior to grace: because as merit relates to reward, so nature relates to grace. § 41. 5. Also, In natures potency precedes act: therefore also in the being of grace the potency which is in natural things alone, must precede the habit of grace: therefore it seems, that it belongs to them to be created in natural things. § 42. 6. Also, Whatever things are given unequally to those which are of the same nature, those things are not given with nature: because in all things which are given with nature, there is equality: but grace was given unequally to the § 43. Angels: therefore it was not given with nature. § 44. Solution. Without prejudice it seems to me, that the opinion of the Saints is, that the Angel was created in grace: and therefore taking up that position, I will solve the objections which were from the words of Augustine, just as Augustine solved them, namely, that those things are said for the distinction of being, and not of time. Whence he intends, that the beginning of the creature is in natural things in the order of nature before grace, and not in the order of time. Similarly when he says, In the beginning He created, he signifies God as the principle of nature: and when he said, Let there be light, he signifies the same calling to form, not in the order of time, but of nature: because nothing is called, unless it is, to this especially that it be informed by grace: and thus Praepositivus used to say. § 45. To another it must be said, that he could well be moved by natural knowledge and love to the exercise of nature, yet not by a meritorious motion: because Augustine says that the Angel had [that] whereby he could stand: but he did not have [that] whereby he could advance. This however according to another opinion is understood concerning advance to confirmation, and not concerning advance to merit. § 46. To another it must be said, that the reason has already been stated, why He created them indifferent. But yet I say this, that as far as I can understand of the mind of the original [authors], the Saints were plainly of this opinion, that they were created in natural and gratuitous things simultaneously. § 47. BUT TO THE ARGUMENTS we will say, that although God relates Himself in one way, yet He is a voluntary agent: and when He gives one gift, He wishes him to whom He gives to experience his own powers: and therefore He wished that the Angel should test himself in natural things, and see that he would not suffice for himself, and thus he would be more grateful for the grace which he would receive in its proper time. § 48. TO THE FOURTH OBJECTION it must be said, that the state of the way relates to the confirmation of beatitude as preceding in time: and this is so, because beatitude depends in some way on merit, as will be held below: but nature cannot merit grace: and therefore it is not similar on this side and that. § 49. But if we wish to sustain the other opinion, that they were created in natural things alone, then we shall gloss light in the words of Augustine as the splendor of natural things, and we shall call grace innocence. § 50. To another it must be said, that this proposition is false, that those things which are given with nature, are given equally: but those given with nature refer to act and habit: because neither is nature equal, as was held above: yet it is not proven whether Angels are of the same nature and species. § 51.

Articulus 13 — Whether God Could Make An Evil Angel

§ 53. Whether God could make an evil Angel? § 55. Whether God could make an evil Angel? § 56. Secondly, It is asked on account of the error which is posited in the Text, Whether God could make an evil Angel? § 57. It seems, that He could: because § 58. 1. He who operates by will, operates what he wills, and it is not to be said why he does so: but God operates by will: therefore He can do what He wills: therefore He can make an evil Angel. § 59. 2. Also, the Apostle to the Romans 9:21: Or does not the potter of the clay have power out of the same lump to make one vessel indeed unto honor, but another unto dishonor? And it is certain, that he is speaking of God: therefore it seems, that He can make an evil Angel and man. § 60. 3. Also, He Himself made those whom He knew would be evil: therefore by the same reason He could make evil ones. § 61. BUT AGAINST: § 62. 1. Augustine says, that God is not the avenger of that thing, of which He is the maker: if therefore He Himself made the Angel evil, He Himself could not be the avenger of evil, which is false: therefore He cannot make an evil Angel. § 64. 2. Also, It belongs to the good to bring forth good things: but God is the best: therefore He does not make anything except the good. § 65. 3. Also, Boethius says, that this is the reason of the good, because it is from the first good: but God is the first good: therefore nothing evil can be from Him. § 66. 4. Also, Augustine: A wise man does not make that by which his work becomes worse: therefore much less does he make a depraved work: but God is most wise: therefore nothing can be evil, according as it is from Him. § 67. Solution. I concede, that God by no power of His, neither by His ordained wisdom, nor absolute, can make an evil work: because this is not to be able, but is of extreme foolishness and impotence. Whence I say, that He made the Angel good: but He could have made him better, if He had willed. § 68. To the first it must be said, that it is true, that God made the Angel as He willed: but He could not make him evil: because He makes nothing except what is His willed object, and the good for which he is made, and neither the good nor the willed is ever evil. § 69. To another it must be said, that that authority is understood of the work of God by which He knows that certain ones will be evil, whom nevertheless He Himself made good. Whence the expression is improper, when it says, that it was a vessel unto dishonor, so namely that the preposition notes consequence, and not the end, that is, that it terminates in dishonor: but dishonor is not an end moving the efficient cause. § 70. To another it must be said, that nothing is similar: because those whom He knows will be evil, become evil without God as author: whom nevertheless He Himself makes: because He does not will to interrupt the course of nature in them: and also because He knows for what goods, their evils will be able to be useful. § 71.

Articulus 14 — Whether An Angel Can Become Evil In Such A Way That God Would Not Be The Author Of That Malice, But Immediately In The Same Indivisible Instant Be Made And Evil At Once

§ 73. Whether an Angel can become evil, so that God would not be the author of that malice, but immediately in the same indivisible [instant] he would be made and evil simultaneously? § 75. Whether an Angel can become evil, so that God would not be the author of that malice, but immediately in the same indivisible [instant] he would be made and evil simultaneously? § 76. Thirdly it is asked, Whether an Angel could become evil, so that God would not be the author of his malice, but immediately in the same indivisible [instant] he would be made and evil simultaneously? For thus posits the opinion which is recited in the Text. § 77. But it seems that he could: because his 'having been made' is measured by an indivisible 'now': because every 'having been made' is in a 'now', and 'to be made' and 'to be moved' are in time. If therefore at some time he was made evil, and that 'having been made' is also in an indivisible 'now': either therefore 'to have been made evil' and 'the Angel to have been made' are in the same indivisible [instant], and then I have the proposition: or in diverse ones, and then since between any two 'nows' there is a middle time, there will be some time in which he is evil. § 78. BUT AGAINST it seems, that this cannot be: because every creature is from nothing: therefore by its own weight and defect it tends to nothing, unless it is supported by grace: but grace was not supporting it: therefore it tended to nothing: therefore it sinned: because this is to tend to nothing. § 79. Moreover it is asked, Whether it could have sinned in the first instant when it was made? § 80. It seems, that it could: because § 81. 1. It could will evil, since it had a perfect will: therefore it is not unfitting to posit: for a false but not impossible thing being posited, what follows is false and not impossible: therefore those who say, that the Angel is evil from the beginning of its creation, are not to be reprehended.

§ 82. 2. Also, It is certain, that it was moved from the beginning of creation: because such optimal natural endowments cannot be idle: either therefore it was moved ordinately, or inordinately. If ordinately. Against: To be moved ordinately is to be converted: therefore it was converted, which is false. If inordinately, I have the proposition: because to be moved inordinately is a sin: therefore from the beginning of its creation it sinned. § 83. 3. Also, If it did not sin from the beginning of its creation: therefore it stood for a time in natural things alone. BUT AGAINST: Fire stands upwards by the same power by which it is moved upwards, when it is violently depressed: therefore also the Angel stands by the same power by which it is elevated: but it is elevated by the power of grace: therefore it does not stand except by the power of grace, which is false, because the Angel did not fall from grace according to the opinion of the Master in the Text. § 84. 4. Also, There are two extremes, namely nothing, and being: and two others good, and evil: but no creature can of itself tend to being: therefore neither to the good: therefore of itself it tends to non-being, and to evil: therefore the Angel if it did not have grace, immediately tended to evil: therefore it sinned from the first instant of creation. § 85. 5. Moreover, Many authorities concerning this are introduced in the Text. § 86. BUT AGAINST: It seems, that this is a heresy: § 87. 1. For every principle of something through deliberative will is prior to it in nature and time: the first Angel is the principle of its own sin, through deliberative will: therefore it is before its sin in nature and time: therefore there was a delay of creation between creation and the fall. Proof of the first. Every deliberation presupposes to itself the conception of that about which the deliberation is and comparison, and it is certain that apprehensions of this kind are in time. But the second is self-evident. § 88. 2. Also, If the Angel had been evil in the first instant, the lesser ones would never have seen him except as evil: therefore they would never have consented to his election. § 89. Solution. It must be said, that there was a delay between his creation, and the fall. Whence I say to the first, that his 'having been made', and 'having been made evil', were not in one instant: but there was a middle time. § 90. BUT TO THAT which is objected, that the creature of itself tends to non-being: I say, that it is true unless it is held by the hand of the omnipotent God: but that hand is not sanctifying grace: and in this the author of that opinion was deceived: because sanctifying grace is not in a stone, and yet it is contained: and it is not in a demon, and yet it is contained. § 91. TO ANOTHER it must be said, that it could not happen, that it sinned from the beginning: because it was necessary to be moved beforehand by other motions which were not sin, in the knowledge of itself, and of God, and of others: and these required time. § 92. If it is objected, that it was not necessary to be moved beforehand according to act, but according to habit only: I do not think that is true: because when one desires to be equated with another, or to be preferred, it is necessary first actually to know and compare both. § 93. To another it must be said, that it was moved by natural knowledge and love: and those were not inordinate, but ordered by the order of nature, which order does not suffice for conversion to the Word by inhesion: therefore their objection does not have any force. § 94. To another it must be said, that an Angel from natural things alone can stand in the good of nature, but not in the good of grace: and therefore he does not take standing and being elevated as the same: because he could stand in nature through nature, and be elevated in nature through the same, but through that he cannot be elevated to grace: just as also air is well elevated out of water to the place of air, but not to the place of fire, unless another species is given to it. § 95. TO ANOTHER it must be said, that evil is from nothing: but yet man can tend to evil, and not tend: because it is voluntary, and not natural: and his nature although it is from nothing, yet it does not have the whole of what it has from nothing as the principle of its existence, but it has its whole essence from God, and therefore in Him it can stand. § 97. BUT IF it is objected, that no one perseveres without perseverance: but to stand implies the act of perseverance: therefore since perseverance is a virtue, no one can stand without virtue: that is ridiculous: because perseverance is said in three ways. In one way it is said as the purpose of sustaining what is difficult until the end of the fight, and for this there is a certain virtue which is a part of fortitude. In a second way, it is called the gift of perseverance which is given at the end of life to the Saints, when the end of labors is reached: and this is not a virtue, but the effect of a virtue continued unto the end. In a third way, perseverance is called the continuation of that state in which something is unto the end, or up to a time, and thus it adds nothing above the state in which one is persevering: and thus the Angel could persevere in natural things, that is, continuously hold himself in them, until he fell: and this is not a virtue in any way. § 98.

Articulus 15 — Whether Angels Know Through Species

§ 100. Whether Angels know through species? § 102. Whether Angels know through species? § 103. Next it is asked about what he says, there, § 104. "Here it is usually asked, What wisdom, etc." § 105. For the Master says this about the threefold knowledge of Angels, namely that they knew that they were made, and by whom they were made, and with whom they were made, and they had some notice of good and evil. Below we will ask about the morning and evening knowledge of Angels, and now about the natural knowledge of Angels. § 106. Let us therefore ask three things here, of which the first is by what do they know, or what is the ratio of the known? § 107. Second, Whether their science is universal or particular about things? § 108. Third, Whether their science is the form of all particular casual, and fortuitous things, and of those things which are caused by free choice? § 109. TO the first one proceeds thus: § 110. 1. No one knows anything whose species is not in the knower himself, or its essence: if therefore Angels know things: therefore the species of things, or their essence is in the knowers themselves. The first is evident by this that there must be an assimilation between the knower and the knowable: and there is no assimilation (as Augustine says) except by one of two ways, namely, that the thing be essentially in the knower, as charity, and as the intellect itself, and God, or the like: or that the species of the thing be present to the intellect. But the second is written in the Text here. § 112. 2. Also, It does not happen that the knower is borne upon the knowable, unless something leads it which is the species and ratio of the knowable: but nothing leads the knower, except what is in it: therefore the species and ratio of every knowable is present to the knower. The first is evident from this that the intellect of itself relates equally to every knowable, and is not borne more to one than to another, unless something should lead it. But the second is self-evident. § 113. 3. Also, To God who is most simple, even in the ultimate degree of simplicity, we attribute a species, which according to reason is the medium of knowing, differing in mode of signifying, not of being, from the knower himself: therefore since the Angel is below the first, we shall attribute to him species differing essentially from the knower himself: therefore he has species. § 114. 4. Also, This seems true by that proposition in the book De Causis, that an intelligence is full of forms: therefore it seems, that similarly the Angel, although according to our intention an intelligence is not an Angel.[135] § 115. BUT AGAINST: § 116. 1. Those species either are after the likeness of ideas, or they are the species of things: if after the likeness of ideas: therefore he knows all things through them which God knows, which is false. § 117. 2. Also, There is only one idea in itself by which God knows everything which He knows: if therefore the species in the mind of the Angel are after the likeness of that, it seems that the Angel knows all knowable things by one single species. § 118. BUT AGAINST: § 119. 1. God can therefore know all things by one single thing, because He Himself is the immediate cause of all things, remaining one and the same: but the Angel does not relate thus to things: therefore he cannot know all things by one single thing. § 120. 2. Also, It is impossible, that besides the first cause something be taken which is the ratio of all things, so that it is proper to each one: but nothing is known in its proper nature, except by its proper ratio: therefore if the Angel knows things in their proper nature, he must have multiple rationes which are appropriated to proper things. But if you say this, since proper things at least in potency are infinite, it is necessary to posit infinites in the Angel: and whatever things are in him, are in him in act: therefore an infinite in multitude is something in act, which is impossible: therefore he does not seem to know through species of this kind received from God. § 121. But if you say, that they are species received from things. AGAINST: The reception of species does not occur except through abstraction: but abstraction does not occur unless the abstracting powers are posited first, namely sense, imagination, and phantasy: therefore since the Angel does not have things of this kind, he cannot understand things through species of things abstracted from things. § 122. If you say, as some do, that he knows through the presence of the thing, it is asked then about that presence: for presence by itself does not cause knowledge, but it is necessary that there be a cognizable reception: but this does not occur without the immutation of the knower by the knowable itself: but this reception must have a proportion to the medium and to the receiving power, as we see in sense: and nothing of such things can even be feigned in an Angel: therefore it seems, that neither does he know through such species. § 123. FURTHERMORE it is asked, Is proximity required in the knowledge of an Angel? § 124. It seems, that it is: because § 125. 1. Every agent and patient relate to each other in a determined and proportioned position, beyond...

which the agent cannot act upon, and the patient cannot suffer from the active: but the knower and the known are related as agent and patient: therefore they require such a proportion of proximity.

§ 2. 2. Also, otherwise it would seem that the Angel would know everything that is in the world: because everything that he knows is near to or remote from him: if therefore he relates to this indifferently, it seems that he knows them indifferently: and this seems absurd, because according to this the devil existing in hell would know every sin in the world, especially since he greatly desires to know them: therefore if the will suffices for knowing, and proximity according to place is not required, he will know all things: and the same is true of a good Angel with respect to the good things that are done.

§ 3. And so that the whole may be comprehended in a summary, this question is difficult, and in the three ways by which it is usually solved, an impossibility always occurs. For if we say that the Angels have one species similar to the first idea, the impossibility occurs that one and the same is the common reason of common things, and the proper reason of proper things, and the same is the proper reason of diverse things in no way agreeing with each other, which cannot be understood. But if you say by the second way, that there are many species, it is necessary that they be multiplied according to all things known by Angels, because otherwise they are not of use, and then three impossibilities follow: one of which is that the Angel knows all future things according to contingents and necessaries which will be: because all knowledge of that is had by the knower whose proper reason is with him: but the reason of all future, present and past things is posited in Angels in this way: therefore he has knowledge of all things: and this is not said by the Saints: because they say that Angels and demons do not know future contingents. Another impossibility is posited above, namely that infinite things would be in the knowledge of the Angel; because future things are innumerable. The third inconvenience, which is the greatest, is that the species of some thing would be in some knower besides God, which is neither in itself nor in any ordered cause, like those things which happen by chance and fortune and from a cause per accidens. But if we wish to evade by the third way, that they receive new reasons from the presence of things, then it is necessary for us to give them powers proportioned to sensible things which either act or suffer from them: and this is impossible.

§ 4. Solution. The authority of Dionysius on this matter in the book On the Divine Names is to be noted beforehand: The utterances say that Angels know the things that are on earth, not according to senses knowing indeed existing sensible things, but according to the proper power and nature of a deiform mind [136].

§ 5. Therefore it is to be noted that concerning this question there are four modes of opinion. For some say that the intellect of Angels is totally acting and has nothing besides itself, and receives nothing, but by itself, as if sending out its spiritual light, knows all things, and they give the example of the sun: because if it were alive and intelligent, by its light which it posits over us it would know all things which are, and would receive nothing from them: and this opinion was of certain Doctors of great authority, and would be good if it could be understood, how then the knowledge even of absent things would remain with the Angel: because with the sun withdrawing its rays, if it were intellectual, the intellect of things would not remain with the sun, unless it abstracted and retained species, which they do not say is done.

§ 6. Therefore others said that the Angel, when he was created, received the forms and species of all those things which are done by nature in an ordered course: but he learns chance and fortuitous things anew, just as we do. And this opinion is nothing, and wondrous: because it posits that he learns, and yet receives nothing from things: or if he receives, it does not determine the mode of reception.

§ 7. Moreover, natural things (as the Philosopher proves in VI of First Philosophy [137]) frequently depend on accidental and unordered causes, as on the will: for example, it is natural that a man is generated from the seed of a man: but the severing of the seed depends on the will of the one severing through voluntary acts of the mingling of seeds: therefore according to this he must continually learn even the greater part of natural things. Also, the sounds of words, the journeys of men, and all mechanical arts, whose principle is the will, it will be necessary to continually learn: and yet no mode of learning by receiving from us is posited for him: or if it is posited, that mode by which an intellectual and simple substance receives from corporeal things will be wondrous: and therefore among all, this opinion seems less probable.

§ 8. Therefore the third are those who say that God has ideal reasons in Himself for knowing and operating: and these, when He wished to unfold them through creatures, He divided, and inserted into nature the reasons for operating, and into the Angel the reasons for knowing: and therefore nature and the Angel relate to God: the Angel indeed as receiving the science of the artisan, and not the work: but nature as receiving the work, and not the science: and by the mediation of these the Angel knows whatever of sensible things is in the world. But still this opinion seems to have less [truth]: because certain things are voluntary, which when they are done are manifested in sensible organs, of which man, when they are manifested, receives knowledge through natural powers: and those the Angel cannot know through these species, and thus he is more imperfect than man.

§ 9. The fourth opinion is the one I understand better, although there are many difficulties in it: however, because it is better saved, and fewer inconveniences follow, therefore I choose it, saying that the Angel in the principle of his creation received the species of the universal order of natural causes, both proper and common, and those are applicable to everything that happens in nature: and therefore by their mediation he knows everything he wishes, except this alone which remains in free choice, the reason for which will be rendered below.

§ 10. And so that this may be better understood, I say that the first and common causes are according to the order of the stars, whether they be from the number or from the proportion of motions, whether from the images of the fixed stars, whether from the aspects and exaltations and triplicities or whatever others of the planets, and under this is the order of the distinction of elements, and under that the order of the action and passion of active and passive qualities in the mixture of elements, and after this the order of mixture in complexions, and after this the order of complexion to the composition of organic bodies, and all that order according to the whole reason of agreement and difference is impressed upon him from creation according to the species of knowing, except those things which are voluntary and chance and fortuitous. But voluntary things are either remaining in the sole will, as to will: or they are proceeding to the body: and this in three ways: because either they proceed in an interior sign, or an exterior: interior, as is the procession of spirits into what is willed, and the concourse of blood to desiring, and the dilation of the heart: but exteriorly as the mutation of the face, the suffusion of redness, and the like, and according to this then it is reduced to causes in matter, which are hot, humid, dry, cold. The second mode is, when it proceeds into a work which is completed through the organs of the body: as to speak, to walk, and the like: and then again it is reduced to natural principles. The third mode is in mechanical arts, when the operation of art is done whose principle is the will, and it is clear that again it touches corporeal nature. But all these voluntary things are known a posteriori: because they are after the will which is their principle. Chance and fortuitous things, Boethius in the Consolation of Philosophy teaches to reduce to nature: because just as being per accidens relates to being per se, so a cause per accidens is reduced to a cause per se. For example, fleeing a burning house by chance a horse is saved: and if I know someone digging a grave there, I will not necessarily know the finding of the treasure, and this will be fortuitous: but then that chance and fortuitous thing is known by that which is the cause per se and priorly: because what is per se is prior to that which is per accidens. Therefore I say that the Angel received the species of this order of causes from the common down to the proper in creation according to the reason of their diversity, and not according to matter and number: because if he had received them according to matter, particular species of all things would be in him, and he would know all things. Whence I say that every reason of the diversity of those causes is in him, and it is applicable to everything that is and will be: and therefore it is apt that through it everything that is may be known. I take a likeness of this from Avicenna in First Philosophy [138], who seems to say that the movers know things, receiving nothing from things, and he gives the example of the knowledge of an eclipse: for he knows the eclipse otherwise who saw it by observing it with an astrolabe or other instrument, and receives its beginning and middle: and he knows otherwise who has in himself the knowledge of every motion of the sun and moon, and of the dragon's head, and of the time of their courses. For the first receives his knowledge from the sun and moon: but the second nothing, nor does he ever need looking: because his knowledge is applied to the thing: and therefore I think the Angels know thus.

§ 11. According to this therefore I respond to the first, that the first three reasons are good, and necessarily conclude that the species of knowables are with the Angel: and I say that they are with him in the said mode.

§ 12. But to that which is objected concerning the book Of Causes it must be guarded against: because the Philosophers speaking of intelligences posited them to be causes: for an intelligence full of forms explicable through the motion of some orb, insofar as it is full of forms, is desired by the mover of the orb, and moves it as the desired [moves] the desiring: and therefore the intelligence of the first order has more universal and simple forms, which are explicated through the one and simple first motion in the one and simple mobile: and the intelligence of the second order will be full of forms explicable by the twofold motion of the oblique circle, and less universal: and so in descending: because thus the Philosopher understands that it understands all intelligible things; what is above it, because it is caused and informed by it: and what is below it, because it itself is the cause to it according to that reason that every form is from the splendor of the intelligence upon that informed by that form. But we repute this ridiculous: because we do not speak thus of Angels, but rather posit them to be separate substances, not determined to any mobile: and therefore we say they have forms which the Creator put in them for knowing the things of this world, each in proper and common nature, as they will.

§ 13. To that which is asked, Whether those forms are similar to ideas? I say that in some things they are similar: they are similar in this that they are the reasons of things which are known through them: and because they are neither universal, nor particular, as will be determined in the following article of this question: and because they are simple, according to what the Angelic intellect demands: and because they are not forms abstracted from things, but rather by the mode of an art making things, or rather by the mode of the reason of art. But they are dissimilar, because they are not operative as ideas in God: and because they are not one in essence, in my judgment, but many according to the diversity of the reasons of causes by which according to reason the reasons of near and remote natural causes can be varied. And through this it is clear that it is not necessary, that by their mediation the Angel knows all future things, like God, according to which He knows by one the many things which are not united in anything.

But how they are posited concerning the thing to be known, will be clear later.

§ 14. To this which is asked, Whether they are similitudes of things? It must be said that they are in a certain mode, and they are not in another mode: for they have a similitude with the thing, just as the reason in the mind of the artisan has a similitude with the artifact: but conversely the form of the artifact is from the form which is in the mind of the artisan, as Aristotle says in VII of First Philosophy [139], that the house in stones and woods is from the house which is in the soul of the builder, and health in hot and cold, is from the health which is in the soul of the doctor: whence the doctor does not need to receive anything for knowing health. Thus neither does the Angel receive anything for knowing a thing: and yet contingents and voluntary things and chance and fortuitous things and the like whose course is not ordered, he does not know before they are: and this will be explained below in the third article of this question.

§ 15. To that which is asked, Whether the presence of the thing is required? I say that in all things which do not happen always in a certain order, as the generations of material chance things, and the events of fortuitous things, and the works of the will, there must in a certain mode be presence before he knows: but this presence does not say presence in a near or remote place, but presence in the nature of natural causes, in that mode in which we said voluntary things are reduced to natural causes through signs and organs, and chance things to a cause per se: but when he knows them, he receives nothing from them: but rather he posits the reason of the proper cause which he has with him, around them: and by that exposition it is determined, that it be proper, and this will be explicated below.

§ 16. To that which is asked concerning proximity of place or remoteness, I think speaking without prejudice, that it does nothing: because there is no proportion of spiritual things to corporeal according to site, but rather according to order: but conversion alone through the will to know suffices to determine this.

§ 17. But how science or the conception of this is done by him, or in him, remains to be said below.

§ 18. And through this the evasion from the impossibilities which occur to the three objected ways of solving is also clear.

Articulus 16 — Whether The Knowledge Of The Angels Is Universal Or Particular, Namely That The Species Or Forms Through Which They Understand Are Universal Or Particular

Whether the knowledge of Angels is universal or particular, namely whether the species or forms by which they understand, are universal or particular?

§ 19. Secondly it is asked, Whether these species or forms are particular, or universal?

§ 20. And it seems that they are universal: because 1. Boethius says that the universal is what is understood, but the singular while it is sensed: but Angels do not have a sense by which their intellect is determined: therefore the species always remain universal.

§ 21. 2. Also, the Philosopher wills that nothing is understood unless it is simple, because there must be a proportion between the intelligible and the intellect: but the intellect is simple: therefore also the intelligible: but it is not simple as long as it is received in those things particularizing it, which are matter and individuating things: therefore the intelligible is remote from those: therefore it is received as everywhere and always: therefore as universal: therefore whatever is understood is a universal species, as it seems.

§ 22. 3. If you say that this does not seem true: because we also understand things in proper nature, and we receive the universal in itself, and in being according to which it is in this or in that: and since the Angel is more potent in understanding than us, the Angel will have that mode more potently than us: this is nothing: because we cannot understand the universal according to being, except through the appearance of individuating things and matter: and this individuation is not done through universal intentions: because the reason of whiteness individuates nothing, nor even the reason of place or matter, but this whiteness, and this place: therefore also the determination of our intellect to particulars of this kind, will be through reflection to the parts of the sensible soul in which those particular species are, and through reflection of assent. Since therefore such powers are not in the Angel, it is impossible for his intellect to be determined to particulars.

§ 23. 4. If you say, as some say, that the intellect in Angels takes the place of sense and intellect in us, and therefore it is equally of both, namely universal, and particular: this can in no way be, as it seems: for there must be a proportion between knowing and known, just as between potency and act, as the Philosopher wills in III De Anima: but the universal is purely simple, but the particular with matter and individuating things: therefore it is impossible that the same thing and behaving in the same mode, be proportioned to both.

§ 24. 5. But if you say that the same thing behaving not in the same mode, is proportioned to them: then we return to the whole difficulty of the question: because then I ask, what makes it diversely behave to that, since powers affixed to organs which are proportioned to the particular are lacking to him?

§ 25. But if you say that the Angel does not know except the universal, the greatest inconvenience follows: because

1. Particulars cannot be inferred from universals, because they are not in it except in potency: therefore Angels will not know particular things, which is against Dionysius induced above.
2. Also, According to this the whole office of custody which they do concerning us will perish: because we are particulars, and our works particular, and it is worth nothing to us for the species of man to be guarded, unless we are guarded in the individual.

§ 26. But if you say that it is false what the Philosophers say, that the intellect is of universals, but rather it is also of particulars: this is nothing: because although it were not already a dictum of the Philosopher, it is proved that it is true in the preceding reasons, through this that there must be a proportion between knowing and known.

§ 27. Solution. It must be pre-noted that diverse sentences even of Authors show the difficulty of this question. Whence Isaac and Rabbi Moses, Philosophers of the Jews, coerced by this difficulty, took away from the Angels which according to law they are coerced to posit, the notice of particulars, and said those Angels to be intelligences moving orbs, and not to know particulars, but rather to influence into orbs or movers of orbs simple forms, which are determined to particulars through the diversity of motion and matter and accidents of matter: and therefore the diversity of particulars neither descends from the intelligence, nor is known by it except per accidens, namely insofar as it is caused through the motion of the orb, and not as it is this or that. But others erring more, said Angels not to be around us, but only around God, and to receive universal revelations, and according to precept to command matter to obey them that this or that be done.

§ 28. But all these we refute in our faith, and we must seek a way competent to faith: and therefore it can be said that those species are neither universal, nor particular, but to knowing the universal and the particular: and this is thus clear: Universal and particular divide the abstracted species: for if it is received with matter and those things which particularize it, we say it to be of this, and particular: but if it is received without these, then it is received as it is one among all, and thus it is everywhere and always the same and in every past and in every future, and then we say it to be universal. But there is also a form not of abstraction, but of composition, and this is twofold. For there is a certain one proceeding from the artisan into the artifact, and this without doubt it is necessary to be simple, according as it is in the mind of the artisan: and just as it goes out, thus it receives the conditions of matter and matter, and such is the form of human art. The other is according to the mode of the first artisan, of whom nothing is made in matter, neither his substance, nor the species which is in him: but the species which he is, and is in him, is the reason regulating and making this species which is produced by his virtue in matter: and similar to this according to something we posit the species of Angels by which they know: for they are regular to them for knowing things, whether they be universal, or particular: but they are not something of particulars, or of universals: and therefore it is clear that division by universal and particular does not compete to them, just as neither to the first idea.

§ 29. And then it does not rest to us to solve, except two, namely what proportion is between intellect and species, and whether one is universal and particular?

§ 30. To the first I say that there is a proportion of simple to simple: because the species in him is according to the efflux from God in creation, and then has simplicity not depurated from particularizing things, but which is through imitation of the first idea as much as it can.

§ 31. To the other it must be said that the particular and universal of that which is not divided except by the sole division of matter is one in number Species in the cognition of the Angel: but the universal species is another, which is divided by formal division through differences, as the most general, and subaltern.

§ 32. But what individuates and determines to knowing this and that, will now be a question.

Articulus 17 — Whether The Knowledge Of The Angels Is Of All Things, And Of Casual And Fortuitous Things, And Of All Things That Can In Any Way Come Into Cognition

Whether the science of Angels is of all things, and of chance things, and of fortuitous things, and of all things which in whatever mode can come into notice?

§ 33. Thirdly therefore it is asked, Whether his science is of all things, and of chance things, and of fortuitous things, and of all things which in whatever mode can proceed into notice?

§ 34. And it seems that so: because all things whatever are done in whatever mode, whether from a cause per se, or from a cause per accidens, provided they are done, we know through natural powers which we have without any revelation: therefore since the Angel is not more imperfect, he also will know all those through nature without revelation.

§ 35. But then it is asked, What determines or contracts his species, that the species be made the reason of knowing this or that? For that by which a common thing is made proper, cannot be common, but proper: since therefore there is not a proper of this kind in the Angel, as is proved above, it is impossible that he has that, except by receiving from the thing of which that is the proper: and then the first difficulty returns, that it behooves us to give the Angel powers by which he receives that proper, which I repute absurd.

§ 36. If you say that the will of knowing appropriates, then I ask, Whence comes the will of knowing this? For the will of this is not except with pre-existing notice of this: because of the unknown there is no will: therefore when you say, the will of knowing this, you already posit the notice of this to be with him: and I ask, Whence did that come? and in the solution of this reason is the whole difficulty of this question.

§ 37. However because of the depraved intellect of some it is asked concerning this, How does one Angel understand another Angel who is next to him through equality of nature? For it seems that by understanding him he is substantially the same with his intellect: because Aristotle says thus in III De Anima: "In those things which are without matter, the intellect and what is understood are the same" "for speculative science and what is speculative are the same" . But the Angel is without matter: therefore when he is understood, he is the same with the intellect of the understanding Angel. And he says the same elsewhere also, but let this suffice.

§ 38. Solution. It must be said that the Angel does not have science of future contingents: but he knows them when they are done, receiving nothing from things, but rather positing his species which he has, around them. And to understanding this it must be noted that, just as Avicenna and Alfarabi recite, the opinion of some was concerning the sense of sight, that the sensible would not behave itself in some mode as agent to sight, as conferring species to sight, but rather that the visive power itself virtually would go out in an emitted ray, and place itself under the sensible thing, and by positing itself around it, would be determined to seeing this or that, receiving nothing from it, and afterwards with itself the soul would form an image of that thing, by which even with the thing absent it would imagine it: thus we can say, not indeed approving the opinion of those, but receiving a simile, that the Angel has species with himself, and what the reception through sense does to our species, the direction to place and to those things which are in place spiritual or corporeal, convenes to his species: and therefore that direction which is conversion in the will of knowing located things in a place which is known to him, because place has necessity of order in nature, but not all located things: whence by directing himself to place under the species which he has, he is certified concerning located things, and his species are determined through direction to the thing, and when he retracts himself, the intention of determination remains with him, not which he received from things, but which he himself made through the direction of himself to the thing, and under that he knows the thing, even when he does not direct himself: and thus he will not have determinate cognition of future contingents, except when they are, and thus in this mode he knows all particulars: and the whole difficulty is solved, as it seems.

§ 39. But if it is asked, What excites him to directing himself to this place? I say that the will of knowing those things which are in that place, which however are not determined through notice with him: just as my will when I know a place and indeterminately know something to be in the place or not to be, excites me to directing sight there, and then if my sight would go out, it would receive notice of the thing by positing itself around it, and receiving nothing from it: but returned it would form an image similar to it.

§ 40. But to this which is objected concerning the cognition of the Angel, it must be said that the objection proceeds from a bad understanding of the letter of Aristotle: because the Angel is not simple with the simplicity of the intelligible: because the simplicity of the intelligible is an intention abstracted from this individuating thing: and that abstraction is in the Angel, just as in an ass equal: but Aristotle speaks there, how the intellect in act behaves to the intellect in potency, and says that the intellect in act is just as the thing understood, and is the same to it: because both the thing and the intellect are in one act which is the science of the thing understood. And this is what he adds, that speculative science, that is, the species of the speculative intellect, is the form of the thing and the act. Whence he speaks there of every intelligible according to act: and therefore in the end of the chapter he says that the intellect is the species of species, and sense the species of sensibles, just as the hand the organ of organs: and therefore there is no objection: for the Angel is understood through species, just as an ass but differently by us, and differently by Angels.

§ 41. K. Whether they had any love of God, or of each other?

It is also usually asked, Whether they had any love of God or of each other? To which it can be said that they had natural love, as memory, intellect, and genius, by which they loved God and themselves to some extent: by which however they did not merit.

Articulus 18 — Whether The Angels Had Love, Either Of God Or Of Themselves, For One Another

Whether the Angels had love of God or of each other?

§ 42. Then it is asked concerning this which he says there, It is also usually asked, Whether they had any love of God or of each other, etc.

§ 43. And that question is concerning natural love, Angels not being understood except in the state of natural things, whether they could love God above themselves, and above all things?

§ 44. It seems that they could not : because 1. That love is of charity: and charity according to this exposition they did not have.

§ 45. 2. Also, This is to love God from the whole heart, and from the whole mind, and from all powers: but this precept (as Augustine says) is not fulfilled even by him who has grace as long as he is in the way: therefore much less the Angel in the state of natural things could fulfill this.

§ 46. 3. Also, This is the highest of merits: but to the highest of merits nature does not suffice: therefore neither could he do this in the state of natural things.

§ 47. 4. Also, This is the highest of rewards that with the whole heart above all things we love God: therefore to this nature does not suffice.

§ 48. 5. Also, Bernard says that nature is curved in itself, and loves nothing except itself, and for its own sake: therefore it seems that nature does not extend itself to loving the first for His own sake, and above all things.

§ 49. ON THE CONTRARY : 1. Either he loved God for His own sake, and above all things: or not. If so, I have the proposition. If not, therefore he loved himself more than God: therefore from the means he made an end: therefore he sins mortally.

§ 50. 2. Also, If he loved himself more than God: therefore by love he adhered to himself for his own sake: therefore he enjoyed himself, as it seems: therefore he mortally sinned.

§ 51. 3. Also, In the first state he knew God to be good above all things, and per se: therefore by the same reason, the will not existing weaker than the intellect, he also could love Him for His own sake and above all things. If you say that he was not bound in the first state, since he could not: this is nothing: because he who does not have grace and is in sin, is more impotent than the Angel: and yet he sins mortally if...

...he sometimes makes a path into an end, and enjoys the creature more than the Creator.

§ 4. Also, if natural things are said to be those that are apart from sanctifying grace, then we read in the books of the Philosophers and Stoics that some loved the moral good (honestum) in which they placed happiness for its own sake and above all things, such that they rather suffered themselves to be killed than to withdraw from the moral good. If therefore nature can do this in a lesser good, much more an Angel, stronger than a human in all natural endowments, could do this toward a greater good, namely the uncreated.

§ Solution. It must be said that there are two opinions here. One is of William of Auxerre, who concedes the objections first introduced and resolves the subsequent ones, saying that love is twofold, namely of friendship (amicitiae) and of concupiscence (concupiscentiae). Friendship is that by which I will good to myself and to another. But concupiscence is that by which I desire things to enjoy them. According to the first mode, I love a friend. In the second mode, I love food or something sweet to me which I want to enjoy.

§ He says therefore that with the love of friendship they could not love God more than themselves, because they willed a good for themselves more intensely than for God; but they willed a greater good for God, namely with the love of concupiscence, since the divine good is sweeter than the Angelic, they loved God more than themselves, and yet referred this to themselves. And to the objection about sin, he says that they were not obligated unless grace was received.

§ To the other it must be said that they loved the moral good with a love of concupiscence, and not of friendship, and because by its fruition it was bitter for them to lack it, they chose rather to die.

§ To the other it must be said that it is different for a human: because he is in a state in which he ought to have grace; and if he does not have it, this is from his own fault; but the Angel was not, because a time of proving of his natural endowments was given to him, as was said above; just as a puppy is not called blind before the ninth day.

§ But Philip the Chancellor says otherwise, and I think more truly, namely that in the first state, even if they are not supposed to have charity, they could love God even for His own sake and above all things. But when it is said "for His own sake," the word "for" can denote only one cause, namely the final cause, and then it is fitting for natural love, which is not caused effectively by the first goodness, but is directed to it as to an end, and is caused by the natural cognition of the highest good. And then it is not of charity, nor of merit, nor is it the highest degree either on the way or in the homeland. But if it denotes two causes at once, namely the efficient and the final, then it is an act of charity, and the highest on the way according to the mode of the way, and the highest in the homeland according to the mode of the homeland. And about this many things are noted in book III of the Sentences, distinction XXVII, on charity.

§ Through this the solution to all that the others object against him is clear, except to the statement of Bernard. And to this it must be said that natural reason is considered in two ways: namely as nature, and thus it is curved according to its own mode; and as deliberative and inquisitive of the moral and the good, and thus it can love something more than itself, as many have done who never had charity.

DISTINCTIO IV

Divisio Textus

§ "After these things it must be seen," etc. This distinction has two parts. In the first it is asked, whether He created them blessed? In the second, whether perfect? there, D, "Moreover to this which was asked," etc.

§ In the first of these there are three: in the first of which he shows that they could not be blessed if the events of their lives were uncertain, and that they did not have foreknowledge of their fall or confirmation. In the second he seems to say that the good had foreknowledge of their confirmation, there, A, §2: "Moreover it is asked, why it was not," etc. In the third he returns, showing that none had foreknowledge of his fall or confirmation, there, B, "But this rather by opining," etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Definition Of An Angel Given By Dionysius Is Good

Is the definition of an Angel given by Dionysius good?

§ Here, regarding the first part, three questions arise, of which the first is concerning the definition of the good Angel which Dionysius posits. Second, whether the Angel was created blessed or not? Third, whether he could foreknow his fall or not?

§ To the first, the definition of Dionysius is taken which he gives in the book On the Divine Names, saying thus: "First, the Angel is an image of God, a manifestation of the hidden light, a pure mirror, most clear, uncontaminated, undefiled, unblemished, receiving the whole, if it is fitting to say, beauty of the good-formed deiformity, and causing to shine purely in himself, as much as possible, the goodness of the silence which is in the hidden places." [140]

§ But it is asked here, what is called an image?

§ 1. For it is either an image of creation, or of likeness, or of recreation. It is not of creation or of likeness, because this belongs to the good and the bad. Therefore it is of recreation. Therefore this will be in glory, or some grace which causes one to imitate God.

§ 2. If therefore this is said, it seems that it only applies to the superiors: because they alone are informed by God immediately, whereas the others are informed by them. Therefore only the superiors are the image of God, and the middle ones are images of the superiors, and the inferiors are images of the middle ones.

§ 3. That this is true is taken from Dionysius, who says in the book On the Divine Names: "That the most holy and advanced powers existing, and placed as it were in the vestibules of the supersubstantial Trinity, have from It and in It both to be, and to be deiformly; and after them the subjects and the extremes down to the Angels." [141]

§ Further it is asked, how does "manifestation of the hidden light" apply to him? Is it according to the mode of a theophany, or not?

§ And it seems that it is: because the Commentator says on the Celestial Hierarchy: "For the spirits themselves also have their signs and demonstrations by which they are educated immaterially about the invisible things of God." And a little below: "Which signs, regarding those things which are according to us, are invisible: but regarding that much invisible and inaccessible light of the deity, they are as if outside, and proceed to demonstration. Wherefore the signs themselves which supervene upon minds or souls inwardly illuminated are called theophanies or divine apparitions, because when they come to manifestation, that which is completely hidden is demonstrated." [142]

§ But then it seems that that hidden light is not essentially God, but a light which is a sign or demonstration of something knowable about God. This also seems to be through Dionysius himself who says in the book On the Celestial Hierarchy that "theology calls the vision which is described in it a theophany, as a divine likeness in the form of the formless, that is, of signs which are the form of those divine things which do not properly have a form." [143] Therefore, according to this, the good Angel would not be immediately blessed from God being united to him, nor will he see God as He is. Therefore neither shall we after death, which is a condemned heresy, and against the canonical epistle of John, who says that "we shall be like Him, and we shall see Him as He is." (1 John 3:2).

§ But if you say that that light leads into God, so that afterwards one is immediately joined, as Dionysius seems to mean in the same place a little later, saying: "It is called a theophany as if by it a divine illumination is made for those seeing, which the divine things themselves holily perfect." Then I ask about that reduction: for it is certain that according to the order of the hierarchy one reduces another, as will be disputed below in the tractate on the Orders; therefore it seems that one is to another that manifestation of the divine light.

§ Further it is asked concerning the third that he says, "a pure mirror".

§ 1. For a mirror is receptive of the form of a thing, and not of the essence; but the Angel receives the divine essence by itself rather than the form.

§ 2. Also, a mirror placed in the dark receives more than one placed under the rays of the sun. But the Angels stand immediately under the rays of God; therefore it seems that they cannot be mirrors.

§ 3. Furthermore, whenever he calls them—especially according to another translation—agalmata (images), is agalma the same as a mirror?

§ It seems that it is, because the Commentator says that agalma is the same among the Greeks as "image" or "mirror" or "likeness" among us. Since therefore one, by illuminating another, leads him to this, that he is made the agalma of him according to Dionysius, it seems that one is a mirror to another.

§ Then I ask, is everyone a mirror to everyone, or not? If not: this does not seem right, because then not everyone could signify his intention to another; therefore it seems that everyone is a mirror and agalma to another. BUT AGAINST THIS: Illumination descends and does not ascend; therefore it belongs to the inferior to be only a mirror, and to the superior to be the manifestor of illumination. Therefore it seems that in this assignment, "manifestation of the divine light" and "pure mirror" do not refer to the same Angel.

§ Further it is asked concerning the fourth thing he says, that "he receives the whole beauty of the good-formed deity".

§ For this is impossible, because thus God would be circumscribed by some created intellect, which cannot be.

§ Similarly concerning the last thing he says, that "he causes to shine purely in himself the goodness of the silence which is in the hidden places".

§ 1. For the Angel does not do this, but rather God.

§ 2. Furthermore, how is it in the hidden places, and how is it silence, if he causes this to shine in himself? For splendor does not suffer to be in hidden places, because all things which are shining in the light are manifested by the light itself.

140. Pseudo-Dionysius, De divinis nominibus, cap. 4.

§ Solution. It must be noted that Dionysius here gathers five things which apply to the Angel illuminated and beatified through the contemplation of the Word, of which three are taken in the beatified nature of the Angel, and those three follow one another.

§ And one is that he is capable of the beatifying substance: and for this five dispositions are required, namely removal from the impure thing that impedes. The second is purity, so that he is on all sides of his own nature apt for the penetrating deity; just as a mirror, insofar as it is a mirror, is capable of an image; and purity removes the nature of the opaque, which would not receive. Clarity, moreover, posits the polishing of it, lest perhaps something obscure in one part should overshadow another. And three dispositions follow through removal from things that accidentally darken, namely contamination, defilement (coinquinatio), and blemish (maculatio). And contamination properly happens from the lesion of a touch leaving an infection; defilement, however, from the touch of filth; but blemish from the staining of an infected spirit proceeding from the eyes, just as a mirror is blemished at the sight of a menstruating woman. And these are figuratively referred to the blessed spirits: because capacity is there regarding virtual nature, and purity through removal from matter inducing opacity, "because the corruptible body weighs down the soul, and the earthly habitation depresses a sense thinking many things" (Wisdom 9:15). But clarity is from equality through removal from penal state: because tribulation (as the Philosopher says) makes virtue unequal. Uncontaminated, however, speaks of the removal from the contact of those behaving badly: because from fellowship an infecting touch adheres. Undefiled, however, speaks of the removal from the filth of vices; and unblemished speaks of the nobility of the spirit depurated in them from every defect of menstruosity and mutability. And this is the first with its conditions.

§ But the second is that, according to act, he receives the incident light from God, which indeed falls as a whole, but is not received except according to capacity.

§ And the third is that he reflects it at pure angles: because every reflection of incident light is at pure angles, as is proved in the Perspectiva. But this reflection will not be except into the same line beginning directly into God, so that the heat of the ardor of perpetual charity may be excited. And these two he touches upon by the two things he subjoins, namely "receiving the whole, if it is fitting to say," etc., and by that: "And to shine purely." But the first two are taken according to the conformity of the Angel filled with God to God: and one indeed is the manifestation of the divine light in himself, just as burning iron manifests fire; and the other is the conformity of the one manifesting to the manifested, and this is the image of God.

§ And through this the solution to the whole is already almost clear.

§ For to that which is objected about the image, it must be said that it is taken in none of those modes, but rather for the said conformity.

141. Pseudo-Dionysius, De divinis nominibus, cap. 4.

§ To the other it must be said that all, in the vision which is the reward, stand immediately under the rays of the sun and are informed by God; but in other revelations one is illuminated by another, and of these it will be spoken below.

§ To that which is objected about Dionysius, it must be said that he does not intend that not all are informed immediately by the Word, but rather that according to proportion the superiors receive the Word supremely, the middle in a middle mode, and the inferiors in an extreme mode. Yet all stand in the vestibules of the Trinity, clothed with the light of God as with a garment (Psalm 103:2).

§ To that which is further asked, it must be said that he manifests the hidden light, as was said; and this is not the light of theophany by which one illuminates another, but of the theophany by which anyone is illuminated by God.

§ To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that such objections and calumnies of the sacred books come from the fact that it is not understood that theophany means two things, namely the light of glory elevating the intellect and comforting the phantasm, and this is created glory which is united to the intellect of the Angel; it also means the intelligible distinguishing and perfecting the intellect, and this is nothing else than God. Just as also in the sense of sight there is light perfecting, and color determining sight; and in our intellect there is the light of the agent intellect elevating and illuminating, and the intelligible distinguishing. For the nature of the intellect cannot be fixed there unless it is comforted by the light infused into it by God. And then the objection ceases: because then that light is a sign, not in which God is seen as in a medium, but under which, as it comforts the intellect, the intellect is immediately fixed in God.

§ To that which is asked about the mirror, it must be said that a material mirror, from its imperfection, does not receive except in the dark. But that is not so: because it does not receive the rays of the divine light on its surface only, like a material mirror, but rather into its depth and inmost parts.

§ To this which is asked about agalmata, whether one can be an image to another? It must be said that not properly, nor even a mirror spoken of in this way, because it speaks of the capacity of glory. But one can be to another an occasion or cause of some illumination pertaining to a work, for the reception of which one is not called a mirror or image in this way which is considered here, except perhaps relatively (secundum quid). And I well concede that all speak to each other, but not all illuminate each other, as was noted in the second book of the Sentences.

§ To that which is objected about the fourth, the solution is already clear, because God exhibits Himself wholly, but He is received according to the capacity of each one, such that He is wholly inside, but not inclosed , so that He is also wholly outside: and this is what he intends to say.

§ To the last it must be said that the divine light by itself is most manifest, and is not hidden except because it is inaccessible to be comprehended. And therefore it is called silence, because nothing participating in it speaks it entirely, just as it speaks itself in the Trinity of persons; and therefore it is called hidden, because no one knows it by comprehending, except the Trinity God.

Articulus 2 — Whether An Angel Was Created In Beatitude

Whether the Angel was created in beatitude?

§ Secondly it is asked, whether the Angel was created in beatitude, or not?

§ And it seems that he was: because § 1. Thus says Augustine in the book On Rebuke and Grace: "The Angels although created... therefore were made blessed." [144]

§ But because he says this many times in many places on Genesis, let it be objected to the same through reason.

§ 2. For beatitude consists in the vision of the Word. But the Angels in the first state saw the Word: therefore in the first state they were blessed. The first is proved by the saying of Augustine, that the Angels were formed by conversion to the Word, by seeing it. The second is proved by this, that the Angel could not see the creature to be made in the Word, unless he saw the Word: therefore it seems that he was blessed.

§ 3. Also, Augustine in book II On Genesis says thus: "Not like us did the Angels advance to perceiving wisdom, so that they might catch sight of the invisible things of God being understood through the things that are made, they who from the moment they were created enjoy the very eternity of the Word in holy and pious contemplation: and looking down from there upon these things, according to what they see within, they either approve what is done rightly, or disapprove of sins." [145] Therefore if they enjoy from the moment they are made, it seems that they were made blessed.

§ 4. Also, Augustine in book IV On Genesis: "Morning is when with the cognition of the creature one rises into the praise of the Creator." [146] Therefore it is clear that they were enjoying, and seeing, and praising: but these acts seem to be of beatitude; therefore it seems that they were made blessed.

§ BUT AGAINST THIS: § It is held in the Text that he is not blessed who is uncertain of his fall; but the Angels were uncertain of their fall. Since therefore from the beginning they were not confirmed, it seems that they were not blessed.

§ Solution. It must be said that the Master sufficiently hints at the solution of this question in the Text, that beatitude is spoken of in many ways: namely according to the best state of natural endowments without misery, and thus the first man and the first Angel, each according to his own state, was blessed. Sometimes a species of beatitude is called beatitude, and thus it is said: "Blessed is the man who fears the Lord" (Psalm 111:1). Sometimes it is called the state perfected by the aggregation of all goods: thus only those confirmed with God are said to be blessed. Sometimes it is called the state of all goods which are substantially the very thing which is called blessed: and thus nothing is blessed except God alone. And through this the solution to the first is clear.

§ To the other it must be said that according to those who say that the Angel was not created in grace, it is necessary to say that it happens in two ways to see the Word, namely as He is the art and reason of things to be made, and as He is the object of beatitude. In the first mode the Angels saw; in the second mode the blessed saw.

§ But if it is asked, how does it happen that one is separated from the other? I say that in comparison to the act of the soul, or of a spiritual substance, this is easy: because those things which are not separated in reality, the intellect well separates; and it happens that one and the same thing is understood in one respect and not in another; especially since that eternal mirror is voluntary, and shows itself as it wills, and in whatever respect it wills, and how much and when it wills.

§ To the other they say that it is understood of natural piety and contemplation, not of beatitude.

§ It follows to the last. Furthermore, it can be said that praise is of things known through nature in the Word, and not through grace.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Evil Angels Were Able To Foreknow Their Fall Or Not

Whether the evil Angels could have foreknown their fall, or not?

§ Thirdly it is asked, whether they could have foreknown their fall?

§ And it seems that they could: because § 1. God, supremely loving our salvation, ought to have given all occasions for standing. But foreknowledge of the fall is a caution aiding to stand; therefore it seems that it was expedient to foreknow the fall.

§ 2. Also, the Lord revealed his fall to Peter, saying: "Before the rooster," etc. (Matthew 26:34). Therefore it seems that He ought to have done the same for the Angel.

§ 3. Also, let us posit that He had revealed it to him, what inconvenience would follow? It seems that none would: because He forewarned man lest he fall, when He had said: "In whatever day you eat from it," etc. (Genesis 2:17). Therefore it seems that it would have been good also for the demon.

§ 4. Also, the Lord could reveal this, whose power is constrained in nothing; therefore he who would receive this revelation could foreknow this.

§ BUT AGAINST this are four arguments of Anselm in the book On the Fall of the Devil, of which the first is this:

§ 1. Knowledge is only of certain and necessary things. But the fall of the Angel was contingent before it happened; therefore he could not foreknow it, unless perhaps from God to whom nothing is contingent. [147]

142. Maximus the Confessor (or John of Scythopolis), Scholia on the Celestial Hierarchy.

§ 2. But if you say that he could have had an estimation about his fall. Against: Anselm says: Let it be granted that he had an estimation of his fall. Either he willed the future fall, or not. If he willed it, then by that very falling will he already fell; therefore he fell before he fell, which is false. But if he did not will it: then he grieved about his future fall; and the more he grieved, the more miserable he was. Therefore the more he foreknew his fall, the more miserable he was. But the more he grieved about his fall, the more just he was: and the more just he was, the more happy he ought to have been. Therefore, from the first, the more he grieved, the more happy he ought to have been. And earlier it was held that the more he grieved, the more miserable he was. Therefore whence he ought to have been more happy, thence he was more miserable, which the order of justice does not permit. Therefore he could not foreknow his fall.

§ 3. Also, the third reason is: Either foreknowing his fall, he willed to hold the rectitude in which he was created, or not. If so, then he willed to persevere in it: because no one holds it unless by willing to persevere. But willing to persevere, he thought he ought to persevere, and he foreknew his fall: therefore foreknowing his fall, he thought he ought to persevere, which is absurd. But if he did not will to persevere: then he already fell; therefore he fell before he fell, which cannot be.

§ 4. But the fourth is this: Either he would have avoided the fall, or not. If he had avoided it: either by love of justice, or not. It is certain that it was not by love of justice: because the subsequent event of the matter proved this; and when a fall is not avoided by love of justice, the heart has already fallen through the affection of falling. Therefore he fell before he fell through the affection of falling. But if he had not avoided it, then his knowledge would have been useless, which is impossible, since it is written in the Text that knowledge is the fruit of piety.

§ Solution. With the holy Doctors it must be said that he could not foreknow his fall, and the reason Anselm touches upon sufficiently in objecting.

§ To the first therefore it must be said that it would not have been an occasion for standing, but rather for despairing: because he well knew the possibility of falling, on account of the fact that he was not confirmed; and again he well knew that falling he would from strict justice deserve to be eternally punished, but he (as Anselm says) perhaps did not think that God would do this which He could justly do. And therefore when it is asked about the foreknowledge of the fall, since he well knew the possibility of the fall, it is asked only about the act of falling; and foreknowledge of that would rather induce despair than caution.

§ To the other it must be said that Peter did not receive this as spoken from foreknowledge, but as an admonition of caution, which did not need to be done for the demon, because he well knew that he ought to beware lest he fall.

§ Also, it is not similar concerning Peter: because Peter fell not from a state of repenting, but in a state with the possibility of rising again; but the demon falling, simultaneously with this fell from the state of repenting. Because as Damascene says: "What death is in humans, this the fall is in Angels." [148]

144. Augustine, De correptione et gratia, cap. 10.

§ To the other, the solution is clear through the arguments of Anselm, who deduces to many inconveniences. And besides them there are two: a certain punishment of sadness would precede the fault, and the falling Angels would be induced into the suffocating sadness of despair, before they had merited any evil.

§ To the other it must be said that God could reveal it. But positing that He had revealed it, I say that since it still depended on the free choice of the Angel, he would have accepted this as revealed by the Lord not only from foreknowledge, but for caution.

§ But as to the other things which could be asked here, namely whether the good Angels could foreknow their confirmation, or foreknow the fall of the evil Angels, what the Master says in the Text is quite sufficient.

DISTINCTIO V

Divisio Textus

§ "After these things consideration adduces," etc. This part is divided into two: in the first of which it is treated of aversion and conversion. But in the second, of the distinction of the orders; and this begins at the beginning of distinction IX, there, A, "After the foresaid things it remains," etc.

§ The first of these is divided into four: in the first of which aversion and conversion are posited. In the second, who were turned away, in the following distinction, there, A, "Furthermore it ought to be known," etc. In the third, of their works and the powers ordered to works, in distinction VII, there, A, "It was said above that Angels," etc. In the fourth, it treats of their apparitions through assumed bodies, there, "It is also accustomed to be turned in question," etc., and there begins distinction VIII.

§ But in this distinction there are four: of which the first is, What is aversion? Second, by what as a power were they turned away and turned towards? there, B, "For they all had free choice," etc. In the third, he says what was added to the converted, and taken away from the averted, there, C, "But if it is asked," etc. In the fourth it is asked, Whether they merited, or do merit the beatitude perceived? there, G, "Here it is usually asked," etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether It Was Possible For An Angel To Fall

Whether it was possible for the Angel to fall?

§ Here, moreover, three things are asked before the Text, namely: Whether it was possible for the Angel to fall? Second, What was his first sin? Third, What did he appetite?

145. Augustine, De Genesi ad litteram, lib. 2, cap. 8.

§ To the first it is objected thus: § 1. Aristotle says that the intellect is always right: but the phantasy is right and not right. But in the Angel there was nothing moving the appetite except the intellect. Since therefore it is impossible that from a rightly moving thing an inordinate motion or sin be elicited, it seems that the Angel could not fall through sin.

§ 2. Also, in the Angel there was a deiform intellect: but a deiform intellect does not err. Therefore the Angel never errs; therefore neither did he sin, because every perverse act is from some error, as Augustine says.

§ 3. Also, the nature of the Angel by itself was ordered to the good, nor was there anything that would depress it: therefore it tended into that, because all things that are desire the good. But tending into that, he could not sin: therefore he could not fall, as it seems.

§ 4. Also, every will proceeds from some cognition. But then he knew that God was good above all things. Therefore since affection follows cognition, it seems that he also loved God above all things: therefore he never sinned.

§ BUT AGAINST this is: § 1. The fight which we daily experience from him, and everything that is in the Text.

§ 2. Also, reason: because the will is not obligated to what is known, although it wills nothing except what it knows; therefore it can be deflected from it when it wills. Therefore it was possible for the Angel to sin.

§ 3. Also, Augustine says that the cause of the first sin is nothing but the will, namely one good indeed by nature, but failing from the good in act. Therefore since the Angel had free will, he could sin, as it seems.

§ Solution. To the first it must be said that the intellect is considered in two ways, namely in comparison to its proper object; and this is the true absolutely if it is speculative, or the good absolutely if it is practical. And then it is never not right, nor does it ever err: because thus it proceeds only from the principles of the true and the good absolutely, and in those there is no error. There is another consideration of the intellect in comparison to one's own proper good: and thus it is not moved by the good according as it is good, but to the good according as it is proper, and this is as good for now and for oneself. And in this deception is frequent: and in this mode the intellect of the Angel was not right.

§ To the other it must be said that it is deiform: because it does not need collation and inquiry to choose and to receive knowledge, but it is not deiform to the effect that it would always imitate God; and spoken of in the first mode, it can be deflected and can sin.

§ To the other it must be said that every nature, insofar as it is nature, is by itself ordered to the good; but nevertheless through free choice it can be deflected from it.

§ To the other it must be said that if the will proceeds from cognition, it does not follow from this that if a cognition of something were held, that thing would be loved. But rather the fallacy of the consequent falls in, because positing cognition, the will does not necessarily will the known thing; nor does it even will it as much as it knows it, and conversely sometimes it has more of affection concerning that which it knows, as is clear in charity on the way, which sometimes loves more than it knows.

146. Augustine, De Genesi ad litteram, lib. 4, cap. 24.

Articulus 2 — What Is The First Sin Of The Angel

What is the first sin of the Angel?

§ Secondly it is asked, What was the first sin of the demon?

§ Moreover it seems that it was avarice: because § 1. The Apostle says that "the root of all evil is cupidity" (1 Timothy 6:10). But the sin of the devil was the root of all evil, because it was the first; therefore it was avarice.

§ 2. Also, Augustine says that from it the devil is the devil; therefore it was the first sin.

§ 3. Also, upon that of Psalm 79:17, "Things set on fire," the Gloss says that every sin is either from an evil humiliating fear, or from an evil inflaming love. And because fear also comes from self-love, since therefore cupidity is excessive love of one's own good, it seems that the evil of the Angel proceeded from avarice.

§ ALSO IT SEEMS that it was from pride, because § 1. Thus it is said, Sirach 10:15: "The beginning of all sin is pride."

§ 2. Also, Augustine says, and all others, that the Angel first sinned from pride: therefore, etc.

§ 3. Again, Psalm 35:12: Let not the foot of pride come to me, etc. Therefore, the foot of the first sinner was pride. But that sinner is the Angel. Therefore, the first sin of the Angel was pride.

BUT it seems that it was an omission. For when he saw his own beauty, and the divine altitude, he ought to have compared them, concluding that he ought not to extol himself above God, or to an equality with God. But he did not make this comparison; therefore, he omitted it. Therefore, an omission was the first sin.

Again, it seems that it was infidelity. For no wise person strives to obtain something that he does not believe can be done. But the Angel was most wise; therefore, he was not striving to obtain something that he did not believe could be done. But he was striving to obtain equality with God, as is said in the Letter; therefore, he first believed that this could be done. But this is infidelity, [namely to believe] that something could be equaled to God. Therefore, it seems that infidelity was the first sin of the Angel.

Solution. It must be said that the first sin, absolutely speaking, was pride, because an undue appetite for dignity is properly the vice of pride.

To the first, it must be said that avarice or cupidity is spoken of in three ways. In one way, it is called a habitual taking-pleasure in one's own good, and in this way it is the same as lust (libido), and in this way it is called the root of all evil, but it is not itself any special sin. In another way, it is called an immoderate actual will for a mutable good; and in this way it is still not distinguished into a species of vice, because every vice wills some mutable good with an immoderate appetite. This is evident from the definition of sin which Augustine gives, that sin is to cling to mutable things, spurning the immutable good. And thus it accompanies every sin, and thus it is not a root. In a third way, avarice is called an immoderate appetite for having things that promise sufficiency in life, which are riches and money. And in this way it is taken properly, and it is one of the capital vices. And in this way it is evident that it was not the first sin of the Angel. And through this the solution to the first three objections is evident, because they proceed according as avarice is a root, and not a special sin.

To that which is objected concerning pride, it must be said in the same way that pride is spoken of in three ways. In one way, it is a habitual appetite for altitude; and that is the beginning of all sin, because unless one were to set oneself on high above the will of the one commanding and above the precept, one would not sin. And thus it is the beginning; and it is the same in substance as avarice, which is the root, as Augustine says: "Let us beware of pride and avarice, not two evils, but one evil." But yet they differ in the rationale of that of which they are principles, because there are two things in sin, namely aversion and conversion. On the part of the conversion to the mutable good, avarice is the root; on the part of the aversion, the root is pride. And because it belongs to the root to give moisture and sap, and the sap of love is on the part of the conversion, therefore avarice is called the root. But because aversion is the form of sin, because it makes it evil, and this is the beginning of sin and apostasy, therefore pride is properly called the beginning, not the root, and the beginning of apostatizing from God. And therefore both are written: Pride is the beginning of all sin, and Pride is the beginning of apostatizing from God. In another way, pride is called an immoderate appetite for extolling oneself in whatever matter; and thus it is a common vice which contains under it vainglory, hypocrisy, boasting, and the like, which seek to excel. In a third way, it is called most properly the appetite for excelling in a degree of dignity or prelacy, and thus it is one of the capital vices, and it is the first sin of the demon, because he desired the perfection of power over others in the degree of dignity and prelacy.

To that which is objected concerning omission, it is commonly resolved that this is false, [namely] that he was bound to compare [his beauty with the divine altitude], because he could have avoided [sinning] otherwise than by comparing. Furthermore, even if he had compared, it was still not necessary that he not desire it, even after the comparison; and therefore the objection is null.

To the last, it must be said that an election preceded by which he desired that altitude. Furthermore, he did not desire an equality of parity in all things, but in that to which he would have attained if he had stood firm; and therefore there was no infidelity in him. However, some say that judgment is threefold, namely, of reason as it is speculative, of reason as it is about operable things, and of reason as it is giving a verdict about the work to be done by oneself; and he errs only in this last one, not in the first two. And therefore he erred according to how every evil person is ignorant, and not in infidelity.

148. John of Damascus, De fide orthodoxa, lib. 2, cap. 4.

Articulus 3 — What Did The Angel Desire When He Sinned

What did the Angel desire when he sinned?

Thirdly, it is asked: What did he desire? § 1. Now it seems that he desired equality with God through that passage of Isaiah 14:14: I will be like the Most High. [149]

§ 2. Again, through many things which are said in the Letter, that he wished to be like God.

§ 3. Again, Anselm also seems to prove that he wished to be greater than God. For whoever desires not to be subject to God, and to obtain this against God: in that he desires not to be subject, he desires equality; but in that he wishes to obtain it against God, he wishes to be greater than God. The devil desired this; therefore he wished to be greater than God.

BUT AGAINST this are the strong reasons of Anselm, thus:

§ 1. That which cannot be thought cannot be desired. The equality of God cannot be thought; therefore it cannot be desired. The first premise is evident from the fact that nothing is desired unless thought announces it beforehand. The second premise is evident from this, that to him whose quantity exceeds all thought, nothing equal can be thought or feigned.

§ 2. Again, we had above in the Letter from Augustine that he desired that to which he would have attained if he had stood firm. But to equality with God he would never have attained; therefore he never desired equality.

§ 3. Again, Augustine says of Adam that it is not to be believed that a man endowed with a spiritual mind could have been seduced into believing that he would be like God; therefore neither could the Angel, since he was endowed with a much more spiritual mind.

§ 4. Again, although the will can be of impossibilities, yet in a wise person there is no will of impossibilities with a striving to obtain them. But in the Angel there was maximal wisdom, as is said in Ezekiel 28:12: Full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty; and there was in him a striving to obtain what he desired. Therefore, it was not impossible for him. But equality was always impossible for him; therefore he never desired divine equality, as it seems.

FURTHERMORE it is asked: Did he sin by desiring to be like God?

§ 1. It seems not: because 1. This is promised to the elect. 1 John 3:2: We know that when he shall appear, we shall be like to him, because we shall see him as he is. Therefore, if it is promised, it can and ought to be desired. Therefore, this is not a sin; therefore much less was this a sin in the Angel who was higher, and ordained to a higher reward if he had stood firm.

§ 2. Again, to desire to be assimilated to God, this is to be converted to God. To be converted is praised in Scripture concerning the other Angels; therefore it seems that it would also be praiseworthy in this one.

§ 3. Again, the rationale of goodness in every creature is to be assimilated to the first good as much as it can. And a thing desires to be that which it desires, as Boethius says. Therefore, the Angel, by desiring this, desired a good in which he might become good; therefore he ought not to have fallen through this.

§ 4. Again, a conversion to a mutable good is either evil because it is to a mutable good, or because it is a conversion. If in the first way, then God would be the author of evil, because He is the author of the mutable good. If in the second way, then every conversion would be evil, which is false. Therefore, it seems that the Angel did not sin in this.

§ 5. Furthermore, Anselm says that he wished to have beatitude without labor; but in the will for beatitude he did not sin; therefore, if he sinned, this circumstance made it so: without labor. Therefore, his sin was rather in the flight from labor than in the appetite for altitude. But this is the sin of acedia (sloth); therefore acedia, and not pride, was the sin of the Angel, which is contrary to what was proven above, as it seems.

Solution. It seems to me that it must be said with Augustine and Anselm, that he desired that to which he would have attained if he had stood firm. Whence it must be known that, just as Augustine and Boethius prove in the book On the Consolation of Philosophy, all things desire beatitude. And although beatitude is a state made perfect by the aggregation of all goods, nevertheless there are three principles in it, namely perfect power, perfect knowledge, and perfect will. The demon, therefore, desired beatitude with respect to perfect power; but the first man desired beatitude with respect to perfect knowledge. Now this perfection consists in three things, of which one is the substance of that power itself, confirmed and supported, not declining through infirmity. Another is to have that power of oneself, and not from another. The third is not to expect it through merit under another, but to have it without merit, just as a superior has it. And with respect to the first, it is not a sin for a rational creature to desire perfect power. As to the second two, [the sin is] namely that he wishes to have from himself what cannot even be from himself; and that he wishes to snatch at once what is to be expected from merits under the grace of another. For this bespeaks the perversity of the order of the rational creature. Whence according to Anselm, the sin of the demon consists in these two things. Whence, with respect to the first, he desired that to which he would have attained if he had stood firm, but not with respect to the second. Again, with respect to the first, he did not desire a likeness of parity or equality, because he did not desire as much power as God, because he could not think this. But with respect to the two—namely the second and the third—he extolled his own will, and preferred it to the divine will. And with respect to this he wished to snatch it against God; and thus in a certain respect (secundum quid) he wished to be greater than God or equal.

With these points established, it is easy to respond to the objections.

For it MUST BE SAID to those things which are in the Letter, that he desired equality in the mode of having, but not in the very substance of the thing desired.

To the next, it must be said that this proceeds concerning the quantity of the desirable thing, and this is well conceded.

149. Isaiah 14:14.

To the next, it must be said that he would have attained to perfect power, but not to the mode of having it.

To the next, it must be said that he did not desire equality in the quantity of parity, but in the likeness of having.

To the next, it must be said that the striving for the mode of having was caused by the consideration of his own beauty; for it seemed to him that it would be just for this to be granted to him. Whence, Ezekiel 28:17: Your heart was lifted up in your beauty. [150] Others say that ambition believes it can do more than it can.

To the next, it must be said that there is a likeness of imitation which is to be desired with the order and mode of having it from another who is superior, and concerning that the three objections proceed which are posited in order:

and a likeness of equality in the mode of having, and concerning that they do not hold; and this likeness was in the appetite of the demon.

To the next, it must be said that it is evil in neither way, but rather in the mode of conversion: because, namely, he is converted to a private good, as to an end as that which is to be enjoyed. Because then it is an averting conversion, and in this way was the conversion of the Angel to his own beauty.

To the last, it must be said that to have it without the labor of merit was not the rationale for willing or desiring, but rather the rationale was elation from the consideration of his own beauty, so that from this it seemed worthy to him that in this he should be like God. In acedia, however, the flight from labor is the rationale of the sin.

Articulus 4 — Whether To Be Turned Away Is To Have Hatred Or To Envy

Whether to be averted is to hate or to envy?

Then it is asked concerning what he says there, at A, To be averted is to hate or to envy.

For this seems impossible: because § 1. Thus hatred would be the first sin of the Angel, which was disproved above.

§ 2. Furthermore, envy would have been first in the Angel, which cannot be, because hatred is not envy, nor conversely.

§ 3. Again, hatred (as Gregory says) is inveterate anger. Therefore anger would have preceded that sin, and anger would have been the first sin, which seems to be the case in the Apocalypse, where it is said: Woe to the inhabitants of the earth, because the devil has come down to you, having great wrath. [151] But in his heart he carried to the earth the sin which he had conceived in heaven; therefore it seems that anger was first.

§ 4. Again, what is said in the Letter seems false, that he hated God. Because God alone is good through Himself, and is the highest good, and is entirely desirable, as is said in the Canticles. Therefore no rationale for hatred can be in Him; therefore neither can the demon hate Him.

§ 5. Again, nothing seeks to be assimilated to that which it hates. But the demon wished to be assimilated to God; therefore he did not hate Him, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said that hatred is the first thing following aversion, as an effect follows a cause; but it was not the first sin causing the aversion of the demon, but rather pride. For as soon as he was averted, the infernal fire was kindled in him, and from then on he hated the judge justly judging. And through this the solution to the first is evident.

To the next, it must be said that his envy was with respect to man, not God, because he envied man the salvation which he himself had lost. Nor does Augustine intend to say that envy was the first sin through its essence, but through its cause: because wherever the mistress pride precedes, the handmaid envy follows, as is implied in the Letter.

To the next, it must be said that hatred here is called rooted anger, not indeed through custom, because it was new, but rather through confirmation, because he simultaneously fell, and in the fall was confirmed or made obstinate.

To the next, it must be said that he does not hate God as God, or as good, but as judge, whom he perceives in the impedance of his iniquitous will and the infliction of penalty; therefore because these things are continuous. And it is said that the envy is continuous, as Psalm 73:23 says: The pride of those who hate you ascends continually; [152] and John 15:24: They have hated both me and my Father. [153]

To the next, it must be said that he sought to be assimilated to God not through the same mode in which he hated Him, but through another, as was determined above.

Articulus 5 — What In Angels Is Aversion And Conversion, And What Is Confirmation And Obstinacy

What in the Angels is aversion and conversion? And, what is confirmation and obstinacy?

What in the Angels is aversion and conversion? And, what is confirmation and obstinacy?

Then it is asked concerning that which he says there, at C, But if it is asked, whether after creation, etc.

By reason of this there can be a doubt: What is conversion, and what is aversion; or confirmation, and obstinacy?

§ 1. For it is certain that afterwards they had free choice just as before; therefore it seems that they can be deflected into what they wished just as before. Therefore they are not confirmed.

150. Ezekiel 28:17.

§ 2. Again, confirmation sounds involuntary; therefore [it implies] an amission of praise in the work. Therefore it seems that the Angels are not praiseworthy in the fact that they adhere to God.

§ 3. Again, they have a rational power before just as after, and conversely. But every rational power from its nature is toward opposites; since therefore its nature is not taken away from it, it seems that afterwards the indifference to good and to evil remains just as before.

Solution. It must be said to this that just as material potency is toward an act; and because it cannot attain an act which totally satisfies its appetite, therefore by having one act, it is in potency to another. But if it were to attain one totally fulfilling its appetite, as is the case in the sun and the stars, it would no longer be in potency. So it is concerning the rational power in the way [i.e., in via, in this life], that it does not attain any of the desirable things totally fulfilling its appetite and reason, and therefore with respect to opposites it is separable from both. But in the fatherland [i.e., in patria, in heaven] it will be conjoined to the desirable thing whose sweetness it tastes, ceaselessly penetrating it without disgust and without an appetite for another; and because this is infinite, therefore it is never averted from it, nor will it wish to be averted, nor can it. But this is not an inability, but the highest ability; and it is not coercion, but a spontaneous will immobilized in the quiet of its desire from the taste of a good which can never be finished, nor generate disgust, and which calls the whole appetite to itself.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that although free choice is toward opposites, nevertheless it is not for the sake of opposites, but rather so that it might adhere to one; and therefore when it finds that beyond which there is nothing to seek, there will be rest in it.

To the next, it must be said that praise is not lost, because the will remains spontaneous, but immobile, for the reason that the infinite sweetness calls and converts the willing—not coerced—will entirely into itself. And this is the inebriation of which the Psalmist says: They shall be inebriated with the plenty of thy house, etc.

To the next, it must be said that it will always be rational and discerning opposites and many things; but one thing will be preferred to all, which totally possesses the affection; and it cannot do another, not out of coercion, but because it totally occupies the affection, so that nothing is sought besides or outside it.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Evil Angels Always Sin, And Whether Every One Of Their Acts Is Evil

Whether the evil Angels always sin, and whether every act of theirs is evil?

But then it is asked concerning the obstinacy of the evil angels.

For it seems that they always sin, and that every act of theirs is evil.

151. Apocalypse 12:12.

§ 1. Because, on 2 Corinthians 6:15, What concord hath Christ with Belial? the Gloss says: "Just as Christ does all things well, so the devil does all things badly."

§ 2. Again, on 1 John 3:8, From the beginning the devil sinneth, the Gloss says: "Beginning to sin, he continuously sins even unto the end."

§ 3. Again, Augustine says in the book City of God: "The mind of the demons, oppressed and subjugated by the vices of the passions, directs whatever of reason it naturally has to deceive, and does so the more fiercely the greater the cupidity for harming possesses them."

§ 4. Again, on that word of the Apostle to the Romans 14:23: All that is not of faith is sin, the Gloss says that the whole life of infidels is sin. Since therefore the demon is of more ample malice than the infidel, it seems that the demon is so coerced toward evil that he never does anything except evil.

§ 5. Again, Psalm 73:23: The pride of those who hate you ascends continually.

§ 6. Again, Habakkuk 1:17: He ceases not continually to kill. [154] And he speaks concerning the figure of the devil regarding Naboth. Therefore it seems that a good act never proceeds from him.

§ 7. Again, the confirmation of the good and the obstinacy of the evil are related through opposites. But from the good a bad act can never proceed; therefore from the evil a good act can never proceed. Therefore it seems that they are coerced toward evil.

BUT AGAINST this there seems to be: § 1. What is said, James 2:19: The devils believe and tremble. But to believe is good; therefore they are not entirely obstinate in evil.

§ 2. Again, he went out from obsessed bodies at the command of the Lord; and this was good. Therefore he is not entirely confirmed in evil.

§ 3. Again, God is more prone to have mercy than to punish. Therefore, although He confirmed the good Angel in Himself so that he could not will evil, nevertheless He ought not to have permitted it thus that the evil one be made obstinate so that he could not will good at all.

§ 4. If you say that he believes under coercion, and went out of the obsessed bodies under coercion with a murmur. Against this: Augustine says that a man can do other things unwillingly, but he cannot believe unless willing; if therefore the demon believes, he believes willingly; therefore he is not coerced.

§ 5. Again, when he went out of obsessed bodies, at least he consented to the act, and he did this willingly. Therefore he wills something of good.

§ 6. Again, synderesis is totally extinguished in no one; therefore neither in him. But its office is to remurmur [i.e., to cause remorse or protest against evil], and this is good. Therefore there is something of good in him. If you say that it does not remurmur in him. Against this: Because the remurmuring is the penalty of the worm which (as Isaiah says) dies not.

152. Psalm 73:23.

Furthermore, some evil of penalty would thus be taken away from him, which is unfitting; therefore it murmurs in him.

§ 7. Again, his nature is not totally destroyed; therefore neither are the natural operations; and those are something of good. Therefore he is not entirely obstinate in evil.

§ 8. Again, Dionysius says concerning the demons, that they concupisce the good and the optimum, such as to be, to live, and to understand; but this is good. Therefore they are not entirely obstinate in evil.

Furthermore, this seems to be the case from the comparison of the fall of the Angel to the fall of man.

For just as the Angel desired equality in power, so man desired equality in knowledge; therefore one sinned as much as the other. Since therefore man falling was not immediately obstinate, but had room for penance, it seems that the Angel similarly [should have].

BUT AGAINST: § 1. His free choice is not coerced; therefore he can will the good of grace. But whoever efficaciously wills the good as much as is in him: therefore he prepares himself for this, and that suffices. Therefore the demon can return to grace, as Origen said.

§ 2. If you say that man sinned at the persuasion of another, whereas the Angel did not, and therefore man could be redeemed through another, but not the Angel. This seems to be nothing, because to sin through oneself or through another are circumstances not varying the sin according to genus or species. Therefore they do not infinitely aggravate the sin of one over the sin of another. Therefore the Angel ought to have been admitted to penance, although he ought to have sustained a heavier penance than man.

§ 3. If you say that reason in man was clouded by the flesh, and therefore his sin was more excusable, whereas the Angel sinned against a deiform intellect, and therefore it is inexcusable. Against this: Although reason was less clear in man, nevertheless it was not infinitely distant from the intellect of the Angel, for in both was written the natural law. Therefore the fall of one ought not to have been infinitely aggravated over the other, as it seems. But if this be conceded, it is contrary to Apocalypse 12:8, where it is said that they prevailed not, neither was their place found any more in heaven. [155]

§ 4. Again, Damascene says: What death is in men, this the fall is in Angels: because just as men after death, so Angels after the fall are insusceptible to penance.

BUT then it is further asked, whether by the evil acts in which they are obstinate, they demerit continuously?

§ 1. For Isaiah expressly says this, that they sin continuously, and their torments grow continuously.

§ 2. This also seems from the fact that what they do proceeds from an evil root and an evil intention; therefore they sin.

153. John 15:24.

§ 3. Again, if from the fall they had an inability to sin any further, then the fall would seem to sponsor them in something; and this is not true. Therefore it seems that the devil sins continuously.

BUT AGAINST: § 1. If his penalty and sin grow continuously, it seems that his penalty could become infinite, because the increase will have no end.

§ 2. Again, since sin takes away the good of nature, it seems that the whole [of nature] could be taken away, since it is finite, and there is no reason why a subsequent sin would take away less from the natural good than the preceding one.

§ 3. Again, after death a man does not sin, nor does he demerit anymore. Therefore it seems that neither does the devil after the fall.

Solution. It must be said that the act of the devil can be considered in two ways, namely according to its substance, and thus sometimes it can be generically good (de genere bonorum); and according to the circumstance of the agent, and thus it is always evil, as it seems to me, and proceeds from an evil will, and he is obstinate in it. Now diverse people assign the cause of obstinacy in diverse ways. For some say (as was touched upon in objecting) that the cause is: because he sinned through himself and not through another, and against a deiform intellect. Others, however, [say] that because the devil is simple, therefore he totally converts himself to that to which he converts himself; and therefore when he converts himself to evil, he wholly clings to evil; and when he converts himself to good, he wholly adheres to good. But I repute this solution foolish, because although he is simple in the division of essence, nevertheless he is not simple in the quantity of power which is capable of many things; and this is evident in the ministrative, ministered, and assisting power in the good Angels. But others [say], to whom it seems one should rather consent, that free choice was given for the way (ad viam), so that through reason it might see true and false, and true and truer—not that it might rest in both, but in one, namely which is the first truth; and that through the will it might prove good and better, and rest in the optimum. And therefore when it is conjoined to the highest good and first truth, it is so informed that it no longer finds anywhere it might be deflected. And by contrast, when it is deflected all the way to the end of the way, it is inflicted upon it from the order of justice not to be able to recede from the evil to which it is conjoined through election; and this is the cause of obstinacy. And this is taken in Ezekiel 32:26 and following, where it is spoken of the sepulchers of the king of Babylon, and Meshech and Tubal, etc. And it is subjoined that their swords are under their heads, and their iniquities are in their bones. [156] And by the sword is understood the affection of the act of sin by which they fought against God. But by iniquities in the bones is understood the immobile rooting of the habit in the powers of the soul.

AND ACCORDING to this, it must be said to the first, that the Gloss says that the devil did all things badly, but not all evil things; because by doing he sins, but nevertheless from the deed it is not always a cause of sin for him.

154. Habakkuk 1:17.

To the next, it must be said that it is understood with respect to the comparison to the root of the evil will.

To the next, it must be said that he directs the vivacity of his genius against us; but nevertheless he is sometimes restrained so that he elicits a deed which is generically good, although it is not done well.

TO THE NEXT, it must be said that when it is said, The whole life of infidels is sin, this means, in sin, because never is either venial or mortal sin remitted to them without grace. Nevertheless, not every act of theirs is evil in substance, nor indeed do they do all things badly; because often throughout their whole life infidels have some political virtues, and the acts of those are neither evil, nor do they become evil.

To the next, it must be said that pride always ascends in affection, although in effect it is repressed. Through this the solution to the following is evident.

To the next, it must be said that they are contrary-the states of confirmation and obstinacy with respect to affection, and not with respect to work.

TO THAT which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the believing of the demons is like a conclusion and not like a principle; for they are coerced by the very opening of truth, just as a stubborn person is by the violence of a demonstration. And therefore Augustine is not speaking of that [believing], but rather of that which is like the argument of things not appearing, which is treated in the third book of the Sentences.

To the next, it must be said that the departure was good, but the mode of departing was evil, because he went out with indignation and murmuring.

To the next, it must be said that God does not condemn beyond condignity; because it would be condign that He should reduce to nothing him who so proudly opposed Himself. But He inflicts upon him the inability to be able or willing to be averted, from the order of justice rendering for merits.

To the next, it must be said that he does not consent to the act of departing spontaneously, but coerced by the force of superiors.

To the next, it must be said that synderesis remurmurs against three things, namely the good omitted, the evil committed, and the evil of penalty. And in the devil they say it is extinguished with respect to the first two, but not with respect to the third. And this is not of praise, but of vituperation, because this is to remurmur against the order of divine justice. But this seems surprising, because synderesis is the worm whose proper act is to gnaw on account of crime or sin, and to testify that he who committed such things is worthy of penalty; and this remains as a witness to divine justice, and unto the accumulation of damnation. And therefore it seems to me that it remurmurs in the damned even against the evil of the fault committed; but a motion [of will] does not follow because of the affection for the opposite; but that is not his [deliberative] act, but rather the act of nature which is not entirely destroyed in him.

TO THE SAYING of Dionysius, it must be said that he is speaking with respect to nature; and no motion of deliberation follows that concupiscence, but rather indignation and aversion; because he is indignant even with his own being, and with his understood nature, insofar as it lies oppressed under penalties by justice.

To that which is further asked, the solution is evident through what was said before, both concerning the Angel, and why he is obstinate, but not man: because man fell on the way (in via), but not from the way; whereas the Angel [fell] at the terminus of the way, and therefore from the way into obstimacy.

BUT IF it is asked, why one had a longer way than the other? I say that the Angel did not know these things [creatures] so that from them he might learn the Word; but rather from the revealing Word he knew these things, and he was created alongside the Word. But man was placed over the creatures of the world, so that in them he might see the Word, and, passing through all things, might come to adhere to the Word. And therefore it was fitting to posit a longer way for man than for the Angel. However, those reasons are good which the Masters touch upon, as is evident in objecting. Another is also touched upon by the Saints: that divine foreknowledge could not be deceived and frustrated concerning man. But if the first man had not had room for penance, no one of his descendants would ever have been saved, and the human race would have perished in one; and the foreknowledge which had foreseen many to be saved from men would have been frustrated. The Angelic nature, however, is separated, and it could not perish by certain ones perishing. And therefore foreknowledge was saved in the others.

NOW TO THAT which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the demon does not will the good, and (in my judgment) immobly wills the evil. And speaking thus of the power proceeding from habit, he cannot will anything except evil; but from nature he can will the good; but that nature is oppressed by the rooting of the habit, so that it can never break forth into act. And therefore that objection is null.

TO THE NEXT, it must be said that that is not...

principal cause, but a concause: but rather that is the cause which was stated.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that this can well be a single cause: because a deiform intellect and a clouded reason are disproportionately distant, even though both are finite: for it well occurs that two things are finite, and yet have no proportion, such as the diagonal of a square and its side or edge. Another cause is that those things from which they fell are not proportioned, such as the immortality of a spirit and of an animal body, and the paradise of spirits and of bodies: and the contemplation of creatures in the Word, and the contemplation of the Word in creatures: and those things caused their ingratitude to be of a disproportionate quantity.

156. Ezekiel 32:27.

§ 3. To that which is further asked, Whether they continue to demerit?

§ 4. It seems to me that they do not: and to the saying of Isaiah I say that he speaks of accidental punishment and torment, namely that which is the worm of conscience, and to be punished for more things, but not to be punished more sharply and with a more bitter fire.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that this would be true unless the very thing that thus proceeds from a bad will were a torment [supplicium] to him, and therefore it is rather a punishment: and if he has guilt, it is not demeritorious of a greater evil, except accidentally, as it seems to me. However, there are those who agree with what Isaiah says, and thus they prove the objections.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that the fall did not profit them: but rather this is an obstinacy in the perversity of a bad will that is greater than every punishment for them, as Bernard says: "For eternity he will not obtain what he wills: and what he does not will, he will endure in perpetuity."

§ 7. Those who are of another opinion respond to the arguments to the contrary. To the first, saying that their punishment increases until the day of judgment: because until then they can sin by harming others.

§ 8. To the next they say that the sin does not take away in quantity as much as the first: but nevertheless it takes away in proportion, for example, that the first takes away a thousandth part: but the second not as much, but a thousandth part of the remainder: and so then the division will go on into infinity as in a continuum.

§ 9. To the last they say that it is not similar: because a man after death does not harm another as a demon does: because he is not given over to the exercise of temptation: but this solution is easy to disprove: and therefore it is abandoned.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Angels Merited Their Beatitude, And If They Merited, Whether Before Or After Glory Was Received

Whether the Angels merited their beatitude, and if they merited it, whether before or after receiving glory?

§ 10. Next it is asked concerning what he says: "Here it is usually asked, Whether in that very confirmation, etc."

§ 11. For there is a question here: Whether the Angels merited their beatitude? And if they merited it, whether before or after?

§ 12. But it seems that they merited it: because 1. Beatitude is in the character of a reward: therefore it should not be entirely given, but also rendered for merits: therefore they must have had merits for the reception of beatitude. 2. Also, Either it is given to the worthy, or the unworthy. If to the worthy: since no one is worthy unless he has merited, it seems that it is not given except by merit. 3. Also, Anselm says that this was the sin of the devil: that he wanted to have without merit what he would have received through merit if he had stood firm: therefore the others who did not fall received it through merit. 4. Also, It is established that in their conversion they had a movement of free choice informed by grace: because it is held in the Text that they could not be converted without grace: but every movement of free choice informed by grace is meritorious: therefore they had it through merit.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 13. Conversion and confirmation were simultaneous: but after confirmation they do not have merit, nor before conversion, if they were created in natural things, as the Master says: nor was confirmation a merit for them, but glory: therefore they never merited, as it seems.

§ 14. Further it is asked, If they could merit after receiving glory?

It seems that they could: because 1. We often see that a soldier receives his stipends before his military service, and afterwards merits them: therefore it seems that it could similarly be done in the Angel. 2. Also, Otherwise the best and most worthy services they perform around us would be of no value to them if they did not merit by them: therefore it seems that they merit. 3. Also, Charity merits: therefore greater charity avails more for merit: but their charity is maximal: therefore they merit maximally.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. If the lower ones merit, then it seems that the higher ones are dealt with unjustly: because they are not sent, so that their glory would not increase from merit. 2. Also, If they merit: then something of their glory depends on the service of men, which I consider absurd. 3. Also, Suppose that they merit: and let us posit that one of the lower ones merits, and not one of the higher ones: therefore a lower one can merit so much that he ascends to the rank of the higher ones: therefore he can change his orders, which is absurd.

§ 1. SOLUTION. There are three opinions here, of which two are held by almost a few: but the third is more celebrated. And the Master touches on two of these in the Text: the first of which is that they did not merit either after, or before: the other, that they merited after. And neither of these is held much. The third is that by converting themselves to God they merited: and that merit preceded the reward in cause, not in time: and that is also touched upon in the Text. But through the works they perform around us, they merit accidental rewards: such as rejoicing over the progress of their ward, and the like: and that is the common way of almost everyone. But when someone says that the Angels were created in grace, there would be no doubt to them that merit had preceded both in cause and in time: and I think this is true according to the intention of Augustine and Anselm.

§ 2. However, sustaining the common way, we can say to the things asked, by conceding the first four concerning the merit that precedes in cause: and this suffices for the first.

§ 3. But to that which is objected on the contrary, it is clear that it does not hold except concerning precedence in time: and thus merit did not precede: and if it follows, this will be in respect to an accidental reward.

§ 4. To that which is further asked, we can say that it is not similar concerning a human remunerator who needs service, and concerning God: and therefore it does not follow in God: for what He Himself gives, He does not give in hope of service, but freely.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that they are not of no value: but to serve God in this is glory for them, and the gain of an accidental reward.

DISTINCTIO VI

Divisio Textus

§ 1. "Moreover it must be known, since just as of the greater ones," etc. In this distinction those who fell are discussed. And it is divided into five parts: in the first of which those who fell are discussed: in the second, to what they fell, there, B, "And by the merit of such great pride," etc. In the third, concerning the order of prelacy of the demons, there, D, "And just as among the good," etc. In the fourth, it is touched upon where they remain continually, there, E, "But it is usually asked," etc. In the fifth, the power of Lucifer is specifically discussed, there, F, "But of Lucifer," etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether That Angel Who Was The Head Of The Falling Angels Was Of The Order Of The Higher Or Of The Lower

Whether that Angel who was the head of the falling Angels was of the order of the higher ones or the lower ones?

§ 2. But here before the Text three things are asked: the first of which is, Whether he who was the head of the falling ones was from the higher ones or the lower ones? Second, concerning the appetite of the lesser ones consenting to him. Third, concerning the mode of persuasion, whether he persuaded them of his will, and concerning the time.

§ 3. To the first, that he was from the higher ones, many things are introduced in the Text. But it is shown by reasons thus: 1. One of the lesser ones would not have presumed to obtain equality with God: therefore since Lucifer wanted to obtain equality with God, he himself was either of the greatest, or the greatest. 2. Also, He himself said that he wanted to exalt his throne above the stars: but for a lower one it is not to exalt above the stars, unless he first came to the equality of the stars: therefore it seems that he himself was not of the lesser ones.

ON THE CONTRARY to this seem to be reasons and authorities. § 4. 1. For Damascene says: "Of the Angelic powers he who was set over the earthly order and to whom the custody of the earth was committed by God, was not made evil in nature: but existing as good, and made by the Good, and having no path of malice in himself at all from the Creator: not bearing the illumination and honor which the Creator had bestowed on him, was changed by the power of his free will from that state which is according to nature, into that which is contrary to and beyond nature." But it is established that according to the order of the Hierarchy the higher ones are not set over the earthly order: therefore it seems that he himself was of the lower ones. § 5. 2. Also, Augustine touches on this question upon Genesis, saying thus: "Now let this complex suffice: either from the beginning of his creation the devil fell by impious pride from the beatitude which he would have received if he had willed: or that there are other Angels of lower ministry in this world, among whom he had lived according to some non-prescient beatitude of theirs, and from whose society he fell with his Angels subjected to him as an Archangel, through the impiety of pride: but this can by no means be asserted, that is a marvel if it can." From this it is gathered that it is at least doubtful from which order he was who was the head of the falling ones.

§ 6. Solution. It must be said that without a scruple of a question this Lucifer was of the higher ones, or simply superior: and although Augustine, who wanted to assert few things about the orders of Angels, did not determine this yet Gregory expressly asserts this, saying: "Are there not orders of Angels, with which orders indeed that first Angel existed adorned and covered for this reason: because while he was set over all the troops of Angels, he was brighter in comparison to them." Also the Gloss says upon that of Isaiah 14:12: "You who used to rise in the morning": "The Devil created in the beginning of the world, and glorious among the Angels."

§ 7. To the saying of Damascene therefore, it must be said that he presided over the earthly order by the descent of illumination, and not by a consortium of order.

§ 8. To the saying of Augustine it must be said that he does not say this asserting it, but reciting the error, not the opinion, of others.

Articulus 2 — Of What Sort Was The Appetite Of The Lesser Angels Who Fell With Lucifer

What was the appetite of the lesser Angels falling with Lucifer?

§ 9. Secondly, it is asked about the appetite of the lesser ones. 1. For it is established that they were punished with a similar damnation: therefore they sinned with a similar kind of sin: therefore they too wanted to be like God. 2. Also, If Lucifer desired this to which he would have come if he had stood firm: it seems that for the same reason these did too: therefore it seems that each of them wanted to have perfect power of himself, and not under another: therefore it seems that the lower ones did not consent to Lucifer more than he did to them. 3. Also, They were all spirits: therefore they desired some spiritual altitude: but since this was not in the prelacy of the world, it could not be other than that equality with God of which it was had above: therefore it seems that their appetite was the same as his.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 10. They knew well that they could not arrive at equality with Him: since by a striving to obtain that they did not desire that they be equal to God, as it seems.

§ 11. Solution. Our Doctors say in this place that they all wanted something higher than they were created: but this was only to say that the lower ones in the exaltation of the higher ones wanted to obtain this, but he through himself. And they give the example: "Just as some canons promote an unworthy one, so that when he is promoted they themselves are also exalted." And thus both are true: both that they desired altitude, and that they consented to him: and through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 3 — It Is Asked Concerning The Time And Mode Of The Suggestion Of The Other Angels, And Why The Battle Is Attributed To Michael, And Who Are The Leaders By Whom They Were Drawn Away

It is asked concerning the time and mode of the suggestion of the other Angels: and why the battle is attributed to Michael? and, Who are the ropes by which they were drawn down?

§ 12. Thirdly, it is asked about the time and mode of suggestion. 1. For it could not be done in a single moment that the first Angel consented to malice, and persuaded it to others to which he himself consented: and they consented to him, and afterwards all simultaneously strove to obtain it: therefore it seems that for some time he was evil in heaven. 2. Also, This seems, Revelation 12:7, where it is said that "there was a great battle in heaven: Michael and his Angels were fighting with the dragon," etc. But in that battle there was a delay, as it seems. 3. Also, This seems, 2 Peter 2:4, where it is said: "If God did not spare the sinning Angels, but drawn down to hell by ropes," etc.: but a drawing down indicates a delay. 4. Also, Revelation 12:4 it is said that the tail of Lucifer drew a tenth part of the stars, and cast them to the earth: but the drawing of a tail indicates persuasion and consent to malice, all of which import a delay.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. What death is in men, this the fall is in Angels: therefore as soon as he conceived malice, he was deformed, and pressed downwards by the weight of iniquity: but they did not consent in time: therefore it seems that without delay and without persuasion they simultaneously consented with him, and with him were immediately pressed downwards.

§ 2. Further it is asked, Why is this battle attributed to Michael, since he is not read to be of the higher ones, since he has the use of the office of the exterior ones, and in Daniel it is expressly held that he is the prince of the Jews, and from the Saints that he is now the prince of the Church?

§ 3. Further it is asked, Who are the ropes by which they were drawn down into this dark air to be tortured in Tartarus on the day of judgment?

§ 4. Solution. It must be said that there was no other persuasion there except occasional, namely because seeing him to be a most excellent creature, they approached by consent to his desire, so that they might be promoted in him: and therefore occasional persuasion is called his tail by which he drew them: and this was simultaneous with his desire in time, but not in cause, or nature: and by this the solution to the first is clear.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that that battle expounded anagogically says nothing other than the contrariety of the appetites of the good and bad Angels, of the converted and the averted.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that the drawing down by ropes is the condemnation by the holy Angels through the application of the sentence which they received from the Lord concerning the fall.

§ 7. To the next the solution is clear through what was said before.

§ 8. To that which is further asked, Why is the battle attributed to Michael?

It must be said that according to the Text that battle refers to the Church: and thus the Gloss expounds in the same place, and then he who is set over the Church deservedly fights for the Church. But if it is expounded anagogically, then that battle is attributed to Michael for the sake of his name, not his order: because Michael is interpreted "Who is like God," who is rightly said to fight against him who desires to be like God.

§ 9. To the next let the exposition of the Gloss be taken, which says thus: "Ropes are the cords by which sailors suspend sails, so that when the breeze blows they may leave the tranquility of the port, and always entrust themselves to ambiguous gusts: to which ropes the efforts of unclean spirits are fittingly compared, who as soon as they were driven by standing pride, erected themselves against the Creator, and by the very efforts of their elation they were snatched into the depth of the abyss."

Articulus 4 — Whether, Just As Among The Good Some Are Over Others, So Also Among The Evil Some Are Over Others, And Whether There Is Among Them An Order Of Prelation Which Will Cease After The Day Of Judgment

Whether just as among the good some preside over others, so also among the evil some preside over others, and is there an order of prelacy in them which will cease after the day of judgment?

§ 10. Next it is asked concerning this which he says: "And just as among the good Angels some preside over others," etc.

For this does not seem true: because 1. Good has the character of order, but evil the corruption of order: therefore since the Angels fell from good, they seem also to have fallen from the character of order. 2. Also, A grade is usually taken for the dignity of altitude: but they fell from all dignity: therefore from all character of order, as it seems. 3. Also, It seems that they all should have fallen into the grades of one vice only, so that namely they would all preside over one vice, because they all sinned with one sin: therefore they should also have been punished with one punishment: therefore they should have taken grades of damnation in one vice. 4. Moreover, How is this true, what he says in the Text, that "until the day of judgment Angels [preside over] Angels," etc.? For below the Master says that order is not only according to offices, but also according to grades of nature and of grace: but they will not have these grades equal after the day of judgment: therefore it seems that the orders will remain, and will not be destroyed.

§ 1. Solution. It must be said that order is twofold, namely of comparison according to greater or lesser altitude, and that is the order of proper power: and from that they did not fall: because power is always just, even that which is committed to the evil. Another is the order of perfection to an end: and from that the demons entirely fell.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that although they are most unworthy, yet through this they are ordered by God's justice to offices which cannot belong to the good Angels, such as torturing the evil, and exercising the just, and the like.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that although the sin was one in species, yet it also brought with it envy and the affections of other sins, and in these they are permitted to exercise men.

§ 4. To the last it must be said that the offices of mission and exercises will cease, and that one is tortured by another: but the distances of rewards and punishments according to mansions will not cease: and in the first way the Master understands it.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Gloomy Air Is The Proper Place Of Demons

Whether the dark air is the proper place of demons?

Whether the dark air is the proper place of demons?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, E, "But it is usually asked, Whether all in this air," etc.

And two things are asked, of which the first is, Whether this is their proper place, and why it is called heaven? And the second, Whether it is dealt justly or unjustly with souls, that they immediately descend into hell, when demons are permitted to be in the air?

§ 2. To the first one proceeds thus: 1. Boethius says that the common conception of the mind is that spiritual things are not in a place: therefore it seems that they are not detained violently in any place: therefore the demons are not detained violently in this dark air. 2. Also, In whatever place something is detained violently, it is naturally moved away from it: if therefore Angels are detained violently in this air, it seems that they would naturally be moved away from it, which is false. 3. Also, A thing is violently in a place, which is detained in a place contrary to its proper liberty: but demons desire to be in this way: therefore it seems that it is not a violent place for them. 4. Also, They say to the Lord: "Have you come... to torture us before the time?" Also, "We beg you not to command us to go into the abyss": therefore it seems that they dwell here willingly, and in the abyss violently: therefore they are not projected to this place.

§ 3. Moreover it is asked, Why is this place called heaven? For heaven sounds of a place of light and delights: but this air is dark and entirely penal: therefore it seems that it should not be called heaven.

§ 4. Also, It is said in this same distinction that it is not granted to them to dwell around us: therefore it seems that they would dwell more willingly on earth than in the air between heaven and earth: and it seems that it would even be more fitting: because they do not dwell here except for a time in order to tempt men: but they cannot tempt men unless they are with men: therefore they ought to dwell here with us.

§ 5. Also I ask, How far up can they ascend in the air? For the superior part of the air which is near fire is vehemently hot, in which are generated perpendicular fires, and shooting stars, and comets, and the like. And it seems that since the heat of fire properly afflicts demons, that there would be the proper place of their habitation.

§ 6. Moreover, Since fire is hottest in its own sphere, it seems that there the demons ought properly to dwell, because there they would be maximally tortured, and not here in the air with us.

§ 7. Solution. It must be said that there is a place deputed to a thing according to nature, and a place deputed to it according to the congruity of its state. A place according to nature is not due to Angels, neither good nor bad: but a place according to the congruity of state is due to them: and this is twofold, namely according to the state of creation, and thus the place is the empyrean heaven: and according to the congruity of the state of beatitude, or of fault: and thus the place according to beatitude is the presence of the face of God: but according to fault it is twofold, namely according to the merit of the fault, and thus it is hell which is called a mansion, or domicile, and habitation: or according to office, and this is a place in the dark air around us: for because they have foul offices, therefore they inhabit darkness: but because they exercise us, they are not far from us. And through this the solution to almost the whole is clear.

§ 8. For to the first it must be said that it is understood of a place deputed according to nature.

§ 9. To the next it must be said that their desire is from the wicked will of tempting: but yet a just and justified power of tempting is granted.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that they dwell here more willingly: because they consider themselves ruined when the power of harming us is taken away: for the envious one always delights in the punishments of others.

§ 11. To the next it must be said that it is named heaven from three things, namely because it has something of light, of delight, and something of the figure of heaven: it has weak material light, and weaker where demons dwell than here around us, as will soon be clear in the following. Moreover, spiritual light of faith, and charity, and other virtues, and stars, namely the Saints as luminaries shining in this world, and they radiate here, although not in them: because just as in heaven, so also on earth he strives to draw a third part of the stars. For since there are good combatants in the active life both in heaven and on earth, and there are others desiring to be equal to God in the felicity of this world, he draws those men: but of the other two troops, none. For this reason too it is called heaven, because it has the delights of grace in the Saints: but in demons the delights of envy in the subversion of the good, just as it is a solace to the miserable to have companions in their punishments. Also, it has communication with a figure: because namely it contains something of this world, namely earth and water. But the place of hell is crushed and pressed by all the elect: and therefore it does not indicate heaven, but the perpetual oppression of those who are detained there: however, below in the treatise on the works of the six days we will posit a question upon the number of heavens which Strabo posits, in which the aerial heaven is contained, and there the reason will be more clear.

§ 12. To the next it must be said that demons would more willingly dwell here: however, because in His anger God does not forget to show mercy, He did not permit them to dwell here, lest they should harm too bitterly, both by appearing corporally, and by inflicting spiritual harms.

§ 13. To the next it must be said that according to the Philosophers there are three regions of the air, which some call zones, but others interstices: superior, inferior, and middle: and the superior is indeed luminous, and tranquil, and of subtle air, and vehemently hot, for which reason it is also named aestus [heat] by the Philosophers; but it has light, in my judgment, not from fire, but from the vicinity of the stars: and therefore because the shadow of the earth is contracted and diminished there, on account of which the rays of the sun remain in it longer. But this part which is around us touches a solid element, which is the earth, and a polished element of flat surface, which is water: and therefore there is a great reflection of rays here, on account of which a great light is generated here. But the middle between these is vehemently cold, and dark: because it lacks the cause of both illuminations: and therefore it is tempestuous, and there are generated tempests, and snows, and hailstorms: and this is the habitation of demons: for which reason some holy Fathers say that they stir up clouds, and thunders, and the like to the harms and terrors of men: and therefore that place of dark air is deputed to them. But how much that place is distant from the earth has been measured by the Philosophers, but it is not the place here to determine this.

§ 14. To the next it must be said that although heat is there, and also in the fire, yet there is a purity and tranquility there, which are not congruent to a troubled spirit for habitation.

§ 15. Through the same also the solution is clear, why it is not granted to them to dwell in fire since it is hot.

Articulus 6 — Why It Is Not Granted To The Souls Of The Damned To Dwell Here With Us Until The Day Of Judgment, As To Demons

Why it is not granted to the souls of the damned to dwell here with us until the day of judgment, like the demons?

§ 16. Secondly it is asked, Why it is not granted to souls to dwell here with us until the day of judgment, like the demons? And because this is one of the errors of the modern Greeks, namely, that no one descends into hell until the day of judgment, therefore it must be disputed more amply against this.

§ 17. But it seems to make for them, that 1. A man is not more to be condemned than a demon: but it is granted to the demon to dwell here until the day of judgment, although sometimes they descend with the damned, as is said in the Text: therefore this should also be granted to the souls of the damned. 2. Also, God grants to some souls to be purged (as Gregory says) to be purged in the same place in which they offended: therefore it seems that He ought to grant a habitation for a time at least to the damned. 3. Also, Some Platonists posited a second and third generation, and some a simple permansion, before there would be a reversion to a companion star. For the first incorporation was into the body of a man: but if he behaved well in it, and was killed or otherwise died before the time of his period, the soul remained around the place of the sepulcher, and until the completion of the period, and then it was reverted to the companion star. But if a woman behaved badly in the first incorporation, she receives a second generation into the body of a female of the same species: and if in that she again behaved badly, she receives a third generation into the body of a brute congruent to her motions, namely of a swine if luxurious, a dog if irascible, a lion if rapacious, and so of others. But this physical sentence did not entirely have its origin from nothing: but it does not seem to have provided an occasion except the remaining of some souls: therefore it seems that they remain. 4. Also, Aristotle says in On Sleep and Waking, that what is said by men, either in whole or in part is true: for otherwise it would not be probable in definition, since it is said, that is probable which seems so to all, or to the most: but many holy men seeing visions say, and some write, that they saw the damned going in this world, full of fire, and appearing around the places of their sepulchers, and causing restlessness to those delaying there, and speaking with some: therefore it seems that there is some truth in that opinion.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 18. 1. An Angel before he fell was disposed from the grade of nature, so that he would provide a support of illumination to falling man: therefore in him the utility ought not to entirely perish, therefore it was fitting that they remain around us for exercise. § 19. 2. Also, Why would the damned remain? For it is established that immediately they must have in themselves the fire of hell which they merited: but that fire is not more tolerable here than there: therefore it would not profit them, even if they remained here. § 20. 3. Also, Some holy man converted from sins, seeing the places and societies in which he sinned, is indignant with himself, and flees those places and societies: therefore since the damned already know through their punishments that they acted badly in those places, the penance of the places...

§ 1. ...they would be punished more than consoled: therefore it is not fitting for them to remain here. § 2. 4. Also, it is certain that they would not remain for the exercise of temptation, since by nature they are not ordered to this: therefore, since this place is assigned only for the exercise of temptation or for repentance, it would be necessary that they remain for repentance: but they are not susceptible to repentance after death: therefore they would remain uselessly, as it seems. § 3. Solution. It must be said that it seems to me to be heresy [to say] that they remain [permanently]: but that they appear without remaining, this seems to me to be true according to the sayings of the Saints. But that they do not descend into hell as to a place of perpetual habitation, this without doubt is a heresy in which many of the Orientals are, and it is derived from the error of Pythagoras, and from the error of Plato. § 4. Through this, therefore, it must be said to the first, that a greater or lesser condemnation is per se in the quantity of the penalty, and in the place of perpetual horror: but in a place of temporary habitation there is no condemnation except per accidens, because it is not permitted for demons to remain here except per accidens. § 5. To the other it must be said that it is otherwise concerning souls to be purged: because some need very light purgation, as Blessed Gregory says: and they, so that an example of caution may be given to others, are shown in the places in which they offended, and sometimes they are liberated in the same place. But concerning the damned it is not thus: because if they appear, this is for the sake of the caution of the living: but immediately again they pass into hell to penal and horrible places: so that just as they inwardly suffer burning wherever they go, so outwardly they may have a horrid and dark place congruent to their sins. § 6. To that which is objected concerning the Platonists, I say that absolutely and simply it is an error, and not to be believed: but it had its occasion from the idolaters, who called forth the souls of men through the operation of demons as an instrument of their fallacy: so that they might be as it were witnesses to the cult of idols: and thus it would be all the more difficult for them to recede from them: and the Dream of Scipio is founded as it were upon such an error. § 7. To the other it must be said that there is some truth in the apparitions, but none in the habitation until the day of judgment: and this is proved from the rich man clothed in purple: because as soon as he died, he was buried in hell. And from Isaiah, where it is said of the dead Nebuchadnezzar: "Hell from beneath is moved for thee to meet thee at thy coming"; and in Ezekiel, and in many other places.

Articulus 7 — Whether Demons Daily Descend To Hell, Or Are Continually Around Us

Whether demons daily descend to hell, or are continually around us? § 10. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at E, That they daily descend into hell, etc. From this it is also left [to be concluded] that they are not here also around us. § 11. 1. Also, Augustine says this, that sometimes they are mixed in our blood, and cause it to boil in concupiscence; and mixed in flavors to provoke gluttony. § 12. 2. Also, Gregory says that a certain demon was sitting upon a lettuce, and a nun bit into it, and from then on it obsessed her. § 13. 3. Also, in the Gospel, Now many demons went out, and a legion of demons entered into the herd of swine: therefore it is undeniable that demons are frequently with men, and in men.

§ 1. ON THE CONTRARY: § 2. The common opinion of the Saints is that demons carry fire with them wherever they go: and the Gloss says this. Now it is certain that that fire is upon that [text] of James: The tongue... is an unquiet evil, etc. It inflames the wheel of our nativity, being set on fire by the corporeal hell therefore it burns by the necessity of nature, and not according to will: therefore as often as it approaches a combustible thing, it burns it: and since it is infinitely hotter than ours, as the Saints say, it ought to burn to ash all obsessed bodies, and buildings, and clothes, and everything it approaches: and we do not see this happen: therefore it seems that some demons do not carry fire with them: or that fire is not corporeal, or that demons are not here with us, none of which the holy Fathers who handed down the faith to us admit. § 3. Solution. It must be said that demons are here, as the first objections prove, and they have corporeal fire with them, and are themselves kindled by that fire. § 4. But to the 1 which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the fire does not act merely in nature, and as fire: but rather that force is material, and moved merely as an instrument. But the primary mover and director is vindicating justice: and that fire is as an instrument of that justice: and therefore it does not act except upon those things against which justice directs it in condemning for vindication. And then the objection ceases which certain infidels sometimes made against us. § 5. But whether it is possible for a spirit to be tormented by corporeal fire, we will find arguments at the end of the fourth book of the Sentences: persuading of this, the Lord granting, by excluding the arguments of the infidels who do not believe there is a hell.

Articulus 8 — Whether God Acts Justly And Well With Man, Granting Him To Fight Against A Combatant Who Is Stronger Than He

Whether God acts justly and well with man, giving him to fight against a champion who is stronger than him? § 8. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at F, near the end: They think he tempted the first man. For from this it seems God acts unjustly with man, since He gives him to fight against a champion who is stronger than him. But that the demon is stronger than him, is proved: § 9. 1. Job: There is no power upon earth that can be compared to him. § 10. 2. Also, in the judgment of men this would be unjust, that some weak person should be judged to fight with an infinitely stronger one: rather, let there be a proportion between the fighters. § 11. 3. Also, must we hold the opinion that a weak person is tempted by a weaker demon, and a strong person by a stronger one? § 12. Solution. It must be said that I consider it most foolish [to say] that there is a proportion between the forces of the fighting demon and the resisting man: although some have said this. For this whole fight consists in consent: and this will is equally free from coercion in all rational creatures: therefore Bernard says that an enemy who cannot conquer except one who is willing is weak. And therefore in this there is equality and the possibility of resisting: and thus all objections cease.

Articulus 9 — Whether A Demon Defeated By One Of The Saints Can Tempt And Conquer Another, And Whether He Can Tempt The Same One In The Same Sin

Whether a demon conquered by one of the Saints can tempt and conquer another, and whether the same one in the same sin? § 15. Next it is asked concerning what Origen says: I think, he says, surely, that the Saints fighting back, etc. For reason also supports this: because § 16. 1. Otherwise it would not be an equal fight: because if the demons could diminish the number of our soldiers, and we could not diminish their army, it would not be an equal fight: therefore it seems that those conquered by one Saint cannot tempt another at least in the same genus of sin, as the Master says. § 17. 2. Also, he himself says in the Letter that the demon who first conquered Adam was conquered by Christ: and therefore bound and captured: therefore it seems that it is similarly so with other Saints conquering their demons. § 18. 3. Also, we see this in the custom of men, that someone conquering his enemy does not conquer him only so that he may not harm himself, but also so that he may not harm his friends: therefore it seems to be similarly so in spiritual victory: therefore it seems that they lose the power of assailing others when they are perfectly conquered by one, at least in that sin. § 19. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Because according to this, in the last times they ought to have the least power of tempting, their number having been diminished from the beginning of the world by many thousands of Saints: but this is false: because those times will be of graver temptation than there ever were times upon the earth. § 20. 2. Also, after a thousand years Satan will be loosed at the end of the world, and will tempt others again, he who was perfectly conquered by Christ: therefore also other conquered ones can still tempt. § 21. 3. Also, the power of tempting is not given to them to conquer, but the power for exercising the Saints is said to be handed over to them: but a conquered one can provide exercise, just as one not conquered: therefore it seems that there is no reason why the power of tempting should be taken from them. § 22. 4. Also, it is asked concerning the third opinion which is not posited here, which says that one perfectly conquered by one Saint cannot tempt him any more concerning the same sin. For it is asked, What is it to conquer perfectly? For as long as the fight lasts there is no perfect victory: but as long as life lasts, so long does the fight last: therefore it seems that a perfect victory does not happen before death. § 23. If you say that in one actual temptation there is one actual victory: according to this, in one day I can conquer a thousand demons, and thus I can cast many away from me: and this is wonderful if it is true, and at least it can in no way be proved. But if the fight is perfected in death, then there is no question: because then neither in this nor in another, neither he nor another can tempt. § 2. Furthermore it is asked, What are called the thousand years, after which Satan will be loosed? For already one thousand two hundred and forty-six years have elapsed: and he is not yet loosed. § 3. Solution. I confess that I do not know what is true concerning this question: but it must be left to the judgment of God, whether from the victory of the Saints some are suspended from the fight of those sins in which they are conquered, or whether it is otherwise. But this seems to me, that all will fight in the end with all their forces, knowing that they have a short time. But the last opinion does not please me: because it is supported by no reason, or authority, as is evident in the objection to the contrary. § 4. To the last, therefore, it must be said that the thousand years are to be taken here not from quantity, but from the figure of the number: because a cubic number and a square number are the end and root of a perfect number: for perfection is in the end, and the denarius [ten] is the final limit of digital numbers [digits 1-9]: but the centenary number [hundred] is the final limit of the decades of numbers through digital numbers: and the millenary number [thousand] is the final limit of the decades of the number of hundreds numbered through a decade: and therefore it signifies the perfect collection of the number of the Saints, who are squared by political virtue, and rise up in triform perfection by faith, hope, and charity: and then it will be the end of the world when Satan will be loosed.

DISTINCTIO VII

Divisio Textus

§ 5. Division of the Text § 6. Above it was said, that the Angels who persisted, through grace, etc. Here the Master begins to treat of the works of the converted and the averted [angels]. § 7. And it has two parts: therefore there are certain works of the Angels which they work without assuming a body, and concerning these is the first part: but there are certain others which they work assuming a body, and concerning these is the second part, which begins in the following distinction, there at A, It is also customarily asked, etc. § 8. This distinction is divided into two parts: in the first of which the Master treats of the confirmation of free will in the good, and obstinacy in the evil: on the grounds that free will is the cause of works. But in the second he treats specially of the works which both the good and evil Angels do by transmuting things, there at E, And although the evil...

Articulus 1 — Whether The Same Free Choice That Was In The Good And Evil Angels Before Confirmation Is In Them After Confirmation

Whether the same free will that was in the good and bad Angels before confirmation, is in the same ones after confirmation?

Whether the same free will that was in the good and bad Angels before confirmation, is in the same ones after confirmation? § 2. Now a threefold question falls here, namely: Whether the same free will that was in the good and bad before confirmation, is in the same ones after confirmation? Secondly, Whether it is freer in the confirmed, or the unconfirmed good? Thirdly, Whether it is freer in the good than in the evil, or conversely? § 3. For all other questions that could be asked concerning this have been determined in the preceding [distinctions]. § 4. TO THE FIRST one proceeds thus: 1. Immobile and mobile divide being simply and do not belong to the same thing: before confirmation free will is flexible or mobile from the good, and afterwards it is immobile: therefore it is not the same. § 5. 2. Besides, nothing that remains the same in number and species is susceptible to opposite differences: mobile and immobile are opposite differences: therefore they are not of the same free will remaining the same in species and number. § 6. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. The immortality of the first state and the immortality of the second state do not differ through the substance of the potency, although they differ through the habits received: but just as the potency holds itself toward the first and second immortality, so free will holds itself toward this and that liberty: therefore it is the same free will in substance. § 7. 2. Also, liberty from coercion and liberty from misery do not differ through the subject: but before confirmation there was in them liberty from coercion, but afterwards liberty from misery: therefore these do not differ through the substance of the potency, as it seems. § 8. Solution. It must be said that the potency is one and the same, as was proved in all the last [distinctions]. § 9. But it must be said to the first, that mobile and immobile when they are referred to the same principles, then they divide being: but not when they are referred to diverse ones: whence what is mobile by nature can be the same as what is immobile by grace and glory. § 10. To the other it must be said that they are not opposite differences: because they do not proceed from one through the same division: because immutability is from the liberty of grace and glory, but mobility is from the liberty of nature alone: and these are not reduced to one division.

Articulus 2 — Whether Free Choice Is Freer In The Non-Confirmed, As In Us, Than In The Confirmed, Namely The Good Angels

Whether free will is freer in the unconfirmed, as in us, than in the confirmed, for instance the good Angels? § 13. Secondly it is asked, Whether it is freer in the unconfirmed, than in the confirmed? § 14. And it seems that it is so: 1. For by as much as a potency is capable of more things, by so much does it seem to be freer; but a potency which is capable of good and evil is capable of more things than one which is capable of good only: therefore that one seems to be freer: and this is in us: therefore in us free will is freer than in the confirmed Angels. § 15. 2. Also, by as much as a potency in its act or work recedes more from the mode of a natural potency, by so much does it seem to be freer: but a potency which can do good and not do good and the contrary, recedes more than that which can do good only and not what is contrary to the good: therefore since ours is such, and that of the confirmed Angels is only toward the good, it seems to be freer in us than in the other confirmed ones. § 2. But against this is: because 1. By as much as a potency needs fewer things for the expedition of an act, by so much is it freer: but the Angels do not need age, inquiry, and experiment, and art, and doctrine to choose the good: but we need all these things: therefore, etc. § 3. 2. Also, obligation to matter takes away liberty: therefore by as much as a potency is more separated from matter, by so much is it more free: but that which is not united to a body is more separated than that which is united: therefore it is more free: but the free will of the Angels is not united to a body: therefore, etc. § 4. Solution. To this it must be said that the free will of the confirmed Angels is freer than ours: for that free will is complete in liberty which can serve neither from nature nor from the habit of confirmation: but that is freer which is capable of certain things through nature and habit, but falling from the good, can return: and that has the lowest liberty which is not capable of the good except through nature, and through a habit conjoined in evil. § 5. To the first, therefore, it must be said that the plurality of things which it is capable of does not belong to liberty, unless it pertains to power and liberty, and not to impotence and servitude: for he is not called more powerful or freer who can conquer one and can be conquered by another, than he who can conquer only: because to be conquered is to lack power [not to be able]. Thus also to be able to be conquered by sin is extreme impotence and servitude: and it is the same to be able to do evil, and to be able to be conquered by evil, although they differ in their mode of signifying. § 6. To the other it must be said that through the ability to do evil, free will is rather bound to matter and material things, than it recedes from them: because every evil arises from an aversion from the incommutable Good, and a conversion to a commutable good: and therefore that does not indicate a dissimilitude to a potency unbound to matter, but rather posits an approach to it. § 7. And if it is objected concerning this which is said: He who could transgress, etc.; let this be sought as solved in book III of the Sentences, where the free will of Christ is disputed.

Articulus 3 — Whether Free Choice Is Freer In The Good Angels Than In The Evil

Whether free will is freer in the good Angels than in the evil ones? § 10. Thirdly it is asked, Whether it is freer in the good than in the evil? § 11. 1. And it seems that it is so through Anselm, who divides free will into the accepted, and the not accepted: and the accepted into having rectitude, and not having it: and having rectitude, into having it amissibly [losably], and not amissibly: similarly lacking it, either it lacks it recoverably, or irrecoverably. And he says that it is freest in one having the not accepted having rectitude amissibly, and after this in one having the accepted lacking rectitude but recoverably, but in the lowest degree in one having the accepted lacking rectitude irrecoverably. § 12. 2. To the same there also seems to be a reason: because it seems to be so much the freer, by as much as it serves less: but in no way does it serve in the confirmed ones, whereas in those evil ones it serves: because everyone who commits sin is a servant of sin: therefore it is freer in the good than in the evil.

§ 1. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. There is the saying of Bernard, who says that liberty from coercion is not more in God than in a creature, but in God it is more powerful: and not more in the good than in the evil, but in the good it is more ordered: therefore it seems that it is equally present. § 2. 2. Also, liberty from coercion denotes the privation of coercion: but privations do not receive more and less: for one is not more naked than another, nor one more blind than another: therefore since liberty is founded in privation, it seems that it is equal in all to whom it belongs. § 3. Solution. It must be said that it is freer according to the degrees which Anselm posits. § 4. But to that which is objected through the authority of Bernard, it must be said that liberty from coercion is spoken of in two ways, namely according to absolute privation, and thus it is true what Bernard says: or according to that in which the privation is founded. Just as in natures privation is in two ways: for one is founded in matter to which form is absent, and the other which is founded in a contrary form: so it is here: because liberty is founded in a form which is not obligated to matter: and in this it is contrary to a natural form: whence with respect to this form referred to works, it happens to be freer and less free, according to whether that [form] is more and less noble, or more or less expedited to act. § 5. And through this the solution to the following is also manifest.

Articulus 4 — Whether Demons Have A Threefold Knowledge: One From The Subtlety Of Nature, A Second From The Diversity Of Times, A Third From Revelation

Whether demons have a threefold knowledge: one from the subtlety of nature, the second from the diversity of times, the third from revelation?

Whether demons have a threefold knowledge: one from the subtlety of nature, the second from the diversity of times, the third from revelation? § 2. Next it is asked concerning what he says: And although the evil Angels through malice, etc. § 3. For it is asked concerning this threefold knowledge of demons which they have. But it seems that they have none: § 4. 1. For free will is wounded through sin: therefore both reason and will: therefore just as the will is confirmed in evil, so reason ought to be confirmed in the false: and since nothing except the true is known, the knowledge of demons seems to have perished. § 5. 2. Also, evil Angels are called darkness: but darkness is more opposed to the light of the intellect than to the charity of the affection, because darkness is the privation of light: therefore it seems that demons are deprived of the light of reason. § 6. 3. Also, there is no evil will which is not preceded by an evil choice: nor is there an evil choice which is not preceded by an evil judgment: nor an evil judgment which is not preceded by an evil cognition and error: therefore from the first there is no evil will which is not preceded by an evil cognition and error: therefore since demons are universally corrupted in will, they will be universally corrupted in the cognition of the true. § 7. 4. Also, the good is diffusive of being, and not the true: therefore the good adheres more inseparably to created things diffused by the goodness of God, than the true: therefore if demons are universally corrupted toward the good, they will also be universally corrupted toward the true: but this corruption is not except through the removal of cognition: therefore it seems that they have lost all cognition. § 8. 5. Also, Dionysius: The evil of the demon is against the deiform intellect: but that is to know through innate species, as was said before in the question concerning the cognition of Angels: therefore it seems that demons do not know through species of this kind: nor do they even know through sense, because they do not have a sense: therefore they have no cognition. § 9. 6. Also, Dionysius, in the same place: The evil of the demon is irrational fury, mad or demented concupiscence, and wanton fantasy. But fantasy is a power receiving a phantasm made from the motion of sense: therefore it seems that there is no intellectual cognition in a demon. § 10. Also, why is it called wanton fantasy, and irrational fury, and mad concupiscence? § 11. Further it is asked concerning that knowledge which is through the length of experience. For experience is the cognition of sensible things: and the demon does not have this, since he does not use a sense. § 12. 7. Also, revelation from supernal spirits does not happen except through illumination: but demons are not illuminated, since they are addicted to perpetual darkness: therefore it seems that none of these cognitions is fitting for a demon. § 13. Solution. It must be said that Augustine speaks excellently here, and Isidore receiving from Augustine, that demons have a threefold cognition: for either the cognition is natural, and that is through species received in creation, concerning which it was held above that in those things demons do not differ: or through acquired cognition: and this in two ways: either concerning those things which are above reason, and concerning these nothing certifies except revelation: or concerning those things which are contingents concerning the future, of which a sign precedes in nature, as in the motion of heaven, or the disposition of the elements, or the disposition of animate bodies: and concerning these it is through experience and conjecture. § 2. To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that reason does not thus encompass the good just as the will does: and therefore corruption through evil principally corrupts the will, and not reason except according to what is simply considerative of the true and the good: and this is to know what does nothing or little for virtue: but to will and to work does much. § 3. Or let it be said more plainly, that there is speculative reason, and practical reason: speculative reason in an Angel is not corrupted, and this is not a part of free will, but the practical is corrupted, according to what it chooses for itself, and this is a part of free will. Whence Dionysius says: Their natural gifts having been given, we by no means say they are changed: but they are intact, and most splendid. § 4. To the other it must be said that a demon is perfect darkness in the light that induces heat, and of this kind is the cognition approving the good: but in a vain light, which is light without fruit, they are not darkness, but rather they shine, as Dionysius says. § 5. To the other it must be said that there is no will which is not preceded by an evil choice to itself, that is, to the very one who wills evil: because unless choice determines, he himself will not will. But it is not necessary that he does not have the knowledge of choosing the good: because many have the best knowledge of things to be chosen, and act to the contrary, as the Philosopher says. § 6. To the other it must be said that that good which is concreated with the creature, because it is from the Good, is a good in a qualified sense (secundum quid), and not the good of grace: and this the demon has not lost in its entirety: but that does not belong to him, except insofar as he is, and not simply. But the true which is convertible with being is in him insofar as he is: but this is not the true which is the end of the speculative intellect. And therefore the whole objection proceeds through an equivocation: because we are speaking of the corruption of the good of grace and the natural good ordered to grace, and not of the good which is convertible with being: and we are speaking of the true which is the end of the speculative intellect, and not of that which is convertible with being. § 7. To the other it must be said that the intellect can be called deiform in three ways, namely from the intelligible, and from the imitation of grace, and from the similitude of an act: from the intelligible, as when it is of God, and just as a contemplative man can have a deiform intellect: from the imitation of grace, and thus the Saints have a deiform intellect: to have a deiform intellect from the similitude of an act is, in understanding, not to need collation and inquiry, but immediately to see all things of which a knowledge can be had through reason: and in this last way Angels have a deiform intellect, and by so much more, because they have it within themselves, not receiving their intellect from things: and in this last way the evil of the demon is to be against the deiform intellect, that is, against the law [right] of the deiform intellect: because he acts against the judgment of such an intellect: and a soul sinning against the judgment of such an intellect, is a soul sinning against the judgment of a well-disposed reason. § 8. To the other it must be said that, as the Commentator says upon the book De Anima, fantasy among the Greeks is spoken of equivocally, from phantazo, which is I appear, and thus it is sometimes posited for the possible intellect: and from a phantasm, and thus it is the sensible part of the soul. And in the first way it is in the evil Angel, in the second way it is not. § 9. But if it is asked, why is it called wanton fantasy? I say that the intellect of the demon is called fantastic, that is, apparitional from obscure signs: because it is not contiguous with the irradiation of the first light. But it is called wanton [brazen/impudent]:

§ 1. ...because he knowingly attacks the truth, especially what is true according to piety. For he is properly called "impudent" [protervus] who impedes the true process which he knows to be true; while he is "ignorant" [ignorans] who is disposed to the contraries of the principles; but he is "unknowing" [nesciens] from whom knowledge is universally absent. It is called "irrational fury" [furor irrationalis] because fury is of itself irascible, and fury is boiling anger; and this ought not to be according to the order of reason, except against what is harmful to the good and the honorable. But a demon is not angered except at the good and the honorable, at which one must never be angered: and therefore it is called irrational fury. But "mindless concupiscence" [amens concupiscentia] is concupiscence without a mind: because the mind orders concupiscence with respect to the good and the delectable, but of evil as evil there is no concupiscence essentially; and therefore, because evil essentially pleases the demon, it is called a mindless concupiscence.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that he receives experiential knowledge from natural signs, and especially when he wishes to deceive, just as in the motion of the stars certain future things are prognosticated, and in the signs of the clouds; and he predicts these things to deceive, so that he may be believed even in false things. Sometimes also he knows the human mind in exterior or interior signs: interior signs, such as the concourse of spirits and blood; exterior signs, such as a blush, or pallor, and the like: and this not by receiving something from the things, but rather, as we said above, through the forms which they have within themselves, which are determined to this sort of figure or signs.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that illumination does not accompany that revelation: because they happen through simple expression, which anyone can have with anyone, the evil with the good, and conversely; and the inferior with the superior, and conversely.

Articulus 5 — Whether Demons Can Foretell Future Things, And What The Difference Is Between Demons Foretelling Future Things And Prophets, And By What Mode The Demon Inspires His Prophets

Whether demons can predict the future? And, what is the difference between demons predicting the future, and Prophets? And, by what mode does a demon inspire his prophets?

§ 4. Next, it is inquired concerning what he says: Sometimes these same unspeakable spirits, etc. For here falls the question concerning the divinations of demons.

§ 5. For it seems that they can predict the future: because 1. Men by art can know the future for a long time ahead: therefore much more the demons, who have much greater knowledge. But that men can know the future is clear through the Astronomers, who judge concerning the events in a whole life through the constellation of nativity, and concerning the events in a whole year through the science of revolution from the beginning of the year, and concerning the events in twenty years through the science of the cycle in the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn from triplicity into triplicity: therefore much more do demons prevail in this.

§ 6. If you say that they err, and those things are not known through the stars. On the contrary: Augustine in Book V of The City of God says thus: "It could not be altogether absurdly said that certain astral influences have power only over the differences of bodies, just as in the solar approaches and recessions we see even the seasons of the year vary, and in lunar waxings and wanings certain kinds of things are increased or diminished, like oysters, and shells, and the wondrous tides of the Ocean, but that souls and the wills of the soul are not subjected to the positions of the stars."

§ 7. If you say that it is not denied that they have an effect upon bodies: therefore he who foreknows the proportions of their motions over many years, he can predict the future accidents of bodies over many years.

§ 8. If you say that they have no power over our souls and wills, even Ptolemy testifying to this in the Centiloquium, and saying that the wise man dominates the stars: this is not denied; but yet none of the Saints denies this, but that souls drawn by the bodily dispositions of choler, blood, and the rest, are more quickly moved to anger, and the like: therefore from the signs of bodies a conjecture can be had concerning the signs of wills.

§ 9. 2. Also, we find that through the traces of the navel of the firstborn infant certain midwives prognosticate concerning the number of children that woman is going to bear in the whole time of her life unless impeded by accident, and often tell the truth: therefore it seems that demons prevail much more in this.

§ 10. FURTHER it is inquired: Since they themselves predict certain future things, what difference is there between them and the Prophets?

§ 11. It seems that there is none: because a Prophet speaks of future contingents, and the demon likewise: therefore they do not differ.

§ 12. FURTHER it is inquired, by what mode do they inspire their Prophets, just as the evil spirit said: I will deceive Achab... I will go forth, and I will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets .

§ 13. 1. For it is certain that an equal cannot act upon an equal: but our mind is immediately subordinated to God: therefore by nature it is equal to an Angel, as some say: therefore superior to a demon: therefore a demon cannot impress anything upon it.

§ 14. 2. Also, the demon himself is not the creator of any thing, as will be held below: therefore neither of the species which the lying Prophet has in his soul, and in which he sees the future: since therefore so many future things are seen in them, it seems that he could never reveal the future to his Prophets.

§ 15. SOLUTION. That I may speak without prejudice concerning hidden things, I say that demons can know future corporeal things ordained in some way to the course of nature, in three ways: namely, through the course of the stars, and through the dispositions of natural things, and through revelation made to them. But those things which do not have a course reducible into the order of natural causes, I think that they have no foreknowledge of these, just as neither does a man who involves himself in divinations, as Augustine says in Book V of The City of God, and in many other places: and through this I concede the divinations of the stars to that extent, just as Augustine does, and no more.

§ 16. TO THIS which is objected concerning those things which depend on free will, I say that insofar as they depend on free will, they are not known through the stars: but insofar as they are signified in the dispositions of bodies, an uncertain conjecture is had concerning them. Whence Damascene distinguishes, just as Aristotle does in the book On Sleep and Waking, between a cause and a sign: because a cause is that upon which another thing follows: and thus the stars are signs of wars and of voluntary actions, not causes, namely insofar as the wills of men are drawn by the disposition of bodies toward certain mobilities and affections; just as the physician also says that a good complexion signifies good morals, and a bad one bad morals, and just as he says that melancholic people are envious and perfidious, not keeping faith, and the like: and these are signs which frequently fail.

§ 17. To that which is inquired concerning the difference between Prophets and demons predicting the future, it must be said that the demon says those things which he receives from another, or sees in the course of nature: whereas the Prophet says those things which he knows through inspiration.

§ 18. TO THAT which is further inquired, I think it should be said without prejudice, that the demon does not inject species into the soul of his Prophet, but rather from the ones existing there he elicits a new understanding of future things. For it is in a certain way similar regarding species and letters: because just as the same letters diversely combined and ordered make comedies and tragedies, so also the same species diversely ordered express diverse present, past, and future things. For just as the Philosopher says in Book II On Sleep and Waking: "The senses being bound by sleep, the agent intellect is made potent to extract from phantasms certain signs of future things, in which prognostications are received": so it can be said that the application of the natural light by which the intellect of the demon thrives to the light of the intellect of the false Prophet, elicits certain things which show the future, and sometimes true things, and sometimes false, but always with the intention of deceiving: and in this way is the inspiration of the false Prophet.

§ 19. To that however which is objected to the contrary, it can be said that my soul in merit of reward can be equated to an Angel, but not in the mode of perceiving illuminations, just as Alexander said in the book On the Motion of the Heart, that the soul is perceptive of the illuminations which are from the First [Cause] by the ultimate revelation.

§ 20. To the next it must be said that although the demon does not have the light of grace, he nevertheless has a very strong light of nature, and uses it for evil, namely to deceive men through pseudo-prophets.

Articulus 6 — Whether Illusions Can Be Brought About By Demons, And How They Do Them

Whether illusions can be done by demons, and how do they do them?

§ 21. Next it is inquired concerning what he says there, By whose knowledge and power also magical [arts], etc. And four things are inquired here, because the operation of magical art is done in two ways: one in the illusions of those things which appear and are not; the other in the transmutation of certain things according to truth. First it is inquired, How are illusions done by demons? Secondly, How can they transmute bodies? Thirdly, Whether they can induce substantial forms? Fourthly, Whether demons are aided in these by a constellation, or not?

§ 22. To the FIRST one proceeds thus: 1. A certain magical girl seemed to have the appearance of a horse, and being brought to a certain abbot, he said: "This girl is not a horse: but pray that the species by which you are impeded from seeing her form may be taken away from your eyes, and then you will see that she never was a horse": therefore it seems that illusions of this kind are rather in the eyes of the beholders, than in the bodies in which they appear to be.

§ 23. 2. Also, if they were in the bodies in which they appear to be, then with respect to every beholder those bodies would appear in one way: but this is not true: because a holy man sees in one way, and a sinner in another way: therefore the forms of illusions are not in the bodies in which, etc.

§ 24. 3. Also, that form would necessarily be in something as in a subject: therefore either in the same thing in which that to which it is superimposed is, or not. If in the same, then two substantial forms would be in the same thing, namely the form of the illusion, and the natural form, which cannot be. But if in another, this can only be the surrounding air: and this is impossible: because air does not contain form, but rather scatters and diffuses it.

§ 25. 4. Also, since the same air does not always remain around that body in which the form of the illusion appears, that form would not remain, or it would be necessary that it be numerically the same in diverse subjects, which is impossible. But if you say that it is impossible according to nature, but not for a demon: this is absolutely nothing: because a demon is weaker than nature, and it is also contrary to the principles of that art: because this is supposed in it by a certain author speaking to his disciple, and saying: "Know that the nature of impossibility is firm, and what anyone strives for contrary to necessity does not endure."

§ 26. SOLUTION. It must be said without prejudice that those forms are not in the things in which they appear to be, but rather in the eyes and senses of the beholders. How this happens, may be understood through the authorities of three Philosophers, in which we can see it through a likeness.

§ 27. For Aristotle says in the book On Sleep and Waking, showing how simulacra in sleeping seem to be sensed things received not according to the truth of the thing: "Not only while awake are motions made from simulacra, both those which are extrinsically and those which are in the body: but also when this passion occurs which is called sleep, and they appear more then: for during the day they are repelled while the senses and intelligence are operating, and they are exterminated, just as a smaller fire next to a great one, and small sorrows and delights next to great ones: but while they are at rest, even the small simulacra float to the top. But at night because of the vacation of the particular senses and the impotence of acting: because from the exterior things toward that which is done intrinsically there is a reflection of heat, they are referred to the principle of sense, and they become manifest when the disturbance is calmed." And he intends to say, according to the exposition of the commentary, that the motion of heat in sleeping is collected intrinsically in the place of digestion, and from it evaporations are made to the head, which evaporation, being cooled by the brain, descends into the organs of the senses, and weighs them down, by removing the heat, and closes, and immobilizes them: but in flowing from the anterior cell, the sensibles received earlier flow, and internally touch the organs in their principle, that is, in the common sense: and then they seem to be sensed most truly, and the soul is converted to them, just as to things received through the sense.

§ 28. Avicenna says altogether the same thing, and Averroes says the same in the book On Sleep and Waking. We can therefore say that demons in the works of illusions cause some species to flow from within to the organs of the senses, whenever it happens that the sense looks at or is compared to that sensible around which the magician is operating: and thus they delude the eyes and senses, since there is no truth in the thing.

§ 29. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 7 — How And In What Manner Demons Transmute Bodies, Namely Whether With An Assumed Body Or In Another Way

How and in what way do demons transmute bodies, namely whether by an assumed body, or in another way?

§ 30. Secondly it is inquired, How do they transmute bodies? For it seems that they cannot do this without an assumed body: 1. For the Philosopher says in Book XVI of On Animals: "If it does not touch, it does not act, and alteration does not follow": but demons do not touch physically, nor mathematically: therefore they do not act on bodies, nor transmute them.

§ 31. 2. If you say that this argument does not hold even according to the Philosophers: because there are separate substances which act and transmute bodies, according to what Aristotle seems to say, that the work of nature is the work of intelligence. On the contrary: No Philosopher ever conceded this, that there should be any motion in this transmutable matter, which would not be reduced to the motion of another body moved by a spiritual mover: just as the work of art is reduced to the artisan who is moved by the soul, but it is not immediately reduced to the soul; just as also the motion of this generated thing is reduced to the motion of heaven which is moved (as they say) by its spiritual mover, whoever he may be. But if you say that it is simply: because the demon collects seeds, as is said in the text, and by means of them he transmutes. Then I ask, by what mode does he collect them, with what hands, or by what mover, since he does not have a body, and there will be no mode to find it, as it seems.

§ 32. 3. Also, nothing not united to some matter by the union of form or mover, can transmute any matter: a demon is not united to this matter by the union of form, because he is not in it as in a subject: nor by the union of a mover, since between the mover and the mobile there is always a proportion: therefore it seems that he does not move or transmute it.

§ 33. If you say that there is an intrinsic mover, and concerning this it is true what is objected: and there is an extrinsic mover, and concerning this it is false, just as nature is the mover of a ship not united to the ship. On the contrary: A sailor will never move a ship except through those things by which his motion is proportioned to the ship, as by the rudder, and the helm, and the sail, and the like: but there is nothing of such sort between the moving demon and this moved matter: therefore it seems that he does not move it. But if this is conceded, it does not seem how we see that they move clouds together, and mix mixtures, and make transmutations, just as they turned rods into serpents, and the like: therefore it seems that they transmute even without an assumed body.

§ 34. SOLUTION. It must be said that demons according to the words of Augustine transmute bodies, and collect seeds, and the like: how this happens must be understood through a likeness. Certain Philosophers, like Avicenna in Book VI of his Naturalia, and Algazel in his Physics posit fascination, such that the soul of one man through a look or proximity impedes the progress of the works of another man, by a power spiritually going forth from one soul, and operating upon another. But I say this not approving that saying: because I firmly believe that fascination does not harm someone having firm faith in the Lord, nor can magical art harm him, nor does it do any of these things which are feared about such matters: but in this we can see that there are certain operations containing a species insofar as it is this species, which do not belong to any of the principles of that species, and these belong to the species according as it is in this individual and in another individual of the same species, or they do not belong, or according to a lesser degree, just as, for example, that the sapphire cures an anthrax, and the emerald breaks the inclination to coitus, and that the diamond restrains the magnet from attracting iron, and the like. So we can say that spiritual substances insofar as by nature they are superior to corporeal things, a power transmuting and moving bodies follows them: but it is only to say that corporeal things having powers of this kind act by those powers through the necessity of nature present in that to which the power is proportioned, and at another time that power is not active except in potency only: but spirits have this according to the liberty of the will closing or opening the power, according as they are proportioned to the matter into which that power acts.

§ 35. BUT THEN we shall say to those things which are objected first, with one solution, that the Philosopher speaks there about the action which is from active qualities, which are elemental, and not about operations having species. Or it may be said better, that when the Philosopher says: "If it does not touch, it does not act, and alteration does not follow," that it is understood not of the touch of the substance of the agent, but of the touch of the power: for unless it touches the mobile, alteration never follows.

§ 36. But if it is inquired, How does it touch, namely whether it multiplies itself in the medium all the way to the mobile, just as a hot thing moves? Answer. It seems to me, that it does not: but rather from the proportion of the acting spirit to that into which it acts according to a command, a transmuting power is made in the body: but in corporeal things acting through powers which follow their species, I well believe that the power arrives through the medium all the way to the thing into which they act.

§ 37. To the next it must be said that if Philosophers are called necromancers, then certain Philosophers posit that mode which was stated: but a natural philosopher does not posit it, because it cannot be determined through natural principles.

§ 38. To the next it must be said that in such an operation there does not need to be a union through substance, but only according to the proportion of power: and through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 8 — Whether Demons In Transmuted Bodies Can Induce Substantial Forms

Whether demons can induce substantial forms in transmuted bodies?

§ 39. Thirdly it is inquired, Whether demons can induce substantial forms in transmuted bodies? It seems that they cannot: because 1. On that text of Exodus [157], And they also did, namely the sorcerers, as the Gloss of Strabo says, "it must be known that the devil deluded the eyes of the spectators with figments, so that things remaining in their nature, seemed to be something else": therefore it seems that they did not make serpents from rods, but they seemed to: therefore it was an illusion, and not a transmutation.

§ 40. 2. Also, in the same place Augustine says in the beginning of a certain great Gloss, that the rod of Moses swallowed the rods, not the dragons: for it could swallow what was, not that which was not.

§ 41. 3. Also, in the time of the Antichrist there will be a demon of greater power than there was then, or is now: and yet then he will not be able to perform true miracles: therefore neither now true transmutations. But that he will not be able to perform true miracles then, is seen in the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, [158] where it seems to be said, that those miracles will be according to the working of Satan in lying signs and wonders: therefore it seems that they do not truly transmute bodies to certain forms.

§ 42. 4. Also, it is said in the text, that they do not operate except like farmers: but those do not transmute to a form, but aid nature: therefore demons do likewise: therefore it seems that if a transmutation also happens sometimes, nature does it.

§ 43. 5. Also, art does not transmute from a substantial form into a form: because Aristotle says in IV Meteorology: "Let the artisans of alchemy know that species cannot be transmuted": therefore neither demons, because they do not operate except by the mode of art.

§ 44. 6. Also, on that text of the Psalm, He sent immissions through evil Angels, Augustine says: "Those things which are done wondrously in creatures, we do not dare to attribute to evil Angels." Since therefore the wondrous is something arduous and unusual which appears beyond the hope and faculty of the one admiring, it seems that evil Angels do no such thing: and since a sudden transmutation of bodies into certain forms is such a thing, it seems that Angels cannot do this.

§ 45. 7. Also, nothing has the power of transmuting bodies to which the patient itself already is subjected by them: an evil Angel is subjected to the elements, because he suffers from corporeal fire: therefore he does not have the power of transmuting elements to something composed out of the elements.

§ 46. 8. Also, that body which demons transmute to a form, from what agent will it have the form? For every form is from a commensurate [moving agent], as the Philosopher says in Book VII of First Philosophy. But it is evident that a demon is not commensurate in genus or in species with the educed form: therefore it is not from him.

§ 47. If you say that by the same reason substantial forms are also not from God acting and transmuting: this is invalid: because with God is the cognitive and operative exemplar of all things: and this is not with a good or evil Angel: therefore it seems that demons in no way can transmute bodies to any substantial form.

§ 48. BUT AGAINST this is expressly what is said in the text; because 1. They collect seeds and transmute bodies according to the will of God permitting, either to deceive the deceitful, or to prove the elect.

§ 49. 2. Also, Augustine, in the Gloss on that text of Exodus And they also did, namely the sorcerers, etc.: "Although demons are evil, they have not lost their nature: therefore while through incantation the sorcerers try to make something of theirs happen, they run about the world, and suddenly bring the seeds by which this is done, and thus from them, God permitting, they produce new species of things." Here it is expressly said that new species are produced by the power of demons, God permitting: therefore they transmute to a form.

157. Exod. VII, 11.

§ 50. 3. Also, in the text it is said, And the sorcerers also did likewise. But it is not said there, "But the sorcerers seemed to do likewise."

§ 51. 4. Also, Job says: [159] There is no power on earth that can be compared to him: therefore it seems that if the power of art operates upon the transmutations of bodies, like alchemy, that demons much more prevail in doing this.

§ 52. 5. Also, Augustine says that God ordained the world, placing the spiritual substance over the corporeal. But the more powerful and the one placed over another are disposed in the order of mover and transmuter to the inferior: therefore it seems that demons can transmute bodies to new species.

§ 53. 6. Also, it is read in the lives of the Saints and in the legend of Saint Bartholomew, that they seemed to cure those whom they had harmed before, while they ceased from harming. But it seems that this is a small thing for them, according to those things which are said here. For if they can collect seeds for a sudden transmutation of a body into another form in species and genus, as is the transmutation of a rod into a serpent, it seems that much more can they collect seeds to reduce an unequal complexion to equality: therefore it is not unfitting to say that they most truly healed the sick even through nature.

§ 54. 7. Also, it is conceded of the physician that he heals: therefore much more must it be conceded of the one knowing better and operating more subtly: but the demon both knows better and operates more subtly: therefore it seems it must be conceded of him that he most truly cures infirmities.

§ 55. SOLUTION. What is true about this question, I think only God and the Angels who operate these things fully know: nevertheless, insofar as can be had from the doctrines of the Masters and at the same time of the Natural philosophers, then I think that they induce no permanent substantial form, except only that which would also easily be produced from putrefaction.

§ 56. And for understanding this, it must be noted that the transmutation of bodies is in four ways: one of which is of mixable things to the act of a mixture only, in which the mixable things remain according to the truth following their proper species, although they do not remain according to the form of their species, just as composite medicines are mixed, like theriac, and electuaries, and the like: and in such things there are certain powers, which follow the individual things received, and nature, which is sagacious, divides them when they are received. But another is what follows the act of the mixture insofar as it is from all of them, as in theriac to resist poison follows the act of the mixture insofar as it is from all the things which are received in it: but the comforting of the heart, and of the liver, etc., follows the particular things received: just as is also seen in artifacts: because a house has certain things from its parts, certain things from the whole conjoined, like being worth a hundred marks.

§ 57. Another is the transmutation of a body into its components: just as we say fire transmutes bodies, because it has a vehemently active quality.

158. 2 Thess. II, 9.

§ 58. The third is through the stripping away of properties, and the giving of others through liquefaction and feeding [cibatio] and sublimation and distillation, by which alchemists operate: and in this way by a sufficiently known operation bread is made, and ink, and the like. And I think that they do not give substantial forms, just as Avicenna also says in his Alchemy: the sign of which is: because in such operated things properties containing the species are not found: whence alchemical gold does not gladden the heart, and alchemical sapphire does not cool burning heat, nor does it cure the windpipe, and an alchemical carbuncle does not put to flight a vaporable poison in the air. And the experiment of all such things is in this, that alchemical gold is consumed more in the fire than the other, and similarly alchemical stones: and again they do not last as long as the natural ones of that species. And this is so, because they do not have the species, and therefore nature has denied them the powers which are given with the species for the conservation of the species.

§ 59. The fourth transmutation is through nature, and then I think that from God who is the first author of all things, every substantial form is given by a celestial power: and from it also are given the properties conserving those species. But in this transmutation certain things are easily transmutable, such as those of similar bodies, and their generation is easy, like frogs, and serpents: for they are made easily by a little heat of putrefied things even by art aiding nature, just as Avicenna says that from hair, especially of women, placed in a hot humid place under the sun in a fitting place under the earth, serpents are somewhat made, and from orache in the hollow of a putrefied tree, and dripping rain, frogs are made. And Avicenna narrates that even from a light cooking sometimes in one moment, just as in his land a field appeared full of silkworms, and they all made silk, although it was not as good as the other, because they did not have fitting nourishment from mulberry leaves: and from a moderate rain sometimes infinitely small frogs are generated.

§ 60. Therefore in the three genera of works, namely the first, the second, and the third, I believe demons are capable by their power, but not in the first part of the fourth: and if they make animals which would also be made from putrefaction and suddenly, then it is necessary that they be aided in some way by nature, as Augustine says in the text: but into perfect animals I do not believe they can [transmute] in any way.

§ 61. TO THE FIRST therefore and the second it must be said, that Strabo and Augustine (as appears to one inspecting the Glosses) speak in doubt, whether they are truly operations or only illusions: and therefore they say Glosses for either side.

§ 62. To the next it must be said that I well think, that, God permitting, some true miracles not by the power of the demon, but of God, will happen in the times of the Antichrist: but they are also called lying signs fittingly enough: because although they are truly wondrous in themselves, yet they are for inducing into error, or for holding in error those who have merited this.

§ 63. To the next it must be said that this is understood regarding the last part of the fourth mode of transmutation.

159. Job XLI, 24.

§ 64. To the next it must be said that it may well be, that art of itself cannot induce a form, as was said before: but it can aid nature, and thus the demon does.

§ 65. To the next it must be said that it is not to be attributed to demons as operating, but as disposing to this, that they happen in certain works which easily happen even under any power of the heaven with a little putrefying heat.

§ 66. To the next it must be said that demons suffer from fire according to the order of vindicating justice, and not according to the order of nature: but they operate in transmutating according to the order of nature, and not the order of vindicating justice.

§ 67. To the next it must be said that every form which is the species and act of matter, is from some commensurate moving nature, and these are putrefying seeds, and the like.

§ 1. ...drawing forth the radical [moisture] with the natural heat to the surface: and because there it touches the cold air, therefore its viscosity is hardened there and dried into a skin against which the evaporating heat is beaten back, and by its motion it makes a mixture of another complexion, into which, because it is sufficiently disposed, a sensitive soul is infused. But this seems miraculous, that the animal the magician spoke of emerges: and this is from the subtlety of the demons collecting those seeds, which they dispose toward the form of the generation of that animal: nevertheless the form is given by God principally, and by celestial virtue secondarily.

§ 2. To the first five [arguments] which are objected to the contrary, I readily concede regarding such a mode of operation, as has been said.

§ 3. To that which is objected concerning the restitution of health, it must be said that when they harm, then they cure by themselves: but in other things only by the operation of nature, and I readily think they did this for their worshippers, God permitting: but I readily think that if the limbs were mutilated, in which there is no restorative power on the part of nature, they could not restore them.

§ 4. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 9 — Whether Demons In Their Works Are Helped By Constellations Or Not, And Whether The Science Of Images Is Brought About By The Operation Of Demons Or Not

Are demons in their works aided by constellations, or not? and, Is the science of images done by the operation of demons, or not?

§ 5. Fourthly it is asked, Whether demons in their works are aided by constellations, or not?

§ 6. Now it seems that, just as is read in the books of Images, when the moon is in one sign, demons are more easily called than when it is in another: now this cannot be, except because they know they are then aided by the signs and aspects of the planets toward the easier effect of what the necromancer intends, as it seems. That this is true, Aristotle says in the book On the Mansions of the Moon thus: "When selin descends to albethaim, make [images] for the love of the rulers of the earth, cast idols, and call the Angels to you": and it is established that this is not understood of good Angels: therefore evil ones come more easily then than at another time. Selin is the same as the moon. Albethaim is a certain constellation which is in the second mansion of Aries, such that to the first mansion are given thirteen degrees and seven minutes of the image of Aries: therefore it seems that superior bodies aid demons in accomplishing such works.

§ 7. By reason of this it is also asked concerning the science of images, whether it is done by the operation of a demon or of nature?

§ 8. And it seems that by the operation of a demon: because § 9. 1. Such science is prohibited: but it would not be prohibited if it were done by the operation of nature: therefore it is done by the operation of a demon.

§ 10. 2. Also, Such science does not seem to have a reason: because those things that are done through nature are done by the action and passion of primary qualities: but there none of those acts or is acted upon: therefore it seems that such things are done by the operation of demons.

§ 11. BUT AGAINST this is, because § 12. 1. We see nativities vary according to substance and according to consequent operations from constellations, just as Ptolemy says in the Tetrabiblos, that if the sun is in a certain degree and minute of Aries, human generation does not occur: and if seed then falls into the womb, a monster will be born. And so that it may be believed, I proved this by experiment in two upright and good matrons, from whom I perceived that they gave birth to monsters, and asking the time from them and equating the stars, I found that they had conceived according to their estimations when the sun was around that same degree and minute.

§ 13. 2. Also, Avicenna says in his book On Animals, that the cause of monstrous births in dissimilar seeds cannot be the nature of the seed: since dissimilar seeds, like those of a pig and a human, and a human and a dog, and a dog and a pig, do not aid each other, but corrupt. And he says that there is no cause that a birth should have the head of a dog, or a human the foot or head of a pig, except the aspect of a star to the ascendant or the face of the ascendant in the hour of the fall of the seed into the womb: therefore it seems that this is natural: now the science of images differs from that impression only as art and nature: because if nature then effected such an image as is made by art, it would have more easily and better those marvelous things which the aspect of the star imprints, than an image made by art: therefore it seems that there is nothing there of the work of demons, but only the work of art and nature.

§ 14. SOLUTION. It must be said that I do not contradict this, that demons appear more willingly under one aspect than another, and under one constellation than under another: and of this I think there are three principal causes, although perhaps there are many others. One is because, since they do their works imperfectly, those signs or stars would give them greater perfection, so that from this they would seem more powerful, and seduce more easily. Another is, so that they make the magician himself or the Chaldean less horrified of them, since it seems to him that the nature of heaven contributes to the effect of that operation. The third is, because they would want to lead the magician himself to this, that he would believe some divine power is in that sign, and thus through idolatry he would apostatize from the faith. This I think was the reason why some adored the stars, and wrote books of prayers for the invocation of the planets: and through this the solution to the first part of the question is clear.

§ 15. TO THAT which is further asked, it must be said that without doubt, just as is also proven above by the authority of Augustine, the risings and aspects of the stars have a great effect in the works of nature and art: but nevertheless they do not have [an effect] over our free choice, as Damascene says. But the art of images is therefore evil, because it inclines to idolatry through the divine power that is believed to be in the stars: and because images were only invented for vain or evil things, like for seducing women, or for opening locks, or immobilizing ships, or inducing terrors, or such things: and therefore through this the solution to the following part of the question is clear.

Articulus 10 — How The Operations Of Demons Are Distinguished From Those Things That Are True Miracles, And Whether Evils Are Done Through Good Angels Or Through Evil Ones

How are the operations of demons discerned from those that are true miracles? and, Are evil things done by good Angels or by evil ones?

How are the operations of demons discerned from those that are true miracles? and, Are evil things done by good Angels or by evil ones?

§ 16. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, G, Nor is it to be thought that to these transgressors, etc.

§ 17. For from this it seems that they truly form those things, or that such things truly come to be at their operation.

§ 18. If so then it is asked, How will the operations of demons be discerned from those that are miracles according to truth?

§ 19. It seems, that in no way: because if Pharaoh's sorcerers had always done [miracles] throughout all the plagues just as Moses did, there would have been no difference between the works of Moses and the magicians: therefore it seems that they could not be distinguished.

§ 20. Also, If anyone wanted to say that it must be discerned: because demons do harmful things, but good Angels do useful things. Against this is what Augustine says upon that Psalm: He sent... inflictions by evil Angels. It follows that we must say even Sodom was overturned by evil Angels: and this seems to be absurd: because they were received first by Abraham, and afterwards by Lot, as is held.

§ 21. Also, In the Itinerary of Clement Niceta said to Peter: "Just as you operate contrary to nature, so too does Simon whom we have followed: for we see images walk, dogs sing, and other such things:" therefore there is no discernment.

§ 22. BUT AGAINST: 1. Since a miracle is given to infidels so that they may be led to the faith, it seems according to this that it would not be a sin for them if they believed false miracles: and this is false.

§ 23. 2. Also, To the Hebrews: God testifying by signs and portents, and various miracles, etc.: therefore a miracle is a way to the faith: therefore in no way ought it to be permitted that a true miracle be done by a subverter of the faith.

§ 24. But if this is conceded, again it is false: because the Lord says of some doing true miracles, who say to Him: Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy in your name, and cast out demons in your name? And afterwards: Depart from me, you who work iniquity: therefore it is common to the good and the evil to do these miracles.

§ 25. SOLUTION. It seems well to say that doing miracles is common to the good and the evil: but concerning the discernment between the miracles that magicians and demons do, and those that Prophets do by good Angels, it seems to me that it can be said that in three things they are to be considered: of which one is, because the things that demons do are either vain or evil, as is said. But good Angels, even if they sometimes harm certain people, this itself is good, because those whom they harm have deserved this, and this is useful for the good either for the liberation or for the extermination of those who oppressed the good. The second difference is, because although sometimes the work they do seems to be the same in species, nevertheless it is not referred to the same thing: but rather the evil ones even openly refer this to the impediment of the faith, as if the faith ought not to be believed on account of miracles which can also be done by infidels. The third difference is on the part of the doers: because, as is held: The magicians hiss in their incantations: but a Prophet does this by an honest invocation of God. Just as the prophets of Baal wounded themselves with lances and knives and such things.

§ 26. To that which is further asked, Whether good Angels inflict harm on the evil? There is a twofold opinion: because Jerome seems to favor or say that it is the evil ones who do it, but at the command of the good. Whence Moses says to the sons of Israel those things which he had learned from the good Angel: He will not allow the smiter to enter your houses: and according to this the authority of Augustine is understood, that it is not always evil ones who command harms to be done, although those executing the command are always evil. Others say that good Angels through the justice of God sometimes inflict harm on the evil by themselves.

§ 27. TO THAT which is further asked concerning the miracles of the good and the evil, it must be said that simulators and hypocrites do miracles through simulated justice, and God wills this so that others may be edified to the good: but the good through true justice, but the evil, by the very fact that they are evil, cannot harm in this way through miracles. Whence Augustine: "The saints do miracles through public justice, hypocrites through signs of public justice: but magicians through private contracts of an initiated pact with demons."

§ 28. And through this the solution to the whole that is asked about this article is clear.

Articulus 11 — Whether Good Angels Can Work Miracles As Demons Do, And Why Men Cannot Do This

Whether good Angels can do miracles like demons? and, Why can humans not do this?

§ 29. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, K, around the middle: Whence by whatever Angels the neighboring causes from the elements, etc.

§ 30. For from this it seems that the good too can operate these things: and this is seen by another reason: because § 31. 1. There is one order of Angels which are called Virtues, whose [role] is to do miracles: therefore they can do this much more than the evil ones.

§ 32. 2. Also, The good are related to those operations by grace and nature, but the evil by nature only: therefore, etc.

§ 33. 3. Also, Upon that Psalm: He sent... inflictions by Angels, etc., the Gloss says that both the good and the evil can do that.

§ 34. BUT THEN it is asked, Why can good humans not do this, since virtue is stronger than nature?

§ 35. Also, Since grace elevates to God that which is further away, since they could convert rods into serpents, why could they not also conversely convert serpents into rods?

§ 36. SOLUTION. It must be said that good Angels both know how and can do more of these things that are beyond nature than the evil ones, as the first reasons prove: but they cannot do them as those ones do: because those ones do them for the subversion of the faith, and this is impotence.

§ 37. TO THE OTHER it must be said that the grace of humans is not substantially ordained to this, but to that which pertains to salvation: and therefore it can do the latter, and not the former, unless a new gift is given which is not grace making pleasing [gratum faciens], but rather freely given [gratis data].

§ 38. TO THE OTHER it must be said that according to the way of nature, an animal is readily made from wood through putrefying things, but not conversely: because in putrefaction the evaporating heat draws with it the moist, and that is soft, and apt for the body of an animal: but it does not happen conversely, except rarely, as is read of certain animals, that they were converted into stones, and of the wife of Lot into a statue of salt.

§ 39. Others say that the natural order is from the vegetative to the sensitive, and not conversely: and therefore they could do this, and not conversely.

Articulus 12 — Whether It Is Evil To Use Magical And Mathematical Powers, And Whether Mathematical Figures Are Harmful

Whether to use such magical and mathematical virtues is evil? and, Do mathematical figures harm?

§ 40. Next it is asked concerning what is said in the last chapter, there, That also must be known, etc.

§ 41. Whether to use such magical and mathematical virtues is evil and an apostasy from the faith, as some say?

§ 42. For it seems not: because § 43. 1. Not a human, but a demon operates: therefore that operation is not referred to the human.

§ 44. 2. Also, Frequently such things are very useful, namely the finding of lost things, caution from thieves, and the manifestation of robbers: therefore it seems that such things are not evil.

§ 45. It is also asked concerning the figures of the mathematicians, who make no conjurations and no sacrifices nor incantation, but operating only to the aspects of the stars, sometimes predict useful things: therefore in such things there seems to be no apostasy.

§ 46. Also, Did not God confer power on herbs, and words: therefore much more on the stars: therefore in such things there is no evil. BUT AGAINST this are the multiple words of Augustine who says that they do all things by the works of demons.

§ 47. SOLUTION. It must be said that in such things there is an apostasy either of mouth or of work. For if they are done through invocations, conjurations, sacrifices, fumigations, and adorations, then a pact is openly initiated with a demon, and then there is an apostasy of the mouth there. But if it is done only by a simple work, then it is an apostasy of work: because that work is expected from a demon: and to expect something from a demon or to will to perceive something through him, is always a contumely of the faith, and therefore an apostasy.

§ 48. To that which is asked concerning the works of the mathematicians, here it is commonly said according to the words of Augustine, that they are to be avoided especially in images and rings and mirrors and characters, lest the use of idolatry be induced, as was determined above.

DISTINCTIO VIII

Divisio Textus

§ 49. It is also customary to be versed in questioning among the doctors, etc. In this distinction three things are said. First, concerning the bodies of Angels? Second, concerning the apparition of God in an assumed body, there, B, Nor is it to be doubted, etc. And third, concerning this, Whether evil or good Angels can substantially slide into [illabi] the souls of humans, there, F, That also is most worthy of consideration, etc.

§ 50. Now it is easy to subdivide these parts.

Articulus 1 — Whether Demons Or Angels Have Bodies, And Whether It Is To Be Conceded That Angels Are Corporeal In Comparison To God

Whether demons or Angels have bodies? and, Whether it must be conceded that Angels are corporeal in comparison to God?

§ 51. Circa the first part we will ask five things, namely, Whether demons or Angels have bodies? Second, Whether they sometimes assume bodies? Third, What is it to assume? Fourth, from what nature they assume them. Fifth, concerning the acts which they operate in them.

§ 52. TO THE FIRST we proceed thus: For it seems that all Angels have bodies by nature:

§ 53. 1. For Augustine says: "For on account of this also by divine providence to those, whom it is established are more powerful than us, are given certain gifts of more powerful bodies, so that that by which we are preferred to them, might also be commended to us in this way to be cultivated with much greater care than the body, and that we might learn to despise corporal excellence itself, which we knew demons to have, in comparison to the goodness of life, by which we are preferred to them, since we too will have immortality of bodies, not such that the eternity of punishments will torture, but such that purity of souls will precede." From this it is gathered that demons have bodies naturally united to them: therefore by the same reason Angels do.

§ 54. 2. Also, Ibidem: "For just as it could be done that the aerial birds are not only not preferred to us terrestrial ones, but are even subjected to us on account of the dignity of the rational soul, which is in us: so it could be done that demons, although they are more aerial, are not therefore better than us terrestrial ones, because air is superior to earth: but humans are to be preferred to them for this reason, since the hope of pious humans is in no way to be compared to their despair." From this the same is gathered as before.

§ 55. 3. Also, Ibidem: "Apuleius himself calls human a terrestrial animal, who nevertheless is far preferred to aquatic animals, although Plato prefers the waters themselves to the lands: so that we may understand that the same order is not to be held, when dealing with the merits of souls, which seems to be the order in the grades of bodies: but that it can be done, that a better soul inhabits an inferior body, and a more decent [soul] a superior one." From this the same is gathered as before.

§ 56. 4. Also, Ibidem: "Apuleius defining demons, says they are animals in genus, passive in soul, rational in mind, aerial in body, eternal in duration. Now of these five the first three are common to them with us, the fourth is proper, the fifth they have in common with the gods." From this the same is gathered as before.

§ 57. 5. Also, Ibidem: "If demons were virtuous and wise, they would not be worshiped: how much less are aerial animals not worthy of divine honor, rational for this, that they might be miserable: passive for this, that they are miserable: eternal for this, that they cannot end their misery." And because to this many authorities are supplied, therefore let these suffice.

§ 58. 6. By reasons it is objected thus: Gregory says that he preached a rational animal to the Jews as ones using reason: and he understands this of an Angel: but a rational animal is composed of body and soul: therefore Angels have bodies united to them by nature.

§ 59. 7. Also, Bernard says thus: "Since now they fulfill their ministry without a body, especially among those living in a body. Finally it is not [possible] to run about, nor to pass from place to place, except for bodies."

§ 60. 8. Also, Ibidem: "Every spirit except the uncreated needs a body, the animal one so that it may serve, the angelic one so that it may be able to profit [others], the human one so that it may acquire beatitude:" and he says this frequently in the same place, namely in four places.

§ 61. Also, Augustine seems to mean this: therefore it is so.

§ 62. Also, Ibidem the Saints argue that they speak, and eat, and do other bodily acts: therefore they have bodies, as it seems: therefore it is necessary to say this.

§ 63. BUT TO THE CONTRARY is what Dionysius says in his books frequently, that they are divine minds, and spiritual lights, immaterial, and incorporeal. And Damascenus, that existing as intellectuals, they are substances in intellectual places: therefore they do not have bodies.

§ 64. 9. Also, By some it is objected thus, that if two things are composed, of which one is found without the other, it is necessary that the rest also be found by itself: now there is a certain composition of spiritual and corporeal substance, and the corporeal is found without the spiritual: therefore the spiritual also without the corporeal: therefore it is necessary that some spiritual [substance] be by itself without a body.

§ 65. 10. Also, There are grades in spiritual substances, namely vegetative, and sensitive, rational, and intellectual. And the vegetative is found by itself, and the sensitive and vegetative together, and the rational with these two: but the intellectual is the act of no body: therefore intellectual substance ought to be found without a body.

§ 66. BUT THEN it is further asked, Whether it must be conceded that Angels are corporeal in comparison to God, and in themselves spiritual and incorporeal?

§ 67. It seems that they are: because 1. Gregory and Damascene say this expressly.

§ 68. 2. Also, Whatever is contained in a place and demands a place by which it is enclosed, is a body: but an Angel is contained in a place: therefore an Angel is at least respectively a body.

§ 69. 3. Also, Nothing receives the actions of an acting body according to corporeal and material quality, except a body: demons receive the actions of an acting body according to corporeal quality, because [they receive] heat: therefore they have bodies, as it seems.

§ 70. SOLUTION. Among certain Fathers, as are blessed Bernard and others, this was posited among opinable matters, Whether Angels have bodies, or not? Whence Bernard says: "But as for Angelic bodies, whether they are natural to the spirits themselves, just as to humans theirs are, and whether they are animals just as humans, immortal however, which humans are not yet: furthermore whether they change and turn those bodies in whatever form and species they wish when they wish to appear: densifying and solidifying them as much as they wish: although nevertheless in the truth of themselves they are impalpable on account of the subtlety of their nature, and entirely unattainable by our sights: or whether indeed subsisting as simple spiritual substance, they assume bodies when there is need, and again having fulfilled the work lay them aside, to be dissolved into the same matter from which they were assumed; I do not wish that you ask of me. The Fathers seem to have felt diverse things concerning such matters, nor is it clear to me whence I should teach either one, and I confess I do not know. But I also judge that the knowledge of these things does not confer much to our profits." From this it is gathered that in antiquity the Saints opined diverse things concerning these matters: but now the truth has been more discussed, and it has been found that Augustine said these things by hypothesis, and by referring to the opinions of others: and therefore it is in no way to be doubted that Angels are spiritual substances, and have no bodies naturally united to them.

§ 71. To all the first authorities it must be said that there Augustine speaks by hypothesis against the Platonists, that if it were supposed that demons naturally have aerial bodies, they still would not be to be worshiped as gods by humans: because humans are preferred to them by the dignity of the soul: and the more unworthy is not to be worshiped by the more worthy. And anyone diligently considering the circumstances of the letter will find that this is so.

§ 72. To that which is objected concerning Gregory, it must be said that animal is said in two ways, namely properly, and then it is called animal from its nature, and thus Angels are not animals: and from a property sometimes broadly, which property is to live and to have cognition of sensibles, and thus an Angel is called a rational animal: because it agrees with the human in the power of ratiocinating, although not in the mode.

§ 73. To the other it must be said that Angels well run about without a body, but not by commensurating themselves to a place: and in this way Bernard understands in his saying: because by commensurating themselves they are not moved except in an assumed body.

§ 74. To the other it must be said that an Angel in ministry does not universally need a body, but in a certain one according as it acts in the presence of the senses for the solace of those to whom it appears: and concerning this the saying of Bernard ought to be understood, if he says anything. But nevertheless Bernard himself also leaves his saying in doubt: and therefore nothing can be proven by his saying.

§ 75. To the other it must be said that such acts are done with assumed bodies not united to them, concerning which it will be asked below.

§ 76. To the other it must be said that although it was shown above that that argument is not valid: nevertheless I concede it.

§ 77. To that which is further asked, it must be said that Angels neither in themselves nor in comparison to God are bodies: since it is impossible that something be a body in comparison to another, and not a body in itself.

§ 78. To the sayings of Bernard, Gregory, and Damascene, it must be said that they are called corporeal as to a remote agreement with a body, and this is to be circumscribed in place, since God is not terminated in place: but nevertheless they are not circumscribed except definitively, whereas a body is circumscriptively in place.

§ 79. To the other it must be said that I think this is false, that an Angel needs a place for its existence or proper work, although some say this: but in a certain ministry on account of our indigence, it is necessary to assume a body.

§ 80. To the last it must be said that this is entirely absurd, and very alien, that demons need a body, so that they can be tortured by fire: because according to this even our souls stripped of their bodies would need bodies when they go to hell or purgatory.

§ 81. How however does that fire act on a spiritual substance? it must be said that it acts as an instrument of avenging justice, just as was said above, and is proven.

Articulus 2 — Whether Good And Evil Angels Can Assume Bodies, And For What They Need Assumed Bodies, And What Moves Bodies Of This Sort

Whether good and evil Angels can assume bodies? and, For what do they need assumed bodies? and, What moves such bodies?

§ 82. Secondly it is asked, Whether they sometimes assume bodies?

§ 83. Now it seems that it is impossible for them to assume bodies: 1. For it is necessary that between every assumer and assumed there be a proportion: but there is no proportion between an Angel and a body: therefore it is impossible for it to assume a body.

§ 84. 2. Also, Just as a spirit unible to a body by substance is related to the body, so a spirit not unible to a body by substance is related to separation from a body: but a spirit unible to a body by substance is not made except in a made body: therefore another spirit is never except separated from a body: therefore they never assume bodies.

§ 85. 3. Also, What is it that would move the body to clothe the Angel? for this will be either nature, or art. If nature: therefore by nature it would be united to it, which is false. Furthermore, the nature by which a body is moved is hot, and cold, and other such elemental qualities: but none of such moves a body to an Angel. But if you say that art: now every art moving and mutating a body needs an instrument: therefore it seems that it needs an instrument: and what is that? If you say that God forms the body for them, as seems to be said in the text: according to this it is easy to solve: because if God willed, even the spirits themselves would be converted into bodies: but this seems to be fictitious: therefore it seems that the whole was done in certain illusions, what is read about the bodies of demons and blessed Angels.

§ 86. 4. But it also seems that they do not need the assumption of bodies: for good Angels only need them on account of us: if they need them on account of us, but we do not need anything from them except custody, and that they ward off demons, and that they illuminate souls: and they do all these things more nobly without an assumed body than with an assumed [one]: therefore it seems that it is superfluous to assume a body.

§ 87. 5. Furthermore, Since our soul is a spirit, a spirit is more easily applied to it than a body: therefore it would also be useless to assume a body.

§ 88. 6. Similarly, Demons intend principally the subversion of souls; and they achieve this more by spiritual temptations than by corporeal apparitions: because if seen they would be fled if they assumed bodies: therefore it is entirely superfluous to assume a body.

§ 89. BUT TO THE CONTRARY is what Bernard says: [160] "Therefore since without the adminicle of a body neither the bestial spirit can pay the debt of civil condition, nor the spiritual and celestial creature fulfill the ministry of piety, nor the rational soul be sufficient to consult for salvation for its neighbor as well as itself: it is clear that every created spirit, whether to aid, or to be aided and simultaneously aid, is altogether in need of corporeal solace." From this it is gathered that it needs the assumption of a body in the ministry of good, and the exercise of evil: and because concerning this many things are easily found, let these suffice.

§ 90. SOLUTION. Here some searching with scrutiny have erred, saying that Angels can never assume bodies, like some Philosophers of the Jews, but they say that the forms of images obey them: and these things were only in the illusions of images, and not in the truth of assumed bodies: especially on account of the inconveniences which seemed to follow later in this question. But others wishing to evade, feigned that they naturally had bodies united to them. But the Catholic Doctors walk in the middle, saying that they indeed do not have bodies naturally united to them, but they assume them according to the will and ordination of God.

§ 91. AND ACCORDING to this it must be said to the first, that there is no natural proportion of form to matter, or of a natural mover to its movable, between an Angel and an assumed body. But the proportion of the body is attended to the act of the enjoined ministry which it exercises by the ordination of God in the body: and therefore when sent to such an office the adjoined body obeys, whether that body be organic, like the body of the ass, and of the serpent: or animated and formed for this, like those in which the three appeared to Abraham. And through this the solution to the first is clear.

§ 92. To the other it must be said that it is not similar: because the order of a separated spirit is one, and that of a spirit conjoined to a body by nature is another: because a separated created spirit is ordained so that it may operate around a spirit conjoined to a body: and therefore the act of the work sometimes demands the assumption of a body.

§ 93. To the other it must be said that nothing moves that body except the will of the Angel: for just as was held in the preceding distinction, this power follows the nature of the Angel insofar as it is superior to a body, so that the inferior nature obeys it at its nod, and especially in these acts which are according to divine ordination in ministering to or exercising the elect: nevertheless it can well be that mediating elemental seeds they suddenly move and turn into diverse species.

§ 94. To the other it must be said that not in all the ministries or exercises which they do around us do they need a body, but in some they need a body so that they may operate to the sense, and in some the form of an image...

...images of a body so that they operate upon the phantasy, and in certain intelligible species so that they operate upon the intellect. Nevertheless, I readily concede that a demon cannot act immediately upon the intellect, although he can arrange phantasms, and also illuminate in some manner with the light of his own intellect, as will be evident below, in order to deceive the intellect of a human being.

§ 1. To the other argument it must be said that a false premise is supposed, because sometimes a human being is more effectively and perfectly instructed and deceived from sense than from imagination or intelligibles. And this is due to the connaturality of our intellect, which is accustomed to draw all its intelligibles from sense and sensibles, and because the particular sense is not deceived with respect to its proper sensible. The phantasy also, and even the composing intellect, which operates from the phantasm, frequently err.

Articulus 3 — What It Is To Assume A Body, And How Speech Occurs In Angels With An Assumed Body, And How In Us, And How An Animated Body, As A Serpent Or An Ass, Through Imagination And The Senses And The Animal Spirit Was The Cause Of That Voice Which Sounded Through Its Mouth, Or Not

What is it to assume a body? And, how does speech occur in Angels who have assumed a body, and how in us? And, how was an animated body, such as a serpent or a she-ass, the cause of that voice which sounded through its mouth, by means of imagination, the senses, and animal spirit, or was it not?

§ 2. Thirdly, it is asked: What is it to assume a body?

§ 3. 1. If this is the same as to move it, then it seems that Angels assumed Sodom, because they moved it to burning. And this is of little weight.

§ 4. 2. If it is said that to assume a body is to clothe oneself with it, so as to appear to anyone, and to perform some operations appropriate for the time. ON THE CONTRARY: An Angel speaks in that body; but speech does not occur without the conception of those intentions which are expressed through the tongue. Therefore, there must be a way by which they descend from the conceiving intellect to the uttered speech, just as in us the intellect is continuous with the imagination through the union of the intellectual part with the sensible part. And therefore, the intention of the intellect receives bodily images in the organ of imagination, and has that continuity with the common sense, and there receives sensible imaginations; and on the part of the common sense there is a continuity with the tongue through the nerves, from which they flow into expressed speech. However, there is nothing of such a kind between the body of the Angel and the intellect conceiving what it speaks. Therefore, it seems that it is impossible to express by voices that which it intends, but every voice of his will be non-significative.

§ 5. 3. But if you say that the Angel generates intentions of significations in those voices. ON THE CONTRARY: We held in the preceding distinction that they are not creators of any form, but operate like farmers; therefore, they cannot generate those intentions in the sound which they utter.

§ 6. Furthermore, every form is generated by its proper effective principle. Therefore, concerning the form which is the intention of signification in the voice (which the Philosopher calls the power of the voice, and Augustine similarly), the generator will have the proper effective principle. But it is certain that this is not nature, because nature does not use such things. Therefore, it is necessary that the intellect in some way be continuous with the organ or instrument by which that voice is formed; and then the same conclusion returns as was had before.

§ 7. In the same way it is asked: If that body which is animated, such as a serpent or a she-ass, was the cause of that voice which sounded through its mouth, by means of imagination, the senses, and the animal spirit, or not?

§ 8. It seems that it was: because something is done more easily and aptly by a natural mover than by a violent one; but the soul of that animal was the natural mover of the body; therefore, it ought to have been done by it.

§ 9. But on the contrary: The imagination of that animal and its common sense are not apt for the intentions of intelligible sentences to flow into or through them for the formation of a voice. Therefore, since those voices were uttered significatively of sentences conceived by the intellect, it seems that they were not uttered by the mediation of the powers of those animals.

§ 10. FURTHERMORE, it is asked concerning the organs of the senses which appear in such bodies. For it is certain that every diversity which is in a natural body is due to the diversity of powers which is in the soul, as the Commentator says on Book II of De Anima. Therefore, it seems that there is also an eye in the assumed body so that the Angel might see through it, and an ear for hearing, and so on for the others.

§ 11. BUT AGAINST this is: 1. That then the Angel would have cognition of sensibles by receiving something from the sensibles themselves; and this has been disproved above.

§ 12. 2. Furthermore, the visive power of a human being would not see through the eye of an ass, because it has no proportion except to its own connatural organ. However, Angels and demons appear in diverse figures. Therefore, it seems that those members which are seen in them are useless.

§ 13. SOLUTION. Speaking without prejudice concerning hidden things, I say that for an Angel to assume a body is to clothe himself with it for operating and appearing according to the congruity of the office which he then intends to manifest and perform; and I think that the body follows the Angel's command, obeying him.

§ 14. As for what is asked about speech, I say that there is a twofold opinion about the generation of intention in uttered speech. For some say that the very intention which is in the intellect flows out through the imagination and common sense; and I think that this is false, because the intellect does not form species but receives them from things, and therefore if the very same ones flowed out, they would not remain there after teaching. The other opinion is true: that the intellect, mediating through the powers of the sensible soul, striking and shaping voices in the drawn-in spirit, generates something similar to them in sounds, just as art generates in matter a species similar to itself; and I think that this is true. But Angels can easily do this, yet with the sole difference that the Angel generates them through a body not united to himself, whereas the intellect does so through a united one.

§ 15. To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that there is no continuous pathway there, neither in an animated body like a serpent, nor even in an inanimate one; yet it does not follow that Angels create them, but they furnish aid so that they are drawn out from their proper matter, just as they also do in the transmutation of bodies, as was said above. But this is nothing other than the formation of figures in sound, because when that is had, the sign of the intellect is had.

§ 16. To the other, it must be said that, as I think, the tongues of those animals were moved immediately by the Angel, and not by their own soul; and therefore they were not rational, nor did they imagine such voices when they were uttered.

§ 17. To the other, it must be said that, as I think, the Angel is present in his totality in that body, and is not distinguished according to powers corresponding to the likenesses of the organs which appear in those bodies. Hence, I do not see that I can sustain that he hears through the ear and sees through the eye, and so on for the others; yet they are not useless, because they serve to render intelligible the ministry of obedience or the malice which they exercise around us, and for this reason they also appear in diverse forms.

Articulus 4 — Whence Angels Assume Bodies, Whether From The Elements Or From The Nature Of The Heaven, And Whether They Form Bodies Gradually Or Suddenly

From where do Angels assume bodies, whether from the elements or the nature of heaven? And, do they form bodies gradually or suddenly?

§ 18. Fourthly, it is asked from what body they assume them, whether from the body of heaven or from the elements?

§ 19. 1. If it were granted that it is from heaven, then a part of heaven would have to be torn away from another part; therefore, it would be divisible and corruptible, which is disproved by the Philosopher at the end of Book I of De Caelo et Mundo.

§ 20. 2. Furthermore, a body which, through its motion, is according to nature the cause of all generation and corruption, cannot be understood to be generable and corruptible. However, such is any body, whatever it may be; because the body approaching and receding obliquely and directly must cause the divided transmutation which appears. Therefore, if this body is not heaven, you will have to seek another; and if you do not find it, you will grant that one: therefore, it is impossible for it to be divided; therefore, they do not assume bodies from there.

§ 21. 3. Also, that body by its nature cannot have any motion except circular in some way; therefore, Angels would never come to us in it, but would always revolve around the center of the earth.

§ 22. 4. Also, that body is not receptive to any figure except a circular one, as is proved in Book II of De Caelo et Mundo. But Angels appear in the figure of men and lions and many others, as Dionysius says; therefore, they do not take bodies from heaven.

§ 23. But if you say (as is hinted in the Text) that good Angels take a body from the upper air, and evil ones from the lower. To this follows a manifold absurdity. The first of these is that air is hot and moist, but mostly moist; therefore, it is least capable of being bounded by its own boundary, but always flows into other things. Therefore, wherever it is moved, it will be continuous with the air to which it is thrown; therefore, the body of the Angel does not remain distinct from the whole air when it is moved in it. Second, since the moist is primarily non-bodily—such as air—it is in no way retentive of figures; it follows that the body of the Angel would be of no figure, except accidentally, if it were poured into a vessel and had the figures of the vessel as long as it is in the vessel; and it is ridiculous to say this of Angels. Third, because since they often move from us into heaven, those bodies would be burned in the fire, and those of demons in hell. Fourth, because since every body is divisible, those bodies would be cut, so that part would fall from part, which many have tried to do to demons and could not. To object via authorities here is superfluous, because infinitely many are available.

§ 24. SOLUTION. Without prejudice I say that they form bodies from air; but they have the power, through natural seeds, of thickening and mixing air: because just as air is naturally condensed by contracting cold into water, and water into earth; and by rarefying heat earth and water into air. Hence I say that an Angel can do suddenly what nature does gradually. And I readily concede that they do not hold figures unless they are mixed to a thickness; and again they are suddenly turned into invisible subtlety by the application of other seminal causes. And therefore, if they are cut, they are almost instantly made continuous again, and not with another body; because they are bounded by seminal causes that mix and thicken them; and I understand this is what the Text means to say when it says that they change and turn them as they wish.

§ 25. And through this the solution to the whole is clear, because I well think that it was foolish to say that those bodies were of the nature of heaven.

Articulus 5 — Inquiry Is Made Concerning The Acts Of Angels: Whether The Good Can Eat, And The Evil Generate, And Whence The Evil Have The Seed Of Their Generation

It is asked concerning the acts of Angels: Can the good ones eat, and the evil ones generate? And, whence do the evil ones have the seed of their generation?

§ 26. Fifthly, it is asked about the acts which they perform in those bodies, and especially about two, namely using nourishment, which the good Angels have often done, and generating, which the evil ones are said to do.

§ 27. Now, they seemed to truly eat: because 1. The patriarch Abraham, who was spiritual and it is probable that he had discernment, offered them food, and they ate; therefore, it seems that they truly ate.

§ 28. 2. Also, it does not befit Angels, who are messengers of truth, to delude men with fantastic prestidigitations; therefore, it seems that Angels showed nothing in themselves which they did not do according to truth.

§ 29. 3. Also, although they are immortal and have no need, it does not follow from this that they did not truly eat: because even the Lord rose again in an immortal and impassible body, and yet he truly ate and drank, as is read in the Gospel.

§ 30. 4. Also, they truly spoke; and there is no greater reason why they should truly perform one bodily act rather than another; therefore, they also truly ate.

§ 31. But if this is granted, then it follows that they truly digested food, and truly incorporated something into themselves; and since this is done for the restoration of what is lost, it will be necessary that something in those bodies would be lost by natural heat; these are absurdities, besides other unclean things that would follow from this.

§ 32. From the opposite side it is also asked concerning evil Angels, whether they generate?

§ 33. It seems that they do: because we read most truly of incubi and succubi demons; and we have seen persons known by them, and places in which a man can scarcely ever sleep through the night without a succubus demon coming to him.

§ 34. Also, the public rumor concerning Merlin, the son of an incubus, testifies to this, as it seems.

§ 35. But then it is asked, whence comes the seed? For either it is cut off from the same body, or a foreign one is brought in. If from the same, this cannot be, because this is not human.

§ 36. Furthermore, although seed is cut off from the whole body, nevertheless for its greatest part it is cut off both from the brain, and the liver, and the heart, and especially from the brain; and such interior members are not in those assumed bodies, because they would be superfluous.

§ 37. Furthermore, according to the judgment of Aristotle, spirit indeed retained in the viscosity of the seed, having in itself a threefold power from the heat of the element and of heaven and of the soul, performs the work of an informative power. Moreover, physicians say that a threefold spirit is retained in the viscosity of the seed, namely animal, natural, and vital; and that this spirit does the whole thing; and whence does that spirit come into the body assumed by a demon?

§ 38. If you say that he assumes the body of a dead man when he wishes to perform such acts, and cuts off such a thing from it by making it himself through motion, and seeds of heat drawn in the elements. Against this is that it is dead; and if the whole were to melt, it would not make seed apt for generation.

§ 39. Also, it does not have the principle to which that act belongs, namely the vegetative soul. How then is it posited to generate?

§ 40. But if you say (as Augustine seems to say) that he takes seed from the polluted and transfuses it, or makes himself a succubus to one, and an incubus to another, and thus transfuses it. This does not seem to be the case: because the Authors teach that even on account of the length of the genitals or unsuitability, the seed evaporates in emission, and the spirit exhales from it, so that it is not apt for generation; therefore, it will exhale much more when transported from place to place.

§ 41. Also, if such a kind of demons intends generation primarily, then he could place the received seed into the womb of a woman without coitus. Why therefore does he coit with them, especially since the delay of coitus contributes to the exhalation of the seed? If you say that the seed of the woman is also required for generation, and therefore he coits in order to cut this off. On the contrary: According to Avicenna, this can be cut off through the motion of the womb; therefore, since he can move the womb, it seems that coitus is superfluous.

§ 42. If you say that seed is not necessary for conception, because Isidore says that mares in an island of Portugal conceive from the wind. This is nothing: because he does not say that women can do this from the wind; and we are speaking of the conception of a woman by demons. Furthermore, Isidore says many things in that book on Animals which are not well proven.

§ 43. SOLUTION. It must be said, without prejudice, that Angels do not truly eat. For there is a twofold eating, according to Augustine in Book XXII of The City of God, namely of need, and of power. That of need is the one we use, when food is incorporated into us to restore what is lost. But that of power is the one by which a natural power for eating is proven to be present, but not a need; and thus the Lord ate after the resurrection; but nevertheless the food was reduced into pre-existing matter, just as rainwater by the sun, and combustible things by fire.

§ 44. But I cannot well posit either of these in an Angel: because to posit in some substance the natural power of some work which was never in it, and which if it were present would be contrary to its nature, is empty and vain to posit in the works of God and of nature; but thus the Angel stands with respect to eating. And this is what Raphael said, Tob. 12:19: "I seemed indeed to eat and to drink with you: but I use an invisible meat and drink, which cannot be seen by men."

§ 45. TO THAT which is objected concerning Abraham, I say that he indeed recognized the ministry of the Trinity to be figured in them, but he did not recognize them to be Angels until after the meal; and this is not incongruous, nor does it show lesser sanctity.

§ 46. To the other it must be said that Angels did such things by referring them to something spiritual and moral, just as the Lord feigned that he would go farther; and according to the relation to that, it was not a prestidigitation, but truth.

§ 47. TO THE OTHER question concerning generation, I do not know what to say according to truth; but this seems more probable, that they are succubi to one and incubi to another; nevertheless, I understood most truly recently from someone who is still living, that while he was subjugated by the vice of effeminacy, at a certain time countless cats appeared around him when he was polluted, licking up and carrying away the seed with the greatest wailing and noise.

§ 48. TO THIS however which is objected concerning the evaporation of the seed, it can be said that they surround it with similar seeds of natural heat, and thus keep it warm and retain it, just as it is sometimes reserved for a time after emission in the seminal vessels, so that it does not perish.

§ 49. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text Exposition of the Text.

§ 50. Then it is asked concerning the second part of this reading, there, B, And it is not to be doubted, etc.

§ 51. But this whole reading is found disputed to the best of my ability in the first book, in the tractate on the visible mission of the Holy Spirit. And as for the last chapter D, it is disputed in the first part of the third distinction of the first book of the Sentences; and therefore we must pass to the last part of the distinction, there, E, That also seems most worthy of consideration, etc.

Articulus 6 — Whether Demons Substantially, And Also Good Angels, Enter Into The Bodies Of Men

Whether demons, and also good Angels, substantially enter the bodies of human beings?

§ 52. That also seems most worthy of consideration, etc. We ask five things here: the first of which is, Whether demons and also good Angels substantially enter the bodies of human beings? Second, Whether they can substantially glide into minds and souls? Third, What is it to immission (send in) and to enkindle? Fourth, concerning the modes of immission and enkindling? Fifth, To which part of the soul can they send in, and to which not?

§ 53. To the first of these the procedure is easy, thus: 1. Nothing is cast out of a body unless it is in it; a demon is cast out of a body; therefore he is in it. But that he is cast out, the Gospel and the miracles of the Saints prove.

§ 54. 2. Also, many are read to be possessed by demons; but to be possessed is for the pathways of the animal powers to be impeded lest they reach to the act of human discernment; since therefore these pathways are inside and not outside, and an Angel is where he operates, a demon must operate interiorly; therefore he must be present interiorly; therefore they are inside.

§ 55. 3. Also, Augustine says: They persuade in wondrous and invisible ways, and through that subtlety of their bodies they penetrate the non-sensing bodies of human beings without an assumed body.

§ 56. 4. If you say that he applies himself to the body from the outside, and presides interiorly through energy and operation. I ask what this means? For we see that however inordinately they behave in sense, discernment is not thereby perverted interiorly, unless those things reach it through some operation. Now energy (energia) is spoken of in two ways, namely from en, which is "in," and ergon, which is "labor," as it were interior labor; and from en, which is "in," and ergon, and ge, which is "earth," as it were laboring interiorly from an earthly complexion, namely the foolishness of melancholy. And in either way energy will not make one labor interiorly with foolishness, unless by operating some disturbance interiorly: and if this is the demon by himself, it is necessary that he be present interiorly.

§ 57. 5. Also, the body does not resist him; why therefore will he not reach interiorly?

§ 58. 6. Also, Augustine says that he mixes himself into the blood and makes it boil into anger or foam into lust; therefore it seems that he is present interiorly.

§ 59. 7. Also, it is read in the Gospel that he tore some people when exiting; therefore he must be interiorly.

§ 60. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Upon that text, The Lord is in his holy temple, the Gloss says: "An unclean spirit can preside over idols from the outside, he cannot be on the inside"; therefore much less can he be inside in a body.

§ 61. 2. Also, the soul is in the body totally in the whole; therefore since the demon is also in the body in some part, he will be with the whole soul; therefore two spirits will be in that part in one spiritual place.

§ 62. 3. Also, in the Text there is that which the Gloss on Acts 5:3 says, that Satan fills, not indeed by entering, etc.

§ 63. 4. Also, What is your name? And he says to him: My name is Legion, for we are many. And since a legion is six thousand and sixty-six, how could they be in so small a body?

§ 64. 5. Also, why did they want to be uselessly occupied there, when one could vex beyond the victim's strength?

§ 65. SOLUTION. I have no doubt that many human beings have had and do have a demon in their body interiorly; and many are also aided by good spirits existing interiorly for many good contemplations and actions. And therefore I concede the first part of the objections.

§ 66. As to that which is first objected to the contrary, I say that the Gloss is understood to mean that he is not exteriorly like an essential part which makes one natural composite with the whole idol; but interiorly with respect to place he can well be.

§ 67. TO THE OTHER it must be said that the soul is not in the body as in a place, as was shown in the first book of the Sentences. And therefore it does not exclude another spirit from the same place, provided that that place is corporeal.

§ 68. TO THIS which is objected from the Text, I say that he does all those things inside; but Bede understands that by doing these things he does not enter into the soul, nor into the body, nor into the will substantially.

§ 69. To the other it must be said that this question is foolish; because all spirits are of no quantity, and they do not constrain themselves more in a small place than in a large place.

§ 70. To the other I think it must be said that this was done so that the power of demons over human nature as a result of sin might appear; and consequently they might acknowledge the grace of the one benignly and powerfully liberating.

Articulus 7 — Whether Demons Substantially Glide Into The Minds And Senses Of Men, So That They Substantially Enter Into The Substance Of The Powers Of The Soul

Whether demons substantially glide into the minds and senses of human beings, so that they substantially enter the substance of the powers of the soul?

§ 71. Secondly it is asked, Whether they substantially glide into the minds and senses of human beings, so that they substantially enter the substance of the powers of the soul, which are the senses, imagination, phantasy, intellect, will, and the like?

§ 72. It seems that they do: because 1. The Philosopher says that if an impartible touches an impartible, it touches it entirely; therefore if an impartible is joined to an impartible, the whole will be joined to the whole; therefore interiorly and exteriorly; therefore it is necessary that it glide in.

§ 73. 2. Also, Luke 4:33, on that text, There was a man having an unclean demon, the Gloss says: "The demon had entered whence the Lord had departed"; therefore it seems that since the Lord had departed from the substance of the soul, that the demon entered into the substance of the soul.

§ 74. 3. Also, some argue by a similitude from the body: because among bodies the more noble penetrates the less noble; just as they say heaven penetrates all other bodies, and they say fire is in iron; similarly light, since it is a body (as they say), is in the same place with another, and penetrates it; therefore it is thus in the order of spirits. Since therefore demons and good Angels are by nature of a subtler essence than souls, it seems that they substantially penetrate them.

§ 75. BUT AGAINST this is: 1. In the Text and in many places of testimonies, it seems that only God the Trinity glides in.

§ 76. 2. Also, if it were to glide in, then essence would be colimited with essence; therefore both would be terminated by one spiritual terminus; but those of which one is the numerical terminus are one terminated thing; therefore those two spirits would be numerically one spirit, which is impossible.

§ 77. SOLUTION. It is foolish to say that either good or evil Angels glide substantially into minds.

§ 78. To the first therefore it must be said that this is true in an indivisible which has no potency for divisibility; but concerning an indivisible which has virtual quantity, it does not hold: because that is divided by the quantity of powers that are distant in potentiality, which cannot be in others.

§ 79. To the other it must be said that that Gloss speaks of entry through the effect of malice and not through substance.

§ 80. To the other it must be said that those things are most false, nor did any Philosopher whose sayings are approved ever hold that heaven is in the same place with any body and penetrating it, and that light is a body, and that fire is corporally in iron. But they are fictions of men erring in natural science, and absurd among Philosophers; and they are not Philosophers who prove this by demonstrative reasons.

Articulus 8 — What It Is To Insert And To Inflame, Namely Whether Both Good And Evil Angels Insert Their Concepts Into The Hearts Of Men And Inflame The Kindlings Of Vices In Ministering

What is it to send in (immittere) and to enkindle (incendere)? That is, whether both good and evil Angels send their concepts into the hearts of human beings, and enkindle by administering the fomentations of vices?

§ 81. Thirdly it is asked, What is it to send in and to enkindle?

§ 82. For it seems that both good and evil Angels send their concepts into the hearts of human beings. Hence, 1. In Psalm 77:49: He sent... immissions through evil Angels. And of the good: The Angel of the Lord will send in, etc.

§ 83. 2. Also, John 13:2: When the devil had now put into the heart that he should betray him, etc.

§ 84. 3. Also, Damascene: "They cannot inflict violence on anyone; for it is in our power to receive their immissions."

§ 85. 4. Also, Gregory in the Gloss upon that text of Job 19:12, His robbers came together, and made a way for themselves through me, etc.: "Malignant spirits who make a way for themselves in the hearts of the afflicted, sometimes among the diverse things which they endure exteriorly, do not cease to send in their thoughts." From these and many others it is evident that both good and evil Angels send in.

§ 86. But against this is what is said in the Text. And the same in the Gloss, Matt. 15:11, upon that text, Not that which enters into the mouth, etc.

§ 87. In the same way it is proven from the Text that they enkindle by administering the fomentations of vices.

§ 88. And for the sake of this the question is: What is it to send in, and what is it to enkindle?

§ 89. SOLUTION. Without prejudice I say that "to send in" is spoken of in two ways, namely to put inside, or to first make exteriorly and afterwards inject. I say therefore that the forms which are inside—not made by the demon, but received from sensibles, or impressed by God—the devil and a good Angel adhering interiorly can send, by ordering them to diverse compositions and divisions, in which the soul may read, and consequently be moved to its will; and in this way the cited authorities understand "to send in." Also, to send in is to make exteriorly and afterwards inject. And in this way he does not send in: because he himself cannot make new species by creating, and this is certain; but if he were to make them by abstracting, they would not be proportionate to the powers of the soul, even granting that he could do this; but nevertheless it was shown above in the question on the natural abilities of Angels that an Angel cannot do this, namely abstract species. And in this way Bede understands it. Through this the solution to the query is clear.

§ 90. As for "to enkindle," I think that it is in two ways. In one way by the very ordering of species, so that they express thoughts of concupiscence or anger. And in another way by drawing the heat of the complexion to this, and by protending the corporeal spirits, so that from these an inclination is made toward consent.

Articulus 9 — Which And How Many Are The Modes Of Immission By Which The Devil Interposes Himself, And What Are The Modes Of Temptations

What and how many are the modes of immission by which the devil insinuates himself, and what are the modes of temptations?

§ 91. Fourthly, it is asked concerning the modes of immission.

§ 92. Now Augustine touches upon certain modes in the book 83 Questions, saying: "The demon gives himself to figures, accommodates himself to colors, adheres to deeds, hides deceit in words, subjects himself to odors, infuses himself into tastes, disturbs the mind with tenebrous affections, and darkens the senses, and with certain fogs darkens the passages of intelligence through which the ray of the mind is accustomed to spread the light of reason." Now of these (as is evident) the demon seems to do some from this number on the outside, and some on the inside.

§ 93. Also, Gregory touches upon other modes of temptation and immission in a manifold way, saying first the general mode, Job 41:11, in the Gloss upon that text, Out of his nostrils proceeds smoke: "Out of his nostrils proceeds smoke, by whose noxious inspirations depraved thought is born in human hearts, through which the gaze of the mind is blunted."

§ 94. But he touches upon a more special mode, Job 18:10, upon that text, His snare is hidden... upon the path, saying: "The enemy looks upon the morals of men, to which vice they are closer; and those things he places before the face of the mind, to which he easily sees each one inclined."

§ 95. Also, Gregory in the Morals, upon that text, Behold Behemoth whom, etc.: "To his faithful servant the Lord insinuates all the machinations of the cunning enemy: everything which he seizes by oppressing, everything which he flits around by insinuating, everything which...

...by threatening he terrifies, everything that by persuading he flatters, everything that by despairing he breaks, everything that by promising he deceives.

Also, on 1 Peter 5:8, He goes about seeking whom he may devour, the Gloss says:

"He goes about like an enemy besieging closed walls: he explores whether there is any part of the walls less stable, by whose access he might penetrate to the interior: he offers illicit forms to the eyes, so that by sight he may destroy chastity: he tempts the ears through melodies, so that he may soften Christian vigor: he provokes the tongue by insult: he instigates the hand in provoked men to slaughter: he promises earthly honors, so that he may take away heavenly ones: and when he cannot secretly deceive, he adds open terrors: deceitful in peace, violent even in persecution." Therefore, since there are so many modes of entering and injecting [thoughts], it is asked according to what they are taken?

Also, it is asked whether in all bodily modes he needs the assumption of a body, and in spiritual ones the laying aside of the same?

For it seems to some that the tempter from without always needs an assumed body: because

1. He first tempted Adam through an assumed body: but nevertheless this is not necessary, because according to this it would behoove him always to come in the body of some assumed animal.
2. Also, nothing mixes itself with flavors unless it is a body: therefore in such a genus of temptation he seems always to need an assumed body.

But against this is that 1. He intends only to deceive a spirit: and the application of a spirit to a spirit is easier than of a body to a spirit.

1. Also, he often tempts concerning spiritual things: therefore then he does not need a body.

§ Solution. It must be said that the modes which Augustine posits are general and are multiplied according to those things in which his effect can reach the soul. Now he posits seven, of which five are outside, and two inside. Of those five, four are taken according to the delectables of the senses, namely sight, hearing, smell, and taste. And according to sight the first mode is taken, which is in two things, namely in the sensed object of the common sense which is maximally known by sight, as when he gives himself to figures, because we maximally know figure through sight, although it is the proper sensed object of the common sense. In the second mode, when he accommodates himself to colors: and this mode is according to the proper object of sight. But according to hearing there are two, namely one according to sound in relation to harmony, when he adheres to sounds; and another according to articulate and literate voice, when he causes a lie to lie hidden so that he may deceive more efficaciously. And afterward he takes two according to smell and taste, which are evident per se. But it is asked: Why is none posited according to touch? And to this it must be said that there it would not lie hidden in such a way, because touch does not receive its sensible object without matter, like the others. For according as taste is indeed not touch but an indicator of flavor, thus it has a proper delectable besides touch. The other two which are inside: one is taken according to the order of concupiscence set in motion in comparison to the effect; and the other according to the order of a disturbed phantasy to the intellect.

Gregory, however, in his first word expresses only generally how all of them occur. But in the second he touches upon the mode which is by the assistance of complexion [temperament] and custom. The third is the authority of Gregory, according to the two things inclining to evil, which are love wrongly inflaming, and fear wrongly humbling. For love behaves inordinately toward the good, and with respect to that there are three modes. The first of these is by experiencing, to which good of mutable things a human is more easily inclined, and with respect to that is "to circumvallate by insinuating." But once the good is possessed toward which there is an inclination, there follows the excitation of affection into it: and this is what he "deceives by promising." The third is the labor for attaining and for remaining in it when it is perceived: and this also he "flatters by persuading": for from the sweetness of the desired or possessed good he posits reasons of persuasion and flattery. But if it is according to fear: either it is on the part of the body, and then often he "snatches by oppressing," because he can oppress the body; or on the part of a future evil, or on the part of a past one. If on the part of a future one, then he "terrifies by threatening"; if on the part of a past one, then from the consideration of that he many times "breaks by despairing."

Now the modes which are in the Gloss of Peter are taken in three ways, namely according to the things attracting reason from without, according to the instruments of sinning, and according to spiritual objects. The first mode is carnal ordered to the spirit. The second is of the flesh and the spirit simultaneously. The third is of the spirit in comparison to carnal things. According to the first there are two modes: according to sight, and hearing; and not according to the other senses: because only these are disciplinable, as the Philosopher says in the book De Sensu et sensato. And through this the objection which could be made about the others is solved. The second two modes are taken according to two general instruments of sinning. For since sin is in words and in deeds, the general instrument of sinning will be the tongue, of which James says that inflamed by hell, it sets on fire the wheel of our nativity. The hand, however, is the general instrument for works, of which the Philosopher says in De Anima III that it is the "organ of organs"; and in De Animalibus XVI, that nature gave man a hand for an instrument and weapons. But the third two are according to spiritual objects, both according to a perverse order to the good of this world (and thus he "promises earthly honors"), and according to a perverse order from the evil of punishment, and then he openly prepares, by himself or his own, "terrors": because through this, contempt rises into scandals, as it says.

To that which is further asked, whether in all these he needs the assumption of a body? It must be said that no: because the matter of corporal things (as was noted above in the preceding distinction) obeys him at his nod and for mixtures; but sometimes he does assume one, when he sees that that mode avails him more.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 10 — To Which Part Of The Soul The Malignant Spirit Can Insert, And To Which Not, And Whether He Can Act Upon The Intellect And Upon The Affection, And Whether A Demon Or A Good Angel Sees Our Thoughts

Into which part of the soul can the malignant spirit inject [thoughts], and into which can he not? And, whether he has power over the intellect and over the affection? And, whether a demon or a good Angel sees our thoughts?

Fifthly, it is asked into which part of the soul the malignant enemy can inject [thoughts]?

1. For there is in us a power receiving outside with the presence of matter, and a power inside receiving the similitudes of bodies without the presence of the matter, as imagination, phantasy, estimation, and memory. There is also a certain one receiving species purified from all matter and the appendages of matter. Similarly, there are three substances existing above us according to the nature by which we are united to the body, namely, God, the good Angel, and the demon. Therefore it seems that according to the congruence of dignity in the powers, there ought also to be an order of those injecting into them. Therefore, since God works upon the intellect, the good Angel will not work except upon the phantasy, and the demon only upon the sense.
2. Also, Augustine says that between our mind and God there is no medium: therefore nothing is posited under it except God; but everything that impresses species in something is above it: therefore nothing impresses species on our intellect except God alone: therefore as before, the phantasy will be left to the good Angel, and the sense to the evil Angel.

But against this it seems: 1. The serpent first attacked the woman: and this is the inferior part of reason, as Augustine says. Therefore it seems that he can have power over our intellect: for he can do much more over ours, than over the woman's, which was not corrupted by the first sin.

1. Also, it seems that he has power over the intellect: because he did not lose his natural light. Therefore, from his natural intellect he can radiate upon phantasms and impress them upon the possible [intellect]. For nothing more is required for the possible [intellect] to become in act, except that there be a light extracting the intelligibles, and phantasms, and those things which are extracted.

2. Also, it seems from what is said in the book De Causis, that the soul is therefore the instrument of intelligence, because it impresses intelligibles in it; but the demon has not lost the nature of intelligence, but was sometime an intelligence: therefore he can still impress upon the intellect of the soul.

Also, it seems that he has power over the affection: because 1. They are "incendiaries" of evils, as is said in the text. Now "to set on fire" is said with respect to the affection, because heat is in the affection: therefore the demon has power over the affection.

1. Also, Hosea 7:4 says that they are all adulterers, like an oven heated by the baker. But according to the Gloss, the baker is the devil; and it speaks there of the love of idols which has nothing corresponding to itself in the body: therefore he inflames the will, as it seems.
2. Also, he has power over the intellect (as some say): therefore also over the will; because both of these powers are in the imagination; and also the intellect is prior to the affection or the will.

Further it is asked here, Whether a demon or a good Angel sees our thoughts?

Now it seems that they do: because 1. Otherwise he would not know to what things he ought to inflame more or less.

1. Also, Augustine in book XII of De Genesi ad litteram: "Evil Angels know thoughts, because they predict many things which they would not predict if they did not know thoughts."
2. Also, Augustine: "Angels can hide thoughts from the soul: but the soul cannot hide thoughts from an Angel."

But against this is what all say, that no one knows the heart of man except God alone.

§ Solution. It must be said to the first with common opinion, that God alone immediately operates upon the will: whereas the good Angel by the order of grace, not of nature, operates upon the intellect by illuminating it; and the demon, because he fell from grace, cannot operate on our intellect except consequently: namely, because he orders the phantasms in one way or another, so that from them this or that results in the intellect. Yet I well concede that from his natural light he can flow something into the phantasms, whence that which he intends results more clearly in the species; but I do not think that this light can flow upon the possible intellect: but rather for this the light of the agent [intellect] is required, because the agent is substantial, since the agent acts by itself, just as light shines by itself; and its understanding is similarly its own work, and not of anyone besides itself.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the order is not that: because in man the affection is further than the intellect; and the phantasy is not much more perfect than the sense; and the interior and exterior powers of the sensible soul are, according to the degree of nature, all under the demon; but the intellect, in which there is a disposition to grace, is ordered to the ministry of the good Angel, who nevertheless can also [operate] upon the interior affections. But the proper subject of grace, which is from God alone, is ordered here with God alone operating in it.

To the next it must be said that this is understood as regards the will of the mind in which God alone operates, and not as regards the intellect. Or it can be said that this is understood according to the comparison to the end which is beatitude, and not absolutely: just as it was also glossed above in the first distinction of this book.

To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that although the woman signifies reason in the spiritual marriage of the mind, as Augustine says, nevertheless the serpent itself did not attack her on the part of reason, but on the part of the sense ordered to reason.

To the next it must be said that he scatters this light for the increase of malice as much as he can, but not upon the mind, but upon the species ordered to the mind, the reason for which has already been said.

To the next it must be said that that incension is not in the affection, but in things ordered to it, as was said above.

To the next it must be said that he "bakes" through things inciting concupiscence ordered to the mind. Through the foregoing, the solution to the following is clear: because I believe that statement to be false, and not to belong to every Angel, but only to the good one, and this on account of grace, not on account of nature.

To the next it must be said that this happens on account of the colimitation of the body and the soul: because immediately the motions of the mind move the body, even however much it is a spiritual object. Nevertheless, if it is of joy, the heart is dilated, and the spirits flow into it; and if it is of sadness, it is constricted, and the blood runs back to cool it: and in those signs he sees it.

To that which is further asked, it has already been solved above: because they do not see thoughts except those which have some sign in the body: and concerning those the first authority of Augustine is understood.

Note also, that some have said that the demon is like a mirror in which the forms which he wills appear: and thus he objects himself to the intellect; and then our intellect reads in him, such that he does not act upon our intellect, but the intellect does this in itself. But this is wondrous if it can be proven, that a spiritual nature is so specular when it wills. And if this were conceded, it is wondrous if our intellect, receiving all science from the phantasm, so knows how to read in him.

Also, according to this it seems wondrous to me that he does not always object himself to the intellect so that it is always occupied concerning the reading of those things which he objects. If you say that the intellect averts itself. Against this is that the demon who follows is swifter; and again he objects, unless perhaps it closes its eyes with some covers. And because such fictions lack reason, therefore let them be dismissed.

DISTINCTIO IX

Divisio Textus

After the aforesaid things it remains to know concerning the orders of Angels, etc. Here the Master begins to treat of the distinction of orders and offices. And it has two parts: in the first of which he treats of those things which pertain to the distinction of orders: and this terminates in this distinction. But in the second he posits those things which pertain to the office of ministry: and this begins in the following distinction, there, A. This also must be investigated, etc.

This distinction has five parts: the first of which contains the distinction of hierarchy, and of order. The second the reasons of the names, there, C. These names to them, etc. In the third he inquires, Whether these orders are from nature or from grace? there, D. Now it remains to inquire, etc. In the fourth he inquires, Whether all the Angels of the same order are equal? there, F. Besides it must be considered, etc. In the fifth he inquires, Whether the number of orders will be augmented from the assumption of men, so that a tenth order will be made from assumed men? there, G. It must also be noted, that a tenth order, etc.

From these and the disputation the sentence will be clear.

Articulus 1 — What Hierarchy Is According To The Definition

What is a hierarchy according to definition?

What is a hierarchy according to definition?

Now four things to be inquired occur here, namely what is a hierarchy? And concerning the division of hierarchy, and concerning the connection of hierarchy, and what is an order, and the multiplication of an order?

TO THE FIRST one proceeds thus:

In the Celestial Hierarchy Dionysius posits such a definition of hierarchy, saying: "A hierarchy is indeed according to me a divine order, and science, and action, assimilating to the deiform as much as possible, and proportionally ascending into the likeness of God toward the illuminations divinely infused into it."

In the same place a little below he posits a second, saying thus: "Whoever says hierarchy, universally declares a certain sacred disposition, an image of the divine beauty in hierarchical orders and sciences sacrificing mysteries of proper illumination, and assimilated as is licit to its proper principle."

Our Masters, however, also posit a third, namely this: "Hierarchy is the ordered power of sacred and rational beings retaining due dominion in subjects."

Against the first it is objected thus: 1. Order is a part of hierarchy: therefore it ought not to be posited in its definition: but rather conversely.

1. Also, science does not seem to belong to all who are in a hierarchy, since it belongs only to the Cherubim: therefore it ought not to be posited.
2. Also, since charity is a higher gift than science, and belongs to the first order, hierarchy should rather have been defined by the first of its gifts than by the second.
3. Also, action belongs only to those ministering from the second and third hierarchy: but the most potent hierarchy does not act, but assists: therefore it is badly defined by action.
4. Also, this does not seem true which he says, assimilating to the deiform as much as possible: because not all hierarchies receive illuminations immediately from God, but some from Angels: therefore they sometimes assimilate to the Angeliform rather than to the Deiform.
5. Also, this seems to follow from what he says in the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, that it belongs to every hierarchy to become a cooperator with God, in this that some are purging, and some purged: and some illuminating, and some illuminated: and some perfecting, and some perfected.
6. Also he says that every divine law is to reduce the lowest through the first means, and through the means. Therefore it seems that not all assimilate to the deiform as much as is possible. If you say that this is understood as regards what he says, that the divine goodness proceeds inegressibly through all things, and fills each thing according to the analogy of its capacity: this is nothing: because according to this it will not be proper to hierarchy: but rather each of the beings from the first goodness according as it is from it, in this mode assimilates to the deiform as much as possible.
7. In the same way it is objected concerning the last which he says, ascending into the likeness of God toward the illuminations divinely infused into it. For ascension signifies a change of degree: therefore it seems that Angels continually advance in heaven: therefore those who were in one choir can be elevated to the first of another choir. If you say that this does not fit: because with an inferior advancing, the superior also advances: this is nothing: because still nothing less follows but that the inferior can come into the degree in which the superior is now.

It is also objected against the second: 1. It is asked what sacred disposition universally says? For if disposition says ordination, just as another translation seems to will, then it does not state a sufficient determination through this that he says, a certain sacred, etc.: for the institutes of the Fathers are certain sacred ordinations universally, and yet they are not a hierarchy.

1. Moreover, What does he call an image of the divine beauty? For an image pertains rather to natural things than to superadded gratuitous things, as is evident from the things disputed in Book I of the Sentences.

2. Also, concerning this that he says, in hierarchical orders and sciences of proper illumination: for there are hierarchical acts, to purge, and to perfect, just as to illuminate: therefore he ought to have said, of proper purgation, and of proper perfection, just as he said, of proper illumination.
3. Also, to sacrifice according to the law is to offer oneself or one's own to God, and from this to be consecrated: and in hierarchies it seems to be in the converse order: because illuminations are rather sacred because they are from God, than because they are offered to God.
4. Also, a mystery is the same as a secret: but Angels are in the open [vision] of the face of God: therefore a mystery does not seem to apply to them.
5. Also, when he says, to its proper principle, it is asked what does proper principle supposit? If you say that [it is] God: then it seems to be entirely unfitting: because God is a common principle in them and not a proper one. But if you say that it supposits something else: then it cannot apply to a hierarchy: since a hierarchy (as is said in the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy) is a similitude and unity to God as much as possible.
6. Also, what he says, as is licit. For the licit (as the Gloss on the first epistle to the Corinthians says) is what is prohibited by no sin: and thus each one can ascend as much as he can: nor is there anyone who would prohibit him.

It is also objected concerning the third, because it seems diminished: because 1. Since there are three things about a hierarchy, namely order, science, and action: this definition makes no mention of science and action.

1. Also, what it says, of sacred and rational beings, does not seem to apply: because hierarchy is saved in the prelates of the Church who are also called hierarchs: and yet many of them are not sacred.
2. Also, what it says, in subjects, does not seem to touch upon hierarchy except by comparison to inferiors, and it is not fitting: because the comparison to a superior is also more essential to a hierarchy than to an inferior, since in ascent there is perfection, in descent purgation and illumination.
3. Also, what it says, retaining due dominion in subjects, seems to be against the precept of the supreme hierarch Christ, who says to his hierarchs: The kings of the Gentiles lord it over them, and they that have power, etc.[161] Also, 1 Peter 5:3: Neither as lording it over the clergy. Also, Bernard to Eugene: "Do not seek to lord it, lest all iniquity lord it over you."
4. Also, since there are many gifts of other orders just as of the Dominations, why is it not defined by the gifts of the others just as by this one?

Lastly it is also asked: According to what are the three said definitions taken?

§ Solution. Without prejudice to others I say that the first definition is given according to those things which are essential to a hierarchy, and according to its proper effect in the substances which are in it. For order and science and action are of the substance of a hierarchy: and from these a similitude to God is effected in the ordered substances, and an ascent according to the infused illuminations. The second, however, is given through the composition of the copy to the exemplar. And the third considers the proper substance which is ordered in the hierarchy, and in which the hierarchical order is saved. Whence none of these definitions touches upon the divine hierarchy which is in the three persons: which some call supercelestial. And this is clear from the words posited in the definition: because similitude to God and unity and ascent into God as much as possible, is not expounded of God except absurdly. And I say this on account of some who wish to extend these definitions: but it is true that they are common definitions for the celestial and the ecclesiastical: nor is it found from Dionysius that there is any supercelestial hierarchy: for it is absurdly said that the divine persons are ordered in science and action: for although there is in them an order of nature, nevertheless there is not in them an order of science and action: and therefore the saying of Bernard, which is said of the celestial hierarchy, has neither authority nor unity: and therefore that was never handed down by Dionysius, nor defined.

We say therefore that the first collects those things which are substantial to a hierarchy.

And to the first object it must be said that order is said in two ways, namely an ordered thing: and thus order is a part of hierarchy, and does not fall into its definition. Order is also said as the concept [ratio] of order: and this in two ways. In one way it is called the common concept which is taken from whatever sacred science and action, and thus it defines hierarchy. In another way it is called a special concept taken from a special gift, and as it is charity, or science, or rest, or some other such thing: and thus it defines an order, not a hierarchy. In the first way it is an order. In the second way definitive of a hierarchy. In the third way definitive of an order.

To the next it must be said that science is taken here generally for the participation of the divine illumination, and not specially for the gift of science by which the Cherubim are denominated: and that this is true is taken from Dionysius, in the same chapter saying thus: "For the perfection of each one allotted a hierarchy is this, to ascend according to proper analogy into the imitation of God, and most divinely of all, as the eloquent sayings state, to become a cooperator with God, and to show the divine action shining forth in oneself according to what is possible: seeing that the order of a hierarchy is that some indeed purge, and others truly are purged: some however illuminate, and others are illuminated: and some perfect, and others are perfected." The reception of illumination therefore and the effusion are of the substance of a hierarchy: and its reception is called through science, but its effusion through action.

And from this the solution to the following is clear, and to the third after this: because if science were taken here from a special gift, then there could be an objection about charity: but it is not so: similarly action is not taken for the action of ministry, but rather for the effusion of illumination in which the superior is made a cooperator of God for the illuminated.

To the next it must be said that every hierarchy assimilates to the Deiform in every illumination: for the superior does not effuse something of its own upon the inferior, but rather the divine light, as the Apostle says: For we preach not ourselves, but Jesus Christ our Lord.[162] And again: For I judged not myself to know anything among you, but Jesus Christ, and him crucified.[163] And through this the solution to all that were objected concerning that part of the definition is clear.

To the next it must be said that Angels continually advance not in merit, but in the perception of the highest illuminations. For the font of that light cannot be exhausted, since it is infinite. Now those illuminations are reasons for glorying in a new way, yet they do not exalt the degree of beatitude in the substantial reward: and therefore that which is objected does not hold.

To that which is objected concerning the second definition, it must be said that disposition is called ordination according to degrees of perceiving illumination, as will be clear below, and it is restricted through this that he says sacred, and through the consequents which are science and action, in which is hierarchical disposition: and therefore that objection is of little avail: since statutes are referred to the order of science which is from illumination.

To that which is objected concerning the reason of an image, it must be said that this definition is given through the conformity of the copy to the exemplar. For the similitude and conformity of God illuminating results in the illuminated through this that he who is the true light fills them and shines from them, just as fire in glowing iron: and this conformity of participated light, is called here an image, and not agreement in natural similitude. And that it is so, is taken from the words of Dionysius speaking thus: "But a hierarchy perfects its subjects as divine agalmata, clear and clean mirrors receptive of the principal light and the divine ray. Now agalma phiasotos, that is, praisers and subjects, is the same as image or similitude according to another translation."

To the next it must be said that although to purge is a hierarchical act and similarly to illuminate, and similarly to perfect, nevertheless purgation and perfection follow from illumination: purgation indeed on the part of the subject into whom the light is infused: but perfection on the part of the end into which the illuminated is reduced, as will be clear below when the disputation will be about those acts: and therefore illumination is posited here rather than perfection, or purgation.

To the next it must be said that this whole sacrifice is understood effectively: because they are made holy and sacred from such an order, the divine light descending into them: and therefore the objection does not hold.

To the next it must be said that it is occult as regards immensity and not as regards substance: for no one receives that light in such a way that he encloses it, such that nothing of it is outside him: but rather the whole remains outside: because it is not divided by being inside and outside: for otherwise that light would be comprehended, which cannot be.

To the next it must be said that proper here says the removal of that which is from another: because although an Angel illuminates an Angel through this that the splendor of deity shines through him, nevertheless he does not convert and assimilate him to himself, but to the proper principle of illuminations, which is the Lord God alone: and therefore the proper is not called here private, but that which through itself and not through another emits the rays of illuminations.

To the next it must be said that licit imports there the limitation of degree according to the state of reward and nature: because to progress beyond that into the divine light is not possible: and thus in unequal clarity there is equal joy, as Anselm says, and star differs from star in glory.[164]

To that which is objected concerning the third, it must be said that it does not consider except the substances in which is the order of hierarchy: and therefore it does not posit science and action.

To the next it must be said that the order of Prelates is holy, although they themselves are unclean: and therefore, as Augustine says with Dionysius, they are to be counted who have fallen from a sacred order.

To the next it must be said that the descent of illumination is from superiors, and that...

is more substantial to a hierarchy, and the reordering to God is, as it were, a consequence of the illumination.

To the next it must be said that Christ did not forbid that dominion, but rather the dominion of ambition: for that dominion (as Dionysius says) expresses a position above, or an excess belonging to the firsts, and the possession of all beautiful goods, and a firmness incapable of falling.

To the next it must be said that dominion expresses an ordered superposition toward inferior subjects: and because this is substantial to a hierarchy, it is therefore defined by that rather than by another.

§ 1. Article 2 How and in what way is a hierarchy divided?

Articulus 2 — How And In What Manner The Hierarchy Is Divided

How and in what way is a hierarchy divided?

Secondly, it is inquired concerning the division of hierarchy.

We reject, however, the fictitious words of some, invented against the opinion of Dionysius, which are found in no translation.

For some say that he divides the hierarchy into epiphania, hyperphania, and hypophania. And they say that epiphania is the first, and they define it, inventing extraneous things in order to falsify the words of Dionysius, that it is "a distributed result, free of judgment, by the fire of warming affection, at the height of a loftier intellect." But these are not the words of Dionysius, nor his sense: because he in his whole book does not attribute freedom of judgment to the Thrones. But they are spoken according to Gregory: yet they are not Gregory's, and therefore must be rejected as vain. They define hyperphania thus: "Hyperphania is a divine illumination partaking of itself, marking with inter-scalar reverence, teaching the use of dominating, and warding off what is contrary." And they say that Dionysius says the first on account of the Principalities, whose role is to teach inter-scalar reverence. The second on account of the Dominations. The third on account of the Powers: which is contrary to Dionysius, who never posited the Principalities in the second hierarchy, but in the third: and it is contrary to all the other Saints, who although they seem to posit the Principalities in the second hierarchy, nevertheless do not put them before the Dominations. Also, the act is against the words of the Saints: because no Saint gives to the Principalities the proper act of revering. The third they define thus: "Hypophania is a divine participation meeting the laws of nature, revealing secrets according to a discrete participation." And they say that "meeting the laws of nature" is said on account of the Virtues. And this immediately appears false: because Dionysius places the Virtues in the second hierarchy. But "revealing secrets according to discrete participation" is said on account of the Archangels and Angels: because Archangels announce greater things and Angels lesser things.

§ 2. There are others who wish to divide the hierarchy according to a threefold conversion, namely to God, and to the Angel, and over man: and that according to the conversion to God the first is taken, according to the conversion to the Angel the second is taken, and according to the conversion over man the third is taken. And this again cannot stand: because in the middle hierarchy two orders, however they are taken, whether according to Dionysius or according to others, do not express a conversion to the Angel, but over the soul, such as the Virtues and Powers according to Dionysius; and Principalities, Dominations, and Powers according to others: therefore it seems that Dionysius did not reasonably posit three hierarchies.

§ 3. Therefore there are others who wished to take the division according to the attributes of the persons, so that the first is taken according to the goodness of the Holy Spirit in love and contemplative knowledge and tranquility: but the second according to the Father to whom power is given, because Dominion, Virtue, and Power express names of power: but the third according to the wisdom of the Son, because it belongs to Princes to think about what is worthy of a prince: while Archangels know secrets, and Angels common things. But this is an adaptation, and not a substantial distinction.

§ 4. Solution. It must be said that the division of a hierarchy is taken according to the proportion of illuminations, as Dionysius holds: and that every celestial adornment is divided according to assisting and ministering according to a threefold movement of Angels, of which the first is to constantly circle eternal knowledge and be moved obliquely toward the providence of subjects, and yet not to be deflected from the contemplation of the beautiful and good about which the choirs act: and to be moved straight when they provide for those having less, correctly passing through all things: therefore those perfections can be taken according to the reception of illumination from God, or according to that to which it ordains. If in the first way, it will be the first hierarchy, which entirely expresses conversion to God in receiving illumination. And that this is true is stated by Dionysius, who says that the properties of the first hierarchy are six: of which the first is that it purely sees many and blessed contemplations. The second, that being illuminated it sees simple and immediate flashes. The third, that it is filled with divine food. The fourth, that it is filled with much first-given outpouring, and solely the domestic and unifying unity of divine refreshment. The fifth, that having been filled by much communion and cooperation with God, it is made worthy of it, as much as is possible, by a likeness of good habits and actions. The sixth, because it is superimposed, knowing many divine things by participation in divine knowledge and cognition as is permitted, having been made thus. From these it is understood that its proper role is to receive illuminations immediately from God more than all the others: but the received illumination ordains to power and action: and according to power the second is taken, and according to action the third.

§ 5. And that this is true is gathered from the words of Dionysius, who says that the proper characteristics of the second hierarchy are these, namely that it has deiform properties in this, that it is indeed purged and illuminated and perfected, as has been said, by divine illuminations instilled in it secondarily through the first hierarchical disposition, and conveyed through that middle stage by a second manifestation. The third, however, is taken according to action: and this again is evident through the words of Dionysius saying thus concerning all three: "One must consider the most excellent hierarchy to be that which is proximating the occult primordially, secretly forming it; to order the second: but the second, which is completed by the holy Dominations and Virtues and Powers, presides over the hierarchy which belongs to the Principalities and Archangels and Angels. The first hierarchy indeed more manifestly: but the one which is after it more occultly: and to direct the manifestative disposition of the Principalities, Angels, and Archangels to human hierarchies consequently, so that there may be ascent, conversion, communication, and unity in an ordered progression toward God." Whence the division is accepted thus, that the first receives illumination by way of divine light, in which there is supreme rest and joyfulness, and it descends from that by way of supreme power into the middle, and from that to the most complete action into the third.

I have, however, noted this at length elsewhere in a treatise on the Angels, where a more subtle rationale of these things is found.

§ 6. Article 3 Are the members of a hierarchy connected to each other?

Articulus 3 — Whether The Members Of The Hierarchy Are Connected To One Another

Are the members of a hierarchy connected to each other?

164. 1 Cor. 15:41

Thirdly, it is inquired concerning the connection of the hierarchy. For everything that issues from one through division must be connected in something: but the division of a hierarchy issues from one common principle through division, which is the definition and name of hierarchy: therefore it must necessarily be connected in something.

Also, since there are three orders in any hierarchy, and they agree through the formal rationale of that hierarchy, and are distinguished in the formal rationale of the orders: there must again be a connection in the act of that hierarchy.

And it is further asked, what is that connection still, since they are not perfectly equal, as the Master says below? One must again find a difference and a connection between the persons of any order: because if they did not have a special connection, they could not be reduced into one order; and if they did not differ, they would not be distinguished by higher and highest in the same order.

Still further, since in the same person one can accept an inferior power by which he is converted to lower things, and a purer superior power, the illumination must necessarily have a difference according to the power of those faculties, so that the whole person is reduced to God: therefore it is necessary that there also be a connection and distinction there.

But against this seems to be what Dionysius says, that those who are of one hierarchy are equipotent in the act of that hierarchy: therefore much more will those who are of one order be equipotent in the gift and act of that order.

§ 7. Solution. It must be said that without doubt Dionysius means that there is a fourfold connection in the Angels, and he himself touches upon this in the book on the Celestial Hierarchy. For there is a connection of the threefold hierarchy in order, knowledge, and action, which are substantial to the hierarchy: and a distinction in the mode of receiving illuminations. And there is a connection of the orders in the substantial act of one hierarchy, such as of the first in receiving simple and flashing divine illuminations not proportioned to the others, and of the second in the act of power, and of the third in action concerning us: and the distinction is in the acts of the gifts of the orders. The connection in the act of the gift, however, will be of the persons in one order, and the distinction in the participation of the illuminations. And the connection in the reception of illumination is in one person: but the distinction is according to the superior or inferior faculties participating in it. And these have been proved at length elsewhere through the words of Dionysius.

To this therefore which is objected, it must be said that he does not mean they are equipotent simply, but relatively, namely in the act of the hierarchy in common. And similarly those who are of one order are equipotent in the formal rationale of that gift, and not in the quantity of virtue according to that gift.

§ 8. Article 4 What is an order, and what is the multiplication of an order?

162. 2 Cor. 4:5

Articulus 4 — What Order Is, And What The Multiplication Of Order Is

What is an order, and what is the multiplication of an order?

Fourthly, it is inquired what an order is? and concerning the multiplication of an order.

The Master says in the text that an order is a multitude of celestial spirits who are likened to each other in some gift of grace, just as they also agree in the participation of natural gifts.

Against this, however, it is objected that: 1. According to this, human beings by themselves make one order: because they are not of the Angelic nature. Since therefore the Angelic nature is part of the definition of an order, man will make a tenth, which will be disproved by the Master below.

1. Also, those things which are not of the same nature are not of the same order in the grade of nature: but the grade of nature is part of the definition of an order, as is evident through the last member of this division: therefore man will not be assumed into the number of the orders of Angels.
2. Also, just as there is a distinction in participating in illuminations among the Angels: so there is also among souls: therefore it seems that souls make three hierarchies and nine orders, just like the Angels: therefore there will be eighteen orders at least, and six hierarchies.
3. Furthermore, it seems to be false what the Master says, that they agree among themselves in some gift of grace: because orders are read of even among demons, as was held above. Therefore grace does not make an order, but nature.
4. Also, that nature makes it, was held above. But if this is conceded, it will be against the text: because the Master proves here that orders are not from nature, but from grace.

§ 9. Also, it is inquired concerning the contrariety of Dionysius, and Gregory, and Bernard: because Dionysius places the Virtues according to the order of the middle hierarchy, and Gregory and Bernard place them in the first order of the last hierarchy, and the Principalities in the second order of the middle one.

Solution. It must be said that in this part Dionysius is to be believed, whom Gregory also adduces in commendation of his own words: and because it is believed that he learned this from Paul. It must be said therefore that an order is called here the rationale of an order from the participation of some gift of grace: and that rationale is well present in natures diverse in species, provided they agree in the rationale of the participation of that gift: and thus Angels and men would only make three hierarchies and nine orders.

To that therefore which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that in this definition some material aspects of an order are posited, such as the multitude of celestial spirits: and some which express an inclination of disposition to the order, such as the agreement of natural gifts: and some as perfecting the formal rationale of the order, such as similarity in a gift of grace: and this last, which is the perfective principle of the order, regards men and Angels equally: but the first two do not diversify, since they are material.

To the next it must be said that although the participation of illuminations differs in Angels and in blessed souls according to the subject, nevertheless it does not differ according to the formal rationale, and therefore it does not make another species.

To the next it must be said that there are no orders among demons except relatively, namely according to the distinction of natural gifts, as the Master will say there.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that without doubt Gregory (as is evident to one who diligently attends to his words) does not intend to rank the orders, but only to enumerate them: but Dionysius intends both, namely to enumerate and to rank. According to Dionysius, therefore, the orders are multiplied thus, that the orders of the first hierarchy are taken according to the rationale of conversion to God for the reception of illuminations. Thus conversion to God is either in relation to Him, or in motion toward Him, or in perfectly possessing Him. If in the first way: then it is the Seraphim, because seeing and knowing means nothing else but to be converted to a present sight. But charity means motion: because it is mobile and acute and superfervid, as Dionysius says: and then it is the Cherubim. But according to the third is taken the Throne in which God rests, while He makes it rest in Himself. But according to this multiplication the order is not considered: but rather according to the dignity of the gifts: and there is lesser dignity in merely possessing: because this belongs to possessing perfection according to the intention of nature, and not necessarily to knowing and loving it: but more perfect is possessing and knowing: and most perfect is possessing and knowing and loving: and therefore the Seraphim are first, the Cherubim second, and the Thrones third.

§ 11. The second and third hierarchies, however, according to Dionysius are taken according to those things to which the illuminations are ordered: and the second according to the power which immediately and completely proceeds from the possessed illumination. The perfection of power or potency is in three things, namely in being high and excellent: depressing and weakening [the opposition]: and according to this are the Dominations. The second perfection is toward the act, which is in the ultimate and most difficult of power: and according to this are the Virtues: because a virtue is the ultimate of power regarding a thing: and therefore Dionysius defines them according to virility in fulfilling every will of God: and therefore also miracles, which are of the highest power in act, are attributed to those Angels by the holy Fathers. The third perfection is that it be ordered to the praise of the good and the punishment of evildoers: and according to this are the Powers: and therefore warding off the contrary powers of evil men and demons is attributed to them.

But the three orders of the last hierarchy are taken according to Dionysius from the action to which the illumination perfects: for the perfection of action is either with respect to many ordered under one according to a law: and to these belong the Principalities, such as Michael the Prince of the Church, and the Angel who was the prince of the Persians, and so for the others. Or it is perfection in the revelation of God's will: and this in two ways, namely in those things which are secrets and mysteries pertaining to the recreation of all: and to these belong the Archangels; or for the revelation and custody of those things which concern the life of individuals: and to these belong the Angels.

But Gregory and Bernard, according to the Masters, place the Virtues in the lower group: because they have singular works: and then it can be ordered thus, that the middle hierarchy is taken according to power in common, and the lowest according to particular acts, and the middle is then multiplied according to the multiplication of power: for Kings and Popes and Potentates are of singular power, and the Dominations correspond to them: and there is power more distinct as a principle, and the power of cities and congregations, and to these belong the Powers. But singular works are either arguments of faith like miracles, and to these belong the Virtues; or revelations, and then it is doubled as before. But if anyone wishes to refer to another treatise disputed concerning this, he will find more things discussed, both to a greater extent and differently: and there he will read what is posited as proper to individual orders according to Dionysius, and disputations concerning each order one by one, and concerning their hierarchies, and concerning their acts, and all the words of Dionysius which he says about this.

Through these and those things the text is clear up to that point.

§ 12. Article 5 Whether superior Angels, since they have the gifts of the inferiors excellently and powerfully, ought also to have their names? and, What do they signify under the diverse endings, M, N, B?

Articulus 5 — Whether The Higher Angels, Since They Have The Gifts Of The Lower Excellently And Powerfully, Ought Also To Have Their Names, And What They Signify Under The Diverse Terminations, M, N, B

Whether superior Angels, since they have the gifts of the inferiors excellently and powerfully, ought also to have their names? and, What do they signify under the diverse endings, M, N, B?

"These names [belong] to them not for their own sake, etc."

But there it is inquired: 1. Since the superiors have the gifts of the inferiors excellently and powerfully, as Dionysius says: it seems also that they ought to have their names, but not conversely.

1. Also, if the inferiors have the gifts of the superiors, although less powerfully, and the denomination is from the better, it seems that they ought to be denominated from the superior gifts: and this does not happen.
2. Also, if those names were given to them for our sake, then it seems that all ought to be named from guardianship: because we name them through the effect of guardianship, and not through the office of contemplation: and this does not happen: because we name some Seraphim, and Cherubim, Thrones, and Dominations, which do not denote an effect of guardianship concerning us.
3. Also, certain names are common only, such as that they are called spirits, and celestial essences, and celestial minds - but certain ones are proper only, such as Seraphim, Cherubim, and Thrones, etc.: but certain ones are common to all and proper to some, such as Virtues, and Angels : for all are called Virtues, and all Angels: therefore I seek the reason for the diversity among these names.

4. Also, Cherubim and Seraphim are terminated in different ways: for sometimes by the final letter N, sometimes by M, and sometimes it is called Cherub, and Seraph: and I seek the reason for this diversity.

§ 13. Solution. It must be said with the Master that all have the gifts of all, and they have the gifts equally: such that there is as much of one as of another: although one does not have as much as another. But just as there is a distinction in general and special gifts, so they yield to each other in general names: because some refer to contemplation, such as charity, knowledge, and rest in a seat: and those are left by the inferiors as more worthy, to denominate the superiors. But some refer to the action of power, and this either indistinctly or distinctly: indistinctly, like Virtues and Powers: but distinctly, like Principalities, Archangels, and Angels. But Dominations are named from power, not in comparison to action, but rather in imitation of the first principle from which all power descends: and therefore they are not read to be sent at any time. There is also a special distinction, which is expressed in the names themselves, such as charity, knowledge, and the like. And from this the solution to the first and second is clear.

To the third it must be said that although the superiors do not operate around us, nevertheless their gifts happen around us: for the gifts of all happen in us, although through the inferiors: and therefore we name them by those: for otherwise the militant Jerusalem would not descend from the triumphant new Jerusalem, adorned like a bride for her husband, as is said in Apocalypse 21:2.

§ 14. To the next it must be said that certain names express the nature in the genus in which all Angels agree. And these names occur in four ways according to how the nature can be named: for either indistinctly, or distinctly in genus: or they are named by things superadded to the nature, yet consequent upon the nature itself. In the first way they are called celestial essences. In the second way celestial spirits. In the third way they are named in two ways, namely on the part of the speculative intellect: and thus they are called minds, or intelligences, or divine intellects. Or they are named on the part of the motive affection: and thus they are called celestial souls: because the soul (as Anselm says) is the mover of the other faculties, according to which we say, "he did this from his soul." Sometimes they are also named from power: because it is common to all, although not to this or that: for it is not a perfect substance lacking its proper capability: and then they are called Virtues. But sometimes they are named from the act: because just as a substance has its proper virtue, so it also has its proper work: and then they are called Angels.

And if it is objected that an Angel is the same as a messenger: and to announce is not the proper work [of all]: therefore they are wrongly denominated by it. I answer that this is true, if to announce at a distance alone is called the office of a messenger: because then it will be proper to one troop of Angels. But if it is taken commonly in an active sense for to illuminate, and through illumination to announce something deiform to another who sees the divine light in it, then it will be common to all to announce: and thus all are called Angels. And therefore Dionysius, solving this question, namely why all are called essences, spirits, virtues, and angels, says that supermundane essences are divided into three: into substance, virtue, and operation: and according to substance he wishes to take the name of spirit, according to virtue the name of virtue, according to operation the name of Angels.

To the last it must be said that those terminating in N are of the neuter gender, and signify the entire troop of one order: and therefore they are of plural number. But those terminating in M are of plural number and masculine, and signify several persons of that troop: but Seraph and Cherub are said of some singular person of the troop. Whence the verse: "Say haec Seraphin [neuter plural], say hi Seraphim [masculine plural], say hic Seraph for that one [masculine singular]."

§ 15. Article 6 Whether the order in Angels is from nature or from grace? and, What names did the falling Angels retain?

Articulus 6 — Whether Order In Angels Is From Nature Or From Grace, And What Names The Fallen Angels Retained

Whether the order in Angels is from nature or from grace? and, What names did the falling Angels retain?

Then it is inquired about what he says there, "Now it remains to inquire, etc." 1. For that the order is from nature seems to be held above, where it was said that they had a distinction in nature corresponding to the orders.

1. Also, it was held above that Lucifer was from a superior order: and in the same place, that the demons still retained the names of the orders from which they fell, such as Powers and Princes.

Also it is further inquired in relation to this, Why are demons called Powers, and Princes, and evil Angels, and not Seraphim? Why are they also called Cherubim, as in Ezechiel 28:14: "Thou art a cherub stretched out, and protecting"? but they are not called Thrones:

Also it is further inquired, Whether they will be evacuated? And because this was disputed above, it is inquired, Why does the Apostle say principally of three that they will be evacuated, namely of Power, Principality, Domination.

§ 16. The solution is plain from things previously held above: because they have a natural disposition from nature, but the perfection and complement of the order from grace.

To the next it must be said that the falling demons retained those names which can be had with mortal sin, and not the others, such as charity, and rest in God: and therefore they are not named by those, because they are depraved by vice.

To the next it must be said that those which denote prelacy and governance are principally said to be evacuated: but the others which denote a distinction of grace alone are not said to be evacuated thus: because the grace will remain, but the prelacy according to act will cease.

§ 17. Article 7 Do Angels differ only in number or also in species, or do even those who are in diverse orders and hierarchies differ in genus or species? and, Are those who are in one order equal?

Articulus 7 — Whether Angels Differ Only In Number Or Also In Species, And Whether Those Who Are In Diverse Orders And Hierarchies Differ In Genus Or In Species, And Whether Those Who Are In One Order Are Equal

Do Angels differ only in number or also in species, or do even those who are in diverse orders and hierarchies differ in genus or species? and, Are those who are in one order equal?

Then it is inquired about what he says there, "Furthermore it must be considered, Whether all Angels, etc."

Here it is necessary to ask three things in order under one question: Do Angels differ only in number or also in species? And, Do those who are in diverse orders and hierarchies differ in genus or species? And thirdly, Are those who are in one order equal?

To the first it is thus objected through physical reasons:

1. Multiplicity in number is due to two things, namely because the matter is not totally within the form: and because it is not only in one, but in succession: but neither of these is in an Angel: therefore there is no multiplicity in him by number under one form of species. That the first is true is evident: because matter desires form, as the female does the male, and the base does the good: therefore matter or potency which is imperfect in nothing, and base by no privation, will desire nothing at all: and such is the potency in perpetual things whose potency is inseparable from act.
2. Also, in all those things whose matter is one in species, there is one act by which that matter is drawn from one into another. There is no instance of this unless someone brings an instance to the present matter. But in Angels there is no such act. Therefore they do not differ solely in number, but also in the nature of the species.
3. Also, every multiplication is made by something making a division in that which is prior by nature or time: but matter (as the Philosopher says) is not before the form by nature, but after: therefore Angels do not have multiplication from this sort of division: therefore another [cause] is left, namely that through diverse specific rationales they issue from one genus, which is before them by nature, not by time: but things thus divided differ in species: therefore it seems that all Angels differ in species.
4. Also, we see this in the noblest body in the genus of bodies, that its distinct parts, such as the orbs, and stars differ in species, as is known from their effects: therefore it will also be so in the nobler spiritual nature: but that is the Angelic nature: therefore all differ in species.

§ 18. But against this, 1. There seems to be the statement of Damascene, that all are intellectual substances, and have one work, dwell in the heavens, and praise God with hymns: therefore they agree in substance and work, since there is no substance which does not have its proper operation.

1. Also, they are of one perfection, for all contemplate in the Word: therefore, since the perfection of diverse natures is not one, it seems that they are not of diverse natures. But the grade of nature seems to vary the species of nature, as regards the perfection which follows the nature.
2. Also, he who is of a certain order agrees more in something with him who is with him in the same order, than with him who is not in the same order: but with him who is not in the same order, he agrees in grace: therefore with him who is in the same order, he agrees in grace and in the nature of the species.
3. Also, to have hypostases in one common nature is a certain passion belonging to God, to an Angel, and to man: therefore they agree in something common, and in something they have a difference: but it belongs to God in one nature numerically, not multiplied by species, nor by number: but to man in one nature multiplied by number, not by species: therefore to an Angel in one nature multiplied by number, and by species, as it seems.
4. Also, the goodness of God appears greater in this, that diverse natures participate in it, and flow from it, than in this, that only one does: therefore it seems that God created them differing in nature.

§ 19. But against this seems to be that: 1. The same reason applies concerning souls: and yet souls do not differ in species. And if you say that this is on account of the body: this seems to be nothing: because it is separable from the body: therefore an active soul would then differ in species from another soul.

1. Also, more and less do not vary the species: but it was held above that Angels do not differ except according to a greater or lesser simplicity of essence: therefore it seems that they do not differ in species from this: or if it is said that this makes a diversity in species in an Angel: therefore it seems that it ought to do so in souls as well: because they too differ thus, as the Master says in the text below.

Furthermore it is inquired, whether those of one order are equal?

And it seems that they are: because 1. Dionysius says that those who are in one hierarchy are equipotent: therefore much more those who are in one order.

1. Also, those whose gift is one and first, their capacity is one: but of those who are of the same order, the gift is one and first: therefore the capacity is one: therefore they are equal in natural and gratuitous things.
2. Also, otherwise it would seem to follow that Lucifer's place would have remained empty: because no one would have been proportioned to that place: and this is unfitting: therefore another in the same order equal to him rose up into his place.

If this, however, is conceded, it will be against what is said in the text.

Also, what Dionysius says, that they are not equal: and therefore in the same order there is a superior illuminating, and an inferior illuminated, as we said above.

§ 20. Solution. It must be said that concerning the first and second there are three opinions: for some, on account of the first reasons, concede that all Angels differ in species, and this seems to me more probable than all others: because in truth no other can be well defended rationally. There are some who say that those who are of the same order are in one species: and those who are in diverse ones are in diverse species: and that those who are in diverse hierarchies differ still more. Thirds say: and this is the more common opinion among the Doctors, because they do not gladly receive the previously held reasons, that all are in one species: and because it is easy to sustain the other opinions, according to this one we will respond to the objections, saying that multiplication is twofold, namely in length which occurs through succession, and this requires potency preceding act: and the other to which the first reasons are adduced, and this multiplication is not in Angels. But there is a multiplication in breadth, and this God completed at once.

in creating: and the rationale for the distinction is not derived from one translating its nature into another, but rather from the order of offices, just as the celestial spirits are distinguished, and the arguments first adduced hold nothing concerning this.

§ 1. To what is objected to the contrary, according to the two former opinions it can be said that from the words of Damascene it is not held that they are of one species, but that they are of one nature in genus.

§ 2. To the substance [of the argument] it must be said that it has no force: because according to this even the soul would be of the same species as the Angels: and therefore this argument was resolved above, where the difference between an Angel and a soul is inquired into.

§ 3. To what is further inquired, according to the last opinion it must be said that those degrees are in superadded powers, and not in the substantial species of nature: just as we also see that a human differs from a human through superadded things, and not through species. But that solution is not according to Philosophy, which reduces this diversity to the matter of the body. But this is supposed by that opinion to be also in a spiritual substance from the order of the creating wisdom, which made the Angels unequal in natural [gifts] on account of the distinction of offices.

§ 4. To the next it can be said that in superadded things [an Angel] agrees more with one who is of its own order, than with another: but not in substantial diversity, or agreement.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that that property is not distinguished in this way: but rather because in an Angel [it is] according to a multitude in breadth from the order of the Creator, but in a human [it is] in length according to the order of generation.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that goodness in a multitude of species shines forth in the order of the universe: but in the order of one nature it shines forth according to a multitude of individuals.

§ 7. To what is objected to the contrary, according to the other opinions it must be said that it is not the same concerning souls: because souls are not so separated that they are not the substantial forms of bodies: and therefore they receive their being in a body, even though according to their being they do not depend on those bodies: and of one power according to reason there is one act according to reason: and therefore souls are of one formulation [rationis]: because the power is of one formulation.

§ 8. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the order to the body is never separated from the soul: and therefore that objection has no force.

§ 9. To the next it must be said that more and less are sometimes founded upon diverse forms through the less noble and more noble ordered to the same thing, just as to know more and less in the sensible and rational: and then it is true that they do not vary the species, but show a variation of species: and thus more and less is in the simplicity of essence and perspicacity of intelligence of the Angels: and therefore they show a diversity of species.

§ 10. To what is further inquired, it must be said that no one in the whole heaven, according to Dionysius, is equal to another.

§ 11. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that they are equipotent in the formulation of the act of hierarchy, such as to be converted to God, or things of this kind: but they are not equipotent in participating in the deiform light which is participated in the hierarchy, and in divine assimilation.

§ 12. To the next it is resolved above, because humans who are inferior in nature advance through the pursuit of virtue and receive the degree of superiors: and thus the place of Lucifer is supplied.

DISTINCTIO X

Divisio Textus

§ 14. This also is to be investigated, Whether all those, etc. Here the Master begins to treat of the missions of the Angels.

§ 15. And it has two parts: in the first of which it is asked, Whether all are sent, or certain ones? But in the following distinction, he inquires concerning the custody which they have over us, there, Dist. XI, A, That also is to be known, etc.

§ 16. That distinction is divided into three parts, according to the three opinions introduced here: of which the first is that not all are sent. The second, that all [are sent], there, C, Here a question arises, etc. The third, that not all are sent to us: but certain ones to the middle ones, as superiors, and the middle to the inferiors, and the inferiors to us: and this begins, there, F, But others say, etc.

§ 17. And this alone is the opinion, as it seems to me, which has little reason, and has very many authorities against it: because Virtues and Principalities and Powers are expressly read to have been sent, and to have offices concerning us, such as to work miracles, to ward off demons, and to order and distinguish and govern principalities: and yet this opinion has several followers.

Articulus 1 — Whether Angels Are Sent, And For What They Are Sent

Whether Angels are sent? and, For what reason are they sent?

§ 18. Concerning the first part there are two things to be asked, namely whether Angels are sent? And, Whether being sent diminishes their glory?

§ 19. Now it seems that they are not sent: because 1. An impartible thing cannot be moved simultaneously by diverse motions, but turns its whole self to whatever it turns itself: an Angel is impartible: therefore it cannot be moved simultaneously by diverse motions: if therefore it assists, it cannot simultaneously minister with this.

§ 20. 2. Also, a messenger is superfluous to one who can indicate to someone distant from himself with equal facility without a messenger: but God could do this: therefore a messenger is superfluous: therefore since a superfluous thing cannot be in the ordination of God, an Angel is not sent, as it seems.

§ 21. 3. Also, the Son is sent, and the Holy Spirit, namely to reorder the rational nature, which had been turned away, as was held in the first book of the Sentences. Therefore since each of them is most sufficient, it seems that an Angel is sent superfluously.

§ 22. ON THE CONTRARY are those things which are said in the Text.

§ 23. SOLUTION. It must be said that an Angel is sent: and this occurs on our account, and not on account of God's indigence.

§ 24. Now to the first it must be said that although an Angel is an impartible substance, it is nevertheless divisible, that is, in the quantity of its power: and it can assist and minister simultaneously.

§ 1. To the next it must be said that the mission is on our account: because God inspires, and so that an intermediary may be made on our part, He also sends an Angel suggesting the same thing that was inspired.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that each mission, both of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, is most sufficient: but nevertheless because we are fragile, we therefore need more things holding us in goods, inwardly and outwardly.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Glory Of The Angels Is Diminished When They Minister And Are Sent

Whether the glory of the Angels is diminished when they minister and are sent?

§ 3. Secondly it is asked, Whether their glory is diminished when they minister?

§ 4. It seems that it is not: because 1. Bede says that they run within God, wherever they are sent: therefore they are not deflected from contemplation.

§ 5. 2. Also, Gregory: "Angels, when they come to us, never recede from innermost things in contemplation."

§ 6. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Aristotle says in the book De Somno et Vigilia that when one power is in act, another is withdrawn: therefore since the contemplation of the Word draws the appetite and will of the Angel so much into itself, it seems that simultaneously with this it cannot diligently minister around us.

§ 7. 2. Also, it is impossible for the same thing to be moved simultaneously by diverse motions according to the same thing: but to contemplate and to minister are diverse motions: therefore the same Angel cannot be moved by them simultaneously, as it seems.

§ 8. SOLUTION. It must be said that it ministers and contemplates simultaneously.

§ 9. To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is true that one work is not the rationale and cause of the other: but the ministry is caused from contemplation: for because they read in the Word that this is the will of God, they are therefore borne to the ministry. And the act of ministry never begins from our side: for they do not learn from us in what things they ought to minister, but rather always from the Word: and therefore they are withdrawn from neither.

§ 10. Through this the solution to the following is evident.

Articulus 3 — Whether All Angels Are Sent Or Not

Whether all Angels are sent, or not?

§ 11. Concerning the second part it is to be inquired, Whether all are sent, or not? It seems that they are:

§ 12. 1. Heb. 1:14: Are they not all ministering spirits, sent to minister? and other things which are introduced in the Text: therefore all are sent. [165]

§ 13. 2. Also, Damascene: "Those who pre-eminently stand out above the others give their illuminations, dispensing and helping those things which are according to us:" therefore all are sent.

§ 14. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Dan. 7:10: Thousands of thousands, etc. In the same place, the Gloss: "There are more who minister than who assist."

§ 1. 2. Also, our body is so disposed that one member helps another: therefore since they are more powerful in the mystical body, they ought to help us by ministering.

§ 2. SOLUTION. It is to be noted that we have disputed about this very diffusely elsewhere, and whoever wishes can insert this: but for the present it must be said that there are three opinions concerning this which are plainly posited in the Text by the Master, but nevertheless according to the opinion of Dionysius not all are sent. And if we believe that Dionysius wrote the vision of Paul, then it seems he is to be followed more than others.

§ 3. And therefore it must be said to the authorities introduced that all are ministering and sent into the ministry of salvation: but this is by ministering illuminations, not by ministering around us.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that Damascene says this plainly, which was already said in solving the first, and he understands it in this way.

§ 5. But concerning all the others a prolix tract is held elsewhere.

Articulus 4 — Whether One Angel Enlightens Another; And Whether One Purges Another, And From What He Purges, Since He Has No Sin

Whether one Angel illuminates another? and, Whether one purges another, and from what does it purge, since it has no sin?

§ 6. Then it is inquired concerning the third opinion, Whether one illuminates another?

§ 7. And it seems that it does not: because 1. Augustine says that he has a chair in heaven who alone teaches the heart of a human: therefore he alone also teaches the heart of an Angel.

§ 8. 2. Also, Augustine in a certain sermon On the Image says that between our mind and God there is nothing intermediate: therefore there is no intermediate illuminating Angel: therefore neither do they illuminate each other.

§ 9. But if this is conceded, it will be against Dionysius in the book On the Celestial Hierarchy, who says that some are illuminators, purgers, and perfecters: and others illuminated, purged, and perfected in every hierarchy and in every order.

§ 10. Next to this it is also further inquired, if one purges another, from what does it purge, since it has no sin?

§ 11. SOLUTION. What was disputed elsewhere, this I do not wish to corrupt here: because such prolixity could not be posited here. But it must be said briefly that they illuminate each other and us.

§ 12. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that God alone teaches as the first efficient cause, but not the only one, in such a way that it would exclude the cooperation of the Angel and the human: and the Angels illuminate as cooperators.

§ 13. To the next it must be said that this is understood only with respect to beatifying things, and not in others: for He Himself alone beatifies the human and the Angel: but in other illuminations one receives from another, and the superior from the inferior.

165. Heb. 1:14.

§ 14. To what is further inquired, it must be said that purgation is from the confusion of similitude, as Dionysius says. But confusion is called here not the opprobrium of sin, but rather the non-united intellect in light: and it is purged from that by the immission of light, not by casting out something else: because light by its presence and absence makes a mutation, just as a substantial form does.

§ 15. And if it is asked concerning the difference of these acts, I say that light is effected in a holy one, and in this respect it is purgation: and the light itself is something in substance, and this signifies illumination: and it orders toward seeing something in God which was not seen before, and in that is perfection: and therefore they are one in substance, and three in formulation.

§ 1. And concerning this you will find explanations individually elsewhere with a prolix disputation, such that all the words of Dionysius are [expounded].

DISTINCTIO XI

Divisio Textus

§ 2. That also is to be known, that the good Angels, etc. Here the Master treats of the custody of the Angels, and touches on three things: of which the first is that they guard. The second is, Whether individuals have individuals? there, B, Now it is wont to be asked, etc. The third is, Whether they advance in merit? And he touches on two opinions concerning this, there, D, Furthermore that ought to be considered, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether It Belongs to an Angel to Guard; And to Which Angels It Belongs to Guard

Whether it is fitting for an Angel to guard? and, To which Angels is it fitting to guard?

§ 3. Here six doubts fall upon the first [point], namely, Whether it is fitting for an Angel to guard. Secondly, Whether it is fitting for a human to be guarded? Thirdly, concerning the time of custody. Fourthly, concerning the effect. Fifthly, If Antichrist will have a guardian Angel? Sixthly, Whether a human would have had [one] if he had not fallen? All these are disputed elsewhere.

§ 4. To the first one proceeds thus: 1. Luke 22:27: Who is greater, he who reclines, or he who ministers? is it not he who reclines? therefore it is not fitting for the greater to minister to the lesser: but an Angel is greater than a human, both in nature and in state: therefore it is not fitting for it to minister to a human. [166]

§ 5. 2. Also, that God has ministers conveying His will to us, this seems to sound like a defect in His power.

§ 6. 3. Also, that He has some who ward off contrary powers, seems likewise to be a depression of His power.

§ 7. 4. Also, if you say that they convey our desires and prayers to God, this again sounds like an imperfection in Him who knows all our things before they happen: therefore it seems altogether unfitting that Angels minister.

§ 8. ON THE CONTRARY to this, 1. There are the authorities of Jerome and Gregory introduced in the Text by the Master.

§ 9. 2. Also, it belongs to mercy to apply a support to the falling weak: since therefore the human is weak and falling, it seems that it is congruous that he have a guardian.

§ 10. 3. Also, rational nature is threefold, namely divine, angelic, and human: and the angelic is intermediate: therefore according to the order of mediation, it is fitting that it be around both. But it is not around the divine except by assisting: but it cannot assist the human, because it does not receive beatitude from the human: therefore it is fitting for it to minister to the human.

§ 11. 4. Also, the charity of the way is so great that it induces the greater to come to the aid of the lesser: since therefore the charity of the homeland is greater, it induces the Angels to this, that they minister to us.

§ 12. SOLUTION. It must be said that it is fitting for an Angel, especially from the five lower orders, to guard: and this for three reasons. The first and principal is on our account: because God, on account of our indigence, multiplies for us on all sides the causes of our salvation, inwardly and outwardly, as will be evident in the following article of the question. The second is the order of angelic nature, which is intermediate between two rational natures, namely the Creator's and ours: and this was touched upon in objecting. The third cause is the descent of illuminations: because, as Dionysius says, the law of divinity is to neglect order in nothing, but to lead back the middle things through the first, and the last things through the middle.

§ 1. Therefore it must be said to the first that to minister is as it were from the right of condition and obligation: just as an inferior ministers to a superior, and a servant to his lord: and in this way Angels do not minister to us. There is also ministering from the order of charity, and of nature, and of office: and in this way Angels do minister to us: because to minister in this way belongs to a superior: so that charity looks to the indigence on our part: the order of nature is referred to the intermediate state between us and the Lord of the Angel Himself: but the order of office is referred to the order of the celestial hierarchy above the ecclesiastical in the order of receiving illuminations.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that these do not mean a diminution of power in God, unless we were to posit this on account of God's indigence: but we do not do this, but rather on account of the indigence of the human, and the ordination of wisdom disposing all things in number, weight, and measure, ordering the nature of the Angel and of the office between us and God.

166. Luke 22:27.

§ 3. And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 2 — Whether It Is Fitting for a Human to Be Guarded by an Angel

Whether it is fitting for a human to be guarded by an Angel?

§ 4. Secondly it is asked, Whether it is fitting for a human to be guarded?

§ 5. It seems that it is. 1. Ecclus. 17:14: Over every nation he has set a ruler. The Gloss: "that is, a ruling Angel": whence the highest order of the lowest hierarchy is called the order of Principalities, that is, of Angels who preside over diverse kingdoms, nations, and provinces. [167]

§ 6. 2. Also, Matt. 18:10: Their Angels, that is, of the little ones, always see the face of my Father. The Gloss: "They are not to be despised to whose custody Angels are sent." [168]

§ 7. 3. Also, Ps. 90:11: He has given his Angels charge over you. The Gloss in the same place: "This is said of the head by reason of the members." [169]

§ 8. 4. Also, Isa. 62:6: Upon your walls, O Jerusalem, I have appointed watchmen. The Gloss: "The walls are the Apostles, the watchmen are the Angels." [170]

§ 9. 5. Also, Ecclus. 33:15: Good is set against evil, and life against death: so also is the sinner against a just man. And so look upon all the works of the Most High, two and two, and one against another. And, in the same place, 42:25: All things are double, one against another, and he has made nothing to be lacking. But it is established by experience that we have bad Angels as exercisers: therefore something would be lacking in the works of the Most High, unless He had also given a good one as a guardian. [171]

§ 10. 6. Also, it is fitting for an indigent one that a guardian be applied: but the human is indigent, as experience teaches: therefore he needs a guardian.

§ 1. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. The best human was stronger than every Angel, namely Christ: therefore the human is simply stronger than the Angel: therefore he does not need a guardian.

§ 2. 2. Also, 1 John 2:27: His unction teaches you concerning all things. Therefore we do not need an Angel teaching. [172]

§ 3. 3. Also, the fomes [tinder of sin], and sin, and the devil incline to evil: and against the fomes we have the sacraments, against sin grace, against demons God as a helper: therefore it seems that the custody of an Angel is superfluous.

§ 4. 4. Also, the least charity is able to resist whatever temptation: therefore a human having charity does not need another guardian: therefore the custody of an Angel is superfluous: but nothing is superfluous without a vice: therefore the custody of an Angel seems not to ought to be.

§ 5. SOLUTION. It must be said that the custody of an Angel is very necessary for us.

§ 6. To those things which are objected to the contrary, it must be said to the first that this argument is invalid: because this is an accident, insofar as Christ was God, and not simply.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that unction teaches inwardly: and on account of many withdrawing things we also need something persuading and suggesting outwardly: and this is the guardian Angel.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that that does not proceed: because causes of salvation superabound over occasions of perdition for all: and yet there is no superfluity there, because even nature not only gives necessary things, but also comforting things and things holding in the being of the form what it gives: for if nature were to give nothing but form, that form would be destroyed by the slightest agent to the contrary, and thus the product by nature would not remain: and therefore it gives powers conquering contrary dispositions in matter, and resisting subsequent alterations: and thus God also does. Nevertheless we can also say that the things that were touched upon incline to evil, and moreover occasions of evil which we [have from] those suggesting: and therefore against the bad Angel we have a good one, and God against sin, and grace formally disposing so that God may inhabit in us: and against the fomes the sacraments: and against things suggesting evil, the unction which teaches all things.

§ 9. To the last it must be said that charity, as much as it is from itself, suffices well: but as much as it is in us weak and infirm ones, it frequently fails: or to speak more properly, we fail it.

Articulus 3 — It Is Asked Concerning the Time of Guardianship, Namely When an Angel Is Appointed to Us for Guardianship; And Whether Angels Always Guard Those to Whose Guardianship They Are Appointed, or Sometimes Abandon Them

It is inquired concerning the time of custody, namely when an Angel is deputed to us for custody: and, Whether Angels always guard those to whose custody they are deputed, or sometimes abandon them?

§ 10. Thirdly it is asked concerning the time of custody.

§ 11. 1. Jerome seems to say in the Text that an Angel is deputed to us at the rise of nativity.

§ 12. 2. Also, if custody is owed to the infirm: then it is most owed at the time of greatest infirmity: but this is infancy: therefore it is most applied then.

§ 13. 3. Also, Christ said concerning the little ones, Let the children come to me, and do not forbid them. And Matt. 18:10: Their Angels always see, etc. [173]

§ 14. 4. Also, in the womb when the offspring is formed, there is a soul created to the image of God, which in many ways from interior and exterior dangers can be frustrated from the grace of regeneration: it seems that custody is owed to it.

167. Sirach 17:14 (Vulgate).

§ 15. ON THE CONTRARY: A benefit is exhibited in vain to one who cannot recognize [it]: but the little ones in the womb and in infancy do not have the use of reason so as to recognize: therefore the benefit of the ministry of Angels is exhibited to them in vain.

§ 1. FURTHERMORE it is asked here, if Angels always guard, or sometimes abandon the guarded?

§ 2. Now it seems that sometimes they abandon.

1. Jer. 51:9 (actually Josephus): Let us cross over from these seats. And this same voice was heard in the air in the Passion of Christ, as is read in the Gospel of the Nazarenes. And Michael said it, abandoning the Synagogue, and transferring himself to the Church. Therefore sometimes they abandon. [174]

§ 3. 2. Also, Jer. 51:9: We have cured Babylon, and she is not healed: let us forsake her, etc. The Gloss: "The physicians are the Angels, whom we repel from us when we do not acquiesce to their counsel." [175]

§ 4. 3. Also, Jer. 17:6, on that, A land of saltness, the Gloss: "which has neither God as a guest, nor the protection of Angels."

§ 5. 4. Also, let us posit that it is revealed to an Angel that he whom he guards is foreknown to eternal death: and then either he abandons, or not. If he abandons, I have the proposition. If not: then he makes him sin more: because he contemns the monition of the Angel: which he would not do, if he did not have a guardian Angel: therefore it seems that it hinders and does not profit him. Since therefore he at least intends not to hinder him, it seems that he then falls away from him.

§ 6. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. A good one is more fervent in guarding than a bad one in impugning: but a bad one never abandons a good one: therefore neither a good one a bad one.

§ 7. 2. Also, although he could know someone to be damned, nevertheless he can still impede many evils, and thus he attains the effect of his custody.

§ 8. 3. Also, no one is to be despaired of while on the way: but a physician does not abandon one who is not despaired of: therefore since Angels are physicians, they never abandon on the way: and this is to be conceded.

§ 9. To the first therefore it must be said that (as I opine) an Angel is given to the offspring formed and animated in the mother's womb, even before it is born.

§ 10. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it does not behoove the guarded to understand: because the Angel does not do his obedience on account of this, that it may be understood by us, but rather so that the glory of God may be promoted in us.

§ 11. To what is further inquired, it must be said that an Angel never abandons, as the last arguments prove. And all the authorities introduced before have one solution, namely that they are said to abandon when they exhibit tribulation, and thus they abandoned Babylon, otherwise they never abandon.

§ 12. But nevertheless here certain ones say otherwise, namely that sometimes they subtract the office of custody, and do not abandon locally unless the human rushes from sin into sin: and the multitude of sins makes him at length return to God. But this I would not dare to say: because it does not seem consonant with the charity of the Angel that he would not do whatever he can against sin, saving the liberty of the human's choice: because no one is to be coerced to good or to evil. But what one authority says in the third argument, that the physician's abandonment is condemnation, is to be understood, that is, a sign of condemnation, when on account of sins he exposes to tribulation unless you be corrected.

§ 13. To the next, the solution is evident through the objection to the contrary: because although he might know someone to be foreknown, he nevertheless impedes many evils in him: and thus his custody works toward a more tolerable damnation.

Articulus 4 — What Are The Effects Of Angelic Guardianship

How many and what are the effects of Angelic guardianship?

§ 1. Fourthly, it is asked concerning the effect of guardianship. And twelve are assigned by the Masters. § 2. The first is to loose from the bonds of sins: And behold an Angel of the Lord stood by... The chains fell from his hands. [176] § 3. The second is to strengthen on the way. An Angel said to Elijah: Arise, eat, for a great journey remains for thee. [177] § 4. The third is to ward off demons: He himself restrained the demon from my wife. [178] § 5. The fourth is to teach: Now I have come forth to teach thee, and that thou mightest understand. § 6. The fifth is to console: Be of brave mind, etc. § 7. The sixth is to reveal secrets. Three Angels expressed the mystery of the Trinity, and of the unity, and of Christ who was to be born: and therefore there follows what one of the Angels said: Shall I be able to hide from Abraham what I am about to do, since he shall be etc. § 8. The seventh is help against enemies: An Angel of the Lord went forth, and struck down a hundred and eighty-five thousand in the camp of the Assyrians. § 9. The eighth is to rebuke for offenses: An Angel of the Lord went up from Gilgal to the place of Weepers, and said: I brought you out of Egypt, and brought you into the land. And after: And you were unwilling to hear my voice. Why have you done this? § 10. The ninth is to remove hindrances to the good: and this is signified where an Angel struck the firstborn of Egypt, while whom were living the people of the Lord could not depart from Egypt. And: Behold I send my Angel. § 11. The tenth is to lead and conduct on the way: I will lead, and bring back. § 12. The eleventh is to mitigate temptation: and this is signified where Jacob wrestled with an Angel, and received a blessing: and this availed against temptation from a demon. And he was strengthened against his brother, by the Angel saying, etc., and this signified the mitigation of temptation from the world. And the sinew of his thigh withered: which signifies the mitigation of temptation from carnal delights. § 13. The twelfth is to pray and offer prayers: When thou didst pray with tears,... I offered thy prayer to the Lord.

169. Ps. 90:11.

Articulus 5 — Whether the Antichrist Will Have a Guardian Angel; And Whether Christ Had an Angel Deputed to Him

Will Antichrist have a guardian Angel? and, Did Christ have an Angel assigned to him?
