THOMAS BRADWARDINE, FORMERLY ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, ON THE CAUSE OF GOD AGAINST PELAGIUS, AND ON THE POWER OF CAUSES, TO HIS MERTONIANS, IN THREE BOOKS.

BY THE COMMAND OF THE MOST REVEREND GEORGE ABBOT, ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY; BY THE LABOR AND STUDY OF DR. HENRY SAVILE, WARDEN OF MERTON COLLEGE IN THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD.

Now first published from manuscript codices.

LONDON, FROM THE NORTON PRESS, AT THE SHOP OF JOHN BILL. 1618.

TO THE MOST SERENE AND MOST POWERFUL PRINCE JAMES, BY THE GRACE OF GOD KING OF GREAT BRITAIN, FRANCE, AND IRELAND, ASSERTOR AND DEFENDER OF THE TRUE FAITH, THE BEST, GREATEST, AND MOST INDULGENT PATRON OF GOOD LETTERS:

THIS WORK OF THOMAS BRADWARDINE, FORMERLY ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, RESCUED FROM NEGLECT, HENRY SAVILE, MOST DEVOTED TO HIS MAJESTY, DEDICATES AND CONSECRATES AS A MONUMENT OF PERPETUAL OBEDIENCE.

TO THE READER.

Wishing to say a few words by way of preface about the author, the first thing that presents itself is his name, which is written variously in our old books: Thomas de Bradwardina, and de Bredewardina — the latter being how it is consistently written in the Public Records. Foreign writers almost all call him Bravardinus, with the name deflected for the sake, I think, of euphony. Gerson, in Book III of On the Spiritual Life, writes Bragwardinus; the author of the Catalogue of Witnesses and Gesner write Branduardinus. In John Bacon (or Baconthorpe, as others prefer), on Sentences IV, distinction 1, question 4, folio 86 of the Venice edition of 1527, he is called Bradinkardin — by a disgraceful error of the printer, not of Bacon himself, who, being a contemporary of Bradwardine (for both came from the same hive, namely Merton College), could not have been ignorant of the correct spelling of his fellow's name.

Concerning his place of birth, I once thought he was born at Bradwardin castle and village (that castle is situated, as our most learned and diligent Camden attests, on the bank of the river Wye, some miles above Hereford). But I was recalled from this not improbable opinion by the express words of Bradwardine himself, Book III, chapter 22, page 559 of this edition, where he hints, not obscurely as it seems to me, that he was a native of Chichester. The words are: "By a similar reasoning, whatever I now write at Oxford, my father would write at Chichester, because he begot me the writer — indeed my grandfather and great-grandfather," etc. So that Bale and the author of British Antiquities seem not to have erred greatly in asserting he was born at Hartfield in the diocese of Chichester — on what authorities or moved by what arguments, I do not know. With me, certainly, the author's own words will outweigh others, until something more certain is brought forward by others. In the meantime, it seems likely to me that his ancestors were born at the castle or village of Bradwardin, and thence acquired the surname for themselves and their posterity, even when they migrated elsewhere (which is very common among our countrymen) — and that some one of these Bradwardine folk, having thus established himself in new quarters at Chichester, passed on to his son, our Thomas, that name which was already established and hereditary.

In what year he was born, just as I would assert nothing for certain (for the beginnings of great men are often obscure, whose endings are most renowned), so since it is established that he was Proctor of the University of Oxford in the year 1325, I would believe he was born around the year of our Lord 1290, in the middle period of King Edward the First.

After completing his boyhood studies, he was admitted to Merton College, Oxford, in the time of Edward the Second, where he was Proctor of the University, as I said; for I found it thus written in the Catalogue of Chancellors and Proctors of that University: "Year 1325. William de Alburwike, Chancellor of Oxford, and Richard de Kamshall his Commissary; Proctors: William de Harington and Thomas de Bradwardina."

In that University, at a more mature age — in the time, I think, of Robert Trengre as Warden — he attained, says Bale in his first edition (which some think was wholly copied from Leland), "such an increase of learning that he was made Master of the highest faculty, and finally supreme Chancellor" (about which, with the good leave of Bale and Leland, I may be permitted to express doubt), "in which office he so conducted himself," he says, "that he earned great praise from all."

In this scholarly career he drew a solid philosophy from the fountains of Aristotle and Plato, but his industry shone forth chiefly in the mathematical arts and in theology. In mathematics he so excelled that that age produced perhaps no one equal to him. Witness are the astronomical tables, exquisitely drawn up, of the equations of the planets and the conjunctions and oppositions of the luminaries, which I have in my possession, carefully written out by hand in a rather thick volume. Witness his treatise on the proportions of velocities; another on speculative arithmetic; another on speculative geometry (which book Vives praises in Book IV of On the Handing Down of the Disciplines) — all published long ago in Paris.

In theology, however, the palm is held — for he composed very many other works in every kind of discipline, if we believe Bale, which I have not handled — the palm, I say, is easily held by this book which we now publish from six manuscripts against the treachery of the Pelagians, a heresy continually springing up in the Church in every subsequent age, as experience teaches. This work, largely put together and woven from his Oxford lectures (as he himself tells us in the preface), he polished and published at the request of his Mertonians, when he was Chancellor of London.

The title is that which I have placed at the head, in nearly all the manuscripts I have seen. In the book of New College, Oxford, however, the title is: "The Summa of the Profound Doctor on the Cause of God against the Pelagians, and on the Power of Causes, the Power of God the Cause of Causes." In the Vatican Library, in nearly the same manner: "The Summa of the Profound Doctor Thomas Bradwardine on the Cause of God against the Pelagians, and on the Power of God the Cause of Causes."

This book, as soon as it was published, was received with such applause from all the Doctors that it was copied into nearly every library in all of Europe. Gerson, as to a well-known author, frequently refers to it in his books On the Spiritual Life. Gregory of Rimini cites it in his commentary on Sentences II — to say nothing of Pico, Volaterran, Cassander, the author of the Catalogue of Witnesses (who poured the whole preface of this book into his own compilation), and more recently Luther, Perkins, and others — while it still lay hidden in the dust and neglect of libraries.

For concerning Geoffrey Chaucer, almost a contemporary of those times, the prince of our poets, a man of keen judgment and not merely of witty genius — who did not keep silent about our Thomas — it would be wrong for us to be silent here. He, being not inconsiderably versed in philosophical and theological matters, and having apparently perused these recently published lucubrations of the Archbishop of Canterbury, mixing, as was his custom, the serious with the jocular, in a certain Canterbury tale touches in passing on the difficult question of God's foreknowledge and the contingency of things, and ranks Bradwardine with Augustine — as one, namely, of those who in debating this difficult controversy "sifted the flour down to the bran" (for such is his familiar and elegant expression), that is, drew forth the truth sunk in the depths. Let us bring him forth, if you please — and it does please to hear the old English simplicity, even of his style — in his own comic buskin:

But what that God afore wote, must needs bee, After the opinion of certaine clerkis. Witenesse of him that any clerke is, That in Schoole is great altercation In this matter, and great disputation, And hath been of an hundred thousand men. But I ne cannot boult it to the bren, As can the holy doctour S. Austin, Or Boece, or the Bishop Bradwardin. Whether that Gods worthy foreweting Straineth me needly to doe a thing, (Needly clepe I simple necessite) Or if the free choice be granted me To doe the same thing, or do it nought, Though God forewot it or it was wrought. Or if his weting straineth neuer a dele But by necessite conditionele. I woll not haue to done of such matere.

[Savile provides a Latin verse translation of the Chaucer passage.]

To return to our Bradwardine: the cognomen of "the Profound" — whether imposed by the Pope, as is recorded in an old Merton register, or received by the common vote of Doctors throughout the Christian world — so prevailed regarding him that Bradwardine is no less known by the cognomen of "the Profound Doctor" than Scotus by "the Subtle Doctor" or Aquinas by "the Angelic Doctor."

And so that the character of this book may be better known to the Reader, it will not be beside the point to offer a few preliminary observations.

First, our Thomas, being a supreme mathematician — as appears from the foregoing — did not depart from his art even in treating theological matters. And so he was the first, as far as I know, and the only one to attempt this method in theology: to weave theological matters on a mathematical thread — namely by positing first two hypotheses, as it were principles, and from them demonstrating the next propositions and deducing corollaries, even drawing proofs from Euclid; then from the hypotheses and what has been previously demonstrated, weaving together all the rest in a continuous series to the end of the work. The result is that his conclusions may perhaps seem to some to be drawn from too high. But if in his lemmas and propositions he could not always achieve that mathematical exactitude in every respect, the Reader should remember that this is not to be imputed to the author but to the subject matter he treats. For as the Philosopher most rightly teaches, [one must not demand the same precision in all inquiries].

There is also another thing that may perhaps somewhat offend delicate ears: the citation of certain apocryphal or plainly spurious books — such as the Secret of Secrets attributed to Aristotle, the Cow of Plato, Ovid's little book On the Old Woman, the Poimandres of Hermes, and other rubbish of this kind. But this must surely be forgiven to the great virtues of our Bradwardine, and indeed to the times themselves — for that age was the least critical of all. Add to this that he himself more than once calls into question the reliability of these books.

If anyone should have enough leisure from his own affairs to inspect the passages cited throughout from the Fathers and correct them from the sources, and to shed light on the passages drawn from Aristotle and Plato — either by appending the Greek or by supplying another somewhat more tolerable translation — he would indeed render a good and useful service to our Bradwardine, and certainly earn great gratitude from his studious readers. But let that be the concern of those who will publish this work anew; let it be enough for me, at this advancing age, to have faithfully not begrudged to posterity such a Bradwardine as we found him in the manuscript codices.

Now, to touch briefly on his civil and public life: after holding the office of Proctor in the University of Oxford, and (if we believe Bale) administering the dignity of supreme Chancellor there with great praise, after a theological professorship at Oxford for many years, he attached himself to Richard de Bury, Bishop of Durham — easily the most learned man of that age, and a singular patron of all learned men, who (as he himself testifies in a little book he published entitled Philobiblon) was carried away by a certain mad love of collecting books from everywhere, as that age allowed. In this man's household, as I said, Bradwardine lived for some time, together with seven others largely from the Merton fellowship — men of the greatest genius and the greatest learning. On this matter it will be worthwhile to hear the words of the Durham history, most worthy of record for more than one reason:

"He [Richard de Bury, Bishop of Durham] always had many clerks in his retinue, among whom were Thomas Bradwardine, afterward Bishop of Canterbury; Richard FitzRalph, afterward Archbishop of Armagh; Walter Burley; John Mauduit; Robert Holcot; Richard Kilwington (alias Kilmington) — all Doctors of Theology; Richard Bentworth, afterward Bishop of London; and Walter Seagrave, afterward Bishop of Chichester. And every day at table he was accustomed to have a reading, unless it was prevented by the arrival of magnates; and after dinner every day, a disputation with the aforementioned clerks, unless a greater cause prevented it."

Our Bradwardine was then made Chancellor of London (which perhaps gave occasion to Bale's error), and was of such integrity and innocence that to this not exactly rich benefice he scarcely and reluctantly allowed a Lincoln canonry to be added. At which time, not for his learning alone but much more for the holiness of his character and life, he was chosen by Archbishop Stratford of Canterbury to be confessor to King Edward the Third. Accompanying the King constantly in the French war — which was waged with such great resources of two most powerful kings, with such spirit, and with such variety of events, things generally inclining toward the English — he so tempered the King's spirits, fierce with victories, and restrained military insolence by frequently preaching before the army with such prudence and gentleness of words, that there were not lacking among the writers of those times those who thought that those famous victories of Edward should be attributed to this man's sanctity and virtues rather than to anyone's either courage or prudence.

After the death of Stratford, the monks of Canterbury postulated our Thomas as Archbishop — but this postulation was in vain, King Edward refusing to release such a man from his retinue. But when John Ufford was nominated and immediately died, and the monks had postulated Bradwardine by a repeated election, with the King's consent and the Pope's, by the supreme agreement of all orders, without canvassing and with no one dissenting — which was rare in those times — he was declared Archbishop and consecrated in the Church of the Friars Minor at Avignon. There, since he did not well know the manners of the Curia — a man who had spent his life from youth in the schools and in military camps — he was mocked by those foppish courtiers, though not without the displeasure of grave and modest men, as a rustic.

After his consecration, returning home, he had his temporalities restored and did fealty to the King in the customary manner, as is evident from the records of August 22, 1349, in the 23rd year of Edward III. He survived not many weeks thereafter, dying at Lambeth in the following October, without having completed the enthronement ceremonies — a man most worthy of a longer life, whether we regard the uprightness of his character or his learning, singular for that age.

PREFACE OF THOMAS DE BRADWARDINE, CHANCELLOR OF LONDON, TO THE THREE BOOKS ON THE CAUSE OF GOD AGAINST PELAGIUS, AND ON THE POWER OF CAUSES.

I am unceasingly solicited by the accumulated requests and repeated petitions of many great men to commit to an enduring written record what I recently set forth in a passing voice while doing battle in the scholastic camps on the cause of God against Pelagius and on the power of causes. But without doubt, just as God's friends in God's cause urge me forward and encourage me to undertake this, so the friends of Pelagius — far more numerous than the former — call me back and deter me.

For behold — and I report this only because I am touched with grief of heart within — just as of old against one single Prophet of God, 850 prophets of Baal and the like were found, to whom an innumerable people adhered, so also today in this cause. How many, O Lord, today fight with Pelagius for free will against Your gratuitous grace, and against Paul, the spiritual champion of grace! How many also today disdain Your gratuitous grace, and protest that free will alone suffices for salvation! Or if they use grace, they pretend perfunctorily that it is necessary, and boast that they merit it by the powers of their own free will — so that it may seem at least not freely given but sold! How many also, O omnipotent God, presumptuously trusting in the power of their own will, refuse the help of Your cooperation in their works, saying with the wicked: "Depart from us"! How many furthermore, O Lord, exalting the freedom of their own will, flee from Your service! Or if they confess at least with their lips that You cooperate with them, with those proud and hateful citizens of Yours of old, they refuse to have You reign over them — indeed, more proud than Lucifer, not content with equality with You, they most shamelessly strive to reign over You, the King of Kings! For they do not shrink from asserting that in their common action, their will goes before as mistress and Yours follows as handmaid; that they go before as lords and You follow as a servant; that they command as kings and You obey as a subject. Indeed, they attribute to their own will in contingent future things every kind of freedom — to such an extent that even against the prophetic voice they claim exemption from Your subjection, and endeavor to cast down Your most free, most omnipotent, and most immutable will, when these things shall have passed into the past, from the supreme citadel of its ancient freedom and to subject it to the irreparable servitude of a novel necessity.

O Lord my God, only with groaning do I recall how many and how great lawless judges plot to absolve and reconcile the pestilent Pelagians, long ago condemned and banished from the borders of the whole Church! How many swollen advocates shout on their behalf! How many unconscionable proctors manage their case! How many furthermore, O Lord, not having artificial arguments, turn to inartificial ones, and to exalt the Pelagians' side at least with clamors, horrible insults, abuse, laughter, and gestures, strive to depress Your side! And how many and how innumerable favor them! For nearly the whole world has gone after Pelagius into error.

Arise therefore, O Lord, judge Your own cause, and sustain the one who sustains You; protect, strengthen, and console him. For You know that I have undertaken so great a cause — I, so small — trusting not in my own strength but in Yours.

But as I was supplicating and praying thus for a long time and anxiously, behold recently, in the silence of a certain night, after I had poured out my heart before the Lord, falling asleep I learned and found that He is the one who after the tempest makes calm, and after weeping pours in exultation, and is near to all who call upon Him truly.

For I seemed to see myself, surrounded by the light of day, lifted up far above the earth into the air, and thus proceeding fearlessly from the east toward the western parts, ascending. And Pelagius, coming from the opposite direction, seized my left hand and interlocked his fingers with mine, and tried with all his violence to drag me down to the earth. And I, girded with confidence in my own strength, resisted him greatly, and such a struggle, not a little anxious, lasted for a long time. But with Pelagius continually prevailing and almost dragging me down to the lowest depths, I received in myself the answer of despair. Yet resisting with all my might, I fled to divine help with my whole heart — and immediately Pelagius, his hand released, was thrust headlong down, and with broken neck fell upon the earth, and with closed eyes lay dead on his back. But I remained above the earth, ascending and proceeding in the air as before, rejoicing more pleasantly and marveling.

Hence, strengthened by the spirit of fortitude, I drew hope that I — Christ's little one — would triumph over the proud Pelagius, the pestilent prince of the Pelagians (and therefore over his entire army): not I, however, but his grace with me — though I labored with it according to my powers. For it is not my cause, nor my war, but God's — the Lord of knowledge, of hosts, and of powers — and I under Him sustain His side. From whose faces, then, from whose assaults, from whose furies or terrors shall I tremble, fortified by the most secure protection of so great a Patron? Wherefore let whoever is the Lord's join himself to me — indeed not to me, but let us both be joined to the Lord; let us stand together — who shall stand against us? For I know that one man, with whom the Lord is, will pursue a thousand adversaries, and two will put ten thousand to flight.

Moreover, just as the ancient Pelagians, puffed up with the windy name of secular learning, despised the theological court and demanded the philosophical one, so also the moderns. For I have heard certain advocates of Pelagius — though far advanced in sacred studies — affirming that Pelagius could never be refuted by natural and philosophical reason, but was barely argued against somehow by certain rather bare theological authorities, and chiefly by the authority of the Church, which did not please the grandees.

For this reason I resolved to reform them through philosophical reasons and authorities.

And because furthermore all Pelagians commonly, both old and new, strive to pervert the canonical Scriptures and the writings of the Catholic Doctors to the ruin of their own perversity, I thought it right to elucidate more sincerely a solid understanding of the same. And because they come in immoderate multitudes and try to overwhelm God's side, I resolved to restrain them with a great throng of God's witnesses, lest I too should seem solitary against so many beasts — especially in a cause so uncertain and sublime.

And who could accomplish this in a few words? For in how many volumes have the holy Fathers cut down the forest of Pelagian heresies! And how many poisonous shoots from the old roots still multiply and grow afresh! For as it was anciently, so it is now.

For first, when their Heresiarch Lucifer — refusing to be subject to God, but wishing to be co-equal — was cast down by Michael, there arose Cain, thinking that the sinner is by no means justified freely by God through grace freely given, but through antecedent merit. When he was struck down by divine vengeance, there arose Nimrod — who, as Josephus recounts, persuaded men that they should by no means ascribe to God the fact that happiness befell them, but that this was furnished to them by their own power, and that they should place their hope in their own strength, not in God. The multitude too was inclined to obey his commands, regarding service to God as a heavy servitude. And so he drew men away from the fear of God, made them arrogant, and brought them to injury and contempt of God and to tyranny.

When his sacrilegious presumption was checked by Abraham the Patriarch, there arose those vain and grandiose speakers who thought that their lips and words were their own, and therefore disdained to have God as lord. Their children, the Sadducees, according to Josephus, seem to affirm that good and evil are set before men's choice, and that each chooses this or that by his own will, without God. When these were corrected by the Prophet, there arose certain Hebrew, Greek, and Roman Christians who said they had received the grace of faith by their own merits. When these were refuted by the Apostle, there arose Pelagius the Briton, who waged proud wars against the grace of God and His help. When he was condemned by the Catholic Fathers, Julian and Celestius renewed the same heresy — which, extinguished by the orthodox Fathers, was raised again by Cassian, whom Prosper successfully chastised.

But around the same time the same heresy began to sprout most widely in Britain. On account of which — as the Venerable Bede in his Ecclesiastical History of the English People and Henry of Huntingdon in his History of the English relate — Germanus of Auxerre and Lupus of Troyes, bishops, crossed the ocean (despite the demons stirring up a most savage storm at sea) and vigorously demolished it with arguments not only vocal but also real — namely with manifest miracles. But behold, shortly afterward the pestilent shoots of the heresy already cut down grew green again, as the same chroniclers recorded — and the same Germanus and Severus, Bishop of Trier, coming to Britain, took care to cut them down again. Still before and after the passage of time, the diligence of the Roman See purged Scotland, infected with the remnants of this pest, with salutary letters — as the same Venerable Bede attests. Saint Prosper also mentions these things.

And although this barren fig tree has been cut down so many times, uprooted so many times, burned, incinerated, and trampled to nothing so many times — how broadly and densely it still does not cease to germinate, and to propagate its vicious suckers, the more subtly than before, the more dangerously!

Burning with zeal, therefore, for the cause of God, knowing what I do, I put my hand into a terrible flame. For I am not ignorant how the pestilent Pelagians will bark against me with seething spirit and tumultuous clamors, and will endeavor to tear this little paper with savage teeth — and those especially are accustomed to criticize others' work most freely who have produced nothing of their own.

But did not the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians rise up against Abraham for this cause, as Josephus reports? Did not the ancient true Prophets suffer very many things from the pseudo-prophets for the cause of God? Did not certain unlearned men charge the most learned Paul with madness, and distort his illustrious Epistles? Did not Julian, Pelagius's pupil, snarl at the most glorious Augustine — imitator of the Apostle and most valiant defender against the ungrateful Pelagians against grace — even while he was still living, with how many many accusations, and boasted that he would winnow his books and lay bare and pierce the impiety of his opinions? Did not other defenders of Pelagius in Gaul, after Augustine had passed from death to life, presume to criticize the same man's writings? And who or what manner of man am I? I know that I am not better than such great Fathers of mine, nor greater than my Lord. Nevertheless, with all my heart I always desire a just corrector — not the oil of the sinner — who mercifully rebuking, persecutes not the person but the vice, not the man but the error. For this is what I would wish, and I believe I do, for myself and for others — God is my witness.

Furthermore, whoever wishes to treat this one cause thoroughly, it seems necessary that, beginning from a higher point, he should discourse carefully on the power of all causes. But considering my own measure, I am greatly deterred by the inaccessible sublimity of these matters, the impenetrable depth, the impassable immensity, and the inextricable difficulty.

Is it not regarded among the philosophers as most difficult, and therefore fitting for the wise man alone, to know the causes of things? Wherefore the Poet says:

Happy is he who has been able to know the causes of things.

For to investigate the natural and proximate causes of beings involves no small difficulty and labor. How much more to transcend the whole universe of these causes by the flight of a mind weighed down by the corruption of the body, and to penetrate even to the impenetrable sanctuary of supernatural, most lofty, inaccessible, and invisible causes — and to behold them penetratingly, as it were with the blinking eye of a night-owl — and to elevate others in similar fashion, and to purify their eyes so that they too may similarly contemplate them!

Does not this inquiry involve the investigation of the universality of causes, of the one first cause, of the production, preservation, and every action of things; of divine power, knowledge, and will; of foreknowledge and providence; of predestination, election, reprobation, and grace; of fate, chance, and fortune; of free will, merit, and sin; of the necessity or contingency of future things — with so many and such great dependent and emergent anxieties?

This theory, therefore, comprehends the more recondite mysteries of all Logic, Physics, Astronomy, Ethics, and Metaphysics or divine science. Here also is the most debated problem of all nations and languages, degrees, sexes, and persons — from whose noisy ventilation not even the unlearned, nor even the old woman, restrains herself.

Let your discretion consider, I beg, how perfunctorily all those glorious Philosophers scarcely greeted from the threshold this so talkative Muse. Wherefore Wisdom herself, responding to a certain pupil of hers who was anxiously inquiring about these things, said: "You call me to a matter the greatest of all in seeking, for which scarcely anything exhausted is enough."

Did not the Prophets, seeing most clearly the excellence of certain of these secrets, with dazzled gaze marvel at them as though bleary-eyed and unknowing, and therefore complaining? Did not he whose like was not on earth, not explaining but complainingly wondering at one small article of divine providence, say: "Bear with me, that I too may speak; and after my words, if it seems good, laugh. Is my disputation against a man, so that I should not rightly be saddened? Attend to me and be astonished, and place your finger upon your mouth. For when I remember, I am afraid, and trembling seizes my flesh: why do the wicked live, are they elevated and strengthened with riches?" (Job 21).

Did not he who was found after God's own heart, who rejoiced that he understood above all who taught him, even above the elders — did he not, being zealous over the prosperity of sinners, with feet almost moved and steps nearly spilled, conclude that he had justified his heart in vain and castigated himself uselessly — and immediately rebuking himself for this, because he would thus condemn God's children, added that he had tried to understand, but that this was labor, until entering the sanctuary of God he might there attain understanding? (Psalm 72)

Did not that beloved of the Lord who surpassed all in wisdom complain greatly that all things happen equally to the just and the unjust, and declare this to be the worst of all things — indeed, judging it most vain that the just are shaken by adversities as though they were wicked, and the wicked are fostered by prosperity as though they were just — and profess that man, even a wise one, can attain no reason for all the works of God? (Ecclesiastes)

Did not that Apostle, that most brilliant vessel of election and so great a secretary of God — who was even caught up to the third heaven and made privy to divine secrets — searching a certain gulf of this abyss, swallowed up by its depth, cry out: "O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How incomprehensible are His judgments and how unsearchable His ways!" (Romans 11)

Here, then, is the infinite Chaos of Anaxagoras; here the inextricable Labyrinth of Daedalus; here the monstrous miracle of the Hydra — indeed a thing more monstrous than the Hydra. For in the Hydra, when one head was cut off, three immediately grew back; but here, as both experience and Wisdom attest, when one doubt is cut away, innumerable others are born. Who, then, will unravel so many and such sinuous involutions of things in a brief volume?

Is not this also the place which the wise call "the Fall of the Wise"? Are not the perils of Charybdis and Scylla here to be dreaded by anyone? For how many, desiring to pass by Charybdis, have struck upon torn Scylla! And how many, seeking to avoid Scylla, have fallen into the whirlpool of Charybdis! Who then will presume to navigate safely through the middle?

But I know what I shall do: I shall commit myself to that ship which cannot perish — the ship of Peter. For in it our one Author and Master, Christ, sitting most securely, is recorded as having taught — mystically indicating to us that with Peter's little boat, with the Roman Church, the authority and mastery of all Christian doctrine would remain.

To the judgment of this so authoritative and great mistress, therefore, I fully subject and entirely submit myself and all my writings, written or to be written. And I most urgently beg with all my vows for her protection, where I have fought against God's enemies; her correction, where I have erred; her approbation, where I have judged rightly.

Against all these difficulties, each and every one, that strong Helper sweetly encourages me, with whom no word is impossible or difficult. For I know, O Lord God, I know that You do not despise, desert, or abandon those who sustain You; but You sustain, teach, cherish, surround, strengthen, and confirm them. Trusting therefore in this confidence, I take up Your cause, about to serve continually under Your most unconquerable standards.

For those who deign to inspect this little work: concerning the citations of Aristotle's text, it should be noted that where Averroes expounds by commentary, the citation follows his divisions and sections of the commentaries; but elsewhere it follows the divisions of chapters customary among others.

CHAPTERS OF THE FIRST BOOK

CHAPTER I. First, he sets forth two suppositions: the first is that God is supremely perfect and supremely good, to such a degree that nothing more perfect or better can exist. The second is that there is no infinite regress in beings, but in every genus there is one first.

COROLLARY

Part I. It has a moral corollary containing 40 parts, against 40 errors, the first of which is against Protagoras, who doubted that God exists.

II. Against Diagoras and the fool who deny that God exists.

III. Against those who doubt or deny that God really, equivalently, or supereminently possesses every virtue and every goodness, and universally whatever it is better to have than not to have; and that He is good in every way and in every manner, and possesses every kind of goodness that it is better to be and to have than not to be and not to have; and that He possesses no vice or wickedness; and universally does not possess anything that it is better not to have than to have, nor possesses anything in any manner such that not having it would be better than having it, nor possesses anything in vain or superfluously; and that He is always supremely happy, blessed, and actual or in act, so that nothing happier, more blessed, or more actual could exist.

IV. Against those who deny that God is of absolutely infinite virtue and goodness.

V. Against those who say that God does not fully suffice for Himself but needs another.

VI. Against those who believe that God is not necessarily but contingently supremely perfect and God; and that He is mutable, susceptible to anger, appeasable, capable of sadness, joy, or any other new passion; and who hold that "God" is an accidental and not an absolutely essential name.

VII. Against those who deny that God is omnipotent actively, and incapable of being acted upon passively—that is, that He cannot suffer anything from another.

VIII. Against those who hold that God is not a rational substance and power, having intellect and free will, actually knowing and willing; and who think that the divine will is not universally efficacious—that is, not capable of being impeded, frustrated, or deficient in any way.

IX. Against those who believe that God is ignorant of something.

X. Against those who imagine that God is composed of human limbs or any other diverse parts, and who deny that He is the simplest substance, utterly indivisible, having no composition, divisibility, or magnitude—that is, bodily magnitude.

XI. Against the Sabians and their wise men who worship the heavens as God.

XII. Against worshippers of the Sun or Moon, Mars or Jupiter, or any celestial sign or signs, and universally of any part of the sky.

XIII. Against those who fabricate temporal gods for themselves—humans, animals, trees, fire, or any such thing.

XIV. Against the foolish triflers who worship a burdensome multitude of equal gods of the same species or nature.

XV. Against those who imagine many equal gods, differing in nature or species.

XVI. Against those who posit a confusion of many gods of unequal power and disparate dignity, whether of the same or different species.

XVII. Against those who deny that God is one and not many, or who affirm it is possible for there to be many; and who deny that it is absolutely necessary for there to be one and not more, or who affirm it is possible for there to be more.

XVIII. Against those who posit many first principles absolutely contrary to one another, of which none is reducible to another, nor all to something common to them—for example, good and evil—and who consequently dream further of two or more such gods.

XIX. Against the poets who falsely claim that God envies studious or other men.

XX. Against those who fabricate indecent and base gods—eating, drinking, consorting with women, delighting in dishonest, base, and theatrical affairs or games.

XXI. Against idolaters.

XXII. Against the Arians.

XXIII. Against the Donatists.

XXIV. Against the Sabellians.

XXV. Against those who do not distinguish, but simply concede that God is of infinite virtue and infinite power, even intensively.

XXVI. Against the painters of God who depict Him with various qualities, attributes, habits, or accidental acts really diverse from Him, or with any accidents whatsoever.

XXVII. Against despair, whether from the greatness or from the multitude of sins.

XXVIII. Against the Cainites who believe that God admits no sinner to the grace of reconciliation unless he has first made satisfaction by meriting as much or more than he sinned.

XXIX. Against the Pelagians or Cainites who imagine that God gives no benefit freely to anyone, but only for preceding merit.

XXX. Against those unskilled in the art of loving, who do not know that God is to be loved for His own sake, and all other things for God's sake, and that all human acts are to be finally ordered toward Him for His own sake, and that He is to be loved above all things; and who think that a man, for the sake of gaining or preserving however many goods, or of removing however many penal evils already possessed, or of guarding against those not yet possessed—being able not to do these things—ought not, at least knowingly, to do anything, even the slightest thing, against God, against a divine command, against a divine prohibition, offending Him even in the slightest way, against the rule of conscience divinely instituted, or to sin knowingly to any degree however small.

XXXI. Against the unbridled who say that all things happen equally to the good and the wicked; that some evil goes unpunished or some good unrewarded; and who falsely claim that God punishes someone abundantly—namely beyond what is deserved, or even to what is deserved—and rewards someone sparingly—namely less than deserved, or not beyond what is deserved; and who also imagine that it is never fitting for God's infinite pity and mercy to punish any offense, but always to mercifully leave everything unpunished.

XXXII. Against the philosophers who presume to be able to know God fully and His every action; who therefore mock Christians for believing certain things about God and His wondrous actions, and about the actions of creatures by divine power, which they cannot demonstrate by the way of human reason.

XXXIII. Against the philosophers who deny the possibility of creation, annihilation, and re-creation.

XXXIV. Against the philosophers who deny the possibility of the creation of the world.

XXXV. Against the philosophers and heretics who deny the possibility of the conception and birth from a Virgin, and who say that Christ was in no way born of holy Mary, ever Virgin.

XXXVI. Against the Epicureans and Sadducees who say that no spirit exists, and who irrationally deny the immortality of the rational soul; and against Averroes, who asserts that all men have a single rational soul.

XXXVII. Against the philosophers who deny that the motion of the heavens and the generation of human beings can cease, that the dead can rise again with their own bodies, that the good can ascend to heaven and the wicked descend to hell, and that both can live thus for eternity.

XXXVIII. Against the philosophers and heretics who deny that temporal merit can reasonably be rewarded with an everlasting reward, or that temporal sin can justly be punished with eternal punishment.

XXXIX. Against the philosophers and heretics who deny that there will be a future resurrection of the dead to a blessed or miserable life according to the difference of merits; and who concede that it will happen, either immediately after death or after the space of a great year, in bestial or human bodies, alien or one's own, for a temporal worldly life customary to beasts or humans, lasting through the usual period; and who believe that universally all the dead, both good and evil, will rise to everlasting life and blessedness, and none to everlasting punishment and misery; and who think the good will possess eternal blessedness, but not in heaven, and the wicked will have eternal misery, but not in hell, but that both will remain together on earth; and who say furthermore that the bodies of the good will in no way be transformed to a better, purer, and more heavenly condition in the future blessedness, nor will they then be immortal, but will remain in their former state; and that the bodies of the wicked living in eternal torments will by no means endure eternally; and who shamelessly imagine that the eternal happiness of the good will consist in the customary pleasures of the flesh, or in something or some things other than God.

XL. Against Aristotle, who asserts that the world had no temporal beginning, was not created, that the generation of human beings will not be terminated, and that the world or the present state of the world will never come to an end. Also against Anaximander, Plato, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, and the vain talkers of the Moors on the same subject.

CHAPTER II. That God is the necessary preserver of all other things. It has a corollary with three parts.

COROLLARY

I. That no created thing suffices to preserve another.

II. That it is necessary for God to preserve every creature through Himself and immediately.

III. That it is necessary for God to preserve every creature more immediately than any created cause.

CHAPTER III. That God is the necessary efficient cause of every thing made. It has a corollary with three parts.

COROLLARY

I. That nothing can make anything without God.

II. That nothing can make anything unless God Himself immediately makes that same thing.

III. That nothing can make anything unless God makes that same thing more immediately than any other maker.

CHAPTER IV. That whenever any creature moves, God necessarily co-moves. It has a corollary of four parts.

COROLLARY

I. That nothing can move anything without God Himself properly co-moving the same thing.

II. That nothing can move anything without God immediately moving the same thing.

III. That nothing can move anything without God moving the same thing more immediately than any other mover.

IV. That no proposition attributing anything created to any secondary cause is absolutely immediate.

CHAPTER V. That God is not mutable in any way. It has a corollary of five parts.

COROLLARY

I. That God essentially and presentially is necessarily everywhere, not only in the world and in all its parts,

II. But also outside the world in the infinite imaginary space or void.

III. Whence He can truly be called immense and uncircumscribed.

IV. Whence the answer to the ancient questions of the Gentiles and heretics seems clear: "Where is your God?" and "Where was God before the world?"

V. Whence it is likewise clearly evident that a void of body can exist, but a void of God, never.

CHAPTER VI. That God has distinct knowledge of all things. It has a corollary: That God has distinct knowledge of all things—not only present, past, and future, but also of all things possible and impossible, imaginable and knowable in any way; whence He can truly be called omniscient, just as He can be called omnipotent.

CHAPTER VII. He objects against the sixth chapter and resolves the objection.

CHAPTER VIII. That God has volition and love both generally and specifically toward all things.

CHAPTER IX. That the divine will is the efficient cause of every thing made, the mover or moving principle of every motion, and universally the most loving mother of all things, nurse, and life-giving preserver. It has a corollary: That all things that have been made were made by the divine will, and all things that will be made will be made by it.

CHAPTER X. That the divine will is universally efficacious, insuperable, and necessary in causing; not capable of being impeded or frustrated in any way. It has a corollary: That when God wills to make or bring about something, through Himself or through any other thing in any way, it necessarily follows that it comes about in that way; nor does He, in our manner of striving, apply other forces; nor is there in Him, beyond the intellect dictating and the will consenting, any other executive power to be posited; nor does He stand differently when acting than when resting; and that the divine will is the first free principle.

CHAPTER XI. That the first necessary and true simple principle is God; and that the first complex principle is absolutely about God—namely, "God exists," "God knows all things," "God wills all things," or something similar.

CHAPTER XII. He shows what that first principle is like—namely, that it is affirmative—and that it is "God exists" or "God is God."

CHAPTER XIII. From these premises he infers, as corollaries, twelve parts:

I. That act is absolutely prior to potency.

II. That being is absolutely prior to non-being.

III. That the necessary is prior to the possible of contradiction.

IV. That the necessary is prior to the impossible.

V. That pure necessary being, or pure necessity, is absolutely prior to everything else, and is the first root and primary foundation of all other things.

VI. That the first complex principle is supremely and purely necessary and firm.

VII. That the necessary is in no way rightly defined through the possible or through the impossible.

VIII. That necessary being cannot be absolutely defined.

IX. That an affirmative proposition is prior to every negative, and that every true negative is reduced to another prior affirmative which is the cause of its truth.

X. That the first cause of every true negation is in God.

XI. That God is the first cause of every non-being.

XII. That the first cause of every impossibility and incompatibility is in God.

CHAPTER XIV. That the divine will is the cause of every future and past thing being such as it is. And it has a corollary: If God ceased to exist, nothing would be past or future, true or false, possible or impossible, necessary or contingent, nor could anything be. From this the opposite evidently follows—namely, that God Himself, and thus something, has existed before, exists now, and will exist. Oh, how necessary is this being, whom it is so impossible ever to cease to be! And that for God in any way not to exist most necessarily contains and implies a contradiction; and that "necessary being" seems to be the most proper name of God.

CHAPTER XV. That the things known are not the causes of divine knowledge.

CHAPTER XVI. Against certain people who say that the things known are a sine qua non cause of divine knowledge, but not a true cause.

CHAPTER XVII. He distinguishes the objects of divine knowledge: some in a certain way precede His knowledge, and some follow from it. He shows that the latter are in some way the cause of divine knowledge, the former never. And it has a corollary: that divine knowledge, which is His simple awareness, is truly the cause of every thing made—not merely a sine qua non cause.

CHAPTER XVIII. He distinguishes divine knowledge into what is in a certain way simple and complex; he likewise distinguishes complex knowables into those that are in a certain way prior to and those posterior to the divine will; and he shows that the former are in some way the cause of divine complex knowledge, but the latter in no way—rather, God knows those through His will.

CHAPTER XIX. He objects and responds.

CHAPTER XX. He likewise distinguishes the objects of volition into those prior to and those posterior to the divine will, and shows that the posterior objects of volition are not the cause of divine volition, nor a sine qua non cause; and that the prior objects of volition are in some way a cause of it.

CHAPTER XXI. He objects and responds, and distinguishes the reasonable and the just into what is prior to the divine will, what is posterior, and what is mixed.

CHAPTER XXII. That God has an actual, distinct volition or nolition toward every object of the will. And it has a corollary: That God wills every truth and does not positively will—that is, rejects—every falsehood. Second, that if God wills any antecedent, He wills whatever follows from it, and does not positively will anything incompatible with it. Third, that of any pair of incompatible things, He has a willing of one and an unwilling of the other. That from God's willing anything, it follows that He does not will its opposite, and conversely, that from God's not willing anything—whether affirmatively or negatively signified—it follows that He wills its opposite. That from God's not being unwilling of anything, it follows that He does not will its opposite. That from God's positively not willing anything, it follows that He also privatively does not will it, and likewise conversely. That whatever is in any way, God wills it to be so; and whatever in any way is not, God does not will it to be so.

CHAPTER XXIII. That both God's knowledge and His will are entirely immutable. And it has a corollary: That God newly loves or hates no one, nor more or less at one time than another; nor do prayers or any good or evil merits bend or change the divine will in the least, this way or that; and that everyone to be saved or damned, rewarded or punished, under whatever degree, He willed from eternity to be saved or damned, rewarded or punished, under that very same degree; and this not only by a conditional or indeterminate will, but by one as absolute and determinate as He wills in the present or final judgment, or will will thereafter.

CHAPTER XXIV. He objects against the immutability of divine knowledge and responds.

CHAPTER XXV. He objects against the immutability of the divine will and resolves the objection.

CHAPTER XXVI. That the entire universe of things is good, and no thing is evil in itself. And it has a corollary: That good and evil in itself, or goodness and pure wickedness, are not contraries but privatively opposed.

CHAPTER XXVII. That all things come about from divine providence.

CHAPTER XXVIII. On fate.

CHAPTER XXIX. On chance and fortune.

CHAPTER XXX. That voluntary things are governed by the laws of divine providence.

CHAPTER XXXI. That voluntary actions are subject to divine providence.

CHAPTER XXXII. That all things come about from God's providence actually disposing, not merely permitting.

CHAPTER XXXIII. That wherever there is God's permission, there is also His actual volition.

CHAPTER XXXIV. Whether and how God wills and does not will sin.

CHAPTER XXXV. Against Pelagius: that grace is given freely by God, not acquired by preceding merits. And it has a corollary against Cassian, who takes a middle position, saying that God gives His grace freely to some without preceding merit, but to others only if they first merit to receive it; and therefore that no servant of mortal sin can be freed by his own powers alone.

CHAPTER XXXVI. Against the agents of Pelagius who assert that even if merits are not the principal cause of the conferral of grace, they are nevertheless a sine qua non cause.

CHAPTER XXXVII. Against certain Pelagians who say that a man can from himself alone prepare adequately, and if he does, God will give him His grace freely.

CHAPTER XXXVIII. Against certain Pelagians who say that God anticipates man in the conferral of grace by knocking, and man brings about the acceptance of grace by opening and consenting—from himself alone, however, to the one knocking—and thus in a way merits it.

CHAPTER XXXIX. Against those who think a man from himself alone can merit the first grace de congruo, though not de condigno. And it has a corollary against certain other very recent defenders of Pelagius, who imagine that although a man can in no way merit the first grace, he can nevertheless obtain it by his own powers alone.

CHAPTER XL. That grace, which is a habit freely given by God, together with the human will, is the proper efficient cause of every good and meritorious act of that will.

CHAPTER XLI. That grace, prior by nature, produces good acts before the human will does. And it has a corollary: That both God and His created grace properly produce, prior by nature, every good act of a rational creature before the creature itself does; and that authors who say God does our good works do not exclude, but include, God's grace likewise doing them; and those who say God's grace does our good works do not exclude, but include, God Himself likewise working them.

CHAPTER XLII. That God, prior by nature, produces every good act of a created will before grace does. And it has a corollary: That God, and the Holy Spirit, is said in a certain way to be the charity and the grace by which not only God loves Himself and man charitably and freely, but also by which man likewise loves God and neighbor.

CHAPTER XLIII. On salvific penance according to various opinions, and on the power of the keys. And it has a corollary: That something is prior in nature, or naturally prior, to another which is the cause of that other—something from which a consequence of existence holds to the other and not conversely—is prior to it in nature. Therefore, not everything from which a consequence of existence does not convert is prior in nature, but rather prior in superiority or universality according to consequence, or in any other such manner; and not everything that is prior to another in nature can exist without it; nor is everything that can exist without another, and not conversely, prior to it in nature, but in some other manner already mentioned—unless perhaps "prior in nature" is said equivocally in three senses.

CHAPTER XLIV. On predestination according to the meaning of the term.

CHAPTER XLV. That predestination is truly to be affirmed; what it is; in how many ways it is spoken of; that it is not on account of works but according to God's gratuitous will. And it has a corollary: That no one is predestined or reprobated on account of works that he would do if he lived longer; nor is anyone saved or damned on account of works.

CHAPTER XLVI. Against certain people who concede predestination and reprobation to glory and to punishment, but deny that these are to any definite degrees. And it has a corollary: That all degrees of graces, merits, prosperities, adversities, glory, and punishment—in the present and in the future alike—are predestined by God eternally and distinctly.

CHAPTER XLVII. He objects and responds.

CHAPTERS OF THE SECOND BOOK

CHAPTER I. That free will exists, and what it is.

CHAPTER II. On the act of free will and its object. And it has a corollary: That free will is not so called because it can freely will and not-will anything whatsoever, but because it can freely will whatever is a suitable object of its willing, and not-will whatever is a suitable object of its not-willing.

CHAPTER III. That no inferior cause can necessitate a created will to its rational and free act for merit properly speaking, or for sin. And it has a corollary: That the will of a rational creature is not merely passive but active; and that a will most sufficiently disposed by secondary causes to act can at one time not act and at other times perform its free act; therefore, when unequal goods are proposed to the will, it does not necessarily will the greater; indeed, when an honest good and a dishonorable but very delightful or useful evil are proposed, it can knowingly neglect the good and choose the evil. Therefore, with right reason in the intellect, error is possible in the affection. Also, that the irrational appetite does not necessitate a man to act; that the heavenly bodies do not necessitate the will; that the Devil does not necessitate the will; and that no temptation necessitates the will. However, pure evil presented to the will does necessitate it to not-willing, and pure good to not hating positively—that is, to not hating it—and the will by natural necessity necessarily cannot do these things. Here it is also consequently shown that it would perhaps be very fitting and most expedient for theologians and perfect Catholics not to be ignorant of astrology and other such sciences.

CHAPTER IV. That free will, when tempted, cannot by its own powers, without God's help and His grace, overcome any temptation.

CHAPTER V. That free will, even supported by however great a created grace, without another special help from God, cannot overcome any temptation.

CHAPTER VI. That this special help from God is His unconquerable will.

CHAPTER VII. That no one who is not tempted can, by the powers of free will alone, without grace, or with however great a created grace without another special help from God, avoid any sin. And it has a corollary: That the divine will, just as it preserves the tempted from falling, so also it preserves the untempted both from temptation and from sin.

CHAPTER VIII. On perseverance: what it is, and that no wayfarer, however supported by created grace, can, by the powers of free will alone, or even with the help of grace, persevere finally without another special help from God. And it has a corollary: That no wayfarer, by the powers of free will alone, or of grace, or of both together, without another special help from God, can persevere for any period of time at all.

CHAPTER IX. That neither man nor angel, with however great a grace before the fall, could persevere finally or for a time without another special help from God.

CHAPTER X. He objects and responds.

CHAPTER XI. That perseverance is not some created gift of God really different and distinct from charity and grace. And it has a corollary: That the name "perseverance" does not essentially signify any absolute thing, but accidentally and relatively—namely, charity or justice with a relation of future continuous permanence up to the end; and that it could not implausibly be said that perseverance is this very relation.

CHAPTER XII. He objects and responds.

CHAPTER XIII. That the help without which no one perseveres, and through which everyone perseveres, is the Holy Spirit—divine goodness and will.

CHAPTER XIV. That perseverance is given freely by God, not acquired by merits.

CHAPTER XV. On everlasting perseverance—namely, the confirmation of the blessed—and its cause: that it is the eternal charity of God's will.

CHAPTER XVI. On everlasting perseverance, or the obstinacy of the wicked in evil, and its cause.

CHAPTER XVII. That no rational creature can be confirmed or obstinate immutably by nature. And it has a corollary: That no rational creature is or can be immutable, inconvertible, or impeccable by nature.

CHAPTER XVIII. Against certain people who say the act of free will is nothing.

CHAPTER XIX. He objects and responds.

CHAPTER XX. That God is the necessary co-effector of every act of a created will. And it has a corollary: That whatever a created will effects, the uncreated will necessarily co-effects; and whatever the angelic or human will has done, the divine will necessarily cooperates in; and that every act of the created will is wholly effected by the created will, and wholly likewise by the uncreated.

CHAPTER XXI. He recounts six false responses: the first says that God is said to make every act of the created will only because He makes every created will, which alone truly and properly effects its act. The second, that God is said to make the good act of the created will because He makes the charity or grace that effects it. The third, that God preserves the will. The fourth, that God makes the object and all things moving the will. The fifth, that He permits. The sixth, that God properly effects every good act of the will but absolutely no evil act. And he corrects them generally and together.

CHAPTER XXII. He specifically corrects the first of these.

CHAPTER XXIII. The second.

CHAPTER XXIV. The third.

CHAPTER XXV. The fourth.

CHAPTER XXVI. The fifth.

CHAPTER XXVII. The sixth.

CHAPTER XXVIII. He objects against the twentieth chapter and responds.

CHAPTER XXIX. That the uncreated and created wills, in co-effecting the act of the created will, are not co-equal nor coeval in the natural order.

CHAPTER XXX. That in every common action of the uncreated and created wills, the uncreated naturally precedes the created. And it has a threefold principal conclusion: one natural—that in every causation common to God and a secondary cause, God causes prior by nature to the secondary cause; another theological—that God conditionally wills nothing; a third logical—that no proposition attributing any causation to any inferior cause posterior to the divine will, or anything else positive inferior to anything under God, is absolutely first, unless perhaps a proposition is said to be absolutely first by reason of the priority of its subject, not of its cause; however, very many such propositions are first in a qualified sense and in a certain genus.

CHAPTER XXXI. He objects and responds. And it has a notable corollary: That sacred theology requires a pious and prudent reader.

CHAPTER XXXII. That in every instance of non-action common to God and creature, it is naturally prior that God does not act there than that the creature does not; likewise, because God does not perform a certain action through a creature, therefore the creature does not perform it—and not conversely.

CHAPTER XXXIII. He objects and responds. And it has a corollary: That not only do beings need God necessarily for their true being, and non-beings for their non-being, but God most worthily holds sovereignty not only over beings but also over non-beings.

CHAPTER XXXIV. Through the foregoing he draws men toward fear and love, toward trust, patience, and humility, toward prayer and the giving of thanks. And it has a manifold corollary, pleasing to all who are grateful.

CHAPTERS OF THE THIRD BOOK

CHAPTER I. That God can in a certain way necessitate every created will to its free act and to its free cessation and rest from action. And it has a corollary: That a certain kind of necessity and freedom and merit, and also chance and fortune, are not mutually incompatible; and a general statement on the concord of fate, foreknowledge, predestination, and grace with free will and merit.

CHAPTER II. That God in a certain way necessitates every created will to every free act of its own and to every free cessation and rest from action, by a necessity that is naturally prior. And it has a corollary: That a certain kind of antecedent necessity and freedom and merit are not incompatible; and that no inferior cause, but only the superior one—namely, the will of God—is the antecedent necessity with respect to its effect; and that all things that are, occur, and happen do so from some necessity naturally preceding them.

CHAPTER III. On contingency in either direction according to various opinions, and that it exists.

CHAPTER IV. What contingency in either direction is. And it has a corollary: What the freedom of contradiction is, and what a free act by the freedom of contradiction is.

CHAPTER V. As corollaries from the foregoing, he infers thirteen parts. The first is that propositions about what is equally contingent are converted through opposite qualities.

II. That some valid consequence is not necessary absolutely or as of now, but equally contingent.

III. That some indeterminate cause—that is, one not predetermined to act—does act.

IV. That every and only a free act by the freedom of contradiction is equally contingent.

V. That every and only what is equally contingent is a free act by the freedom of contradiction.

VI. That contingency in either direction and necessity are not incompatible.

VII. That contingency is properly said with respect to the present.

VIII. That freedom is properly said with respect to the present.

IX. That no act of a creature is absolutely equally contingent, but only in an indeterminate genus—namely, with respect to inferior causes.

X. That no act of a creature is free absolutely by the freedom of contradiction, but only in a qualified sense—namely, with respect to all secondary causes.

XI. That only the act of the divine will ad extra is absolutely equally contingent.

XII. That only the act of the divine will ad extra is free absolutely by the freedom of contradiction.

XIII. That the first and highest freedom of contradiction, and the like contingency in either direction, is in the divine will; and that these are the causes of like freedom and contingency in all other things.

CHAPTER VI. He objects and responds.

CHAPTER VII. He raises the question whether anything is in the power of the created will; and he puts forward one response and corrects it.

CHAPTER VIII. He recounts another six brief responses and amends them.

CHAPTER IX. He responds.

CHAPTER X. He distinguishes concerning necessity and freedom. And it has a corollary: That necessity and freedom and merit are not mutually incompatible, or else they are.

CHAPTER XI. He objects and responds. And it has a corollary: What kind of freedom exists in irrational creatures, and how it differs from and agrees with the freedom of rational beings.

CHAPTER XII. He begins to dispute that most famous question—whether all things that will happen will happen of necessity—and recounts the opinion of the mathematicians or Stoics, who say that all things that will happen will happen of absolute necessity.

CHAPTER XIII. He treats the opinion of Cicero, who says that God does not know the future.

CHAPTER XIV. He treats the opinion which says that many things are future in their own nature, but not with respect to God.

CHAPTER XV. He recounts the fourth opinion of the Sophists, who say that nothing is future.

CHAPTER XVI. He refutes the fifth opinion of the Megarians, who deny all potency regarding future things.

CHAPTER XVII. He corrects the sixth opinion of certain people who think that something is future in either direction or not future in the composite sense, but not the divided sense.

CHAPTER XVIII. He rectifies the seventh opinion which says that something can begin to be future.

CHAPTER XIX. He censures the eighth and ninth opinions, which hold that nothing in the lower world is under divine providence, and that no voluntary or free things are disposed by God's providence.

CHAPTER XX. He corrects the tenth opinion—that God has no volition regarding any effect of the lower world—and the eleventh, that He does not will any voluntary or free effect.

CHAPTER XXI. He refutes the twelfth opinion, which holds that no inferior things are made by God, and the thirteenth, which judges that no voluntary or free things are immediately and properly made by Him.

CHAPTER XXII. He censures the fourteenth opinion—that God does not will anything freely future absolutely, but only conditionally—and the fifteenth, that no evil things, but only good things, are absolutely foreseen, willed, or made by God.

CHAPTER XXIII. He argues against the sixteenth opinion, which holds that God does not will the free act of a creature by an antecedent will, but only by a consequent one, and that God co-effects every free act of a creature with the creature, but posteriorly in the natural order; and the seventeenth, which thinks that although God always in fact acts and pre-acts every act of a creature, it is nevertheless absolutely possible for some creature to act by itself alone.

CHAPTER XXIV. He treats the eighteenth opinion, which says that God's willing and pre-willing is in man's power; and the nineteenth, that it is in man's power to do something from which it follows that God does not will, nor ever willed, nor ever will will, what He nevertheless now wills and always willed to come about; and the twentieth, that as soon as the divine will anticipates the free act of the human will, so immediately can the human will move toward the opposite of that act; and the twenty-first, that when God wills a man to produce a certain future act in a given measure, the man can so dispose himself beforehand that God then does not will this, and therefore he does not have that act; and the twenty-second, that the divine will is not always necessary in acting, but is in some way defectible and frustrable; and the twenty-third, that the divine will is not the efficient cause of anything, but only consents to the divine intellect dictating, and some other executive power, posterior and either in God or in secondary causes, effects the things effected; and the twenty-fourth, that although the divine will co-acts and pre-acts every act of the created will, it does this by influencing so weakly that it in no way necessitates the created will to act.

CHAPTER XXV. He touches on the twenty-fifth opinion, which imagines that God does not provide, predestine, will, or bring about the degrees of free acts, merits, or even rewards; and the twenty-sixth, that no act is anything; and the twenty-seventh, that no non-acting, ceasing, or resting is from God; and the twenty-eighth, that foreknown future things are the cause of God's foreknowledge; and the twenty-ninth, that foreknown future things are a sine qua non cause of divine foreknowledge; and the thirtieth, that God knows and foreknows things according to their mode; and the thirty-first, that of the Academics, that no one can search out or know this so deeply hidden miracle of nature, so concealed a secret of God; and the thirty-second, that in all future, present, and past things, with respect to divine knowledge and will, there is always contingency in either direction and freedom, and no necessity at all.

CHAPTER XXVI. He treats the thirty-third opinion, more famous than the others, which affirms that something has always been future and still is future, but it is in no way necessary that it ever was or now is future; and that something never was future nor now is future, and it is possible—with a possibility opposed to all necessity—that it always was and now is future; and correspondingly about God's foreknowledge in every respect. Yet about every past or present thing it says that it is necessary that it was, and that it is necessary that God always foreknew it to be future, or knows it to be now present, and that it is also necessary that God knows it to be past and to have been. And he rebukes this opinion for the insufficiency of its response, because it does not adequately resolve the difficulty.

CHAPTER XXVII. He responds according to the view of the philosophers and theologians: that all future things will happen by a certain necessity with respect to the superior causes, a necessity not contrary to but consonant with freedom.

CHAPTER XXVIII. He recounts one erroneous gloss on the authorities.

CHAPTER XXIX. He objects and responds.

CHAPTER XXX. He argues against it on the falsity of its hypothesis, by a way taken from the necessity and freedom of the divine will, which always necessarily remains uniform and equal.

CHAPTER XXXI. He refutes the same by way of the necessity and contingency of the divine intellect and knowledge.

CHAPTER XXXII. He reduces the same by way of the immutability of the divine will.

CHAPTER XXXIII. He moves the same by way of revelation in the Word, and sets forth six responses of those who concede revelation in the Word, and argues vigorously against them.

CHAPTER XXXIV. He argues specifically against the first.

CHAPTER XXXV. Against the second.

CHAPTER XXXVI. Against the third.

CHAPTER XXXVII. Against the fourth.

CHAPTER XXXVIII. Against the fifth.

CHAPTER XXXIX. Against the sixth.

CHAPTER XL. He rebukes those who deny revelation in the Word.

CHAPTER XLI. He recounts diverse ways, according to diverse thinkers, of seeing in the Word; and he objects and resolves.

CHAPTER XLII. He further presses the thirty-third opinion and its hypothesis by way of revelation in the proper genus—first concerning the Lord Jesus Christ—and recounts one response which says that Christ could be deceived, and refutes it.

CHAPTER XLIII. He treats another response.

CHAPTER XLIV. He recounts a third response.

CHAPTER XLV. He examines a fourth response.

CHAPTER XLVI. Against the same opinion and hypothesis by way of revelation in the proper genus, concerning pure creatures—namely, angels.

CHAPTER XLVII. Against the same opinion and hypothesis by the same way, concerning pure human beings.

CHAPTER XLVIII. He recounts four responses and corrects them.

CHAPTER XLIX. He recounts a twofold opinion which says that in revealed future things there is an ordained or absolute necessity, but in others none.

CHAPTER L. He responds according to the view of the philosophers and theologians: that God wills and knows necessarily whatever He wills and knows, by a following necessity of immutability, immobility, stability, and order—not a preceding, absolutely simple, natural, violent, or unwilling necessity; not contrary to but consonant with the highest and greatest freedom. And it has a corollary: That every present act of divine volition and knowledge necessarily, by the aforesaid following necessity, always has been and likewise always will be. Therefore, all things that presently are, occur, or happen, by a similar necessity are, occur, and happen in the present; and all things that will happen, by a similar necessity will happen in the future. Indeed, all things that now occur do so from some preceding necessity; and all things that will happen will happen from some preceding necessity in the future.

CHAPTER LI. On eternity. And it has a corollary: That there is a single, identical, and utterly immutable instant in all eternity, and that all eternity is no more multiple or greater than its instant, nor is the instant of eternity simpler or less than eternity itself; therefore eternity and its instant are really the same. Furthermore, notwithstanding this, eternity is called whole, great, long, and even infinite, and is said to have been, to be, and to be about to be; and something is said to have been, to be, and to be about to be in it. Therefore, concerning God and His intrinsic act, "was," "is," and "will be" are said metaphorically, but concerning His extrinsic actions, "He did," "He does," and "He will do" are said properly and temporally.

CHAPTER LII. By way of eternity he demonstrates the view set forth in the fiftieth chapter. And it has a corollary of thirty notable parts; and he objects and resolves.

CHAPTER LIII. Against hasty accusers, easy judges, and rash condemners. He sets forth thirty-six propositions that seem to him erroneous, humbly imploring the authority of the Church to determine the truth.

Thomas Bradwardine, De Causa Dei contra Pelagium, et De Virtute Causarum, Ad Suos Mertonenses, Books Three. Published by command of the Most Reverend George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury; through the effort and study of Dr. Henry Savile, Warden of Merton College in the University of Oxford, edited for the first time from manuscript codices. (London: From the Norton press, at John Bill's, 1618.)

PRIOR EPISTLE OF THOMAS DE BRADWARDINE TO HIS MERTONIANS.

To his beloved brothers and friends, the Warden and Scholars of Merton Hall in Oxford — may the Holy Spirit grant His sevenfold grace.

I have found that it has sometimes happened in the treatment of difficult matters that either the incompetence of the reporter corrupts the hearer, or the rashness of the hearer brings disrepute upon the reporter. For this reason it seems to me that we must be equally on guard — especially there where nothing else can be held without danger — that we neither presume to assert too readily, nor rashly judge what belongs to others. I know how many dreams the human heart gives birth to, as Blessed Augustine says, and that by the same judgment by which it errs in the knowledge of itself, it also wrongly suspects all other things that exist for its sake. For what do you think it means that men are accustomed to hold such diverse opinions about the truth of things? Is truth not one? Behold — to say nothing of God for the moment — what is it that dialectic has so many diverse and so contrary, not to say perverse, opinions? Surely not all of them knew the one thing that is, and out of love of deception invented diverse things? I do not think so; rather, each tells his own dreams, and those by whose opinion they were first deceived in themselves, they afterward unwittingly lead others astray. And as Blessed Job says to his friends who were arrogant and presumed of themselves more than was fitting, they all now think that wisdom will not only die with them, but also arose from them. It is worthy, therefore, that we see this very thing in our own assertion of truth — that so many of us are already so diverse. For because truth is seen from afar, it gives rise to judgments, and each person can perceive of it only as much as he himself is. For in us, what we perceive by the cognition of day, in that same way the understanding of the heart judges about those things that are outside with respect to the truth, in the manner in which the mind inwardly configures itself in its representation. Hence it is necessary that while the mind is inwardly wrongly disposed, the understanding too is deceived in its judgment of those things that are outside. This is the very cause that sometimes also generates controversy of words even within a unity of meaning — which controversy, however, becomes venial when it is not obstinate. If therefore we, who seem to be handlers of God's word and investigators of truth, sometimes find this among ourselves — as is customary — let us more quickly return to unity, lest if we begin to defend our own words obstinately, we be thought to have held a different view.

That which your charity has deigned to ask of me concerning the cause of God against Pelagius, I have learned was debated long ago among certain wise men; and from those whose judgment we consider more trustworthy, I have come to know what they thought — both from others' reports about them and from their own reports about themselves. But since I am accustomed to be pressed on this matter quite often, I profess myself to be the sort of person who would wish that nothing on this subject be either so curiously and superstitiously inquired into by all, or so confidently asserted. Hence now too I am constrained by a twofold consideration in this matter, since I see that I owe silence to your prudence, and a response to your goodness. Amid these very things, the difficulty of the matter also presents itself — which perhaps cannot be discussed by me as concisely as is fitting. For if I exceed due measure in speaking, I fear I may seem superstitious. Yet I wish — and much more do I wish — to be sometimes charged with partial ignorance than to seem a contemner of charity; and to have inelegant words rather than a perverse heart.

Farewell always in our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the Way leading from the byway, the Truth confirming in the promise, and the Life conforming at the journey's end.

THOMAS BRADWARDINE'S DE CAUSA DEI — BOOK I

CHAPTER I

He sets forth two suppositions, of which the first is: God is most highly perfect and good, to such a degree that nothing more perfect or better could exist.

The second is: There is no infinite process among beings, but in every genus there is some one first.

In the first place, let it be most firmly supposed that God is most highly perfect and good, to such a degree that nothing more perfect or better could exist. This supposition could be evidently demonstrated from the magnitude of His perfection and goodness, which is simply infinite, just as it could be demonstrated in many ways by philosophical and theological reasonings. This supposition also seems to be attested by the father of the Philosophers, Hermogenes — or Hermes, Mercurius the threefold, Trismegistus the threefold, in philosophy thrice greatest, King of Egypt, Philosopher and Prophet — in his work On the Eternal Word, chapter 34, saying of God: "He Himself is wholly full and perfect"; and below at chapter 35: "He Himself is holy, and incorrupt, and everlasting, and if anything can be called better: for God is the highest good." His son Aristotle seems likewise to bear witness in On the World, chapter 11, saying thus: "That ought rather to be reckoned which is both fitting and most apt for God"; and in another translation: "But that is to be received which is better, and most fitting for God"; and in Metaphysics XII.39: "God is one, eternal, of infinite nobility." And Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy III, prose 10: "Nothing better than God can be thought." Of the twenty-four definitions or propositions concerning God set forth by twenty-four Philosophers, the fifth runs thus: "God is that than which nothing better can be thought." With these in concord, Anselm in Proslogion 2: "We believe Thee, O God, to be something than which nothing better can be thought." And in Monologion 15: "Just as it is impious to think that the substance of the supreme nature is anything which it would be in any way better not to be, so it is necessary that whatever it is altogether better to be than not to be, that it is." Richard [of St. Victor] also testifies thus in On the Trinity I.20: "All men attribute without hesitation to God whatever they judge to be best."

And Augustine, On Christian Doctrine I.4: "All contend earnestly for the excellence of God, nor can anyone be found who believes God to be that than which something is better. And so all consent that God is that which they prefer to all other things." Whence also the Prophet: "Great is the Lord and greatly to be praised; and of His greatness there is no end" (Psalm 144).

Secondly, let it be supposed for the present that there is no infinite process among beings, but in every genus there is some one first. For this has been demonstrated elsewhere, and almost all Philosophers and truly all Theologians attest it. But lest I should seem to suppose suppositions of such weight without even a little proof improbably, behold at least a brief intimation of both. Let A be called, for the sake of brevity, something so perfect and good that nothing more perfect or better could exist. Let "possible" also be taken in the common manner of speaking, or, if it must be taken most absolutely, for that, namely, which through itself and formally simply does not include contradiction or repugnance: namely, from which, when posited and admitted as absolutely possible according to the species of obligations which is called positio, in no good and formal consequence simply does there follow what is absolutely impossible — namely, that which through itself and formally simply includes contradiction. For every repugnance imports and produces contradiction. This way of taking "possible" and "impossible" is grounded on this, that everything is either possible or not possible, and so impossible in this manner. It is therefore possible that A is, or A can be, or could be — who would not at once assent? Or who, this being posited and admitted as absolutely possible, would not defend himself from contradiction? But if it is possible that A is, or if A can or could be, A is — nay, it is necessary that A is, and A is "necessary-being," and this through itself. Let "necessary being" be called, in the manner of the Philosophers' speech, that which through itself and of itself is necessary to be, by absolute necessity: that, namely, which could not, cannot, nor will be able not to be; and "possible being" in the opposite manner, that, namely, which could, can, or will be able to be and not to be. For "necessary being" is more perfect and better than "possible being," especially in a perfect good and one most highly perfect. For one could not depart from it except by omitting it either wholly or partly irrecoverably, which no one doubts to be evil. Necessary being is also in a perfect good a perfect good act, complete in good, and pure from imperfect incomplete potentiality and from evil corruptibility. But possible being imports the privation of this pure act, imperfect potentiality, an incomplete aptitude toward evil, and corruptibility. Is not also strong and firm being — nay, supremely strong and firm — especially in a perfect good and one supremely perfect, to be judged better and more perfect than weak and infirm being? Therefore necessary being is to be judged better than possible being, which could be shown by many other reasons. But whose mind does not feel this inwardly? Whose spirit does not assent? But if anyone, out of abundance, desires witnesses, behold Aristotle, who in Metaphysics IX.13 and following says diffusely and proves that act precedes potency in three ways: namely, in reason, that is, in definition; in substance, that is, in perfection; and in time, namely in the individual generating — but, on the contrary, in the individual generated. And below at 19, teaching that in goods act is better than potency, and in evils worse, he writes thus: "The act of a serious potency is better and more honorable; but it is necessary that in evils too the end and act be worse than the potency."

And above at 17: "The eternal things," he says, "are prior in substance to the corruptible; but nothing eternal is in potency." And the reason is this: every potency is at the same time of contradiction; therefore what is possible to be, may be and not be. Therefore the same thing is possible to be and not to be; but what is possible not to be, may not be; and what is contingent not to be is corruptible, either simply, or in this very respect that it is said to be contingent not to be. Therefore nothing simply incorruptible is being in potency simply, nor any of those things which are by necessity, and indeed those very first ones. For if these were not, nothing whatsoever would be. Where Aristotle seems to suggest such a reason: that which is through itself, not depending on another, is prior in nature and more perfect than that which is not through itself but depends from elsewhere; that which is necessary being is of this kind, with respect to that which is possible being. Averroes follows him in his Commentary; whom Avicenna also followed in Metaphysics I.6, saying that necessary being according to itself has no cause, and what is possible being has of itself a cause, and proves that necessary being has nothing else co-equal to it, nor anything prior to it, but it through itself is the first of all others. Who also below in book VIII.6 says that necessary being is perfect and more than perfect. If therefore A can be, A can be; therefore A can be necessary being, since this is more perfect and better than possible being, and it can be necessary being through itself. For to be good through oneself is more sufficient, more worthy, more perfect, and better than to be good through another, to lack another, and to depend from another, as anyone's mind judges, and as the aforementioned Philosophers attest. And if A can be necessary being through itself, then A is necessary being — nay, it is necessary that A be necessary being (for otherwise it would be possible-being). But this is impossible. For let it be put into being, just as it is possible, that A be necessary being, and this through itself, and it follows that it never could, can, or will be able not to be — the opposite of which was being said. Also, what is once possible to be, is always possible to be; and what is once necessary being through itself is always necessary being. For whatever is once through itself and formally simply imports no repugnance, never does it import any; and whatever is once, also is always: for the consequence which is once formal simply, was always so and will be, since it is through itself and absolutely necessary, and so can never fail in consequence. And what at some time is not formal simply, never was nor will be; for if it were at some time, it would be always. Whose mind, moreover, conceives a nature of itself possible turning into a nature of itself necessary, or contrariwise? Again, a little must be tasted in advance: everything that is called possible or able is so called by some power; and this either by its own power, like an existing thing having active or passive power, or by another's power — as non-beings possible to come to be, and future effects, are called possible by the power of those active and passive things, namely because the active can do them and the passive can be acted upon. Whatever, also, is called possible by the power of some passive thing, is called possible by the power of some active thing: for how can anything possible be acted upon by what can do nothing? Or how can some effect come about which nothing can make? And if anyone requires, as it were, a torch to see the sun, let him demand a witness for this self-evident truth: behold Averroes upon the De Caelo et Mundo I, comment 124, who says that the possible is not possible except in respect to an agent and patient, and it is impossible to imagine something to be possible in respect to a patient and impossible in respect to an agent, since it would happen that there would be a patient impossible, and a possible impossible. Therefore every non-being which is called possible or able, is so called through the power of some active thing. If therefore A is not, and can be, by some power it can be — and not by its own power, since it has none, since also nothing whatsoever can make and produce itself from non-being to being. For every maker in some way precedes — at least naturally — its product; but nothing precedes itself. Since moreover, according to the premises, every non-being called possible is so called by the power of some active thing, neither can A be by another's power. For this, according to what was shown earlier, would be by the power of some active thing which could make A: but there is no such thing, since everything other than A is incomparably less than A and impotent to cause it. Also, if A is caused by another, A is not [God]. For it is more perfect to be sufficient through oneself, altogether incausable and independent of another, and the highest and first cause of others, than to depend on another and be subject to another as an effect. Therefore A cannot be from another in any way, which could be shown by many other reasons. Therefore by no power can A be — the opposite of which was being said. Therefore it includes contradiction that A is not and can be; and it is true and necessary that A can be; therefore it is false and impossible that A is not. Wherefore it is true and necessary that A is. Wherefore it is also true and necessary that God is; and that He is so perfect and good that nothing more perfect or better could be.

The second supposition follows from this first: for it follows from it that God is the first and highest of all beings; with this notoriously co-assumed, that to be first and highest is more perfect and better than to be later and inferior to another, or co-equal to another. But if anyone desires a witness, behold the Philosopher who in De Caelo et Mundo II.34 expressly attests that the upward is more honorable and divine than the downward, and the prior than the posterior. He, together with the other Philosophers, often teaches that nowhere in the same genus are several principles co-equal and equally first simply found. Whence also Apocalypse 1: "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last."

COROLLARY

It has a moral corollary containing 40 parts against 40 errors, of which the first is:

1. AGAINST PROTAGORAS DOUBTING THAT GOD EXISTS

From these things, as it were by way of porism, many men erring in many ways seem capable of being clearly led back to the path of truth, provided that truth herself deigns to go before as a guide.

From these things, then, let Protagoras be made certain — who, as Lactantius recounts in Divine Institutes against the Gentiles I.1, called the gods into doubt.

2. AGAINST DIAGORAS AND THE FOOL DENYING THAT GOD EXISTS

Let Diagoras come to his senses, who, as is similarly recounted there, afterward shut out the gods. Let the fool also at some time be wise — who, as the Prophet recounts, foolishly said: "There is no God."

3. AGAINST THOSE DOUBTING OR DENYING THAT GOD HAS REALLY, EQUIVALENTLY, OR SUPEREMINENTLY EVERY VIRTUE AND ANY GOODNESS WHATSOEVER; AND UNIVERSALLY WHATEVER IT IS BETTER TO HAVE THAN NOT TO HAVE; AND IS IN EVERY WAY GOOD IN EVERY MANNER, AND HAS GOODNESS OF EVERY KIND — WHATEVER IT IS BETTER TO BE AND HAVE THAN NOT TO BE AND NOT HAVE; AND HAS NO VICE OR MALICE; AND UNIVERSALLY DOES NOT HAVE WHATEVER IT IS BETTER NOT TO HAVE THAN TO HAVE, OR HAS IN SOME OTHER MANNER THAT WHICH IT WOULD BE BETTER NOT TO HAVE THAN TO HAVE, OR HAS ANYTHING IN VAIN OR SUPERFLUOUS; OR THAT GOD IS NOT ALWAYS SUPREMEPLY HAPPY, BLESSED, ACTUAL OR ACT, SUCH THAT NOTHING HAPPIER, MORE BLESSED, OR MORE ACTUAL COULD EXIST

Let those make progress who confess God to exist but doubt or deny that He has really, equivalently, or supereminently every virtue and any goodness, and universally whatever it is better to have than not to have; that He is in every way good in every manner, and has goodness of every kind — whatever it is better to be and have than not to be and not have; that He has no vice and malice; and universally that He does not have whatever it is better not to have than to have; or has in some manner that which it would be better not to have than to have; or has anything in vain or superfluous; or that He is not always supremely happy, blessed, actual, or act, such that nothing happier, more blessed, or more actual could exist. For otherwise something could be more perfect, better, and more becoming than God is, which the first Supposition forbids. The supreme actuality of God is also specially demonstrated by this: that act is better and more perfect than potency, and especially a good act than its good potency, as appears from the demonstration of the first Supposition. And if any potency be posited in God, it is necessarily good, as the prior particles of this part teach. Therefore no potentiality, but supreme actuality, is in God, as the first Supposition clearly shows; which is similarly demonstrated through the next particle of this part. For if God is supremely blessed and happy, He is supremely actual: for who does not know that these consist not in habit but in act, as the Philosophers also make manifest?

4. AGAINST THOSE DENYING THAT GOD IS OF ANY VIRTUE AND GOODNESS WHATSOEVER SIMPLY INFINITE

Let those who deny that God is of any virtue and goodness whatsoever simply infinite stretch themselves out. For if any virtue of His or goodness were only finite, it could be increased; therefore something better than God could exist, which the first Supposition condemns. These men are also most clearly refuted through the next part of this. Now, according to this infinite virtue and power of God, and with respect to it — following what was touched upon above concerning power — I deem it true what the Geometers suppose: that a straight line can be extended as far as one pleases in continuum and direct line, and on any center, occupying any space whatsoever, a circle can be designated, as appears in the first book of Euclid's Elements; and what the natural Philosophers say, that a medium can be subtilized as far as one pleases, and the like; and universally everything which among the Logicians, or any others, is called through itself and absolutely possible — namely, what through itself does not formally include contradiction — although it is not possible by nature, that is, by natural power.

5. AGAINST THOSE SAYING THAT GOD DOES NOT FULLY SUFFICE TO HIMSELF, BUT NEEDS ANOTHER

Let those be opened up who say that God does not fully suffice to Himself, but needs another. This evidently follows from the two preceding parts and from the first Supposition: for it is notoriously established that sufficiency is a good. Whence the Philosopher also in De Mundo 11, speaking of God, says: "He needs no artifice, nor another's support, as our Kings need clientela because of impotence." And in De Caelo et Mundo I.100: "He has nothing depraved, nor is needy of any of those things which are His goods." Whence also of the 24 definitions concerning God set forth by as many Philosophers, the 11th says thus: "God is the always-existing, who alone by necessity sufficiently abounds for Himself." This is also attested by Sadai, one of the Hebrew names of God, which, as Rabbi Moses says in the Guide of the Perplexed I.61, is the same as "sufficiency," because He needs the essence of no being, nor needs anything outside Himself for the firmness of His essence; but His essence suffices Him. Jerome also, expert in the Latin and Hebrew languages, in his letter to Marcella concerning the 10 names by which God is named among the Hebrews, Epistle 99, says that one of these 10 names is Sadai, which we may take as "robust and sufficient for accomplishing all things."

6. AGAINST THOSE BELIEVING THAT GOD IS NOT NECESSARILY BUT CONTINGENTLY MOST PERFECT AND GOD; AND THAT HE IS MUTABLE, IRASCIBLE, PLACABLE, ABLE TO BE SADDENED, GLADDENED, OR CAPABLE OF SUFFERING IN ANY OTHER NEW PASSION; ALSO OPINING THAT "GOD" IS AN ACCIDENTAL NAME, AND NOT ESSENTIAL SIMPLY

Let those be changed who believe that God is not necessarily but contingently most perfect and God; and that He is mutable, newly irascible, placable, able to be saddened, gladdened, and capable of suffering newly in any other passion: also opining that "God" is an accidental name, and not essential simply. That God is necessarily most perfect and God evidently follows from the first Supposition, since to be so is more perfect and better than to be contingently so, as appears from what was premised in the demonstration of that Supposition. Moreover, if God is not necessarily most perfect and God, He can be not such; if this be posited, it will be reproved, and its opposite proved, just as the first Supposition was proved. Wherefore neither is God mutable in any way: for not to the better, since He is supremely good; nor to the worse, since He is necessarily supremely good (as is just now demonstrated); nor to the equally good. For this would seem superfluous, against the third part of this, unless perhaps He should do this for the sake of preserving His own good — and then He would need motion, against the fifth part — or for the good of the creature — and so He would still need motion, nor would He suffice to Himself for doing what He willed. Also, if God could be changed to an equal good, why not to a lesser? If, moreover, God should temporally lose and acquire any goodness, He does not always have goodness of every kind, especially infinite, against the third and fourth parts of this. If, moreover, God were mutable, He would be potential, and not supremely actual or act, against the last part of the third part of this. From these things, further, it is patently inferred that God is not an accidental name, but essential simply: especially if it be imposed from that supreme perfection and greatest goodness; for otherwise God could not be God, and could be changed, against the two prior particles of this part.

7. AGAINST THOSE DENYING THAT GOD IS OMNIPOTENT ACTIVELY, AND NULLIPOTENT PASSIVELY — THAT IS, NOT ABLE TO SUFFER ANYTHING FROM ANOTHER

Let those be denied who deny that God is omnipotent actively, and nullipotent passively — that is, not able to suffer anything from another. That He is omnipotent actively, the third and fourth parts demonstrate. For it is established that active power is a certain virtue and a good; nor can He suffer from another, for then He would be mutable, against the previous part; and His impassibility, like His immutability, can be demonstrated.

8. AGAINST THOSE OPINING THAT GOD IS NOT A SUBSTANCE AND RATIONAL POWER, HAVING INTELLECT AND FREE WILL, ACTUALLY KNOWING AND WILLING; ALSO HOLDING THAT THE DIVINE WILL IS NOT UNIVERSALLY EFFICACIOUS — THAT IS, NOT IMPEDIBLE, NOT FRUSTRATABLE, NOT DEFECTIBLE IN ANY WAY

Let them reason better, who opine that God is not a substance and rational power, having intellect and free will, actually knowing and willing; also holding that the divine will is not universally efficacious — that is, not impedible, not frustratable, not defectible in any way. For from the first Supposition it is patent that God is, and is a substance, since substance is more perfect than accident; and therefore is a substance and rational power, since the rational is reasonably preferred to the irrational; wherefore He has intellect and free will, which the third part also shows; knowing also and willing actually, not however habitually, since this is more perfect, just as a good act is more perfect than its potency toward the good. The divine will is also universally efficacious in the manner stated. For this is more perfect than that it should be impedible, frustratable, or defectible in any way. Also, if God should will anything and not have it, nor have it come about, He would not be supremely blessed and happy, but miserable; especially since He wills nothing, nor can He will anything, except justly, by the third part of this, which also makes Him supremely blessed. For who does not know that happiness and beatitude are an entire and perfect good, and that it is more blessed to have whatever is justly desired or willed than to lack it? For if, on account of the non-having of one thing willed, anyone were not less blessed, nor on account of the non-having of another, and by the same reason still further, and so on in succession, then neither would anyone be less blessed even if he lacked all and each thing willed and desired. But whose mind feels thus, unless perhaps the senseless? Whence the Philosopher in Ethics I.9 says happiness is "a good through itself sufficient and perfect." Boethius also, Consolation of Philosophy III, prose 2, says that beatitude is "a good which, when one has obtained it, can desire nothing further; which indeed is the highest of all goods, and contains all goods within itself; if anything were lacking to it, it could not be the highest, since something would remain outside that could be wished for. It is clear, therefore, that beatitude is a state perfect by the gathering together of all goods." Is it not also more joyful, more delightful, and more pleasing to have what is desired and willed than to lack them unwillingly? Who dissents here? Whose mind does not so feel? But in supreme beatitude, supreme joy, delight, and pleasure are contained. Now God is always supremely blessed by the third part of this; therefore He never lacks anything willed unwillingly. Furthermore, who does not know that this excellently follows: "If God can do this and wills this, He does this, since nothing required is lacking" — which Philosophy also often attests? Hence, contrariwise, "If God does not do this, and wills this, He cannot do this," as some possible thing being shown: therefore He is not omnipotent, but to be reckoned impotent, against the seventh part of this — which the 12th of the 24 definitions of God by the 24 Philosophers also attests, saying thus: "God is He whose will is of deifying power."

9. AGAINST THOSE BELIEVING THAT GOD IS IGNORANT OF ANYTHING

Let those be ignored who believe that God is ignorant of anything. Such seem to be certain Philosophers and common folk: for it appears to some that Aristotle in Metaphysics XII.51 wishes to assert that God does not know anything outside Himself; and that Averroes there in his comment 51 wishes to construct that God does not know vile things, nor singulars; with which Avicenna in his Metaphysics VIII.6 and Algazel in his Metaphysics III, sentence 6, seem to consent. Cicero also in De Divinatione denies all foreknowledge of future things to God. Of similar persons it is recounted in Job 22 in this manner: "What does God know? And as if through a mist He judges; the clouds are His hiding-place; nor does He consider our things, but walks about beyond the hinges of heaven." And Psalm 72: "And they have said, How does God know? And is there knowledge in the highest?" And below, Psalm 93: "And they have said, The Lord shall not see, nor shall the God of Jacob understand." But all these will easily be corrected through the third and fourth parts. For it is established that wisdom, science, and approving or reproving discretion are most distinguished virtues.

Likewise, by the previous part, God knows actually; and if He knows anything, it most especially seems that He knows Himself. It also seems more perfect to know Himself than wholly to be ignorant. Therefore by the first Supposition He knows Himself. Also, how, according to the third part of this, is God supremely blessed if He in no way feels, perceives, or knows Himself to be blessed? Therefore God knows Himself, and not imperfectly and diminished, on account of the second Supposition and the third and fourth parts. Therefore He knows Himself perfectly and supremely perfectly, such that nothing more perfect could be known or could know. Therefore He knows Himself according to His essence, and according to all His conditions, relations, and universal circumstances. But there is no thing of which God is not prior, superior, better, and more perfect, as the first Supposition teaches; of which also God is not the cause, principle, and end, as the Philosophers attest. Therefore there is nothing which God does not know properly and distinctly: for this knowledge is more perfect than confused.

Likewise, either God knows that there is something other besides Himself, or He does not know. If He knows, and not confusedly — since distinct knowledge is more actual and more perfect than confused — then He distinctly knows something outside Himself; and by the same reasoning He knows one thing and all things, by the fourth part premised. If He does not know that there is anything besides Himself, this is more wonderful and absurd; for then He could plausibly believe that there is nothing at all besides Himself, and so be shamefully deceived and err, against the third part of this.

Likewise, according to what has been premised, God perfectly knows Himself; therefore He knows Himself to be of infinite power, omnipotent, and of universally efficacious will, according to the fourth, seventh, and eighth parts premised. Therefore He knows Himself able to make, destroy, and move something outside Himself. If this be posited, then He knows it; for He works not rashly but knowingly, and He does not know it newly, on account of the sixth part — and because He previously knew He could and would so do, and would so do: therefore He has known it eternally; and likewise anything else by similar reason.

Likewise, if God did not know certain truths, He could desire and will to know them; for every rational nature naturally desires to know. Therefore, since by the previous part He has a will universally efficacious, He could know them, and not newly; for then He would not always be most actual, most knowing, most perfect, most blessed, and altogether immutable, against the third and sixth parts. Therefore necessarily He knows all truths eternally.

Likewise, although some things are vile, the knowledge of them is precious and noble, as all natural Philosophers attest who treat of animals, of parts, and of the generation of animals — especially in those who through knowledge of vile things do not become vile, nor can become vile. But God, as the sixth part attests, cannot be made vile: therefore He knows all things perfectly and distinctly. But if anyone wished to consider more subtly, he would find that every nature, and every natural thing, and every essence according to that which it is, is good and beautiful, as the Philosophers also attest. Why then does it not befit God, the good and beautiful, to know these things? Or perhaps because they are less good and beautiful than He? How then can He not make and preserve such things, by His omnipotence and most efficacious will, according to the previous parts of this? How also does it befit man, so worthy and noble a nature, to know baser things?

Likewise, how could God fittingly remunerate His worshippers, and His good and bad despisers, if He were ignorant of their merits?

Likewise, why do we pour forth prayers in vain to the Lord God, if He cannot hear them?

Furthermore, who doubts that it is better, more orderly, and more becoming, that God — who, the first Supposition proving (as appears in the demonstration of the second Supposition), presides over the world and all other things — should preside wisely over all things, and be able, know, and will to expedite supplications offered to Him, to reward the good, and correct or punish the evil? Otherwise the spur of hope and love would be less sharp, the rein of fear would be broken, and the audacity to offend would be unbridled. Whence the whole order of human affairs, both toward God and toward neighbor, would be shaken. But if Aristotle should wish to say that God does not understand anything besides Himself, because anything such is vile — at least with respect to the divine dignity it is nothing, as appears from the premises. By the same reasoning, He could do nothing else nor move anything else, against the seventh part of this. That also which Averroes seems to argue — namely, that God does not have knowledge of particulars, and distinct knowledge of particulars and singulars, because these are infinite and are not determined by knowledge — should not move us; because God is simply infinite, and any virtue of His likewise, as the first Supposition and fourth part demonstrate. Indeed, God is more infinite than any infinite multitude which Averroes posits of existing particulars, of whatever species they may be, or even of all species: for than any such infinite multitude of any species, there is another greater multitude, namely, that gathered from it and another similar multitude of another species; even than the whole infinite multitude of all existing particulars, some greater could be — nay, double, triple, quadruple, and so on, simultaneously or successively. But God is so great and infinite that nothing greater or more infinite could be, as the first Supposition and fourth part show; wherefore correspondingly any virtue of His. Therefore the knowability of God and His capacity is not satisfied by any finite or infinite multitude of existing singulars of one species, or even of all together; but exceeds each one of them — even the whole multitude, if posited, gathered from all — somehow infinitely. What some moreover argue — that if God knew singulars, since they are mutable, His knowledge likewise would be mutable — would be true if He knew them as man does, alterably and passibly from them; but He does not know them so, on account of the sixth and seventh parts of this; rather materially and actively, as if a fixed eye through extramission saw the succeeding parts of a river.

10. AGAINST THOSE FEIGNING THAT GOD IS COMPOSED FROM HUMAN MEMBERS, OR OTHERS, OR FROM ANY DIVERSE THINGS WHATSOEVER, AND DENYING THAT HE IS A MOST SIMPLE, MOST INDIVISIBLE SUBSTANCE, HAVING NO COMPOSITION, DIVISIBILITY, OR MAGNITUDE — NAMELY, BODILY MAGNITUDE

Let the composers of God come to their senses, who feign that He is composed from human members, or others, or from any diverse things whatsoever; and let them know that God is a most simple, most indivisible substance, having no composition, divisibility, or magnitude — namely, bodily magnitude. For if such composition were in God, it would not be repugnant for the parts to be drawn off and separated from one another, nor therefore for the whole to be changed, diminished, or corrupted, which the premises corrupt. How, moreover, would God be supremely perfect, sufficient, or blessed, as the premises attest, if He necessarily depended on others and needed other necessary things? Also, it seems more actual and more potent to exist of itself and through itself sufficiently, than to be supported by another's prop and aid. But God is supremely actual and potent, such that nothing more actual or more potent could be, as the first Supposition and other earlier things demonstrate. Also, if God were composed of parts, any part composing — or at least the form perfecting, uniting, and joining those parts — would be naturally prior to God, against the first Supposition, as appears in the demonstration of the second Supposition. Beyond this, either God is composed from homogeneous parts only, or also from heterogeneous: if from homogeneous only, animals and the heavens are more perfectly composed, against the first Supposition and the third part of this. If from heterogeneous parts He be composed, those parts are of dissimilar office, of disparate dignity, and not equally perfect; therefore some of them is not supremely and infinitely perfect, against the fourth part premised.

Furthermore, if God is composed from parts: either some of them is of infinite perfection simply and in every way, or none. If some, it would itself be God, as the first Supposition shows; it would also be superfluous that God should have several parts, since that one alone would suffice for any purpose, against the third part of this. If none, this strikes against the fourth part of this. By the same token, then, any part could be more perfect, and so could God, which the first Supposition condemns. Moreover, the parts of God are either finite or infinite in number: if finite, the whole God is of finite perfection, against the first Supposition and fourth part. If infinite, the same will follow, since any of them, being only of finite perfection, could be increased; therefore, similarly, the whole God. Infinity also the second Supposition excludes, and all nature together, and any mind, refuses and abhors it. The other particle of this part follows from the prior and from the first Supposition, with the third and fourth parts.

11. AGAINST THE ZABIANS AND THEIR WISE MEN WORSHIPPING HEAVEN AS GOD

Let the Zabians and their wise men blush who worship heaven as God. For these men, by the testimony of Averroes upon Metaphysics I, comment 41, believing the heavens to be eternal, judged that the heavens are of themselves of eternal motion, nor must any principle nobler than themselves be posited; whence (as it seems) they worshipped them as God. But these will be corrected by the previous one. Moreover, the heavens are of finite virtue and power; they are also mutable, alterable, illuminable, and obscurable. Many possible perfections and goodnesses are also lacking to the heavens; therefore they are not God, as the preceding parts make manifest. Whence Averroes there premised: "This indeed, namely to find the simply first mover, is exceedingly difficult and concealed; and therefore that place was the slip of the wise."

12. AGAINST THE ADORERS OF THE SUN OR MOON, MARS OR JUPITER, OF ANY HEAVENLY SIGN, OR OF ANY SIGNS WHATSOEVER, AND UNIVERSALLY OF ANY PART OF HEAVEN

Let the adorers of the Sun and Moon, of Mars and Jupiter, of any heavenly sign, or of any signs whatsoever, and universally of any part of heaven, cease, on account of the reasoning given above concerning the whole heaven.

13. AGAINST THOSE FABRICATING FOR THEMSELVES TEMPORAL GODS — MEN, ANIMALS, TREES, FIRE, OR ANY SUCH THING

Let those be struck who fabricate for themselves such gods — men, animals, trees, fire, or any such thing. Such were certain ancient Gentiles, who made themselves gods of certain men, some living, some dead, as many histories attest. Whence Plato in Timaeus II.3: "Let our credulity," he says, "be a companion to the assertion of the ancient men, that the offspring of Earth and Heaven are Ocean and Tethys, and from these in turn Saturn and Rhea and Phorcus; and the offspring of Saturn and Rhea, Jupiter and Juno, and the others who are on the lips and in the minds of men, and of whose brotherhood fame is celebrated; and from these others have been born, who are reckoned gods." The Roman histories also attest, as Augustine recounts in De Civitate Dei IV.27, that Scaevola, the most learned Pontiff of the Romans, distinguished a threefold genus of gods — the Poetic, the Philosophical, and that of the Princes, or Civil — concerning the second of which he says thus: "The second does not suit cities, since it has some superfluities, some also which it harms peoples to know. Concerning the superfluous there is no great reason: for it is wont to be said by experts that 'superfluities do not harm.' But what are those things which, brought forth among the multitude, do harm? These," he says: "that Hercules, Aesculapius, Castor, and Pollux are not gods. For it is handed down by the learned that they were men and have failed by the human condition." Such were the ancient Babylonians who worshipped the Dragon, as recounted in Daniel 14. Such also were the ancient Egyptians, adoring the Bull as a deity. Whence Solinus, On the Wonders of the World 7, treating of Egypt and its affairs, says thus: "Among all the things which Egypt has worth memory, they especially marvel at the Bull which they call Apis, or Apim. They cultivate him as the likeness of a Deity, distinguished by a spot of white mark, which, born on his right side, bears the face of a horned crescent moon. A fixed span is established, which when it has come, immersed in the depth of a sacred fount he is killed, lest he draw the day longer than is permitted. Soon another, not without public mourning, is sought; whom, when found, a hundred priests escort to Memphis, that he may begin there, initiated into sacred things, to be made sacred. The shrines, into which he goes or in which he reclines, they mystically name 'thalamoi.' He gives all things manifesting concerning the future — that especially, if he should take food from the hand of the inquirer. Finally, having opposed the right hand of Germanicus Caesar, he disclosed the calamities pressing in, and not much after Caesar was extinguished. Boys follow Apis in groups, and suddenly, as if struck with frenzy, they prophesy things to come. A female cow is shown to him once a year, and she also is not without certain marks; which, as soon as she is found and offered, on the same day is given to death. The birthday of Apis they celebrate at Memphis by the throwing of a golden cup, which they cast into a vile whirlpool. This solemnity is conducted for seven days, on which days, with the priests, they have a certain truce with the crocodiles, nor do they harm those bathing. But on the eighth day, the ceremonies now finished, as if license to rage being restored, they resume their accustomed atrocity." This Apis, Papias in his Elementarium, and Isidore in Etymologies VI.44, say was a Bull of Egypt consecrated to Serapis, whose image they affirm the Jews going forth from Egypt to have fabricated for themselves in the desert. There are also certain more recent persons who, by the testimony of Marco of Venice, On the Conditions and Customs of Eastern Regions III.25, in Greater India, in the kingdom of Var, adore the bull, saying the bull is a most holy thing; nor do they kill bulls, nor eat their flesh out of reverence. When bulls die, they anoint their houses with their fat. And below at chapter 28 he says that in the province of Maabar, namely in Greater India, when those who adore the bull go forth to wars, each one carries with him some hairs of the wild bull. For they believe the wild bull to be of such sanctity that whoever carries upon himself any of his hairs will be safe in every danger. Such also were those Indians who, as appears from the Letter of Alexander to Aristotle on the situation and vastness of India, worshipped the trees of the Sun and Moon, which on any matters inquired of — even with silent thought, without any utterance — gave true responses to all; to which an Indian Priest solemnly ministered. Where also concerning Alexander's questioning and the wonderful response of the trees it is written in this manner: "We saw from the West the tops of the trees struck by the radiance of Phoebus' shining rays; and the Priest said, 'Look up, all of you, and let each silently meditate in silence on whatever matter he is going to consult about; let no one pronounce openly.' When I and the friends and the comrades had looked more carefully, lest amid the density of the groves any falsehood should mock us in the manner of men — soon, no such deceit intervening, we looked all the way up to the tops and branches; standing at hand, with divine ears we received the oracles. I was thinking, if, the world having been conquered, I might triumphantly return to my fatherland, to my mother Olympias and my dearest sisters; to which suddenly in a most slender Indian speech the tree responded: 'Unconquered Alexander in wars, as you have consulted the deity, you will be the one lord of the whole world; but living you will not return any further to your fatherland, since the Fates have so determined concerning your head.' Then I, since I knew not what the oracle was, asked the Indian to interpret it, whom partly by gifts, partly by threats, I compelled to declare whatever the trees should say. Wherefore, all having been known, with those who were in my company struck and weeping, openly — so was the custom — I was about to consult something else, and to enter at evening time. But the Moon had not yet risen, when, again invited to the grove, we stood near the sacred trees; soon, by accustomed custom, we adored. I had brought in with me three most faithful friends, Perdiccas, Diconas, and Philotas, since I feared no one further, nor was anything to be feared in me, where it was lawful for no one to be killed. I therefore consulted where I should die; and then at the first rising of the Moon, the horn of the tree being struck and brightness received, the tree answered in Greek: 'Alexander,' he said, 'you have now the full end of your age; but in the following year in the month of May you will die in Babylon — by him from whom you least expect, you will be deceived.' And below: 'I entered a third time to consult from the same most sacred Tree of the Sun, by what assassin's hand my death is to be guarded against; and what end my mother and my sisters will have.' The tree said in Greek: 'If I should disclose to you the plotter of your death, with him removed you would easily change the impending Fates; the three sisters would also be angry with me, namely, Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos, that I had betrayed their truthful oracles. Therefore in a year and 8 months you will die in Babylon, not by iron, as you suspect, but by poison. Your mother by a most foul and miserable end will at some time lie unburied in the road, prey to birds and beasts. Your sisters will be called happy by fate. You yourself, even though a brief time remains, yet will be Lord of the world. Now beware, do not question us further; depart from the bounds of our grove.'" All of which Justin and other Historiographers attest to have happened thus.

There were also many who worshipped fire as God, because it seems to conquer and consume other things. But all these can, like the previous ones, be easily chastised: for God, as the premises about the first Supposition attest, is necessary being. Therefore no temporal, generable, corruptible thing is God. Also, if any pure man be God, either man is from himself, or from another. If from himself, why not another man similarly, since he is of the same nature? Or why cannot another make himself God, just as he made himself? If from another, that other rather seems to be God, and is the one of which the first Supposition sings. Who also, unless more irrational than a beast, would have set up a beast, a tree, fire, or any irrational thing as his god — a thing knowing all or other things not at all, having an inefficacious will, a thing not omnipotent but weak, needy, passible, killable, and even destructible, even if it should strive to save itself — against the first Supposition and the parts premised? O miserably wretched, miserable man, if indeed a man — why are you not ashamed to adore and worship as your Lord God an irrational nature naturally baser, more ignoble, more imperfect, and subject to you? For whose mind does not place his God before himself and all other things in the order of dignity, as the first Supposition teaches?

14. AGAINST THE TRIFLERS AND TRIFLING ONES WHO ADORE A BURDENSOME MULTITUDE OF EQUAL GODS OF THE SAME SPECIES OR NATURE

Let the triflers and trifling ones be restrained who adore a burdensome multitude of equal gods of the same species or nature, as if one such did not suffice them. For if the first Supposition is true, one God most fully suffices. For where He did not suffice, some perfection and goodness would be lacking to Him, which could be present to Him or another, as the third and seventh parts of this show. Since therefore He alone in every way suffices, why is another posited superfluously and without cause, or others posited, since any wise philosopher or other — nay, nature itself — refuses and avoids this? And if anyone requires a witness, behold the Philosopher in De Caelo et Mundo III.39, who says: "It is not necessary to make the elements infinite: for all these, namely composites, will be rendered finite as existing." And below at 35: "It is manifest, because it is much better to make the principles finite; and these, as fewest, with all things being the same, just as those who in disciplines also judge them worthy." Why then, by worshipping many equal gods, do they make this one insufficient? Or if they believe this one to suffice, why, to the injury and contempt of Him, do they subtract from this one love, honor, and glory due to Him alone, and bestow them on others? Those also who feign thus concerning the divine nature greatly deviate and err. For it is not multipliable, nor can be plurified into many individuals altogether of similar reason, which would differ substantially and only in number, as natural species do — nay, neither could there be another individual of that nature. For if there could be, it could be supremely perfect and good; therefore it would be so, as was proved above in the conclusion of the first Supposition; and by the same reasoning by which one other could be, another could be, and another, and so beyond number infinite ones; therefore actually they would be so, which any mind refuses, and the second Supposition forbids.

Likewise, it is simply absolutely possible that there be a unique God. Who would not at once consent? Who, with this posited and admitted as absolutely possible, would not easily defend himself from all contradiction? And if it is possible that there be a unique God — namely, that one which according to the premises is necessary to be — and let that one be A, then it is necessary that that unique one be, and that every other God not be. For let B be some other God; and according to the previous things it is possible that B not be God, therefore by the sixth part it is possible that B not be: therefore either it is impossible to be, or possible to be by the possibility of contradiction; therefore it is necessary that B be not God, as the things had above in the demonstration of the first Supposition lucidly make manifest. Or more briefly: every God necessarily is God, as the first Supposition and sixth part demonstrate; B is not necessarily God; according to the premises, therefore, B is not God. Also, a multitude of equal gods, if posited, is it not in some way more perfect than one God? Therefore none of them is supremely perfect; therefore neither God, as the first Supposition shows. This unique true God, moreover, contains the whole essence and perfection possible of His species or nature, as the first Supposition proves. Therefore there is no other such God; nay, there cannot be, because not simultaneously with this one for the cause premised, nor after this one corrupted, or with this one in any way not being [there would be nothing], as the first Supposition shows. This reasoning, concerning any other individual of any other species — whether in natural things, or in artificial, or in any others — is self-evident. If anyone, however, rejoices in testimony, behold the Philosopher in De Caelo et Mundo I.92, showing that there is not, nor can be, several worlds, says thus: "Neither is there one necessity that there be several worlds, nor does it happen that they have been made several, since this one is from all the matter, as it is. So perhaps what is said will be more manifest." And it follows at 94: "For if snubness is curvature in the nose or flesh, and the matter is flesh for snubness; if from all flesh one flesh be made and there be in this snubness, nothing else will exist, nor will it be snub, nor does it happen to have been made. Likewise also, if to man are matter flesh and bone; if from all flesh and all bone man be made, with possibly existing things being dissolved, it will not be possible for there to be another man. Likewise also in others." And it follows at 95: "But the heaven is something singular, and of those things which are from matter; but if it does not consist from a part of itself, but from the whole, no other will be, nor will it happen that several have been made, on account of all the matter being comprehended."

Upon which Averroes in comment 95 says that demonstrations to the impossible are of the genus of signs; but this demonstration, proving the world to be unique, is propter quid. For it has the cause as its middle term, and therefore gives us knowledge of this thing along with its cause; and this is the most perfect of modes. Who also doubts which is more worthy, more honorable, and more perfect: to be through oneself the supreme and first without peer, or necessarily to have a peer, even though one would not? Therefore God, by the first Supposition, has no peer. Why also could not one of equal gods, differing numerically — like Angels or men — will what another would not, and contrariwise? For there seems no reason why, by absolute power, this could not be, since the volition of any of them does not depend on another, nor is it the same in number as the volition of another, just as he is not the same as another. Therefore any one of them could impede any other, and any others, and make him miserable, and them miserable, and contrariwise — which the first Supposition, third part, and eighth refute. Now of this matter the witnesses are nearly all the natural, divine, and moral Philosophers. For all natural Philosophers (with few exceptions) posit a unique first mover, who according to them is God. The divine ones likewise more expressly posit a unique first being, a unique first cause, a unique highest God. Whence Aristotle, Metaphysics XII, last chapter: "Beings do not wish to be ill-disposed, nor is a plurality of authorities a good. Therefore one Prince" — which Avicenna also proves in Metaphysics I.6 and 7, as was touched on above; and Algazel in his Metaphysics II.10. The moral Philosophers also, treating of polities, say that Monarchy is the best polity, especially if there be found one sufficiently fit; nor that several should rule simultaneously, except on account of the lack of one fit man to rule uniquely. This the books of Ethics and Politics of Aristotle, this the Civil Laws of the Nations, this the laws of all cities, communities, and Kingdoms attest. Those treating of military matters and the affairs of war also assert that one supreme leader is always best. All this appears more clearly in the lesser world — namely, in the lesser community of the powers of man (whence also all other human communities are originally derived). For there are collegially associated in man the exterior and interior powers, sense, appetite, will, and reason. But who is ignorant that one of these naturally ought to rule, and the others to serve? Whence the Philosopher in the Secret of Secrets, Part III, Chapter 8: "When God most high created man, He constituted His body a certain city, and His Intellect King in it; He constituted for it 5 bearers, namely the 5 Senses, presenting to it whatever things." Thus then in the greater World, also in the most ample City of the world, it must be felt. For thus most worthily, most honorably, and best does it suit God Himself and all others; therefore by the first Supposition it is necessary that it be so. Therefore it is not possible that there be many gods, equal, of the same species, differing only in number. Furthermore, according to the harmonious sentence of many Philosophers and Philosophical men, if there are many gods univocally, none of them is through itself and primarily God; but all by some one nature prior to themselves common to them and inhering commonly, which through itself and primarily is such, and the others secondarily through it. Therefore none of those is God, since He is not first and through Himself; but only that one common nature, as the first Supposition makes manifest. It is also more perfect to be good through oneself and primarily, than through another and secondarily, as no one is ignorant, and the Philosophers attest. Therefore He who is not through Himself and primarily God, is not God, as the first Supposition and third part demonstrate. Since moreover these are gods who are not most actual, most pure, most simple, and most sufficient through themselves, but constituted through another, against the first Supposition and parts premised?

15. AGAINST THOSE FEIGNING MANY EQUAL GODS DIFFERING IN NATURE OR SPECIES

Let those tremble who feign many equal gods, but differing in nature or species: of whom one presides over the East, another over the West; one over the South, another over the North; one over crops, another over vines; one over peace, another over health; one is set over one species, another over another. These, like the previous ones, will be easily instructed by the virtue of the first Supposition. Who also does not easily see that, if there are many gods differing in species or nature, any of them lacks the specific and proper perfection of any other; therefore is not supremely perfect, since something more perfect could be? Wherefore consequently none of them is God, as the first Supposition and third part demonstrate.

16. AGAINST THOSE POSITING A CONFUSION OF MANY GODS OF UNEQUAL VIRTUE AND DISPARATE DIGNITY, WHETHER OF THE SAME SPECIES OR DIFFERENT

Let those be confounded who posit a confusion of many gods of unequal virtue and disparate dignity, whether of the same species or different. Such were certain ancients, who however posited better in this than those positing equal and simply equally first gods, in that they said all besides one alone — whom they called Jupiter — were subjected to that one alone, as to a Prince or father. Whence the Philosopher in Politics I.8: "Well did Homer call upon Jupiter, saying, 'Father of men and of gods,' calling Him father, the King of all these." And above in the same I: "All gods," he says, "are said to be ruled." This was also the old error of the ancient Romans. Whence Augustine, De Civitate Dei IV.5: "But how in one place of this book can all the names of gods or goddesses be commemorated, which they could scarcely embrace in great volumes, distributing the proper offices of the deities to single things?" And below at 6: "They wish Jupiter himself to be King of all gods and goddesses. This, Varro believes, is also worshipped by those who worship one God alone without simulacrum, but called by another name" — by whom (as I believe) he understood the Jews; whence Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews XII.2, recounts that a certain Aristaeus, a wise man, said to Ptolemy Philadelphus, King of Egypt: "I have learned that the Jews worship the God maker of all things, whom we name Zen, that is, Jupiter." The Philosopher also in De Mundo, last chapter, showing that God, although one, is yet of many names, says that He is called Zeus and Jupiter; whom Hermes also in On the Eternal Word 21 likewise calls Jupiter. Plato also, by the testimony of Ambrose in On the Good of Death, called Jupiter both God and the mind of all. The Tartars also, who worship the great and immortal God, by the report of Marco of Venice in On the Conditions and Customs of Eastern Regions I.58, also worship a god whom they call Ntagay; whom they consider the god of earth and to bear the care of themselves and of the fruits of earth, of their sons, and of their flocks; and this one most reverently. But these err horribly. For He is not God who is not supremely perfect, as the first Supposition shows.

17. AGAINST THOSE DENYING THAT GOD IS UNIQUE AND NOT MANY, OR AFFIRMING THAT IT IS POSSIBLE FOR THERE TO BE MANY; AND DENYING THAT IT IS NECESSARY SIMPLY THAT THERE BE A UNIQUE ONE AND NOT MANY, OR AFFIRMING THAT IT IS POSSIBLE FOR THERE TO BE MANY

Let those revere who deny that God is unique and not many, or who affirm that it is possible for there to be many; and who deny that it is necessary simply that there be a unique one and not many, or affirm that it is possible for there to be many. Such were many famous Philosophers. For as Augustine recounts in De Civitate Dei VIII.12, Plotinus, Iamblichus, Porphyry, Apuleius, and the other Platonists — and also Plato himself — judged that sacred rites should be made to many gods. But let all these deign to acknowledge that there are not, nor can there be, many gods equal or unequal, of the same species or different, as the prior parts lucidly make manifest. That one is necessarily simply, namely God, the first Supposition clearly shows; and that He is unique and not many, the first particle of this part shows. For nothing is necessarily simply except God. For God has no cause from which He depends in being, as the first Supposition and fifth part prove; nor has He any part, as the tenth part shows. Therefore anything else besides Himself, God could possibly absolutely destroy and remain. For He could will it not to be; therefore by the eighth part He could make it not to be, as the seventh part by the omnipotence of God shows: especially since anything else besides God is less than He, since not supremely perfect, as the first Supposition was saying — nay, even disproportionally and somehow infinitely less than He, since infinitely somehow distant from the supreme perfection aforesaid. Furthermore, who doubts that it is absolutely possible that there be a unique necessary being simply, namely God? Who would not at once consent? Who, with this posited and admitted as absolutely possible, would not easily defend himself from all repugnance? Therefore anything else besides God can not be simply; therefore anything else is not necessary being simply, as can be evidently shown from the demonstration of the first Supposition. Furthermore, if there is no necessary being simply besides God, neither can there be anything else besides Him, as the demonstration of the first Supposition perspicuously demonstrates; and if a falsifier should posit it to be, it would be continuously destroyed by the premises. This Avicenna also attests in his Metaphysics I.6 and 7, and Algazel in his Metaphysics II.1.

18. AGAINST THOSE POSITING MANY FIRST PRINCIPLES SIMPLY CONTRARY TO ONE ANOTHER, OF WHICH NONE IS REDUCED TO ANOTHER, NOR ALL TO SOMETHING ONE COMMON TO THEM — AS GOOD AND EVIL — AND CONSEQUENTLY DREAMING OF TWO SUCH GODS, OR MORE

Let those without shame be ashamed who posit many first principles simply contrary to one another, of which none is reduced to another, nor all to something one common to them — as good and evil — and consequently further dreaming of two such gods, or more. The father of this error seems to be Empedocles. For seeing not only goods coming to be, but also evils, he posited one principle good, from which all goods would proceed; another evil, from which all evils would proceed; which he sometimes also named love or friendship, and strife or hatred. Whence the Philosopher in Metaphysics I, chapter 10: "Since contraries seemed to inhere to goods — and not only ordering and good, but disorder and the base; and more evils than goods, and depraved than upright — thus another introduced Love and Strife, each as the cause of those several things. For if one should follow up and take it to its sense, and not to what dictated Empedocles babbles, he will find Love to be the cause of goods, but Strife of evils. Wherefore if one should say that Empedocles in some way first names good and evil as principles, perhaps he will say well: if good is the cause of all goods, and evil of all evils." Pythagoras, following him, is said to have posited two systichias — two co-elementations or co-orderings — of 10 principles on one side, and 10 on the other, as is briefly touched in Metaphysics XII.37, where in the ninth Translation it has "co-elementation," but in the Translation which Averroes expounds, systichia: which word Alexander and Averroes likewise expound briefly to the aforesaid sense. But Eustratius, on that passage of the Philosopher in Ethics I.7, "But the Pythagoreans seem more probably to speak about it, positing one in the co-ordering of goods," in his commentary 56, expounding this more fully, says thus: "The Pythagoreans set forth two systichias, that is, co-orderings, which by following Eustratius himself can be described thus":

1. Limit Infinite
2. Perfect Superfluous
3. One Multitude
4. Right Left
5. Male Female
6. Straight Curved
7. Light Darkness
8. Square Oblong
9. Resting Moved
10. Good Evil

But following Alexander, it appears that the description ought to be transposed, namely by placing Good and Evil at the heads of the systichias as supreme, and the others under them — so that one would be called the systichia of good, the other of evil — which also seems to me more fitting, although the text which Averroes expounds says that the things understood through themselves and the first substance are the last systichia: for I understand this in ascending. Alexander also seems to say that these Pythagoreans ordered the first under the genus which is good; and the last in evil. But if this be true, the other two which Eustratius posits ought to be removed, and in their place these two be put. The Philosopher himself, in Metaphysics I.12, both in the things ordered and in the order, differs from both. For he says: "Others say there are 10 principles according to the said co-elementation: Finite, infinite; Even, odd; One, plural; Right, left; Male, female; Resting, moved; Straight, curved; Light, darknesses; Good, evil; Quadrangular, oblong." But I think the Philosopher did not weigh much — because it was not much necessary — the order of these in this place. The reason of Pythagoras (as is recounted there) was because the denary is perfect, in that it comprehends the nature of all numbers. Therefore he posited 10. He also posited 10 celestial Spheres; and therefore perhaps he wished to posit 10 gods. Following this reason of Pythagoras, Architas the Pythagorean, as Boethius recounts in Arithmetic II.41, before Aristotle constituted the 10 famous Predicaments. To these, certain others succeeding, deceived by the previously touched motivation of Empedocles, said, as Averroes recounts upon Metaphysics XII, comment 52: "There are two Gods, of whom one causes goods, the other evils." The inventor — or rather follower — of this error was Manes the Maniac, the father of vain Manichaeans. It seems however more reasonable from the premises that he and his disciples should be called Empedocleans or Pythagoreans. Concerning this Manes, in the Ecclesiastical History book VII, chapter 28 (the second-to-last), it is written in this manner: "A certain Manes, raging according to his name, also stirred up by the impulse of the demon, teaches a hateful heresy"; where also many things are written about him. The blessed Augustine also, On Heresies 46, treats of this Manes and the Manichaeans and their heresy; and many other books were written against them or any of them. Isidore also, Etymologies VIII.9, recounts; and it is recounted in the Canon, Cause 24, last Question, last Chapter; where also many heretics with their heresies are recounted. His perverse sect persists in some, although few, parts even up to this day. But all these err in two ways; therefore they must be reduced in two ways. First, because they assert many Gods, against what was just shown. Secondly, because they construct an evil God: for how could there be any evil God, the first Supposition and third part of this most constantly reclaiming? Their motivation also ought to move no one. For any existing thing, insofar as existing, is good, and none simply evil, as invincible reason makes manifest, and the later, more profound, and more famous Philosophers and Catholic Doctors attest; therefore neither is anything inappropriate if it proceeds from a good God. What they argue concerning the denary number is not worth a denarius nor a minutum; for it does not even attain the force of Rhetorical persuasion.

19. AGAINST THE POETS LYING THAT GOD ENVIES STUDIOUS MEN OR OTHERS

Let the Poets be punished who lie that God envies studious men or others. Such were certain ancients, as the Philosopher recounts in Metaphysics I, in the Prologue. But these, like the previous ones, will be refuted, since to envy is evil; whom also there briefly the Philosopher refutes, citing the Proverb: "The Poets lie much."

20. AGAINST THOSE FABRICATING DISHONORABLE AND BASE GODS — EATING, DRINKING, MIXING WITH WOMEN, DELIGHTING IN DISHONORABLE, BASE, AND THEATRICAL MATTERS OR GAMES

Let those be honored who fabricate for themselves dishonorable and base gods — eating, drinking, mixing with women, delighting in dishonorable, base, and theatrical matters or games — and all who feign such goddesses for themselves. Such were the ancient Babylonians, who believed their god Bel to eat and drink, as is recounted in Daniel 14. Such also were the ancient Romans and Greeks, who believed their gods to eat and fornicate, and to delight in such matters and gesticulations; therefore they dedicated to them Theatrical Games, as is sufficiently established from their histories. Such also seem to be the Tartars, of whom Marco of Venice in On the Conditions and Customs of Eastern Regions I.58 says that every Tartar has in his house an idol of his god Natigay, and idols of his wife and son; and when they go to dinner or supper, first with the fat of cooked flesh they anoint the mouths of these gods of theirs, and they pour out part of the broth outside the house, so that these gods may receive their part. Concerning such gods, as Augustine recounts in De Civitate Dei VIII.13, the Gentiles opined that, just as good and honorable Gods are to be placated by sacred honors, that they may help, so also evil and dishonorable gods, lest they harm; therefore they joined Theatrical Games to their divine matters. Concerning such Gods and their Games and pictures, the Philosopher speaking in Politics VII, last chapter, writes thus: "The Legislator must, totally, exterminate from the City foul speech, like anything else: for to say easily anything of base things makes one near to doing it. The greatest care, therefore, must be taken from youth, that they neither say nor hear anything such. But if anyone has appeared saying or doing anything forbidden, if free but not yet judged worthy of mention in banquets, with disgraces and beatings he is to be punished; but one of older age in dishonorings unbecoming free men, for the sake of utility. Since therefore we exterminate the saying of any such things, it is manifest that also the seeing — either pictures or dishonorable speeches. The Princes' care, therefore, is that no sculpture or picture be of such actions, except among certain such gods to whom also the law has attributed lasciviousness. Further, the law dismisses those who have age more advanced both for themselves and for their boys with worship to honor the gods. But the younger ought not be set as spectators of Iambics or Comedy, before they receive the age in which it will exist for them to share already in reclining at table, and from drunkenness and from what is done by such, training will make all impassible. Now, therefore, in passing we have made discourse of these things; later, however, insisting we must determine more, whether it is necessary or not. First, whether it is not necessary, doubting; and how it is necessary; according to the present time we have remembered as if necessarily. But perhaps they did not say well, that such was Theodore the gesticulator of Tragedy: for he never permitted any to bring himself in, nor any of the vile actors, as ones appropriate to the first Theaters, to the first hearings. But this same thing happens also in the conversations of men, and in those of things: for we love all the first ones more; therefore we must make all foreign things which are depraved foreign to youths, but most of all whatever of these has the infection or adhering." What also Plato felt concerning Theatrical Games offered to such gods, hear (Augustine narrating, where above), that he judged the Poets themselves, who composed songs so unworthy of the majesty and goodness of the gods, must be expelled from the city: with whom Scaevola, the most learned Pontiff of the Romans, also concurs, as their deeds attest, and Augustine recounts in De Civitate Dei IV.27, distinguishing a threefold genus of gods, namely the Poetical, the Philosophical, and the Civil. The first he calls trifling, because they feign many things unworthy of the gods: namely because they so deform the gods that they cannot be compared with good men, when they make one steal, another commit adultery; likewise something else basely and ineptly to say or do — as that three goddesses contended among themselves for the prize of beauty; that the two conquered by Venus overthrew Troy; that Jupiter himself was turned into a Bull or Swan, that he might lie with someone; that a Goddess married a man; that Saturn devoured his sons. Finally, no marvels and vices can be feigned which are not found there, and which are far from the nature of the gods. But just as the previous ones are led by the first Supposition and third part to the goodness of the gods or God, so these are led to honesty. Is not honesty to be reckoned a great virtue and goodness?

Likewise, if God eats, this is either on account of necessity, or on account of pleasure: not on account of necessity, as the first Supposition, fifth part, sixth, and seventh clearly teach; for then He could also be corrupted, which the premises corrupt. If on account of pleasure, how is He not to be reckoned intemperate or incontinent? — against the third part of this. God also most fully suffices to Himself for fullest pleasure, joy, gladness, beatitude, and perfect happiness, as the fifth and third parts demonstrate. Everyone also alternately delighted by eating is alternately changed, and has a mouth and other members required for such an act: but God by no means, as the sixth and tenth parts show.

Likewise, it can be shown that God does not touch a woman, especially since God is necessary being, and inimitable, not needing an heir, nor the help of anyone, as the premises attest. Also, if God so generated from a woman or goddess — what worthier thing would He generate than another God? — and so there would be many gods, against the 17th part of this. If also any goddess be posited, it seems that she is in some way God, since "God" is an essential name by the sixth part of this. Therefore there will be many gods of disparate dignity; for it seems that a goddess is of more imperfect condition than a God; against the 16th and 17th parts of this. How, moreover, will such a goddess be honored as a God, since she is of more imperfect condition? Therefore not supremely perfect; therefore not God, as the first Supposition makes manifest.

21. AGAINST IDOLATERS

Let Idolaters cast away all their idols — masculine, feminine, or neuter, of human, bestial, or other figure. Such idols indeed many ancient Gentiles of old worshipped; some also up to this day in the parts of the East are reported to worship such idols. But any idol, if it be of any perfection, power, and virtue, is only of finite, and could be of greater; but God by no means, as the first Supposition teaches. An idol is also fabricable and corruptible: but God is necessary being, as the same Supposition makes manifest. An idol moreover needs a supporter, and many other things, and is mutable, an irrational power, composed of diverse things: but God by no means, as the fifth, sixth, eighth, and tenth parts teach. Is not man, beast, tree, heaven, Sun, and Moon of more perfect nature than an idol — metal, any wood, stone, or mud? And yet none of these is God, as the 13th, 12th, and 11th parts show. Therefore neither can any idol be. All Idolaters also posit a multitude of idols, therefore of gods, against the 17th part of this. Idols moreover are posited as having sex and diverse members, which can be refuted by the things premised in the demonstration of the next part of this. Idolaters also make their idols from nobler and ignobler, more perfect and more imperfect matter; but, the first Supposition proving, God cannot be that than which something more perfect is found. An idol also made of nobler matter — for example, of gold — could have greater matter, and perhaps purer, and more gems, and better stones; therefore could also be better: but God by no means.

Here perhaps the Idolaters will respond, saying that that material idol is not by itself materially God; but when it has been carmined, dedicated, and consecrated in the due manner, it receives a certain virtue, and so becomes God, and is. But these can be refuted as before; for if it is so, that god is new and not necessary being, mutable, passible, destructible, needy, composed, plurifiable — if such consecration be made in diverse places — but God by no means, as the things had make manifest. Moreover, that virtue which the consecrated idol receives is either God or not. If it is God, and the composite from the material idol and that virtue is God, then either there are many gods, or the same God is part of Himself. To the same point: if that virtue is God, either it is that God of whom the first Supposition speaks, or another. If that one, why is He not more compendiously worshipped without the consecrated idol? — especially since He does not need an idol; since also an idol is said to be a little form formed to the image and likeness of another thing; but God is altogether incorporeal; therefore He cannot properly have any little form or bodily likeness, by the testimony of the tenth part. That true God, moreover, by no incantation or carmination can be drawn to an idol, since He is altogether immutable and impassible. If another, there are many gods, against the 17th part of this. If that virtue is not God, neither is the material idol God; how then from two non-gods is one God made? That virtue also, even if it be not God, is yet finite, and could be greater; and similarly the material idol; therefore also the whole gathered together: but God by no means, the first Supposition and fourth part forbidding. Likewise, if a man makes for himself a God, either he does this by his own virtue, or by another's: if by his own, it seems that he is more worthy than his god, as any maker than his thing made; if by another's virtue, either of another God, or of a non-God: if of another God, therefore that god does not suffice, and there will be many gods; if of a non-God, how can a non-God make one God? And the lesser the greater, and so much greater? Likewise, if a man makes for himself a God, that God is more obliged to the man than contrariwise; like a son to his father, and a thing made to its maker.

Otherwise perhaps it is responded that the material idol, after such consecration rightly performed, is wholly transubstantiated and converted into God. But how can a corporeal thing be immediately converted into an incorporeal thing? For God is incorporeal and altogether indivisible, by the testimony of the tenth part. This conversion also can be refuted in many ways, according to what is given by them. For it appears to any sense, with all experiment attesting, that there is the same material idol there as before; therefore, if any conversion is made there, it seems rather that God is converted into the idol than contrariwise. That God moreover into whom the idol is converted is either new or eternal; not new, the first Supposition forbidding; if eternal, either it is that God of whom the first Supposition speaks, or another, etc., as against the prior response. And if you should still consequently say that God dwells in the heavens, nor heeds what is done about us on earth, nor furnishes help to us, except through such consecration He descend into the form of an idol to dwell with us — you make God mutable, against the sixth part; nor do you heed that God always knows all things by the ninth part, and that He has a will universally efficacious by the eighth. Is it not so, even if God dwells on the highest summit of heaven, that He sees all things which are done on earth, every necessity of yours, every petition of yours of mouth and heart? Is it not so, also, that if He should will that you be helped on earth and have any petition most efficaciously, immediately it would be done? And is it not so, that the more honorably and better you feel concerning Him, the more willingly will He hear your petitions? And is it not more honorable and better that He, existing in heaven, should know and be able to help you on earth, than that He should not know nor be able, unless having left heaven He descend to earth? Thus then feel concerning God, especially since the first Supposition and parts premised infallibly demonstrate this. Furthermore, to the consecrated idol, either God comes voluntarily, or necessarily and unwillingly. If voluntarily, He recognizes in heaven the consecration made at such time and in such place on earth; why then not similarly all other things? But that necessarily, unwilling and constrained, through such consecration He descends from heaven, who would say it, the first Supposition, third part, and seventh most constantly reclaiming?

Furthermore, who will make such conversion? If a man, by his own virtue, or that of his words — why cannot he more easily make every lesser conversion of any material thing into any other? If God makes this, since in every making and motion the maker and mover are simultaneous with the thing made and moved, God was there simultaneously with the idol now converted, and prior in nature to the conversion that was made; therefore, to have God present there, it was not necessary that such conversion should be made.

Further, Hermes Trismegistus the threefold, in his book On the Eternal Word, the maker, worshipper, and defender of idols, says that idols and statues are certain gods — not however the supreme God, but subjected to Him and lesser than He, and which he says are made by men, and that this is the greatest power of men, and that they are composed from souls and bodies; and because men cannot make souls, they call out the souls of Demons, Angels, or men, and clothe them in sacred images, as appears clearly at chapters 25, 40, and following. Whence in chapter 40: "Of all marvels," he says, "this conquers in admiration: that man could find out the divine nature, and effect it. Since therefore our forefathers erred much concerning the reason of the gods, incredulous, and not heeding the divine cult and religion, they invented an art by which they would effect gods; to this invention they joined virtue agreeing from the nature of the world, and mixing it — since they could not make souls — calling out the souls of Demons or Angels, they put them into sacred images and divine mysteries, through which the idols had powers both of doing good and evil." And below in the same 40, he shows the same concerning human souls. And above at 25, speaking to Asclepius despising statues: "O Asclepius," he says, "do you see how much you yourself distrust statues animated, full of sense and spirit, and doing such great and such things — both statues prescient of futures, and prophets predicting many things, making weaknesses for men, and curing them?" But if Trismegistus speaks univocally of God or gods, by the 16th and 17th parts of this he will be easily corrected. But if he speaks equivocally, it is not too much to be heeded; for things being known, it appears vain to wrangle too much about names.

But concerning religion, very much is to be heeded. Since therefore that one God of Trismegistus, of whom the first Supposition speaks, is supremely knowing, supremely good, supremely pious and clement, supremely generous and powerful, also indeed everywhere present, as the same Supposition and following parts demonstrate, and you yourself in the same book of yours in diverse places confess — why do you feign other gods, or another god, for yourself? Why cannot this one suffice you? — especially since this God in any goodness exceeds any other, and any others, infinitely, as the third and fourth parts evidently show. Why therefore do you reckon Him less sufficient or less propitious to the suppliant? Why also, to His prejudice and contempt, do you bestow upon other gods made by hand the honor of divinity, and procure that it be bestowed by others? Why also, moreover, do you consecrate idols to Demons, reprobate and malignant Spirits, enemies of the true God and of His friends, render cult, and derogate from the cult of the true God? Are not Bel, Astaroth, and the rest of the names of idols, names of Demons and malignant Spirits, as the Necromantic books On the Office of Spirits and others make manifest? What, I ask, does the consecration of an idol differ from the magical consecration of a Head of Venus or Saturn? Indeed such a head duly consecrated would seem much more divine than an idol. For very many Spirits are reported to inhabit such a head; but only one inhabits an idol. But who does not know that a head so consecrated — or rather execrated — is not God, nor to be cultivated with divine honor? Why also do you offer Latria — that is, the cult due to God alone — to any creature? For it is not hidden from you, Trismegistus, Father of Philosophers (as I think), that God is the final cause of any creature, as is also easily persuaded by the first Supposition with the second. Therefore no creature is finally to be loved, honored, or cultivated for its own sake; but finally for the sake of God, that thus He may finally and principally be honored in it.

You will perhaps respond, saying that you so honor those Gods and offer them the cult of Dulia, not Latria. But why, I ask, do you so adore the Devil, the enemy of God and all His friends, Angels and men? For never have I heard of an idol dedicated to the name of any holy Angel, but only to the name of Bel, Astaroth, or the like, all of whom it is established are Demons and reprobate spirits.

And if you should still say that some Holy Angel inhabits some consecrated idol, how, I ask, does the idol enter at your consecration — voluntarily or by force? Voluntarily it does not seem. For how would a Holy and blessed Angel willingly leave the most glorious society of Angels and the most glorious heaven, and descend to the dark prison of the idol, and remain there solitary? Also, if voluntarily he comes to the idol, he could not come; therefore even after such consecration rightly performed, the idol could not be God, but only the matter which preceded; and so you would be worshipping not God but only that matter — which (as I think) you yourselves deny. If moreover he should come voluntarily, voluntarily he stays there, and could voluntarily withdraw at any time; and so you, deluded, will adore one trunk. Nor at your consecration does he enter constrained and unwilling. For thus a blessed Angel in heaven would become miserable on earth. How also do your powers exceed the powers of the strongest Angels? Or your prudence theirs? How also do the powers of carmens, aromatics, and herbs transcend natural bounds, ascend to the summit of heaven, and drive out Angels, enclose, imprison, and bind them inseparably?

Moreover, if such consecration could draw one heavenly Angel unwilling from heaven, why not another, and yet another, and all the others, and so empty the whole heaven of Angels? Is it not also so, that at the same hour at which you in your place call out some Angel, another could also elsewhere call out the same one similarly? To which of you therefore would he come? Certainly to neither, and so you both will be deluded, and will adore a pure stone or wood.

Further, if anyone, with your idol consecrated in your place to the name of any Angel, should call out the same Angel to another idol elsewhere through consecration, carmination, herbs, gems, incense, aromatics, and all such stronger things — would he not abandon your idol and go to the other? Furthermore, with your consecration ceasing, and you together with others sleeping, what would detain the Angel unwilling there perpetually? For a continued effect requires a continuing cause. But that any force of characters, herbs, aromatics, or gems would have such dominion over so potent and noble a creature would be altogether dissonant from reason and contrary to the natural order. How also is it not contrary to the natural order, that an inferior man should preside over superior Angels, by commanding, sending, and compelling them as he wishes? For it would more befit contrariwise, as we see in any polity, in any family, in every house duly ordered.

You will say perhaps, Trismegistus, as in your book you sometimes seem to suggest, that man is more perfect and superior to an Angel in the natural order. Why then do you subject yourself to a creature subjected to you, and worship and cultivate it as your God? For it would more befit contrariwise.

Concerning good and holy human souls likewise it is to be argued, especially since, by your own authorship, departing from the body they ascend to heaven.

Furthermore, if you make for yourself a God, it seems that in some way you are greater and worthier than He, as a maker than his thing made; and that your God, if He is grateful, is more obliged to love, honor, and cultivate you than you Him: for you have done more for Him. For you have given Him being, like a father — nay, more than a father gave to his son, whose being also continually depends on the nod of your judgment. For by something contrary to the prior consecration you can dissolve Him, or by fire, hammer, or axe reduce Him to dust and to nothing. Nor ought your reasoning, Hermes, to conclude anything to any rational animal: for you know well, as also the Necromancers and others know well, that Demons, the reprobate and malignant, are prescient of futures, and work many marvels even in the bodies of men; not however are they gods to be cultivated by men, but to be guarded against as their pestilent enemies and crafty seducers.

Some however responding more subtly, and approaching nearer to true religion, say that the true God, although He is one and incorporeal and simple, yet has many virtues by which and through which He shows Himself, making many corporeal and sensible effects, from which correspondingly He is named with many names. Whence the Philosopher in De Mundo, last chapter, says that God, since He is one, is yet of many names according to the multitude of those things which He renews, and of which He is the cause; and that He is called Jupiter, and by many other names. It was also shown above through other testimonies that God is called Jupiter. Whence also Albricius of London, On the Origin of the Gods, or in his Poetaster, in the Prologue, says that God is called Vituneus, because He furnishes life; Sentinus, because sense: and is called Jupiter in the ether, Juno in the air, Diana on earth, and in diverse sex; for which he also alleges these verses of Valerius Sorianus:

Jupiter Almighty, finder of things and of Kings, Father and mother of the Gods, one and the same God.

Therefore these responders say further that they fabricate an idol only to the true God — although in much dissimilar and unworthy manner, yet in the more similar and worthier manner that they know and can. They say also that they fabricate many idols to the one true God, on account of the multitude of names, effects, and virtues of His; and so they cultivate these idols not on account of the idols themselves in any way, but that through the one true God and His manifold virtue they may manifoldly venerate. And this seems the response of the wise ancient Romans. But would that all worshippers of idols so understood, so felt. But to what purpose, I ask, is it necessary to impose so many names on one God, to fabricate so many and so varied idols — when He could more compendiously, more briefly, more lightly, and more usefully be called by one proper name God, and similarly without an idol be adored? For Him being adored under that name, all His virtues are necessarily co-adored: for these do not really differ from Him, as the fifth and tenth parts teach, and the response confesses. But he who would not adore the virtues of God except severally, and through several idols, will never adore them severally; nay, it is necessary that he not adore many incomparably more than he ever adores, since God has infinite virtues, as the third part demonstrates; but he can know distinctly only finite and few, and fabricate only finite idols.

Is it not also more compendious and useful that, in any necessity, you should have one certain refuge most fully sufficient in every way — as is God, the fifth, seventh, eighth, and ninth parts attesting — to which you may always promptly recur by supplication? Than that, according to the doctrine of Varro, in infirmity to Aesculapius, in war to Mars, on the sea to Neptune, for wine to Liber, for water to the Nymphs, and so in single necessities to single Gods, names of Gods, or of God, you should recur? For you can fall into many necessities, whence you might not know to which proper God to flee by entreaty — unless perhaps you should wish to feign for yourself some new God and fabricate a new idol for Him; but before you should do this, perhaps you would perish. Let then the most sufficient and most omnipotent and most clement, the one true God, and the one name of Him, suffice you always, everywhere, and in all things, the multitude of idols being relinquished.

Let also any subtle and learned man take care for himself, while he preaches the many and varied virtues of God, while he names Him variously, and fabricates varied idols — although he himself soundly understands that these virtues in God in no way really differ, but are the same, and God is really only one and simple — lest perhaps he make the rude, simple, and unlearned to believe that these virtues really differ, and also that there are many gods really differing according to the multitude of names and the differences of idols.

22. AGAINST THE ARIANS

Let the arid Arians be converted, who turn aside no small part of Asia — who, by the testimony of Augustine in On Heresies 49 and Isidore in Etymologies VIII.11, and in the Canon where above, separate the substance of the Divine Persons, and co-affirm them as unequal and not co-eternal: but the Son the temporal creature of the Father, and the Holy Spirit the temporal creature of the Son: since if it were so, there would be a plurality and inequality of Gods against the premises, and against the edict of the first Supposition.

How also would He be God, who would not be eternal and necessary being, as the first Supposition shows, and the preceding things have taught?

23. AGAINST THE DONATISTS

Let the Donatists return, leading away nearly the whole of Africa, similar and dissimilar to the Arians, saying that the divine Persons are of the same substance, but of unequal magnitude — because the Son is less than the Father, and the Holy Spirit less than both — as some Histories, and Augustine in On Heresies 69 and Epistle 32 to Boniface, attest. But these let them deign to acknowledge that He cannot be God who is not supremely perfect, as the first Supposition teaches.

24. AGAINST THE SABELLIANS

Let the Sabellians revere, who posit in the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit unity and identity of essence and person. For God is necessary to be, and is necessary to be God, as the first Supposition shows, just as was shown above. But it is impossible that any such thing be; or if it could in any way be, it could not be God. For if Father and Son are the same, this is either with respect to Himself or with respect to another. Not with respect to Himself: for no thing begets, effects, or produces itself (for this includes contradiction), by the judgment of any mind whatsoever, as the preceding things make manifest. If with respect to another, therefore God the Son is from another than Himself — another, I say, personally and essentially. That so other, then, either is God or not. If He is God, there are many gods, against what was shown before. If He is not God, God is begotten and is from a non-God; the opposite of which the first Supposition shows, as the preceding things have declared. Nor can anyone respond for Sabellius by saying that God is not simultaneously Father and Son and Holy Spirit, but successively, when He has wished, severally — now this, then that, at other times that. For when He is Son, He is necessarily Son of some Father or parent: for these necessarily refer to one another, as no mind is permitted to be ignorant. But neither can He be Son of Himself, nor of another, as was shown above, His hypothesis standing: God would also be mutable, against the sixth part premised.

Chapter 25 — Against Those Who Do Not Distinguish, but Concede Without Qualification That God Is of Infinite Virtue and of Infinite Power, Even Intensively

Let those who say that God is of infinite virtue and of infinite power distinguish and separate the pure from the worthless, and the true understanding from the false. For no one seems to have ever wanted such a saying to be understood of infinity according to duration only, or according to extension, or according to those other improper modes which the Philosopher touches upon in Physics III, but only according to intension. And according to this kind of infinity it can have a twofold understanding. One [understanding is] proper, namely that God is properly intense, and his virtue and power infinitely so — as if some remitted light were intensified until it became infinitely intense; or as though from the beginning it were infinitely intense, just as heat and other natural qualities are intense under certain degrees. But God is not in this way properly infinite intensively, nor is any virtue of his. For whatever is properly intense could without contradiction be remitted. Therefore God and his virtue could be remitted, and could be more imperfect than he now is — which power, together with its act, the fourth Part and the first Supposition forbid.

Likewise, if God were properly intense, it would be without contradiction possible that there should be some remitted suppositum of the same species or nature; and since "God" is an essential name (because otherwise God could be not-God), that more remitted suppositum would be God. Wherefore, according to the fourth Part, it would be supremely perfect, and consequently supremely intense. It was shown above that there cannot be many unequal gods of the same species or nature. And further, why could not the more remitted God be intensified up to the supreme, even to equality with the more intense, since they are of the same nature? And so there could be many equal gods of the same species, differing only in number. God too would be mutable — which was reprov'd above.

This same point could be demonstrated otherwise and in many ways, but these things ought to suffice for any pure lover of truth. God therefore is not properly intense, nor remitted, neither intensible nor remissible, but of a most indivisible, most immutable, most stable, and most simple nature. Yet he is truly, although in a certain way improperly, of infinite virtue, of infinite fortitude, of infinite power intensively — which can be understood in three modes.

First, with respect to other active powers, namely equivalently, and even pre-eminently. For whatever action or effect this active power can produce — say heat, and twice this, and four times this, and so on — God can produce by his proper power, without the aid of any other, and indeed greater. Indeed, even if there could be a heat infinite intensively that could act so much, God could likewise.

Second, as to the species of action. For God by his proper power can make and create something out of nothing, which no other power, however great, can do.

Third, as to the measure of the extrinsic action or effect. For every effect which another cause produces in some time, God could produce in less time, however much less — indeed, even in an instant. God can also produce some extrinsic operation or effect, and a greater one twofold, fourfold, and so on without end. There is therefore no maximum that he can do, nor minimum that he cannot do; wherefore he can truly be called of infinite power. For according to the Philosopher, On the Heavens and the World I [text 116], and through Averroes in his Commentary, an active power is defined and bounded by the maximum into which it can do, or — according to those who perhaps look more subtly — by the minimum into which it cannot.

Chapter 26 — Against the Painters of God, Who Depict Him as Affected by Various Qualities, Attributes, Habits, or Accidental Acts, or by Some Accident

Let the painters of God desist from depicting him as affected by various qualities, attributes, habits, or accidental acts really diverse from him, or by any accidents whatsoever, or by some accident. For such qualities and accidents would not be infinitely intense, on account of what was said above; nor finitely, on account of the fourth Part already laid down. Those accidents too would either be infinite in number or finite. They would not be infinite, for it is better to be perfected through finite means and to need fewer rather than many. The first Supposition does not allow this, nor does the second permit it. Nor can they be posited as finite, because then more in number would be worth more. Thus God would not be supremely perfect, nor would he have all power and virtue — which the first Supposition shows.

Furthermore, that God is disposed by no accidents — indeed, that he is not subject to any accident — is clearly evident from what precedes. For if he were subject to some accidents, or to some accident, he would not be the most pure act, nor maximally actual, contrary to the third Part of this work.

Again, if God has any accident, it is either superfluous, or necessary, or useful: not superfluous, on account of the third Part of this work; nor necessary or useful, on account of the fifth.

Further, since an accident can be present or absent while the subject remains, if God is disposed by some accident, he is mutable, contrary to the sixth Part already laid down.

Chapter 27 — Against Despair Either from the Magnitude or from the Multitude of Sins

Let the Cainites and the Judaics breathe again, who despair on account of however great a magnitude or multitude of crimes. The Cainites are so called from Cain, who on account of the magnitude of his iniquity despaired of pardon: "My iniquity is greater," he says, "than that I should deserve pardon" (Gen. 4).

The Judaics are so called from the Jews, who despair on account of the multitude of their sins. For they tenaciously believe — and within a short time they steadfastly said this to me myself — that if anyone has sinned a fourth time, pardon is not possible for him, nor any medicine of penance. This is to be understood of the same kind of sin, and of one who has at some time fallen into sin, and risen again through the mercy of God and penance; who, after penance, relapsing, fell a second time, and likewise rose again a second time; who still, relapsing, falls a third time, and a third time also rises; who, according to them, if he falls a fourth time, will not be able to rise, but every hope of salvation is taken from him. Their opinion seems to them to be founded on Amos 1, where the Lord speaks thus: "For three transgressions of Damascus, and for four, I will not turn away from him"; and so concerning the three and four transgressions of Gaza, Tyre, Edom, Ammon, Moab, Judah, and Israel in turn. And when I asked a certain learned Jew what such a one would do if it should happen that anyone among them sinned a fourth time, he replied: "Whatever he pleases, since he is most certainly handed over to the Devil and damned"; and that perhaps in the end he will wander as a vagabond in some grove or desert, and will perish by some wretched death.

But the first Supposition refutes both these and those, and leads them back to the hope of mercy, pardon, and salvation. For if God is supremely good, such that nothing better could be, he is also supremely merciful, such that nothing more merciful could be — or even be conceived. He is likewise supremely pious and clement, supremely rich and powerful, supremely liberal, supremely generous, supremely magnificent, and in all goodnesses supremely good, and beyond what can be understood supremely full, as the third and fourth Parts show. For who even slightly hesitates that mercy, piety, clemency, power, liberality, generosity, magnificence, and other such are most splendid goodnesses? But the sin of a man, however great, is finite and small. For it could be increased, and there could be another sin greater than it; indeed, it is as it were a point, a nothing, a void, with respect to the divine mercy, piety, and clemency, which are most infinitely infinite — as is anything finite with respect to anything infinite. Why therefore can such mercy and piety, such clemency and power, not overcome, take away, and purge so small a sin? Why cannot such liberality, and such generosity, and so great a magnificence, remit so small a debt to the prodigal and penitent son, humbly supplicating, and having no means to repay? Why not most fully relieve so small a need of his — indeed, also to give him beyond these some great gifts? — especially since from such remissions and bestowals his infinite riches and abundance are diminished by no need, nothing decreases for him, but rather in a certain way it more increases: one inestimable jewel, one most clear pearl, one most precious soul, one most worthy creature, and through it perhaps many others. Since also through this his domestic citizens and friends rejoice with great gladness, and praise him more, glorify him, and adore him.

Is it not more powerful to be able to do these things than not to be able? And is it not more merciful and clement, more liberal and magnificent, for one able so to do, to do this for the wretched, the needy, the truly penitent, the one proposing to desist and humbly supplicating — than to turn away the face, to stop up the ear, to harden the heart without compassion, and mercilessly to block the fount of innumerable mercy prepared for the wretched? Is it not therefore most fitting that the good God be able so to do, and most decent that he so do, as the first Supposition shows? Whoever also will say, "Up to so much, or so much, can God remit, wash away, and purge sin, and beyond he cannot" — does he not absolutely set an end, a limit, and a measure to divine goodness, power, and infinite mercy? And does he not as it were press it together and constrict it under a bushel? Therefore whoever, oppressed by however great a magnitude of sin, securely repents — let him without doubt approach, let him drink certain hope of mercy, pardon, and salvation. Wherefore also whoever, transfixed by however great a multitude of sins, let him confidently return to the hope of life. For any of his sins is finite and small; wherefore the whole multitude likewise of all his sins, especially since all those, as they say, are four, or at least are comprehended under a finite and brief number — and that whole multitude could still further be increased by sinning [in number], and could be increased in malice, and twofold, and a hundredfold, and however much greater you wish, if, namely, each unit of any simple sin were augmented and proportionally increased; and there can be another multitude of sins greater in number, and in malice manifoldly greater than that. This multitude therefore is finite and small, as it were nothing with respect to the divine mercy, and power, piety, and clemency, generosity, and magnificence, most infinitely infinite above every number and measure, as the first Supposition together with the third and fourth Parts clearly show — and the rest as above.

Who moreover dares to say: "Up to so many, or so many in number, can God remit sins and extend the hand of piety, and not beyond"? For the goodness, power, wisdom, mercy, and other virtues of God, just as they are absolutely infinite intensively, so also innumerable, as the first Supposition with the third and fourth Parts manifest. I also specifically address you, O Jews. Is it not so, that someone committing once some light gluttony, pride, or some light sin, and immediately rising again through penance, and so a second and a third and again a fourth time sinning from depraved custom and human frailty — could not, I say, someone commit on the first occasion one great sin, say a most horrible blasphemy, a most cruel homicide, a most foul incest, or some other sin equally weighing or outweighing this fourth sin or these four sins, and obtain mercy for that, however grave and great, and gain pardon, as the things already established have taught — which you also do well in conceding? Why therefore not concerning that fourth sin equal to this, or perhaps lesser, all circumstances weighed?

Moreover, if some father or master had a son or servant entirely fearful, and he proposed to avoid offense to the father or master as much as he could, and labored manifoldly toward this — yet from ignorance or human frailty he once offended the father or master, and immediately with tears and every possible satisfaction diligently sought and received reconciliation, and so a second and third time consequently; who likewise sins a fourth time, and in like manner, or in a more devout manner if he can, seeks reconciliation, with firm resolve never to offend further — and all this, not from fear of punishment, but from love of justice, not from servile fear, but from most devout filial love. And there were of the same father or master another son or servant, wholly proud, contumacious, and rebellious, who in contempt of his father or master proposed always to sin, never to repent, never to make satisfaction, nor ever to obtain any reconciliation, and so lived most wickedly for many years, ever heaping crimes upon crimes with all his strength: is not the former more apt and disposed than the latter to obtain mercy and to procure full reconciliation? Otherwise indeed, too great an occasion would be afforded for men to lie like swine in their sins until the evening of their lives, and then at last when they could no longer sin, to repent of all sins at once and together, however lukewarmly or remissly. But who, I ask, knows so, save he who is foolish and mad?

You also, O Jew — have you never remitted a fourth time to your son, or to a foreign servant offending, humbly and truly penitent? I think a fifth, sixth, and seventh time, indeed seventy times seven if it was needful, and beyond. And if you have not done it, I know that I have, and many others have done so still more often. And is not also God, supremely good, so merciful as the wretched sinner — indeed incomparably far more merciful, beyond every number and measure, as the twelfth Supposition most clearly manifests? Whoever therefore, burdened by however great a multitude of sins, let him securely repent, cease to sin, and receive certain hope of grace, life, and glory to be obtained.

But the motive of the Jews, if it be understood literally, does not work for them. For the truth is that the Lord sometimes converts certain sinners from very many sins, but others from few, indeed from one actual or original only, sometimes does not convert. If, however, it be expounded morally, it likewise does not work for them. For expounding morally, the first sin can be understood as alluringly and voluntarily to think evil; the second, to consent to evil; the third, to fulfill it in deed. Or: the first is to will to do evil; the second, to seek opportunity for doing it; the third, having gained the opportunity, to consummate it in work. The fourth sin truly is so to remain finally without penance or correction in the present life — from which sin the Lord does not convert in the present life (because then he would not so finally remain), nor even after this life. For the Jews confess that "If the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in whatever place it shall fall, there it shall be" (Eccl. 11).

Chapter 28 — Against the Cainites Who Believe That God Admits No Sinner to the Grace of Reconciliation Unless He Has First Made Satisfaction by Meriting As Much as or More Than He Has Transgressed, and by Making Satisfaction Has Merited As Much as He Has Transgressed

Let the Cainites beware — those who believe, and therefore perhaps despair, that God admits no sinner to the grace of reconciliation unless he has first made satisfaction by meriting as much as or more than he has transgressed, and by making satisfaction has merited as much as he has transgressed. Did not Cain intend this when he said, "My iniquity is greater than that I should deserve pardon," as if he were saying: "If my iniquity were less and small, I could by making satisfaction proportionally merit pardon. But if it were so, one who had always sinned most gravely for many years, up to old age or senility, would necessarily despair." For he cannot make satisfaction and merit as much as he has transgressed, contrary to what was just shown.

How moreover would God be supremely merciful, such that nothing more merciful could be (as the first Supposition and what was premised testify), if he remitted the offense or debt of sin to no one without full satisfaction first sent ahead? This is not the work of mercy, but of justice and rigor; indeed, not so to do would seem to be impiety and cruelty. Does not even a good and merciful man sometimes remit an injury to one supplicating without prior full satisfaction? How much more God, who, as the first Supposition teaches, is shown to be incomparably better and more merciful?

Chapter 29 — Against the Pelagians or Cainites Who Imagine That God Gives No One a Benefit Gratis, but Only for His Preceding Merit

Let the Pelagians turn pale — or rather the Cainites, the sons and followers of Cain — who imagine that God gives no one a benefit gratis, but only for preceding merit. Did not Cain sufficiently insinuate that pardon is given to no one unless he has first merited it? — and consequently that grace is not pardon, or that by which the pardon of sins is effected. The Pelagians indeed, sons and followers of Cain, what their father said implicitly, they say explicitly: namely, that grace is given according to our merits. And if grace is not given gratis, what else is given gratis? Is it not for this reason that among Hesiod, Homer, Chrysippus, and other ancient Greek poets, the three Graces, daughters of Jove, sisters, with hands intertwined, laughing, young, virgins, are described in loose and translucent garment? And, to be silent of the rest — why virgins, and in loose garment, unless that no price intervening might prostitute or corrupt the gratuitous benefits of the favors? In which also, according to Seneca On Benefits I [3], "nothing ought to be bound nor inscribed." And does not the Philosopher, in his Rhetoric II [11], defining favor (gratia), say: "Favor according to which one is said to have favor, is to come to the aid of one in need, not for any return, nor that something might come to the helper, but that something might come to him." This Cain, then, accursed, is the author and pestilential father of the pestilential Pelagians in this part. O most perverse generation, and faithless sons. But is it not so that, the first Supposition teaching, God is supremely good, such that nothing better could be; and is supremely liberal, such that nothing more liberal could be — or even be conceived? And is it not more liberal to give than to sell? — to give gratis, than for some merit as a kind of preceding or even subsequent reward? Does not a liberal man bestow many things in this way? Why therefore not God, infinitely more liberal?

Chapter 30 — Against Those Untaught in the Art of Loving, Who Do Not Know That God Is to Be Loved for His Own Sake, and All Else for God's Sake, and That All Human Acts Are to Be Finally Ordered to Him for His Own Sake, and That He Is to Be Loved Above All Things; Who Also Suppose That a Man, for Whatever Goods to Be Gained or Preserved, or Whatever Penal Evils to Be Removed When Had, or to Be Avoided When Not Had — Being Able Not to Do These Things Without Sinning — Ought to Do, At Least Knowingly, Even the Slightest Thing Against God, Against the Commandment, Against the Divine Prohibition, Offending Him Even Most Lightly in Any Way Against the Rule of Conscience Divinely Instituted, or in Any Way However Slightly to Sin Knowingly

If anyone among this people knows not the art of loving, Let him read here, and reading, having learned the song, let him love.

Let every man therefore know that God is to be loved for his own sake, and other things for God's sake, and that all human acts are to be finally ordered to him for his own sake, and that therefore God is to be loved above all things. Wherefore also no man, for whatever goods to be gained or preserved, or whatever penal evils to be removed when had or to be avoided when not had — provided he could refrain from doing these things without sinning — ought knowingly to do even the slightest thing against God, against the commandment or divine prohibition, against the rule of conscience divinely instituted, or in any way to sin knowingly however slightly, by offending him in any way however lightly. For it stands fast that so great a good as God is, is to be loved, and not for the sake of another, by an order congruous and natural; for he is not naturally ordered to anything else. Since according to the natural order, the more vile is ordered to the more worthy, the less perfect to the more perfect, and the less good to the greater; but anything below God is less perfect and good than he is, as the first Supposition shows.

Likewise, it is more worthy, more perfect, and better to be loved for one's own sake than for the sake of another, as appears from what was premised, nor does anyone doubt this. Since therefore God is to be loved, he is to be loved for his own sake, as the first Supposition and the third Part show.

Likewise, if God were to be loved for the sake of another, according to the right order of loving, that other would be more to be loved. For the end is more loved than that which is to the end; and that which is loved for its own sake more than that which is loved only for the sake of another, as anyone's mind experiences. And the Philosopher is also a witness, Posterior [Analytics] I [2], saying: "Always, that on account of which a thing is, that thing is more so" — as that on account of which we love, that friend is more so. But what good is more to be loved than the highest and greatest good, God?

Likewise, among things to be loved, this one is to be loved for the sake of that, according to the worthy order of loving, and that for the sake of some other, and so on; and so there is no infinite process, as the second Supposition manifests, as also anyone's own mind says. There is therefore something which for its own sake is finally to be loved, and others for its sake; and what is more worthily such than God?

Likewise, according to these same things, there is some natural end of all beings; but the end according to natural order is more perfect, more worthy, better than those which are to the end, and is to be loved for its own sake, and other things for its sake — as both the things premised here and the Philosophers attest. But what is more perfect, more worthy, and better than all natural beings — except God? He therefore is the natural end of all things, and to be loved for his own sake, and other things for his sake. The second particle follows from this first, and from what was already established concerning the first. The third particle follows from the second, and from what was already established concerning the first. For it stands fast that man, since he is a rational creature, ought reasonably to order all his acts to some end. But any end intended by man, if it be not the ultimate, ought reasonably to be ordered to a further and ultimate end, which is God. The fourth particle follows evidently from the first and second particles of this part. The fifth particle seems to follow from the fourth.

Likewise, the offense of a good and great person is to be avoided, and the offense of a better and greater person more so. How much therefore is the offense of the divine Person to be avoided — than whom no better or greater could be, as the first Supposition teaches? Certainly so much, that it ought to be committed knowingly for nothing.

Likewise, let the false-writer (falsigraphus) say, if he dare, the opposite part of this, namely, that someone ought, according to the requirement of reason, for the sake of some good to be captured, or some evil to be avoided which he can refrain from doing without sin, knowingly to offend God; let him be supposed thus to offend God by doing act A. Either then, all things weighed, A is rightly done altogether, or it is sin, or an indifferent act, or neither. If rightly done, he does not offend God, who by the first Supposition and the third Part is proved most upright, most just, and most reasonable. How therefore is he offended, if someone placed in any case acts most rightly and most reasonably — that is, according to the requirement of reason most rightly — even as God himself would counsel and dictate? What act, I ask, will please God, if a most rightly done act displease and offend him? Indeed, it rather seems that if he should despise this most right reason and the very judgment of God, by not so doing, he would offend God; and so on each side of this contradictory two-way, whatever he did, he would of necessity offend God — which does not befit the divine piety, clemency, justice, goodness.

To these matters: if A is rightly done, it is meritorious; wherefore also, according to the first Supposition and the third Part of this work, in no way to be punished by God, but rather to be rewarded. For he who, according to the three Parts premised, sometimes gives goods to certain ones not acting rightly but indeed acting badly — how to those acting rightly will he render evils, or not render goods? And how will he reward act A, which offends him, displeases him, and which he hates? Furthermore: either God is justly offended and angered at A, or unjustly. If justly, A is unjust. If unjustly, God is unjust, contrary to the first Supposition and the third Part of this work. If however A be said to be sin, it ought not to be done, nor is it done according to the requirement of reason. Wherefore if the doer of A, all things weighed, does in everything as he ought, and according to the dictate of most right reason — even as God himself would counsel and dictate — he does not sin. For what is sin, except a certain obliquity from the rectitude of practical reason? Furthermore, it is plain to anyone, and the Philosopher attests in Topics III, that necessary things are more to be chosen than non-necessary, even if those should be better. But not to sin against God, and universally not to sin, at least knowingly, is necessary for any rational creature; because it is of the substance of his natural rule — namely, of reason or synderesis naturally implanted in him, and divinely instituted to rule him in all things. But other things which can be omitted without sin are by no means to be judged necessary to him. Nor can anyone say that A is an indifferent or neutral act, for then it would not offend the gentle God. Why also would it then offend him, rather than please? If also A is done as it ought to be in every way, according to the false-writer, why is it to be reputed an indifferent act, and not rather rightly done?

Chapter 31 — Against the Unbridled Who Say That All Things Happen Equally to Good and Evil, That Some Evil Remains Unpunished, or Some Good Unrewarded; and Who Lie That God Punishes Anyone Abundantly — That Is, Beyond What Is Worthy, or Even According to What Is Worthy — and Sparingly Rewards Anyone — That Is, Below or Not Beyond What Is Worthy; Imagining Also That It in No Way Befits Divine Piety and Infinite Mercy to Punish Any Offense, but Always to Remit the Whole Mercifully Unpunished

Let the unbridled be bridled — those saying that all things happen equally to good and evil, that some evil remains unpunished or some good unrewarded; lying that God punishes anyone abundantly, namely beyond what is worthy or even according to what is worthy, and sparingly rewards anyone, namely below or not beyond what is worthy; imagining also that it nowhere befits divine piety and infinite mercy to punish any offense, but always to remit the whole mercifully unpunished. These are most rude and gross, weighing only the palpable goods and evils of nature or of fortune. Is it not so, according to the part next preceding, that to evil men knowingly sinning and offending God however slightly, immediately and inseparably so great an evil, so evil a sin happens, that for whatever goods to be gained or preserved, or whatever penal evils to be removed when had, or to be avoided when not had, they ought not to admit it?

Whereas to good men, on the contrary, knowingly obeying the divine commandment as often as they are bound — immediately and inseparably so great a good, so noble a merit, and so incomparably precious, happens, that for whatever goods not to be gained or preserved, or whatever penal evils not to be taken away or avoided, they ought not to neglect it by passing it over — by what was just now premised concerning the evil men; because then they would knowingly condemn the divine command and sin. And if the merit of one serving God from necessity be so precious, so great, so good, how shall the merit of one serving from spontaneous freedom be nothing? O rude and untaught soul, which easily looks upon earthly and carnal goods and evils, slight and almost nothing, and does not weigh these moral and spiritual ones, the greatest!

Furthermore, no just, discreet, and powerful man permits that all things should happen equally to his good and evil servants or subjects, but differently, according to the differences of merits, providing better things to the better. But God is more just, discreet, and powerful than any man — infinitely so, as the first Supposition and the parts following show. Whence it also evidently appears that no evil remains unpunished. For how great an evil immediately and inseparably follows everyone knowingly sinning, is plain from the thirtieth and the demonstration of the first particle of this part.

Is not also every sinner, by that very fact, made evil and culpable, or worse and more culpable, and does he not lose the pristine liberty, innocence, and immunity which he had before, with respect to that sin — does he not become more unlike to God, and more remote from him? And is this not a punishment, and how great a punishment? And whence this, except from the first justice, from the first rewarder of all, who is God, as the Suppositions show? From which it likewise appears that God permits no good to remain unrewarded. For far be it that God should be more inclined to punish sinners than to reward those meriting. For this would rather seem of cruelty, impiety, and lack of mercy, than of supreme goodness, piety, and mercy — contrary to the first Supposition, the third Part, and the fourth. But God leaves no evil unpunished, as was just now taught.

How great a good also immediately and inseparably follows every one duly serving God from necessity — what precedes manifests. How then does no good follow him who serves God liberally? Is not he who acts well, meritoriously, and laudably, by that very fact better and more praiseworthy, than if he in no way merited? And is not this inseparable reward the fair wage of merit? And whence such reward, such wage, except from the first justice, the first rewarder of all, who is God? — as the Suppositions demonstrate.

How also would it befit the supremely just, liberal, powerful, and abundant lover of inexhaustible treasures to leave his workers, according to the doctrine of the thirtieth, unrewarded — to cast them off empty, and to make them equal to others, vain, in no way loving him, nor working anything for his sake?

Nor does God punish anyone abundantly beyond what is worthy; for this is unjust, impious, unmerciful, and cruel — but God is in no way such, by the third Part of this work — nor even up to what is worthy. For this would seem of severity, lack of mercy, and rigor, which are far from God; indeed the opposite virtues are most fully in him, by the third and fourth Parts.

For any offense at least knowingly committed against God, however great a punishment of actual loss and sense, even the annihilation of the offender, could justly be repaid; for to avoid however great such a punishment or even annihilation, it ought not to be committed (the thirtieth of this work being witness). But God inflicts on his offenders a finite and small punishment; wherefore he could justly inflict however much greater. He therefore mercifully remits to any offender of his, when punished, an incomparably greater punishment than he inflicts.

Nor does it befit God to reward anyone sparingly, below what is worthy: for this is either of impotence, or of injustice, illiberality, sparingness, tenacity, and avarice — which are far from God; indeed, the opposite virtues are fully in him, by the third, fourth, and seventh Parts of this work. Or perhaps more plainly thus: either God wishes to render to those meriting up to what is worthy and cannot — and then he is impotent, contrary to the seventh; or he can but does not will, and then he is unjust, illiberal, and sparing, contrary to the third Part of this work.

Nor does it befit God to reward anyone only up to what is worthy, and not beyond. For to reward a worker up to what is worthy is of justice and necessity, not of grace or liberality. But he is most super-excellently generous, and most super-abundantly liberal — by the first Supposition, the third Part, and the fourth — nor will his abundance be diminished by however great a magnificent largess. For it cannot be diminished in any way, by the seventh and eighth.

God also, according to the next-preceding particle of this part, gives to whatever undeserving enemies and offenders of his — evil men — how great benefits gratis, by mercifully punishing them not a little less than they deserve, by remitting very much punishment. How then does it befit, that to his lovers and servants, according to the doctrine of the thirtieth, he should make no grace, bestow nothing gratuitously, give nothing liberally — but should scarcely render to them, sparingly, the simple debt?

Does not also a liberal and powerful man sometimes reward his workers beyond what is worthy? But God is more liberal and more powerful than any man — infinitely so, by the third and fourth Parts. Nor does it repugn divine piety and infinite mercy to punish sinners. For he does not do this only out of hatred or zeal of vengeance — for this in no way befits his greatest goodness, piety, and mercy — but out of zeal of correction, chastisement, amendment, and the glorification of the punished if he wills it; or otherwise, of others through him; but always for the sake of the good, for the sake of the beauty and order of the universe. For he is so good and beautiful, so pure from evil and base, that he can finally intend nothing except the good and beautiful, as the first Supposition and the third Part show.

Is not also God as just and wise as he is merciful and pious, as the first Supposition, the third Part, and the fourth attest? But how does it befit one supremely wise and just to make those sinning and not sinning, those not sinning and sinning, in everything equal?

Is it not also clearly plain from what is above, that every sinner is at once and inseparably and by that very fact, by the necessity of indispensable justice, justly punished — and whence this, except from the first just disposer of all, from the first justice, from the primary truth? This therefore necessarily comes from God, as the Suppositions show.

Who also does not know that in every right polity two things are required, by which citizens are drawn back from vices and advanced to the pursuits of virtues — namely, fear and love: fear of punishments for those sinning, and love of rewards for those meriting? Why therefore does it not befit God, the institutor and ruler of the great worldly polity, to establish like things from like causes for all his subjects? Do we not see many, with the terror of punishments established for sinners despised, run unbridled to the allurements of sins? How much more would they do this, if no punishment were threatened to sinners? Which very many others would likewise do, who now by the fear of punishments alone abstain from sins.

Chapter 32 — Against the Philosophers Who Presume That They Can Know God Fully, and Each of His Actions; Who Therefore Mock Christians for Believing Some Things Concerning God, and Concerning His Marvelous Actions, Concerning Also the Actions of the Creature by Divine Power, Which They Cannot Demonstrate by the Way of Human Reason

Let the Philosophers who presume that they can know God fully, and each of his actions, be repressed; let them cease to mock and condemn Christians who believe some things concerning God and concerning his marvelous actions, and concerning the actions of the creature by divine power, which they cannot demonstrate by the way of human reason. Is not your soul small and finite, but God beyond measure great and in every way infinite? Infinite, I say, in a certain way numerous and extensively, on account of the all-sided infinity of virtues and goodnesses which he has, as the third Part shows; infinite also in a certain way intensively, as the fourth Part says. How then can you fully grasp him, fully discuss him, fully know him? Indeed, blush, O Philosopher, and you who pride yourself in knowledge, scorn to have so small a God that you, small as you are, by your small mind might scrutinize him whole, ransack all his secrets, grasp and know plenary the whole of him. For God, just as he is of infinite entity, so also of infinite truth and knowability; wherefore he is fully known by no finite thing through its finite virtue, but only by himself, through himself, through his own infinite virtue — unless perhaps he should accommodate to a man his own eye and his own infinite cognoscitive virtue (his whole self, that is), so that thus through the whole God himself, he might in some way know the whole God.

Tell me yet, I ask, Philosopher, what do you fully know? I think you would not dare to say even the smallest creature. I know that you do not perfectly know the smallest atom in the sun, nor the smallest dust of the earth, nor the smallest drop of water. For in every little body there are contained infinite linear, surface, and corporeal figures, diverse in number, quantity, quality, and species. Wherefore correspondingly there are infinite Geometrical conclusions, even following one another in order, such that the latter cannot be known except through the former. In every little body also there are contained infinite species of numbers, and infinite Arithmetical conclusions, also ordinally related to each other. Of these infinite demonstratively knowable conclusions, how many do you know, I ask, Philosopher? I think few and finite. Let me give you more Philosophers as many as you wish, even infinite, all endowed with the highest genius, given to the highest study, for however long a time, even a thousand thousand years, concerning these Geometrical or Arithmetical conclusions disposed in knowability according to the order said above. You all therefore, infinite Philosophers together — how many do you know of these infinite conclusions? Finite without doubt, finite and few. Wherefore there remain infinite, of which on account of their difficulty and your slowness, none of you can know any by himself, nor can all of you together know them. Does not therefore each of you, and the whole multitude of all together, more not-know than know concerning the things and the knowability of any little body? If therefore you cannot fully know the smallest, but on the contrary necessarily and infinitely more not-know it than know it — how can you fully know the greatest? Do not presume; acknowledge yourself a man, and humbly confess that you infinitely more not-know God than know him.

Is it not also so, as it seems through the second Supposition, and according to Philosophical discipline: if something is difficult to know plenarily, and something more difficult, and something still more, and so forth — there is something supremely difficult; and what is this, except God? For in creatures, as in ordered Mathematical conclusions, the latter is always more difficult than the preceding, nor is any most difficult — as also no last — to be found. What therefore is most difficult to know, except God? — which both his immensity and his maximum infinity, in a certain way numerously, extensively, and intensively (attested through the first Supposition, the third and fourth Parts), lucidly manifest. In whatever infinite series of conclusions of this kind, infinite are those of which, on account of their difficulty, none can be properly known demonstratively by any Philosopher or any group of Philosophers. How therefore can God, infinitely more difficult to know than any of those, and than all of them together — who also knows all those perfectly, and others and others infinitely-many-fold infinite (as the ninth Part demonstrates) — be fully known? Let any Philosopher therefore taste soberly, and acknowledge this truth as the highest Philosophy: that nothing this side of God can fully know God, except perhaps through him.

If he does not believe me, let him believe twenty-four men of his own profession — Philosophers who concordantly established as many definitions concerning God, of which the sixteenth runs thus: "God is he whom voices do not signify, nor intellects understand, on account of dissimilitude." And the twenty-first: "God," it says, "is the darkness left in the soul after every light." And the twenty-third: "God is he who is known by the mind alone through ignorance." Whence also Hermes On the Eternal Word [35] says: "The understanding of the highest God is truth alone, of whose truth in the world not even the extreme line of a shadow is discerned." Wherefore Plato also in the second prologue of Timaeus speaks thus: "It is as difficult to find the maker and begetter of the universe as, having found him, it is impossible to declare him worthily." If therefore the Philosopher incomparably and infinitely more does not know God than knows him, how will he fully know any operation of his? For if he be incomprehensible in being, why not likewise in acting, since action is in a certain way proportioned to the agent? Tell me, I ask, Philosopher: are you not of finite and small genius? Of finite and small knowledge, as what was premised attests? But God is of infinite, and absolutely infinite in every way, as the first Supposition, the third, fourth, and ninth Parts show. How easily then can he excogitate something marvelous to be done, and some marvelous mode of doing it, to whose plenary comprehension your ingenuity will not be able to ascend? And since by the same Supposition, the third Part, and the seventh, God is of equal power for any thing whatsoever to be done in any way whatsoever, as for excogitating that it should be done, or so done — how easily he can do some marvelous work, according to some marvelous mode of doing it, to the full investigation of which your genius cannot extend itself. Indeed, you cannot fully know even the operation of a small natural thing. Does not a small spark of fire, by illuminating and heating, cause infinite luminous circles and Spheres mutually containing one another, and mutually intersecting; infinite luminous Pyramids also, visual Pyramids, according to infinite qualities and differences; infinite radial lines also, and visual rays incident, reflected, and refracted (if the medium be deformed), having other splendid properties and infinite differences — in which (as also according to what was premised) infinite Geometrical and Arithmetical conclusions are contained, so also other infinite perspectival conclusions? And who can fully know all these?

Do you also fully know the action of the magnet on iron, and many such actions, the secret properties of nature, and the modes of such actions?

Furthermore, what thing or what natural action do you certainly and perfectly know? For in that which you suppose yourself to know better, another Philosopher will contradict you, and very many others one against you alone. Indeed, perhaps you yourself today contradict yourself of yesterday, or tomorrow you will contradict yourself of today. Or if perchance many of your contemporaries consent to your opinion, let that period pass, let another come; and perhaps as many or more, as ingenious and studious or more, will reprove your judgment by some probable Sophistical reason perhaps, or true, which was not plain to you, marveling that you have so foully raved and have been ignorant of things so open and so easy. Does not the process of time demonstrate this? To which judgment then shall I adhere with certainty?

Is it not so, that even if two or three Philosophers, your equals or greater, felt the contrary of your judgment, you would adhere less firmly; and if more, less still? Wherefore it seems that if very many or all Philosophers and the common people concordantly felt the opposite, you also would consent and would withdraw from the prior judgment. What then is Philosophy of this natural kind, except faith confirmed by defect of apparent stronger contrary reason, by defect of a multitude of witnesses attesting the opposite — which defect is reduced to the prior? What then is in such matters, except faith? And no sincere certitude of knowledge. Which also a certain not-small sect of Philosophers — namely the Academics — less proudly and more soberly tasting, plainly feels. For they say that it does not happen for anything to be known — which seems to be understood in doubtful matters, where probable contradiction is found.

Is it not also the case that Philosophers, according to the custom of hearing and receiving from boyhood these or those things, and according to the profession of the Sect they hold (say, Academic, Peripatetic, Stoic, and the like), say very many things gratis without the violence of reason, as all the books of the Philosophers lucidly manifest? Which also is clearly weighed from this: that any of these Sects probably sustains a judgment displeasing to another, just as anyone who knows can probably sustain without evident contradiction, by the indeclinable violence of reason, in matters probably doubtful — sufficient many, and perhaps all.

Wherefore the Philosopher in the Categories, treating of those things which are toward something: "Perhaps," he says, "it is difficult to declare confidently concerning such things, unless they be more often handled. To doubt about each, however, will not be useless." What then is in such Philosophical matters, except faith? Wherefore Plato in Timaueus II [3]: "To give an account of the divine powers which are called Daemons is a greater task than the genius of man can bear. Therefore let us take a shortcut from believing. Let us therefore believe those who at the previous age" — where Calcidius feels the same thing. Whence also Hermes On the Eternal Word [35]: "It happens to men," he says, "that as it were through a fog we see those things which are in heaven, as much as it is possible by the condition of human sense; but this intention for seeing such things is most narrow for us, when it has seen with the felicity of conscience."

Aristotle also in Metaphysics II [1]: "Concerning truth, theory is in this way difficult and in this way easy. The sign is that none can attain it worthily, nor are all without share of it." And below: "As the eyes of bats are toward the light of day, so also the intellect of our souls toward those things which are by nature most manifest of all." Who also in Ethics VI [9]: "It is necessary," he says, "to attend to the indemonstrable enunciations and opinions of the experienced, the elder, and the prudent — no less than to demonstrations." And Elenchi I [2]: "It is necessary that he who learns, believe." And in On the Heavens II [34] he says: "That one must see, having and believing first in human manner, or more firmly." And above, in I [22] of the same: "This happens sufficiently, so as to speak to human faith." Behold how these Philosophers in their own Philosophical matters faithfully profess faith. And if Philosophers do this in natural matter, why do they not allow Christians to do likewise in moral matter? In moral matter, according to the Philosopher, lesser persuasion suffices, and lesser certitude is required.

You err also no little, Philosopher, in believing that you can demonstratively prove every divine operation. For according to the eighth Part, God is a rational power, of free will. There is therefore no demonstrative reason naturally antecedent to his will which compels him to particular things to be done or not done. But just as you can do and omit many things freely, so also God: of which, if he wills to do this, to omit that, it is reasonable that it be so, because it is just that it be so, by the third Part of this work — reasonable, I say, by reason concomitant and following the divine will, not naturally preceding. Nor can you object by saying that God ought always to make the best of possibles, and that this necessary reason precedes his will, and necessarily regulates it in his actions. For God cannot make the best — that is, the optimum — that he can make. For if he could, let it be supposed that A is such. Either A is God or it is not. If it is God, there is some God made and new, and many gods, contrary to the first Supposition, and the seventeenth Part of this work. If it is not God, it is less perfect and good than God, and not indivisibly, but divisibly, by an infinite latitude — as is easy for the Philosopher to demonstrate. Since therefore by the fourth and seventh Parts of this work, God is of infinite power, and fully omnipotent, he can make something better and better and better without end.

Who also doubts that God can make things better than they are? For he is not impeded by defect of knowledge, on account of the first Supposition and the fourth Part; nor by defect of power, on account of the same Supposition, the third, fourth, and seventh Parts of this work. According to this also, God would not be a rational and free power, or at least not supremely free in acting, contrary to the first Supposition, the eighth Part, and the fourth. According to this judgment also, since all things come from divine providence and will, as the Philosophers confess, all things would always come about as God always willed and made them, by absolute simple necessity — contrary to the first Supposition and the third Part of this work — since another mode of acting is more perfect, which the Philosophers themselves deny. You also seem, Philosopher, to be ensnared in your own words. For do you not, in saying that God necessarily makes the better — that is, the optimum of things possible to be made — insinuate that other things are possible to be made, and that God can make others?

If also God always makes the better — since it is better that a good and true law be divinely given to men, than not given — God did give to men such a law; and what law, if not the most holy Christian law?

But since, according to what was premised, God cannot be fully known by man through natural scrutiny — indeed is necessarily infinitely more not-known than known, and his manifold possible operation likewise — why could not God, if he willed, reveal some of his secrets, and even of his operations, when he willed, to whom he willed, and how he willed, through Angels, through Prophets, or even through himself? Cannot you reveal the secrets of your heart and of your actions to others who cannot investigate them, through yourself or through others? Let the Philosophers therefore cease to condemn Christians who believe certain things divinely revealed to them concerning God, and concerning his works which they cannot demonstrate — provided they know how to defend them from your contradictory demonstrations. Ought it not suffice to any Christian, indeed even to the profane, as a demonstration: "God says it"? For he can neither err nor lie, by the first Supposition and the third Part of this work. And of this kind are the Articles of the Christian Faith.

I know, Philosopher, and I confidently affirm that I know, that there is no Article, great or small, of the substance of the Christian Faith, which God did not first reveal many times before the beginning of this Faith, through the solemn Prophets, as through certain heralds — as the authentic Books of the New and Old Testaments evidently show. For there is no Article of the Christian Faith which, even with the Philosopher as judge — uncorrupted, not sophistical, not impudent, but indifferent, solid, sober, and friend of truth — cannot effectively be founded in the Old Testament, in the old Prophecies, as it stands fast that anciently truly happened.

For — the Histories handing it down — the Emperor Constantine of the Romans was converted at Rome to the faith of Christ through Pope Sylvester, and was gravely rebuked by Helena, the Queen, his mother, who having left idols, believed in the God of the Jews and was then living in Judea, because he had preferred to believe in Christ a crucified man rather than in the God of the Jews. He asked the Queen to bring back with her the wisest masters of the Jews, to dispute with the Doctors of the Christians. She came, bringing with her 140 most learned men of the Jews, of whom 12 most renowned were chosen — Abiathar, Jonas, Godolias, Annan, Doeth, Cusi, Benjamin, Aroel, Iubal, Thara, Silion, and Zambri — and with two most wise Gentile Philosophers, Crato and Zenophilus, established as Judges by consent of the parties, with the Emperor and the Queen sitting nearby, and a great multitude of Christians, Jews, and Gentiles standing around, the business of disputation was hastened forward. With the eleven aforesaid Masters of the Jews objecting one by one and impugning the faith of Christ, Sylvester responding, convinced each one in turn from their own Scriptures, the said Judges deciding. The twelfth, however, refusing to argue by vocal argument, but performing a real magical miracle, was overcome by a true miracle. Wherefore the Queen, the Judges, and the rest of the unbelievers who were present, were equally converted to the faith of Christ.

Nor can anyone say that the Christians newly fabricated the Old Testament and the Books of the Prophets in confirmation of their faith, as if they had anciently predicted their future faith. For the beginning of the Christian Faith stands fast; the Histories of the Gentiles preceding it by much stand fast, evidently witnessing our faith concerning the Patriarchs, Prophets, and matters of the Old Testament. Behold also the famous witness Ptolemy II Philadelphus, King of Egypt, who, as the Histories of the Greeks and the Jews attest — Josephus also testifying in Antiquities of the Jews I, in the Prologue, and more fully Book XII [2] — caused to be translated for himself in Alexandria, by 72 Hebrews, the whole Old Testament from Hebrew into Greek, very many years before Christ.

And do not the Jews — capital enemies of the Christian Faith, instituted by Abraham and Moses — through very many times before the beginning of our Faith down to today persevere, having the whole Old Testament and its Prophetic Books, in their own Hebrew tongue or one akin, concordantly attesting that they were issued and written by the ancient Fathers and Prophets in ancient times?

And if you should ask why then they themselves do not believe in all things the faith of Christ — I say that many of them, and those who better understood their Law and the Prophets, most certainly believed, adhered most firmly to Christ, wrote the Gospels, added their own Epistles, founded the New Testament on the Old, held the faith of Christ most constantly, and most fervently preached it, even to consummated martyrdom — as the Apostles and Evangelists, converted Jews, attest. Whence also the Jew Josephus of Jerusalem, a priest from among the priests, who soon after the Lord's Passion wrote those famous Histories — still persisting in Judaism, as is plain from On the Jewish War I in the Prologue, and below in Books III and XX Antiquities, last; and Antiquities XVIII [8] of the same — speaks thus: "There was at those same times Jesus, a wise man (if indeed it is right to call him a man), for he was a worker of marvelous works and a teacher of all those who willingly hear what is true. And he drew to himself many of the Jews, many also from the Gentiles. This man was Christ. When Pilate, by the accusation of the leading men of our nation, had decreed him to be led to the cross, those who from the beginning had loved him did not desert him. For he appeared to them on the third day, alive again, as the Prophets, divinely inspired, had foretold these things and innumerable other miracles concerning him. And to this day the name and the race of Christians who are named from him perseveres."

Many of them too still are converted often. But many on account of the pride and malice of will do not believe, or are unwilling to confess that they believe — unless perhaps with the article of death imminent. Many do not believe expressly, or are not converted, on account of a certain most wicked custom observed in some parts, by which all the goods of converted Jews are confiscated to their Lord.

Many also through ignorance of the Law and Prophets, and through defect of sound doctrine, do not believe — especially since on account of hatred of the Christian Faith, in opposed principles, and in another understanding of the Law and Prophets (although too foreign and very forced, and even contrary to the expositions of the ancient and more solemn Doctors of theirs), they are instructed from their cradles. For it is not hidden from us Philosophers how great a force a custom introduced from boyhood has.

In the same Prophetic Books also it is contained that the Jews, in punishment for their sins, fell into such blindness of mind that they did not see even the most clear things — wherefore they would not be converted commonly to the faith of Christ before the evening and the latest days of the world; and that the eyes of the Gentiles would be illuminated and they would be converted to Christ. For Moses, having promised all goods to the Jewish people, provided they should obey the Lord's commandments, added: "But if you will not hear the voice of the Lord your God, to keep and do all his commandments, all these curses shall come upon you" (and after reciting many curses, added): "May the Lord smite you with madness and blindness and frenzy of mind, and may you grope at noonday, as the blind man is wont to grope in darkness, and may you not direct your ways." Isaiah also, the most clear herald of Christ and the Christian Faith — indeed, the Lord through Isaiah — speaks thus: "Go and tell this people: Hear, you who hear me, and do not understand; and see the vision, and do not know. Blind the heart of this people, and weigh down its ears, and close its eyes, lest perhaps it see with its eyes, and hear with its ears, and understand with its heart, and be converted, and I heal it." Who also again, speaking in the person of his people in prophetic manner concerning the Messiah: "How," he says, "his face is hidden and despised, whence also we did not reckon him; we supposed him as it were a leper, smitten and humiliated by God."

Does not also the Angel speak thus to Daniel? "But you, Daniel, close the words and seal the book, until the appointed time; when the dispersion of the hand of the holy people shall have been completed, all these things shall be fulfilled." "And I heard, and did not understand, and I said: My lord, what shall be after these things? And he said: Go, Daniel, because the words are closed and sealed until the predetermined time. They shall be chosen and made white, and as it were proved by fire, many; and the impious shall act impiously, nor shall any of the impious understand; but the learned shall understand." With which Isaiah also concordantly: "Be astonished and marvel, waver and stagger, be drunken and not from wine, be moved and not from drunkenness, because the Lord has mingled for you the spirit of slumber; he will close your eyes; he will cover your Prophets and Princes who see visions; and the vision of all things shall be to you as the words of a sealed book, which when they shall give to one who knows letters, they shall say: Read this; and he shall answer: I cannot, for it is sealed. And the Lord said: Because this people draws near with their mouth and glorifies me with their lips, but their heart is far from me, and they have feared me by the commandment of men and doctrines, therefore behold I will add — that I may make a marvel for this people by a great and stupendous miracle. For wisdom shall perish from its wise men, and the understanding of its prudent shall be hidden. And in that day the deaf shall hear the words of the Book, and from darkness and gloom the eyes of the blind shall see. Thus says the Lord: Now Jacob shall not be confounded, nor shall his face now blush; but when he shall see his sons, the works of my hands in his midst sanctifying my name, then they shall sanctify the seed of Jacob, and shall preach the God of Israel, and those erring in spirit shall know understanding; the murmurers shall learn the law."

These and many like things concerning the aversion of the Jews and the conversion of the Gentiles are contained in the Prophetic Books — which also testify that they themselves shall finally be converted to the Lord. For Moses, having prophesied many evils to the Jewish people on account of their future sins, added: "But in the latest time you shall return to the Lord your God, and you shall hear his voice." Concerning whom also David: "They shall be converted at evening." With whom Jeremiah also accords: "In the latest days you shall understand his counsel"; and again: "In the latest of days you shall understand these things. In that time, says the Lord, I will be God to all the kindreds of Israel, and they shall be to me for a people." With whom also consonantly Hosea: "Many days shall you wait for me, but I also will wait for you. For many days shall the sons of Israel sit without King and without Prince and without sacrifice and without altar and without Ephod and without Teraphim. And after these things the sons of Israel shall return, and shall seek the Lord their God, and David their King, and they shall fear the Lord, and his good thing in the latest of days." David, he says, their King — that is, the Messiah; for it was promised divinely to King David that from his seed he should descend, and should rule his kingdom. Wherefore also the Messiah is frequently figured in the Prophetic Books under the name of David himself.

It was further prophesied to the Jews that on account of their sin to be committed against Christ, their famous City Jerusalem and its noble Temple should be destroyed; that they themselves should irrecoverably lose their land, and should be dispersed through foreign lands, wretched, wandering, and fugitive, round about — which a few years after the beginning of our Faith was effectively fulfilled, and continues to this day, namely for years 1200, indeed almost 1300 — which the Jews themselves concordantly attest. All of which perhaps is therefore done, that you and many others, through them and their Books — free of all suspicion, bearing for us against them true and not feigned testimony — may be converted and confirmed in this faith.

Nor can anyone imagine those Prophets to have been fictioneers and pseudo-prophets. For how does it seem credible that those who so abhorred all manner of vices, who cherished and taught all virtues openly and secretly, and did these things so constantly that they even endured martyrdom, who did so many and such great miracles in life and in death — or the Lord did them through them or for them — should be fictioneers? How also are they fictioneers in those things alone which pertain to us, when in all other past things which they said — both concerning their own nation and land, as well as concerning others (say concerning the Babylonians and the Kings of Babylon and the city itself, concerning the Egyptians and their Kings and their land, concerning the Persians and Medes and Cyrus the King by name, concerning the Greeks, the Romans, and others) — they are proved most truthful Prophets, as the outcome of things demonstrated, as very many sufficiently authentic and famous Chronicles manifest? How also if they had been fictioneers, would they have feigned for their own sons and citizens such great evils, and for us, who are not yet born, such great goods? How also are they fictioneers, since in all past things which pertain to their nation, which also pertain to the Religion of Christ, they are found most truthful predictors, as the outcome of things proves, as was touched on above? Who also doubts that God can illuminate and inspire a man so as to render him a Prophet? Does not the first Supposition, the ninth Part, and the seventh evidently prove this? Why therefore does it not befit God, supremely provident, and moderating all things by his providence (as the first Supposition and the parts following show, and the Philosophers confess), so to do? Indeed it does befit. Therefore it befits that the Prophet be God's Secretary, the counselor of men, the mediator of God and men, announcing the divine will to men — especially in those things which concern the worship of God and Religion.

All the great Philosophers also whose writings I have looked at concede Prophecies and that there were true Prophets. Whence Aristotle in Secret of Secrets, last part [I], says: "That the Prophets are proved of most pure intellect and of true vision" — which Averroes also intends On Sleep and Waking, expounding it, where he also alleges Socrates to the same point. Avicenna also in On the Soul IV [4], and Metaphysics X [1, 2, and 3] concedes Prophets, which Algazel similarly in Physics V [6, 7, and last] concedes plainly enough. Ptolemy moreover, Albumazar, Haly, and the other Astrologers likewise confess both Prophets and Prophecies.

Furthermore, all who concede true dreams have true indications of future, past, and present things, and consequently must concede the truth of Prophets and Prophecies. But the truth of Dreams all Philosophers and the common people concede. Aristotle indeed in On Sleep and Waking truly concedes true dreams, true indications of things, and true presagings of future things. Where Averroes too: "Of these comprehensions some are called Dreams and Divinations, and some Prophecies. And certain men deny these, and say that they happen by chance. But to deny them is to deny things sensed, and especially to deny dreams. For there is no man who has not seen a Dream that announced to him something future. And when a man has experienced this often, he will see that this does not happen by chance, but essentially. And those other comprehensions, namely of the Philosophies, although they are not seen so commonly, are nonetheless very famous; and things which are famous among all are necessary, either as a whole or in part. For it is impossible that what is famous should be false as a whole. And the discussion of all these is the same; and so the discussion concerning the quiddity of the Dream will suffice, because their causes do not differ except according to more and less, but they only differ according to names and mode."

Afterward indeed he says that the interpreter is he to whom the intellect grants corporeal intentions, to which spiritual intentions are likened in sleep. And he alleges the condition of the interpreter from Aristotle, saying thus: "And it is necessary that the interpreter, as Aristotle says, be always thinking, and clean, not declining to the manners of a brute animal." Algazel also in his Physics V [3] determines concerning the interpretation and presaging of Dreams. Avicenna similarly in On the Soul IV [2] concedes true Dreams as heralds of future things.

Furthermore, the Philosophers seeking the cause of Prophecy, just as of true Dreams, concordantly say it is God, and that he illuminates and inspires Prophets sometimes when waking, and sometimes when sleeping; and that this is from divine solicitude and care concerning men, that they may thus be able to avoid harmful things and obtain useful ones. Whence the Philosopher in Secret of Secrets, last part [I], writes: "If anyone seek the cause of the Prophets — who are proved in this world of most pure intellect and of true vision, with helpful miracles — it comes from the abstraction of the soul from desires and concupiscences and harmful things, when it is dominant over the body; and the flame-like virtue existing in the heart does not cease." This flame-like virtue, according to him, is the agent intellect, illuminating the possible intellect, not burning. And above, in part II [I]: "God most high and glorious has ordained the mode and remedy for the temperament of humors, and for the conservation of health, and for very many other things to be acquired; and has revealed these to the holy Prophets, his servants and just Prophets, and to certain others whom he chose forth and illustrated by the spirit of divine wisdom, and endowed them with gifts of knowledge. From these following, men of Philosophy received the principate and origin: the Indians and Persians, Greeks and Latins; from these they drew and wrote the principles and secrets of Arts and Sciences. For in their Scriptures nothing false, nothing reprobate, is found, but what is approved by the wise." And below, in [chapter] 26, he says: "That Enoch knew this secret, which is called inestimable glory, and the treasure of Philosophers, through vision."

Avicenna also and Algazel in the places alleged above similarly say that the Prophet is from God, by inspiration and divine illumination — and this from his providence and government. Whence Avicenna in Metaphysics X [3] says that the Prophet is from God and from his sending, and that in the wisdom of God it is necessary that he be sent — and whatever he constitutes is nothing other than that which was with God to be constituted.

Ptolemy moreover in the first proposition of his Centiloquy says that some, on account of the strength of soul dominant in them, although they have not much knowledge of the art of stars, have from the better part the knowledge of future things, and are nearer the truth than the Astrologer. Concerning which Haly says in the Commentary that there is a twofold way of knowing future things: one, that one looks at the motion and works of the stars, and the books of such ancients, joined with the experiences which he has tested; and the other way is when someone has, through divine grace and inspiration, the knowledge of future things. For there are many who give true judgments concerning future things, of which we find neither significations nor reasons in the operator, or in the work, or in the operated; but what they say flows from their hearts; and of these we have seen many. And this way, when it is pure, is by the Philosophers called divine. And therefore Ptolemy says that some of those who are under the circle of the Moon have the knowledge of this Art by teaching; others by divine inspiration. Wherefore also Socrates — Averroes recounting in On Sleep and Waking — reasoning to the men of Athens, says thus: "O men, I do not say that your knowledge, that divine knowledge, is false; but I say that I am one making human knowledge."

Furthermore, whoever concede true dreams to be from God, similarly concede prophecies. But all the aforesaid Philosophers concordantly confess true dreams to be from God, as their books in the places already touched evidently indicate. Wherefore also Averroes On Sleep and Waking says that the cause of divinatory dreams and of Prophecy is the same, as is recounted above; where also he recounts the common opinion thus, writing: "The common people say that dreams are from Angels, and divinations from Daemons, and Prophecies from God, either with a medium or without a medium." But he himself shows at length that the true cause of true Dreams and of Prophecy is God, who truly knows all such future things and is the true cause of all.

Whence he says that the intellect in act, whose being has been declared in the book On the Soul — namely, the agent intellect, which gives and acts the first propositions, namely the first complex principles — gives likewise the cognition in Sleep. And he adds: "But they differ, because in universal cognitions it gives universal principles producing the cognition of that which was unknown. Here, however, in Sleep, it gives the cognition of the unknown thing without a medium; and this mode of giving in a broad sense is very noble, and is attributed to a more noble principle, namely the principle of will. Indeed it is from a divine thing, and from perfect solicitude concerning men. And because Prophecy enters this mode of giving, it is attributed to God and to divine things, namely Angels." And below he says that "Dreams are on account of the solicitude of God concerning men, that they may know future useful and harmful things, that they may be ready against them. And therefore was sustained this virtue with this noble enunciation and spiritual comprehension. And therefore it is said that it is one part of Prophecy. And this is manifest in the dream of Pharaoh, concerning which Joseph was questioned."

From all these things it appears evidently how undauntedly, how securely, how constantly, how firmly we ought to believe true Prophets. For they prophesy nothing to men except what they had seen and learned beforehand with God. Therefore one ought to believe them as God; for it is he who speaks through the Prophets, as what was already laid down has urged.

Do not also disciples to Doctors, lesser Philosophers to greater, and posteriors to priors — not only of Philosophers, but even of non-Philosophers — often give credence, even where they simply assert that it is so, where neither evident argument nor slender persuasion supports? — as was touched on above. Which it does not displease me to recount and confirm again. Plato indeed in Timaeus II [3], about to speak of Angels and the posterior or second gods, says: "To give an account of the invisible divine powers, which are called Daemons, is a greater work than the genius of man can bear; therefore let a shortcut from believing be taken. Let us then believe those who at the previous age, since they preferred kinship and propinquity of the divine race from the nature of greater Gods and others, and concerning the births of each ones, left eternal monuments in books to posterity. Certainly, not to believe the sons or grandsons of the Gods is sufficiently irreligious — although they speak by incongruous but necessary arguments — both because they pronounce concerning domestic matters: I think it is to be believed deservedly. Therefore let our credulity also be a companion to the assertion of ancient men." Where also Calcidius, expounding Plato, writes that of Pythagoras it is said that he says, "And therefore one should not seek beyond"; therefore, he says, neither should proofs always be adduced, nor persuading assertion to those things which are said by ancients endowed with a certain divine wisdom.

Aristotle also Elenchi I [2]: "It is necessary that he who learns, believe." And On the Heavens and the World II [2]: "It is necessary to show oneself well persuasible to the ancients, and especially to believe that the words of our Fathers are sayings." Where the Translation that Averroes has: "It is necessary," he says, "that we believe the Sayings of the ancients, of the most ancient, the most true, and especially because they are our parents." If therefore such Authors — neither demonstrating, nor persuading, but simply asserting it is so — are to be believed in Philosophical matter, how much more the most splendid and famous Prophets, divinely inspired, divinely taught, throughout the whole world celebrated — as what precedes has taught? But whom shall we reckon to be true Prophets, whom worthily and certainly we may believe in all things, if not those splendid ones famously diffused throughout the whole world? Those, I say, ancients of the Old Testament, of the old Law of the Jews, who in all their sayings concerning so various and so many past matters are proved most truthful. Why therefore in a few articles of the Christian Faith should they not reasonably be believed?

And if you should require prophecies of another nation, behold the Sibyl, most famous Prophetess among the Gentiles, whose fame did not escape either the Philosophers or the Poets. In her book expository of the vision or dream which 100 men of the Senate of the Romans saw, each in one night — namely, 9 Suns variously and diversely manifold — by the 9 Suns, the 9 future generations being understood, and the exposition of the third Sun being dispatched, she adds concerning the fourth: "The fourth Sun is the fourth generation. There shall be men denying what is true. And in those days shall arise a woman of the stock of the Hebrews, by name Mary, having a spouse named Joseph; and there shall be brought forth from her without commixture of man, by the Holy Spirit, a son of God, by name Jesus. And she shall be a virgin before birth, and a virgin after birth. And he who shall be born from her shall be true God and true man, as all the Prophets have preached. And he shall fulfill the law of the Hebrews, and shall add his own things to it; and his kingdom shall remain forever and ever. At his birth, hosts of Angels on the right and on the left shall be saying: Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men of good will. For there shall come over him a voice saying: This is my beloved Son, hear him."

And it follows: "There were there from the Priests of the Hebrews, who hearing these words, indignant said to her: These are terrible words; let this Queen be silent." And it is added: "The Sibyl responding said to them: O Jews, it is necessary that these things be done, but you will not believe in him." And they said: "We do not believe, because the Word and the Testament has God given to our fathers, and he will not take away his hand from us." She responded to them again: "The God of heaven shall beget for himself a son, as it is written, who shall be like to his Father; and afterward as an infant he shall grow through the ages; and Kings and Princes of the earth shall rise up against him. In those days there shall be Caesar Augustus of celebrated name, and he shall reign in Rome, and shall subject all the earth to himself. Not many or not few, not three nor two, are gods, but one God alone and immense, who made the Heaven, the Sun, the Stars, and the Moon, and the fruitful Earth and the wavy Sea. They who shall honor him shall inherit eternal life, and shall inherit a perpetual Paradise, also a most pleasant garden. The resurrection of the dead shall be, and the running of the lame shall be most swift; the deaf shall hear, and the blind shall see; those not speaking shall speak; and from five loaves and two sea-fish many thousands of men shall be filled, and they shall gather the remains of the fragments and shall fill twelve baskets thence; in the hope of peoples he shall teach truth; he shall restrain winds with a word, and shall calm the raging sea; treading the sea with his feet and walking upon the waves, he shall loose the infirmity of men, and shall make even the dead to rise, repelling many griefs; and from one bread or wine there shall be the satiety of the living. But when all these things shall be perfected which I have said, in him shall every law be loosed, and afterward he shall come into the hands of the impious. After these things the Priests of the Hebrews shall convene against Jesus, because he shall do many signs, and they shall apprehend him. They shall also give blows to God, hands being laid on him, and with impure mouth shall spit on him venomous spittle. He, however, shall give his holy back to the scourges likewise, and receiving blows, shall be silent, lest anyone know what Word, or whence it comes. He shall speak to the lower regions, and shall be crowned with a crown of thorns; for food they shall give him gall, and for thirst they shall give him vinegar, and shall hang him on wood and kill him. You yourself, foolish, did not understand your God deluding the senses of mortals; but you crowned him with thorns and mingled horrid gall. The veil of the Temple shall be rent in the middle, and at midday it shall be a dark night for three hours" — or according to another reading, "the day shall be dark for three hours" — "and he shall take the lot of death for three days, sleep being assumed; and then returned from the lower regions to the light he shall come, the first showing the principle of resurrection to mortals, because on the third day he shall rise, and shall show himself to his disciples, and they seeing, he shall ascend into heaven, and there shall be no end of his kingdom. They shall call me an insane and lying Sibyl. But when these things shall have been done, then at last they shall remember me, and no one afterward shall call me insane, but the Magus of God."

These the Sibyl wrote in Greek, having prophesied concerning the course of the world from then on to the end. At the end of her prophecy she set forth certain verses in Greek, the capital letters of which make these five Greek words: ΙΗΣΟΥΣ ΧΡΙΣΤΟΣ ΘΕΟΥ ΥΙΟΣ ΣΩΤΗΡ — which sound in Latin: JESUS CHRIST, SON OF GOD, SAVIOR. The verses translated into Latin according to the sense, and almost according to the corresponding capital letters, are these verses of the Sibyl:

1. The sign of judgment: the earth shall grow wet with sweat;
2. From Heaven shall come the King, to be through the ages;
3. Namely present in the flesh, that he may judge the world;
4. Whence the unbeliever and the faithful shall behold God,
5. Lofty, with the Saints, in the very end of the age.
6. So shall souls with flesh be present, whom he himself judges.
7. When the world lies uncultivated in dense thorns,
8. Men cast away images, and all treasure also.
9. Fire shall burn up lands, and the sea, and the heavens.

10. Searching, it shall break the gates of foul Avernus.
11. But for the Saints there shall be free light to all flesh,
12. The eternal flame shall burn the hidden springs,
13. Uncovering hidden acts; then shall each speak
14. Secrets, and God shall lay open hearts to the light.
15. Then shall be lamentation, and all shall gnash with their teeth.
16. The radiance of the sun shall be snatched away, and the chorus of stars shall perish.
17. The heaven shall be rolled up; the splendor of the moon shall depart.
18. He shall cast down hills, and shall raise valleys from the depth.
19. There shall be no high or lofty thing in the affairs of men.
20. Mountains shall be made level with plains, and the blue depths of the sea.
21. All things shall cease; the broken earth shall perish.
22. Likewise springs and rivers shall be parched with fire.
23. And the trumpet then from on high shall send forth a sad sound.
24. The earth groaning, opening, shall reveal the wretched crime
25. And various labors, and the Tartarean Chaos.
26. And before this Lord all kings shall be set together,
27. And from heaven shall fall a sulphurous river of fire.

The defect of correspondence in the capital letters could easily be corrected, if one wished. And it follows after these verses: "Then God shall judge according to the work of each one. And the impious shall go into the gehenna of eternal fire; the just, however, shall receive the reward of eternal life. And there shall be a new heaven, and a new earth, and the sea now shall be new, and the Lord shall reign with his Saints, and they shall reign with him forever and ever, Amen."

Behold also another Sibyl, a Gentile Prophetess. For ten Sibyl Prophetesses are read of in the Chronicles. Behold, I say, another Sibyl, who about the Advent of Christ — when Octavian Augustus, the first one called Augustus, King of the Romans, was ruling the whole world, according to the Prophecy of the other Sibyl already laid down, and this peacefully for 12 years without wars (as also other Prophets predicted) — when he consulted her whether he ought to permit himself to be adored as God, as the Romans had offered to him, after a three-day fast premised, she responded according to the Prophecy of the other Sibyl premised. And immediately heaven was opened, and an excessive splendor rushed over him; and he saw in heaven a most beautiful Virgin standing upon an altar, and holding a boy in her arms. He also heard a voice saying: "This is the altar of the Son of God." Greatly marveling, and prostrate upon the earth, adoring, he reported the vision to the Senators, who themselves also marveled exceedingly. In the worthy memory of which vision, at Rome, in the place where it appeared to the Emperor, there was constructed a certain Church of Saint Mary, which is called Ara Coeli (Altar of Heaven).

Do not all these things bear testimony to Christ? Behold Balaam, the foreigner, who likewise spoke testimony to Christ. Behold also that one long ago dead and buried, whose tomb in Constantinople, in the first year of Constantine the Emperor, with his mother Irene, was by chance dug up — through the Writing in a golden plate lying with him: "Christ shall be born of the Virgin Mary, and I believe in him. Under Constantine and Irene the Emperors, O Sun, you shall see me again." If you believe the saying of this man as second, since the outcome of the matter showed it most true, why not also the first — since (as it seems) in confirmation of that first, he added this second?

Behold yet another such admirable testimony. In the time of Ferdinand King of Castile, in Toledo of Spain, a certain Jew, by breaking a rock for the enlarging of a vineyard, found in the middle of the stone a hollowness, having no division at all, nor any cleft. And in that hollowness he found one book, having as it were wooden leaves. This Book, written in three languages — namely Hebrew, Greek, and Latin — had as much of letters as a Psalter, and spoke of the threefold world from Adam to Christ, expressing the properties of men of each world, and placed the beginning of the third world in Christ, saying thus: "In the third world the Son of God shall be born of the Virgin Mary, and for the salvation of men shall suffer." In the same Book likewise it was written that in the time of the 80th Ferdinand King of Castile it should be found — and then truly was found in testimony of another truth.

Behold witnesses witnessing Christ to be future, and behold also witnesses witnessing him present: John the Baptist in the womb of his mother, and afterward in adult age. Behold Symeon the Just, the elder; behold also Anna full of years, all most holy and powerful in the spirit of prophecy. Behold also the three Magi of the East, splendid, who, instructed by the doctrine of Balaam aforesaid, with a marvelous Star as guide, brought gifts to the new-born Christ. What Christian corrupted these so many witnesses, suborned them, and taught them, that they should bear such testimonies to our Christ — when neither the name of Christ nor of Christian was known to anyone? Now this star perhaps was that Comet seen by the Romans and Octavian Augustus, in whose reign Christ was born; concerning which Pliny in Natural History II thus writes: "A comet is worshipped in one place of the whole world, in a Temple at Rome, judged by Augustus himself to be very fortunate to him, who at his beginning [in 82 BC] opened the games which he was making for Venus the Genetrix, not long after the death of his Father Caesar, in the College instituted by him. For with these words betrayed: On those very days of my games, a haired Star for seven days in the region of the heaven under the Septentrions was beheld; it rose about the eleventh hour of the day, and was bright and seen in all lands. The common people believed that by that star was signified the soul of Caesar received among the divinities of the immortal Gods — by which name the marker for the Insignia of the head of him, which we soon consecrated in the Forum, was added." Pliny says these things in public, with interior joy interpreting it as illuminated to him, and that he was being born in it; "and to confess what is true, the same was salutary to the lands."

But Calcidius, writing more clearly concerning that splendid star, on Timaeus II of Plato, treating of the Stars rarely appearing, announcing diseases and deaths, adds: "There is also another more sacred and venerable history, which holds that by the rising of a certain star, not diseases and deaths were announced, but the descent of a venerable God to the conversation of human and mortal things by grace; which star, when on a nocturnal journey the wise men of the Chaldeans, indeed exercised in the consideration of celestial things, had beheld, are said to have sought the recent rising of God; and that Majesty being found, are said to have venerated the little one and to have proclaimed vows befitting so great a God."

I knowingly pass over here Ovid On the Old Woman and Albumazar, speaking of Christ. Do not also the cases of the Temple of Peace and the statue of Romulus seem to attest Christ — at the hour of the Nativity of Christ from the glorious Virgin? — concerning which it had been predicted that they should not fall until a virgin gave birth. Do not also the falling of all the Idols of Egypt, at his entry into Egypt, attest him? Do not many heavenly Angels solemnly attest him, in the very hour of his Nativity, by announcing great joy to the Shepherds, because then was born the Savior, Christ the Lord, in the City of David — by praising God and saying: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men of good will"?

Do not also that glorious appearance on the day of Epiphany, when he had been baptized, attest him? Does not also that eclipse of the Sun seem to attest him — by which, with Christ suffering in the flesh, in the middle of the lunar month, around the customary full moon, from the sixth hour to the ninth, the Sun was darkened? But someone perhaps will think this darkening to have been in a certain way casual, through the interposition of some dense cloud at the time occurring. But if it had been so, it is not in any way verisimilar that so many and so great Historiographers — say Matthew, Mark, and Luke — would have written this concordantly in the foundational books of the Christian Faith; especially because then that cloud would have been very dense, great, and broad — indeed greater and broader than the whole earth shadowed at midday. For what Philosopher does not know that the Sun is greater than the earth? Wherefore also lines drawn from the extremities of the whole earth, or of any part of the earth, to the contingency of the Sun in opposite points, by receding from the earth continuously distance more. Wherefore also no cloud would exclude all that incidence of light, unless it were broader than the whole earth, and any part of the earth totally shadowed. Who is ignorant of any of these things, who has even glanced at the threshold of Astronomy, Geometry, and Perspective? But as the Evangelists testify, with Christ suffering, from the sixth hour darkness was made over the whole earth until the ninth — which perhaps ought to be understood of the whole land of Judea. That cloud therefore had to have been very dense and very broad, and well perceived by all. What therefore notable and memorable thing would our Evangelists and Historiographers have written by writing these things? Wherefore also Luke, the most diligent investigator and writer, adding the cause to the others: "The Sun," he says, "was darkened." Should it likewise be supposed casual that then also the veil of the Temple was rent into two parts from top to bottom; that the earth was moved; that rocks were rent; that monuments were opened; that the bodies of many Saints arose — as the same Histories attest? Not so, not so were his enemies thinking — the Centurion and those with him; but seeing these things, they said: "Truly this was the Son of God" — as the said Histories do not pass over in silence.

This eclipse therefore was of this celestial luminary, supernatural, insinuating something concerning the author of heaven and nature. Wherefore Dionysius the Areopagite, a Philosopher still a Gentile, seeing these things, said: "Either the God of nature suffers, or the machine of the world is being dissolved." And because he believed the machine of the world was to last, he believed God to be suffering. Wherefore he erected an Altar entitled "to the Unknown God." Wherefore also when Paul preached Christ, the unknown God, to the Athenians and Philosophers, Dionysius received the faith of Christ. The mode of this Eclipse the same Dionysius writes to Polycarp the high Priest, in Epistle 7, where against Apollopheanes the Sophist, denying these things, he says: "Tell him what you say of the defect made at the Cross of the Savior. For we both, then present at Heliopolis, and standing together, beheld the Moon unexpectedly falling on the Sun (for it was not the time of conjunction); and again from the ninth hour till evening, supernaturally restored to the Diameter of the Sun. Recall to him also something else: for he knows that we saw the Eclipse itself begun from the East, and coming up to the Solar terminus; afterward going forth, and again not from the same the defect and repurgation, but from the contrary along the Diameter made. Such things were of that time supernatural, and possible only to Christ who is the cause of all, who does great and marvelous things, of which there is no number. Tell this to himself; and if it is possible, Apollopheanes, refute me, then present with you and at the same time observing, and at the same time pointing out, and at the same time marveling — if anything also of divination."

Then somehow Apollopheanes began, and to me — as it would be useful — said: "These, O good Dionysius, are mutations of divine matters, of such things as are spoken by us in the Epistle. It will be your part both to fulfill sufficiently the things lacking, and to lead perfectly to God a man wise in many things existing, and perhaps not disdaining gently to speak above the wise of the truth of our religion."

If anyone diligently consider, he will see many miracles in this Eclipse: that the Moon was so swiftly moved from opposition to opposition; that in the middle of the lunar month a Solar Eclipse occurred; that the Eclipse of the Sun began from the eastern part of the Sun; that the part of the Sun first eclipsed was last repurged, and that which was last eclipsed first purged; that it had so great a delay, namely for three hours; that the Moon so swiftly returned whence it came; that it came through the East, or returned against its own motion — whether its proper motion be from the West to the East faster than the motion of the Sun, or contrarily under-defecting. That all these things are against nature, no one is ignorant of, who has even slightly been instructed in such matters. Who therefore could do these things, except he who long ago, with Joshua fighting against the five Kings whom the Lord decreed to destroy, and praying — made the Sun stand still and the Moon: the Sun in the middle of heaven, that it should not hasten to set for the space of one day, until the people might avenge themselves of the aforesaid enemies? Who could do these things, except he who in the time of the Prophet Isaiah invoking the Lord, and of King Hezekiah of Judea, made the Sun return until the shadow on the Sundial returned correspondingly through 10 lines and as many degrees — as the most sacred Histories, and most famous throughout the world, clearly produce? But this sign — Dionysius referring above — fittingly moved the Babylonians to stupor, and without battle subjected them to Hezekiah, as to one equal to God and exceeding men — which is also chiefly conveyed by the priestly memories of the Persians.

Believe therefore, Apollophanes, our Histories, especially the Evangelical, so authentic among us, so famous, especially where they hand down the bare History. For if you do not believe the Histories of our nation, how shall I believe the Histories of your nation? Or how shall anyone believe any History of any nation not his own? Or even of his own nation, which he has not seen with his own eyes fulfilled? But far be from men this poison: for this would render men unbelievable, lawless, unsociable, inhuman, incommunicable, uncivil, and would dissipate almost all the bonds of humanity. For who knows from what land or country, from what nation or kindred he descended; through whom, and from whom his country and kindred, and he himself, received so many goods — except through Histories and the testimonies of elders? And if in this part you do not believe the Histories of our nation, nor do you believe the Histories of the Jews, Babylonians, Persians, Greeks — indeed, neither Dionysius and Polycarp, splendid men, who beheld together that Eclipse — who then will believe you? Why therefore do you not believe the Histories referring that thing to be past, which the Sibyl and the ancient Prophets predicted long ago to be future? The Prophecy of the Sibyl sufficiently expressly is recounted above.

Is not this also what the Prophet Amos predicted, saying: "It shall be in that day, says the Lord, the Sun shall set at midday; and I will make the earth grow dark in the day of light"? — and he speaks there literally of the final extermination of the Jews, as the preceding and following text evidently shows; which soon after the death of Christ, the Gospel having been preached among the Gentiles, even among the Romans through Titus and Vespasian, was plenarily consummated; which also continues to this day. With which all, also other ancient Prophets predicted many like things. But far be it that anyone should so understand it of a natural Eclipse of the luminaries. For how does it seem credible that so many Prophets, by a great prophetic sign, should predict a natural and customary Eclipse — which one boy could most certainly predict with all its circumstances through natural science?

Your subtlety, however, Apollophanes the Sophist, scarcely deserves to be called sophistic: for it is scarcely colored with thin appearance. It sins gravely both in matter and in form. In form indeed: for how does the place hold negatively from authority? "The author does not say, therefore not true." How does it follow: "No one of the Greeks, or of the Barbarians considering such things, wrote this, therefore so it was not"? — especially since those considering such things never saw or heard anything such happen in the middle of the lunar month, and they knew that nor could it then occur by nature. Wherefore even if such darkness then came to be, they did not consider it diligently, supposing those things to happen from the obstruction of some dense cloud, as is wont often to happen.

You could also similarly cavil against other heavenly signs mentioned above. But pass beyond, I ask, a little, the state of the Sophist, and learn that even a universal Eclipse of the Sun does not appear in every place and to all, as an Eclipse of the Moon appears — and this on account of diversity of aspect, as Theorems not Sophistical, but Philosophical, namely Mathematical, clearly show. Wherefore also an Eclipse of the Sun could happen in some land, even though those in Greece would not see it, even on a clear day.

In matter also you sin, by saying that no one of the Greeks saw that Eclipse, or made mention of it — as what was already laid down manifests. Does not also the Resurrection of Christ from death, the attestation of the Angels, his Ascension into heaven with many seeing it, the attestation of the Angels, the sending of the Holy Spirit promised, with the inspiration of the rude lay disciples — so marvelous, so effective, so strong, that immediately they spoke in the tongues of all and understood the Scriptures — bear testimony to Jesus Christ?

Do not also his other miracles of every kind, so far exceeding the strength of nature — which and how great our authentic and famous Histories attest — make certain faith? For Philosophers are wont to proceed inquiringly from sensed and known effects to unknown causes. But there were with Christ many miraculous effects, and among Christians, in his name, they continue to this day: say, the sudden conversion of water into wine; the satiation of five thousand men from five loaves and two fishes, with twelve baskets of fragments left; the sudden cleansing of lepers; the sudden illumination of the blind; the sudden consolidation of paralytics; and (to comprehend many things briefly) the sudden and perfect cure of any languors whatever — indeed, also the sudden and true revival of those truly dead, as very many sufficiently authentic Histories concordantly attest, as also the ancient Prophets and the Sibyls anciently predicted concerning him; which also our enemies the Jews, and Josephus attest. Therefore, O Philosopher, of these effects say the cause: are not the effects, just as they transcend the powers of all created nature, so also their cause?

I know that by impudent Sophists, who wish to seem Philosophers, to these and like points many things are answered. For some irreligious persons do not fear simply to deny all miracles. But these will be corrected as Apollophanes was above. For it is uncivil and inhuman simply to deny all the Histories of Christians, and even of the Jews. Whoever also denies miracles, has consequently to deny every possibility of doing miracles — and you reckon yourself able fully to know every divine operation, contrary to the prior particle of this part, and contrary to the seventh and eighth Parts already laid down.

Whoever also denies Christian miracles, come and see with your eye, even still in these times in places of the Saints, by turns, glorious miracles. Come into England to the present King of the English, lead with you any Christian whatsoever having the Royal Disease (morbus regius), however inveterate, deep, and foul, and with prayer poured forth, hand imposed, and blessing given under the sign of the cross, he will cure him in the name of Jesus Christ. For this he does continually, and has very often done for most filthy men and women, and to those rushing to him in crowds in England, in Germany, and in France round about — as daily deeds, as those who have been cured, as those who were present and saw, as the peoples of the nations and the most celebrated fame, most certainly attest. Which also all Christian Kings of the English and of the Franks are wont divinely to do, as the Books of Antiquities and the concordant fame of the Kingdoms attest. Whence also the Royal Disease has taken its name. Go into Ireland, enter the Purgatory of Saint Patrick, and you will experience a marvel manifoldly admirable — which also some have most certainly experienced.

Furthermore, if you do not believe the Histories of Christians concerning miracles done among them, believe the Histories of Philosophers, Poets, Chronographers, Gentiles, and of those who never received the faith of Christ — and these themselves concerning miracles done among Christians among foreign nations. Behold Aristotle, the famous Philosopher, in On the World [12], referring one great marvel: "There was lately, toward the West, an earthquake, which overthrew very many cities. With the greatest rains and rage of winds, in some places it converted the sea into dry land and dry land into sea. And so great fires were made, that all things were enkindled. For fire bursting from the earth, as if the prisons of Etna were broken, was carried in the manner of a river over the earth. Where also a faithful kind of Numen was honored particularly: where, while certain young men, parents and elders being borne on their shoulders, had been taken hold of by the rheum, and the river of fire was terribly approaching them — the river of burning was divided: this part to here, that part to there it turned aside, and preserved the youths with their parents unharmed."

Which also more expressly Solinus On the Marvels of the World II testifies, where he treats of Sicily, saying: "Between Catania and Syracuse there is a contest concerning the memory of the illustrious Brothers, whose names diverse parties adopt for themselves. If we hear the Catanians, they were Anapius and Amphinomus; if Syracuse, which they prefer, we shall think Emantia and Crito. The Catanian region, however, gave the cause for the deed: into which when the fires of Etna had burst forth, two youths bore away their lifted-up parents, unharmed by the fires among the flames. Posterity has so rewarded their memory, that the place of their Sepulcher is called the Field of the Pious." And the same below, in the same book, narrates that there in Sicily is the Vulcanian Hill, where two marvels are demonstrated. For when the worshippers are placing green twigs upon the Altars, with no fire applied, it is proved whether God is present propitious by this — that the woods take fire of their own accord, and with no one fanning them, are kindled by a breath from the divinity. Where also after the sacrifice is consummated, with those feasting, the flame plays — which, wandering with sinuous excursions, does not burn whomever it touches.

A like thing Pliny attests in Natural History VII, under these words: "Not far from the city of Rome, in the territory of the Faliscans, are a few families which are called Hirpiae, who in an annual Sacrifice which is made at the Mountain Sorastes — to Apollo, walking upon a burnt heap of wood — are not burned. And on this account, by perpetual decree of the Senate, they have exemption from military service and all other duties."

Aristotle also reports in Secret of Secrets, part 3, ch. 14, how with a Magus of the East praying to God, a Jew who had brought to him the mule lent to himself, was cast off it and prostrated, with a tibia broken, and likewise with the neck injured. And the same below in the same, last part, ch. 1, approves the helpful miracles of the Prophets; and above in the same, part 3, ch. 1, alleges Hermogenes — these words: "Our father Hermogenes, who threefold in Philosophy, philosophizing best, said: The truth has itself thus, and there is no doubt that lower things correspond to higher and higher to lower. The worker of miracles is one and only — God, from whom every marvelous operation descends."

Avicenna also in Metaphysics X concedes miracles, and likewise in On the Soul IV [4], although there he feigns erroneous causes; and likewise Algazel in his Philosophy V [5] confesses miracles. Albumazar also On Conjunctions, Tract. 1, Difference 3, determines concerning the miracles of solemn Prophets, although, as also Avicenna, he goes astray in their causes. Likewise Josephus Antiquities II, last, referring to the passage of Israel through the middle of the Red Sea, in argument of the faith adds these things: "Let no one disbelieve the marvel of the word, if to ancient men, and those deprived of malice, the way of salvation — though through the sea — was made, either by the will of God, or revealed of itself; since also to those who were with Alexander, King of Macedon, long ago and anciently — when they were resisting — the Pamphylian Sea was divided; and when there was no other passage, it gave passage to them, with God willing through him to destroy the principate of the Persians; and this confess all who have written the Acts of Alexander."

The Historia Scholastica also, where it treats of Esther, recounts from the same Josephus that Alexander the Great praying the God of Israel that he would enclose the 10 Tribes within the Caspian Mountains, the precipices of the mountains came together, and made the place impassable. Valerius Maximus reports also, Book VIII [1], that a certain Vestal Virgin, suspected of corruption, in argument of her unimpaired integrity, with prayer to the Goddess Vesta premised, carried a sieve full of water from the Tiber into her Temple most intactly. Ovid On the Fasti IV, treating of the festival of Cybele which the ancients celebrated on the Nones of April — whom they thought the mother of the Gods and Virgin, and who was named Berecinthia, Idea, Pessimica, Phrygia, the Virgin Goddess, and the Heavenly Virgin (as it appears partly there through Ovid, partly through Augustine On the City of God I [29] and II [5, 26], and X [16], and through many others handling Histories and poems) — describing the itinerary by which she from Phrygia toward Rome, through many seas, to the mouth of the Tiber was conveyed, reports a great and stupendous miracle. The keel (as he says) sat upon the slime of the Tiber now dried up by excessive heat, so firmly that by no ingenuity, nor by any forces, could it be moved.

Claudia Quinta, a Virgin commonly defamed concerning violation, approaching the Goddess, with suppliant prayer poured forth in purgation of her public reputation, drew forth the ship with a girdle or rope, with light effort, whither she wished. And because verses help the minds of some, I repeat a few verses of Ovid, which speak thus:

Verses of Ovid:

The vessel had reached where the Tiber divides itself into the deep, And swims more freely in the field. Every horseman, beside the Senate at the same time with the people, Comes to meet at the mouth of the Tuscan river. The mothers proceed equally, and the sons and the men, And those who tend the holy fires by virginity. The men eagerly slacken their arms by twisted rope; Scarcely does the foreign ship advance against the waters. Long had the soil been dry; thirst had burned the herbs; The keel sat pressed in the slimy soil. Whoever is present, labors at the work more than for his share, And helps the strong hands with sounding voice. She, like a stable Island in the middle of the Sea, sits; Astonished at the prodigy, men stand and tremble. Claudia Quinta traced her descent from ancient Clausus, Nor was her face unequal to her nobility. Chaste indeed she was, but not so believed; unjust rumor Had injured her, and she was made guilty of a false crime. Adornment and variously worn-out hair had hurt, And a tongue prompt to rigid sounds. Her mind conscious of the truth laughed at the lies of fame, But we are a crowd credulous to vice. When she had come forward from the band of chaste matrons, And had drawn pure water from the river with her hands, Three times she sprinkles her head, three times raises her palms to the sky; Whoever beholds her, thinks she is mad. And with knee submitted, she fixes her face on the image of the Goddess, And with hair flowing, gave forth these sounds: "Fruitful Mother of the Gods, gentle, receive the prayers Of your suppliant under a certain condition. I am denied chaste; if you condemn, I shall confess to have deserved; By death I shall pay the penalty, conquered by the judgment of the Goddess. But if the crime is absent, you shall be a pledge of our life by the deed, And chaste, you shall follow chaste hands." She spoke and drew the rope with slight effort: A marvel — but I speak attested on the stage. The Goddess is moved, and follows her leader, and praises her by following. The sound, an index of joy, is borne to the stars.

But lest I should seem to ground myself only on the suspect sayings of Poets — behold Titus Livius, who in Book IX On the Second Punic War attests this. Behold Solinus On the Marvels of the World, last part, who speaks thus: "A ship from Phrygia, the bearer of sacred things, while it follows the headbands of chastity, conferred on Claudia the principate of modesty." And behold likewise Augustine, who first On the City of God [16] both this and the preceding, with certain others, recounts and concedes. And the same Solinus above, in I [2], thus writes: "There is a shrine of Hercules in the Boarian Forum, in which arguments of his banquet and majesty remain. For divinely neither flies nor dogs have entry there. For when he was libating the offering of the sacrifice, he is said to have invoked the great God; and to have left his club in the entry, the smell of which dogs flee, and which lasts even to this day."

The Histories of the Tartars also report, and Hayton in the book entitled Flower of the Histories of the Eastern Land part 3 commemorates concerning Genghis Khan, the first Khan, the first Emperor or King of the Tartars, one stupendous miracle, in these words: "After Genghis Khan had subjected to his empire all the lands and provinces which were on this side of the mountain Belian, and possessed those things peaceably and quietly, on a certain night in dreams he saw another vision: for he saw again a white knight, who said to him: 'Genghis Khan, the will of the immortal God is that you cross the mountain Belian toward the West, and you shall occupy the lands and kingdoms, and there you shall dominate the peoples whom you shall subject to your empire. And that you may be certain that the things which I tell you are from the part of the immortal God, rise and go to the mountain Belian with all your nation, to the place where the sea joins itself with the same; and there you shall descend, and toward the East with nine genuflections nine times shall you adore the immortal God; and he who is Omnipotent shall show you the way through which you can pass through.' Genghis Khan, having seen the vision, joyfully rose, and was in no way doubtful: for the first vision which he had seen of others gave him certainty. Hastily also he gathered his men universally, and commanded that they should follow him with their wives and sons, and all that they had. He proceeded then until they came to the place where the great and deep sea adhered to the mountains; nor was there any passage, or way. Continually, however, Genghis Khan, as had been commanded by the immortal God, descended from the horse: and all doing the same thing universally, toward the East with knees bent nine times adored, imploring mercy and grace from the omnipotent and immortal God, that he would show them passage and way for going. They stood in their prayers that night, and rising in the morning, they saw that the sea had retreated from the mountain by 9 feet, and had left for them a broad way. All were stupefied marvelously seeing this, and to the immortal God unanimously giving thanks most devoutly, they passed through the way which they had seen."

Who therefore, except one too stiff-necked, and an impious striker of the Fathers, alone will contradict so many and such great witnesses? And if to these Histories you accord faith, why not to the much more famous Histories of the Hebrews and Christians? Wherefore also others, acting more humanly, concede Christian miracles, but disagree in the assignment of cause. For some assign a cause not true, others a true one. Those assigning a cause not true vary manifoldly. For some Physicians say the goodness and property of an optimal complexion, tempered, which they call tempered to justice in Christ, was the effective cause of health in other bodies, and of whatever miracles he did. But these will easily be cured. For although they can in some way, with color, assign this cause for some miracles of Christ — say a few of the cures which he did by touching — yet of others they cannot. For Christ healed many not by touching, indeed not by entering the house, but at great distance, when he was asked for the sick, by consenting. But Philosophers and Physicians know that in every action and motion, real and spiritual, mover and moved are together: the great Philosopher Aristotle is witness, Physics VII [9], and On the Soul

II [74]. That complexion also, and all its property, was only of finite virtue. Wherefore in cleansing a leper, in solidifying a paralytic, and in healing other infirmities, it would require a certain time, a certain alteration and motion, according to the proportion of that healing power to the resistance of the infirmity to be healed. And where there were a more resistant and greater infirmity, there a greater time would necessarily be required, as also the Philosophers and Physicians well know. And there would necessarily be some medium between the infirmity and perfect health, which the Physicians are wont to call convalescence. But Christ — suddenly and perfectly, as not without cause I have recounted above — made those whom he willed, who were sick, well.

Again, according to these same things, if it had been so, an infirmity could have been so great, so incurable, so mortal, that the virtue of Christ's complexion would not have been able to heal it. Yet he is read of as having cured the most grievous and most antiquated diseases, nor in anything to have failed. How also any disease, however mortal, could he not cure, who also raised up the dead?

Furthermore, if such and so great a complexion could do so many miracles, any lesser complexion could similarly do proportionally lesser miracles in proportional patient — as both Philosophers and Physicians attest. What virtue also of complexion could call back a four-day-dead man, already stinking, not by touching but by word alone, suddenly to perfect life — could change water into wine, multiply loaves and fish so vehemently, walk upon waters, as Christ did all these things? What complexion, while Christ was hanging on the cross, made the earth move, monuments open, the bodies of Saints arise — indeed even the Sun be eclipsed in the manner aforesaid? What complexion could rise from death, ascend into Heaven, send down the Holy Spirit, and so effectively inspire the Apostles? Did all Christians through whom miracles are done exist of that one and not more all-sided complexion? Indeed, miracles are done through men and women, through old and young, through the living and the dead. Were also Moses, the ancient Prophets, and all who do miracles of this complexion? What complexion also dried up the sea, kept it dry, transferred mountains, made the Sun stand still and return?

It stands fast also that complexion is an irrational power, wherefore according to the Philosophers, it has effect for one of opposites only; but the power productive of miracles, for both, according to what the miracles to be made require. Is not also complexion an irrational power, wherefore according to the Philosophers it does not act from election and freely, but from the necessity of nature, as fire heats? Wherefore the complexion of Christ, always and necessarily with the patient present, would have done any miracle which it could have done. Yet we read that he, and others also, did their miracles freely and from free will.

What also need would there be for praying to God for miraculous effects, if the natural complexion did nothing there, since natural complexion suffices? Yet the Saints through whom miracles are done pray to God — which would be entirely superfluous, unless he himself worked miracles.

If also any creature can do miracles, God too can — as the first Supposition shows. Why therefore does he not do them, when he is suppliantly entreated? Indeed, more it befits God so to do, and us to believe it is so. Wherefore also the Father of Philosophers, Hermogenes, says that the worker of miracles is one and only God; with which Aristotle in his Secret of Secrets consents, as was recounted above. Who also above, in the same, part 1 [22], showing what the foreknowledge of future things avails — say of a winter too cold, of a summer too hot, of years of famine and scarcity — says: "It avails much to foreknow future things, because men can better avoid them when they foreknow what is to come. For also they ought then to implore the most high Destinator with prayers, that through his clemency he may avert future evils from them, and otherwise ordain. For he has not so predestined, that in anything he should derogate from his power. Indeed men can entreat the divine clemency by prayers, devotions, supplications, fasts, services, sacrifices, alms, and many other goods, imploring pardon for things committed, repenting of accusations: and most truly then God Almighty will avert from them what they tremble at and fear." With whom also concordantly Avicenna Metaphysics X [10] says that "Because the first true one knows this whole, therefore from him begins to be everything that is done. And on account of these causes, prayers and sacrifices help men, and especially Litanies for rain, and other things of this kind. And one ought to fear to render evil for evil, and study to render good for good. The certitude of which thing will make you flee evil. But the certitude of this thing is the evidence of his miracles." Where also speaking of the disposition and utility of the members of animals and plants, he says: "There is no natural cause there in any way; but the principle of it is from divine care, just as those things depend from care; how much more therefore should one feel similarly in miracles?" And he adds: "Know also that more the common people approach and hold and say it is true, nor do any flee it but those who wish to seem Philosophers, because they are ignorant of the causes and occasions of these things."

The Astrologers, however — say Albumazar, where prior, and others elsewhere — seeing the terrestrial body to be insufficient for doing miracles, ascend to the celestial; saying that diverse conjunctions and virtues of celestial Bodies in diverse signs cause diverse miracles. But the Astrologers, like the Physicians, will be corrected. The Celestial Body also, or any Celestial conjunction, if it does a miracle here on earth — since it cannot do this immediately — requires some medium through which it does this. But this is not only fire or air, but some great man, some saint, conceived in some such great conjunction, born or pre-signified through it. For we see that not only the air works the miracle, but some great man, some holy man — which also these Astrologers confess. Which also Aristotle seems to say in Secret of Secrets, last part [I]. But if it were so, such a man would work miracles by virtue of his complexion — as the prior response said.

How also is it fitting to a celestial conjunction and virtue, to break the celestial virtue, to alter the motions of the celestial luminaries, to make the Sun and Moon stand still, return, and the Sun to be eclipsed by the Moon in the middle of the lunar month in the manner aforesaid?

How also could the luminous virtue of a celestial body make some country accustomed to be illuminated by day in the earth, and to be darkened by night, to be (like the region around it) shadowed by perpetual gloom? For Hayton, indeed, in his book entitled Flower of the Histories of the Eastern Land part 1 ch. 10, treating of the kingdom of Georgia, writes thus: "In this kingdom of Georgia appears a certain stupendous marvel, and manifoldly monstrous, which I would not dare to say, nor would I have believed by the report of anyone, unless I had first seen it with my own eyes. But because I was personally there, and saw it as it were with the eye, I say that in those parts there is a certain province, Hanissen, which in circuit well takes up three days' journeys; and as much as that province extends, by a certain caliginous and shadowy gloom that place is so dimmed, that there is no one who can behold anything; nor is there anyone who would dare to enter that land, since for returning he is ignorant of the path. The inhabitants of that region assert that they have often heard the voices of men shouting, the songs of cocks, the neighings of horses; and through the channel of a certain river which flows out from that place, certain signs appear that there is a habitation of peoples in it. It is true that, by reading, it is found in the Histories of the Kingdom of Armenia and Georgia, that there was a certain most evil Emperor and dominator of the Persians, who is named by the name Sanoreus. He worshipped idols, and persecuted Christians most cruelly. On a certain day he commanded that all the inhabitants of Asia should come and adore his idols, and that whoever was contrary to the imperial edicts should suffer the penalty of burning. Whence it came about that some faithful Christians chose Martyrdom rather; some adored the idols; some fled to the mountains; some good Christians at that time, however, lived in a certain plain which is commonly called Mogan; and when they were unwilling in any way to sacrifice to idols, they thought of flight; and while they thought to transfer themselves to the parts of Greece, that most evil son of iniquity, the Emperor with his most unhappy army, while they fled, encountered the Christians in that province Hanissen, named above. And when by the order of the Emperor the Christians piecemeal were to be beheaded universally, they cried to the Lord Jesus Christ, and immediately that darkness obscured the lights of the perfidious, and the Christians, going by a straight path, escaped. The wicked, however, in that valley of darkness reside even now, and ought to reside until the end of the age, as is believed and recounted by all."

How also would the virtue of heaven sustain a Church or column standing without foundation, as if upon flowable air, immobile for many times? Marcus of Venice, indeed, who personally circled around eastern Regions for many years, and what he saw and learned there faithfully committed to memory in the book entitled On the Conditions and Customs of Eastern Regions book 1 [39], writes in these words: "Samarkand is a noble city and great, in that Region which is tributary to the Nephew of the Great Khan, where together dwell Christians and those who adore Mohammed, who call themselves Saracens. In this city such a marvel was made by the virtue of Christ in these times. A certain brother of the Great Khan, who was called Cygatay, who presided over this Region, induced and instructed by Christians, received baptism. Then the Christians, having the favor of the Christian Prince, built a great Basilica in the city of Samarkand in honor of Saint John the Baptist. By such ingenuity was the Church fabricated by the Architects, that the whole height of the Basilica was firmed upon one marble column, which column was in the middle of it. While the work was being done, however, they took a certain stone of the Saracens, of which they formed a base under the said column. The Saracens indeed, who hated the Christians, grieved over the stone taken from them; but fearing the Prince Cygatay, dared not to contradict. It came to pass, however, that the Prince died, whose son succeeded in the Kingdom, but not in the faith. The Saracens prevailed upon him, that the Christians should be compelled to restore their stone to them. The Christians offering a great price for the stone, the Saracens refused the price, willing that with the stone taken away, the Church should be destroyed by the falling column. And when there was no remedy for the Christians in this matter, with tearful prayers they began to invoke Saint John the Baptist. Therefore on the approaching day when the stone was to be removed from under the column, and consequently by the Saracens the ruin of the whole roof of the Church was hoped for, by divine nod the column was so much lifted up from the Base, that for the space of three palms it was elevated, sustained in the air; and so without the support of human aid, it perseveres to this day."

Furthermore, how could celestial virtue, for long times, every year, on a certain day, dry up the sea, keep it dried for 7 days, exhibit a little child left in the middle of the waves, after a year completed, unharmed? For a celebrated history far and wide diffuses, how the Blessed Clement, preaching the faith of Christ, was thrown by an unbelieving prince into the sea with an anchor about his neck, lest perhaps being found by Christians he should be held a Martyr; and with Cornelius and Phebus his disciples praying, the sea retreated for three miles. They, with a great multitude of Christians, entering through the dry land, found a habitation prepared in the manner of a marble Temple, and there in a certain ark his body decently composed, and the anchor next to him; in whose Passion also the sea, for 3 miles for 7 days, withdrew with very many shores, offering to those coming a dry path, until on account of the fury of barbarians it was carried to Rome where he had been before; where also in the Church, which is called from him Saint Clement's, he is solemnly venerated.

How also during the recounted miracle, a certain woman led there her little son, and at the end of the solemnity, with the waters of the sea rushing in, on account of excessive haste left him there; and a year having gone round, returning with a multitude of Christians, found the boy sleeping; who, being roused and entirely unharmed, supposed himself to have slept sweetly only the space of one night. Many indeed and other almost innumerable glorious miracles offer themselves in crowds to one turning the pages of Histories, which through the celestial virtue of bodies alone cannot even sophistically be colored.

Tell me, I beg, Astrologer, what so powerful and miraculous conjunction in the making of the prior miracles newly occurred? Are not the motions, conjunctions — small, great, greater, and greatest — oppositions all, aspects, properties, and celestial virtues, known to the faithful as to the unbelieving Astrologers, or rather Sophists of Astrology — who on account of the paucity of those skilled in that science, feign that they know many things which they do not know, and many non-causes as causes, that thus irreprehensibly above others they may exalt themselves? If,

I say, you, learned Astrologer, know how to assign a celestial cause of any miracles, tell me, I beg, what and what kind of miracle, when, and where will it occur, when will it begin, how long will it last? But do not, I beg, deceive me, by saying that at the Pillars of Hercules or in the depths of the Ocean, after 100 years, or after the term of my life, such a miracle shall be — lest perhaps you should seem by sophisticated flight to decline the question. Or tell me when and where this or that miracle was made; or yet tell me, within what future time in a certain place no miracle will be made, or such a miracle will not be made; or within what past time in a certain place no miracle was made, or such a miracle was not made. Or if you do not know how to tell me, I shall tell you: what, of what sort, when, and where God shall have willed or willed, a miracle will be done, or was being done; and likewise negatively. Of the divine will, however — since by the eighth Part and the fourth, it is supremely and maximally free — I cannot assign an antecedent necessary cause, as was shown above. This, however, evidently appears, because these miracles happen with prayer poured forth to God; which would seem entirely superfluous, frivolous, and vain, if heaven did these and not God, as was argued above.

Others, however, seeing no body to be able to suffice for doing miracles, posit a spirit as the cause of these. And these vary further. For some suppose that the spirit of man, the rational human soul, is the sufficient cause of these — yet not any soul disposed in any way; but, as Aristotle says in Secret of Secrets, last part [I]: "When the soul shall be surpassing the body, dominant and pre-weighing it, it makes a Prophet with helpful miracles." But this response can be corrected like the prior ones. Furthermore, if the soul from such a habitual disposition alone makes miracles, always and necessarily it makes whatever miracles it can, as long as it is so disposed — like an irrational agent. Just as if the soul, from the species alone of fire in it, would burn, it would always burn, as long as it had that species, sleeping, waking, and doing anything else, with the patient approached and impediment removed. Wherefore Avicenna, following and supplementing Aristotle in this part, On the Soul IV [4], says that "the soul, when it shall be noble, constant, similar to the principles, then according to its will not only its own body but also extrinsic bodies, and the matter which is in the world, obey it: so that it heals the sick, weakens the wicked, changes the elements; rain happens, sterility, and absorption from the earth, just as the work of the eye of the fascinator is on a foreign body" — where he also seems to insinuate that the soul does such works from the strength and firmness of the form of the thing impressed in it and of the imagination of it. With which imaginary fiction Algazel agrees, Physics V [5], and certain others of the moderns. But the image of this imagination will easily be broken, and reduced to nothing, through the prior responses. For such a soul, willing to heal someone distant — if by this very fact it heals — this would be through some action expanded to him through the whole intercepted medium. For Philosophers know — and Physicians are not ignorant — that nothing acts on the extreme except by acting on the medium, even if not always similar action. Wherefore even if in that medium however many other sick should be placed — at least detained by similar infirmity — all would similarly be healed.

That soul also, that volition and imagination, is only of finite virtue. Therefore there could be such great distance between it and the sick, or in small distance the medium so indisposed by density or other quality, that it could not heal him. There could also be so many sick in some great army, and company, or convention, that if it wished to heal all, it would heal none — or so many enemies in some army, that wishing to weaken or kill all, it would harm none. But is it so with Christ? Did he not, who from few loaves and fishes satiated so many thousands of men with so great abundance of fragments left, have power (had he willed and had it been needful) to satiate more and more thousands, and to multiply loaves and fish more and more, and at greater and greater distance? Wherefore one is to feel similarly concerning other miracles.

Such a soul moreover, however willing and imagining, since it is only of finite virtue, requires a certain time and successive alteration according to the resistance of the patient; and an infirmity could be so great and have so much resistance, that it could not heal it. Both of which are false of Christ, as was argued above.

If also so powerful a soul through such strong volition and imagination can do so great miracles, why cannot any soul through proportional volition and imagination do proportional miracles? How also can a soul, by willing or imagining, raise the dead, and call back souls from heaven or from hell to bodies? Much more easily could it preserve someone from death, and render his own body immortal — indeed all men, and all beasts, immortal. Whose imagination, I ask, enclosed so great an army and so great a country in darkness, as was touched above? Not the imagination of the Christians, for they were not then thought to have been imagining concerning such darkness, but concerning flight; nor the imagination of the persecutors, for they (as it seems) did not imagine themselves to be apprehended by such gloom, but to be persecuting Christians; and that darkness continually perseveres: it has therefore a continuous cause. But who attends to such imagining continually? Who continually perseveres so imagining? Whose imagination would have sustained the said column, with the base subtracted? Not of the Saracens (for they rather imagined the Church about to fall), nor of the Christians (for they (as it seems) rather hoped for some vengeance to be divinely inflicted upon the Saracens, or for the base of the column to be there divinely retained, than one such unexpected miracle unheard of for ages); whose imagination also so continual perseveres, that for so great times it sustains the column, with the Christians even continually sleeping?

Marcus of Venice also reports, On the Conditions of Eastern Regions I [18], in this way: "In those regions, namely between Tauris and Baghdad, is a mountain which long ago was translated from its place to another place by divine virtue. For the Saracens wished to show the Gospel of Christ vain — because the Lord said, If you have faith as a grain of mustard seed, you shall say to this mountain, Pass thence, and it shall pass; and nothing shall be impossible for you. They said indeed to the Christians who under their dominion in those parts dwelt, 'Either translate that mountain in the name of Christ, or all be converted to Mohammed, or all perish by the sword.' Then a certain devout man, comforting the Christians, with prayer poured forth faithfully to the Lord Jesus Christ, with the multitude of peoples seeing, translated the mountain to the designated place; on which account many of the Saracens were converted to Christ."

But whose imagination (I beg) is so strong, that it transfers a mountain? O magnanimous Avicenna, having a great soul — transfer through your imagination this little hill, or the smallest clod of it, and I will give you a mountain of gold to be possessed. Would not also so many contrary imaginations of Saracens have rather retained the mountain there? Indeed, rather are these and other miracles of this kind to be reckoned to have been done by Christ and God, who to help was suppliantly entreated. Whose imagination also was converting Saul the Jew, so skilled in the law, so fervent in the law, so vehement a persecutor of the Christian Faith, so unexpectedly, so powerfully, so marvelously — predicting so much truly concerning him — imbuing him in the Christian Faith so perfectly, so suddenly, that he even confounded unbelieving Jews and Greeks, and converted to the Christian Faith the most wise even among the Philosophers?

Whose imagination concerning the bodies of dead Christian Saints works all manner of miracles? — as our Histories most certainly attest, as was recounted above of Saint Clement, as also Marcus of Venice On the Conditions of Eastern Regions III [27] recounts, how about the body of Saint Thomas the Apostle in Maabar, that is, in Greater India, in a certain city buried, many miracles even at these times frequently are done. Wherefore also the Saracens themselves of those parts venerate him most, and say that he was a great Prophet, and call him Anar nan, that is, holy man. Whose imagination, I say, makes these things — not the imagination of a dead body, no one is ignorant; if the imagination of the souls which animated those bodies — those souls are powerful, holy, noble, and blessed. Who therefore would have hesitated to believe as they believed? If the imagination of the living worshipping those Saints — why do they not similarly elsewhere, by imagining, receive what they desire? Why (I ask) do they vainly extend prayers to them? Why do they fallaciously believe themselves helped through them, or through God on account of their merits dear to God?

Is it not also among the miracles of Saint Thomas of Canterbury, the Archbishop, recounted, how a certain Lady, for the sake of lasciviousness desiring more beautiful eyes, approaching the tomb of the Saint and praying this, was immediately wholly blinded? Was not her imagination borne to the opposite? Whose imagination moreover did the celestial miracles aforesaid?

Furthermore, if such a soul can do miracles, God also can, as the first Supposition and following parts lucidly manifest. And he is not only powerful and supremely powerful to do miracles; but also supremely clement, pious, and propitious, magnificent, liberal, as the first Supposition and the third Part show. Does it not therefore seem more decent and more credible that when his lovers, in the manner premised in the 30th Part of this work, in their great necessities exceeding their own strength, suppliantly entreat him, he himself miraculously should succor them — especially since he sees this to be expedient for them — than that he should mercilessly turn aside, cast them off, repel them, and permit them to perish?

Did not Hermogenes, or Hermes, your Father, and you yourselves, Aristotle and Avicenna, above affirm this — namely, that God is the maker of miracles? How then do you now dream of another cause? Nor does it escape, as I think, you, Avicenna, that although the eye of the fascinator could marvelously work in a foreign body, yet it in no way is needful that that soul should be able to work miracles of this kind. For you do not wish to say that anyone of any complexion can fascinate in this way, but certain ones having an infected complexion and a certain complexional venomous malice, which through mouth and eyes, by speaking and seeing, they evaporate and emit subtly, or by altering they infect the medium and so injure. Wherefore neither do they do this in every distance, but in a near one — as also the eye of a menstruating woman infects a mirror, and the Basilisk killed living things by sight. But miracles in no way follow the property of complexion, as was shown above. Why therefore, Avicenna, do you assert something so admirable through such a weak reason? And why, Aristotle, without any reason? Why also, contrary to your prior judgment, do you now posit another cause of miracles than God?

Or perhaps it is verisimilarly answered for you by saying that, your sayings being diligently inspected, you assign no other effective cause of miracles. The saying of Aristotle indeed seems able to be understood of a dispositive cause to prophecy and miracles, not properly effective. For according to the judgment of Aristotle in On Good Fortune, and On Sleep and Waking, prophecy and true dreams, presagings of future things, are from God, and are not from the man himself — which Avicenna also attests On the Soul IV and V, and Metaphysics X, and Algazel V of his Physics, and Averroes On Sleep and Waking manifestly; where also he says that the interpretation of dreams is one species of prophecy — which he says is manifest in the dream of Pharaoh, concerning which Joseph was questioned. And he adds: "And it works the interpreter, as Aristotle says, that he should always be thinking and clean, not declining to the manners of a brute animal." The saying of Avicenna also can perhaps similarly be understood and expounded. For the Christians confess that to men of holy life there flows in graciously the spirit of prophecy, and that God willingly works miracles for such. Or perhaps Avicenna, when he says that any soul similar to the principles can work miracles, understands that this it can do by the virtue of these principles, which according to him are God and the Angels: or that these Principles can do this and will it sometimes through it or for the sake of it, on account of the similarity, namely, of holiness and will of this soul and of theirs.

But here I ask, listen kindly, great Philosopher, greatest of the Arabs Avicenna: when you say that a soul similar to the principles can do so much, do you not insinuate that one dissimilar cannot? Since therefore Christ and perfect Christians could and can, as what was premised attests, it follows evidently that they themselves had and have souls similar to the said principles. Mohammed, however, your master — by your own testimony in Metaphysics IX, last — could not do miracles, by his own testimony, in a certain book of your law, where to those asking miracles of him he thus replied: "I am not sent with this." The other Saracens also, although they are Monks and lead a most strict life and most holy according to the traditions of Mohammed, cannot do miracles; this is plainly clear. For it is not fitting that a disciple be above the master, or a servant greater than his lord. Do not therefore Mohammed and all his Saracen and Tartar disciples have souls dissimilar to the said principles? Why therefore do you not become Christians, that thus you may be able more fully to be assimilated to those principles?

Aristotle and Avicenna will perhaps respond to the things premised, saying that they do not deny but affirm God to do certain miracles, and even such a soul to do certain ones. But then, I beg, distinguish reasonably and teach to distinguish between those. Is it not also so, that the greater and more glorious miracles will be most worthily ascribed to God? But what greater or more glorious miracles than those of the precursors and heralds of Christ — namely the ancient Prophets — and than the Christian miracles, as from the things here premised and from our most certain Histories it plainly stands fast? It is therefore God who does those glorious Christian miracles in attestation of the Christian Faith.

The Jews, however, and their Philosophers, enemies of Christ and the Christian Faith, say that Christ did miracles — not true ones, but feigned, by the Magic art and by the power of malign spirits. Certain Magicians also, in approval of their infamous art, say that Christ used certain magisteries written there, as appears in the book which is called Vacca Platonis (The Cow of Plato). But how do you not see, you Jews — that the Manichaeans, who reject Moses and the Prophets, saying God to be evil, namely the prince of darkness, the author of the whole Old Testament, can similarly respond to you concerning all the miracles of Moses and of all the Prophets? How then will you show the truth of your miracles against them, and I against you will show the truth of our miracles?

You will perhaps say that you have authentic Scripture which attests the miracles of Moses; and I confidently say that we have Scripture much more authentic, which attests the miracles of Christ. For who wrote those books and miracles of Moses? — was it not he himself? was it not he alone? — and were they not miracles previously nowhere predicted by other prior Prophets? Christ, however, did not write his own miracles, nor did any one alone write them; but four great Scribes, and many other lesser, not at the same time in place or time, as if conspiring and feigning the miracles of Christ concordantly: but some in Judea, some in Italy, some in Achaia, and some in Asia, some in one tongue and some in another, some according to one mode and some according to another, the doctrine, deeds, and miracles of Christ, in concordant judgment they wrote. Of these Scribes and Protonotaries of Christ, witnesses are the Apostles, splendid men, continually assisting Christ, present at his miracles, and most certainly seeing them with their own eyes; and these as well as those, by nature Jews.

Were not also the miracles of Christ prophetically pre-announced both through men, and through the Sibyl? — and the same reason concerning the miracles of the Prophets. Or perhaps you will say that the manner of life of Moses and your Prophets evidently shows that they were not magicians, wherefore also that their miracles were true. And who was ever of holier life than Christ — as not only our Histories, but also those of the Gentiles attest? Look at his deeds, read his words, attend to his law. What was ever more innocent? what more holy? what more honorable could be found? Did he not, in the end, so live, as your Prophets and the Sibyl prophetically predicted of him? Did not Christ live so, as the Messiah, whom you (according to the prophetic predictions) ought to have lived for from your sins?

You will perhaps object that he was endeavoring to pervert your law — but wrongly. For he did not pervert your law, but expounded and fulfilled it, as also it was divinely prophesied. Furthermore: why do you not attend that the same calumny can similarly be objected to the true Messiah whom you, according to the prophetic prediction of your Hosea, expect for many days — but with an ass yet to come, when he shall do his true miracles? — how then will you defend his miracles, and I shall defend the true miracles of our true Christ.

Furthermore, if Christ had been a magician, a false Prophet, and had only done false miracles, how would he have been by so many and so solemn witnesses, so concordantly prophesied as future, and even at presence attested, and through your Josephus commended, as is recounted above? How also is it verisimilar, if the miracles of Christ had been only feigned and done by diabolical art, that they would have been divinely prophesied — not in reproof, but in total approval? Furthermore, if Christ had been a magician, pseudo-prophet, and subverter of the law, by the precept of your law he ought to have been killed; wherefore also that to kill him was in no way demeritorious or punishable, but rather meritorious and rewardable, who doubts? But you on account of his denial and killing have been and are punished gravely and afflicted — through the great slaughter of you in your land, through the Emperor and the army of the Romans, soon after the killing of Christ done; through the dissipation of your cities and Temple; through your captivity and emigration from your land perfected; through your dispersion, subjection, and miserable contempt round about, as your Histories and ours attest, and especially your Josephus in the seven books On the Jewish War written, in which also personally he was — as the present day also indicates. But how would God so good, just, and clement (as the first Supposition and the third Part show) have so excessively punished you then, incomparably more than at any past times — except for some great sin, incomparably graver than any prior sin of yours — especially since God promised to you and gave to you your land to be possessed perpetually, which also he confirmed by oath, if indeed, or while indeed you should keep his law (as your books most often and most clearly attest)?

What therefore so great a sin did you then commit, by reason of which you incurred so great misery — except that sin against Christ? — for had you not before committed most foul adulteries, killed most holy prophets, abandoned the Lord, and worshipped idols? — and for these and such-like things did not God send upon you now this King, now that, now these enemies, now those, who afflicted you in many ways, but incomparably more mildly and briefly than in the aforesaid affliction? Was not your greatest affliction before — the taking of your City of Jerusalem, the destruction of your Temple, the captivity, the migration into Babylon, and the detention of you there for 70 years? Yet that migration was not perfect, since many remained in their own land; it was not very long-lasting; it was not very bitter, because in it still you had Prophets divinely consoling you; and after 70 years you were dismissed free, and returned to your own, and rebuilt the City and Temple. But this captivity of yours and emigration is perfect, the dissipation of your City and Temple perfect, very long-lasting, since for almost thirteen hundred years it has been; very bitter, because no Prophet have you had in all that time. On account of what therefore so excessive a sin committed about that time do you suffer this punishment, surpassing all your other punishments so incomparably — if not for that most surpassing sin of yours against Christ, the Holy of Holies, surpassing all other Prophets and Saints incomparably?

Here perhaps you will say that this calamity befell you on account of the unjust killing of Saint John the Baptist, or of James the brother of Christ, each of whom was held among you most holy. But if each was most holy, he was also most truthful and most faithful in right faith. John, however, solemnly attested our Christ, and pointed to him with his finger. James indeed was a Disciple and Apostle of Jesus Christ, who held the faith of Christ most constantly, taught, preached it, even to triumphal Martyrdom — as the Histories manifest. The faith of Christ therefore is most holy and most faithful. Nor did the Jews kill or counsel to kill John the Baptist, but Herod Agrippa — whom the Jews therefore say betrayed his army, as Josephus Antiquities of the Jews XVIII [12] plainly reports, which also our Histories produce. Nor did the Jews by common consent kill Saint James, or have his killing pleasing to them; but, Josephus reporting Antiquities of the Jews XX [16], a certain Ananus, the Pontiff of the Jews, with a Council of Judges made, handed him over to be stoned. Wherefore the most moderate Citizens of the Jews, and those who had concern for the integrity of the law, took this gravely, and sent secretly to the King, asking that he should command him not to perpetrate such things, since not even before had he acted rightly. Wherefore also King Agrippa deposed him from the Pontificate, which he had held three months. Before too the Jews killed most holy Prophets, nor for that reason did they incur such a misery. Indeed, even if all the Jews of that time had unanimously consented to the death of John and James, and on that account had been expelled from their land, with the homicidal fathers dead, God would have led their sons back — especially if they did not at all approve the paternal deed, nor concordantly held it ratified and pleasing — on account of the divine promise touched above, even confirmed by oath, that namely the Jews and their sons after them should possess that land perpetually, if indeed, or while indeed they should keep his lawful things. Is not this expressly found in your Law? Is it not read in Numbers, that with your Fathers murmuring against Moses (indeed rather against God), and despairing that they could enter that land promised them, the Lord, in punishment of the sin of their unbelief, established the people in the desert for 40 years, until all the culpable fathers should be consumed by death — and then their sons, the innocent, as he had promised, he led in? Is it not so that after your entrance into your land, on account of your Idolatry, transmigrated by Nebuchadnezzar into Babylon, you were captives only for 70 years, after which, with the Idolatrous Fathers dead, the innocent sons returning to their own, restored the destroyed City and Temple? Did not Moses, truly foreseeing and predicting, and invoking as witnesses Heaven and Earth, that if you sinned against the Lord, he would not wait long, but quickly would blot you out from your land and disperse you among all the Gentiles, and you would remain few in the nations — add: "And when you shall seek there the Lord your God, you shall find him, if indeed with all your heart you shall seek him, and with all the tribulation of your soul; after all things which are foretold shall have found you, he shall not let you go, nor shall he forget the covenant which he swore to your fathers"? And again: "When therefore there shall come over you all these words, and being led by repentance of your heart in all the Gentiles into which the Lord shall have dispersed you, you shall return to him, and shall obey him and his commands, the Lord shall lead you back from your captivity, and again shall the Lord gather you from all peoples into which he had before dispersed you, and shall bring you into the land which your Fathers possessed; for the Lord shall return that he may rejoice over you in all goods, as he rejoiced in your Fathers — if indeed you shall hear the voice of the Lord your God, and shall keep his precepts, and return to the Lord your God." Why therefore now is this calamity of yours incomparably far greater, graver, and more long-lasting beyond measure, than all those past — if not on account of some sin incomparably far greater, graver, and more long-lasting beyond measure? And what is that, except the killing, the approval of the killing, and continual denial of Jesus Christ?

If you do not believe me, believe your most splendid of Prophets Daniel, who (Josephus your witness, Antiquities of the Jews X, last), not only predicted future things like other Prophets, but also defined the time when these had necessarily to be fulfilled. But nowhere did he define the time more certainly than where, by the number of 70 weeks fittingly divided, he predicted the Advent of the Holy of Holies, Christ; the killing of Christ the Leader; the negation of you; and that the people who were about to deny him should not be his people; that your City — namely Jerusalem — and the Sanctuary, that is, the Temple, should be dissipated by a people with a leader to come; and that its end should be devastation, and a desolation not transitory, but determined; that sacrifice and oblation should then fail; and that the abomination of desolation should be in the Temple — desolation, I say, not temporary and brief as in past times, but stably persevering even to consummation and unto the end. Was not the time of those weeks, according to the prophetic prediction and division, in the Advent of Christ, in the killing of Christ, in the dissipation of the City and Temple by the people of the Romans with the Leader, most clearly fulfilled? I know that it was so, Jews, I know that it was so — as through the Jewish and Gentile Histories it can perspicuously be demonstrated.

And although some of your Sophists have wished to be impudent, by subtracting or adding something modest to the regal times designated in the Histories, and so cavilling that those Prophetic Weeks were not then precisely fulfilled — by no color, however, can he extend those weeks even up to the present, for almost thirteen hundred years. For no Histories, even if drawn unwillingly, can color this even slightly — speaking of Weeks of days, namely, and of years, as your Fathers, your Prophets, and your Books up to now have spoken. If also those weeks were not then fulfilled, let some skilled Jew tell me, I beg, if they are now fulfilled, and when, and let him show me the Holy of Holies, and Christ, who then came, and the other Prophetic things mentioned above. Or if they are not yet fulfilled, when shall they be fulfilled? And let him ground himself in the Law, the Prophets, or in true (not feigned) Histories with color. Or if you cannot do this, believe Josephus, believe me knowing how to show most clearly through the Law, the ancient Prophecies, and truthful Histories, that they were plenarily fulfilled at the said times.

Did not also Daniel truly predict the dissipation of your City and Sanctuary by the Leader and people of the Romans aforesaid, the failure of host and sacrifice, and the determined desolation of your City and Temple? Does not your present calamity indicate this? Does not the translation of the city and Temple from its ancient place to Mount Calvary — the place namely of the Lord's passion of the Temple — into which it was never again to be rebuilt at its ancient place (as it seems from the testimony of Daniel premised, and your Scriptures attest) — indicate this? If therefore Daniel truly predicted these things, he predicted also verisimilarly the time of these — the weeks aforesaid. For he had not predicted things only as future, but the time also; truly therefore when these things befell you, the said weeks were fulfilled — wherefore also then truly came Christ — since all these things are prophetically connected. If, however, Daniel did not predict this so great misery of yours — what other of the Prophets predicted it? For it is not in any way verisimilar that your Prophets so diligently predicted to you and left in writings calamities of yours impropotionally less, and yet about this incomparably greatest were entirely silent. Did not one of your Prophets thus speak: "Shall there be evil in the city which the Lord has not done, because the Lord God shall not do a word, unless he reveal his secret to his servants the Prophets"? If moreover Daniel did not predict this aforementioned tribulation of yours, his prophecy remains not yet effectuated; wherefore still you expect a leading-back into your land, the rebuilding of City and Temple, and your habitation there for some times, and after all these things that so great a discord — indeed rather, according to the prophetic voice of Daniel, far be from you so horrible a calamity — far, far, far. Your Doctors also attest in their writings frequently, that your Temple ought not to be rebuilt a third time. The Prophets, however, who seem to prophesy the contrary, namely that Jerusalem and the Temple are still to be rebuilt — they understand of the Jerusalem of the City and Temple not earthly, but heavenly, as your Doctors very many attest. By these things therefore and the like, it not improbably seems persuaded that to sober Jews, friends of truth, it ought reasonably to appear that their nation and land, City and Temple were (as is premised) desolated, on account of the non-reception — indeed denial, blasphemy, and killing of the Messiah and Christ; their sons indeed, and the sons of their sons, even up to the present, sustain so wretched a destruction continually, on account of the approval and continual imitation of paternal crimes. For they continually approve the killing of Christ, nor by believing, loving, and worshipping do they receive him; truly they continually hate, deny, and blaspheme. Who therefore, these things attended, will reasonably or verisimilarly say that our Christ was a magician, a pseudo-Christ, and his miracles feigned?

Furthermore, I beg you Jews, listen a little. Is it not so that the true Messiah, if he has not yet come, but will come, as you hope, when he comes and does true miracles will not be known, will not be received — indeed, he will be denied, will suffer, and will be killed by you? Will not afterward and on this account your land, city, and sanctuary be dissipated, and you ejected and dispersed round about — as Isaiah and Daniel and the other Prophets and other doctors of yours most clearly predicted? And then no doubt, in your excuse and his accusation, you will compose some lying calumny, saying him to be a magician and his miracles feigned. For that he will do true miracles you will in no way concede. Did not that noble Prophet of yours, speaking in your person to the Messiah, say thus: "When you shall do miracles, we shall not bear it"? Let it suffice therefore I beg you, let it suffice, that thus far you have erred. Return I beg, return, do penance, acknowledge the miracles of Christ, and through them himself the marvelous worker.

Furthermore, from abundance, behold Rabbi Moses ben Maimon, the greatest of your Philosophers, in the book On Judges which he wrote, says: "Jesus the Nazarene was seen to be the Messiah, and was killed through the house of Judgment; and he himself was the cause — or merited — that Israel was destroyed by the sword, and that their remains were dispersed, and that they were brought low." For the authority of this Rabbi Moses I once asked of a certain great and famous Jew whether his writings were held authentic among them. He, striking his cheek, replied that whatever this Moses said was as authentic among us as if it had come from the mouth of God. And he added: "Between the first Moses and this one, there has not arisen so great a one among the Jews."

Furthermore, if our Christ had been a magician and not good, merciful, and pious, he would not have wept over this subversion and desolation of yours, foreseeing and predicting it, but would rather have laughed — especially since he most certainly knew and predicted that he was to be crucified by you, and that you would in no way receive his teaching. Yet, drawing near and seeing your city, and predicting the subversion of it and of its sons, on account of the cause premised, future, he wept, having compassion upon it, as all our Histories most certainly attest. Likewise, if our Christ had been a magician and pseudo-prophet, how, for the saving of men and the fulfilling of the Scriptures of the Prophets, would he have endured such a death knowingly and voluntarily? How also when dying would he have prayed for his killers? Yet he did these things, as is clearly plain from the authentic Histories. Did not also your most splendid Prophet predict this? Where, speaking most fully of the future and suffering Messiah, he says: "He was offered because he himself willed it"; and below: "He was reckoned with the wicked, and he himself bore the sin of many, and prayed for the transgressors." If also our Christ had been a magician, pseudo-prophet, an adversary of your law, how would your holy Prophets and others, or the Sibyl, so solicitously have predicted his Passion, the manner and circumstances of the Passion, by venerating it more devoutly, and detesting your blindness and cruelty and frenzy? Did not David, in Psalm 21, very expressly and plainly predict his Passion, manner, and circumstances thus? — and what he did not say there, he supplied in Psalm 68. Did not Isaiah and other Prophets predict it likewise? Did not Christ, about to die, begin in your tongue that Psalm 21, saying: "Eli, Eli, Lamma sabachthani" — evidently insinuating that this Psalm had been pre-said and fulfilled concerning him; who also, thirsting and having received vinegar, said it was consummated, as our Histories most certainly attest? The Book also which is called the Testament of the 12 Patriarchs, very many and most clear testimonies bears to our Christ — if it be true, not feigned. And why could it not be true, since the said Sibyl, alien from your prophetic nation, gave such clear testimonies to our Christ? Why therefore would those 12 Patriarchs, sons of the most splendid Patriarch and Prophet Jacob, after the paternal manner of attesting, in no way bear testimony to the Messiah — as also their father did, by saying: "The rod, or scepter, shall not depart from Judah, nor a giver or bearer of laws from between his feet, or from the middle of his feet, until Shiloh come" (that is, the Messiah, as your ancient gloss there expounds) — which also other glosses of yours elsewhere attest? Whence also your Chaldaic Translation plainly says: "the work, or action of regal power or domination shall not pass from the house of Judah, and a Scribe from the sons of his sons, even into the age, until Massilia come" — that is, the Messiah, or Christ. Which prophecy, with the other parts that follow, in our Christ stands fast as plenarily fulfilled. For, as your Histories attest, from the time of Moses there were always 71 ordinary Judges, or Scribes, having ordinary and regal jurisdiction and power, even of blood, and of exercising all judgments — who also after the transmigration of Babylon, and the taking away of the crown and scepter from the tribe of Judah by King Nebuchadnezzar, with as it were ordinary authority and regal power remaining among them, exercised judgments of this kind, and this most of all in Jerusalem, the Royal city and Metropolis of the kingdom of Judah, even up to Herod and Christ — who also not long after were equally destroyed. Or if this prophecy was not fulfilled in the Messiah and our Christ — since both Scepter and such Judges and jurisdiction or power has long ago plainly receded from Judah — find for yourselves another Messiah who has come.

The said Book moreover, even if perhaps among you it cannot be found anywhere, does not therefore consequently follow that it is feigned. For it could have happened that that book was translated into Greek, as also other books of yours were, before that great destruction of yours by the Romans, and in it was burnt completely or destroyed; or also that some such book among other spoils had been carried to Rome, and into Roman translated, with your other books of this kind being burned or destroyed.

Furthermore, if Christ had been a magician, how is it verisimilar that all the things prophetically said of the Messiah were in him plenarily fulfilled? For if it were so, your Prophets and Doctors had handed down to you a doctrine and notice diminished and too deceptive concerning the Messiah; and certainly whatever you may feign in answer concerning the many things which befell about Christ, of the time of the Advent and Passion of the Messiah predicted by Jacob and Daniel (as was touched above), feign you cannot.

Furthermore, at the same time against the Philosophers and magicians of the Jews aforesaid: if Christ had been a magician, an associate of malign spirits and friend, and through their power had done miracles, he would have used some suffumigations, rings, instruments, characters, incantations, songs, or other such things — as other Necromancers do, and the art teaches — and diverse for diverse effects. Wherefore also a fitting time would have been necessary for him to do miracles. But he almost always did miracles diverse and various by word alone, by command alone, by his bare imperative, and that suddenly without delay. Sometimes however he prayed the heavenly Father, but the demon never.

If also our Christ had been a magician, it seems that he would more willingly and commonly have done miracles harmful to men — as Necromancers and malign spirits do — than miracles helpful, especially with the article of his Passion impending. Yet he healed all those evilly affected, and at the very time of his Passion and article, the ear of one of his torturers, cut off by Peter, when Peter was rebuked, he touched and healed — as our Histories teach. How also if he had been a magician, would he have departed so most holily, emitting no diabolical or profane word, but always the most holy words? What magician also, or evil spirit, did all those miracles, especially the celestial ones, and the resurrection of the saints which happened at his death — as is recounted above?

Furthermore, if Christ had been a magician and Necromancer, it seems that for preserving and more widely amplifying his sect, he would have taught his disciples his art. Whoever, however, has diligently looked at the whole doctrine of Christ, will nowhere find any such word, will nowhere come upon anything except most pure worship of God, faith, hope, and charity to God; in every necessity, prayer and recourse to God with that most holy prayer dictated by his own mouth: "Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be thy name," and the rest equally holy. Nothing there except integral charity, all-sided sanctity, and perfect honesty — whose teaching also his learned disciples imitating, all magicians with their magical arts as pestilential poisons, and as heretical and contrary to the Christian Faith, condemned. Which also all our Canonical and Civil Laws sanction and confirm. If also Christ did miracles by magic — how do his holy disciples, namely the holy Christians, work similar miracles, as their Master Christ had promised them, by the sole invocation of God, of Christ, of Mary, of any other Saints — without invocation of any malign spirits, and without those things customary in such arts? — indeed even those who learned nothing at all of such arts, but those very arts with their artificers as far as possible they destroyed; and this not only in the present life, but also often after this life. Magicians and Necromancers among Christians do not work miracles, neither in life nor in death; nor other perverse Christians; but only integral Christians, irreprehensibly conversing before God and man. If however anyone shall say that the demons gratis do miracles for such Christians — how is it verisimilar that they should so honor their chief enemies, who themselves, their altars, their idols, their Temples, and universally every honor and worship of theirs, by life, doctrine, deed, and word, with all their powers destroy, annihilate, and confound? Does it not rather seem that they would so honor rather their worshippers, that thus to their worship they might rather provoke men, than to the Christian religion, so hostile, contrary, and inimical to them? Do not also our Histories transmit how Cyprian, from his very boyhood by his parents consecrated to the Devil, the greatest Necromancer, lusted after the blessed Justina of Antioch, the Christian virgin, for himself or for a certain Acladius — and incited her, first through one Demon, second through another stronger, and third through the prince of the Demons, manifoldly, even for seven years, to sin, now invisibly, now visibly, now assuming the species of a virgin, now of a young man, and entering the bed of the virgin; transforming Cyprian himself sometimes into a woman, sometimes into a bird, and Acladius into a sparrow, and bringing them transformed to the chamber of the virgin — all of whom, fortifying herself with the sign of the Cross, she overcame, and reformed those transformed to their proper form? How also the same Demon, seeing himself unable to profit, turned into the form of Justina, offered himself to Cyprian, that thus at least he might palliate his impotence — and at Cyprian's saying, "Welcome Justina!" immediately at the utterance of the virgin's name he vanished like smoke; wherefore Cyprian, converted to the faith of Christ, at length for the faith of Christ, together with Justina, consummated Martyrdom. Like things also are read of the holy Apostle of Christ James the son of Zebedee, who was converting through miracles Hermogenes and Philetus, the greatest Necromancers, evacuating all their magical workings. If therefore by the virtue of the Christian Faith, all the miracles — indeed magical workings — of demons are destroyed, by what reason ought one to suppose Christian miracles to be done by the power of demons?

Furthermore, if the Devil can do any miracles, God too can — as the first Supposition, the third and seventh Parts demonstrate, etc. — as above against the prior response. Do not also the prayers of Christians loving God show the truth of Christian miracles, according to the doctrine of the third Part of this work — which prayers in their greatest necessities they offer to God, not to demons (indeed against demons), for miraculous help to be obtained? For how would God supremely good and powerful, supremely pious and clement (as the first Supposition and other things preceding manifest), repel such lovers of his fleeing, crying, praying to him in supreme dangers, and commend them to demons? Furthermore, if demons so help Christians praying Christ and God in their great necessities — they do this either voluntarily or unwillingly, spontaneously or coactedly. It does not seem that spontaneously, since Christ and Christians have done and continually do so many things against them. If coactedly — great is the virtue of the Christian Faith, to which the demons even coacted are subject, and unwillingly obey, and reluctantly serve. For there is no power on earth which compares with demons. Wherefore it rather seems that God, through his great omnipotence, compels demons thus when he wills, where he wills, and in what way he wills, that they may serve his worshippers and servants, the Christians — especially since good Christians in their excessive necessities nowhere use any magical document, nowhere is it the Devil, but God they suppliantly entreat. How greatly therefore does God love and approve the faith of Christ?

The magicians, however, will object — or someone for them — that they themselves compel and force demons to certain things. But why can they not similarly compel the good Angels of God, since they are of the same nature, or men, viators good or evil, of weaker nature? It seems moreover that it can be shown by Philosophical and Theological reason that the natural Free Will of a rational substance cannot be compelled or forced to its own acts through any words or songs, seals or signs, aromatics or suffumigations, herbs or characters Celestial or Terrestrial, nor through any inanimate creatures, irrational or rational, even any whatsoever this side of God. For this seems to repugn the natural liberty of the Will. Wherefore demons, invoked by Magicians, often do not come; sometimes, however, gratis they approach to seduce the unhappy souls, and to confirm the seduced more. Did not also at other times demons, so malicious, cunning, and powerful, compel men, especially sinners, to do all magical workings?

Furthermore, if Christ had been a fictioneer and had done only feigned miracles, why at the time of his preaching and Passion did your true miracles cease, nor are they now renewed — as also your Histories transmit? For from your Histories and ours alike it can be plain that the Romans dissipated your City and Temple, according to the prophetic prediction of Daniel and Christ, in the year 42 after his Passion or Ascension into Heaven. Therefore your Babylonian Talmud also clearly says: "10 signs were done in the house of the Sanctuary: 1. No woman miscarried on account of the smell of the meats of the Sanctuary; 2. The flesh of the Sanctuary never stank; 3. There was never a fly seen in the house of the Butchers; 4. No accident befell the High Priest on the day of propitiation; 5. There was no corruption found in the sheaf or handful, neither in the two loaves, nor in the loaves of presentation: those standing in the rows and adoring were spacious, although withdrawn from the house of the Propitiatory by 11 cubits; 6. Neither serpent nor scorpion harmed in Jerusalem; 7. Never did a man say to his neighbor: Our place for staying in Jerusalem is narrow; 8. Never did rains extinguish the fire of the woods of preparation, nor did the wind overcome the column of smoke: although all the winds in the world should blow into it, they could not divert it; 9. Fragments of earthen vessels were absorbed from their places; 10. The ashes also of the inner altar and of the Candelabrum were absorbed from their place. All these true signs ceased for 40 years before the destruction of the Temple, as it is said: 'Signs we did not see, no longer is there a Prophet, nor is there with us one knowing how long.'"

Another book of yours also, which is called Iona, attests that your Masters handed down that "for the 40 years in which Symeon the Just ministered, the lot of the name of the Lord ascended to the right; and for 40 years before the destruction of the house — that is, the Temple — the lot did not ascend to the right, but to the left. The tongue of splendor — namely the lava made red — suspended in the Temple, was changed into whiteness; but from then on by no means. The evening flax also formerly always burned, but from then on not, but was sometimes extinguished. The fire likewise of the preparation, which ought to burn continually on the altar, was always strong, and there was no need that they should put under many woods, but only two armfuls because of the commandment of placing the woods. From then on however and beyond, sometimes it was strong and sometimes by no means; and then the Priests did not cease to put under woods all day. Into the handful or sheaf, moreover, and into the two loaves of faces or position or presentation was sent so great a benediction, that however little the Priest should touch, he ate and was filled, and yet the remains exceeded. From then on however so great a curse was sent in, that whatever thence came to the Priests was not worth what one bean. Wherefore the honest withdrew their hands, and the gluttonous tolerated. Furthermore, in the year in which Symeon the Just died, he predicted to the Jews that he was about to die in that year. To them inquiring whence he knew, he replied: 'Every day on which I entered, namely the Holy of Holies, an old man clothed in white was likened to me, who entered with me and went out with me. Today, however, an old man, one clothed in black, appeared to me, who entered with me, but did not go out.' Afterward he was sick for seven days and died; and from then on his Priest brethren ceased to bless, namely in the name of the Lord. The doors also of the Temple were always opening themselves spontaneously, until Rabban Johanan son of Zaqgai rebuked them, and said: 'Temple, Temple, why do you destroy yourself? For I know concerning you that your end will be destruction. For of you Zechariah prophesied: Open, Libanus, your gates, and let the fire devour your Cedars.'"

These same things your Talmud of Jerusalem also commemorates, "in all the days in which Symeon the Just was existing, the lot of the name of God ascended in the right hand," etc. — judiciously as above; and it follows: "But for forty years when the house was not yet destroyed, the evening light was extinguished, and the tongue of splendor reddened as blood, and the lot of the name ascended in the left, and the doors of the Temple were opening themselves at night, and those rising in the morning found them open. And Rabban Johanan said: 'Temple, Temple, why do you stupefy us? We know that your end will be at devastation, and that of you Zechariah prophesied: Open, Libanus, your gates, etc., and let the fire devour your Cedars.'"

Nor is it hidden from you Jews, nor ought it be hidden from others, how, in numbering by greater number — say by the article of as it were the integer number recounted — you are wont frequently to throw away the digits and lesser numbers as it were minutes or fractions, by neglecting them. Although therefore your books affirm that your miracles ceased for 40 years before the destruction of the house or Temple — yet it can be that for 42 years, or 43, 45, or thereabouts before, they ceased, namely at the time of the Baptism, preaching, working of miracles, Passion, or Ascension of the Lord Jesus Christ — as I rather reckon the truth to be. But although then truly your miracles entirely failed, yet before, around 100 years, they began to fail — as also before deep night the light is somewhat thinned, and before perfect blindness the sight is somewhat obscured. For Josephus your countryman Antiquities of the Jews III [8] hands down that "God Almighty has left it to the readers to know whether [the High Priest] should come to sacred things, or be unwilling to be." And he adds: "And this God willed to be manifest not only to the Hebrews, but also to foreigners. For while God was present at the sacrifices, the other of the Sardonyx stones, which was carried on the right shoulder of the Pontiff, was sparkling. And from it splendor would come forth so that even to those placed afar it appeared, when previously this had not been in that stone. And this is also marvelous, however, to those who attain wisdom, not the abjection of divine works. What is more marvelous, I shall say. For through the twelve stones which the Pontiff carries above the breast sown into the Essin (that is, into the rational), God pre-announced victory to those about to fight. For so great a splendor used to flash in them, when the army was not yet moved, that it became manifest to all the multitude that God was present with their aid. Whence the Greeks also, who honor our solemnities — because in these they cannot contradict — call the Essin the rational. Both the Essin and the Sardonyx therefore have ceased to shine, for two hundred years before I wrote these things." Nor is it a wonder. For with the Messiah coming, according to the Prophecy of Jacob touched above, the rod or scepter had to be taken away from Judah, and all the ordinary and judiciary power — which could not, or did not befit, to be done suddenly, but successively through wars succeeding and destroying your power. Successively, that thus your lamp also might be extinguished — because the way and paths of the Messiah about to come in proximity (as you well knew, or ought to have known, from the prophecies and traditions of your forebears) you in no way duly prepared, as is prophetically commanded you. On the contrary, against him as he came, you yourselves prepared yourselves enemies, plotters, contradictors, and impious oppugners — as the outcome of the matter showed; for many years preceding you neglected your lawful things, exercising manifold evils, as the Books of the Maccabees (whom you call sons of Asamonaeus or Asamonaei) and the Books of Josephus On the Antiquities and Jewish War, with other Histories, attest. But why at the time of our Christ aforesaid did your miracles entirely cease? Was it not because you depraved his glorious miracles, contemned the Author of miracles himself, denied him, killed him; cast out also his disciples, and his whole doctrine, from your borders? What wonder if, the Author of miracles having receded from you, the miracles likewise have receded? Indeed, also from the recession of miracles from you it can not improbably be argued the recession of their Author the Lord our God, who, by the testimony of the Prophet, "alone makes great miracles" — as also above through prophetic testimonies was shown? Wherefore around that time was heard a voice in your temple of those saying: "Let us migrate hence, let us migrate from these seats" — namely of the holy Angels. Did not therefore at that time the Lord and God of armies with his holy Angels migrate from you and from your seats, and to the people of the Gentiles, who dwelt in darkness, transmigrate — illuminating them, becoming the Father of them, the Father of the future age once, now of the present? For from Christ as from our Father are Christians named, whose paternal presence and present paternity among us his magnificent benefits — namely glorious miracles — clearly indicate, as also formerly with you they indicated his presence.

You will perhaps say that God works for you continually one great miracle among your enemies, by conserving you so long a time, feeding you, and ministering necessities. But this seems rather to be deputed to your misery than to a miracle for you. For even if it is a miracle, yet it is recognized to redound to your misery, in punishment of your sins — as it was anciently prophesied of you. For Moses said: "If, perpetrating evil before the Lord your God, you provoke him to anger, I invoke as witnesses today Heaven and earth that you shall quickly perish from the land which crossing the Jordan you are about to possess. The Lord shall blot you out, and shall scatter you among all the nations, and you shall remain few in the nations to which the Lord is about to lead you. He shall not let you go, nor altogether blot you out." David also, in the person of the Messiah and Christ then about to suffer from you, says: "God has shown me concerning my enemies, slay them not, lest at any time my people forget. Disperse them in your power, and depose them," etc. Which both your execrable lies still continued against Christ, and your punishment, evidently indicate; and how long these will last — until they shall know that God shall rule, not only Jacob, but also the ends of the whole earth, and at evening they shall be converted. Do you not continually live in most grievous subjection and miserable servitude, in misery and trouble, in manifold sorrow and labor? — which marvel, or what is wondrous, that they live as laborers all-sidedly from their labors, with the Poet saying:

Every soil is a fatherland to fortune, as the sea is to fish, As to the bird whatever empty thing in the world lies open.

Nor are Christians your enemies, as you say — but friends. For in love of Christ, who descended from you, they will, pray, and procure for you good with all their strength — indeed the greatest goods in the present, and similarly in the future — as for themselves. Therefore that you are conserved in this way is in punishment of your sins, that also through you others may be chastised; and lest moreover the lamp and memory of your holy Fathers should be entirely extinguished. For Moses says: "He shall not let you go, nor altogether blot you out, nor shall he forget the covenant which he swore to your fathers." And David: "Slay them not, lest at any time my people forget." Which is also believed not unreasonably to be done — that your prophetic books, remaining among you the enemies of the Christian Faith, may faithfully attest the faith of Christ, as was touched above; furthermore also on account of those who from you daily are converted; further on account of the remnants of Israel, which finally shall be converted.

Others, however, say the Saracens and their Philosophers — confess the miracles of our Christ, and the true cause of their miracles: namely, the true God, and his true power and virtue. But they say further: those miracles do not prove him to have been God, as the Christians estimate, but some great saint, great friend of God, and great Prophet — as Moses and Mohammed were; and this is the tradition of Mohammed. But if Christ was a great saint, a great friend of God, and a great Prophet (as also God demonstrated by such evident miracles), he was not a lying seducer, but a truthful leader and teacher. His doctrine therefore was not lying but true: but in his doctrine it is held that he himself was God; therefore truly Christ was God.

Here you will perhaps respond with the Manichaeian heretics, according to the tradition of Mohammed, saying that the whole doctrine of Christ was true, but his disciples as rude men understood it ill, and from ignorance or from malice in writing corrupted it manifoldly; and that in the doctrine of Christ itself it is in no way contained that he was God — but perhaps in the doctrine corrupted by his disciples. But here I beg, listen peaceably. Do not the authority and uncorrupted truth of our Gospels sufficiently show — against the immediate prior response — what was already laid down? Does it not seem rather to be more reasonably believed that so many, such, and so great disciples of Christ, Apostles, and Evangelists, conversing with him continually in his presence, beholding his life and works continually in his presence, hearing his teaching continually in his presence — concerning these things concordantly wrote — than that Mohammed, alone and absent (because by 600 years and more later than Christ) wrote concerning these things? Indeed our Scripture concerning Christ, which so many and such concordantly wrote, and by faith, life, and doctrine continually attested, seems much more authentic than your law, which Mohammed alone, or any disciple of his alone, or any wife of his alone, wrote. Furthermore, you will perhaps say that Mohammed was a Prophet, wherefore that the doctrine of Christ was divinely revealed to him. Truly however much he had been a Prophet, many things could have been by no means divinely revealed to him. Is not therefore more to be believed concordant witnesses, present, seeing, hearing, palpating, than Mohammed alone and absent — concerning whose prophecy it does not stand fast specially in this part? Why also is it not to be believed that Christ taught that he himself was God — since the ancient Prophets of Judea and the Sibyl concordantly prophesied him to be God, as from their prophecies it can be perspicuously demonstrated? How therefore shall I believe Mohammed alone, and not believe these many and most clear Prophets? Nor can anyone imagine that we Christians have feigned such Prophecies, as has been shown above. Furthermore, if Mohammed was a Prophet, so were the disciples of Christ writing his deeds — as our Histories teach. Was it not, according to Avicenna, the greatest of your Philosophers (Metaphysics X [2]), that prophecy is a gift of the Holy Spirit? — and how plenarily had the disciples of Christ, gathered equally, the Holy Spirit, or the gift of this Holy Spirit, when on the day of Pentecost the Holy Spirit in the species of fire filled the whole house where they were sitting, and them all so much that, although they were Hebrews, they spoke suddenly in the tongues of all nations? Did not Peter and Paul and other disciples of Christ prophesy? Did not John, the disciple and Evangelist of Christ, in his Apocalypse describe by prophesying the course of the world from the time of Christ to the end of the world — where also concerning your Mohammed and your seduction through him, and the impugning of Christians by you, he was not silent? Did not also many other Christians at many times most clearly prophesy? The disciples of Christ also, the Apostles and Evangelists, in dictating, writing, and by life, doctrine, deed, and word — even unto martyrdom and in the very martyrdom — most constantly attesting our Gospels, did (that is, God did for them) many glorious miracles, both in life and after their life. Wherefore also according to your response premised, they themselves were great saints and great friends of God — indeed greater than your Mohammed, for whom God did no miracles, as was touched above. Their life therefore and doctrine was holy and true, which God by such miracles approves and attests. Furthermore, from the time of Christ till now, miracles have always lasted among Christians — through Christians or for Christians who lived according to this doctrine of Christ which we have. God therefore approves such life and doctrine equally. Did not first the holy Christian Martyrs, men and women innumerable, contending for this faith, shine with very many miracles? Did not afterward the Christian Doctors, against the Heretics for the faith which we hold, in concord with words and writings fighting, shine with very many miracles? Did not Confessors and Virgins, living according to this faith, shine with very many miracles, as very many Histories attest? How also does it seem credible that if Christians erred commonly in believing — especially since they love God according to the doctrine of the next-preceding part of this work — God would not reveal the truth to some Christian, for whom he does so many other and so great miracles, but only to one unbeliever, idolater Gentile, namely your Mohammed? For such was he before he received the gift of Prophecy, as your books attest. For so he revealed to our Christ the Jew, and through him to his Jewish disciples, when their law he willed spiritually to expound and to fulfill.

I beg further attend diligently to the manner of doing miracles of Christ and of all others. Did not all others, through whom or for whom miracles were done, pray to God tacitly or expressly for the miracles to be done — protesting that they could not do miracles by their own power, and that they were not God? Christ however very often, and almost always when doing miracles, did them without the suffrage of prayer; indeed, he pretended to do everything by his own authority, by his own power, and by his own sole will — that thus he might show himself to be God, and might be believed to be God by men. Whence also doing miracles for the most part, he expressed only the will of doing it, and immediately the miracle which he willed was done — that thus he might evidently show himself to have an unfrustratable will, omnipotent and generally efficacious, such as no creature has, since it is only of finite virtue, but only God of absolutely infinite virtue, as the eighth Part teaches. For he said to the dead, paralytics, and other sick: "Rise"; to the blind: "Look up"; to him with the withered hand: "Stretch out your hand"; to the leper: "I will, be cleansed"; and to many asking many things, "Be it done"; and immediately the miracle which he willed was done. Christ therefore was truly God. For how otherwise would God have so approved him? Some sick however he cured by doing certain other things on account of ministry; sometimes however he prayed God the Father for a miracle to be done, that thus he might show that by virtue of the assumed humanity he could not do miracles, but only by divine virtue. Furthermore, Christ was a greater Prophet and more eminent than Mohammed; therefore, as it appears, the law of Christ is also greater than the law of Mohammed. Is not he the greater Prophet who has both the spirit of Prophecy and the power of working miracles, than he who has only one of these? Does not Avicenna, the most renowned of your Philosophers, say in De Anima IV.4 that the property of working miracles depends upon the power of desire, which proceeds from the soul of a Prophet worthy of prophecy; and in his Metaphysics X.1, that certitude comes from the evidence of miracles? Now Christ possessed both of these in the most excellent degree, as a great many histories make manifest; but your Mohammed scarcely had even tenuously, if at all, one of them—namely, the gift of Prophecy. For he predicted some things truly, but few; and others falsely, as both your books and the outcome of events make plain. But he worked no miracles, as he himself testifies in your Scripture. Has not this same point been shown above, against the fourth response, by the authority of Avicenna in like manner?

Does not he also seem the holier Prophet who enters the world more holily, lives more holily in the world, and departs the world more holily? Now Christ entered the world more holily, because he was conceived through angelic annunciation, by the Holy Spirit, from the Most Holy Virgin Mary, and was born of her, as the book of your law testifies in many places. He lived more holily in the world, as his life, doctrine, and miracles prove, nor do you deny this, as I believe. He departed the world more holily, as those greatest miracles which occurred around his death lucidly manifest: he rose from the dead, ascended into heaven, promised and sent the Holy Spirit to his own. Therefore he was more excellent than Mohammed.

Furthermore, since you Saracen Philosophers are great Astrologers, and you assign all things that occur below to higher causes (so that I may speak to you according to your principles), consider,

I pray, the great conjunction of Saturn and Jupiter that preceded and pre-signified your Prophet and sect, with all its circumstances to be weighed. Consider also the great conjunction—indeed, a greater and the greatest—of these same planets, with all their universal circumstances, which preceded Christ by a few years, and was the signifier of our future Prophet and sect. For both your people and ours know how to calculate these most readily; and consider which ought to be judged more solemn, more excellent, and more worthy. Was not that conjunction Christ's? What Astrologer doubts or is ignorant of this? Therefore, do not our Prophet and our sect surpass and excel your Prophet and your sect in like manner?

Did not Christ and the Christian religion also have very many most clear testimonies before, alongside, and after, as the preceding has taught, and as continued miracles still teach? But your prophet and your religion had none, or at least not so many, not such, nor so great. Furthermore, a law leading to the perfection and felicity of the soul in the present and in the future seems better and worthier than one which leads to the felicity or pleasure of the body in the present and likewise in the future. Now our law leads principally to the perfection and felicity of the rational soul in the present and likewise in the future; but yours leads to the felicity or pleasure of the body in the present, and also in the future, as the institutions and promises of our law and yours testify.

Does not Avicenna, the greatest of your Philosophers, say in his Metaphysics IX, last chapter: "Our law, which Mohammed gave, sets forth the disposition of felicity and misery which pertain to the body; but there is another promise which is apprehended by the intellect and by demonstrative reason, and this is the felicity and misery of souls, which is proved by argumentation, although our estimations are too feeble to imagine these now, for reasons which I shall set forth. To wise Theologians, however, the desire was much greater for attaining this felicity than the felicity of bodies; for although the latter were given to them, they did not attend to it, nor did they prize it in comparison with this felicity which is conjoined to the first truth, as I shall show concerning it. Therefore I shall make known the disposition of this felicity and the misery contrary to it; corporeal felicity, however, has already been assigned in the law."

Do not your Caliph and Sultan, and your other great ones according to the tradition of your law, believe and preach that your dead, raised to life, will eat and drink all delicate things—such as wafers, honey, milk, cheese, and butter—and that they will have many beautiful wives with whom they will mingle carnally? But how dishonest this would be in future felicity, how carnal, how bestial, how irrational—what honest Philosopher does not easily perceive? For to what end will it be necessary to eat there? Either from necessity, or from pleasure alone? If from necessity, then the bodies of men there will be alterable to infirmities, blindness, sorrows, and to death, and thus perhaps they will be altered—but this is repugnant to felicity. For felicity, according to all your Philosophers and others, is a stable and perfect good. If from pleasure alone, who will excuse them from gluttony, incontinence, or intemperance? Moreover, if you eat there carnally, will you not also have to evacuate carnally, and thus shamefully pollute the most felicitous place, and produce mutual abomination, stench, and weariness?

Furthermore, if you eat and drink there, will you not afterward sleep, and thus cease from felicity and incur misery? For the Philosophers concordantly teach that act is more perfect than potency, and use than habit; therefore felicity, which is the highest human good, consists in act and use, not in potency or habit. Hence a certain illustrious Philosopher recites in Ethics I, last chapter, approving the common saying that "the felicitous differ in nothing from the miserable for half their lives." To what end also would you have wives there—for generation, or for pleasure alone? Not for generation: for here, not there, is the place, time, and necessity for generating, nor will anyone there need an heir, since each one there, as you believe, will live forever in immortality. Furthermore, either you will always generate there, or you will at some time cease. If you will always generate, you will produce an immoderate and burdensome multitude of children, and that society of paradise or heaven will never be perfect, nor finally consummated. If at some time you cease from generating, you will also cease from your felicity, and incur eternal misery.

Your sons also begotten there will either further generate there, or by no means. If they will generate, there will be infinite and immoderate multiplication of children. It also seems that sons who never merited beatitude will be as blessed there as their fathers who multiply merited it here, since there is no time or place there for meriting. If they will by no means generate, they will never attain beatitude, but will always be miserable. Nor will you have wives there for filling pleasure alone—what Philosopher doubts this? What honest man is ignorant of it? What sane man hopes for this, except perhaps a swine of Epicurus?

Likewise, either you will have concupiscence and appetite for venereal acts there before the venereal act, or by no means. If you will have it, you will have sadness and grief there from delay and lack of the desired delectable. For the Philosopher says in Ethics III.21: "The intemperate man desires delectable things, on account of which he is also saddened when not obtaining them; for with sadness comes concupiscence." And in Metaphysics XII.39, showing that God always has himself in the best way, he proves that he always has the greatest delectation or pleasure, and that this is of some act always presentially existing, because an existing act is per se and maximally delectable; but hope concerning a future act, and memory concerning a past act, is delectable not per se but on account of the act, and insofar as they have, as it were presentially, the act itself.

Concerning which your Averroes says: "Hope and remembrance, although they are pleasurable, nevertheless are of things not existing in act; and they are pleasurable because the one hoping imagines them as comprehended in act, and likewise the one remembering." And he hints that pleasurable comprehension is only of that which is in act, not in potency, and that desire preceding comprehension seems more grief than pleasure—which both your Avicenna and all Philosophers and Physicians attest, and frequent experience makes manifest. But sadness does not befit felicity—rather, it is repugnant to it. If, however, you will have no concupiscence at all, neither will you have delectation in the work, as it appears. To what end also will it be necessary for those not desiring at all to exercise such an act?

And if you men, with so many wives full of pleasures, abound, and this will be your felicity, why will not every woman likewise have many men, so that they too may be similarly satiated with their full pleasures—or will they themselves remain forever unhappy and miserable?

Furthermore, either you will continually exercise the carnal act always, or you will sometimes cease by turns. But far be it that you should even lightly think you will continually exercise such an act; for thus you will be made more vile than the swine, which by you are also unclean and unlawful for eating. Nor will you be able to exercise such an act continually with one wife, since you will have many there; nor with many—how also will many wives of one man be able, for the completion of his felicity, to be continually occupied in such an act, except by committing adultery with various men? And if you cease from such an act at some time, your felicity will be diminished or will cease, as the foregoing testifies.

What Philosopher is ignorant that human felicity consists only in the most perfect operation of man, and who does not know that the most perfect operation of man is the operation according to the most perfect power of man, concerning his most perfect object? And who doubts that the rational soul is a more perfect power than any corporeal power? Therefore, it ought to be certain to anyone that the felicity of man consists in the cognition, conjunction, and most perfect fruition of God, as Hermes, Plato, Aristotle, Avicenna, Algazel, Averroes, and all Philosophers, both Saracen and others, equally attest. Do not corporeal pleasure and the bestial soul—especially that of venereal acts—greatly impede the spiritual operation of the rational soul and its sincere delectation? Therefore it is repugnant to perfect felicity. For Aristotle says in Ethics VII.11: "The impediment to being prudent is the pleasures, and the more one rejoices, especially in those of venereal acts: for no one indeed can understand anything in them."

Why also do you expect human beatitude in such carnal and bestial delectation, and not in spiritual and rational delectation, more perfect, more permanent (because continuous), more honest, purer, better, and greater—especially since you cannot have both at once? For they are repugnant to one another and mutually expel each other, as was just taught above. And what Philosopher does not know that just as for a more perfect power, more untiring, more honest, more holy, and better, concerning its most fitting object, there ought reasonably to be a proportional operation, so also a proportional delectation? But the most perfect power of man, the most untiring (because immaterial and incorruptible), purest, most honest, most holy, most especially Deiform, and universally best—who denies that this is the rational soul? And its proportional object—who doubts that this is God? Therefore no one is permitted to doubt that the most delectable felicity and the most felicitous delectation are to be expected in the most perfect, most continuous, most sincere, and most holy operation of the rational soul concerning God, as the aforesaid Philosophers and very many other Gentiles, Jews, and Saracens unanimously attest, and how reasonably according to the premises!

Is not God, according to the first supposition, third part, and fourth, supremely, most copiously, most abundantly, and most infinitely delectable, pleasurable, delicious, sweet, agreeable, lovable, joyful, felicitous, and good? Why therefore, according to the seventh and eighth parts, can he not exhibit himself thus to his worshippers in future beatitude, and satiate them with his sincere delights, always continuous, sincerely and continuously and eternally, so that thus he himself becomes for them the most delectable felicity and most felicitous delectation always? Does not this also most beautifully agree with reason?

According to all Philosophers truly Philosophers, and according to the requirement of reason, ought not man to do all things for the end? And since there is no infinite process in ends—as the second supposition and they themselves equally attest—there is some ultimate of all ends, which is sought for itself, and others on account of it. But this is final beatitude and felicity. And in what is felicity itself to be sought, except in God? And what will this felicity be, except God? Otherwise God would have to be loved finally, and venerated by his worshippers, on account of something other than himself—against all who rightly Philosophize, and against the 30th part of this work.

According to the 31st part, will not God recompense his lovers and servants not sparingly but abundantly? And where and when, except in future felicity? But these, according to the doctrine of the thirtieth part of this work, love him above all things—not only existing but also possible and imaginable, on this side of God, however great—and serve him in this manner: that for the sake of obtaining any delectable goods whatsoever, or for avoiding any sad evils, they would never knowingly offend him in any way. Therefore will he not recompense them with a greater good and a greater delectation? And what good, except himself? And what delectation, except his own infinite one? And who does not know that divine delectation is most holy, most sincere, most honest, most continuous, and most abundantly infinite, as the first Supposition, the third, fourth, and 20th parts teach? This most delectable felicity, then, and most felicitous delectation, and most especially Deiform, we Christians according to our law, the doctrine of Christ, all expect concordantly. Therefore is not our law more reasonable, more honest, and holier than yours?

Is it not also held in your Scripture that the sun rises between the two horns of the devil, and therefore that those who adore toward the East adore the devil? That the Ass, when it brays, sees the devil, and therefore makes such a horrible sound? That the Cock, when it crows, sees an Angel, and therefore sings thus? And many similar things which no Philosopher doubts to be empty ravings and fictions? It also seems against the natural order that to a more subtle, more spiritual, and more divine law (such as our law is), a ruder, more carnal, and more bestial law should succeed (such as is your law). For the natural process seems to be from rude to subtle, from carnal to spiritual, from less perfect to more perfect. Do not the most powerful miracles, divinely worked for us against you on many occasions, also show the excellence of our law over yours, as many chronicles relate, of which a few are recited above?

Perhaps you will respond and say that even if our law were better, yours nevertheless is good and sufficient for salvation. But if ours is good, it is true and right; yours, however, is bad, false, and erroneous, for they are repugnant in many things. Even if ours is better, why do you persecute it so? Why also do you not choose the better? Or if not all of you wish to do so, why do you not allow those who wish from among yourselves to choose and hold it? But if anyone among you should choose it, you continually slaughter him. Hear Avicenna, the greatest of your Philosophers, in his Metaphysics X, last chapter, expressly teaching that there ought to be no other law except that which descends from God through the Prophet, whose institution is best, and that this is to be spread through the whole world; and if there be any who disagree from the law, "let them first," he says, "be corrected so that they come to their senses; but if they will not do so, let them be killed."

From this whole long contestation, therefore, such a brief argument is gathered: Whatsoever God revealed and testified is true, as the first supposition and the third part demonstrate; God revealed and testified the Christian Faith, as the foregoing makes manifest; therefore the Christian Faith is true. I know that the obstinate and quibbling will quibble obstinately, either tacitly thinking that the foregoing does not demonstrate that God revealed or testified to this faith. And I confess that there is here no Mathematical demonstration from principles known per se, just as neither in natural Philosophy, nor in Metaphysics, nor in moral Philosophy, but such as such moral matter permits. Does not that great Philosopher rightly say in Ethics I.3 that "it will be well said sufficiently if it is made manifest according to the subject matter"? "For certainty is not similarly to be sought in all things; for the goods and just things, with which Civil science is concerned, have so much difference and error that they seem to be by law alone, but not by nature. Speaking lovably, therefore, of such matters, we ought to show the truth in a coarse and figurative way; in the same manner each of the things said ought to be received, for it is the mark of a disciplined man to seek certainty in any genus only insofar as the nature of the matter receives it. For it appears equally close to accept a Mathematician persuading and to demand demonstrations from a Rhetorician."

Indeed, Plato, about to speak of natural things in the second Prologue to the Timaeus, thus says: "I tell you now, O Socrates, if while disputing concerning the nature of the universal thing, I am unable to bring forth utterly unshakable and inexplicable reasons, do not marvel; rather, observe whether I bring forth assertions no less consonant than anyone else. For remember that both I, who speak, and you, who judge, are men, and that to give a moderate explanation of such sublime matters is the burden of some great labor."

Let the professor of any other faith come forward, I beg, and let him bring forth for his faith such reasons as he can; and let the Christian bring forth for his faith the reasons set forth above, or other better possible ones; and weigh both these and those, on this side and that, with a just balance, and I know—and I know that I know—that yours will be found to have less.

And if anyone shall think to resist me by arguing that miracles cannot prove our faith, since miracles were sometimes worked among Idolaters and Gentiles (as is recited above), unless perhaps the unfaithful faith of these can likewise be approved by their miracles—it is to be responded, not improbably perhaps, that before the time of Circumcision and the Law, and likewise during the time when they endured, there were certain ones even among foreign nations, among Idolaters and Gentiles, who—either through divine revelation, or through human teaching, or through their own investigation and discovery—truly knew God (although perhaps tenuously and veiledly), and likewise worshipped him. Did not certain Gentiles most clearly prophesy that Christ would come, as was touched on above? Why then was it not fitting that God, wonderful in his Saints, should work miracles for such persons, that thus he might further advance and confirm them in his cognition and love, and attract others to imitate their Religion?

Such indeed seem to have been certain Just men and Prophets before the flood and after the flood, before Circumcision and the Law. In the time of Circumcision instituted through Abraham, Job, king of Edom, was the fifth from the Patriarch Abraham, who descended after the election of Jacob from the reprobated Esau. In the time of the Law given through Moses, such seem the Queen of the South, and the men of Nineveh, as the sacred letters, even the Evangelists, attest. Such moreover seems to have been Nebuchadnezzar, the most renowned king of Babylon, and the first Monarch of the Chaldeans, after his humiliation and the penance he performed. Darius also, King of the Medes, who took the Monarchy from the Chaldeans. Such likewise seems to have been, while the law was still enduring, also that noble Alexander, King of the Greeks, who took the Monarchy from the Medes—which Cornelius the Centurion, a religious man and acceptable to God, never a Jew nor yet made a Christian, evidently testifies.

Why therefore should it not similarly be believed concerning other similar persons, although divine histories or others make minimal mention of them? Does not God, speaking through the Prophet about his city and citizens, say generally enough: "I shall be mindful of Rahab and Babylon among them that know me; behold, the foreigners, and Tyre, and the people of Ethiopia, these were there"? And did not his Apostle, having experienced the same generality, say: "In truth I have found that God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that fears him and works justice is acceptable to him"?

Hence Augustine in his book On the Time of the Christian Religion against Porphyry, and in On the Predestination of the Saints, to Prosper and Hilary, ch. 11, says: "From the beginning of the human race, sometimes more hiddenly, sometimes more evidently, Christ has not ceased to be prophesied, nor have those who would believe in him been lacking; both from Adam to Moses, and in the people of Israel itself (which by a certain special mystery was a Prophetic nation), and in other nations, before he came in the flesh. For when some are mentioned in the holy Hebrew books from the time of Abraham, neither from the stock of his flesh, nor from the people of Israel, nor from adventitious society in the people of Israel, who nevertheless were participants of this sacrament—why should we not believe that even in other nations on this side and that, others were so, although we do not read them mentioned in the same authorities?" Concerning the just men and Prophets before circumcision or the divinely instituted law, indeed, there are many sufficiently authentic and famous Histories.

Concerning Job also there is a celebrated and well-known History, whence Augustine in De Civitate Dei XVIII.⁴⁸ says: "Nor do I think the Jews themselves dare to contend that no one belonged to God except the Israelites, from the time when the lineage of Israel began to be, with his elder brother having been reprov'd. For there was indeed no other people which would properly be called the people of God; but they cannot deny that certain men, by no earthly but a heavenly society, belonging to the true Israelites, citizens of the supernal fatherland, were also in other nations. For if they deny it, they are most easily convinced concerning the holy and wonderful man Job, who was neither a native nor a Proselyte (that is, a stranger come into the people of Israel), but drawing his lineage from the Idumean nation, born there, and there having died; who is so praised by divine eloquence that, as far as pertains to justice and piety, no man of his times is equal to him. Although we do not find his times in the Chronicles, we gather, however, from his book (which the Israelites for the merit of it received into Canonical authority) that he was three generations later than Israel. I do not doubt that it was divinely provided that from this one we might know that even through other nations there could have been those who lived according to God and pleased him, belonging to the spiritual Israel—which is to be believed granted to no one except him to whom there has been divinely revealed the one Mediator of God and men, the man Christ Jesus."

The same author, On the Perfection of the Justice of Men, ch. 32, says "that the just men of old believed in Christ, helped by his grace, so that, rejoicing, they foreknew him, and certain ones even foretold that he would come; some in the people of Israel, such as Moses, and Joshua son of Nun, and Samuel, and David, and others such; some outside that people, such as Job; some before that people, such as Abraham, such as Noah, and whoever others there are whom divine Scripture either commemorates or passes over in silence."

Concerning the salutary penance of Nebuchadnezzar and his conversion to God through the preaching of Daniel and the divine scourge, the History of Daniel teaches; whence Augustine in On the Predestination and Grace of God (which is the fifth among his Sermons), ch. 17, says: "That Nebuchadnezzar, after innumerable impieties, having been scourged, did penance, and merited fruitful penance, but Pharaoh by no means; and that these two had different ends"—which is also recited in the Canon, causa 23, quaestio 4, Nabuchodonosor. Concerning Darius also, this seems to appear in the history of Daniel.

Concerning the noble Alexander, this is also reasonably to be estimated, especially because he had been educated in the doctrine of that most renowned Philosopher and his Master, Aristotle, who knew and evidently taught that there is a true God, who is all the highest good, the first efficient cause, the first form, and the ultimate end of all things—as his Philosophical books make manifest. Josephus also in Antiquities XI, last chapter, recites how, when Alexander, indignant after the capture of Gaza, hastened toward Jerusalem, God commanded Jaddua the High Priest, after supplication and sacrifices offered to God, by him and the people while sleeping, that he should trust, and adorn the city with garlands, and forthwith open the gates, and that others should go forth to meet him with white garments, but that he himself and the rest of the Priests should go forth with their lawful robes, hoping to suffer nothing savage, since God was providing—which they did. And he adds: "But the Phoenicians and Chaldeans following the King thought that whatever the imperial fury could permit against the city, he himself would commit, and that he would afflict the High Priest with the highest contumelies; but it happened to fall out otherwise. For Alexander, providing the multitude clad in white garments, the Priests in linen robes, but the High Priest in a hyacinth and golden robe, having on his head a tiara, and on it a golden plate, on which the name of God was written, approached alone, and adored the divinity, and first venerated the High Priest. While all the Jews with one voice were saluting Alexander, the surrounding Kings of Syria and the rest, seeing him doing this, were stupefied, and thought the King's mind was corrupted. But Parmenio alone interrogated him, saying: 'Why, when all are adoring you, do you yourself adore the High Priest of the Jewish nation?' To whom he replied: 'I have not adored him, but the God whose principate of the priesthood he has been made. For I beheld him in such a habit through a dream, while still established in Dios, a city of Macedonia; and when I had been thinking with myself that I could conquer Asia, he urged me not at all to neglect this, but to cross over confidently. For he said that he would lead my army across, and would deliver up the power of the Persians; and therefore, seeing no other in such a robe, when I had perceived this one, having the memory of the nocturnal vision and proof, I saluted him. Hence I judge that I, beloved by divine help, both conquered Darius and broke the strength of the Persians. Therefore I trust that all things which were hoped for in my heart will come to pass.' And after Parmenio had spoken, honoring the High Priest, with the rest of the Priests running up, he came as far as the city, and ascending to the temple, sacrificed to God according to the showing of the Priest; and to the High Priest himself and to the rest of the Priests he munificently gave many things."

It might also perhaps be responded somewhat otherwise, and somewhat similarly, by saying that certain ones adoring idols by no means adored them for their own sake, but only for the sake of God and the divine virtues, according to the last response of the twenty-first part—just as we also adore the images of Christ, of God, of the Trinity, of Angels, and of holy men. Therefore it also seems that God could not unfittingly have heard them in their tribulations crying out, and miraculously aided them if it was necessary.

Furthermore, somewhat otherwise and somewhat similarly perhaps it might be said: that certain Idolaters truly knew and worshipped the supreme God, but under the name and idol of the god Jove, as appears from the premises around the sixteenth part of this work; and nonetheless, besides him, they worshipped certain other idols, dedicated to holy Angels, men, or demons—not, however, finally for the sake of the idols themselves, nor finally for the sake of those of whom they were idols, but because they are creatures and servants and instruments of God, executing his will in prosperous and adverse things concerning men—so that thus in them and through them they might finally adore God, just as we adore God for himself, and his holy Angels and men, and their images, finally for the sake of God. And although perhaps in the manner of worshipping God they erred from simple ignorance, not from certain malice, nevertheless loving him above all things according to the doctrine of the thirtieth part of this work, and willing to know, and applying due diligence as to what worship and manner of worshipping was pleasing and acceptable to God, and prepared to observe that worship and manner once known, in the meantime they honored him according to their knowledge and conscience—God, regarding these things piously and discretely, spared their ignorance and simplicity, and accepted their sincere love, holy intention, and benevolent will. This seems consonant with reason. For it does not seem that the most just and most pious One (as the first supposition, third part, and fourth attest) requires more from man than he has received, and than is in man's power; rather, that he accepts that, if it is offered with due intention.

Does it not also, according to the common opinion of the Philosophers and according to anyone's natural judgment, seem that one deliberately proposing to give something—say, gold—and applying the requisite diligence, but deceived, gives brass in place of it (which, if he knew, he would by no means do)—does he not seem to give not brass but gold, and is he not deservedly reputed liberal? Just as conversely. For the Philosopher says in Ethics IV.2: "That which is liberal is not in the multitude of things given, but in the disposition of the giver." And above, III.4: "But the involuntary being that which is by force and on account of ignorance, the voluntary will indeed seem to be that whose principle is in the one knowing the singulars in which the operation lies." And below, VI.10: "We say that some performing just acts are by no means just, such as those doing the things ordained by the laws either unwillingly, or on account of ignorance, or on account of some other thing, and not for their own sake—although they perform indeed what is fitting and as much as is fitting and what the worthy man does; but it appears that there is a certain manner of being so disposed in performing each thing, as that one might be good. I mean, for instance, on account of choice, and for the sake of the things performed themselves. Right choice, therefore, virtue makes; but whatever things are by nature suited to be done for the sake of that choice are not of virtue, but of another power. We must, however, speak more manifestly to those who know about these things. There is, then, a certain power which they call deinotēs [cleverness], and this is such that, with respect to the supposed intention, it can perform the things conducing to it and obtain them. If therefore the intention be good, it is praiseworthy; if perverse, it is craftiness."

Does not the Apostle also seem to mean this when he says: "When the Gentiles who do not have the law naturally do those things which are of the law, they having no law are a law to themselves; who show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience bearing witness to them, and their thoughts among themselves alternately accusing or even defending, on the day when God shall judge the secrets of men"? Does not Truth itself say: "If thy eye be single, thy whole body shall be lightsome"? Whence Augustine in On the Sermon of the Lord on the Mount II.21 says: "By eye here we ought to understand that very intention by which we do whatever we do. If it be clean and right, and looking at that which ought to be looked at, all our works which we work according to it must necessarily be good. He has called all our works the whole body, because the Apostle also calls certain operations our members, which he disapproves and commands to be mortified, saying: 'Mortify your members which are upon the earth, fornication, uncleanness, avarice,' and other such. Therefore not what each man does, but with what mind he does it, is to be considered." And the same author on the title of Psalm 31 says: "Intention makes a good work; faith directs the intention. Do not greatly attend to what a man does, but to what he looks at when he does it." And in his 83 Questions, q. 27, he says that the wicked, through whom that which they do not know is brought about, do not receive the reward of justice, which is referred to God, but of their own malevolence; just as it is not imputed to good men that, when they wish to be of profit to themselves, harm comes to someone, but the reward of benevolence is bestowed for a good intention.

Moreover, in his little book On the Dishonest Familiarity of Women, he writes thus: "The will prone to do is reputed for the work of the deed." Which the laws also seem to wish, saying: "By will and purpose evil deeds are to be distinguished." Does not Ambrose in De Officiis I say: "Your affection imposes a name upon your work"? And Jerome in his epistle to Paulinus on all the books of divine history thus says: "Not what you find, but what you seek, do we consider." For who can rationally say that a sincere will of serving the Lord, according to the doctrine of the thirtieth part, is not right and reasonably to be accepted, even though in the manner of serving an unwilling error creeps in?

Why else would Seneca be placed in the Catalogue of saints? For Blessed Jerome, On Illustrious Men, ch. 12, and the preface placed before Seneca's epistle, thus writes: "Lucius Annaeus Seneca of Cordoba, disciple of Photion the Stoic, and uncle of the Poet Lucan, was of most continent life, whom I would not place in the Catalogue of Saints, except that those Epistles, which are read by very many, of Paul to Seneca and of Seneca to Paul, provoke me. In them, although he was Nero's master and most powerful in that time, he says he wishes to be of that place among his own people which Paul is among the Christians. He was killed by Nero two years before Peter and Paul were crowned with martyrdom."

Does not also, according to the Canon Laws, on this account error in person and in condition dissolve a marriage already contracted? Does not also for this reason one approaching another's wife in ignorance, whom he reputes to be his own, become excused from adultery? Is it not written in this manner: "Error of person and of condition does not admit consent of marriage. For if anyone should bargain to sell a field to Marcellus, and afterward Paul should come saying that he is Marcellus, and should buy the field from him, has this man come to an agreement with Paul about the price, or is he to be said to have sold him the field? Likewise, if anyone should promise to sell me gold, and should offer me brass for gold, and thus deceive me—am I to be said to have consented to brass? Did I will to buy brass? Nor at any time did I consent to that, because consent is only of the will. Just as, therefore, here error of matter excludes consent to the purchase, so also in marriage error of person. For he did not consent to this man, but to him whom he thought this man to be."

That error of person also excuses some is proved by that authority by which a wife's sister is reported to have gone (with both, namely the sister and the husband, unknowing) into his bed, and to have been known by her sister's husband: who nevertheless is judged to remain forever without hope of marriage; but he who knew her is excused on account of ignorance. Otherwise also this is proved: The Devil sometimes transforms himself into an Angel of light, nor is the error perilous if then he is believed to be good, when he simulates himself good. If then he should ask of some simple person whether he wished to be a participant of his beatitude, and that one should respond that he wished to pass into his fellowship—is he to be said to have consented to the fellowship of diabolical damnation, or rather to the participation of eternal brightness?

Likewise, if anyone of the heretics under the name of Augustine, or Ambrose, or Jerome, should offer himself to some Catholic, and provoke him to a change of his faith, if he should give consent—into whose faith and opinion would he be said to have consented? Not into the sect of the heretics, but into the integrity of the Catholic faith, which that heretic was lying that he held. Therefore, just as she who, deceived by error in person, did not consent to this man, but to him whom he was lying himself to be, it is plain that she was not his spouse." This same opinion with the same examples the Theological Doctors also profess.

I believe constantly, however, that God, pious and just, reveals the religion due and necessary for salvation—namely, the Christian religion, implicitly or expressly—at some time to everyone loving him above all things and willing efficaciously to venerate him with due worship and manner, and persistently applying due diligence. For many Jews and Gentiles lucidly foresaw that Christ would come, and prophetically foretold it, as not a few histories testify, and as the foregoing has touched upon. For how shall God—who, by the first Supposition and the following parts, and many Philosophers attesting, provides even for the vilest inanimate things and beasts—abandon man without providence? And he who, by the 27th part with the following, and the demonstrations of these, and many histories proving, sometimes graciously provides things necessary for salvation to men nowhere seeking God, but indeed even contemning him—how will he deny necessary things to those who piously and perseveringly seek and worship him according to their knowledge and power, turn his face away, despise, cast off, and repel them?

I also truly think that very many infidels apply no diligence, or none that is due, to inquiring after and knowing the due worship of God; rather, even if to them, while negligent, by divine inspiration, reason, or human preaching, it should gratuitously be revealed and evidently appear that our law is better than theirs—or even that our law is true but theirs erroneous—hardened by a certain pertinacious pride they refuse to bow their proud necks, refuse to abandon the ancient sect, refuse to admit the better, refuse to acquiesce to truth; but they resist with all their power, contradict, and oppose. For I conferred recently with a certain learned and very famous Jew about his conversion to the faith of Christ, and after other matters, asking him to pray to his God devoutly that he might illumine his heart and show him truly which law was better and more acceptable before him. He responded to me that he would never do this, because this would be in some way to doubt his law, and somewhat to hesitate. I asked whether he wished that I should so pray for him to his God and mine in common, namely the great God, and that I would gladly pray. He immediately responded "no," for the cause of doubt aforesaid. Then I said: "You do not wish to pray for yourself, nor permit, nor have it pleasing, that I pray for you—pray, I beg, for me in the manner aforesaid"—so that thus at least I might provoke his contumacious hardness to the benefit of prayer. He, peremptorily refusing, said, "I know that you will never be a good Jew," and added, "and if you wish to doubt your law, I do not wish to doubt mine."

Furthermore and otherwise, it can also be truly said that certain miracles are fantastical, delusory, and Diabolical; certain ones true. The Magi of Pharaoh in Egypt performed delusory miracles, as is recited in Exodus, and such were the miracles among Idolatrous Infidels—and this is the response of Augustine in De Civitate Dei X.16, treating of such miracles. You will perhaps object that in the same way the Infidels can speak of Christian miracles. I confess it, and they have so spoken. And if you should ask, how then can they be refuted? I respond: if they say this universally of all miracles of Christians, they can be refuted as before; if particularly—say, of certain marvelous delusions perhaps reputed for true miracles among certain Christians—they are perhaps not to be refuted. And if you should further ask how these can be discerned, I respond that probably it is by the circumstances, and by the probable conjectures concurring, by the sanctity of life, by the manner of believing, loving, praying, and obtaining the miracle, and by the manner of the obtained miracle, and other such things, which are not easy to enumerate; but with certitude, by divine illumination and inspiration, and by the gift of the Holy Spirit, which by the Apostle is called the discretion of Spirits. For God can do this, by the seventh part of this work; and it greatly befits him to do this for Christians loving and worshipping him according to the doctrine of the 30th part of this work; and if not always and generally for all Christians, yet for those whom it concerns to judge concerning miracles—say, the highest Priests and the princes of Priests, when necessity or opportunity requires this, as in performing the Canonization of some saint.

Nor is this to be wondered at: for in many histories we find that God revealed many things concerning themselves and their principates to many gentile princes—concerning Pharaoh King of Egypt, Genesis 41; concerning Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon, Daniel 2 and 4; concerning Belshazzar his successor, Daniel 5; concerning Alexander King of the Greeks, Antiquities XI, last chapter, as is recited above; concerning Genghis Khan, the first king of the Tartars, in the Histories of the Tartars, as was touched on above; concerning Agamemnon King of the Greeks and the dream which he had seen concerning instituting battle, and which he reported in the Greek Council. Homer writes that Nestor, a man of great prudence, reconciling faith to his report, responded that "concerning the public state, a royal dream is to be believed"; and Macrobius recites this On the Dream of Scipio. Did not Caiaphas also, although he was a malign Pontiff of the Jews, touched by the Spirit of God, truly prophesy? How much more worthily, then, is it fitting that God impart such gifts of his Spirit to our supreme Prince, our supreme Pontiff?

Furthermore, the Gentiles and their Philosophers will perhaps respond, saying that even if our law is good, and better than any other positive law whatsoever, the law of nature alone—namely, of natural reason, of conscience or synderesis—suffices for anyone to regulate him in all things, for doing all things. But if our law is good and best, it is also true; and in it is contained expressly that "he who has not believed, as it teaches, will be damned." Likewise, if our law is positively good and best, it is also more perfect than the law of nature alone: for it contains the whole perfection of that, and adds to it; it supplies its insufficiencies and corrects its defects. Why then do you not choose and hold it?

Furthermore, if the law of nature alone sufficed for man for whatsoever, why would God (who, by the first supposition and third part, and you yourselves attesting, does nothing in vain) have given another law and other laws—the old and the new—as the premises attest, especially since each is more difficult to know and more laborious to fulfill? For what wise person does anything through more, for which fewer suffice—as natural reason and all Philosophers concordantly attest, and as was touched on above—unless perhaps it be done more becomingly, more usefully, and better through more? But if this is true of positive laws, and especially the Christian, why do you not accept and hold it?

The Gentile Philosophers also, supposing themselves to follow natural reason, were frequently seduced by a thin shadow and fallacious and lying image of phantastical reason, irrationally erring—as the truest reason, and their very frequent contradiction, clearly teaches. How then does so irregular, so disordered a rule, and so fallacious, suffice for man to direct him in all things? Does not God—who by the first Supposition, third part, and second Supposition attesting, is proved to be the sincere, supreme, and first truth—love and accept truth more than falsehood, true rather than false service, rectitude rather than error, especially concerning religion and divine worship? Does not, according to the 30th part of this work, God alone for his own sake be loved above all things most efficaciously, and worshipped most devoutly? How then, on account of the error of irrational reason and seduced conscience, does it make no difference whether one renders this worship to the true God, or to Demons or idols?

Did not the Gentile Philosophers—the true Philosophers—reprove idols, and judge that one true God ought to be worshipped? But to what fruit, if it avails as much to worship an idol as God? Why, moreover, I ask, do the Philosophers spend such laborious diligence concerning the cognition of truth, if falsehood and truth weigh equally, are equally valid, bring forth equal fruit for whomsoever, provided only they act according to their consciences? Where error is worse and graver, is not a rectifying law proved more necessary? And who is ignorant that error toward God and concerning divine worship is worse and graver than toward man, and concerning human polity? And here also through the Gentile Philosophers themselves very many laws are established. How, then, is another law not necessary concerning God and divine worship?

Therefore Aristotle, Politics VII.9, enumerating the necessary parts of a city, says: "Especially those things which concern divine care, which they call the Priesthood." And Plato and the other Gentile Philosophers consent in this part. If also reason alone naturally suffices for man for doing all things, why are so many human laws also vainly established by the Philosophers themselves? Did not Plato write many books on laws? Aristotle on Ethics and Politics many? Tully on the Republic many books? And many other Gentile Philosophers many books on similar matter?

Furthermore, Philosophers, hear me a little patiently. Just as a householder can, in his little house; just as a political Prince in his little city; just as a king in his little kingdom can establish laws for his subjects—laws, I say, positive, arbitrary, and voluntary, which they who shall keep will be rewarded, and they who shall not keep them or shall condemn them will lack rewards and pay due punishments—so also why can not God, the supreme householder in his greatest house, the supreme Prince in his greatest principate, and the supreme King of kings in his greatest kingdom, establish that whoever shall keep the Christian law receive eternal glory, and they who shall not keep it but condemn it lack glory and incur eternal damnation? He could indeed, and did, as the foregoing makes manifest.

You err also, Philosophers, in not seeing original sin, the original ineptitude for future life in all men. Could not God have established for the first man such a law, that if he obeyed the divine commands in all things, he would have eternal beatitude; but if not, both he himself and his whole succession the privation of beatitude and eternal misery, unless he himself or some of his sons should make competent satisfaction? For so can a man, an earthly Prince, promise or give a city to anyone. With which law established, if that first man should sin against the divine command, would not all that progeny become reprobate, and be held unsuited to eternal life? But that this happened thus is gathered from the Christian law. Whatever therefore you may do, according to your natural ingenuity, unless you make satisfaction, you do nothing for obtaining future glory, the aforesaid law obstructing.

You will say perhaps that it is easy to make satisfaction to God for sin. But is not making satisfaction to God for sin knowingly committed against him, to render something as much or greater as the sin ought not to have been committed—especially if one acts strictly and rigorously with the sinner? For otherwise he does not fully restore the honor of God contemptibly violated, nor does he do enough, but less or nothing; therefore neither does he fully placate the offended one. But who can render to God so much, since by the 30th part of this work no sin ought to be committed knowingly against God for any goods whatsoever to be preserved or gained, or any penal evils whatsoever, had to be removed, or not had to be guarded against?

You will say perhaps that the sinner is excused through impotence. But although perhaps through impotence he is excused from a new continually proper sin (in not rendering what he owes), yet not from the ancient debt and sin, nor is he rendered fit for eternal beatitude, the aforesaid law forbidding. What also would the Philosopher say, if God should will that no man have the consortium of Angels in eternal beatitude and incomparable felicity, except one similar to Angels, innocent and virgin from sin, and generated from such innocents and virgins—however much the sinner might satisfy for sin? For a virgin culpably deflowered, even if she should make satisfaction however much, is not however restored a virgin.

Furthermore, perhaps you will say that God can simply remit every sin without any satisfaction to the sinner; but this does not stand in the way: for although he could do this, nevertheless he will not do this according to the aforesaid law. If he could also do this, he could simply remit sin unpunished, against the 31st part. It also seems not improbably, according to Philosophical reasons, that if man is now a sinner and afterward will be just, this will be brought about by some change—and not in God, on account of the sixth part premised, nor in something impertinent, because this would seem impertinent—therefore in the sinner himself. But this change is satisfaction for sin, or seems to be not without satisfaction.

And according to all who truly Philosophize, every evil—namely, pure malice and sin—is not some positive thing, but a privation or lack of a good thing, or of some goodness; but a privation in a fit subject cannot fully be removed, except through the full positing of the habit which it deprived. For no medium can be found there. And if you should ask, who therefore can or could exhibit so much satisfaction for the sin of man, I say that Christ, simultaneously God and man, is most sufficient in every respect, as the first supposition with the following parts clearly proves, as also the law of the Jews predicted, and the law of the Christians truly professes. What therefore remains, except that you all become Christians, that you may be made participants of this satisfaction?

CHAPTER 33. AGAINST PHILOSOPHERS DENYING THE POSSIBILITY OF CREATION, ANNIHILATION, AND RECREATION.

Let the Philosophers repudiate that foolish little Harlot, whom under the appearance of wisdom they have for too long loved cloaked, fallaciously lying that creation, annihilation, and recreation are not possible. For God, according to the first supposition, the fifth part, and the seventh, is supremely perfect, sufficient, powerful, and efficacious, in such measure that nothing more perfect, more sufficient, more powerful, or more efficacious could be. And is it not to be reckoned more perfect, more sufficient, more powerful, and more efficacious to make something by one's own power alone out of nothing, than out of preexisting matter necessarily required? Likewise, if God is of infinitely greater power and efficacy than any created effective cause, why can he not, proportionally, produce a stronger and greater effect, or a stronger and greater mode of effecting, according to natural Philosophical rules? Why therefore can he not create?

Furthermore, according to the eighth part premised, God has a universally efficacious will; therefore, even if there had never been any matter, nor anything besides him, and if he willed something else really to be, it would forthwith be. Furthermore, according to the first supposition and the third part of this work, whatever essential and intrinsic thing worthy of God is attributed to him, if it can be held without contradiction, must necessarily not be denied. And is not the power to create thus attributed to God? And can it not most easily be defended from all contradiction? Therefore the creation of things is possible; therefore also annihilation and recreation in like manner, the possibility of which can likewise be demonstrated.

Annihilation also, especially, granted creation, is easily persuaded: For far be it that a slender created work should be more powerful for remaining than the omnipotent Maker for destroying, if he willed; which could likewise be demonstrated of any thing of finite entity and power, even if it were not created. And does not, according to the 17th part of this work, nothing other than God necessarily exist, but its being is contingent according to contradiction? Who, therefore, does not easily see that God—since he is necessary being and omnipotent simply in every respect—can, by his absolute power, annihilate anything else?

But the possibility of creation and annihilation being admitted, who will deny the possibility of recreation? Let the Philosophers, I beg, weigh the foregoing arguments and the contrary ones of their own reason in a just balance, and I think that their own arguments will be found wanting. If however they have any arguments, let them, I ask, lay aside the blinding pride and humbly recognize themselves as fallible men—which their frequent contradiction of one another, indeed even of one and the same person against himself at different times, makes manifest—nor let them be ashamed to advance, always embracing the stronger and more beautiful argument before others, lest perhaps they be justly deprived in other matters of the name as well as the substance of Philosophers, and be called frivophiles [lovers of trifles]. Let them suppliantly observe, I pray, what valid argument would be required to reprove so great a famous opinion, which is approved by every faith and sect, and by nearly all men, especially since it is supported by such strong arguments. Therefore the Philosopher in Ethics X.2, refuting those who deny that the good is what all things desire, says: "What appears to all, this we say is so; but he who removes this faith does not say things more credible." Averroes also, on De Somno et Vigilia, says: "Things which are famous among all are necessary, either as a whole or in part." If the Philosophers, however, in this matter have no argument, why do they irrationally speak thus, especially since "God cannot create, annihilate, and recreate" is not known per se? Indeed, the contrary is famous among very many.

CHAPTER 34. AGAINST PHILOSOPHERS DENYING THE POSSIBILITY OF THE CREATION OF THE WORLD.

Let the Philosophers be put to flight who affirm that God could not have created the world. For according to the next part above, God could create some thing; why then not the world, since the world is of finite entity and power, but God simply infinite, as the first Supposition, the 3rd part, and the 4th demonstrate? God can also annihilate the world, as is plain by the next preceding part and its proof, and by the seventeenth part; and he can likewise recreate it by the same next part of this work and its demonstration; therefore he could also have created it by similar reasoning. The chief thing also which seems to stand in the way is the impossibility of creation out of nothing; but this does not stand in the way, according to the next part of this work. For who is ignorant how fragile are the other little quibbles of the Philosophers?

Nevertheless, that this may appear more evidently to all, that procedure in Physics VIII is to be a little examined, especially because, as I have heard, certain of the faithful proceeding by that procedure of the unfaithful have proceeded into the very abyss of unfaithfulness. But it appears to me—a Christian by Christ's grace—and it would even appear to me, if I were not a Christian nor a follower of any law, but only a lover of truth, that this procedure sins mortally in matter and in form.

It is granted by the Philosophers that "prior" and "before" are taken in two ways for our purpose, namely according to nature and according to time. I posit therefore against you, Aristotle and Averroes, that the world and motion began at instant A, and that there was no time, change, nor temporal succession, nor any true changeable or partible duration, great or small, before that first motion which I shall call B. I posit therefore consequently that nothing whatsoever preceded A by any temporal priority, just as nothing precedes the outermost heaven by local priority or superiority; and that this is consequent is plain through yourself, in chapter 10 of that Physics VIII, saying: "How will there be prior and posterior, with no time existing—or time, if there be no motion?" And on the other hand I posit that the eternal God, and his eternal wisdom and will, preceded A by priority of nature, as cause precedes the caused.

When therefore you, Aristotle, throughout that whole procedure, suppose that the non-being of any made thing necessarily precedes its being—and this speaking of temporal precedence, as you intimate in chapter 10—and you, Averroes, expressly say this same thing in your eighteenth comment, and likewise in the fifteenth and others suppose this: behold, how impudently you beg in the beginning what finally you ought to prove, namely that before A and B there was a temporal priority, which necessarily, as you yourself say, follows or imports some motion. Here therefore you sin in the form of proving, and likewise in the matter: for this supposition of yours is repugnant to my true position which I posited first.

And by the same response it can easily be answered to all such things which you argue and ask in arguing: "If God made the world at A and B, then it began, this was through some new volition which he had then and not before, or on account of some new disposition in the agent or patient, or in some other way, or on account of the removal of something, which not being removed, he was unwilling to operate; or at least on account of the presence of the hour or instant in which or at which he disposed before always to make then for the first time the world and motion; and none of these was without change; therefore before B, the first change, another prior change occurred." Behold how you always suppose that before A there was changeable and long temporal succession, which you ought to prove; for I posited the opposite of this in the first place. When also you ask, or it is asked on your behalf, why God made the world at A and not before—behold how you intimate that before A there was something prior by temporal priority, which is not true. But it is similar as if you should ask why heaven is terminated at its convexity, and not above.

It is plain likewise how that does not follow against me which you reckon a great impossibility, namely "that from an ancient will a new action proceeds immediately." For the eternal will of God, by which he made the world, is not more ancient than the world by an ancientness or property of time, but of nature; nor is the world newer or later by time than this will, but by nature. You will perhaps reply here, saying: "By the same reasoning, God is not more ancient than the world; and the world began to be and is not eternal; therefore neither is God; or if God did not begin but is eternal, the world likewise."

I concede to you that God is not more ancient than the world by an ancientness of actual time. And further when you say, "therefore God began to be," it does not follow. And if you say, "To begin to be is to be now and never before to have been; but God was at A and never before"—here I say, if you intend to define "to begin to be" convertibly through "to be now and never before to have been," and if you understand by "never before to have been" actually—namely, through no actual preceding time—you do not rightly define. Rather, "to begin to be" is "to be now and never before to have been habitually or potentially"—namely, that even if time had been before, still it would not have been in that time. And thus the world began at A; because although time had actually been before, the world would not have been in it (just as the soul of Peter was not in time before its creation). But God did not thus begin to be at A, because however much time there had been before, God necessarily would have been in it; but the fact that he was not earlier in time is because time was lacking to him, not he to time, if there had been time.

And by the same response it is plain regarding the other part of your conclusion, which is that God is not eternal. For the eternal is what is without beginning and ceasing, in the manner aforesaid. For just as the immensity of God is not determined or restricted by the fact that he is actually only in some determined place, namely in the world and not outside (according to the opinion of certain Philosophers and your own), because he would necessarily coexist universally with however much greater extent if there were any: so neither is his eternity confined by the brevity of time. If, however, you understand "eternal" not as the rest of men do, but in your own way, that is, "through all actual time," it can be conceded that the world is eternal, just as you, Aristotle, seem to define the eternal—or rather to allege the definition of it from the Ancients, in De Caelo I.100, saying: "This name 'eternal' was divinely uttered by the Ancients. For the limit which contains the time of each thing, of which nothing is outside according to nature, is called the eternal of each thing. According to the same reasoning, also the limit of the whole heaven, and the perfection containing all time and infinity, is the eternal, taking its denomination from 'always being.'"

I might also, according to your folly, perhaps respond to you otherwise, supposing according to your Logic (in Peri Hermeneias I) that "the verb consignifies time," and concede to you the proposition: "God began to be"—namely, to be in time or in an instant, or temporally or instantaneously, just as he began to be Lord of time and of all temporal things whatsoever. For at A, God was instantaneously and not before; nor does it follow from this that God is not eternal but new, nor that he is changed but they (i.e., the things), as is sufficiently established from what was said before.

Furthermore perhaps you will confront me, eager to argue sophistically, that the world is altogether co-eternal with God, as I was speaking, because if God made the world at some first instant, he could have made it not at some first instant but immediately after an instant, if any instant had preceded—just as he made motion and time immediately after the first instant. And if he had thus made the world with motion and time, the world would have been eternal. For it would never have begun intrinsically nor extrinsically: for it would have been in no first instant, nor at any instant would it not have been such that immediately after that instant it would have been; rather, before any instant whatsoever it would have been, as is plain inductively concerning each instant, and now the world is not of less duration than it would have been then; therefore now it is eternal.

To this argument of sophistical folly, it would not be needful otherwise to respond, except for the counsel of the wise man, "lest such a fool, sophisticating, seem wise to himself." For such, according to the Apostle, "saying themselves to be wise, became fools." First therefore I shall chastise you with your own sword: for you posit that surfaces terminate bodies. Let it therefore be posited by the omnipotence of God, and according to the next preceding part of this work, or as you posit similar things, or at least as in many places you argue conditionally from such things, that with the whole heaven preserved its convex surface is destroyed; or let it be argued conditionally in your manner. If that surface were destroyed with the heaven preserved, the heaven would be simply infinite. For it would not be terminated intrinsically nor extrinsically, since by no surface, as is plain.

Further, however, out of abundance, I respond and say that the world is not eternal, but began to be—and this extrinsically, not actually, in the sense that some time or instant actually immediately preceded it; but habitually, as has been said before. Because if there had been eternal time, the age of the world being supposed in some instant of it, the world would necessarily have begun extrinsically; and that it did not thus actually begin is not on account of the antiquity of the world, but on account of the defect of preceding time. But perhaps not even thus will you cease to chatter, but you will say: even if before the world there was no true time, there was at least imaginary time, and the arguments proceed concerning such fictitious time, just as concerning the true.

Here, however, I say (just as you, Aristotle, in Metaphysics IV prove) that things do not follow imagination or estimation. Hence however much someone imagines time before the world, no time was thereby any more there before, just as on account of no imagination of anyone is there any place or time outside the heaven, on your own testimony in De Caelo I.100, thus speaking: "It is therefore manifest that neither place, nor void, nor time is outside."

Furthermore, that I may confound you with greater shame, and thus, with truth itself leading, lead you back to the recognition of truth: Let it be posited according to your gross and rude imagination that before the world there was eternal succession of such kind, true or fictitious; I say then that at instant A of that succession God voluntarily produced the world, and that B—the first new change, or first new motion, which no new change preceded except perhaps the parts of that eternal succession posited by you—then began. And when you argue, "therefore God then or immediately before had some new disposition which he did not have before, by means of which he then produced the world and B, and not before; therefore that was acquired by him through some new prior change; therefore before B, the first new change, was another prior new change"—I say that this argument proceeds concerning an irrational agent, but not a rational one, as you, Aristotle, in Metaphysics IX.10 taught, where, the distinction of powers through rational and irrational being posited, and one difference between them assigned, you assigned another, namely that when irrational active and passive powers, with their due dispositions, are brought near to each other, it is necessary that this one act and that one suffer; but with rational powers it is not so. Which you, Averroes, there in comment 10 most plainly attest. Therefore a rational and voluntary agent most disposed to acting can wait through time and times, even through eternal time, and at length newly act without any preceding change. Therefore your progress between Physics VIII (where you did not see this) and Metaphysics IX (where you saw this and revealed it to others to see, and retracted your former defect) I greatly praise and commend.

But lest perhaps your authority on account of variation seem suspect, I shall show this same thing through reason. For if it were not so, there would be no power freely contradictorily for acting. For if there be such, let A be its first free act. Either then, with all things necessarily prerequisite and sufficient for the production of A being posited, A is necessarily produced, or not. If so, since to posit all those is not free—because A is the first free act, and with those posited A will necessarily be posited—neither will the positing of A be free, nor in the free power of the producer. Likewise, if with the free active cause posited, with all the necessary and sufficient prerequisite dispositions, the effect's being produced necessarily follows, since to posit it thus is not in its free power but somehow necessary; and in every necessary consequence, if the antecedent is necessary, the consequent will likewise be necessary, not free, and contingent: no act will freely be produced, nor will rational power be freer than irrational. For a free act is never produced except by a rational disposed cause, as has been said.

If, however, with those posited, A is not necessarily produced, then that free power, with all those things standing always uniformly in every way, can freely wait through time and times, and at length newly produce A without any preceding change which makes anything around itself. For before, it was sufficiently disposed to producing A, and now it is altogether as it was then; therefore even now it can sufficiently produce A, and through the whole intermediate time it could have produced it. And if you ask, "Why then does it produce A now and not before?"— certain ones respond, "Because it wills." Their response I do not approve. For let A be the first free volition; then it does not produce A because it wills, by the same volition, because then the same volition would naturally precede itself; nor by another volition, because then A would not be the first, and because then the same question would return concerning that other volition, and thus would proceed infinitely.

I say therefore that he who asks "why etc." asks for a cause; the efficient cause, however, is that free power; because therefore it is an active rational and free power, it freely then produces; the final cause, however, is the end which it sets before itself in acting. I know, however, that you seek a cause which you cannot find, namely one which, being posited, determinately and necessarily it would follow—which is not true in active rational powers, as both authority and reason have taught. But supposing this as most true through that whole procedure of Physics VIII, you most disgracefully limp from the paths of truth. And Avicenna in Metaphysics IX.1, and Algazel in Metaphysics IV.1, likewise supposing this, fell into your opinion.

In another respect also you seem to demonstrate to yourselves most certainly, and this universally concerning every power, whether rational or irrational, as you, Averroes, in comment 9 manifestly assert. For, the first change being given, you argue that another was prior to this first one; you, Averroes, formulating Aristotle's argument thus: "Movement and mover are in the category 'in relation to something'; and since at some time this does not move and that is not moved, and after, this moves and that is moved, it is manifest that between these things a relation came to be which was not before; and every relation follows a transmutation: therefore it is necessary that before the transmutation posited there be some transmutation in the mover and in the moved, or in both, or in something extrinsic—for example, that there be some impediment which is removed."

But behold how disgracefully you rave: for when you suppose that every relation follows a prior motion or change, either you understand the consequence of relation and the priority of change as temporal or as natural. If as temporal, you suppose badly: for the relation between a rational agent and a patient does not necessarily follow a temporally preceding change, as the foregoing has taught, but sometimes arises temporally or instantaneously, and rises up together with its first action, or with its first acting, although it naturally follows after. But speaking of natural consequence and priority, you do not have even the color of slender appearance.

I have also specifically against you, Averroes, that no thinking or imagining of the presence of time or instant is necessarily required, as you in comments 8 and 15 seem to suppose. For we do many things when we least think about the presence of time, nor do we count the instants; or if this happens, we do many things not on account of the presence or imagination of this or those, just as we do not act on account of the presence of an ape or any other irrelevant things whatsoever. God however, who does nothing in any way casually, but by his infinite wisdom sweetly disposes all things, never has done, does, nor will do anything at any time or instant unless he disposed from eternity to do that thing then; and therefore from eternity he disposed to make the world at instant A, and made it at A without any preceding transmutation, except perhaps in that eternal succession or its parts which you posit.

And when you say in comment 8 that "this discourse is not intelligible, because when the will wills to do something at some hour, it is necessary that some concupiscence arise in the will at that hour which was not before, and that concupiscence will be the proximate cause of acting at that hour, and not before; and the cause of this concupiscence is the presence of time; and the presence of time, which was not before, is necessarily a transmutation or follows transmutation; therefore concupiscence brought about through the presence of time is a transmutation outside the first transmutation given. Therefore before the first transmutation posited is another transmutation; and a sane man cannot escape this faith by the supposition of penitence":

Here I say truly that even if I were infirm in faith, or dead from every faith, except from the faith of reason alone, it would seem to me that you, sophisticating so presumptuously and so notoriously sinning impenitently in matter and in form, would be worthy of the greatest penitence. For you sin gravely, supposing that God could not do something at a certain hour which he disposed then to do, unless he then received some new disposition by means of which he then would act, which he did not have before—which is against what was shown before. You sin also mortally against the immortal and necessary truth, intimating in that comment 8 and expressly supposing in comment 15 that "for God to understand or imagine the present time" is a transmutation following transmutation—as if otherwise on his side he understands some time when it is future, and otherwise when it is present—the opposite of which the sixth part shows; and you yourself below in the same comment 8 and elsewhere, and many other Philosophers more often, are witnesses; and that the presence of time is the cause moving the divine intellect, and effecting the intellection of the present time in him—against the 7th part of this work, and against yourself plainly on Metaphysics XII, comment 51.

You err likewise, intimating that God otherwise on his side wills some time, or anything else, when it is future, and otherwise when it is present, just as you have erred concerning divine cognition, because then he would be mutable, against the sixth part. You suppose, moreover, that the presence of time is the cause moving the divine will, and effecting concupiscence or volition in it—against the 7th part of this work. It is settled, however, according to the foregoing, that the intellect or will of God is not moved or affected by anything posterior, nor otherwise on its intrinsic side, but in like manner in every way understands and wills something firstly future, secondly present, thirdly past; and therefore just as from eternity, by eternal cognition and volition, he knew and willed to create the world at A, so also he made it through the same cognition and volition altogether unchanged precisely; and so also in time he makes any immediate effect which he makes. And if a Christian desires a Christian witness, behold Augustine, De Civitate Dei XII.17 and 14, treating this matter.

You sin also not little in the form of proving, when you argue that before the first new transmutation given another was prior, because the presence of time which was not is a necessary transmutation, or follows transmutation; for this is not against me. For I posited at first B as the first new transmutation, with the parts of that imaginary fictitious eternal succession excepted, which—you positing it—I admitted, if however those be new transmutations.

Lest, however, in what I said above—namely that no successive or partible temporal duration preceded the world—I should seem burdensome to Catholics, who are accustomed to hear frequently and to say that "God preceded the world long, eternally, or even infinitely," I shall show that it ought Catholically to be so said. For according to Catholic truth, nothing other than God had been before the world; and by the sixth part, God is altogether immutable; therefore nothing mutable, nor any mutability, was before the world; therefore neither any temporal succession or duration, which without some change cannot be understood. Likewise in every succession, one thing comes and another departs; but to God, on account of his every-mode immutability, nothing comes or departs. In God therefore there was no succession before the world, nor in anything else, since there was nothing else before. Likewise every such succession has greater and lesser parts, prior and posterior; but God, according to the 10th and 26th parts, has no such parts; therefore no such succession was before the world in God, nor in anything else, since there was nothing else before. Likewise, if it had been so, such parts could have been signed there, like hour, day, month, and year, just as in the time now running—although nothing had been before the world, by whose measure or comparison such distinction or measure could be made. Nor can anyone say that all these things—namely, mutability, coming and departing, partibility according to greater and lesser, prior and posterior, and measured distinction—were in pure non-being, since in pure non-being nothing whatsoever can be, except perhaps pure non-being.

Likewise every change, coming, and departing necessarily belongs to something actually changed, coming, and departing. For each of these is necessarily in some actual subject, as natural Philosophy teaches throughout: but no pure non-being is such. Nor does it appear why such things should be posited more in one non-being than in another; and they cannot be posited in any whatsoever; therefore in none. Likewise partibility, greatness, and smallness are properties of quantity and the quantitative; but non-being is not quantitative. Likewise by the same reason there would now be such temporal succession outside the heaven. Likewise it does not appear more that such successive quantity was before the world than permanent quantity; but this latter was not before the world. Likewise if before the world there was such temporal succession, God could have destroyed it before the creation of the world. Who therefore "has so known the mind of the Lord, or has been his counselor," that he can say "he did not destroy it"? Who also (I ask) can prove that it necessarily was so, since it was not necessarily so but could have not been so? Likewise if such temporal succession had been before the world, it would not have been needful to create time with the world; for that ancient succession would have sufficed. Likewise if so, it appears that it still endures with the present created time, and thus two times wholly distinct coexist, against the Philosopher in Physics IV expressly.

Likewise eternity alone was before the world, but in it there is no temporal succession, as is plain through Boethius, De Consolatione Philosophiae V, last prose, defining it thus: "Eternity is the whole simultaneous and perfect possession of interminable life." In the explanation of which he subsequently adds: "That is rightly said to be eternal to which no future is lacking, nor has any past flowed away." Whence he expressly adds what I posited at first, thus saying: "Nor ought God to be seen as more ancient than the things created by quantity of time, but rather by the property of his simple nature."

To which Augustine agrees on that verse of Psalm 101: "Recall me not in the midst of my days; thy years are unto generation and generation," and responding, says: "[They] which do not come and pass away, nor come for this purpose, that they should not be. For all days in this time come for this purpose, that they should not be: every hour, every month, every year—none of these stands; before it has come, it will be; when it has not come, it will not be. Therefore those eternal years of thine, thy years which are not changed unto generation and generation, will be: for thy years are not one thing and thou another; but the years of God are the eternity of God, the eternity of God is his very substance, which has nothing mutable, where nothing is past as if it were not now, nothing is future as if it were not yet. There is not there except 'is'; there is not there 'was' and 'will be': because both what was now is not, and what will be not yet is; but whatever is there, only 'is.' This eternity called us, and the Word burst forth from eternity; now eternity, now the Word, and not yet time. Why not yet time? Because time was made, since 'all things were made through him, and without him was made nothing.'" And below, on that text "In the beginning, thou, O Lord, hast founded the earth," he says: "I know thy eternity, by which thou predest all things which thou hast made."

The same author in Confessions I.6, treating that passage of the same Psalm, "Thy years shall not fail," says that the years of God are the present day of God, which is never finished nor passes away, but our years and days pass away through that present day of God. The same author below in the same work, XII.28, says: "That something precedes another by eternity, something by time, something by election, and something by origin: by eternity, as God all things; by time, as the flower the fruit; by election, as the fruit the flower; by origin, as sound the song." The same also in De Libero Arbitrio III, last chapter, expounding that verse of Psalm 83: "For one day in thy courts is better than thousands," says: "That a thousand days are understood in the mutability of time, but by the name of one day the unchangeableness of eternity is called."

This whole position also Augustine seems to hold in De Civitate Dei XII.15, when he thus says: "These dimensions of temporal spaces—namely, hours and days, months and years, which are usually and properly called times—it is manifest, began from the motion of the stars: whence also God, when he instituted these things, said, 'Let them be for signs and times, days and years.' For where there is no creature by whose mutable motions times are accomplished, times altogether cannot be. Therefore the Angels are said always to have been, because they were at all times; but they are not on that account co-eternal with God, since time, because it runs by mutability, cannot be co-eternal with immutable eternity. Wherefore if God was always Lord, he always had a creature serving his dominion—but not generated of himself, but made by him from nothing, nor co-eternal with him; he was indeed before it, although at no time without it, preceding it not by a transient space but by an abiding perpetuity." He does not, however, wish to affirm this opinion, which he thought ought to be done so that readers may see from what perils of questions they ought to restrain themselves, nor judge themselves fit for all things—which most learned doctrine of his I venerate and embrace with all reverence.

But here perhaps someone will object that Augustine in De Civitate Dei XII.12 intimates that before the creation of the world there were infinite times back, in which God ceased from that creation, and afterward newly created the world. And he says in the same place: "That God's cessation from creation, eternal back, is so great, that if there be conferred with it any however great and ineffable terminated numerosity of times, it ought not to seem as great as a very brief drop of water compared to the ocean. For of these one is exceedingly small, the other indeed incomparably great, but each finite; but of those, the other is infinite, namely that cessation of God back."

Likewise by reason: otherwise God could not have made the world earlier than he made it, for nothing had been earlier. I say therefore that these and many similar things which could be adduced should be understood as: that before the world there were many years not actually but potentially, just as outside the heaven there are infinite spaces and miles, because God could have made the world earlier through however much time, and however many years; just as he can make outside the heaven spaces and miles above every terminated number. Whence Augustine himself, in De Genesi contra Manichaeos I.3, to the Manicheans asking, "If God made heaven and earth at some beginning of time, what was he doing before he made heaven and earth, what suddenly pleased him to make what he had not made through eternal times?", responds thus: "To these we respond that God made heaven and earth in the beginning of time, but in Christ, since the Word was with the Father, through whom all things were made; but even let us believe that God made heaven and earth without a beginning of time. We must indeed understand that before the beginning of time there was no time: for God made even times, and therefore before he made times, there were no times. For we cannot say that there was some time when God had not yet made anything. How then was there time which God had not made, since he himself is the fabricator of all time? And if time began to be with heaven and earth, no time can be found when God had not yet made heaven and earth." And in chapter 4 he immediately adds: "When, however, it is said, 'What suddenly pleased him,' it is said as if some times had passed in which God had wrought nothing; time could not pass before, which God had not yet made, because he cannot be the operator of times unless he is before times."

The reason that has been made argues irrationally and takes an irrational cause. For although before the world there was nothing prior by priority of time, there could nevertheless have been something through the creation of God, in which he could have likewise created the world earlier.

The other arguments of yours, Aristotle, and of Averroes, fabricated for the eternity of the world—since they scarcely attain the grade of appearance and sophistical altercation—I have judged it superfluous studiously to discuss; indeed all your arguments speaking for the eternity of the world are scarcely shaded fallaciously by even some thin color of sophistical ostentation; so that they scarcely deserve to enter into the scrutiny of disputation.

Are you not, Aristotle, impudently contemning and procaciously impugning the doctrines of your Master Plato and the rest of the prior Philosophers, and especially in this part—according to your own manner of speaking—deservedly to be called the "beater of the Fathers," as their writings and yours luculently show? Is it not for this reason that Chalcidius, on the second of Plato's Timaeus, says of you thus: "This man, by a certain manner of his own, when something seems good to him from a full and perfect dogma, neglects the rest with fastidious carelessness."

I shall also cite you yourself against yourself as a witness, in De Caelo et Mundo II.80: "They seem," you say, "to seek up to a certain point, but not indeed up to the point where doubt is possible. For this is customary to all of us: not to make the question relevant to the matter, but to him who speaks contraries." Likewise in your Topics I, intimating that the question of the eternity of the world is a "neuter problem," you write thus: "But there are problems concerning which there are contrary syllogisms; they have doubt whether they are so or not so, because there are verisimilar reasons on either side; and concerning which we have no reason, since they are great, judging it difficult to assign one—as whether the world is eternal or not. For someone may ask such a question." Whence Galen, in some book of his treating this matter, as Averroes recites on De Caelo et Mundo I, comment 22, says that no one can know whether the world is eternal or new, nor have any certitude concerning this. Whence you yourself, about to pay the debt of death, with your scholars standing by, by no means as before with pompous, garrulous, and inane ostentation, but with sincere conscience affirmed that "in your eight first books of Physics are found all the ways of science, by which a man can comprehend and teach principles to the ways of all methods, and know the reasons adduced upon those things which reasonably adhere to disputable matters and which dis-cohere from them, not having a right way through which something true can be known. And reasons of this kind are near to truth, even if they are not true; they are nevertheless useful, that through them may be shown the audacity of the speaker in his science, for weakening the words of his colleague and overcoming the words by the force of his science, with ordered and marvelous reasonings, since the colleague does not have the power of resisting; and this science is useful, like the scorpion in theriac, which, although it is poison, nevertheless if given to the patient, diminishes pain and provides a remedy." These things are most plainly recited in the book that is written about his death, chapter 13.

CHAPTER 35. AGAINST PHILOSOPHERS AND HERETICS DENYING THE POSSIBILITY OF THE CONCEPTION AND BIRTH OF THE VIRGIN, AND SAYING THAT CHRIST WAS BY NO MEANS BORN OF SAINT MARY EVER VIRGIN.

Let the Philosophers and Heretics, corrupted in mind, purify themselves, who deny the possibility of virginal conception and say that Christ was by no means born of Saint Mary ever Virgin. Is not the omnipotent God—through the seventh part of this work, having a universally efficacious will according to the 8th, who can create something out of nothing, indeed even annihilate the whole world and recreate it if he wills, and create a man out of nothing according to the next preceding parts—able also without the help of a man to form a boy in a virginal womb? He also, according to the foregoing concerning the 32nd part of this work, can do and does miracles of every kind; why can he not do this miracle alone?

In the other species of animals also, whose females are accustomed commonly to conceive from the company of the male, it is sometimes found that they conceive and bear without a male, in marvelous ways. Whence Virgil in Georgics III thus writes:

Above all, the frenzy of mares is notable. Love drives them across Gargara, and across the sounding Ascanius; they surmount mountains and swim rivers, And immediately, when the flame is set beneath their greedy marrow More in spring, because in spring that heat returns to their bones, All turned face to the West Wind, they stand on high rocks, And catch the light breezes, and often without any Couplings, pregnant by the wind—wondrous to relate.

Nor let anyone reckon this a lie or fiction because written by Virgil the Poet. For in that book of the Georgics he is rather to be considered a Philosopher than a Poet, as the matter and procedure evidently show. Many Philosophers also, and Catholic Doctors, are accustomed often to allege the Poets, and even Virgil himself in the same book. Servius also, his commentator, expounding that passage, says that those mares are from Spain, and that those foetuses conceived by the wind are of shorter life than those naturally propagated.

Behold also Pliny, Natural History VIII, treating of the natures of horses: "It is established," he says, "in Lusitania around the town of Olisippo and the river Tagus, that mares, with the West Wind blowing, turning toward it, conceive a living spirit; and this becomes their offspring, and is born most swift, but does not exceed three years of life." With which Solinus also, De Mirabilibus Mundi IV, treating of Spain and its things, accordingly writes thus: "In Lusitania there is the promontory Artabrum, others call it Olisipponense. This distinguishes sky, lands, and seas; it is the limit of Spain, of the sky on the side, and divides the seas in this manner: that from its circuit begin the Gallic Ocean, and the northern fountain terminating in the Atlantic Ocean and the West. There is the town of Olisippo founded by Ulysses; there they prefer the Tagus to other rivers on account of its golden sands. In the regions near Olisippo, mares wanton, with marvelous fecundity. For with the West Wind blowing, they conceive, and being thirsty, are wedded by the spirit of the breezes." And below, in chapter 10, treating of Cappadocia and its horses, he thus says: "Mares also bring forth those conceived by the winds, but these never extend their age beyond three years."

Behold also the greater Philosopher than these, in De Animalibus V.2, thus says: "Partridges, if they have stood with the wind, the females are made pregnant by the males; and frequently also by voice, if they have shown themselves desirous, and from those flying over by the male's blowing." Behold here a triple conception of the female without a male: by wind, by voice, by blowing. Which Solinus also briefly touches in De Mirabilibus Mundi III, where he treats of the third gulf of Europe and the partridges: "Lust," he says, "agitates them so that if a wind has blown from the males, they become pregnant by the odor."

If therefore in other species the female by the power of nature can conceive without a male, why in the human species cannot a pure virgin female conceive without a male, by divine power incomparably exceeding all the powers of created nature? And if it is possible by divine power for a female without a man or virile seed to conceive, who shall presume to deny that Christ was conceived and born by divine power of Saint Mary, ever and continuously remaining Virgin—especially since the most clear testimonies touched on in the demonstration of the 32nd part of this work, and many similar things, most clearly show this?

Did not the heavens also narrate this glory of God, and announce this his justice to the people, when heaven and earth were moved through one most worthy conjunction, a little before the desired Christ came to all the Gentiles? For he who "extends the heaven like a skin, and folds it up like a book"—in which, as the Philosophers attest, future things are figuratively described, in which also nothing is described idly, as no one denies—to designate what other thing did he describe in heaven the figure and sign of the glorious Virgin nourishing a boy?

Concerning this Virgin and her pure boy, Albumasar, following the doctrine of the ancient Chaldeans, in Maius Introductorium VI, differentia 1, says that "in the first face—namely, the first third—of Virgo, there rises a girl whom we call Celchinus Dorastora; and she is a virgin, beautiful, honest, and pure, of long hair and beautiful face, having in her hand two ears of grain; and she sits upon a strewn seat, and nourishes a boy, giving him to eat in a place which is called in Arabic Ius, and certain peoples call this boy Jesus; and there rises with her a man sitting upon the same seat."

What do these things signify? What do they portend? For God said in the creation of the heavenly luminaries: "Let there be lights in the firmament of heaven, and let them divide the day and the night, and let them be for signs." That constellation also is commonly called the sign of the Virgin. A sign is said relatively with reference to the thing signified; what therefore does this sign signify? What better, what fitter, what more becoming than that one pure virgin, continuously remaining a virgin, would bring forth a heavenly boy and nourish him with her milk? For if a woman, first virgin, afterward according to the course of nature deflowered, should conceive, bear, and nourish a boy—what kind of sign would this be? What great, what marvelous, what extraordinary thing would it designate? By what reason would the sign of such a signified thing be so gloriously placed in heaven, to be contemplated by the eyes of all, when it would figure nothing unusual? For it daily happens thus, nor would that sign reasonably be called "Virgin," but rather "Woman" or "Matron." Therefore this is not the sign of this signified, but of another aforesaid.

Whence also that most sharp-sighted Isaiah: "The Lord himself," he says, "shall give you a sign: behold, a Virgin shall conceive and shall bear a Son, and his name shall be called Immanuel; butter and honey shall he eat." What kind of sign, I pray, would it be if a deflowered virgin should conceive? And why would it be said that "the Lord himself shall give a sign" if he himself were not doing something above the course of nature? For man and woman according to the course of nature would procreate a son. The man, however, sitting upon the seat with her—does he not aptly signify her spouse, who, although she remained perpetual virgin, nevertheless for many honest causes received a husband, according to the prophecy of the Sibyl recited in the demonstration of the thirty-second part above?

Nor is it to be reckoned without mystery that the aforesaid sign of the Virgin is placed sixth in order among the celestial signs. For through this it designates its signified, future in the sixth age of the world. This number, however, is perfect, on the testimony of Boethius in Arithmetica I.22; therefore also this age is "the perfect fullness of time." With this drawing nearer, there occurred one greatest and incomparably glorious conjunction of Saturn and Jupiter at the beginning of Aries, with the change of the watery triplicity to the fiery, six years and a few days and hours before the advent of Christ. Which if anyone wishes to have precisely and demonstratively, he can easily by reckoning their motions, or more easily by a table recently made for this and all such conjunctions. Mercury, the Lord of Virgo (which sign was then ascending at that time), presided over that conjunction; through all of which was perspicuously signified the aforesaid signified of the sign Virgo then to be future—namely, a heavenly boy to be born of a virgin, who would be the greatest of Prophets and would deliver a new law.

Nor is it to be passed over wholly in silence that "Mercury" is interpreted as "illuminating the meeting of the sign"—and of what sign more than its own proper sign? But this is Virgo, on account of his many dignities in it, as all Astrologers attest. Mercury is also interpreted "discourse" [sermo], and is called "running between," than which figure what is more fitting than the Word of God, the middle Person, the Mediator of God and men?

If however anyone wishes to accept the testimony of that Ovid, De Vetula, for authority or for pleasure in this part, behold, in book 3 of De Vetula, speaking generally of such great conjunctions, and especially of this one, he writes thus:

One indeed of such kind, in a felicitous time, recently In the twice-twelfth year of Caesar Augustus From the newness of his reign, occurred, which signified That after six years a Prophet ought to be born, Without intercourse of a male, of a Virgin, whose figure is held Where the force of Mercury is most multiplied. Whose first complexion will be concordant with the future Sect: For nowhere among the signs does Mercury so dominate As in the sign of Virgo: there Is his house, exaltation, and triplicity Throughout the whole sign, and also his term In the first seven degrees; and the figure of the said Prophet Is held there, although under enigma; for In those images which are described by the Indians, And by the wise men of the Chaldeans and of Babylon, It is said from the writings of the ancients to ascend first. In the face of Virgo, a Virgin of long hair, Pure indeed, and of great spirit, and of great beauty, Of much honesty, and in her hands are Ears of grain suspended, and old garments. On a strewn seat she sits, she nourishes a boy, to the boy giving Ius To eat; this boy a certain people calls Jesus. This part of heaven was rising in the hour In which with Saturn the holy conjunction of Jupiter occurred, Signifying the sect, and they changed Their triplicity, and also near the point Of spring, where the greatest conjunction could occur At the beginning of the sign, if perhaps it had been nearer. Then also there were three hundred and five years of the Greeks, And nine months, with nearly thrice six days: Happy he to whom such great conjunction was fully open.

And many other things concerning the excellence of this Prophet and his sect, faith, or law.

Nor is it a marvel if God, about to be born in human form in the manner of human nativity, willed by certain blessed presagings and glorious testimonies to be visibly demonstrated to all from heaven, that thus he might premonstrate to all generally, by a great and admirable indication, so great and admirable an effect, salutary to all generally—just as also a marvelous star indicated the marvelous Nativity of Christ, as the demonstration of the 32nd part touched. Nor is it that, because such a constellation or such a conjunction preceded Christ, therefore Christ was to be born of a virgin or to give a law; but rather the contrary. For these were not the cause of those things, but the sign; nor on that account is the Lord of stars and times subjected to them, but they to him. For by the first supposition, the 8th part, and the Philosophers themselves attesting, all heavenly things together, and singly separately, inviolably always observe the divine statutes, and serve his will in all things.

Nor ought it to move anyone that this Virgin is described among the Chaldeans in one way recited above, and according to the Indians and others otherwise. For the celestial images are variously described by various peoples, according to the assumption or rejection of other stars, or according to other and other ordering of the same stars, as their books on images manifestly indicate. Whence Albumasar, where above, says: "Certain wise men of one region differ from other wise men of another region in the creation of these images, and in the figures and being of them; and we find this in three ways." In the description of the Virgin afore-tasted, however, the Ancients of the Babylonians, Persians, and Egyptians equally agreed, Albumasar in the same place promising in these words: "And first we shall begin to narrate the images upon which the Ancients of the Persians, and Babylonians, and Egyptians agreed; after these we shall narrate that in which the wise men of the Indians concurred." And the aforesaid description of the Virgin is the first which he narrates, where also, according to the procedure promised, he subjoins: "And according to the Indians there rises in this face a girl, a Virgin, having upon her a linen sheet, and old garments in her hand, and her hands suspended, and she standing in the middle of Mirceti, wishing to come to the dwellings of her Fathers, and her friends, to seek garments and ornaments." According to Ptolemy, however, in Almagest VII.4, this Virgin is described as standing erect and winged; but as he himself there testifies, in this he discords from the prior ones, positing the longitude of the Virgin which they posited her latitude. For otherwise, as he says, the latitude would exceed the longitude, which is not becoming. Nevertheless, although this may seem unbecoming in a standing woman, in a woman, however, sitting upon a strewn seat and nourishing a boy, this need not be reckoned unbecoming. The truth is, however, that the description of the Virgin according to the Babylonians, Persians, and Egyptians aforesaid he neither recites nor amends. But should it not, I ask, be reasonably presumed that so many and such great wise men, agreeing, would more aptly figure this glorious Virgin than Ptolemy alone, discording from these and others—especially since he seems wholly not to have seen this figuration of theirs? Yet none of the figures premised is empty of great mystery.

That, however, these afore-tasted Astrological things may appear more credible to all, concerning the Inventors, Authors, and Doctors of Astrology, Astronomy, and other such arts, a little must be discoursed. In these arts indeed the sons of Seth shone greatly: Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Solomon, and other Holy Fathers, as very many Histories attest. For Josephus writes in Antiquities I.1, that "Seth, when he had been nourished and come to the age in which he could now discern those things which are good, applied himself to virtue; and when he had been an excellent man, he left behind sons imitators of himself. They all, when they had been born good, dwelling in the same land without any vexation, lived most felicitously, and nothing cruel came to them up to the term of life. They first invented the discipline of heavenly things and their adornment; and lest the things which seemed to have been invented by them should slip away from men, or perish before they came to recognition—since Adam had foretold an extermination of all things, one to come by the force of fire, the other indeed by the violence and multitude of waters—making two columns, the one indeed of bricks, the other indeed of stones, they inscribed both with the things they had invented; that even if the one constructed of bricks should be exterminated by rains, the stone one remaining might furnish to men the writings to know; and at the same time, because they had also placed the one of bricks, which along with the stone one remains until now in the land of Syria."

The Philosopher also in Secretum Secretorum, part 2, ch. 1, says: "The exalted and glorious God ordained the manner and remedy for the temperance of the humors, and for the conservation of health, and for very many other things to be acquired; and revealed these things to the holy Prophets, his servants, and his just Prophets, and to certain others whom he pre-elected and illumined with the spirit of divine wisdom; and endowed them with the endowments of knowledge. From these the following men had the principate and origin of Philosophy: the Indians, and the Persians, and the Greeks, and the Latins drew from these, and wrote down the principles and secrets of arts and sciences; for in their Scriptures nothing false, nothing reprobable is found, but what is approved by the wise."

And below, ch. 26, he says: "It is worthy, Alexander, that you know the great medicine which is called gloria inaestimabilis [the inestimable glory], which is also called the treasure of the Philosophers. I indeed have never perceived nor truly known who invented it. For some assert that Adam was its inventor; others, however, say that Aesculapius and Hermogenes, the Physician Hirfos, and Donastios, and Vatildos the Hebrews, and Dioris and Carans, the glorious Philosophers, who are eight, to whom it was given to know the secrets of the sciences which lay hidden from all men. These are they who inquired into and disputed concerning those things which are above nature, concerning the Full, the Void, the Finite, the Infinite, and concordantly agreed in the confection of this inestimable Medicine, which they divided into 8 parts. Some indeed affirm this, that Enoch knew this secret through a vision; for they wish to say that this Enoch was the great Hermogenes, whom the Greeks much commend and praise, and to whom they attribute every secret and heavenly science."

Whence in the Prologue to the book of Hermes Mercurius Trismegistus On the World and Heaven, it is written in this manner: "We read in the ancient histories of divine things that there were three Philosophers, of whom the first was Enoch, who was also called Hermes, and by another name Mercurius. The second was Noah, who likewise was called Hermes. The third indeed was called Hermes Mercurius Triplex, because he flourished as King and Philosopher and Prophet. For he, after the flood, with highest equity held the kingdom of Egypt, and prevailed in liberal and mechanical arts; and first elucidated Astronomy; and completed with luculent work the golden rod, the book of latitude and longitude, the book of election, the Ezich on the equation of the planets, and on the Astrolabe, and many other things."

Josephus moreover in Antiquities I.2, speaking of the longitude of the life of Noah and of the other Fathers of those Ancient times, says: "They, since they were religious and made by God himself, and since foods more opportune for a greater time were prepared for them, lived through such circles of years; and afterward, on account of the virtues and glorious utilities which they continually scrutinized—that is, Astrology and Geometry—God granted them ampler spaces of living, which they could never have learned out unless they should live six hundred years; for through so many years' courses a great year is fulfilled."

In the little book On the Death of Aristotle, ch. 9, it is also referred according to the opinion of Melon, the disciple of Aristotle, which his Master also greatly commended, that up to the advent of Noah, men estimating the Sun and Moon and other stars to be moved of themselves, and therefore to be the first movers simply, and gods, served them as gods according to various idols (concerning which the eleventh part also touched). Noah however was the first who knew the creator of the spheres, and that he is the principle of every motion; and he himself had the science and highest grade of these things.

Albumasar also in Maius Introductorium V, differentia 11, says that "in the histories of the ancient divine things it is found that Noah, the Prophet to be venerated, first of all populated Babylon after the flood, and instituted the Babylonians or Chaldeans; and all the Chaldeans were wise in the number of stars and the science of Judgments, and they flowed together to their Doctors from all climates for love of learning; and according to the assertion of certain ones, Shem the son of Noah taught these men first this science of the stars."

This testimony of Albumasar and similar ones, however, seems worthy of greater faith because he knew many histories, as that Introductory book proves in many places. Indeed he himself was one of the Historiographers, Haly saying on the first of Ptolemy's Quadripartitum: "We know that Albumasar, before he read Astronomy, was one of those who made Chronicles, as we find in writings."

Concordantly with this, that Ovid of De Vetula, in book 3, On the Science and Judgments of the Stars, thus says:

These things wrote that prior Prophet Noah, to be venerated, And his firstborn son Shem taught.

In the little book On the Death of Aristotle, ch. 9, it is likewise recited that after Noah was born Abraham, who was wiser than all and attained to the highest grade of Prophecy; and he knew that the Sun and Moon and all the stars had a first mover, and therefore did not follow the way of his Father and his generation, who adored idols. This Abraham himself, as Josephus relates in Antiquities I.5, "was exceedingly understanding in all things, and wise in those things which he had heard, and concerning whatsoever he might think anything; on which account also by the power of prudence he was greater than others, and prevailed to renew and change the opinion which all then had concerning God. He therefore first presumed to pronounce God the one Creator of all things; but the rest, although they tend to felicity, he confessed to be given by the precept of him who furnishes each thing, and not to subsist by their own power. These things he conjectured through the passion of earth and sea, and those things which happen around the Sun and Moon, and from all things which around heaven always come about. For with virtue present in them, and the providence of their ordering, he taught that all things were disposed; whichever might be deprived of which would be made manifest, that neither could the things necessary to our utility have been possessed by their own power—which, namely, are ministered according to the strength of the one commanding, to whom alone it is good to give honor and the action of thanks."

Of this noble Abraham also, Berosus and Hecataeus, Historiographers of the Chaldeans, make mention, Josephus saying where above: "But Berosus mentions our Father Abraham, not indeed naming him, but thus saying: 'After the flood in the tenth generation, among the Chaldeans there was a certain just and great man, expert in heavenly things.' Hecataeus also did somewhat more for the memory of him: for composing a book about him he left it behind." And below in the same place: "He conferred Arithmetic upon the Egyptians, and the things which are of Astrology he himself delivered. For before the advent of Abraham into Egypt, the Egyptians were wholly ignorant of these things. For from the Chaldeans these things, planted, are born in Egypt; whence also they are known to have come to the Greeks."

Solomon also, divinely inspired, as is plain from 1 Kings 3 and 2 Chronicles 1, received from the Lord such great wisdom and intelligence and knowledge, that no one before him was similar to him, nor after him. Concerning whom in 1 Kings 3 it is written: "The Lord also gave Solomon wisdom, and prudence exceedingly much; and the wisdom of Solomon surpassed the wisdom of all the easterners and of the Egyptians, and he was wiser than all men." Concerning whom Josephus also in Antiquities VIII.2 says: "That God gave him intellect and wisdom, such as no other man had—neither of Kings nor of private men—so that he excelled even the ancient men, and not even compared to the Egyptians (who are said to differ from all in wisdom) was he little or less, whose wisdom indeed greatly preceded theirs. He composed, however, books five, and four thousand. For no nature unknown or unexamined did he pass over, but he philosophized concerning all things, and excellently expounded their discipline and property."

By the most learned doctrines of these Fathers, divinely illumined, the later Philosophers, informed, wrote down these glorious sciences, and superadded certain other things in some manner not wholly alien, because derived from those first fountains, according to what Aristotle himself recited above. The books of these venerable Fathers, however, perhaps the pride of certain sophistical Philosophers destroyed, or changed the titles, that they might steal the glory of the inventors; or perhaps too great antiquity of time abolished them. Is not also in our sacred books the Prophecy of that very Enoch, the seventh from Adam, solemnly alleged, of which nevertheless the writing is by no means found?

Chapter 36

AGAINST THE EPICUREANS AND SADDUCEES, WHO SAY THAT THERE IS NO SPIRIT, AND WHO IRRATIONALLY DENY ALSO THE IMMORTALITY OF THE RATIONAL SOUL; AND AGAINST AVERROES, WHO MAINTAINS THAT ALL MEN HAVE ONE SINGLE RATIONAL SOUL.

Let the Epicureans and Sadducees be cured and healed, who say that there is no incorporeal spirit and who irrationally deny the immortality of the rational soul; and let Averroes be turned aside, who maintains that all men have one single rational soul. These men, however, seem to have been those Ancients—or imitators of those—who, as the Philosopher recounts in various places, posited only material things and matter, and sensibles and sense, denying intellect, or [holding] it to be itself a body or a corporeal form, and therefore affirming it to be corruptible, and on this account placing the highest good in bodily pleasures, just as a pig in mire, so they wallowed themselves in pleasures of this kind. Concerning Epicurus, whom philosophers named "the pig," and concerning his swinish followers, the books of philosophers and grammarians make frequent mention. Concerning the Sadducees, however, it should be known that Josephus, in The Jewish War Book 2, and Jewish Antiquities Book 18, chapter 3, says that among the Jews there were four philosophies, or species of philosophers: the Pharisees, the Sadducees, the Essenes (or Essenoi), and the Judaic [school named] from a certain leader of theirs Judas, or Libertines, because they fought for liberty, who for this reason are also called Sicarii in Book 7 of The Jewish War. Concerning the second of these, in Book 2 of The Jewish War, he says: "The Sadducees are the second collection," and in Jewish Antiquities 18.3: "The Sadducees consider souls to be mortal, and to perish together with the body." Moreover, our sacred books also make mention both of the Epicureans and of the Sadducees. Concerning the aforesaid opinion of Averroes, however, it is sufficiently established in his exposition on Book 3 On the Soul, comment 5, and in others following.

But how is there no incorporeal spirit, when according to the eighth and tenth parts God is proven to be an incorporeal spirit? For what should an incorporeal spirit be called, if not an incorporeal rational substance? This spirit, moreover, most omnipotent, having a will universally efficacious according to the seventh and eighth parts—why, according to the thirty-third and thirty-fourth parts, can He not, and could He not have, created and made other spirits like Himself, just as He has created other natures unlike Himself: those indeed loosed from bodies, whom we call Angels; but those joined to bodies, whom we call rational souls; and both species immortal? If therefore this whole thing is possible, why should it be denied to be so, since this is more in accordance with divine bounty and manifold goodness, as the first Supposition and the parts following have plainly taught? Especially since this is renowned among all great philosophers, truly philosophers, among every faith and sect, and among nearly all men, especially since it is fortified by reasons, and is scarcely impugned by the slender shadow of a reason, according to what was said before about the thirty-second and thirty-third parts of this work. How many and how varied are the most certain experiences which prove there are many spirits? Do not even the magic arts, though evil, teach that there are spirits, just as was touched on above concerning the thirty-second and twenty-first parts?

Who, however, does not know that the petty opinion of Averroes is empty, false, foolish, and fabricated, having no verisimilitude or probability? For which reason it is to be labored over with less concern; nevertheless, lest it boast itself altogether untouched, it seems at least to deserve to be refuted in passing. Who therefore, attentive to the prior matters diligently, does not clearly see that God can impart individual souls to individual men? This indeed accords better with God and with nature. For why would God give abundantly to other more imperfect species, which neither know God, nor love Him, nor worship Him, individual souls and proper natural forms to each one, while to men—much nobler, knowing, loving, and worshipping God in nature—to all together He should give most sparingly only one? Why should He ordain it thus rather of men than of vegetables, of other animals, or of the heavenly bodies? What reason or what cause [could there be], when concerning similar things one ought similarly to judge?

Furthermore, according to the thirty-first part, God will reward every one of His worshippers fully and abundantly, which He does not do in the present life, as is plain; therefore He will do so in the future life. And by no means [will He reward] His despisers and worshippers equally, nor all His worshippers equally, just as they have not equally merited. Therefore individual men have individual souls, by which after death they may be rewarded or punished, as is fitting, individually. Do not even you yourself, on that passage of the Philosopher, Ethics 1.16, concerning the happy man, [say] that "we all judge a man truly good and wise to bear fortunes becomingly," and so you say, as it is said of Job, "To whom be salvation"? For why would you pray for the salvation of Job deceased, unless you hoped that his soul, and the souls of virtuous men, would after death be saved according to the requirement of their merits?

Further, concerning the rewarding or recompense of men in the present life: that with which God rewards the virtuous in the present life is to be placed rather in the soul than in the body. But if there is only one soul of all, whatever such reward or punishment one man receives, all the rest receive likewise. According to this senseless opinion also, if one man had perfect happiness or perfect misery in the soul, all would have it together at the same time, and all would simultaneously be perfectly happy and miserable; and consequently neither happy nor miserable—which no one would concede unless he were miserable. How, moreover, would God, wise, just, and powerful, dispense His greatest rewards so improvidently? Does not the Philosopher in Ethics 1.14 say thus: "If there is some other gift of the gods to men, it is reasonable that happiness too is given by God, and most of all of human goods, the more so as it is the best. But this seems to belong even to the most divine things. For the prize and end of virtue seems to be the best, and something divine and blessed." And below at 18: "We call the gods blessed and happy, and the most divine of men we call blessed." On which passage you yourself, Averroes, [say]: "We refer the deified and the elect among men to happiness." And below, at the end of that first [book], thus you say: "Thanks be to God, the giver of wisdom and the bestower of happiness."

Furthermore, if by the supreme omnipotence of God all men, both happy and miserable, should die with no survivor, the rational soul being preserved, either it would itself be miserable or blessed; why one rather than the other? Nor could it simultaneously be miserable and blessed.

Further, according to the harmonious judgment of the philosophers, Nature is the principle of motion and rest of that whose nature it is, and nature, which is form, is the effective principle of these. The rational soul also is the nature of man and his form; therefore it is the effective principle of all human motions and acts. Who doubts that it is itself of finite power? And therefore of finite and determinate power in acting. If therefore it then moves locally the body of one man as much as it can, and to the utmost of its power, how can it simultaneously move similarly another such body of another man with equal velocity, and a third body, and a fourth, and so on beyond every limit and measure—indeed, infinite bodies, if infinite men were posited? How, moreover, could any finite mover move through itself diverse moved things totally separated and entirely unconnected? Does not Aristotle, your god, and you, his worshipper, in Metaphysics 12, argue from the number of celestial motions to the number of moving Intelligences? If, however, one single soul suffices for moving all human bodies—very heavy, very resistant, and very difficult to move, so many, so disorderly, and so unconnected to each other—why, by similar reasoning—indeed by much greater—does not one Intelligence suffice for moving all the heavenly bodies, which are alien to such conditions, since they are few, best ordered to each other and connected? And not only the heavenly bodies now existing, but more and greater however many were posited, just as one soul suffices for moving equally bodies of men beyond every number and measure? According to your judgment, however, if one further star were added to some heavenly orb, its mover would not move it at all, or would move it with fatigue and toil, or more slowly.

In a similar manner one can argue concerning the operations more proper to the rational soul, namely concerning intellection, volition, memory, recollection, syllogizing, and the like. For how does one finite and small soul suffice all at once for such operations, so many, so varied and diverse, no less for any number of such things at once than for one separately? Does not certain experience teach, and do not all the philosophers attest, that one operation of the soul either impedes or expels another? How then can the same soul perform so many actions, so varied and contrary, all at once and most perfectly? Is not such a soul, finite and very small—just as it is of finite entity and nature—likewise of finite capacity? How then can it at one and the same time take in and hold so many intellections, volitions, memories, syllogisms, and such things without limit, without end?

Further, just as Avicenna, On the Soul 5.3, and Algazel, Physics 4, last [section], refute this heresy: if there were the same soul of all, there would also be the same knowledge of all, nor would anything be known by one which was not known by another. Indeed, if there were the same soul of all, since all knowledge of man is in the soul as in a subject, and in every man there is a rational soul, in every man there is all human knowledge, every habit, and likewise every act inhering in the rational soul. Therefore every man has every habitual knowledge, and likewise actual, which any other man has—the contrary of which we seem most certainly to experience in ourselves. For why, if I had the brightest light in my house or in my bodily eye, could I not behold it with the eye of the body? Or if I could, why not similarly concerning the brightest light of the sciences in the house or eye of the spirit, and the eye of my mind? For the Philosopher says, Ethics 1.7: "As sight is in the body, so intellect in the soul." Why, moreover, if I had a manifold treasure in my material treasury, could I not draw out from it what I willed? Or if I could, why from my treasury and treasure incomparably more manifold and spiritual—closer, more proper, and more subject to my power—can I not, if I will, even though I strive with all my strength, draw out one iota? By common experience teaching, and according to the harmonious judgment of Aristotle, of yourself, and of other philosophers, he who has a habit can use it when he wills. Why therefore can not every man, since he has every habitual knowledge and every scientific habit actually, use any one at the pleasure of will?

Does not the Philosopher in Posterior Analytics 2, last [chapter], inquiring how principles known to us come about—whether their habits, when they are not present, come to be in us; or whether, when they are present, they lie hidden—reproving the second member, says thus: "If indeed therefore we have them, it is unfitting; for it happens that one having the most certain cognitions of principles in demonstrating may lie hidden." He also seems to think the same in Problems, particle 30.2 and 4. He also says in On the Soul 3.14 thus: "In some way the intellect is the intelligibles in potency, but in act nothing before it understands; but it is necessary that it be thus, just as in a tablet on which nothing is actually written"—which indeed happens to the intellect. Where the text which you expound has thus: "What happens to the intellect ought to run with a similar course, namely as a tablet which is fitted for painting, not actually painted at all." How great a weight of authority the words of Aristotle have, and especially in this part, you yourself in that comment 14 plainly testify, affirming that all those who hold the intellect to be simple, impassible, abstract, and not mixed with body do not believe except because Aristotle said so,

"since this is so difficult, by God." "If the discourse of Aristotle were not found in him, then it would be very difficult to fall upon this, or perhaps impossible, unless someone such as Aristotle were found. For I believe that this man was the rule in nature, and is the exemplar which nature found to demonstrate the ultimate human perfection in natures." And below, at 36, speaking of the labor of Avempace, on the question of the continuation of the agent intellect with man, [a labor] so diligent and unsparing that the question did not depart from his thought even for the time of one blink of an eye, and of the other difficulties and ambiguities concerning that question, you say thus: "The cause of this ambiguity and labor is that we find no discourse from Aristotle on this intention." You also write thus on Physics 1, in the prologue: "The name of the Author is Aristotle, son of Nicomachus, the wisest of the Greeks, who composed other books in this art, and in Logic, and in Metaphysics, and he discovered and completed these three arts. He discovered, because whatever was discovered by the Ancients in this science is not worthy to be a part of this; he completed, because no one of those who have followed him up to this time, which is fifteen hundred years, has added anything, nor found error in his words; and that such virtue should exist in one individual would be miraculous and strange, and this disposition, when it is found in one man, would be more worthy to be called divine than human."

How then do you understand or expound the words of this divine man, of so great an Author, so canonical and so authentic? Do you not, in the aforementioned comment 14, expounding the example of the Philosopher comparing the intellect existing in potency to an unwritten, unpainted tablet, say thus: "When he had made known the manner of passion in the intellect, he began to give an example from sensible things, through which this intention is understood in the material intellect; and although it is not true, nevertheless it is a way to understanding, and that mode of teaching is necessary in such matters, although it is rhetorical." But how viperous a gloss is yours, which gnaws at its own text! How impudent an exposition, which expels its own text! How petulant a son, who says to his father, "You lie!" Who are you? Of what authority? Or of how great, that you should contradict so great a Philosopher, especially since you bring forward neither any greater authority, nor any reason compelling any rational animal—or even probably moving it—on your side, as is very easy to see when the first supposition and the parts following are understood. With what temerity therefore, with what blindness, with what audacity, indeed with what madness, did you presume so impudently to babble against so great a man, so great a Philosopher, so renowned, since (by your own testimony) there is no error in his words? Indeed, how senseless you are made, since you do not perceive yourself contradicting yourself, while you so commend Aristotle and yet contradict him! Who therefore will believe you? For when a greater Author and a lesser contradict, to which is one rather to adhere? Who doubts but that to the greater? And who does not know that Aristotle is greater than you?

I fear therefore that very many in this part have raved very greatly because they looked more diligently upon your writing and neglected the writings of Aristotle. Do you not yourself on On the Soul 3, comment 30, speaking of the erring Avempace, say thus: "What made this man err, and us also for a long time, is that the moderns lay aside the books of Aristotle and consider the books of the expositors, especially in On the Soul, believing that this book is impossible to be understood"? Does not the same Philosopher in the same Book 3, in many places, say that the intellective soul is passible and receptive of species, and has all intelligibles, and the species of all things, in potency, not in act? And therefore he proves that it necessarily needs another intellect, namely an agent intellect, which may perfect its potentiality and lead it forth to act. Does he not, in that same Book 3, comment 5, say that the intellective soul has no nature except a passible one, nor is any intelligible actually before it understands it in act? Are not his words these: "Nor does it have its [proper] nature, nor is it one [thing], but it is what is before this called possible; thus is the intellect of the soul. I call intellect that by which the soul opines and understands; it is nothing in act of the things which are, before it understands." Where the text you expound has thus: "It will not have a nature except this, that it is possible. That therefore of the soul which is called Intellect—and I call intellect that by which we distinguish and cogitate—is in act none of the beings before it understands."

And the Philosopher here is speaking of an intellect similar to that below at 37, where he says: "Now, recapitulating what has been said about the soul, let us say again that the soul is in some way all the things that are. For [things] either are sensibles, or intelligibles. And science indeed is in some way the knowables, sense the sensibles." And it follows at 38: "How this is, must be inquired. Science and sense, then, are divided according to things; that which is in potency is in those things which are in potency; that which is in act is in those things which are in act. The sensitive part of the soul, and that which can know, are these in potency: this indeed the knowable, that the sensible. It is necessary, however, that they be either the things themselves, or the species. Indeed they are not the things themselves; for the stone is not in the soul, but the species. Wherefore the soul is just as the hand; for the hand is the instrument of instruments, and the intellect is the species of species, and sense the species of sensibles—truly in potency, not in act." Wherefore also above at 6, he says thus: "They are speaking well who say the soul is the place of species; except that not the whole, but the intellective; nor in act, but in potency, the species." And below at 8 he shows that the soul is said to be knowing or to know in potency in two ways: namely, remotely and proximately, that is, by remote or essential potency, such as is in a man before he learns; and by proximate or actual potency, such as is in one having knowledge in habit but not using it in act, from which potency it can by itself proceed to act. Whence he says thus: "When this [intellect], namely, knows individual things, it is said to be knowing indeed according to act; this happens at once when it can operate through itself; it is then in some way still in potency, however not in like manner as before learning or discovering."

He also writes below at 17 thus: "Since, however, just as in every nature there is something—this indeed matter, in each genus, and this is in potency all those things—and another, the cause and effective [principle], which by making all things, like art toward matter, has sustained, it is necessary that these differences also be in the soul." And immediately at 18: "And the intellect is one such, in which to become all things, the other in which to make all things." This whole judgment also Avicenna, Algazel, and almost all other philosophers plainly hold. If therefore these things are so, how do you presume to assert as false that the Intellect, before it understands, is just as a tablet on which nothing is actually written or painted? Indeed, because this is true, what you say is false and foolish: namely, that all speculative intelligibles, all species, all sciences, all habits, all acts, and universally all and each of the possibles are there written actually and eternally, are there painted actually and eternally, are there actually and eternally. Do you not in that comment 5 say thus: "When it shall have been considered concerning these intelligibles, insofar as they are beings simply, not in respect of any individual, they are truly said to be eternal, and not to be understood at one time and at another not, but always; since [it is held that] for wisdom to be in some manner proper to man is just as for the manner of the arts to be in manners proper to man. It is judged that it is impossible that the whole habitation should flee from Philosophy, just as it is to be opined that it is impossible that it should flee from natural arts. For if some part of it should lack them, namely the arts—for example, the northern quarter of the earth—the other quarters will not lack them; for it has been declared that habitation is possible in the southern part as in the northern part. Perhaps therefore Philosophy is found in the greater part of the substance at every time." And below at 20: "The intellect which is called material, according to what we have said, it does not happen that at one time it understands and at another not, except in respect of the stronger imagination of those existing in each individual, not in respect of the species; for example, that it does not happen to it that at one time it equally understands an intelligible and at another not, except in respect of Socrates and Plato; similarly, however, in respect of the species, it always understands this universal, unless the human species should fail altogether—which is impossible."

Did not Plato in the Meno posit similarly in some way that all knowledge is always in the soul of every one, but lies hidden? Wherefore he is reproved by Aristotle. Why therefore are you not similarly to be reproved? If, moreover, it were so, what would be the office of the agent intellect? What would it do concerning the possible intellect? How would it help? For it produces no species, no intention, no cognition in it, since all species, intention, and cognition, just as also all the rest of the things it has, persevere actually and eternally in it. How then do the philosophers, and you yourself, say that it is the [office] of the agent intellect to denude and abstract the material intentions to immateriality, and so to transfer them from order to order, from materiality to immateriality, from the imagination, which is a material power, into the possible intellect, which is an immaterial power, and so finally to make that which is intellect in potency to be intellect in act?

I know that you will say this is true with respect to the individual, not with respect to the species or the human intellect simply. But what, I ask, does the agent intellect operate in the individual demonstrated? For the intention denuded by it is not transferred nor enters into the possible intellect, by what was said before; therefore it remains in the material power; wherefore it is also material as before, although perhaps a little more subtle than before. Which, however, considered subtly, does not seem to be said—since immediately in the very instant of sensation and imagination, anything whatever is understood, as we all commonly experience. And your master in On the Soul 3.28 says: "To sense is similar to mere saying and understanding"—a judgment which you also there most plainly profess. And [is it not so] that with the imagined intention remaining gross and rude, just as it flows in from the object, yet with the intention proper to the thing being had in the intellect, the man could understand? Why could he not? Further, what necessity is there of positing an agent intellect for slightly subtilizing the material phantasmal intention? Why does not, as in other animals, imagination alone suffice? Why do you not in like manner posit an agent intellect for subtilizing the intentions of other powers? Who, moreover, reading and not neglecting the books of Aristotle, Theophrastus, Themistius, Avempace, Avicenna, Algazel, and other philosophers, would say that the agent intellect is necessary to man because it slightly subtilizes the material intentions of the imagination, while yet they remain material, and remain as before in the material phantasmal power, and not rather for the effect recited above?

Further, the intentions, propositions, discourses, and conclusions, and the other habits and acts in the rational soul, which according to you always actually exist, are either finite in number or simply infinite. Not simply infinite, since it itself is simply finite, of finite entity, and of finite capacity. Nor likewise can there be any multitude actually and simply infinite, as your master and you yourself often affirm. If, however, they are only finite, say a hundred or a thousand, it is possible that some men—and some one man among men, by your account simply infinite in past and future—understand and have, make and form, some intention, proposition, discourse, conclusion, act, and habit, different from all and each of those. Who would deny this? Who would doubt? Who would not at once concede it to be so? For just as one standing at the center of a circle can go out through any radius to its proper point situated on the periphery, although not simultaneously nor successively through all to all its points, so he who has a scientific principle stands in the midst of infinite possible discourses leading to infinite proper conclusions, and can go out through individual ones to individual conclusions, even if not through all to all. Infinite men also could proceed through infinite such discourses to infinite proper conclusions, as I reckon does not escape scientific men. Therefore there is some conclusion knowable by man—indeed infinite conclusions knowable by men—which the possible intellect does not actually now have. The same can similarly appear concerning erroneous conclusions and opinions. For who does not know that truth is to be compared to a sign set up for archers, and to a point in the middle of a target, which it happens to attain in few ways or one, but to fail in infinite? Who therefore does not see that erroneous conclusions and opinions can be varied and multiplied in infinite ways, especially among infinite men?

Further, who does not know that, if according to your judgment the world is eternal before and after, according to the common course there have been, and there will be, infinite eclipses of the Sun and Moon, knowable specially by men—indeed known and to be known, as according to your aforesaid assertion seems more apparent? And because this is most certainly possible, let it be supposed: there have therefore been and will be infinite investigations, conclusions, and proper and special sciences concerning them. For who would believe that it is the same particular and proper science, the same credulity, adherence, and affirmation, now to be that an eclipse will occur (namely, this night or day) and then to be that an eclipse will occur (namely, the seventh month following)? For many know one and doubt and are ignorant of another. Otherwise, moreover, it would be the same to know, believe, adhere, and say, "Then there will be an eclipse"; and "Then, and then, and then," at any time designated—which no one doubts to be false, as also is sufficiently apparent in other such things concerning the future. Moreover, the identity of human immanent acts, according to your judgment eternally remaining uniform, is similarly refuted. For who is ignorant that it is not the same act but a different one, internally to affirm and believe, "There is an eclipse now," "There will be an eclipse tomorrow," "There was an eclipse yesterday," and the like—just as the affirmations and the things affirmed are not the same but different, and are infinitely permuted from true to false, and the contrary? Are not also acts of understanding, believing, loving, and similarly doing, infinitely varied according to the variety of degrees in various men and times? But such great variety cannot actually exist simultaneously in the same soul, as the foregoing has taught.

Perhaps your vicar will respond and say that the intellect, or man through the intellect, understands and wills many varied and distinct things, particularly, properly, and distinctly through the same intention or species, and through the same act, not entirely diverse really. But who does not know that the one understanding through any whatever distinguishes any diverse things properly and distinctly, or can distinguish through the same distinctly and properly between them? And who doubts that the same man through the same power, through the same species, and through entirely the same act, without any added diversity, cannot distinguish those diverse things—namely, cognize them properly, particularly, and distinctly? For otherwise the same man, through the same species, could now cognize one thing distinctly (say A), and not another (say B), and at another time the contrary. But whom does it escape that one as one—especially in natural powers not free—is by nature apt always to make one thing, not another nor a different one, in the same passible thing not diverse? Does not reason perspicuously demonstrate this? For what cause of diversity of effects is there in such cases? Why is now this one, not that one, produced; now the contrary, except in agent or in patient, since in such cases there is no free election, but natural necessity? Does not Aristotle for this reason in On Generation 2, penultimate [chapter], say: "The same having itself similarly is by nature apt always to make the same"? The same, however, sometimes makes contraries and diverse things; but this is on account of contrariety and some diversity in agent or patient, as the same Philosopher teaches in Metaphysics 9.10, Metaphysics 9.11, Metaphysics 9.12, Metaphysics 5.2, and Physics 2.30; which Averroes' exposition in those places likewise confesses. Further, otherwise the intellect could through one general species cognize distinctly all species of genera, or of any genus, and the individual instances of species; sight also through the same and one species of one color could distinguish all the species, differences, and degrees of colors.

Furthermore, if the same intention and the entirely same act signify diverse things properly and distinctly, then let A intention and B act signify C and D diverse things properly and distinctly, and let a man compose in the mind A with A through B act, for C only saying, "A is A," and that composition will be true; and let him compose similarly for C on the part of the subject, and for D on the part of the predicate, and that composition will be false; and thus the same proposition will be at the same time true and false. According to this judgment also, the intentions of things and natural species in the mind would be purely equivocal; for they would signify diverse things according to the same intention or name, and a different and proper notion. Wherefore they would also signify, or could signify, at pleasure. For why could they not signify some other diverse things, and others, just as these? But who doubts these things to be false, contrary to nature, and dissonant from natural Philosophy?

Does not also the Philosopher in On the Soul 2.135 write thus: "Let someone inquire for what cause we have several senses, and not one alone." And he responds: "Or [is it] insofar as the consequents [follow] less broadly?" namely, with respect to proper sensibles and common ones, like motion, magnitude, and number. "For if there were sight alone, and it [were the sight] of white, they would lie hidden more, and all things would seem to be the same, on account of the fact that color and magnitude follow each other simultaneously; now, however, since [these] common things are in another sensible, [reason] makes manifest that each of them is something else." The Philosopher therefore supposes that sense cannot distinguish between diverse things except through diverse [things]. And below at 145, having shown that it is necessary that whoever discerns between diverse things should discern through the same indivisible power, and in indivisible time, that is, in an instant, and the question being raised how the indivisible power could perceive and discern contraries and diverse things, he responds that what senses diverse things—namely, diverse according to being—is divisible, that is, according to a different reason, cognition, or intention; in place or in number, indivisible, that is, according to its proper essence. Where Averroes [says]: "It is possible that this judging power, all simultaneously, be the same in subject, and indivisible, but through the intentions which it receives is divisible, as we say of an apple that it is indivisible in subject and divisible according to the diverse accidents in it—namely, smell, color, and taste; thus the question is dissolved thus, since this power, insofar as it is divisible, comprehends numbered divisible things, and insofar as it is the same, judges them by a single judgment." And on On the Soul 3, comment 9, he says it has been earlier declared that whatever power apprehends otherness between two, it is necessary that it be one in one way, and many in another—namely, by two different dispositions. In this judgment also all expositors agree. This response of this vicar therefore, truth reproves, nor does the proper Lord approve, but impugns.

Further, how can in the same indivisible soul, and in the same indivisible power of it, things so opposed, so contrary, so perfect, and so actual be simultaneously, as for example, science and ignorance with respect to the same thing—indeed science and deception, and contrary opinion, both in particular and in act, and simultaneously; willing and not willing, love and hate in particular and in act, and simultaneously, with respect to the same thing; the highest virtues and contrary vices to them; the highest goodness, and the highest privative malice opposed to it, and the highest positive contrary; the highest happiness, and the highest opposed misery? For I know, and you know, and who does not know, that by common experience teaching, and by the harmonious judgment of the philosophers attesting, things privatively opposed and positively contrary are by nature apt to come to be in the same susceptible of both successively, not simultaneously, especially in complete act. Are you not ashamed to confess that in your soul and in you are all errors and heresies, all vices and sins, concupiscences, malices, and spiritual miseries in act, and that they remain there inseparably?

But I know your fictitious little response: for you say that, although there is the same soul of all, it does not on this account follow that there is the same knowledge of all, because the imaginative intentions, which are related to the intellect as sensibles to sense—of which the intellect therefore necessarily has need in knowing—are diverse in different individuals. This imaginative response of yours, however, even if it can in some way avoid the identity of knowledge in all, cannot avoid the other unfittingnesses adduced above; nay, neither will it be able to avoid identity of knowledge, since at least there will be the same habitual knowledge in all, since all habitual knowledge is in the intellect, which is the same in all. According to what was said before, anyone whatever can therefore actually use any knowledge whatever when he wills, considering actually and knowing whatever, at least by the science of a simply universal proposition, of which the terms (or similars properly) are not had in the imaginary power.

Further, let two be posited: a Philosopher and a layman or a cleric ignorant of demonstrations, similar or equal in the imaginative and in all other material powers and their intentions; and let the Philosopher have a demonstration to some subtle conclusion, but the other none. Then the Philosopher has certain knowledge of that conclusion, and demonstratively knows it; therefore so does the other—since they are similar and equal in the imaginative power and its intentions—which, however, who does not know to be false? Are there not also many things understood to which no true imaginary intentions correspond? That, however, you suppose imaginary intentions to be related to the intellect as sensibles to sense, and the intellect to need them necessarily in cognizing anything, seems true, and is in agreement with the judgment of the philosophers in the beginning, when the intellect is as a bare tablet on which nothing is painted or written, until the species of cognoscibles are acquired. But when they have been acquired, and fully painted and written in the intellect, why can it not read them through them, and cognize things through them, without further action or motion of imaginary intentions? For what is now perfectly generated, perfectly formed, perfectly completed, does not seem to need further a generator, but perhaps a conserver. Further, who doubts that the intellect is a more perfect power than the material powers, the sensitive virtues? But these, when they have been fully informed by the species of objects, always, as long as the species remain, can sufficiently through them cognize those objects, without being moved by those objects or by any others whatever. Who concerning the interior virtues and senses—imaginative, cogitative, and memorative—does not perceive this in himself? Who, moreover, even slightly advanced in natural [philosophy] does not also notice this?

Who has not experienced those experiments recited at the beginning of the Perspectiva of Alhacen: namely, that with the sight intuiting strong visibles long and stably, and turning itself away from there, or even closing itself, the prior vision remains, or the appearance and likeness of the previous vision; which vision indeed is necessarily proven? Wherefore the Philosopher in On Sleep and Wakefulness says: "When we continually sense something, the passion follows for those who transfer according to sense, as from the Sun to darkness; for it happens that one sees nothing on account of the still subsisting motion in the eyes from the light. And if we look at one color for a long time, whether white or green, of such kind it seems whatever sight we transfer to. And if, looking at the Sun or some splendid thing, we close [our eyes], to those observing—according to the direction in which it happens that the sight sees—it seems first indeed of such color, then it changes into red, then into purple, until it comes into black color and vanishes." Reason also clearly shows the same: for let it be posited that omnipotent God preserves in the eye the species received from an object, the object being destroyed, and any species of it in the medium outside sight; and the sight will have or can have all its intrinsic operation as before; and it will see, or can see, as before; for nothing required is lacking. For object and medium are in no way required, except for the species to be generated in the eye, or, once generated, to be conserved. Why therefore should one not similarly judge concerning the most noble power of the intellect?

The intellect therefore in the beginning, when it is wholly potential, needs such extrinsic intentions moving, informing, and actuating it; but when it shall have stood fully informed and actuated, it does not need them further, but from then on can through itself and its intrinsic [content] sufficiently cognize all things. Indeed, from then on they seem to it to hinder rather than help, in that they distract the intellect from sincere speculation and its perfect operation. Wherefore Avicenna On the Soul 3, showing how the animal powers help the rational soul in many things, [says]: "The human soul is helped by the body for acquiring the principles of consenting and understanding; then, when it has acquired them, it will return to itself. If, however, some of the powers which are below it should obstruct, and impede it by some dispositions, they will draw it back from its action; if, however, it has not been impeded, it will not need it afterwards in its proper actions, except in some only, in which there is need to return to the imaginative virtues, and to consider them again, in order that it may perceive a principle other than that which it had had, and they help to represent that which is desired in the imagination, and the representation of it in the imagination be confirmed by the help of the intellect; this, however, happens in the beginning only, and not afterwards, except little. When, however, the soul advances, and is strengthened, it operates its operations alone through itself absolutely; the sensible and imaginative virtues, however, and the other corporeal virtues, draw it back from its action; for example, as a man who at one time needs a beast of burden, and its equipage, by which he may arrive where he proposes; when he has arrived there, the cause which had been [the cause] of arriving is the same that prohibits." The same in Metaphysics 9, last [section]: "When a form is described in the soul, the apprehension seen is perfected there; but it does not make [one] delight, nor harm certainly, except this which is described in the soul, not what is outside; whatever, however, is described in the soul performs its action, although it does not have a cause from outside; for the essential cause is this description, the extrinsic, however, is caused by accident, or cause of cause."

Further, who does not know that every cognitive power cognizes properly through a proper intrinsic immanent act, not through anything extrinsic properly? Why therefore, the layman well disposed in body and in all corporeal powers, having in his soul most clear scientific acts and most clear actual knowledge, cannot use them when he wills, cannot perceive them? Why can he not see so great a light in his house? For he could through the corporeal eye, if he had proportionate light in the corporeal eye; indeed even through the rudest touch, proportionally informed by the senses, he would perceive and feel.

Further, perhaps with hardened forehead you will add to respond, saying that the possible intellect, or rational soul, is not the essential form of man through which he exists, but a certain heavenly intelligence, which perfects man only by cognizing, and through its action only is coupled with man. For in that comment 5 you say thus: "Let us therefore say that it is manifest that man is not understanding in act, except on account of the continuation of the intellect understood with him in act. And it is also manifest that matter and form are coupled to each other, so that what is gathered from them is one—and especially the material intellect and the intellective intention in act. For what is composed from them is not some third thing other than them, as is the case with other things composed from matter and form. The continuation therefore of the understood with man, it is impossible that it be, except through the continuation of one of these two parts with him, namely the part which is of him as it were matter, and the part which is of him, namely the intellect as it were form. And since it has been declared from the aforesaid doubts that it is impossible that the understood be completed in each of the men, and be numbered through the numbering of them, through the part which is of him as it were matter—namely, the material intellect—it remains that the continuation of the understood things with us men is through the continuation of the intentions understood with us. And the imaginative intentions are, namely the part which is in us of them, in some way as form. And therefore to say that a boy is understanding in potency can be understood in two ways, of which one is, because the imagined forms which are in him are intelligibles in potency; the second, however, is because the material intellect, which is by nature apt to receive the understood through the intention of that imagined form, is receiving in potency, and continued with us in potency. It has therefore been declared that the first perfection of the intellect differs from the first perfections of the other powers of the soul, and that this name 'perfection' is said of them in an equivocal mode."

And below at comment 19: "It is to be opined," you say, "according to Aristotle, that the last of the abstract intelligibles in order is this material intellect." And in comment 20, on that word of the text, "The passible intellect is corruptible," you say that "Intellect is taken in four ways: for the material intellect, for the intellect in habit, for the agent intellect, and for the imaginative virtue," intimating that there it is taken for the imaginative virtue. And below at 33 you say plainly: "The action of the intellect is other than the action of the cogitative virtue, which Aristotle called the passible intellect, and said it to be generable and corruptible; and man is not generable and corruptible except through this virtue." And in that comment 20 you join thus: "And through this intellect which Aristotle called passible, men differ in the four virtues spoken of in the Topics; and through this intellect man differs from other animals."

And who does not know that man is constituted in the being and species of man through the same essential form by which he differs essentially from other species? The essential form of man, therefore, by which he is man and differs essentially from other species, is not the rational soul, immaterial and immortal, but another form, material, generable and corruptible—namely, the imaginative or cogitative virtue, as you seem to think. But who would so think, unless perhaps a senseless one? For who, unless irrationally irrational, does not know that man is a rational animal, and that rationality is also his essential difference, by which he is essentially defined in being and placed in the species of man and separated from other animals? Wherefore his essential form is the rational soul—rational, I say, not only by participation and improperly, but essentially through itself and properly, according to the distinction of the Philosopher in Ethics 1, at the end. Further, if the essential and ultimate form of man were a material form and essentially irrational, and rational only according to participation and influence from the lowest of the heavenly intelligences, man would by himself and essentially—namely, through all his essentials—be an irrational animal, nor ought "rational" to be placed in his essential definition. For in an essential definition nothing accidental or extrinsic is to be placed. According to this same irrational reason, moreover, irrational animals could be called rational; for they participate somehow in reason, for they receive discipline from man. Since also their souls are material, and similar to the material souls, or essential and proper forms, of men, and differ only in materiality, in subtlety and rudeness according to more and less—why cannot irrational animals participate in some manner and receive some influence of reason from that intelligence, just as man, and be called rational, just as man? And if you should say that man is not a rational animal before the material intellect is actually coupled with him, you will necessarily say consequently that infants are not men nor rational animals, and that they are changed from one species into another—from the irrational and bestial to the rational and human—wherefore men can also similarly be changed back.

Further, how and through what is the intellect coupled with this singular man? Only through its operation and intellection, by your own testimony. And what other mode could be given? The intellect therefore is the efficient cause of this coupling, wherefore also naturally prior to it. But is not having intellect naturally prior to understanding or operating through it, just as having sight is prior to seeing through it, and so concerning all active forms and powers universally? Do not you yourself in comment 18, speaking of the agent and recipient intellect, say thus: "Since we find ourselves to act through these two virtues when we will, and nothing acts except through its form, it was necessary to attribute these two virtues of intellect to us"?

Further, the immaterial intellect, that is, that heavenly intelligence, is either only in the heaven, in the lunar orb, or in men. If only in the heaven, how does man understand and act through a form and knowledge so distant from him? If in men, either in men alone, or also in all other things subject to the lunar orb. If in all others, this seems very marvelous and incredible, and contrary to Philosophy and to common opinion. What reason or authority therefore compels to this? Why, moreover, do not other higher and more perfect intelligences similarly fill the whole space subject to their orbs? That intelligence, moreover, is of only finite entity, wherefore also of presentiality, repletivity, and occupativity simply only finite. So great therefore could the space of the lunar orb be that it would not suffice for filling and occupying the whole, indeed not even down to the earth; and if it were so, still it would seem that man is a rational animal and can reason as before. If, however, it is posited only in men, how will it be in men distant from one another, neither coupled to one another nor to some third thing, and not in the medium? Moreover, so many men could be, and have so many bodies and so great, and be so distant, that it would not suffice for occupying them fully, as the foregoing reason touched on.

Further, just as the vegetative soul to the vegetable, and the sensitive soul to the sensible, so also the rational soul to the rational animal: for they seem proportional. Just as therefore the vegetative and sensitive soul to the vegetable and sensible, so the rational soul to the rational animal is related. But each of these is the essential form, substance, act, species, ratio, and "what it was to be" of that of which it is, animating, actuating, and informing the same itself essentially through itself and properly, constituting, perfecting, and inhering, as reason clearly shows, and the Philosopher plainly attests in On the Soul 2, investigating the definition of the soul, and showing it when investigated. Wherefore one is to judge similarly concerning the rational soul. Does not the Philosopher, defining soul universally, say that it is "a substance, as the species of a physical body having life in potency," in On the Soul 2.4, where the text which you expound says that "the soul is the form of the natural body"? On which, showing that the soul is form, and how it differs from accidental form in two ways, you write thus: "That, however, it is substance according to form is manifest from this, that it is other than accident; since accident is not part of such a composite substance, but form is part of such a composite substance. And also it is said equivocally that form is in a subject, and that accident is in a subject; for the subject of accident is a body composed of matter and form, that is, something existing in act, and does not need accident in its being. The subject of form, however, does not have being in act according as it is subject, except through form, and needs form that it may be in act."

The same judgment also can be had from the Philosopher writing thus below at 7: "Whence one ought not to inquire whether soul and body are one, just as neither wax and figure, nor at all the matter of any whatever, and that of which it is matter. For this 'one' and 'being,' since it is said in many ways, properly is what is act." Which also below at 8 he shows by an example of the axe and its substance, namely its form; and at the ninth, by an example of the eye and sight, which is its substance according to reason, namely its form. Where also he subjoins: "It is necessary therefore to take what is in the part, in the whole living body. For proportionally [the relation] is just as part to part: the whole sense to the whole sensitive body insofar as it is such; wherefore also universally as one soul to its animated [thing], so any other whatever to its [own]."

Wherefore also the Philosopher there at 7: "If," he says, "one ought to say something common in every soul, it will be the first act of an organic physical body." What is in every soul, except in every species, in the threefold species of soul? Does not also the same Philosopher in On the Heavens and the World 1.2 say that "the whole and all are determined by three; for those things which we call two we say 'both' and 'two both,' but we do not say 'all'; but of three we first say this predication"? The Philosopher therefore, defining soul, understands universally of any whatever.

But I know your cavilling little response. For you say: "He introduced this discourse in the form of doubt, when he said 'If,' etc." For who does not know that "if" does not always exclude affirmation and include doubt, just as neither does "it seems" or "perhaps," as many places of Philosophy demonstrate? Does he not for this reason at once subjoin below at 8: "Universally therefore it has been said what soul is; for it is the substance which is according to reason; this, however, is what it was to be of such a body"? Where your translation also has: "We have already said therefore what soul is universally, and it is substance according to this intention." Nor ought it to move anyone that the Philosopher says below at 11 that some parts of the soul are not act of the body. For through this he assigns the difference between acts of the soul separable from the body and inseparable [from it], saying that the parts of the soul vegetative and sensitive in animals are not separable from the body, because they are acts of certain parts of the animal—namely, acts inhering properly to certain parts of animals, as material forms coextended with their proper matter; wherefore they cannot be separated from their matter. The rational soul, however, is not such an act of any part of the body, nor of the whole; wherefore it is also separable from them, as the sailor from the ship, as the Philosopher there intimates. Wherefore below at 21, speaking of the intellect, he says expressly that "this only happens to be separated as the perpetual from the corruptible; the other parts of the soul, however, manifestly are not separable." Nor ought it to move that he says above in the same 21: "Concerning the intellect, however, and the speculative power, nothing is yet manifest, but it seems to be another genus of soul"—as though it were not comprehended in the general definition of soul previously [given]. For he understands that nothing special and proper concerning the intellectual soul is yet manifest through some special and proper definition and determination, just as concerning the other souls; indeed, not before the third book following, which is specially about it.

Further, who does not know that nature is the principle and cause of moving and being at rest in that in which it is first per se, and not according to accident, Physics 2.3? Wherefore that which moves an animal progressively is its essential form, namely the soul itself essentially and properly informing—which reason proves and the philosophers attest. But man is moved progressively, speaks, eats, and similarly operates through the rational soul—namely through the rational will, which doubtless it is established to be a certain power or part of the rational soul. For he is not moved by the aforesaid motions by other souls, or by another soul. For this would seem most of all from the bestial soul, from the concupiscible and irascible soul or virtue; but then he would not be moved freely by such motions, but necessarily, as a brute. We see, moreover, and feel, that with the concupiscitive virtue exciting one most strongly to be moved, to pursue allurements, he restrains himself by the judgment and will of free reason; that also with the same concupiscitive, or irascitive, or fugitive virtue drawing one back most strongly from some difficult, sorrowful, terrible, virtuous work, he nonetheless freely does it; otherwise the whole of moral Philosophy would be useless and empty. Moreover, of two men equally affected in all corporeal virtues and sensitive powers, one is moved, the other is not moved; one pursues vice or virtue, but the other flees, according to the difference of their rational wills. For "in the soul or in the rational part of the soul, according to the Philosopher, is will; in the irrational, however, concupiscence and anger"; although also according to the same, "animals also share in will," which is nothing but their sensual concupiscence. The rational will therefore and the rational soul moves man progressively and by the other recalled motions. In this judgment also all the philosophers agree whose writings I have been able to find; nay, also you yourself on On the Soul 3, where the Philosopher treats this matter. The rational soul therefore is the nature of man and his essential form, constituting, actuating, and informing him essentially, through itself first and properly.

Further, doubtless this senseless judgment is repugnant to the judgment of Aristotle. For Aristotle holds and teaches that the rational soul is not educed from the potency of matter, as other [souls] are, but comes from outside, and is made in each singular man, and does not temporally precede him, but eternally succeeds him, as his various books attest. For in On the Soul 1.65, he says: "The intellect seems to be a certain substance existing, and not to be corrupted." Where also the translation which you expound has thus: "The intellect, however, seems to be some substance which is made in you and is not corrupted." And the Philosopher there understands by "intellect" the material intellect—namely, the intellective soul—as his process indicates evidently, which you yourself also attest. Who in On the Generation of Animals 2.6, which is On Animals 16 in the old translation, and 18 in the new, inquires whether all souls enter in the matter, in the seed, in potency namely and virtue, or none; or whether all come from outside, or none; or whether these in this way, and these not. And responding, having shown that it is not possible for corporeal souls to come from outside, he subjoins: "It remains, however, that intellect alone comes from outside, and is divine alone. For nothing of corporeal operation communicates with its operation." Where he also teaches that corporeal souls are not separable from the body, but the intellect alone. The same in Metaphysics 12.17 and 18, setting out the difference between efficient and formal causes, says thus: "Moving causes indeed [are] as previously made, existing; but those which are as ratio [are] simultaneous; for when a man is being healed, then health also is, and the figure of a bronze sphere. If, however, something afterwards remains, it must be examined. For in some it is no impediment, as if there is such a soul—not all, but the intellect; for all, perhaps, [is] impossible." Where you also write: "He said 'perhaps,' because the demonstration concerning this is not [the business] of this art, but of the book On the Soul." The same judgment in Problems and in the Secret of Secrets in various places he seems to affirm. Does not also in the booklet On the Death of Aristotle his plain judgment be recited: that the rational soul is created by God, and that they are individuals of individuals, to be rewarded or punished after death according to the requirement of merits?

This judgment of Aristotle Avicenna and Algazel imitate: Avicenna On the Soul 5.3, Algazel Physics 4, last [section], showing that rational souls are many according to the multitude of human bodies, nor however are they corporeally impressed on bodies, nor do they precede bodies temporally, but are created in them; where they also reprove and refute this judgment of yours. That also the rational soul does not die with the body, but even after death remains eternally, and is rewarded or punished according to the suitability of merits, the same philosophers plainly teach: Avicenna On the Soul 5.4 and Metaphysics 9, last [section]; Algazel Physics 4, last [section], and Physics 5.1. Indeed, this marvelous wisdom of yours all wise philosophers, all wiser prophets, all laws, all peoples and tongues, and all individual men taught by the instinct of nature, except perhaps very few seduced by your unlearned doctrine, harmoniously argue against and condemn.

Further, with the first supposition attended to, and the parts following understood, who doubts that omnipotent God could have given, and could give, individual rational souls to individual men, just as also to other animals individual irrational souls, just as also to other natural things individual proper forms? He could indeed, He could and can; and it more befits God most powerful and most bountiful to have done and to do thus rather than otherwise. Which also similarly more befits men for many natural and moral causes. Why therefore is not this judgment rather than yours to be held—especially since this is so renowned, and the contrary so infamous; this is favorable to all, that hateful to all; this fortified by so many and such great reasons and authorities, that scarcely colored fallaciously by the slender shadow of reason or authority? For the stronger of the reasons which seem to help you—which, however, I do not recall to have come out of your quiver—is such: If it were not as you say, the rational soul would be created from nothing, which all the philosophers deny. But here Plato and the Platonists would respond, by avoiding the consequence though not the consequent, through the circular return of the same souls into diverse or the same bodies through the alternations of times. I, however, confess the consequence and the consequent, as the philosophers above mentioned, as also all the prophets and laws, just as also the parts above demonstrated the possibility of creation from nothing.

You could also argue, according to the Philosophy of certain ones, that if there were any rational souls separated from bodies through death, they would be entirely idle, since they move no body, just as they argue concerning the heavenly Intelligences. But what consequence? Or what color? "The rational spirit does not have this operation, therefore none, but is entirely idle." Are there not many other actions besides corporeal motion? Indeed, the motion of the heavenly body or another is an action of the rational spirit very accidental and extraneous; but its action most essential, natural, and proper, is to understand, love, and contemplate. Indeed, its most natural action, most perfect, and most blessed, is to know and love God fully, to adhere to Him blessedly, and to enjoy Him beatifically—as all who have tasted ever so little of true Philosophy harmoniously profess. Wherefore also the rational heavenly spirits are more appropriately named not "Movents" or movers, from moving, but "Intelligences," from understanding. Wherefore not improbably could it seem that the more the Intelligences are given over to fewer—indeed lesser—extrinsic operations, the more blessed they exist; for the less are they distracted from divine contemplation, beatific adhesion, and fruition, and the more freely can they be at leisure for it and possess it more integrally.

Further, perhaps you argue that in the Intelligences in the same species there is not, nor can there be, numerical plurality; wherefore neither in rational souls by similar reason. But by what reason? Indeed, by what similarity of reason will you prove the assumption? Are not the essential and accidental actions of Intelligences, of which was touched on above, of the same species? For who will demonstrate in them an essential specific diversity? Could not, according to the seventeenth and thirty-third parts of this work, God annihilate any Intelligence, and create another most similar to it in species and in degree? Wherefore He could similarly, with another intelligence remaining, create another most similar to it, and conserve both equally; and so three and four, and further, however many He willed; otherwise He would by no means seem fully omnipotent.

Further, you do not cease to babble, but say: "If we shall posit that the material Intellect is numbered through the numbering of the individuals of men, it would follow that, if it is something, this would be either body or virtue in body"—namely, a corporeal power corporeally and materially extended, as it is established other souls are. But this consequence, as unconnected as it is unfit, as inartificial and as informal, ought to allure or move no individual of scientific or vulgar men having the congruent virtue of intellect, as the foregoing manifest. For who does not know that omnipotent God can multiply rational immaterial souls according to the multitude of men and human bodies? Many Intelligences also moving the heavenly orbs are, or could be, of the same essential species, as was shown above; wherefore all rightly philosophizing, all prophets and laws, concede the antecedent of your consequence, but deny the consequent. The other arguments of yours, however, as ridiculous, are rather worthy to be despised than gathered up to the care of response, or admitted. For as the Philosopher says: "It is foolish to be solicitous about anyone bringing forth contraries to opinions." And again: "To examine all opinions perhaps is more vain; it suffices, however, [to examine] those which superficially either appear or are judged to have some reason."

37. AGAINST PHILOSOPHERS WHO DENY THAT THE MOTION OF THE HEAVENS AND THE GENERATION OF MEN CAN CEASE, THAT THE DEAD CAN RISE AGAIN WITH THEIR BODIES, THAT THE GOOD CAN ASCEND TO THE HEAVENS AND THE EVIL DESCEND TO HELL, AND THAT BOTH CAN THUS LIVE FOR ALL ETERNITY

Let the philosophers cease — those who deny that the motion of the heavens and the generation and succession of men can cease, that the dead can rise again with their bodies, that the good can ascend to the heavens and the evil descend to hell, and that both can thus live for all eternity. For Aristotle and Averroes seem to maintain that the motion of the heavens, and the generation and succession of men, are necessarily eternal. The Epicureans likewise, and many other philosophers, plainly deny the possibility of the resurrection of human bodies and of any reward of men after death. With these Pliny too, in the second book of his Natural History, writes in agreement: "But the chief consolations of the imperfect nature in man are that not even God can do all things. For neither can He bring death upon Himself, even if He should wish (which He has granted to man as the best gift in the midst of so many penalties of life), nor can He bestow eternity on mortals or call back the deceased, nor make it that one who has lived has not lived, or that one who has held honors has not held them; nor has He any right over the past except that of oblivion — by which things, beyond doubt, the power of nature is declared, and this it is which we call God."

Whence the blessed Augustine, on that verse of Psalm 88, "as the moon perfect for ever, and a faithful witness in heaven," in the second tractate, says: "In no matter is there such vehement, such pertinacious, such obstinate and contentious contradiction of the Christian faith as concerning the resurrection of the flesh. For concerning the immortality of the soul many of the philosophers of the gentiles also have disputed at length, and have left to memory in many and varied books written that the soul is immortal; but when it comes to the resurrection of the flesh, they do not waver but most openly contradict; and their contradiction is such that they say it cannot come to pass that this earthly flesh should be able to ascend to heaven."

But could not He who, according to the 33rd and 34th parts, was able to create the world, and is able to annihilate it, also make its motion to cease? And how otherwise would He be omnipotent and have a will universally efficacious according to the 7th and 8th parts above, especially since this includes no contradiction, as appears from the 34th part? This therefore must be ascribed to God, as the first supposition proves. Moreover, the celestial mover is either God or not God. If God: since He moves voluntarily, and according to the 8th part has free will — why then can He not cease? If not God, He is inferior and lesser than God; therefore God, of most free and most efficacious will, can make him cease and bring his mobile to rest. He also, according to what was said before in the demonstration of the 32nd part, made the Moon at the customary full moon swiftly turn back to the Sun and so wondrously eclipse it; He made the Sun retreat and stand still — why could He not make the motion of the heavens cease?

Again, if God can make the motion of the heavens cease, why not also the motion of human generation, especially since the former seems more regular, less impeded, and more necessary; and this second particle can be shown as the first. Likewise, if the generation of men is necessarily to remain, this is either from men alone — which does not seem so, since they generate freely; or from celestial motion — which does not seem so, because that can cease; or from God — which does not seem so, because if He acts in this matter, then since according to the 8th part He is a rational agent, by free will He could not act.

Furthermore, if the creation and re-creation of things — indeed of the whole world — is possible according to the 33rd and 34th parts, and a virgin's conceiving and bearing a son according to the 35th part, why not the resurrection of men and of dead bodies, whose possibility can likewise be demonstrated? Moreover, since God, according to what is said above in the demonstration of the 32nd part, works miracles of every kind, why could He not work this miracle? Indeed He has worked it on several occasions, as was there recounted. Furthermore, God has a power of restoring what has perished, of repairing what has been destroyed, and of reforming what has been deformed — and not merely a finite power but absolutely an infinite one, by the 4th part of this work. He can therefore raise up any dead thing.

Likewise, some created power can put living things to death — such as diseases, swords, and poisons; but God forbid that any small and finite created thing should be more powerful for destroying than God for repairing, on account of the foregoing. And if you should say that these things are true if there were in the matter some power of returning, but it is not so, because there is no possible regression from privation to habit, as the philosophers attest — it appears that you measure divine power according to the manner of the power of created agents. For these in acting require a natural power in the matter subject to them, but God by no means, since He can create from nothing, and since He can recreate every power, matter, and thing destroyed — even annihilated — by the 33rd part of this work. Nor is it altogether most certain that no regression is possible from privation to habit; for in many cases it happens that one who has lost something recovers what was lost. This is therefore not certain, especially in respect of God's great power. Nor do these philosophers bring forward any efficacious argument; and an evident argument has already been brought against them. To which side then ought we rather to adhere?

And who does not know how many histories attest that men, at least according to their bodies, were transformed into beasts? Does not that great book of Ovid's Metamorphoses testify this in many places? Whence it took its name. But most plainly in book 14, chapter 5, where it is expressly recounted how Circe by her songs transformed the companions of Ulysses, changing them into beasts; and below in chapter 8 of the same, the like is told of the conversion of the companions of Diomedes into birds. Nor can anyone say that these and all such things are poetic fictions and fabulous lies. For many authors make mention of that most famous sorceress Circe and of her marvelous works.

Boethius, in book 4 of On the Consolation of Philosophy, meter 3, recounts the aforesaid transformation of Ulysses' companions when they came to this Circe, whom he calls a goddess, by virtue of certain enchanted potions she made. Solinus, in book 2 of On the Marvels of the World, says that Circe inhabited the Circaean mountains, falsifying various images by the wickedness of her enchantments. Papias in his Elementary says: "Circe, daughter of the Sun, who is said to have changed Ulysses' companions; Circe is an island of the East; the Circaean is a mountain where Circe dwelt." Pliny too, in book 7 of his Natural History, reports a race of the Marsi who descended from Circe and have a natural force against the venoms of serpents.

Concerning whom Solinus also, in book 1 of On the Marvels of the World, says: "It is no wonder that the people of the Marsi are unharmed by serpents. They trace their lineage from a son of Circe, and they know that, by the power she possessed, the service of poisons is owed to them."

Girgith too, daughter of Circe, wrote a certain book in On Magical Images.

Euvantes, as Pliny recounts in book 8 of his Natural History, hands down that the Arcadians used to be led to a certain pool of Italy, and with their clothing hung upon an oak swam across, and went away into the wilderness, and were transfigured into wolves, and gathered with others of the same kind for nine years, during which time, if they had abstained from human flesh, they returned to the same pool, and when they had swum across, they recovered their former shape, with the addition of nine years' aging. Where likewise it is recounted that Fabius says that the same man recovered his clothing; and it is written there too that Ithacopas relates how a certain Demainetus, in a sacrifice which the Arcadians made on the Lycaean mount with a human victim, tasted the entrails of an immolated boy and was turned into a wolf, and the same was restored in the tenth year.

Solinus too, in book 2 of On the Marvels of the World, writes thus: "There is an island which faces the shore of Apulia, distinguished by the tomb and shrine of Diomedes, and it alone nourishes the Diomedean birds." Concerning which, after recounting many marvels, he adds: "For this reason they say that the companions of Diomedes were turned into birds." Whence Papias also: "They assert that Diomedes is the Pagan god, and his companions were turned into birds, whence they are called Diomedean birds, in Greek Erodii."

The Greeks too attest that the companions of Diomedes were turned into birds, and confirm this not by fabulous and poetic lying but by historical attestation; which Augustine also recounts in City of God, book 18, chapter 16. This same thing Varro too strives to confirm in many ways, of which Augustine in City of God book 18, chapter 18 says: "This" — namely the aforesaid conversion of the companions of Diomedes — "Varro, in order to establish, mentions other things no less incredible: concerning that most famous sorceress Circe, who likewise changed the companions of Ulysses into beasts; and concerning the Arcadians, who, drawn by lot, swam across a certain pool, and there were converted into wolves, and lived with similar wild beasts in the desert places of that region. But if they did not feed on human flesh, after nine years, having swum back across the same pool, they were reformed into men. Finally he even named expressly a certain Demainetus, who tasted of the sacrifice which the Arcadians used to perform with an immolated boy on their Lycaean mount, and was turned into a wolf, and in the tenth year was restored to his proper figure, exercised himself in boxing, and conquered in the Olympic contest. Nor for any other reason does the same historian think that such a name was attached in Arcadia to Pan Lycaean and Jupiter Lycaean except on account of this transformation of men into wolves, since they would not believe that it could happen unless divinely. For 'wolf' in Greek is Lycos, whence the name 'Lycaean' appears to be derived. The Roman Luperci too, he says, sprang as it were from the seed of those mysteries."

Isidore too, Etymologies 11, last chapter, says: "Certain monstrous transformations of men and changes into beasts are written about, as concerning that great and most famous Circe, who is said to have changed the companions of Ulysses into beasts; and concerning the Arcadians, who, drawn by lot, swam across a certain pool, and there were converted into wolves. For they confirm that the companions of Diomedes were turned into birds, not by fabulous lying but by historical affirmation. But some assert that Striges are made from men. For the figures of wicked men are changed for many acts of robbery, and either by magical chants or by the poisons of herbs they pass over with their whole bodies into wild beasts. Indeed, by nature also many things receive change, and corrupted things are transformed into diverse species: as bees from the rotted flesh of calves; as beetles from horses; locusts from mules; scorpions from crabs."

Furthermore, in the Marvels of Ireland it is read that in the parts of Ulster certain men and women are turned into wolves and after seven years return. Solinus too, in book 3 of On the Marvels of the World, reports that the Neuri in summer are changed into wolves and again changed back. How great, moreover, is the rumor in modern times in England and France about certain men who, by some property or infirmity of constitution, are at times turned into wolves and exercise the works of wolves; and when the passion has subsided, they return again to themselves.

Likewise Augustine, City of God 18, chapter 19: "When we were in Italy," he says, "we used to hear such things of a certain region of those parts, where they used to say that women innkeepers, imbued with these evil arts, were accustomed to give in cheese to whomever they wished or could of travelers, by which they would forthwith be turned into beasts of burden and carry whatever was needed; and after these tasks were performed, they would again return to themselves; nor yet was the mind in them made bestial, but the rational and human mind was preserved."

With which agreeing, William of Malmesbury, in book 2 of On the Deeds of the English, relates: a certain entertainer named Ephoebus was received in lodging by two old women dwelling on the public road by which one goes to Rome. They made him appear to himself and others as an ass, and as an ass — which nevertheless performed its accustomed gesticulations as best it could — to the great laughter of many; until at last, having rolled in water, he returned to his pristine state.

Does not Apuleius also, in his book of Metamorphoses, which he names On the Golden Ass, plainly recount about himself: that wishing to learn from a certain sorceress the art by which men were changed into beasts, and this experimentally upon himself, he was changed into an ass; and before he could be changed back, having been wickedly placed in a certain house, he was carried off by certain robbers who came upon it and stripped it, with packs placed upon him; and afterward, transformed back, he wrote the aforesaid book about that transformation of his, not in meter but in prose, as the same book makes plain to its readers.

Is not also the art of such transformations and reformatations handed down — or feigned to be handed down — in Plato's Cow, in which many other shameful, superstitious, and magical things are contained? Moreover, Ovid, Metamorphoses 3, relates that a certain Tiresias was changed from a woman into a man; nor is it necessary that this be said to be a lie or a poetic fiction. For Pliny, in book 7 of his Natural History, writes thus: "That women are changed into males is not fabulous; we find in the Annals that, under the consuls Licinius Crassus and Cassius Longinus, a boy was made out of a girl in his parents' presence, and by the order of the soothsayers was transported to a desert island. Licinius Mucianus reported that he had seen at Argos one Ariston who had married, and presently a beard and virility came forth, and he took a wife. Of the same fate too was a boy he had seen at Smyrna. I myself in Africa saw Lucius, a citizen of Tisdrita, changed into a man on the day of marriage."

Augustine also says, in Questions on the Old and New Law 57, that in the time of the Emperor Constantius it is well known that a girl in a part of Campania was changed into a male and brought to Rome.

The History of the Britons, in book 8, also relates that, when Uther king of the Britons besieged Gorlois duke of Cornwall in his castle Dimuliot, and Gorlois' wife Igerna, whom the king most ardently desired, was placed in another of his most secure castles, Tintagel; and Uther consulting Ulfin his familiar, and after Ulfin, Merlin the seer then present, how he might obtain his desire — Merlin answered: "That you may obtain your wish, you must use new arts unheard of in your time. I know how by my medicaments to give you the figure of Gorlois, so that you appear in all things to be him. If therefore you obey, I will make you wholly to resemble him, and Ulfin to resemble Iordanus of Tintagel, his familiar, and I myself shall be present as a third in another aspect; and you shall be able safely to enter the town to Igerna and have access." And it follows: "The king therefore obeyed and applied a diligent mind. At last, having committed the siege to his familiars, he committed himself to Merlin's medicaments, and was transfigured into the likeness of Gorlois. Ulfin too was changed into Iordanus, Merlin into Britael, so that none could tell what they had been; and so coming to Igerna, and being received in all respects as Gorlois, he begat upon her that famous Arthur. And while these things were being done, the castle was taken and the duke slain." And it follows: "Messengers came to Igerna who would announce both the death of the duke and the issue of the siege. But when they perceived the king in the figure of the consul sitting beside her, blushing they marveled that one whom they had reported slain in the siege had thus preceded them in safety. For they did not know what medicaments Merlin had compounded. The king then, going forth, sought his army, and having put off the figure of Gorlois, returned to being Uther."

Do not the famous and sacred writings also indicate that a certain rod was turned into a serpent and back again, and certain other rods turned into dragons? And water turned into blood, and the dust of the earth into gnats? That Nebuchadnezzar was so transformed that his heart was changed from a human one and the heart of a beast was given to him, and he was driven out from men, and ate hay with the beasts like an ox, until seven seasons changed over him, and when these were completed his sense returned to him, and his figure too returned to him? Which transformation Jerome, expounding that place, supports and confirms by many similar examples. Whence Josephus, Jewish Antiquities 10, chapter 9, says: "The king saw in dreams that he was about to fall from his kingdom and to dwell with beasts; and when he had spent seven years in this way in the wilderness, he would receive his dominion again. And Daniel expounded this, and as he had foretold him, so it came to pass. For when he had dwelt the aforesaid time in the wilderness, and no one had presumed during those seven years to retain dominion over affairs, he, supplicating God to receive his kingdom again, returned to him." Therefore let no one blame me for thus narrating each thing as it is found written in the ancient books.

If, therefore, such transmutation of human bodies and of other things is possible by some created power, however small and finite, as many infidels and philosophers confess, why should not the reformation of dead bodies to their former form, and a certain transformation to a certain better form or species — and so the resurrection of the dead — be possible by the power of God, indeed by His omnipotence infinitely infinite, than which none greater can be or even be thought?

Furthermore, according to common report, and according to Avicenna in the demonstration of the 32nd part above alleged, and according to Algazel, Physics 5, chapter 5, and according to certain other philosophers and gentiles, fascination is possible by the gaze and speech of certain persons, to the deterioration, wasting, and death of animals. Whence Virgil in the Bucolics, Eclogue 3:

Some eye, I know not whose, fascinates my tender lambs.

Witnesses are Isigonus and Nymphodorus, with Apollonides and Philarchus, Pliny in book 7 of his Natural History relating thus: "In Africa, certain families of those who fascinate, Isigonus and Nymphodorus hand down, by whose praise sheep perish, trees wither, infants die. Of the same kind, Isigonus adds, are men in Triballia and Illyria, who fascinate also by sight, and kill those whom they look upon for a long time, especially with angry eyes; their evil is more easily felt by the unpubescent; it is notable that they have two pupils in each eye." "Of this kind also are women in Scythia, who are called Viciae," reports Apollonides Philarchus; "and in Pontus the race of the Tibii, and many others of the same nature, whose marks he hands down: a double pupil in one eye, in the other the figure of a horse; these moreover cannot be submerged, not even when weighed down with garments." Solinus too, in book 1 of On the Marvels of the World, writes thus: "Apollonides reports that in Scythia women are born who are called Viciae; these have double pupils in their eyes, and kill by sight if they look upon anyone with anger. These are also in Sardinia."

If, therefore, a feeble creature is so powerful by sight or word alone for the deterioration or mortification of the living, why should not omnipotent God by His infinite omnipotence be powerful for similar or contrary effects, not just so much, but incomparably more? And who does not know how much necromancy and the other magical arts can do, as the theoretical and practical books of those sciences and the holy books alike attest, as common report and most frequent experience teach, as also was touched on above concerning the masteries of Cyprian in the demonstration of the 32nd part? If, therefore, those arts can do so much through the power of demons, of stars, of images, of characters, or of words, or through any other created power whatsoever — how much more can the infinite omnipotence of God? Why then can He not truly raise the dead?

If therefore, according to the foregoing, omnipotent God can quiet the heavens and raise the dead, He can also lift up those raised to celestial things, and place them with Himself, who dwells in the heavens, in the heavens. For this seems less than that, and can be shown as that. Omnipotent God too, who according to the foregoing about the 32nd part works all kinds of miracles in the heavens and on earth — why should He not be able to do this one? And if God can do this, why can He not also press down the wicked, raised with their bodies, into hell? Furthermore, if God can raise the dead to life, He can also preserve those raised in life as long as He wills; for this seems less than that, and can be shown as that.

38. AGAINST PHILOSOPHERS AND HERETICS WHO DENY THAT TEMPORAL MERIT CAN REASONABLY BE REWARDED WITH AN EVERLASTING REWARD, OR THAT TEMPORAL SIN CAN JUSTLY BE PUNISHED WITH ETERNAL PUNISHMENT

Let the philosophers and heretics be corrected — those who deny that temporal merit can reasonably be rewarded with an everlasting reward, or that temporal sin can justly be punished with eternal punishment. Does not a man at times reasonably confer land or a township upon his servant, and upon his heirs, to be possessed in perpetuity? And he would so confer it upon him, even if he were to live forever, in return for his brief temporal service. How much more does it befit God — supremely good, rich, liberal, and most fully filled with every virtue infinitely, as the first Supposition and the third and fourth parts show — similarly, or more abundantly, to reward His servants for their temporal service?

Could not God, supremely liberal and good, reasonably confer upon an angel or a man who would always live some everlasting good, not for any prior merit of theirs, but purely liberally, purely gratis? Why then could He not eternally reward one who has merited well, even if temporally — especially since God rewards everyone beyond what is fitting, according to the 31st part?

Furthermore, it befits any lord who is knowing and powerful to reward his servants according to the quality and quantity of their service and love. But everyone who serves God rightly so loves and reverences Him that, for any good however great and however lasting, he would not knowingly offend Him by omitting due service or committing anything displeasing to Him, according to the 30th part of this work. Does it not therefore most fittingly befit God, supremely knowing and supremely powerful, to repay such a servant of His with some greater good and some fuller reward, beyond any temporal good and reward whatsoever — namely with an everlasting good and reward?

And if anyone shall say that a certain goodness inseparably following a good act, according to what was set forth above on the 31st part, can be reckoned as sufficient reward — how is it that all laws decree and arrange other rewards for those who merit well? If too God does not otherwise reward one who has merited well, He rewards him sparingly, not beyond what is fitting — against the 31st part. Moreover, whoever duly worships God according to the doctrine of the 30th part of this work would never knowingly offend Him in any way for any greater good than that. How then does it befit God, supremely powerful and most copiously liberal, to reward so sparingly, so meagerly, so great a worship of such a worshipper of His? Does not even a good and powerful man more amply reward his worthy servants? Much more fittingly therefore God, infinitely better and more powerful than any man.

Furthermore: a man ought not knowingly to sin for the removal of any punishment whatsoever to be borne, or for the avoidance of any not yet borne; therefore so great a punishment can justly be imposed on him for any sin knowingly committed, and even any infinite one in respect of duration, by the 30th part of this work. Is not even a man, for a temporal offense committed against a temporal prince, condemned to perpetual prison? And if he could live eternally, he would be eternally punished in prison, and forfeits his land or fief for himself and his heirs forever — just as one convicted for a temporal offense and pronounced a forger and perjurer, and so infamous, would, if he lived eternally, be held as such eternally. Why then not similarly concerning a temporal offense committed against the supreme Prince, God?

Is not also an offense knowingly committed against a greater person — for instance, against a father or a prince — worthy of greater and longer-lasting punishment? Is not therefore an offense knowingly committed against God, who incomparably exceeds every father and prince, worthy of incomparably greater and eternal punishment? For if such an offense were worthy only of a temporal finite punishment, say of a year, then a similar offense committed against a greater person could, by a finite increase of the person, be augmented until it were worthy of equal — indeed of greater — punishment.

Furthermore, when one is sent into prison and to punishment for his sin knowingly committed against God, he by no means seems justly to be liberated until he has made satisfaction for what was committed. But how can one — if the matter is dealt with strictly and rigorously — make satisfaction to God for any sin knowingly committed against Him? For according to the 30th part, no sin ought to be knowingly committed against God, for any goods however great to be preserved or gained, or any evils however great to be removed or avoided; and to make satisfaction for sin is to render as much as, or more than, that for which the sin ought not to have been committed — as the demonstration of the 32nd part argued more fully and amply.

But if anyone shall say that the impotence of making satisfaction excuses him, this will be contradicted by what was set forth concerning the 32nd part of this work. According to this, too, it would seem that every sinner, while he sins, would be excused by the impotence of not sinning. For he cannot then not sin, but necessarily then sins. Did he not also constitute himself debtor and make himself impotent — and this through his fault, not abolished but remaining? It seems just, too, that the thief or robber who ought to make satisfaction by rendering equal or greater goods, if he cannot, should meanwhile suffer by paying penalties. For in the punishment of the sinner the honor of the offended or injured is in some way restored, satisfaction of some sort is rendered, sin is chastised, the occasion of sinning is restrained, and justice is preserved — unless perhaps the glorious indulgence of the offended intervenes.

Furthermore, the culpable impotence of making satisfaction nowhere seems to excuse from the whole, but that one ought to render as much as he can. However greatly, therefore, anyone sins against God, let him always make satisfaction and render to God according to his strength as much as he can; even if he should live eternally, he is never rendered fully excused, but is bound always to do likewise, and meanwhile, in supplement of due satisfaction of whatever sort, to bear the penalties he can. For it does not befit the best polity of the best lawgiver that one knowingly sinning, despising Him and His laws, and one not sinning; one making satisfaction and one not making satisfaction, should be regarded as alike. Is it not for this reason that in all lawful polities, just as rewards are decreed for those who merit well, so also penalties for delinquents and for those who do not make satisfaction?

If, too, satisfaction be remitted on account of impotence to make it for one knowingly sinning against God: either it is remitted necessarily and absolutely, or freely. If necessarily and absolutely — what grace is it to the remitter? For what kind of liberality is to be reckoned, if one remits what he cannot help remitting, what he cannot have, what he cannot exact in any way? And who but an ungrateful man would presume to say that the remission of debt is not a grace? If freely — He can also not remit.

Furthermore, if the sinner is excused from the debt of satisfaction on account of impotence to make it, either he is excused and rendered innocent of sin, or he is held continuously guilty of sin. If he is rendered clean and innocent of sin, he was always so, even while he was sinning, on account of the aforesaid impotence. Or if for some time he is held guilty of sin, the aforesaid impotence notwithstanding, why could he not be so for an eternal time? — especially if at no time satisfaction be made. If he is held and is guilty of sin, how great a punishment he has annexed necessarily and inseparably is taught by the demonstration of the 31st part. How also is any sinner whatsoever, so long as he remains guilty of sin, not worthily relegated from sincere beatitude and the fellowship of the blessed, and held bound in prison?

But if anyone shall answer that the essential punishment inseparably annexed is sufficient for the sin, this does not exclude the intention of this section. For it does not avoid that the sinner, for a temporal sin, is at least eternally punished by this very punishment; wherefore it does not avoid that he is eternally excluded from beatitude and the College of the blessed. This response too can be corrected by the foregoing, as the other similar response previously touched upon.

39. AGAINST PHILOSOPHERS AND HERETICS WHO DENY THAT THERE WILL BE A RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD UNTO BLESSED OR WRETCHED LIFE ACCORDING TO THE DIFFERENCE OF MERITS, AND WHO GRANT THAT IT WILL TAKE PLACE EITHER IMMEDIATELY AFTER DEATH, OR AFTER THE SPACE OF A GREAT YEAR, INTO BESTIAL OR HUMAN BODIES, ALIEN OR PROPER, UNTO A WORLDLY LIFE CUSTOMARY TO BEASTS OR MEN, TEMPORAL, TO LAST FOR THE ACCUSTOMED PERIOD; AND WHO BELIEVE UNIVERSALLY THAT THE RESURRECTION OF ALL THE DEAD, BOTH GOOD AND EVIL, WILL BE UNTO EVERLASTING LIFE AND BEATITUDE, AND OF NONE UNTO EVERLASTING PUNISHMENT AND MISERY; AND WHO ALSO SUPPOSE THAT THE GOOD WILL POSSESS ETERNAL BEATITUDE — YET NOT IN HEAVEN — AND THE WICKED WILL HAVE ETERNAL MISERY — YET NOT IN HELL — BUT THAT BOTH WILL REMAIN IN COMMON ON EARTH; SAYING MOREOVER THAT THE BODIES OF THE GOOD WILL BY NO MEANS BE TRANSFORMED TO A BETTER, PURER, AND MORE HEAVENLY CONDITION IN THE FUTURE BEATITUDE, NOR WILL THEY BE IMMORTAL THEN, BUT WILL REMAIN IN THEIR PRISTINE STATE; AND THAT THE LIVING BODIES OF THE WICKED WILL BY NO MEANS LAST ETERNALLY IN ETERNAL TORMENTS; FEIGNING ALSO IMPUDENTLY THAT THE FUTURE ETERNAL HAPPINESS OF THE GOOD MUST CONSIST IN THE CUSTOMARY PLEASURES OF THE FLESH, OR IN SOMETHING ELSE, OR IN ANY OTHER THINGS BESIDES GOD

Let the philosophers rise to the hope of life — those who deny that there will be a resurrection of the dead unto blessed or wretched life according to the difference of merits. Let them rise up to the light of a truer judgment — those who grant that there will be a resurrection of the dead, either immediately after death, or after the space of a Great Year, into bestial or human bodies, alien or proper, unto a worldly life customary to beasts or men, temporal, to last for the accustomed period; and who believe universally that the resurrection of all the dead, both good and evil, will be unto everlasting life and beatitude, and of none unto everlasting punishment and misery; supposing also that the good will possess eternal beatitude — yet not in Heaven — and the wicked will have eternal misery — yet not in hell — but that both will remain in common on earth; saying moreover that the bodies of the blessed will by no means be transformed to a better, purser, and more heavenly condition in the future beatitude, nor will they be immortal then, but will remain in their pristine state; and that the living bodies of the wicked will by no means last eternally in eternal torments; feigning also impudently that the future eternal happiness of the good must consist in the customary pleasures of the flesh, or also in something else, or in any other things besides God.

The Epicureans and Sadducees denied that there would be a future resurrection of the dead, supposing the rational soul to be mortal, as is recounted above. The senseless judgment of these men Pliny too, in book 7 of his Natural History, strives to confirm by certain unreasonable reasons, writing thus: "After burial, all the other meanderings of empty things; for everyone, the same things hold from the supreme day as before the first day; nor any more after death is there any sense of body or soul than before birth. For the same vanity propagates itself even into the future, and at the very time of death falsely promises itself life — sometimes by giving immortality to the soul, sometimes by transfiguration, sometimes by giving sense to those below, and worshipping the manes, and making a god of one who has even ceased to be a man; or really, in any way, the manner of breathing differs from the rest of the animals, when there are not many things found longer-lived in life, of which no one divines a similar immortality. Now if the body pursues the matter of the soul, where is its thinking? how does it see, hear, or how does it touch? what is its use? or what good is there in it without these? what then is its seat? or how great would be the multitude of so many ages of souls, like the puerile shadows of the elements? Like to this is the vanity, promised by Democritus, of preserving men's bodies and bringing them back to life — who himself did not come back to life. Plague upon that very evil, that life and death should be repeated! Meanwhile there is no rest if the sense of the soul remains on high, and shadows among those below. Truly this sweetness of credulity destroys the chief good of nature, death, and doubles the moment of dying; and even invents the supposition of pains to come thereafter. For if it is sweet to live, for whom can it be sweet to have lived?"

Josephus too, in book 2 of On the Jewish War, speaking of the Sadducees, says: "They generally deny rewards or punishments of souls." Of these Epicureans and Sadducees, moreover, and their opinion, even Sacred Letters make mention. Dionysius too, in On the Divine Names 6, recounts the madness of Simon, who denied the resurrection of the bodies of the dead, on the ground that it is contrary to nature, as he says.

Those, however, who grant that the resurrection will be in the future are further separated. For some say it will be immediately after death, by the entrance of souls into other bodies, bestial or human, denying any other reward or punishment after death to man. Whence Ovid, Metamorphoses 15, prefacing a pompous proem, thus says:

Things great and unsearched out by the genius of the elders, and things long hidden, I shall sing. It pleases me to go through the high stars; it pleases me, leaving the lands and inert seat, to be borne on a cloud, and to stand on the shoulders of stout Atlas; and from afar to look down upon men wandering everywhere and lacking reason, trembling and fearing death, thus to exhort them, and unfold the chain of fate. O race struck dumb by the chill fear of death, why do you fear the Styx, why the shadows, and the empty divinities, the matter of seers, and the perils of a false world? Whether the funeral pyre with flame, or wasting age take away your bodies, think them able to suffer no evils. Souls lack death, and ever leaving their former seat, live in new homes, and dwell when received. I myself (for I remember) at the time of the Trojan war was Euphorbus, son of Panthous, in whose breast once fixed in the front the heavy spear of the lesser Atrides. I recognized the shield of my left arm, recently from the Anthaeans, in the temple of Juno at Argos. All things change, nothing perishes; the spirit wanders, and from there comes here, hence thither, and seizes whatever limbs it pleases, and from beasts passes into human bodies, and ours into beasts, nor in any time does it perish: and as soft wax is signed with new figures, nor remains as it was, nor keeps the same forms, yet is itself the same — so I teach that the soul is always the same, but migrates into various figures.

Ovid in this part seems to follow Plato, who in Timaeus 2, treating of the state of souls after death and speaking of souls that conquer their passions and those conquered by them, thus says: "And as long as they reined them in and subjugated them, life will be just and gentle to them; but if they should be conquered, unjust and rough; the conquered, moreover, change sex, and are relegated to the infirmity of feminine nature in the time of the second generation; and to those who do not desist from vice and intemperance, punishment and rejection into worse things do not cease, until they put on the forms of vast wild beasts congruent to their disposition and merits."

By this occasion perhaps certain philosophers also, as Ambrose touches in On the Good of Death, posited the supreme reward of the great philosophers to be this: that their souls after death should pass into bees or fireflies, that those who first had fed others with the sweetness of philosophy should afterward themselves be fed with the sweetness of honey; or that those who first had ministered to others the light of wisdom should afterward themselves be endowed with the gift of light; who consequently posited that the souls of others migrate into other bestial bodies corresponding to them — for example, the souls of musicians into nightingales, of soldiers into wild boars, of princes into lions. From these things too it evidently appears that Plato and Ovid say that the souls of men sometimes transmigrate to other human bodies, female and male.

To these likewise consented those pseudo-poets who said that they had received the spirit of Homer; against whom Persius inveighs, thus saying:

Nor have I washed my lips at the Caballine fount, nor do I remember to have dreamed on the two-peaked Parnassus, that I might thus suddenly come forth a poet.

Such too were certain heretics, asserting that John the Baptist had the spirit and soul of Elijah, and that he was personally Elijah, on the occasion of certain Gospel words which seemed to the eyes of the foolish to sound thus.

Others, namely Plato and his followers, posit a true future resurrection — that is, the return of the soul to its ancient body — after the space of a Great Year. Of this Great Year, Plato in Timaeus 1, last chapter, says: "It is easy to understand that the perfect number of times completes a perfect year, only when the courses of all the eight revolutions are completed and return as it were to the origin and beginning of another revolution, which one and the same and uniform motion shall measure." And below, 21:6, speaking of vicious souls and their punishments, and the end of those punishments, he says: "There will be no end of evils, sooner than the firm and ever-the-same winged revolution of the world, following them, has wiped away all their vices contracted from fire, water, earth, and air, and every defilement, with their unconsidered and immoderate errors reduced to the manner and temper of reason; that having put aside their pollutions, expiated and purified, they may at length deserve to come to the honor of their ancient countenance." And above, in the same place, speaking of souls victorious over the passions, he says: "To the victors lies open a return to the seat of a companion star, to do thereafter true and blessed life"; whom Augustine, City of God 22, chapter 27, attests Plato said would return to bodies. The folly of this opinion was at one time very common in England among many, who, as our chroniclers attest, when dying caused their treasure to be buried with them, that thus, returning to their bodies, they might recover it.

The quantity of this Great Year, however, is variously set down by various authors. Varro, in On the Race of the Roman People, as Augustine in City of God 22, chapter 28 recounts, thus says: "Certain genethliacs have written that there is in the regeneration of men what the Greeks call Palingenesia, and they have written that this is completed in the number of four hundred and forty years, so that the same body and the same soul which had once been joined together in some man may again return to the same conjunction." Josephus, Jewish Antiquities 1, chapter 2, asserts that the Great Year is fulfilled by the courses of six hundred years, as is recounted above. Others, imitating Ptolemy, Almagest 7, chapter 2, who posits the eighth sphere to be moved according to the succession of the signs by one degree in every hundred years, say that the Great Year contains thirty-six thousand solar years.

From these things, however, it evidently appears that Plato thought the punishment of the wicked to be ended temporally, not eternal; with whom Avicenna in Metaphysics 9, last chapter, agreeing, says: "Since punishment is from an extraneous accident, and such does not endure nor remain, it follows that the punishment owed to the soul is not perennial, but is removed and effaced little by little, until purified it comes to felicity." With whom Origen too is thought similarly to have agreed.

Some, however, granting a future resurrection unto everlasting beatitude and misery, imitating the philosophers of whom Augustine above alleged speaks, hold that those who rise will receive this and that in common here on earth — not, however, this in heaven and that in hell. With whom certain Jews seem to agree, Theophilus saying on Luke 9, "John has risen from the dead, etc.": "The Jews expected the resurrection of the dead in carnal life, and in feastings and drinks." Whence it appears that those Jews also suppose the future happiness must consist in the customary pleasures of the flesh, which the Saracens too — or Hagarenes — suppose, as was touched on above; which many Tatars also believe, as evidently appears through Mark of Venice, On the Conditions of the Eastern Regions, in various places. They — as the same Mark recounts — so impudently dote, that even when a young man and a young woman die unmarried, they cause them to be solemnly betrothed, that thus in the future life they may more freely enjoy their pleasures.

But why do the philosophers deny the future resurrection of the dead unto life, when its possibility has been shown above; and so great a fame, so many sects or laws — namely the Jews, the Christians, the Saracens or Hagarenes, and the Tatars — many illustrious prophets, and many philosophers too unanimously attest it, as appears from the foregoing and from many other histories; and our most certain histories and certain others evidently report that some dead truly arose, as the demonstration of the 32nd part touched upon? Does not Plato in On the Laws or On the Republic relate a certain soldier by name, Er, by nation a Pamphilian, slain in battle by wounds — that on the twelfth day, on which he was to be cremated with others slain there, he came back to life, and announced whatever in the days that had passed he had done or seen, professing public judgment to the human race? Nor would anyone suspect so great a philosopher of lying fabulously in such matters; for this is not customary to philosophers who philosophize.

Does not Pliny too in book 7 of his Natural History write a great chapter about those who come back to life? Does not also that noble volume of Heraclides among the Greeks expressly recount that a certain woman, lifeless for seven days, returned to life? Does not Varro likewise narrate that certain dead arose, and Pliny in the place above? Does not Democritus too grant the resurrection of the dead, and Plato a return to life, as was touched on above? Whom Porphyry too imitates, the blessed Augustine, City of God 22, chapter 27, recounting. Does not Bonellus the philosopher, as is recounted in The Throng of Philosophers, say to Pythagoras: "Behold, O Pythagoras, all things die and live by the nod of God"; and adding concerning a certain corporeal and medicinal matter, how it is to be mortified and vivified into something better, and confirming this by the example of man, thus says: "Then, son of doctrine, that thing requires fire, until the spirit of that body is turned over, and is dismissed through the nights, that the man in his tomb may also be made dust. When these things are accomplished, God will return to it its soul and spirit; and the infirmity removed, that thing is strengthened, and after corruption is amended; just as a man after the resurrection becomes stronger, and younger than he had been in this world."

If, therefore, these things are so, why do the philosophers deny the future resurrection of the dead, especially since they bring forward no — or only slender — reason to the contrary? Yet how compelling and how strong a reason would be required to invalidate something so famous in every law and sect — especially since its possibility has been most certainly demonstrated, and its truth more reasonably affirmed than it can be impugned, according to what is set forth concerning the 33rd part of this work?

Is not the rational soul, according to the 36th part, immortal, incorruptible, and eternal — and each individual soul belongs to each individual man — and has it not the aptitude and natural appetite for administering the human body, dwelling in it, and through it exercising its noble operations, just as other natural forms relate to their formed and formable matter? For if the human soul did not naturally desire and love the conjunction and cohabitation with the body, but a solitary, separated mode of being, how is it joined to the body and inhabits it, administering it against the natural order? How also would man be a natural species — and so noble a species, that he seems even more noble than the angels, who do not have bodies in any way, on account of his many noble operations which they do not have?

Whence Hermes too, in On the Eternal Word 10, speaking of simple angels and composite men, thus writes: "Some, very few of those aforesaid, have obtained the venerable care of looking after heaven; but whoever, from the confusion of their twofold nature, has settled into the inner intelligence by the bulk of body, are placed over the elements that are in those things which are below, to be cared for. Therefore man is an animal, not because he is on that account lesser, that he is in part mortal, but rather because he is so much the more aptly and efficaciously composed for a certain reason, that he is seen to have been augmented by mortality — namely because he could not have sustained both unless from each kind of matter; he is formed from each, that he might have both the cultivation of earth and the love of his own divinity." And below, 24: "Finally He composed the good man too, who could be immortal, of each nature, divine and mortal; and so by the will of God it has been arranged that man is constituted better than the gods, whom He formed from immortal nature alone, and than all mortals — for which reason man, joined to the gods by knowledge, venerates them by religion, and the gods too by affection guard all human things." Here by "gods" he understands the angels, which manner of speaking is more frequently found in Plato, Aristotle, and other Greek philosophers.

If therefore these things are so, how is it that the rational soul — eternal, virtuous, and holy — once separated from the body by death, will eternally and naturally desire to be united with the body, and eternally and naturally lack this? How will it eternally and naturally hunger and thirst to be joined with the body, and eternally and naturally lack this? How will it eternally and naturally pant after its natural kingdom, after the body in which — by the teaching of experience and reason, and Aristotle attesting above — it most worthily presides, like a king in city and kingdom, and eternally and naturally be deprived of its kingdom?

Indeed this lack and privation does not seem natural, but rather violent. And how can such a violent state be eternal? Do not the philosophers deny this, and how can such a natural appetite be idle, and eternally idle? How will such a holy soul remain forever hungry and thirsty? Wherefore it will never be blessed, but eternally remain wretched, according to what is set forth concerning beatitude in the 8th part — especially since God, supremely liberal and good, does not sparingly but abundantly reward all, by the 31st part. But how can He abundantly reward such a holy soul, here hungering and thirsting and laboring in many ways for the love and honor of God according to the doctrine of the 30th part of this work, if in the future He should permit it likewise to hunger, to thirst, and always to be wretched? Wretched, I say, always, because always lacking in fact and in hope the body always naturally desired.

Concerning beatitude in hope, the Philosopher, Ethics 1, chapter 14, says that "children called happy on account of hope are beatified"; concerning beatitude in fact, however, the same Aristotle and others establish it in many places. And if perchance you should say that God will give to the soul something else for the body which it desires — that something else either soothes that aforesaid appetite altogether and satiates it, or it does not. It does not soothe it, on account of the foregoing; for as long as the soul itself remains, it has a certain natural aptitude and concupiscence for the body, as the foregoing make manifest. How also is that privation or lack which the soul sustains taken away, except by the restitution of the body of which it is deprived? And how will that natural concupiscence cease while that lack remains? If it does not soothe, the inconveniences previously touched on return.

According also to all the philosophers granting the immortality of the soul, the virtuous soul awaits beatitude or felicity as its reward. For what other thing for sufficient reward would it await? Not anything more vile, nor better — this is plainly clear; which the foregoing concerning the 32nd part also attest. And the Philosopher, Ethics 1, chapter 14, says that "felicity seems to be the reward of virtue." But beatitude or felicity is the final human good, the ultimate of all human goods, as the foregoing according to the 31st part evidently indicate. With the end attained — and especially such an end — the motion or the mobile rests perfectly; otherwise that end would not be perfect. With such a perfect end attained, therefore, nothing further remains which it might desire as not had — nothing external toward which it tends, nothing which it might further covet — as also the foregoing concerning the 8th part lucidly manifest, which Aristotle's saying there written attests.

Wherefore Boethius too, On the Consolation of Philosophy 3, prose 2, thus says: "Every care of mortals, which the labor of multiform pursuits exercises, proceeds indeed by a different path, but strives nevertheless to come to one end of beatitude. That, however, is the good which once attained, no one can desire anything beyond — which is the supreme of all goods, and contains all goods within itself; which if anything were lacking to it, could not be the supreme, since something would be left outside which could be wished for. It is plain therefore that beatitude is a state perfected by the assemblage of all goods." In felicity therefore, and in final perfect beatitude, the soul will have the body it desired.

Furthermore, if the virtuous soul were not beatified together with the body it desires, this would be either because God could not, or because He would not. Not because He could not, on account of the 37th part of this work and the 7th and 8th. Nor because He would not, since He is supremely just, retributive, pious, liberal, and good, by the first Supposition and the 3rd, 4th, and 31st parts.

Furthermore, in any rightly disposed polity, rewards are decreed which provoke to virtues, and punishments which draw back from vices; otherwise very many men would be made slothful toward virtue and prone to vice — which all the philosophers unanimously attest. God therefore, the most wise instituter and ruler of the whole polity of the world, does not leave it without such rewards. But the good are by no means sufficiently rewarded, nor the wicked sufficiently punished, in the present life. For the wicked frequently abound in delights in the present life, and are consoled by prosperities; the good, on the contrary, are deprived of delights and tormented by adversities. Indeed many beasts also live more delightfully in the present life than many virtuous men.

What worthy thing, I ask, will God repay to a temperate man who, for His love and honor according to the doctrine of the 30th part of this work, abstains from delights and sustains tristesses? What more fitting than ampler delights, according to the 31st part — which He nevertheless does not do in the present life? He will therefore do it in the future, especially since He can most easily do this, as the foregoing have taught. If, too, a virtuous man perseveringly through life sustains sad things on account of God, and at last a most sad death on account of Him, on account of preserving His law and honor, and avoiding dishonor according to the doctrine of the 30th part — what except a most delightful life will He render him, according to the 31st part? How otherwise would He animate His soldiers to a terrible death? For either He can render to such soldiers of His sufficient stipends, or He cannot. Who would presume to say He cannot, on account of the 7th, 8th, and 37th parts of this work? But if He can, He either wills or wills not. And who would say He wills not, on account of the 31st part of this work? This too would seem to belong to parsimony and not to fullest liberality and goodness. He can therefore, and He wills; wherefore He will do so abundantly, according to the 8th and 31st parts.

Furthermore, who does not know that man naturally desires good, and the greater more, and most of all the greatest good — namely that which perfectly satiates him, the felicity or beatitude most perfectly satiating and quieting all desires, as was touched on above? But this appetite either ought to be plenarily satiated, or it ought not. And who would say it ought not? For then it would seem idle and unnatural to man. But how is the most natural, most general, and greatest human appetite permitted to be such? How also does God, who, by the first Supposition and following parts — the philosophers also attesting — does nothing in vain, implant such an idle appetite in man, of so perfect a nature, in so noble a creature? The philosophers did not so judge, nor do they so judge unless perhaps they are senseless. If, however, the aforesaid appetite ought to be satiated, and is not satiated in the present life, as frequent experience teaches, it will therefore be satiated in the future. There will therefore be a resurrection of the dead.

Furthermore, who does not know that the whole man, constituted of soul and body, merits, not the soul alone? Who indeed doubts that the actions of natural species are of the whole composite, not of one part only? Wherefore the Philosopher, On the Soul 1, chapter 64, says: "To say that the soul is angry is similar to saying that it weaves or builds. Better perhaps it is not to say that the soul pities, or learns, or understands, but that the man does so by the soul." And below, 66: "To understand or to love or to hate are not the passions of that, but of him who has it, according as he has it." And what is more just, what more equitable, what more becoming, what more congruous, what more fitting than that he who merited be rewarded? For what justice, equity, or reason admits that one should merit, and not he himself but another be rewarded — and this not for a brief time but eternally, especially since He whom by meriting he served could, if He willed, equally easily reward the very one who merited in himself? What therefore more fitting than that the whole man in soul together and his own body should be blessedly rewarded? For God can most easily do this, and most fittingly it befits Him, as the foregoing have persuaded.

By such reasonings, therefore, Plato, Porphyry, and many other philosophers, persuaded, unanimously held that human souls, separated by death from bodies, would again be given to bodies — as was touched on above. From these things, however, the error of the response and opinion saying that the soul alone, or man according to the soul alone, ought to be rewarded or punished after death evidently appears. Who also with so great diligence would reasonably labor in worshipping virtues and abstaining from vices, for beatitude to be acquired and misery to be avoided — for another, and not for himself?

For this reason, perhaps, it is otherwise responded, by saying that man is sufficiently rewarded for all his good works in the present; and this seems to be the response of the Epicureans, of the Sadducees, and of Averroes, according to what was touched on at the 36th part. But this is refuted by the foregoing.

Furthermore, since according to the 36th part the rational soul is immortal, and each is each man's own, they will remain after the deaths of men, and not without a fitting recompense of joy or sorrow. For it would not befit nature that souls so noble, separated from bodies, should be deprived of every action and passion, like sleeping or dead, eternally; and that things should be altogether equal for good souls and for bad — which would not befit divine goodness, as the foregoing attest, and all who confess the immortality and propriety of souls unanimously confess. And if souls, after the deaths of men, ought to be sufficiently and beatifically rewarded, they ought to return to their bodies, as the preceding things have persuaded.

Does not Hermes Mercurius Trismegistus — illustrious prophet, and so glorious a philosopher that he is called Father of Philosophers, with Aristotle attesting above alleged — in On the Eternal Word 13, dialoguing with Asclepius, write thus: "This man, then, so wrought and conformed and set over such a ministry and obedience by the supreme God, both fittingly cleanly preserving the world, and piously worshipping God, worthily and fittingly obeying the will of God in each — by what gift do you believe such a one ought to be gifted? Indeed, since the world is the work of God, he who by diligence preserves and increases its beauty joins his own work with the will of God; since by the daily care and work of his body he composes the species which He formed by divine intention — by what gift, except that with which our parents were gifted, with which we too desire to be gifted, if it should be pleasing to the divine will (we wish for this with most pious vows): namely, that having served and being stripped of the worldly custody, loosed from the bonds of mortality, He might restore us to the higher part of nature — that is, the divine — pure and holy?" "Justly and truly you say, O Trismegistus. For this is the reward of those who live piously under God, diligently with the world. Otherwise, those who shall have lived impiously, both return to heaven is denied them, and a foul migration into other bodies unworthy of a holy soul is appointed, as this discourse of reason has proceeded, O Trismegistus, by the hope of future eternity. Souls in worldly things are imperilled, but to others incredible, to others fabulous, to others perhaps it may seem to be ridiculed. For the matter is sweet in this corporeal life, who is captured by fruit from possessions. Wherefore it holds the soul, as they say, by a twisted neck, that it may cleave in the part of itself which is mortal, nor allow that part to acknowledge divinity, the malice envying it immortality."

And below, 30: "Concerning the immortal or the mortal we must now discourse. For many the hope and fear of death tormented, ignorant of true reason. For death comes to pass by the dissolution of the body wearied with labor, and of the number completed by which the members of the body are fitted into one machine for vital uses. This therefore is death — the dissolution of the body, and the perishing of corporeal sense. Concerning this there is superfluous solicitude; but there is also another necessary one, which either ignorance or human incredibility despises." "What is it, O Trismegistus, that they either ignore, or distrust to be possible?" "Hear then, O Asclepius. When the soul has departed from the body, then the judgment and examination of its merit will pass into the power of the highest demon. And he, when he sees it pious and just, permits it to remain in places fitting for it; but if he sees it stained with the spots and vices of offenses, he hurls it down from above to the lowest, and delivers it over to the storms and whirlwinds of often discordant air, fire, and water; among heaven and earth, in floods rushing into diverse parts, it is ever rapt, agitated by eternal punishments — so that in this respect eternity is harmful to the soul, in that by an immortal sentence it is subjected to eternal punishment. Therefore, that we be not entangled by these things, know that we must reverence, fear, and beware. For incredible men after their offenses will be forced to believe — not by words but by examples, not by threats but by the very suffering of penalties." "Therefore, O Trismegistus, are not the offenses of men punished by human law alone?" "First, O Asclepius, the things that are earthly are all mortal; and those things too which are exposed to penalties for the merits or offenses of life by corporeal reason are subjected, after death, to the more savage punishments by so much as in life perhaps they had been hidden, until they were found out. For the requitals of all things are rendered by divinity through judgment, as the punishments are according to the qualities of the offenses."

Where also consequently, 31, concerning the remuneration of the good, he subjoins: "On the contrary, for the just man, in the religion of God and in the highest piety, there is a defense. For God preserves such men from all evils. The Father of all, or Lord, both He who alone is all things in all, gladly shows Himself; for not where He is by place, nor of what kind by quality, nor how great by quantity — but illuminating man by the sole intelligence of mind, who, the darkness of errors having been dispelled from his soul, and the light of truth perceived, mingles himself wholly to the sense of divine intelligence; whose love, freed from the part of nature in which he is mortal, conceives confidence in future immortality. This therefore will distinguish between the good and the evil; for each one shines forth by piety, religion, prudence, worship, and veneration of God — true reason being perceived, and confidence of his belief — as much among men as the Sun stands forth by light over the other stars."

And further below, 41: "Your grandfather, O Asclepius, the first inventor of medicine — namely Aesculapius — to whom a temple is consecrated on the mountain of Libya, near the shore of the Crocodiles, in which the worldly man (that is, the body) of him lies; for the rest, or rather, if he is a man, the whole has gone back to heaven in the sense of the better life."

Does not Plato too in Timaeus 2, chapter 4, say that the gods (namely the angels) after the dissolution ought to receive that loan which they had entrusted — namely the soul — by the separation of soul and body being made? And below, 6, he says that to souls victorious over corporeal passions, return and a seat in the company of a companion star lies open — to do thereafter true and blessed life. Whence Ambrose too, On the Good of Death, says: "Plato composed for himself that garden which he called the garden of Jove, elsewhere the garden of the mind; for he called Jove both God and the mind of all. Into this he says the soul (which he names Venus) entered, that she might be filled with the abundance and riches of this garden, in which, filled with drink, she would lie, and the drink would pour forth nectar."

Which perhaps too those ancient poets and theologizers wished to understand, who — Aristotle recounting in Metaphysics 3, chapter 15 — posited certain ones tasting nectar and manna to be made gods immortal. Whence Socrates too, as Ambrose recounts in On the Good of Death, said he was hastening to his gods, to those best men. This judgment of Socrates, his disciple Plato, with not a few others, imitates, as appears from the demonstration of the 13th part of this work, and universally all those who say that men become gods. Whence Pliny, Natural History 2, treating of God, says: "What is to men the way to eternal glory: by this the chiefs of the Romans went; by this now with celestial pace passes the greatest ruler of every age, Vespasian Augustus, succoring exhausted affairs. This is the most ancient custom of returning thanks to those who merit well: that such are ascribed to the divinities. Indeed all the names of other gods too — and those of the stars I mentioned above — were born from the merits of men. To call themselves Jupiter, Mercury, or other names variously among themselves." This whole, however, seems to be referred to the souls of the deceased.

Wherefore Hermes Mercurius Trismegistus, On the Eternal Word 41, speaking of Aesculapius and Hermes, men, and Osiris, a woman, deified and worshipped through their idols, says: "It happens by the Egyptians these holy animals are named, and through their individual cities the souls of those whose they are consecrated are worshipped, alive — so that they are inhabited by their laws, and named by their names." But the souls conquered by passions and given over to vices, Plato says, Timaeus 21:6, are to be punished with due penalties, as was touched on above. And below, 9, speaking of a man instituted in goodness, honesty, and prudence, and of one contrarily disposed, thus he writes: "If the helpful diligence of honest erudition and moderation comes to this state, immune from all perturbation and sickness, he will pass his age; if neglected, with a lame way of life, he will be revoked at last to the lower world with his familiar foolishness. But these things shall come about most lately, the merits of life having been already settled."

These things, moreover, in his book On the Laws, or On the Republic, the immortality of the soul having now been asserted, he establishes consequently that the fruit of justice and of virtues is principally to be expected after the death of man, and likewise the harm of injustice. Wherefore — as Augustine recounts, City of God 1, chapter 22 — Cleombrotus, having read the book of Plato in which he disputed of the immortality of the soul, threw himself headlong from a wall, that thus he might migrate from this life to that one which he believed better.

Whom Aristotle, his disciple, follows in On the Secret of Secrets, third part, 7: "If," he says, "the soul be perfect and complete before its separation from the body, by the universal virtue which is sublimated through it, and is led to the supernal perfection, then it acquires another government, until it comes to the circle or firmament of the intelligence with which it is well pleasing. But if not, the soul slips down to the abyss of the lower regions, then a government receives it, without hope of pleasing God."

He also, when about to die, instructing and consoling his disciples against the fear of death, and concerning the state of souls after death — as is recounted in the little book written about his death, 6 — thus says: "First I will ask you, do you confess and believe that in the science of philosophy, which contains all sciences, that it is true, and that he who inquires into it inquires into truth and rectitude, and the highest and divine grades, and that through it is the difference between men and other animals?" When they confessed it was so, he secondly thus asks: "If it is so as you say, does good come to man, or does it come to man in this age in which we are today, or after death in another age? If you say in this age in which we are before we die — then you have not learned the fitting grades of science. For most men who have not walked in the right way, nor known their Creator, ended their days in good, and their years in their desires; and there are many wise men who have multiplied themselves in sciences and intelligences, and have learned doctrines, and have known their Creator, and have privation of good and of peace. And you, if you are troubled and fearful of death (which is the way and step of the soul going forth from the body, ignorant to comprehend the divine grades and to join itself to the wise and joyful souls), do not give to science its grades nor its reasons, but you are submerged into the bestial soul with other beasts."

Behold, from these things can be elicited the reason previously made — that because virtuous men are not sufficiently rewarded in the present life, they will be rewarded in the future life. To this he confidently relies almost throughout the whole book, and shows that virtuous men — namely studious philosophers — are by no means plenarily rewarded in this life, since others abound in all kinds of desires and delights in the present, and these are deprived of these, indeed are afflicted with many sorrows; especially since final felicity or beatitude requires perfect delight, as the foregoing manifest; which he himself, Ethics 1 and 10, clearly proves.

Whence Ethics 1, chapter 13: "The best, and most beautiful, and most delightful, is felicity. And these are not diverse, according to the Delian inscription: the best is the most just, the most desirable is to be healthy, the most delightful is what one desires to enjoy. For all these exist in the best operations; and these — or one of them — the best, we say is felicity." Wherefore in the prior little book, 7, he addresses his disciples thus: "I have declared to you that man cannot comprehend the noble sciences except through the grades of the soul, when it is purged and perfect and sanctified from impurities." And below, 8: "Do you not know that the pure and perfect philosopher mortified all his desires in this age — in feasting, drink, clothing, and other delights, and treasures of gold and silver — and condemned all delights?" And below: "The wise man despised all corporeal delights, and hated them, and perfected his soul in inquiring into the science of his Creator, who from nothing made him a being. He it is who ought to have rejoiced in death, which is the departure of the soul from the body. For what use would he have in life, since he mortified all delights which are despicable and vile? Indeed he ought to exult at the time when his soul drew near to its Creator, and is delighted in His brightness; for he does not fear to draw near to Him, nor finds a contradictor or a repulser — like the souls who followed vanities, nor strove for sciences, nor directed their ways. And these are they who cannot draw near, nor come to that place, but find a contradictor and a repulser."

And further below, 13: "Blessed," he says, "is the soul which is not infected by the depraved works of this world, and has understood its Creator; and it is itself which returns to its place in great delights — not however delights of the body, which are despicable. And woe to the sinful soul, which has not the virtue nor the power of returning to its place, nor can ascend to its homeland; in which the foul works of bodily delight impede its ascent on high." His disciples, following his teaching, when he died, thus said: "May He who collects the souls of philosophers collect your soul, and place it in His treasures, as is worthy of the soul of a man directed and perfect such as you are" — as the end of that little book attests.

A similar judgment concerning the souls of the dead after death Avicenna, On the Soul 5, chapter 6, and Metaphysics 9, last chapter; and Algazel, Physics 4, last chapter, and 5, chapter 1, agreeingly profess. With whom Averroes too agreeingly, on that of the Philosopher, Ethics 1, chapter 16, On the Happy Man: "as we hold the truly good and wise man to bear all fortunes becomingly," thus says: "as is said of Job: To whom be salvation." For why would he wish for him in death — for the merits of patience or fortitude — and pray for salvation, except that he hoped him and similar dead would be saved?

To these still agreeing, Sextus the Pythagorean in his Sentences says: "Believe immortal honors and punishments to remain for you in judgment." And again: "Those living evilly, when they have departed from the body, an evil demon will torment, until he exacts from them even the last farthing." "Blessed is the man whose soul, going to God, no one rebukes." And below: "If anyone unjustly should thrust forth the wise man from the body, by his iniquity he confers a benefit on him; for he is loosed as if from chains." And further: "Whatever pursuits the soul has wrought while inhabiting the body, it shall have such witnesses in judgment. The unclean demons claim the unclean soul for themselves."

This judgment Italian philosophers also attest — Tully, Seneca, Macrobius, Boethius, and many others. Whence in the Prologue of Macrobius on The Dream of Scipio, it is written thus: "So hold, that to all who shall have preserved, helped, and increased their country, there is a certain place defined in heaven, where the blessed enjoy everlasting age. For nothing is more acceptable to that prince of God who rules the whole world, of those things which are done on earth, than counsels and assemblies of men joined by right, which are called Cities. The rectors and preservers of these, having gone forth from here, return hither."

Among the doctrines and wisdoms of Ptolemy, written in the first Prologue of the Almagest, it is written thus: "In the good which God works, you ought to attend as it were to the goodness of a generous giver, and in adverse evils as it were to the goodness of purgation and eternal remuneration. The more you draw near to the end, the more do you work the good with increase."

Albumasar, too, in Greater Introductory 6, distinction 26, treating of the houses of the planets, says: "The 9th house is called the house of pilgrimages and motion, and of faith and good works, on account of its return to Jupiter signifying the second being. For the native, when he goes forth from the womb of his mother, is changed from place to place, and from being to being, and from the nature of Saturn to the nature of Jupiter, and therefore signifies pilgrimage. And as Jupiter is fortune, and signifies from the fortune of the age substance and duration and abundance, as we said already; and the fortune of the future age which is by faith — therefore signifies also faith, and the signification has been made here for this house similar to the same signification. Again too, since Jupiter and Venus are fortunes, and there are two species of fortunes, of which one is the fortune of this world, and the other of the future age; and the fortune of another world is more worthy than the fortune of this world; and that one is sought through faith — and because Jupiter is more fortune than Venus, therefore signification has been given to him over faith, through which the fortune of the future age is sought, which is more worthy; and signification has been given to Venus over the fortunes of this world, of plays, joy, and gladness."

Have not these later philosophers borrowed this judgment of theirs from the more ancient philosophers of the Hebrews, according to what is set forth concerning the 35th part? For the Pharisees — Josephus, Jewish Antiquities 18, chapter 3, reporting — "hold that there will be a future judgment of God; there all men will receive their proper merits, both those who lived according to virtue and those who were depraved by wickedness; and they say souls are immortal." Who also in book 2 of On the Jewish War, speaking of Essenes placed in tortures, thus says: "In the midst of torments smiling, and mocking those who applied the torments, they returned constant souls with a certain hilarity — as if those who would receive them again. And some agreeing with the good in this opinion of the Greeks, declare that they dwell beyond the Ocean, where enjoyment is laid up for them. There indeed there is a region which is not weighed down by rains, nor snows, nor heats, but which the rising Zephyr from the Ocean and breathing gently makes pleasant. To wicked souls, however, they delegate stormy and wintry places, full of groans of penalties to be exercised without end. Now to me they seem, according to this very intelligence, to have set apart for the Greeks too, for those whom they called Heroes and Demigods, the Islands of the Blessed; for the souls of the wicked the place among the Lower Ones of the impious, in which they have invented certain ones too to be tormented — Sisyphus and Tantalus and Ixion and Tityus."

For the Greeks call Heroes the noble and well-meriting souls dwelling above in air or aether. Whence Isidore, Etymologies 8, chapter 47, thus writes: "They say the Heroes drew their name from Juno; for in Greek Juno is called Hera; and therefore I know not which her son, according to the Greek fable, was called Eros — this fable mystically signifying that the air is appointed to Juno, where they wish the Heroes to dwell, by which name they call the souls of certain meritorious deceased — as it were aerial — and aerial men, and worthy of heaven on account of wisdom and fortitude."

This judgment of the Greeks, fabulous, Aristotle touches in Physics 4, chapter 97, where he teaches: "Those not perceiving motion do not perceive time, just as neither do those who are fabled in Sardo to sleep among the Heroes, when they are awake." Nor ought it to disturb that this is given as a fable. For this is not a fable which is fictitious and false both in narration and in signification; but one which under metaphorical, tropic, figurative narration, for the sake of rhetoric, wishes mystically to announce some true fact. For this species of fable seems to fit Rhetoricians and Poets. For many approved men have expounded poetic fables to a solid intelligence. And who does not know that those famous Aesopic and Libyan fables contain a clear sense mystically — as Papias in his Elementary, and Isidore, Etymologies 1, chapter 95, Aristotle, Rhetoric 2, chapter 25, and others elsewhere attest? Wherefore according to the Philosopher, the place above: a fable is a certain species of rhetorical persuasion, distinguished against the parable on the other side. Where also first he recounts a Libyan fable by which Stesichorus dissuaded the Himeraeans, who wished to choose a foreign emperor as the leader of their army against enemies. He spoke a fable: how the horse alone obtained a meadow; but with a stag coming and corrupting the pastures, wishing to punish the stag, he asked a certain man if he could punish the stag with him. He answered: if he should accept a bridle, and he himself should ride upon him, holding a lance. When he had consented and mounted on him to punish the stag, he served the man. "Thus too you," he said, "see that wishing to punish your adversaries, you do not suffer the same as the horse with the bridle. For what do you have when now you are choosing a leader of the army, an emperor?"

Where also presently adding another species of fable, he says: Aesop, addressing the people in Samos when the ruler of the people was being judged to death, said: "A fox crossing a river was thrust into a hole; and not being able to come out, was afflicted for a long time, and many dog-flies clung to her. A hedgehog wandering, when he saw her, took pity, and asked if he should take away the dog-flies from her; but she did not permit it. When he asked why, she said: 'Because these are now full of me, and draw little blood; but if you take these away, others coming hungry will drink up the rest of my blood.' Thus also you, men of Samos, this man will harm no further, for he is rich; but if you kill him, others will come, poor men, who will absorb you, stealing the rest." There are, however, fables for assemblies, and they have this good — that to find similar things in real affairs is difficult; but fables more easily. For one must do as in parables, if one can see something similar — which indeed to do is from philosophy.

Wherefore in the Prologue of his Metaphysics he says: "And the Philosopher is in some way a Philomath." Does not the Philosopher's Poetics clearly teach similar things? Does he not, in Meteorologica 1, last chapter, expound the fable of those riddling about Ocean — that it flows circularly around the earth from subtle vapor ascending above and thickened descending below? Does not the same in On the World, last chapter, expound that famous fable of the three fatal sisters, who are commonly called Clotho, Lachesis, Atropos, to a true understanding concerning God, thus saying: "The fable too is completed not without order. But these are nothing other than God, just as also the strenuous Plato says."

Does not also in the Prologue of Timaeus of Plato, 5, that Ovidian fable of Phaethon get expounded in these words: "That fable too which is known to us, of Phaethon son of the Sun affecting the office of his father, having ascended the chariot of light, nor with the solemn orbits of charioteering preserved, having burned earthly things, and himself having been consumed by celestial flames — it is reckoned a fable, but it is true. For at long intervals there is an excursion of the world's revolution, which a vastness of conflagration must necessarily follow." Which also Aristotle in On the World 12, though briefly, in similar manner understands and expounds. Wherefore Macrobius on The Dream of Scipio says: "Philosophy does not contend with all fables, nor does it acquiesce in all; and that it can easily be discerned which of these it abdicates from itself, and as profane excludes from the very vestibule of sacred disputation, and which it admits often and willingly — must be unfolded by degrees of division." Which he pursues at length not in one division but in many. Let it suffice to have spoken thus much, not impertinently, of fables.

By the foregoing, however, can easily be known how the Egyptian, Hebrew, Greek, Arabian, and Italian (or Latin) philosophers agreeingly profess the rewarding and punishment of souls after death. With whom agreeingly the community of Greek and Latin poets supposes a similar remuneration of good and evil after death. For they say that some good and noble men — for instance, Saturn, Jupiter, and the like — are made gods after death; some, however, are translated to the gods and remain with them; the wicked, however, they affirm are sunk down into the lower world and tormented by infernal punishments. For they posit four or five rivers flowing in the lower world, in which souls are tortured: of which one is burning, one is freezing, but each having its own punishment, as poetic books often show. These, among the poets, are commonly named Styx, Phlegethon, Cocytus or Cocitus, and Acheron, and Lethe.

Concerning which Eberhard the Bithynian in his Greek Things, among the Greek names, says: "Styx, hatred; Lethe, oblivion; but Phlegethon, burning; Cocytus, mourning; Acheron sounds sad" — which by others elsewhere are more amply expounded. Lethe, however, by some is therefore called oblivion, because whoever in the lower world drinks from it forthwith forgets all things, and goes happy to those above. This perhaps not ineptly signifies the river of divine clemency, by which souls fully purged, visited, are freed from all sorrow and translated to celestial joys.

Does not, also, as Ambrose touches in On the Good of Death, the poets fable that the wicked in the lower world sustain the barkings of Cerberus, and the sad whirlpool of the river of Cocytus, the still sadder Charon, the troops of Furies, or having been snatched from prison; and after these, one whom the more savage Hydra has as her seat; and there too entrails fertile for repaired punishments. There an immense vulture, without any end, feeds; and the perpetual giddiness of the wheel of Ixion under the atrocity of penalty; and even the impending ruin of a rock from above, hanging over the heads of those reclining among the feasts. Cerberus, according to the poets, is the dog of the lower world having three heads; Charon the porter of the lower world; and the Furies are called Goddesses of the lower world, who are also called Eumenides — Alecto, Tisiphone, and Megaera. These three are feigned to be women with hair of serpents; the Hydra a serpent of nine horrid heads, of which when one is cut off, three grow up in its place. Ixion, as they say, after he sought the unlawful embraces of Juno, is bound on a wheel with serpents in the lower world. The remaining words of this fable are clear, in which nothing is alien from mystery.

Furthermore, if man is sufficiently rewarded for good works in the present, what is that reward, what is the wage, what is the good? It will be said perhaps that it is the essential goodness inseparably following a good act; and this judgment seems able to be gathered from the words of the Philosopher, Ethics 9, chapter 9, saying: "He himself doing good will be helped, and he will help others; for every intellect chooses the best for itself; the epieikes obeys his intellect. For it is true what is said of the studious man, and that he does many things for the sake of his friends, and dies for his country if it is fitting. For he will throw away both monies and honors, and entirely the goods around which there is contention, procuring for himself good. For he will choose to take delight much more for a little time than tranquilly for a long, and to live well a year than many years however; and one good and great action than many small ones. To those dying, however, this perhaps too happens. They choose for themselves the great, and throw away monies, in order that their friends may receive more. For monies become for the friend, and the good for himself; he attributes to himself the greater good."

But this is refuted by the foregoing concerning the next part of this work; and because then likewise any evil act would be sufficiently punished by the malice inseparably accompanying it — against what is shown previously concerning the next part of this work. How also does just God, who according to the 30th part of this work wills to be loved and worshipped by men above all things — namely so that for any goods whatsoever they would not knowingly offend Him in anything — for so great a love, for so great a service, render so little to them, against the 31st part? How also does true God, who according to the same 30th part wills to be loved and worshipped by men above all things on account of Himself finally, render not Himself but another non-final and beatific reward — according to what was previously touched on in the demonstration of the 32nd part of this work?

Nor is one who works well sufficiently rewarded by the delight connected to his operation, since that is less good than the essential and moral goodness inseparably following it — as no one is ignorant, and as the foregoing show concerning the 31st part. Sometimes, moreover, a lesser delight accompanies a better operation — perhaps none — as is seen of the operations of fortitude, or of certain passions, as Aristotle, Ethics 3, chapter 18, expressly attests. Whence also is then evil delightful operation, and sin, sufficiently punished? This little response too will be reproved like the prior. Nor is one praiseworthy working sufficiently rewarded by other voluptuous things, or by other corporeal delights, since these are less good than the goodnesses and delights other above-mentioned, which are proved less to suffice. Many virtuous men too flee such voluptuous things, sustain very many adversities, do not have prosperities, nor enjoy such delights; indeed less virtuous and especially the most vicious men wallow most in such voluptuousnesses, do not feel adversities, abound in prosperities, and enjoy delights — like beasts unbridled. These therefore — as much beasts as bestial men — seem more blessed than virtuous men.

Is not also, according to what is set forth here, beatitude or felicity the final reward of virtuous work, or of the virtuous man? But this does not consist in the foulnesses of swine, and in the voluptuousnesses of Epicurus, as the foregoing concerning the 32nd part of this work show. This little response too can be refuted easily by what is the first.

Furthermore, neither do the external goods of fortune sufficiently reward the virtuous man working virtuously. For the goodness essentially following the good act exceeds all external goods, as can be had from the demonstration of the 31st part; and this by no means sufficiently rewards the virtuous man, as was shown above. Moral virtue too, and virtuous operation, is incomparably better than riches, possessions, dominations, honors, and other external goods, as no one rightly philosophizing denies. How therefore is it plenarily rewarded by these — especially by God, who does not reward sparingly but abundantly, with the 31st part attesting? Is not, with Aristotle as judge, Ethics 4, chapter 7: "Honor is the greatest of those things which are external goods"? Wherefore he himself in his Economics says: "What each man bears most heavily is to be deprived of his honor." Wherefore also in the Ethics, where he first says: "The reward of virtue is honor." But how disproportionate a reward, how shadowy, how empty, how unequal a recompense, how inferior a wage is honor compared to virtue and virtuous work — who does not know? Wherefore the same Philosopher, Ethics 4, chapter 8, says: "To perfect virtue worthy honor will not by any means come." Many works too are virtuous secret ones, not patent to another's notice, to which worthy honor is not rendered.

This too will be refuted as the prior. For it is certain that felicity or beatitude is the final reward of the virtuous, and that this does not consist in such goods. Wherefore Averroes too with his followers says: human felicity consists in speculative sciences acquired. For in his Prologue on Physics 1, he thus says: "The being of man according to his ultimate perfection — and the grace of him is perfect — is to be himself perfect through speculative sciences; and this disposition is for him final felicity, and supernal life with this science." But this response can be corrected like the priors. Furthermore, it is certain that felicity is not only good but the best, and this not accidentally but essentially and by itself. But perfection through speculative sciences is not such. For many men can be perfect in speculative sciences, and are dishonest and bad — as reason and experience manifest, and Averroes in the Prologue on Physics 1, and 8, plainly grants. But better than this perfection is perfection through moral, heroic, or divine virtues.

For it does not escape you, Averroes, that Aristotle, your god, Ethics 7, chapter 1, writes thus: "But to bestiality there most fits to say above us a certain heroic and divine virtue — as Homer concerning Hector made Priam to say, that he was very greatly good, nor seemed to be the son of a mortal man, but of God. Wherefore if, as they say, from men become gods, on account of such excess of virtue, there will indeed be a certain habit, namely opposite to bestiality." But moral, heroic, or divine virtues are not only speculative, but practical or active, or more truly operative. Wherefore the same Philosopher, Ethics 10, chapter 13, plainly teaches: "For felicity one must aim at works and at life." And he subjoins: "He who works according to intellect, and is concerned for it, and is best disposed, seems to be most loved by God. For if there is some care of human things by the gods, as it seems, it will be reasonable both that they take pleasure in the best and most akin to themselves; this will be intellect, and those who love this most, and honor it, and benefit it as friends caring for them, both rightly and well operating. That all these things most exist for the wise man is not unmanifest. Therefore he is most loved by God; and the same it is fitting also to be most happy."

On which also you, Averroes, say: "If there be care of God for men, as he believes — and as is due — He rejoices in the better, and it is more worthy that He do good to those who love Him more, and honor them, and visit them, as is the disposition of friend with friend." Where also below 14, the Philosopher writes thus: "It is not in operables the end to speculate each, nor knowing nothing sufficient of virtue; but to have and to use, must be tried, that we may be in some way good." And above, Ethics 2, chapter 2: "Since the present negotiation is not for the sake of contemplation, as others (for not, that we may know what virtue is, do we scrutinize, but that we may be made good — since otherwise it would be no benefit), it is necessary to scrutinize the things which concern operations, how to operate them; for these are the mistresses. Therefore to operate according to right reason is common."

Wherefore also the Father of philosophers, Hermes, On the Eternal Word 14, teaches that true philosophy consists in knowing the divinity, and in holy and divine religion. And he subjoins: "Therefore the men who shall be after us, deceived by the cunning of sophists, will be turned away from the true science and pure philosophy. For with simple mind and soul to worship the divinity, and to venerate its deeds, and to give thanks to the will of God, which is most full goodness alone — this is philosophy uncorrupted by no importune curiosity of the soul." Sextus the Pythagorean too, in his Sentences, says: "Understand what are good things, that you may act well."

Who too does not know that, when it is asked: "What kind of man is he?" and it is answered simply: "Good, or evil," it is understood of the goodness or malice of conduct and life, not of speculative knowledge or ignorance — but if he is a good philosopher, or good cleric, the answer is given thus. Which the Philosopher above seems to have intimated when he said: "Not that we may know do we scrutinize, but that we may be made good."

Who, moreover, I ask, is so knowing that he is deceived in nothing, nor errs — that he knows perfectly all things he wishes — that his desire is quieted in all things and plenarily satiated? For this felicity demands, and beatitude requires, as the foregoing attest. Who, moreover, of the men of science is so wholly blessed and felicitous in the present life, that even in soul and in body, and in their powers, he enjoys full beatitude, without labor and pain, without defect and misery, without repugnance or discord? Does not the body and the corporeal powers fail when the soul progresses? Does not the soul fail and languish when the body progresses? Does not continual discord persevere between body and soul? How therefore, with these things being so, is the whole man perfectly blessed to be esteemed, and not rather wretched?

What also, according to that judgment, would be the misery of the vicious? Either it is deception contrary to true science — and then the greater philosophers, on account of their multiple contradiction, are more wretched than beasts, than bestial men, and than simple idiots — or it is the simple lack or ignorance of science. And so the most viciously operating, but learning nothing, and the simply learning nothing nor doing anything evil, would be subject to equal misery.

If, too, speculative science were by itself and essentially the end, felicity, and human beatitude, it seems that man should or could acquire that end by whatever means possible to him, others failing — even by sin. Are also only the speculative philosophers, and none others — however morally and deiformly virtuous — to be reputed capable of being made happy or beatified, when felicity is the common good and end of any natural man, when also many such love and worship God more, and more observe the divine law and the rule of reason? Let Averroes recall, I pray, his sayings, and Aristotle's previously alleged.

Wherefore some perhaps will say that moral or heroic virtue, or its augmentation, sufficiently rewards virtuous works. But this little response, like the first of these and the next, is chastised. Nor does anything sufficiently reward man except felicity, as the foregoing attest. This, however, does not consist in habit but in act, since a good act is more perfectly held than potency toward good — as no one is ignorant, and the demonstration of the first Supposition, and many philosophers, attest; which the Philosopher, Ethics 1, chapter 12, clearly proves; and below, the same, last: "They say there is no difference, according to half life, between the happy and the wretched. This happens fittingly; for sleep is the rest of the soul, according as it is said studious or depraved." Wherefore perhaps one will join both these intellectual and moral virtues together, saying that in both jointly felicity consists, by which man is plenarily rewarded; and thus Averroes in the Prologue on Physics 1 of Aristotle seems to have judged. But this, like the priors and the next, will be repelled.

Therefore perhaps someone will say: not the virtuous habit, but the act, is felicity and consummated beatitude of man, and his plenary and perfect reward in the present life; and so Aristotle seems to opine. But this little response will be reproved like the first and the others following. Is not any virtuous act in the present state free, praiseworthy, and meritorious of reward, and a better one of a better reward? What therefore is the reward of that beatific and felicitous act? Not it itself: clear, and especially because it intended another — namely God — finally, according to the document of the 30th part; and because, according to the 31st of this work, God rewards no one sparingly but abundantly. Nor another, lest the process happen to be infinite.

Wherefore Aristotle and Averroes, more subtly and more nearly to truth thinking, said human felicity consists in conjunction or copulation of him with the agent intellect in the present life — though it last for a small time. Whence Aristotle, Metaphysics 12, chapter 38, speaking of the first principle from which heaven and nature depend, thus says: "An induction such as is best is for us for a short time; thus always is impossible for us." On which Averroes: "From this it indeed appears that Aristotle thinks the fortune of men, in that they are men, is not except by their continuation with the intellect, which is declared in the book On the Soul to be the principle agent and moving us. For the abstracted Intelligences, in that they are abstracted, ought to be the principles of those of which they are principles in two ways: as moving, and as end. For the agent Intelligence, inasmuch as it is abstracted and a principle to us, must necessarily move us, according as a beloved moves a lover. And if every motion must be continued with that from which it is, according to the end, we must in the last be continued with this abstracted intellect, so that we shall depend from such a principle, from which heaven depends, although this be in us for a small time, as Aristotle said." He too above 18 hands down a similar judgment to this. He too on On the Soul 3, comment 36, thus writes: "It is necessary that the agent intellect be coupled with us, by the continuation of speculative intelligibles. And it is manifest that when all speculative intelligibles shall be existing in us in potency, that he will be coupled with us in potency; and when some shall be in us in potency, some in act, then he will be coupled with us according to part, and according to part not, and then we are said to be moved to continuation. And it is manifest that when the motion shall be completed — when, namely, all speculative intelligibles shall be existing with us in act — then he will be coupled with us according to part, and according to part not — and then they are said to be moved to continuation, and it is manifest that when this motion is completed, immediately that intellect will be coupled with us in all ways. And then it is manifest that the proportion of him to us in that disposition is as the disposition of the intellect which is in habit to us. And since it is so, it is necessary that man understand by the intellect proper to him all beings, and that he act the action proper to him on all beings — just as he understands by the intellect which is in habit, when it shall be continued with the imaginable forms, all beings by an intellection proper. Therefore man, according to this mode, as Themistius says, is assimilated to God, in that he is all beings in some way, and knows them in some way. For beings are nothing other than His knowledge: nor is the cause of beings other than His knowledge. And how marvelous is this order, and how strange is this mode of being!"

Truly, if this felicity of man last for a small time, as you say — and as must necessarily be said, since all philosophizing men, and others, experience most certainly that they lack this felicity nearly for the whole time of their life — except perhaps, according to your judgment, in the last moment of life, with corporeal powers as it were extinct, and he himself now nearly alienated from body in ecstasy, syncope, or rapture — how is it sufficiently compensated for the labors and virtuous works of a man performed for his whole time, through a hundred, five hundred, or a thousand years? How is so great strenuousness, so great penalty, so great daily duration rewarded by so brief a stipend? Especially by God, who according to the foregoing always rewards beyond what is fitting, and abundantly — who could most easily reward him much more in the present life, by anticipating this reward, or by continuing the present life further; or in the future life according to the 37th and the next part of this work?

Does it befit a man, an earthly prince, that a soldier, who has fought for him and his honor for the whole of his time, in many years most strenuously, despising profits and delights, sustaining hunger and thirst, heat and cold, blows, wounds, chains, prisons, and all kinds of penalties most strongly, should refresh by a momentary delight only, reward only with momentary wage, and render only a momentary crown — especially if he could equally easily reward him much more? Does this befit a good man? Does this befit a just, clement, powerful, retributive, beneficent, magnificent, liberal, or generous man? — and not rather a sparing, niggardly, and tenacious one? But God in all conditions of virtue exceeds any man infinitely, as the first Supposition, the third part, and the fourth demonstrate.

How, moreover, would such a Prince, by such a momentary reward, sufficiently animate soldiers and stir up the slothful to such great and such daily labors, to so wearisome and dangerous a soldiery, to be strenuously exercised for such long times? How therefore God His own? How also is so small, so fluid, so brief a reward compensated to so great a love — by which one taught in the art of loving in the school of the 30th part loves God, by which he loves Him above all things conceivable, so much that for no goods or evils, delightful or sad, however great, however lasting — even through eternal time — would he in any way knowingly offend Him, by omitting due service, or committing some displeasure? — especially since God rewards each according to the quality and quantity of his service, work, and love, and not sparingly but largely, according to the 31st part, as the demonstration of the next part also touches.

Does not anyone naturally desire good, and the greater more, so also desire a durable, daily good, and a more durable or daily one more; and the better or greater the good is, the more does he desire it to remain longer? How therefore is this appetite of the blessed satiated by a beatitude so transitory, scarcely hourly or momentary? Or how will he be blessed, while he is not plenarily satiated, but hungers, thirsts, and desires what he does not have, nor will have in perpetuity — as the preceding things, with Aristotle attesting, taught?

Likewise such a blessed or felicitous man either knows that he will lose so great a beatific good, or believes the contrary, or considers neither. If he knows that he will lose it, it seems he grieves. For who would not grieve at the irrecoverable loss of so great a good, when he would grieve at the loss of a lesser good? Do not also you, Aristotle, Ethics 3, chapter 18, speaking of the brave man, thus say: "By how much one has every virtue, and is the more felicitous, the more in death will tristesse be. For to such a one most worthy is to live, and he is deprived of the greatest goods knowingly; this however is sad" — or at least he does not rejoice perfectly. For more fully would he rejoice if he knew, or believed, that good would remain. Wherefore he does not seem perfectly blessed, since perfect beatitude perfectly contains all goods required for beatitude — which joy is established to be.

If he believes the contrary, he is foully deceived, not concerning impertinent things, but concerning the greatest, and his proper good. How therefore felicitous, who is deceived by false hope, is harmed by so great an evil, is blinded by such error, and stained by so great foulness?

How also does the perfectly blessed man not know that he will lose his beatific good, when you, not blessed, know this? When also, according to you, Averroes, the blessed knows all things, like God? If he considers neither, how does he know all things? You too, not blessed, know that you will lose your beatific good — why does not the blessed man himself know it? How, moreover, is it likely to be esteemed that he should consider nothing concerning his great good — whether he ought to lose it or to hold it inadmissibly — when the wise man considers this frequently concerning lesser goods, when also the security of retaining the beatific good acquired, so desirably coveted, so joyfully attained, so lovingly possessed, would seem the most happy and most blessed portion of him? Will not the felicitous, unless perchance he died by the most natural death (as very few or none die), before death sustain pain and tristesse? How therefore is felicity then, and not rather misery, to be expected?

Furthermore, if the beatific reward of man were to be expected in the present life, no young man, ever — and universally no one not yet attaining beatitude — should reasonably expose himself to death knowingly for the preservation of divine religion, for the defense of the Republic, for the salvation of parents or friends, and universally from any cause whatsoever. For who reasonably ought to lose, or not acquire, his greatest good for no good, or for a lesser good — for a small momentary augment of virtue in the present, or for any other whatsoever? Who, too, does not know that beatitude exceeds every other human good? Nor too should one who has attained felicity, from any cause whatsoever, expose himself to death; because by so doing, through the tristesse of wounds, and by the anticipation of death, he would diminish and curtail his joyful beatitude, and his greatest good.

Do not you, Aristotle, Ethics 3, chapter 18, say: "To be struck is grievous if carnal, and sad; every labor is such; and what is around fortitude — death indeed and wounds are sad to the brave"? But for what reason, except a most irrational one, ought a man to make himself worse, to make himself less good and altogether not good? Does not, with the spirit of each judging, and you Aristotle attesting: "Every act and choice seem to desire some good"? "Therefore well they pronounced that good which all things desire; and every intellect chooses the best for itself; and that for the cause of which singulars are to be done, is the good of each one; but the entirely best is in the nature of all." Wherefore also concerning the liberal man you write thus: "If however besides the best and well having him to consume occurs, he will be saddened." No one therefore at all ought to expose himself to death from any cause, nor to mortal danger.

Who therefore will be brave for religion or divine law, who will fight bravely for the Republic or for friends? How efficaciously will anyone be provoked to fight strenuously, to bear death if necessary, if dying he loses all goods, nor receives any wage after death in eternity? Hermes, in On the Eternal Word, did not so judge; Plato in On the Laws or On the Republic did not so judge; Varro did not so judge, nor Tully, nor Macrobius, nor any other wise instituter or rector of the Republic — none so judged, except those who consented to senseless men.

Do not you, Aristotle, Ethics 9, chapter 9, affirm that the studious man, for the sake of friends and country, ought, if it is fitting, to die? Do not you, Ethics 3, treating of fortitude, teach the same? But how can one efficaciously exhort the timid of death, the slothful and the dispirited, to fight strenuously, not to fear death, but to bear it briskly if needful — if no wage, or only a sparing one, in the present is rendered to them; indeed if dying they lose the beatitude they had, and the possibility of beatitude, and all goods, without any hope of future retribution? Far be such wretched poverty and such poor wretchedness from the nature of things, from the universality of beings, from the great Republic of the great world, from the most powerful and most copious and most generous Prince of the ample world! Far be it that God should so unrewardedly cast off and condemn His lovable lovers, His strenuous soldiers, the defenders of His injury — those who fight inflexibly to death for Himself, His honor, religion and law, for justice and the preservation of the Republic divinely instituted — on account of the 31st part. Nor does He sufficiently reward them in the present; therefore He will do so in the future.

Furthermore, that beatification which you posit is too diminished, since though it perfects man according to soul, not however according to body. For the body then fails, and the corporeal powers. That felicity too, according to your doctrine, is a human act, and not necessary as it seems but free, since it is the most noble act of man, of the most noble rational power, which according to your saying is capable of opposites. It seems therefore praiseworthy and meritorious of reward. But of what? What is that reward? Not the same felicity itself, the same act — clear; nor another felicity, lest perhaps the process in felicities be infinite; nor anything else in the present — for what? It also seems that the man placed in ecstasy does not have free use of himself.

Do not also you yourself, Averroes, on Metaphysics 12, comment 18, say: "If this intellect be denuded near the human perfection from potency, it must necessarily that this action be destroyed by him, which is other than him; and then either we shall not understand at all by this intellect, or we shall understand according to that which his action is his substance — and it is impossible that in any hour we should not understand by him. It remains therefore that, when this intellect shall have been denuded from potency, that we understand by him according as the action is his substance — and this is final prosperity"?

If too such felicity be the final reward of the virtuous man, what is the final misery or punishment of the vicious man? Not only the privation of that felicity. For thus the vicious and the neuter would be reputed equally wretched, and to be punished with equal punishment. What therefore else?

Were not those who were most joined with the principle of heaven and of nature, with the agent intellect, with God, in the present life — those famous and renowned Prophets, who with God and through God, as it were God in some manner, beheld all or most things most marvelously, and prophesied things seen to others not seeing — as was touched on above? Whence too they were called of old "seers" and Prophets. They themselves, however, agreeing attest a future life, rewards and punishments according to the difference of merits.

This response too can be corrected as the priors. But hearken, Averroes, I pray, especially to one word. When you say: "When all speculative intelligibles shall be in us in potency, the agent intellect will be coupled with us in potency; and when some shall be in us in potency, some in act, then he will be coupled with us according to part, and according to part not, and then we are said to be moved to continuation; and when this motion shall be completed — when, namely, all speculative intelligibles shall be with us in act — then he will be coupled with us in act, in all ways" — too manifestly that prior in nature the man will have all speculative intelligibles actually coupled with him, before the agent intellect be coupled with him; and that this is the cause of that coupling. But this is manifest impossible, as the demonstration of the 32nd and 36th parts perspicuously showed. For this would necessarily be by infinite acts or habits, and infinitely infinite — indeed infinitely infinitely without end.

What you also assert — that man then knows all things — who is this? Who in all retroact times has been such? Who ever was found such? How many glorious philosophers preceded — but who of them was found such? Was not Aristotle, your god, and the most famous of philosophers, by his own attestation ignorant of the squaring of the circle? Did he not also ignore very many other mathematical, natural, metaphysical or theological, and moral things, as his books evidently indicate? Have not all philosophers contradicted one another in some things, even to the going forth of their life? How therefore and when did all these know all things? And if not these, who others are these?

What, moreover, you add — that man will then perform a proper action on all beings like God — wonderful! Who ever of philosophers or others has been found such, except perhaps those famous and illustrious Prophets, powerful in deed and word, knowing all or most things divinely, and doing all kinds of miracles in heaven, in fire, in air, in water, in earth, and under earth, in men, in beasts of burden, and as it were in all beings, divinely — as the foregoing concerning the 32nd part evidently indicate? But these unanimously profess a future life after death in glory and in punishment.

The cause of this error of yours, however, seems to be the unity of the intellect and of the rational soul in all men, which you erroneously posited, as is shown above. Nor is it wonder if from one error error breaks forth — nay, from one error innumerable errors are propagated. The cause, however, of Aristotle's error in this part was the error concerning the eternity of the world, and of human generation; therefore he had consequently to posit only the immortal souls to be beatified after death, not the whole composite of soul and body. For he did not posit the return of souls to bodies, nor the same man in number to return, as the Platonists posited.

Nor ought the irrational reason of Simon to disturb anyone — denying the resurrection of the dead, because it is against nature, if omnipotent God, the author of all nature, be considered. Indeed if we follow Plato, who — John of Salisbury reporting, Policraticus 2, chapter 12 — asserts nature to be the will of God, the resurrection of the dead will be according to nature, because according to divine will. This Simon too Dionysius, Irenaeus, Hippolytus, Origen, and Epiphanius rebuke and refute.

Those, however, positing the return of human souls to bestial bodies — as Plato, Ovid, and the other Platonists — horribly deviate, and monstrously rave. For who of philosophers does not know that proper natural forms desire proper matter disposed according to proper conditions, and do not enter others? Who also does not know that natural species — for example, man and ass — disagree specifically, essentially from one another by substantial differences and forms, essentially, substantially, and specifically differing? How therefore does the form or soul of a man constitute an ass, or contrariwise?

If too the soul of a man, putting off the human body, would immediately put on a bestial one, and the same man would live, but under another form, as Ovid feigns, as Plato also seems to think — that man would never die, but continuously live, since the last of a permanent thing is not given but the first — which Ovid too seems manifestly to grant. For he says: "All things change, nothing perishes." But who, senseless, would grant that man — and universally no man — dies? If too man does not die, he will not rise again, against the prior particle of this part.

You also are repugnant to yourself, Ovid; do you not, below in the same, thus say:

Time devourer of things, and you, envious old age, destroy all things, and the things vitiated with the teeth of age little by little with slow death you consume.

And further below, toward the end, speaking of Julius Caesar, dead, and his nobility, and many others dead, and the elder of Julius's nephews, and Augustus Caesar, then alive, you write thus:

Nor unless when older he shall have equaled like years, will he touch the ethereal seats and the kindred stars. Meanwhile snatch this soul from the slain body, make it a sunbeam, that always our Capitol and forum the divine Julius from his lofty temple may look upon. Hardly had he spoken, when in the midst of the seat of the Senate kindly Venus stood, to none discernible, and from the limbs of her own Caesar snatched it, nor allowed it to be loosed into air; the recent soul, but bore it among the celestial stars. And while she bore it, she felt it take divinity and kindle, and she sent it forth at once; at once it flies higher, and drawing a flame-bearing hair on a spacious path, the star shines, and seeing the well-deeds of her son confesses them to be greater than her own, and rejoices to be conquered by him. He although forbids his own things to be preferred to his father's, yet free fame, subject to no commands, prefers him unwilling, and only in this part is repugnant. So Atreus yields to the great titles of Agamemnon, so Theseus surpassed Aegeus, so Achilles' Peleus. Finally, that I may use examples equating themselves, so Saturn too is less than Jove, Jove tempers the ethereal towers, and the kingdoms of the threefold world. The earth is under Augustus; both are Father and Ruler.

And in the end, concerning yourself you thus say:

When that day shall will, which has right over nothing but this body, may it end the space of my uncertain age. In the better part of me, however, perennial above the high stars I shall be borne.

Do you not here say expressly that well-merited souls are to be lifted up to the stars, and there to be placed in different mansions or places, according to the differences of their merits?

Furthermore, if well-merited human souls immediately return to such bodies, and to such worldly life, when and where are they sufficiently rewarded for their merits? Not when they bore their ancient habitations, their former bodies, and in those — as the preceding things manifest — nor when they are separated from all bodies, since (as this opinion says) immediately after those they enter others; nor in the second bestial bodies, since right rewarding ought to make the rewarded better. But who doubts that a beast is more vile than a man? What melioration or reward, I ask, is to be reputed — that the soul, so noble, so perfect, should from a body so noble and perfect be expelled to a body so much more ignoble and vile, that so noble a creature should be turned into so horrid a monster? How is such a transformation rather to be deemed reward and not punishment? Or if any reward whatever could be feigned, yet not the most generous and beyond what is fitting, according to the judgment of the next and 31st part and their demonstrations.

How, moreover, does just God — who by reason as mistress teaches us that He is to be loved and worshipped by us above all things, so much that for any goods or evils we ought not knowingly to offend Him in any way, as the 30th part attests — render to them so sparing and small a reward for so great a love and so great worship, against the 31st part? How also does true God, who according to the doctrine of the same 30th part wills Himself to be loved and worshipped by men finally on account of Himself, render to them not Himself but another non-final reward — another, I say, incomparably less than Himself, and as it were nothing and empty? How is such a one plenarily beatified? How is his desire satiated? — as has been argued above.

Nor are virtuous-living human souls, having immediately entered other human bodies for worldly life, thus beatified to the full. For they return to the wonted labor and pain, to the state of meriting newly and sinning, to the wearinesses and miseries customary. But how is such a condition to be reputed sufficient wage of all prior labors, and felicity of man?

Does not also the soul of man, just as it has the natural aptitude and appetite for body — and not indifferently for any body whatever, but for human body — so also, among human ones, for the proper body which it bore, in which and through which it exercised noble acts, and which it loved more than an extraneous and altogether alien human body? Thus the soldier too would more desire and love his own and ancient horse and sword, by which he strenuously bore himself, than others. Wherefore the Poet says: "The soldier honors the horse with which he has grown old."

Pliny too, Natural History 8, recounts, and other histories attest, that Alexander, for his horse Bucephalus killed, made solemn obsequies, and committed him to burial; and around his sepulcher, building a city, named it by his name. And what is more fitting, what more becoming, what more congruous to reason, than that the whole man who merited — the same whole, not another — be rewarded in the same soul and body, by which he exercised the works of strenuousness? What more apt, and more fitting to retributive justice, than that the same man who merited — in the same soul and body in which he merited, abstained from delights, sustained sadnesses, hunger and thirst, cold and heat, vigils and toils, blows, wounds, prisons, and squalors, and a most strong death at last — should, reunited together, be rewarded; molestations, harms, sadnesses, and toils removed, be cherished by delights, and softened by joys, and enjoy gladnesses?

This is convinced not only by moral or divine reason, but even by natural reason. For it is held certainly among natural philosophers that the agent or efficient cause precedes its act, its effect, in time; but the formal cause never precedes its formed thing, with Aristotle, Metaphysics 12, with Averroes attesting — as was recounted in the demonstration of the 36th part.

How also does Ovid feign that some remember to have been other men, or otherwise named, and then to have done and suffered the same things they now do — which other certain ones too feign? But how? By what likely reason? For why could I not concerning myself, and other men concerning themselves, by similar reason? Is it not perhaps therefore feigned by some — because, as the Greek histories attest, Menelaus, Euphorbus having been conquered, placed his shield in the temple of Juno; which Panthoides — who was called Pythagoras — accepted? Wherefore they said the soul of Euphorbus had entered Panthoides, and that he had been Euphorbus.

It will be said perhaps that virtuous souls do not immediately return to bodies, but with a Great Year interposed; nor then to other bodies, but to their own; and that vicious souls alone immediately return to alien bodies, bestial or human — for example, the souls of males to the bodies of females. But how will it come to be so, since God is more prone to bestow rewards than to repay punishments — just as He more abundantly rewards the virtuous than punishes the vicious, as befits His magnificent goodness, with the 31st part attesting — nor is the virtuous soul meanwhile sufficiently rewarded for virtuous works, as is persuaded above?

Furthermore, if a male was incontinent of voluptuous things, how is he fittingly punished if he is changed into a female more incontinent and having greater delight in the acts of voluptuousness, with the doctors and likewise Tiresias attesting — having experienced the male and female lot, with Ovid, Metamorphoses 3, recounting? For punishment ought to be sad and contrary to voluptuousness. How also would so delicious a punishment sufficiently terrify men inclined to voluptuousness, and draw them back from sin (according as was perhaps touched on above) — and not rather perhaps incite them?

Nor again will they return into bodies of fierce wild beasts on account of similar reasons, and on account of reasons previously touched on. Furthermore, according to what is set forth concerning the rewarding of the good — what is more consonant to reason than that the same numerically who sinned, the same numerically be punished; than that in the same members in which he enjoyed enticements he be conversely punished; than that in the same body in which he bathed himself in voluptuous things, and conversely be punished?

Furthermore, since rewarding and punishment seem contraries — and contraries according to the doctrine of the philosophers are wont to be done about the same thing — if virtuous souls alone without bodies be rewarded, and vicious souls alone without bodies be punished; or if vicious souls with bodies be punished, and virtuous souls likewise with bodies be rewarded — although those in tabid, corrupt, and wretched bodies, these in glorious bodies.

Furthermore, what shall become of the souls of those who have done nothing good or bad? Either they will immediately be reunited with bodies, and then with what kinds; or they will wait longer, and how shall they bear themselves in the meantime?

Nor is the judgment to be held which affirms that all souls, after the space of a Great Year, will return to their own bodies, and lead the customary worldly life, and so all the same things numerically be repeated infinitely. For when, and where, would virtuous men thus be rewarded to the full? Not in the present worldly life, as is shown above; nor in the celestial life — for there not the whole composite man, but the soul alone, is rewarded, which reward does not suffice the virtuous man and his virtuous works, as is shown above; nor in the second worldly life, after the soul's return to body, as was shown above. How, moreover, does so diminished a rewarding, so cut short, that it does not reward the whole servant but only his half part, reasonably befit God, according to what is set forth here, and the 31st part?

How also in the middle of that part is so curtailed, so brief, so sparing a reward — or any temporal reward — sufficiently repay the integral lover of God, and His sincere worshipper, who according to the doctrine of the 30th part, for any goods however delightful — intensively or extensively, or even in duration to be gained, or these gained to be preserved, or evils penally not yet had to be avoided, or these had to be removed — would never knowingly offend Him in any way, by withdrawing any due service, or doing anything displeasing — as was here above touched on, and concerning the next part of this work?

Nay, more reasonably must it be esteemed that it befits divine justice, generosity, and goodness most amply and most infinitely infinite — that to such a lover and worshipper of His persevering finally, the warfare consummated, in opportune time, retributing abundantly, He repay full delights, all and any kinds of delightful things, exceeding such failing and fluid things, and in duration surpassing them — eternal delights — and relegate and segregate all adversities and penalties, sadnesses and molestations, defects and lamentations, labors and sorrows, and universally all misery.

Such a soul too is not perfectly blessed, on account of the appetite which it has for the body, in no way satiated; and the privation of its noble operations through corporeal organs accustomed; the privation also of its prior kingdom, according to what is shown above; nor will it ever be perfectly blessed, because neither in the body nor separated from the body. Such a soul, moreover, separated and blessed in heaven, either believes and hopes that it will so eternally remain, or knows it will return to the body, and to corporeal miseries; or considers nothing about that, etc., as above against the little response at the end of the preceding particle.

Wherefore — Augustine, City of God 22, chapter 27 reporting — Porphyry the Platonist, wishing to correct the opinion of Plato, affirmed the most purified soul, when it has returned to the Father, will never further return to the evils of the world. Avicenna too, On the Soul 5, chapter 4, proves that one soul is not transferred to many bodies, nor to another body in any way; and he subjoins: "And let this suffice for him who seeks the judgment of this matter. You ought, however, to know that this can be expounded by many words." Whom too Algazel, Physics 4, last chapter, imitating, proves the same. Nor can anyone thus object to the Christians: for we hold that holy souls separated from bodies, even if they do not immediately have their bodies in fact, yet have them in certain hope. For they know most certainly that, in the time fitting and divinely preordained, and on account of a reasonable and just cause delayed, they will receive and hold them eternally glorious.

Let Plato consider, I pray, what manner of things — how absurd — he affirms about men and human souls, without any violence of reason, indeed without even a slight image or thin shadow of reason, and without the support of any authority. Whence, I ask, is authority — or rather temerity — to you of dreaming such things, of prophesying such things, of affirming such things? Especially since you do not profess yourself a prophet, nor son or follower of a prophet, but a pure philosopher.

In this part one thing I know: that if I or any of the Christian philosophers — not a prophet, nor following a prophet — should presume to affirm so great a judgment without so much as the slenderest reason or image of reason, I would exhibit myself a laughingstock to you and to the others of your profession.

Consider further, I beseech, the judgment of the Christians in these articles, strengthened by the concordant judgment of the Prophets — nay, founded on the authority of the supreme Prophet, the Lord Jesus Christ, according to what the foregoing concerning the 32nd part perspicuously demonstrated — confirmed by beautiful and fitting reasons (according as the matter allows), reasonably defended from all contradiction, impossibility, and inconvenience, according to what is set forth concerning the 32nd part of this work. What philosopher, lover of truth and not defender of vanity, guardian of his position or sponsor — would not most joyfully admit, sustain, and defend the more probable or more proven, more reasonable and more reasoned, more desirable, more useful, and more joyful judgment?

According to that judgment, too, the generation of men, and all human acts, would be necessarily subjected to the dispositions of the stars — which how unworthy and contrary to natural order, who does not know? For who is ignorant that the rational soul is of more worthy and more noble essence than any irrational thing — wherefore also than the stars? How then, according to the worthy natural order, is this in all its operations necessarily subjected to be regulated by them? Far be such an ill-regulated regimen, such an incongruous polity, that flesh should rule the spirit, wife the husband, beast of burden the man, and a fool plenarily rule a wise man. Not such a worldly polity did the most wise, most powerful, and best Prince, God, institute — according to what the first Supposition and following parts convince — which all moral and natural philosophers attest.

Marvelous, moreover, concerning Plato and the Platonists thus positing — especially since they posit the world and time to have a beginning, and to be created by God; and man and other species universally — as the first Timaeus evidently shows, and the philosophic books often teach; which Ovid the Platonist too, Metamorphoses 1, attests. For there he posits the production of higher and lower things from God, according to the order recounted in Genesis. For if at the end of a Great Year men numerically the same returned, by similar reason all other effects too — nor then would there be any other men or effects, or the same otherwise disposed, on account of the omnimodal identity of the higher celestial causes. But how, at the end of the present Great Year — which will be the beginning of the following Great Year — will all things be newly created, just as in its beginning all things were anciently created? For if all things will then be newly created except God, they will be created from non-beings, just as anciently they were created. All beings therefore will be previously non-beings. The world therefore will not endure, nor time with its things, until the end of a Great Year, but before all things will fail, with God alone remaining — the opposite of which was posited.

How also will the second gods (namely the angels), and the rational souls of men, immortal and eternal from their creation according to the judgment even of Plato himself, Timaeus 2, return into nothing? Does not Plato, Timaeus 2, chapter 3, induce God thus addressing the angels: "Gods, of whom I am workman and Father, you are indeed my works, dissoluble by nature, yet by my will indissoluble. For everything which is joined is dissoluble by nature; but truly that which is joined and modulated by good reason — to wish to dissolve it is not of God. Wherefore, since you have been made and generated, you are by no means immortal, nor altogether indissoluble, nor yet shall you ever be dissolved, nor undergo the necessity of death, because my will is a greater bond and more vigorous to the custody of eternity than those vital bonds from which your eternity has been compacted and composed" — which he wishes also concerning human souls, the heaven, and the world.

If too all these beings will at some time be non-beings, that general non-entity and privation of things will endure for some time — but how much? Through the space of a Great Year? But then there will be no Great Year nor small one, since neither heaven, nor celestial motion. What therefore then will moderate that duration, and tax it — what, I ask, but the divine will? What therefore if He should will to wait further? Can He not? Has He not formerly been able and done so? Has He not free disposition of His own will?

Whence does Plato know that all things will immediately at the end of a Great Year be re-created by God? Unless perchance he should say it is because God always does the best of possibles — and to be is better than not to be. But this is destroyed above. According to this, too, He would never permit things not to be, nor would they ever be except in the best way, since He is fully omnipotent and of universally efficacious will, as the preceding things have taught — and Plato himself does not deny it. If, however, you should respond that not universally all things will then return, but only the corruptibles previously corrupted, and the others will continuously remain — you seem to contradict yourself.

For if all things previously corrupted will then return the same numerically, all and singular creations of all and singular created things in the beginning of a Great Year, formerly corrupted, will then return the same numerically. Wherefore also all and singular beings created in the beginning of a Great Year will at the end of the same be created anew. Will not even the first man then be re-created? For how otherwise will he then return? Not by natural generation, since previously he was not naturally generated but created. Or if then he will be naturally generated and not created, and in the beginning so it was — against the hypothesis. Nor does it seem he is to be naturally generated; for from what parents? Why from these rather than from those? This too would necessarily be from some woman defloured — if previously he was created by God without any woman acting with Him; nor then was there any woman defloured, since by no prior man, since he was the first of men.

That woman, moreover, will then have him in her womb first alive: for if he is born or alive before, he will return before the beginning of a Great Year — against the hypothesis; and if then he will be in his mother's womb first alive, so was he first created. But it does not seem that the woman preceded the first man.

How also, the hypothesis standing, was he created in his mother's womb alive, from preceding matter and his begetter's seed, just as he will be in the beginning of the future Great Year? If, too, that woman pregnant near the end of this Great Year shall live until the beginning of the following Great Year, why not also after — indeed, why not before — since according to natural reason and the common judgment of philosophers the last instant of a permanent thing is not to be given? And if she will so endure, why not other men and women naturally generated, sufficiently many? So therefore was it in the beginning of a Great Year — against the hypothesis.

Nor does it seem that, in the beginning of the future Great Year, the first man will be created, since men and women, according to the natural course, suffice for perpetuating the species and the supposita of the species. For it does not seem that, at the end of a Great Year, all men everywhere shall suddenly die. For of so general a future mortality, suddenly to come, no natural cause could be feigned except a celestial one — nor on the part of heaven, except by reason of the most slow motion of the eighth sphere. But this — to those who know the natures and forces of the celestial mobiles, motions, orbs, and stars — is plain to be a fable and fiction. Will not men have Hyleg, Alcocoden, and all the givers or signifiers of life and death then, just as before?

What also was said above — that not immediately, but after the space of a Great Year, souls will return to their own bodies, and the same men numerically will return — if a year be posited to contain 440 or 600 common years, is easily reproved. For it is plain to those positing the celestial reason on earth, that the motion of the eighth sphere and of the planets in no way return in so many common years to their pristine places, order, and aspect. The same is reproved by the lapse of time. For it is plain that Noah, Abraham, Moses, David, Nebuchadnezzar, Cyrus, Darius, Alexander, Octavianus Augustus, Christ, Hermes, Plato, Aristotle, and very many similar preceded by so many years and more, who have not yet returned, nor have been seen, nor heard. Furthermore, if the dead return in such a time, by similar reason all other effects too: wherefore in such a time too each man, the same as before, from the same parents, the same hour and place, by the same act, is generated again, dies again, and rises again. But, as diverse histories attest, several living beyond so many courses of years continuously have endured — as also some cities, stones, and metals.

But those who assert that a Great Year contains 36,000 solar years can be similarly chastised. For to those who have the discipline of celestial motions, it is easy to demonstrate that there is no return of all celestial mobiles to their primordial places in so many years. Nor is it altogether plain that, when the eighth sphere completes its motion fully, all celestial moved bodies will likewise complete their motions; nor does it seem that the eighth sphere completes its motion in so many years — indeed the contrary will easily be shown. Nor does Ptolemy say that the eighth sphere truly moves through one degree in every hundred years, but "nearly." Nor is this Ptolemy's tradition about the motion of the eighth sphere held as certain or true, as Albategni, Thebit, and other later astronomers have most certainly discovered.

If however Plato should wish to say that virtuous souls will return to bodies, not however passible and wretched, but impassible and blessed, to a life not temporal and wretched, but perpetual and blessed — and this at the end of the world, when all celestial moved bodies will fully return to their primary state, and so from the origin of the world to its end will perfect one Great Year — he would not seem far from the judgment of truth. For thus too certain theologians opine, and divine: for it seems worthy to them that all things should be performed in a circle, and so the celestial motions and times should end where they began. Yet sufficiently reasonable would it seem that, just as God instituted angels and men in good not best, that thus from good through better to best by progressing they should ascend, and progress by ascending, and so at last in the best should finally remain — so also He should have ordered the celestial moved bodies in places, dignities, aspects, and other such.

By these things, however, it is not impertinent to persuade that, just as the good will rise again to everlasting beatitude, so also the wicked to everlasting misery. For what is more proportionable, what more fitting to equity, what more congruous to reason? For these are recognized as contraries to one another. As therefore eternity in beatitude is reputed the most blessed portion, so in misery it is proved the most wretched portion. What other punishment, worthy in another way, in the most ample polity of this world, could sufficiently recall the wicked from evils committed to penance, and deter from evils not committed — as was touched on above? Nor can anyone say that the threat alone of such punishment suffices. Far be it that God, the most truthful, faithful, and most upright Prince of the world, should need lies, rejoice in perjuries, or exercise fallacies — against the first Supposition and following parts. If, too, in threatening punishments He deceived us, why not likewise in promising rewards? Why too, by reason of the speaker, ought we ever to believe Him in anything?

Do not also the foregoing concerning the next part of this work evidently show that temporal sin can justly be punished by eternal punishment — indeed ought to be eternally punished, if not corrected — unless God shall will to act more graciously and benignly with evil men than with good, with blasphemers than with lovers, with despisers than with worshippers, by spontaneously remitting so great a deserved punishment, and gratuitously bestowing so great undeserved glory.

Do not earthly princes, too, have it in them to establish many just things, and do they not in fact establish them, to which natural demonstrative reason does not altogether compel by precedent, but they are committed to the arbitration of the lawgiver — concerning which the jurists say, "What pleased the Prince has the force of law"? Could not therefore a Prince justly establish, and very consonant to reason, that whoever for the Prince or the Republic over which he presides shall have done strenuously, perseveringly, be perpetually rewarded; and whoever shall do the contrary, be perpetually punished? — which would justly be done eternally in their persons, if they could live eternally; which because they cannot, in their posterity, as it were in themselves in some way, in perpetuity is exercised, when they are repelled from hereditary succession, and decreed unsuitable to many honors perhaps?

Why therefore could not the most excellent Prince, God, to whom human souls always live, and whole men raised up will likewise always live, as the foregoing attest — establish similar things justly concerning His subjects, and efficaciously fulfill them, as most fittingly, most proportionately, most decently befits reason, justice, equity, as the foregoing have persuaded? Indeed He has so established and sanctioned, as His secretaries, referendaries — most illustrious Prophets — Christ chief of Prophets and Lawgivers, as the foregoing concerning the 32nd part show, and the other divine men of the old Law and the new unanimously attest. With whom Hermes the Philosopher — nay, the Father of Philosophers, On the Eternal Word 30 — plainly agrees, as is recounted above. Whom Aristotle too, in Secret of Secrets, first part, 18, alleging solemnly, thus writes: "Beware as much as you can to shed the blood of men. Because the egregious Doctor Hermogenes wrote, saying: When a creature kills a creature similar to itself, the powers of the heavens will cry to the divine Majesty, saying to the Lord: 'Lord, Your servant wills to be similar to You.' If unjustly he is killed, the highest Creator answers: 'Permit him who kills, because he will be killed in revenge — and I will repay'; and so often in their praises the powers of the heavens will represent the death of the slain, until vengeance be taken upon the slayer, who will be one of the perseverers in eternal punishments."

Which his authority below, in the third part, 7, recounted above, attests, and certain other authorities of the foregoing. Avicenna too, Metaphysics 9, last chapter, says: "An imperfect soul stripped from the body shall fall into a tract of eternal labor." Algazel, moreover, Physics 5, chapter 1, expressly teaches: "Certain vicious souls separated from bodies will incur eternal punishments, and will be eternally punished."

What other thing too is more aptly figured by the four other infernal rivers of the poets, ever flowing, and never failing, mentioned above, than eternal infernal punishment? Nor do the philosophers or heretics saying the contrary bring forward any reason — nor can they bring forward, namely, an efficacious reason. But as historians in non-historical, but philosophic and disputable matters, against the nature of things, they weave a bare history — and a history of the future — though they are not Prophets nor sons of Prophets. For to punish sinners is not repugnant to divine mercy and clemency, by the 31st part; nor likewise is it repugnant to the justice of God to punish eternally those who sin temporally, by the next part of this work. Nor is what was said above repugnant to this — that God punishes no one abundantly or to what is fitting. For although He punishes eternally, yet by turns or always continuously He can punish more mildly than fittingly, less than the iniquity of those punished merited — which He does, as the foregoing concerning the 31st part and the next have persuaded.

These men, however, perhaps, although they cannot construct their own part by reasons, will at least try to destroy mine by responding, saying that the privation alone of eternal felicity, without any punishment of sense, is sufficient punishment for every fault. But this is at once refuted by the foregoing. For thus he who sins more, and he who less, and he too who never operates well but always most evilly, and he who never acts well or evilly, would equally be punished. The same is easily reproved by the next part of this work and by its demonstration. Why, too, if it were so, would it by no means suffice in every right polity to punish any sinners only by privation of reward and honor, and not by various torments and by death? He too who sins knowingly especially against God, seems more to merit torment, than he who acts rightly, wage. For no one ought to sin for some right thing done. For sin is more to be avoided than merit to be acquired — unless perhaps sin cannot be avoided except by meritoriously operating, as the 31st part proves. Beatitude, moreover, and misery are contraries, not only privatively opposed; they are made therefore by positive contraries, not only by privatively opposed.

If, however, according to the foregoing, the good finally raised up are eternally to be rewarded — where more fittingly than in heaven, than in the glorious habitation of God, before the face of God, always with Him whom they have loved above all things, and finally sought? Does not also reason teach this? For the rational human soul is incorporeal and immaterial, neither extended to the extension of matter, nor educed from the potency of elemental or mixed matter, nor having in itself the nature of matter. Wherefore neither is its natural place on the earth, nor among the elements, or these elementals here, but above. For all simples and composites according to their natures naturally require for themselves places, as experience manifests, and the philosophers attest.

Does not also a worthier place befit a worthier nature, as the philosophers and the common folk commonly confess? And who does not know that the rational, immaterial, and immortal soul prevails over material and corruptible things? And what place is worthier than what is above, as no man denies? Wherefore the Philosopher says, On the Heaven and the World 2, chapter 34: "More divine is the place which is above, than that which is below." Where the text of Averroes thus has it: "The superior place is more noble than the inferior."

The placed thing too and the place demand a fitting and natural similitude, as reason persuades, experience shows, the philosophers and others confess. But the rational soul is immaterial, spiritual, and immortal; it demands therefore such a place — a place above all these material and mortal things — as also the holy angels demand heaven. For by this reason persuaded, all gentes and peoples, philosophers and common men, agreeingly attribute heaven to the holy angels.

Whence the Philosopher, On the Heaven 1, chapter 22, says: "All — both barbarians and Greeks — attribute the place which is above to God; whoever indeed think there are gods. Plain that immortal is fitted to immortal. Otherwise impossible." Where the translation which Averroes expounds thus has: "All men unanimously agree that this first glorious body is the place of spirits — namely the Greeks and the others of the first peoples, who knew God and His dominion, and said: 'That upon which corruption does not fall ought to be in a place which does not corrupt.'"

On which Averroes: "All gentes confessing that there is a God, agree in this: that heaven is the place of God and of the other spirits, who are commonly called angels."

The Philosopher too, On the Heaven and the World 2, chapter 2: "Heaven, and the place which is above, the ancients indeed attributed to the gods, as alone existing immortal." Where the translation of Averroes: "All the ancients posited heaven to be the place of the Creator, on account of its incorruptibility and eternity"; on which Averroes: "The place of the eternal is eternal."

Do not also things similar in nature require a similar natural place? But spirits or angels and rational souls are similar in nature, as the foregoing attest, and all gentes and peoples, philosophers and common men, confessing the immortality of the soul equally confess. But the natural place of angelic spirits is heaven, as the foregoing attest.

Furthermore, beatitude or felicity is the most noble, most worthy, most pleasant good, separated from all adversities, and universally integral and perfect, as the preceding things have taught. But such a good requires a fitting place; otherwise it will not be perfect. But where could the rational blessed soul have such a place fitting for it? Not in sublunary things — that is plainly clear, as the foregoing attest; for only in celestials is such a place. Whence also the Philosopher, On the Heaven and the World 1, in the ancient translation, and in the translation which Averroes has, frequently calls heaven a "glorious body."

By these, therefore, and such reasons inclined, many philosophers and poets recounted above affirm agreeingly the virtuous and purged soul is finally to be rewarded in celestial things — to have final felicity and beatitude in celestial things. But man to be beatified will not be beatified in his soul alone, but in soul together and body, as is shown above. The whole man therefore in soul and body raised up at the same time is to be beatified in heaven, and there finally rewarded.

And behold how aptly this fits with reason: for certain natural forms naturally desire certain natural places, and likewise the whole composite naturals on account of the forms. Wherefore they are naturally moved to their natural places, and in them naturally rest, as the philosophers attest. The natural place of the rational soul, moreover, is heaven, as is shown above. Therefore it naturally desires that place, is moved naturally to it, and in it naturally rests. Wherefore likewise the whole man.

Is not also the soul worthier and more perfect than the body? What therefore is to be reputed worthier and more natural — that the soul rule the body, that the soul lead the body, that the soul place the body in a place fitting the soul — than the contrary? Therefore, the whole man would more naturally be placed in heaven than on earth. For there he would naturally be placed according to his most natural form, his worthiest and most perfect part, as the foregoing attest; on earth, however, only according to his body and his matter. In final beatitude indeed, just as the soul is naturally placed in heaven, so also the body — otherwise it would not be most natural nor most apt for the soul thus blessed; nor would the soul or the whole man have perfect felicity and consummated beatitude.

Nor ought it to disturb philosophers, or any others, how this earthly flesh can naturally ascend into heaven and remain. For why should not omnipotent God, the Author of all nature — who according to the foregoing could create and recreate the whole body from nothing, raise the dead, and work all kinds of miracles as He shall have willed — be able marvelously, and to us perhaps small ones incomprehensibly, to alter and subtilize the grossness of this flesh, until it should naturally ascend into heaven and remain — just as the Sun subtilizes those gross and heavy elements; just as also the alchemists subtilize many gross and heavy things by means of fire? Does not also the magnet, a stone very rude, so dispose iron — a body very rude and heavy — that it naturally ascends to it, follows it upward at any distance whatsoever, and remains with it? Why therefore can omnipotent God, who dwells in the Heavens, not so alter the bodies of men, lift them up to celestial things, and place them with Himself eternally in celestial things?

Furthermore, in any rightly disposed polity, the places of those acting properly and improperly, the places of rewards and punishments, are discrete from one another according to higher and lower; honorable and dishonorable; delightful and sad. For who does not know that the virtuous and the upright are honored with the foremost seats? And who does not know that the vicious and improper are cast out from such, thrust into prisons, hanged on gibbets, and consigned to other vile and contrary places?

The good, however, in God's greatest polity, according to what was said before, are above in celestial things to be rewarded, and there finally to be placed. What therefore more fitting than that the wicked, below on earth, and beneath the earth — in some horrible place beneath the earth, and beneath our common habitation, which is therefore called inferus and infernum — be finally thrust to be punished? So that, just as those who offended the God of heaven are deprived of celestial light, sight, and favor; so that the spirit of man, and the whole man, who according to the foregoing ought naturally to have inhabited in the heavens — because he acted against nature, against the God of nature, against the natural rule of loving which the 30th part handed down — should against nature inhabit in the lower world; so that, besides his other punishments, the place itself, unnatural and horrid, should be penal: that just as for the good all things are turned into glory, so for the wicked all things are turned into misery.

For Hermes says, On the Eternal Word 19: "From the fact that they are deprived of sight, in Greek they are called Ades; from the fact that they are in the lowest of the sphere, in Latin they are named the lower ones." Plato, too, Timaeus 2, chapter 9, says that the negligent man of God will be recalled to the lower world, as is more fully alleged above. With whom Aristotle in On the Secret of Secrets, 3rd part, 7, plainly consents, as is recounted above. With these too consent very many histories of the gentiles and Greeks, distinguishing higher and lower gods, and very many songs of the poets, as was touched on above.

Does not, also, with the Philosopher, On the Heaven 2, chapter 73, recounting, the Pythagoreans hand down that the prison of Jove is in the middle of the whole, at the center — which they also profess Tartarus, and the spirits or men Tartarean — and Jove inflicts threats and punishments on them? For the Philosopher recounts, Posterior Analytics 2, chapter 3, that the Pythagoreans say it sounds or thunders for the cause of threats to those who are in Tartarus, that they may fear.

From these things, however, it evidently follows that the bodies of the blessed are to be transformed to a better, purer, more celestial condition in the future beatitude. For how otherwise will they ascend to heaven, and there naturally rest, as is shown above? If too, according to the foregoing, not one part only of man, but the whole man together in soul and body is to be rewarded and finally beatified — since his soul is then to be changed for the better, and incomparably better — why not also similarly the body? Especially since, according to the foregoing, God can most easily do this; since also it more befits a soul better, more purged, and more celestial, naturally inhabiting in heaven, to have such a body — a body alike and conform; since besides, otherwise he would not be the perfectly blessed man — for how is the whole man to be deemed perfectly blessed whose whole body is subject to customary misery, opposes, contends, and fights against the spirit?

These things being granted, who would deny that the blessed will have immortal bodies? Immortal, I say, either by force of nature to be transmuted for the better, or by the benefit of the Creator and Recreator, the Beatifier and continuous Preserver. For how otherwise does the whole man in soul and body together enjoy eternal beatitude, as the preceding things have persuaded? Do not also forms and bodies need to be naturally conformed, and to agree with a natural similitude? And what is more correspondent, more natural, and more similar than that a corruptible and temporal form should inhabit and inform a corruptible and temporal body? But an incorruptible and eternal form — an incorruptible and eternal body? This was the ancient opinion of many of the ancients, as was touched on above. For all who say that gods come from men say also this; which the Philosopher too, Metaphysics 3, chapter 15, manifestly commemorates.

Who too, Topics 4, says: "Sometimes they sin, placing the passion in the genus of the patient, as whoever say that immortality is eternal life. For immortality seems to be the passion or the chance of life. That what is said is true, however, will be plain if anyone grants that some mortal becomes immortal. For no one says that this person assumes another life, but a certain chance or passion is begotten in this same one. Wherefore eternity is not the genus of immortality."

I know, however, that Aristotle and Averroes, Metaphysics 3 in the place above, deride those saying so — and this perhaps because they by no means understand them, on account of the metaphor of the use of manna and nectar; or because they have no more efficacious argument. For why could not omnipotent God draw away from the human body the intrinsic corruptive causes, or temper all those, proportion them, and equate them to one another, that they should remain incorruptible mutually — as also the doctors assert about the body of optimally natural complexion, which by them is called "tempered to justice"? Or why could He not so alter all those causes? For we see that many natural actives, multifariously altered, suspend their natural actions.

Is not gold, naturally or artificially generated by natural philosophers — universal and particular, namely Alchemical — affirmed to be unputrefiable and incorruptible? Does not also Pliny, Natural History 7, thus write: "They report that a boy wearied by the heat and his journey slept in a cave for fifty-seven years, marveling at the face of things and their change, as if waking up the next day. The same afterward lived the same number of years, as if those in which he slept were not counted, since he endured 157 years." To which other famous histories report similar things. If therefore the body of him and of similar persons did not putrefy in so much time — indeed did not even tend to putrefaction or corruption — why could it not have similarly endured for so much further time, and through however much, even infinite?

Pliny, moreover, in book 2 of the same, thus writes: "Paphos has the celebrated shrine of Venus, in a certain area of which it does not rain. Likewise in it the town of the Troad around the image of Minerva. In the same too the relics of sacrifices do not putrefy."

Among us too in England and Ireland it is most certainly reported that there are certain islands in which no one dies, nor can die, as longest experience manifests; whose inhabitants, however, when about to die, are vexed by an excessive languor, and therefore being carried out, immediately die.

Why therefore can omnipotent God not so alter the bodies of men that they persist immortal? And whatever may be the case concerning the proper power of human bodies, or of the whole universality of created nature, no one doubts that God, of His omnipotence and of His efficacy of will simply infinite, can preserve such glorious bodies of men in blessed life eternally without the divorce of death — as also the 37th part has taught.

Does not Plato profess a similar judgment about the angels recounted above? Who too, Timaeus 1, chapter 4, says: "God fabricated that lustrous and visible spotty mass, joined by a friendly reason of equilibrium of parts, which would be immortal and indissoluble against every chance, except by the will of its Fabricator." By these things too can be plain the proposed concerning the bodies of the reprobate. For unless the reprobate as wholes lived eternally in soul together and body, by no means would they wholly sustain eternal misery, as is shown above.

How, however, they can do this, can be persuaded by the preceding things — through the salamander, through Aetna, and through certain other similar things which are by no means consumed by fire — but most of all by the infinite omnipotence of God. From these things, however, it must further be inferred that the future felicity of the blessed will by no means consist in the customary pleasures of the flesh, or in something else, or in any other things besides God. For how is a body so pure, so marvelously purified, and in all things so blessed, that it serves a fully blessed man fully — that he may plenarily enjoy his full beatitude, and in nothing be drawn back — believed to have its accustomed voluptuous and concupiscent pleasures, wretched and dishonest, drawing the blessed many ways from perfect beatitude, which consists in perfect knowledge of God, love, delight, and adherence — as the foregoing concerning the 32nd part show?

Is not also more perfect, more natural, and more blessed for man to be reputed that he be perfected according to soul, than according to body — in which they are mutually contrary and repugnant? Are not also therefore the virtuous and the studious, abstaining from carnal voluptuous things, more perfect than others, deservedly judged? So therefore will it be in future felicity, nor will there be there repugnance or contrariety of any kind between body and soul. For then there would be there punishment, sadness, and some misery — not consummated felicity.

If too future beatitude and felicity consisted in the customary pleasures of the flesh, beatitude would likewise be possible in the present; and so the Epicureans, the swinish, those given over to all voluptuousnesses, would be more blessed, better, and more virtuous than others in the present, because nearer to the true future beatitude, and to the truly blessed. But who would grant this — except perhaps the impudent swine of Epicurus?

This particle too clearly appears from the foregoing concerning the 32nd part of this work, and concerning the present part — of which some helps still to be briefly recalled. For the said things teach that beatitude or felicity is the final human good, and the ultimate end of man, which is not desired or sought on account of something else, but on account of itself only, and the rest on account of it. But what is so reasonably desired or sought in all beings if not God, as the 30th part has shown?

Furthermore, how does true God, who according to the 30th part of this work has decreed that He be loved and worshipped by men above all other things — whether existing or thinkable — on account of Himself finally, ultimately — render not Himself but another non-final and beatific reward to them? For whatever else He should render to such a lover and worshipper of His, He seems to render nothing, but to defraud — just as if a head of household promised you for your daily work gold, say a talent, and at evening having come, rendered to you dung. Does not whatever is on this side of God, conferred upon Him, seem as dung in respect of the talent? Indeed incomparably much less than nothing and empty.

Wherefore the Philosopher, Ethics 9, chapter 1, speaking of just and due recompense in human communication, thus says: "They contend, however, when other things are made for them, and not what they desire. For it is similar — that nothing be made — when one is not in possession of what one desires; for example, to a citharist promising, and the better he should sing, so much the more — but when in the morning to the seeker his promises were paid for delight, he is said to have rendered delight for delight. For if each one wished this, it would suffice. If however this one wished delight, this one wished gain — and this one has, this one not — it will not be that it should be well according to the communication."

By how much more, in such communication of a lover and worshipper of God with God — in which God Himself is intended, sought, and hoped for finally — is it likewise to be judged? Especially since no other good is greater than He, equal, or comparable from near, but any incomparably more vile, and as it were nothing and empty?

Does not also any virtuous man doing all things finally on account of God, according to the doctrine of the 30th part of this work, finally intend, seek, and continuously be moved toward God? This motion, however, since it is not circular but rectilinear, ought not to be naturally infinite, just as neither is man naturally imperfect. But how shall this motion be naturally finished and finally perfected, the natural and naturally-intended end being in no way acquired but another?

This motion therefore is to be terminated finally in God, who also according to the philosophers, as a beloved and desired thing moves us — as Aristotle, Metaphysics 12, chapter 37, and Averroes in his comment, plainly attest. Where also the Philosopher, 38, speaking of the first principle moving as a beloved: "From such a Principle," he says, "depends heaven and nature." On which Averroes thus says: "It has been declared already that heaven and nature are continued with a principle which is intellect, which is in the end of joy and voluptuousness, just as our disposition will be in continuation with the intellect which is the principle. And from this it appears well that Aristotle thinks the fortune of men, in that they are men, is not except by their continuation with the intellect — which is declared in the book On the Soul to be the principle agent and moving us. For abstracted Intelligences, in that they are abstracted, ought to be principles of those of which they are principles in two ways — as moving, and as end. For an Intelligence agent, inasmuch as it is abstracted and a principle to us, must necessarily move us according as a beloved beloved. And if every motion must be continued with that from which it is, according to the end, we must in the last be continued with this abstracted intellect, so that we shall depend from such a Principle, from which heaven depends."

Furthermore, if consummated felicity of man consisted in any other thing whatever this side of God — not in Him — it would consist in some finite and small good, since there is no other good this side of Him. But how does most just God, most powerful, most abundant, and most generous, who has decreed that He be loved and worshipped by men so much that for any goods not yet had to be acquired, or had to be preserved; or for any penal evils not yet had to be avoided, or had to be removed, they would in nothing knowingly offend Him in any way, according to the doctrine of the 30th part of this work — for so great a love, for so great worship, for so great service, render so little a reward to them? For it befits that He should not sparingly reward His own, but abundantly, according to the 31st part. What therefore worthy of so great love, fitting to so great worship, or proportionate to so great service, will He at last render — the warfare consummated — except some good greater than all goods which they have hoped for, all evils which they have sustained, at least so far as in them was, namely in the promptness of soul and in the constancy of will, for His love, reverence, and honor — especially since He can most easily do this, and most fittingly it befits both Him and them?

How great a good therefore will He render to such lovers, worshippers, and soldiers of His, except some good greater than all goods even imaginable this side of Himself? And what such good if not Himself? Furthermore, no finite and small good satiates a soul or man desiring greater and better, and capable of greater and better. For we all most certainly experience that we naturally affect good, and the greater more, nor are we plenarily quieted in any finite good — nay, we proceed further, and desire and wish for the greater good more.

And how shall this appetite — so natural, so reasonable, so honest — remain without demerit eternally idle, especially since it has been inserted by God, the Author of all nature, not vainly into men? Therefore God Himself alone, infinitely infinite, will satiate this appetite, this desire, this hunger — this thirst — for Himself, and through Himself, most blessedly. But where and when, if not in future felicity, and in the beatitude which we hope for?

Thee therefore, my God, Thee for Thine own sake, above all other things I love, Thee I desire, Thee I covet finally, Thee on account of Thyself — not anything else — always and in all things I seek finally with all my heart and marrow, with groan and weeping, with continuous labor and pain. What therefore wilt Thou finally render me? If Thou render not Thyself to me, Thou renderest nothing; if Thou give not Thyself to me, Thou givest nothing; if I find not Thyself, I find nothing — Thou by no means rewardest me, but tormentest me vehemently. For before, when I sought Thyself finally, I hoped quickly to find and to hold Thyself finally, and by this honeyed hope was I sweetly consoled in all my labors. Now, however, if Thou deny Thyself to me, whatever else Thou give me — frustrated of so great a hope, not for a small time but forever — shall I not always languish for love, mourn in languor, grieve in mourning, lament and weep in grief, and always remain empty and void? Shall I not therefore inconsolably be saddened, incessantly complain, interminably be tormented?

Is this not Thine, best, most powerful, most clement, most loving God of mine? It by no means befits, nowhere is fitting, that Thou shouldst so unfriendlily — indeed so inimically — pay little regard, despise, cast off, and condemn, beat, wound, torment, and afflict for everlasting time Thy perfect lovers from whole heart, from whole soul, from whole strength — when they hoped for Thee, and in Thee plenary felicity, and expected plenary beatitude.

Thou therefore, true God, beginning and end of those who love, wilt render to Thy perfect lovers finally Thyself, perfect felicity, and consummated beatitude — Thyself desired finally and hoped for, Thyself, every good of all beatitude, in Thyself most blessed, beyond what we suffice to think most blessedly contained — as by the first Supposition, the third part, and the fourth, the most learned Doctor hast Thou taught Thy disciples.

Therefore, good Master, and Lord, that which now Thou teachest us by slender argument, at last I beseech, teach us by full experiment; that which now Thou teachest in perfect knowledge, at last teach in perfect comprehension; that which now Thou teachest by long hope, at last by reality teach by a longer one. Make therefore, best God of mine, that in the whole of present life always I love Thee for Thine own sake before all things, seek Thee in all things, and at last in the future find Thee, and hold Thee for ever.

A disciple of Epicurus or a son of Mahomet will perhaps object that men in the future life will possess souls together and bodies; wherefore also carnal concupiscences and venereal appetites — and on that account also acts — if they shall remain without any sadness in all the joy of felicity. But this man does not advert how, according to the fifth particle of this part, the bodies of the blessed in future felicity will by no means remain in their pristine state, but will be divinely changed to a better and purer condition.

Do not many men lack many concupiscences? Does not the same man have and not have the same concupiscence at different times? Do not boys, the decrepit, the sick, the bewitched, and the cold not have the concupiscence of venereal things? Does not castration, camphor, the chaste lamb, mouse-dung, and similar things extinguish the appetite of Venus? Why therefore cannot omnipotent God so sincerely purify the bodies of the blessed, and preserve them eternally purified, that no such concupiscence should ever arise in them?

Indeed He will do so, since such concupiscence would be harmful to them, and depriving of perfect beatitude. For He who, according to the foregoing, will lift up these earthly, heavy, and mortal bodies to celestial things — that there they may naturally remain, and persist immortal — will also take from them every carnal appetite, useless and contrary to perfect felicity; that thus the whole man in soul together and body, all sincere, may eternally enjoy a sincere, spiritual, and perfect beatitude.

40. AGAINST ARISTOTLE, WHO MAINTAINS THAT THE WORLD HAD NO TEMPORAL BEGINNING AND WAS NOT CREATED, NOR IS THE GENERATION OF MEN TO BE TERMINATED, NOR THE WORLD OR THE PRESENT STATE OF THE WORLD TO BE ENDED AT ANY TIME. AGAINST ANAXIMANDER ALSO, PLATO, ANAXAGORAS, EMPEDOCLES, AND THE EMPTY-TONGUED OF THE MOORS CONCERNING THE SAME

Let Aristotle be argued against — who maintains that the world had no temporal beginning and was not created, that the generation of men is not to be terminated, nor the world or the present state of the world to be ended at any time. Let Anaximander too, Plato, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, and the empty-tongued of the Moors be likewise argued against from their errors.

To those considering the sayings of the ancients about the world, two principal opinions present themselves. One, and the most ancient, is that the world is generated and has a temporal beginning; and this is further varied in two ways. Some affirm that the world was created from nothing, and this by God; others, however, that the world was made from something, from some preceding matter — and these are separated in many ways. Anaximander supposes that things, infinite in number, lay hidden among themselves, at rest in a kind of Chaos, for an infinite time; and at last that the Intellect, or God, separated them from one another, and so made the world — which he posits will likewise endure for an infinite time, in the customary and common manner of things. Plato, however, holds that things before the world fluctuated eternally in a disorderly motion, and that God reduced these to order, and so made the world to remain eternally.

To these too another opinion can be added: that the world has been made only once, and is to be corrupted only once — which the Philosopher touches in On the Heaven and the World 1, chapter 102, and which Averroes there imputes to Anaxagoras. The earlier one, however, Aristotle himself in Physics 1, chapter 32, imputes to Anaximander. Whence it appears that Anaximander and Anaxagoras are diverse, and that the one posited the earlier opinion, and the other this one. But let no one, I pray, be too solicitous about their names: for science is not in names, but in things.

Empedocles, however, says that the world was made from the four elements through Strife, and is again to be corrupted through Friendship; and this he says was done in the past infinitely, and will be done in the future infinitely. The other principal opinion affirms the world to be ungenerated; and this is twofold. For some, speaking in the law of the Moors — Averroes attesting on On the Heaven 1, comment 102 — say it is ungenerable but corruptible. Aristotle, however, was the first of all who presumed to affirm the world to be ungenerable and incorruptible. And because his opinion seems more famous than the others, even though it is later, of it nevertheless we must first discourse. With it destroyed too, the others will be easily destroyed.

Is it not therefore, according to your judgment, Aristotle — and according to natural consequence — if the world is anteriorly eternal, that the human species and human generation are likewise so? And is it not, according to the 31st part, and according to your judgment likewise, that the rational human souls are eternal, and each is each man's own; nor is there a circular return of souls, according to the next part of this work, and likewise according to your own judgment in the demonstration of the same part above set forth? Are not therefore now actually souls of this kind simply infinite in number? Wherefore that Algazel, your follower and son in this part, grants the infinity of souls.

For in his Metaphysics 1, definition 6, he thus says: "Being is divided into finite and infinite. The infinite is said in four ways; of which two do not exist; but two argument shows to exist. For it is said that the motion of heaven has no end, because it has no beginning, and this argument now grasps. It is said too that the human souls which are separated from bodies are infinite. This, however, is necessarily true if finitude be removed from time and from the motion of heaven, which is the removal of beginning."

And below: "We grant the human souls which are separable from bodies through death to be infinite in number, although they have being together; since there is not among them any natural ordination by the removal of which they cease to be souls — because none of them are causes for others." But this — so contrary to order, so absurd — does not befit God or nature, which you, Aristotle, and all philosophers — all true philosophers — are wont to reckon impossible.

Is it not, too, according to your judgment, and according to the judgment of truth, that more things are not posited in vain where fewer suffice? To what end therefore are infinite souls posited, when finite ones suffice? You will say perhaps that infinite souls are posited on account of the greater perfection of the universe; otherwise it would not be so perfect. But why infinite souls rather than infinite Angels, infinite spheres, infinite stars, infinite other beings of this kind? Indeed even a finite multitude seems more perfect than an infinite one. For every perfect, spherical, circular, cubic, square, even-times or odd-times, even or odd, digital, articulate, composite number, or of any other praiseworthy disposition, is finite, as Arithmetic clearly shows; whereas an infinite number can be of no such praiseworthy disposition.

In the same way it seems to be of numbers as of bodies and figures; but a finite body is more perfect than an infinite one, if it could exist. For it has a determined and certain figure; an infinite by no means. Indeed every regular body, both with nature and with the geometers and philosophers praiseworthy and famous, is finite. For every body of this kind is a pyramid, cube, octahedron, dodecahedron, icosahedron, or sphere. The spherical figure, however — by reason teaching, and the mathematicians and natural philosophers attesting — is the most perfect of figures. Wherefore the heaven, the most perfect body, has it. The infinite, however, has no figure.

Is not, too, the ordered and determined better and more beautiful than the disordered and confused? For how great a good is order? How much beauty does it bring to things? Do you not yourself, Aristotle, Metaphysics 13, chapter 2, refuting Aristippus and other such Sophists who say — as you recount in Metaphysics 3, chapter 3 — that there is no good in mathematics, thus speak: "But since the good and the best are different — this is in operation, but the good also is in immobile things — saying that the mathematical sciences differ in nothing concerning the good or the best — they lie. For they speak and demonstrate above all. For if they do not name works and reasons, they show; they do not speak about them. The species of good especially are order, commensuration, and the determined, which the mathematical sciences chiefly show. And since these seem to be the cause of many things, I say, for example, order and the determined."

Do you not also, Politics 7, chapter 3, say: "Law is a certain order, and good legislation must necessarily be a good ordering. A number greatly exceeding cannot participate in order"? Is it not for this reason too that the Pythagoreans posited terminus, or the finite and the perfect, in the co-elementation of the good, and the infinite and the superfluous in the co-elementation of evil — as in the demonstration of the 18th part it was recounted?

Of beauty truly, who does not know that it consists in order, determination, and fitting proportion? This the parts of an animal show; this the parts of a building, of painting, of writing, and of other heterogeneous things of this kind clearly demonstrate. Which Alhazen too, in Perspective 2, treating of beauty and its causes, by these and similar things teaches beautifully; where also he thus says: "Position sometimes makes beauty; and many beautiful intentions appear beautiful only on account of order and position. For all distinctions ordered as it were painted do not appear beautiful except on account of ordering; and writing does not appear beautiful except on account of ordering — since beauty is not except from composition and direction of figured letters, and from their composition with each other. If, however, the composition of letters and their ordering be not according to one proportion, but one great and another small, then the writing will not be beautiful, although the figures of the letters by themselves be well placed. And sometimes a writing appears beautiful when its composition is proportional, although the letters be not in the end of good disposition; and similarly very many forms of visibles do not appear beautiful except on account of disposition and ordering of parts to one another."

And below: "A writing will not be beautiful except when its letters are proportional in figure and quantity, and position, and order; and similarly of all kinds of visibles by which diverse parts are gathered together. And when you shall have considered the beautiful forms of all kinds of visibles, you will find that proportionality makes beauty more than any other intention, or even any others joined by themselves. And when there are considered the beautiful intentions which particular intentions make through their conjunction with one another, it will be found that the beauty which appears from their conjunction does not appear except on account of their proportionality. Beauty therefore is not except from particular intentions, and the perfection of it is from proportionality and the consonance which is made between particular intentions."

Where also he says that number makes beauty, as is plain of the number of stars in the heaven, and of candles in a house. But what number, I ask, makes beauty, except a beautiful one? — except one which by its conditions and properties beautiful, beautifully ordered and proportioned to one another, beautifully presents itself to him who contemplates? But infinite number is not such, as is persuaded above. Indeed by its disordered confusion and confused disorder, indecorous, undelectable, and ugly rather it would seem.

For contraries are regularly the causes of contraries, as you yourself, Aristotle, often confess. If therefore these things are so, how is it to be supposed that God, most wisely arranging all things most wisely (as the foregoing show), would make the celestial city of His, His own house, His special family, constituted from holy souls or men according to the next part of this work, disordered and confused, undisposed, imperfect, uncomposed, undecorous — namely in a multitude actually infinite? Indeed, more reasonably must it be esteemed that He arranges this city most wisely in some number known to His wisdom, perfect, elect, fitting, becoming, beautifully and sweetly ordered.

Do not you yourself, Aristotle, in your Politics, show diffusely that a city ought to have a certain mediocre number of citizens? How then will that glorious celestial city have an infinite confusion of citizens? Why, moreover, are there men, or human souls, infinite, rather than infinite Angels, Intelligences, spheres, stars; or now in the world infinite species or infinite supposita? Why, I ask, this marvelous monster only in this species?

Furthermore, if continuous occupation should permit, and prolixity not stand in the way, it seems that this judgment can be by other reasons, as it were quasi-mathematical somehow mathematically, be reproved. Which is therefore briefly to be done by some brief considerations, leaving more exquisite diligence to others, or to another time.

If therefore souls be infinite, they have had, and have, or will have, their own bodies infinite, by the next part of this work. Let those infinite bodies, therefore, or some infinite of them, be posited according to one consequent series — in the manner of speaking of the Philosopher, Physics 6, chapter 2 — so that any preceding body has some next body following it, with no body of this kind intercepted. And let that series be ordered along one straight line, true or imaginary, beginning here at the center of the horizon and extending to the west infinitely; or along a line spiraling, from the same center through proportional unequal parts of the diameter or semidiameter of the horizon toward its circumference, infinitely turned around; or further along the proportional unequal parts of some straight, finite line — for instance, the semidiameter of the horizon tending toward the setting.

Nor let the corpulence of these bodies disturb anyone. For let them be posited truly or imaginarily in that infinite straight line, true or imaginary; or, if you wish to situate them in that spiraling line or finite straight line, let them be posited so that the later are always proportionately less than the prior, as is fitting; or let surfaces, lines, or points be posited in their place in the said way — which nevertheless are to be called bodies. The reasoning, too, proceeds only from multitude; and therefore let no one be solicitous about magnitude.

These things, then, being thus disposed truly through the omnipotence of God, or fictitiously through imagination, let the souls also be disposed against their bodies altogether correspondingly. And let A be the whole multitude of all the souls, and B the multitude of bodies. The single units of A, and the single units of B, and all the alls, correspond mutually to one another equally, and the contrary; for any soul has had its single body, and any body has had its single proper soul, as appears from the next part. And this response confesses, which the series exhibited shows, with their units corresponding to one another mutually equally.

Which also, that it may appear more clearly, with these so disposed, let the souls be distributed through the omnipotence of God, or through imagination, in this way: the first to the first body; the second to the second; and so onward. With this distribution completed, any soul will have a single body, and any body a single soul. These therefore singly and conjointly correspond to one another mutually equally.

But how will this stand? For with A and B disposed as before, let the first soul be given to the first body, the second to the third, or the tenth, or to one however far distant from the first; and the third soul to the body as far distant from the second body animated, as that one was from the first; and so onward, until the whole distribution of this kind be completed. With which done, either the singles and the alls of the souls have been distributed to bodies of this kind, or some remain. If the singles and the alls have been distributed to such bodies, the whole multitude A corresponds to that part of B dividedly and conjointly equally, and the contrary. If any soul remains, since from that to the first there are only finitely many, and all such bodies pre-accepted of the multitude B are just so many, and finite, wherefore also the whole multitude B is likewise finite — which had been posited infinite.

Turning the gaze to the other side, however, with A and B disposed as before, let a thousand souls be given to the first body, and the like to the second, and so onward as long as the multitude of souls suffices. Either, then, this distribution will somewhere cease, or it will extend itself to the singles and the alls of the bodies. If it shall cease somewhere, since between that place or body of that place and the first body there are only finite bodies, there will be just so many. Wherefore only finite thousands of all the souls, and the whole multitude A finite — which had been posited infinite.

If, however, that distribution extends itself to all and singular bodies, to any unit of B corresponds one thousand of the units of A — indeed ten thousand, and a hundred, and a thousand thousands, and any finite number you wish, if so much be distributed in the same manner aforesaid; which can likewise be demonstrated. How then do A and B as multitudes, and their single units one to one, and all to all, mutually correspond equally to one another, as is shown above, nor does the opinion deny it?

Furthermore, that the reasoning may be more openly elucidated, let it be posited that, as the world and the human species are anteriorly eternal, so it eternally has had a single prince of all — for example, an emperor or pope, who and all are called popes by way of example. As therefore, by hypothesis, infinite men have preceded, so likewise infinite popes; wherefore now there are alone the souls of popes infinite — which, if they be distributed to bodies in the said manner, suffice to animate single and all bodies; indeed they suffice that to the single bodies a thousand souls, and however many you wish, may be allotted — which can be most clearly demonstrated, as above.

From these things, moreover, it evidently follows that the multitude A would suffice to animate infinite multitudes B; which is also so perspicuously demonstrated. With A and B disposed as before, let the second soul be given to the first body, and the fourth to the second, and the sixth to the third, and so onward, as long as the multitude of souls suffices, always alternating in the multitude A, but in the multitude B continuously proceeding. And so in the end the singles and the alls of the bodies of the multitude B will be animated, and there will still remain infinite souls — which can be demonstrated as above.

Which done, let the multitude B be removed, and another multitude similar likewise placed, and let a distribution be made of the residual souls as before; and in the end the whole of this second multitude of bodies will be animated, and there will remain, as before, infinite souls. Again, let this second multitude be removed, and the third similar likewise placed, and let the distribution be made as before; and so a fourth, and a fifth, and infinitely many times in similar manner. For that marvelous multitude of souls suffices most fully and abounds — which can be demonstrated perspicuously as above.

Yet that it may appear more elucidated: let it be posited that, with the first distribution made through alternate souls in the said manner, the residual souls be advanced anteriorly by one degree toward the first, until they be situated singly correspondingly to the singles of the bodies, and all to all as before; for to this the remaining souls plenarily suffice, which, with the priors considered, is most easily demonstrated. With which done, let the multitude B be removed, and another multitude similar likewise placed and likewise animated; with that plenarily animated in the said manner, let an anteriorization of the remaining souls be made as before, etc. — as above. Which can likewise be demonstrated of the multitude of papal souls.

From these things too further it is luculently inferred that the multitude A suffices to animate the multitude B, and the double, and the quadruple, and onwards without limit, without rest. Which appears perhaps more expressly, if to the multitude B be added the multitude C equal, with the units mixed alternately on either side, according to the order foretaxed; or also with the units of C posited separately corresponding to the units of B singly. And let a continuous distribution of souls be made in this manner: give the first to the first body of B, the second to the first of C, the third to the second of B, the fourth to the second of C, and so on, as long as you have the sufficiency of souls. With this distribution thus completed, no soul will remain without a body, nor any body without a soul — both of which are most easily demonstrated as above.

If, however, you wish that, with all these bodies plenarily animated, there should remain infinite souls as before, let an alternate distribution of the souls be made as was touched above, but according to the order of bodies just now set forth; and let an anteriorization of the remaining souls be made; and you will most certainly have what you wished. And in this manner you can still likewise add D, another similar multitude, and E and F, and however many you wish; and likewise animate them from A. Which can likewise be demonstrated of papal souls.

In a similar manner too it can be shown that any multitude however great of common bodies, and even of papal ones, corresponds to single units of souls.

But who will bear so great inconveniences and repugnances? Why also, I ask, so great and so excessive a superfluity of souls for animating so many bodies or men, when fewer plenarily suffice — even papal souls, and however fewer still, as the foregoing demonstrate? Why are there infinite souls superfluous there, and infinitely infinite, as appears perspicuously from the foregoing? Why also so great and so excessive a superfluity of bodies for hosting so many spirits, for composing so many men, when fewer would suffice — even papal bodies, and however fewer still? Why, then, are there infinite bodies superfluous there, and infinitely infinite, as appears clearly from the priors? This in no way befits God most wise, as the first Supposition and the parts following show; this does not befit nature; this all the philosophers detest.

Furthermore, with bodies B posited according to the order foretaxed, or without order in one confused heap, let single and all the souls A approach and enter, and let any one assume a single body, no two; and let all alike occupy as many bodies as is fitting, no more. With which done, there will be some infinite multitude of bodies animated, and none. That some — follows evidently. And that none — is proved, because no reason can be assigned why these rather than those. For what reason, why the whole multitude B should be occupied by these souls, since a lesser one suffices — for example, the multitude of papal bodies, which is C, and a still lesser, while infinite — for example D, and so of others infinite, as the preceding things clearly show? Why therefore is the whole B occupied rather than C, and C than D, and so onward — no reason can be given. For it does not necessarily follow that they occupy the whole B, nor the whole C, nor the whole D, and so of all the others, as the preceding things have taught. Indeed if they take no more bodies than is fitting, they will occupy no infinite multitude, since for any infinite multitude a lesser suffices for them, as the foregoing clearly show.

And if a forger should perhaps wish to cavil concerning the greater, let that be called greater than another which contains all that whole and something further, or another quantum beyond or outside.

And if anyone should say that these souls therefore assume all these bodies, because previously they were animating all those — this conflicts with the priors, because they still superfluously take more bodies than is fitting, as is shown above. Nor does this response evacuate the argument: for let all those old bodies be removed, and let so many new ones be created in their place, etc., as before; or let so many denarii be posited in a heap, or according to an ordered series, from which any soul, or any man when he shall be animated, may take to himself one denarius and not more — etc., as above.

But what kind of superfluity is this to be reckoned? For how could the souls take more sparingly of those bodies than for any one a single body — single ones single ones — nor do any of them, nor all together, take any besides their own proper bodies, or one in common?

Furthermore, if there is here a superfluity of souls for animating those bodies, let the superfluous be removed, and the necessary be reserved. How many souls then are reserved? Either infinite, or only finite. If infinite, there is still a superfluity of souls; for from them a thousand souls could be given to any body, and those souls could animate a thousand such multitudes B, as is shown above. There is still therefore an excessive superfluity. If only finite, how would those suffice for animating infinite bodies singularly?

If too there be there a superfluity of souls, there is likewise of co-equal bodies for so great a multitude of men to be integrated; wherefore also of men consequently. But how can so great a multitude of men be without so many men? How is the multitude of those men subtracted from them and that multitude — by any multitude of men, indeed however great you wish, even infinite — yet remain immutably as great as before? And likewise in addition, by similar reason.

If, moreover, beyond necessity there be a superfluity of souls for animating so many men, just so many souls are superfluous as are bodies numbered. For to any body two, indeed a thousand, and however many souls you wish correspond, as the foregoing manifest. With these men, therefore, all existing animated by all these souls, let there be removed as many souls as there are bodies, and any man will be rendered soulless, and any body will remain without a soul. Indeed take away one soul, and you will desoul some man or some body — that is plain. For from whom would you take some soul, except from some man, and some animated body?

Furthermore, if these infinite men, for their daily work according to the convention with God, were to receive in the evening single denarii each, how, according to the foregoing, would they receive superfluously many denarii — indeed infinite denarii? For who has, or who have, those infinite superfluous denarii, when none has except one denarius? Nor have any of them, nor all, any denarii or any denarius in common.

How could any one of those, according to the foregoing, have from those denarii alone — not multiplied, not increased — a thousand denarii, indeed ten thousand, and however many he should wish, even infinite? For if any could thus have, so they have. For all those denarii are distributed among them equally, single. If too the singles of these could have from those denarii alone — not multiplied, not increased — a thousand, or infinite denarii, why do they not so have? Who does to them so grave an injury, so great a damage? Who thus defrauds them of their just labor? Who prohibits them from carrying off advantage, as much as they can without prejudice to another, from their just labor, from their just wage?

This whole, therefore, would seem to happen from the malice and defect of him who renders them their wage. For he could, according to the foregoing, from those denarii alone — not multiplied, not increased — which they have commonly merited by their just labors, hand over to one of them a thousand, or however many denarii, even infinite; and so to another, and onward to the singles singly, or to all those alike. But who would impose fraud or any malice upon God, against the first Supposition, the third part, and the 31st? Furthermore, let it be posited that these infinite operatives stand seriously disposed consecutively, and that infinite denarii likewise be posited in the same order against them, as was posited above of souls and bodies; and let God command that all and singular take their just wage, nor presume to usurp more for themselves; and let them take single denarii consecutively, so that not even one denarius be left behind.

It seems therefore, according to the foregoing, that these are guilty of great fault and penalty. For they take much superfluously, much more — indeed infinitely more — than they ought to take; and the whole treasury, gazophylacium, or treasure-house of the Lord they evacuate, exhaust, and consume, where they could leave behind an infinite treasure, infinite riches, infinite denarii, as the foregoing most clearly demonstrated.

But if God should from this cause condemn them, He would condemn them if they were to take alternate denarii, leaving the rest of threes, fours, thousands, or any others residual, while singles took singles, because then all alike would take infinite ones — wherefore many infinite times more than the convention requires, or just retribution requires. Always therefore God would, from this cause, accuse and condemn these His operatives — which does not befit His most plenary goodness, justice, and piety, as the first Supposition, the third part, and the 31st teach.

So far by the way of discrete quantity; now, however, by the way of continuous quantity must we proceed.

If therefore there be human souls actually infinite, according to the next part of this work, there are or will be at some time together also human bodies corresponding to them likewise infinite; or at least this is absolutely possible by the absolute omnipotence of God. For by what reason can God simultaneously make human souls actually infinite, He could simultaneously give them all bodies and animate just so many men — which the opinion seems to grant consequently. Let, therefore, B series of infinite human bodies equal here begin, and be infinite simply to the west; or, easier to understand, let B be one quadrangular log, of equal grossness throughout, here beginning, and proceeding into infinity in a certain way to the west. Which is therefore called infinite in a certain way, because it is infinite according to one dimension only — namely length — not all; indeed according to others it is finite. And because still according to that one — namely length — it is infinite to one part only, not the other, but finite. Which therefore, for distinction from a body imagined infinite simply according to every dimension, or a straight line infinite simply on either side, can be called infinite in a certain way fittingly. The other things, however, let be called infinite simply.

This B solid or corporeal quantity, therefore, let be distinguished by cubes, or feet, or footwise quantities, dividing it according to length through the middle through its whole grossness, correspondingly to the bodies of men and the souls aforesaid. Let, then, its first cube, or solid foot, be taken, and let it be placed more meridionally next to its prior position; and the second be placed contiguous to the first from the side of the east, and the third also from the side of the west, and so onward through its single cubes or feet.

With this done, from the same cubes, feet, or parts precisely — not multiplied, not rarefied, not in any way increased — from which B body was constituted, infinite in a certain way, now is constituted a body simply infinite, not according to another dimension but the same — which, like the foregoing, is most easily demonstrated. For this body secondly constituted in this manner is not finite from the side of the east, because then it would be similarly finite from the side of the west, and so from either side; wherefore it would contain only finite feet — wherefore B likewise — the opposite of which was posited.

Indeed, what seems a greater miracle, if its alternate, quaternate, or however many you wish parts be taken — according to the manner concerning souls aforesaid — and joined in the said manner, they will make, according to however many diameters of the world, however many bodies according to length simply infinite, indeed innumerable according to all the diameters of the world; and there will still remain infinite feet, as many as before. Which appears more easily, if, with alternate or other feet taken away, the residual be advanced anteriorly and joined as before, as was taught above of human souls.

Furthermore, from this there evidently follows one stupendous miracle, and horribly monstrous: namely, that the cubes B or feet suffice for filling the whole place, situ, or imaginary vacuum simply infinite, according to all dimensions simply in every direction whatsoever, without multiplication, rarefaction, or addition of any kind, to make one body simply infinite in every direction. Indeed two such bodies; likewise three, four, and however many you wish, even infinite in number, and infinitely infinite; and that B should still have infinite cubes, as many as before, and remain as great as before. Which is more briefly and easily demonstrated, if the cubes B filling the place, as is plain, be taken continuous or alternate, as is fitting, and through imagination, or through the omnipotence of God, through infinite said instants of a day, or through the proportional unequal infinite parts of a day around some given point — quasi around the center equally — be heaped contiguous or continuous, until the singles and the alls of these be so heaped. With which done, you will have there a body from every part simply infinite. Otherwise it would be in every direction finite, and would contain only finite cubes; wherefore B likewise would have held only finite cubes, and would have been simply finite — the opposite of which was posited. Which is also clear of a thread however slender, infinite in a certain way in length, mutually wound up.

And if you desire to have two, or however many such bodies simply infinite — first make one out of the parts B, with the alternate residual reserved. With which done, and the first having been entirely annihilated through imagination, or through the omnipotence of God, according to the 33rd part of this work — make a second out of the alternate parts still reserved. With this done and annihilated, in like manner make a third, and so onward, as often as you please to operate — even an infinite number of times, indeed infinitely infinite — and there will still remain infinite cubes B, as many as before, and B likewise as great as before. Which is more limpidly clear, if the first part of B remaining always immobile preserved, with the second part of it subtracted, and the fourth, and the residual parts thus alternate — of the residual parts, any later be made contiguous with the next preceding part.

Through these things, however, the error of Epicurus or Democritus feigning infinite worlds is evidently shattered. For this it must be known that Augustine, City of God 11, chapter 5, says that Epicurus dreamed of innumerable worlds. John of Salisbury, however, afterward Bishop of Chartres, in his Policraticus — which he wrote to the blessed Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury when he was Chancellor of the King of England — in book 8, chapter 5, thus says: "Alexander, whose breast was insatiable for praise, when Anacharsus his companion, on the authority of Democritus his preceptor, reported there were innumerable worlds, said: 'Alas, miserable that I am, that I have not yet possessed even one!'" I suppose, however, that Democritus first invented this judgment, and Epicurus afterward confirmed it — as concerning the judgment affirming all things to be done by chance, Lactantius in book 1 of Divine Institutions Against the Gentiles, chapter 1, manifestly recounts, as is more fully recounted in chapter 27 of this first.

And this seems to be the opinion which Aristotle in On the Heaven and the World 1, chapter 76 and after, strives to reprove. For the single least bodies — which seem the least dust of earth — taken from single worlds, and heaped together to one another in the said manner, would totally occupy the whole place, situ, space, or vacuum, true or imaginary. Where, then, would other bodies, incomparably more and greater, be hosted? How also would they be content with a lesser space, and not occupy totally the whole universal space? How also do those cubes, parts of the thread, or least bodies of single worlds, now collected and spherically heaped, not previously occupy as much space as now the whole universal space; and how do they now occupy a fuller space than they did then? — especially since, according to the most certain doctrine of the geometers, the sphere is the most capacious of figures.

Furthermore, with B posited as before, let there be added to it according to the right C body altogether equal to the eastern part, and let it be made contiguous at point D; and let any cube or foot of B be rarefied to the west, and C to the east, and the whole BC will be augmented according to rectitude, according to the dimension according to which it is simply infinite; and to that part to which it is finite simply, it will be moved by straight motion, and there will be one infinite simply greater than another simply infinite. Which can also be argued similarly, by condensing the parts toward point D. Which is also more patently shown perhaps, if from BC there be subtracted one or two feet at D, and the residuals — through imagination, and through the omnipotence of God, without addition, rarefaction, or augmentation of any kind — be conjoined to one another by the local motion of one or both parts, and again be disjoined, and be reduced to a similar distance. Which can also be argued of a body posited simply infinite, and condensed as much as you wish toward some given point — also even rarefied.

Furthermore, if a simple infinite can be, why this in one species of things and not in another, and in others to be posited? A man therefore could be simply infinite. For a man could have a soul of natural perfection infinite simply intensively; wherefore also by similar reason, body proportionally adapted, which would necessarily be infinite; wherefore also single members of him, if they were naturally and proportionally adapted — which how great and how multifold a repugnance it implies, who does not see? Which also would subvert the whole of geometry and falsify it, as can easily be demonstrated.

After this, however, by the way of fortitude, power, or vigor of these innumerable souls. Let A therefore be that whole innumerable multitude, and let all be of equal power. Either, then, A is of active power infinite simply, than which a greater could not be — or simply finite — or infinite in a certain way, and in a certain way finite. Not infinite simply, since some greater could be. For it could be augmented by the addition of unity and a finite multitude — even of an infinite equal, or of however much greater — by intensive augmentation of the power of all these souls, and in either way; indeed there is some power greater than that — namely the supreme power and omnipotence of God, than which in no way could any greater be — as the first Supposition and the parts following show.

Nor can anyone say that A is of power simply finite. For then it would have a finite proportion to that simple power of soul B assigned. And some finite multitude, part of A, has a similar or equal proportion to B or its power; and some finite multitude, part of A, has greater proportion, as appears most clearly. For two souls are doubly more powerful than the one B (since all are posited equally powerful), and three triply, and so onward, beyond every finite proportion. Some part of A therefore is equal to A, of equal power and virtue, and some greater.

For the ninth of the fifth of Euclid's Elements says: "If of any quantities to one quantity there be one proportion, those are equal; if, however, of one to those there be one proportion, those are necessarily equal." Whose eighth thus says: "If two unequal quantities be proportioned to one quantity, the greater shall obtain a greater, the lesser a lesser proportion; but of that to those, to the lesser indeed greater proportion, to the greater lesser proportion shall there be."

Two souls, moreover, exceed B in double, three in triple, and so onward, beyond every finite proportion. All these infinite souls, therefore, gathered together at once, exceed the one B infinitely. They are therefore of infinite power.

Therefore perhaps it will be said in the first place that A is of power infinite in a certain way, and in a certain way finite. But, according to the foregoing, A exceeds B simply infinitely, since beyond every finite proportion. A therefore is of power simply infinite. Let too be taken imaginarily, or truly by hypothesis, through the great omnipotence of God, C, an active power simply infinite. C therefore and A have an equal proportion to B, since simply infinite, and B to both has an equal proportion. A and C therefore are equal, with the ninth of Euclid foregoing attesting.

Furthermore, either C and A are equal, or by no means. If they are equal, and C is simply infinite, therefore A also; or if they are equal, and A is not simply infinite but in a certain way only, and in a certain way finite, then C likewise — against the preceding hypothesis. If they are not equal, C is greater; otherwise A would be simply infinite and greater. But if C is greater, it is possible through imagination or through the supreme omnipotence of God to take some multitude of such souls equal to it, which is D. D therefore either is a multitude simply infinite, than which a greater or more powerful could not be, or it is not so great, or so powerful.

The first cannot be granted: for to every multitude of souls existing or possible, it is absolutely possible to add another unit, indeed other innumerable units. For there is some multitude greater than that, and incomparably greater than that — namely the multitude gathered from all those souls and all the points of this line, surface, or body; or from all the points of the world; or from all the things of the world. Nor is D so powerful, but that a more powerful multitude could be: for the power of any soul could be doubled, and however much augmented; and to D multitude of souls there could be added another similar multitude of Angels.

If, however, it be said that D is not so great a multitude, nor so powerful, but that some greater and more powerful could be, D is not of power simply infinite. For no greater can be than the simply infinite, but a greater in a certain way only, and in a certain way finitely. D therefore is not equal to C, or C is not of power simply infinite — the opposite of which was posited.

Furthermore, let C be posited by the absolute possible as one Angel of so great power intensively, that he is equal of active power with A. For two souls of these one Angel could be made equal in fortitude — and three, and so onward; wherefore also all these together. C therefore either is of power simply finite intensively, or simply infinite. Not only finite, since then it would have proportion only finite to B; wherefore also A likewise; and would be finite simply in every way, as is argued above. Nor is C of power infinite simply intensively, because A is not of simply infinite power, as is shown above.

Let too be subtracted from A one soul, or however many you wish — finite or even infinite — say all the souls of males; and let there remain alone the souls of females, or even of popes, or any other multitude however much smaller, while infinite — which is D. And let F be an Angel equal to D, just as C is to A. Either, then, F is of power simply finite intensively, or simply infinite. Not only finite, on account of the foregoing. If simply infinite, it is equal to C — since one infinite simply intensively cannot be less than another such, any more than one straight line infinite simply can be greater or longer than another such straight one. C therefore is equal to D, by the eighth of Euclid's fifth foregoing — and more clearly by the seventh thus saying: "If two equal quantities be compared to any third, of those to that there will be one proportion; likewise of that to both, one proportion." Wherefore D and A are equal, by the ninth of Euclid's fifth above-recited.

In a similar manner can be argued against these by positing A to be however much diminished — not by subtraction of some soul, but by remission of the power of any one of the souls; or also however much augmented by the addition of more souls, or by intension of the power of single ones. Every multitude of souls infinite, therefore, however great or small, however remiss in power, or however intense, is equal to every such multitude.

Furthermore, if not all such multitudes be equal in multitude and power, let A be the multitude as before, and B be — through imagination or through the great omnipotence of God — another infinite multitude of Angels, greater however much you wish in multitude — say for example double — and likewise doubly more powerful. For let it be posited that single Angels, and single souls, are of equal power; and let A and B be multitudes altogether distinct, namely having no unit common to both.

Let, therefore, B be disposed according to one consecutive series, as was supposed before of A, and to any unit of B let one unit of A be distributed — which can be done well, as was shown above. With which done, the single units of A correspond to the single units of B, and all alike to all, mutually equally; and they are mutually as it were supposed equally to one another. These multitudes are therefore co-equal in multitude. For how would equality in such things be better proved? For thus among the geometers in magnitudes equality is demonstrated. Whence the first of Euclid's Elements supposes this principle as self-evident: "If any thing be supposed to another, and applied to it, nor does either exceed the other, those will be mutually equal."

Nor does any reason possible seem to be assignable why and by how much B exceeds A; just as not in the parts of time, according to your opinion, Aristotle, simply infinite; just as also of two straight lines in a certain way, not simply infinite, whose equality through the supposition to one another said above is geometrically demonstrated. A therefore and B — wherefore also any two infinite multitudes ordered or orderable according to one consecutive series altogether distinct — are mutually co-equal in multitude. Wherefore also in fortitude, power, and virtue.

For this follows of A and B manifestly, since single Angels are of co-equal power with single souls. Which also follows evidently if any Angel be posited however much more powerful than a soul — say in double — and all Angels among themselves be of equal power, as was posited above of souls. For if A and B are not of equal power, but are of equal multitude by the foregoing, and all Angels are among themselves of equal virtue, and all souls among themselves likewise, and any Angel is only doubly more powerful than the soul corresponding to him, B is only doubly more powerful than A — with the first of the fifth of Euclid's Elements saying: "If there be however many quantities, of others as many equally multiples, or single ones equal to single ones, it is necessary, just as one of those is to its corresponding, so also the whole gathered from these to all those alike accepted similarly to be."

But if B be only doubly more powerful than A, let C be taken as another multitude of souls equal to A in number and virtue, so that single ones are equal to single ones, and all to all in power; to which let further be assumed D, another multitude of souls altogether equal in number and virtue, and let it be joined to C, making the multitude F. C therefore is of equal power with A, and D likewise. Wherefore also by the seventh of the fifth of Euclid foregoing it is of subdouble power to B. F therefore composed precisely from C and D is co-adequated to B in power. F also is co-adequated to A in power. For it is equated to it in multitude by the props, and the single souls of F to the single souls of A in power and virtue, as was posited above; wherefore also by the first of the fifth of Euclid above-prescribed, the whole F altogether to the whole A altogether in power is co-adequated. Wherefore also by the seventh of the same foregoing, A and B are of equal power and vigor.

A therefore by similar reason is equal in multitude and fortitude to any multitude however great, imaginary or absolutely possible, of souls or of Angels of however great virtue intensively. Wherefore also to a multitude of virtue infinite simply numerously and intensively similarly, if it be posited.

Furthermore, of however great power some multitude can be of souls numerable or innumerable, so great can also some one form be, or one thing through intension or extension of power and vigor — and even contrariwise. Who, granting infinity, would not grant this consequently?

Let, then, B be some power infinite simply intensively, than which a greater intensively could not be; and C a multitude of such souls imaginary or true equal to it — equal, I say, of power and virtue. C therefore either is of multitude and fortitude infinite simply, namely so that a greater multitude or stronger could not be, or it is not so great, nor so strong. That it is not so great, nor so strong, is established most certainly through the foregoing. For it is absolutely possible to add to C some unit, or some units, and to augment the fortitude of any soul. And if it be not so great, nor so powerful, it would be absolutely possible that some greater and stronger than that should be. It would be likewise possible by similar reason that to that greater and stronger multitude some one intensive or intense power should be equated, which would necessarily be greater than B power posited infinite simply intensively, than which a greater intensively could not be.

Which can also be argued similarly, if B be posited a heavy body of grossness infinite simply in every way intensively, and likewise extensively, to which C multitude of such souls be posited equal — equal namely of capability.

Furthermore, let A be one form, one Soul, of fortitude infinite intensively, and let B be — through imagination or through the great omnipotence of God — one heavy body of equal grossness and power (that is, of resisting capability), as A is of moving capability. Then A cannot move B, but anything less than it, as the natural rules show.

Of what condition therefore is B? It seems that it is infinite simply intensively, and simply extensively. For any heavy thing less is in a certain way and in some way finite; wherefore also of virtue similarly finitely; A truly of virtue simply infinite, and sufficiently exceeding to motion. Which appears, if B first be posited a heavy body finite simply by grossness, and likewise by quantity, and to be augmented intensively and extensively in every direction through one day, accelerating each motion as much as is fitting, until in the end it be infinite simply in every direction intensively and likewise extensively. For then first B is equal to A of equal power and virtue. For always before it was of less, since finite simply in intension and likewise in extension.

To such a body, moreover, of grossness infinite simply in every way could there be some soul equal of equal virtue, and not more intense than A, since A is of intension simply infinite. B therefore is a body of infinite grossness simply in every way. But this cannot stand. For let C be one heavy body of finite and equal grossness throughout here beginning, and to the west extended into infinity, and so of quantity infinite in a certain way, and let it be of grossness uniform infinite simply intensively — which nevertheless is not of grossness infinite simply, because not intensively and extensively, but in a certain way only, in the manner of speaking foregoing.

A therefore cannot move C. For according to the prior shown, C is co-adequated in quantity to a body infinite simply in every direction. Wherefore also in grossness similarly, if that body be posited of grossness uniform, and infinite simply intensively. For grossnesses follow in such bodies the quantities. For from the parts of C cut from it and spherically heaped, without any addition, can be made one body of quantity infinite simply extensively, as the foregoing demonstrated. Wherefore also of grossness infinite simply intensively. Indeed two and three such bodies, and however many you wish, of which any is infinite simply extensively, and even intensively. C therefore now is simply of so great grossness and weight, as one such body of grossness infinite simply in every way; indeed as two and three, and as many as you wish to number.

How therefore does A suffice to move C? For neither does it suffice to move B, nor many B's, nor one. Furthermore, if A can move C, A exceeds C. It is therefore possible to take some soul of equal virtue with C — since of greater, since infinite simply, such as God is, and as A is posited; and of lesser. Let, therefore, D be such. D therefore is less than A, of less power and virtue, as this hypothesis posits. But how? For either D is of intension infinite simply, or finite. If infinite simply, it is equal to A. If only finite, it is of power finite simply in every way; not therefore equal to C.

If too it were equal to C, it could lift, or move, anything less than it; wherefore also the half of C as long as C. But how could a soul of intension and virtue finite simply in every way lift or move so heavy a body as much surpassing it disproportionately? Which also through the proportionality of D and another soul of small virtue, and of their objects, through the terms of even powers themselves can easily be confuted.

A therefore does not suffice to lift or move C. Wherefore neither any such body altogether of quantity infinite in a certain way, and of grossness infinite simply intensively. Indeed nor does A suffice to lift any body of quantity finite simply in every direction, while it is of grossness infinite simply intensively. For if it suffices, let F be such a heavy body, which A can lift; then A exceeds F. Possible therefore is it to take some soul equal to F of equal power and virtue, since of greater — as A is posited — and of lesser. Let, therefore, G be such, etc., as above.

Furthermore, F is of equal grossness with K body simply infinite extensively, of finite and uniform grossness intensively, or it exceeds it. Which appears if K first be posited a heavy body uniform finite extensively, and likewise intensively, and be augmented continuously extensively through one day, until in the end it be infinite simply extensively, with the prior intension remaining. F indeed always exceeds it up to the end of the day. Wherefore also then either still it exceeds it, or it is equal to it — of equal grossness, as more it seems. K too in the end exceeds infinitely simply one of its footwise quantities, and F likewise. That footwise quantity also is exceeded infinitely simply by either. They are therefore mutually co-equal, by the ninth of the fifth of Euclid's Elements above-recited.

Whence also it is evidently convinced that, however much K shall be more intense or more remiss uniformly than it is now, with F remaining as before, still they would be equal; and however much F shall be in quantity more or less, with the others remaining as before, still they would be equal. Wherefore also the whole and the part, the double and the half would be equal, and equally weigh, by the ninth of the fifth of Euclid's Elements foregoing.

Furthermore, if F too were posited of length infinite in a certain way, with the others remaining as before, still it would be equated to K. For if F continuously grew until it were made infinite in this manner, always it would be equated to K up till then. Why therefore not then? Which also appears more expressly, if there be taken L, a part of K of length infinite in a certain way here beginning, and to the west infinitely proceeding, of finite grossness and equal throughout; and there be taken another part of K similar to L and equal, whose grossness be added to L, or as much, or as much further intensified, and let it be made doubly more intense, and so infinitely, of all such infinite parts, until the whole grossness of K, or as much, be conflated and gathered into L. K and L of quantity infinite in a certain way, and of grossness infinite simply intensively, mutually adequate one another. Wherefore also F itself to L; and a finite part to its whole infinite in a certain way; indeed even simply infinite. For from the parts of L without any addition can be made a body infinite simply extensively, and likewise intensively, as was demonstrated above. F therefore would be equated to such a body posited.

F also is equated to K of so great intension; and double, even if it be posited; and triple; and so onward transcending every finite number, as was shown above. Wherefore also if it be posited of grossness infinite simply intensively. For some such heavy thing is the maximum to which F is equated. Which also appears if K be posited first finite simply extensively and intensively, and be augmented extensively and intensively through one day, until in the end it become in either way simply infinite. F namely up to the end of the day continuously exceeded it. Wherefore also then likewise either it exceeds it, or it is equated to it. For it is not exceeded by K then infinitely, since K acquired no quantity or grossness suddenly, nor F ever before exceeded.

If, however, anyone should wish to be obstinate about the foregoing, let recourse be had to the balance, and to the equilibrium placed at equal distance from the horizon, and let there be agreement in the judgment of it concerning the equal or unequal grossnesses of bodies. Let, however, the balance be imaginary, or true, made through the omnipotence of God, or adapted, of such virtue and so great that any bodies in it can be faithfully weighed. For who does not know, according to the rules concerning weights and according to daily experience, that if one F be suspended on one side of the equilibrium, and another F altogether equal on the other, that they will weigh equally; and if a third F equal be added to either one and not the other, the nod will be made; and that the arm will incline from the side of the heavier weight, of doubled weight; and so of other heavy things faithfully weighed.

Furthermore, according to the foregoing, let A be one soul of power infinite simply intensively, and B another equal to it in every way, and C a third equal to both jointly; and either A or B will be of remiss power, and not infinite simply intensively. Or to a power infinite simply intensively there will be another power such more intense and greater — indeed in double greater, in triple, in quadruple, and so onward however much. Wherefore also one infinite simply more by like manner than another simply infinite.

Furthermore, by the way of action and passion: and first by the way of local motion in this manner. Let A be one heavy body of quantity finite simply in every direction, and of grossness infinite simply intensively. If it be posited above, in the middle it will descend, since it is outside its natural place least impeded. But either it will descend suddenly, or successively. Not suddenly, since it has some resistance; and because then in every medium and with every greater and lesser finite resistance it would do so. Every body of this kind moreover, greater and lesser, in the same medium, and with the same resistance, would descend equally quickly.

How also will a natural and rude body, by natural power, transit from extreme to extreme with the medium passed over, and go out from a place closed most strongly in every direction without rupture, opening, co-extension, or compenetration of any kind? Nor successively, because by whatever velocity it would descend, by so much would some body of grossness simply finite in every way descend, and some of greater.

Nor can Avempace, against the judgment of Aristotle, respond by saying that heavy and light bodies have from themselves an inclination determined and only finite to a velocity determined and finite. For although this could somehow be said about the simple elements according to the disposition which they now have — because they have forms only of finite intension — yet of a body of grossness infinite simply intensively it cannot be said. For by how much, according to that response, it has form and grossness more intense, by so much also has it appetite and inclination to motion, and to greater velocity, and so much more swiftly would it be naturally moved.

Consequently by the way of alteration in this manner. Let A be one hot body — for example, fire — of quantity finite simply in every direction, and of heat infinite simply intensively, to which let approach B, contrary, combustible, finite simply in every way. A therefore will burn B — that is plain — but either suddenly or successively will it burn it, etc., as above.

Furthermore, also by the way of locating in this manner. Where would fire infinitely intense and light be naturally located? For according to the judgment of the philosophers — as also seems well reasonable, and is therefore supposed — the more intense and lighter fire is, the higher place or situ does it naturally desire and seek out. It desires therefore a place infinitely distant from the center, from the place of a heavy body — which appears more if earth too be posited of grossness infinite simply intensively. But what place is distant from another simply infinitely, or in a certain way also infinitely? For who does not know that from a point in one place to a point in another, as Euclid says, a straight line can be drawn, which necessarily is finite simply on either side, since at those two points aforesaid finally terminated? The whole distance therefore between those two places taken is finite simply in every way.

Furthermore, by the way of intension simply infinite alone. For let A be one form infinite simply intensively, from which through imagination or through the omnipotence of God let be removed by remission some finite part B; for from every infinite there seems to be able to be removed some finite part; and let C be the other part remaining. As much B as C therefore are finite simply, and constitute the whole A. Wherefore also the whole is finite simply intensively.

Or otherwise in this manner. Let A be remitted as you will, yet so that it be not totally consumed, and let the part lost be B, and the residue C. If, then, B as much as C be finite simply, also the whole A is finite simply. If indeed C be finite simply (as it is necessary to say) and B infinite in a certain way (as someone perhaps says), still the whole A is finite simply. For finite simply joined to infinite in a certain way never makes simply infinite, as in every other matter clearly is plain — which is also demonstratively proved. For if to infinite in a certain way be added something finite simply, only finitely is it augmented, and is made greater than before, if so it be greater.

Nor can anyone further feign cavilling, that as much B as C in a certain way is infinite, and in a certain way finite — as according to the judgment of Aristotle, the past and future parts of time simply infinite, which the present instant copulates — because an infinite intensively, however little it be remitted, is simply and in every way finite intensively: as appears of heat posited infinite intensively, which if however much remitted, is necessarily simply in every way finite. For it is finished above intrinsically to a certain finite degree, and below extrinsically to non-being of heat, as also any form intensible is terminated. It has too proportion certain and finite simply in every way to every other heat finite simply in intension, as also in velocity of motion and action; as also such grossness would have to every other grossness in intension, and in velocity of local motion. Wherefore also every such heat, however little remitted, in every way and simply is finite, as the mathematical theorems concerning proportions manifest.

Nor can anyone say that B is simply infinite. For it is necessarily finished in the copulation of C with itself. There is then necessarily there some degree which is the common end and term of either, just as also some point would be in the continuation of two such lines. And since B is part of A, wherefore also lesser than that — but no infinite simply is lesser or greater than another simply infinite.

And if anyone still — though not understandingly — should babble against the truth, saying that one imaginary part of heat infinite intensively is infinite simply toward the higher, finite however toward the lower; another partial heat — since it is less and more remiss than heat infinite simply — can be intensified toward the higher (for every intension is ascent); it is therefore not infinite simply intensively toward the higher, as the preceding things have taught.

Furthermore, let D be heat simply infinite, E truly such a part of it, F however the rest part of the same; and let D be remitted to E. For to any of its parts, and to every degree, can it be remitted. Then E is not simply infinite toward the higher, because D was above it; and because part is not equal to its whole; and because then D in nothing would be remitted. E too has proportion finite simply in intension, as also in action, to any other heat finite simply, as is argued above.

Furthermore, if E be finite in a certain way in intension, and F is finite simply (because from every part both above and below) — from E and F is not constituted simply infinite, as is shown above.

Furthermore, by the way of omnipotence and supereminence supreme of God. If God can make infinite numerously and even intensively, He can make some thing once to have, really, equivalently, or supereminently, all virtues, and any of them infinitely, or infinite simply intensively. God therefore can make one other God, indeed and other gods many — against the seventeenth part of this work. How also can there be some recent God, and not necessary being simply, nor eternal — against the first Supposition, and the demonstration of the same?

Therefore perhaps it will be said that God cannot make a creature which is from itself necessary being and eternal — wherefore neither another God. But although He cannot make a creature have these virtues or properties, let Him make it have all other virtues possible to a creature, and any of them simply infinitely. And let A be one creature of this kind. A therefore is the most perfect creature possible — that is plain. But how is A still not of perfection infinite simply in every way, nor of equal perfection with God simply infinite? It is therefore either of perfection finite simply in every way, or infinite in a certain way only, and in a certain way finite. It is therefore not only of less, but even of infinitely less perfection than God simply infinite. Otherwise, infinite simply in every way would not exceed infinite in a certain way only, and in a certain way finite, except by finite simply in every way — which who doubts to be false, as is shown above? A therefore is of less perfection, and of infinitely less, than God.

God therefore can make something more perfect than A. For there is no defect of receptive possibility on the part of the creatable creature, nor effective possibility on the part of the Creator, by the first Supposition and the seventh part of this work. And God can make another creature equal to A, and a third equal to both — wherefore also greater than A. A therefore is not the most perfect creature possible — the opposite of which was said.

Furthermore, if God can make some thing infinite numerously and likewise intensively, He can make some thing omnipotent — some thing omnipotent simply or actively — which is made, and let it be A. A therefore either is equally powerful with God, or not equally, but less. Not equally powerful, as the forger perhaps will say. For how shall a creature be equated to its Creator? For the philosophers know, and theologians do not ignore, that any creature made by God in being always depends on Him, as on its necessary preserver. Wherefore also similarly in doing — nor by itself does it suffice to do anything without God specially co-acting with it; indeed even principally pre-acting. How therefore can A in being or in doing be equated to God?

Nor can anyone say that A, supposing its existence, is so powerful to do something as God. For it cannot of itself and from itself alone do something as God, as is shown immediately above. Indeed even granted by a false position of the forger that A now made could of itself be and act, still God would be more powerful — and not only a little more powerful, but also infinitely. For if A tried to move anything — for example, a wheel or the heaven by one motion — God could impede A, that it should move not at all, but that the wheel should stand unmoved, or even be turned by contrary motion. Which also He could likewise do, with two such A's striving together, and three, four, and so onward, however many you wish, even infinite. For however much some creature can do, or some creatures, however many, even infinite, can do — God too can do, as the first Supposition clearly shows.

But one A could impede another like itself; and two A's could not only impede that one, but also move its wheel by contrary motion; and similarly three to two, and four to three, and so onward; even an innumerable multitude of such could be impeded from motion by an equal multitude, and by a greater that wheel could be turned by contrary motion. If too A were equally powerful with God, it could impede Him from motion, and two A's could move the mobile of God — namely a wheel or the heaven — against the intention, will, and effort of God. Wherefore also God impotent, of impidable will, and miserably miserable He would be, against the first Supposition, and against the seventh, eighth, and third parts of this work.

Furthermore, let B be created equal to A altogether, and C equal to A and B jointly. For of any two — especially those of which there are or could be any greater things, and some virtue greater — God omnipotent can of His absolute omnipotence make one equal. But of these two, three such are or can be greater; and now actually God is greater, as the foregoing clearly prove. Let, therefore, C be equal to A and B jointly, namely of equal power. C therefore is equal to A and B jointly. It is therefore greater than them dividedly. Neither, therefore, can be called omnipotent. For neither can do as much as C. Nor can one omnipotent be less than another, just as neither one infinite simply than another simply infinite.

If, moreover, C is greater than A — since A and God are posited equal — C is also greater than God, of greater power and vigor, by the seventh of the fifth of Euclid foregoing — which the first Supposition does not permit. If, too, C be greater than God, God is not omnipotent, and of power simply infinite, against the first Supposition, the seventh part, and the fourth.

Furthermore, if A be omnipotent, and equally powerful with God, it can do whatever God can. It can therefore annihilate itself, and again recreate itself; for this God can, as appears by the 33rd and 34th parts and their demonstrations; and A can make all things which are required for the production, preservation, and government of all things. God therefore is not necessarily required for these and such things to be done; how therefore is the existence of God philosophically proved through these?

Furthermore, how can A be called omnipotent, and equally powerful with God, when God omnipotent can destroy it through the foregoing — and because otherwise He would not be omnipotent — but A cannot destroy strong God, as the first Supposition, the sixth part, and the seventh lucidly manifest? If, however, it be said in the first place that A is less powerful than God, then A is not omnipotent through the foregoing. If too A be less than God, there could be some virtue greater — which if it be posited, A is not omnipotent, but defective in virtue with respect to it. That virtue too could impede A from moving; indeed it could move its mobile against it.

Furthermore, if by absolute possible there be posited another virtue equal to A, that can impede A — however much it strive — from moving; and two not only impede, but also move its mobile against it. A therefore is by no means omnipotent, but to be reckoned impotent — which also through the reasons foregoing can be perspicuously demonstrated.

Nor can the forger be obstinate by saying that to A virtue omnipotent there cannot be made some other virtue equal, since then God would not be omnipotent — and God omnipotent can destroy A, and with it destroyed make B virtue equal to A. Wherefore also He could, with A remaining, preserve A and B alike, since He is plenarily omnipotent in every way.

Furthermore, that in fewer — indeed in one virtue more — it may appear: let A be a creature having only one active power — say motive locally infinite simply intensively. Either then A is equal to God in that power, or less. Not equal, as can be demonstrated as above; nor less, since it is in that species simply infinite, and one infinite simply cannot be less than another simply infinite. If too A be less than God, there could be made some virtue greater than A of the same species, and A could be augmented to equality with that, on this side, or beyond; and God could make another creature equal to A in the same species, and a third equal to both jointly, wherefore also greater than A, etc., as above. A therefore is not of such power infinite simply, but finite simply in every way, as the foregoing have taught — the opposite of which was posited.

Furthermore, many in many ways are eager to respond to such things. For some indeed are not ashamed to deny that the whole is greater than its part, or to grant that the whole is equal to its part. Thus if A be the whole multitude infinite of all souls, and B one of them, but C the whole residual multitude, they say that A is not greater than C, but equal — which also they say, just as they have necessarily to say consequently, of any two infinite quanta compared to one another.

But does not Euclid in the first of his Elements suppose this principle as self-evident to anyone: "Every whole is greater than its part" — which he understands of the quantitative part — which all mathematicians and natural philosophers agreeingly profess? To which the mind of any one seems spontaneously to consent with terms known. Which appears too from the significations of the terms. Is not that greater than another which contains that and also more, or another quantum beyond or outside? Whose mind contradicts? Whose mind does not so say?

Wherefore perhaps, as Alhazen says in his Perspective, that famous principle is known by such a syllogism: "Every thing containing another and also more is greater than it. Every whole contains its part and also more. Every whole therefore is greater than its part." But because, with the terms known, the premises and the consequence are immediately known, perhaps such syllogizing or discourse is not perceived; and so the conclusion is reckoned a principle known per se.

Is not, also, every multitude — for instance, of all souls — augmented by units always added, just as also it is diminished by them subtracted, especially if there be added another multitude infinite equal to the first, or also subtracted? For who is ignorant that there is doubling and halving — double and half — when the definitions of them, with terms known, are clear to anyone per se? Whose sense disagrees? Whose conscience does not agree? The whole multitude therefore of all souls is simply double the whole multitude of all the souls of males, and likewise of the whole multitude of the souls of all females, since each of these is infinite; wherefore also equal to the other through the foregoing.

Who too, I ask, would not rather flee a torment lasting from this moment to the age, than a torment to begin after a thousand years, or however many more — and after to last continuously or discontinuously, however much you wish, eternally?

According also to that senseless judgment, A — eternal continuous punishment — and B, half of it intensively, would be altogether equal. For each is infinite. Which also can be shown by similitude, and from the similitude of proportions in this way. Let C be a body infinite in a certain way of equal grossness throughout, and D the half of it as long as the whole, or another body altogether separate from C, as long as C, but doubly less profound or thick throughout. As, then, A is to B, so C is to D. But C is equal to D, as the response seems to confess; and because, according to the foregoing, to any finite measure of C — for example, a solid or cubic foot — there corresponds equally an equal measure altogether of D; and the contrary; and however much place C can fill, also D — without addition, rarefaction, or augmentation of any kind — can fill, and the contrary. C therefore and D are altogether equal: wherefore also A and B, on account of their proportionality aforesaid.

Is not also, just as this finite log to its half, so also C to its own — say, to D — and the contrary? If, therefore, C and D are altogether equal, this finite log too and its half are likewise equal. Or if this finite log be double its half, also C be double its own.

Nor can anyone say D is not the half of C; for it is part of C — that is plain, and the forger confesses it. But of what kind, and how much, except the half? — which also the definition of half shows. For C with another such part altogether equal constitutes integrally that whole.

Furthermore, let A be a heavy body, of grossness infinite simply intensively, but of quantity finite simply extensively — say a foot's; and B of like grossness, but of subdouble quantity. According to this new wisdom, A and B are of equal grossness, and altogether weigh and incline equally. Which yet, that it may more appear, let it be further posited that C be a heavy body of grossness uniform, and finite simply intensively; nevertheless of quantity infinite in a certain way, not simply extensively. A therefore is equal to C — equal namely of grossness, as the preceding things clearly show; which also can be easily demonstrated.

For A is equated in grossness to some body of grossness uniform and finite simply intensively, and of quantity infinite in a certain way, or simply extensively; and any such body is equal to C — namely of grossness equally weighing, as was shown above. Just as, also, this response has to say consequently. For if, as this response says, the infinite part of an infinite body is equal simply to its whole, it is by the same reason equal to any infinite, and any infinite either in a certain way or simply equal to any in a certain way or simply infinite.

A therefore is equal to C, weighs equally, of equal heaviness; and B likewise by similar reason. A therefore and B are equal in that way. Just as, also, C is to its half, which is D, so A is to B; but according to the foregoing C is equal to D, wherefore also A to B. Or thus: as A is to C, so B to D; wherefore also permutatively, as A is to B, so C is to D; but A is double to B, therefore also C to D — which this response denies; or if C be equal to D, also A and B. For the sixteenth of the Elements of Euclid says: "If there be four quantities proportional, permutatively also they will be proportional."

If anyone, however, should grant that A is equal to B — namely of grossness equally weighing — by the equilibrium's just judgment will he be convinced, as was touched above. Likewise, if A and B be of equal grossness equally weighing altogether, since they are of equal grossness intensively, they are also of equal grossness likewise extensively. For in the greater body of this kind there is a greater virtue.

In the same reason, moreover, B is equal to the double of A, and to the quadruple, and to such a body simply infinite. Furthermore, with the others standing as before, let D be a heavy body of quantity equal with C, but of grossness subdouble intensively; and it follows from the foregoing that C and D are equal in the said way. A also is equal to each, which, with the priors understood, is most easily demonstrated.

But if C and D are equally heavy simply, and they are equal extensively, they are also equally heavy intensively. According also to this, however much C be intensified further, with D remaining as before, always equally heavy, equally weighing they would remain; wherefore neither would C become more heavy than before. Whose just balance's judgment, moreover, would tolerate so great injuries of nature?

Furthermore, let A be one innumerable multitude of souls equal in virtue, in fortitude, and in vigor; and B another altogether equal, and altogether distinct from that. If, therefore, the equilibrium be posited at equal distance from the horizon, and A from one side, and B from another, drawing or pulling, each as much as it can — there will be no nod, but all things will stand as before.

If indeed to A be added another similar multitude, and let there be C multitude constituted from those, and to B nothing; and let C draw or pull from one side, and B from another as much as they can — still the equilibrium will stand equally as before. For C, according to this response, is equal to A, wherefore also to B. Even if still to A and C be added another similar multitude, or however many you wish — the whole composed multitude will always be equated to B in fortitude and virtue.

Wherefore likewise even if the single units of A — single souls — be intensified in power and vigor to the double and to the quadruple, even infinitely, with B remaining as before in all respects — A always will be equal to B altogether, equal namely of capability. But whose equilibrium's equity does this not condemn?

According also to this, A would not grow, nor could grow in virtue, by however much addition of virtue extensively or intensively or in either way jointly. But whose mind grasps this? Whose mind so judges? For A is of multitude finite in a certain way, and of power finite intensively, nor of power equal with God, as the first Supposition clearly shows. It is therefore absolutely possible that A be augmented in power and virtue, and God can do this, as the first Supposition and the seventh part clearly show.

Who would presume to say that omnipotent God could not augment a creature which is not simply infinite, nor has the whole perfection of the capacity of its nature? Nay, however much it has, so much does it lack — and again so much, infinitely too so much.

Furthermore, also according to that judgment senseless and insensitive: since according to the foregoing, the science of God is infinite simply, and if truly or imaginarily there were detracted from it some science finite or infinite which it has — for instance, of some or all theorems of geometry — it would not be less than before, nor He less knowing than before. In the same way concerning His infinite power: if there were detracted from it some power finite or also infinite — for example, of knowing geometricals or of creating — still it would remain equally powerful and omnipotent as before. And so of any of His perfection separately, and of all alike, if there were subtracted from them however much, always He would remain equally and supremely perfect as before — so that nothing more perfect could be.

How therefore and why has He so great superfluity in every virtue of His, and in His virtues universally, against the third part of this work? If, however, anyone should be obstinate concerning God, let it be posited according to this position truly through the omnipotence of God or imaginarily, that something else knows all things which God knows except geometricals — or can do all things which God can do except creation — or has every perfection which God has except one; and it will be equally knowing, equally powerful, and equally perfect with God. For any infinite part is equal to any its whole, wherefore also to any infinite in a certain way or simply.

Indeed, if some thing be posited infinite simply, or even in a certain way, in unique perfection or virtue — like that innumerable multitude of souls, or one soul equal to all those — there will be a creature of perfection equal simply, and of virtue with God. Which crime so blasphemous the first Supposition and the parts following do not allow, but evidently rebuke and refute, as the foregoing by the way of the omnipotence of God perspicuously demonstrated.

Robert Lincoln-Bishop, namely Grosseteste, of subtle and profound genius, in a certain treatise of his on light beginning ("I think the first corporeal form is light"), shows that all proportions found among finite are found likewise among infinite. For the whole multitude of all binaries, as he teaches, is double the whole multitude of all quaternaries; and the whole multitude of all weeks quadruple to the whole multitude of all months; and likewise in all similar — which seems to be true, if it be supposed, according to common opinion, that there is in act a multitude of such infinite.

Besides these things, however, this forgery, although by such an impossibility granted it could in some way define some reasons foregoing — yet to many it neither truly nor apparently suffices to respond, as is easy to see for those willing to consider. I know that many other little responses, and many little objections — indeed also many objections greatly probable — are possible in this part; but hastening to other things, to others more abundant in leisure, or to another time, I leave these.

These things, therefore, by the way of infinite, against Aristotle and Algazel, this time it suffices to have brought forth.

Furthermore, according to your philosophy, Aristotle, how can a possible being be eternal anteriorly? But the world is a possible being, as the 17th part shows. For your philosophy plainly attests, and the human mind quasi naturally acquiesces, that everything possible to be — just as it does not exist sufficiently from itself, but continuously depends on another causally preserving it — so also is totally produced.

Some, however, suppose that even though the world is new, it would be absolutely possible without any formal repugnance included that it has been and is eternal from God — like an eternal footprint from an eternal foot in coeternal dust, and like an eternal image from an eternal face in a coeternal mirror. Which if it is true, the whole depended on the divine will. Neither was the world's being new, nor eternal, necessary absolutely, nor demonstrable propter quid and a priori — just as neither was God's having willed eternally this or that, just as too of the divine will to extrinsic effects there is no necessary antecedent cause, as the demonstration of the 33rd and 34th parts has shown.

Wherefore also, if that previously said is true, in similar manner concerning this soul, or some other creature, although it be new, it is yet not necessary absolutely that it be new, but absolutely possible that it be eternal. Neither its newness nor its eternity can be demonstrated simply a priori. Each of them depended on the divine will, of which there is no preceding necessary cause absolutely; nor is it itself necessary absolutely, but free with the freedom proper to it in causing.

Approach, therefore, Aristotle, and demonstrate to me by demonstration necessary absolutely that this soul, or another such thing, is not eternal but new; and I will demonstrate to you likewise that the world is not eternal but new. Truly if you wish to demonstrate, beware lest you take some true and necessary by accident in demonstrating. Or if you take such for yourself, permit me to take similar; and I will demonstrate likewise that the world is not eternal but new.

Furthermore, the possibility of the creation and beginning of the world is shown above. All gentes too — Hebrews, Greeks, Latins, and Barbarians; all Prophets, all theologians and poets, and all philosophers before Aristotle — affirmed agreeingly that the world had a temporal beginning. Which all laws and sects alike confess, just as very many famous histories — even your books — perspicuously attest.

Does not Hermes, whom even with you, Aristotle, attesting, is fitted to be called the Father of Philosophers, hand down that the world and man were created by God, and had a temporal beginning? Does not, in On the Eternal Word 2, he thus say: "In the Creator were all things before He created all things"? And below, 3: "Of heaven, and of the soul itself, and of all things which are in the world, He is the governor, who is the effector God. From all the aforesaid, of which the same governor is God, an influencing frequentation is borne through the world, and through the soul of all kinds, and of all species, through the nature of things. The world, however, has been prepared by God as the receptacle of all-formed species."

And 6: "Man passes into the nature of God, as if he himself were God; man knew the kind of demons, as one who recognizes that he had risen with them." And 11: "There is a reason," he says, "incredible to most, but integral and true to be perceived by holier minds. Therefore from this I shall begin: the Lord of eternity is the first God; the second is the World; the third is Man — the effector of the world is God, and of those things which are in it; with all things together to be governed, He composed man with the governor Himself, of which composition the very governor is governed. Which whole, taking up, man makes the proper care his own diligence — that thus both he and the world should be ornamented to himself; that thus, by his every divine composition, the world may seem in Greek to be called cosmos, that is, ordered. He knows himself, knows also the world, namely that he should remember what fits his parts, what is to be used by him, and to what he must be subservient — so that he may recognize and give greatest thanks and praise to God, venerating His image, not unaware that he too is according to the image of God; whose images are two — the World and Man."

And below, 15, speaking of the world and worldly things: "They were not when they were not, but in Him then they already were, whence they had to be born." And 24: "God the Father and Lord, after the gods, made men." To whom He also says many similar things in many places. Who too in his Alchemy, which Galen, as he says, "Antrum Hermetis" entering, in the Smaragdine Tablet between his hands he found written, thus says: "All things were from one, by the mediation of one, and all things were born from this one thing by adaptation."

And below: "This is the strength of every fortitude — strong, because it will conquer every subtle thing, and will penetrate every solid thing, just as this world has been created." Who also in On the World and Heaven 1, prefaced with "Of the Principles of Things," thus writes: "From eternity beginning time, into the lap of eternity it dissolves itself, fatigued by a longer circuit." Does he not hand down expressly that time had a beginning, and likewise will have an end? Wherefore also below 2: "Just as a circle to a center, so the temporal world stands related to eternity." And below in the same: "The motion round, by which the firmament moves, is always in one place, from that hour at which it was formed by the reason of the divine mind." And above the same: "Not was that begetting of the world, nor did the world have a certain day of its beginning, nor did anyone interfere on that day on which the world was formed by the reason of the divine mind, nor up to that point could the intention of human frailty extend itself, or conceive the origin of the world by easy reasoning, or explicate it — especially since after three hundred years a greater apocatastasis is made by hypprosis or cataclysm."

How great, moreover, a throng of philosophers later — how celebrated, how illustrious — agreeingly profess this judgment of their Father, the throng of philosophers shows. Does not also the priests of Egypt — among whom, as is said in the first Prologue on Timaeus, is the chief memory of antiquities — indicated the natal day of the world, with the Sun placed in Leo, between the third Calends of August and the eleventh, as Solinus, On the Marvels of the World 7, treating of Egypt and its things, manifestly recounts?

Does not your master Plato affirm the world, worldly things, the angel and man had a temporal beginning, as his book which is called Timaeus by many things teaches? Which also your books often record. Does not Anaxagoras, does not Pythagoras, does not Empedocles, does not Democritus, does not Parmenides, and Melissus — and that I may name briefly more — does not all your fathers, all the philosophers, prophets, theologians, and poets before your time affirm agreeingly that the world had a temporal beginning, as ancient histories attest, and your natural and metaphysical books are not silent?

Do not you yourself, On the Heaven and the World 1, chapter 102, inquiring whether the world is ungenerated or generated, attest this thus saying: "Generated indeed, then, all say it is"? And in the translation which Averroes has: "All the ancients agree that the heaven is generated"; on which your son and devout worshipper Averroes: "All agree in this — that the heaven is generated, and none before him (namely Aristotle) said that the heaven is not generated." Who too above in the same, comment 22, says that you were the first of the Greek philosophers saying that the heaven was ungenerable.

Wherefore Augustine, City of God 8, chapter 12, speaking of this matter, says: "Aristotle gathered many disciples to his heresy." Why therefore, with the temerarious assertion of you alone notwithstanding, is it not so constantly to be held? Why is it not so confidently to be believed? Why is it not so confidently to be felt? How could you, the first and alone, Aristotle, presume to babble against so great famousness?

How, against so many gentes, tongues, and peoples — so many and so illustrious fathers and prophets, so many theologians and poets, and so great and so famous philosophers — did you, the first and alone, dare to begin to rebel? By what temerity, by what blindness, by what audacity, by what madness did you, the first and alone, presume to do this? Especially in so worthy a matter, in so great a judgment, pertaining to the knowledge and veneration of God, and to the religion of all men? — especially since you bring forward no compelling, indeed scarcely sophistic reason. The stronger of your irrational reasons scarcely has the shadow of a tenuous appearance, as was demonstrated about the 34th part. Very many of your subtleties indeed which you make against your master Plato and others, Physics 8, chapter 1 and 2, On the Heaven and the World, and elsewhere, have no image or shadow even of tenuous reason — as no one is ignorant who has scarcely entered the threshold of logic or philosophy, or who has even small natural logic.

Wherefore I do not deem it worthy to recount them, or to solve them diligently. For nearly all who see them or hear them know how to impugn them reasonably, but no one to defend them reasonably, except perhaps scarcely against the manner of positing of Plato, or of some other. But against the matter itself, and the manner of positing of Hermes, of the Prophets, and of the Christians, no one knows how to color them slenderly — as the 33rd and 34th parts teach.

But how strong reasons, how irrefragable, how insoluble, how compelling, how violent, how clear, how certain would be required to immutate, overturn, and root out from the hearts of all or most — and especially of the wise — so great and so notable a famousness, according to what is set forth concerning famousness about the 33rd part of this work, especially since the ancient judgment ascribes greater honor to God, and ampler religion to men?

Whence it seems to me as a general rule or maxim to be observed: that among equal judgments, the one more honorable to God, more famous, more religious, and more favorable to men, always conquers.

That, however, what I say may more appear: I posit that all men, peoples, nations — every law, sect, or faith — all prophets, poets, all philosophers past and present up till now agreeingly held, and all present philosophers and common men in the present hold agreeingly and constantly that the world was created by God; and that Aristotle without the gift of prophecy or evident miracle, with his contrary subtleties only, should now come to prove the contrary — what or how much would he effect? Which philosophers would he conclude by force of argument? How many of the philosophers would he pervert by force of argument to his heresy? None, I think; nay, rather, I esteem he would exhibit himself a laughing-stock to them, saying: "Is this the great Aristotle, that ancient, that famous one? How is he caught by a small fallacy? How is he played upon by a puerile sophism? How is he tied by a slender thread? And blinded by a feeble trick? How does he err and rave?"

Is it not for this reason that many later philosophers derided your subtleties, and your Peripatetic sect, and you yourself with it as its author, unanimously contemned, nor wished to be called Peripatetics, but Academics — indeed Platonists rather did they prefer? Whence Augustine, City of God 8, chapter 12, says: "Therefore I have especially chosen the Platonists, because the better they have judged of the one God who made heaven and earth, the more glorious and more illustrious are they reputed than others, by so much preferred to others by the judgment of those after — that even though Aristotle, Plato's disciple, a man of excellent genius and (in eloquence indeed unequal to Plato but easily surpassing many) had founded the Peripatetic sect, because deambulating he had been accustomed to dispute, and had gathered very many disciples by illustrious fame to his heresy while his preceptor was still living; and after Plato's death Speusippus, son of his sister, and Xenocrates his beloved disciple, had succeeded him in his school which was called the Academy; and from this both they and their successors were called Academics. The most noble more recent philosophers, however, to whom Plato seemed worthy to be followed, did not wish to be called Peripatetics, or Academics, but Platonists. Of whom were greatly nobled Greeks — Plotinus, Iamblichus, Porphyry. In each tongue indeed, that is, Greek and Latin, Apuleius the African was a noble Platonist."

Does not also Calcidius the Platonist in his Commentary on the Timaeus of Plato repress, despise, and deride your insultations against your teacher Plato, where on the second part he thus writes: "Here, in his own certain manner, with full and perfect dogma elected, what seemed good to him, the rest of the fastidious neglect by inattention." And below: "When these things had been so plenarily, so diligently elaborated by Plato, the younger philosophers, as not the best heirs, dissipating the paternal fortune into pieces, and the perfect and full sentence, fell into mutilated little opinions."

Does not also that great Ptolemy, in the second Prologue of the Almagest, allege solemnly you, Aristotle, and in certain rightly said things follows and commends you? In this matter, however, he by no means follows you, but most plainly contradicts. For he says that the science of the stars assimilates man to his Creator. And he adds: "We labor that, of those leading to the love of the science of the eternally remaining things — up to the term which their Maker imposed upon them — we add some in what follows of this our book."

Who also, Almagest 3, chapter 1, inquiring the quantity of the solar year, says: "We see that it is fitting that we be content with the quantity of that which is possible for us to add — namely the length of the time which is between the like considerations of the year, in revolutions of near time. Truly the inquisition of the whole time, or the time elongated from the longer times of considerations through long time multifariously — we say it is not from the love of science, nor from the love of truth." And what is that whole time, if not the whole time elapsed from the creation of the world? For who would, by inquiring revolve, or by revolving inquire, the whole time, if it be posited eternal?

Albumasar, too, later than Ptolemy, not him but him followed, in Greater Introductory 3, distinction 2, thus says: "The Sun by participation of the planets to it is cause of the temperament of the elements, and of natures, and of the composition of the individuals of the elements, through this that the omnipotent Creator placed in them of natural fortitude. But what we said is this: just as He placed in fire combustion through its nature, and likewise He placed the daily luminary, that is the Sun, the cause of the light of day and of universal heat which is in this world."

And below: "If the Sun should ascend to the circle of the fixed and starred ones, the elements and likewise the elementates would be destroyed; if indeed it should descend to the circle of the Moon, in like manner they would be destroyed, because in length or proximity of it the destruction of elements and elementates is made. For this cause therefore the most high God placed the Sun in the middle of the seven planets, that there might be made through its natural motion upon this earthly world a temperament of elements and elementates."

And below: "Hippocrates the physician says in the book Aleceb — that is, of weeks — that the light of the stars renders the density of night more subtle, because night is very dense, and sight cannot penetrate it; but the brightness of the stars renders that very density subtle, and so the eye penetrates it. And if it were not so, every animated body would be destroyed by the density of night. The Sun, however, in its day makes hot the air, and renders it subtle and rare. For this reason God created the stars mobile and shining, that by their light they may make warm the air, and rendering it subtle, by their motions make it delicate — that is, more subtle."

And below, book 5, distinction 5: "Some say that the planets are placed in houses and degrees of their exaltations, from which degrees they began to move in the beginning of their motion. Some say that the planets began to move from the beginning of Aries, and have proceeded over the being in which they are now, and over this they equate them; and according to my own judgment," he says, "the omnipotent and most high Maker made the planets in the beginning of their creation in the degrees of their exaltations, over being and motion. After this He did not wish to corrupt or change their motions from what they had been."

And below, in the same, distinction 7: "When the first minute of Aries shall be in the middle of heaven over the line of equality, the first minute of Cancer will be ascending; and therefore the ancients said that Cancer is the horoscope of the world, and it is worthy that it be the horoscope in the beginning of the increase of the world — the degree in which Jupiter in Cancer is strengthened. And when the 15th degree of Cancer shall be the horoscope of the world over the line of equality, the 19th degree of Aries will be in the middle of heaven; and when the Sun shall be stronger in the 15th degree of Aries, the 19th degree of Aries will be more worthy of the exaltation of the Sun. And we know now that no cause is in the circle which is not well and wisely disposed, and that of the science of the disposition is, that Jupiter be in the horoscope of the world."

And below, in book 6, last distinction: "Lords of days and hours took beginning from Sunday, and the wise conceded this day to the daily planet — that is, to the Sun. For through the rising of the Sun, or its ascension, the world is illuminated; and through its setting or descent it is obscured by darkness. Beginning was made therefore from the Sun, and they placed it lord of the Lord's day, and the first hour of that day they conceded to it. Furthermore, their beginning in days is from the Lord's day, which the Arabs call the first day. They did this on account of two causes: one, because the beginning of the days of the world which the authors of the Mastery of the Stars used — from the Persians and Indians — was from the Lord's day, and the Sun in the beginning of those days was ascending in the first minute of Aries, in the eastern hemisphere, over the inhabitable place of earth, which is called Alkankadar. And from the same hour and day they number the middle course of the planets, and from the same hour and day the ancients number their years. The longitude, however, of Alkankadar from the middle of earth is six hours, and from Bebilalirac the ancient — which is where the Euphrates flows — 108 degrees, which constitute six equal hours, and a fifth of one. The second indeed is a cause, that all gentes according to the diversity of their tongues, and the dissimilitude of their sects, named the Lord's day from the name of one which is the beginning of number — and the day following from the name of the second number which is the second day; and likewise they named the other numbers of days according to the order of numbers."

Who too, in On Conjunctions 1, distinction 1, says that "from the creation to the night of the day of Venus in which was the deluge, there were 2226 years, one month, three days, and four hours."

Behold how great fame, what exquisite ancient histories of the gentes condemn your little opinion. Do not you yourself too, compelled by truth itself, sometimes seem to affirm the contrary? For On the World 2, you thus speak: "World is called every ordering and creation by God, and through God preserved." And below 11: "It remains to be said summarily about the cause containing all things, just as also of others. For it is impious for those speaking of the world — although it has not been done subtly, as in figural doctrine — to pass over the beginning of the world. The ancient indeed and paternal saying is to all men, that from God all things and through God consist." Where another translation thus has: "The ancient saying, and paternal, is to all men, that from God all things, and through God all things, have constituted." And above 10, showing how the World consists of contrary things, and remains incorrupt, alleging Heraclitus — who, as you yourself attest, On the Heaven and the World 1, chapter 102, posited the world to be new — thus you write: "The same was for him, also what was said by the obscure Heraclitus: it joined into the converted and the not-converted, the agreeing and the disagreeing, the consonant and the dissonant, and out of all things one, and out of one all things."

And immediately you subjoin: "So therefore the constitution of all things — of heaven I say and of earth — and of the entire mixture, especially of contrary principles, one harmony has adorned"; where another translation: "One harmony has founded; and you add: "the dry mixed with the moist, the hot with the cold, also the heavy with the light, and the straight with the curved, the whole earth and sea, the aether and the sun and the moon, and the whole heaven adorned"; and another translation: "Has founded one virtue passing through all from unmixed and diverse — namely from air and earth, fire and water — creating the whole orb, and disposing of one sphere by superficies; and especially the contrary natures in it, compelling them to agree to one another, and from these contriving for the universe salvation."

Who also in the Secret of Secrets of the 30th part, 1, thus you write: "You ought to know, O Alexander, that just as in plants there are diverse natures, and diverse forces divinely innate, so also in stones."

And below 5: "There is justice pertaining to man in the reasoning of himself, and in those things which are between himself and his Creator." And below 6: "Know that that first which the Most High, Glorious, formed, is a simple spiritual substance in the end of perfection and complement of goodness, in which are the forms of all things, and is called Intelligence; and then proceeded another substance lesser of its degree, which is called soul, and another substance which is called Hyle before commensuration, which is extended in length and breadth and depth, in which the body simply was made; then a body having a most noble figure, which surpasses all figures, and is more true comparatively and more ancient, and remained in one place — of the spheres and planets, that which was purer of it, and which was simpler."

And further below 7: "Know that the universal Soul is a spiritual force arisen after the intelligence by divine will, and has three forces running in bodies, like the light of the Sun in parts of air. One of the forces is intellective, the second sensitive, the third vegetative; which the glorious God illustrated with seven forces, which are the attractive force, the retentive, digestive, expulsive, nutritive, generative, informative."

And further 8: "When the most high God created man, and made him most noble of animals, He commanded him, prohibited him, punishes, and rewards him; He constituted his body a certain city, and his intellect King in it." Who too is that Adam, of whom above in the same you had made mention, as is recounted above, except that famous Adam first man created by God in the beginning, when also other things were created?

Nor let anyone murmur that that famous Aristotle did not write this book. For in the little book on the life of Aristotle it is written thus: "That, however, he might do good universally to all men, he wrote to Alexander a book On Kingship, teaching him how it is fitting to reign." Philip too, the translator of that booklet, in the first prologue says: "Which book the most expert Prince of Philosophers, Aristotle, composed at the petition of King Alexander, his disciple."

And another certain Doctor in the second prologue thus says: "I gave heed to inquire the book which is called the Secret of Secrets, which the Prince of Philosophers, Aristotle, son of Nicomachus of Macedonia, edited to his disciple, the great Emperor Alexander, son of Philip, King of the Greeks." And John the translator in the third prologue: "I translated," he says, "the book of the most expert Aristotle, first from the Greek tongue into Chaldaean, and from this into Arabic, in which is responded to the petition of King Alexander."

This same too celebrated fame holds; nor does the plainness of style oppose it, or its diversity from the customary style of Aristotle. For to a king for many causes plainly was it to be written; and perhaps the translation, not from Greek but from Arabic into Latin, makes the sentence plainer — just as also in certain other books of his, which can also happen on account of the prudence of the translator, transferring not always words but rather sense — as both these patently appear from the first prologue.

Nor is the text here or the style most plain in every way. For who plainly and easily expounds the first chapter of the third part of the same — concerning the stone of the philosophers not a stone, of its division into four elements, of the preparation and reunion of them, and other most abstruse words there written?

Did you not too, when about to die — that vain old appetite of appearance, ostentation, glory, and honor having been laid aside — wisely correct that ancient judgment of yours about the eternity of the world, in the presence of many wise men, humbly confessing your prior pompous error — with you yourself attesting in the booklet written about your death, recounted above concerning the 34th part?

Did you not too, in the seventh of the same booklet, say: "When man dominates his voluptuous things, abhorring the delights of the body, and inquires the delights of the soul in learning the sciences of God, who created by His wisdom the age, and investigates His ways, and understands His secrets — then are opened the eyes of the soul, and they delight much, and are delighted by a delight unlike the delights of the body"?

And below: "The delights of the soul are to understand its Creator, to consider the works of the heavens and His wisdom, and the courses of the spheres and their forms; and that all things are formed and founded in His wisdom and in His science. And if man cannot comprehend such great degrees, let him speculate himself, and the subtlety of his members, his giving them pre-eminence in motion and in pulling the body to rest and motion; and the virtues placed in any one member to the service of the body, in which nothing is addable or mutable; and through this he can recognize his Creator in his mind."

And below 8 you say that "the wise man, who perfected his soul in inquiring the science of his Creator who from nothing made him a being, ought to have rejoiced in death." And below 12 you are recounted to have said: "There is another species of men whose sense and intellect is ready, and powerful, and they see all things in their souls. And there are two sects of these. Of which the first say that the age has no beginning nor end, nor is anything new under the Sun, but generation passes and generation comes; the earth, however, stands eternally, and has no sustainer; and these are they who deny the root."

Wherefore consequently approving the contrary sect, you retracted that prior judgment of yours, this same or similar, as was said above. Nor let anyone dream that this book is a dream and figment. For about the transit of lesser persons booklets are written; and why is it not likely that at the transit of so great and famous a Philosopher and Doctor, other philosophers, especially Peripatetics, and his disciples, and others too for various causes had come together, and the memorable things which they had heard there and seen had written down — which fame celebrated authorizes?

And if anyone desires to hear this judgment of the creation of the soul from books of Aristotle more common and more famous: behold, On the Soul 1, chapter 65: "The intellect," he says, "seems to be borne in some existing substance, and not to be corrupted." Where the translation which Averroes has: "The intellect," he says, "seems to be some substance, which is made in a thing, and is not corrupted." To this also accords that of Metaphysics 12, chapter 18 above-recounted: namely that the intellective soul does not precede in time the individual whose it is, but remains after it. It is plain therefore evidently that, according to Aristotle in these places, this soul is made in the animated suppositum, and together with it; and is not educed from the potency of matter, according to him, like other material forms, since then it would be corruptible, just as he himself against the same. How therefore is it made, and from what — except by creation from God? — especially since, according to his judgment in these places now most recently recounted, no circular return of these same souls is made.

Furthermore, the most illustrious Prophets most clearly attest that the world was created by God, and had a temporal beginning. How great authority indeed they have, and how great faith was to be given to their predictions, the demonstration of the 32nd part shows.

From all these things, it can to anyone sober, not obstinate, reasonably appear that the world has not only had a temporal beginning, but also was created from nothing. For from what preceding matter would it have been made? Of what kind would that be — simple or composite, eternal or new? Wherefore also you, Aristotle, very reasonably often prove that the world was not made from preceding matter. What therefore more consequent to natural consequence than, having granted that the world had a temporal beginning, to grant that it was created from nothing consequently?

It is objected, perhaps, by some, that the wise men of the Chaldaeans, and the common folk, according to the doctrine of their law, before the time of Aristotle held that the world is truly eternal, without beginning, without end — as Averroes, on the first of On the Heaven and the World, comments 22 and 102, seems to attest.

In the first Prologue of Timaeus of Plato, in chapter 5, it is recounted that an Egyptian priest derided Solon, when he was reciting the history of one inundation, saying that infinite preceded. And below, in the same place, the priest is recounted to have said to Solon that the same Goddess founded two cities — one in Greece which is called Athens, almost a thousand years before; the other in Egypt which is called Sais, eight thousand years from its foundation having then elapsed — as is contained in the apices of sacred shrines.

And below 6: "Of these things, O Solon," said the priest, "you will hear from your elders, who lived nine thousand years before, by which laws they used." From which at least it seems to be inferred that the world did not begin in the time designated in our sacred apices, but either much before, or never — which seems to argue and to falsify the sacred codices, and to take from them prophetic authority.

To this concords that Egyptian priest in the Epistle of Alexander to his mother Olympias, asserting that the empire of the Persians and Macedonians had then endured more than eight thousand years.

Some, however, as Augustine recounts, City of God 18, chapter 41, say: "From the time when Egypt comprehended the reason of the stars, more than a hundred thousand years are numbered."

Truly, as much as I conjecture from the law, or sayings of old of the old Chaldaeans, by no means did they hold the world to be eternal. For that they had any law or prophecy before the deluge, no one says. For how would it be established, since through the deluge all things perished?

Indeed even Babel and Babylon — whence Babylonia, and those who are called Babylonians — were founded after the deluge by the sons of Noah and so named, where also the Chaldaean tongue was likewise instituted, as certain histories hand down. After the deluge too Noah, Shem, and Abraham taught the Babylonians or Chaldaeans themselves the sciences, as the foregoing concerning the 35th part attest. These, however, knew that the world and heaven were created by God. Wherefore also it seems that they taught this, not the contrary, as the foregoing concerning the 35th part seem to attest.

Wherefore also it seems that their disciples likewise believed this — which more appears from another source. For from the Babylonians or Chaldaeans themselves philosophy was derived to the Egyptians, and from these to the Greeks, as the foregoing concerning the 35th part, and many other histories, attest. And all the Greek philosophers before Aristotle agreeingly held the world had a temporal beginning, as is recounted above. Wherefore also it seems that they received this judgment from the Egyptians, and the latter from the Babylonians, agreeingly. For how — if the philosophers of the Chaldaeans agreeingly or discordantly had held the contrary — would not in like manner their disciples the Egyptians, the doctors of the Greeks?

How therefore is it likely to anyone that all the Greek philosophers up to Aristotle agreeingly held the world had a temporal beginning? Wherefore Aristotle himself confesses that all the ancients agree that the heaven is generated, as is recounted above. The motive of Averroes, however — and which from Aristotle he takes — ought to move no one. For in the first of On the Heaven, comment 22, and the second, 2, he says that the Greeks and others of the first peoples agree in this — that the heaven is the place of spirits, and of the Creator — and that these are incorruptible, wherefore also their place. Wherefore as Aristotle and Averroes argue, it too is eternal.

But concerning the spirits this does not move. For just as the spirits began temporally, so the heaven; and as the spirits are incorruptible, so the heaven. Concerning the Creator of both too, this does not move. For He needs no celestial place, nor any other whatever, as the first Supposition and the fifth part manifestly indicate. Indeed the contrary: every place, and every located, and universally every other thing, needs Him for being, since anything else is possible-being, and He alone necessary-being, as the preceding things have taught.

The first Supposition too and the sixth part prove, and the philosophers confess, that God is everywhere. Any place therefore, and any thing located, is incorruptible and eternal by your prior reasoning.

Furthermore, the words of the ancients, if they be strictly weighed and properly understood, seem to sound the contrary. For Aristotle attesting, On the Heaven 2, in the translation which Averroes has: "All the ancients posited the heaven to be the place of the Creator, who with them is God." God therefore according to them is not only the maker of beings, but the Creator. Was not Aristotle just now recounted attesting that all the ancients said the heaven is generated? How therefore do they seem to be alleged to the contrary?

That Egyptian priest, however, affirming to Solon that infinite inundations had preceded at that time — whence took he color and audacity to say so? Not from reasoning seems it: for he touched no reason, but turned himself to histories. But whence to him such a history? Not from sight — that is plain; nor from report. For report does not effect a certain faith that it is so, but that it was so reported; nor from books preserved in their shrines: for who, and with what audacity, could write this confidently?

Has not the general inundation under Noah — which exceeded the summits of the highest mountains, even those near to the Egyptians (since placed in Babylonia) by fifteen cubits, and your Bashan land of Egypt, since it touched it — destroyed its inhabitants, shrines, and books alike — as the most holy, most certain, most famous histories of ours produce? And not only the histories of the Christians, but also of the Indians, even of the Egyptians, and likewise of the Chaldaeans?

Josephus, namely Jewish Antiquities 1, chapter 2, after referring to this general deluge, in testimony of faith subjoins thus: "Of this deluge and of the ark, however, all who have written barbarian histories make memory. Of whom one, Berosus the Chaldaean, narrating of the deluge, has thus uttered: 'It is said that his ship, which came to Armenia near the mountain Cardi, has still some part remaining, and that some take from it bitumen, which men chiefly use for expiations.' Of these, moreover, Hieronymus the Egyptian — who is known to have written the antiquity of Phoenicia — makes memory; but also Mnaseas the Damascene, in his ninety-sixth book of histories, thus says of them: 'There is, above Minyas, a high mountain in Armenia, which is called Baris, on which it is said many fled in the time of the deluge were liberated; and a certain one, with him together carried in the Ark, came to the summit of the mountain Sool; and the relics of the woods were preserved for a long time.' This was, moreover, he whom even Moses, the Lawgiver of the Jews, wrote of."

Albumasar too, instructed in the divine histories of the elders, confesses this deluge, as is recounted above; which other astronomers also do, having an agera, roots, and tables instituted from the time of the deluge.

Did not also Solon, that famous one of the seven Wise Men, in the assembly of priests, as the first prologue of Timaeus of Plato recounts in the place above, make words about the most ancient historicals of the Athenians, Phoroneus, and Moba; and after the inundation of the world, Pyrrha and Deucalion; and pursue the prosapia of the recalled human kind up to the memory of his parents, and recount the number of years?

Furthermore, if Egypt were eternal, and never was devastated by deluges or burnings, as the priest says — why would philosophy and philosophic books not be eternal there, and eternally preserved, just as historic knowledge and historic books are preserved according to the prior priest? How therefore did the Egyptians receive the mathematical sciences from the Chaldaeans and Abraham, as is recounted above, and other histories attest? Do not also other histories hand down by whom and when the Egyptians first received letters? Which, it is established, was done much after that general deluge.

What therefore does this old priest feign to himself? Do not other Egyptian priests too agreeingly profess the natal day of the world, as is recounted above? That which also concerning that marvelous multitude of years, which had been alleged by the same priest or another, by these very things is established most certainly to be false, if he speak of years according to the common manner of speaking. For it is established by the sacred histories of the Jews, the Gentiles, and the Christians, even by the astronomical tables, that from the deluge to Alexander — indeed even to Christ — far fewer years are had.

Yet because it seems shameful and harsh to falsify their histories altogether, and entirely reject — a certain division of years is to be noted. For who does not know that there is a twofold year — solar and lunar? And solar: this one Egyptian without the quadrant, which Ptolemy uses in the Almagest, which he wrote at Alexandria in Egypt; another Roman or Latin with the quadrant. Lunar truly: this one Arabic, containing 354 days, and the fifth and the sixth part of a day, which make eleven thirtieths of a day; and in bissextiles there will accrue from these minutes one day; and such years Arzachel uses in his canons, and his astronomical tables.

Another however Hebraic, or Hebrew, and this further is bipartite. For one is non-bissextile, or non-embolismic; another truly is bissextile, or embolismic, which exceeds by one lunar month of 29 days, and by one day non-bissextile, or non-embolismic. And each of these still further is tripartite. The non-bissextile namely: another common or middle, of 354 days; another superfluous or abundant, of 355 days; another diminished, of 353 days. The bissextile too correspondingly is separated in three ways. And these years the Hebrews use, and the whole sacred Scripture in the whole Old Testament. These however are years now and in many retroact times commonly used.

But it must be vigilantly attended to further: that in more ancient times, when men were more rude, the quantities of years were not so subtly perceived; but some at times used much shorter years. For Ovid recounts, On the Fasti 3, and other histories attest, that the ancient Romans up to the time of Numa Pompilius had a year of ten months only, because so much time would suffice a woman for parturition; others before, however, had still shorter years.

Whence Solinus, On the Marvels of the World 1, chapter 2, thus says: "Before Augustus Caesar they computed the year in an uncertain manner; among the Egyptians it was terminated by four months; among the Arcadians by three; among the Carnani by six." And still see — even shorter. For Pliny, Natural History 7, thus writes: "Some determined a year by one summer, and another by winter; others by quadripartite seasons, like the Arcadians, whose years were of three months; some by the senium of the Moon, like the Egyptians — among whom some also are produced to have lived single thousands of years."

Behold, the age of the moon — that is, a lunar month — was sometimes held for a year among the Egyptians; and their year was a year, namely a lunar one — and reasonably in some way. For annus is named from a circuit, as the signification of the name manifests, which Ptolemy too in Almagest 3 likewise attests. By this reasoning, perhaps, the recess of the Moon from the Sun, and its return, the Egyptians called a year. Whence Isidore, Etymologies 5, chapter 40: "A lunar year," he says, "is of 30 days." And still further, perhaps a year was sometimes taken for a week, since after seven diverse days completed, the return is always made circularly to the first.

These things therefore being soberly considered, what wonder if among the Egyptians so many thousands of years are numbered? From all these things, soberly considered, it seems that the world had a temporal beginning, wherefore also the generation of men is to be terminated. For otherwise, according to the foregoing, by the infinite progress of time the immoderate number of souls and of citizens of the supernal home would grow, which in no way seems to befit the divine city or house, as the foregoing have persuaded. Why too would this be more in men than in Angels, stars, or spheres, as was touched on above?

Does not also, according to the next part of this work, every dead man rise again to life with his soul and body together? But when, except when that number of souls and of men shall have been fulfilled, which God in His wisdom predetermined for the perfection of His house and celestial city? For the dead have not commonly risen from the beginning of the world up till now; nor do they rise singly as they die, as certain experience teaches. When therefore will they rise? What do they wait for, except the fulfillment of the said number?

This same too is persuaded by reason taken from the angels. For the angels frequently exhibit ministry to men in dreams, in prophecies, in wars, or in their other most numerous necessities, by the nod of God. Whence too they are called angels — that is, messengers — as frequent experience teaches; which also many philosophers and many illustrious histories attest. Which also all laws agreeingly profess. Do not Hermes the Father of Philosophers, and Aristotle his son, say the same?

Is it not in the first part of the Secret of Secrets of Aristotle, 19, written thus: "Do you not know that, with Hermogenes attesting, two are the spirits which guard you, of whom one at the right and another at the left guarding, and knowing all your works, and rescribing to the Creator whatever you shall have decreed to do."

Perfect beatitude, however, does not permit such extrinsic occupations. For they distract from the perfection of the angelic vacation and contemplation about God; and the beatitude of them at some time will be perfected to the full, and not except with the generation of men terminated.

In such occupations too the angels are in some way changed; but change is repugnant to perfect beatitude, as also to perfect good. For perfection finally attained, motion ceases. For it is the way to perfection, and a potency imperfect to a perfect act, which is established to be better than such a potency. The Philosopher says, Physics 3, chapter 15: "Motion indeed seems to be a certain act, but imperfect; the cause however is, because the imperfect is the possible, of which it is the act." And Ethics 7, last: "Not always," he says, "is one delightful thing the same, on account of our nature not being simple; but to be one and another, according as we are corruptible. Wherefore if the nature of this be simple, always the same action will be most delightful. On account of which God always rejoices in one and simple delight. For not only of motion is operation, but also of immobility; and delight is more in rest than in motion. Change, however, of all things is the sweetest, according to the Poet — on account of a certain malice. For just as a man easily changeable is bad, so a nature which needs change. For it is not simple, nor epieikes. Wherefore also the Pythagoreans posited rest in the co-ordination of good, motion truly in the co-ordination of evil — as their description above-mentioned clearly demonstrates" — etc., as above.

Is it not, also, according to the philosophers, that no unnatural or violent thing is eternal — especially in those who never sinned against the law or Author of nature, that they should merit to sustain such things eternally as a punishment? It is established that the elements are in an unnatural and violent disposition with respect to their forms and places; and when shall they receive a fully natural disposition, except with the generation of men and other animals — which are for the sake of men — terminated?

Furthermore, the 37th part has shown that the generation of men can cease, which prior reasons persuade — indeed prove more evidently — than the contrary judgment can be proved or even persuaded. Which also the most illustrious Prophets, and all laws — though some sects discrepate — agreeingly profess. Is not therefore the world, or the state of the world, customary to be ended? Does not also from this it seem that the celestial motion ought to cease — just as the possibility of its cessation was shown above? For the celestial motion seems to be ordered finally for the generation and preservation of inferior things; and all these to man, just as imperfect things are ordered to a more perfect thing, and instruments to the artificer finally. For man is naturally over all these, and uses them. Whence you yourself, Aristotle, Physics 2, chapter 24, say: "We use for ourselves all things which are; for we are in some way too the end."

That, however, Averroes and certain others suppose that the celestial movers move on account of the generation and preservation of inferior things secondarily, but primarily and by first intention on account of the perfection of themselves — is not altogether most certain. For how is the first mover — who according to them is God — by motion or any extrinsic thing reckoned to need for His perfection, against the fifth part of this work? Or how are the Intelligences perfected by such an extrinsic thing, and not sufficiently through intrinsic things — especially since they by no means so move from the necessity of nature, just as neither does the soul of man move his body, since they are naturally free according to contradiction — as appeared with the Sun standing, and on the contrary withdrawn, as is recounted above?

For this was not by the impediment contrary to the will of the Intelligence; for then it would have been miserable not blessed, as appears from the foregoing concerning the eighth part of this work; nor was it then less perfect or blessed than before. For the perfection and beatitude of it consists more in its intrinsic things and in divine contemplation than in any such extrinsic thing must be reputed. I think therefore that the first intention of any Intelligence is to please God, and therefore when it sees God to will that it then move the orb, on account of whatever cause He shall will, then it moves on account of that cause finally — but more finally, that I may so speak, and most finally on account of God. And when it sees Him to will that then it not move, neither then does it move. And in this — namely in this contemplation, and perfect love of God, and in perfect conformation of the angelic will with the divine — consists principally the perfection of the Angels.

Wherefore neither are they more perfectly moving outwardly than wholly resting. Indeed it seems that the celestial motions are principally on account of man, more than on account of the perfection of the Angels, or on account of any cause other except God, on account of whom and to whom all things are principally and finally ordered.

For when the utility of men required that the Sun should stand, or be moved by retrograde motion, and likewise of the Moon, so it was done — as can be gathered from the foregoing concerning the 32nd part of this work. And when the utility of men requires that it be moved continuously and variously, so it is moved — as common experience and philosophy attest.

Nor ought this to be reputed wonderful or absurd, since here below many obsequies, benefits, and labors are spent on men. Wherefore also it is not unreasonably to be esteemed that, with the generation of men ceasing, the celestial motion will cease too. Which also, according to the things touched above, is seen by reason taken from the Angels not improbably to be persuaded.

For who doubts that the angels, just as also men, are or ought to be perfectly blessed? Perfect beatitude, however, of the angels — as also of men, and of any rational creature — consists in the perfect contemplation of God, as can be plain from the foregoing concerning the 23rd part of this work; which also Aristotle and other philosophers confess.

Any rational creature, however, since it is of finite virtue, seems to be able to contemplate God more perfectly, to enjoy Him more integrally, and to inhere to Him more fully, when it whole plenary wholly is at leisure for Him alone, wholly intends, and whole wholly insinuates and infuses itself, than when it is occupied about other extrinsic things — especially if such other things be not most essentially ordered to that end, like moving extra bodies, and to operate extrinsically: which by no means are most essentially ordered to perfect beatitude or felicity. For these in no way consist in extrinsic operation, or in transient action, just as also outside the blessed or felicitous one — but in intrinsic operation, or rather action immanent — since beatitude is the proper and supreme good of the blessed, and felicity of the felicitous; which both Aristotle and the other philosophers alike attest.

For we experience in ourselves that, occupied about extrinsic things, we are less able to contemplate, which the philosophers also attest. Why therefore not similarly to be suspected concerning the angels? Indeed since they are of finite virtue, it seems necessary that it be so. Otherwise they could be occupied about two extrinsic operations, three and four, and however many, in their most accustomed and most full manner, and not less perfectly contemplate God beatifically.

It seems therefore that the operation and motion extrinsic of exterior bodies in some way diminishes the supreme and perfect beatitude of the angels; and that the perfect beatitude of them will be in rest in every way, not in motion. Which from this likely much appears: that the angels more perfect, because superior, and moving the superior or more perfect bodies, by fewer motions move them, and more recede from motion, and more accede to immobility and rest.

The perfect beatitude of the angels therefore excludes every such occupation and motion, and includes a perfect vacation and rest. Not yet therefore is the beatitude of those supremely perfect, nor will it ever be perfected to the supreme, until they shall cease to move, and to be occupied extrinsically.

The heaven therefore at last shall stand. And when more reasonably shall it be supposed to stand than when the number of holy souls and men, predetermined by divine wisdom, shall have been fulfilled, and placed in the celestial palace, according to the judgment of the next part of this work? — that thus that celestial and most glorious city, the house of God, the whole simultaneously in its mansions and citizens, angels and men, may be perfected happily, and beatifically completed, that thus all together about their Prince God may quietly recline; and in His and their most delicious eternal banquet, that He Himself may be their full, perfect, and quiet refection, beatitude, and felicity heaped up, according to the next part of this work.

Furthermore, to the most perfect natural body the most perfect corporeal disposition seems to be attributed; rest however is more perfect than motion, as is shown above. Wherefore also natural bodies acquired natural places rest. Heaven therefore, when it shall be supremely perfect, will rest. To what, too, with the generation of men ceasing, would it be moved? Not on account of any perfection to be acquired, nor even to be preserved. For what perfection by moving would it acquire to itself, or what perfection could it lose by resting, since it is unalterable and incorruptible, both from the intrinsic and from extrinsics universally?

Furthermore, according to the things touched above, when will the inferior elemental world be in its most natural disposition — in figure, in location, in the surrounding of elements from one another, spherical and equal, and in other dispositions — except by the celestial motion ceasing? From all these things, therefore, it is not improbably persuaded that the whole superior and inferior world, celestial and elemental, and the whole number of celestial citizens — angels and men — at the same time will be finally perfected and perfectly beatified all at once.

And perhaps both heaven and the inferior world will then receive from God qualities and conditions multiply better than it has in the present — perhaps so that the elements be pervious to light, but unalterable and incorruptible from one another, and from heaven, in the manner of the carbuncle, or the sapphire, the crystal, or the emerald — just as also of the bodies of the blessed it was said above. Does it not befit the most fitting God to perfect most fittingly His work, His house, His temple, and His celestial city? Nor with omnipotent God is anything to be reputed impossible or difficult, as the first Supposition and the parts above set forth lucidly manifest.

Earth perhaps in some part of itself — namely in Tartarus — will perpetually suffer some violence or unnaturalness, for the punishment of the wicked, who against the Law and Author of nature violently in some manner and unnaturally sinned, that thus both the good and the wicked may be ordered in fitting degrees; and so the glory of the blessed seeing these things may shine forth more amply, please, and delight.

Does not Ptolemy too, above alleged, plainly attest that the celestial motions will cease? For what are those eternal things remaining up to the term which their founder imposed upon them, of which in the book of Almagest he considers, if not the celestial motions? For he did not suppose that the heaven or celestial bodies according to their substance would be corrupted, as the same Prologue clearly teaches.

Does not Albumasar too, in Greater Introductory 1, distinction 2, where he treats of the adaptation of times, thus write? "The planets are not corrupted, neither do they receive augmentation or diminution, nor defect, nor detriment, until the time which God shall have willed" — which it behooves to be understood not concerning the planets according to their substance, but according to their accidents perhaps imperfect, and motion. Who too below, in the same, distinction 5, treating of the first sect, thus says: "All the philosophers of the ancients said that there is effected from the natural and durable motions of the planets a natural and durable effect, which is made until the time which God shall have willed."

Hermes too Mercurius triplex Trismegistus, On the Eternal Word 26: "Then," he says, "neither will the earth stand, nor will the sea be navigated, nor the heaven by the courses of the stars, nor the course of the stars stand in the heaven. Every divine voice will be silenced by necessary taciturnity, the fruits of the earth will be corrupted, nor will the earth be fecund, and the air itself with sad body will languish. This and such is the old age of the world coming — irreligion, disorder, irrationality of all good things."

And it follows, 27, consequently: "When all these things shall have happened, O Asclepius, then that Lord and Father, God omnipotent, and one governor of all, intuiting on the morals and acts voluntary, by His will (which is the goodness of God) resisting vices, and the corruptions of all errors recalling, and every malignity either by inundation washing, or by fire consuming, or by pestilent diseases here and there in diverse places dispersed ending — to the ancient face will recall the world, that the world itself may seem to be adorable and admirable; and that the great effector and restorer God may be celebrated more frequently with eulogies and benedictions of praise by the men who shall then be. For this is the begetting of the world, the reformation of all good things, and the most holy and most religious restitution of nature itself, by the compelled course of time, which is and was without beginning, eternal."

What, however, he says — that the world will be recalled to the ancient face — can be understood of the eternal face which it eternally had in the divine mind and will, as also his words insinuate. Wherefore consequently 28 thus he says: "For neither does He vehemently will anything who is fullest of all things; but He wills those things which He has. He wills however all good things, and has all things which He wills. All good things however both He thinks and wills; this however is God; whose image is the world of good"; wherefore also below 38 he distinguishes the world into intelligible world in God, and sensible in nature.

Whom also follows the learned Plato, Timaeus 1, chapter 2, distinguishing animal and world likewise. Who also below in the same, 9, distinguishes the world into archetype and sensible; and the archetype he says is eternal, the sensible truly to have begun temporally, and to be the image of the archetypal world.

Furthermore, the most illustrious prophets too most clearly attest this judgment, and the Sibyl too the prophetess likewise, as in the demonstration of the 32nd part it was recounted.

Furthermore, all those positing the world not to have been created from nothing, but made from preceding matter, are reformed by the preceding things. All also saying that the world will be corrupted have to say also consequently this concerning the souls and the blessed men; wherefore also they are corrected by the next part.

Behold how many and how great errors this one little Supposition argues, and emends. Indeed, as I think, there is no error possible about God, about the essentials of God, which by the virtue of this Supposition cannot be virilely destroyed and elided. For God, as this Supposition shows, is, and has whatever is better to be and to have; and is not, and has not, whatever is better not to be, and not to have. Any error, however, about God, against some of these errs; wherefore also all such errors and errants through it can be directed to the rule, and reduced.

Although also many erring even commemorated above can be reduced likewise by many other ways which I have not touched above, by reason of brevity, and that the most great virtue of this golden Supposition, at least in the smallest, I might declare — though of its infinite content scarcely have I drawn a small drop. This Supposition therefore, as the corner-stone of philosophers and theologians most virtuous, most precious, most beautiful, proven, elect, and altogether perfect in every way, I have placed in the foundation of the whole structure.

There are nevertheless, as I think, some who will busy themselves to reprove this proven stone — or at least the proof of it — just as also other parts of this little work. For by frequent experience I have learned that, just as Josephus reports concerning the Sadducees of old, who reckoned it glorious to contend and resist the doctors of their philosophy, so also now very many strive — or at least appear to strive — to destroy what has been constructed by others, glory with the Sadducees, as I fear, hunting.

For what is glory, as authors define it, except frequent fame about something with praise? In which vice those especially are inflamed before others, who have constructed no edifice or hut, and so much the more audaciously they tear apart the things of others, by so much the less they fear any perils to their own (because they have none); that thus, at least while they destroy — or rather while in the eyes of the foolish they seem to destroy — what has been constructed by others, themselves constructing nothing destructible, they may appear more glorious than the constructors of the destroyed.

Would, our Master and Lord, would that as much I as other disciples and servants of Yours, with blinding pride removed, with simple mind we might seek not the appearance of empty vanity, but the existence of solid truth; that thus, with You leading, we may merit truly to find, to know, and to hold it.

For I know, Lord, with You teaching, that frequently the proud and envious studies of the proud You neglect, despise, and deride; You make foolish, mutilate, and eclipse them; the simple things of the simple, however, You look upon, love, and rejoice with; You visit, illuminate, and consummate them.

These things therefore as it were preludial having been pre-tasted, to the cause of God proposed — with divine help always accompanying — confidently must we pass over.

Thomas Bradwardine, De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium

Book I, Chapter II

THAT GOD IS THE NECESSARY CONSERVER OF ALL OTHER THINGS: WITH A COROLLARY HAVING THREE PARTS.

Hitherto, then, having pleaded in a general way in God's cause against various heretics, henceforth, in His special cause against Pelagius — with the patronizing counsel of the supreme Advocate ever assisting — we must plead in a special manner. First, then, let it be shown that God is the necessary conserver of all beings — necessary, I say, by supposition, namely, on the supposition of the entity of things. For nothing which in itself is capable of being and not-being has being except from something which in itself is necessarily, upon which it always depends in being. But anything short of God is in itself capable of being, while God alone is in Himself necessarily. The whole of this appears from the force and connection of causes drawn from the first supposition and from the seventeenth part of the first corollary of this work. For everything that exists determinately, which is not sufficiently determined of itself to be, is determined to be by something else; but every existent which is in itself capable of being and not-being is an existent of this kind; therefore through another. Now that other is either in itself necessarily — and we have what we intend — or it is in itself capable of being and not-being, and then by the same proximate reasoning it follows that it itself is determined to be by something else; and concerning that other the same divisive inquiry is to be made. And since by the second supposition there cannot in such matters be an infinite process, we must necessarily arrive at something in itself necessarily, by which every existent in itself capable of being and not-being is determined to be. This is the argument in essence of Avicenna and Algazel, by which they consider themselves to demonstrate this same conclusion: Avicenna in Metaphysics I and in many chapters of book VIII, Algazel in Metaphysics II in his twelfth saying.

Hence Avicenna in Metaphysics VIII, ch. 3 says: "When the first principle is spoken of absolutely, it is necessary that it be one; but when first material cause and first formal cause are spoken of, with these it is not necessary that there be one, as is required in the necessarily existing. For none of these is the first cause absolutely; rather, the necessarily existing is the principle even of these first causes. From this, therefore, and from what we have said before, it is manifest that the necessarily existing is one in number; and it has appeared that whatever is other than this, when considered in itself, is in its own being only possible, and is therefore caused, and is well known to come, in causality, undoubtedly to it. Hence whatever is — except the one which is one to itself, and the being which is being to itself — is acquiring its being from another than itself, by which it has being to itself, not by itself. And this is the meaning of the thing being caused, namely, receiving being from another than itself, and having a privation which is verified in its essence absolutely."

Algazel likewise in Metaphysics II, where above, says: "Whatever is other than the necessarily existing must arrive from it and have its being from it. For it has been shown that the necessarily existing is only one; therefore every other is possibly existing and depends upon that necessarily existing." And further in the same place: "It has been shown that the universe is possible and needs a cause, and all causes by necessity proceed from the necessarily existing, which by necessity is one. It is therefore said that this is the first principle of the world."

Wherefore Hermes too, On the Eternal Word 21, says that the highest of the governors above and below obeys that highest Lord, "for all things hang and flow from Him." Hence Boethius, On the Consolation of Philosophy III, last prose, writes thus: "This is, as it were, a certain helm and rudder, by which the worldly machine is preserved stable and incorrupt." Aristotle, too, in Metaphysics XII.38, says thus: "The First is necessary, not contingent otherwise, but simple. From such a principle, therefore, depend the heavens and nature." And in Metaphysics IX.17: "Things which exist by necessity are themselves indeed first; for if these were not, nothing whatever would be." And in Physics VIII.52, he says: "There must be some first mover, immobile and not by accident, if, as we have said, there is to be among existing things some unceasing and immortal motion, and that which is must abide — that is, the whole universe in itself and in the same. For the principle abiding necessarily, what is continuous with the principle must necessarily abide." Hence God is said to be the necessary principle of all things, both in being and in moving.

This view of the philosophers Augustine, with deserved praise, recites in City of God VIII.6: "The philosophers, whom we see deservedly preferred above the rest in fame and glory, perceived that no species in any mutable thing whatsoever, whatever it may be in any way, of whatever nature, can be except from Him who truly is, since He is unchangeably." And he pursues this same view at length in On Free Will II.28, showing that all mutable things are reduced to something immutable, by which they are formed, and on which they continually rest in being. Hence the Philosopher in On the Cause of the Motion of Animals — which is the twelfth book of On Animals in the new translation, ch. 1 and 3, and almost throughout — holds that everything moved rests on something fixed in being moved. And the same is plainly stated by Augustine in On Genesis according to the Letter VIII.13. Hence Ammonius Hermeas, in his Commentary on Aristotle's On Interpretation, on the last part of book I, says: "The gods truly exist, and to receive transmutation is not possible even according to the intellect; for that which is altogether immutable must precede that which in any way undergoes transmutation, in order that what is transmuted may abide. Therefore, in the gods, who have the character of principle with respect to beings, it is impossible to consider past or future."

The faithful Abraham, moreover, who deserved to be called the Friend of God, faithfully attests both the production of all things from God and the conservation of those produced by Him, as Josephus reports — as is more fully recited around the thirty-fifth part of book I. And does not the Apostle to the Hebrews 1, saying that "God hath spoken to us in His Son, by whom He made also the worlds, who, being the brightness of His glory and the figure of His substance, and upholding all things by the word of His power," seem to ascribe both the making and the conservation of all things to God Himself? Hence Chrysostom, expounding this in homily 2, says: "Bearing, he says, all things — that is, governing; for He upholds the things that fall and tend to nothing. For it is no less to uphold the world than to have made it; nay, if we may say something more boldly, it is even greater. For in making, the essences of things are produced from things not existing; but in upholding, the things which have been made are upheld lest they return to nothing. Here, therefore, while they are governed, and things mutually opposed are fitted together, an indication of great and very wonderful and very abundant power is declared."

Augustine, in On the Divine Essence of God's Divinity, and on Invisibility and Immutability I, speaks thus of God: "Without doubt no place is absent from His presence. Above every creature He presides, ruling; beneath all, sustaining and bearing — not by the weight of labor, but by indefatigable power; for no creature founded by Him is able to subsist of itself, unless it be sustained by Him who created it. He is outside all things, but not excluded; within all, but not enclosed." This little book is in some codices ascribed to Jerome, but I rather think that it was Augustine's. Hence also Gregory in On Ezekiel II, homily 5: "He Himself is interior and exterior, lower and higher; ruling, He is higher; bearing, He is lower; filling, He is interior; surrounding,

He is exterior. So is He within that He is without; so He surrounds that He penetrates; so He presides that He bears; so He bears that He presides." Wherefore Anselm in Monologion 14, speaking of the supreme Essence: "It is clear," he says, "that it is itself which bears and surpasses, encloses and penetrates all other things."

To this saying of the Apostle agrees the saying of the Philosopher in On the World, last chapter, where he shows that God, though one, is yet of many names according to the multitude of those things which He newly produces, and of which He is the cause; and he says that He is called Jupiter, wherefore not badly is it said in the Orphica: "Jupiter is the foundation of earth, and of starry heaven; Jupiter is the root of the sea." And in Jeremiah 23: "I will fill heaven and earth, says the Lord," or, in another rendering, "I do fill them." And the Wise One in Wisdom 11 wisely teaches the same, where, addressing God, he says: "Thou lovest all things that are, and hatest none of the things which Thou hast made. For how could anything endure, if Thou wouldst not? or be preserved, if not called by Thee?"

Again, this same is confirmed by another similar reasoning. For anything you please that is pointed to (e.g., the Earth) either is in itself, or through another and in some way by accident. If by accident and through another, the same inquiry is to be made about that other; and since there cannot thus be an infinite process, by reason of the second supposition, there is something one and first of all in itself, which is God, through which whatsoever else is. Nor can it be said that the Earth exists in itself, because then it would always have necessarily existed. For in itself includes "of all" universally, as is plain from Posterior Analytics I.4. And "of all," as taken there, imports the universality of time in every way, as appears from Aristotle himself defining it thus: "I say of all this — what is not in some thus and in some not, nor sometimes thus and sometimes not, but of all and always."

For this very reason Augustine, in the gloss on Galatians 2 ("And from these, who seemed to be something, of what kind soever they were once, it is no matter to me"), speaks thus: "They themselves are not anything, even if they are good ministers of God; for Christ is something in them, not they themselves. For if they were anything in themselves, they would always have been something; but they were once sinners and ignorant." This same reasoning, and that in itself includes the universality of time, appears likewise from Augustine, On the Immortality of the Soul 13, where he says: "But this incorporeal force and nature, the producer of the universal body, holds the universe by present power. For it did not make and depart, and abandon what it has made. For that substance which is not body, and is not, so to speak, locally moved, cannot be separated from that substance which occupies place; and that effecting force cannot be at leisure, but must protect what has been made by it, and must not allow it to lack form, in whatever measure it is. For what is not by itself, if it be deserted by that through which it is, certainly will not be. And we cannot say that the body, when it was made, received this — that it should be henceforth contained by itself, even if it were forsaken by its founder. Although if this is so, the soul has it more than the body, as is manifest; and so very nearly the soul is proved to be immortal, if it can be by itself. For whatever is such must be incorruptible, and on this account cannot perish, since nothing forsakes itself. But the mutability of body is at hand, which the universal motion of the universal body itself sufficiently indicates. Wherefore, to those who diligently inspect — so far as such a nature can be inspected — by ordered mutability, that which is mutable is found mutable; but what is by itself has no need even of any motion, all sufficiency existing for it in itself, since all motion is toward another, of which that which is moved has need. Form, therefore, is present in the universal body by a better nature, sufficient and possessing what it has made; wherefore that mutability does not take from body its being body, but causes it to pass from species into species by most ordered motion. For no part of it is allowed to be reduced to nothing, since that effecting force takes hold of the whole, with neither laboring nor idle power, granting that everything that is by it should be, in the measure that it is."

And in ch. 16 he writes thus: "But if — what is doubtful to no one — the soul is then most wise, when it is intimately joined to truth which is always in the same way, and immovably adheres to it, joined by divine love (and from that one are all things which are in any way), it is from that essence which most highly and greatly is. Either the soul is from that one, in the measure that it is, or it is by itself: but if by itself, when itself is the cause of existing for itself, and never deserts itself, it never perishes, as we have argued above." Nor can anyone say that the Earth is by itself, but yet this proposition — "the Earth is" — is not by itself, in order so to evade the foregoing argument. For according to the truth, and according to the Philosopher in the Categories: "From the fact that a thing is or is not, a speech is said to be true or false." Therefore, from the fact that a thing is or is not thus or thus, a speech is called thus true or thus false. Hence, in On Interpretation I, last chapter: speeches are likewise true as things are.

Furthermore, even if anyone, leaning on certain reasons or authorities, should wish at all costs to defend that some things short of God exist and abide by themselves, yet under no color can he establish that anything short of God exists by itself equally, worthily, primarily, supremely, perfectly, and equally as God, as the suppositions and the parts of the first corollary show. Nay, even if other things are said to exist by themselves in any manner, yet God is incomparably more, more worthily, more primarily, and more perfectly said to exist by Himself. And it is established that, of all things sharing the same name, that to which the name belongs more greatly and worthily is the cause of the rest, in respect of their sharing that name. By this the Philosopher in Metaphysics VII.3 proves that substance is the cause of being for any other category. Where also the text which Averroes expounds, from the fact that substance is more worthy of the name "being" than the rest, concludes thus: "It is therefore manifest that this is the cause of the essence of any of these, and these are because of that." On which Averroes, comm. 3, says: "Since this has been declared concerning substances, it is manifest that substances are the causes of the essences of accidents, and accidents are not except on account of substances; and this is necessary. For when it has been declared that this name being is said of the ten categories, and more worthily of substances, and it has been declared that, when several share in the same name, and one is more worthy than certain others, that which is more worthy of this name is the cause of the rest, and the disposition of the rest in respect of causality is as the disposition of these in that name, then from these propositions it is concluded that substance is the cause of the other categories."

Hence the Philosopher, Metaphysics II.4: "Each thing itself is most of others, according to which it inheres in others univocally — for instance, fire is hottest. For it is the cause to the others, here causing; wherefore also the most true, because it is the cause to the posterior that they are true. Wherefore the principles of always-existing things must necessarily always be most true; for they are not at any time true, nor is anything the cause to them that they are so, but they are to others. Wherefore each thing, as it is in being, so it stands toward truth." Where the text of the Commentator has it more expressly thus: "Each principle is properly the cause of those things according to which other things are, which agree in name and intention." Where Averroes: "Since it has been declared that the cause in any genus of beings is more worthy in being and in truth than those things of which it is the cause in that genus, it is manifest that, if there is a first cause of all things — as has been declared in natural science — that cause is more worthy in being and in truth than all beings. For all beings do not acquire being and truth except from this cause. It is therefore alone being by itself, and true by itself, and all other beings and truths exist through the being and truth of that one."

Hence Augustine, Confessions VII.15: "I beheld certain things, and saw that they ought to be referred to Thee, since they are: in Thee all finite things are, not as in a place, but because Thou holdest all things with hand and truth. And all things are true insofar as they are; nor is anything falsity, except when that is thought to be which is not." With which Avicenna agrees, Metaphysics VIII.6: "The necessarily existing is truth; for the truth of any thing is the property of its being, which is established for it. Therefore nothing is more worthy of being truth than the necessarily existing. Now that is called true, of whose being there is a certain judgment. Therefore nothing is more worthy of this certitude than that of whose being there is a certain judgment. And it is always with its certitude, and always with its eternity, by itself, and not by another than itself. The quiddities of other things, as they are in themselves and apart from their relation to the necessarily existing, do not deserve to be, but deserve privation; and on this account, all things, as they are in themselves, are false; but on account of Him is their certitude, and on this account every thing perishes except inasmuch as it is turned toward His face. And therefore He is more worthy that He should be the necessarily existing and the truth."

Concordantly Isaiah 40 writes thus: "All nations are before Him as if they were not, and are reckoned to Him as nothing and emptiness." Hence Job 23: "He alone is." On which Gregory, Moralia XVI.14, speaking of Angels and men, heaven and earth, and all other things in general: "All these things are," he says, "but principally are not, because in themselves they do not subsist; and unless they be held by the hand of the Governor, they cannot be at all. For all things subsist in Him by whom they were created; nor do those things which live grant life to themselves; nor do those things which are moved, but do not live, lead themselves to motion by their own motions; but He moves all things, who quickens some, and others, quickened, He marvelously orders and preserves in their final essence. For all things have been made out of nothing, and their essence would tend back again to nothing, unless the Author of all things held it by the hand of His governance. All things, therefore, which are created, by themselves cannot prevail to subsist nor to be moved, but they subsist insofar as they have received that they should be; they are moved insofar as they are disposed by hidden instinct. For lo, the sinner is to be scourged by human things: in his burnings, the earth grows parched; in his shipwrecks, the sea is shaken; in his sweats, the air is enkindled; in his floodings, the heaven is darkened against him; in his oppressions, men are kindled; in his adversity, even the Angelic powers are moved. Are these things, then, which we have called inanimate, or which we have called living, agitated by their own instincts, and not rather by divine impulses? Whatever, therefore, rages outwardly, through this He must be regarded who inwardly disposes this. In every cause, therefore, He alone is, who principally is, who also says to Moses: I am who am; thus shalt thou say to the children of Israel: He who is hath sent me to you."

Hence Plato, Timaeus II.3, introduces God thus addressing the other gods, namely, Angels: "Gods, of whom I am the maker and Father: works of mine, by nature dissolvable, but by my will indissoluble. For everything that is joined is by nature dissolvable; but what is joined and modulated by good reason — to wish to be dissolved is not of God. Wherefore, although you have been made and generated, and are by no means immortal nor altogether indissoluble, yet you shall not at any time be dissolved, nor shall you undergo the necessity of death; for my will is a greater bond and more vigorous for guarding eternity than those vital bonds out of which your eternity has been compacted and composed."

Furthermore, even the heaven, the firmest of bodies, by no means suffices by itself to be. For Averroes says, On the Substance of the Orb, treatise 2: "You ought to know that the celestial body, which is simple and intransmutable by anything extrinsic, does not need a power moving in place only, but also a power bestowing on it and on its substance eternal permanence. For though it be simple, and not having potency for corruption, yet it is necessarily of finite action, because it is of finite dimensions and of dimensions determined by the surface containing it. And every such thing, when the intellect posits it as existing by itself, without anything else bestowing on it permanence and eternity, must necessarily be in the finiteness of its permanence as it is in the finiteness of its action. And therefore it is necessary in the intellect that there be here a power bestowing eternal permanence on it, even as it bestows on it eternal motion." Hence Psalm 32: "By the word of the Lord the heavens were established, and all the power of them by the spirit of His mouth." If, therefore, according to Augustine, Plato, and Averroes, neither soul, nor Angel, nor heaven can abide by itself, without divine conservation and sustentation, what else will be able so to abide?

Wherefore the Father of Philosophers, Hermes, On the Eternal Word 38: "This sensible world, which is so called, is the receptacle of all sensible species, qualities, or bodies, all of which without God cannot be quickened. For God is all things, and from Him are all things, and all things are subject to His will — which whole is good, becoming, prudent, and immutable, and to Him alone sensible and intelligible — and without Him neither was anything, nor is, nor shall be.

For all things are from Him and through Him, both manifold qualities, and great quantities, and all measures exceeding magnitudes, and all-formed species, which when thou hast understood, O Asclepius, thou shalt give thanks to God."

In agreement with which the Apostle to the Romans 11: "Of Him, and through Him, and in Him are all things; to Him be glory." Whom, as it were expounding, the twenty-second of the Twenty-four Definitions of as many Philosophers concerning God says thus: "God is He from whom whatever is, is — without partition; through whom it is, without variation; in whom it is, without commixture." Hence Augustine, Confessions I.1, addressing God, says: "I should not be at all, if Thou wert not in me. Or rather, I should not be, unless I were in Thee — of whom are all things, through whom are all things, in whom are all things? Even so, Lord, even so." Who also, on Psalm 113, "Whatsoever the Lord hath willed, He hath done": "In which He himself is, as Containing not as needing; not by them as by needing is He contained."

Dionysius, moreover, On the Divine Names II, when Timothy asks what is meant by "God exists by Himself" — whether it means that God exists by Himself as Life, or as Wisdom, or as anything else of the kind — answers: "What we say is no small matter, but is right, and has a simple declaration. For we do not say that any divine or Angelic essence exists by itself, being the cause of being to all things which are. Rather, the cause only of being to all things that are; only the cause of existing to all things that are; and being itself the super-essential principle, and essence, and causal source. Nor do we declare any other deity than the super-divine to be the parent of life, the cause of life and of brought-forth life to all things which live; nor do we say there is any gathering principle of existing things and creative essences and substances, which they have promptly perfected as gods of existing things and creators — gods whom we should truly and properly say neither formed themselves, nor existed, nor were their fathers — but we call 'Being-by-itself' and 'Life-by-itself' deity, principally indeed and god-formedly and causally one super-principal and super-essential principle and cause of all; but participatively, as providential powers brought forth from the non-participated God, vivification by itself (according to another translation, essentification) and deification by itself, in which existing things properly participate in themselves, and are existing, and living, and divine, and are and are called, and the like. And the best substituent of the first ones themselves is said to be the second, then of the whole of these, then of the particulars of them, then of the whole of those that participate in them, then of those that participate in them particularly. And what need is there to speak of these things, since indeed our divine Masters call also that which is by itself the substituent of goodness and divinity 'more than best' and 'more than divine,' calling goodness and divinity by itself a beneficent and deific gift proceeding from God; and form by itself, formific outpouring by itself, and total form, and particular form, and universally good, and other things which according to the same manner have been said and shall be said — declaring providence and goodness participated by existing things, proceeding from the non-participated God."

And further, in ch. 5: "All things," he says, "Goodness turns to itself, as principal gatherer of dispersed things, as principal and life-giving deity; and all things desire it as principle, as containing power, as end. And the best is, as the divine words say, that from which all things subsist, and are, as brought forth from a most perfect cause, and in which all things are constituted, as guarded and comprehended in an omnipotent counsel, and unto which all things are turned, as each into its proper summit; and all things desire it." And further, in the same chapter: "Simply, every on — that is, being — is from the Good and the Best, and is turned into the Good and the Best, and all things whatsoever are and come to be, are and come to be through the Good and the Best, and to this all things look, and by it are moved and contained; and on its account and through it and in it is every exemplary, consummative, intellectual, special, formal principle — and simply, every principle, every containing power, every summit; or, that I may speak comprehensively, all things which are, are from the Good and the Best, and all things which are not are super-essentially in the Good and the Best. And this is the principle and end of all, super-principal and super-final; for from Him, and through Him, and in Him, and into Him are all things, as the sacred speech says."

By the same reasoning already made, Anselm, in Monologion 3 and in following chapters, shows that there is some being which alone is by itself, and that through this one all the rest are; and that itself is unique, having neither equal nor greater, since whatever is through another is less than it. Wherefore he concludes that it most highly and greatly is of all beings; and afterwards, by the same reasoning, he shows that it necessarily and continuously sustains all other things. Hence in ch. 13 he says thus: "It is therefore established that whatever is not the same as itself has been made through the supreme Nature. Now it can be doubtful to no rational mind that all things which have been made are vigorous, and persevere in being so long as they are, by the very same one sustaining them, by whose making they have, out of nothing, the being which is theirs. For by a reason similar in all respects to that by which it has been gathered that all things which exist through some one thing, and that this one alone is by itself while others are by it — by a similar reasoning, I say, it can be proved that whatever things are vigorous are vigorous through some one thing, and that one alone is vigorous by itself, while others are by another. Since this cannot be otherwise except that things which have been made are vigorous through another, and that from which they have been made is vigorous through itself, it is necessary that, just as nothing has been made except through the present creative Essence, so nothing is vigorous except through the conserving presence of the same."

And he adds in ch. 14, consequently: "If it is so — nay, since by necessity it is so — it follows that wherever it is not, nothing is. Therefore it is everywhere, and through all, and in all." And further: "It is clear that itself is what bears and surpasses, encloses and penetrates all other things. If, then, these are joined to those things which were found above, the same is what is in all, and through all, and from which, and through which, and in which all things are."

Furthermore, every caused thing is caused by some cause actually now causing — which appears from the mutual relation between them, and from Algazel, Metaphysics I, and Avicenna, Metaphysics VI and VIII, at length. Now anything short of God is caused, and He alone uncaused; therefore whatsoever besides God is in some way caused by God. But this causation, at least of things which are not moved, nor newly produced, can be called nothing but necessary conservation, as is plain from the said philosophers in the said places. Nor can it be said that God is therefore now said to cause some caused thing, because He previously caused it, or the cause which caused it. For this is repugnant to the authors cited; and because then a father would be said now actually to cause a son actually existing — nay, even a dead father a now-living son, because he caused him or his cause.

Wherefore Algazel, Metaphysics I, last chapter, shows that no possible-existent has being except through another which is its maker; and that even the world, though it be eternal, may be called a making of God most high. And, distinguishing concerning maker, he subjoins: "Maker is understood doubly: first, that which extracts the made from non-being to being; second, that which makes the being of a thing to be through it, as the being of light is through the sun, and the sun is naturally seen to be the maker of light. But some thought that, when a thing has being, it does not need a maker, but although that one is not, yet its product does not cease to be; and perhaps they presume to say that, although it be posited that God is not, it does not follow from this that the world is not." And they try to show this by example and by reason. By example thus: as, with the builder of a house being dead, the house itself remains. By reason thus: that which is not, needs a giver of being; but that which is, does not so need.

He answers to the example, and says that the builder is not the cause of the house except improperly, but is the cause of the motion of the parts of the house while it is being moved to the form of the house; but, when the form of the house has been induced and the motions have ceased, his causality ceases. Nay, according to the same in the same place, the form of the foundation, of the wall, and of the other parts are the causes of the house. And to the reason he says that what already has being does not need a giver, but a conserver. Which he proves thus: every product depends upon its maker — and this not according to the not-being which it had; therefore according to its being. And he adds: "Therefore that which has begun to be needs a maker only according to its being, since according to this mode it is possibly existing." And further: "After, then, the product does not depend on the maker except inasmuch as it has being, then so long as it remains in being, it needs the maker, and depends on him according to its being, and is on his account, and with him in all its dispositions — as the being of the day is on account of the sun, and with the sun in all its dispositions."

Algazel, in this argument as in many of his sayings, follows Avicenna, who in Metaphysics VI.1 most diffusely pursues the same reasoning virtually, where among other things he says thus: "The divine philosophers do not understand by agent the principle of motion only, as the natural philosophers understand, but the principle of being and the giver of it, as is the Creator of the world. The natural cause does not acquire being for a thing except by some motion, in some of the modes of motion; therefore that which acquires being in natural things is the principle of motion." And further in the same place: "Perhaps someone will think that the agent and cause is not needed except that the thing have being after non-being; but, after the thing has been, if the cause be destroyed, the thing will yet be self-sufficient. He will think, therefore, that the thing does not need the cause except for beginning to be; but after it has begun and has had being, it will then no longer need the cause. With them, therefore, causes will be causes of becoming only, and prior to that which is made, not simultaneous with it. Now he has thought what is false, as you know. For the being of the thing, after the thing has been made, must be either necessarily existing or not necessarily existing." And having shown at length that it is not necessarily existing through itself, but depends on the necessarily existing through itself, he says at the end of the chapter: "After it has been clear that the being of the quiddity depends on something, inasmuch as it is being to that quiddity — not inasmuch as it is being after non-being — then that being according to this mode is caused, and so long as it lasts will be caused, depending on another. It is therefore manifest now that the caused needs something which gives to it being itself only by itself; but beginning and other things of the kind are things accidental to it, and the caused needs the giver of its being always and unceasingly, as long as it has being."

In agreement with these, Hermes, On World and Heaven I, treating of the principles of things, exploring and inquiring what is the highest and first cause, and what its effect, says thus: "Therefore that cause is to ouk olos — that is, a fount having a seed-bed of life," (in Greek)" which is called fullness of knowledge, the good of the divine clemency of goodness, which, placed throughout the whole body of the world after the manner of a circle, and now placed externally, now internally, governs and composes all things, and to procure and conserve all fiery and spherical things, does not cease to perpetuate agitation. There are joined together, in an individual species described in singularity, whatever matter, whatever the world, whatever the machine of the world, whatever time, whatever in temporal things the elements bring forth. There is the text of the work, the chain of fate, the disposition of ages, the goal of all temporal things engraved by the finger of the supreme Disposer. There is the knot of perpetuity. The divine Mind, therefore, by no fatigue lays down its office, but does not cease to sustain itself and the world and all things which are within it by perpetual and indefatigable utility — or, alternatively, stability — of itself."

This same Truth itself most truly attests, when it says: "My Father worketh until now, and I work" (John 5) — which is understood not of that operation by which things are merely newly produced, but of the necessary conservation of things produced, as Avicenna and Algazel above expounded. Hence Augustine, On Genesis according to the Letter IV.14, treating how God on the seventh day rested from every work, and how nevertheless with this the Father works continuously even now, says thus: "It can be understood that God rested from founding the kinds of creature; but henceforth even now and beyond He works the administration of those same kinds which were then instituted. Not that on the seventh day even, His power should cease from the governance of heaven and earth, and of all things which He had founded — otherwise they would forthwith fall asunder. For the power of the Creator and the strength of Him who is omnipotent and holds all things is the cause of subsisting for every creature; and if at any time it should cease from them, at one and the same time their species too would cease, and the whole creature would collapse. Nor, as a builder of houses, when he has built, departs, and his work, with him ceasing and departing, stands — so the World will be able to stand, even for the blink of an eye, if its Lord should withdraw from it the rule of itself. And so what the Lord says, My Father worketh until now, shows a certain continuation of His work by which He contains and administers the universal creature. And what is written of His Wisdom, It reacheth from end to end mightily, and disposeth all things sweetly — of which it is likewise written that its motion is more agile and swifter than all motions — appears sufficiently to those rightly intuiting, that this same incomparable and ineffable, and (if it could be understood) stable, motion of His He grants to things to be sweetly disposed, which, plainly, being subtracted, if He should cease from operation, they would forthwith perish. And what the Apostle says, when he preached God to the Athenians, In Him we live and move and are, clearly known, so far as the human mind avails, helps this view, by which we believe and say that God works unceasingly in those things which He created. For we are not in Him as His substance, in the way it has been said that He has life in Himself; but, since we are something other than He, we are in Him for no other reason than because He works that, and this is His work, that He contains all things, and by which His Wisdom reacheth from end to end mightily, and disposeth all things sweetly — by which disposition we live and move and are in Him. Hence it is gathered that, if He should withdraw this His work from things, we should neither live, nor be moved, nor be. It is plain, therefore, that not even for one day has God ceased from the work of governing what He created, lest their natural motions (by which they are driven and quickened, that they may be of the natures of all, and in that which they are, may abide each according to its own kind) should at once lose them, and they should altogether cease to be anything, if there were withdrawn from them the motion of the Wisdom of God by which He sweetly disposes all things." And from this place is excerpted the 277th sentence of the Sentences of Prosper.

Furthermore, Augustine, On Genesis according to the Letter IX.23, says that if God should subtract from nature its inmost operation, by which He establishes and continuously makes it, it will remain as if extinct, in nothing. And further, in ch. 23, he says that the formation of woman from the rib was made by that work of God which He worked not through Angels, but through Himself; and He has not let it go; but the works are so continued that neither the nature of any other things, nor the nature of the Angels themselves, subsists, if He does not work. And on Psalm 118, "Thy hands have made me," he says: "If the operative power of God be subtracted from things, they perish." He also, in On Genesis according to the Letter VIII.19, On Nature and Grace 26, in the Sentences of Prosper 131.285, teaches a sentence similar to this.

Anselm, also, in On the Fall of the Devil 1, says: "Since not only is no other essence except by His making, but it cannot in any way remain, after it has been made, except by His preserving. When He ceases to preserve what He has made, what was returns into not-being." Lombard too, in the Sentences I, dist. 37, recites certain ones saying: "All places are present to God, and in those things which are in them He does not cease to operate. For also those very places, and whatever is in them, unless He preserves them, cannot remain. He is therefore said to be in them by substance, because by the power of His own substance He makes that even places be, and all things which are in them" — and he approves and confirms this view of theirs.

Furthermore, no thing having a formal cause can exist without it; but God is the first form of all things, as the suppositions show, and as is also demonstrated in Metaphysics II — since in formal causes there is not an infinite process, but there is one first of all, and this is God. In Metaphysics XII, near the beginning, the same is plain. Hence Averroes says there in comm. 6 — and Alexander had said it before — that God is the first form of all things, the first efficient, and likewise the first end. The same Averroes, on On Sleep and Waking, says thus: "Since these individuals have determinate being, it is necessary that none of them be understood except in the abstract form, whose proportion to that is as the proportion of the form of the artifact to the artifact." For "she is the maker of all things" (Wisdom 7).

This same thing Plotinus also affirms — concerning whom Augustine, City of God X.4, writes thus: "Plotinus the Platonist surely disputes concerning providence, and proves it from the supreme God — whose unintelligible and ineffable beauty He is — to reach as far as these earthly and lowest things, by the beauty of little flowers and leaves, which, all though as if cast away, and most swiftly perishing, he affirms cannot have most fitting numbers of their forms, unless they be formed from there, where the intelligible and unchangeable form, having all things at once, perseveres."

Wherefore Augustine, On the Word of the Lord, sermon 38: "The Word of God is a certain form, a form not formed, but the form of all formed things, surpassing all things without place, eminent above all, and a certain foundation in which they are, and a summit under which they are. For all things are under God; the Word abiding in itself renews all things; therefore it is the form of all things, a form unfabricated, without time, without spaces of place." And in Eighty-three Questions 23, he says that this very likeness of the Father is called the Son, by whose participation those things are alike which in any way are alike — whether to one another, or like to God; and he subjoins: "For it is the first species, by which, so to speak, things are speciated, and the form by which all things are formed."

Chrysostom too, on the Epistle to the Hebrews, homily 2, says that the Son is the proper character of the first form. Which Dionysius too, On the Divine Names II, cited above, attests. The blessed Hierotheus also — Dionysius reciting in On the Divine Names II — writes thus: "The divinity of Jesus, the cause and replenisher of all, joining the parts to the universe, saving — neither part nor whole, and whole and part, embracing every part and whole in itself, and supereminent and excelling, perfect indeed in the perfect, as principal perfection, but imperfect in the imperfect, as super-perfect, and before-perfect — forming form in formless things, as principal form; formless in forms themselves, as super-form; the essence of every essence, and incontaminate, supergrasping, and super-essentially removed from every essence, ordering all principles and orders, predestining, and super-collocated in every principle and order — and the measure of those things which are."

Of these no ignoble imitator, Robert Lincolniensis the Bishop, in a certain Epistle directed to Master Adam Rufus — who was inquiring whether God were the first form of all things — shows that God is the form of all, and even the first form. And first, having presupposed that He is form, he proves that He is necessarily the first form, because before Him is nothing; for He is the first and the last. Then he proves that He is form, by authorities, and likewise by reasons. The first authority he alleges from Augustine, On Free Will I — and so it is, if "Whence Evil" be not numbered, namely, the first book; but if that be numbered, as Augustine himself in Retractations I.9 numbers it, it is On Free Will II.28. Augustine, then, says: "If you behold whatever is mutable, and either by sense of body or by consideration of mind cannot grasp it unless it be held by some form of numbers, with which removed it must of necessity recede into nothing — doubt not that, where these mutable things are not intercepted, but with measured motions and varied diversity of forms, accomplish, as it were, certain verses of times, there is some eternal and unchangeable form, which is neither contained as it were diffused in places, nor protended and varied through times, through which all these things can be formed, and according to their kind fulfill and perform the numbers of places and times. Now every mutable thing must of necessity be also formable; just as we call mutable that which can be changed, so I will call formable that which can be formed. But no thing can form itself, because no thing can give itself what it does not have; and at any rate, in order that it have form, something is formed. Wherefore, any thing whatever, if it has any form, has no need to receive what it has; if it does not have any form, it cannot receive from itself what it does not have. Therefore no thing, as we have said, can form itself. So it is concluded that body and soul, since they are mutable, are formed by some unchangeable and ever-abiding form, to which form it has been said: Thou shalt change them, and they shall be changed; but Thou art the same, and Thy years shall not fail — by years without defect, prophetic speech has put eternity. Of this same form it has been said that abiding in itself, it renews all things. Hence also it is comprehended that all things are governed by providence: for if all things which are, with form altogether subtracted, will be nothing, then the unchangeable form itself, through which all mutable things subsist that they may be filled and acted with the numbers of their forms, is itself their providence; for these things would not be, if that were not." This seems to be the reason of Avicenna and Algazel touched above, by which through possible being they found one necessary being.

To this Augustine also alleges from Confessions XIII a discourse directed to the Father: "What did the spiritual and corporeal nature, which Thou hast made, deserve from Thee, that they should depend even when not yet begun, and so depend, informed in Thy Word, unless through the same Word they were called back to Thy unity, and were formed, and were from Thee, the one supreme Good, all things very good?" And further: "What did the inchoation of the spiritual creature deserve from Thee, that it should at any rate float dark and like an abyss, unlike Thee, unless through Thy Word it were turned to that from which it has been made — and, illumined by it, become light, though not equally, yet conformed to a form equal to Thee?" Again, he adduces the same Augustine, Confessions II, speaking thus to the Father: "I shall stand and be made firm in Thee, in my form, Thy life."

After these, by four reasons he shows that God is form to Himself; then he manifests how God is the form of creatures, and he holds that form is found in creatures in four ways. First, as a part of the composite, from which and from matter the whole itself is composed, and thus God is not the form of creatures. Second, that is called form to whose likeness something is formed — as a wooden foot is called the form of a sandal, which is formed according to it. Third, that is called form by application, to which matter is figured to its likeness, and thus a seal is the form of wax, and clay of a fusible statue. Fourth, the likeness in the mind of an artificer, looking to which he operates, is called the form, namely, of such an artifact; nor does it differ much from the form of the second mode. And he subjoins:

"Imagine, then, in the mind of an Architect, the form of a house to be fabricated, to which alone he looks, that to its imitation he may make the house; and imagine with this, by the impossible, his will so powerful that by itself alone it applies the matter to be formed into a house; and imagine with these that the matter of the house is fluid, nor can it remain in the form received in itself, if it should be separated from the form in the mind of the Architect — as water figured by a silver seal, when the seal is separated, immediately loses the figure received. Imagine, therefore, the will of the artificer applying the matter of the house to the form in his mind, not only that it be thus formed into a house, but, so long as the house remains in the being of a house, that the formed thing be preserved in being. In that mode, therefore, by which the form of this kind in the mind of the Architect would be the form of the house, the art, or wisdom, or word of omnipotent God is the form of all creatures; for it is at once the exemplar producing, forming, and conserving in the form given." And further he says that the eternal Wisdom of God is so the form of all things, as if you should imagine the figure of a silver seal to be life and intelligence, understanding itself and willing to figure to its imitation and likeness, more or less expressed, the fluid wax — which cannot of itself remain in any received figuration — and that, by this will alone, it should move the formless and fluid wax to itself, apply it to itself, and so impress some of its likeness on it, and preserve the impressed likeness; thus the eternal Wisdom of the Father is the form of all things. Thus Robert Lincolniensis, on the testimony of Grosseteste, of subtle and sharp wit.

This same Aristotle expressly attests, On the World 11, thus saying: "No nature suffices for itself by itself, deprived of the safety which is from Him — namely, God." Wherefore some of the ancients were moved to say that all these things are full of gods. Hence Virgil in Bucolics, eclogue 3: "From Jupiter the beginning, Muses; all things are full of Jupiter." And Jeremiah 23: "I will fill heaven and earth — or, in another version, I do fill — saith the Lord." And it follows in On the World: "That the power which resides in Heaven, and in things most distant — speaking of the one (in another translation, 'in one to say') — to all things should be the cause of safety, this is His omnipotent word, which from Heaven, from royal seats, comes" (Wisdom 18) — "who heals all things" (above 16). Hence the Apostle to the Hebrews 1: "Bearing all things by the word of His power."

Is it not for this reason that Hermes says God to be in some manner all things, and to be named by the names of all — as his authority, On the Eternal Word 38, alleged above, partly teaches? Is it not also above, in the same author's 31, that he says: "The Father of all, or the Lord, and He who alone is all things, willingly shows Himself to all"? And in 22, inquiring the name of God, he speaks thus: "I do not hope that the maker of all majesty, and the Father or Lord of all things, can be named by one name, even though composed of many; but rather by no name, or rather by the name of all things — since indeed He is one and all, so that it is necessary either that all things be named by His name, or He by the names of all."

In agreement with which the Philosopher, in On the World last chapter, treating of the divine names, writes thus: "Though He be one, He is many-named, named from all the passions which He Himself newly produces" — and, this being extended as it were inductively through each, in the end he says that He is called Savior and Eleutherius (in another translation, Liberator), "and, to speak summarily, He is to be called celestial and terrestrial, by every nature and fortune, as He being the cause of all things; on account of which it is not badly said in the Orphica: 'Jupiter, foundation of earth and heaven; Jupiter, root of the sea; Jupiter, sun and moon; Jupiter, king; Jupiter, prince of all.'" Wherefore Lucan: "Jupiter is whatsoever you see."

Or perhaps this is what God answered, veiledly, to Moses inquiring His name: "I AM WHO AM. Thus shalt thou say to the children of Israel: HE WHO IS hath sent me to you" (Exodus 3) — as if He would intimate that He is Himself simply by Himself, and that He also is somehow the whole of being, namely, by giving essence to all other things universally.

Wherefore Dionysius, On the Divine Names I, showing the supreme Unity and Divinity to be unnamed and yet named by the names of all, speaks thus: "The knowing Theologians praise it as unnameable, and from every name as unnameable; and when they say that the Divinity itself, in one of the mystical visions of the symbolic divine manifestation, rebuked one saying what is Thy name? — and, as it were leading him back from every denominative knowledge, said: Why askest thou my name? — and this is wonderful: or, is not this truly that wonderful name which is above every name, which is unnameable? Multivocal, however, as when they introduce it again, saying, I am 'on' (that is, being) life, light, God, truth; and when the Theosophers praise the cause of all multivocally from all causatives — as best, as existing, as cause of ages, as bestower of life, as virtue, as Lord of lords, as King of kings, as Ancient of days, as not aging, as immutable, as salvation. And they say that He is in spirits, and in souls, and in bodies, and in heaven, and in earth, and at the same time in the same — Himself unworldly, around-worldly, above-worldly, supercelestial, super-essential — sun, star, fire, water, spirit, mist of dew, by Himself stone and rock, all things which are, and nothing of these things which are. Thus, then, to the cause and supereminent and unnameable cause of all, they will join also all the names of those things which are; that diligently there may be the kingdom of all things, and that around all things which are, things depending on it as on cause, as on principle, as on end."

Lo, here he plainly intimates God to be the threefold cause of things — formal, efficient, final. And it follows: "And itself, according to the speech, is all things in all; and is truly praised the inchoative, consummative, and containing substance of all." Where the Gloss says: "All things which are, are God — because from Him are all things; nothing of those things which are, because He is not created." And further, in 5: "The divine name of the Best, manifesting all the causal processions of all things, is extended both into existing and non-existing things, and is above existing things, and beyond non-existing things." Where the Gloss: "By procession, however, he means the divine operation by which all things proceed to effect."

God moreover, in Hermes, On the Eternal Word 22 and 31, is named Father of all. Now "Father" — as Papias in his Elementarium attests — is Greek, that is, progenitor, called from the Greek pantater, which is "preserving all things." Wherefore Hermes, as touched above, says of God that He is the Father of all, or the Lord of all, or He who alone is all things — namely, giving essence to all things by producing, and likewise by conserving — as the efficient cause and formal cause of all.

This same view Hermes seems to teach, On the Eternal Word 1, where, speaking of the fullness of all goods, as if correcting himself, he subjoins: "If, however, many goods are, and not one in which all are — for one is known to be consequent to the other — all things are of one, or one is all things; for thus each is connected to each, that one cannot be separated from either."

Aristotle, in agreement, On the World 12, confirms the same by an elegant example: "They say," he says, "that the sculptor Phidias engraved Minerva (in another translation, Pallas) in the middle of a certain shield, and impressed his own face, and connected it to the statue by some hidden artifice, so that necessarily, if anyone wished to remove it, he would dissipate the whole statue and break it. Such a relation God bears to the World, containing the harmony and safety of all things."

Hence Avicenna, Metaphysics VIII.6: "All things perish except inasmuch as it is toward His face; and therefore He is more worthy that He should be the necessarily existing, and the truth, and pure intention." With which Psalm 103 agrees, saying: "When Thou openest Thy hand, all things shall be filled with goodness; but when Thou turnest away Thy face, they shall be troubled. Thou shalt take away their breath, and they shall fail, and shall return into their dust" — that is, shall be reduced to nothing.

Was it not also for this reason that some have posited God to be the Soul of the world? — although Plato, Timaeus I.2 and 6, seems to maintain that the Soul of the world is produced by God, and placed in the middle of the World. Hence Themistius, as Averroes recites on Metaphysics XII comm. 19, speaking of animals generated from putrefaction, and of the industry and intention of nature, says thus: "It is not wonderful that, although nature does not understand anything of this kind, yet she does this by inducing some intention; and this is shown because something reminds her from the noble causes — as the soul which is in the earth, of which Plato says that it is from the second gods." But this saying of Themistius Averroes consequently rejects, and says that such animals are generated from celestial heat duly measured. And he subjoins: "And this measure proceeds from the divine intellectual art, which is similar to one form of one principal art, under which are several arts. According to this, then, it is to be understood that nature does something perfectly and in order, although it does not understand — as if it were reminded by virtues acting more nobly than those which are called intelligences. And therefore it is said that all proportions and forms which are in potency in first matter are in act in the first mover, and are in some manner assimilated to the being of that which comes to be in the soul of the artificer."

Does not also Avicenna, On the Soul IV.4, say that there is one common soul of Heaven and World, whose operation is for the nature of the whole? This soul, however, according to some, is God; according to others, born or produced by God: whose views are not repugnant to one another, nor to the Catholic truth. For this Soul can be understood as the reason, or the will, the word or the willing of God, by which He effects and preserves things, which by no means differ essentially from God, but are God — by the twenty-sixth part of the first corollary of this work.

Hence Aristotle, On the World 11, says that God in one saying, or by speaking, is to all things the cause of safety, as is recited above. And further, in 14, treating how God produces things, he speaks thus: "He sent forth out of His nourishing heart, working His thoughts" — in another translation, "out of His great soul." With which Hermes, in agreement, On World and Heaven I, teaches that there are three principles of things: namely, Cause, Reason, and Nature. By Cause he understands the first cause simply, in no way caused — namely, God the Father, who first causes the Reason proceeding from Him, namely, the Son, and through Him the universal Nature.

That the Father causes the Son also, and is His eternal cause, Augustine and Chrysostom attest. Wherefore Hermes, where above: "Reason is from Cause, and from both is Nature." And further: "Reason is a certain power proceeding from Cause, ordering all things from the principle." Where also he takes these three — Reason, Nous, and divine mind — indifferently, and as if synonymously, for the same. For he says that Nous is so called of which nature, qualifying things, inserting natural qualities, is said. And further he says that the divine Mind, without any fatigue, does not cease to sustain the world and all things which are within it — as is more fully recited above.

Hence Papias in his Elementarium says: "Nous: the will of God, or the mind which is called providence. It is, however, intelligible essence emulous of goodness, on account of unwearied turning to the supreme God; Noun, that is, the Word of God, containing the original species of things."

Does not also that Platonic statement consonant with this view — which Augustine, Confessions VII.9, recites that he read in the Platonic books translated from Greek into Latin, although not under these words, yet in the same sense — agree? "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He was in the beginning with God: all things were made through Him, and without Him was made nothing that was made. In Him was life." And what Catholic does not know this to be the beginning of the holy Gospel according to John, in the same sentences and words? Wherefore Augustine, City of God X.29: "Learned men ought to be ashamed," he says, "to be made disciples of Christ from disciples of Plato — He who taught the fisherman by His Spirit to know and to say In the beginning was the Word, etc." And he subjoins that this beginning of the holy Gospel which is named according to John, "a certain Platonist — as we used to hear from holy Simplician, who afterwards presided over the Church of Milan as Bishop — said ought to be inscribed in golden letters, and to be set forth in all churches in the most eminent places. But for this reason God, that great Master, was contemned by the proud, because the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us."

But because the rational cause does not act through reason alone, without the concomitance of will, the same philosophers, more zealously meditating, joined to God the first cause, or to God the Father and to His Reason, mind, or Word, the will also. Now will, on the testimony of Augustine, On the Trinity XV.20, by a certain appropriation, is recognized to belong to the Holy Spirit.

Hence the same Hermes, On the Eternal Word 22, speaking of God the Father of all, says thus: "He alone, as if of both sexes most fully fertile, always pregnant with His own will, brings forth always whatever He wills to procreate. His will is goodness, all goodness; this same goodness of all things is born from His divinity." And further, in 23: "I say," he says, "that sense, and nature, and the world contain in them nature, and conserve all born things; for both sexes are full of procreation, and the connection of each — or, what is more true, the comprehensible unity — is what you can rightly call either Cupid or Venus or both. This, then, more truly than every truth, more manifestly perceive in mind: that from that God of all nature, this office of procreating eternally has been found and granted to all, in which the highest charity, gladness of joy, desire, and divine love is innate." Now charity, desire, and love properly belong to the will, which, on the testimony of Augustine, On the Trinity XV.17 and 20, is in some manner properly attributed to the Holy Spirit.

Wherefore Plato, Timaeus I.1: "If anyone should posit the will of God to be the most certain origin of all things, I should rightly agree with him, thinking the same." But this divine will, suited to the Holy Spirit, the same Hermes seems sometimes to call Spirit. For On the Eternal Word 15: "Of these things," he says, "thus far has been treated; but of Spirit and things like these let the beginning be taken from this point. There was God and hyle, which we believe in Greek to be the world. Spirit accompanied the world, or Spirit was in the world, but not similarly as in God; nor was it in God for that reason that the world was not there when they were not, but in Him they then were, whence they had to be born. Now Pan, or the nature of the world, is Spirit, although it appears to be born; from the principle, however, in itself, it possesses the power of being born and procreating, and the nature of fertility. For the beginning is in the quality of nature, which possesses both conception and birth in itself, by force and matter. Therefore, without another conception, it is by itself generable." And further, in 18: "By Spirit all things are administered and quickened in the world, which is, as it were, an instrument or machine subject to the will of the supreme God. By Spirit are agitated, or governed, all the species in the world, each according to its nature distributed to it by God. Now Pan, or the world, is the receptacle and agitation and frequenting of all things, of which God is the governor, dispensing to all things as much as is necessary to each one in worldly things. And by Spirit He fills all things, as the quality of the nature of each is."

Is not this what the Wise One protests, saying: "The Spirit of the Lord hath filled the orb of lands; and that which contains all things" (Wisdom 1)? Furthermore, the same Hermes, On the Eternal Word 28: "The nature of God," he says, "is counsel of the will, supreme goodness; the will is born from counsel, and wills those things which it has; it wills, however, all good things, and has all things which it wills; it both thinks and wills all good things — and this is God; His image is the world of the good." Is not this the view supported by that first of the Twenty-four Definitions of as many Philosophers concerning God: "God is monas, generating monas, reflecting toward Himself the one ardor"? And the seventh, which says thus: "God is principle without principle, process without variation, end without end"?

This view also Porphyry the Philosopher — disciple of Plato, not of Christ — more plainly attests; whom Augustine in City of God X.29, addressing, speaks thus: "Thou preachest the Father and His Son, whom thou callest the paternal Intellect or mind, and the medium of these, whom we think thou callest the Holy Spirit; and after your manner thou callest these three Gods." And above, in 28, disputing with the same: "Ignorance," he says, "and on its account many vices — thou sayest these are purged by no rites, but by the paternal nous alone, that is, the paternal mind or intellect, which is conscious of the paternal will. Yet thou dost not believe this to be Christ."

Now this nous, mind, reason, divine will, or spirit, seems not unfittingly to be called the Soul and life of the world. Hence Hermes, On the Eternal Word 2: "Although it is varied by the manifold equality of images and the infinity of qualities, although species are known to be at intervals, yet they are united, that the whole may be one, that all may seem to be from one. Therefore, the things by which the World has been formed are entirely one — the World one, the Soul one, and God one." And further at the end: "O true life of all life, O fertile pregnancy of all our things; we have known Thee by Thy conception of all nature most fully; we have known Thee, eternal perseverance."

In agreement, the Philosopher in On the World last chapter, treating of the divine Names, says: "We call Him Jupiter and Zena, using parallel names — saying Zena from the Greek (in non-Latin alphabet) zen, which is to live, as if we said: through whom we live. Jupiter, the spirit of all; Jupiter, the unwearied movement of fire."

Josephus also reports, Antiquities of the Jews XII.2, that Aristaeus the Greek said to Ptolemy Philadelphus, King of Egypt: "I have known that the Jews worship as the maker of all things God, whom we name Zena — that is, Jupiter — because He grants to all (in non-Latin alphabet) zen, that is, to live."

To this is consonant Albricius, On the Origin of the Gods, or in his Poetarium, saying that God is called Vituneus, because He grants life; Sentinus, because [He grants] sense — as around the twenty-first part of the first corollary of this work is more fully alleged. Hence Servius, that old and not ignoble commentator, on Virgil's Bucolics, eclogue 3 — "all things are full of Jupiter" — alleges a similar passage from Lucan saying, "Jupiter is whatsoever you see, wherever you move"; and adds that elsewhere the same says:

The Spirit within nourishes, and Mind, infused through the limbs, Stirs the whole mass.

Of which Servius gives the cause there, saying: "He Himself is the Spirit without whom nothing is moved or governed."

In agreement Ovid, in Fasti book VI, says thus:

There is a God in us; we grow warm at His urging; This impulse has the seeds of a sacred mind.

Is not this what the Apostle, disputing with the Athenians concerning God, alleges from the poets and teaches, when he says, "In Him we live and move and are, as also some of your poets have said" (Acts 17)? Let no one therefore, I beg, be angry with me if I sometimes — though most rarely — allege any of the poets, since it is established that the holy Apostle of God did this. Thus also blessed Jerome, Epistle 58 to Magnus, Senator of the city of Rome — who objected to Jerome that he polluted the brightness of the Church with the dirt of the Gentiles, because he inserted in his writings the songs of the poets — excuses himself through the Apostle, saying that the Apostle also alleged poets; and he says that he whom the Apostle alleges in this place was Aratus, the Greek poet.

Arator too, subdeacon of the holy Roman Church, in book II On the Acts of the Apostles, versifying this place, speaks thus:

O love of sacrilegious novelty! we see that ye have placed An altar to an Unknown God — who founded the stars, Who gave sea and lands; whom Life as Father has, That we may move; from whose fire we breathe; Of whom we are the image; concerning whom the poets sang, That from Him stands the race of men; whom I preach: He has Sanctioned all things from His mouth.

This view also Augustine confirms, treating this authority of the Apostle, On Genesis according to the Letter IV.14, recited above. Hence Dionysius, On the Divine Names 6: "Praiseworthy," he says, "is the praiseworthy eternal life, from which by itself is life, and every life, and from which to all things participating life in any way, the proper living of each is ingenerated. Therefore both the life of immortal Angels and immortality, and the imperishability of the always angelic motion, is from itself and through itself, that it subsists. Therefore they are called both ever-living and immortal, and again not immortal — because they do not have from themselves to be immortally and to live eternally, but from the life-giving and the maker of all life and the continuator-cause; and as in onte, that is, in being, we say, because it itself is causal of being; so also there again, because also through itself the divine life of life is the vital and substantial and every life, and the vital motion is from life itself, which is above every life, and every principle of all life. From itself also souls have imperishability, and all animals and germinations have, according to the last consonance of the soul, to live; with which removed, according to the speech, every life fails, and things that fail and pass to the earth, on account of weakness participating in it, are again turned, and again become animals; and there is given indeed first, and through itself, life to be life, and every life — and from it through individuals to be properly, individually estimated, nature subsists."

Who furthermore, above in 1, says that God is the cause and principle and essence and life of all things; and further, in the same place, speaking of God, writes thus: "It is the best tradition and simply to be said, the life of living things and the essence of those which are, the principle and cause of every life and essence, by its active and containing goodness, that they may be what they are. This we have learned from the divine speeches, and you will find that all the sacred hymnody of theologians thus speaks."

Furthermore, all things essentially participating in something necessary, need it. But all beings short of the first are not essentially and purely simply by themselves, in that they participate in the first being, which is purely and essentially by itself. The whole of this appears from the relation of principles and principled, of causes and caused, of beings by themselves and through another, of beings more and less. Which also very many philosophical and theological authors most often attest. For this is, as it were, a kind of general rule, customarily observed both by logicians and philosophers, which no one is ignorant of who diligently considers the writings of the ancients. They very often suppose that everything which is said to be of a certain kind, either is said to be such by essence — and then it is unique — or by participation; and however many participants there are, what is participated by all will be one. Which rule the theologians also embrace.

Hence the venerable Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, Monologion 1, showing that there is some first and supreme good of all, says thus: "It is most certain, and perspicuous to all who are willing to attend, that whatever things are said to be something, in such a way as to be said relatively to one another more or less, or equally — they are said through something, which is not understood as one thing in some and another in others, but the same in diverse, whether considered equally or unequally in those things. For whatever things are said to be just relatively to one another, whether equally or more or less — they cannot be understood as just except through justice, which is not one thing in some and another in others." And he says the same of all various goods: that they are good by some one good which exists the same in diverse, and that it alone is good by itself; and no other good is equal or greater than it; wherefore it itself is the supreme.

The same procedure he makes also in ch. 2 concerning the great; and in ch. 3 concerning being or to be, where he says thus: "Everything which is, either is through something, or through nothing; but nothing is through nothing. For it cannot even be thought that anything is not through something. Whatever is, therefore, is not except through something. Since this is so, either it is one or several, through which all things which are exist. But if there are several, either they themselves are referred to some one through which they are, or those several singly are by themselves, or they themselves are through one another. But if those several are through one, then now all are not through several, but rather through that one through which these several are. But if those several singly are by themselves, then surely there is some one power or nature of existing by themselves, which they have, that they may be by themselves; and there is no doubt that through that one they are, by which they have to be by themselves. Therefore, more truly are all through that one one than through several, since without that one they cannot be. But that several be through one another — no reason allows; since it is an irrational thought that any thing should be through that to which it gives being." A similar procedure also Avicenna makes, Metaphysics I and VIII; and Algazel, Metaphysics II; and Anselm, On Truth last chapter, concerning rectitude and truth likewise.

Which also Augustine holds, On the Trinity VIII.4, where from many inferior goods he argues for one supreme good of all; and, having numbered many goods, he says: "Why several and several? this good and that good? Take away this and take away that, and see the good itself, if you can; thus you will see God, not good by another good, but the Good of every good." And further, in the same place: "Mutable goods would not be," he says, "unless there were an unchangeable good. Therefore, when you hear this good and that good, which can otherwise be called even non-goods, if you could — putting aside those which are good by participation in good — perceive the good itself, by participation in which goods are good, you would also at the same time understand it itself, when you hear this or that good. If, therefore, having put aside those, you could behold by itself the good, you will have beheld God." And in City of God VIII.6: "Since in the sight of philosophers body and mind, more or less beautiful, were beautiful — they saw that there was something where there was the first and unchangeable beauty, and therefore not comparable; and that there was the principle of things — they most rightly believed."

Aristotle too, Metaphysics IV.18, from the fact that some things are less and more false and true than others, proves that there is one true simply; whom Anselm, Monologion 4, most rightly imitates. And Augustine holds the same in many other places. This view also Dionysius, On the Divine Names, in many chapters, Boethius, On the Hebdomads, and many other authors in many places profess — as also the things premised here and in book I a little attest.

Furthermore, being is in matter, in form, and in the composite; in substance, and in accident; and not first simply, or not equally first, nor equally is it in them. Therefore in some one thing first and most greatly, by which existing in the rest, it is in them. But this cannot be posited unless it be that which first and through itself is — and this is God. The whole of this is clearly shown by the things premised in the proximate argument. Hence the Philosopher, On the Soul II.68, says: "For not water inasmuch as it is water, nor air inasmuch as it is air, is diaphanous; but because the same nature is in both these, and in the perpetual superior body — namely, Heaven." Where Averroes: "Not inasmuch as it is air etc., that is, because diaphaneity is not in water alone or in air, but in the celestial body, it was necessary that diaphaneity should not be in any of these, inasmuch as it is what it is, but according to the common nature existing in all, although it has not a name."

This same is confirmed by the same Philosopher, Posterior Analytics I.4 and 5, and II.4 and 5, teaching that whatever passion is in many diverse things, has some one subject or cause to which it belongs first, and through it or through her in the rest in which it is — as having three angles equal to two right angles, having horns, contrary or contrary states, the falling of leaves, mutually proportional. And he shows this of all others, whether they be substantial or accidental, whether univocal, analogical, or equivocal — which whole Robert Lincolniensis more elucidates by expounding.

It will perhaps be said that that cause of diverse things in diverse things is one in genus or in species, but in number not at all. But if causes numerically differing be similar in nature and name — either each of them is such by itself, primarily, and essentially, or through another secondarily and by participation, etc., as above in the proximate argument. Others perhaps will say that that one cause of diverse things in diverse things is the universal. But if a universal be something short of God, it seems that there is one universal of men, another of asses, and others of others. Therefore those universals are many, agreeing in nature and name, etc. — as against the prior reply. Yet this is not improbably posited, if by universal be understood some universal reason, or divine power unitive of all such things.

Hence Psalm 32: "By the spirit of His mouth, all the power of them"; and Aristotle, On the World 10: "The whole earth and sea, and ether, and the Sun and Moon, and the whole heaven, was adorned by one virtue passing through all." Now this virtue, unitive of all things, is God — "tenacious vigor" — and that principal Unity, which we beseech with the song of praises in hymn-form, whose principality Boethius shows in Arithmetic I.6, whose title On the Principality of Unity is prefixed.

Hence Avicbron, in the book which he names Fount of Life, in ch. 35 of book V, says thus: "All things at all diverse and divided, both in superior and in inferior — namely, individuals, species, genera, differences, properties, and accidents, and at all opposite and contrary — are moved to conjunction, and desire agreement, and seek union; for although they are divided, they are conjoined; and although diverse, they agree in something which retains them and conjoins them and makes them agree. And the root of all this is in this: that unity overcomes all things, and is diffused in all, and is the retainer of all."

In agreement, Proclus the Philosopher, in proposition 1, says thus: "Every multitude in some way participates in the One"; and in proposition 14: "Every good is unitive of those participating in it; and every unition is good; and good and one are the same." This unity, unitive of all, the saying of Hermes, On the Eternal Word 2, recited above, attests; who also further, in 14, speaking of celestial, terrestrial, and intermediate things: "Of all these," he says, "knowing the effects and nature, let one wonder, adore, and praise the divine art and Mind. To know music is nothing other than to know the order of all the things joined — what each is, allotted by divine reason. For the order of singular things into one, gathered by the reason of the artificer of all, will produce a certain consonance most sweet and most true with divine melody."

Dionysius, moreover, On the Divine Names 1: "In nearly every theological action," he says, "we see thearchy divinely praised, and the monas and the one — on account of the simplicity and unity of the supernatural impartibility, by which, as by a vivifying power, we are united, and our partitive othernesses being supermundanely complicated, we are gathered into the deiform Monad." And further, in 5, he says that being-itself-by-itself is the principle of existing things, and all existences, and whatever in any way is contained by being — and this immeasurably, and convolutedly, and unitedly. "For in the monas every number pre-subsis, and the Monas has every number in itself singularly; and every number is united in the Monas, but as much as it proceeds from the Monas, so much is it discerned and multiplied. And in the center, all the lines of the circle stand constituted according to the first unity, and the sign in itself has all uniformly united to itself and to the one principle from which they proceeded; and in the center itself they are universally united, but a little distant from it, they are a little discerned; receding more, more; and simply, the closer they are to the center, the more they themselves and to one another are united; and the more from it, so much they are distant from one another. And in the whole nature of all things, all the natures of singulars are convoluted, by one unconfused unity."

And further below, last chapter, treating of the One — namely, how the One belongs to God — he writes thus: "One, however, because He is universally all, by the excellence of one unity, and is irreversibly causal of all of one. For there is no existing thing not participating in one. But just as every number similar participates in monas and in one, and is called two and ten, and half, and one, and third, and tenth: one and multitude is terminated. Thus all things, and all of one, participate, and being one, all things are existences; and the cause of all is not one of many one, but before every one. For there is no multitude not participating in something of the one; and nothing of existing things which participates in or is something of the one downward — all singularly all things, and the whole all things, and opposites, and universally comprehending; and indeed without one there will not be multitude, but without multitude there will be one — as monas is before every multiplied number — and if anyone shall posit all things united to all, all things will be wholly one. But thus and this is to be known, because according to one of each thing, the species is preconceived; the united things are said to unite, and there is one exemplar of all; and if you should remove the one, there will be neither universe nor anything else of existing things. For all things in itself the One uniformly preambles and circumcomprehends." Theology itself, then, [praises] the whole Thearchy.

Boethius too, Consolation of Philosophy III, prose 11, proves through individual genera of beings, inductively, that all things desire unity. He says, then, concluding: "All things, therefore, desire unity. But unity itself, we have shown, is what is good. All things, then, seek good — which indeed you may so describe: that which is desired by all. For either all things are referred to nothing, and as if destitute of one summit, will float without a ruler; or, if there is anything to which the universe hastens, it will be the highest of all goods."

And as many multitudes are thus united, so many such unities of multitudes, unitively and virtually, are in God — out of which indeed the exemplary and archetypal number is, in this most simple unity, in a wonderful manner gathered, by which He forms, numbers, and disposes the rest of the numbered. And this is that intelligible and archetypal world of Hermes and Plato, of which the 40th part of the first corollary touches.

Hence Boethius, Arithmetic I.1: "Whatever things have been constructed by the primeval nature of things, are seen to have been formed according to the reason of numbers. For this was the chief exemplar in the mind of the founder. Hence the multitude of the four elements is borrowed; hence the changes of times; hence the motions of the stars and the conversion of the heaven." And above, in the same prologue 2, he holds this same most fully. This luminous saying of Boethius, however, seems to be taken from the obscure words of the first part of Plato's Timaeus, ch. 1, which Chalcidius in his commentary I, On the Generation of the World, entitles. Hence Eustratius, on Ethics I.6, comm. 48, says that the universal exemplars and ideas with Plato are indeed the divine number, by which, as by an exemplar, the founder works the material making; and this view of Plato against Aristotle he approves and defends. Nay, perhaps Plato in this view Aristotle did not wish to reprove. Therefore Eustratius says: "Aristotle perhaps did not wish to oppose Plato, but those who receive his sayings according to what is not fitting."

In agreement, the Wise One says, addressing God: "Thou hast disposed all things in measure, number, and weight" (Wisdom 11). Which number, it is established, is not any creature, but that "manifold, unique, and subtle Spirit of Wisdom" (Wisdom 7) — nay, even Wisdom itself, in which all things were made (Psalm 103). Hence Augustine, On Free Will II.19: "Far be it that wisdom be found inferior in comparison to number, since the same it is." And On Genesis according to the Letter IV.5, expounding the authority of the Wise One adduced, he says thus: "According to that by which measure prefigures to every thing its mode, and number bestows on every thing its species, and weight draws every thing to rest and stability — He primarily and truly and uniquely is who terminates, forms, and orders all." And further, in the same place 6: "Number without number, by which all things are formed, but is itself not formed."

Now of this kind, the unities of number are the proper reasons in the divine mind — creators, nurses, and continuous preservers of all things. And these perhaps are the universals which very many of the ancients dreamed about, but very few saw. Wherefore Porphyry, in his Prologue to the Isagoge, as if it were the highest, convolutes this view but does not unfold it; which view, however, is plain from what has gone before evidently. Hence Eustratius, where above, says that universal exemplars or ideas are the founding reasons, and as it were the markings of the Maker. Robert Lincolniensis too, on Posterior Analytics I.7, says that universals are the cognitions of things to be created, which were eternally in the first cause; and they are their reasons and formal and exemplary causes; and they themselves are also creative; and these are what Plato called ideas, and the archetypal world; and these, according to him, are the genera and species and principles both of being and of knowing. The same Augustine also holds, in Eighty-three Questions 46, in his epistle to Nebridius, manifestly.

Item: if universals be posited in the intellect — as Averroes, Boethius, and many others seem to hold — in what intellect more worthily would they be posited than in the first, supreme, and most worthy intellect of all, who most truly understands the universe, who, while others sleep, watches eternally?

Furthermore, it is certainly established that there are some preserving causes of beings, and preservers of existing things, in which (as the second supposition teaches) the process is not allowed to be infinite. Of all those causes, then, there is some first and supreme; this, it is established, must necessarily be God, who (as the first supposition and the fifth part of the first corollary attest) is conserved by no other. God, then, is the first and supreme conservator of all. Either, then, this is by itself or by accident. If by itself, then necessarily; for by itself includes necessity. For if it were not necessarily, it could not be, and so it would be by accident — which is plain from the logical definition of accident, sufficiently known from the Isagoge of Porphyry and Topics I of Aristotle. This is also sufficiently plain from Posterior Analytics I.4 and 6, and II.4, where by itself with its conditions is defined.

But if this is said to be by accident — every per accidens is posterior to that which is by itself; and therefore that God is the conservator of all is reduced to it — then that God is the conservator of all is reduced to something prior to Him, by whose virtue He does this. Therefore, not God, but rather that prior thing, would be the first conservator of all.

That every per accidens is reduced to something per se prior, appears: for as substance naturally precedes every accident, and to it any accident is reduced as to a prior cause, so by similar argument or by proportionality, the essential seems to precede every accidental, and every of these is reduced to that.

Item, every caused thing, as it has a determined mode of being, so it seems to have a determined cause of becoming and of being; for otherwise it would no more become or be this rather than that. But the accidental is altogether infinite and indeterminate, as is plain from Physics II, ch. On Chance and Fortune, almost throughout; and Metaphysics VI.4, and afterward at length, where Averroes says, comm. 7: "What comes to be by chance has, from the principle, a terminated nature and a terminated cause; for what is by accident, accidentally happens to that which is by essence."

This is likewise confirmed: something is per se conservative of beings, conserving itself; and that which is by accident is not the principle of that which is per se, but rather the contrary. For what is from that which is by accident is simply by accident — as what is from something by chance is simply by chance. This appears from the Philosopher, Physics II.44, refuting those who hold chance to be the cause of the heavens and of all celestial things, by this: that then all inferior things would be by chance. For Averroes says: "Since they posited that chance and fortune was the cause of the renewal of the celestial body, and of the motion which gives to other beings their order, it happens for them that all causes be found by chance; for what is found in that which is found by chance, is found by chance." Otherwise, also, there could be science of beings per accidens; for of all things ordered per se, there can be science. Which is against the Philosopher, Physics II, ch. On Chance and Fortune, at length proving that such things are not knowable, nor certain, because they are accidental causes, and consequently infinite. And in Metaphysics VI.4: "Of being according to accident, there is no speculation; for no science, neither active nor productive, is studious of it; nor theological" — which the whole following process teaches. And in Posterior Analytics I.6 the same is shown manifestly.

Furthermore, what is more perfect is to be attributed to God, as appears from the first supposition and the third part of the first [corollary]. But to be per se is more perfect than to be by accident, as no one is ignorant; nor otherwise would God be by Himself good and powerful. God, then, by Himself, not by accident, is the first conserver of all.

Item, in the whole genus of conservers, some one is conserver per se and naturally first; and that which is per se and naturally first in any genus is greater, more worthy, and better than any posterior. For the Philosopher says, Metaphysics II.10: "Always the prior is more; and that which is posterior, is not." Where the text which Averroes has speaks thus: "The prior is always more worthy in being; the posterior, however, is not so." Who also, Metaphysics XII.37: "The best is always — the proportional to the first; wherefore the Pythagoreans posited the first in the elementation of good, and the last in the elementation of evil" — as the demonstration of the eighteenth part of the first corollary touches. Again, to the same point: in any genus the first is most highly such, as is sufficiently plain from Metaphysics II and X — as that which is equal by itself is more such than that which is such by accident. As is manifestly plain from the Philosopher, Topics III; nor does anyone deny it.

Furthermore, if this is by accident, it can not-be; for everything that inheres in something not per se and essentially, but only accidentally, can be separated from it (separately); for this includes no contradiction. And because anything of beings sufficiently exists when it has all and only those things which are required for its existing per se and essentially — since then nothing is lacking to its existence. This is also plain from the proper definition of accident; and Posterior Analytics I.6 is written thus: "Everything, however, is either thus per se in the first or second mode, or by accident; but accidents are not necessary." And it is confirmed by the Philosopher, Physics VIII.36, proving that not every mover is moved, because not per se nor by accident: not by accident, because, he says, "if according to accident, it is not necessary that what is moved be moved. But if this is manifest, that sometimes it happens that nothing of those things which are moved — for the accidental is not necessary, but it happens that it not be" — which is plain there from Averroes more expressly in the comment.

If anyone, however, fears not to concede that, with things existing, God can not be their conserver, he is easily refuted. For the antecedent and the consequents are necessary in the argument by which, through the finiteness of things and their conservation, it is proved that some one — who is God — is the first conserver of all; wherefore the conclusion is established by like necessity.

Item, if things could exist by themselves without divine conservation, they would be conserved by God in vain, according to that maxim of the Philosophers: "More are vainly posited where fewer suffice"; but, according to the Philosopher, On the Heavens I.32: "God and Nature do nothing in vain." As also the Apostle argues, Galatians 2: "If by the law," he says, "justice, then Christ died gratis"; where the Gloss of Augustine: "If by the law, that is, by the works of the law, in which the Jews trusted, justice is — then Christ died gratis, that is, in vain, without cause." Therefore God is the necessary conserver of all beings.

Of this view a witness also is Thomas Aquinas, who in his Questions on the Power of God, q. 35, manifoldly shows this; and in q. 36 he asks whether God could communicate to any creature that, by itself, it should be conserved in being without God; and he answers under the words which follow:

"It must be said that it does not pertain to the omnipotence of God that He could make two contradictories be at the same time. But in this — that it is said that God should make something which does not need His conservation — a contradiction is implied. For it has now been shown that every effect depends on its cause, in that it is its cause. In this, therefore, when it is said that it does not need God's conservation, it is posited as not caused by God; and in this, when it is said that God should make it, it is posited as caused. Just as, then, it would imply contradiction if anyone should say God makes something which is not caused by Him — so if anyone should say God makes something which does not need His conservation. Hence both, by like reason, God cannot."

COROLLARY

From all these things, then, the principal conclusion is manifest. Whence, not unmanifestly, this porisma follows: No created thing suffices to conserve another; and it is necessary that God by Himself and immediately preserve every creature; nay, more immediately than any created cause — immediately, I say, not only by immediacy of place or position, but of nature and cause, and more immediately by the same modes, or at least by the two last said modes.

1. That no created thing suffices to conserve another.

For if, as the principal conclusion says, God is the necessary conserver of all beings, every created thing necessarily needs divine conservation; therefore no such thing suffices to conserve another.

2. The second is, that it is necessary that God by Himself and immediately preserve every creature.

That God also by Himself and immediately conserves every creature, the foregoing reasonings will evidently show, if they be duly applied to this. For everything potential of itself, if it must be actuated, this will necessarily be by some act, not immediately exteriorly, but actuating and forming altogether interiorly, and diffused through the whole — as appears of matter and form, of accident and subject. That act, then, thus actuating a potential of this kind, either is an act per se pure, actuated by no other at all — and then it is God, and we have what we intend; or it is not an act of this kind, and then that act is of itself potential, necessarily needing another act actuating it immediately. And since, on account of the second supposition, it is not allowed thus to proceed to infinity, finally there will necessarily come to one act per se pure, actuated by no other at all, which actuates and informs every potential of itself posited under act, by itself and immediately — not only by exterior surrounding, but by interior totally penetrating. And anything short of God is potential of itself; God alone is act per se and pure, as the things premised attest.

Item: everything fluxible and formless of itself, in order that it be fixed stably and formed, necessarily needs some fixation and form fixing and forming it immediately. Such a fixation or form, then, either is per se fixed or fixation, formed or form — and then it is God, and we have what we intend; or it is not such, and then necessarily it is immediately fixed and formed by some fixation and form. And since the second supposition does not allow such an infinite process, necessarily one will finally stop at one fixation and form per se and pure, fixed and formed by no other in any way — and this is the disposition of all creatures and of God.

These reasons sufficiently agree with the philosophical and theological authorities recited above.

Item: if it sufficed to any creature to be conserved by God only mediately — namely, only by means of another creature — since that conserving creature would only influence a finite virtue into the conserved creature, God could create some creature of permanence so much more powerful than the creature conserved through another, by however much of virtue that conserving one influences into the conserved. Which, if it be posited as created, will not need the conservation of any creature; for it is of permanence so much more powerful from itself, by however much, if it were weaker, it would need to be strengthened by another creature. Nor will it need the mediate conservation of God, because that would be done through a mediating creature; therefore it would need the conservation of the mediating creature — against the proximate point shown. Nor will it need the immediate conservation of God, because the weaker creature did not need this either. There would be, therefore, some creature not needing any conservation of the Creator — which the premised conclusion does not permit.

Nay, according to this, God could only strengthen the things of the world, and create this whole world, or another world, both as a whole and according to its single parts, so strong that in no way — neither mediately, nor as a whole, nor in part — would it need divine conservation. Nay, even with God altogether removed by imagination, it would remain sound and entire — which the premises destroy evidently.

Item: as God is everywhere, so He conserves everywhere; but God is per se and essentially everywhere. For if not, either He is nowhere — which no one not denies; or He is somewhere circumscribed — which contradicts His infinity and immensity in every way, which the first supposition teaches, as also certain authorities premised attest. For the first supposition, the third part, and the fourth of the first corollary of this work teach that whatever is of most perfect and most infinite goodness or perfection is in God; but it is of great perfection to be able to be in many places presentially whole at once. Wherefore spirits, who can do this, are judged more perfect than bodies, which cannot. The supreme Spirit, therefore, on account of His infinite simple perfection, is necessarily of replenishing power and presence simply infinite and immense; wherefore He is necessarily presentially present to all places and positions located and placed, essentially filling all things — great above all their measure, and immense — that, just as He is truly called Omnipotent, so He may truly be called Omnipresent. And this, I think, is the reason of holy Scripture and of the Doctors, by which they show the immensity of God. Hence, that I may commemorate one of many: Baruch 3 says: "O Israel, how great is the house of God, and how vast is the place of His possession; great, and having no end; lofty and immense."

If God were anywhere circumscribed, this would most appear in Heaven, since it is the most worthy of places — and further, in the most worthy part of Heaven, or at the most worthy point of Heaven; and then, with Heaven moved, He would likewise be moved — against the sixth part of the first corollary of this work. Otherwise He would sometimes leave a worthier part or point of Heaven, and enter a less worthy. But if it be said, according to the surface of On the Heavens II of Aristotle, that God is continually in one most noble position — namely, in the East, in the section of two great circles — this cannot stand, because: why would He be in the East of Oxford rather than in the East of London, or of Cadiz of Hercules, or vice versa? And if it be said that He is continually in the East of the whole habitable earth, in some section of the Amphitrite or Ocean — since, according to the natural disposition of heaven and earth, and according to the same Aristotle, Meteorology II — where now there is sea, there will be at some time dry land, and vice versa — there will be some other East of the whole habitable earth which then will be; and then either God will be only in that, and it follows that He is locally moved from one East to another East; or then He will not be in the said East — therefore, by the same reason, neither now is He.

Also, if God be put only in the East, He will not be in the most worthy place, since the middle of the heaven, and the center of the Sun, of Saturn, or of Jupiter, is a more worthy place or position. Item: if God were only in one particular place or position, He could leave that and enter another, and be moved locally.

By this also — that God everywhere acts and conserves — the authors prove that He is everywhere in three ways: namely, essentially, presentially, and potentially, as is plain from Sentences I of Peter, dist. 37 — which, however, by no means would follow, unless God immediately made and preserved all things. Hence Anselm, Monologion 13, speaks thus: "Since otherwise it cannot be that those things which have been made are vigorous, unless that also from which they have been made is vigorous by itself, it is necessary that, just as nothing has been made except through the present creative Essence, so nothing is vigorous except through the conserving presence of the same." And he adds, in 14, consequently: "If this is so — nay, since by necessity it is so — it follows that wherever it is not, nothing is. It is therefore everywhere, and through all, and in all. It is plain, therefore, that itself is what bears all and surpasses all, encloses and penetrates; and the same is what is in all, and through all, and from which, and through which, and in which all things" — as had been more fully alleged above, and was set forth in the seventh chapter of the same work.

"There is no need to ask whether the universe therefore exists through that supreme substance, because, with another making, or with another matter existing, it has only in some manner aided as much as possible that all things should be — since it is repugnant to those things which now appear, if in the second place, and not principally, all whatsoever exists is through it." Augustine too, On the Divine Essence of God's Divinity I, having shown by Scripture that God is uncircumscribed, immutable, and immense, subjoins: "Without doubt no place is absent from His presence; above every creature He presides, ruling; below, sustaining all things — not by the weight of labor, but by indefatigable power; for no creature founded by Him is able to subsist of itself, unless it be sustained by Him who created it. He is outside all things, but not excluded; within all, but not enclosed."

Lo, the causal argument of Augustine, proving God to be everywhere — because, he says, no creature can subsist unless it be sustained by Him — who also in Epistle 39, which is On the Presence of God to Dardanus, makes a diffuse process to the same end, where among other things he says thus: "Thus is God diffused through all, that He is not as a quality of the World, but as the substance creating the World, ruling without labor, and containing the World without burden." And in On Genesis according to the Letter VI.33 he shows that God is immutable through time and place, although He administers and moves mobiles through time and place, since, he says, "He Himself, by no place, by no interval or space, by an unchangeable and excelling power, is both interior to every thing — because in Him are all things — and exterior to every thing, because He is above all things." Which reasoning, however, would not avail unless God by Himself and immediately administers and moves the universe. For if God by Himself is exterior and interior to every thing whatever, and so moves things moved, it is manifest that, when He moves anything locally, it does not follow that He Himself is locally moved with it, because He is in every place present.

Nor can anyone say that for this reason it is said only improperly that God is everywhere essentially, presentially, and potentially — because every essence existing in any place, and universally every place, has being from Him; and because all things located, and the places themselves, are present to Him — namely, to His knowledge — and subject to His power — since this fiction is destroyed by the prior arguments, and condemned in Sentences I of Lombard, dist. 37.

Item, if God preserves something — say, the earth — only mediately, since He immediately conserves some creature, and by the same reasoning, if He willed, He could immediately preserve the earth, then in its most natural place He could be moved locally to the earth so to be preserved — which is repugnant to what was premised. Item, if God only mediately conserved some things, this would most seem of these inferior things — that He should preserve them by means of the celestial body. But the rational soul is of itself of as much permanence and greater than the celestial body; therefore by no means is it naturally conserved by it. For natural order requires that the weaker be conserved by the stronger.

The same the authorities also show. For the Philosopher says in On the World 8: "The whole earth and sea, and ether, and the Sun and Moon, and the whole Heaven, was adorned by one virtue passing through all." Ammonius the Armenian also, in his Commentary on Aristotle's On Interpretation, on the last part of book I, says: "It was more probable that eternal things should not be ruled by providence than those which have a fluxible nature; for the former indeed have determination from their own nature, and immutability of such an existence allotted to them by the gods. But those which are in generation, on account of the fluxibility of their proper matter, born to come about in every change — neither to be, nor to be contained, nor to be ordered — could not be, unless they were allotted much constituting and providential power of those things which always behave in the same way: not only the more total and supereminent, namely, the celestial body, but also some more particular and proximate. Just as, of men, women seem to need fuller care than men, and the senseless than the wise."

And Avicenna, in Fount of Life V.35, as was alleged above, showing that all diverse, contrary, superior and inferior things are conjoined by unity, says thus: "And the common root in this is in this: that unity overcomes all things, and is diffused in all and is the retainer of all." And further, in 36, he says: "The Word, namely, the will, after it had created matter and form, bound itself with them as is the binding of the soul with the body, and poured itself into them, and did not depart from them, and penetrates them from highest to lowest." And further, in 38, he says thus: "To describe will is impossible; but it is almost described when it is said that it is the divine virtue making matter and form, and binding them, and diffused from the highest to the lowest, like the diffusion of the soul in the body. And it itself is moving and disposing all things." Which he also manifests by example, saying thus: "Matter and form is as body and air; and the soul and will binding them and infused in them is as the soul in the body, light in air, and intelligence in the soul." And the mode of such infusion he shows thus: "Since the will is a spiritual virtue — but much more excellent than spiritual — doubt not that it is infused into matter and embraces it together with the form, like the penetration of the virtue of the sun (that is, the virtue diffusing light) and its union with light in air. The will, then, will be as virtue, and form as light, and matter as air." And in 39 he says: "The will penetrates all things without motion, and acts all things without time, on account of its great fortitude and unity."

To which the sacred authorities agree. For Wisdom 1: "The Spirit of the Lord hath filled the orb of lands; and that which contains all things"; and further, in 8, it is read of uncreated wisdom that "it reacheth from end to end mightily, and disposeth all things sweetly." Of which Ecclesiasticus 1 says that "the most high Creator poured it out upon all His works"; and Isaiah 66: "Heaven is My throne, and earth My footstool." Of whom Jeremiah 23 says more expressly: "Do I not fill heaven and earth, saith the Lord?" Hence the Prophet, Psalm 138: "Whither shall I go from Thy spirit, and whither shall I flee from Thy face? If I ascend into heaven, Thou art there; if I descend into hell, Thou art present. If I take my wings early in the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea — even there shall Thy hand lead me, and Thy right hand shall hold me." Blessed Job, also, in 11 says: "He is higher than heaven, and what wilt thou do? Deeper than hell, and how wilt thou know? The measure of Him is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea." And in 22 he recites the false madness of heretics in these words: "The clouds are His covert, and He doth not consider our things, and He walketh about the poles of heaven."

Whereon blessed Gregory, Moralia XVI.4, says: "Who, even among the foolish, would suppose this concerning God, who, while He is always omnipotent, so attends to all things that He is present to each, so is present to each that at the same time He is never absent from all? Thus, then, He surrounds exterior things, that He fills interior things; thus He fills interior things, that He surrounds exterior; thus He rules the highest, that He does not desert the lowest; thus He is present to the lowest, that He does not recede from the higher."

Holy Thomas, also, in On the Christian Religion to Reginald, or On Faith, Hope, and Charity 133, says that God immediately ordains all effects through Himself, although He executes them through middle causes; but in the very execution He has Himself in some manner immediately to all effects, inasmuch as all middle causes act in the virtue of the first cause, so that in some manner He Himself seems to act in all, and all the works of secondary causes can be attributed to Him — as the work of the instrument is attributed to the artificer. For it is more fittingly said that the smith makes the knife than that the hammer does. He has Himself also immediately to all effects, inasmuch as He Himself is per se the cause of being, and all things are preserved in being by Him.

The same too, in his Questions on the Power of God, q. 20, where it is asked whether God works in every operation of nature, in answering proves that God is the cause of every natural and voluntary action in six modes:

First, because He bestows the virtue of acting — as it is said in Physics VIII, that the generator moves the heavy and the light inasmuch as it gives the virtue by which such motion follows.

Secondly, because He continually conserves it.

Thirdly, because He moves any agent to acting, and applies the virtue to the action — as a man is the cause of the cutting of the knife. And this is, as he says, because no thing moves by itself, except a mover not moved. Therefore it follows of necessity that God is the cause of the action of any natural thing, as moving and applying virtue to acting.

Fourthly, because He is the principal agent in any action, and any other agent is His instrument, since by His virtue every other virtue acts. And a little after he subjoins: "Thus, then, God is the cause of every action, inasmuch as He gives the virtue of acting, and inasmuch as He preserves it, and inasmuch as He applies action, and inasmuch as by His virtue every other virtue acts. And when we have joined to these that God is His own virtue, and that He is within any thing — not as a part of essence, but as holding the thing in being — it will follow that He immediately operates in any operating thing, with the operation of will and nature not excluded." Hence can be elicited a fifth mode, namely, that God immediately operates everywhere.

Which is also most clearly plain through Lord Stephen, Bishop of Paris, condemning a certain article under this form: "That the first cause is the most distant cause of beings — error, if it be understood with precision, namely, that He is not also most proximate."

3. The third part: that it is necessary that God preserve every creature more immediately than any created cause.

God, then, immediately conserves every thing — and not only immediately, but truly more immediately than any other conserving thing. For if He did not conserve more immediately, since He conserves immediately, then either He conserves equally immediately as the secondary cause conserving, or less immediately than it.

Not equally immediately, because God and the secondary conserving cause are essentially ordered conservative causes of the same thing; and no such causes — and most of all in the same genus of cause — have the same order to their caused; but it is necessary that one be prior, the other posterior in that mode of causing — as reason and philosophy attest. For otherwise, by the same reasoning by which there could be two proximate causes of the same caused thing, equal in order, there could also be two other higher equally co-equal, and so successively. Wherefore there could be two first causes simply, in the same order of causing altogether co-equal; and two first principles simply, and two Gods — although yet all many things in any way ordered to some one are necessarily reduced — as has been manifested in book I, and in book II, where premised.

The Philosopher also teaches in his Metaphysics that of any two such causes attributed to the same, one is reduced to the other, or both to a third. Since, then, God and the secondary cause are co-equal causes in the order of conserving, neither is reduced to the other as the proximate to the conserved more remote one; therefore both are reduced to some third prior to both, by whose virtue both conserve — which is impossible of God, as the preceding things have taught, and the suppositions show. But if it be feigned that God and the secondary cause be conservative causes of the same thing accidentally ordered, then much more either one is reduced to the other, or both to a third essential prior — as has been shown above.

Item, every name belonging to God and to a creature more perfectly belongs to God Himself, especially since He Himself is the first in such a genus; and that is the cause why that name is said of all others whatsoever, according to the procedure of the Philosopher in Metaphysics II and X, alleged above. Therefore the name immediately conserving most and most perfectly belongs to God Himself. Wherefore God conserves more immediately than any other conserving thing. Therefore not equally immediately, nor less.

Furthermore, if God conserved less immediately, and consequently so caused the conserved and the caused thing of the secondary cause than it itself does, He would not be the most proximate cause of beings — which is condemned in the Parisian article premised: most proximate, namely, by proximity of causality and nature, not only of position or place. Then, also, God would be more distant in the conservation and causation than the secondary cause; therefore through more means, or at least through some mean, while the secondary cause through none. Therefore God would by no means immediately preserve, nor cause that, the opposite of which has been shown.

Item, every secondary cause, causing or conserving any caused thing, does this through the mediating causation or conservation between them — which therefore is naturally more proximate to the caused or conserved than that secondary cause. But God conserves through Himself and immediately every causation or conservation of this kind, as the proximate part of this corollary teaches; and He couples and conjoins this with the caused or conserved, as the things premised manifest. Therefore between the secondary cause and every caused thing of it, God naturally mediates, by causing it more immediately.

Item, the more essential and more necessary cause in the being of the caused is naturally more proximate to it. But God is a more essential and more necessary cause in the causation of any caused thing than any secondary cause. For there cannot be an equally or less essential cause of any caused thing as or than the secondary cause, as the premised process of equally immediately or less shows.

Furthermore, that which by itself and by its proper virtue is anything is more essentially and more such than anything which by another and by another's virtue is such — as both logic and philosophy teach in various places, and as was touched above. The first cause causes the common caused by its proper virtue and through itself; the secondary cause, however, by the virtue of the first cause and through it. Therefore the first cause more essentially and more so.

Wherefore the first cause is more proximate, more conjoined, and more intimate to the caused than its matter or form, or any secondary cause. Therefore it is more proximate, more conjoined, more intimate, and more immediate to any created thing than any created thing could be to another. Wherefore also, in any causation of any created or secondary cause, of any caused thing in any way causing, the first cause more proximately, more conjointly, more intimately, and more immediately causes the same.

Hence the Commentator, on this first proposition of the Liber de Causis — "Every primary cause is more influential upon its caused than the secondary universal cause" — speaks thus: "The universal first cause acts upon the caused of its cause before the universal secondary cause, which follows it, acts upon it." And further: "It is manifest that the first long-distant cause is more comprehending and more vehemently the cause of the thing than the proximate one; and on this account its operation comes to be of more vehement adherence than that of the proximate cause. And this indeed is not so, except because the thing first does not suffer except from the long-distant virtue; then it suffers secondly from the virtue which is under the first; and the first aids the second over its operation, since every operation which the second cause effects, the first effects there — yet effects it in another higher and more sublime manner. And when the secondary cause is removed from its caused, the first cause is not removed from it; for the first cause is of greater and more vehement adherence with the thing than the proximate cause."

Item, holy Thomas in his Questions on the Power of God, q. 20, where it is asked whether God operates in every operation of nature, in answering, among other things, says thus: "God is the cause of every action, inasmuch as any agent is the instrument of the divine virtue operating. Thus, therefore, if we consider supposita acting, any particular agent is immediate to its effect; but if we consider the virtue by which the action is done, thus the virtue of the higher cause will be more immediate to the effect than the virtue of the lower. For the lower virtue is not joined to the effect except by the virtue of the higher cause. Hence it is said in the Liber de Causis that the virtue of the first cause acts before upon the caused, and enters more vehemently into it. Thus, therefore, the divine virtue must be present to any acting thing, just as the virtue of the celestial body must be present to any acting elemental body. But in this they differ, that wherever the divine virtue is, there is the divine essence; the essence of the celestial body, however, is not wherever its virtue is. And again, God is His virtue, but the celestial body is not. And therefore it can be said that God in any thing operates, inasmuch as any thing needs His virtue for acting. It cannot, however, properly be said that the heaven always acts in the elemental body, although by its virtue the elemental body acts."

Hence, beyond the five modes of divine operation premised, a sixth mode can be elicited: namely, that God, in any operation, more immediately operates than any other operating thing.

Wherefore the Philosopher, On the World, last chapter, speaking of God, speaks thus: "Since He is one many-named, named from all the passions which He Himself newly produces — we call Him Jupiter; He is also called fulminous from the lightning, pluvial from the rain, thunderous, tempestuous, serene" — and it follows consequently — "and to speak summarily, He is to be called celestial and terrestrial, by every nature and fortune, as Himself the cause of all things. On account of which, it is not badly said in the Orphica: Jupiter is the firstborn; Jupiter is the last; Jupiter is the head; Jupiter is the middle."

Lo, how the Philosopher first teaches that God is generally the cause of all things; secondly he shows that He is specially the threefold cause of any whatsoever — namely, the first, the last or final, and the middle. Jupiter is the firstborn and head, for the first cause; Jupiter is the last, for the last or final cause; Jupiter is the middle, for the middle cause of any whatsoever. Therefore he expressly subjoins: "God therefore, as ancient speech testifies, has the beginning, the middle, and the end of all beings." God, therefore, according to the Philosopher, in any way of causing any caused thing of any secondary cause, is in causing prior, posterior, and more immediate in every way.

Hence Dionysius, On the Divine Names 5, says that He is "the substantifying principle, mean, and consummation of all existing things." Which also the authorities premised, saying that God is more interior to every thing, seem to sound. Nor am I ignorant of the responses of certain ones who feign — or who can feign — that the authors do not therefore say that God conserves all things, because immediately by Himself and properly preserves them, but only by means of Heaven, or some other thing, and through it; or because He prohibits corruptive things; or because He permits the thing to be, or does not destroy the thing when He could. But all these false madneses, which vanity has feigned, the truth of the foregoing will easily shatter.

Some, however, object: It does not seem consonant with reason that any created thing — finite, small, and so tiny — should need so great a form and so great a conserver, simply infinite. Others object differently: If God is omnipotent, He can make something able to exist sufficiently by itself. Furthermore, perhaps someone will object: It does not befit God most worthy, most beautiful, most honest, by Himself and immediately to be mingled with whatever obscenities, just as not to do whatever filthy works, or to exercise whatever vile businesses. Nay, to a majesty so sublime, it would more be fitting in some most worthy place — say, in the highest summit of the heaven — to reside, exercising some most noble operation proper to Himself, with all other works whatsoever, and other secondary causes, gradually assigned to Him as subject ministers.

Wherefore the Philosopher, On the World 11, says thus: "It is rather to be considered, and what is fitting and more apt to God, that the virtue residing in the heaven and in things very distant — speaking of one — should be a saving cause to all, rather than that — going forth and arriving where it is neither good nor honest — He should operate per se on earth. For not even to leaders of men is it fitting to insist on every work — as to a prince of an army or city or house — and, if there is need, to mend furniture, or do something more vile, which in a great king no servant whatever would do." Which he proves by similitude through King Xerxes, who dwelt in Susa or Bastana, who did many things in many provinces, yet not by himself, but through various officers deputed to various tasks.

To the first of these, however, it must be perspicuously responded: because every creature is created, finite, small, and so tiny, therefore by the seventeenth part of the first corollary of this work, it is of itself capable of being and not-being. Wherefore, according to the premises, it necessarily needs something necessarily existing of itself continually sustaining it — therefore God, by the testimony of the same seventeenth part.

The second is easily resolved: because, although God is omnipotent, yet He cannot do something simply absolutely impossible. Wherefore He cannot make another God, nor another necessarily existing, but only a possibly existing, by the said seventeenth part, etc., as above. This response is confirmed by Thomas mentioned above.

The third objection Peter, Sentences I, dist. 37, says is so frivolous as not even to be worthy of a response — which yet he resolves by two examples. Of which the first is: that just as a created spirit, namely, the rational soul, by the squalors of a leprous body and however much polluted, is by no means polluted, so neither is God. The second is: that just as a solar ray, diffused through whatever pollution, is by no means polluted, so neither is God. Augustine too, in On the Christian Combat, by the same example, in the same way responds. Hence Wisdom 7 it is said of uncreated Wisdom: "She reacheth therefore everywhere by reason of her purity. For she is a vapor of the power of God, and a certain pure emanation of the brightness of Almighty God; and therefore no defiled thing cometh into her. For she is the brightness of eternal light, and the unspotted mirror of God's majesty, and the image of His goodness." For this is more beautiful than the sun, and above all the disposition of stars; compared to the light, she is found prior — or, alternatively, purer."

This response can be confirmed thus: it is more perfect, to all that is corrupting, to be able to resist, lest it suffer any corruption from it, and consequently, not to be able to be polluted at all, than to be able to be so. The first supposition, then, gives this to God. Otherwise, however, no less reasonably, it can be said: that just as any thing, inasmuch as it is, is good (as all philosophers and theologians together teach), so also every thing, inasmuch as it is, is beautiful. For the beauty of a thing is its natural disposition. Whence the Philosopher, Physics VII.17, in the translation which the Commentator expounds, speaks thus: "Beauty and strength are of the head of relation; for they are dispositions of animals in respect of the most noble of animals; and I say the most praiseworthy disposition is that which is the natural sphere." Whereon Averroes says that beauty and strength are praiseworthy dispositions in animals, which are not understood except in respect of the most praiseworthy disposition, as in respect of the most noble animal. For the most praiseworthy disposition of an animal is that, in all its dispositions, it should be according to the course of nature; and beauty in some animal is the disposition in its creation considered according to its disposition, which it has in comparison with the most noble of animals in that species; and it is that which, in all its dispositions, is according to the course of nature.

Which Avicenna also attests, Metaphysics VIII.7, under these words: "The beauty of every thing, and its honor, is that it should be as it befits it." Hence Plato, Timaeus I, where, according to Chalcidius in his Commentary, he treats of the generation of the world, says thus: "Nor was it lawful for the supreme goodness to make anything except the beautiful." And according to him, the supreme goodness of God made all things; therefore, according to him, all things had been beautiful. By like reasoning, all things which are, inasmuch as they are, are beautiful.

Wherefore Augustine, On the Nature of the Good 13, speaking of the various modes of things, speaks thus: "In all these things, whatsoever are small in comparison with greater, are called by contrary names; just as in the form of man, by which beauty is greater, in his comparison the beauty of an ape is called deformity; and it deceives the imprudent, as if this were good and that evil." And further, in 15, he proves that ugliness is not altogether evil, but good — and this specially of the ape, because it itself can become uglier; therefore in it the good of beauty can be diminished; wherefore it has the good of beauty.

What, then, is unbecoming that the beautiful be mingled with the beautiful? and the more beautiful with the less beautiful — that thus the more beautiful may appear, and by its undeformable beauty illumine and adorn it? Wherefore the Philosopher, On the World 10, says: "The whole earth and sea, and ether, and the Sun and Moon, was adorned by one virtue passing through all." Hence Dionysius, On the Divine Names 4: "The good and the beautiful is not to be separated in itself, in the cause comprehending all in one. For dividing this in all existing things into participations and participating things, we say good indeed to be participant of the beautiful; beautiful, however, the participation of the cause beautifying all goods. The super-essential good, however, is called beautiful, on account of the beauty given by it to all existing things, properly to each one, and as it were the causal of the good compaction and clarity of all — as light flashing at once on all the beautifying traditions of its fontal ray, and as it were calling all things to itself."

Nay, not only is it fitting that God be everywhere present, but it would be most unfitting and most impossible to Him, with places and located things existing, not so to be — because then God would not be, as is demonstrated in the showing of the second part of the premised corollary. Whereas the Philosopher says God does not operate per se on earth — it is true: not so per se as that He does not [operate] through a secondary cause, and through another inferior agent, as per se, and through none of those does He operate His own proper operation.

This matter I pursued a little more diffusely on account of its great beauty, and because it seems no small foundation for what follows.

Thomas Bradwardine, De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium

Book I, Chapter III

THAT GOD IS THE NECESSARY EFFICIENT CAUSE OF EVERY THING MADE: WITH A COROLLARY HAVING THREE PARTS.

To this, however, must be added: that God is the necessary efficient cause of every thing made. For it seems less for a thing to exist by itself, or to conserve another, than to make something by itself when it was not. But no creature has the power to do less in this respect, as the proximate chapter has taught; wherefore neither the greater. God therefore necessarily lays His hand to every making.

The reasonings made concerning conservation can be made concerning making, the terms being changed; and many of the authorities which speak of conservation speak likewise of making. There are also, besides the authorities alleged above, many which give witness to the truth.

Aristotle, in On the World 11: "Ancient," he says, "and paternal is the saying among all men: that all things are from God, and through God they consist." And further: "God is truly the savior and progenitor of all things which in any manner come to be in this world." And it follows, in another translation: "Yet He works through Himself, sustaining the labor of a laboring animal, but using also a power impassible." And further, in the same place, he shows that God by a single action does all the works of this world, saying thus: "As, in a chorus when the choragus begins, the whole chorus of men and women sings together with various voices, sharp and graded, continuing one continuous harmony, so it is also with God, who disposes all things." And it follows consequently: "It seems most to be compared with what is done in things which happen in time of war, when the trumpet signals to the army. For then each one, hearing the clangor — this one indeed takes up his shield, another fits his hip-armor and helmet, and adjusts his belt; this one bridles his horse, that one mounts his chariot, another gives the signal; presently the leader stands in ambush, the prince of the line in the line, the soldier on the wing, but the unarmed runs back to his own. All things are moved under one signaler, by the nod of the Leader who exercises authority. So also of the universe is it to be understood. For from one Mover, with all things stirred up, their proper acts come to be — and this Mover an invisible and hidden Being, who in no way is a hindrance, neither to Himself for acting, nor to us for believing."

Now this single action of God is not the motion of the heaven, as some dream, but God's single speaking or saying — Aristotle himself in the same chapter attesting, as is recited in the proximate chapter. This same thing he shows further by another similitude thus: "For the soul, by which we live and have houses and cities, an invisible Being, is seen through its works. For all the ornament of life is by it discovered, ordered, and contained — cultivations of land, plantations, the contrivance of arts, the use of laws, ornament and civility, internal businesses, beyond the borders battles or peace. These things must be considered also of God, or understood — according to another translation — being most strong, in species most beautiful, in life immortal, in virtue most powerful, or, according to another translation, best. Wherefore made invisible to every nature, He is seen from the works themselves. For all passions, both those through the air and those above the earth and those in the water, will truly be called the works of God diffusing Himself over the world; from whom — according to the natural philosopher Empedocles — all things which are and afterwards shall be have proceeded: trees, and men with women, beasts also and birds, and fishes nourished in the waters."

Hence the Apostle to the Romans 1: "The invisible things of God, from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by those things which are made; His eternal power also and divinity" — which the holy Fathers hold by literal exposition. Wisdom 13 also disputes against the idolaters by this: "Vain are all men in whom is not the knowledge of God, and who from the things which are seen as good have not been able to understand Him who is, neither, attending to the works, have they acknowledged who was the artificer." And it follows: "For from the greatness of the species and of the creature, knowably the Creator can be seen." And further, in the same place: "If, however, they could so far know that they could estimate the world, how is it that they have not the more easily found the Lord of it?"

Furthermore, the Philosopher in On the World 11 says of God: "Since He is one, He is many-named, named from all the passions which He Himself newly produces. We call Him Jupiter; He is also called fulminous from lightning, pluvial from rain, thunderous, tempestuous, serene." And, the induction having been completed, almost through each, in the end he subjoins: "And to speak summarily, He is to be called Celestial and Terrestrial, by every nature and fortune, as Himself the cause of all things; on account of which it is not badly said in the Orphica: Jupiter Argicereaunus" — according to another translation, Prince of Lightnings; and it follows: Jupiter the Head, Jupiter the Middle; from Jupiter all things have been generated.

Into this view also consent Hermes, Plato, Avicenna, Algazel, Averroes, the author of the Liber de Causis and his Commentator, and a not-small crowd of philosophers. This view also the series of either testament most often attests. Hence Isaiah 45: "I am the Lord, who do all these things"; and further, in the same place, He curses all who say the contrary: "Woe," He says, "to him who contradicts his maker, a sherd of the earthen pots of Samos." And above, in 26: "Lord, Thou wilt give us peace; for all our works hast Thou wrought, O Lord." Wherefore in the Hymn of the Three Children, all creatures, as the works of the Lord, are stirred up in order to bless the Lord — as if to give thanks to their Operator. And John 5, the Truth itself says: "My Father worketh until now, and I work." Whence also above, in 1: "All things were made through Him."

Where Augustine, in the first homily: "Receive it then thus altogether, brethren: All things were made through Him; the universal creation was made through Him, both greater and lesser. For no form, no compages, no concord of parts, no substance whatever, can have weight, number, measure, except through that Word and from that Creator, to whom it has been said: Thou hast disposed all things in measure and number and weight. God made all things, and placed them in their grades. Therefore all things through Him, brethren — altogether all things through Him were made, and without Him was made nothing."

The same, further, in homily 8: "Just as," he says, "what the ministers put into the water-pots was turned into wine by the work of the Lord, so also what the clouds pour forth is turned into wine by the same work of the Lord. But we do not wonder at this, because it happens every year; assiduity has lost admiration. For who is he who considers the works of God by which this whole world is governed and administered, and is not astonished? He is overwhelmed by miracles. But because men, intent on other things, have lost the consideration of God's works, in which they would daily give praise to the Creator, God has reserved for Himself certain unusual things which He should do, that, as it were sleeping men, He might rouse them by wonders to worship Him. A dead man rose again — men wondered. So many are born daily, and no one wonders. Yet, if we consider more prudently, it is a greater miracle for him to be who was not, than for him to come back to life who was."

And in On the Trinity III, almost through the whole book, he proves the same by very many examples. Hence in ch. 5 he says that the divine power, which administers all spiritual and corporeal nature, every year on certain days makes rain; but when He made rain at the prayers of Elijah as if against the natural disposition of the air, it was called a miracle. So God works lightnings and thunders; but when on Mount Sinai they happened in unusual fashion, they seemed miracles. Who draws moisture through the root of the vine to the cluster, and makes wine, but God, who, with man planting and watering, gives the increase? Yet when at the nod of the Lord water was changed into wine with unusual swiftness, even with fools confessing, the divine power was declared. Who clothes the trees with leaf and flower at the customary times, but God? But when the rod of the priest Aaron flowered, the Divinity in some manner conversed with man who was doubting. And surely, for all woods and the flesh of all animals to be brought forth and formed, the earthly material is common; and who makes it but He who said: Let the earth bring forth — and by the same Word of His, by which He created, He rules and acts.

From all these things it sufficiently appears that God, who does rare miracles, likewise does the rest of His customary works. Is not this what the Apostle teaches, Romans 11, saying: "Of Him, and through Him, and in Him are all things"? And is not this one article of the faith, as the Nicene symbol testifies, teaching us to believe in God the Father, maker of all things visible and invisible, and in the Son, through whom all things were made?

Furthermore, God makes every man, and universally every animal whole, both according to body and soul, and not the natural agents alone. Wherefore by like reasoning, every made thing. For the Philosopher says, On Animals XI in the old translation: "It must be said that the natures of animals, whether the most noble or the ignoble — the nature which created the animals will be the cause of great delight in those who can know the causes of nature, namely, in the natural philosophers, when they consider in a vile animal. And on this account we ought to consider their forms, and delight in the Artificer who made them, since the artifice of the worker is manifested in the work — for example, because in the operation of images appears the science of the artificer; and on this account it is fitting that we see, or otherwise not avoid the consideration of the natures of vile animals; nor be this grievous to us, as to children. And in all natural things there is something wonderful; and on this account we ought to inquire the nature of any animal, and to know that in all animals is some noble natural thing — since none of them was naturized otiosely or by chance, but whatever proceeded from the operations of nature was not except for the sake of something, and as a complement; and for this reason, has a noble place and order." With this also agrees the saying of Averroes on Metaphysics XII, comm. 19, premised in book II of this work.

Is it not also for this reason that Job 10, addressing God, says: "Thy hands have fashioned me, and made me wholly round about" — according to the punctuation of blessed Gregory, Moralia IX.26? And further: "Hast Thou not poured me out as milk, and curdled me as cheese? Thou hast clothed me with skin and flesh; with bones and sinews Thou hast compacted me?" And the Prophet: "Thy hands have made me, and fashioned me" (Psalm 118). Whence also the Lord of the Prophets: "Before I formed thee in the womb, I knew thee" (Jeremiah 1).

Wherefore Augustine, expounding the said verse of Psalm 118, says it can be understood doubly: in one mode, according to Adam — from whom, since all men are propagated, what man, when he was made, can also say himself to have been made, by the reasoning of origin and seed? In another mode: that each one, not without the work of God, is even from his parents — He Himself creating, they themselves generating; for if the operative power of God be subtracted from things, they perish, and nothing at all is born — whether of the elements of the world, or of progenitors, or of seeds — if God do not work it.

The same, On Genesis according to the Letter IX.23: "What ministry," he says, "the Angels exhibited to God in the formation of woman, who would dare to affirm? Yet most certainly I would say that that supplement of flesh in the place of the rib, and the body and soul of the woman herself, the conformation of members, all the viscera, all the senses, and whatever there was by which she was both creature and human and woman — was made by no other than that work of God which God worked not through the Angels, but through Himself; and He did not let go, but these works are continued, so that neither the nature of those other things, nor that of the Angels themselves, subsists if He does not work."

Furthermore, God makes all vegetables; nor do natural agents alone suffice. Wherefore also all other things, by like reasoning. Is not this what the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 3: "Neither he that planteth is anything, nor he that watereth, but God who giveth the increase"? Wherefore Augustine, On Genesis according to the Letter IX.22, says that farmers are not the creators of crops or trees: for "neither he that planteth is anything, nor he that watereth, but God who giveth the increase." And he says that the farmer makes nothing grow, but He who disposes all things in measure and number and weight, who gives the increase. Nor does the physician applying medicines heal the sick, but Nature does it by an interior motion most hidden to us — yet from which, if God should subtract His inmost operation by which He establishes and makes it, it will at once remain as if extinct, in nothing.

The same, On the Trinity III.7: "The Apostle," he says, "discerning interiorly God creating and forming, from the works of the creature which are applied externally, taking a similitude from agriculture, says: I planted, Apollo watered, but God gave the increase. As, then, in our very life, the mind, by justifying, none can form except God — but to preach the Gospel exteriorly, men can — so the creation of visible things God works interiorly; the exterior operations, however, whether of good or of evil Angels or of men, or even of any animals whatever, according to His command, and to the distributions of powers and the appetites of advantages distributed by Him, He so applies to the nature of things in which He creates all things, even as agriculture is applied to the earth."

This same the Truth itself truly attests of the lilies and the hay, which God so clothes — as is recited in Matthew 6 and Luke 12.

COROLLARY (three parts)

- First: that no thing can do anything without God.
- Second: that no thing can do anything except as God by Himself and immediately does that same thing.
- Third: that no thing can do anything except as God does that same thing more immediately than any other doing thing.

Hence it manifestly follows that no thing can do anything without God; and that no thing can do anything except as God by Himself and immediately does that same thing — nay, even more immediately than any other doing thing — immediately, I say, not only locally, but also naturally and causally, and more immediately by the same modes, or at least naturally and causally.

For it is less to preserve a thing made in being than to make it from non-being. But by the corollary of the second [chapter], no thing can preserve another thing in being without God likewise conserving it — and this immediately, nay, more immediately than any other conserving thing. Wherefore neither can any thing make a thing from non-being without God likewise making it — and this immediately, nay, more immediately than any other doing thing.

Item: every thing, just as it can do something, so it can also preserve in being a preservable thing made; for this is easier. But if the opposite of the foregoing corollary be granted, some thing can do something without God, or without God doing the same thing immediately or more immediately. Therefore some thing can thus conserve something — against the corollary of the second, premised. The reasonings and authorities adduced for that corollary also prove this corollary.

But if anyone presumes to say that God is said to make all things — not because He immediately by Himself and properly makes these things, but only by means of Heaven, and because He has made the natural agents and patients, or conserves them, or because He permits, or does not impede, or defends them against impediments — he will easily be repressed by the foregoing, just as the proximate chapter repressed a similar presumption.

Book I, Chapter IV

THAT WITH ANY CREATURE MOVING, GOD NECESSARILY MOVES TOGETHER WITH IT: WITH A COROLLARY HAVING FOUR PARTS.

These things being foreknown, it cannot be unknown that, with any creature moving, God necessarily moves together with it. For it is less to exist than to move. For some things exist which do not move, and which cannot move; but whatever moves, exists; and (by the second of this work) no creature can exist by itself — therefore neither does it suffice to move by itself, without God.

Item: by the third of this work, no creature can by itself produce any motion; nor (by the second) preserve what is produced. God, then, is required as a necessary co-helper.

Furthermore, all the reasonings — or nearly all — and very many of the authorities adduced for the divine conservation and making of things, can also be adduced for His co-moving, the terms being changed as is fitting.

Furthermore, as it is in the lesser world, so it appears to be in the greater world. But in the lesser world — namely, in man, or in an animal — it is so, that all its motion, as such, proceeds from its formal and essential principle, namely, the soul, as is plain from On the Soul II.37. Therefore every motion in the greater world will proceed from its like principle, namely, from God Himself. And this seems to be the response of Aristotle in On the World 11, as is plain in that long authority written in the third chapter of this work; wherefore he holds this view. And further, in ch. 13, he shows the same view by a similar reasoning. For he says: "He Himself immobile moves all things and bears them whither He wills, by various ideas and natures, just as — I say — also the law of a city, being immobile, disposes — in the souls of those using it, the soul which is according to citizenship." And he shows this as if inductively through each of the works of the city; and concluding, he says: "Thus we should think indeed of the greater city — I mean of the World — for the law to us, equally inclining, is God."

Furthermore, there is that view premised, positing God as the soul of the great world; and Avicenna's, Metaphysics IX.1, who says: "The heaven is an animal obedient to God." Averroes too, on Metaphysics XII, comm. 39, says: "It has been declared by reason that there is some one eternal, very noble — and it is that which moves all"; this, then, is God.

Item: if a creature could by itself move with one species of motion, it could also with every species; wherefore it could by itself alter, generate, and make many new things — which the proximate chapter does not permit.

Item: every thing having a form moves only through it, as the whole of philosophy proclaims. But, as the second of this work shows, God is the form of every form, and is the substantial act by which every form is what it is — which is plain from the same place. He is therefore the substantial form of every form. By this argument it is proved, On the Soul II, that the soul is the form of the animated. Therefore no form moves except through God; therefore neither can anything formed move except through Him.

Likewise to the same point: every formed mover moves through the form most essential and most principal to it, according to which it is such a formed thing. But God is the form most essential and most principal of any formed thing. For who, with God and a creature existing as causes of one caused thing in the same genus of cause, would attribute to God what is more imperfect and less? Nor do the things premised in the second of this work allow this.

Item: Augustine, City of God XXII.20, alleges from Cicero such a definition of God: "God is a certain mind, free and unbound, secret from every mortal commixture, sensing and moving all things, itself endowed with eternal nod" — and he says he found this in the books of the great philosophers.

Item: God is the first cause in the genus of moving causes, just as of formal and final causes, as is shown in Physics VIII and Metaphysics XII, and by many philosophers in many places. And from the second supposition it can be had: just as no posterior cause moves except in the virtue of the prior cause — as is plain by the first proposition of On Causes with its Commentator alleged above — and because the first in any genus is the cause of any posterior of that genus, as the things premised in the second of this work attest. God, then, necessarily co-moves with every mover. Otherwise, moreover, no way could be taken from the inferior movers to prove some first mover — against Aristotle, Physics VII and VIII, Metaphysics XII, Alexander, Averroes, Avicenna, and almost all other philosophers, with whom the theological authors agree in this part.

Item: an instrument is not moved artificially except by an artificer. But every posterior mover is the instrument of the first Mover; for otherwise it would not be naturally posterior to it, but prior, or even coeval, or altogether disparate from every order. Hence Boethius says, On the Consolation of Philosophy IV, prose 6: "Every generation of things, and the whole progress of mutable natures, and whatever in any way is moved, takes its causes, order, and forms from the stability of the divine mind. For just as an artificer, perceiving in his mind the form of the thing to be made, moves the effect of the work, and what he had foreseen simply and presentially, he leads through temporal orders — so God by providence indeed singularly and stably disposes the things to be made; but by fate He administers manifoldly and temporally these very things which He has disposed."

This Averroes too attests, on On Sleep and Waking, saying: "The causes of future things are not of determined being with us, but with the intellective nature, from which whatsoever the sensible nature receives, and by which it is moved — as instruments are moved by the form of the artifice. And therefore no individual essentially comes to be from nature, except through antecedent science; for the instrument of the artificer, as Aristotle says, is not moved except according to the artificer." Lo, Averroes the Commentator universally so holds, and alleges Aristotle to the same effect. Who also on Metaphysics XII, comm. 44, says: "The first Mover and the inferior movers are much assimilated to artificers who serve one another by turn, and aid one another toward one artifice. And they are those of which some are principal over others, and all are reduced to one artifice, and are perfected by one another, and all are reduced to receiving all their principles from the universal artifice containing them. And therefore the proper science of the first God is, as it were, the first Philosophy; and the proper science of the principles which are under Him, is similar to the particular sciences which are under the first Philosophy" — as Nicomachus the Peripatetic said in his First Philosophy.

This view also Hermes plainly attests, On the Eternal Word 14, as the second of this work has premised. Hence Augustine, On the Trinity VI, last: "The Son is a certain art of the omnipotent and wise God, full of all the unchangeable living reasons, and all are one in Him, just as He Himself is one of one, with whom He there knows all as one — God, who made all things through Him; for He is the artificer of all things (Wisdom 7)."

It is confirmed by similitude. Because by the Philosopher, On the Soul II, where above: "All physical bodies are instruments of the soul." And since God incomparably exceeds any soul, all things are His instruments. Certain things premised in the proximate chapter of this work also seem expressly to attest the artifice of God. Wherefore the divine Isaiah 29 and 45 calls God potter, maker, and fashioner; and man, clay, work, figment, and sherd — which the Apostle, following him, Romans 9, calls them by the same names. The Lord too, through Isaiah 10, likens King Sennacherib of Assyria to "the rod and staff of His fury," and to the axe with which God cuts, and the saw drawn by God, and the rod which God lifts. Where the Gloss says: "Just as these inanimate things are only instruments, doing nothing of themselves, but through Him who moves them, so neither did Sennacherib operate by himself, but in the virtue of God."

This same — namely, of the artificer and the instruments — Thomas Aquinas, in On Faith, Hope, and Charity 133, attests, as the second of this work alleges.

Furthermore, Augustine, On Genesis according to the Letter VIII, shows at length that God moves every spiritual and corporeal creature, voluntary and otherwise, by all their motions universally. Where also, in 29, having distinguished the work of divine providence into two parts — namely, of creation and of administration, by which He provides for the whole universe and for individual creatures — he says thus: "The creating Spirit moves Himself without time and place; He moves the created spirit through time without place; and He moves body through time and place."

In agreement, Dionysius, On the Divine Names 4, speaking of the good and the best which is praised in God, speaks thus: "This one Best and Good singularly is the cause of all many goods and bests; and from this come all the essential subsistences of existing things, unities, discretions, immutabilities, alterities, similitudes, dissimilitudes, fellowships of contraries, distinctions of united things, providences of superiors, vicissitudes of like-formed things, conversions of all inferiors, the self-guarding and immutable habitations and collocations; and again, the proper fellowships of all in all to each one, and compactions, and unconfused friendships, and harmonies of the universe, and universal concretions, indissoluble continences of existing things, the not-failing receptions of things to be done — all states and motions: some of intellectuals, some of souls, some of bodies. For He is the State and Motion above every motion and every state to all things, collocating each in its own ratio, and moving them in their proper motion."

Where, having consequently shown how Angels and souls are moved circularly, directly, and obliquely, he subjoins: "Of these, then, and of the sensible three motions in the universe, and much before of each one of the abidings, stations, and collocations, the cause and container and end is the good and best, and above every state and motion. Wherefore every state and motion is from itself, and through itself, and into itself, and on its account. For from it and on its account is essence and every life of mind and soul, and of all natures; all conjunctions, consummations, terms, orders; every essence, every virtue, every operation, every habit, every sense, every reason, every intellect, every illumination, every science, every summit; and simply, every on — being — is from the good and the best, and is converted into the good and the best, and all things which are and come to be, are and come to be through the good and the best, and to these all things look, and by it are moved and contained, etc." — more fully recited in book II of this work.

The blessed Hierotheus, moreover, in his amatory hymns, as Dionysius recalls where above, says thus: "There is one certain simple virtue, moving itself to a certain unity-temperance from the best, even to the last of existing things; and from that one again consequently through all unto the best — and from itself, through itself, and to itself, returning itself, and turning back into itself always in the same way."

Does not the Wise One teach the same, saying: "Wisdom is more mobile than all mobile things; she reacheth everywhere; and being one, she can do all things; and remaining in herself she reneweth all things"? "She reacheth therefore from end to end mightily, and disposeth all things sweetly." Does not Truth itself say: "My Father worketh until now, and I work"? And the Apostle of Truth: "In Him we live and move and are."

COROLLARY (four parts)

- First: that nothing can move anything without God by Himself and properly co-moving the same.
- Second: that nothing can move anything without God immediately moving the same.
- Third: that nothing can move anything without God moving the same more immediately than any other mover whatsoever.
- Fourth: that no proposition attributing any created thing to any secondary cause is immediate simply.

Hence, with sound eyes, I repeat: it is manifest that nothing can move anything without God by Himself and properly co-moving the same, and without God immediately moving the same — nay, more immediately than any other mover whatsoever. Immediately, I say, and more immediately, as the corollaries of the second and third [chapters] expounded.

And from this natural corollary another, logical corollary manifestly follows: namely, that no proposition attributing any caused thing to any secondary cause is simply immediate.

This natural corollary sufficiently appears from the things premised in this chapter, joined to the corollaries of the third and second with their proofs. With which securely supposed, the logical corollary is easily demonstrated. For no proposition having a cause naturally mediating between its extremes — namely, which is the cause naturally mediating the inherence of the extremes — is immediate simply, as the Posterior Analytics I shows. But every such proposition is of this kind, as the proximate natural corollary, with the other prior corollaries, clearly proves.

But if anyone respond cavillingly that God moves all moved things, yet not properly, immediately, and through Himself, but only by means of another — say, the Heaven — or because He has made the mover and the moved thing, or because He preserves them, or because He permits, or does not impede, or defends them from things impeding — he will easily be refuted by the foregoing, just as the second and third of this work refuted similar [evasions].

And if anyone object against the chapter that then God would bark, eat husks, lie, steal — with other absurdities better passed over in silence than spoken — and against the corollary, that the Philosopher both in Logic and in Philosophy affirms many such propositions to be immediate: it must be said that the first does not proceed, because those words do not signify such actions absolutely, namely, only according to that which they essentially are or come to be, but with a certain relation to the creature, inasmuch as they flow forth and emanate from it.

For the second, it must be said that the Philosopher in such matters speaks as a natural philosopher — namely, of the immediacy of a secondary cause, that is, of a natural cause. And this is immediacy secundum quid, because only in the genus of created things; not, however, of immediacy simply, which simply deprives every middle cause.

Book I, Chapter V

That God is Not Mutable in Any Way: It Has a Corollary of Five Parts.

Having shown, then, that God is the effective principle of every change and motion, it remains to show next that God is not mutable in any way. This follows evidently from the sixth part of the first Corollary of this book; and although it seems sufficiently shown there, it is nevertheless to be further fortified here for cause by certain reasons and Authorities.

It is established, indeed, according to what was set forth in the third and fourth chapters of this book, that God makes and moves all things; and in every making and motion there is some maker and mover that is unmakeable and immovable, otherwise there would be an infinite process in such things, contrary to the second Supposition; and certain things set forth in the second chapter of this book attest to this. And who more worthy of being such than the first and supreme maker and mover? — which also certain things set forth in the second, third, and fourth chapters of this book seem to bear witness to. Many Philosophers and Theologians also confirm this conclusion for the reason just given.

Furthermore, if God were mutable in any way, He would not be most pure act, contrary to the second Supposition and the third part of the first Corollary of this book. Whence the Philosopher in Metaphysics XII.38: "Since, however, the mover itself is unmoved, being in act, this cannot be otherwise in any way." On which Averroes: "That which moves the first moved, since it is itself unmoved — because it is pure act without any potency — it is impossible that it should have any disposition other than that which it has."

Likewise, if God were changed in any way, He would not be supremely one and simply so, nor supremely necessary being, contrary to the first Supposition, the second part, and other parts of the first Corollary of this book, and the Philosophers and Theologians in many places. Whence the Philosopher in Metaphysics V.6, distinguishing the necessary, writes thus: "First and properly necessary is what is simple; for this cannot be in many ways; therefore not now this way and now that, for then it would be in many ways." And in Metaphysics XII, distinguishing the necessary, he says thus (XII.38): "But this is not contingent otherwise, but is simple; from such a principle, then, depend heaven and nature." And Avicenna, Metaphysics I.6: "Necessary being through itself is necessary in all its modes." And below in book IX, ch. 1: "Necessary being is in this way necessary being in all its modes, that there cannot be in it some future disposition that was not."

Likewise, if God could be changed, why could He not be changed for the worse? And how would He in no way be in need of another, contrary to the first Supposition and the parts of the first Corollary of this book? Whence Hermes in the last chapter of On the Eternal Word: "Nothing is wanting to Him who is Himself all things, or in whom all things are." And Sextus the Pythagorean in his Sententiae says, "God indeed is in need of nothing." Whence the Prophet: "You are my God, since You have no need of my goods" (Psalm 15). And the Apostle: "He, since He is the Lord of heaven and earth, does not dwell in temples made with hands, nor is He worshipped by human hands as needing anything" (Acts 17:24–25).

Likewise, then He would be passible, as is clear in itself; for every being-changed is a suffering. And so Averroes argues in Metaphysics V, comment 6: "If it were possible to be changed into another species — that is, disposition or mode — then His nature would be of the nature of a possible thing receiving many species" — which he holds impossible. And so it appears, since to act is always more excellent than to suffer. Whence Aristotle, De Anima III.19: "Always more honorable is the agent than the patient, and the principle than the matter." And Ethics IV.1: "It belongs more to virtue to do well than to suffer well." And Augustine, On Genesis according to the Letter XII.29: "In every way more excellent is he who makes than that thing from which he makes something." And he proves the same at length in On Music VI; and in Eighty-Three Questions 28: "Every efficient is greater than that which is effected." And he says the same in On the Immortality of the Soul.

Likewise, then He would be changed [by another], or at least could be — as is clear from Aristotle, Physics VII, and Averroes in his commentary, and Avicenna Metaphysics I.3, who agree that everything that is moved is moved by another; and so He would be in potency with respect to another, inferior, and passive — all of which derogate too greatly from the first Supposition and the third part of the first Corollary. And this seems to be the reasoning of Algazel, Metaphysics II, dictum 9: "Necessary being," he says, "cannot be changed, because not by another nor by itself, since no thing acts upon itself in any way."

Aristotle also in On the Heavens I.110, briefly comprehending many of these reasonings in his manner, says thus: "In encyclopedic philosophical writings concerning divine things it has many times been declared by reasonings that the divine, intransmutable, necessary being is everything first and supreme; and what has thus been said is testified to: nor is there anything else better that will move it. For that would surely be more divine; nor does it have anything depraved, nor is it in need of any of those things that are its goods."

Many Philosophical and Theological Authorities sufficiently confirm the same. Whence Hermes in On the Eternal Word, after showing in chapter 33 that God moves all things celestial and terrestrial, superior and inferior, by a temporal order written by divine law, says thus in chapter 34: "All things being so disposed, then, nothing is stable, nothing fixed, nothing immovable — neither among things being born, nor celestial, nor terrestrial — but God alone, and rightly alone. For He is in Himself and from Himself, and around Himself He is wholly full and perfect; and He is His own firm stability, nor can He be moved by the impulse of anything or by place, since in Him are all things, and in all things He alone is."

Whence also Aristotle, Metaphysics XII.51: "God is not transmuted; for transmutation is into something less worthy, and motion is something of that sort." And Metaphysics IX.2: "Passibility is toward the worse and toward corruption." On which Averroes: "Everything that suffers either suffers toward the worse or suffers toward corruption." And Physics VIII.36 and following, the Philosopher diffusely shows that the First Mover is not moved at all, since neither essentially nor accidentally in any way; where also (VIII.37) he cites Anaxagoras as positing that intellect, which is the first principle, must necessarily be impassible, unmixed, and immovable.

Boethius too, in On the Consolation of Philosophy III, last prose, cites from Parmenides: "By the form of the divine substance He turns the moveable orb of things, while He preserves Himself immovable." Whence also among the 24 Definitions of the 24 Philosophers concerning God, definition 19 says thus: "God is the always-moving Immovable." Avicenna, Algazel, Ammonius, Averroes, and many other Philosophers many times confirm this same thing.

Sacred Authority teaches the same. Whence in Psalm 43 [Vulg.; cf. 42:2]: "You are my King and my God." On which Augustine: "You are the same; for You have not been changed. I see times changed; the Creator of times is not changed." And Exodus 3: "I am who am." And Psalm 101: "You shall change them, and they shall be changed; but You are the same." Gloss: "But You who said 'I am who am' are the same — that is, immutable and omnipotent. For these things are from You, through You, and in You; yet they are not what You yourself are, who are changing not changed, making not made, moving but remaining."

Whence also Numbers 23: "God is not as the son of man, that He should be changed." Malachi 3: "I am the Lord, and I do not change." James 1[17]: "With whom there is no change nor shadow of vicissitude." 1 Timothy, last chapter [6:16]: "Who alone has immortality" — that is, immutability.

Whence blessed Augustine, On the Trinity I.1, says thus: "It was said to Moses, 'I am who am, and He who is sent me to you.' But since 'to be' is in some way said both of body and of soul, unless He had wished it to be understood in some proper way, He would surely not have said this. And what the Apostle says, 'who alone has immortality' — since the soul too is in some way said to be immortal, and is — He would not say 'alone has' unless because true immortality is unchangeableness, which no creature can have, since it belongs to the Creator alone. This is what James says: 'Every best gift, and every perfect gift, is from above, descending from the Father of lights, with whom there is no change nor shadow of a moment.' This too David: 'You shall change them, and they shall be changed; but You are the same.' Therefore to behold and fully know the substance of God making things mutable without any change of Himself, and creating temporal things without any temporal motion of His own, is difficult."

And in On the Trinity V.2 he teaches the same more briefly, where he holds that God alone is utterly incapable of being changed; and he adds: "What is changed does not preserve its very being; and what can be changed, even if it is not changed, can fail to be what it had been. And on this account, it is not only what is not changed, but what utterly cannot be changed, that without scruple comes forth as that which most truly may be said to be." And in On Christian Doctrine I, penultimate sentence (37): "He supremely and primally is, who is utterly unchangeable." He maintains the same in City of God XII.1, 2, 3, and in many other places.

Wherefore blessed Gregory, Moralia XVIII.31, on Job 28 ("nor shall they be remembered in comparison with Him"), says: "The Prophet, contemplating the unchangeableness of His essence, says, 'All things shall grow old like a garment, and like a covering You shall change them, and they shall be changed; but You are the same, and Your years shall not fail.' Hence it is said to Moses, 'I am who am, and "He who is" has sent me to you.' For He alone truly is, who alone unchangeably remains. For everything that is now thus and now otherwise is next to non-being; for it cannot remain in its state, but in some way it is on the way to non-being, while it is led by moments of time from what it had been ever to something else."

Peter [Lombard] also shows this same thing in the first book of his Sentences, distinction 8 and distinction 37, citing more copiously the Authorities of the Saints.

Corollary

From these things, however, it seems probable — if Truth herself truly knows — that the following may be inferred corollarily: that God is essentially and presentially everywhere, not only in the world and in all its parts, but also outside the world in an imaginary infinite place or void. Whence He may also truly be called immense and uncircumscribed — although He may be called immense and uncircumscribed in another way as well. Whence too there appears to come forth a certain clear response to the ancient questions of the Gentiles and Heretics, which they used to put to the faithful: "Where is your God?" and "Where had God been before the world?" — one of which was put metrically thus:

Tell where then He was, when besides Him there was nothing.

Whence likewise it is clearly evident that there can be a void from body, but a void from God by no means.

Thus the corollary has these five parts:

1. God is essentially and presentially everywhere of necessity, not only in the world and in all its parts;
2. but also outside the world, in an imaginary infinite place or void;
3. whence He may also truly be called immense and uncircumscribed;
4. whence also a response appears to the ancient questions of the Gentiles and Heretics: "Where is your God?" and "Where had God been before the world?"
5. whence likewise it is clearly evident that there can be a void from body, but a void from God by no means.

[Demonstration of the parts.]

That God is necessarily everywhere in the world follows manifestly. For if He were not in some place of it, and yet could be in it (since by the seventh part of the first Corollary He is omnipotent), this could be either by motion or not by motion of a creature — since now there is a creature there, and continuously there was before, which by the same reason by which another creature does and did suffice for God's existence there, [now suffices]; nor by motion of Himself, as the chapter has shown. The same is shown evidently from the Corollary of the second chapter of this book, and from the demonstration of it.

For proving the second part, let me suppose that A is the imaginary fixed place of this world, and B is an imaginary place outside the world, distant from A; and that God moves the world from A to B, situating it in B. Then by the first part of the present corollary and by the Corollary of the second chapter of this book and the demonstration of it, God is now in B; therefore either He was there before, or He was not. If He was, then by the same reason He was before, and now is, everywhere imaginarily outside the world. If not, then by the same reason He is now not in A but in B. Therefore God was before in A and not in B, and now is not in A but in B, which is wholly distant; therefore He withdrew from A and approached B; therefore He was moved locally or situationally — as also our soul is moved at the motion of our body.

Here certain men, following the Philosopher in On the Heavens I, respond by supposing that every local motion is necessarily upward or downward, or circular — that is, from the middle, to the middle, or about the middle. But if such a motion as I have posited were posited, it would be none of the foregoing; therefore they say that it is not possible for the world to be so moved. But these men gravely mutilate and curtail the divine power — nay, omnipotence. God could also have created this world in B in the beginning; why therefore can He not now place it in B? He can also now create another world in B; why therefore can He not place this world in B? This response is also condemned by Stephen, Bishop of Paris, in these words: "[The article saying] that God cannot move the heavens with a rectilinear motion — and the reason is that then a void would be left behind."

Nor does that response evade the difficulty: for let it be supposed that God, without local motion, creates another world in B and annihilates this world in A — and the difficulty returns.

Others also, seemingly following the Philosopher, respond by saying that there is no place or void outside the world; therefore neither is God there, nor can He move the world thither. But these men have to say consequently that God by His omnipotence could in no way have made the world greater in any respect, nor lesser — which would too greatly restrict and constrain His omnipotence. They also have to say that God necessarily made the world in place A, and that before the world there was place A, and no other. But why this and not another? Why so great, and not greater, nor lesser? For either this was from God or [was] of itself, not from Him. If from God, He could have made another and another place greater without end, on account of His infinite power. But if it was of itself, not from Him, what virtue, what reason, what nature determined this precise and impassable terminus to it inviolably? — since that imaginary place has no positive nature, as no one is ignorant. Otherwise there would be some positive nature that is neither God nor from God — the opposite of which the second and third chapters of this book teach — and it would be coeternal with God, which no Christian admits. Wherefore Stephen, Bishop of Paris, condemned the article asserting that "many things are eternal, and God could not destroy them even if He willed it" — by which He would be deprived of omnipotence.

Their reasoning also militates against them: for if, according to the Philosopher and according to their own supposition, there cannot be a void, nor an imaginary place not filled with body, then either the World is eternal — which is heretical, and which they deny — or before its creation its imaginary place existed, void, not occupied by body. The article cited also condemns this response and its irrational reasoning. With these things in no way standing in the way, then, the foregoing reasoning seems to proceed without offense.

Again, God in the beginning, creating the world and any part of it whatsoever, was simultaneously with the World and with any part of it. For as is clear from Physics VII.9 and following, and De Anima II.74: in every motion and in every action the mover and agent is together with the moved and the patient. Whence Augustine, Homily 2 on John 1, on the words "He was in the world, and the world was made through Him": "How," he says, "was He in the world?" And he answers: "As an Artisan ruling what He has made. For He did not make as a craftsman makes who stands outside the chest he is making, which is placed in another location while it is being fashioned; and although he is alongside it, he himself sits in another place who is making it, and he is extrinsic to that which he fashions. But God, infused into the World, fashions; placed everywhere, He fashions, and does not depart anywhere; not from outside, as it were, does He turn the mass which He fashions; but by the presence of His majesty He does what He does, and by His own presence He governs what He has made. Thus, then, He was in the world in the manner of Him through whom the world was made."

Either, then, God by nature was prior there before He created there and before the creature was there; or conversely. If He was prior there by nature, this was not through the creature, nor through creating, but through Himself, and not anew — for then He would be changed anew through Himself. Therefore He was there eternally through Himself; therefore by the same reason He was eternally through Himself everywhere in the void or imaginary infinite place, and still is everywhere likewise outside the world.

Nor can anyone say the contrary — that prior by nature is the creature's being created than its being here or there; and prior by nature is God's creating there than the creature's being created there. For this is the cause of that. And still prior by nature is God's being there than His creating there — just as He is by nature prior than that He creates, as is also any other agent. For not because God or any other agent acts, therefore He is; nor because He acts there, therefore He is there; but rather conversely.

To the same point: with the World created in this place, God was here either anew or eternally. If anew, this was through some change or motion in God or in another, namely the world. But not through change in God, as the fifth chapter shows; nor through change in the world, since God by nature was there prior to the world's being created or being changed in any way, as the foregoing manifest. Therefore God was not made there anew, but eternally was there. Wherefore by the same reason eternally He was, is, and shall be everywhere in the imaginary infinite place.

In a similar way, and perhaps a plainer one, the same can be shown by supposing that God creates something — say A — at some distance outside the heaven, since it is clear from what was set forth that He can. For He can move the world to another distant place, and He could have created the World in a distant place; therefore even now He can create there. Let Him therefore create A there. Then God immediately acts on A there and conserves it, as the things set forth here and in the corollary of the second chapter of this book show. Therefore God is there immediately and essentially through Himself. Either then He is by nature prior there than A is there, or conversely, etc., as before.

To the same: with A created there, God is there — either anew or eternally, etc. — as above.

Furthermore, God is in the place of the World; therefore either He needs the creature necessarily — as a kind of leaning or reclining support, or foundation sustaining Him lest He fall, lest He flow away, or rather lest He vanish — or He does not so need the creature. The first cannot be said because of the foregoing. For God is by nature prior in the place of any creature than that creature itself, as has been shown above; nor is He sustained or carried by the creature, nor does He in any way lean upon the creature, but conversely, as the second chapter of this book has shown. God also was in some place before any creature: for this would too greatly repugn His infinite perfection and sufficiency, which the first Supposition with its consequent parts gave to Him. God is therefore the foundation without foundation, founded on no prior thing, but the first and original foundation of all others — upon which all others, since they are unstable in themselves, lean as upon a foundation fixed of itself, stable, and immovable; by which they are continuously sustained and continuously supported, as the second chapter of this book has manifoldly shown. It is therefore not the converse.

God can therefore be in whatever place He wishes, without needing the creature, and not anew — since not through motion of Himself, as the fifth shows — therefore eternally, by remaining at rest. Therefore God essentially through Himself perseveres in every place everywhere, eternally and immovably.

Moreover, it is more perfect to be everywhere in some place, and in many places at once, than to be in only one place. And so a spirit, which can do this, is more perfect than a body, which cannot. But God is an infinitely perfect spirit, as the first Supposition and its demonstration manifest. Therefore this belongs to Him infinitely — and this without need of the creature, as has been shown above, and without any mutability whatever. Therefore God necessarily, eternally, infinitely is everywhere in the imaginary infinite place. Whence also He may truly be called omnipresent, just as also omnipotent.

He may also by similar reason be called in some manner infinite, infinitely great, or of infinite magnitude — even in some manner, although metaphysically and improperly, extensively. For He is inextensibly and indimensionably extended infinitely. For He coexists wholly and simultaneously, fully, with infinite magnitude and imaginary extension and with any part of it. Wherefore likewise He may be called immense — that is, not measured, nor measurable by any measure — and uncircumscribed, since He is not circumscribed by anything fully surrounding Him, nor can He thus be circumscribed by anything; but He Himself circumscribes, contains, and encompasses all things.

Whence Sextus the Pythagorean in his Sententiae says: "You will not find the magnitude of God, even if you could fly with wings." This sentence is attested by the second of the 24 Definitions of God posited by the 24 Philosophers, which says: "God is an infinite sphere, whose center is everywhere and whose circumference nowhere." And the eighteenth: "God is a sphere whose circumferences are as many as there are points." And the tenth, saying: "God is one whose power is not numbered, whose being is not enclosed, whose goodness is not bounded."

Theological Authorities also seem to attest this sentence. For Solomon says, speaking to God: "Heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain You" (1 Kings 8 and 2 Chronicles 6); "Heaven and the heaven of heavens contain You not." With which the Church accords, singing thus: "Holy Mother of God, who didst worthily merit to conceive Him whom the whole world could not comprehend," etc. And again:

Virgin Mother of God, whom the whole orb cannot contain, In your womb He enclosed Himself, made man.

Wherefore Jerome to Marcella, On Five Questions, Epistle 96, responding to the last, says: "You will not doubt that the God-Word so dwelt in the Lord's body that He was both in the Father, and enclosed the orb of heaven, and was infused into all things and around all things, the same Person, so as to penetrate all things from within and to contain them from without. It is foolish, therefore, that the power of Him should be limited by the smallness of one little body — He whom heaven does not contain — and yet He who was everywhere was wholly also in the Son of Man."

Baruch 3 says: "O Israel, how great is the house of the Lord, and vast the place of His possession; great, and having no end; high and immense." Whence also the Prophet: "Great is the Lord, and exceedingly to be praised, and of His greatness there is no end" (Psalm 144). And Job 11, speaking of God, says: "He is higher than heaven, and what will you do? deeper than hell, and how will you know? His measure is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea." On which Gregory, Moralia X.8, says that God by transcending all things encloses [them]. And below, in book XVI.12, on Job 23, "If I go to the east, He does not appear" etc.: "The Creator of all things," he says, "is not in part, because He is everywhere; and then He is the less found, when He who is wholly everywhere is sought in part. For an uncircumscribed Spirit has all things within Himself, which He nevertheless surrounds by filling, and fills by surrounding, and transcends by sustaining, and sustains by transcending."

Augustine also, On the Divine Essence, IX, says that God alone is uncircumscribed, immutable, and immense; and adds that, of His immensity, in the book of blessed Job it is written: "He is higher than heaven," etc., as cited above. He also, in On Genesis according to the Letter VIII.33, says that God is in no place either by interval or by space, but by an unchangeable and excellent power; and is interior to every thing, since in Him are all things; and exterior to every thing, since He is above all things.

Is not this what the Prophet — albeit obscurely — seems to insinuate when he says: "Who has measured the waters with a fist, and weighed the heavens with a span?" (Isaiah 40), as if to say, "Has not God?" And the Lord through the Prophet: "Heaven is My throne, the earth is the footstool of My feet" (Isaiah, last chapter). Wherefore Gregory in his second [book] on Ezekiel, Homily V, says: "God is everywhere, and everywhere is wholly. For He says: 'Heaven is My throne, but the earth is the footstool of My feet.' And of Him it is written: 'Who measures heaven with a span, and encloses the earth with a fist.' From which it is necessary that He who presides over heaven as a throne is both above and within; and He who measures heaven with a span and encloses the earth with a fist is exterior, superior, and inferior. Thus, in order that almighty God might indicate that He is both interior and superior to all things, He declared heaven to be His throne; in order to show, however, that He encompasses all things, He claims to measure heaven with His span and to enclose the earth with His fist."

Blessed Augustine, moreover, in Confessions VII.5, comparing the whole creature to the Creator, says: "I made one great mass, distinguished by kinds of bodies — Your creature — whether the things which were really bodies, or those which I myself had imagined to be spirits; and I made it great, not as great as it was (for that I could not know), but as great as I pleased — finite indeed in every direction, but with You, O Lord, surrounding it on every side and penetrating it, but everywhere infinite. As if there were a sea everywhere and from every side, through immense reaches, an infinite sea — and only sea — and it had within itself a sponge, however great, but yet finite, full from every part of itself with the immense sea: thus did I think Your creation, finite, full of You who are infinite. And I said: Behold God, and behold what God has created, and God is good; and most strongly and far most distantly is He more excellent than they; but yet, being good, He has created good things; and behold how He surrounds and fills them."

Nor must it be an obstacle that the Authorities of Scripture cited above are often expounded to another sense. For who is unaware that Sacred Scripture, impregnated with the manifold power of the Holy Spirit, contains a manifold sense and brings forth many meanings?

These parts of this Corollary having been made manifest, the remaining ones will become manifest [from them].

If anyone, however, against the possibility of the motion of the whole world along a straight line, of which we touched above, should object the sentence of the Philosopher already touched on — namely, that every motion is from the middle to the middle, or about the middle — it is to be said that he is speaking of the species of natural motions of natural bodies and of the parts of this world.

And if anyone should still object [the Philosopher] reproving the void, it is to be said that perhaps he understands that the void is not necessarily and naturally to be posited within the world, nor even outside the world, on account of the effects for which the Pythagoreans, Democritus and Leucippus, and many of the more ancient Philosophers posit it — namely, on account of local motion, on account of motion of augmentation and diminution, of condensation and rarefaction, on account of motion of alteration, and on account of the distinction of beings, lest they be one, or on account of the breathing of the heaven from an infinite void outside itself, as is clear from Physics IV.3 and following, and On the Heavens and the World IV, On the Soul II, and other places.

This seems to be posited in two ways: in one mode only privatively — namely as the pure privation, or pure absence of the full; in another mode positively, and this in two further ways. In one way, as if it were only a corporeal dimension separated from natural forms, as it were a Mathematical body, or quantity alone separated from other natural things; and so it is sometimes taken in Physics IV. In the other way, as if it had also an active power, and a power of moving according to place, as is clear from On the Heavens IV. Sometimes, too, the void is defined by him as "a place not filled, but apt to be filled"; place, however, according to him, is the ultimate, namely the ultimate surface of the containing body. But such a void is not outside the heaven, nor is there a place or situation there apt to be filled, according to the natures instituted in natural things.

Yet it is true that his arguments by no means convince by an irrefragable necessity that God could not, by His absolute omnipotence, make a void wherever He willed within the world or outside; nay, even now in fact: let there be an imaginary place outside the world, void — void, I say, of body, and of anything else apart from God — as the foregoing have urged. But those arguments of his are, as also are very many others of his, certain probable subtleties in natural matter, more ad hominem against the contrary professor than against the thing itself — which is nonetheless of much value in the scrutiny of truth. Whence he himself in On the Heavens II.80: "They seem," he says, "to seek up to a certain point, but not as far as is possible for the doubt.

For in all manners this is the custom: not for the question to be raised concerning the matter, but against him who says the contrary."

It is further objected that, if there were such a void place outside this world, it would be possible for another world to be there — contrary to the same Philosopher, On the Heavens I.76 and following, who variously rejects this. But who denies or doubts this conclusion, except perhaps one who also denies or doubts God's omnipotence? And if anyone shall do this, he will be corrected by the help of the first Supposition and the seventh part of the first Corollary of this book. And the Philosopher's arguments in this part are similar to his other subtleties recalled above.

And if anyone still should not cease objecting by saying: if the foregoing are true, then it is necessary that God be in this place however designated, which seems greatly to contravene His infinite omnipotence and most worthy liberty — nay, also to fetter Him unwillingly in prison, and to bind Him irrecoverably — let the objector observe that it can similarly be objected against him: with places and the placed, locations and the located actually existing, it is necessary that God be in any of those; it is similarly necessary that God be in the whole imaginary place, and even in some partial place — for otherwise He could be nowhere, and therefore not be at all.

Therefore this is in God not [a sign] of imperfection, of illiberality, or of any impotence, but of infinite power — just as also that He is necessarily pure act, that He necessarily actually thinks and knows anything whatever, however vile; just as also He necessarily generates, and this not a daughter but a Son, nor another Son, nor many, but this one only Son absolutely necessarily. Therefore it is of perfection and of infinite power that God is necessarily everywhere; for otherwise He would not be supremely perfect and powerful, since not supremely in act, or rather supreme act, but potential and movable; and accordingly imperfect in some respect, as the fifth chapter of this book has more fully shown.

These things are spoken and to be received not by way of rash assertion, but for the sake of sober inquiry.

Bradwardine, De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium, Book I

CHAPTER VI. THAT GOD HAS DISTINCT KNOWLEDGE OF ALL THINGS.

These things being thus established, it is certain that God has a knowledge of all things present, past, and likewise future — a knowledge supremely actual, particular, distinct, and certain. But who does not see that this shines forth from the ninth part of the first Corollary of this book? Yet to confirm it more fully, by way of cause, with certain reasons and testimonies will not be at all unprofitable. God therefore preserves, effects, and moves all things, as has been shown above, but not without disposing wisdom; for otherwise a prudent man would do his deeds better than the most glorious God does His — as the third part of the first Corollary teaches. Otherwise, too,

God would not naturally preside over wise men as their ruler, but rather the contrary; for according to the Philosopher, Metaphysics I, the wise man ought not to be ordered but to order, and ought not to be advised by another but rather to advise the less wise; and Ethics V.11, "We do not allow a man to rule, but reason"; and Politics I.1, "What can foresee with mind, this is by nature ruling and by nature lordly"; and Book III.9, "Whoever bids the intellect rule, seems to bid God and the laws to rule; but whoever bids the man rule, adds also the beast." He also says in On the Secret of Secrets, Part 1, ch. 4: "Know that the intellect is the head of governance"; and below, in Part 3, ch. 5, speaking of the king, he says: "In this he ought to be made like to God, and the king must therefore be likened to and imitate the Most High in all his works; for God is wise and knowing, and His proclamation and His glorious names are in Himself, and the greatness of His dominion is greater than commendation, and so likewise His wisdom." And below: "It was found written upon a stone in the Chaldean tongue, 'The king and the intellect are brothers, each needing the other, neither one without the other'"; but as is apparent from the first and second suppositions and from the seventeenth part, and is proved at the end of Metaphysics XII, He Himself is universally the one Prince of all beings; therefore He has wisdom that disposes all things sweetly.

Again: God knows some present singulars; therefore by the same reasoning He knows whatsoever singulars there are. For He loves and cares for only what He knows; but He loves and cares for those who live rationally, as the Philosopher says in Ethics X.13: "He who acts according to intellect and cherishes this, and is best disposed, seems to be most beloved of God. For if some care of human affairs comes from the gods, as it seems, it will surely be reasonable that they delight in what is best and most kindred — and this is the intellect — and that they reward most those who love and honor this, as friends well taken care of, working rightly and well." Where Averroes says: "If God has care of men, as is believed and as is fitting, He rejoices in the better, and it is more worthy that He should benefit those who love Him more, and honor them and visit them, as is the disposition of friend toward friend." Aristotle also in Rhetoric II.28 speaks thus: "If you speak just things, men will hate you; if unjust things, the gods will; but if you speak just things, the gods will love you; if unjust, men."

Again: otherwise God would not be a just rewarder of the good, nor an avenger of the evil — against many things laid down in the parts of the first Corollary of this book, and against Hermes, who says of God: "Who justifies the work of no evildoer, nor deprives any benefactor of rewards"; and against Aristotle in On the World, last chapter, who speaks thus of God: "Vengeance and justice always accompany Him." He also in On Good Fortune I says: "We deem God worthy as Lord of such things, that He may distribute to the worthy both goods and ills"; and in On the Consolation of Philosophy IV, prose 1, Philosophy thus answers Boethius: "It would be a thing of infinite astonishment, and more horrible than all monsters, if, as you reckon, in the most well-ordered house of so great a paterfamilias, the cheap vessels were cherished and the precious ones grew foul; but it is not so. For with Him, of whose kingdom we now speak, as your Author you will know that the good are always powerful, but the evil always abject and feeble — that vices are never without punishment, nor virtues without reward." Seneca too testifies to this in many places, and all moral philosophers, together with the poets, unanimously; nay, this is, as it were, the common conception of mind of all peoples living under any law, or even without law.

Further: it would seem superfluous and vain to hope in God and to pray to Him, unless He understood the hope and the prayers; but all men, of whatever sect, hope in God and pray to Him; whence also that pagan Aristotle in On the World 12 thus says: "All life grants the highest place to God, and we all stretch our hands to heaven when we pray." With this also accords his saying in Secret of Secrets, Part 1, ch. 2; and the saying of Avicenna, Metaphysics X.1, recited in the showing of the thirty-second part of the Corollary of the first chapter of this book. Does not Plato also, in the prologue to the Timaeus, say: "It is the custom of all, and as it were a kind of religion, that those about to do anything concerning the greatest or the least matters should pray for the help of Divinity, or otherwise pray for divine help" — and immediately he himself does this devoutly there, subjoining: "How much more fitting it is that we, who are about to set forth the rationale of the universal nature and substance, should invoke divine aid, unless we are plainly carried away by some savage frenzy and inexplicable madness! Let it therefore be comprehended in my prayers especially, that those things may be said by us which are pleasing to God, and likewise that we may produce things consistent with ourselves and fitting to the work proposed." And below at 21.17, about to treat of prime matter, he says: "Then also now we shall invoke the helper, the deliverer before the auspicious beginning of speech, from the turbulent and stormy tossing of discourse already begun." With whom Hermes concordantly, in On the Eternal Word 9, says: "We ask God to grant us the faculty of rendering this account." And below at the end: "Speaking this, we beseech God that He may will to preserve us persevering in the love of knowledge of Thee, and never separated from this kind of life." Sextus the Pythagorean also says in his Maxims: "Take a beginning from God in doing what you do"; and again, "Ask of God those things which it is worthy of God to bestow"; and again, "Seek from God those things which you cannot receive from man"; and below, "Unless you ask of God what you have, you will not perpetually retain it." Wherefore Boethius too, in On the Consolation of Philosophy V, last prose, speaks thus: "There remains a watcher above, foreknowing all things — God, dispensing rewards to the good and punishments to the evil; nor are hopes and prayers placed in God in vain, which when they are right cannot be ineffectual."

Further still, the knowledge of God is shown evidently through the glorious miracles done for His worshippers, often performed when they cried to Him in their necessities — concerning which the thirty-second part of the first Corollary of this book treated more fully.

Again: if God did not know any present things whatsoever, then a foolish man would know, and a beast would recognize many things which the most perfect God would be ignorant of. Again: if God knew some present things and not all, it is possible for the most blessed God to be deceived and to err, and to be exceedingly miserable. Wherefore Aristotle in Metaphysics III.15 leads Empedocles, who held that anything is known by its like and that God does not have hatred, to this impossible consequence: that the most blessed God would be less prudent than others. For He does not know all the elements, since He has no hatred; and notice indeed comes from like to like. And in On the World 11 he likens King Xerxes, who understood all things through his ministers, to God, who sees and hears all things. The very name of God in the Greek language testifies the same: for God in Greek is called Theos from theoro, which means "to see," because He sees all things. Wherefore Avicenna also, Metaphysics VIII.6, says: "The Necessary Being does not understand whatever is except universally; and yet with this no singular is lacking to Him, and therefore there is not lacking to Him that which is exceeding in heaven and on earth; and this is among the marvels which only one of subtle wit can imagine." Wherefore Sextus also in his Maxims admonishes: "Never think the wisdom of God to be insensible"; and again, "The thought of man is not hidden from God; and therefore let your thought be pure from all evil"; and below: "By no means will the one acting unjustly be hidden from God, nor even the one thinking it." With whom Ptolemy also concordantly, as is recited in the first prologue of the Almagest, says: "It is fitting that the intelligent should be ashamed before God when he thinks those things which are not pleasing to Him."

Further: there is some agent intellect that produces all our intellectual cognition and the science we have, as the Philosopher proves in On the Soul III.17, and Averroes there; and Avicenna On the Soul V.5; and al-Ghazali Physics V.1. Now this agent intellect, if it be God, the point is gained; but if, with Avicenna Metaphysics IX.3 and al-Ghazali Physics V.1, it be said to be the lowest intelligence of the heavens, namely of the orb of the Moon, then this knows all things; and if it knows all things, how then should the supreme Intelligence, God, be ignorant of any of these? Further: since any intelligence below God is of itself potential to understanding, just as it is to being, as appears from Book II of this work, who reduces its potentiality to act? Who perfects it and sustains it in act? Who makes it actually understanding, except the supreme Intelligence God, who from Himself and through Himself most actually always perseveres in understanding? This supreme Intelligence God therefore effects and preserves every act of understanding in every inferior intellectual nature, as the third, fourth, and second [parts] of this work plainly manifest. This view concerning the agent intellect — namely, that it is God — is confirmed by the Philosopher in On Good Fortune II, who says: "It is plain, just as in the whole God moves all things in some manner, so the divine principle of reason within us is not reason but something better; for what then will be better than science and intellect, unless God? For virtue, namely, is God's instrument of intellect." And below in Secret of Secrets, Part 1, ch. 1: "God," he says, "pours forth His riches abundantly into the souls of the wise, and bestows upon students the grace of knowing — to whom nothing is difficult, without whom nothing is possible to be possessed." The same in Part 2, ch. 1, of the same says: "God most high and glorious has revealed many things meditable, and very many other things, to His holy prophets, and to certain others whom He had foreordained, and illumined them with the spirit of divine wisdom, and adorned them with the gifts of knowledge." And Averroes intends the same on On the Soul III, comments 25 and 36, and on On Sleep and Waking, where he assigns the cause of true dreams; and on Metaphysics XII, comments 18 and 38. The Platonists also, as Augustine recites in City of God VIII.7, said that God Himself is the light of minds for learning all things — by whom all things were made. The same is testified by the prayers of Plato and Hermes recited above. For how would they ask of God that knowledge be given them, unless He Himself were the Lord and teacher of knowledge? Wherefore Plato, Timaeus II.15, says that "no greater good than philosophy ever passed to the human race by divine munificence." And Hermes, On the Eternal Word 35: "To Thee, supreme God," he says, "I give thanks, who hast illumined me with the light for seeing divinity." And below at the end: "Thanks," he says, "be to Thee, most supreme, most exalted. For by Thy grace alone have we obtained so great a light of knowledge of Thee, since Thou deignest to bestow upon all paternal piety and religion, love, and whatever sweeter efficacy there is."

From these things it is therefore clear that God knows all things now present; and by the same reasonings it will likewise be shown that He always knew, and will know, all things which were then, or will be, present. And since by the fifth [part] of this book He learns nothing anew, nor loses anything once known, He Himself always knows all things present, past, and future. Whence also Aristotle in On Good Fortune II says: "God well sees the future and the present, and the things whose ratio has perished" — that is, the past. With whom Ammonius accords on Peri Hermeneias I, last [section], thus writing: "It must indeed be said that the gods know all things made, existing, and future, in a manner befitting gods; and this is by one, determinate, and infallible knowledge — wherefore indeed it must also be said that they comprehend the science of contingents." And below: "It is the nature of the gods themselves," he says, "to know contingent things; and on this account, while these things, having an indeterminate nature, can both happen and not happen, they nevertheless, as it were by a more noble mode than is their own nature, foretaking the cognition of them, know these things determinately. For it is necessary that they know divisible things indivisibly, and things-without-distance, and things multiplied unitively, and temporal things eternally, and generable things ingenerably." Wherefore also Avicenna On the Soul IV.2 says: "All things which are in the world — past, present, and future — have being in the wisdom of the Creator." Hermes moreover, On the Eternal Word 9, says: "Nor is it credible that what has pleased God should displease Him, since He has long known beforehand the future, and that the same would please." And below at 30, he says that "divinity is the foreknowledge of all things." The foreknowledge of God is also specially proved by clear prophecies, clear visions, and truthful dreams, true presagings of things to come — concerning all of which the thirty-second part of the first Corollary of this book has more fully treated.

In this view all the philosophers of whom I have heard agree, except one, who in this matter is no philosopher but rather a windbag and a sophist — nay, he does not even merit the name of sophist, since he has no semblance of one. For this Cicero wrote a rather large book On Divination, in which, by reciting the most truthful dreams of many — or rather the clearest visions — he lucidly demonstrated divination through dreams. But, fallen to the contrary side, he answers all things, solving none, by denying every divination and foreknowledge of any kind whatsoever; who also, with sacrilegious daring placing his mouth in heaven, broke forth into such blind blasphemy as to deny that God Himself foreknew the future — saying perhaps with the fool, with the fool in his heart, "There is no God"; or otherwise, more foolishly and tastelessly than the foolish, was wise, namely that God is, and that He is foolish and ignorant of the future. Now further: astrologers and physicians often by natural signs prognosticate and predict many future things; how then does God not know any of those future things? How also have geomancers, necromancers, augurs, and other diviners — yes, and the gods of the Gentiles — often spoken many true things, as your many histories, Marcus the Roman, attest, without any knowledge or at least probable conjecture concerning future things? And if they themselves had even a small such knowledge, or some most slender conjecture however weak, yet true, who not knowing — or rather, going mad — will dare to assert that God is ignorant of future things, when, by the first Supposition and the third and fourth parts of the first Corollary of this book, it must necessarily follow that He knows them infinitely more perfectly?

Further: if God, according to what has been laid down, has knowledge of all things present, past, and likewise future — since to know actually and particularly, distinctly and certainly, is more perfect than to know only habitually, potentially and universally, confusedly and uncertainly — God knows all things in those modes; nay, He knows all things supremely, and according to the highest of those modes, as the first Supposition and the third and fourth parts lucidly manifest.

COROLLARY.

It has a corollary, that God has distinct knowledge of all things — not only of present, past, and future, but also of all possibles and impossibles, of all things imaginable and knowable in any way; whence also He may truly be called Omniscient, just as He is Omnipotent.

Whence also it evidently follows that our most wise God not only has knowledge of this kind of all things present, past, and future, but also of all possibles and impossibles, of all things imaginable and knowable in any way whatever; whence also He may truly be called Omniscient, just as Omnipotent. This Corollary, or porism, is easily demonstrated through the foregoing, just as the prior conclusion. These things I have said against those who have not proved that God has in His knowledge — "The Lord shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob understand" — and who believe that all worldly things, destitute of all governance, are driven by chance motions. But because in this no Catholic even slightly hesitates, I have thought no Catholic authority needs to be adduced, although the whole series of both Testaments most fully testifies to this.

Thomas Bradwardine, De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium

Book I, Chapters 7–12

CHAPTER VII. HE OBJECTS AGAINST [CHAPTER] SIX, AND RESOLVES [THE OBJECTIONS].

Here perhaps some sophistical sower of words will object in this manner: To every multitude it is fitting at least imaginably to add a unit; therefore [it is fitting to add one] to the multitude of all things known by God. But if such a unit be added, it follows that God does not distinctly know that whole second [C] multitude, since one of its units, namely, that newly added one, He does not know. Likewise, let A be the multitude of all imaginable points known by God, B the multitude of all imaginable souls known by God, C the multitude of all imaginable angels known by God, and D the multitude composed of B and C alone; then A is equal to B and C taken separately, and therefore less than D. It can therefore be increased imaginably to equality with that [D]; but if this be supposed, God does not know that whole multitude A so increased distinctly. Likewise, suppose, according to Aristotle's view, that the world is eternal in the past, and let A be the multitude of all past days in the divine mind, according to that prophetic saying, "I have meditated on the days of old, and have had the eternal years in mind"; and let B be the multitude of all past years, eclipses, or equinoxes; then A is greater than B. This is plain: for as the days of one year stand to that year, so all the days taken together stand to all the years taken together; [D] and the same is to be thought concerning the multitude of eclipses and equinoxes. Otherwise, A would also be equal to B, and so the part to the whole. By the same reasoning also, the multitude of all hours and minutes whatsoever, indeed even of instants, would be equal to the multitude of eclipses, equinoxes, common years and great years, and indeed even to the multitude of myriads of years of any kind whatever; and therefore even the multitude of all past instants simply would be equal to the multitude of equinoctial, eclipsal, annual, and myriadal instants — that is, those which begin or terminate eclipses, lesser or greater years, or myriads of years — which who would concede? Therefore A is greater than B. But if you concede this, let there be distributed, imaginably or truly, in the divine mind, one [unit] of yesterday's day and the next unit of B — that is, one and the next past eclipse — and to the day before yesterday the eclipse next before that, and so onwards always proceeding continuously and retrogressively; and at length, the whole distribution being completed, to each unit of A there will correspond equally one unit of B, and conversely, which is most clearly evident. Otherwise, somewhere in [E] some past day such a distribution of units of B would cease, and since that day is distant from the present day by finitely many days only, B would have only finitely many units. Therefore the units of A and B mutually correspond to one another equally; therefore those whole multitudes are equal. Indeed, B is even greater than A by as much as you please — by double, by tenfold, and so on. For to each unit of A let there be distributed, in the manner described before, two, or ten, or however many units of B you wish, and so on, as above. Therefore God does not distinctly know such whole multitudes, and therefore not any infinite multitude.

Likewise, I can imagine, at least fictitiously, something which God does not understand; and so I do, and I understand it. Therefore I understand something which God does not understand; and so I do, and I understand that which God does not understand. To the same effect: when you hear something uttered which God does not understand, [A] you understand something by what is uttered; therefore you understand what God does not understand; therefore God does not understand all intelligible things.

Likewise, if God understands all intelligible things, and yet cannot do them all (because He cannot do impossible things), He is more intelligent than He is powerful; therefore He is not omnipotent, nor of infinite power: for everything less than another is finite. To the same: if His power is less than His intelligence, it could at least imaginably be increased to equality with it, and so He could become more powerful than He is now.

Likewise, the multitude of all really existing points, or even of possible or imaginable points, is simply infinite. For otherwise yet one further point could be added to them, and so the first multitude posited as that of all points would not be of all points. Therefore that multitude fills and satiates the whole capacity of the divine intelligence. For it is not in any respect less than it, since otherwise it would be in some way finite, and not simply infinite.

Likewise, if God understands all things, then either confusedly or distinctly. Not confusedly, on account of the preceding chapter; nor distinctly, because then He would have in Himself certain things, and as many things really distinct, as He distinctly knows. For some really distinct things are necessarily required for making any distinction, as appears from the demonstration in part 36 of Corollary 1 of this [book]. [B] Nor can anyone concede a multitude — whether infinite or finite — of really diverse cognitive habits or acts in God, on account of part 26 of Corollary 1 of this [book].

Likewise, the Philosopher in Metaphysics XII.51, by many arguments shows that God does not understand anything other than Himself; and there Averroes shows that the knowledge of God is not universal, since universal knowledge implies potency with respect to singulars, and there is no potency in His knowledge, as he supposes; nor is it particular, as he argues, since particulars are infinite, and are not determined by knowledge. Therefore the proposition is plain.

Likewise, the Lord says to certain ones: "Amen I say to you, I do not know you," Matthew 25; and above, in the same [Gospel], chapter 24: "But of that day and hour no one knows, neither the angels of heaven, nor the Son." And Genesis 22: "God tempted Abraham," and after the experience said to Abraham, "Now I know that thou fearest God"; therefore He did not know this beforehand, or He spoke vainly thus. And Exodus 16: "The Lord said to Moses, I will rain bread for you from heaven, and let the people gather, [C] that I may tempt them, whether they will walk in my law, or not." And Deuteronomy 13: "The Lord your God tempts you, that He may openly know whether you love Him or not." And Jeremiah 11 it is written thus: "I did not know, because they had thought up counsels."

Likewise, the saints frequently rouse the Lord that He may know, saying: "Hear, see, understand, remember, O Lord, this or that"; "Be mindful, think upon, recall" — as appears most frequently in Scripture, which would not be so if He always knew all things actually and distinctly. And Scripture often commemorates God as sometimes remembering some things, and forgetting some things, and repenting of some things.

Likewise, Tobit 12, Raphael said: "I offered your prayer to the Lord."

Likewise, Jerome, on Habakkuk 1, "He shall make the face of man as the fishes of the sea, and as the creeping things that have no ruler," says: "It is absurd to bring down the divine majesty to this — that He should know moment by moment how many gnats are born or die, what number of fleas and flies there is, how many fish swim in the waters, and the like."

Likewise, that God does not know all true contingents concerning the future seems [to follow]; because this would be either necessarily or [D] contingently. Not necessarily, because they are not necessarily true, and therefore not necessarily known. Nor contingently, because then He could not know them; and because nothing not true is known by God, every true contingent contingently is not true; therefore at least, as far as possibility goes, no true contingent is contingently known by God. For the Philosopher teaches in Prior Analytics I, where he treats of the mixture of contingent and de inesse [premises], that with the major premise de inesse (not as "now," or "at this time," but simply), and the minor concerning a contingent in either direction, the conclusion follows concerning a contingent as far as the possible. The same is proved thus: Every true contingent contingently is not true; therefore let it be posited as actual, and the proposition is had. The mode of arguing is plain by the Philosopher in the place above cited, who proves the said mixture by this: that from the opposite of the conclusion (which will be a necessary one), and the minor posited as actual, there follows, in the mixture of necessary and de inesse shown previously, a conclusion of the necessary which infers the opposite of the first major premise.

[E] But to this fool sophistically chattering against the divine wisdom, according to the counsel of the Wise One, it is fitting to respond according to his folly, lest he seem wise to himself. It can therefore be said, not improbably, in the first place, that this argument does not impugn the divine knowledge: for if anyone concedes that there is some multitude of all things known by God, he will deny to you the other thing you assume — namely, that to every multitude another unit can be added — and will say that this is true only of a finite multitude, to which infinite units necessarily are lacking, but not of a simply infinite multitude, which contains all units.

Or perhaps, may it not be said in another way, no less probably, that this little argument does not stand against, nor resist, the divine knowledge? For it argues equally that there is no multitude of all imaginable or knowable things, as that God has no knowledge of such a multitude. For that God does not know such a multitude can be conceived in two ways: either because such a multitude exists and God does not know it, which no one suspects unless ignorantly or lightly; [A] or because no such multitude exists in any mode of being, and therefore is not intelligible or knowable in any way — just as it is not knowable that man is non-man, ass, or lion. And this seems to be sayable not implausibly. For if there were any multitude of all imaginable, or knowable, things simply, there would also be some multitude of all imaginable or knowable points, of all such souls, and likewise of angels, as the following argument touches.

Let A therefore be the multitude of all imaginable or knowable points, B of all such souls, C of all such angels; and D the whole multitude composed of B and C alone, as was posited above. Of these three multitudes, then, each is, as it seems, equal to each: for no reason can be given why this should exceed that rather than the contrary. If, moreover, one of these — say B — be less than another — say C — it can be imaginably increased to equality with it. Therefore B did not from the beginning contain all imaginable souls; and C could be diminished to equality [B] with B and yet still contain all imaginable angels — for nothing would be subtracted from it, since if anything were, how much? Who would reasonably say how much? — which involves a contradiction. Therefore these three multitudes, A, B, C, are each equal to each, and D is double each of them taken singly, as the premises show, near the last part of Corollary 1 of this [book].

It seems therefore possible for A to be increased imaginably to equality with D. For why cannot a lesser number be increased, at least according to imagination, to equality with a greater, just as conversely? Indeed, I imagine A as equal to D. For I imagine each unit of D to have one proper point of its own. Why, I ask, could not the multitude of such irrational unit-points be, or be imagined to be, equal to the multitude of rational units of souls and angels? What hinders? What resists? Indeed, I imagine each soul and angel to have within itself ten, a hundred, or however many species or likenesses of things known you wish. These therefore are more numerous than those; and why can I not imagine as many points? Indeed, I imagine each species [C] to be a point, or to possess its own point. I imagine moreover each soul and angel to be turned into new points, while the prior points remain. Is not therefore the whole multitude of imaginable points augmented? I imagine likewise that each point and each soul is turned into an angel, while the prior angels remain; is not therefore the whole multitude of imaginable angels imaginably increased?

To these things, moreover, let E be the multitude of all imaginable luminous points, and F the multitude of all imaginable dark points, and G the multitude composed from them. Either E is equal to A, or less. Not equal, because it is part of it just as part of G, and because then it would be equal to its whole G. Nor less, because by the same reasoning it would be less than B and C taken separately, which can be destroyed by the previous arguments. I imagine moreover that every point becomes luminous; therefore the multitude E is made equal to the multitude A. The like can be argued concerning souls and angels, supposing some multitude to be of all imaginable wise or good souls, and another to be of all imaginable [D] foolish or evil souls; and concerning the angels in like manner, etc., as above.

Furthermore, a similar prior-argument could be made concerning men whole in body and soul, concerning their hands, fingers, teeth, and hairs; nay, even concerning the points of their bodies. For given the hypothesis, it follows evidently that any multitude of all such imaginable things — say of men, or of human bodies — would be equal to any like multitude — say of hands, of fingers, of teeth, of hairs, indeed even of points. From these things, as it seems, it can not improbably appear that there is no multitude of all imaginable or knowable things in any species — of points, of souls, or the like — and therefore not universally of all things; just as there is also no multitude of all finite imaginable things, nor any multitude of all those things that are not all, although there are many things which are not all; nor any multitude of all things that are few, even in the divine persons three [in number]; nor any multitude of all things compossible from the number of four signified possible contradictories.

Yet to no one ought it to be doubtful [E] that every multitude of knowable things in any way whatever, and any multitude whatever of knowable things, is most distinctly known by God, as the next preceding [chapter] teaches. And if you still do not cease to chatter on — "therefore God does not know how many points He knows" — nay rather, He does know, for He knows that He knows two; and if you understand by "how many" "however many at the most or greatest, so that no more," there is perhaps someone who will concede this — not because God is ignorant of any multitude of points or any points, but because there is no multitude of all the points He knows, as the previous [arguments] persuaded.

For in like manner you would have to concede that God does not know how many finite points He knows; that He does not know how many sides or angles He knows can be contained in a rectilineal, equilateral, and equiangular figure; that He does not know how many feet He knows can be in the circumference or diameter of a circle; [A] that He does not know into how many equal parts He knows a continuum can be simultaneously and actually divided. Indeed, perhaps — what to some seems more wonderful — that God does not know that finite points can be as many as He knows finite points can be; that God does not know that a finite rectilineal [figure] can have as many equal sides and equal angles as He knows a finite rectilineal [figure] can have; that God does not know that a circle can be as great as He knows a circle can be; that God does not know that a continuum can be divided into as many parts as He knows it can be divided; that God does not know what the common measure is which measures together the side of a square and its diameter — although He knows full well concerning quadrangles; that He does not know which are all things that are not all, which are all the things that are fewer than three, which are all the divine persons fewer than three divine persons, although He knows well that all the many things fewer than three are two. And all this is not on account of any defect of knowledge or cognition in God, but because these things are not knowable, like falsehoods and impossibilities; and therefore they cannot be comprehended by knowledge.

That which is consequently argued [concerning past days, etc.] is solved perhaps by [B] the same point: for it does not derogate from the divine knowledge, but rather rejects [the existence of] such a multitude. For with Aristotle's opinion posited, perhaps no multitude exists of all the days, years, eclipses, or equinoxes prior in the divine mind, nor outside it — just as there is no multitude of all the finite ones of these, nor of all those of them which are not all; yet God most distinctly knows every multitude of these past things, and all these past things. Or perhaps by this argument leading to an impossibility, Aristotle's opinion can be rejected and the opposite demonstrated; since according to his opinion, just as there is some whole infinite time, so there is also some whole infinite multitude of all days, months, and other such things, as the Corollary of the first [chapter] touches.

Some will perhaps respond by confessing that A and B and all such multitudes are mutually coequal. But this insolence has been refuted before. And when you further propose that you can imagine, at least fictitiously, something that God does not understand, and so proceed further — O you who are less than understanding! Why are you unwilling to understand that by your own sword [C] you can likewise be struck back? For if you can imagine in any way that God does not understand [something], why can you not likewise imagine that you yourself do not understand? Since there are many — and far more — things you do not understand than you distinctly understand. And why do you not further deduce from this that you understand something which you do not understand? And when further with foolish mouth you bubble forth foolishness, saying, "When you hear something uttered which God does not understand, you understand something by what is uttered" — out of your own mouth I judge you by your own words: "When you hear something uttered which you do not understand, you understand something by what is uttered," and so on, as before. But this folly I leave to those men to chew on further, by whom that which is foolish of God is accepted as wiser [than they are].

When it is argued that, if God understands all things, He understands more than He can [do], it must be said that whatever God understands, He can understand. Therefore it does not follow that God is more intelligent than He is powerful. But if you speak of being able to produce externally, in this way — not properly but very improperly — He is more intelligent than He is powerful, because with respect to whatever He is [D] able [to do], He is intelligent, but not conversely. And so it does not further follow that He is not omnipotent. For He is truly called omnipotent because He can [do] every possible thing, not because He can [do] every imaginable thing or what can be feigned to be — as Lombard proves in Sentences I, distinction 42. Although there, by the sayings of the saints, he likewise shows that God is called omnipotent because He can do whatever He wills, which can fittingly be understood thus: that He is truly called omnipotent because He can [do] whatever He wills — that is, whatever can be willed by Him to be done; and this is every possible thing, as has been said. And He is likewise said to be of infinite productive power as to the outside, because His power is not bounded to some possible, nor to certain possibles, which He cannot.

The other argument concerning the multitude of all real possible or imaginable points does not proceed. For just as it argues that this multitude fills and satiates the whole capacity of the divine intellect, so it could be argued that the same would fill and satiate the whole capacity of being or possibility of being, so that nothing else could exist. The same is also otherwise solved by the premises.

[E] To the next [argument] I say that God most distinctly understands all things, not by any distinct things in Him, but only by His most singular and most simple clarity, which from the multitude of His infinite virtue and strength is equivalent — nay, incomparably surpasses — every multitude of likenesses, exemplars, ideas, habits, acts, and accidents whatsoever, as the third and fourth parts of Corollary 1 teach. And this is what most faithful and most eloquent Isaiah testifies in chapter 40, saying: "Lift up your eyes on high, and see who hath created these things; who bringeth out their host by number, and calleth them all by name; by the greatness of his might, and strength, and power, not one was missing" — that is, according to the gloss, alien from his number and knowledge.

The philosophical authorities alleged to the contrary are to be understood concerning beings of finite strength and virtue. Such beings, as it appears, cannot distinctly know anything except through certain [things] correspondingly [A] distinct — unless perhaps this is by that divine clarity, supplying in them, by its infinite virtue, the office of such distinct things.

For the authority of the Philosopher, it must be said that he does not intend to prove that God does not understand anything other than Himself, but he proves these three things: that God does not understand in potency; that God is His own intelligence; and that God does not understand anything other than Himself in such a way that He should be acted upon, and causally perfected by it, like the human intellect — which can be apparent to those who read, and are not negligent of, that chapter with the expositions of Averroes, Thomas, and other Doctors.

For that Gospel saying which follows, it is to be known that God's knowledge is twofold: namely, of simple cognition or notice, and of approbation and complacency, which adds to simple cognition or notice approbation, good pleasure, and complacency of the will. This distinction appears through Blessed Gregory in Moralia XXV, last [chapter], treating that text of Matthew 25, "Amen, I say to you, I do not know you"; nor can it be otherwise understood except that He does not approve, or reproves, those whom He thus does not know. For He knows by simple [B] notice those to whom He will so speak. Whence also the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 8: "If any man love God, the same is known by him." This distinction also Lombard alleges, Sentences I, distinction 36, from Cassiodorus on the Psalter, and from Augustine likewise, and in his book to Helvidius, where he says: "If you refer it to knowledge, God is not ignorant of those to whom He shall say, 'I do not know you'; but their reproof is insinuated by this word." And in Eighty-three Questions, 60: "When God is said not to know, it is said for this — that He does not approve; that is, in His discipline and doctrine He does not acknowledge." And there he subjoins a third sense of the same saying: "It is said, 'I do not know you,' for this reason — that He profitably makes them not to know what it is unprofitable to know"; and so God is said not to know, in the sense of making not to know.

There he likewise expounds the other authorities objected: "Just as," he says, "God is said to know also when He makes someone know, as it is written, 'The Lord your God tempts you, that He may know if you love Him.' For it is not so said because God does not know, but that they themselves may know how much they have advanced in His love, which is not fully known by men except by trials. Therefore it is well taken what is said, that the Father alone [C] knows of that day, because He alone makes the Son to know; and what is said, that the Son does not know, because He makes men not to know — that is, He does not bring forth to them that which they would know unprofitably." And this last mode of speaking of Scripture he proves in On the Trinity I.12 efficaciously, and diffusely in On Genesis V.20, and on the title of Psalm 6; and the same exposition appears through the glosses on the places previously alleged. Whence on the text of Genesis 22, "God tempted Abraham," the Gloss says, "that He might make known to him the perfection which He Himself was not ignorant of"; and on the text below, in the same chapter, "Now I know," etc. — that is, "I have made him to know."

For the others which follow, it must be said that God's hearing, seeing, and the like can be understood in three ways. Properly, as they import the operations or proper passions of the senses, and so they do not pertain to God: for He is not an animal, nor has He bodily senses. Transumptively, and this in two ways: namely, either as they import divine cognition or affection — and the saints do not understand it thus when they say, "Lord, hear, see," or anything similar (for in these things [the divine knowledge] always uniformly remains the same); or as they import the extrinsic work and effect of divine cognition or affection, [D] and so the saints understand it when they pray.

And because, according to the Philosopher in Topics VI, "All who transfer [terms metaphorically] transfer them according to some likeness," this likeness was the cause why such things are transferred by men to God. Men, when they see or hear, are angered and appeased; they know and are interiorly affected, whence also they exteriorly operate. Therefore these causes are often figuratively put for their effects: as "hand" for "writing," when we say of good handwriting, "this is a good hand"; and "tongue" for "speech," when we say, "He spoke in the English tongue," or "in Latin" — that is, in such speech. And this is the 33rd rhetorical color of the embellishment of words, as Tully in book II at the end of his Rhetoric makes clear, from which the denomination is denominated. There is also in such cases the second mode of equivocation, or amphiboly, since the diction or speech is taken transumptively, when we are accustomed to speak thus, as appears through the Philosopher in Sophistical Refutations I, where he ascertains and clarifies the doubtful and obscure meanings of amphiboly. Which mode of speaking in sacred Scripture is sometimes transferred not only to God, but even to inanimate things. For [E] the Lord says in Hosea 2: "I will hear the heavens, and they shall hear the earth, and the earth shall hear the wheat, the wine, and the oil, and these shall hear Israel."

Whence Augustine on the text of Psalm 118, "Be mindful of thy word to thy servant," speaks thus: "Does forgetfulness, as in man, fall upon God? Why then is it said to Him, 'Remember'?" And he answers: "These things are not understood in God as they happen to men. For just as God is said to repent when, beyond the hope of men, He changes things, His counsel not being changed (because the counsel of the Lord stands forever), so He is said to forget when His help, or what was promised, seems delayed, or when He does not requite the worthy to sinners, or anything of this kind — as if that which is hoped for, or feared, has slipped from His memory and is not done. These things are said in this human manner of speech, by which the human affection is moved, although God does these things by a certain disposition, His memory not failing, His understanding not obscured, His will not changed. When therefore it is said to Him, 'Remember,' the desire of the petitioner is shown, since he asks the promise; and God is not, as if it had slipped from His mind, admonished. 'Be mindful,' he says, 'of Thy word to Thy servant' — that is, fulfil Thy promise to Thy servant." And in Eighty-three Questions 52 he shows the same throughout; and at the end of On the Repentance of God he says: "We are not accustomed to change something certain, and to transfer it into another, except by repenting; although divine providence administers all things by a most certain order, yet to humble human understanding, those things which begin to be, and do not endure as long as they were hoped to endure, are said, as it were by the repentance of God, to have been removed." The Gloss also on Genesis 6, where the repentance of God concerning the making of men is treated, says: "Repentance does not fall upon God, whose sentence concerning all things is as fixed as His foreknowledge is certain; but Scripture uses customary words, accommodating itself to our littleness, that from the known we may know the unknown. He seems therefore to repent when He changes the work, while His will and disposition remain immovable." [B] In another way also, "God repents" can be expounded — namely, as bearing Himself after the manner of one who repents; for which the Gloss on 1 Samuel 15, "It repents me that I made Saul king," says: "That is, I shall do as one repenting, by destroying his kingdom." And this exposition agrees with Augustine, Eighty-three Questions 52, alleged above; with which Anselm also agrees, in Cur Deus Homo I.9, expounding the text in Luke 2, "Jesus advanced in wisdom," etc. He says: "Not that it was so, but that He bore Himself thus, as if it were so." And this is what Lombard says, Sentences III, distinction 13, last [section].

What is alleged concerning Raphael — that he offered Tobit's prayer to the Lord — does not conclude that the Lord did not know it before, and learned it then from him. Rather, that he offered the prayer before the Lord was nothing else than to consult the divine will concerning such a prayer — whether and how much, when, or how it ought to be heard. Or perhaps Raphael's offering Tobit's prayer to the Lord was to commend it to the Lord by his own prayers. Whence Augustine, on Genesis V.19, says thus: "Not indeed for the knowledge of inferior things does He need messengers, as if through them He should become more knowing, [C] but in that simple and wonderful mode He knows all things stably and unchangeably. Yet He has messengers for our sake, and for their own sake, since to obey and assist God in this manner — to consult Him concerning lower things, and to obey His precepts and commands — is good for them in the order of their proper nature and substance."

The authority of Jerome resolves itself, in this — that he said "moment by moment." For God knows all things at once and always, not by alternations of time; just as the things known begin to be or cease in the human manner — since with Him there is no alteration, nor shadow of vicissitude (James 1, and chapter 5 has demonstrated). It is also resolved by what he subjoins consequently: "Let us not," he says, "be so foolish flatterers of God, that while we thrust His providence even down to the lowest things, we be injurious to ourselves, saying that the same care is for irrational and rational things." Jerome therefore wishes to deny to God the knowledge by which He provides for irrational creatures as for rational ones; for to these He has appointed laws, and rewards or punishments eternal, but not to those. And this is what the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians [D] 9: "Doth God take care for oxen?" — that is, such care as directs them in merits and crowns them in rewards — although, according to the Wise One, Wisdom 6 and 12, "God's care is over all," that is, by which "He reaches mightily from end to end, and orders all things sweetly" in His ways. And these are the responses of Lombard, Sentences I, distinction 39.

That mixed argument can be easily excluded: for as it argues against the divine knowledge, so it can be argued against the truth of contingents themselves. For nothing not true is true; every true contingent in either direction contingently is not true, therefore it is contingent for the possible; no true contingent is true; therefore it is contingent that neither part of the contradiction in such things is true, but both equally false. So therefore from this logical, not theological, snare the theologians are extricated, and the logicians are entangled.

CHAPTER VIII. [E] THAT GOD HAS VOLITION AND LOVE BOTH GENERALLY AND SPECIALLY TOWARD WHATEVER [EXISTS].

Now it consequently remains to show that God has volition and love generally and specially toward all things; since, according to what has been previously [shown], God conserves, makes, and moves all things, and not without cognition and a wisdom disposing — as the sixth [chapter] of this [book] showed. But these things, without will, conserve nothing, make nothing, nor move anything: for His knowledge alone, by itself, is as much of impossibles as of possibles, and of possibles which will never be done as of things to be done; and as much of past things as of future; and as much of remote future things as of those near at hand; and as much of all future things [A] as of present things, which are now actually being done or are conserved as already done. If therefore knowledge alone, of itself, made or preserved anything, it would always and at once make all the aforesaid things.

Likewise, divine cognition of itself appears indifferent to making or not making; nay, it does not, of itself alone, appear factive. Therefore it can effect nothing unless it be limited by something determining; but this can be posited as nothing other than divine actual volition.

Likewise, it appears thus in the production of things by God, as in the production of progressive motion in an animal. In the latter, knowledge alone does not suffice, but with this, appetite is required, as Aristotle proves in On the Soul III, where he inquires the principle of this motion. He proves first that it is not the vegetative power; second, that it is not the sensitive power; third, that it is not reason, nor speculative or practical intellect; fourth, that not even appetite is master of this motion; fifth, that these two — namely, phantasy and appetite, or intellect and will — move the animal progressively. These things appear through Averroes there more expressly, comment 44 and following; and the same is proved in On the Motion of Animals [B] manifestly.

Likewise, according to the Philosopher in Ethics IX.7: "Every artificer loves his work, and every benefactor loves the one who is well-treated, that is, the one to whom he does good — and this more than he is loved in return." And all things are works of God the highest Artificer, as the foregoing have taught, and His benefits most liberally distributed.

Likewise, because otherwise God would not preserve nor act, nor act freely; for no action is free which does not proceed from a free will. And so a peasant or servile man would be freer than God. Otherwise also God would have no will (against the eighth part of Corollary 1 of this [book]), or He could not use His own will — with other infinite absurdities. Moreover, the free and voluntary mode of operating outwardly is better and nobler than the other, and therefore the rational power, which operates in such a manner, is reckoned nobler than the irrational, which operates otherwise. This mode therefore of operating outwardly toward whatever is to be attributed to God, witness the third part of Corollary 1 of this [book].

This same view also certain authorities cited in the second [chapter] of this work clearly attest. And Algazel says, Metaphysics III, sentence 7: "The First is willing, [C] and all things flow from Him, and they are pleasing to Him, nor does He hate any of them." This was looked upon from afar by the ancient Empedocles. For he, as Aristotle reports in Metaphysics III.15, posited two general principles of things, namely Love and Hatred; but in God he posited love toward all things, without hatred of anything. With which the Wise One agrees in Wisdom 11, addressing the Lord thus: "Thou lovest all things that are, and hatest none of the things that Thou hast made; for how could anything endure if Thou hadst not willed it? Or be preserved which were not called by Thee?"

CHAPTER IX. THAT THE DIVINE WILL IS THE EFFICIENT CAUSE OF EVERY THING MADE, THE MOVER OR MOTRIX OF EVERY MOTION, AND UNIVERSALLY [D] THE MOST LOVING GENETRIX, NURTURER, AND LIFE-GIVING CONSERVATRIX OF ALL.

To this should be joined, I judge, [the proposition] that the divine will is the efficient cause of every thing made, the mover or motrix of every motion, and universally the most loving genetrix and life-giving conservatrix of all things. This whole follows manifestly from chapters 3, 4, and 2, with the next preceding [chapter]. It can also be confirmed by certain rational arguments and by philosophical and theological authorities.

For in causes of this kind there is no infinite progress, by the second supposition; therefore there is some one first cause of all, which is God, as has been shown above. But this cannot be posited [E] as God in His absolute essence, since this, as far as it depends upon itself, stands equally and indifferently to possibles which will never come to be, as to things to be made; and to remote future things, as to those near; and to things moved, as to things at rest. Therefore all these things would similarly and equally be always [in being] — especially because, if anything were made by His essence alone, without any will, it would be made by the mode of nature and necessity, like the effects of natural causes (since freedom is placed in the will alone). And such natural causes, when they can [act], with the due disposition of the patient supposed, necessarily and always act. For in this these causes differ from voluntary causes participating reason, as appears in Metaphysics IX.10, and likewise in the commentary. Wherefore, since all inferior or secondary causes in any of their causations are necessarily subjected [A] to the first cause, all their causations, as also any causation of the first cause, would proceed from the necessity of nature, and altogether absolute. Therefore universally all freedom, contingency, and merit would be destroyed.

For it does not befit the natural order of causes that the inferior secondary cause should be freer than the supreme first, nor is it possible in any way. For this is the regulator in all things, that the necessarily regulated in all things; this the subjecter, that the subjected; this the preceding and dominating, that the following in all things and the handmaid.

Also, if God acted outwardly purely naturally, He would act according to the utmost of His power, and therefore necessarily of infinite [power]; and every effect of His would be simply infinite and equal to Himself, since He can do more than every lesser thing, as the first supposition shows. Nor can the cause of all such things be posited as the divine cognition alone, as the next preceding chapter showed. Therefore no such sufficient cause remains, unless the divine will be posited.

Likewise, whoever acts something freely, acts it voluntarily; but God acts freely whatever He acts outwardly. For thus to act is more perfect; otherwise also the giving of [B] thanks would be irrational, and the prayers of all toward God vain.

Likewise, otherwise God would have no will, or would not use His own will in all the aforesaid effects which are from Him, as has been shown above — which yet, without doubt, more befits Him.

This same is attested by many philosophers. For learned Plato, Timaeus I.1, where he treats of the generation of the world, speaking of God says thus: "He was the best from the best; envy, moreover, was far removed. So consequently He willed all things to be made similar to Himself, in proportion as the nature of each was capable of beatitude. Which will of God, indeed, if anyone posits as the most certain origin of things, I think he rightly judges." Behold, as to the production of things by God; for the conservation of things by God he holds the same view in [Timaeus] II.3, as is more fully reported in chapter 2 of this [book].

With him also his disciple Aristotle agrees, in On the World 13, when he says universally that what the sailor or pilot is in a ship — according to another translation, the charioteer in a chariot, the choragus in choruses, the law in a city, the leader in an army or host (according to another translation) — this God is in the world. For He, immobile, [C] moves and bears about all things whither He wills, by diverse ideas and natures.

And below, in the same: "Vines, palms, and Persian fig-trees, sweet [trees] and olives, as the Poet says — and unfruitful ones, whose work is yet for another purpose, like the plane, the pine, the box, the linden, poplars, cypress, and the like; living things also, both domestic and wild, which dwell in the air, on land, or in water, are generated, grow, and are corrupted, obeying divine decrees" (according to another translation, "commands"). But decrees and commands are works of the will.

The same, above, in the same chapter 9: "As when the choragus begins, the whole chorus sings together with various voices, sharp and grave, continuing one continuous harmony, so the case stands with God, who disposes all things. For according to the supernal infusion from the said Choragus, the stars are always moved, and the whole heaven proceeds; the bright Sun, dividing day and night, and the four seasons of the year. There are also rains, and winds, and dews, and passions [of the elements], on account of the first and original cause. There follow from these the flowing of rivers, the inundations of the sea, the rising of trees, the maturing of fruits, the generations of animals, [D] the nourishments and increases of all, and corruptions, the condition of each cooperating to these things. When therefore the Leader of all things (according to another translation, the Prince) and Begetter beckons (according to another translation, commands) to every nature spread between heaven and earth, it is moved continually in its proper circles and bounds (according to another translation, terms); now disappearing, now appearing, showing a thousand ideas (according to another translation, forms), and again hiding, from one principle." To beckon and to command is an operation of the will.

The same in Secret of Secrets I, part 23: "The king is in his kingdom as rain in the earth, which is God's grace, the blessing of heaven, the life of the earth, the help of the living; therefore men also praise God, considering the signs of His grace, the gifts of His mercy — namely, rains and winds and other influences which He sends out from the treasury of His mercy, who has unavoidably established by supreme providence the colds and heats of winter and summer." And above [in part] 1, he says that God grants to those who study the grace of knowing. But who does not know that to do grace and mercy, [E] to provide and establish, befits the will?

Nor ought this book to be reckoned among the Apocrypha, because it speaks of the grace and mercy of God, which seem more theological than philosophical terms. For philosophical books well known to all speak of these same things. The Philosopher in Ethics X.14 posits a threefold opinion as to how men become good, saying: "Some hold that men become good by nature, some by custom, some by teaching." And he holds that each of these opinions has something of truth; and for the first opinion he subjoins: "That what is from nature, manifestly, does not exist in us, but through some divine cause, and exists in those who are truly fortunate." Where Averroes says: "Some men are thought to be good by nature, and some by teaching; and it is plain that what is in this matter from nature is not from us, but from a certain divine grace; to these also fortune is truly good."

Nor can anyone pretend that by this divine cause, and grace, and fortune, [A] is to be understood only some celestial or stellar influence such as astronomers are wont to dream up in nativities or conceptions; since, according to the same Philosopher in On Good Fortune II, "Good fortune is from God, who immediately moves the intellect of the well-fortuned to attaining good fortunes." For he says thus: "What is sought is this: what is the principle of motion in the soul? Plainly, as in the whole, namely in the universe. For God moves in some manner all things which are in us; and the divine principle of reason is not reason, but something better. What therefore will be better than knowledge and intellect, except God? For virtue is the instrument of intellect; and on this account those who of old were called well-fortuned are so called who, if they make a rush, succeed without reasoning, and to whom counsel is not expedient — for they have such a principle as is better than intellect and counsel; but those who have reason do not have this, nor have they divine instincts."

Averroes also in the prologue to Physics I says that the perfect grace of man is to be perfected by speculative knowledge. And that he understands [this] of the grace which is freely given by God, appears through the same author on On the Heavens I, comment [B] 32, where he says that he tarried a long time because he did not understand the explanation of that place where Aristotle proves that there is no motion contrary to circular motion; and he subjoins, "But God led me to the truth." And the same on On the Soul II, comment 34, says of the mercy of God: "The divine solicitude, when it could not make the living to remain according to the individual, took mercy in giving it the power by which it can remain according to the species."

This view of the grace of God just mentioned, Hermes also in On the Eternal Word at the end attests, as was related in the sixth [chapter] of this [book]; concerning which Sextus the Pythagorean in his Sentences says: "The grace of God is not subject to fate."

Furthermore, very many of the ancient philosophers posited the love of God as the original principle of whatever exists; and love is by no means separated from the will. The Philosopher in Metaphysics I reports Hesiod and Parmenides as saying that the love of the gods, providing for all, is the principle of the generation of the universe — that love which founded all, which must be in beings and be the cause that moves and assembles things themselves. [C] And Empedocles thought the same, as is reported by the same Philosopher in Metaphysics III.15; and in many places of his philosophy he touches on the opinions of those who posit love and hatred, or friendship and strife, as the principles of generation and corruption in beings of any kind. Which is not improbably said, if it be understood that the love or willing of God is the cause why something is generated and endures; and His not-willing is the cause why something is not generated, or does not endure, but the generated is corrupted.

Avicenna also, in the book which he names Fountain of Life, proves this same thing diffusely, especially in book 5 from chapter 35 almost to the end, as the second [chapter] of this [book] more fully reported. He also in [chapter] 37 says thus: "All those motions in spiritual and corporal substances are derived from the will; therefore from this it must be that all spiritual and corporal substances are movable by the will. The example of which is that the will of the soul moves the body, or causes some member of it to rest, as is the rest when the breath is held. And this motion which is diffused in all substances by the will is diverse in strength and weakness on account of the diversity [D] of recipients, not on account of the diversity of the will in itself." And in the last chapter: "Creation is likened to the word which a man speaks; for when a man speaks, by his words his form and understanding is impressed in the hearing of the hearer, and in his understanding. And so it is said that the Sublime and Holy One spoke a word, and His understanding was impressed on matter, and matter retained it — namely, because the created form was impressed on matter and depicted in it."

Likewise, Avicenna in Metaphysics IX.7, showing that nothing happens by chance, but that all things proceed from divine care, says thus: "There is no way for you to say that anything is done by chance, since reason induces you to judge that all things are done by governance and disposition. For you must know that the care of these things is from this — that the First knows Himself, and that from Himself is the necessity of the ordering of goodness, and that His essence is the cause of goodness and perfection, in so far as is possible to things, and pleases Him, as has been said." The same in Metaphysics X.1: "This whole flows from above, nor does it follow from the imagination of the celestial bodies only, but because the First True knows this whole, therefore from Him begins to be the burden of what is made." And below in the same, [E] of natural and voluntary, celestial and terrestrial things, he says thus: "The collection therefore of all these things proceeds necessarily from the necessity of the divine will." Algazel shows the same in Metaphysics III, sentence 7, manifestly: "Because He acts not only from nature, but from knowledge; and every action which is subject to knowledge is subject to the will. Everything therefore that flows from it pleases Him, nor does He hate any of them."

This view also many authorities cited in the second [chapter] of this [book] attest. The same is shown evidently by the Canonical Scripture: for in Apocalypse 4, twenty-four witnesses, beyond all exception, attest this with one voice before Him sitting on the throne, saying: "Worthy art Thou, O Lord our God, to receive glory, and honor, and power, for Thou hast created all things, and for Thy will they were and have been created." The Psalmist also [A] in Psalm 148, when all the celestial things have been roused in order to praise the Lord, subjoins this cause: "Because He spoke, and they were made; He commanded, and they were created"; just as it is also read in Genesis 1, of the works of the six days, "God said, let this be made, and let that be made, and so it was done." But to command is proper to the will, and likewise to say in this place. For Rabbi Moses says in Guide of the Perplexed 63: "Word is threefold: that uttered by the tongue, the conception of the mind, and the will. The latter two only befit the Creator." And expounding the text of the Psalm, "By the word of the Lord the heavens were established," he says that this signifies that they were brought into being by His intention and will. And after the Psalmist has roused celestial things to praise the Lord together, he likewise next exhorts terrestrial things: "Praise the Lord," he says, "from the earth, ye dragons and all deeps, fire, hail, snow, ice, stormy winds, which fulfill His Word" — that is, the precept of His will.

Not only these things, however, but by the same reasoning all other universal things [are caused by the will of God]. [B] Whence Augustine in On the Trinity III.8 teaches that of those things which often happen by the customary course of nature — like the risings and settings of the stars, the generations and deaths of animals, the innumerable diversities of seeds and germs, mists and clouds, snows and rains, lightnings and thunders, thunderbolts and hails, winds and fires, cold and heat, and all such things — even of those which happen in the same order, but rarely, like eclipses of the lights, unusual species, monsters of the stars, earthquakes, and all things similar — the first and supreme cause is none other than the will of God. Whence also on the Psalm: "When some things of this kind have been mentioned," says Augustine, "such as fire, hail, snow, ice, the spirit of tempest, lest anyone should believe these to be done by chance, or only by corporeal causes, or even by spiritual causes existing apart from the will of God, immediately he subjoins: 'which fulfill His Word.'"

Likewise Psalm 134: "All things whatsoever the Lord willed, He has done, in heaven and on earth, in the sea, and in all the deeps." And Judith 9: "This is done, what Thou Thyself hast willed." And many similar [passages] are abundant in Scripture. Likewise Augustine, On the Trinity III.4: "The will of God in the heavenly fatherland, in the blessed spirits, as in a lofty seat [C] residing, as in His house and temple — thence indeed by the most ordered motions of the creature, first spiritual, then corporeal, He diffuses Himself through all, and uses all things, according to the unchangeable arbitrament of His sentence — whether incorporeal or corporeal things, whether irrational or rational, spiritual whether good through His grace, whether evil through their own will." And as if through that whole book, in many chapters, he shows that the divine will is the first and supreme cause of all things.

The same in Enchiridion 6 says: "It is enough for the Christian to believe that the cause of created things, whether celestial or terrestrial, visible or invisible, is none other than the goodness of the Creator." And the same in On Genesis Against the Manicheans I: "The will of God is itself the cause of all things that are. He therefore who says, 'Why did God make heaven and earth?' is to be answered: 'Because He willed it.' For the will of God is the cause of heaven and earth." And the same in On the Questions of Orosius 39: "Every cause of the creature is the will of the Creator."

Moreover, everything which is, or is made, is and is made by God as Author, He willing it — as appears through Augustine, [D] Eighty-three Questions 3, expounding the meaning of the term thus: "When 'by God as Author' is said, it is said 'with His will'; but God is the Author of every thing." For in authors there is not an infinite progress, but there is some first Author of all; and this necessarily will be God. Augustine also says, On the City of God XII.5: "There is absolutely no nature of which God is not the Author and Founder." This also is found very often elsewhere; and this is what the whole Church attests in its Paschal joy, hymning thus: "Who is the Author of all things?" etc. Hugh also, On the Sacraments book I, part 4, chapters 10 and last, shows that the divine will is the first cause of all things.

From all these things the principal proposition appears in each of its parts. Yet, that I may, from the abundance of reasons already shown, more sensibly manifest [the matter] by a gross example, I imagine that as the weight stands in our small clock, so does God in the great clock of the world. For just as here the weight, while by its single motion it bears around the principal wheel, by all motions moves all moved things, and singly the singulars; and quiets the things that are at rest, and conserves the things at rest, at definite times — so that they correspond to one another, [E] and so the wheel artificially conjoins [them]: so does God in the world, while by His single volition He turns about the primary celestial wheel, [and] all the variously-moved things, and likewise the things at rest, He administers; and this is so much the more regular in the world than in a hand-made clock, in that both its weight and its wheel are more orderly disposed, and in that the other beings are more skillfully bound to one another, to the wheel, and to the weight by virtues which, though more hidden, are more powerful and artificial.

Whence Wisdom 11: "Thou hast disposed all things in measure, and number, and weight." Wherefore Blessed Augustine, On Genesis IV.5, expounding this authority of the Wise One, and inquiring whether these three — measure, number, and weight — are God or not, says thus: "According to that which we know of measure in those things we measure, and number in those things we number, and weight in those things we weigh, God is not these things; but according to that by which measure prefigures to every thing the mode, and number gives to every thing its species, and weight draws every thing to rest [A] and stability — He is, primarily and truly and singularly, that which terminates all things, regulates all things, forms all things, and orders all things; and nothing else is understood by what could be said by the human heart and tongue, 'Thou hast disposed all things in measure, number, and weight,' than that 'Thou hast disposed all things in Thyself.' It is great, and granted to few, to surpass all things which can be measured, that He may seem a measure without measure; to surpass all things which can be numbered, that He may seem a number without number; to surpass all things which can be weighed, that He may seem a weight without weight."

With this imagination Hermes also agrees in On the Eternal Word 18: "By the Spirit," he says, "all things are administered in the world, which is, as it were, an organ or machine of the supreme God, subject to His will." And below, [chapter] 26, he writes thus: "This whole world is the immutable work of God, a glorious construction, a good thing composed of a manifold variety of images, the machine of God's will, supporting His own work without envy."

This same can someone imagine more truly, if he imagines a clock having a wheel of perpetual motion by virtue of an inherent weight not depending from outside; for God, [B] according to what has been previously [shown], is the inmost in every thing. But still someone can imagine this most truly, by imagining a wheel of perpetual motion from some attractive or even expulsive virtue eternally at rest — as if the wheel had iron at the extremities of its spokes, or in its periphery, or were itself wholly of iron; and a magnet, attractive or otherwise expulsive, or in different extremities of either virtue, neighboring [it], should from one part of it always openly look upon it; from the other part, however, by some obstacle should be hidden from it, or more ingeniously in any other way. What therefore the magnet at rest, attracting or expelling, [is] in such a small clock — this God, the immobile, willing or not-willing, [is] in the great clock of the world. Whence Wisdom 7: "Remaining in Himself, He renews all things."

But further, perhaps this whole [matter] could be more closely and similarly conceived by the example proposed, by supposing — according to chapters 2 and 4 of this [book] previously [stated] — that God first moves Himself by a certain immobile and invariable motion, and all other things by all their variable motions consequently. Whence also Hermes, On the Eternal Word 34, says: "It is credible that God is moved into Himself by the same [C] immobility." This cogitation of God, or motion of His, is to be reckoned an eternal volition.

This imagination, although gross, does not disagree with the subtle science of the natural philosophers, astrologers, and theologians. But lest with certain astrologers I may seem to subject the free wills of men to the necessary servitude of the stars, I imagine still further: that as the greater world is a certain great clock, so man, who according to the philosophers is called a lesser world, is a certain small clock — that one in some way natural, this voluntary; that stable, this portable. And as there the weight or virtue of the divine will, by moving through itself the first motion of it — namely, the first intelligence, with the greatest wheel of heaven — moves all the others by whatsoever natural motions, as is demonstrated in Metaphysics XII; so by moving through itself the first motion in man — namely, the rational soul, with the wheel of the heart or head — He moves the rest of man's [organs], and the whole man himself, by whatsoever voluntary motions. And this is what was alleged above by the Philosopher in On Good Fortune: namely, that the principle of motion in our soul, [D] just as in the whole universe, is God. For He moves, as he says, "all things which are in us; the divine principle of reason, not reason, He being the virtue of the organ of intellect."

Whence also Proverbs 21: "As the divisions of waters, so the heart of the king is in the hand of the Lord; whithersoever He will, He shall turn it." Wherefore there is no doubt that thus it is in the hearts of all others, since "He made the small and the great, and He has equal care of all," as Wisdom 6 says wisely. Wherefore also Isaiah 40 says: "Behold, the nations are reckoned as the moment of a balance before Him"; where the Gloss says, that namely the moment is inclined from nothing into either part. Wherefore also we singularly petition with the Psalmist, saying: "Incline my heart to Thy testimonies, and not to covetousness," Psalm 118. On which Augustine says: "What is it to have the heart inclined to something, except to will it? He prays therefore that he may will, when he says, 'Incline my heart,' etc."

Whence Blessed Augustine, On Genesis IV.5, on the said authority of the Wise One — immediately after his exposition above-cited — subjoins: "For neither can measure, and number, and weight be considered and conceived only in stones and in [E] woods, and similar masses, and in corporeal quantities. There is also a measure of acting, lest the progression be irrevocable and immoderate; and a number of the affections of the mind, and of virtues; and there is a weight of will and of love. But this measure of minds and souls is restrained by another measure, and the number is formed by another number, and the weight is borne by another weight. The measure without measure, however, is that to which is equal what is from it; the number without number is that by which all things are formed, but is itself not formed; the weight without weight is that to which all things are referred that they may rest. And these three are God," as has been alleged from the same place above.

COROLLARY.

IT HAS A COROLLARY: ALL THINGS WHICH HAVE BEEN MADE WERE MADE BY THE DIVINE WILL, AND THINGS WHICH WILL BE MADE WILL BE MADE BY IT.

Whence it is evidently known that all things which are made, preserved, or moved, were, are, or will be from the divine will, and this in the modes premised in the corollaries of the third, second, and fourth [chapters] of this [book]. This corollary follows so plainly from the premises that it does not need proof. For if it is necessary that all things presently being made are presently made by the divine will, it is correspondingly necessary concerning past and future things, and likewise concerning things preserved and moved. With these things examined, and the corollaries previously touched understood, I judge the said moderated modes are not concealed. Some little responses also can here be fabricated, like those in the chapters above-said, and likewise refuted.

[B]

CHAPTER X. THAT THE DIVINE WILL IS UNIVERSALLY EFFICACIOUS, INSUPERABLE, AND NECESSARY IN CAUSING — NOT IMPEDIBLE NOR FRUSTRABLE IN ANY WAY.

Now it remains to show consequently that the divine will is universally efficacious, insuperable, and necessary in causing — not impedible nor frustrable in any way. This whole is evidently known from the eighth part of Corollary 1 of this [book]; [C] which yet is here for some cause to be confirmed by certain reasons and authorities.

Who therefore would not know how excellently it follows: if God can do something, and wills to do it, He does it, or will do it at the destined time, the power and will remaining? For nothing is wanting in Him to that which is required for doing. The Philosopher says, Metaphysics IX.10: "What is potent according to reason — every such thing necessarily, when it desires, [does] that of which it has the power, and as it has [the power], does this." And in Rhetoric II.24: "If he could and willed, he did. For all who, being able, will [something], do it." And Politics V.7: "What the powerful will, all of them do." Wherefore, by the teaching of the Philosopher in Prior Analytics I, from the opposite of the conclusion with the same minor, by inferring the opposite of the prior major, it follows excellently conversely: God does not do this, and wills to do it; therefore He cannot do this. Therefore He is not omnipotent, but impotent in this part — against the seventh part of Corollary 1 of this [book], and against the general faith of the Church.

Whence also Augustine, Enchiridion 76, [D] says: "To the Omnipotent God, just as it is easy to do what He wills, so easy is it not to allow what He does not will to be. Unless we believe this, the very beginning of our confession is in danger, by which we confess to believe in God Omnipotent. For He is not for any other reason truly called omnipotent, except that He can do whatever He wills; nor is the effect of the omnipotent will impeded by the will of any nature."

Likewise, the divine will is the act of a power, as is known, and of no less than infinite power, on account of the first supposition and the fourth part of Corollary 1 of this [book]. It surpasses, therefore, every finite [thing], nor is it surpassed by any [thing]; nor by any infinite [thing], because God alone is such, by the seventeenth part of Corollary 1 of this [book]; nor does He surpass His own will, nor has He anything in Himself contrary to it. Wherefore Augustine says, On the City of God V.9: "In His will is the supreme power"; and Enchiridion 75: "It is most efficacious."

Likewise, if the divine will were frustrated by anything, or even conquered, this would seem most so by a created angelic or human will. Therefore this would exceed that in virtue, which the first supposition does not concede. And [E] Isaiah 47 says: "Man shall not resist Me," and above in chapter 14: "The Lord of hosts has decreed it, and who can disannul it?" And the Apostle to the Romans 9: "Who shall resist His will?" It is also written in Esther 13, and the Holy Church sings: "O Lord God Almighty, in Thy power are all things placed, nor is there any one who can resist Thy will. If Thou hast decreed to save us, immediately we shall be freed." And Psalm 113: "All things whatsoever He willed, He has done." Treating of which Augustine, Enchiridion 75, says that this would not be true if He had willed some things and had not done them, and — what is more unworthy — therefore did not do them, because, lest what the Omnipotent willed should be done, the will of man impeded.

Likewise, if God did not always do whatever He willed, He would need help to do certain things — against the fifth part of Corollary 1 of this [book], and against certain things premised in the fifth [chapter] of this [book].

To this also there are very many philosophical and theological authorities. Hermes, On the Eternal Word 9, speaking of God, says that all things depend from His will. And he adds: "For from Him is the supreme perfection, [A] inasmuch as in Him willing and accomplishing are completed in one and the same point of time. For necessity follows the pleasure of God; the effect attends the will." And below, [chapter] 22: "He alone, as full of all both sexes by fecundity, ever pregnant with His will, ever begets whatever He shall will to procreate."

Aristotle also, in On the World at the end, showing that God, since He is one, is yet of many names, and expounding certain of those names, says thus: "I think also that necessity is called nothing other than the insuperable substance; and Adrastia is the inevitable being-cause." And Avicenna says, Metaphysics X.1: "The collection of all these things proceeds necessarily from the necessity of the divine will." And Augustine, On Genesis VI.20: "The will of the Creator of things is necessity"; and shows this there throughout a long process diffusely. And the same in On Free Will III.3: "His will is to me necessity." And the same in Enchiridion 83: "He is to be asked that He may will, because it is necessary that it be done if He shall will." And Anselm says, Cur Deus Homo II.17: "If you wish to know the true necessity [B] of all things which He has done, and suffered, know that all was from necessity, because He Himself willed it."

Likewise Augustine, Enchiridion 77, treating that of the Apostle in 1 Timothy 2, "Who wills all men to be saved," and that of Matthew 23, "How often have I willed to gather Thy children, and Thou wouldest not," shows that the divine will is not impeded, nor in any way frustrated in these matters; and in many following chapters he proves the same. Whence also in [chapter] 83 he says that, however many be the wills of angels and of men, good and bad, willing what God wills, or otherwise, the will of God Almighty is always invincible. And [chapter] 84: "The Omnipotent cannot will vainly whatever He shall will." And [chapter] 85: "It is not to be believed that God Omnipotent willed something to be done, and that it was not done. For He who, without any ambiguities, in heaven and on earth, as truth sings, did all things whatsoever He willed, certainly did not will to do whatever He has not done." Wherefore also through Isaiah 46 God says thus: "All My will shall be done"; and below in [chapter] 55: "The word which shall go forth from My mouth, shall not return to Me empty, but shall do whatsoever I have willed."

Likewise, otherwise the purpose of God in some [matter] [C] would be frustrated, and frustratable — which is expressly against Anselm, Cur Deus Homo I.4, 20, 26, and II.4 and 8.

Likewise Cyprian, the glorious Martyr and Doctor of God, expounding that of the Lord's Prayer, "Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven," says thus: "We pray, not that God may do what He wills, but that we may be able to do what God wills. For who resists God, that He may do less than what He wills?" And this is what that leper faithfully professed when he said, "Lord, if Thou wilt, Thou canst make me clean," Mark 1 and Luke 5; which the response of the Saviour indubitably shows when He said, "I will, be made clean." For the effect of cleansing immediately followed this will, as the Evangelist subjoins: "And when He had said this, immediately the leprosy departed from him, and he was made clean." On which Bede, in book I on Mark, chapter 6, says: "The very confession of the leper is full of religion and faith. For in the will of the Lord he attributes the power"; and below: "There is no medium between the work of God and His command, since in the command is the work — for in the end, He spoke, and they were made. You see therefore that it cannot be doubted that the will of God is power"; [D] and below: "And likewise the marvelous thing — that He healed by that kind by which He had been entreated. 'If Thou wilt, Thou canst cleanse me'; 'I will,' He says, 'be cleansed' — Thou hast the will, Thou hast also the effect of piety. Therefore, as most of the Latins think, it should not be joined and read 'I will to cleanse,' but separately, that He first says 'I will,' then commands, 'Be cleansed.'" Who in book II on Luke 5 expounds the same to the same sense. Thomas also in the Gloss on Mark cites from Chrysostom there: "By this He not only did not destroy the opinion of the leper, but rather confirmed it; for by His Word He puts the disease to flight; and what the leper had said in word, this He fulfilled by work." And on that of Luke 5, the same glossator cites from Ambrose this saying: "By that kind He healed by which He had been entreated. There is no medium between the work of God and His command, that you may understand the effect of healing the virtue of the work." Where he also cites this from Cyril: "From majesty proceeded the imperious mandate; how then is the only-begotten Son reckoned among servants, who, only by willing, can do all things? Of God the Father it is read, that He did all things whatsoever He willed; but He who [E] uses the power of His own Father — how shall He be diversified in nature from Him? Yet marvel in these things at Christ working divinely and corporeally; for divine it is so to will that all things may be made present, but human, to extend the right hand."

This Ecclesiastes 8 testifies more clearly than light, saying thus: "Whatever He shall will, He shall do, and His word is full of power." Damascene, Sentences at the end, agrees, saying thus: "He who by will alone transmuted dust into a body, who is the maker of all, who built all these things by His command — so therefore believe also that the future resurrection of the dead is by divine power, and will, and beck. For He has, concurring with His will, virtue."

This also Hugh holds, On the Sacraments book I, part 4, chapter 15; and Lombard, Sentences I, distinction 45, plainly.

COROLLARY.

IT HAS A COROLLARY: THAT TO GOD'S WILLING TO MAKE OR THAT SOMETHING SHOULD BE MADE, BY HIMSELF OR BY ANYTHING ELSE IN ANY MODE, THERE NECESSARILY FOLLOWS THAT IT IS MADE IN THAT MODE; NOR DOES HE, IN OUR MANNER OF STRIVING, APPLY OTHER POWERS; NOR IS THERE IN HIM, BEYOND THE INTELLECT THAT DICTATES AND THE WILL THAT CONSENTS, ANY OTHER EXECUTIVE VIRTUE TO BE POSITED. NOR DOES HE BEAR HIMSELF OTHERWISE WHEN OPERATING THAN WHEN AT REST. AND THE DIVINE WILL IS THE FIRST FREE PRINCIPLE.

From these things, then, it manifestly follows that, to God's willing to make or that something should be made, by Himself or by anything else in any mode, there necessarily follows that it is made in that mode; nor [B] in our manner of striving does He apply other powers; nor is there in Him, beyond the intellect that dictates and the will that consents, any other executive virtue to be posited, as is posited by some; nor does He bear Himself otherwise when operating than when at rest. From which it is no less evidently inferred that the divine will is the first free principle.

For if anything other than God's willing were required for making, His will would not be by itself sufficient for acting, against the previous [arguments]. Likewise, the will of God is in some way operative outside itself, as our will moves the first corporal motion in us, and not only finitely; for this is repugnant to the first supposition, the third part of the first [corollary], and the fourth. Nor is there any reason why [it should be] under one finite degree rather than under another; therefore [it is operative] infinitely. It does not therefore require any executive power posterior in God, as if a supplement to the defect of its efficacy. Likewise, if such an executive virtue be posited, this naturally mediates between the divine will and the work — against the authorities of Bede and Ambrose alleged above; and it is against Damascene, who says, "He transmuted by will alone," etc.

The other part of this corollary appears from this: that one can will equally when operating and when at rest, and especially [C] God Himself, since by the fifth [chapter] of this [book] He cannot at all be changed. Augustine also says, in the Sentences of Prosper 157: "It is not lawful to believe that God is otherwise affected when He is at rest, otherwise when He operates. For he suffers who is affected, and everything which suffers is mutable. Therefore in God neither sluggish leisure nor laborious industry is to be conceived, since He knows both to act when at rest, and to be at rest when acting."

That the divine will is also the first free principle hence appears: because by the second supposition, in free principles there is not an infinite progress, but there is some one first; and that cannot be posited in any second cause, since by the next preceding chapters every second cause in any of its causations is necessarily subjected to the first cause. Also, if the first cause did not act freely but purely necessarily, since all second causes in any of their causations are necessarily subjected to the first cause, as the ninth and tenth [chapters] clearly teach, all their causations, like every causation of the first cause, would proceed purely necessarily; whereby freedom, contingency, and merit totally perish.

Nor does it befit the natural order of causes [D] that the inferior and second cause should be freer than the supreme and first; nor is it possible in any way. This is the regulator in all things, that the necessarily regulated in all things; this the subjecter, that the subjected; this the preceding and dominating, that the following in all things and the handmaid, as the premises in chapters nine and ten manifest.

The first free principle, therefore, is necessarily in God; and not in His essence primarily, since by chapters one and two it is altogether necessary being. Nor in the divine intellect, since He necessarily understands all things. Nor in any power other than the will. For all other powers are purely natural, and, the will being set apart, if they acted, they would act purely naturally and necessarily, as the beginning of chapter nine showed. Liberty therefore is to be placed in the will alone; and the simply first [liberty] in the simply first [will], which is God's.

[A]

CHAPTER XI. THAT THE FIRST NECESSARY AND TRUE INCOMPLEX PRINCIPLE IS GOD; AND THAT THE FIRST COMPLEX PRINCIPLE SIMPLY IS [SOMETHING] CONCERNING GOD: NAMELY, "GOD IS," "GOD KNOWS ALL," "GOD WILLS ALL," OR SOMETHING SIMILAR.

The first free principle having been found, it remains consequently to inquire the first necessary principle, and the first true of all true things. There is, indeed, among the philosophers a twofold necessary and true: namely, the incomplex and the complex. From the foregoing I reckon it manifest that, just as God is the first being of all beings, and the first cause of being for whatever exists, so He is the first true and necessary incomplex, and the first cause of being for whatever is necessary or true. For, as was alleged in chapter 2: "The first in any genus is the cause of all the others according as they are in that genus, and most worthy of the name of that genus." But God is the first in the genus of true incomplexes, as can easily appear from what has gone before. This same the Philosopher seems clearly to attest in Metaphysics II.4, and Averroes in his commentary; and likewise Avicenna in Metaphysics VIII.6, as the second [chapter] of this [book] more fully reported. With which [C] Augustine agrees, Confessions VII.15, likewise reported there. Whence also Anselm, On Truth 7: "Do you think there is anything, sometime or somewhere, which is not in the supreme truth, and which has not received from it the strength by which it is, in so far as it is, or that it could be other than it is there? It is not to be thought. Therefore the truth is in the essence of all things which are, since these are because they are in the supreme truth."

But since concerning the first true incomplex there seems no doubt, I do not think we should tarry further about it. Concerning the first true complex, however, the difficulty is more dubious. For the Philosopher says, Metaphysics IV.9, that this is the first principle of complexes: "It is impossible that the same simultaneously be in, and not be in, the same according to the same." But, lest I, so small a person, should seem to chatter against so great a Philosopher, it is to be known that principle is twofold: namely, of knowing and of being, or, as to us and as to nature. He, however, speaks there of the first principle of knowing, and only as to us, by which we are generally regulated in all sciences, as the progress of the text and commentary sufficiently shows. The first principle of complexes simply, however, is concerning God: namely, "God is," or "God knows all," or "God wills all," or anything else of the kind. For the first in the genus [D] of true complexes, just as it is in any other genus, is the cause why all posterior things are true. Therefore it is the cause of being really thus, just as any subsequent truth signifies. For according to the Philosopher in Categories, "From the fact that the thing is or is not, the proposition is called true or false"; and no posterior truth is the cause why the first is true. Thus, therefore, to be really thus, just as the first truth signifies, was the cause of being really thus, just as any subsequent truth signifies; and no subsequent truth will be the cause of being really thus, just as the first truth signifies. The cause why it is really thus, as is signified by any truth not said of God, is in God; nor is any of the others a cause of being to God, as appears sufficiently from what has gone before in this chapter and others. In God, therefore, or concerning Him, is the simply first principle of the whole genus of complexes.

Likewise, God is the first cause of every essence or mode of being; therefore also of every truth. Likewise, a truth which can be true without others, and not [E] conversely, is prior to them. But thus stands "God is" to all other truths whatsoever. Likewise, just as that which is most known in cognition as to us is thus the first principle, as appears through the Philosopher in the place above, so that which is most known simply and as to nature is correspondingly the first principle. But that is "God is," although on account of the corruption of the body weighing down the soul we know this with difficulty.

Whence the Philosopher, Metaphysics II.1: "Since the difficulty of the contemplation of truth exists in two modes, the cause of it is not in the things, but in us. For just as the eyes of night-ravens stand to the light of day, so the intellect of our soul stands to those things which are most manifest of all in nature." Where Averroes says: "The difficulty in things which are at the limit of truth — namely, in the first principle and in principles distinct from matter, [A] is from us, not from them."

The same could be argued from the firmness of the first principle, since just as it is the first, so it is the firmest, as appears through the Philosopher, Metaphysics IV.8; and because all other truths lean upon the truth of that one, as upon an original root and primary foundation. But to no one is it doubtful that "God is" is the firmest of truths.

Likewise, an incomplex truth is naturally prior to a complex truth, just as the simple to the composite, and the cause and principle of it; therefore principle to principle will be proportionally so. But God is the principle of every incomplex truth, as the first part of this chapter has demonstrated.

Likewise, in the order of true things there is not an infinite progress; but there is some first truth, which is the cause of all the others. But that is "God is," since it does not have any prior truth as its cause. Likewise, that truth which is only causing other truths, and not caused by them, is the first; but this is "God is." Likewise, that which is the truest of all is the principle of all; but this is God, since He most of all is, as the foregoing have taught.

Likewise Anselm, On Truth 10, says that [B] the supreme truth owes nothing to anything, but all things owe to it; and it is the cause of all other truths, and nothing is its cause. And distinguishing truth into the causing and the caused, he says that the truth which is in the existence of things is the effect of the supreme truth; but it is itself the cause of the truth which is of cognition, and of that which is in a proposition. The same, below, in the same chapter at the end, proves diffusely that there is one truth, and that is the supreme truth, by which all true things are true. The same in Monologion 18, and Augustine, Soliloquies I.21 and book II.20, prove the eternity of God from the eternity of truth. The eternity of truth, however, they prove thus: "This was always true, 'something is future'; and this was always true, 'something is past'; therefore by some truth; and therefore that truth never began, nor will end; therefore truth is eternal."

This proof, however, does not conclude, if any proposition can be true by itself without a higher truth in God causing the truth in such a proposition, and continually sustaining it. Whence Anselm, On Truth 10, expounding this proof, which in his Monologion he reports himself to have made, says to his disciple: [C] "Now you can understand how I proved in my Monologion that the supreme truth has neither beginning nor end through the truth of speech. For when I said, 'When was it not true that something was to be future?' I did not say so as if that speech which would assert that something was to be future, or that truth, were God without beginning. But because it cannot be understood when, if that speech existed, the truth would be lacking to it; so that, because it is not understood when that truth could not be, if there were a speech in which it could be, that truth is understood to have been without beginning, which is the first cause of this truth. For indeed the truth of speech could not always be, if its cause were not always. For that speech is not true which says that something is to be future, unless something is in fact to be future; nor is anything future if it is not in the supreme truth. Likewise it is to be understood concerning that speech which says that something is past. For if by no understanding the truth would be able to be lacking to this speech if it had been made, it is necessary that no end be able to be understood of that truth which is the supreme cause of this. For therefore is it truly said, that something is past, because [D] thus it is in reality; and therefore something is past, because thus it is in the supreme truth. Wherefore, if it can never not be true that something is to be future, and could never not be true that something is past, it is impossible that there have been a beginning of the supreme truth, or that an end be future."

Likewise Augustine, Against Faustus XXVI.2: "Whatever is past, now is not; therefore that which we truly say to have been is not; but it is true that it was, because in our sentence — by which we say that something has been — it is true, because that of which we speak now is not. This sentence God cannot make false, because He is not contrary to truth. But if you ask where this true sentence is — first it is found in our mind when we know it as true and say it; but if it should also be taken away from our mind when we have forgotten that which we knew, it will remain in the truth itself. For it will always be true that what was, was, and is not; and there it will be true that what was already is, where it was true before it came to be, that what was not, was to be. To this truth God cannot be opposed, in whom is the supreme and immutable truth itself, by which it is illustrated that it is true [E] whatever in the minds and souls of any is true."

The same on Psalm 4: "Why do you love vanity, and seek after lying? Truth alone makes blessed, from which all things are true." The same also on Psalm 55: "In God I will praise my speeches; in God I will praise speeches, because there is the fountain of true speeches."

There is therefore in God truly the first principle of every truth.

CHAPTER XII. HE SHOWS WHAT KIND THIS FIRST PRINCIPLE IS — NAMELY, AFFIRMATIVE — AND WHAT IT IS, NAMELY "GOD IS," OR "GOD IS GOD."

Having found, therefore, that the first complex principle is in God, or concerning Him, it remains further to ask what kind it is, and what it is. First, then, it must be asked of what kind it is — whether affirmative, or rather negative.

That it is not purely negative appears from this: because pure negation posits nothing. The first principle of complexes posits and causes all subsequent true complexes, as the next preceding chapter has demonstrated; [B] therefore it is not purely and totally negative. Nor is it a pregnant or implying negative, since such a negative, by the virtue of the negation alone, posits absolutely nothing; but if perhaps it does posit something, this is by virtue of some prior affirmative which it implies. Therefore that affirmative, by itself, is rather the first principle of complexes. For it, by itself, is the cause of truth in others; but that negative is so only through it; therefore it is prior. But nothing such is the first true complex, and the cause of truth in others, before which there is another truth and another prior cause. Likewise, as chapter 2 showed, everything which is in some way per accidens is reduced to something prior which per se is such. But such an implicative or pregnant negative posits and causes truth in others only per accidens; therefore it is reduced to something per se prior, by whose virtue it does this. Therefore that other prior thing more causes truth in others; therefore it is rather the principle of complexes. This other [thing] is also a prior truth, and the cause of the truth of this negative; therefore it is not the first truth, nor the first principle of complexes.

[C] Likewise, according to the Philosopher, Posterior Analytics I.17: "An affirmative demonstration is more worthy, better, nobler, prior, and more excellent than a negative one; and an affirmative proposition is likewise [more excellent] than a negative one," as he there says and proves. For every negative is proved and known through an affirmative, not conversely. Likewise, just as an affirmative demonstration is to a negative, so an affirmative proposition is to a negative; but an affirmative demonstration excels a negative in the conditions above-said; therefore an affirmative proposition likewise excels a negative one. That an affirmative proves a negative, and not conversely, appears from the book of Prior Analytics concerning all syllogisms. And that the negative is known through the affirmative, and not conversely, follows from the same and likewise appears, since privation is known through habit, and not conversely, as the Philosopher proves in On the Soul III.25, and likewise appears in the commentary. Whence Avicenna, Metaphysics I.5: "Being is more known than non-being; for being is known through itself, but non-being is known through being." With which Augustine also consents, On the City of God XII.7, saying that darkness and silence are known [D] not, indeed, in [their own] species, but in the privation of species. Affirmation, however, is being in some manner and habit, or implies these; negation, on the other hand, [implies] non-being and privation.

Likewise, every true negative has a truer prior affirmative, which is the cause of it, as appears through the Philosopher, On Interpretation II at the end, saying thus: "If anything that is good is, both [it] is good and is not evil — this indeed per se, namely 'is good'; that, however, per accidens, namely 'is not evil.' For its being not evil is accidental to it. That is more true in each thing which is per se [such], and likewise [more] false." Therefore "good is good" is truer and prior to "good is not evil." It is also the cause of that, since because good is good, therefore it is not evil, and not conversely; because not being evil posits nothing absolutely, and consequently causes nothing.

Therefore the first principle of complexes is to be most firmly judged in no way negative, but affirmative.

Having shown, therefore, what kind this principle is, it now remains to investigate further what it is — whether namely it is "God is," or "God knows all true things," or "God wills all true things." For any of these could be reckoned [E] such a principle. For as appears from chapter 9 of this [book], the will of God is the first and supreme cause of all things, and therefore of all truths; therefore "God wills" is the first principle of complexes. But this [opinion], I judge, is not true. For that is not the first truth before which is another truth; but "God wills" has another truth naturally prior to it, namely "God knows," since God naturally knows any thing willed prior to willing it. For every volition is necessarily of something pre-known, as is sufficiently agreed by both philosophers and theologians. Therefore "God knows" or "God knows" might appear to be the principle now sought.

But this appearance fails, since [there is] another truth naturally prior to this, namely "God is," "God is cognitive," "God is omnipotent," with similar [predicates] of His — distinguishing and multiplying these in God, and ordering them according to [A] prior and posterior, not essentially altogether or really, but intellectually or imaginably, as both philosophers and theologians are wont to speak, as was alleged above from Aristotle in On the World. The same appears through him in Metaphysics XII in many places, and through Averroes in commentary 39, declaring this same thing more fully; which also learned Plato, Avicenna, Algazel, and Avicbron concordantly attest, as the things alleged above prove.

So also speaks the Apostle to the Romans 1, when he says: "The invisible things of God, from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead"; and elsewhere most frequently in sacred Scripture. In the books of Augustine, On the Trinity, and others, and of the rest of the Saints, and of all the Doctors, there are distinguished, in some manner, power, knowledge, and will. For He can do, and knows, many things which He does not will. The same is plain concerning justice, grace, and mercy, and many similar things sufficiently known to all.

That this principle, however, may more easily be found, it must be known, according to the Philosopher in Metaphysics II, that although God of Himself, and as to nature, is most known, the intellect of our soul nevertheless stands to Him as the eyes [B] of night-ravens to the light of day — namely, the Sun itself — and this equally on account of the muddiness of corporal matter overshadowing the eyes of the soul. As long therefore as the body which is corrupted weighs down the soul, and the earthly habitation depresses the sense thinking many things, man cannot perfectly understand God as He is — He Himself saying to Moses praying: "Thou canst not see My face; for man shall not see Me, and live," Exodus 33.

Wherefore, according to the Philosopher in Physics I and elsewhere, "There is innate to us a way from the things more known to us to the things more known to nature, which are simply more known: namely, from the posterior to the prior, and from the caused to the causes." The names, therefore, by which we know God, do not signify Him essentially in Himself and altogether absolutely; since they are transferred from the creatures and effects more known to us to Him less known to us, although simply more known. Therefore the Philosopher says in On the World at the end: "Although He is one, He is of many names, named from all the affections which He brings forth. For He is called Jupiter, Zima, son of Saturn, Enicus, lightning-flasher, rainy, thundering, tempestuous, serene, and to speak [C] in summary, celestial and terrestrial — to be appellated from any nature and fortune, as being Himself the cause of all." With whom also Hermes and Dionysius, cited above, agree.

Whence also Rabbi Moses, Guide of the Perplexed 58: "All names of the Creator which are found in books are taken from His works, except one name which is appropriated to Him, namely the Tetragrammaton; and therefore it is called the separate name, because it signifies the wisdom of the Creator with pure signification, in which there is no participation."

If therefore, as he says here, the name of the Lord, the Tetragrammaton, or any other, signifies God purely, and be subjected to a verb or predicate most simple or most pure said of God, the proposition thus affirming will be the simply first of all complex truths, and the first intrinsic principle of the whole genus of complexes.

If, however, no created name, nor anything other than the unique Word of God — which is His perfect image — signifies Him purely (which I reckon more probable), let it be supposed that [D] this name "God" — which is the Tetragrammaton, namely of four letters — is imposed on God from His pure essence, and signifies Him most purely as can be comprehended by any creature; and the proposition conjoining most simply and most purely a verb or predicate most pure with this subject is the principle now sought, namely "God is," or "God is God."

That the most proper and most pure name of God is imposed from His pure essence appears from this: He Himself teaches Moses, who wished to know His name, by saying: "I am who am," Exodus 3. Treating which authority, Rabbi Moses, where above, [chapter] 61, holds that this name most befits God Himself, and signifies Necessary Being. And above, [chapter] 58, he says: "That the Tetragrammaton name of God, which is most proper to God, perhaps signifies, beyond reason, Necessary Being." Therefore a name taken from His pure essence seems most properly to befit Him.

It appears, therefore, that "God is," or "God is God," is the first principle of complexes, if the predicate and verb most essentially and most properly correspondingly signify as does the subject. [E] But true things are twofold: the higher and the lower. The lower truths are all those said of creatable things, or creatures, and universally of any [thing] which is not God, or even of God by relation to another, like "God is Lord of all," or "Creator." The higher truths are those which consist in God alone, like "God is powerful, wise, and good." Of these, indeed, some are in some manner naturally posterior, others prior. For "God wills" is posterior to "[God] knows," and "[God] knows" to "[God] is." For "to be" naturally precedes these and universally all such attributes.

Although this, of itself, sufficiently appears, it can yet be persuaded by a similar [example]. For being simply, in created things, naturally precedes every being of theirs determined to such or such being — as the fourth proposition of On Causes says: "The first of created things is being, and there is not, before it, anything created"; wherefore it likewise seems thus concerning the Creator of all.

Likewise, by what has gone before, the first principle of complexes is affirmative; [A] what therefore could it affirm other than being first of being first, the most pure of the most pure, and the most simple of the most simple? For any other affirmation will be posterior to such. It seems, therefore, that "God is," or "God is God," is simply the first principle of complexes. For that truth is the principle of the others, which naturally precedes them itself.

Whence also Anselm, On Truth 10: "All things owe to the supreme truth; itself, however, owes nothing to anything; nor is it for any reason what it is, except because it is."

Here perhaps someone will object thus: That is not the first truth before which is another truth; but "God is" has another truth before it, namely "God can be." For from anything whatever, "this is, therefore this can be," follows, and is not converted; therefore by that most known definition of the prior, "God can be" is naturally prior to "God is."

This argument, however, errs in matter. For "God is" is prior to "[God] can be" — which seems wonderful, but is true. For everything possible or able to be is such by some prior existing power; God, however, is not able to be by any other [B] power. For He needs no such [thing], nor by any preceding power, since there is no such. Therefore God is able or possible to be by His own power actually inhering in Him; but power, possibility, or potency is one divine attribute. Naturally prior, therefore, is that to which it is attributed and inheres, namely the pure essence of God; therefore "God is" seems naturally prior to "God can be," as far as priority can there be assigned. This whole appears from chapter 1 of this [book].

The reason, however, why the contrary more appears [to be the case], is that thus it is in all other things below God — from which, as was said above, we ascend to the cognition of God, judging it to be thus in the Creator of all as it is in all creatures. For in all these, "to be able to be" actually precedes "to be." For the whole world was first able to be before it was; and since non-being has no power, the world, when it was not, was not possible to be by its own power, but by the divine [power]. Whence Anselm, On the Fall of the Devil 12: "What is altogether nothing has nothing, and therefore has no power; and without power it is altogether nothing, and [C] the world before it was made was nothing; therefore altogether nothing before it was, was able. Therefore it could not be before it was; wherefore before it was possible, it was even impossible that it should be — to that, indeed, in whose power it was not that it should be, it was impossible; but to God, in whose power it was that it should be made, it was possible. Because therefore God could first make the world, before it was made, therefore the world is — not because the world could be prior."

Thomas Bradwardine, De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium

Book I, Chapters XIII–XVII (with Corollaries)

CHAP. XIII.

From the foregoing he infers, as it were as corollaries, twelve points.

From this many things seem to be inferred as corollaries.

[D] 1. THAT ACT IS SIMPLY PRIOR TO POTENCY.

First, that act is simply prior to potency in things mobile and immobile, temporal and eternal. This is sufficiently clear from what has gone before, when one speaks of the first act simply, which is the most pure, most absolute, and most actual essence of the most high God — from which, as from a root, posterior things sprout forth like shoots: all the divine attributes, by whose mediation, out of His unfailing fecundity, He brings forth the rest of His creatures. Therefore Aristotle in Metaphysics IX, ch. 13, and afterwards at length, proves that act in every mover and unmoved thing is prior to potency in three ways: namely in reason — that is, in definition; in wisdom — that is, in perfection; and in time — in one way, and in another way not. For every individual generated is prior in potency than in act, and so potency is prior to act; but that from which the individual is generated must necessarily be prior in act, and so act precedes potency in time, as the Philosopher teaches: For from a being in potency is always made a being in act, by something which is in act, always moving as some first thing; but the mover in act already is. And further on, ch. 17: It is plain that act is prior to potency in substance and in time; for one act is always presupposed to another, up to that which is the first act of the eternal Mover. But still more properly: for the everlasting things are prior in substance to the corruptible. Where Averroes says: The act which is the mover precedes in time the thing moved, and this rises up to the first moved and the first mover. For it has been declared in the [A] Physics that all moved things are reduced to the first mover, who is an act in which there is no potency at all — namely no mutability in itself — as chapter five demonstrated.

2. THAT BEING IS SIMPLY PRIOR TO NON-BEING.

Whence also it is shown secondly that being is simply prior to non-being — that is, the being of the first act, as is sufficiently clear from what immediately precedes. Whence Averroes on Metaphysics IX, comment 13: Universally, since potency is non-being and act is being, it is necessary that being precede non-being. Again, however, if this is not, it is true, and so it is, that this is not; therefore, according to what was just premised, by some prior truth and entity it is true, and so it is, that this is not. And the Philosopher says in Posterior Analytics I, ch. 17, that the affirmative is prior to the negative, as being is prior to non-being.

3. THAT THE NECESSARY IS PRIOR TO THE POSSIBLE OF CONTRADICTION.

Thirdly also, it is gathered from the same that the necessary is prior to the possible of contradiction; for this is plainly evident from the seventeenth point and others of this first book. The necessary, moreover, can exist without such possible, but not the contrary; for by the second point every such possible is necessarily preserved by God. Likewise, if the necessary is not prior to the possible of contradiction, it is therefore equal, or posterior; but it is not equal and coeval with it, because, since two are not equally first simply, those two would have to be reduced to something prior to both, as to a first principle and a first cause common to them — but no such thing can be assigned. Nor can the possible of contradiction be prior to the necessary, because then potency would precede act, and non-being, being — which is contrary to what was just shown. Likewise, if the possible of contradiction were prior to the necessary, since such a possible does not necessarily cause such a necessary, it could be without it, which is contrary to the second point above, as was argued above. Likewise, that which has no cause is prior to that which has a cause; but according to Avicenna, Metaphysics I, ch. 6: The necessary being through itself has no cause, and that which is possible being through itself has a cause; and below in the same chapter 8: Necessary is that which is truth through itself, but the able-to-be is being through another than itself; and chapter 6 proves that the necessary being has nothing equal to itself, nor anything prior to it, but it itself through itself is the first of all others.

4. THAT THE NECESSARY IS PRIOR TO THE IMPOSSIBLE.

Fourthly, from this it can be known that the necessary is prior to the impossible: for the possible is prior to the impossible as affirmation to negation, habit to privation, and being to non-being; and the necessary is prior to the possible, as has just been proved. Likewise, the necessary stands to the impossible as the affirmative to the negative, habit to privation, and being to non-being; and the former precede the latter.

5. THAT PURE NECESSARY BEING, OR PURE NECESSITY, IS SIMPLY PRIOR TO ANY OTHER, AND THE FIRST ROOT AND PRIMARY FOUNDATION OF ALL OTHERS.

Fifthly, from the same it is gathered that pure necessary being, or pure necessity, is simply prior to any other, and the first root and primary foundation of all others. This, however, [D] when the prior points are understood, will be easily known. Yet, from abundance, it can briefly be shown thus: if it is not so, then something else is naturally and necessarily prior, or coequal with it. But nothing non-necessary is prior to it: for since every posterior being is constituted in any of its being through the first being, it would follow that the necessary would be constituted in necessary being through a non-necessary being, but rather a possible or contingent being — which is plainly impossible, because even with the possible destroyed, the necessary would still remain through itself; and because nothing can give to another a more firm being than it has itself. Likewise, if one part of a contradiction is possible, the other is possible; and if one is necessary, the other is impossible. And if the possible should constitute the necessary out of the able-not-to-be, it follows that the necessary is not; therefore, from the possible follows the impossible, and from the true the false. Then also possible or contingent would be prior to necessary, contrary to the foregoing. Nor is anything non-necessary coequal with the necessary, according to the preceding instruction. Therefore necessary being is the principle to all others, and the first cause of all. Perhaps someone will set himself against these things, [E] because according to what has gone before, "God is" is the first principle, and consequently "God simply is" is prior to His being necessarily, or to "necessary being is"; and because just as a part precedes a whole, so does "is" precede "necessary being is." We must say, according to what has gone before, that if "God is" be the first principle, this name "God" signifies the first being most essentially and most properly; therefore for like reason it signifies most necessary being, and the predicate or verb will signify correspondingly as much as it can; and so "God is," if it is the first principle through itself, primarily signifies that necessary being so is. And whatever sort of being the predicate or verb may signify, since the subject is naturally prior to predicate and verb, and itself from itself primarily is necessary being, still necessary being precedes any other being whatever. As for what is then assumed — that "is" precedes "necessary being," as the part the whole — it is not true: for necessary being has no part prior to itself, nor anything prior to it at all by which it might be constituted in such being; rather, it itself through itself and primarily most simply is such being.

6. THAT THE FIRST COMPLEX PRINCIPLE IS SUPREME AND PURELY NECESSARY AND FIRM. [A]

Whence also sixthly it indubitably appears that the first complex principle is supremely and purely necessary and firm. For this complex principle correspondingly enunciates being of the supremely and most firmly necessary being, as the preceding things make manifest.

7. THAT THE NECESSARY IS BY NO MEANS RIGHTLY DEFINED THROUGH THE POSSIBLE OR THROUGH THE IMPOSSIBLE.

Seventhly, it is manifestly concluded that the necessary is by no means rightly defined through the possible, nor through the impossible. For nothing is rightly defined through something posterior to it, as is demonstrated in Posterior Analytics II and Metaphysics VII; but each of these is posterior to the necessary. Therefore the necessary is not rightly defined through this — that it is not possible not to be — or through this — that it is impossible not to be. And so Avicenna, Metaphysics I, ch. 5, rejects the definitions of the ancients concerning the necessary, the possible, and the impossible, because they defined them through one another in a circle, as is plain from the definitions [B] which he there recites from the ancients. And he says that of these three, that which is most worthy to be understood is necessary being, since "necessary being" signifies the vehemence of being. But "being" is more known than "non-being"; for being is known through itself, but non-being through being.

8. THAT NECESSARY BEING CANNOT SIMPLY BE DEFINED.

Whence also eighthly it can be evidently established that necessary being cannot simply be defined (for it has nothing simply prior to it). It can, however, be made known to us and described in a certain way through a description taken from posterior and less known things, but more known to us, as is most frequently done in nearly all sciences.

9. THAT THE AFFIRMATIVE IS PRIOR TO ANY NEGATIVE, AND THAT EVERY TRUE NEGATIVE IS REDUCED TO ANOTHER PRIOR AFFIRMATIVE WHICH IS THE CAUSE OF ITS TRUTH.

[C]

Hence ninthly likewise it clearly appears that the affirmative is prior to any negative, and every true negative is reduced to a prior affirmative which is the cause of its truth. For the first principle, which is affirmative, is the first cause of any other truth, as the foregoing manifests. Likewise, this is true of the negative concerning which it appears less so — namely, of such a one whose both extremes are impossible to be, such as "A chimera is not a goat-stag." For this is true; therefore it has some cause of its truth. But it is not the terms alone, because they alone of themselves would not render the proposition more true than false — indeed, neither true nor false. Nor can that cause be the chimera, nor the goat-stag, for these are nothing, and consequently cause nothing. Therefore there is some existing thing that is the cause of its truth. Here, however, someone may object, for an immediate proposition has no prior proposition that is the cause of its truth, since then it could be shown a priori through that. But some negative proposition is immediate, as is plain throughout almost the whole Posterior Analytics. We must say that for a proposition to be immediate [D] can be in two ways: namely, simply, or in some determinate genus; or also through privation of a middle simply, or in a certain genus. In the first way, no negative proposition is immediate, as the reasoning seems to persuade. In the second way it is, namely not altogether and simply, but in the genus of negative propositions — as through the privation of a prior negative proposition through which it could be demonstrated a priori — and so the said book can be understood.

10. THAT THE FIRST CAUSE OF EVERY TRUE NEGATION IS IN GOD.

And from this it appears tenthly that the first cause of every true negation is in God; for of every true negation some prior affirmative is the cause, as has just been shown, and the first cause of every true affirmative is the first complex principle, namely "God is," as the preceding things have taught.

11. THAT GOD IS THE FIRST CAUSE OF WHATEVER IS NOT. [E]

From this, eleventhly, it seems to be inferred that God is the first cause of whatever is not. For of any non-being it is truly denied that it is; but of this negative truth God is the first cause, as has just been shown. Therefore He is the first cause of so being or not being, as it is signified through that proposition. For according as a thing is or is not, the speech is said to be true or false, as Aristotle's Categories taught. Likewise, God is the first cause of all being or every being; and some being or "is" is the cause of some "not being" or non-being; therefore God is the first cause of some non-being or non-entity, and therefore of any whatever by similar reasoning. For "good is not evil" is a certain non-being, and the cause of this is "good is good"; and "man is not a donkey" because he is a rational animal or man. And in purely non-beings the same is plain. For some thing-makable is not made, nor is, because no maker has made it. For a species or thing makable by God alone — such as another star in the heavens, or another angel — therefore was not made nor was, because God did not make it; just as the saving of the ship was not, because the sailor was not present, but was perhaps absent, occupied, as is plain through Aristotle, Metaphysics V, ch. 2, and through Anselm, On the Conception of the Virgin 5.

12. THAT THE FIRST CAUSE OF EVERY IMPOSSIBILITY AND REPUGNANCE IS IN GOD.

Twelfthly, it is brought forth from this that the first cause of every impossibility or repugnance is in God. For if impossibility and repugnance be taken negatively, this is plain by what has just been shown. For if in God is the first cause of every true negation and non-being, therefore also of the negation and non-being of every impossible and repugnant; and because every true negative is reduced to a prior affirmative, and so to the first principle, namely "God is," as is sufficiently plain from above. But if they be taken affirmatively and positively, it is similarly plain, since by the preceding chapters it is established that God is the first cause of all such things. Likewise, of every impossibility and repugnance there is some cause, and God is the first cause of all causes. This can also be proved as the preceding things were proved: for it is true that this is impossible — whatever impossible has been demonstrated; but of this truth, and so of so being, the first cause is the first principle, namely "God is." Likewise, it is true that it is impossible for a chimera to be a goat-stag; but of this truth the cause is not the terms alone, nor a chimera, or a goat-stag, nor any non-being; because what altogether is not can cause nothing at all. Therefore some being is the cause of it, and God is the first cause of all beings. Likewise, everything which is naturally and essentially prior to another is some cause of it; for if not, then it could be without that prior. For every posterior can be without any prior on which it does not causally depend in being. For when all and only those priors have been posited, on which the posterior causally depends in being, that posterior can be posited; for if not, this would be on account of the defect of some essential cause which would necessarily be prerequired for causing it in being. But all such causes are now posited; nor can it be feigned that this is on account of the defect of some accidental cause, since it does not contradict a thing to be without anything accidental to it, as is plain through that most well-known definition of accident mentioned above. Therefore it is plain that, if a prior is not the cause of a posterior, the posterior can be without that prior; and if some posterior can be without the prior signified, that prior is not naturally and essentially prior to that posterior, but only accidentally perhaps — which destroys the hypothesis taken before. Indeed, rather it seems that they are coequal, or connected by no essential order. For if that prior is not the cause of the posterior, each can be without the other, therefore they are not more naturally nor essentially ordered to one another than the units of arithmetic, or any unconnected things — which also subverts the hypothesis previously fixed. This therefore being supposed, it is argued in this way: Everything which is naturally and essentially prior to another is some cause of it; but the necessary is naturally and essentially prior to the impossible, as has been shown above; therefore the necessary is some cause of the impossibility and repugnance of any whatever; and every necessary is either the first necessary, namely God Himself, or caused and dependent upon Him, as the preceding things have taught.

For I imagine that, just as according to what has gone before the first of all is pure necessity, or pure necessary being, standing altogether through itself, not depending upon another in any way — from which, as through likeness and conformity to it, every other necessary or possible is necessary being or possible being — so through dissimilarity and contrariety or opposition to the same, every impossible is impossible to be. I think therefore that every impossible to be is therefore impossible because the necessary being itself necessarily repels it, and so immovably forbids it to be. But lest perhaps it be said to me that things do not follow imagination, and so the image of this imagination be reduced to nothing, I shall fortify it with some reasoning. For every impossible to be is therefore impossible to be because being necessarily and firmly is repugnant to it. But in the impossible to be itself, since it altogether is not, there is nothing; therefore neither any necessity, firmness, or repugnance. That necessity or repugnance, therefore, is in something existing — so that it is impossible for that to be, because some existing thing through itself, primarily, and necessarily is repugnant to it. But that impossible is repugnant to such an existing thing, not through itself and primarily, but only through the repugnance of the existent — namely, because that existent is repugnant to it — just as it is in the relatives of the third mode, which are said according to measurable and measure, of which sort are the sensible, knowable, and intelligible, or the sensed, known, and understood with their correlatives. For these are called relatives, not because they are related through themselves and essentially, but because it happens to them that other things, namely their correlatives, are referred through themselves and essentially to them, and are measured by them, as is plain in Metaphysics V, ch. 20, and similarly in the Commentary.

It seems therefore that every impossible to be is therefore impossible to be because some existing thing, through itself and primarily repugnant to it, forbids it to be. But every existent is either the first and pure necessity, or necessary being, or caused and dependent upon it. Likewise, the impossible and the possible are said relatively to one another according to privation, as is plain in Metaphysics V, where above. But concerning the impossible, since it is purely non-being, no relation through itself and essentially can arise or be founded; for then two purely non-beings could be related to one another through themselves and essentially, without the co-requirement of any existent at all. This relation, therefore, through itself and primarily is founded in the positive extreme, namely in the possible, and emanates from it, and so is attributed and happens in a certain way to the other, privative extreme — as was just said about the relatives of the third mode. The possible therefore causes this relation and impossibility, and necessary being is prior to the possible to be, and the cause of it, as has been shown above; and God is the first cause of all possibles and necessities, and of all causations of them. Likewise, the impossible is therefore impossible, because it is repugnant to the possible — indeed, because the possible is repugnant to it. The possible therefore is the first cause of this repugnance and impossibility, and God is the first cause of every other causation and cause. This can be confirmed by this: that all opposites are reduced to the first opposites, which are habit and privation, as is plain in Metaphysics X, ch. 15, and Metaphysics XII, ch. 23, and there it is proved that these are in the genus of substance. But the habitual and the positive is naturally prior to the other, and therefore some cause of it, as the preceding things make manifest. Therefore the first habit in the genus of substance, namely God Himself, is the first cause of every privation, and therefore of any impossibility and repugnance.

Likewise, the proximate cause why anything is possible is that God can do that, as has been shown above. Therefore the proximate cause why anything is not possible is that God cannot do that. And because God cannot do this, it is not on account of the defect of power in Him, since He is omnipotent. Whence Averroes on Physics VIII, ch. 4: For an agent not to be able to do something impossible is not a diminution of the agent. Indeed, on account of the abundance of His infinite power — and therefore most powerfully — He cannot do this; for He cannot do this because it is repugnant to His infinite power; nay, because His infinite power immovably is repugnant to it, and so necessarily forbids it to be. And because, according to what has been shown before, act in God also precedes potency, therefore His potency is repugnant to such an impossible because His most pure act immovably and necessarily is repugnant to it. And this is so because it is pure necessary being, or pure necessity. For this is the first simply of all affirmations and negations, as has been shown above. And this seems to be the consummated resolution of the whole impossibility.

This reasoning, however, is founded in the saying of the Philosopher, Posterior Analytics I, ch. 12, where he inquires the proximate negative demonstrative middle of a negative conclusion: as, why does the wall not breathe? showing that it cannot be said because it is not an animal, because then to be an animal would be the proximate cause of breathing, and so every animal would breathe. For if a negation is the cause of non-being, an affirmation is the cause of being. Just as being without measure of hot and cold is the cause of not healing, so being with measure of them is the cause of healing; and similarly, if affirmation is the cause of being, negation is the cause of non-being. Likewise, whatever is impossible, [D] God cannot do that. Either, therefore, it is impossible because God cannot do it — and so we have what was proposed; or, on the other hand, God cannot do it because it is impossible. And so, according to what was just alleged: God can do whatever is possible because it is possible; thus also "to be possible" would be naturally prior to "God being able to do it," and the first cause why God could do this — which the preceding things do not permit. And then God would receive His power and perfection from another, nor would He suffice most fully for Himself, nor be the first cause of all. Even if it were so, some creature — indeed, what seems more unworthy, some purely non-existent, neither created nor creatable — would forbid, render impossible, and subject the omnipotent to inevitable necessity, that He should do or not do this or that. And likewise it would coerce the divine intellect to understanding and knowing such things, and His most powerful and most free will to willing.

This view holds Henry of Ghent, Quodlibet VIII, q. 3, saying that it is not true to say of any simply impossible thing that God cannot do it because it cannot be done, but rather it cannot be done because God cannot do it. Just as in the affirmative: it is not said that God can do something because it can be done, but the contrary. The same proves likewise John Duns Scotus on Sentences I, dist. 43, by the prior reasoning founded on the first Posterior Analytics, and by another similar one. And finally holding this, he says there that nothing is simply impossible except what includes contradictories and impossibles, which from their formal natures are impossible, and from Him are principally impossible, from whom in a principiative way they have their formal natures — namely, from the divine intellect — though formally from themselves.

But perhaps someone will object against the things said by the said Doctors. For Henry holds the contrary in Quodlibet VI, q. 3, manifestly: namely, that the first cause why anything is possible is from God; but the first cause why anything is impossible is from itself and from the nature of the thing — speaking most commonly of the thing, namely as it is common to all intelligibles existing or not existing. And to this he alleges Avicenna in Metaphysics IV, saying that an agent therefore cannot do it because it is not possible in itself. The same John also proves the contrary where above, and argues in this way: Nothing is simply impossible except that to which simply being is repugnant, and this primarily of itself, because from its first and per se formal natures, prescinding from anything else; indeed, even if (per impossibile) God did not exist, that would still be impossible. And he says in the same place that the possibility and impossibility of possibles and impossibles are reduced principiatively to the divine intellect, not to His omnipotence or potency — which seems to oppose what has gone before.

To these things I say it seems to me, with John aforesaid where above, that Henry by the second saying corrects or retracts the first. Yet it could be that Henry himself, Avicenna, and John might understand that no pure privation or privative impossibility, through itself and primarily, which does not depend on something positive prior, is in God, which would be the cause of the privation and impossibility of impossibles — just as something positive in Him through itself and primarily is the cause of every possibility of possibles. But the impossibility on the part of the impossible thing — that is, the pure and prior necessity of the impossible thing not being — is the cause why God and any active thing cannot. But this positive necessity, according to what has gone before, is in God.

But John's argument does not stand. For to the impossible to be, "to be" is not repugnant through itself and primarily, but because the first being necessarily is repugnant to it, as was said above. Nor is this primarily from the formal natures which he imagines. For if those natures are in some way causes, they are reduced to a prior cause, namely to God, the first cause of all causes. And this is plain through himself there saying that such things are principally impossible from Him, from whom they have their formal natures principiatively — namely, from the divine intellect. But what he says — that even if God were not, such a thing would still be impossible — if "impossible" be taken affirmatively, is false; because if He were not, nothing positive or affirmative would be. But if it be taken purely negatively, namely for "not possible to be," thus it is true: for He Himself is the first and supreme power, by which any possible necessarily is possible, and therefore, He not existing, nothing would be possible. But from this, what he wished does not follow. Or otherwise — and perhaps better — it can be said that "God does not exist" most necessarily includes a contradiction. Therefore even if "God does not exist" be posited, not only one part of a contradiction in many, and perhaps in all things, but also the other will follow necessarily.

It can be argued similarly against him: He says that the divine intellect is the cause of impossibility in things. Now although God might understand nothing concerning the impossible — because, according to him, even if God did not exist, the impossible would still be impossible — therefore by his own consequence the divine intellect is not the cause of that impossibility. And what he says — that possibility and impossibility are reduced principiatively to the intellect of God, not to His omnipotence or potency — seems strange. For according to his most frequent way of imagining, the divine essence is the principle of potency in God (since act precedes potency in Him), and it is in some way prior to His actual intellection. For from this, it seems, He most powerfully and most perfectly understands the universe of things, because He has a most perfect and most powerful intellective potency. The essence, therefore, or pure being, seems to be the principle of potency or being-able, and this of actual intellection. And whatever is the principle of a principle is the principle of the principiated. Therefore essence and divine potency are prior principles of possibility and impossibility than the divine intellect.

He proves this saying of his thus: Through whatever in God a possible is first constituted in intelligible being, that is the first reason of possibility; but through omnipotence as it is distinguished against the intellect, the creature is not constituted in intelligible being, but through the intellect. But the minor of this reasoning seems to err. For if the divine intellect constitutes anything in intelligible being, since this cannot be done without understanding it, He constitutes it in intelligible being by understanding it. And since to constitute something constituted in some being is naturally prior to the constituted being such, it seems that God naturally first understands any intelligible before it is intelligible — which, however, does not appear; nay, the contrary rather appears. For it seems that the knowable in knowable being precedes knowledge, and the intelligible in intelligible being, intellect.

For it seems that the divine essence, from the infinity of its potency and virtue, most distinctly and as it were nominatim, intelligibly constitutes and contains the universe of intelligibles, and the first, purest, and most proper natures of them all; and these are the ideas of which the philosophers and theologians speak so much. And so, in a manner forerunning the divine intellect, it offers these to it as objects, and so the intellect understands all things consequently. And this Isaiah seems to testify in chapter 40, of God speaking thus: "He calls all by name; on account of the multitude of His might, and strength, and power, not one was left out." Where the interlinear gloss explains "on account of the multitude of His might" thus: because He is omnipotent. Therefore His omnipotence is the cause of His intellection, and prior to it, and in the manner aforesaid. [A]

And from this in particular it could be argued against Scotus. For if God's omnipotence is the cause of His intellection, and His intellection is the cause constituting intelligibles in intelligible being, therefore also His omnipotence constitutes them in this being. For whatever is the cause of a cause is the cause of the caused. And this could be confirmed from his own sayings there: for he proves that God's omnipotence is prior to the creature, according to any of its being — whether existence or intelligible — by this, that this omnipotence is from itself formally necessary, but the creature possible according to any of its being, and such a necessary precedes every such possible — as he supposes, and as I have shown above. Therefore it is the cause of it, as the preceding things have persuaded.

Likewise, against another reasoning of his saying: For he says that the divine intellect produces some two intelligibles in intelligible being, and those things so produced from their formal natures, through themselves and primarily, are repugnant and impossible. It seems that by the same reasoning he should consequently say this also of compossibles, possibles, similars, equals, greateres, lessers — and universally of all positive things, namely that, taking their formal natures, through themselves and primarily, they are such through themselves, or through their formal natures. For the formal nature of "white" makes "white be white" only as much as "not be black" — indeed, prior and more so. For "white," through this that it is white, is not black; and universally every true negative is reduced to some prior true affirmative, as is plain through what has gone before. And so, of no positive thing on this side of God would the first cause or reason be in God, although God is the first cause of all such things — and as he himself says, the first reason of every possibility is in God.

CHAP. XIV. THAT THE DIVINE WILL IS THE CAUSE OF ANY FUTURE AND PAST THING — WHEREFORE IT IS SUCH. [C]

That the treatise on the causality of the divine will may be finally completed, I judge it must be shown that the divine will is the cause of any future or past thing — whereby it is such. For according to the Philosopher, Posterior Analytics II, ch. 3, that which is truly the cause of any thing being is the same as the cause of its becoming, of its having been, and of its being to be. And according to Lincolniensis [Robert Grosseteste], this is conclusion 18 of that second book. But the divine will is truly the cause of any thing's being, as chapter nine proves.

Whence Augustine, City of God XXII, ch. 2: According to that will of God, which with His foreknowledge is eternal, surely in heaven and in earth, all things whatsoever He willed — not only past and present, but even future — He has already done. But before the time comes in which He willed it to be done, which He foreknew and disposed before all times, we say, "It will be done when God shall will." But if not only the time at which it is to be, but even whether it is to be, we are ignorant of, we say, "It will be done if God shall will" — not because God will then have a new will which He did not have, but because that which from eternity has been prepared in His immutable will, will then be. The same appears through Anselm, Monologion 18, and De Veritate 10, and through Augustine, Soliloquies I, ch. 21; Soliloquies II, ch. 20 and 26; Contra Faustum II, as the eleventh chapter of this book touches upon. This appears more, if one attends to Augustine in the same place against Faustus, not only positing the causes of future, present, and past things in God, but also in the divine will. Whence he says thus: "What was done concerning Elijah we do not know, yet we believe of him what true Scripture testifies. This indeed we know was done concerning him, what God's will has; but what God's will does not have, can in no way be done concerning anyone whatever. Accordingly, if it should be said to me that it can be done that the flesh, for example, of this or that man may be changed into a heavenly body, I grant that it can be done, but whether it shall be I do not know — and therefore I do not know, because what God's will has concerning this matter is hidden from me. [E] That, however, is not hidden from me: that without doubt it shall be, if God's will so has it." And below: "Future things can no more not be done than past things not have been done, since it is not in God's will that anything be false by which it is true. Wherefore all things which are truly future will without doubt be done; but if they shall not have been done, they will not have been future. So all things which are truly past have without doubt passed."

Likewise, future and past things have no being at all; therefore they have no cause, nor any truth; therefore neither do they truly of themselves have being future or past. Therefore they have these on account of some other cause, and that cannot be purely non-being on account of the same. Or at least it is reduced to some existing cause, and of all existing causes the will of omnipotent God is the first, supreme, and efficient. [A]

Likewise, the will of God is the cause why any future to either side is future; therefore for the same reason of any other things: For Antichrist of himself has no being at all; therefore of himself he is not more determined to one part of the contradiction than to another; therefore of himself alone he is not future, but purely indifferent. If therefore he is future, this is through some determining cause; but that cause is necessarily the divine will, or is reduced to it as to the first and supreme cause of that determination. Likewise, "Antichrist will be future" has no more from itself why it is future than "Anti-Christ" — equally possible to be future, but never truly future. But this latter is not future of itself; therefore neither is the former, but through some other cause, which without the divine will cannot cause. Moreover, some thing not future yet possible to be — such as A — God can make to be future and to be future. And if it should come to be, the divine will is the cause why A is future; therefore similarly of all similar things. Wherefore John [Duns Scotus] also on Sentences I, dist. 39, says: That nothing such concerning the future is true before the determination of the divine will, but that determination naturally precedes as cause.

Likewise, the same is the cause now why any future is future, which was before the world; but then the divine will was the cause of all futures; therefore still it is, since according to the fifth chapter God is in every way immutable. Likewise, "to be future" is more than "to be possible." But no future of itself has being possible, therefore neither is it future. For every possible, by some power, is possible. But no future has any being, therefore neither any potency. Therefore no future is possible to be, except because some present can make it to be. But no present can make anything without God's will co-acting. Therefore no possibility, or cause of possibility, is in futures, but in present things, and the first and supreme of all causes and possibilities, or of present potencies, is in God. The same, also, is now the cause of the possibility of futures as before the world; but then God alone was, as is plain manifestly through the venerable Anselm, De Casu Diaboli 12, which chapter 12 [of this book] alleged.

Likewise, everything which is necessary to be in some manner, by some necessity is necessary to be such. But no past has any being, therefore neither any necessity. And every such thing is necessarily past; therefore this is by some present necessity, which necessarily is God or depends upon Him, and therefore upon His will. Whence also Anselm, Cur Deus Homo II, ch. 17: "All necessity or impossibility is subject to God's will. But His will is subject to no necessity or impossibility; for nothing is necessary or impossible, except because He so wills it." Likewise, the first true is the cause of any subsequent true, and therefore the cause of really so being, as any subsequent true signifies. But the first true is in God, as ch. 11 with ch. 12 taught; therefore in God is the cause of being true of any future truth, and of so being as is signified through it. And this is not without preceding will, or also concomitant. Likewise, God with His will naturally precedes every past and future; therefore He is the cause of them, as has been shown in the previous chapter.

This Peter Lombard also expressly holds, Sentences I, dist. 45.4, saying thus: "This supremely good will, therefore, is the cause of all things which are made naturally, or have been made, or are future." Is not this what the twenty-four Elders concordantly attest, saying to Him sitting on the throne, "Thou hast created all things, and on account of Thy will they were and have been created" (Apocalypse 4)? "They were," I say — as the Doctors expound — first in predestination, in art, in the Wisdom of God; and "they have been created" afterwards in work and effect.

COROLLARY.

AND HE HAS A COROLLARY: IF GOD WERE TO CEASE TO BE, NOTHING WOULD BE PAST OR FUTURE, TRUE OR FALSE, POSSIBLE OR IMPOSSIBLE, NECESSARY OR CONTINGENT, NOR EVEN COULD BE — FROM WHICH THE OPPOSITE EVIDENTLY FOLLOWS, NAMELY THAT GOD HIMSELF, AND THUS SOMETHING, HAS PRE-EXISTED, IS, AND WILL BE. O HOW NECESSARY IT IS THAT HE BE, WHOM IT IS SO IMPOSSIBLE EVER TO CEASE TO BE; AND THAT GOD IN ANY WAY NOT BE, MOST NECESSARILY CONTAINS AND IMPORTS A CONTRADICTION; AND "NECESSARY BEING" SEEMS THE MOST PROPER NAME OF GOD.

Hence a marvelous corollary seems to follow: namely, if God were to cease to be, nothing would be past or future, true or false, possible or impossible, necessary or contingent — nor even could be. From which the opposite evidently follows, namely God Himself, and so something, has been before, is, and will be — and likewise other things can be through God's great omnipotence. O how necessary it is that He be, whom it is so impossible ever to cease to be, whom even in any way not to be most necessarily contains and imports a contradiction! Whence perhaps, [A] though enigmatically, can be drawn the most proper name of God, namely "necessary being," or "necesse esse" — which must be understood of being through itself, and of necessity by supreme necessity, namely including the contradictory repugnance of not being.

But that, if God were to cease to be, nothing would be past nor future, is plain from this chapter; and that nothing would be true, nor would truly be or not be, from chapters 11 and 12: since nothing can be true or truly without the first true which is in God; from which it follows that nothing would be false, since if one of opposites were false, the other would be true. And that nothing would be possible or impossible, necessary or contingent, is plain through the previous chapter: for all these things originate from God. And that nothing of these even could be is plain, because nothing of these could be without God; but if God were not, He Himself could not be — for if He could be, He would be, as the premises in the proof of the first Supposition show.

The remaining parts up to the penultimate are sufficiently plain. As for the penultimate: it is to be known that something can be said in many ways "not to be." First, as future; secondly, [B] as past; thirdly, as something possible to be, which neither will be, is, nor was; fourthly, as that which simply is impossible to be, including a contradiction — such as a chimera, or the commensurability of the diameter and the side of a square. Let it then be posited, with Diagoras or with the fool, as something absolutely possible and including no contradiction, that God does not exist. If therefore God is not, He is not in some one of the said modes. If in the first mode, He will at some time begin to be, and there will be a new and recent God; therefore He will be God, therefore He will be necessary being and eternal, as the demonstration of the first Supposition shows. Here therefore a contradiction is implied. If in the second mode, God is past and not present, and was God; therefore He was necessary being and eternal, as the proof of the first Supposition shows. Here therefore is a manifest contradiction. If in the third mode, God is not and can be; therefore He is, and is necessary being, as the said proof plainly proves. Here therefore a contradiction is implied. If in the fourth mode: that which can be cannot be — for it is absolutely possible that God be, as the premises in the demonstration of the first Supposition perspicuously manifest; [C] indeed, it is also simply absolutely necessary that "God's being" be simply absolutely possible, as the things had in the same demonstration show. Here therefore a contradiction is evidently included.

Again: God's being is necessary, in such a way that His not being includes a contradiction. For this the said proof evidently shows. Let it be said that "absolutely possible" is what does not include simply contradictory things in formally simple consequence. Let "impossible" and "necessary" or "necesse" be taken correspondingly, etc., as there. For it is established that it is absolutely possible that some such necessary being be. For who, this being posited and admitted, would not easily defend himself from every contradiction? Furthermore, however, as much as something is impossible, so much is something necessary. For as much as it is impossible that contradictories be simultaneously true, so much is it necessary that contradictories not be simultaneously true. And universally, as much as it is impossible that something be, so much is it necessary that it not be; and as much as it is impossible that something not be, so much is it necessary that it be — as could easily be demonstrated. But I reckon no one ignorant of this. There is, however, something so impossible, that for it to be true includes a contradiction; therefore there is also something so necessary, that for it to be false similarly includes a contradiction. But what is more necessary than God's being? Who dares say this or that, since this is the first in the genus of necessities, and the cause of all subsequent necessities — therefore most necessary above all, as the previous chapters have taught. The same evidently show many corollaries premised in chapter 13.

The same likewise can be shown by way of true and false. For as false something is, so true something is; for as false it is that something be or not be, so true on the contrary it is that it not be or be. But something is so false, that for it to be true includes a contradiction; therefore something is so true, that for it to be false includes a contradiction. But what is truer than the first true, as the reasoning just premised, and the previous chapters, manifest? But what is simply and naturally the first true? Is it not "God is," as the twelfth demonstrated? Furthermore, if God is not, truly God is not. Therefore by some truth God is not; therefore there is some truth, and therefore the first truth, which is God. Likewise, if any truth, or anything at all, is, God is — because that or it necessarily is God, or from God, as the second of this book showed. If, moreover, God is not, so it is that God is not, because it is true that God is not, because truly He is not. Therefore through some being it so is that God is not. But every being is the first being, which is God, or from the first being, as the same second [chapter] demonstrates. Therefore God is. This seems the reasoning of Augustine in his Soliloquies, and Anselm's Monologion, and De Veritate 11, written in this book.

From these things it seems clearly to appear that any negative implies and includes some affirmation. For any negative intimates and includes that what it denies truly is not. Does it not also follow: "A is not B; therefore truly A is not B"? For of any whatsoever, "true" and "necessary to be" seems either truly this is that, or truly this is not that. Whether therefore anything be or not be, of necessity God is, because there is some truth. Furthermore, if God is not, nothing truly is or truly is not; nothing truly is this or such, nor truly is not this or such, because by no truth, according to the premises. Therefore anything truly is and truly is not, and anything truly is and truly is not anything [and any such thing] in every way.

Furthermore, it can similarly be argued by way of possibility and necessity. For if God is not, it is possible that He be, or it is possible that He not be. Therefore by some power this is possible; therefore some potency is, and something powerful through that, as is plain from the fourteenth of this book. Therefore something is, therefore also God. If also God is not, it is necessary that He not be — at least for now — and it is necessary that He not be God. Therefore by some necessity of some existing necessary thing, as is shown in the same fourteenth, etc., as before. Likewise, if God is not, there is some positive cause of His not being, and prior to Him, as the 13th of this book shows, etc., as before.

Furthermore, if God is not, neither is the creature, nor anything at all. Yet it is absolutely possible for the creature to be, and for something to be. For in the truth of things now it is true and possible. And what once is or can be absolutely possible is always necessarily absolutely possible — taking these terms as above, and as the proof of the first Supposition more fully expounds. For what once does not formally and simply include a contradiction, never does so. Because a consequence which sometimes is not formal simply through itself and per se, never is so. And whatever can sometimes be not formal simply, always necessarily is not formal simply — just as whatever can sometimes be formal simply, always necessarily is formal simply, as no logician is ignorant. For who is ignorant that a formally simple consequence is absolutely necessary in consequence? And whose mind would grasp that the absolutely necessary could be made to be, or could be possible according to contradiction to be and not be, or vice versa? Who also doubts that whatever through itself and essentially is something, always — at least while it is — is necessarily such? Otherwise it would not be such through itself and essentially, but through another, which could be present and absent while it itself remains, and accidentally — the cause of which is, that whatever is, while it is, of itself and from its essence cannot lack itself. Wherefore also, whatever through itself and of itself essentially is something, always while it is, is necessarily absolutely such. And from this it is, as I think, that the Philosopher in Posterior Analytics I, ch. 4, says that "per se" imports "of all" and "always," as the second of this is more fully recited.

Therefore, God not existing, the creature and something can be; therefore also the Creator and God can be; and if He can be, He is, as the premises here and in the first of this show. If also something can be, truly something can be; therefore by some truth, and by some potency of some existing powerful thing now. It is also necessary that the creature can be; therefore by some necessity of some existing necessary thing, etc., as above. If, moreover, something can be, this is through a prior act, and there is some act prior in nature to potency, as the first part of chapter 13 taught. And by the third part of this, the necessary is prior to the possible according to contradiction. But that prior act, and that prior necessary, is necessarily either from God, or God. If also the creature is not, by that not being, and that negation, there is some prior being, and some prior affirmation in nature, and the cause of it, as the 2nd part and the 9th of chapter 13 showed. That is necessarily from God, or God — which the 10th and 11th parts of it evidently confirm. If therefore God is not, God is; and if God is, God is. Thou therefore truly art my God! Indeed, not only art Thou, but most necessarily art, in such measure that nothing else more necessarily or so necessarily could be. Apart from Thee, who alone truly art, scarcely anything else is. For nothing else is necessarily of itself, or is from itself; nay, of itself nothing is, but from Thee, through Thee, and in Thee, nor can anything be otherwise.

Did not Thy secretary Isaiah see this when he said, "Who has measured the waters in his fist, and weighed the heavens with his palm? Who has poised with three fingers the mass of the earth, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance? Behold, the Gentiles are as a drop of a bucket, and are counted as the smallest grain of a balance; all the nations are before Him as if they were not, and are counted to Him as nothing and vanity." [E] O Lord my God, didst Thou not indicate this to Thy most familiar servant Moses, when, asking Thy name, Thou didst answer him as if for a name proper to Thee: "I am who am; thus shalt thou say to the children of Israel, He who is hath sent me to you"? O Lord my God, how admirable is Thy name! Truly, Lord, admirable is any of Thy names, but how admirable specially is this name! Hence also another wise Moses [Maimonides], following the Sages to whom Thy oracles have been entrusted, says that all Thy names are transferred from Thy works, except one, exact in four letters, and therefore called in Greek the Tetragrammaton, which, as he says, signifies Thy substance purely, not by participation of anything foreign — and which therefore is called Thy separated name. Wherefore, also, it was worthy of so great reverence that it was not pronounced except in the Sanctuary, and by Thy holy priests, and this on a fast day, in the priestly blessing, by the highest priest. Nor did they teach this name except to a disciple suitable for it, and once a week, no more. And this Moses, the Guide of the Perplexed, says — though doubtful in this part — that perhaps it signifies the rationale of necessary being. Which I think also Thou, Lord, didst show to the prior Moses (though under a cloud), when Thou saidst, "I am who am; so shalt thou say to the children of Israel, He who is hath sent me to you. This is My name forever — to Me," Thou sayest. The grammarians say, Lord, that a pronoun in speech ought to be placed for the sake of distinction, or for emphasis. When therefore Thou sayest "to Me," Thou seemest to intimate that this name distinctively belongs to Thee, because to Thee alone through Thyself alone, and not through another — for then it would rather be the name of that other — and to none else save through Thee. Otherwise, it would be as much the name of another as Thine. Wherefore likewise Thou intimatest, as I think, that this name belongs to Thee significantly — namely, more excellently than to any other.

Thou saidst likewise, Lord, that this name is to Thee forever; Thou didst not say "is now," "was before," or "will be after," but "is forever." But to be forever, or to have been, or to be future, and so to be of itself — what better seems it to signify than stability, immutability, and the most firm necessity of being? [B] Thou hast also taught me, sweetest Doctor, in the preceding chapter, that "necessary being" precedes in some manner — as I, stammering, can scarcely express — any other being of Thine. Whence it also seems to follow that it is the first and highest of Thy divine names. O Lord, my Father, suffer Thy little child childishly to play before Thee. Behold, I see "necessary being," by Thy providence disposing, agree with Thy great name Tetragrammaton not only in signification, but also somehow in number of letters: for it has only four letters, four kinds of letters. O necessary being, on account of Thy name, my most sustainable being! Upon Thee may I always wholly lean; may Thou support me, comfort me; with all my heart may I cleave to Thee, with all my powers may I adhere to Thee; may I wholly be transformed into Thee, and eternally confirmed.

Against these things, however, perhaps someone will object thus: If the divine will be the cause of futurity in things, it causes futurity in them; therefore at some time it causes this. Therefore previously some thing was not future, but then begins to be future. Likewise, if the divine will were the cause of the futurity of all futures, [C] it would be the cause of the truth of all true propositions, even of contingent ones concerning the future. And since the divine will freely wills ad extra, it could will nothing concerning future contingents. Which if it should do, all such propositions concerning the future would lack all truth — and both contradictories in such cases would be simultaneously false, and therefore likewise simultaneously true.

But if these arguments proceeded, they would also demonstrate that God by His absolute omnipotence cannot make anything to be, or anything to be future — though many things are possible to be done immediately by Him alone, which never will be done by Him, which, if He should will to be, would necessarily be and be future, by the 10th [chapter], and only through the divine will. Indeed, also, according to this earthly wisdom, God would not be able by any means to impede any future, or make it not to be, except by leading it to being — that is, making it never to be, to be, or to have been. But why could God omnipotent not impede the future act of an impotent man, or of any other creature, and not do some act of His own future — against the first Supposition, the eighth part of corollary 1 of this book, and chapters 32 and 34 of corollary 1 of this book, and against the Prophet who says that God acted freely, and therefore acts and will act with similar freedom?

If anyone wishes to solve these things directly, it must be answered that God by eternal causation — namely, by eternal, immutable, and in every way infrustrable volition — makes futures to be future. Wherefore Aristotle in De Mundo, ch. 11, having shown that all things which are in the world are truly God's works, adds: "From which [that is, from God], according to the natural philosopher Empedocles, all things which are, and afterwards will be, have proceeded" — as if to say with the Prophet, or the Prophet with him: He who has made the things that are to come, just as the Father, by eternal causation and generation, causes and generates His eternal Son.

Perhaps you will reply that, although according to the premises a future thing in no instant or measure of time begins to be future, yet in some instant, or measure, or sign of origin, order, or nature, it begins to be future — which seems no more about these than about those. But this scarcely verbally — really nothing — opposes what has been said. For perhaps the signification of the verb "to begin," signifying with time, with flux, and the succession of temporal measure, deceives — and only similar temporal beginning. But if it signifies only thus, the objection does not stand. If, however, the verb "to begin" can in any way, without offense to common speech and the Authors, be transferred to signifying procession, causation, origination, and any order — not of time, but of nature — I do not see why it cannot be conceded that a thing has begun to be future, namely has had a cause of its futurity, naturally, causally, and originally preceding it, as the foregoing has taught. Yet, speaking thus, the thing has not begun to be future otherwise than that it always continually begins to be future, while it remains future — just as eternally there would have been and would be of an eternal foot, dust, and footprint, of the eternal Father and Son, between whom Augustine asserts a priority of origin — if, however, in that ineffable Trinity it is permitted to affirm any beginning whatever; though the generation of the Son seems to be principiated, or initiated, in some manner from the Father, as from the terminus a quo He proceeds, and to be terminated in the Son, as in the terminus ad quem He tends. For who would deny that the Father is the principle of the Son?

Nor do I think anyone so impudent as to deny altogether that futures have any cause of their futurity, and to say that "Thou wilt run," and any true proposition concerning the future, is the first principle and the first true simply, or coequal with it, or comparable in the order of truth, the previous chapters being understood. Who also would presume to deny that the divine will is, or can be, the cause of the predestination, election, and salvation of the saints?

But to the other argument, some might perhaps respond that God can suspend every act of His will concerning futures and non-futures whatsoever, and so make it that nothing is future, and therefore make any such affirmation false. But [B] even if God could make nothing to be future, and no simple categorical proposition concerning the future to be true, yet He cannot make it that any disjunctive between such an affirmative and its opposite negative not be true. Therefore the truth of no such disjunctive depends on the divine will, but precedes it naturally and necessarily, as it appears; therefore also the truth of one part, as it appears.

Therefore perhaps it will be said that the future thing — say A — of itself and per se is not future, but is not-future, and this antecedently to the divine will. Yet no thing is future except antecedently from the divine will, nor does this include a contradiction. For just as, according to the Philosopher, a temporal contradiction must be for the same time or instant, so a natural contradiction is for the same order, instant, or sign of nature. Therefore it is not contradictory that A first, antecedently to the divine will, of itself is not future, and second, subsequently to the divine will, and through it, is future — just as neither these: this before generation or creation was non-being, and now after is being.

Or perhaps it is better said that any true proposition concerning the future, both negative and affirmative, contingent, is subject to the divine will, [C] and originates from it, and causally depends upon it. For every such proposition imports a certain liberty. But the first free principle is in the divine will, as the corollary of the tenth of this book shows. Therefore there is the first principle and cause of any other liberty.

Furthermore, if such a negative part by no means were causally subject to the divine will, but were antecedent to it, it would of itself naturally be determined, and necessary in some way — except insofar as it might perhaps be impeded by the divine will. Wherefore in such negatives and affirmatives there would not be on the part of the thing contingency to either side, and equal; nor would such affirmatives and negatives equally convert through opposite qualities, which no one denies, nor the Philosopher in Prior Analytics I. Indeed, such propositions would rather be said to be of natural contingency, of contingency in many or in fewer cases, than of contingency to either side, or equally. For there are infinitely more such true negatives than true affirmatives, just as there are infinitely more possibles not future than there are futures — just as also they are of themselves naturally not future. Whatever also of itself is indifferent to both opposites is determined to neither from itself alone. But every possible to be and not to be, or to be future and not to be future, or contingent to either side, or equally to these and those, seems to be of this kind: for it can be and not be, be future and not be future.

Furthermore, such a contingent true negative concerning the future — say "B will not be" — is either true through itself, and that thing is not future, without any other cause whatsoever of its non-futurity, or through another, and through another prior cause. If through itself, therefore always and necessarily, as it appears, by what was premised in the second of this book. According to this also "B will not be" would be the first complex principle simply, against what was premised in chapters 11 and 12 of this book. If, moreover, that negation had no prior cause, by similar reasoning none would either, as it appears, but any being or non-being, whatever would not be, through itself, not through a prior cause, would not be — which through itself is not, through itself is not substance, quantity, nor quality, against what was just premised. Do not the 2nd part, and the 9th, 10th, and 11th of the previous chapter condemn this? Otherwise, moreover, neither God nor any creature could make anything to be not future, nor in any way [E] not to be. But who has not seen that it is not so?

Wherefore Augustine, Contra Faustum II, ch. 26: "God," he says, "what He was about to do, certainly knew, and therefore simultaneously knew that future not to have been, which lest it should be done, He was about to do." Of negations also, concerning which it appears less so, there is some prior cause — namely, of these: "A chimera is not," "A chimera is not a goat-stag," and the like, as the previous chapter teaches. Is it not also that, according to the previous chapter writings, if "God to will anything to be future" is the cause of its futurity, "God to not-will anything to be future" is the cause of its non-futurity?

And if anyone says first that B is not through itself alone not future, but through some other prior cause, that cause is necessarily in God, or is reduced to some cause being in Him. And that cause in God is either the divine essence, potency, or intellect, will set apart, or it is the divine will. If divine essence, potency, or whatever precedes His will — since that cause is merely necessary in being, and similarly in causing, as is plain from the corollary of the tenth of this book — B is necessarily not future, against the hypothesis, just as a chimera of necessity will not be, and of necessity will not be a goat-stag. If, however, that cause is the divine will: just as the divine will is the cause of the futurity of any contingently and freely future things, so also of the non-futurity of all things likewise least future.

Nor does what was first said seem true — namely, that God can suspend every act of His will concerning all futures and non-futures. Indeed, it seems necessary that concerning any future or non-future — indeed, concerning any willable or refusable object — He has some distinct and proper act of will. For how otherwise would He be the highest, or most highly active or even actual act, as the first Supposition, and the third part of the first corollary, teach? Nor does this depend freely from the divine will according to contradiction, just as neither does His being most actual, immutable, and perfect, but it is absolutely necessary. Therefore it is necessary that of any such contradiction He specially wills one part, but not-wills the other. Wherefore also, by so willing, He verifies any disjunctive between opposite contingent parts. Yet neither part of any such contradiction is it necessary simply that God will, nor that God not-will, but any such part He can freely according to contradiction will and not-will. Whence it evidently appears that, although such a disjunctive is necessary by simply absolute necessity, and antecedently naturally to the divine will — namely, in such a way that its necessity or truth is not subject to the divine will, nor to contradictory liberty, or such free power — yet the truth or falsity of either of its parts is so subject to His will causally, originally, and naturally, itself posterior following it. Just as God necessarily simply wills this or that, A and B contingent contradictories being demonstrated, neither of these does He will necessarily, but most freely, with the greatest contradictory liberty.

Yet perhaps there is still such instance: If the divine will be the cause of the futurity, and of the non-futurity, of things, it is the cause of the truth of this disjunctive — "this will be, or this will not be" (call it A); therefore also naturally prior to it. In that prior instant, then, or sign of cause, origin, or nature — call it B — or in the prior instant or sign B, A is not true, or could not be true, although it is absolutely necessary. But whom would this argument move or disturb? Would it not similarly prove that B has no cause of its truth, neither God nor any other prior naturally true proposition, but is itself the first principle, or coequal or comparable to it in the order of truth — which the preceding things do not permit? Would it not also similarly prove that the intellection or word of God has no cause, or could not be? Some little replies can be feigned here, such as in the second of this, the third, and the fourth, and they can be destroyed as those, with the help of the corollary of the ninth of this book.

CHAP. XV. THAT THE THINGS KNOWN ARE NOT THE CAUSES OF THE DIVINE KNOWLEDGE. [D]

Certain clouds of ignorance concerning the divine knowledge having now first been dissipated by its light, it now remains to show — by the same light directing — that the things known are not causes of God's knowledge.

For "to know" is of great perfection in God. If, then, the knowledge of God is caused by things known, He receives perfection from another, therefore He is not from Himself supremely perfect. Likewise, then He would not be most sufficient through Himself; for He would need things known from which He could beg the supports of His knowledge. How, then, will He be incomparably glorious, who glories in begged supports? — which also the 5th part of the corollary of the first of this destroys, and certain things had in chapter 5 of this book. Likewise, if things known were the efficient causes of divine knowledge, they would precede it in time, or in nature; but how, since these are temporal, and that eternal? This little reasoning, however, is famous among many Doctors. If also it were so, God in some way would suffer from them, against the seventh part of the corollary of the first of this book; therefore also He would in some way be changed, against the fifth of this book. Wherefore He would also be in some way inferior, and less noble, than the things known. Likewise, then the divine intellect of itself would be in potency and indifference to knowing this or its opposite, and would be actuated and determined by another, like ours; and so it would not be the highest nor first act — all of which the first Supposition with the third part of the corollary of the first of this book destroys and refutes.

These seem to be the reasonings of the Philosopher, Metaphysics XII, ch. 51, where he appears to prove that God does not understand anything other than Himself; yet he does not intend to prove this, but principally proves three things there. The first is that God does not understand in potency, like a sleeper, because then He would not be venerable and renowned. The second is that He is His intelligence — that is, His act by which He understands; for otherwise He would be in potency, and not the best substance. For through honorable understanding — that is, through the act of understanding diverse from Him — the one understanding has honor. The third is that God does not understand another than Himself in such a way that He suffers and is perfected by it as by a cause, like our intellect, as is plain in the beginning of the chapter.

For after he previously showed the primacy, immateriality, perfection, and unity of God, wishing then to show how God understands, he subjoins, saying: "But the things which are about the intellect have certain doubts. For the intellect seems to be the most divine of apparent things; but how, having such, will it be? — has indeed certain difficulties." Where Averroes [comments]: "How," etc. The question is not in this, that God ought to be most perfect and most noble of all, but the question is, how it will be that He, who is in the term of perfection in Himself, according to which He is of such a disposition, namely intellectual.

Therefore, according to this first matter, he speaks throughout the whole chapter, consequently showing that God does not understand other than Himself in such a way that the divine intellect should suffer from another, and have the perfection of its intellection from it as from a cause, like our intellect, which is perfected by another, suffering — as is sufficiently plain from De Anima III. Whence Averroes where above: "If He understands another, then His substance is not His act, but the potency by which this action is done. Wherefore He would necessarily be perfected through this action, as the intellect is perfected in us through that which it understands. Therefore He will not be the most noble substance of all beings, because His nobility would not be His except because He is perfected through another, which other must necessarily be more noble than He, because the thing understood is the perfection of the one understanding." And below, in the same place, expounding that text of his — "And if of another, what is that which is one and not another?" — he says thus: "And if He understands another, what is that which is always His being, and one without another? For this is not, namely that He is understanding through the being of another — contrary to that which has been posited concerning the first principle, namely that He always is, without this, that He needs another." And shortly after these things: "It is impossible that His intellect be perfected by anything whatever; for the other which the intellect understands, whatever it be, the intellect follows it, and is under it in order. But the divine intellect is exceedingly noble and perfect."

And Aristotle subjoins consequently: "It is plain therefore that He understands the most divine and most honorable, and He is not changed" — namely, by another from potency to act, as our intellect is — which he proves immediately in two ways. First thus: "For change is into the less worthy"; not every change in any being whatever is into the less worthy, but only in this one of necessity it would be so, since He cannot be changed into one equally worthy or worthier, since neither is, nor could be, anything such. The same he proves secondly thus: "And motion indeed is already such" — namely, change from potency to act. But it has been shown previously, in chapter 38 and many other places, that He is immobile in every way. Where Averroes: "He whose intellect is going out from potency into act, as is of our intellect, his intellect is motion, and every motion is from a mover. Wherefore the first would suffer, and would be moved by another" — which he reckons manifestly impossible. And below, in the same place, he leads to this impossible consequence: that He would be perfected by something baser than Himself. And he subjoins: "It is manifest that the most noble principle does not acquire nobility except through its action — as the intellect in those who understand does not acquire nobility except through the action of the intellect. If, therefore, the first understands base things — in such a way that He is perfected by them — it would happen that His nobility be in understanding base things, namely in such a way that He acquire nobility from them. Wherefore His action also would be the basest of actions: for it would be base for so noble a Prince to beg His nobility from less noble subjects. And because anything base is in a more noble being baser, in Him it would be most base, since He is the most noble of all, and more honorable than the universe."

Wherefore the Commentator [Averroes] in the end of the comment thus says: "This name, 'knowledge,' is said equivocally of His knowledge and ours; for His knowledge is the cause of being, but being [is the cause] of our knowledge."

It is plain therefore from what has been said that the opinion of Aristotle and Averroes is that God does not understand another than Himself, by which He is perfected, or which is the cause of divine intellection — which the expositions of others similarly attest. Let no one therefore reckon so great a Philosopher in so solemn a matter so basely to have raved as to lightly believe that God knows nothing at all except only Himself. For Averroes says in the beginning of that comment: "This question is the most noble of all that are of God, namely to know what He understands, and is desired by all naturally."

Furthermore, Themistius, as Averroes recites in De Anima III, ch. 36, says that "Beings are nothing other than His knowledge — that is, God's — nor is the cause of beings other than His knowledge." Wherefore Ammonius on Peri Hermeneias I, last [section], says that "the gods have knowledge of contingents, as producing all things which are in the world, and existing as causes or concauses of all." And below: "To know contingents," he says, "is of their nature; on account of which these things, having an indeterminate nature, can both happen and not happen, but those, by a more noble mode than is their nature, taking the knowledge of them beforehand, also know these things determinately. For it is necessary that they know separable things inseparably, and non-distantly, and the multiplied unitively, and temporals eternally, and the generable ungenerably; the knowledge of these — I say — taking beforehand, from priors, namely from causes and principles, namely from themselves, not from any posterior things whatsoever."

In agreement with which, both in opinion and in mode of speaking, is Dionysius, De Divinis Nominibus VII: "The divine mind contains all things, by knowledge separated from all, in itself, near the cause of all, foreseeing the knowledge of all things, knowing before the angels were made, and leading angels and all other things from within, and from Him, so to speak, the principle, knowing and leading them into being. And this I think the saying conveys, when it says, 'Knowing all things before their generation.' For the divine mind has not learned existing things from existing things, but from itself, and in itself according to the cause, exercises the knowledge, and cognition, and essence of all, and beforehand has co-encompassed" — where another translation: "has beforehand, and has taken beforehand." And it follows: "Not contemplating each according to species, but according to one circumstance of cause knowing and containing all, just as also light, according to cause in itself, has taken before the knowledge of darkness," where another translation, "has taken before." And it follows: "Not seeing the darkness from elsewhere than from light. Therefore divine wisdom, knowing itself, knows also all things — material things immaterially, and unparted things parted, and many things universally" — where another translation, "and divisible things indivisibly, and many things unitively." And it follows: "By the one itself knowing and leading all. For if according to one cause God transmits being to all existing things, according to the same united cause He has known all things, as existing from Him and substituted before in Him; and from non-existing things He shall not take their knowledge, but rather to each one He will be the giver of the knowledge of them; not seeing, God has His own knowledge of Himself, but the other common knowledge comprehending all existing things; for itself knowing itself in every way, the collocation, where above, of those things which are from itself, and of which it is the cause of ignorance. By this, therefore, God knows existing things, not by the knowledge of existents, but by His own; where another translation has it thus: itself the cause of all, knowing itself, is somewhere lacking, if it should ignore the things which are from it, and of which it is the cause."

The same Algazel shows, Metaphysics III, sentence 7, and among many things says thus: "In necessary being there is nothing in potency. It remains, therefore, that we say that for Him to foreknow the order of the universe is the cause of the order of the universe flowing from Him." Avicenna also, Metaphysics VIII, ch. 6 and 7, proves the same. Likewise, John [Duns Scotus] on Sentences I, dist. 39, q. 2, adhering to the said reasoning of Averroes, says that true things do not move the divine intellect to apprehending such truth, because then the divine intellect would become base, because it would suffer from another than His essence.

Furthermore, God makes all things made, by the testimony of the third of this book, and not without His own preceding knowledge, by the fifth of this. But that knowledge of God preceding, and eternally preceding, can in no way be made by posterior and temporal made things. Likewise, past and future things are not at all; therefore they cause nothing at all in God's knowledge. Therefore neither do present things, because they are not otherwise known by God when they are present than when they were future, or will be past — since God is in every way immutable, as chapter 5 teaches. Likewise, then He would not know purely non-beings, since they cause nothing at all. Likewise, then God would suffer from things necessarily, because He necessarily knows all things — which seems to subject His supreme liberty to servitude even of the basest things. Likewise, then by a stronger and more perfect thing He would suffer more, and know it more; and since a thing, when it has present actual being, has more perfect being than when it has only potential and future being, it follows that God does not know Peter more than He knew him from the beginning. And if anything grows or decreases in any entity, it would similarly grow or decrease in divine cognition — which His immutability does not permit.

Likewise, then God would not be the first in the genus of efficient cause, since nothing acts except through cognition. For Psalm 103 says to Him: "Thou hast made all things in wisdom." But the effective principle of His cognition is the thing known; therefore it is naturally prior to such cognition, and therefore to every operation proceeding from it. Again to the same effect: In every order of movers, the unmoved mover is prior to the moved mover, as is plain expressly through the Philosopher, De Anima III, ch. 54, and through Averroes likewise in his Commentary. But the thing known is the unmoved mover of the divine intellect; the divine intellect is, however, mover and moved. Therefore the thing known is the first efficient and the first mover simply, and not God.

Likewise, then God would not be the first cause of all, for He does not cause extrinsic things except by wisdom disposing, and of this there is a prior cause, namely the thing known itself — which is more plain of futures. For "A is to be future" is the cause of God's foreknowledge, and God is not the cause why A is future, because then He would cause altogether ignorantly. Therefore "A is to be future" is here simply the first cause. Indeed, since God's foreknowledge is here so an effect that in no way is it a cause, it is caused by some prior cause which is not God — all of which by all philosophers and theologians is unanimously condemned.

Likewise, contingents to either side are not of themselves more determined to one part than to the other, because then they would not be to either side. Therefore they cannot of themselves determinately cause in God the cognition of one part, or the other; therefore they are not the causes of divine knowledge in any way. Likewise, if so, God would not be efficient cause or mover in that motion by which He is moved by the knowable, against the third and fourth of this book. Likewise, then a thing would have this — that it is so a mover of God — from itself alone, not from God; for God causes nothing without preceding knowledge. Nor would God be the cause of such truth: "This is a mover" or "moves" — which are repugnant to what was had before, in the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th, the 11th, and the 13th, manifestly.

Likewise, if the thing known were the cause of divine cognition, it would cause it according to its mode of being. For according to the Philosopher, Metaphysics II: "Each thing, as it is, so is to truth"; therefore also so to cognition caused by it. Therefore the thing known would be the measure of God's knowledge, naturally prior to it. For that is the first measure of another, according to which the other is primarily measured. Which also is plain through the Philosopher, Metaphysics X, ch. 5, saying that knowledge and sense are more measured by knowable and sensible things than they measure them; because, according to Averroes there, knowledge and sense follow beings, not contrariwise. And this is true commonly of every knowledge which is caused by knowns; for not because something is known by such a knowledge, so is it on the part of the thing, but contrariwise.

And this is plain in the exposition of that place according to St. Thomas, where he so adds: "But if any knowledge is the cause of the thing known, it must be the measure of it — as the knowledge of an artificer is the measure of the artifact, because each artifact is measured according to this, that it is perfect to the likeness of the art; and in this way the knowledge of God stands with respect to all things." This also can be sufficiently proved from that procedure of the Philosopher, since just as in every other genus there is one first measure naturally of all things contained in such genus, so it is in the genus of knowables. But such a measure, besides divine knowledge, can be assigned none. For with whom would the measure of knowables better be placed than with Him who, by His wisdom — of which there is no number nor measure — disposed all things in measure, number, and weight (Wisdom 11)?

Whence also Isaiah 40: "Who hath measured the waters in his fist, and weighed the heavens with his palm? Who hath poised with three fingers the mass of the earth, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance?" For it would seem too unbecoming and unworthy for the artifact to give measure to the artificer, and the creature to set bounds to the Creator. Whence Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy V, last prose, says: "It is unworthy if the future things of ours be said to give cause to the knowledge of God. For this force of knowledge, embracing all things by present-time notice, itself constitutes things in all modes." Which he immediately proves through another reasoning: "But it owes nothing," he says, "to posterior things" — as if he argued in this way: Everyone having good from some first owes him something, as gratitude or love; but God owes nothing to posterior things, therefore He has no good from them. Whence the Apostle to the Romans 11: "Who hath first given to Him, that recompense should be made him?"

And from this word "to posterior things" another argument can be drawn: that if things known were the causes of divine knowledge, since the cause is naturally prior to the caused, things known would be naturally prior to the knowledge of God — which seems absurd, since He is the first and the last, the beginning and the end. The same proves [Boethius] above, in the same prose 3, beautifully and at length, and says: "Neither do I prove" — that is, approve — "that reasoning, by which some believe they can dissolve this knot of the question. For they say: not therefore is anything to be in the future, because providence has foreseen it as future; but on the contrary, rather, because something is future, that this cannot be hidden from divine providence" — of which he places the reasoning, saying: "How preposterous it is, that the cause of the event of such things be said to be the cause of eternal foreknowledge, since the cause is naturally prior to the caused?" And he immediately places another reasoning to the same effect, when he says: "But what else is it to think that God therefore foresees future things because they will happen, than to think that the things which once occurred are the cause of that highest providence?"

And Peter Lombard says, Sentences I, dist. 45.4, that the will of God is the cause of all things, which is preceded by no cause, because it is eternal — and therefore the cause of it is not to be sought. Likewise, predestination is eternal, therefore there is no cause of its generation, therefore future things are not the cause of it.

Furthermore, to the same effect: If things known were the causes of divine knowledge, they would much help Him in knowing, and would give Him counsel, and would show Him things to be done; and so a foolish man, or an ass, would be a necessary helper, counselor, and teacher of our most wise God — which all Catholic ears refuse even to hear. Isaiah 40 also plainly determines this, saying: "Who hath helped the Spirit of the Lord, or who hath been His counselor, and shown Him with whom He has taken counsel, and instructed Him, and taught Him the path of justice, and instructed Him in knowledge, and shown Him the way of prudence?" Whom following, the Apostle to the Romans 11 thus asks: "Who hath been His counselor? or who hath first given to Him, that recompense should be made him?"

This Anselm also proves, De Concordia, ch. 6, by reasoning taken from the priority of causation made before, with which Hugh agrees in De Sacramentis I, part 4, ch. 1. Likewise, Augustine, City of God XV, ch. 13: "For knowing all things which He knows, that perfection suffices Him alone. But all His creatures, spiritual and corporeal, He knows not because they are, but they are because He knows them. For He has not been ignorant of what He was about to create." And above, ch. 6, last part, he says thus: "When times come and go, nothing comes or goes from God's knowledge. For these things which have been created are not therefore known by God because they have been made, rather they have been made, or are mutable, because they are immutably known by Him." Likewise, Confessions XIII, last [section], directing his speech to God, he says: "We see what Thou hast made, because they are; but Thou, because Thou seest them, they are." And above, VII, 4: "What unforeseen by Thee, who knowest all things? And no nature is, except because Thou knowest it." [B]

CHAP. XVI. AGAINST CERTAIN ONES SAYING THAT THE THINGS KNOWN ARE CAUSAE SINE QUA NON OF THE DIVINE KNOWLEDGE, BUT NOT CAUSE.

There are some, however, hobbling on two sides, saying that things known are causa sine qua non (a cause without which not) of God's knowledge, but not a cause — who assign such reasoning: "God does not know without things known, therefore things known are causae sine qua non of His knowledge." And this seems to be the opinion of Peter Lombard, Sentences I, [C] dist. 38; and certain others follow him. But these hobble from the paths of truth.

For when they say that the thing known is a causa sine qua non of divine knowledge, either they understand by this name "cause" what the name signifies among philosophers, theologians, and all the lettered, or even idiots who speak of cause — namely, that which in some way causes, at least as a partial cause and concause — or they do not so understand, but in some other way hitherto unheard of, calling perhaps "causa sine qua non of something" everything without which that thing is not, whether it cause that, or be caused by it, or be impertinent to it in every way.

If they understand in the first mode, since every partial cause or concause of any thing is some cause of it (otherwise the father would not be the cause of the son, because man generates man and the sun, nor the wood or stones the cause of the house), it follows that the thing known is some cause of divine knowledge — which they deny. Likewise, according to the Philosopher in Physics II and Metaphysics V, there are four principal genera of causes, and many more modes of causes; but every mode of any cause whatever is reduced to some principal genus of cause. If, therefore, they speak of cause as he does, it follows that this mode of causa sine qua non is reduced to some of these genera. The thing known, therefore, is the efficient, material, formal, or final cause of divine knowledge. Therefore they have simply to concede that it is a cause.

If, however, they concede that the thing known is a partial cause or concause, and so in some way the cause of divine knowledge, all the reasons of the preceding chapter return against them. Likewise, then they have to concede that just as the thing known is the cause of human knowledge, so of divine; for the thing known is only the partial cause or concause of human knowledge, not the principal. For the exterior and interior senses, and our possible intellect, and the agent intellect, are the principal causes of it — which, however, the opinion of philosophers and theologians alleged above does not concede, but denies. Likewise, then things known would be the cause of such knowledge — namely, the knowledge of approbation, or approbative knowledge of God — which beyond simple notice adds the good pleasure of will. And since this is the cause of things, as chapter 9 proves, the same with respect to the same — in the same genus of cause, namely efficient — would be cause and caused, and prior and posterior naturally — the same in species of priority with respect to the same.

Likewise, according to the same Peter in the same place, the knowledge of God which is simple notice is only causa sine qua non of things known, and things known similarly cause of it; therefore the same in the same way is cause and caused with respect to the same.

If, however, they understand in the second mode, they have to say consequently that everything willed is the cause of the divine will, and of His approbative knowledge — though, on the contrary, it must be said, as is plain through chapter 9, and through Peter where above, and in the following dist. 45.

Likewise, against their reasoning: either they thus understand that this is not without that in fact, therefore it is causa sine qua non of it; or that this of necessity is not without that, but they are necessarily conjoined. If the first be granted, then they have similarly to say that the dog's bark, or the wonder of the ignorant, is such a cause of an eclipse and of God; indeed, also universally, that anything is such a cause of anything, and causes — for all these things coexist. If the second be granted, then the Son of God is the cause of the Father, and the begotten divine essence and wisdom is the cause why the Father is wise, and so the Father is wise by begotten wisdom; and any attribute, and whatever is necessarily in God, would be the cause of any of these — which no theologian doubts to be false. And if a foot had necessarily always stood in dust, the footprint would have been the eternal cause of the foot; and the same is of splendor caused by fire, and the image caused in a mirror by an object, temporal or eternal; and universally, of every caused thing necessarily accompanying its cause — as passion necessarily follows action, effect [follows] efficient — and of every caused thing universally [accompanying] what causes it; all of which are absurd to all.

[B] CHAP. XVII. HE DISTINGUISHES THE DIVINE THINGS KNOWN: BECAUSE SOME PRECEDE HIS KNOWLEDGE IN A CERTAIN WAY, AND OTHERS FOLLOW IT; AND HE SHOWS THAT THE LATTER ARE IN SOME MANNER THE CAUSE OF DIVINE KNOWLEDGE, BUT THE FORMER NOT AT ALL.

Lest, however, you understand this too generally, of such things known by God a certain distinction is to be observed: for some of these precede God's knowledge in a certain way, and others follow it. The divine essence, omnipotence, the divine intellect, and the like, precede it [C] (for God is naturally first, and has omnipotence and intellect, before He understands or knows anything). Others, however, follow this. Therefore those things known which naturally precede divine knowledge are the cause of it. For everything which is naturally prior to another is some cause of it, as the 13th has shown.

Likewise, everything necessarily presupposed to anything seems to be some cause of it; for if it were not some cause of it, why could it not exist without that, especially what is presupposed and necessarily preredquired before? Concerning the necessary thing following any whatever, however, it is to be thought otherwise — as the effect follows necessarily the agent, though it is not the cause of it. But God's being, having power and intellect, is necessarily presupposed for His knowledge; therefore they are some cause of it. Likewise, the intellective potency, or intellect, produces — as efficient cause — its every intellection, and any of its act; therefore the divine intellect is the cause of any of His intellection, and of any knowledge. For thus God produces and causes eternally His Word, and the Father His holy Son, and is its eternal cause, as is plain from the second of this book.

But the other intelligibles, which are not God, have, according to the opinion of the Fathers, a double being: namely, intelligible, and of existence, or real — that is, they are intelligibles before they exist in completed act. The first being of these precedes in some way divine intellection. For prior in some way they are intelligible than they are understood by God — not through themselves (for since they are nothing at all, they have no aptitude or potency through themselves, as is established from prior things), but through God — and so in some way they are causes of divine intellection — yet not truly themselves (since they are nothing at all), but the divine essence alone, from itself, primarily great with the proper ideas and natures of all intelligibles, and fruitful, forerunning the divine intellect, offering all these to it most clearly, most distinctly, and as it were most by name; which intuiting, He understands the universe of things, as the 7th and the 13th have suggested.

For it seems to me that the divine essence is, as it were, a certain intelligible mirror — most clear, infinite, suffering nothing from objects, receiving or reflecting nothing, but actively, from its most infinite clarity, distinctly — not confusedly — bringing forth the faces and ideas of all intelligible objects; into which mirror the eye of the divine intellect, looking, contemplates all these things. I do not, however, opine that such natures or ideas in the divine essence are essentially and really distinguished from it — as the words of the Fathers seem to sound in the ears of some — but that all these are really the same as the divine essence; nay, that this most one and most simple essence from itself alone so represents all intelligibles, as is plain from the first and 7th of this book.

Whence also Augustine, De Trinitate VI, last [section], speaking of the omnipotent God's Art, full of all natures, says: "All are one in it." And concerning the joys of the just and the punishments of the wicked, or concerning the threefold habitation, he so writes: "All things of God are one in God, except for what pertains to relation. For the wisdom of God, and truth, and eternity, are not diverse among themselves, but they are one, as all the other things. The wisdom of God is no more wisdom than truth, and no more truth than wisdom, no more truth than eternity, than all the other things of God. For they are one in God; and not only are they the same in God among themselves, but they are nothing other than God Himself; and the world was in God before it was in itself — not the world but God."

In agreement with which, Anselm, Monologion 33, teaches that "God by one and the same word speaks Himself," etc. And below, ch. 34: "A work which is made according to some art, not only when it is made, but also before it is made and after it is dissolved, is always in that art, not other than what art itself is. Therefore, when the supreme spirit speaks Himself, He speaks all things which have been made: for both before they were made, and when they have been made, and when they are corrupted, or in some way varied, they are always in Him, not what they are in themselves, but what is the same as He Himself. For in themselves they are mutable essence created according to immutable reason; in Him, however, they are themselves the first essence, and the first truth of existing."

But the being of existence and the completed [being] of any creature does not precede divine intellection, nor is the cause of it, but follows it, and is caused by it. For not unwisely, but through His wisdom, He makes all things — itself testifying: "When He prepared the heavens, I was there; when with a certain law and circle He surrounded the abysses; when He established the air above, and balanced the springs of waters; when He surrounded the sea with its bounds; when He set a law to the waters, that they should not pass their bounds; when He poised the foundations of the earth, I was with Him forming all things" (Proverbs 18). And Psalm 103: "Thou hast made all things in wisdom." This therefore precedes — as principal and instrumental efficient — His made things.

Nor are these repugnant in anything to the two chapters now premised. For those speak of things known posterior to divine knowledge in being existence, and of things known which are only intelligible — namely as, against the natures and ideas of the divine essence aforesaid, they are imaginarily distinguished — which according to that being are not in any way causes of God's knowledge.

COROLLARY.

AND HE HAS A COROLLARY: THAT THE DIVINE KNOWLEDGE, WHICH IS HIS SIMPLE NOTICE, IS TRULY THE CAUSE [C] OF ANY MADE THING — NOT MERELY CAUSA SINE QUA NON.

Whence it can evidently be established that the divine knowledge, which is His simple notice, is truly the cause of any made thing, not merely causa sine qua non, as Peter Lombard says in dist. 38 of his Sentences where above. The Authorities here and in chapter 15 alleged sufficiently testify these things, and the proximate reasonings similarly prove this. For this knowledge of God naturally precedes any of His making, and is necessarily presupposed for any whatever. Likewise, intellection and actual cognition moves the will, and is the cause of its volition, as could be proved by the same arguments, and through the Philosopher, De Anima III, ch. 54, and before and after; but divine actual volition is the cause of any made thing, as chapter 9 proves; and whatever is the cause of a cause is the cause of the caused. For thus also the Son is the cause of the Holy Spirit, just as the Father of the Son, as was touched upon above.

CHAPTER XVIII

HE DISTINGUISHES THE DIVINE NON-COMPLEX SCIENCE (IN A CERTAIN MANNER) AND THE COMPLEX SCIENCE; HE LIKEWISE DISTINGUISHES COMPLEX KNOWABLES INTO THOSE WHICH ARE PRIOR (IN A CERTAIN MANNER) AND POSTERIOR TO THE DIVINE WILL; AND HE SHOWS THAT THE PRIOR ONES ARE IN SOME WAY THE CAUSE OF THE DIVINE COMPLEX SCIENCE, BUT THE POSTERIOR ONES BY NO MEANS, BUT RATHER THAT GOD KNOWS THESE THROUGH HIS OWN WILL.

For a fuller acquaintance with the divine science, it must further be observed that, according to the Philosopher in De Anima III, there are three operations of the human intellect: namely, the apprehension of simples, composition and division, and discursive reasoning. The third of these does not belong to God, because nothing is unknown to Him, nor can He acquire any new knowledge, and because such an operation cannot exist without potentiality and imperfection. But the first and second do belong to Him in His own way. For He comprehends all non-complex and simple things, and in some manner composes and divides, affirms and denies, all complex things composed or divided. Let His first knowledge or non-complex notice, then, be called simply apprehensive or intuitive, or simple apprehension or intuition; let the second be called complex, compositive or divisive, affirmative or negative, or adhesive; or, in the abstract, composition and division, affirmation or negation, or adhesion. For I, an unlearned little man, can scarcely — and not properly but only by similitude, stammering — re-echo the lofty heights of God's marvelous science: for it is exalted, and I cannot attain unto it.

Having shown, therefore, that God knows all knowable things by a non-complex science, not through posterior known things, but through His own clear essence, which presents all things to Him most distinctly, it now remains consequently to show how God knows all complex knowables. For this it must first be known that complex and true knowables are of two sorts: for some naturally precede the divine will, and some naturally follow it. That God exists, that God is eternal, that God is omnipotent, and the like, naturally precede the divine will: for it is not the case that because God wills it to be so, therefore it is so, but rather the contrary. That the world exists, that any creature exists, and universally all those true complexes whose truth is caused by and depends upon it, follow it.

Those true complexes, therefore, that precede the divine will, God knows through His essence alone, just as He does the other true non-complexes, as can be perceived from the foregoing chapters of this work. But those that follow His will, God does not know through those complexes, nor through anything else apart from His will, but through His will, or through His substance together with His will — so that, for His complex science, His will is necessarily prerequired naturally as prior.

The first part of this — namely, that God does not know complexly the posterior true complexes through them — can be shown just as it was shown above that He does not know any posterior things non-complexly through them. The second can be shown thus: God foreknows truths concerning the future, and not through any propositions, habits, or acts existing in Him as really distinct from Him, by part 26 of the corollary to chapter 1 of this book. By what, then, except through His own will? Nor can anyone say that God complexly foreknows that Antichrist will exist through Antichrist himself, on account of the chapters already mentioned, since indeed Antichrist in himself is nothing, does nothing per se, and causes nothing; Antichrist also is not of himself determined to come to be, as chapter 14 taught. How then does he per se cause this to be known determinately?

Nor can it be said that God foreknows future things through their futurity. For then, as it appears, future things would be the cause, or causes, of the divine science, contrary to what was set forth above. Moreover, that futurity, if it is nothing, causes absolutely nothing; but if it is something real distinct from God, the same argument applies as before. Furthermore, that futurity is or was at some time caused by God according to what is prior. How then did God know previously that this was to be future? How also did He know previously that those future things were to be future, or that this future thing was to be future? Again, this futurity either makes the thing to be future contingently and indeterminately, or necessarily and determinately. If contingently and indeterminately, how does God know through it determinately and certainly that the thing will be? Does not also that futurity now exist determinately and certainly, and from it does it not follow determinately and necessarily that the thing will be? How then will it be avoided that all things which will happen, will happen of necessity, and absolutely nothing contingently? But if that futurity be posited as in God, it most clearly seems that it must be posited in the divine will, since this is the cause of the determination and futurity of all future things, by the testimony of chapter 14 of this work; and thus the principal intention is established.

Nor again is it reasonable to suppose that God knows future things through His essence alone, with His will set apart. For of itself alone it is equally indifferent and indeterminate to representing to the divine intellect that Antichrist will be and that Antichrist will not be, just as either of them can equally be the case and equally be known by God. Therefore of itself alone, without some prior determination, it represents neither. Nor likewise must one suppose that God knows future things through His intellect alone, or that this determines the divine essence to display this future thing or that, since it [the intellect] is of itself indifferent to either of contingent opposites, just as God's essence itself is — and since, moreover, the intellect alone is not practical in this way with the will set apart, as appears from chapters 8 and 9 of this work. Furthermore, since the intellect with the will set apart is a necessary principle, as is plain and as is shown by the corollary to chapter 10, every future thing would necessarily be future and foreknown by God, and thus the contingent would equally perish.

Nor can it be determined, as some hold, by the infinity or immensity of His knowledge, because, granted the immensity of His knowledge, He can still indifferently know that Antichrist will be and that Antichrist will not be, just as Antichrist can indifferently be and not be: therefore He will know neither without some other prior determining or terminating determination. Again, the determination by which God is determined to know anything is naturally prior to that knowing, that is, prior to the science arising from such determination. But (on this view) God is determined to know that Antichrist will be by the infinity of His science; therefore the infinite science of God is naturally prior to His knowing that Antichrist will be; and since that [infinite science] includes the knowledge of Antichrist will be, it follows that the science of God by which He knows that Antichrist will be precedes itself naturally. This is confirmed: for God is not determined to know that Antichrist will be primarily and adequately through His whole infinite science. For there are no parts of it such as Burnellus brays, the eclipse occurred, and other such infinite things, which, even if He did not have, He would still no less be able to know that Antichrist will be. Indeed, as it appears, He is not determined to know that Antichrist will be by any other part of His infinite science, except by the proper science of this — that Antichrist will be — or by the science of the causes of Antichrist's futurity. But not by the proper science of this, since then the same science would precede itself. Nor by the science of His secondary causes, since then He would know such things discursively, from causes to caused things, which is contrary to what has been said.

Again, let an argument be made concerning a future effect that is always contingent to either alternative until it occurs, just as some free volition of a creature will be: then concerning the futurity of such a future effect there can be no determination through its causes or through their science, since those causes are altogether indeterminate and free to either alternative — to causing it or not causing it. The same applies to the futurity of Antichrist. For he will be produced by his causes not necessarily but contingently. Otherwise he would not be contingently future to either alternative, as is commonly supposed, but determinately and necessarily about to come. Or let the argument be made concerning a future effect which God will make immediately by Himself without any other cause. How, moreover, did He foreknow that things would be before the production and existence of their causes? Surely not otherwise than now, nor now than then, contrary to the teaching of chapter 5 of this work.

Nor can it even be said, as others perhaps would have it, that God is determined to know things of this sort through the infinity and immensity of His knowability or knowing-power (rather than His actual science). For granted and standing His immense knowability or knowing-power, He can still indifferently know that Antichrist will be or will not be, just as he himself can indifferently be and not be: therefore He will determinately know neither, without some other prior determining limitation. In the same way it can be shown that God is not determined to know things of this sort through His omnipotence, nor through His simply infinite perfection.

Some, indeed, drawing a little nearer, affirm that God foreknows future things through the permission of His will alone — that is, through the fact that He wills to permit, or will permit, posterior active things to do these or those. But these suppose that posterior active things can do something without God and the divine will properly co-acting per se with the same act, contrary to chapters 3, 4, and 9 of this work. Furthermore, granted divine permission alone, if a rational and free agent could freely do anything, it could equally and contingently do either of opposites, or neither. How then does God by this alone know determinately and certainly that this agent will do this, and omit that?

From all these considerations, then, it appears that God foreknows future things and non-future things, what will be and what will not be, through a volition [and nolition] in some manner naturally previous in the will. Furthermore, God knows future things through that by which they are first future; but this is the divine will, as chapter 14 showed; and the reasons brought forward for that conclusion can equally be turned to prove this one. Again, by the testimony of the Philosopher, Posterior Analytics I.2, to know is to know through a cause. But God most truly knows future things; therefore through the truest cause, which virtually contains all other causes and their causations; and this is His will, as has been shown in chapters 9 and 14. And it can be confirmed by Averroes on De Somno et Vigilia, where he inquires into the cause of divinatory or prophetic dreams concerning future things; and he shows that it is from the perfect solicitude of God concerning men. Further, showing how God knows these things, he says that He knows them through the fact that they are determined to be, and have a determinate cause and a universal nature understood, which is the first cause of their being; and thus they are known by the intellective nature, from which sensible nature receives whatever it does and is moved, just as instruments are moved by the form of the artifact; nor does any individual come about essentially from nature except through antecedent science, since, as he alleges from Aristotle, the instrument of the artificer is moved only according to the artificer. According to him, then, God knows future things through a cause determining this thing to be and effective of it; and this is the divine will, as chapters 14 and 9 show. And this seems to be in his mind, especially when, on Metaphysics XII, comment 51, he says that being is not the cause of God's science, but contrariwise. Since, therefore, according to him God knows future things through a cause determining them to be, and not through any other cause outside Himself, therefore through a cause intrinsic to Himself; which can be no other than His will.

Concordantly with which Ammonius, on the last [section] of On Interpretation I, says: It must be said that the gods know all things — past, present, and future — in a manner befitting the gods; and this is by one, determinate, and infallible cognition, on account of which one must indeed say that they comprehend the science of contingent things — as those producing all things which are in the world, being themselves the causes of perpetual substances, but co-causes of generable things, according to their proper operations; and as seeing not only the substances themselves, but their powers and operations — those which are according to nature, and those which are beyond nature; which beyond-nature has entered together with the necessary order subjected, or with the subject coursing through being, in those things which are born to participate in this — not principally, but in the manner called parypostaseos, that is, secondary existence. And further on he says: The gods know contingent things in a more noble manner than is their own nature, taking up the cognition of them beforehand determinately, and knowing these things. — But whence are they taking up and pre-taking up the cognition of these things? From what preceding principle, or cause, except from their proper determined will, the indefectible cause of things, and a similar cause of the science had with them?

This same opinion Dionysius, in De Divinis Nominibus 7, seems efficaciously to attest, as is more fully recited in chapter 15 of this work.

Again: God rightly knows future contingent things; therefore through something which is really certain. But this is no future contingent thing, since that is not certain; nor is any inferior cause sufficient for the production of it, in the causation of it, certain — but rather contingent, like the effect. Otherwise, that effect would be certainly and determinately future. It remains, then, that God knows these things through His own most certain will, by which He wills that all those things shall be. This could be confirmed by Averroes, on Metaphysics IX, comment 21, saying that to know those things which always are, immutably, in one mode, is to know; but to know a mutable essence is called to estimate.

Again, this last reasoning and the principal conclusion are made plain by John Scotus, on Sentences II, distinction 37, question 2, refuting those who hold that the created will is the total cause of its own willing without God's co-acting — by the consideration that, if it were so, God would not be by nature foreknowing of future things, since He has knowledge of future contingent things only because He certainly knows the determination of His will with respect to them — which will is immutable and impotential. But if the created will is the total cause of its willing, and itself is contingently disposed to that willing, then however much the divine will be posited as determined to one part of those things which depend on the created will, that [created] will can will otherwise; and so the certainty does not follow from the cognition of the determination of the divine will. He, in Sentences I, distinction 41, also reproving the opinion which says that God predestines someone to life because He foresees him as about to use his free will well, writes thus: But against this it is argued, first, because God does not foresee him as about to use his free will well, except because He wills and pre-ordains him to use it well — for, as was said in distinction 39, the certain foresight of future contingent things is from the determination of His will. And further, having made two instances concerning Judas or Lucifer about to sin, and arguing that permission alone does not suffice for the certainty of the divine science, he answers thus: The first of these is solved by this — that God foreknows that He will cooperate to the substance of that act which will be a sin; and this He foreknows because He wills to cooperate with it (if it will be a sin of commission), or He foreknows that He will not cooperate to some act if He does not will it (if it will be a sin of omission). And knowing that He will cooperate to the substance of such an act not with the due circumstances, or that He will not cooperate to a necessary act, and consequently that the man will omit, He knows him to be about to sin — not only because He knows that He will permit this, but because He knows that He will cooperate with him to the substance of an act not circumstantiated, and consequently this man will commit; or that He will not cooperate with him to a necessary act, and consequently this man will omit.

Again, Saint Thomas, On the Christian Religion (or On Faith, Hope, and Charity) ch. 138, says that the contingency of the effects of secondary causes cannot disturb the certitude of divine providence, because the efficacy of the divine will furnishes certitude to itself: for the will of God, since it is the universal cause of things, not only that something be done, but that it be done in such a manner, pertains to the efficiency of the divine will not only that what He wills to be done is done, but that it be done in the manner in which He wills it to be done, so that the divine will be efficaciously fulfilled. The same author above, in chapter 133, says that contingent things, insofar as they are virtually in their causes, are not determined to one [outcome], such that certain knowledge could be had of them; nevertheless, insofar as they are actually in their being in God's eternity, they are now determined to one, and certain knowledge can be had of them. He also, on Sentences I, distinction 38, last question, asking whether the science of God is of contingent things; and further on distinction 40, fourth question, asking concerning the certitude of predestination, plainly holds the same opinion. But such contingent things can be determined only through the divine will, as chapter 14 showed; and for this determination one could allege the authority of Averroes on De Somno et Vigilia, briefly recounted above.

The same view Anselm seems to hold, De Casu Diaboli 21, where he maintains that nothing is truly known except what is understood by certain reason. Therefore God is not properly said to have foreknowledge of future things, but rather knowledge of present things, because all future things are present to Him. And the same he says in De Concordia 7; and Boethius, in De Consolatione Philosophiae V, prose 6, says what cannot, it seems, be understood otherwise than that God knows all future things by this — that they are present to Him; that is, by His insuperable and immutable will, presentially determined and decreed certainly that they should come about in the future. Whence also it is prophetically said of Him, He who has made the things to come; and Ecclesiastes 6: He who is about to be, his name is already called. But this cannot be except by a previous will; and this God seems to intimate, Isaiah 46, saying thus: I am God, declaring from the beginning the latter end, and from the start things which have not yet been done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and all my will shall be done — as if He would intimate that He thus declares, or can declare, the latter end from the beginning, because all His counsel and will shall stand and be done immutably.

How, moreover, could that of Origen on the Epistle to the Romans be better understood — that not because God knows that something will be, therefore it shall be, but because it is future, therefore it is known by God before it comes to pass — than this: that because something is future in the divine volition and predestination, therefore it is causally foreknown by God by simple notice, and not the contrary?

Wherefore Augustine, Against Faustus XXVI, ch. 2: It is rather true what God knows than what man opines. Whence future things can no more not come to pass than past things can not have been done, because it is not in God's will that anything should be false by which it is true. These things, then, are such, and known by God through His will. The same, De Bono Perseverantiae 49: Chastity, charity, piety, etc., which some confess to be of God, and to be foreknown by Him, and through this they cannot deny these to be predestined. And further, in the same place, ch. 53: If God's gifts are given to the elect, if there is no predestination, they are not foreknown by God; but they are foreknown; therefore there is the predestination which we defend. But all predestination proceeds from will. Therefore all things which are foreknown by God are willed by Him, and not simultaneously, nor naturally afterwards — therefore prior. Therefore the will of God is the cause of His science, as the foregoing has urged.

This same opinion those illustrious 24 Elders of Apocalypse 4 seem to attest, as chapter 14 of this work touches upon. And just as it has been argued concerning God's science with respect to future contingents, that it is through the divine will, so can it be argued concerning His science with respect to all future, present, and past things which naturally follow His will — chapters 14 and 9 assisting — most especially since He does not otherwise know present or past things than future ones, on account of His complete immutability demonstrated in chapter 5. Here, however, by will I understand every act of will, whether it be volition or nolition, or any other act whatsoever.

These things have been said for that not-foolish question of those fools who said: How does God know? — who, perhaps because of its perplexing ambiguity, insoluble for them, will think there is no science in the Most High.

CHAPTER XIX

THE OBJECTS AND RESPONDS.

That the things just said may appear more clearly, they must be tested by a brief scrutiny of disputation.

It is argued that posterior intellectured things are the cause of the divine intellection. [1] For everything that moves the intellect to its intellection is the cause of that intellection, and so of its science. But everything intellectured by God moves the divine intellect: for everything intellectured moves the one who understands and his intellect, as appears throughout De Anima III; and on Metaphysics XII.37 the new translation says: The intellect is moved by the intelligible; and the translation which the Commentator expounds: The intellect is from the intellectured, which Averroes thus expounds — that is, the essence of the intellect is in the intellectured.

[2] Again, that which is naturally prior to another and is necessarily preredquired for another is some cause of it, as appears from the foregoing. But the intelligible and knowable is so disposed to the divine intellect and science, as chapters 13 and 17 demonstrated.

[3] Again, that a thing is or is not is the cause of truth, and truth is the cause of science, not the contrary.

[4] Again, the cognition of non-complexes is the cause of complex science; therefore God's complex science is caused by the things known.

[5] Again, it appears that the divine science is not the cause of the things known, since then, since He always equally knows all things, all things would always be equally caused. And then, since He equally knows non-beings as beings, these too would be equally caused as beings.

[6] Again, the posterior is not the cause of the prior. But intellection and science are posterior to the intelligible and knowable: for it follows, Intellection and science exist, therefore the intelligible and knowable exist, but not conversely, at least formally. Therefore, by that logical rule in the Categories, the intelligible and knowable are prior to intellection and science. Therefore these latter are posterior to those.

[7] Again, just as the intellect is naturally prior to the will, so to know is prior to to will: for none can will except what is foreknown; therefore [it is prior] also to know and to foreknow any complex thing rather than to will it, or to will it to be so.

[8] Furthermore, then God would foreknow future things by such a discursus: Whatever I will to come about, will come about; this I will to come about, therefore it will come about. And thus He would in some way be potential, and not most highly actual, contrary to the first supposition and the third part of the corollary to chapter 1 of this work.

[9] Moreover, Origen on the Epistle to the Romans says that not because God knows something to be future, therefore it will be; but because it is future, therefore it is known by God before it comes to pass.

[10] Again, Augustine, replying to the seventh question of Orosius: In God, says he, the will cannot precede wisdom; therefore it is rationally [first] to know than rationally to will.

[11] Again, Ecclesiasticus 1: Who has investigated the wisdom of God which precedes all things? — Wisdom is created prior to all. Therefore the wisdom of God and His science precede His will.

[12] Furthermore, against the claim that some truths are naturally prior to the divine will: for then by the same reasoning some necessary and impossible things would be prior to it; which seems contrary to Anselm, Cur Deus Homo I.17, saying: All necessity and impossibility is subject to His will, but His will is subject to no necessity or impossibility. For nothing is necessary or impossible except because He so wills; but for Him to will or not to will anything on account of necessity is foreign to the truth.

For the first of these it must be known that to move another can be understood in two ways: properly and metaphorically. Properly, as in real and proper movers and moved, as the Philosopher speaks throughout the Physics; metaphorically, as the end is said to move; and every apparent good or evil moves to pursuit or flight, as is said in De Anima III, Ethics VII.12, Metaphysics XII, and elsewhere in many places. Whence in De Generatione I.7 he sets down this distinction in these words: For there is an effective cause, as that whence the principle of motion comes — that is, properly; — but the cause "for the sake of which," that is, the final cause, is not effective; therefore health is not effective except according to metaphor. Properly speaking, then, it is not true that everything intellected moves the one who understands. For I understand many things which do not exist at all, and so cannot at all properly move. I also understand many existing things which do not properly move me: for I understand the Phoenix of Arabia and the marvels of India — and how would these properly move me, existing at Oxford? — since, according to the Philosopher Physics VII, In every motion the mover and the moved are together, either according to themselves, or at least according to a medium which is immediately moved by the first mover, and immediately moves the last moved by the power of the first mover, as appears in De Anima II.74. But these things neither immediately move me, nor suffice to alter the whole medium. Speaking metaphorically, however, it is true that everything intellectuated moves the one understanding — not because it itself does so properly, but because its similitude, intention, or image, in the memorative or imaginative power, or in the intellect itself, in some way moves the one understanding to understanding; just as, on the authority of the Philosopher, the end and health, not existing, move man's will — not properly, but very metaphorically, because the cognition of these alone moves someone to willing, and the will so moved moves to further pursuit; whence the end is often called by the Philosopher the first mover. Things intellectuated by God, then, move the divine intellect not properly but only metaphorically, because the ideas and similitudes of them in God — that is, the divine essence, which most distinctly represents all intelligible things — move (or moves) in some manner the divine intellect to understanding all intelligibles. And because God has these ideas and similitudes from Himself alone, and in no way from posterior intellectuated things, He is not said to be moved by them to understanding, except perhaps very metaphorically and less properly, as has been said.

The second is solved by this same point. For the intelligible is not always according to itself and properly prior to intellection, since many non-beings are understood — but [is prior] according to its idea and similitude, as has been said.

To the third the same response: for no created truth is the properly so-called cause of the divine science, but the first uncreated truth, by which all other truths are true, as has been shown above; or the divine will, which is the infallible cause of every created truth, as the foregoing has taught. Nor is this truth caused in God by posterior truths, but it is in Him entirely from Himself; therefore neither do posterior truths properly cause the divine science, but perhaps very transumptively, because the idea or image of this truth in the divine mind in some manner causes God's science. Nor is the thing's being or not being the cause of such truth in God, as the major premise supposes, but rather contrariwise.

The fourth is solved by what has been said. For although the cognition of non-complexes in God is the cause of His complex science, yet because that cognition is in Him only from Himself, and is not acquired to Him from things known in non-complexes, it does not follow that they properly cause God's complex science.

The fifth is solved by this: that the divine science of cognition alone, of mere simple notice, is not a sufficient cause of things, but with it is also required the science of approbation and the good-pleasure of will, or some such act in the divine will.

The sixth is solved by this same point.

To the seventh, by the response to the first and following arguments. For the intelligible and knowable are not properly and per se prior to intellection and science (for many non-beings are understood and known), but only metaphorically — that is, according to their similitudes and ideas.

For the eighth, it must be known that the divine intellect, in some way naturally prior to its willing, and therefore necessarily simply and absolutely, knows by simple notice — non-complex, as it were — all complex thinkable things, true or false, possible or impossible. Yet not by complex adhesive notice, which is compared to our complex and compositive science above. For it does not in this way know such things before they become true antecedently and causally through His will, as chapter 14 of this work makes plain. So also you equally know in time, by simple non-complex notice, a complexion of this sort: You are doing this or that, you are willing this or that, before it is so, as well as when it is so; yet not by adhesive complex science, except when it is so, and after it is so, at least in natural order — as also such propositions become true.

Nor does the ninth proceed. For God does not argumentatively only, and not intuitively, know future things — as a calculating astrologer enclosed in his chamber knows a future eclipse, or a present one above his proper horizon or below it, by certain demonstration, not by clear intuition. But just as one seeing the sun sees it through its species received in the eye — prior in nature to the vision and the cause of it, without any argument. For in order that he may see the sun, it is not necessary that he argue thus: Whoever has the species of the sun in his eye sees the sun; I have it thus; but immediately, having the species of the sun in the eye, he sees the sun. So also the divine will, with respect to some future thing, like a proper species of it, represents to the divine intellect that this future thing will be, and He, through it, comprehends this most immediately, without any discursus, just as the corporeal eye, through the species of the sun, [comprehends] the sun.

That [text] of Origen seems to have been resolved in the preceding chapter. Someone perhaps will object that Peter [Lombard], Sentences I, distinction 38, expounds it otherwise — but chapter 16 of this work answers. Again, perhaps it is objected that certain other Doctors expound it still otherwise, saying that when it is said because it is future, therefore it is known by God, here a cause of consequence, not of being, is denoted. But if Origen speaks of the cause of consequence only, not of being, why does he say not because God knows it to be future, therefore it will be? — since it follows excellently, God knows this to be future, therefore this will be.

But it can still be objected more sharply thus: if a thing is naturally prior as future before God knows it, and the thing's being future is the cause of the divine foreknowledge, by similar reasoning present things are also naturally prior as present before God knows them, and things being present is the cause of God's such science, plainly contrary to chapters 15 and 16. But here it must be known that a thing's being future in the divine will and predestination causally — not in its proper extrinsic nature — is the cause of the divine science or foreknowledge. For He in no way needs extrinsic things in order to know, as the foregoing has urged; but He has all future things with Himself intrinsically, cognitively, causatively, intuitively, or scientifically from Himself alone, and thus knows them, just as also present things in like manner intrinsically in every way. Otherwise, that is, He would know intrinsically future things first, present things second, past things third in a different way; and so He would be intrinsically changed, the opposite of which chapter 5 teaches. Always, then, in the same way intrinsically, things are first future in the divine will, second present, third past — and always similarly and equally present and known with Him, and causes of His science, always similar and equal.

Whence Hermes, De Verbo Aeterno 15, speaking of the world and worldly things, says thus: They were not when they were not, but in Him they were even then, whence they had to be born; with whom many philosophers and theologians agree. Wherefore the Wise Man also says, To the Lord God all things are known before they were created; so also after they are made He looks upon all things — so, he says, not otherwise. — Intrinsically, in any manner whatsoever.

Perhaps you will reply still further and say: If God's willing is the cause of the existence of things outside in work and effect, it is the immediate cause of such existence of things, as the corollary to chapter 10 teaches; and it is likewise the cause of God's complex science of the existence of such things; therefore the existence of such things outside in work and effect is naturally prior to the divine science just mentioned; and consequently is some cause of it, by chapters 13 and 17 above — plainly contrary to chapters 15, 16, and 17 of this work. — Or perhaps otherwise you will say: God's complex science is the cause of the existence of things outside, and not in the same order with the divine will, since it is causally and naturally posterior to it, as the foregoing chapter establishes; nor is it a cause naturally prior, as appears through the same. Therefore it is a cause of things naturally posterior to the divine will; therefore mediating between it and its effect of this kind — contrary to the corollary to chapter 10 above.

But who does not see the fault of the first of these? Who does not know that nowhere does it follow: A and B are effects, or things caused, of cause C, and A is immediate, therefore prior to B and the cause of it? For why could not one cause have two immediate effects, neither of which is the cause of the other? Nor does the divine will alone cause God's science: for it should not be doubted but that the divine intellect causes its act of understanding, and its scientific intellection. Why, then, may not the divine intellect, immediately gazing upon the act of the divine will by which He immediately effects things outside, no less immediately, or at least equally immediately, know through it that it will be, is, or has been, exteriorly — especially since that act of the divine will suffices the divine intellect for knowing — namely, in such a way that posterior things, in their proper natures, do absolutely nothing toward God's science, as the foregoing has urged? Indeed, the divine intellect seems even more immediate to the divine will, and act to act, than God's will or His volition is to things outside. Nor does God's complex science seem the cause of things outside except insofar as it includes the simple non-complex notice and the good-pleasure or will of God.

That [text] of Augustine is solved by this: that he is there speaking of the wisdom of God ad intra, by which He is wise of those things which naturally precede the divine will — of which kind is the generation of the Son. For He generates not by preceding will but by nature, as Augustine teaches De Trinitate XV.20; and the will of God is not the cause of the science of such things, as the foregoing chapter sets forth. For Orosius asked: Did the Father beget the Son by will, or by necessity? Augustine answers: neither by will nor by necessity, because necessity is not in God, and will cannot precede the wisdom which is the Son. The other [text] of Ecclesiasticus could be glossed in the same way. For it seems he is there speaking of the Son who is Wisdom — of the Wisdom of God the Father — and so he says there: The fount of wisdom is the Word of God on high. Or it can be said that he seems to understand that the wisdom of God precedes all things outside God, that is, all created things, not all things within Him. For he says there Wisdom was created prior to all things. And further, in chapter 24, more expressly, in the person of divine Wisdom, he says: I came forth from the mouth of the Most High, the firstborn before every creature; I caused in the heavens that an unfailing light should rise, and as a cloud I covered all the earth.

Anselm appears to understand this concerning necessity and impossibility posterior to the divine will, in things creatable or created — by which necessity, according to him in the same place, it was in some way necessary that Christ should die, and impossible that He should not die. Whence also immediately after the cited words he subjoins: Wherefore, since He does what He wills, and only what He wills, just as no necessity or impossibility precedes His willing or not willing, so neither does any precede His doing or not doing — although He wills many things immutably, and does them.

CHAPTER XX

HE LIKEWISE DISTINGUISHES THINGS WILLED INTO THOSE PRIOR AND POSTERIOR TO THE DIVINE WILL, AND SHOWS THAT THINGS WILLED THAT ARE POSTERIOR ARE NOT THE CAUSE OF THE DIVINE VOLITION, NOR A CAUSE SINE QUA NON; AND THAT THINGS WILLED THAT ARE PRIOR ARE SOME CAUSE OF IT.

These things being established, it will be settled that things willed posterior to the divine volition are not the cause of the divine volition, nor a cause sine qua non, as some imagine; and that things willed that are prior are some cause of it.

Now there are some things willed prior to the divine volition, such as: that God is, that God is omnipotent, good, knowing, and the like. Others, however, are posterior, such as that the whole world exists, and its individual parts. These three points concerning the divine volition can therefore be shown in the same way as the three preceding chapters — namely chapters 15, 16, and 17 — showed three similar points concerning the divine science; and they can be persuaded otherwise by an argument from similarity: thus is it in the divine science; therefore likewise in the divine volition, especially since the will is as free as the intellect, or freer.

Again, the first part of this can be shown by the consideration that the will of God is the cause of all posterior things, as chapters 9 and 14 taught: if therefore any of these were a cause of the divine volition, it would be the cause of itself.

Again, otherwise God would not know posterior truths, as the substance of chapter 18 manifests. Nor would God be certain concerning them, since for His volition there would necessarily be prerequired an uncertain cause, namely, those posterior things, as future contingents, and these for His science, as is more plainly argued in the same chapter 18.

Again, since God of necessity knows one part of every contradiction, and this is so in all posterior things known through His will, by the same chapter, if His volition were caused by posterior things willed, the divine will would necessarily suffer from them volition or nolition. How, then, does He have a free will?

Again, if God's will were to suffer from such things not necessarily but freely, He could not so suffer, and yet do all things no less. Therefore it is in vain posited that He so suffers.

Again, if God could through His will at one time not so suffer, at another so suffer, He could in some way be changed, contrary to chapter 5. For whatever suffers from a mutable cause, suffers mutably and is mutable.

Again, it is more perfect simply to act, and not to suffer from such things, than to so suffer, as the foregoing teaches; therefore this, not the other, must be attributed to God, as the first supposition dictates.

Again, future contingents are not a cause moving the divine will, since then they would be naturally prior as future than they would move, and than God would will them to be future — contrary to chapters 14 and 18, just as chapter 15 argued concerning the science of such things.

This could also be shown by many authorities cited in chapter 9, and especially by those that say that the will of God is the first and highest cause of all things; whereas if it were moved by another, that other would be prior and superior — for every efficient or moving cause is naturally prior and superior to its moved.

Again, this Peter Lombard plainly holds, Sentences I, distinction 45.4, saying thus: This supremely good will, then, is the cause of all things which naturally come about, or have been done, or are future; which is preceded by no cause, since it is eternal, and therefore the cause of it is not to be sought. For which he adduces many authorities: first that of Augustine, 83 Questions 28, saying: He who asks why God willed to make the world is asking the cause of God's will. But every efficient cause is greater than what is effected, and nothing is greater than the will of God. Again, Augustine On Genesis Against the Manichaeans I.5: The Manichaeans seek to know the causes of God's will, when His will is the cause of all things which are. If God's will has a cause, there is something that goes before God's will, which it is impious to believe. He, then, who says, "Why did God make heaven and earth?" must be answered, "Because He willed." But he who says, "Why did He will?" seeks something greater than the will of God; but nothing greater can be found. Let human rashness, then, restrain itself, and not seek what is not, lest it not find what is. Hugh [of St. Victor] also holds this, De Sacramentis I, part four, chapter one, saying: The first cause of all things is the will of the Creator, which no preceding cause moves, nor any subsequent cause confirms, since from itself it is just. And further on: This, then, is the established order of things, that the posterior follow the prior. The first of all is the will of the Creator, since from it are all things; after it follow those which are from it. The first are those which are in it; the second are those which are from it. Those which are in it are eternal, having neither degree nor succession, since they consist in unity, and pass not in eternity; those which are from it are created through it.

The other parts that follow can be shown in the same way as chapters 16 and 17 showed similar points concerning the non-causation and the causation of the divine science.

CHAPTER XXI

HE OBJECTS AND RESPONDS, AND DISTINGUISHES THE RATIONABLE AND THE JUST INTO WHAT IS PRIOR TO THE DIVINE WILL, WHAT IS POSTERIOR, AND WHAT IS MIXED.

Many things can here be objected against what has been said concerning the divine will, just as the preceding chapter objects against what has been said concerning the divine science; and they can be solved similarly.

Furthermore, it can also be specially objected against what has been said: For if things willed prior are the cause of the divine volition, the divine will has some cause, contrary to the authorities of Augustine just adduced. And then God's will would not be the first and highest cause of all posterior things; for cognition and things willed prior would be the prior and superior cause of that cause, and so of all His caused things.

Again, the willable moves the will, and the appetible the appetite, as appears in De Anima, the Ethics, and elsewhere in many places; and God wills and desires posterior things willed.

Again, every rational agent acts on account of some end, as appears in Physics II and elsewhere quite frequently; but the end moves the agent, as natural philosophy, metaphysics, and morals together often teach.

Again, every one who wisely wills something wills it on account of some reason: therefore reason moves the one willing to so will.

Again, every one who justly wills something wills it because it is just so to will: therefore this moves the one willing to will.

To the first of these it must be said that this conclusion is not contrary to the adduced authorities, since all those speak of posterior things willed, such as the creation of the world and the like, not of prior things willed. For who would deny that God's will produces and causes His volition, as appears from chapter 17 of this work?

For the second it must be said that there is a twofold cause of things in God: namely, sufficient and necessary, by which when posited the thing is necessarily posited; and thus God's will is the cause of all posterior caused things, as the foregoing clearly shows; and speaking of cause in this way, God's will is the first and highest of all such caused things, and thus the objected authorities understand. The other is a partial cause, not necessary, by which when posited the thing does not necessarily follow as posited; and thus cognition is some cause of these posterior caused things, as appears from chapter 17. Cognition, however, does not per se sufficiently and necessarily produce all things known: for God knows equally any non-beings whatsoever, which He does not produce, and beings, which He produces. And concerning such a prior cause the argument seems to conclude.

To the third the answer appears through the response to the similar argument in chapter 19, concerning the motion of the divine intellect by intellected things. For the will of God is not properly moved by posterior things willed, but metaphorically — too metaphorically perhaps — namely, because it is moved by their similitudes or ideas, or by their cognition in the divine intellect; but these are in no way caused by posterior things willed, as chapters 15, 16, 17, and 19 more fully showed; therefore neither is God's volition caused by these.

For the fourth, it must be known that the end is twofold, as appears in Ethics I.1 and many other places: namely, the ultimate end and the intermediate end. The ultimate end on account of which God wills and works whatever, is Himself — just as He is also the ultimate end of the action of every thing, as appears in Metaphysics XII and frequently elsewhere in philosophy, with which Sacred Scripture concords. Whence Proverbs 16: The Lord has wrought all things for Himself. And this is the most powerful final cause of the divine will, and of any operation of His; therefore the saints often prayed to the Lord through this cause. Whence holy David, Psalm 24: For thy name's sake, O Lord, thou wilt be propitious to my sin. And the most holy Jeremiah in chapter 14 prays to God, saying: Do thou for thy name's sake, O Lord, since our turnings away are many. The holy Daniel also, in chapter 9, thus prays: For thine own sake, incline, O God, thine ear. And this is what the Truth itself plainly testifies, Isaiah 43: I am, I am he that blots out thine iniquities for my own sake. And further, chapter 48: For my name's sake I will defer my fury; for my own sake I will do it, that I may not be blasphemed; and my glory I will not give to another. And Ezekiel 36: Thus says the Lord: Not for your sake will I do this, O house of Israel, but for my holy name's sake; not for your sake will I do it: be it known to you. — Although these can also be understood concerning the efficient cause: for the end moves the will in some way, and effects the willing itself; and the argument does not hold concerning this end, since it is not concerning posterior things willed, but rather prior.

There is also of the divine will a final cause intermediate in some manner, although very improperly so — namely, every creature, on account of which another is ordained by God; and thus man is the final cause of every other creature, at least the irrational, and of that divine volition by which He willed and made this. For all this is ordained for the sake of man, as appears sufficiently from the opinions of many Fathers; with whom the Philosopher also concords, Physics II.24, saying thus: We use all things which exist on account of ourselves; for we are in some manner also the end. And so Scripture speaks, 2 Maccabees 5: Not on account of the place, he says, did the Lord choose the nation, but on account of the nation, the place. And Mark 24: On account of the elect those days will be shortened. And Mark 2: The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath. And John 12: Not for my sake came this voice, but for yours. And 1 Corinthians 11: The man was not created for the woman, but the woman for the man. But such an end does not properly move the divine will, but metaphorically, as has been said in the response to the previous argument.

For the fifth argument, one must inquire whether reason moves and directs the divine will. That it does, has been argued; and it can be confirmed by that of Augustine to the seventh question of Orosius, cited in chapter 19: In God will cannot precede wisdom; therefore it is rationally [first] to know than rationally to will. The same in Questions on the Old and New Law: God could have made all things at once, but reason forbade it.

Again, the Apostle to the Ephesians 1 says of God: Who works all things according to the counsel of His will; where the Gloss expounds: that is, according to His will, which is from reason — as if to say, Why He chose us rather for the office of preaching or apostolate, we know not; but yet He did so by counsel, not rashly. And it can be confirmed: counsel is a kind of discursus of reason, as can be had from Ethics III.7 and the following process. Otherwise that unworthy ridiculous saying would be verified of God: Thus I will, thus I command, let will stand for reason! — and this His wisdom proves, which reaches mightily from end to end, and orders all things sweetly.

Again, if God should well will or do anything without prejudgment of reason, by the same reasoning man could do so, contrary to the Apostle, 1 Timothy 5: Do nothing without prejudice — that is, without prior judgment. And Proverbs 4: Let your eyelids precede your steps. And Ecclesiasticus 15: God from the beginning constituted man, and left him in the hand of his counsel. The same is plain from the Philosopher in Ethics III on choice and counsel.

This reasoning is confirmed: man is made according to the soul in the image of God, namely according to memory, intelligence, and will. If, therefore, in God will leads reason, so it should be in man correspondingly: otherwise there would be no imitation, nor perfect similitude.

Again, otherwise no one could dispute with God concerning anything He has done: for where there is no reason, there can be no disputation — contrary to that of Job 13: I desire to dispute with God; and so he does, saying Why do I tear my flesh with my teeth? why am I consumed in silence? why do you hide your face? and elsewhere he frequently proposes many similar questions; whence also he says: If I am to be judged, I know that I shall be found just; and further, chapter 19, Understand that God has not afflicted me with even judgment. Again, Ephesians 1: He chose us before the foundation of the world; and Romans 9: That according to election the purpose of God might stand — but election is a deliberate appetite, as appears in Ethics III.6 and Ethics VI.2: therefore counsel is the cause of election and of the divine will.

Again, Anselm, Cur Deus Homo I.10: Just as in God any small inconvenient consequence carries impossibility, so any small reason, if not vanquished by a greater, carries necessity. And he so proceeds throughout that book, showing thus that it was rational that God should do or not do this or that, and through this concluding that He has done or has not done this or that. Wherefore in chapter 7 he says: The will of God ought to suffice as reason for us, when He does anything, although we do not see why He wills. For God's will is never irrational. Therefore reason moves the divine will and effects His willing. And Peter Lombard says, Sentences I, distinction 42.1, that the will of God is rational and most equitable.

To the contrary part it is argued thus: If reason moves the divine will, that [reason] is not caused in God by any creature, as appears sufficiently from the foregoing, but is intrinsic and essential to Him; therefore it is necessary; therefore the will of God necessarily consents to it — otherwise in God there could be a repugnance of will and reason, and so sin knowingly against a conscience rationally informed; and thus God would necessarily act ad extra whatever He acts.

Again, if reason moves the divine will, a greater reason would move more. Since, then, God could make all things better than He makes them, and this would be better and more rational if it were done, therefore this more moves His will; therefore He so wills and so does.

Again, whatever God does, He could omit, and do something else equally good. Therefore there is no reason why He omits this and does that rather than the contrary. — This is confirmed by a similar [example] in man: for if to a man able to save only one man from death there occur two who will die unless he aids them, supposing parity in all respects, by saving either of them and omitting the other he does well; and this without any reason previous to the will. For there is no stronger reason for this rather than for that. The same applies to one preferring one of two equally suited men to some dignity, and to one liberally giving a gift to one of many equally worthy, or even to one less worthy than to those unequally worthier. Whence Luke 4: There were many widows, etc., and to none of them was Elias sent except in Sarepta of Sidon to a widow woman; and many lepers, etc., and none of them was cleansed except Naaman the Syrian. And so did that Evangelical householder of whom Matthew 20 [speaks], giving as liberally to those working in his vineyard for one hour as to others working all day, saying to whoever murmured: I will give to this last as also to thee. Is it not lawful for me to do what I will? — and he alleged, as it was not necessary, no other reason. And this is what that of Job 34 seems to sound: When He grants peace, who is there that condemns? When He hides His countenance, who is there that beholds Him? On which Saint Gregory, Moralia XXV.14, says thus: Let no one, then, discuss why, while the Jewish people stood firm in unbelief, the Gentile world for so long lay prostrate; and why, when the Gentile world rose up to the faith, the guilt of unbelief laid the Jewish people low. Let no one discuss why one is drawn by gift, another repelled by merit. For if you wonder at the assumption of Gentilehood — when He grants peace, who is there that condemns? If you are astounded at Judaea perishing — when He has hidden His countenance, who is there that beholds Him? Therefore the counsel of supreme and hidden truth is the satisfaction of open reason. Whence in the Gospel the Lord, when He spoke of the cause of such a thing, says: I confess to thee, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them to little ones. Even so, Father, — and immediately, as if subjoining a kind of reason for the hiding and revealing, says: For so it was pleasing before thee. And further, in the same chapter 15: Whence also when, paying wages to the laborers in the vineyard, He made certain laborers unequal in work equal in reward, and the man who had sweated more in labor sought more in wages, He says: Did you not agree with me for a denarius? But I will give to this last as also to thee. Is it not lawful for me to do what I will? In all things, then, which are exposed exteriorly, the open cause of reason is the hidden justice of will. Wherefore it appears that it is so similarly in all the works of God. Whence Ecclesiastes 8: I understood that of all the works of God, no man can find a reason of those things which are done under the sun. Yet if there were any reason for God's works, it could be in some way found by man, as it can in the case of God, who exceeds all His works in incomparable excellence.

And Anselm, Proslogion 11, says: That, indeed, can be comprehended by no reason, why of like evils, God by supreme goodness saves these rather than those, and damns these rather than those by supreme justice.

Again, Daniel 4: He does according to His will, both with the powers of heaven, and with the inhabitants of the earth, and there is none who resists His hand and says, Why have you done this? And Job 9: Who can say to God, Why do you do thus? Whence even that profane Averroes, on Metaphysics XII, comment 51, says: It is, then, declared that there is some knowing being of whom it is not lawful to say to him: [why?]. With which the Apostle concords, Romans 9: Who resists His will? O man, who are you, that you reply to God? Does the formed thing say to him who formed it, Why have you made me thus? And he shows this through the argument from indifference of reason concerning differing acts, as I argued above: Has not the potter, he says, power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honor, and another unto dishonor? And many such things are in Scripture.

To this, however, someone could briefly respond and say that reason is twofold: namely, uncreated and created. The uncreated reason moves the will of God, not the created; and so the arguments proceed in their own ways on either side. Yet, that these things may appear more clearly, we must dwell a little longer.

For there are some rational things naturally prior to the divine will, such as: that God is, that God is eternal, omnipotent, and the like; and these rational things and their reason can well move the divine will, as has been shown above in similar cases. And there are other rational things naturally posterior to the divine will, and depending on it as on their cause; and none of these, nor the posterior reason of any of them, moves or determines this will. Indeed, because God wills it to be so, it is rational that it be so, not the contrary — just as in the case of a man preferring one of two equals and omitting the other, in any of the cases mentioned. Because the man prefers this one, it is rational that he be preferred. And this is what the end of the authority of Gregory just adduced says.

And besides these, there appear some rational things mixed in some way from both, such as this creature being subject to the Creator, and God being Lord of this thing. For this is not rational necessarily and absolutely, since then it would naturally precede the divine will, and would always be so by absolute necessity; but it is rational conditionally, or by supposition — that is, if this creature or thing exists. And this conditional, if some creature exists, it should be subject to the Creator, and He should be Lord over it, is rational simply absolutely, and is naturally rational prior to God's so willing it; nor does its reason or rationality depend on it. For there is some first reason in God necessary absolutely, naturally prior to His will — perhaps such as God exists or God is truthful or truth — from which many other things necessarily follow; and these, as I judge, are all those which are necessary absolutely. For from a necessary antecedent only the necessary necessarily follows; and every absolutely necessary thing is either the first necessary, or is necessarily reduced to it, and necessarily follows from it. For if it follows from it, but not necessarily, this is through some contingent medium, namely through the divine will. But nothing depending on a contingent and free cause is necessary absolutely. All these absolutely necessary things, then, are similarly absolutely rational. For if the antecedent in a necessary consequence is absolutely rational, the consequent likewise will be absolutely rational, nor in any way depending on the divine will, since neither antecedent nor consequence depends on it; therefore neither will the consequent depend on it.

This conditional, then, If this creature exists, God is its Lord, is absolutely rational, and naturally prior to God's so willing it; but the existence of the condition — namely that this creature is — is caused by and depends upon the divine will. And it is rational that this creature exists because God wills it to exist, not the contrary; for there was no stronger reason why He willed to make this and omit another possible one equal to this in all respects, than the contrary. Hence it appears that this — God is Lord of this thing — is mixedly rational in some manner, as has been said. For that God is Lord of this thing, if this thing is, is rational simply prior to the divine will; but that this thing is is caused by and depends upon it, and therefore is rational posterior to such will.

But still, for the second member of these rational things, it must further be observed that there is a kind of obligating reason, a kind of preponderant reason, and a kind of congruent and concomitant reason. An obligating reason is one which dictates that someone ought to and is bound to do or omit this or that, which whoever has and does not follow it, sins; and such reason is not in God with respect to posterior things willed, but is often in us. A preponderant reason is one which dictates that it would be better to do this than that, or that it would be better to do this than to omit it; and such reason does not move, nor conclude in the divine will, nor determine it to acting. For God could do better things than He does, and many good things which He does not do. A congruent and concomitant reason is one which dictates that it is congruent and good to do or omit this or that; and so speaking of reason, God wills rationally any posterior things willed; and so a man rationally wills to prefer, and prefers, one of two equals, or perhaps one less worthy of two unequals, in any of the previously mentioned cases. For if this be done, it is congruent and good; and such reason does not obligate or determine God or man, but only suffices for willing.

Yet for man it is always safe and holy to conform his will to the preponderant reason wherever he can have such; and so perhaps the Apostle understood when he said Do nothing without prejudice — that is, where such preponderant or even obligating prejudice can be found. But where one cannot, as in the preferment of one of two equals, will suffices for reason, or at least the congruent and concomitant reason as defined; and concerning such prejudice the cited authority could similarly be understood. But God cannot follow preponderant reason in all things unless He were to do all possible things, and any of these infinite, which involves a contradiction, as is shown elsewhere. The will, then, suffices for Him as reason in such matters, or at least the congruent and concomitant reason just defined.

These things, then, fully seen, the solution of all arguments pro and contra cannot fail to appear.

But now, for the sixth and last argument, it remains similarly to scrutinize: Whether justice moves or directs the divine will? That it does, has been argued before; and it can be argued pro and contra, just as concerning reason and the rational. For all true reason seems to be a kind of justice, and every rational thing a kind of just thing. Furthermore, the affirmative side can be specially argued through Augustine in Questions on the Old and New Law, saying: God can do all things, but does only what befits His truth and justice. Truth and justice, then, move the will of God to acting.

Again, 2 Timothy 4: Laid up for me is the crown of justice, which the Lord, the just Judge, will render me in that day. And 2 Thessalonians 1: Yet it is just with God to render tribulation to those who trouble you. And elsewhere in the canonical Scripture, and of the Saints and Doctors, it is found very frequently that justice exacts and requires that God should render to each according to his merits, as he has acted. Whence Proverbs 11: His will is an equal weight.

Again, not being just is the cause why God does not will or do something; therefore by the same reasoning being just is the cause why He wills and does something. For by this it appears that Abraham boldly argued against God in Genesis 18: Will you destroy the just with the wicked? Far be it from you to do this thing, and to slay the just with the wicked, that the just be as the wicked; this is not your way, who judge all the earth: by no means will you do this judgment.

Again, otherwise the will of God would be the first and supreme justice, and whatever He willed would by that very fact be just. But this is plainly contrary to Anselm, Cur Deus Homo I.12, saying thus: That, however, which is said — that what God wills is just, and what He does not will is not just — is not so to be understood that, if God should will any unfitting thing, it would be just because He wills it. For it does not follow, "If God wills to lie, it is just to lie"; but rather, "He is not God."

Again, otherwise nothing would be per se just, but only justness positive [posited] from the divine will; therefore neither would anything be per se unjust, but only because forbidden by the same — which seems contrary to the Philosopher, Ethics V.12, saying thus: Of political justice, this part is natural, this legal: Natural is what everywhere has the same force, and not in being seen so or not — that is, it does not consist in the judgment of the legislator, in that it so seems to him or not. And he adds: Legal is what from the beginning differs not, thus or otherwise; but when it is laid down, it differs — for example, that one mina be redeemed, or that a captive be sacrificed, but not two sheep. And the like is found in the Canon, distinction 1. That something is per se unjust, not only because forbidden, also appears through Augustine, On Free Will I.6, saying: Adultery is not evil because forbidden by law, but it is forbidden by law because evil. And Augustine teaches in Questions on Leviticus 62, and the Gloss on Leviticus 19 recites, that some things are unjust and evil because forbidden, but others contrariwise — like lying.

Again, otherwise the will of God would be the supreme law and the principle of all justice — which seems contrary to Augustine, On Free Will I.13, saying thus: That immutable law to which always one must obey is called supreme reason; therefore it is not will, since reason is in the intellect. And further, in the same: The eternal law is that by which it is just that all things be most ordered. And this law, as it appears, does not depend on the divine will, but is immutably per se just.

The opposite side of this can also be persuaded by some considerations. In the rules of justice or law, one cannot ascend to infinity, because of the second supposition; but there must be some supreme of all and principle of others. This cannot be in any creature, but is necessarily in God. And there is no necessary reason or law in God prior to His will: for there is no law or reason why, of two equal possibles, He wills and does one and not the other, as has been argued above. Therefore that supreme law and justice is necessarily the will. Whence Anselm, Proslogion 11: That alone is just which you will, and what you do not will is not just; and Augustine on Psalm 61, He spoke once: If you ask what is just, what is unjust, look where God spoke once, and there you will find the fount of justice. This could be confirmed by human laws, ecclesiastical and even secular: for frequently in ecclesiastical laws the Pope says: It has pleased us thus, or thus, which by this very fact is established and held for law; imperial laws too often have a similar foundation, whence they say: What has pleased the Prince has the force of law. But God is as free in establishing laws for the governance of His whole commonwealth as these are for theirs. Therefore the will of God is sufficient as law, and is the supreme law.

Here, however, it can be answered in all things concerning justice or the just, just as concerning reason and the rational it was answered above; and as the rational was there divided, so the just can be divided here.

For there are some just things naturally prior to the divine will, and not depending on it — such as that God is, that God is eternal, omnipotent, and the like; and these just things, and their justice, can well move God's will to willing. Others, however, are just things posterior; and others mixed, as was said concerning the rational. Things legal also and laws are similarly divided. Mixed perhaps are such as: the good are to be rewarded, the bad punished, and the like. And as in another genus there is some proper and first principle by which the rest are regulated, as the foregoing has taught, so in the genus of the legal and the just there is necessarily some first law and justice, which is the first rule and the first principle, from which originally all other legal and just things following are derived, and in all things directed.

This proper principle, however, appears to be the infallible truth of the divine essence, on which, as on an immovable foundation, all judgments of justice rest. This David, that exceptional witness of truth, seems to attest, when he says: The principle of thy words is truth; for ever are all the judgments of thy justice (Psalm 118). Wherefore from this principle the whole law is named truth in the same: Thy law is truth. This first justice, however, is just per se, and primarily, necessarily, and absolutely, in no way depending on the divine will, but naturally prior to it. From this first just thing, however, many other just things necessarily follow; and they are, as I judge, all those which are just necessarily absolutely — not because they are commanded by God or any man whatsoever; whose opposites also are unjust necessarily absolutely, which can be shown as above concerning rational things a similar showing was made. And with these just or unjust things neither God nor man can dispense in the least, just as neither can He change what is necessary or impossible absolutely. For these are not subject to the divine will, nor that of any man whatsoever, just as neither is the antecedent, nor the consequence by which from it they most justly follow. Of this kind are: that a creature, if it exists, is subject to the Creator; that one benefitted is bound to his benefactor, at least to God his benefactor; that none ought to sin; and as perhaps is the case, that none ought to do anything against his proper conscience, or against the prejudice of his proper reason. And such perhaps is to lie, as Anselm seems to mean, where he was cited. For this seems to contravene some truth, and so the first truth, which is the principle of the whole law and of justice both divine and human; and beyond doubt such would be for God to lie, of which Anselm there speaks. These, however, are simply natural laws, immovably founded in the very nature naturans.

From this first rule of all legal and just things, however, many other legal and just things follow, not necessarily as the prior, but freely and contingently — because through a free and contingent medium, namely through the divine will. And these are all temporally instituted legal things. Whence Augustine, On Free Will I.13, having distinguished a twofold law — namely, temporal or commutable, and eternal or incommutable — says: In that temporal law there is nothing just and legitimate which men have not derived to themselves from this eternal law. Wherefore Hugh also in De Sacramentis I, part one, chapter 4, speaking of the divine will, thus says: According to it, that is just which is just, which doubtless would not be just, if according to it it were not just. When, therefore, it is asked, why is what is just, just? it is most fittingly answered, because it is according to the will of God, which is just. But when it is asked, why is it itself just? it is more soundly answered, because to the first cause there is no cause, by which from itself it is what it is. This alone, then, is that whence has arisen whatever is, and itself has not arisen, but is eternal. Whence also Wisdom 12: Thy power is the beginning of justice. And Isaiah 51: Hearken to me, my people, for the law shall go forth from me, and my judgment shall rest in the light of the peoples.

Some just things, then, follow necessarily by supposition and inseparably from created nature — as Man is rational; All men are similar in species; The whole is greater than its part, and so of similar things; and this is natural law simply for created nature, and is altogether necessary, with which neither God nor natural man can dispense, while such created nature stands. Some, however, follow created nature, not entirely necessarily but for the most part — what almost all and everywhere do by instinct of nature, not by human institution, of which kind are: To do to another what one wills to be done to oneself, and similarly negatively; love of offspring, and their education; the requital of benefactors; the violent repulsion of violence; the keeping of faith; and the like. And so frequently and almost always do authors and laws speak of natural law. And with this natural law dispensation can be made for cause; for such natural things, according to the Philosopher, Physics II, are always or for the most part disposed in one way, but sometimes and in a small part fail. Whence Gratian in the Canon, distinction 13: Against natural law no dispensation is admitted, except perhaps where two evils so urge that one of them must necessarily be chosen. For this seems to be one natural law: No apparent evil is to be chosen — with which dispensation is made in the case where it is necessary that someone choose a greater or lesser apparent evil. And this is the epieikeia of natural law, just as another similar one is of positive legal right, as appears in Ethics V.16. By this second mode or by the first, however, every just thing seems to be natural law, to which there is a stronger reason — since man naturally has reason as his natural rule. Wherefore natural law also seems to be that which follows this; and the opposites of these are forbidden because evil, and not contrariwise.

Yet there is still a kind of just thing derived from the first rule of justice, not necessarily but freely, which is natural in neither of these modes — to which, that is, before it is established, there is no stronger reason for than against it; and such is purely positive and legal right. Whence the Philosopher, Ethics V.12: Legal justice is what from the beginning differs not thus or otherwise; but when it is laid down, it differs. As if a master should command a subject of two altogether equal things to do this one first, and that one second — then it is first just so to be done, and not otherwise. And such seem all those things which in case of equality and indifference are decided by lot, or even permitted; of which kind perhaps was not to eat of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. And similar to these seems that one is to appeal within ten days. For no reason from the beginning compelled to ten days more than to eleven or nine; but some term was necessary, and so the legislator had to define a fitting term. And of this kind appear all those things which are evil because forbidden, and not contrariwise. And in such cases that maxim of the jurists is true: What has pleased the Prince has the force of law; and Thus I will, thus I command, let will stand for reason. And likewise in certain other cases in which according to truth there is a stronger reason for than against, but it is not clear to all that it is so. Lest, then, anyone according to the fancy of his own head should be able to feign for himself reason, and so make for himself a law — lest perhaps a shadow of reason might creep in under the appearance of true reason — it is expedient that all such things, although according to truth they are per se rational and just, since to many they are doubtful, be made clear by the discreet judgment of the legislator, and by his authority be decreed just and certain.

And thus what has rationally pleased the Prince in establishing has the determinate and certain force of law, and previously had only the doubtful and uncertain. And with such laws dispensation is made, as appears in both rights. In such matters, moreover, epieikeia often has a place, as Ethics V.16 attests.

Furthermore, there is a kind of obligating justice, a kind of preponderant justice, and a kind of congruent and concomitant justice, just as was said above concerning reason. Through these, and other things already set forth, the response to all the arguments appears.

CHAPTER XXII

THAT GOD HAS AN ACTUAL VOLITION OR NOLITION DISTINCT, OPPOSITE TO ANY OBJECT WHATSOEVER OF THE WILL.

It seems consequent to what has been said to show that the divine will has a proper and distinct actual volition or nolition concerning any object whatsoever of the will — good or evil, true or fictitious, possible or impossible, present, past, and future.

This, indeed, with respect to all such things as are posterior to the divine will, is shown through chapter 18: for God knows complexly all such things to be such, and this He cannot do without a previous will through some act of His own.

Again, if it is not so, there is some object concerning which God has no act of will; and it is certain that He can have one. Therefore He is in potency and as it were sleeping with respect to such an object; therefore He could be more actual, more noble, and more perfect than He now is. Now, then, He is not most actual, most noble, and most perfect — which the first supposition and the third part of the corollary to chapter 1 forbid. For act is prior to potency in definition, perfection, and time, as appears from Metaphysics IX.13 and following — where Averroes says, comment 16: The sign that act is completion and perfection is that act is operation, and operation is the completion and perfection of the operator; and therefore "act" in the Greek tongue signifies what "completion" and "perfection" signifies. And in comment 17 he says that the first mover is pure act, in which there is no potency at all. And on Metaphysics XII, comment 38, he says that what moves the first moved, since it is pure act without any potency, cannot have any disposition other than the one it has.

Again, if there were potency in God, that potency would be good; and to every such potency its act is better and more honorable, as is proved in Metaphysics IX.19.

Again, just as understanding in act is to understanding in potency, so willing or not-willing in act is to willing or not-willing in potency. But understanding in act is more perfect than understanding in potency; therefore willing and not-willing in act is more perfect than these in potency. Therefore by the first supposition and the third part of the corollary to chapter 1, these must be attributed to God.

Surely in Metaphysics XII.51 the Philosopher proves through this that God understands in act, not in potency, in these words: If He does not understand, what venerable thing will He be? but He has it as it were in the manner of one sleeping. — Where Averroes [says]: It is necessary, if there is intellect, that always one of these two be the case: either according to a disposition in which the knower does not use his science, or in which he uses it. If the first is granted, he is as one sleeping, and there is not found in him a noble disposition; and this is unfitting.

Again, felicity consists in use, not in possession; in operation, not in habit, as the Philosopher proves in Ethics I.12 by this — that habit can be in one doing no good, as in one sleeping, but operation cannot. And the same is held above, chapter 5, and below in the last [chapter], where also he alleges those who say that the felicitous differ in nothing through half their lives from the wretched. But God is most felicitous, therefore also most actual.

This whole appears more expressly in Ethics X.12, where the Philosopher proves that felicity is speculative operation, by this — that the gods are most blessed and felicitous, and this by operating, not by sleeping; and this operation will necessarily be speculative. — Where Averroes says: Glorious God, and the Angels, are of more noble state and felicity than the rest of beings; therefore they have act: for it is not fitting that they should be sleeping.

Surely it is on this account that Algazel in Metaphysics III, sentence 7, says that in necessary being there is nothing in potency. And Dionysius, De Divinis Nominibus 7, deduces this as something impossible — that God should be free [vacat] anywhere — as chapter 15 of this work more fully recited.

Surely also the Prophet, Psalm 120, says of the Lord: Behold, He shall not slumber, nor shall He sleep that keeps Israel — taking much or moderate idleness, or being free from the work? In the future blessedness too of Angels and men, there shall be no idleness, cessation, or vacancy of intellect or even will, as both reasons and authorities teach us, but actual and perfect operation of both unceasingly persevering. How then concerning God, then, and now, and always more incomparably blessed, infinitely, must one not similarly judge?

Again, such a disposition in our intellect or will has annexed to it a certain indifference, potentiality, and imperfection; therefore similarly in God. Therefore it must not be posited in Him, by the testimony of the first supposition and the third part of the corollary to chapter 1 of this work. And on account of this reasoning, John, on Sentences I, distinction 39, question 2, holds this opinion. For he says that the liberty of our will, which is indifferent to opposite acts, has necessarily some imperfection annexed, namely passive potentiality and mutability; and therefore such liberty is not to be posited in God.

Again, God concerning any object whatsoever has memory and intelligence, as appears from chapter 6. If, therefore, concerning some object He does not have an act of will, memory, intelligence, and will would be unequal in God — when yet in us they are equal, as is declared in De Trinitate X, penultimate, and XV.23. There would also seem to be a kind of inequality in the divine persons, to whom these are appropriated by the orthodox Fathers. Surely also if it were so, some of those powers would not be supremely perfect, contrary to the third and fourth parts of the corollary to chapter 1 of this work?

Furthermore, if God concerning a certain object of will were to have no act, and could have one, it appears that He could in some way be changed, contrary to chapter 5 of this work — as if, having no act of intellect or of will concerning any object whatsoever, and being able to have one concerning any whatsoever, and it were posited in being, He would seem changed. So also the contrary case: for if He should cease from every such act, He would appear changed in some respect.

Furthermore, unless God of necessity had some act of will concerning any object whatsoever of His, He could have no act of will concerning Antichrist — neither that he should be, nor that he should not be. Therefore, as it appears according to what has been laid down in chapter 14 of this work, Antichrist would be neither future nor not-future; and so of all other posterior contradictories universally.

Again, if it derogated nothing in any way from the perfection of the divine will to have no act concerning one object, neither would it concerning another, and concerning all others. Again, then by the same reasoning the divine intellect would not in any way be repugnant to having no act of cognition concerning one object, nor concerning another; and so concerning each individually and concerning all together. Therefore it would not in any way derogate His perfection if He were always as a Lord asleep, as a strong man overcome with wine.

Perhaps, however, it is by no means to be supposed that God acquires any perfection from the cognition or volition of objects; but because He is supremely perfect, therefore He produces such perfect operations — just as the sun is not therefore more perfectly lucid, nor its light more perfect, because it perfectly illuminates the medium, but because it is perfectly lucid, and its light perfect, therefore it perfectly illuminates. Yet if these perfect operations were withdrawn from God, God would be more imperfect, not on account of the withdrawal of any perfection acquired by Him through them, but on account of the withdrawal of the perfect powers, the supreme actuality, and His omnipotence, from which (or from whom) these operations proceed — just as if the illumination of the disposed medium did not occur from the sun, the sun would be more imperfect, not on account of the withdrawal of any perfection which it acquired from the illumination, but through the withdrawal of that light by which it should illuminate.

Nor from this does any absurd necessity follow in the divine will, just as none in His intellect, but virtue, efficacy, actuality, and infinite goodness, which neither wills nor can be made imperfect, idle, or in the least slumber. Just as also no unworthy necessity follows that same will, if it immutably loves and wills the divine essence, the persons, Christ, and the promised glory of those to be saved, future and past, of those saved — but a most-worthy stability, and most-free communication of goodness.

COROLLARY

1. And it has a corollary: that God wills every truth, and does not positively will (but rejects) every falsehood.
2. That if God wills any antecedent, He wills any consequent of it; and does not positively will every thing repugnant to it.
3. That of any pair of repugnant things, He has a willing of the one and a not-willing of the other.
4. That from God's willing anything whatsoever, it follows that He does not will the opposite of it; and contrariwise.
5. That from God's not willing any affirmative or negative significate, it follows that He wills the opposite of it.
6. That from God's not not-willing any whatsoever, it follows that He not-wills the opposite of it.
7. That from God's positively not-willing any whatsoever, it follows that He not-wills the same also privatively; and likewise contrariwise.
8. That whatever is in any manner whatsoever, God wills it so to be; and whatever is not in any manner whatsoever, God does not will it so to be.

From these, however, certain other hidden things, but most worthy of view, lucidly follow.

[1] First, that God wills every truth, and does not positively will, or rejects, every falsehood.

[2] Second, if God wills any antecedent, He wills any consequent of it, and does not positively will any thing repugnant to it.

[3] Third, that of any pair of repugnant or impossible things, God has a willing of the one and a not-willing of the other.

[4] Fourth, that from God's willing anything whatsoever, it follows that He does not will the opposite of it; and contrariwise.

[5] Fifth, that from God's not willing any affirmative or negative significate — for instance, A is, or A is not — it follows that He wills the opposite of it.

[6] Sixth, that from God's not not-willing any affirmative or negative thing uttered, it follows that He not-wills the opposite of it.

[7] Seventh, that from God's positively not-willing any whatsoever, it follows that He not-wills the same also privatively; and likewise contrariwise.

[8] Eighth, that whatever is in any manner whatsoever — present, past, or future, true or false, possible or impossible, necessary or contingent — God wills it so to be; and whatever is not in any manner whatsoever, God does not will it so to be.

The first part of this corollary follows manifestly: For if, as the chapter teaches, God has some act of will concerning any truth whatsoever, and concerning no truth has He an act of not-willing — for then, by chapter 10 of this work, that would not be a truth: for it would not be in reality as it signifies — He has, then, an act of willing concerning any truth whatsoever. The other particle of this part appears in like manner: For if, as the chapter teaches, God has an act of will concerning any falsehood whatsoever, and concerning no falsehood — that is, no thing falsely signified — has He an act of willing, for then by chapter 10 it would really and truly be so. Concerning any falsehood, then, God has an act of not-willing — namely, a not-willing that it should be really as it signifies.

The second part of the corollary follows from the first, and the parts of this second correspondingly from the parts of this first, with two most known maxims taken together: If the antecedent is true, so is the consequent; and Everything repugnant to a truth is false.

The third part evidently follows from the first, with this logical rule: Of any pair of repugnant and impossible things, one is true, the other false.

The fourth follows from the third manifestly, this notorious [maxim] supporting it: God does not at the same time will and not-will anything.

The fifth and sixth are demonstrated by the third.

The first part of the seventh appears from that notorious [point] presupposed in the showing of the fourth part; the false part of it, however, follows fully from the third part of this.

The eighth appears from the first, since the parts correspondingly from the parts. For whatever is in any manner whatsoever, it is true that it is so. Wherefore by the first of the first, God wills it so to be. And whatever is not in any manner whatsoever, it is false that it is so. Wherefore by the second of the first, God does not will it so to be.

CHAPTER XXIII

THAT BOTH GOD'S SCIENCE AND HIS WILL IS ALTOGETHER IMMUTABLE.

After these things I judge it must be demonstrated that both God's science and His will is altogether immutable. For if either of these were changed, God Himself would necessarily be changed, contrary to chapter 5 already cited. This can also be sufficiently shown through the reasons and authorities of that chapter, and confirmed in abundance through others.

For if the science of God were sometimes changed, this would most appear concerning future things, when they become present and so slip into the past. But this is not true, since these are in no way the cause of the divine science, but the contrary, as has been shown above; therefore He always knows them in the same way intrinsically, nor in any other manner. Wherefore Avicenna in Metaphysics VIII.6, and Algazel in Metaphysics III, sentence 6, show that God does not so know singulars or particulars — first as future, second as present, third as past — that according to their change He is in any way changed; but always similarly, and never otherwise in any way. Wherefore the same Avicenna in Metaphysics IX.1 says: Through this it is necessary being — necessary being in all its modes — because there can be no future disposition for it which was not. Wherefore also Ammonius on On Interpretation I, last [section]: The gods, he says, truly exist, and to undergo transmutation, even according to intellect, is impossible. And further: *To know, he says, contingent things, is the very nature of the gods themselves; on account of which these things, having indeed an indeterminate nature — being able to occur and not to occur — they, however, in some more noble manner than is their nature, take up beforehand the cognition of them and know them determinately. For it is necessary that they cognize partible things impartibly, and without distance, and pluralized things unitedly, and temporal things eternally, and generable things ungenerably. For we shall by no means endure that the cognition of the gods be said to flow along with the flux of things, nor that with them there be anything either past or future, nor that it be said of them, "He was" or "He will be" — as in the Timaeus we have assumed — since these are significative of a kind of transmutation; but only, "He is," and this not the "is" which is connumerated with the "He was" and "He will be," and is divided up with them, but that which is understood before all temporal insinuation, and which signifies their inversibility and indecidence — which indeed even the great Parmenides announces of every intellectual being: "For neither was it nor will it be; but only is."*

Concordantly with which Boethius, De Consolatione Philosophiae V, last prose, writes thus: Every judgment, according to its own nature, comprehends those things which are subject to it. But God's state is always eternal and presential; His science also, having surpassed all motion of time, remains in the simplicity of His presence; embracing also the infinite spaces of past and future, considers all things in His simple cognition as if they were now being done. Therefore, if you wish to weigh that presence by which He discerns all things, you will more rightly judge it to be not as it were a presence of the future, but a science of an instance never failing.

This same thing all philosophers and theologians wish concordantly when speaking of eternity, and of God's intrinsic eternal actions, measured by eternity not by time.

Furthermore, Ecclesiasticus 23: To the Lord God, he says, all things are known before they were created; so also after they are perfected does He behold all things. In treating which the blessed Augustine, De Trinitate XV.13, says thus: He knew all creatures, not because they exist, therefore He knows them, but because He knew them, therefore they exist; nor did He know created things otherwise than as creatable; for nothing was added to His wisdom from them; but they being as it was fitting, and when it was fitting, He remained as He was. For so it is written in the book of Ecclesiasticus: Before they were created, all things were known to Him; so also after they are consummated — so, he says, not otherwise.

The same opinion is also reinforced by Dionysius, De Divinis Nominibus 7, as chapter 15 recited.

Furthermore, Augustine, De Trinitate VI, last [chapter], writes thus: Although times depart and succeed, the science of God neither departs nor succeeds. For these things which are created are not therefore known by God because they have been made, but rather they have been made, or are mutable, because they are immutably known by Him.

The same, Questions of Orosius 22: God from eternity, by His established counsel, made what He willed; nor did He see things made differently, and to be made differently; therefore He sees in the same way things done as He had seen them to be done.

The same, Super Genesim ad Litteram V.18: How, he says, were things known to God which were not? And again, how would He make those things which were not known to Him? For He made nothing being ignorant of it. Therefore He knew the things He made; He did not learn made things. So before they came to be, they both were and were not: they were in God's science, they were not in their own nature. And further: I dare not, however, say that they became known to God in any other way when He had made them, than the way He had known them in order to make them, with whom there is no change nor shadow of a moment.

The same, De Civitate Dei XI.21: What else is to be understood when through all things it is said, "God saw that it was good," except the approbation of the work made according to the art, which is the wisdom of God? But God so far from learning that it was good when it was made, that no one of these things would have been made if it had been unknown to Him. While, then, He sees that it is good — what unless He had seen before it was made would by no means have been made — He teaches that it is good; He does not learn it. And Plato indeed dared to say more — namely, that God was elated with joy at the universe of the world being completed; where Plato himself was not so far foolish as to think that God was made more blessed by the novelty of His work, but he wished thus to show that the work already made pleased the Artificer, which had pleased Him in the art as to be made. Not that in any way the science of God is varied, so that other things make other in Him those which are not yet, other those which now are, other those which have been. For it is not in our manner that He looks ahead to what is future, or looks at what is present, or looks back at what is past; but in some manner far and high differently from the custom of our cogitations. He, indeed, not by changing thought from this to that, but altogether incommutably sees, so that those things which are temporally done — and future things which are not yet, and present things which now are, and present things which now no longer are — He Himself comprehends all these by stable and sempiternal presence, nor [does He see] in one way with eyes, in another with mind: for He does not consist of soul and body, nor in one way now, in another before, in another after. Since not, as ours, His knowledge also of three times — of the present, the past, or the future — is changed by variety; with whom there is no change, nor shadow of a moment. Nor does His intention pass from cogitation to cogitation, in whose incorporeal contuition all things which He knows are simultaneously present.

The same, on Psalm 138, Wonderful is thy science from me, says that God spoke to Moses through some assumed corporeal creature, not in the way that He speaks in His substance: For how does He speak in His substance? The speech of God is the Word of God; the Word of God is Christ. That word does not sound and pass, but always remains immutably the Word, through which all things were made. To which Word it is said (for it is also the Wisdom of God): Thou shalt change them, and they shall be changed; but thou art the same. And in another place concerning Wisdom, when Scripture said, "remaining in itself," it says, "it makes all things new." That Wisdom, then, standing — if it is to be called even standing; but it is so called on account of immutability, not on account of immobility, and ever in the same way, in no place, at no time varied, nowhere otherwise than here or there, never otherwise than now or before — it is itself the speech of God.

The same, De Trinitate IV.1: One is the Word of God, through which all things were made, which is incommutable truth. There are all things principally and immutably together — not only those which are now in this whole creation, but also those which have been and have been done. There, however, they neither were nor are to be, but only are; and all things are life, and all things are one; and what is more wonderful, all are one life. For all things have so been made through Him, that whatever has been made in these in Him is life, and is not made.

Further, if the science of God were mutable, it would also in some way be mortal, as appears from the foregoing of chapter 5. How, then, when the Apostle says, He alone has immortality (1 Timothy, last); how also when another Apostle and Evangelist teaches, What was made, in Him was life (John 1) — what kind of life? mortal? Who of mortals will so say? Surely this also seems contrary to Augustine just recited; who also in Confessions I.6 [says]: Thou, Lord, ever livest, and nothing dies in Thee, since before the beginnings of ages, and before everything that can be called "before," Thou art; and Thou art my God, and the Lord of all things which Thou hast created. And with Thee stand the causes of all unstable things, and of all mutable things the immutable origins remain, and the eternal reasons of all irrational and temporal things live. And further, in book 12, chapter 10: Thou art eternal, having immortality, since Thou art changed by no kind of motion, nor is Thy will varied through times, since not immortal is the will which is one and another. Whence is taken the 183rd proposition of the Sentences of Prosper, which says thus: True is the eternity of God, who alone has immortality, since He is changed by no kind of motion, nor is His will temporal. For not immortal is the will which is one and another. Why then must one not similarly think concerning His science? Indeed, hear him himself on John, Homily 23 of the first part, saying: Pass beyond every mutable spirit; pass beyond a spirit which now knows, now does not know; now remembers and forgets; wills what it did not will, does not will what it willed; whether it suffer these mutabilities now, or be able to suffer them. Pass beyond all these things. For you will not find in God any mutability, anything which is now in such-and-such a way, otherwise than it was a little before. For wherever you find "otherwise and otherwise," there is made a kind of death — for death is to not-be-what-was.

This opinion is also confirmed by Gregory, Moralia XVIII.31, as appears from chapter 5 of this work.

From these, then, I judge the immutability of the divine science to appear; which being granted, who will deny the immutability of the divine will? Is not the reasoning similar on either side? Do not certain authorities cited above clearly attest it?

Furthermore, if the will of God were mutable and successively alternable, it would be possible for someone to begin to be saved, and something to begin to be future, and likewise to cease, without their being posited in being. For let it be supposed that God yesterday positively did not will Peter to be saved, nor A to be future, but willed the opposite — and that today He wills both. Then, by chapter 10, yesterday Peter was not to be saved, nor A future; and today he is to be saved, and A future — which is a manifest impossibility. The same can be argued concerning the cessation just mentioned, by supposing the opposites of what was set forth.

Again, if God's will were mutable, He would not certainly know future contingents. For He cannot certainly know them except through some certain thing, as has been shown in chapter 18; nor does God know future contingents except through His will; and if that be successively alternable, it is uncertain, like the human will. For just as I do not now know that I shall write tomorrow, by the fact that I now will to write tomorrow, since my will can be changed in the meantime — so it appears that God now does not know that Antichrist will be, by the fact that He now wills him to be future, if His will could similarly be alternated. For granting this, it does not follow: God now wills Antichrist to be in time A or instant A, therefore Antichrist will then be. For He can after the present willing, before A, have a not-willing or non-willing concerning that, and continue it up to A and always; which if it be posited in being, the truth of the antecedent and of the opposite of the consequent follows.

This also the sacred authorities attest. Whence Psalm 32: But the counsel of the Lord stands forever; the thoughts of His heart from generation to generation. Gloss: that is, they are not mutable, but eternal; and His predestination is immutable, in which all things are stored up. And this Gloss is taken from Augustine on the same place of the Psalm, treatise 1, saying: The thoughts of His wisdom are not mutable, but remain unto the age of the age. Similar is that of Psalm 116: The truth of the Lord remains forever. And that of Psalm 118: From the beginning I knew of thy testimonies, that thou hadst founded them forever. And that of the Apostle, 2 Timothy 2: The firm foundation of God stands, having this seal: the Lord knows those who are His. And to the Hebrews 6: God, willing to show to the heirs of the promise the immobility of His counsel, interposes an oath. And Isaiah 40: My counsel shall stand, and all my will shall be done. And Jeremiah 31: I have loved thee with a perpetual charity, therefore have I drawn thee, having mercy — with a perpetual charity, he says, not a new one.

This same thing Augustine expressly says, De Trinitate III.2, expounding that of Psalm 121, Jerusalem, which is built as a city, whose participation is in itself: By "in itself," he says, in this place is understood that supreme and incommutable Good which is God, and the wisdom and will of Him, to which it is sung in another place: Thou shalt change them, and they shall be changed, but thou art the same. And in chapter 3: Of all visible and invisible things made, the cause is the invisible and incommutable will of God. And in chapter 4: God uses all things, whether incorporeal or corporeal, whether rational or irrational, whether good or evil, for the incommutable arbitrium of His sentence. And Enchiridion 75, speaking of the Tyrians and Sidonians whom God did not will to be saved, he says that in the resurrection, in the most clear light of wisdom, that will be seen which now the faith of the pious has — how certain and immutable and most efficacious is the will of God. And 83 Questions 27: The law of God remains incommutable, and moderates all mutable things by most beautiful governance. And On Free Will I.13: The law which is called supreme reason, by which the temporal law is borne and changed, is so incommutable that it cannot be varied in any way.

This is also attested by the Sentences of Prosper, which I gladly cite, since whenever I cite them, I bring forward two witnesses beyond exception — namely, Augustine and Prosper of Aquitaine, who, like a clever bee sucking the marrow from the flowers of the works of Augustine, into the hive of these Sentences, composed them in a honeycomb of honey. Of these Sentences, then, the 342nd proposition says thus: Since the law of all arts is altogether incommutable, it sufficiently appears that the law which is called truth is above our mind. For this is that incommutable truth which is rightly called the law of all arts and the art of the omnipotent Artificer. And proposition 42: The disposition of mutable things contains an incommutable reason. And proposition 169: The cogitation and recognition of God is the incommutable reason of things to be changed. For not as a man, so does God repent of any of His works, of whom of all things the sentence is so fixed as the foreknowledge is certain. And proposition 158: What in works is said to be prior or posterior, is to be referred not to the maker, but to the things made; for His will is eternal and incommutable, nor is it varied alternately by counsel — in which is together whatever in things to be created or to be ordered either preceded or follows.

Again, Augustine, De Trinitate V, last [chapter]: God forbid, however, that God should temporally love anyone with a new love which was not in Him before, with whom past things have not departed, and future things are already made. Therefore He loved all His Saints before the foundation of the world, just as He predestined them; but when they are converted to Him, then they are said to begin to be loved by Him, that it may be said in the way that human affection can grasp what is said. Just so when He is said to be angry with the bad and gentle with the good, they are changed, not He — just as light is rough to weak eyes, gentle to firm ones, by their own change, namely, not its own.

The same, De Trinitate XV.20, recites the dialectic of the heretic Eunomius to be derided, who posited that the only-begotten Word of God was not Son of nature but of will, namely wishing to assert that will was accidental to God, by which He generated the Son — for this reason, because we sometimes will something which we did not will before. Whom he refutes immediately, saying: As though our nature were not for these things understood to be mutable! — which God forbid we believe to be in God. For not for any other reason has it been written, "Many are the cogitations in the heart of a man, but the counsel of the Lord remains forever," than that we should understand or believe that, just as God is eternal, so His counsel is eternal, and through this immutable, just as He is. But what concerning cogitations, this can also most truly be said concerning wills: "Many are the wills in the heart of man, but the will of the Lord remains forever."

This same is said by the same author much more diffusely in De Civitate Dei XXII.2, by distinguishing concerning the will of God: for sometimes it is taken for the effect of the divine will, and so it is mutable; sometimes for that will of His which is sempiternal with His foreknowledge, and so He never has a new will, but always the same, which immutably perseveres. This same thing he shows much diffusely above, in [books] 12.17 and 14.

The same, Super Genesim ad Litteram VIII.17, speaking of divine providence, says: God omnipotent, holding all things, by incommutable eternity, truth, and will, always the same, not moved through time or place, moves creatures through time and place.

The same appears through the same author in De Civitate Dei V.9 and other places, and not a few books; and through Anselm, De Concordia 3 and 4, and Cur Deus Homo II.17, and elsewhere frequently.

And the blessed Gregory says, Moralia XXVI.4: Although the omnipotent God often changes His sentence, His counsel He never changes. And the same is held in the Gloss on Isaiah 38, where he treats of the addition of fifteen years to the life of Hezekiah.

But still hear Augustine excellently confirming both opinions together, Confessions XII.15, saying thus: Truth tells me concerning the true eternity of the Creator, that His substance is in no way varied through times, nor is His will outside His substance; whence He does not now will this, now will that, but together, and once, and ever wills all things which He wills — not again and again, nor now these, now those, nor wills what He did not will, or not-wills what He did will, since such will is mutable, and nothing mutable is eternal; but our God is eternal. Likewise that which He says in the inner ear: The expectation of things to come is made a contuition when they have come, and the same contuition is made memory when they have passed. But every intention which is so varied is mutable, and everything mutable is not eternal; but our God is eternal. These things I gather and conjoin, and I find that my God, the eternal God, did not by any new will found the creature, nor did His science suffer anything transitory.

These two opinions also concerning the science and will of God, the said Anselm of Canterbury, Robert of Lincoln, Hugh of St. Victor, Peter Lombard, and not a few other Doctors unanimously attest. It is also imputed to the Egyptians as an error that they thought the divine will could be changed through sacrifices.

COROLLARY

1. And it has a corollary: that God anew loves and hates none;
2. Nor more or less at one time than at another;
3. Nor do prayers, nor any merits good or bad, bend or change the divine will in the least, here or there.
4. And that every one to be saved or damned, rewarded or punished under any degree whatsoever, He willed from eternity to be saved or damned, rewarded similarly or punished, under the same degree precisely; and this not merely by a conditional or indeterminate will, but as absolutely and determinately as He wills in the present or final judgment, or shall will afterward.

[1] Whence it follows manifestly that God anew loves or hates none. [2] Nor more or less at one time than at another. [3] Nor do prayers, nor any merits good or bad, bend or change the divine will in the least, here or there. [4] And that every one to be saved or damned, rewarded or punished under any degree whatsoever, He willed from eternity to be saved or damned, rewarded similarly or punished under the same degree precisely; and this not merely by a conditional or indeterminate will, but as absolutely and determinately as He wills in the present or final judgment, or shall will afterward.

This whole, however, follows manifestly from the foregoing. But lest in such a sublime matter I seem to dream a little out of the fancy of my own head, I will show this by the testimonies and reasons of my elders.

The first part of this and the second appear from that of the Apostle to the Ephesians 1: He chose us before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and immaculate in His sight in charity, according to the purpose of His will; and to the Romans 9: When they were not yet born, nor had done anything good or evil, that the purpose of God might stand according to election, it was said: The greater shall serve the lesser, as it is written: Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated. This same thing appears through Peter Lombard, Sentences III, distinction 32, and through the testimonies which he adduces.

The third part of it follows from the foregoing evidently, and can be proved through the response of the Savior to the sons of Zebedee, when their mother adored and asked that He would say that they should sit, one at His right and one at His left in His kingdom — who answered them thus: To sit at my right hand or my left, is not mine to give to you, but to those for whom it has been prepared by my Father (Matthew 20). For if prayers and merits could obtain this, He could give it.

This also appears through the response of Samuel which he gave to Saul: when Samuel had said to him, Because you have rejected the word of the Lord, the Lord has rejected you, that you should not be king, Saul asked him to bear his sin, and to return with him, that he might adore the Lord. He, refusing, answered: The Triumpher in Israel will not spare, and will not be turned by repentance: for He is not a man, that He should do penance (1 Samuel 15). And when Samuel was lamenting Saul, the Lord, rebuking him, said to him: How long do you mourn for Saul, since I have rejected him, that he should not reign over Israel? (chapter 16). Similar is that of Jeremiah 7: I will cast you forth from my face. Therefore do not pray for this people, nor take up praise or prayer for them, nor stand against me, since I will not hear you. And further, in the same, chapter 11, He commanded the same thing: where the Gloss says: It is commanded to the prophet not to pray for those against whom sentence has been completed, lest his prayer should appear infirm and not heard, and rightly so. "Do not take up praise for them" — as if to say: lest by replicating the clemency of the old story, by which I am wont to have mercy, and praising it, you should strive to change my sentence. And further, in chapter 14, after the manifold confession of sins and devout prayer of Jeremiah, the Lord said to him: Do not pray for this people for good; when they fast, I will not hear their prayers, and if they offer holocausts and victims, I will not receive them, since by the sword and famine and pestilence I will consume them. Surely this is what the Lord plainly teaches in Ezekiel 14 through Noah, Daniel, and Job, who, even if they were in the midst of a sinful people to which the Lord predicted punishments, would not free their sons or daughters, but only themselves.

Wherefore Gregory, as recited in the Canon 23, q. 4, Cum superna, says thus: When indignation moves itself, so to speak, from the inmost depths, human opinion does not remove it, nor does any man's prayer usefully oppose itself, when God once disposes anything from the inmost by being angered. With which Augustine concords, De Civitate Dei XXI.24, saying thus: If the Church were as certain about some that, as it knows them, even those who, although still constituted in this life, are predestined to go into eternal fire with the devil, it would no more pray for them than not for him.

Similar also is that of the Apostle to the Hebrews 12: Esau, desiring to inherit the blessing, was reproved. For he found no place of repentance, although he had sought it with tears. — Genesis 27 records that with a great wail he wept.

Similar also is that of Numbers 23: God is not as a man that He should lie, nor as a son of man that He should be changed; has He then said, and shall He not do? has He spoken, and shall He not fulfill? With which agrees that of 2 Timothy 2: He remains faithful: He cannot deny Himself. Gloss: He, namely Christ, remains faithful in His sayings, and truly faithful, since He cannot deny Himself, who is Truth — which He would do, if He did not fulfill His sayings. And lest this should appear to derogate the liberty of the divine will in some respect, immediately he subjoins: This, however — that He cannot deny Himself — is the praise of the divine will; and this is from Augustine, Homily 53 of the first part on John. Who also in De Trinitate XV.14 [says]: The Word of God, he says, can never have anything false, since immutably it is so disposed as is He from whom it is. For the Son cannot do anything from Himself except what He has seen the Father doing. Powerfully He cannot do this; nor is this infirmity but firmness, since truth cannot be false.

This third part also appears through the blessed Gregory, Dialogues I.21, and is alleged in the Canon 23, q. 4, Obtineri, saying: Things which are not predestined can by no means be obtained; but those which the holy men obtain by praying, are so predestined that they are obtained by their prayers. For the very predestination of the perennial kingdom is so disposed by God that the elect arrive at it from labor — that by asking they may merit to receive what almighty God before the ages disposed to give to them. With which Augustine concords, De Civitate Dei X.12, saying thus: Incommutable counsel is with Him, in whose disposition the times have already been made, whatever times will be. For moving temporal things, He is not moved temporally, nor does He know things to be done otherwise than things done, nor does He hear those calling upon Him otherwise than as He sees those who will call upon Him. For when His Angels also hear, He hears in them, as in His true temple not made with hands, just as in His humble Saints, and His commands are temporally done, beheld by His eternal law. And above in V.9 he writes thus: Laws, rebukes, exhortations, praises, and reproaches are not in vain, since God foreknew that these would be in the future; and prayers avail to obtain those things which He foreknew He would grant to those praying. And further, in XXI.24, thus says he: The Church prays for all men, yet not for all is it heard, but only for those who, although they oppose the Church, are nevertheless so predestined that for them it is heard. In De Trinitate XV.13 he wills the same thing.

Again, if the will of God could be changed by any prayers, it would be lawful and pious to pray for the damned Angels and men, plainly contrary to Augustine, De Civitate Dei XXI.24, and contrary to the general faith of the Church.

Again, if so, this would most appear through the most worthy prayers of His most holy Mother, of the holy Angels, and of the holy souls. But they dare to will or ask nothing, nor can they, except what they see God to will. Whence Peter Lombard, Sentences III, distinction 31, says: Those who are in the homeland are so addicted to the justice of God, that nothing pleases them save what pleases God; and through this they will the salvation only of those whom God wills to be saved, and they love only those as themselves. Who also in Sentences IV, distinction 45, writes thus: God is said to hear the prayers of certain men not only when He brings them to effect, but also when He makes known to the court of Angels and holy souls what shall come of it or not, and what they know to be in the will of God, they themselves also will. For they are so addicted to the supernal will that they cannot will anything beyond His will. The Saints, then, intercede for us before God, both by merit, when their merits suffrage for us, and by affection, when they desire our prayers to be fulfilled — which yet they do not do, except as they have learned in fulfilling the will of God.

It appears, then, that the will of God is not changed through prayers and good merits; therefore neither through bad ones.

The fourth part appears through the prior parts and their proofs, and because if God willed something other or otherwise at one time than at another, His will, and He Himself similarly, would be changed.

This same thing can also be specially proved thus: When God created the angelic and human nature, He intended something concerning it finally, absolutely and determinately. (For that wisdom which reaches mightily from end to end, and disposes all things sweetly, does not act more foolishly or vainly than created nature and will, which act determinate actions on account of a determinate end, as appears diffusely in Physics II.) And He did not intend that the whole [angelic and human nature] should stand and finally enjoy beatitude, since then His purpose would be frustrated, which chapter 10 does not allow. And the same argument applies concerning Lucifer, Adam, Judas, and any person who fell or is damned.

Whence Augustine, Against Julian V.6, says: From the number of the elect none perishes; but the rest of mortals who are not of this number, but are made vessels of wrath, are born for the utility of the former. For God does not rashly or fortuitously create any of them, nor is ignorant of what good He works concerning them — when by this very fact He works good, that in them He creates human nature, and that from them He adorns the order of the present age.

God, then, did not intend the standing of those falling, nor the beatitude of those to be damned. Wherefore also, as appears through chapter 22, He intended in some way the fall and damnation of any such — which the Psalmist also seems to feel, Psalm 103, when he says thus: That dragon which thou hast formed to mock him — if by the dragon Lucifer is designated. And Ecclesiasticus 39: There are spirits which were created for vengeance, etc.; and above in the same, chapter 26: Who turns from justice to sin, God has prepared him for the sword; with which seems to consonate the saying of the Savior concerning the son of perdition, namely Judas, in John 17, and the Apostle in 2 Thessalonians 2 concerning the man of sin, the son of perdition, namely Antichrist — although these things are by the holy Fathers expounded otherwise.

This also appears to be the opinion of the Apostle to the Romans 9, saying: Has not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honor, another unto dishonor? — which he immediately expounds concerning vessels of wrath fitted unto destruction, and vessels of mercy prepared unto glory. Which place of the Apostle Augustine, Against Julian V, recites more expressly for this opinion, according to another translation, in these words: But if God, willing to show His wrath and to demonstrate His power, brought in much patience the vessels of wrath which have been completed unto perdition, etc.

CHAPTER 24. HE OBJECTS AGAINST THE IMMUTABILITY OF DIVINE KNOWLEDGE, AND ANSWERS.

It is objected, however, against the immutability of divine knowledge in this manner. God knew Christ to be suffering, and now does not know it; therefore His knowledge is changed. Likewise, God did not know this present instant to exist, and now He knows it. Likewise, God foreknew that Christ was to suffer, or would suffer, and now does not foreknow it. And likewise, in Judith 9: "These things after those Thou didst think upon." For these matters, however, it must be understood that God understands [B] complex things differently than we do; for we always understand such things by comparison to the present instant. For every proposition is composed of a noun and a verb—speaking of the verb in the common manner, as Priscian and the other Latin grammarians speak, so that it embraces present, past, and future—not as the Greeks speak, who, on Aristotle's testimony in the first book of De Interpretatione, call only the verb of the present tense a "verb," but the rest "cases of verbs." And as is plain there, every verb co-signifies time. For "he runs" co-signifies present time, namely that the running now is; whereas "he will run" or "he was running," which embraces past or future. And this is manifest, because "he was running" signifies that he completed running prior in time, and "he will run" signifies a future running posterior. And as is clear in Metaphysics V.16: prior in time in the past is more remote from the present now, but in the future, that which is closer to the now itself, with the now itself as principle and first being to which the others are compared. Now we, on account of the weakness of our intellect, cannot [C] distinctly cognize all the particles of time which are always flowing and continuously succeeding one another. Therefore we take the present instant, which is of all time the most actual and most known to us, and we set it down as a sign and a certain fixed term, by comparison to which we understand things present, past, and future. Therefore our propositions which signify with time necessarily signify in this way, namely relatively and comparatively to whatever present instant. And so this proposition "Christ is suffering" continually signifies different things, according as different instants successively become present; and "Christ was suffering" and "Christ will suffer" co-signify in the same way—just as the species in a fixed eye, seeing in a certain position the parts of a flowing river continuously running by, continually signifies a different part of the river, and another; and just as such propositions in the soul of one so seeing—"this part is directly presented to me in this position," and "this part is upper, this lower," or "this part is prior and this posterior"—always represent another and another, in comparison to the various parts presented to the eye at various times. Therefore [D] also this proposition "Christ will suffer" or "is suffering," which once was true, is now false; and this proposition "Christ was suffering," which once was false, is now true. And because our knowledge, belief, and opinion are by means of such propositions, they vary in like manner as those propositions do.

But God, by His most infinite clarity, comprehends all particular things and all particles of time, just as they are, most truly through Himself. For He does not need comparison or relation of past or future to the present instant, after the manner of human infirmity, but understands all things at once and presentially, equally clearly. And this is because He does not know through such mutable verbal propositions, but through His essence and proper will, which always uniformly and invariably represent all things. Just as if a punctual sight were posited resting at the center of a heaven revolving around it, and saw by extramission and actively, not passively—as God sees things—it would always uniformly, without any change in itself, see the individual parts of the heaven continuously revolving, and the same part now in the east, now in the south, now in the west. So also [E] God, all in the same way on His part, intrinsically sees something first as future, second as present, and third as past. And this is because He does not see by suffering anything from the things seen, that is, passively, but rather by acting, that is, actively, as has been shown above. Augustine, in De Trinitate XV.13, suggesting this cause of the diversity between God's knowledge and ours, says thus: "God did not know created things otherwise than as things to be created; for nothing accrued to His wisdom from them. Far different from this knowledge is our knowledge, because in the marvelous simplicity of that nature, knowing is not one thing and being another, but what it is to know, this is to be. But our knowledge is in many things, and on that account is both losable and receivable, because for us to be is not the same as to know."

Therefore the essence of God, or His will (which is the same), just as it first showed to the divine intellect that Christ was to suffer, in the same way afterward shows Him that Christ is suffering, and now shows that Christ has suffered. And so for God to know these three—or rather this one thing triply named—is to know the same thing and in the same way [A] altogether; just as if we had some one proposition uniformly signifying naturally or by imposition, as God's essence or will signifies to itself, first that Christ was to suffer, then that He is suffering, and finally that He has suffered, and we always had one knowledge conformed to that proposition, then in the same way, without any change in our knowledge, we would know the same thing as future, present, and past.

When, therefore, in the first place it is assumed: "God knew Christ to be suffering, and now He does not know it"—the first must be distinguished according to composition and division, or because it can speak de dicto or de re dicti. In the composite sense, however, and de dicto, it seems further to be distinguished, since the proposition, complex, or dictum can be taken either for a proposition, complex, or dictum outside the divine mind, or in it itself, insofar as a complex can there be assigned in a likeness-fashion, and a complex knowledge, as Chapter 18 was suggesting. In the sense of composition, therefore, and de dicto, outside the divine mind it is true: for God knew such a proposition, "Christ is suffering," namely in the time of the Passion. And if it is argued in this sense, [B] "God knew that proposition, and now does not know it; therefore God, or at least His knowledge, is changed," it must be said that this does not follow. Rather, this is on account of the change of the proposition from a true signification into a false one, and from truth to falsity—just as it does not follow regarding a fixed eye gazing in the same position continuously at the succeeding parts of the river, that it itself is changed, because previously it saw some part which it does not now see. Rather, it suffices that that part be changed. Just as also it does not follow, "God previously was Lord of the Flood, and now is not, therefore God is changed," but perhaps the Flood itself is changed; and as in pure creatures it does not follow in such relative things.

And if it is still argued, at least it follows that God knows fewer things than He knew, it must be said this does not follow, because just as previously this was known and now is unknown, so its contradictory was previously unknown and now is known. Still perhaps the sophistical caviller will press: Suppose, he will say, that its contradictory does not exist nor any such proposition is true—then the compensation of this for that ceases; therefore He will know fewer things than before. Likewise, of any contradiction one part is better, more worthy, and more noble, as is clear from earlier matters, [C] and knowledge of better, more worthy, and more noble things is better, more worthy, and more noble, as is clear through the Philosopher in De Anima I.1, Metaphysics I in the prologue, Metaphysics VI.3, and through Averroes there, and on De Caelo II commentary 60. Therefore the whole of divine knowledge is more perfect at this time than at that.

To the first of these it must be said that it is quite possible for Him to know fewer extrinsic complex things to exist in being than before, but not intrinsic ones in knowable being. Indeed, it is possible that He know no true complex—nor even an extrinsic incomplex—to exist in being, because it is possible that all things be destroyed, just as He did not know before the world existed, when none of those things existed; nor would He, were it so, have less knowledge then than before. For He does not know through such created truths, but only through truths intrinsic to Himself and eternal, as the preceding chapters have taught; and those truths always remain altogether equal in every way, in no way changed.

But still perhaps he will reply and say: let A be such a proposition, or quasi-proposition (speaking by likeness) in the divine mind, "Christ is suffering," and B its contradictory; then A previously was [D] true and now is false, and conversely with B; therefore those truths intrinsic to God are changed, and therefore God Himself is necessarily changed.

It must be said that A does not signify like that created proposition "Christ is suffering," because then it would continually signify or co-signify diversely, or different things according to the diversity of the instant or time in which it would be, as has been shown above; but it always immobily co-signifies altogether the same time or instant. Therefore, just as in the time of the Passion it presentially signified that Christ was then suffering, so now it signifies in altogether the same way that Christ then had been suffering—equivalently to these two propositions of ours: "Christ is now suffering," which was true in the time of the Passion, and "Christ was then suffering," which is true in the present.

But still he will not cease to chatter on, but will say: A is now true, and B likewise; for it is true that Christ is not suffering; therefore contradictories are simultaneously true. But here it must be said that as many instants as there are in the whole of time, so many imaginarily diverse affirmative and negative propositions corresponding to those instants does God have concerning anything—[E] similar to these: "Christ is suffering in this instant," "Christ is suffering in that instant," and so on for the rest. For God understands all intelligible propositions, true or false. And because, according to the Philosopher in Sophistical Refutations I, contradiction is the opposition of one and the same not only in name, but in thing and name, according to the same and toward the same, similarly, and in the same time; if A and B are contradictories, they must refer to the same time. Therefore A in the divine mind affirms for the instant or time of the Passion; so it is necessary that B deny for the same, and then B is false. But if there be taken some other proposition like B, which denies that Christ is suffering for some instant or time, say for the present, that is true—let it be C—but C does not contradict A, because they do not affirm [A] and deny for the same instant or time, just as these do not contradict: "Christ was then suffering" and "Christ is not now suffering"; nor are C and B convertible, because they deny for different instants or times, as these: "Christ is not suffering now" and "Christ was not suffering then."

By these things the response is plain, if the first is taken in the sense of composition, and de dicto outside the divine mind. This, however, I take to be the meaning of those who say that God is an infinite ocean, absorbing every contradiction, and that in the divine eternity all truths—future, present, and past—are simultaneously true. Some try to argue against them, because then contradictories would be simultaneously true, and the same proposition simultaneously true and false. But these conclude wrongly, because God does not know anything through created affirmative and negative propositions, which necessarily contradict, since whenever they exist, they exist simultaneously in the same instant, and they affirm and deny for that instant, and each of such propositions alternates successively from truth to falsity, or conversely. But whatever God knows complexly, He knows through propositions uncreated from the beginning, which, although in a certain respect they may seem to contradict, [B] because in the manner of contradictories they affirm and deny the same of the same; nevertheless do not simply contradict, because they do not so affirm or deny for the same time or instant, nor does any of these ever after truth put on falsity, because the conjoining of the extremes in the divine mind is not changeable according to the changeability of time or instant, but always stably conjoins for the same, as has been shown above.

By these same things the response to the second argument set forth above is plain, because every part of an intrinsic contradiction which God has once known, He will always stably know. But if one speaks of a part of an extrinsic contradiction, by such a nature the knowledge of God is neither perfected nor imperfect, just as it is caused by no such thing, just as also not by posterior known things, as the preceding chapters have taught.

By these things the response is plain concerning this: "God knew Christ to be suffering," if it be taken in the composite sense and de dicto. But if it be taken in the divided sense, and de re dicti, it would seem perhaps that further distinction is required, like this: "the labouring man was being healed"—because pati (to suffer) can supposit or appose for "to suffer now" or "to suffer previously." In the first way it is not true, for God never knew Christ now to suffer. In the second way [C] it is true; for God knew Christ to suffer previously, namely in the time of the Passion. If, then, it be argued in this sense: "God knew Christ to suffer, and now does not know Christ to suffer; therefore God knew something which He now does not know"—there is a manifest equivocation. For in the major, to suffer is taken for "to suffer previously"; but in the minor, for "to suffer now"; for in the second proposition, all the verbs are of present tense, not amplifying to past or future. But if the minor is taken concordantly with the major, really and not vocally, it is necessary to say thus: "God does not know Christ to have suffered"—and the discourse will be one which sins in matter, not in form. For this minor will be false, since it is altogether the same in reality, that God previously knew Christ then to suffer, and that God now knows Christ then to have suffered.

By these things also, as I judge, can be had the right solution of that ancient sophism of Oxford: "God knows whatever He has known." The second argument also can be solved by the same. The third capital argument concerning foreknowledge can be solved by similar logic; [D] and this seems to be the logic of Peter Lombard in the first book of his Sentences, distinction 44, last chapter, and distinctions 41 and 6, and of Algazel in Metaphysics III, sentence 6. The saying of Judith in the third argument can be understood concerning the order of the effects of divine thought, not concerning an order of thoughts in God.

CHAPTER 25. HE OBJECTS AGAINST THE IMMUTABILITY OF THE DIVINE WILL, AND RESOLVES IT.

By the same reasonings someone can also impugn the immutability of [E] the divine will, and by the same defences it can be defended. It can also be argued by other special reasons against it thus: God created the whole rational nature for beatitude, and willed then that the whole be made blessed, and now does not will it—rather, He wills the contrary, namely, that a great part of it sustain everlasting misery. Likewise, when Judas was in charity and grace, God willed him to be saved; for these alone, according to Augustine in De Trinitate XV.18, divide between the sons of the eternal kingdom and of eternal perdition, and grace makes one pleasing to God. But now He wills him to be damned. And so universally concerning the just who will fall and the unjust who will rise and finally remain. Likewise, God, offended by sinners and turned away, by prayers and other merits is converted and placated; and conversely concerning the just who sin. Otherwise prayers would seem vain and useless, and sins [A] would be left unpunished. And this seems to be the general faith of the Church, and the content of the Old Testament and the New. Whence Jeremiah 18 says: "I will suddenly speak against a nation and against a kingdom, that I may root out and destroy and waste it. If that nation shall do penance from its evil which I have spoken against it; I also will repent of the evil that I thought to do to it. As I will suddenly speak of a nation and of a kingdom, that I may build up and plant it; if it shall do evil in My sight, that it hear not My voice, I will repent of the good which I have spoken to do unto it." Likewise,

Ezekiel 33: "If I shall say to him, Living he shall live, and trusting in his justice he commit iniquity, all his justices shall be delivered to oblivion, and in his iniquity which he hath wrought, in it shall he die. But if I shall say to the wicked, Thou shalt die the death, and he do penance from his sin, living he shall live, and shall not die." Likewise, Jonah 3: "Who knoweth if God will turn and forgive, and will turn from the fierceness of His wrath, and we shall not perish? And God saw their works, that they were turned from their evil way, and He had mercy with regard to the evil which He had said that He would do to them, and He did not [B] do it." Likewise, Zechariah 1: "Turn ye to Me, and I will turn to you, saith the Lord."

Likewise, Jerome says in his exposition of Amos the Prophet, and is cited in the Canon, De poenitentia, distinction 1, "Si agamus": "If we should do penance, God Himself will repent of His sentence." And again: "He promises prosperous things if we do penance; but if we are dissolved by negligence, He also will repent of His pledge, and will change His promises." The same on Daniel 4, and is cited in the Canon as before: "Wherefore, redeem thy sins by alms, and thy iniquities by mercies to the poor, perhaps God will forgive thy offences." But how, if Daniel foretold a sentence which cannot be changed, does he exhort, namely Nabuchodonosor himself, to alms to the poor and mercy, that the sentence of God might be changed? And he answers, saying that it is easily resolved by the example of King Hezekiah, whom Isaiah said was to die, and of the Ninevites, to whom it had been said: "Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be destroyed"—and yet from the prayers of Hezekiah and Nineveh the sentence of God was changed. Again, to one acting well, He asserts He promises [C] indulgence; otherwise, also (and reverently God speaks of it), He says He threatens evils against a nation, but if it shall do good, He asserts that the mercies of clemency are changed in turn, and promises indulgence; and if it does evil, He says He changes His sentence—not concerning the men, but concerning the works, which are changed. For God is not angry with men, but with vices, which when they have not been in a man, He never punishes that which is changed. Indeed, the whole New Testament—what else does it sound or teach, except mercy of God and friendship in the present and glory in the future for the penitent and converted, and the contraries of these for the impenitent and turned away, which do not happen without a change of the divine will?

Moreover, it is read often of God that He repented of some good and of some evil. How, then, is He not of mutable will? And to what end would the truthful God so often excite us to prayer and supplications, saying: "Ask and ye shall receive, seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be opened to you," and "Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in My name, He will give you," and "We must always pray and not faint," with many similar things—unless prayers of this sort would bend [D] the divine will, and obtain something which He had not previously disposed for us? For if from the beginning He immutably willed all things to befall all, since according to chapter 10 His will is efficacious and unfrustrable in every way, and without prayers no less would whatever was disposed befall whomever it concerned—then all prayers, all litanies also, by which we ask the saints to pray for us, would seem vain and superfluous.

Likewise, God is not of less power than a potter; but a potter can have diverse and contrary wills succeeding one another; therefore God also can do this. And this seems to be the argument of the Lord in Jeremiah 18, saying to Jeremiah: "Arise, and go down into the potter's house, and there thou shalt hear My words. And I went down into the potter's house, and behold, he was doing a work on the wheel. And the vessel was broken which he was making with his hands of clay; and he turned and made it another vessel, as it had pleased his eyes to make it. Then the word of the Lord came to me, saying: Cannot I do with you, O house of Israel, as this potter? Behold as clay is in the hand of the potter, so are you in My hand, O house of Israel. I will suddenly speak..." etc., as cited above.

Likewise, God can do, and often does, many new effects [E] immediately by Himself, and from an old will a new action cannot proceed immediately, as the Philosopher says in Physics VIII, and Averroes likewise in commentary 8.15, and others; therefore this is by a new will. Therefore the divine will is changed.

To the first of these the answer is plain by what was had concerning the corollary of the twenty-third chapter. Nevertheless, for the understanding of the saints, it can be said that God so created rational nature that the whole was capable of beatitude, and the whole would have attained beatitude, had it not freely sinned, and so rendered itself unworthy of beatitude.

For the second argument it must be known that charitas (charity) is taken in two ways in Scripture according to the present matter, namely for uncreated and created charity. Uncreated charity is also taken in two ways, namely commonly and essentially, and so it belongs to the whole Trinity, and to any of the Persons; and properly and personally, and so it is appropriated to the Holy Spirit alone; and it is taken also properly for the divine will. [A] As is clear through Augustine in De Trinitate XV.19 and XV.20, and many other places. But created charity is the effect of this uncreated charity in the hearts of the faithful, by which we lovingly love God and neighbour. Whence the Apostle, Romans 5: "The charity of God is poured forth in our hearts by the Holy Spirit." And so it is one Theological virtue—nay, according to the same Apostle in 1 Corinthians 13, the greatest of the three Theological virtues, which appears sufficiently by the nearly concordant judgment of all the Doctors. Otherwise, however, charity is taken less to the present matter, for natural, moral, or passional charity, by which someone has something dear to him from nature, or from moral virtue, or from passion. Whence 2 Maccabees 14: "But Alcimus, seeing the charity of Nicanor and Judas to one another," etc.; and according to the Philosopher in Metaphysics V, almost throughout, and in many other places. And as is clear also from chapter 2: everything which is said of diverse things is said of some one of them first, by whose participation and varied attribution to it the others are designated in their ways. So charity is first said of essential uncreated charity, from which, as from an original spring, the others, like [B] streams, are derived in some manner.

Grace also can similarly be taken, as it seems. For there is uncreated grace and created grace; or grace gracifying, that is, freely-giving, and grace freely given. Uncreated and gracifying grace is the divine will, not on account of any preceding merit, nor on account of any retribution or proper utility following, but freely willing eternally good to someone, and giving it to him in time. But created grace, or grace freely given, is the effect of this uncreated grace. The second member of this distinction is sufficiently known to all, but the first is not so known to all; but it can be made known from that of the Apostle to the Ephesians 1: "Blessed be God the Father, who hath predestinated us unto the adoption of children, according to the purpose of His will, unto the praise of the glory of His grace, in which He hath gracified us in His beloved Son, in whom we have redemption through His blood, the remission of sins according to the riches of His grace." Behold that the will of God is gracifying grace, because freely He wills good to someone; and therefore the Gloss says: "Grace predestined us, that is, grace alone fore-elected, that is, by gratuitous will." There is also [C] grace freely giving good, because redemption and remission of sins, where likewise the effect of freely-giving grace is plain. Therefore Augustine says in Super Genesim ad litteram IX.26 that in the will of God is grace through which sinners are made saved; and Peter Lombard sets this distinction plainly in Sentences II, distinction 27.5.

Each of these graces can be understood generally and specially. For it can be said grace freely-willing and giving generally any good, or specially willing to someone the good of justice and eternal glory, and giving him some special virtue by which he can attain such good; and correspondingly throughout it is called grace freely given. This uncreated grace, gracifying or freely-giving, which is the divine will, can also be taken in two ways, like charity: commonly and essentially, and so it belongs to the whole Trinity and to any of the Persons; and specially and personally, and so it is appropriated to the Holy Spirit, as is clear through Augustine in De Trinitate XV.20. Therefore Scripture most frequently attributes grace to the Holy Spirit, as in some special way and proper [D] author. Otherwise, grace is taken less to the present matter for that which is referred back to God for a gracious benefit, as we say: "Let us give thanks to the Lord our God." All these graces also are taken similarly, in a certain imitation, in creatures: for a created will, willing and giving freely good to some creature, can be called grace gracifying, and grace freely giving; and the good given can be called grace freely given. Also that which the recipient renders to the giver for such a benefit is called grace. But among all these graces, grace is first said of essential uncreated grace, which, most graciously, distils and derives all other graces—just as concerning most dear charity it was said above. The will of God also is taken in many ways, namely properly for His essential will, which is called by the Apostle in Romans 12 "well-pleasing and perfect"; but improperly and figuratively for its effect, or for its sign—as is clear through Augustine in De Civitate Dei XXII.2, and through Hugh in De Sacramentis I, part 4, and through Peter Lombard in Sentences I, distinction 45. And it is a certain rhetorical colour which Cicero in his last New Rhetoric calls "denomination." [E]

When, therefore, it is taken in the argument: "When Judas was in charity and grace, God willed him to be saved"—speaking of charity and grace uncreated specially, namely insofar as God has someone dear to Himself and gracifies him unto eternal life—it is not true; because Judas never was in such charity or grace, since God never had him pleasing or dear unto eternal life. But if one speaks of created charity and grace, and of the proper and essential will of God, it is not true, because God never so willed Judas to be saved. And when it is proved that charity alone divides between the sons of the kingdom and of perdition—speaking of created charity, it is not true. For many sinners who will rise and finally remain do not have this; many also of the just who will fall and so finally remain do have it. But uncreated charity alone, which has these dear unto the kingdom, and these not, divides between the sons of the kingdom and of perdition, just as in the beginning it divided light from darkness. And it is of that charity that Augustine speaks there, as is clear in the chapter cited, and in the following chapter at length. And that this charity, [A] namely the dear will of God, immutably and infallibly divides these from those, will easily appear through chapters 20, 21, 22, and 10. For this charity is the Holy Spirit, dividing to each as He wills, 1 Corinthians 12; and the Apostle senses this more expressly in the same chapter, when he asks: "Who distinguisheth thee?"—as if he wished to ask, who distinguishes thee, the elect, from the reprobate?—and to insinuate that God alone so distinguishes thee. And thus Augustine expounds this authority in many places, of which one is De Correptione et gratia, cited in the Gloss, when he says: "Who distinguisheth thee from the mass of perdition? None but God; He alone separates thee from the lost. But because man, puffed up, could respond either by voice or by thought, and say: My faith and my justice and my prayer distinguish me—the Apostle meets him, saying: 'What hast thou which thou hast not received?'" Therefore this question follows immediately upon another question. Concerning grace also it must be said similarly throughout, that and how it makes or does not make any one pleasing to God.

But if one speak of the will of sign or of the effect of the divine will, when it is premised: "When Judas was in charity, [B] God willed him to be saved," it is true. And when it is argued further: "Now He does not will him to be saved; therefore the will of God is changed," speaking uniformly, it concludes well, namely, that the effects and signs of the divine will are changed. Nor is this against chapter 23, since that proves the immutability of the essential and intrinsic, well-pleasing and perfect, divine will and volition. Otherwise it can be said, namely, that Judas, when he was in charity and grace, was dear and pleasing to God according to the present justice then by which he was good, and so was written in the Book of Life, and so God willed him to be saved—not, however, altogether absolutely. And this is plain through blessed Ambrose on Romans 9: "That He might show the riches of His glory in the vessels of mercy which He hath prepared unto glory," speaking thus: "There are some to whom grace is given for use, as to Saul, Judas, and to those disciples to whom the Lord said, 'Your names are written in heaven,' and afterward they went backward. But this the Lord said of them on account of the justice which they served, as if He should say, 'You are now worthy of eternal life,' because they were good. But according to foreknowledge they were in the number [C] of the wicked." And this authority is cited in the Gloss more diffusely; and on account of this authority Peter Lombard maintains it in Sentences III, distinction 21.1. A similar distinction concerning the sons of God Augustine makes in De Correptione et gratia 28 and 29, teaching that some are sons of God according to predestination and foreknowledge, some according to grace temporally received; and again under other words: some are sons of God to God, but some to us; that is, some according to divine judgment, some according to human. And above, chapter 24, he makes a similar distinction concerning the elect; and below, chapter 73, concerning the son of peace. These distinctions of Augustine, Gratian recites diffusely in De poenitentia, distinction 4, "Si ex bono."

For the third argument it must be known that the offence of God and His placation, anger or love, sentence of good or evil, and the like, can be taken in two ways: namely, for the will or the divine volition so affected, or for such effects or signs of it—as has just now been said concerning His will. Whence Augustine in II Ad Simplicianum 20, teaching how human passions can be attributed to God, namely by separating the unworthy from the [D] worthy, says thus: "From the anger of man I subtract the turbulent motion, that the vigour of vindication may remain, and so in some way I rise to a notion of that which is called the anger of God. Likewise of mercy: if you take away compassion with him whom you pity, of misery shared, and there remain the tranquil goodness of helping and of liberating from misery, some kind of cognition of divine mercy is insinuated. Let us not also repudiate and spurn the zeal of God when we find it written; but let us take away from human zeal the pale wasting of grief and the morbid perturbation of soul, and let there remain only that judgment by which corruption of chastity is not allowed to be unpunished, and we rise to begin in some way to grasp the zeal of God. Therefore when we read also God saying, 'It repenteth Me,' let us consider what is wont to be in men the work of repenting—undoubtedly there is found a will of changing, but in man it is with grief of soul. For he reprehends in himself that he acted rashly. Let us therefore take away those things which come from human infirmity [E] and ignorance, and there remain only the willing that something not be as it was; and so it can in some way be intimated to our mind by what rule it is to be understood when God is said to repent. For when He is said to repent, He wills that something not be as He had made it to be; yet, when it was thus, it ought thus to have been, and when it is no longer permitted to be thus, now it ought no longer to be thus, by a certain perpetual and tranquil judgment of equity, by which God disposes all changeable things by an unchangeable will." The same on that of Psalm 82, "Thou wilt trouble them with Thy anger," he says: "Let us remember, however, that we ought to understand the anger of God without any turbulent affection. For its right reason of vindication is so spoken of, as if a law were said to be 'angered' when its ministers, moved according to it, exact vindication." That also the anger of God, "manifested," and the like, are sometimes taken for the effects, that is, signs, of the divine will so affected, the preceding shows.

Speaking, therefore, in the first way, the offence of God, or anger, is altogether immutable; [A] in the second way it is frequently changed. And so the divine will is said to be changed not by a change of itself but of others—as is clear through Augustine in De Trinitate V, last chapter, and De Civitate Dei XXII.2, as chapter 23 cited; and in this sense proceed the authorities of the Prophets, and of Jerome, alleged. Many such prophecies also threateningly predict many things, which do not come to pass; for they do not predict these in order that they may come to pass. Whence Jerome in the Gloss on the cited authority of Ezekiel 33: "It does not at once follow that, because the Prophet says it, what he predicts will come to pass; for he does not predict that it may come, but threatens that it may not come. Nor because God speaks is it necessary that what He threatens be done, but in order that he to whom He threatens may repent, and that not be done which is to come, if the words of God be despised." So in such prophecies always there seems to be understood some condition such as this: "unless ye repent of your sins." Whence also in the prologue of the Gloss on the Psalter, a twofold prophecy is set down, namely according to predestination, which it is necessary always to be fulfilled according to the tenor of the words; and according to [B] threat, as "Forty days and Nineveh shall be destroyed," which is not always fulfilled according to the surface of the words, but according to the signification of the tacit understanding. And the like is found in the Gloss on Matthew 1: "Now all this was done that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Prophet saying: Behold a virgin," etc. This also Augustine wishes on Psalm 50, "Thou hast manifested to me the uncertain and hidden things of Thy wisdom," saying: "Under this, the Ninevites repented and merited certain mercy. Therefore Nineveh stood and was not overthrown. But I think that what the Prophet said was fulfilled: 'Look at what Nineveh was, and see that it has been overthrown in evil and built up in good.'" And so Gregory understands it in Moralia XVI.4 on Job 22, "Who were taken away before their time," when he says that God often changes His sentence, never His counsel, that is, the sense of the words, not His eternal disposition. And so the Gloss expounds it on Isaiah 38: "Thus often it happens that the divine sentence is changed, that it is not always fulfilled to the letter."

The objection concerning the repentance of God is resolved by what has been set forth, which also resolves the seventh of this. To the other thing argued concerning prayers and litanies, it is plain through the end [C] of chapter 23. For it is not to be imagined that God previously wills or does not will anything, and is overcome and changed by prayers, after the manner of unstable man; nor that the Saints in heaven, by multiplied prayers, bend the divine will, as men on earth bend the human—as is sufficiently clear from the preceding. And Peter Lombard says in Sentences IV, distinction 45, last chapter: "We pray the Saints to intercede for us, that is, that their merits may suffrage for us." For the Saints do not pray God to do this or that, unless they have seen God so to will, unless perhaps it be something concerning which they do not know the divine will, just as we are ignorant in many things.

But here someone may press thus: If God wills to do something, it seems vain to pray Him to do this; and if He does not will to do something, by no prayers will He do it; therefore all prayers are superfluous. Likewise, then, it would not be necessary to pray generally for all, nor for any neighbour wayfarer; for it is established that wheat does not grow without tares, nor grains without straw; and that the citizens of the city of God and of the city of the devil always run mixed together in the present. Therefore it is established that God does not will all to be saved. If, [D] therefore, His will can by no prayers be changed, whoever prays for all knows himself not to be heard by God; therefore in such a case he prays without hope and vainly, knowingly so.

To the first of these it must be said that it supposes one falsehood, horrendous to any Christian, and which is repugnant to the works and doctrine of Christ; namely, that it is vain to pray to God that He do His will. For Christ, with His most sorrowful Passion imminent, contristate and sad, prayed thus: "My Father, if it be possible, let this chalice pass from Me; nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt," Matthew 26. And below in the same: "My Father, if this chalice may not pass except I drink it, Thy will be done." Who also in Matthew 6 taught us so to pray: "Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven." For although He wills to give us some good, yet He does not will us to be entirely idle, but wills that we, ever diligent and vigilant, obtain these things by prayers and other merits. Hardly, therefore, in my judgment, can any prayer more useful or efficacious in any prosperity or adversity, concerning anything eligible or to be fled, [E] be found, than that man, with his whole heart, with his whole mind, and with all his powers and marrow, in all things and in each, always say to the Lord: "Thy will be done." For thus it shall come to pass that man retain nothing of himself for himself, but subject totally to the divine will both himself and all things concerning himself in any way—wholly willing only the glory and honour of God, in nothing of himself, in greatest and in least—caring not at all, or fearing, but most gladly embracing, if it be needful, for God's sake, the loss of goods, of honour, and of fame, infamy, mockings, persecutions, and any miseries whatsoever, only excepting the displeasure of God Almighty alone. For this, and thus, no one can say without the deepest humility and the highest charity. And if anyone cannot at once and thus say it, let him repent of this, and let him will this, and let him say so however he can, and pray that he may say so freely and perfectly. And still such a prayer is undoubtedly very fruitful.

For the second, it seems to be said that some are simple persons having zeal of [A] God, but not according to knowledge, who do not know that the sons of the kingdom and of perdition are always mixed in the present, or, if any are in some way sons of perdition, they believe they can change the divine will by pious prayers, and obtain that they be made sons of the kingdom; who, praying generally and piously for all, do not sin, since ignorance and pious intention excuse them; nay rather, they merit much in so praying. Whence blessed Augustine in De Civitate Dei XXII.2, having distinguished a twofold will of God, one essential and eternal, and another which God wills and effects in the hearts of the elect, says thus: "According therefore to this will, by which we say God wills that He effects some to will, by whom future things are not known, He wills many things and does them not. For His Saints will many things to be done, inspired by Him with a holy will, and they are not done as they pray for some piously and holily, and what they pray, He does not do—although He Himself by His Holy Spirit has made in them this will of asking. And by this, when according to God Saints will and pray that anyone be saved, we can in that mode of speech say, God wills and does not, that we may say He wills who makes these to will." A like instance is had in 3 Kings 8, that the [B] Lord said to David: "Whereas thou hast thought in thy heart to build a house to My name, thou hast done well in pondering this in thy mind; nevertheless thou shalt not build Me the house"—where the Gloss: "An argument that the will of any act pleases, even if not the act itself." This same is plain through Augustine, Enchiridion 8, and through Anselm in many places, showing that rectitude of will is to will as God wills him to will, not however to will what God wills—which Peter Lombard in Sentences I, distinction last, makes manifest.

But others, knowing or opining the aforesaid, cannot, as it seems, pray absolutely for all that they may be saved. For reason clearly proves this. For who would rationally pray, unless he hoped to be heard? Indeed, when he believed the contrary as constant? For who rationally undertakes any work without hope—nay, with despair of any kind of fruit or end? This is against all reason of agents and nature; for all agents, both natural and voluntary, act for some end, as is clear through the Philosopher in Physics II.49, and as concerns voluntary things, in his moral philosophy almost throughout. Whence the Apostle in 1 Corinthians 9: [C] "He that ploughs ought to plough in hope, and he that thresheth in hope of receiving fruit." And 2 Maccabees 12: "Unless he hoped that those who had fallen would rise again, it would seem superfluous and vain to pray for the dead." Those, therefore, who do not hope all to be saved, but know the contrary, ought not pray absolutely for all that they may be saved. Indeed, if at any time they pray generally for all to be saved, it is necessary that tacitly at least they understand of all the predestined unto life, or hope that their prayer may avail for all if and inasmuch as it shall be pleasing and acceptable in the sight of God; not that by their prayer they wish to extort something from God, as if unwilling. In the first of these ways, the Saviour prayed, saying: "I pray for them; I pray not for the world, but for those whom Thou hast given Me, because they are Thine," John 17. And to this consents the saying of Augustine in De Civitate Dei XXI.24, alleged in chapter 23 above. For if the Church were certain who, still existing in the way, are predestined with the devil to eternal fire, it would not pray for them more than for the devil; otherwise it would be pious to pray by name for that certain (because revealed) son of perdition, Antichrist. Those who [D] now are certain, at least in general, that in the present way and life there are always such, ought not pray for all absolutely, but in one of the ways said.

But here someone may reply that then no one ought to pray for any wayfarer, for he does not know whether he is predestined or finally reprobate. It must be said: he who believes someone is to be saved, or that by his prayers he can be saved, can well pray for him, even if he is to be damned, as was said above concerning all. If he does not know or doubts, he can pray, at least under the tacit condition aforesaid. This tacit condition of divine right, anyone seems to have if he have charity, by which he prefers the divine will in all things to his own will. But absolutely altogether one ought not pray for any wayfarer.

To the other principal argument concerning the potter, the answer is plain through what has been said. For the succession of contrary wills in him is not without impotence and imperfection, since with potency preceding act—which necessarily implies imperfection, as the foregoing makes manifest. But God is of infinite perfection and actuality. Therefore He is not in potency before act to contrary volitions [E] successively. This therefore is not of impotence or imperfection in Him, as the preceding chapters have taught. But the authority of Jeremiah understands that God can change the effects of His speech or thought, as the potter changes the effects of his art, the art always remaining the same and immobile; and such change is possible in the divine will, as has been shown above. Nor does this set down any intrinsic change in the essential will of God, but extrinsic, in the kingdoms and nations changed. As to what is objected concerning that proceeding in Physics VIII—not advancing, but limping—it is evidently rejected through the 34th part of the first corollary of this work.

CHAPTER 26. THAT THE WHOLE UNIVERSE OF THINGS IS GOOD, AND NO THING IS PER SE EVIL.

Here, however, in the midst of things, on behalf of what precedes and follows, it must be shown that the whole universe of all things is good, and that there is in it nothing which is evil. For the opposite of this Empedocles, Pythagoras, Manes, and the Manichaean heretics seemed to say, as the 18th part of the first Corollary teaches.

Everything per se willable and lovable by [B] the good and wise is in some way good, as Philosophers as well as Theologians equally testify. And any part of the world is per se willable and lovable by God, just as it is per se creatable and conservable by Him, as can appear from chapters 2, 3, 6, 8, and 9. Likewise, every truth is good, because right, just, and holy; and every essence is truth, or has truth, since being and the true are convertible, as is clear from the premises of chapters 2 and 11 of this work. Whence also Aristotle, Metaphysics II.4: "Everything is, just as it is, so to truth"; and Metaphysics V, where being is distinguished: "Esse signifies that it is true; not-being, however, that it is not true but false." And the same is recited in the sixth, the fourth, and the same fifth, where the false is distinguished, it is said that "the false is said to be that which is not"; therefore also that which is is said to be true. And Avicenna, Metaphysics VIII.6: "The Necessary is truth; truth is the property of the esse of any thing, which is established for it." Anselm also in his little book De veritate proves that every essence and every action is truth, justice, and rectitude, as is clear [C] in chapters 6, 7, and 8, and almost throughout the little book. And Augustine in Eighty-three Questions 1: "Every soul is a soul because it is a true soul; therefore every soul has from truth that it altogether is. Why therefore not so concerning any other thing whatsoever?" Whence also in Confessions VII.15 he says thus: "All things are true insofar as they are, nor is anything falsity, except when it is thought to be that which it is not."

Likewise, God, because He is supremely being, is supremely good and perfect, since both Philosophers and Theologians, proving God to exist, prove one first being; and from this they show that this is most being and most perfect and best. Therefore also all other beings, inasmuch as they participate in His being, so proportionally are they naturally good and perfect. And this Aristotle suggests obscurely in De Caelo I.100, when he says: "The end of the whole heaven, and all time containing infinity, and the perfection of the eternal, takes its denomination from always being, immortal and divine; whence also it is communicated to others, to these more clearly, but to these more obscurely, to be and to live." Augustine also in De doctrina Christiana I, second to last, says the same clearly enough: "Because God is good, we are; [D] and inasmuch as we are, we are good; and inasmuch as we are evil, so much the less we are. He supremely and primarily is, who is altogether unchangeable, and who could most fully say: 'I am who am.' Other things, except from Him, cannot be; and so far are good as they have received that they be."

Likewise, if anything were per se evil, that would be contrary per se to the good; that, then, or at least the first in the genus of evils, would be equal to the first in the genus of goods, since contraries, as is established, are placed under the same genus and are most distant. Therefore, as Aristotle says in De Caelo I.44: "Of contraries, if one be determinate, the other will also be determinate." Where Averroes in the commentary proves this saying: "This is manifest from the description of contraries, which are at the limit of distance, and since each of them is most distant, it is necessary that it be equally in contrariety, namely that neither be stronger than the other; but if we suppose one of them finite and the other infinite, then they will not be contrary to each other equally, because the form of contrariety which is in one of them will not be equal to the form of contrariety [E] of the other." And he adds: "And it is manifest per se that they are in the same degree of contrariety; and if not, they will not be at the limit of distance. For it would be possible to add upon the lesser, that it might be more contrary"—which he proves to be false in three ways. First, because then the same would have multiple contraries, namely the highest. Second, because then that which was placed at the maximum distance, would not be so, which is contrary to the position. Third, because then there would not be the same proportion of one of the contraries to the other, and conversely, the opposite of which he asserts to be known. If, therefore, these things be so, evil is infinite and equally strong with God omnipotent, with whom no word will be impossible. He could therefore impede and frustrate the good God from every good work of His, and so He would not be omnipotent, with other infinite absurdities.

This same Augustine proves in Eighty-three Questions 6 in this manner: "Everything that is, is either corporeal or incorporeal. Corporeal is contained by sensible species, incorporeal by intelligible. Everything therefore that is, is not without some species; but where any species is, necessarily [A] some mode is; and mode is something of good. Therefore the highest evil has no mode, for it lacks all good. Therefore it is not, because it is contained by no species; and the whole name 'evil' has been found from the privation of species."

Likewise, if there be anything per se evil, that is contrary to the highest good, the Lord God good—against Aristotle in Metaphysics XII, last chapter, writing thus: "There is nothing contrary to the first." And Augustine in De Civitate Dei XII.2: "To that nature which supremely is, no nature is contrary, except that which is not. For to that which is, not-being is contrary; and on this account to God and to the supernal essence, and to the Author of all whatsoever essences, no essence is contrary."

Further, that which naturally appetites and loves the good, is in some way good. For if it were per se and perfectly evil, it would be per se and perfectly contrary to the good. But none of such contraries naturally appetites and loves the other, but rather hates and flees it. But anything naturally appetites the good. For in Ethics I.1 it is said that "well have they pronounced the good to be that which all things appetite." And in De Anima II.34: "All things appetite the divine and immortal." Which [B] reason also makes manifest. For everything having a natural end naturally appetites it; but God is the ultimate end of all beings, as could be shown from the second Supposition, and is proved expressly in Metaphysics XII and elsewhere in many places in the philosophy of Aristotle, and similarly of Avicenna. Whence Proverbs 16: "The Lord hath made all things for Himself"; and Apocalypse 1: "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end." Avicenna indeed testifies all this concerning the common appetite of the good clearly in Metaphysics VIII.6, saying: "The Necessary Being per se is pure goodness, and goodness is desired absolutely by whatever is. But that which everything desires is to be, and to be perfect in being inasmuch as it is being; and being is pure goodness and pure perfection. And altogether goodness is that which everything desires according to its measure, since by it its being is perfected."

Likewise, anything is either an operation, or has in some way some natural operation. But every operation, and therefore the operating cause, in some way appetites the good. For according to Aristotle in Ethics I.1: "Every art and every doctrine, similarly also action and election, seems to appetite some good. Therefore [C] well have they pronounced the good to be that which all things appetite." And in Politics I.1: "For the sake of that which seems good, all do all things." And Augustine on Psalm 32, "Blessed is the nation whose Lord is its God," after great progress concludes: "The causes of repelling misery, and the causes of acquiring beatitude, make all men do whatever good or evil they do." Boethius also in De Consolatione Philosophiae III, prose 2, says thus: "Every care of mortals, which the labour of multiplied studies exercises, proceeds indeed by a different path, but tends nevertheless to attain one end of beatitude." And in De Caelo II.34: "Nature always does, of contingent things, that which is best." And in De Generatione II, second to last: "In all things, we say, nature ever desires what is better."

This same can be shown otherwise thus: every agent appetites some proper end, as is plain in Physics II diffusely; and Ethics I.1 and Metaphysics IX.16, and elsewhere in many places. But the end always has the ratio of the good, as is clear in Physics II.23, where it is said: "Not utterly is the last the end, but the best." And the like is had below, in the same II.31: [D] it is said, "The end is the most powerful cause, and is always, or seems, good"; and Metaphysics II.8: "Those who take away the end take away the nature of the good"; and Metaphysics III.3, and Physics II.74, and elsewhere very often the same sentence is found. Again to the same: every agent naturally desires the ultimate common end of any action, which without doubt is supremely good, and on account of this is the end of any entity and making. For the Philosopher in Metaphysics III.3 says: "That which is good secundum se and on account of its nature is the end, so that for the sake of it the rest both come to be and are."

Likewise, as the second Supposition wills, and is shown in philosophy in many places, that there is no infinite process in ends, it is necessary that there be one first and last end, and a common one of the whole genus of ends, and the final cause of all other ends, as is in any other genus, as is demonstrated in Metaphysics II and X of Aristotle. But no such end this side of God can be assigned. And this is what the Philosopher attests by many authorities. For he says in Metaphysics XII.37: "But that which is for-the-sake-of-which—[E] that is, the final cause—the definition shows in immobile things"—that is, the definition of the final cause which he immediately adds, saying: "For there is for something a 'for-the-sake-of-which,' of which this is, but that is not. But it moves as the beloved; and what is moved"—namely, the first thing moved by it—"moves the others." Where Averroes, declaring the definition of ends, says thus: "Of perfections on account of which the perfectible is moved, some are qualities, as health; some are substances extrinsic to the thing which is moved toward them, that it may be assimilated to them—as are found all the actions of servants, since they are toward the intention of their Lord; therefore they are said to be on account of the Lord. And similarly beings have this with the first principle. But this first mover moves the first moved, as the first beloved [moves] the first lover. For the first heaven is moved by this mover according to desire, that it may be assimilated to him according to its power, just as a lover is moved that he may be assimilated to his beloved. [A] Other heavenly bodies are moved according to desire toward the motion of the first body, and therefore they have fully a double motion. But those which are under these are moved by means of these motions. Generation and corruption are made by two opposed motions; but continuation by one eternal motion."

And on the same passage of the text above: "What is good, and on account of itself eligible, in the same coordination, and ever best and probable as the first—as the text says, which the Commentator expounds: But that which is chosen on account of itself in the universe of things chosen, is greatly noble when it is first acquired." Where Averroes: "That which is loved and desired on account of itself among these abstracted principles, is that which is at the limit of nobility, and of simplicity, and of unity; and toward it everything is moved with a swifter and greater motion than the proper motions of each of them. For it is per se eligible, and beloved by all; and such is perfect at the end, and that is acquired on account of itself, and all things which are acquired, are acquired on account of it." [B] Whence the Philosopher in De Caelo et Mundo II.63: "What is best-having needs nothing of action, for it is itself the for-the-sake-of-which, namely the end. But action is always in two, when both that for-the-sake-of-which there is and that which is for the sake of this. Of other animals, however, fewer; of plants something small and one perhaps. For either there is some one thing whereby it would be associated, just as also it has, or also many; but all are preludes to the best." As the text which the Commentator expounds: "The actions of man are manifold, and are not on account of themselves but on account of another, since he is not of perfect nobility. But things of perfect nobility do not need an operation by which they may be noble, for it is itself that on account of which the operation comes about; and every action and perfection of operation will be by that which makes the operation on account of something, and on account of that on account of which is the operation of the doer—namely, on account of that noble and perfect end."

And in De Anima II.34: "An animal makes an animal, and a plant a plant, insofar as they participate of the always divine and immortal according to what they can. For all things appetite that, and on account of it act all things which they act according to nature." Boethius in De Consolatione Philosophiae III, prose 11, shows [C] diffusely that any of beings appetites its proper and common end and good—not the common on account of the proper, but conversely. He says, therefore, that "that to which all things hasten is the highest of all goods, and that is the end of all things which is desired by all; which because we have collected to be good, it is necessary we confess the end of all things to be good." And below, in prose 12: "Since God is rightly believed to govern all things by the rudder of goodness, and the same all things, as I have taught, hasten by natural intention to the good; whence it cannot be doubted but that they are governed willingly, and turn themselves of their own accord, agreeing and tempered to the disposer's nod, like things suitable to their ruler. So, I say, it is necessary. There is nothing therefore which, preserving its nature, attempts to go contrary to God; nothing, I say, nor is there anything which can or wills to resist this highest good." Who also in De Hebdomadibus maintains: "The common opinion of the doctors holds that everything that is tends to the good; everything tends to the like; therefore those things which tend to the good, themselves are good."

Likewise, it could be confirmed through Augustine, who maintains in many places that all men necessarily will [D] beatitude, and on account of it they will and act universally whatever they will or act, as was alleged above. Therefore it cannot be said that all these sayings of the authors are understood of natural, not voluntary actions. For some authorities speak expressly of angels and men, and the same reason is on this side and that. Otherwise also, more noble beings, namely voluntary, and more noble actions, and of more noble potency—say voluntary—would be more negligently disposed, and worse, although nevertheless according to the Philosopher in De Caelo et Mundo II.50: "Nature does not care for vile things, despising precious ones."

Whence it seems to follow as something marvellous, namely that every action of any creature is to enjoy or to use, and none to abuse. But to the mind of the Saints this does not follow, because although any action of the creature in some way is referred to God, yet not precisely with the due circumstances, as is required.

Likewise, peace is so great a good that no one doubts but it is good, nor takes counsel concerning it; but all desire it on account of itself as an end. Whence the Philosopher in Ethics III.8: "We take counsel not concerning ends, [E] but concerning those things which are toward ends. For the Politician does not take counsel whether he should make peace, nor does any of the others concerning the end, but, having posited some end, they intend in what manner and by what means it shall be."

Likewise, all beings naturally desire a certain peace, namely natural concord and due harmony, both intrinsic and extrinsic everywhere—as is clear in simples and in mixed things, similar and contrary throughout, but in men most of all. For the peaceful want peace, and similarly the warlike. For as the Philosopher says in Ethics X.11: "We make war that we may lead in peace; for no one chooses to make war for the sake of making war, nor to prepare war; for he would seem altogether a violent killer, who would make enemies of friends, that fights and killings might come about." Therefore also, by the testimony of King Artaxerxes the great: "Peace is desired by all mortals." Whence also Augustine in De Civitate Dei XV.11: "Peace is so great a good, that nothing is wont to be heard with greater pleasure, nothing more desirably to be coveted, nothing better to be found." And peace all good and [A] evil, in every operation, good or evil, desire and love; nor by any means can they not love peace. This whole, however, Augustine in De Civitate Dei XIX.12 and 13 plainly says and proves.

Further, natural order is good, and all things have natural order; therefore all things have good. This reason is almost wholly clear in Metaphysics XIII.2, where Aristotle, distinguishing concerning the good and refuting Aristippus and other such Sophists who set down that there is no good in mathematical (as is recited in Metaphysics III.3), shows that there is good in mathematical, saying thus: "Since the good and the best, the one indeed is always in operation, but the good also in immobile things—those who say that the mathematical sciences say nothing concerning the good or the best, will lie. For they speak and demonstrate most. But of the good, the chief species are order, commensuration, and the determinate—which the mathematical sciences most show. And since these are seen to be cause of many things—I mean order and the determinate." The same is plain in De Caelo et Mundo III.24, where it is said: "The disordered is nothing other than [B] beyond nature; for order is the proper nature of sensibles."

Likewise, that is good which gives to each what is its own; but this order does. For Augustine in De Civitate Dei XIX.13 defines order thus: "Order is the disposition of equal and unequal things assigning to each its place"—which agrees sufficiently with the preceding saying of Aristotle. Therefore in De Civitate Dei XV.22 he defines virtue briefly thus: that it is "the order of love."

Likewise, unless order were a great good, it would not be so diligently noted in Sacred Letters. In the rational of Judgment four orders of stones had to be set, and the names of the sons of Israel according to the order of their nativity, and lamps to be placed in order. The Queen of Sheba, also, seeing the order of the ministers of Solomon, said: "Blessed are thy servants." The order of Melchizedek, similarly, is not in the least commended; and almost the whole law and the prophets are sprinkled in various places with such things. The Apostle also admonishes the Corinthians that all things may be done in them according to order and decently. And writing to the Colossians, the Apostle says he rejoices seeing their order.

That all things have some natural order is shown by this, because [C] all things have one natural end, as has just been shown; and because all things essentially and naturally are ordered toward one another, being equally more or less. Aristotle also in Metaphysics XII, last chapter, inquires in what consists the natural good and best of the universe, namely whether in some separate good, or in order; and answering, he shows that in both, just as the good of an army consists in order and in the leader; and he sets down there a twofold natural order of all beings, namely toward one another, and toward the first; and Averroes shows this beautifully there in commentary 52. And in Metaphysics I, chapter 9, Aristotle recites the reasoning of the Ancients, compelled, as he says, by this truth to set down—although not sufficiently distinctly—one common final cause of all beings. For they saw that in all beings there is being and well-being in natural order; and that this could not be from some element, nor from chance or fortune; therefore they concluded one general principle of the whole goodness to be. Therefore Anaxagoras said that some intellect is in animals, and in nature the cause of the earth and the world, and [D] of the whole order; and the cause of so saying he received from Hermotimus of Clazomenae, as is recited immediately following in chapter 10; and this opinion the Philosopher approves. Therefore it seems that this is the general opinion of the Philosophers. And Boethius says in De Consolatione Philosophiae IV, prose 6: "Order indeed embraces all, lest in the kingdom of providence anything be permitted to rashness."

Furthermore, Aristotle in De Secreto Secretorum I, part 23, says that "the Creator destined all things by His wisdom, with equal weight, and certain number, and order." With which agreeing, the Wise Man in Wisdom 11: "Thou hast disposed all things in measure, and number, and weight"—therefore also in natural order. These three also import a great good, as is clear through Augustine on Genesis IV.4, and below in De Libero Arbitrio II.19 and last, De Civitate Dei V.11, De Praedestinatione Sanctorum 4, and elsewhere in many places. Who also in De Civitate Dei XI.15 says: "There is no nature which He has not constituted, from whom is every mode, every species, every order, without which nothing of things can be found or thought." And any of these three is good; therefore any [E] thing existing has some good, and is similarly itself good.

Further, every truly being is truly knowable positively. Because according to the Philosopher in Metaphysics II.4: "Each thing, just as it has to be, so to truth"—therefore to cognition. But evil is not knowable positively and per se, but privatively and by comparison to good, like a privation through its habit. For the Philosopher says in De Anima III.25 that privation, evil, and black are shown and known in some way by their contrary. Where Averroes says that universally all privations are known only through their contraries, namely through the cognition of the habit, and through the cognition of the defect of the habit; and this he intended through blackness, the privation of whiteness. And in Metaphysics XII.37 the Philosopher suggests this same: "The intelligible," [A] he says, "another coordination, and the first substance of this." Therefore it is established that he speaks of the coordination of good, when he says that this is intelligible per se, suggesting that the contrary coordination, namely of evil, is not intelligible per se, but per accidens. Which, expounding, Averroes alleges from Alexander, that those things which are understood per se are of the Allastochia of the good; but those which are of evil are understood per accidens, namely through the privation of good; and of all the contrary principles of any transmutation, one is as form, and the other as privation. The Allastochia which is as form is understood per se, but that which is as privation is understood, but not per se. For privation is not understood except in respect of the habit, which is form. With these things Augustine in De Civitate Dei XII.7 agrees, saying that to wish to find the causes of the sin of the evil will, and of such defections, is as if someone should wish to see darkness, or hear silence; which both are nevertheless known to us through eyes and ears, not in species, but in privation of species. "Let no one therefore [B] seek from me to know that which I know I do not know, unless perhaps that he may learn not to know that which he must know cannot be known."

Further, if anything were per se evil, this would seem most of all of an evil moral act; but any such is some motion, therefore an act, and the perfection of the moveable or the moved insofar as such, as is clear from Physics III of Aristotle sufficiently diffusely. Likewise to the same: every act is the end, completion, and perfection of the natural potency of which it is the act. For Aristotle says in Metaphysics IX.15: "But the end is the act, and on account of this potency is taken. For animals do not see in order to have sight, but in order to see they have sight." And he there shows this through a long process. Therefore every act is some natural good. And this is the reasoning of Avicenna in Metaphysics IX.8, saying: "Nothing in actions is found to be called evil which is not the perfection of the agent cause; and perhaps it is not evil except in respect of the patient suffering sadness through that action, or in respect of a superior cause which ought to prohibit—just as an injury inflicted by the irascible faculty is the proper perfection of that faculty, and as concerns it such action is good, but is the evil of the injured, or [C] of the rational soul which ought to flee that faculty." The same he shows by another sufficiently fitting example concerning combustion produced by fire, which is the proper perfection of the form of fire, and consequently its good, but is perhaps the evil of what is burned, or of him who kindles the fire.

Likewise, homicide and adultery are not per se evils, nor any external acts, since they are not in children, fools, sleepers, or even in the furious, since they lack the free judgment of the causal will. This is plain from the second of this work, premised. To the same: if homicide is per se evil, homicide insofar as it is homicide is evil, since per se, that is, secundum se, follows secundum quod, as is clear in Metaphysics V.23, where these are defined; and if homicide insofar as it is homicide is evil, every homicide is evil, as is plain in Prior Analytics I, chapter on reduplicatives; and Averroes on Metaphysics V, commentary 3: "Man insofar as he is man is not a maker of idols, since then every man would be a maker of idols."

Likewise, whatever inheres in something per se inheres in it essentially, as is plain in Posterior Analytics I and Metaphysics V, where also [D] previously, and whatever inheres in something essentially, inheres necessarily in all its supposita, as is clear in De Caelo II.59, where it is argued that if one star is of spherical figure, therefore every one is. Where Averroes says: "It is necessary that what exists in some individuals of a species from essential things, exist in all individuals of that species; and figure is from essential things." The venerable Anselm of Canterbury also in De Casu Diaboli 19, showing that every will, namely act of will, insofar as it is, is good, and no thing is evil, proves it thus: that the will of the first angel, by which he willed to be like God, was not evil—namely essentially and per se—because then the Son of God would not will to be like the Father. And he adds: "Or if to will any lowest pleasures were evil, the will of brutes would be called evil."

Likewise, if homicide is per se evil, not per accidens, since always and everywhere homicide is the same itself and has itself wholly, always and everywhere it is evil. For if now or here it is not evil, and then or there it is evil, this is on account of something which befalls it now and here, by reason of which now and here it is evil. [E] But since elsewhere and at other times this has been separated from it, then and there it will not be evil. Therefore it is not evil only by itself, nor by anything essential to it, as soul is, or risibility to man—for such things cannot be separated. Therefore it is evil only per accidens, because by something such which can be present and absent without corruption of the subject.

The venerable Anselm of Canterbury in De Conceptu Virginali 4 also argues in this manner: if concupiscential appetites were per se unjust, as often as they were consented to, they would make injustice. But when brute animals consent to them, they are not called unjust. Likewise, if the acts of adultery and homicide are per se evils, since the act according to essence is similar in conjugates and unconjugates, in innocent persons and those guilty of death, there will also be sin in these. To the same: suppose that, on account of great similitude, or another cause from inculpable ignorance, a man knows another's wife believing her his own; and similarly kills an innocent man placed in prison in the place of the guilty justly damned and duly kept—[A] neither sins, but rather merits in the case. Therefore such acts per se, and according to their substance, are not evils, but sometimes are goods, just as carnal acts with one's own wife, while she is believed to be another's, is mortal sin, and the killing of a guilty person believed innocent. This appears in Genesis 29 concerning Rachel and Leah; and in the Canon, 29 Question 1; and in the fourth book of Peter's Sentences, distinction 30, manifestly concerning similar things.

Further to the same: justice and injustice are privatively opposed, therefore are apt to be made about the same thing, as is clear in the Categories and in Metaphysics of Aristotle. But justice is in the rational creature alone; therefore also injustice is, and not in such external acts. Indeed, sin does not seem to be more per se in such acts than in similar acts of beasts. This whole, almost, is the reasoning of Anselm in De Conceptu Virginali, where similarly he shows that original sin, by virtue of which it is injustice, is not in the seed or body, but only in the rational soul.

Further it seems that no interior act is per se evil, because neither blasphemy nor hatred of God; which can be shown, as concerning external acts has been shown, in fools and [B] also the furious; and because any such act is some natural perfection of such natural potency. Moreover, to understand and to will are diverse operations; let it then be supposed that God create some nature which can freely will and not-will, and do the other works of will, and not judge intellectually nor rationally, but simply comprehend like brutes—then such a nature, blaspheming or hating God, would not sin, because it would not act against the judgment or rule of reason. Therefore such acts are not per se evil, as appears from what has been shown.

Further, a man can without any preceding fault of his be deceived in many ways through many appearances and sophistical arguments. Let it then be supposed that that most cunning Behemoth of Sophists, whose subtleties are perplexed, should involve some simple person, without prior fault of his own, and ensnare him so perplexingly that it should seem to him altogether that, unless he blaspheme God or hate Him, he will necessarily sin more—then according to the judgment of right reason this man is bound to blaspheme God, or hate Him, lest otherwise he fall into a greater sin, since according to the common conception of the [C] mind, of two evils the lesser evil is to be chosen. The cause of which is that in goods it is the contrary, namely that the greater is more to be chosen. Whence in Ethics V.5: "By the reason of the good, the lesser is to the greater evil; the lesser is more eligible than the greater. But what is eligible is the good, and the greater is the more good."

The same is clear through blessed Gregory in Moralia XXXII.17, on Job 40: "The sinews of his stones are intertwined," saying: "The sinews of these stones are intertwined, because the arguments of his suggestions are bound by implicit knottings, that they may make many sin in this way, that if perhaps they may seek to flee one sin, they may not escape this without another snare of sin, or commit a fault while avoiding it, and in no way be able to release themselves from one, unless they consent to be bound in another." And he shows this by many examples, the first of which is: if anyone shall have sworn to conceal another's secret, who indicates to him after the oath that he intends to commit a secret homicide, which the man sworn cannot impede except by betraying this secret resolution—then he is bound by the snares of so great a perplexity that, if he betrays the secret, he seems to himself guilty of perjury; [D] if he does not betray, guilty of homicide. He sets down another example concerning some simple person who promises full obedience to a prelate, who first commands him to do what is not fitting; then such a person is perplexed: for if he obey, he commits and does sin; if he obey not, he incurs disobedience, as he believes. Where, against all such perplexities, he sets down a general remedy, namely that the perplexed always choose the lesser evil. For he says thus: "There is, however, what may usefully be done to destroy his cunning: namely that when the mind is constrained between lesser and greatest sins, if there be no way out at all without sin, lesser ones always be chosen. Because also he who is enclosed on all sides by the circuit of walls, lest he flee, hurls himself in flight where the wall is found shorter." And this whole is alleged in the Canon, distinction 13, "Nervi"; and the like is written in 22 Question 4, "Non solum"; and many similar things in many chapters following and preceding.

Likewise to the same is that chapter above, in the same distinction, "Duo mala," and is taken from the Eighth Council of Toledo: "Two evils, although they are most cautiously [E] to be guarded against, yet if the necessity of danger has compelled to perpetrate one of them, we ought to resolve upon that which is known to be obligated by a lesser bond. But what is lighter of these and what graver, let us investigate by the acumen of pure reason." And to this conduces what is premised at the head of that distinction, namely that against natural right no dispensation is admitted, unless perhaps two evils so urge that one of them must be chosen. The same teaches plainly Isidore in De Summo Bono III.5.

Suppose then that to some simple person, who has willed and sworn to some prelate full obedience in all things, it be commanded by that prelate, or by the devil who transfigures himself into that prelate, that he hate God and blaspheme; and let him judge that such an act against God is the lesser evil, because there it is one sin only, and against God only, and much excused by the precept of the prelate; and let him believe that not to obey in this case is the greater sin, because against his prelate, and against [A] God, whose office he bears, and that it would be to violate the oath, and to apostatize from the vow. Or suppose that the devil, who transfigures himself into an angel of light, transfigure himself into the angel of great counsel, the Lord Jesus Christ, and command some simple person who believes he is Christ, that he blaspheme and hate God for a moment, because if he does not, he will blaspheme God and hate Him eternally damned, and let him believe that it is a lesser evil to blaspheme or hate God in this case than not to obey the one commanding, and let this come about without any preceding fault of his.

For we see that many saints are frequently deceived by sophistical arguments. And at least this is possible by the absolute divine power. And if it be said that this is at least on account of preceding original sin: let original sin be deleted by baptism, and let such a person be in charity—then never will he, in punishment of original sin, fall into ignorance which leads him necessarily into mortal sin. Likewise such credulity is one act possible to come about, as is plain through the council [B] and through the text of Job, which cannot be understood as the letter at first sounds, since Behemoth does not have such members, as is plain through Gregory and through Gratian similarly where before, and reason teaches the same. For someone can believe a more manifestly false and less likely thing, like the opposite of the first principle, or that all things are moved or rest, and the like, as is recited in Metaphysics IV and elsewhere. But such an act of perplexed belief depends neither in becoming nor in being on prior fault as on any cause of itself, as will be plain inductively. Therefore it is absolutely possible without prior fault for credulity of this sort to come about and remain.

Likewise, suppose that God create a man without original or any other sin, in grace, of such a condition as we are, concerning whom, deceived thus, the argument is made as before. And to obstruct all subterfuges, suppose that such a person be perplexed, let him believe that if he wait, deliberate, take counsel, or pray to God, he will sin more grievously by that very fact—let this credulity be part of that perplexity. And suppose it be commanded him to do at once this or that, and that he believe himself bound to do at once, without any waiting or any such thing; or suppose him in prison, where he cannot have counsel; and moreover, although [C] he pray God, since God is not bound, nor compelled by prayers to act, but whatever He acts externally He always acts freely, suppose by His absolute power that He hear not the one praying. Such a person, then, so perplexed, if he choose and do what he believes to be the lesser evil, does not sin. Therefore no such act is per se sin.

But someone perhaps will say that if he so choose, in this case, he nevertheless sins, because he chooses and does the lesser sin, according to the authorities cited above; therefore in some way he sins. But this does not seem so. For no one sins by doing what he ought; but such a person does what he ought. Nor does anyone sin by doing according to the most right judgment of reason, of the Saints, of the Canon, and of a general Council; but this person does so. And likewise if such a one sin, this is mortally in many cases, as it seems; and if he does not so choose, he sins mortally. Therefore such a one in charity, in justice, and in rectitude of will, heir of the heavenly kingdom, would necessarily lose all these of necessity, and unwillingly—which is reproved by many testimonies of the Saints and Doctors. And this seems expressly against blessed [D] Gregory where before, and is alleged in the Canon where before. For he says: "When we are constrained in doubts, we usefully submit to the least, lest in great things we sin without pardon." Augustine also in De Mendacio 13 senses the same, where after a long premised disputation he concludes thus: "Thus then it is to be concluded that whatever sins of others—except those which make unclean him in whom they are committed—any one ought not to avoid by his own sins, neither for himself nor for anyone, but rather to bear them and bravely suffer them. But those which are so committed against a man as to make him unclean, by our own sins also we ought to avoid; and on account of this, those things are not to be called sins, which are done that that uncleanness may be avoided. For whatever is so done that, unless it were done, it would justly be reprehended, is not sin, nor would anything be sin which were done on account of avoiding such things. Therefore on account of avoiding these, whoever shall have lied, does not sin." And below, in the same, 26: "This entire dispute, certainly, although alternates [E] affirmation and denial concerning whether it is to be lied, no one however can say that he finds in any example or word of Scripture that any lie is to be loved or not held in hatred—but that sometimes by lying that is to be done which one hates, that what is more to be detested may be avoided. But in this men err, that they subject precious things to viler ones. For when you have conceded that some evil is to be admitted, lest another more grievous be admitted, not by the rule of truth, but by his own cupidity and custom, each one measures the evil; and thinks that more grievous which he himself more abhors, not what really is more to be fled." And he adds, 27, consequently: "Things which are observed for the cause of sanctity and religion, when injurious persons have wished to violate them, even by lesser sins—not only by injuries to others, if the condition be proposed and faculty given—are to be redeemed; and then they cease to be sins which are undertaken on account of avoiding more grievous things. For just as in useful things, as money or some other commodity, what is lost on account of greater gain is not called loss; so also in holy things what is admitted lest [A] more grievous be admitted is not called sin. Or if also that is called loss which someone loses lest he lose more, let this also be called sin, provided no one doubts that it is to be undertaken, that more be avoided, just as no one doubts that for the sake of avoiding greater loss what is less is to be suffered."

Likewise 22 q. 4, "Si aliquid," is alleged from venerable Bede in homily 44 in this manner: "If anything has happened to us to swear less cautiously, which observed bears toward a worse outcome, let us know that it is freely to be changed by salutary counsel, and that we are rather to perjure ourselves under pressing necessity, than for the sake of avoiding perjury be diverted into another graver crime. Finally, David swore by God to kill Nabal, but at the intercession of Abigail he soon let it go, nor grieved that he had contracted any fault for such perjury." And this same reason makes manifest, for whoever chooses the lesser evil in order so to flee the greater evil, is not deemed to choose the lesser evil, but to flee the greater evil; therefore he incurs no sin. For the Philosopher says in Ethics IX.1: "Friendship existing on account of delight and utility, dissolution comes about when those things on account of which they were loving are not done; for they were not loving themselves, [B] but the existing things." With which agreeing Anselm in De Casu Diaboli 13: "He who wills something on account of beatitude, wills nothing other than beatitude." And in De Concordia 8: "He who keeps rectitude of will only on account of another, does not love it, but that on account of which he keeps it; and therefore he is not to be called just, nor is such rectitude to be named justice." And Augustine says in De Trinitate XI.6: "If anyone refer the will of seeing to another, surely he wills another, and there will not now be the will of seeing, or if of seeing, not this seeing—as if someone should wish to see a scar, in order thence to teach that there had been a wound; or should wish to see a window in order through the window to see those passing." And below, in the same: "Rightly are all wills bound to one another, if that to which all are referred is good; but if it is depraved, all are depraved." And in Eighty-three Questions 36: "If you wish to please men in order that you may profit them unto loving God, now you do not desire this but another."

And these things seem to sound the authorities concerning lying just premised. Which also from canonical Scripture seems to be had. For Isaiah says in the person of God: "Holocausts of rams," etc., "such things I would not"—and certainly [C] He willed them in some way, because He commanded them in the law; but He willed them not on account of themselves, but on account of another end, which He sufficiently expresses below in the same, when He says thus: "Wash yourselves, be clean," etc., "seek judgment, relieve the oppressed," etc. And this is what Micah more clearly makes manifest. "What," he says, "shall I offer worthy unto the Lord? Shall I offer Him holocausts and yearling calves? Can the Lord be appeased with thousands of rams, or with many thousands of fat he-goats? I will show thee, O man, what is good, and what the Lord requireth of thee: verily, to do judgment and to love mercy, and to walk solicitously with thy God." And Psalm 50: "If Thou hadst desired sacrifice, I would indeed have given it; with burnt offerings Thou wilt not be delighted. A sacrifice to God is a contrite spirit." And Mark 9: "Whosoever shall receive one of these children in My name receives Me, and whosoever shall receive Me, receives not Me, but Him that sent Me." And so the Apostle speaks in 1 Corinthians, saying thus: "If I do this willingly," namely if I shall preach the Gospel, "I have a reward; but if against my will, a dispensation is committed unto me"—suggesting that if he preach the Gospel [D] for temporal gain, he preaches it against his will, namely not willing the Gospel but the gain. Which is plain there more expressly through Augustine in the Gloss, saying: "If, compelled by want of those things which are accessory to temporal life, I preach the Gospel, others through me will have the reward, but I shall not, because I do not love the Gospel itself, but its price set in those temporal things."

Therefore it seems that the perplexed person, choosing in his judgment the lesser evil so as to flee the greater evil, does not, to the mind of these authors, choose any evil, but as much as is in him, rather flees every evil; therefore neither does he seem to sin. The authorities, however, saying that such a one ought to choose the lesser sin, understand that he ought to choose that which seems to him the lesser sin, and which in every other case would be sin. For only in this case is it lawful for a man to choose and do what he believes to be sin; and since this is natural right, that every man flee, and not choose for himself, evil, against this natural right dispensation is admitted only in this case, as is recited above.

Further, this opinion many [E] philosophical and theological authorities suggest and confirm. Aristotle indeed in Ethics I.6 says that "good is said equally with being," and shows this inductively through all the predicaments. Where Averroes says thus: "Since the name 'good' is synonymously said to the name 'being,' it is said ambiguously of the ten predicaments, that is, not according to one intention." Likewise in Ethics IV.12: "Evil destroys itself; and if it were entire, it would be unbearable." Where Averroes: "Evil is the corruption of itself; when all its parts shall have been gathered, since this is not tolerable."

Likewise Avicenna in Metaphysics VIII.6: "The Necessary Being per se is pure goodness, and goodness is desired absolutely by whatever is. But that which everything desires is to be, and perfection in being insofar as it is being. Privation, however, insofar as it is privation, is not desired, except insofar as being and perfection follow upon it. Therefore that [A] which is truly desired is being. Being is pure goodness and pure perfection; and altogether goodness is that which everything desires according to its measure, since by it its being is perfected. Malice, however, has no essence, but is the privation of substance, and of utility of its disposition." The same in Metaphysics IX.7 and 8 distinguishes concerning evil and says that it is said in four ways, namely a horrible work, the principle of it, namely manners, sadness and grief, and the defect of a thing from its perfection. And below, chapter 8, he proves that no action is per se evil, because any action is the perfection of the agent, as was alleged above. And below in the same, having made the definition of being through good and evil, he subjoins that a being which is wholly evil, or in which the evil prevails, or is equal to the good, is not yet found. This opinion also Avicenna and Algazel in Metaphysics V last, profess.

Boethius also in De Consolatione Philosophiae III, prose last, proves it thus: "God omnipotent cannot do nothing, and to do evil He cannot; therefore evil is nothing." The same below in the same IV, prose 6, says: "God, the Founder of all natures, directing all to the good, disposes all things; and while He hastens to retain those things which He has produced into His likeness, He eliminates [B] every evil from the bounds of His commonwealth through the sequence of fatal necessity." The venerable Anselm of Canterbury also in De Conceptu Virginali proves the same diffusely, as was touched on above. Whence chapter 4 he says: "Nothing, whether substance or action or anything else, considered per se, is just except justice, or unjust or sin, except injustice." And in the fifth: "From these, then, it is easily known that injustice has no essence, although the affects and acts of an unjust will, which considered per se are something, usage calls injustice. By this same reasoning we understand that evil is nothing. For just as injustice is nothing other than the absence of due justice, so evil is nothing other than the absence of due good." And in De Casu Diaboli 8 the same he demonstrates by intention, and at the end of the chapter concludes thus: "Therefore neither the depraved will, nor the depraved conversion of will, is the evil itself by which an angel or a man becomes evil, which we say is nothing." And in 9 he says that "that evil is injustice, which is the privation of justice; and evil is nothing other than the privation of good." And in 16: "Altogether [C] I reprehend nothing else in the will of the evil angel than the absence of justice, or not having justice." And in 19 he shows the same through two reasons recited above, and concluding says: "Whence it follows that no will is evil, but is good insofar as it is, because it is the work of God." And in 20 he sets down a distinction concerning evil: "There is simple evil, which is nothing other than evil—which is nothing, namely injustice itself; but there is another evil, namely a nature in which is injustice—since it is something, and other than injustice, which is evil and nothing." And in 26, again distinguishing concerning evil, he says evil is double: namely evil of injustice, which is always nothing, and evil of incommmodity, which he also subdivides; for some such evil is nothing, like blindness; some however is, like sadness and grief.

The same in De Concordia 6: "The good which is justice is something truly; the evil, however, which is injustice, lacks all existence; which in the treatise De Casu Diaboli and in the little book which I titled De Conceptu Virginali et de Originali Peccato I have most openly shown. Injustice is not a quality, or action, or any essence, but only the absence of due justice." [D]

This same Hugh in De Sacramentis I, part 5, chapter 26 also teaches.

Likewise, if evil were something, this would seem most of all of an evil will; and since it is not eternal, it would have an efficient cause—which Augustine denies in De Civitate Dei XII.9, showing that God was the efficient cause of the good will in the angels now blessed, and that of the evil will in the reprobate angels there was no efficient cause, but a deficient one; and that nothing makes such a will but defection, by which God is forsaken, of which defection also the cause certainly fails. And above, in 8, after a long argumentation he concludes: "Let no one therefore seek the efficient cause of the evil will. For it is not efficient but deficient, since neither is it an affection but a defection."

The same also through almost the whole book De Natura Boni shows the same conclusion, that evil is nothing, and that all things, insofar as they are, are good and from God. Whence chapter 1 he says: "All goods, whether great or small, through whatsoever degrees of things, cannot be except from God. Every nature insofar as it is nature is good. Every nature, therefore, cannot be except from God." And below in 3 and 13 he says that from God is every [E] mode, whether great or small, and so of species and order. And in 4: "Evil is nothing other than the corruption of natural mode, species, or order; an evil nature, then, is said to be that which has been corrupted." And in 5: "Corruption, however, if it should take away every mode, species, and order in corporeal things, no nature will remain."

The same in Confessions VII almost throughout, by no brief disputation shows that evil is not anything, and chapter 12 thus concludes: "Therefore if corruptible things shall be deprived of every good, they will not be at all; therefore, as long as they are, they are good; therefore whatever things are, are good, because individually they are good, and together all are very good." And chapter 13 he subjoins, saying: "To Thee evil is not, nor to Thy whole creature, because outside there is not anything which corrupts and breaks in upon the order which Thou hast imposed on it." Likewise in IV Super Genesim ad litteram 14: "If God could not do good things, there would be no power; but if He could and did not, there would be great envy. Because therefore He is omnipotent and good, He made all things very good." The same is plain in Enchiridion 6 and 7, in De Libero Arbitrio III.19, in De Civitate Dei XII.6, and in many other [A] places. Whence also Ecclesiasticus 39: "All the works of the Lord are very good." And below in the same: "It is not to be said, This is worse than that; for all things shall be approved in their time."

Likewise, Ambrose in the book which he wrote De Isaak et Anima, says thus: "What therefore is evil, except the indigence of good?" And again: "From goods, therefore, evils have arisen. For there are no evils except those which are deprived of goods."

Likewise this opinion Lombard favours in Sentences II, distinction 25, saying: "Some, however, diligently attending to the words of Augustine, not unlearnedly transmit that the evil will and evil acts insofar as they are, or insofar as they are acts, are good; and they say that every will and act is the good nature of God." And similar to this it seems to feel below in the same, distinction 36; and similarly distinction 45 of the first.

This opinion also blessed Dionysius teaches plainly in De Divinis Nominibus in many places, through several reasons premised, especially however in chapter 4.

In order that I may conclude with a certain end the treatise on evil, ambiguous to some, behold a most brief and most certain argument: that ought certainly to be held Catholic whose opposite is held [B] for certain heretical. Such, however, is the principal conclusion of the present chapter. For Jerome in his book XII on Isaiah, expounding that of Isaiah 45: "I am the Lord, forming light and creating darkness, making peace and creating evil," says: "Let the heresy be confounded which judges God to be the founder of evils, since here evil is set down not as contrary to good, but for affliction and war, according to that which is written in the Gospel: 'Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.' Let Marcion be confounded, understanding two Gods, one good and just, the other evil and unjust, the founder of one of invisibles and the other of visibles, of which the first makes light, the second darkness; that one peace, this one evil—although both, on account of diversity of merits, one and the same God established."

And Jerome here takes evil not for a man or angel denominatively evil, and as it were subject to malice, but for the per se evil, or for the very per se and pure malice, according to what he speaks and defines elsewhere. For above, in the same, book I on Isaiah, on that of Isaiah 2: "Cease ye therefore from the man whose breath is in his nostrils, for he is reputed high"—he speaks thus in this [C] place: "Bama among the Hebrews is not 'high' said, but 'highness'; that is, the very altitude and sublimity, as if it were said: not divine, but divinity; not stream, but spring; not man, but humanity." It is therefore heretical to judge God to be the founder of evils of fault, as the Prophet and Jerome here speak; since nevertheless according to chapter 3, and according to them, He is the founder of all things, also of evils of affliction and of wars; therefore also it is heretical to judge an evil of fault to be any thing whatsoever.

Isidore also in Etymologiae VIII.5 (or 12), reciting the various heresies of various heretics, says thus: "The Colitani or Colicitani say that God does not make evils, against that which is written: 'I, the Lord, creating evils.'" And immediately he subjoins: "The Floriani say on the contrary, that God created evils, against that which is written: 'God made all things good.'" And it is recited in the Canon, 24 q. last, "Quidam autem," where heretics with their heresies are numbered. And that God is Creator of all and Maker, what has been alleged proves; nor does any Catholic ignore this, for the Nicene Creed in the name of the whole Church generally professes this: [D] "I believe," it says, "in one God the Father almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, of all things visible and invisible," as also chapter three has shown.

COROLLARY.

AND IT MAY HAVE A COROLLARY: THAT GOOD AND PER SE EVIL, OR GOODNESS AND PURE MALICE, ARE NOT PROPERLY CONTRARIES, BUT PRIVATIVELY OPPOSED.

Whence it is manifest that good and per se evil, or goodness and pure malice, are not properly contraries, but privatively opposed. For if they were properly contraries, they would be placed under the same genus, and constituted by positive contrary differences, distant most. Whereas, however, per se evil, or pure malice, sets down nothing positive—since therefore they are opposed, and one of these only positive—it is established that these are opposed privatively. Nor ought anyone be moved [E] by the fact that the Philosopher frequently sets down good and evil as if contraries, because he does this by setting down an example. Of the examples, however, which he sets down, he does not always suppose that it is so, but that he who learns may understand, as is plain through the same, Prior Analytics I. Or otherwise it can be said that when the authors at times affirm good and evil to be contraries, they understand by contraries opposites; or by evil, the evil of affliction and sensible pain, according to the distinction of Avicenna and Anselm above recited.

But someone perhaps will object against the things said the saying of the Philosopher in Ethics II.7 in these words: "Not every operation, nor every passion, receives a mean. For some, immediately named, are entwined with malice—for example, joy at evil, shamelessness, envy; and in operations, adultery, theft, homicide. For all these, and such as these, are said [A] secundum se to be evils, but not their excesses or defects. There is therefore never about these to be right, but always to err; nor is there well or not well in such things—in that as it is fitting, and when, and how, for example to commit adultery—but simply to do any of these is to sin." A similar opinion also the Catholic Doctors say in many places, and Lombard in Sentences II, distinction 40, for this opinion recites Augustine.

For these things it must be said, as Anselm suggests in De Conceptu Virginali 4, that names can be imposed in two ways on those evil acts: either so that they signify absolutely the substance of such an act, or so that with the act they co-signify some evil circumstance accompanying. Therefore Anselm says there: "Names are given to certain actions, by which it is signified that they come about unjustly, like fornication and lying. But one thing is understood when the action itself or the speech is considered, another when whether justly or unjustly is considered. Finally, every essence is from God, from whom nothing is unjust." And so the objections are resolved.

For Augustine and the Philosopher take those names above said in the second way, not the first; therefore they do not contradict the things shown.

That Augustine speaks thus appears through [B] this which he says: "Those things which are established to be sins are not to be done under any pretext of a good cause, nor for any so-called good end, nor with any so-called good intention." And that the Philosopher speaks thus, it seems. For he does not say that any such act is really per se evil, but that "some immediately named are entwined with malice"—suggesting that some names signify evil acts not absolutely according to the essence of the acts, but co-signify and entwine malice together with them. And this is sufficiently clear through this, that he named homicide among them, which is not per se evil, as is plain through himself in Ethics X.14, alleging from the lawgivers that "it is necessary to provoke to virtue the obedient by the good; but the disobedient and more degenerate by punishments and chastisements; the incurable, however, exterminate"—which is also sanctioned by the laws of all peoples.

CHAPTER 27. THAT ALL THINGS COME ABOUT FROM DIVINE PROVIDENCE.

It seems consequent upon what has been said to inquire concerning providence. For as Lactantius recites in book one of his Divine Institutes Against the Gentiles, Democritus is the author of the opinion holding that all things come about by chance, and Epicurus the confirmer. Whence also the Philosopher in Physics II.44 says: "There are some who maintain that this heaven and all worldly things have chance as their cause; for from chance, they say, there came about the revolution and the motion which separated all into this order." These, as appears from the first of De Generatione et Corruptione and Metaphysics I, [D] seem to have been Democritus and his colleague Leucippus, who set down that all things come about from indivisible bodies, but concurring differently, according to risutos, diatigi, and tropi—that is, according to figure, order, and position. They said this concurrence to come about fortuitously, that is, by chance; whom Epicurus, imitating, similarly thought.

Therefore Isidore in Etymologiae VIII.19 says that "Epicurus said no divine providence has set up or rules the world, but assigned the origin of things to atoms, that is, indivisible and solid bodies, by whose fortuitous concurrences all things are born. He asserted also that God does nothing." Josephus also in Antiquities of the Jews X, last, says: "The Epicureans deny providence in life, and do not consider that God cares for human affairs, nor judge that all things are governed by a blessed and incorruptible substance for the stability of all things; but assert that this world is borne about of itself without ruler and without any care."

Others, however, not so universally, but dividing, said that the heavenly things [E] are governed by providence, but inferior things, whatsoever, are agitated by fortuitous motions. Others, however, with more irrational opining, brought forth the contrary opinion. But against all these, or rather for all these, it must be shown that all things which come about, come about from divine providence, and are ordained by the laws of His providence.

For what is providence except procul videntia, or praevidentia, of intellect, with procul violentia, or praevolentia, of will? But God has knowledge of all things, as chapter six teaches, and that is some cause of any thing made, the seventeenth attesting; God also has volition toward all things, as chapters 8, 9, and 22 show, and neither of these is new through the twenty-third, and the volition of God is efficacious, nor can be frustrated, by the tenth. It is plain therefore that all things which come about come about from divine providence.

Likewise, through the proximate chapter, all things are good; therefore also according to the priors they descend from the first good, and not perversely and improvidently, but providently and discreetly. Likewise, a good father of a family cares for all things concerning him, and provides as much as [A] he knows and can, nor leaves anything unordered in his house, but orders all things in their places and times carefully. Whence also Aristotle in Oeconomica I.3 says thus: "Whatever things ought to be done per se, the care, namely, ought to be per se"; and follows: "It is needful that masters rise before servants, and sleep last, and that the house never be without a guard, just as the city; and whatever ought to be done, neither by night nor by day be omitted." And below in the same: "The house also is to be constructed for guarding things, for nourishment, garments, and other things animate—servants, free, female, male; foreign and citizen—for safety and for health, for summer cold, for winter warm; and it is needful that each thing be put in its place." How much more shall that great Father of the family, of whose magnitude there is no end, and of whose wisdom there is no number, whose goodness also is immense, govern providently His whole great house, with all that it contains, [A] at all times? Whence Matthew 20: "The kingdom of heaven is like to a man who is a householder." Where Chrysostom: "The man householder is Christ, [B] to whom heaven and earth are as one house; the family is of heavenly, terrestrial, and infernal creatures."

Likewise, if God did not provide for all things, this would seem of unskilfulness, impotence, malice, or negligence—all of which are most far from God. Indeed, it becomes God as well as other things, that all things be providently governed by Him. Whence Boethius in De Consolatione Philosophiae IV, prose 6: "So things are best done, if the simplicity remaining in the divine mind brings forth an undeviating order of causes; but this order coerces mutable things, otherwise about to flow rashly. And so it comes about that, although to us, unable to consider this order, all things may seem confused and perturbed, nevertheless its measure, directing all things to the good, disposes them." With which agrees Augustine in De Libero Arbitrio I.13, saying thus: "It is the eternal law by which it is just that all things be most ordered." And in III.7: "Whatever shall occur to you better by true reason, know that God has done it, as the founder of all good things." And Super Genesim ad litteram IV.14: "If God could make good things and did not, there would be great envy"; [C] and in De Quantitate Animae 18: "By the justice of God this universe is sustained and ruled, by which it has been brought to pass that not only do all things exist, but exist so that they could not better exist." Algazel also in Metaphysics III, sentence 7, says thus: "Everything that is, namely the number of stars, and their measure, the disposition of earth and animals, and whatever has being, came about in the manner in which it is, because of all manners of being this was more agreeable to it; and whatever else is possible besides this is imperfect in respect of this which now is. Care, therefore, is complete with completeness of goodness."

Likewise, the like seems to be in all beings of one species, and generally in all beings of all species, because according to the Philosopher in Oeconomica I.1: "In the smallest things the nature of individual things is found." But it is so concerning men, that unless they had a common ruler directing them to the public good, but each intended his own private good, their commonwealth would be most poorly disposed, or would perish; and although in different provinces they had different princes and rulers, unless they still [D] had one common superior prince and ruler, an error would befall such as the prior. How would inferior providence congruously be aided by abundant, except by the authority of a common Prince embracing both? Of all provinces and men therefore there is naturally one Prince; for this is better for all. For all things naturally desire good, as is clear from the proximate of this work, and the greater good more. Wherefore the Philosopher in Politics I.1 says: "In men there is one ruling, and according to nature, on account of safety." And below in the same he proves that the city is a natural community, because it is the end of two natural communities, namely of the household and of the neighbourhood, and the end of any thing is natural to it. Secondly, he proves the same through this: that what is best and most sufficient of any thing is natural to it, because it is its end; but the best and most sufficient he says is in the civil community. Therefore he concludes saying thus: "From these things therefore it is manifest that the city is of those things which are by nature, and that man is by nature a civil animal." And by the same reasonings it can be shown that of all men there ought naturally to be one community governed by one [E] Prince; therefore also universally of all beings by similar reasoning.

And this seems to be the determination of Aristotle in Metaphysics XII, last chapter, where he argues against the Pythagoreans setting down mathematical number to be the first principle of things, by this: that then the substance of the universe would be unconnected, nor would beings mutually confer with one another, and there would be many principles not ordered under one another nor under any other. But this is against the natural disposition of beings and of the universe; therefore it is not so. And this is what he says in these words: "Beings will not be disposed badly, nor is the plurality of principalities good; therefore one Prince." This Prince, however, according to his whole process there, is God. And this seems to be the reasoning of Damascene in Sentences I.3, and of Lombard in Sentences I, distinction 3, and of many philosophers and doctors elsewhere in many places.

Likewise, the parts of animals [A] and plants, and of the whole universe, are best and most usefully ordered. The cause of this, however, cannot be any element, nor any particular cause; therefore, according to the Philosopher, the universal nature, which is God. And this was the reasoning of the ancient Philosophers, recited from chapters 9 and 10 of Metaphysics I in the proximate chapter. Whence Avicenna in Metaphysics X.1: "When you wish to know that the useful things which you understand lead to commodities in nature, consider the disposition of the usefulness of members in animals and plants, and how each of them is caused; and there is not there a natural cause in any way, but its principle is from divine care, just as also those things hang upon care. Know also that the more the common people approach and hold and say, the truer it is; nor do they refuse this except those who wish to seem philosophers, because they are ignorant of these causes or others."

Aristotle also in De Animalibus, assigning the cause of the disposition of the members of animals, says that nature so ordered them on account of the better and the safety of the animal—which his authority cited above in De Animalibus XI plainly testifies. And in this all philosophers [B] and physicians agree. Aristotle frequently also supposes that nature always does that which is better. Whence in De Generatione II, second to last: "In all things, we say, nature ever desires that which is better." And in De Caelo II.34: "Nature always does, of contingents, that which is best." And in 50: "Nature does nothing as may chance; it is irrational that she has cared for animals and despised precious things—namely the heavenly things—but it seems studiously done that which she does." And in 59: "Nature does nothing irrationally, nor in vain." And above in 56: "Neither animate nor violent will any of them—namely the heavenly bodies—be borne in motion, as if nature provided what was about to be, since with motion not so disposed, nothing would come about." About this place, and in many other places, he says many such things.

And that this nature according to Aristotle is God is plain through his words, which cannot agree to an irrational nature, nor to any rational, except the first. Which his saying recited above from his little book De Morte Aristotelis plainly teaches. Whence in Oeconomica I.1 he says: "Nature fills with the period of the procreation of offspring always being, since by one it cannot, [C] by species nevertheless, just as it was preordained by the divine nature of male and female to community." Averroes also on De Anima II commentary 34 says that "the divine solicitude, since it could not make the generable and corruptible to remain according to the individual, took pity by giving it a power which can remain in the species."

Further, what is to be more rightly esteemed the universal nature than the common soul of the world? But this is God, as the premises of the second of this work show, which also many similar things touched upon there seem to prove.

Further, the principal opinion is proved by many testimonies of the philosophers. For Aristotle, besides what was alleged above, in De Secreto Secretorum I, part 23, says that "God established all impressions, colds, and heats in winter and summer with the highest providence inevitably." The same in De Mundo 13: "With God governing, always immobily and diligently is ruled the whole beauty of heaven and earth, divided according to all natures." This also Avicenna in Metaphysics VIII.9 and 10, and Algazel in Physics V and Metaphysics V, plainly hold.

Averroes also on Metaphysics XII commentary 37 says that [D] God has care and solicitude concerning all beings, both concerning individuals and concerning species. And in commentary

52 he says that the principle of voluntary and natural ought to have an ordered intention of action toward the first cause. And it is to be known that this is the opinion of Aristotle concerning solicitude. And having recited two contrary opinions—one of which set down God to have solicitude concerning anything; the other, that there is no solicitude at all—he says: "And the truth is in this, that there is solicitude; and that if any are without solicitude, they proceed from the necessity of matter, not from a diminution of the agent." But none proceed from the necessity of matter, except perhaps as he himself speaks on Physics II commentary 88, when he says: "Those things which are found in natural things from necessity, not on account of something, like the death of an animal, are on account of matter; but those which are found in them on account of something are on account of form." And such privations, although in some way they are intended by God, nevertheless not so principally as habits and form. For these are intended on their account finally, not the contrary. Whence Wisdom 1: "God did not make death." And Ecclesiasticus 39: [E] "Famine and death are created for vengeance."

Further, Calcidius on the second part of the Timaeus of Plato says thus: "The race of ancient men reckoned all those things which flow forth, by divine counsel and providence, for the use of human life and the faculty of acting—both with potencies and reasons aiding and operating, these very things which aid—to be gods; on this account, because in their rude minds the true sciscitation of God had not yet sat firmly. For they were shepherds and forest-dwellers, and the rest of such, without the study of humanity." Where also for affirming providence he adduces Plato, Pythagoras, Orpheus, Lippon, and Musaeus; and the whole sect of the Stoics concordantly professes divine providence, on the testimony of Lactantius where before.

To this also conduce many philosophical and theological authorities, alleged in chapters 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 9, and the proximate of this work, which make mention of solicitude, providence, governance, and the like. Moreover Augustine in VIII Super Genesim ad litteram, from chapter 11 to the end, shows much and diffusely the work of divine providence to be bipartite, namely of creation and of administration, [A] under which the whole creature lies; and IX.24 the same, and De Libero Arbitrio I.11: "There is nothing of things which divine providence does not administer." And the same in II.28, 34, and III.2, and other books, and not a few places, of which now I will touch on one, omitting the others. De Civitate Dei V.11 he says thus: "God who made man a rational animal of soul and body, who did not allow him sinning to be unpunished, nor leave him without mercy, who gave to good and evil essence with stones, seminal life with trees, sensual life with cattle, intellectual life with the angels alone; from whom is every mode, every species, every order, measure, number, and weight; and whatever is naturally, of whatever kind it is; from whom are the seeds of forms, the forms of seeds, the motions of seeds and forms; who gave to flesh origin, beauty, health, fecundity of propagation, disposition of members, safety, concord; who also gave to the irrational soul memory, sense, and appetite; but to the rational, mind, intelligence, and will; who not only heaven and earth, nor only angel and man, but neither the inwards of an exiguous [B] and contemptible animal, nor the feather of a bird, nor the floweret of an herb, nor the leaf of a tree, did He leave without the agreement of their parts and a certain peace as it were—is in no way to be believed to have wished kingdoms of men, and their dominations and slaveries, to be alien from the laws of His providence."

Lactantius moreover, where before, shows in many ways and diffusely the general divine providence. Of this Lactantius and his book aforesaid, which contains seven books, blessed Jerome in De Viris Illustribus 80 and blessed Augustine in De Civitate Dei XVIII.24 make laudable mention. To no one therefore should his authority seem contemptible.

Isidore also, where before, recites from Epicurus that the world was set up or ruled by no divine providence, as a heresy or error, as his procedure evidently shows. Josephus also in Antiquities of the Jews II, last, recites Moses to have said thus: "To despair of the providence of God is of immense madness."

Likewise, Psalm 118: "By Thine ordinance the day continueth: for all things serve Thee." And 146: "Who giveth to beasts their food, and to the young ravens that call upon Him." And 148: "He hath established [C] them for ever and for ages of ages: He hath made a decree, and it shall not pass away." And Wisdom 12: "There is no other God but Thou, who hast care of all." And the whole Canonical Scripture of the Old and New Testaments most frequently says God to provide for things, to care, ordain, establish, dispose, prepare, make, govern, and many similar things, which both according to the face of the letter and according to the exposition of the saints are referred to divine providence.

For all of which let it suffice to adduce one irrefragable testimony of the Truth saying: "Behold the birds of the air, for they neither sow nor reap, nor gather into barns, and your heavenly Father feedeth them. Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow: they labour not, neither do they spin. But I say to you, that not even Solomon in all his glory was arrayed as one of these. And if the grass of the field, which is to-day, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, God doth so clothe," Matthew 6. And below 10: "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and not one of them shall fall on the ground without your Father." Which all Catholic expositors refer to divine providence, of whom one I will now mention for all. [D]

For Augustine says in the Sentences of Prosper, proposition 286: "When the Saviour says that one sparrow does not fall to the earth without the will of God, and that the grass of the field which after a little while is to be cast into the oven, He nevertheless forms and clothes—does He not confirm that not only is this whole part of the world, deputed to mortal and corruptible things, but even its vilest and most abject particles, are ruled by divine providence, lest, perturbed by fortuitous motions, we should esteem those things whose causes we cannot comprehend?"

Thomas Bradwardine, De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium

Book I, Chapters 28–32

CHAPTER XXVIII. ON FATE.

Here, however, for a fuller treatment of the present matter, a certain brief inquiry must be made concerning Fate. For many assert that Fate exists; and many also, especially the Catholic Doctors, deny Fate. The Stoics indeed, as Boethius testifies in his commentary on the last part of Book I of the Peri Hermeneias, assert that Fate exists, and that all things are managed by Fate; which Augustine likewise attests in the fifth book of the City of God, chapters 8 and 9; and many Philosophers and Poets agree with them. Against these stand Augustine in the first part of his commentary on John, Homily 37: "Oh, if your heart were not foolish (fatuum), you would not believe in Fate"; which he likewise reproves and condemns above in Homily 31. Likewise in Book 2 of On Genesis according to the Letter, chapter 25, he says that Fate is to be rejected by the soundness of Faith. The same author also, in the Questions on the Old and New Law, Question 115, with great labor destroys the fate of the stars and the art of Mathesis, because, if it be posited, it destroys free will in men and in God, and subjects Christ and his deeds to necessity. He moreover, in Book 2 Against Faustus, treating of the star that led the Magi to Christ, rejects the fate of the stars, both with respect to Christ and with respect to all men. Blessed Gregory also, in Homily 10, which is on Epiphany, speaking of the same star, says thus: "It must be known that the Priscillianist heretics, who think that each individual is born under the constitutions of the stars, take this in support of their error, namely that a new star appeared when the Lord appeared in the flesh, whose Fate they think this same star to have been. But far be it from the hearts of the faithful that they should say there is anything called Fate" — which he then refutes by many arguments. Jerome too, in Book 11 [of his commentary] on that passage of Isaiah 38, "In those days Hezekiah was sick," etc., says: "The question of Fate is solved, and the bonds of necessity and of causes, in that the day of death is by no means appointed for each individual, but by the will of God, and by causes unknown to mortals, one either lives or dies; especially since even in this life the necessity of death is now deferred, and we read that very many were raised up after death." Ambrose, moreover, in his Hexameron, treating of the work of the fourth day, refutes and rejects Fate at length. Gregory of Nyssa likewise, as is alleged in the Gloss on Matthew 2, argues against those who posit Fate by this consideration: that then prayers would be foolish, the nature of the contingent would be destroyed, and there would be no free will of the will. Chrysostom holds the same view on that passage of Matthew, as do many Catholic commentators. With these agrees that Ovid Naso of Pelignum, in Book 1 of De Vetula, where he treats of the game of dice, and condemns it because it does not rest upon reason but upon the chance hazard of the dice, and upon men's fortune or fate, saying thus: "Nor do you know the fortunes of men," etc. — "If you posit Fate, those who follow Fates are foolish (fatui). For with Fate posited, freedom of will would not exist; but freedom is something, therefore Nothing — Fate is foolish (fatuum); those who follow Fates are foolish." Of these, however, to use the words of the Philosopher in Ethics I, chapter 12: "Some of these things many and ancient men say; but those things, few and glorious men. It is not reasonable that either of these err in everything, but rather that they direct one thing, or many." Therefore, to that knowledge of dividing — which brings great fruit to the studious — according to the tradition of the Peripatetic discipline, I have recourse.

Fate, then, according to the judgment of the Doctors, is said in two ways: in one way, the common power of the Stars, which generally regulates and constrains all things that happen in the world by inevitable necessity; and specially, a certain sidereal virtue residing in the constitution of the stars at the hour at which someone is conceived or born, which imposes necessity on all future things concerning the one then born. In another way, Fate is said from fando — from the speaking, namely, or pronouncement of Jove, according to the Stoics and other heathen Philosophers and Poets, who among them was the supreme God — which among Catholics may be called the Speaking or Pronouncement (Fatio, Famen) of God. Stellar or astral Fate, especially if it imports necessity, is not to be posited, as the things set forth above concerning the 32nd part and the 39th of the first corollary teach; and so the Doctors recounted above, indeed all the Catholic Doctors, with one accord condemn this Fate. If, however, the fate of the stars in no way imports necessity, but rather a certain disposition and inclination in men toward certain acts, it does not seem to be utterly denied. Divine Fate, however, is undoubtedly to be conceded. Is it not written at the beginning of creation: "God said, Let there be light, and there was light"? And so of the rest of the creatures? And elsewhere: "He himself spoke, and they were made: for whatever things he willed, he made, because his will is perfect"? This, however, is divine Fate above all — that of the divine will, which is the efficacious cause of things, as the foregoing have taught. This distinction is plain through Augustine, City of God V, chapters 1, 8, and 9, where, the first member having been reproved, he says diffusely concerning the second that the Stoics call Fate the entire connection and series of causes by which everything that happens is brought about, which they attribute wholly to the will and power of the most high God, who is most truly believed to foreknow all things and to leave nothing disordered; but they prove themselves to call Fate principally the will of the most high God, whose power is invincibly extended through all things — since they call him Jove, whom they hold to be the supreme God, from whom they say the connection of Fates depends. And below, in chapter 9, he says: "We do not say that all things happen by Fate; rather, we say that nothing happens by Fate, since the name of Fate, where it is wont to be used by speakers — that is, in the constitution of the stars at which each is conceived or born — we show to avail nothing, since the matter itself is vainly asserted; but the order of causes, in which the will of God most prevails, we neither deny, nor do we call by the name of Fate, except perhaps as we may understand 'Fate' as derived from fando, that is, from speaking. For we cannot deny that it is written in the holy letters: Once has God spoken, these two things have I heard, that power belongs to God, and to thee, O Lord, mercy, for thou wilt render to each according to his works. For what is said, Once has he spoken, is understood immovably — that is, he has spoken unchangeably, just as he knows unchangeably all things that are to be, and which he himself shall do." And the same author above, in chapter 1 of the same book: "By divine providence are human kingdoms established, which if anyone for that reason should attribute to Fate — because he calls the will or the power of God by the name of Fate — let him keep his judgment, but correct his tongue."

With this Isidore agrees, Etymologies VIII, 45, saying: "The Gentiles say Fate is whatever the gods speak (fantur), whatever Jove pronounces (fatutur); from fando, then, they call it Fatum, that is, from speaking; which, unless this name were already wont to be understood in another matter, by which we wish to incline the hearts of men, we could reasonably call Fate from speaking. For we cannot deny," etc., the words of Augustine quoted above. There is, however, still another twofold distinction concerning Fate. For in one way Fate is taken actively, for the speaking or pronouncement of the divine will, or of God who disposes all things; in another way passively — and the name itself sounds more in this sense — for the effect and passive disposition of this Fate inhering in the things themselves disposed. The first member is plain through Augustine, City of God V, chapter 8, where he cites Seneca, Homer, and the Stoics on this side. For from Seneca he cites these verses:

Lead me, O highest Father, lord of the lofty pole, Wherever it has pleased thee; there is no delay in obeying. I am at hand untiring; even should you wish me unwilling, I shall accompany groaning, And, evil, I shall suffer to do what was lawful for the good. Fates lead the willing; the unwilling they drag.

From Homer, however, he cites these verses, which Cicero translated into Latin:

Such are the minds of men, as the Father himself, Jupiter, has illumined the bountiful earth with light.

And Augustine says that through these verses, which the Stoics cite for their opinion concerning Fate, it is most openly declared what they think Fate to be — since they call him Jove, whom they hold to be the supreme God, from whom they say the connection of Fates depends. Whence it seems that Aristotle, De Anima II, [text] 148, unjustly reprehends Homer, imputing to him that Homer thought intellect to be corporeal, like sensation, because he said — as Aristotle reports — that such intellect is in earthly men as the Father of men and gods leads in the day. For by the Father of men and gods Homer did not mean the Sun or anything corporeal, as Aristotle tacitly insinuates and his expositors expressly state, but Jove himself, the supreme Father both of men and of the other gods, as is plain through his aforesaid verses, savoring of this same view. Nor ought it to stand in the way that he says "with light" — as if he meant that Jupiter does this through the medium of some material light. For he can fittingly understand by this light the agent intellect, which by your own testimony, De Anima III, [text] 18, is compared to light. Whence also the Psalmist, in Psalm 35: "In thy light we shall see light." This first member of the distinction concerning Fate is also plain through the Philosopher in the last [chapter] of De Mundo, expounding the three appointments of the Fates — as does also Isidore, Etymologies VIII, 45 — Atropos of the past, Lachesis of the future, Clotho of the present, and saying: "The fable, namely concerning the threefold Fate, is fashioned not without order. But all these are nothing other than God, as the strenuous Plato also says." Whence it appears that this opinion is also Plato's.

The second member of the aforesaid distinction is plain through Lady Philosophy in Book 4 of the Consolation of Philosophy, prose 6, where she instructs Boethius thus: "All generation of things, and the entire course of mutable natures, and whatever else is moved in any way, draws its causes, order, and forms from the stability of the divine mind. This, composed in the art of its simplicity, has appointed a manifold mode for the conduct of things; which mode, when it is contemplated in the very purity of the divine intelligence, is called Providence; but when it is referred to the things which it moves and disposes, it has been called by the ancients Fate. That these are different will easily be plain. For Providence is the very divine reason, established in the supreme Prince of all, which disposes all things; whereas Fate is a disposition inhering in mobile things, by which Providence binds each to its own orders. For Providence embraces all things equally, however diverse, however infinite; but Fate distributes individual things, distributed in motion, places, forms, and times — so that this unfolding of temporal order, gathered into the gaze of the divine mind, is Providence; but the same gathering, when distributed and unfolded in time, is called Fate. And although these are different, yet the one depends upon the other. For the order of Fate proceeds from the simplicity of Providence; for just as the artificer, perceiving in his mind the form of the thing to be made, moves the effecting of the work, and that which he had foreseen simply and as present he leads through temporal orders — so God by Providence indeed disposes singularly and stably the things to be done, but by Fate administers in many ways and temporally these very things which he has disposed. Whether, therefore, Fate is exercised by certain spirits ministering to divine Providence, or by the soul, or by the whole subservient nature, or by the celestial motions of the stars, or by Angelic virtue, or by the various craft of demons, or by some of these, or by all, the fatal series is woven; this surely is manifest, that Providence is the immovable and simple form of things to be done, but Fate is the mobile bond of these things which divine simplicity has disposed to be done, and the temporal order. Whence it comes that all things which are subject to Fate are also subject to Providence, to which Fate itself is also subject."

From these things, however, it appears that Boethius posits Fate only according to effect, not, however, according to the efficiency of the divine will, as do the Theologians and the Philosophers cited above. He also seems voluntarily to argue against the Stoics in his exposition of Aristotle's first Peri Hermeneias, where he treats of future contingents, in this — that they posited all things to come about from Fate. For they themselves were speaking of Fate according to the efficacy of the divine will, as appears from what has been said. Wherefore, they are perhaps immune from every real error, even if not from every verbal one, as the foregoing has taught. For this word "Fate" is suspect among Catholics, although the thing itself is sound.

Having shown, then, in what way Fate exists or does not exist, and what it is, it remains now to show of what kind it is. First, therefore, it must be shown that Fate, taken from fando, or from the speaking of God, is in some manner the cause of all things which are done naturally, voluntarily, or in any other way whatsoever. The proximate [chapter] proves this. That all voluntary things, however, come from Fate — namely from the speaking or connection of causes — appears through the proximate and the ninth of this [book]. Indeed, all who speak of Fate place it as much, or more, in human voluntary affairs as in any others. Which is also plain in City of God V, chapters 6 and 9, where Augustine says: "It does not follow that, if to God the order of all causes is certain, therefore there is nothing in the choice of our will. For our wills themselves are in the order of causes, which is certain to God, and is contained in his foreknowledge — since human wills are also the causes of human works. And so he who foreknew all the causes of things could surely not have been ignorant in those causes also of our wills, which he foreknew to be the causes of our works." And below, having distinguished three species or genera of causes — the fortuitous, the natural, and the voluntary — and again by cause which makes and is not made; which makes and is made; and which is made rather than makes; and having reduced all these species to the divine will, he subjoins: "How then does the order of causes which is certain to God who foreknows it bring it about that there is nothing in our will, since in that very order of causes our wills hold a great place? Let Cicero contend, then, with those who say this order of causes to be fatal, or rather call it by the name of Fate — which we abhor chiefly on account of the word, which is not wont to be understood in the true sense. But that he denies the order of all causes to be most certain and most known to the foreknowledge of God — this we detest more than the Stoics. Wherefore our wills also avail just as much as God willed and foreknew them to avail; and therefore whatever they avail, they most certainly avail; and what they are about to do, they shall altogether do, because he foreknew them as availing and as about to act, whose foreknowledge cannot be deceived." This he also more expressly manifests in chapter 10. With which agrees the authority of Boethius cited above, but in the same prose below he says still more expressly: "This series of Fate, or Providence, constrains the acts and fortunes of men by the indissoluble connection of causes."

CHAPTER XXIX. ON CHANCE AND FORTUNE.

It seems pertinent to what has been said to inquire in like manner concerning Chance and Fortune. For many concede these, and many likewise deny them. For Democritus and Epicurus and their followers not only concede them but even attribute excessive dignity to them, saying that all things come about by chance or fortuitously, as is plain from the 27th [chapter] of this [book]. Whence also that ancient Sallust says: "Surely fortune dominates in every matter." These things almost all the Philosophers, Poets, and the common people likewise concede. Aristotle concedes them in Physics II at length, and in his book On Good Fortune, and in many other places. Avicenna also, Algazel, Averroes, and Boethius concede them. Ovid too, in The Art of Love: "Chance prevails everywhere; let your hook always hang ready, in the pool where you least believe it, there will the fish be." The same in Ex Ponto: "All human things hang by a slender thread; and by sudden chance, things which were strong, fall." Many other such things from the Poets are sufficient. The common people likewise posit these, as the adverbs of doubting show, which are very frequently inserted in almost every conversation. The sacred letters too are not silent concerning chance. Whence 2 Samuel 1: "By chance I came to Mount Gilboa"; and 1 Kings (last chapter): "A certain man, drawing a bow at random, by chance struck the King of Israel"; and Ecclesiastes 9: "I saw that neither is the race to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, nor bread to the wise, nor riches to the learned, nor favor to the skillful, but time and chance in all things." The ancient Gentiles, especially the Egyptians and Romans, also worshiped Fortune as a Goddess, as many histories tell, whom certain of the Jews, turned away from the Lord, also at times worshiped: of whom Isaiah 65: "You who have forsaken the Lord, who set a table for Fortune," etc., "I will number you in the sword." However many times also, in Sacred Scripture, adverbs of doubting are placed, all of which seem to belong to fortune.

To these, on the contrary, the Stoics utterly deny Chance and Fortune, affirming that all things are conducted by fate and divine providence. With these agree certain Ancients likewise destroying Fortune and Chance, since one ought to refer each of the things that happen to some determinate and certain cause, as the Philosopher briefly mentions in Physics II, [text] 42. With these likewise certain Catholic Doctors seem to consent. That these, then, who are as it were in extreme contraries, may be brought back to the middle of concord, it must be known that all who speak of Chance and Fortune say that these exist when something happens beyond the intention of the agent, as is plain through the aforesaid Authors and through the common conception of all who speak of them. Now, that something should occur beyond the intention of the agent can be considered in two ways: either beyond the intention of every agent altogether, so that it is intended absolutely by no one, or beyond the intention of some particular cause, or of any inferior cause whatever. The first may be called simply casual or fortuitous; but the second only in some respect. Therefore, nothing is simply casual or fortuitous, but only in some respect; and thus the contradiction mentioned above is removed.

That nothing is simply casual or fortuitous is shown in this way. Nothing which is done from purpose and from the intention of an agent is simply casual or fortuitous. But everything that is done is done from purpose and from the intention of the agent. This agent, however, the Astrologers think to be the heaven, or celestial virtue, which produces all things — even those which seem to be fortuitous — by certain reason and determinate causation. Wherefore they call certain planets fortunate, and indeed even fortunes — namely the Sun and Moon. The "Part of Fortune" too, in nativities, in the inceptions of works, and in all human matters, is judged to be of the very greatest power, and is reckoned the most excellent of all parts. Hence they assign to it the tenth essential house. This is taken in the day from the Sun to the Moon, but at night the contrary, and is projected from the ascendant. Of this, Albumasar, Greater Introductory VIII, difference 3, writes thus: "Its proper signification is to signify the soul and fortune, of that and its powers; and it signifies life and bodies, and substance and progress, and fortune, also enrichment and poverty, gold and silver, and utility and weight, the praise of the marketplace, and good fame, and the eminence of the one born, and of his kingdom, and of his principality. And it signifies the rich, and honor, also eminence, both good and evil, the present and the absent, the apparent and the hidden. It signifies also the intention and beginning of works and matters; and this Part is preferred to all parts, just as the Sun is preferred by its splendor to all the planets; and it is itself loftier and more precious than all the parts." And hence perhaps it is that goods of this kind, by many — even by Philosophers — are most often called the goods of fortune.

Others, however — namely the ancient Gentiles — thought there was one Goddess distributing or withdrawing all such goods at the pleasure of her will, without any reason; wherefore they had even painted her as blind, and called her Fortune. But both these positions are refuted by the things set forth in the proximate [chapter] and the chapters above, especially if the Astrologers should posit human acts to be subject of necessity to celestial virtue, or that virtue itself to do anything at all without God specifically intending and likewise effecting the same. What, then, is that agent which from a certain intention and a determinate purpose makes all things and effects all things, but God, who is the first agent of all agents and makes all things according to the purpose and intention of his own will, as the 28th and 27th [chapters] of this [book] show? Likewise, Chance and Fortune are causes per accidens, as is plain from Physics II, and every cause per accidens is reduced to some cause per se, as the second [chapter] of this [book] shows; and every cause per se to God; therefore God is the first cause of these, and not rashly and necessarily, but according to the purpose of his will.

But lest I seem singular in this judgment, behold, many Philosophers and Theologians hold this view. Aristotle, in Physics II, among the recited opinions on Chance and Fortune, shows in what way that opinion has truth which posits nothing to be done by Fortune, saying that Fortune is the cause of nothing simply, but only per accidens, in these words: "And so it will appear as though nothing were done by Fortune. They speak rightly in all this, for it is reasonable that there should be such a thing as Fortune; for it happens per accidens, and Fortune is a cause per accidens; but as cause simply of nothing — as the builder is properly the cause of the house, but the flute-player per accidens." That all Fortune, however, is reduced to God appears through the same author in the last [chapter] of De Mundo, where he shows how, although he is one, yet he is many-named — from all the things which he initiates — as he inductively declares, and at the end he says thus: "And in sum to speak, he is to be called both heavenly and earthly, and from any Nature and Fortune, as being himself the cause of all." And below he says that God is called Heimarmene because he couples and disjoins, and Nemesis from the distribution made to each — which seem fitting to Fortune. Whence also Damascene, Sentences 39, expounds heimarmene as Fortune. He proves this still more expressly in his book On Good Fortune, where he recites five opinions concerning it, namely: that it is from God, from Nature, from the event of things, from reason, and from appetite — concerning which he proceeds disputatively. And in chapter 2 he refutes the last two opinions. First, that of appetite, since of every appetite there is some cause, either nature or fortune. If nature, then nature is more properly called the cause of it than fortune; and such a man would more properly be called well-natured than well-fortuned. If fortune is the cause of it, then fortune will be the cause of all human acts, since it is the cause of that which is to understand and to take counsel. And he adds, arguing: "For he who took counsel did not take counsel before he took counsel, but it is a certain principle; nor did he who understood understand before he understood — and this to infinity. Therefore the intellect is not the principle of understanding, nor counsel of taking counsel. What other, then, but fortune? And so all things are from fortune." And he answers, saying: "Either there is some principle of which there is not another outside itself, or, since it is such according to its being, it can produce such; but what is sought is this: What is the principle of motion in the soul? Plainly, just as in the universe, God. For in some way the divine moves all things in us. The principle of reason is not reason but something better. What, then, will be better than knowledge and intellect, save God? For virtue is the instrument of intellect. And on this account those of old were called well-fortuned who, if they make a rush, direct it without existing reason, and to take counsel does not benefit them; for they have a principle such as is better than intellect and counsel. But those who have reason do not have this, nor divine instincts." And in the first chapter he says: "There is in the soul, by nature, that whereby we are borne by impulse without reason; in respect of which we shall surely fare well. And if anyone should ask one who is so disposed why this pleases him to do, he says: 'I do not know, but it pleases me' — suffering something like those things which are done by God. For, borne by God, they have impulse without reason to do something." And in Rhetoric II, [chapter] 23, treating of the goods of Fortune and the well-fortuned, he says thus: "They are more unpremeditated on account of good fortune. The best disposition of good fortune is asserted to be those who are lovers of God, and have themselves toward the divine in some way, believing on account of the good things done by Fortune" — but why this, unless God were the Author of Fortune?

The same author also, in Ethics X, [chapter] 14, recites a threefold opinion as to how men become good, saying thus: "Some hold that men become good by nature, others by custom, others by teaching." And determining the truth of the first opinion, he says thus: "That which is of nature, then, is manifest; that it is not in us, but exists by some divine cause, as it is for the truly well-fortuned." On which Averroes says: "Some men are thought to be good by nature; and what is of this by nature is not from us, but by a certain divine grace to those whose fortune is truly good." Likewise Avicenna, Metaphysics X, 1, says: "The principle of all utilities is from divine care; and know that the common people approach more closely and hold to it; and he says: It is true, nor do they shrink from this, except those who wish to seem Philosophers, because they are ignorant of the causes and occasions of these things." And speaking of adversities and prosperities, almsgivings and sins, and similar things, he says thus: "The cause of all these is not here, but thence. The principles of all these proceed to nature, will, or chance. The principle of nature, indeed, is there. But our wills are after they were not; whatever, however, is, after it was not, has a cause. Therefore every will of ours has a cause; and the cause of this will does not extend to infinity, but to certain things which happen extrinsically — earthly, namely, or celestial; but earthly things attain to celestial. The collection, then, of all these comes necessarily from the necessity of the divine will. Chance, however, comes from the concurrence of all these. For when you have resolved all things, they will be reduced to those things, the necessity of which depends solely upon God Almighty. The judgment of God, however, is the first simple position." This Boethius too suggests in the Exposition on the First Peri Hermeneias, where, having distinguished a threefold animal — namely, that subject to nature, to the heaven, and to reason with free choice of will — and having declared the two prior species, of the third he says thus: "Which we are: all subject to divine providence; from the will of the Gods we likewise depend. Therefore neither is the entire necessity of the celestials overthrown, nor does this discussion eliminate chance from things." By which he intimates, as it seems, that there is in things chance with respect to particular and inferior causes, but not with respect to divine providence and will, to which we are subject in all things, and from which we depend in all. This he manifests yet more diffusely and expressly in the fifth book of the Consolation of Philosophy, prose 1: "If indeed anyone defines chance as an event produced by rash motion, with no connection of causes, I affirm that there is nothing at all of chance" — behold, that nothing is simply casual, since it is not beyond the intention of God, as the following sentence shows: "For what place can remain for rashness, while God constrains all things into order?" And, having recited Aristotle's definition of Chance, and given the example of one digging the soil for the sake of cultivating the field and finding a hidden treasure, he says: "The digging of the soil and the hiding of the treasure are fortuitous causes of gain — that is, Chance — which comes from causes meeting and flowing together with one another, not from the intention of the doer; nor did either he who buried the gold, or he who tilled the field, intend that the money should be found." It is plain, therefore, according to him, that nothing is called simply casual, but only with respect to some particular cause, or with respect to inferior causes — which his following words more fully show, when he says: "It is plain, therefore, to define Chance as an unforeseen event from concurrent causes in those things which are done for some other purpose. The order proceeding by inevitable connection, however, makes the causes meet and flow together; and this order, descending from the fount of Providence, disposes all things in their times and places," which the following meter exemplifies.

This also clearly seems to be the judgment of Augustine, Retractations I, 1, saying: "It does not please me that I so often called upon fortune, although I did not wish any goddess to be understood by this name, but the fortuitous event of things either in our body or in external goods or evils. Whence also are those words which no religion forbids us to say: perhaps (forte), peradventure (forsan), perchance (forsitan), perhaps (fortassis), perhaps (fortasse), fortuitously (fortuitu) — which, however, must all be referred to divine providence." This too I did not pass over there in silence, saying: "For perhaps that which is commonly named Fortune is governed by some hidden order; and we call nothing else Chance in things, save that whose reason and cause is secret or hidden." I said this indeed; but it grieves me that I there named Fortune, since I see that men have it as a most evil custom that, where it ought to be said God so willed, they say Fortune so willed. The same author, in 83 Questions, Question 24: "Whatever happens by chance, happens at random; what happens at random does not happen by providence. If, therefore, some things happen in the world by chance, the entire world is not administered by providence; therefore nothing happens in the world by chance." The same, City of God V, 9: "Those causes which are called fortuitous (whence also Fortune received its name), we say are not none, but hidden; and we attribute them either to the will of the true God, or of any spirits whatever." The same on that of Psalm 9, "I will confess to thee, O Lord, with my whole heart": "He does not confess to God with his whole heart who in any way doubts of his providence. All bodily torments either exercise those converted to God, or admonish that they may be converted, or prepare the obdurate for the just final damnation; and so all things are referred to the regimen of divine providence, which fools think happen by chance, at random, and with no divine administration."

The same, also, on that of Psalm 148: "Fire, hail, snow," etc., "which do his word": "Why does he add, which do his word? Many, unwilling to contemplate and discern the creature performing its motions in its own places and order under the nod and command of God, it has seemed to them that God governs all higher things, but does not care for, govern, or rule the lower, but they are abandoned to chance. But do not assent to these; for these things are blasphemous and execrable to God, since the entire providence of God is at work in the earth. In all places, regions, and times, he distributes and orders his own things to each. It would be long to recall the more diligent consideration of all things; who shall explain it? Yet those who have eyes see the visible things which please and are praised — yet not these things themselves, but he who made them. Thus shall all things praise. These things, then, which seem to be moved by chances, do his word, and in their every motion serve the word of God."

This same thing is plain through the Apostle to the Ephesians 1, saying: "We have been called by lot." For what is sors (lot) but fors (chance), fortune, or accident? But this lot is the divine election and will, as is plain there through the Gloss, and through Augustine on that of Psalm 30, "In thy hands are my lots," in tract 3, saying thus: "Sors is called the grace of God by which we have been saved, which is well called sors because it is not the choice of man but the will of God; for it found no merits of ours, but by the lot of his own will called us to salvation, because he willed, not because we were worthy, not from works lest perhaps anyone should be exalted. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus in good works. This sors is in some manner hidden; the will of God in the human race is sors; sors coming from the hidden will of God, with whom there is no iniquity. For he is no respecter of persons, but his hidden justice is sors to thee." What also is more casual or fortuitous than the lot and the events of lots — which yet are known to be moderated by the divine will, as the series of either Testament evidently shows? Wherefore the Apostles, when about to elect another in the place of Judas the Apostate, casting lots, said: "Thou, O Lord, show whom thou hast chosen." Whence also Proverbs 16: "Lots are cast into the bosom, but they are tempered by the Lord." Wherefore also Augustine on that of Psalm 30, where above, says thus: "Not in the hands of men, but in thy hands. What are these lots? Why lots? On hearing the name of lots we ought not to seek out diviners. For sors is not anything evil, but is a thing in human doubt indicating the divine will. For the Apostles also cast lots." This is also recited in the Canon, Cause 26, Question 2, Sors non est.

Furthermore, for Chance and Fortune to be more fully investigated, it seems that each is taken actively and passively, according to efficiency and according to effect, according to cause and according to that which is caused — just as was said above of Fate. Actively, according to efficiency and cause, the Philosopher speaks of them in Physics II, defining each as a "Cause per accidens," etc., as is there written; which also is plain especially of Fortune through what has been set forth here. That Chance, however, is taken passively, according to effect and that which is caused, its very name seems to indicate; for Casus seems to signify passively. For what is casus but that which falls (cadit) from another, as the effect from the cause? Wherefore we commonly say: "A wonderful chance befell or happened to such a man." Wherefore also the definition of Chance recited from Boethius says that Chance is "an unforeseen event from concurrent causes in those things which are done for some other purpose"; with which agrees Augustine cited above: "We call nothing else Chance in things," he says, "save that whose reason and cause is secret or hidden." But Chance taken actively, according to efficiency and cause, would more properly, as it seems, be called casuatio or casuantia. That Fortune also is taken passively, and according to effect and that which is caused, appears similarly from the customary mode of speaking. For we commonly say "wonderful prosperous or adverse fortune befell such a man," wishing to say that some good fortune (enfortunium) or misfortune (infortunium) has befallen him. Whence also the Philosopher, Ethics I, showing that felicity does not consist in the goods of fortune, since itself is permanent and by no means easily mutable, whereas fortune is the contrary, in chapter 15 says that fortune often "recirculates" around the same persons — recirculates, he says, passively. And below, chapter 16, speaking of the Happy Man, to whom prosperous or adverse things happen: "We all judge," he says, "the truly good and wise man to bear his fortunes becomingly." Wherefore also Augustine cited above says that by the name "fortune" he did not wish to signify any goddess, but a fortuitous event of things.

Yet, considering the things above diligently, it seems that Fortune, taken actively according to efficiency and cause, may be further subdistinguished. For it can be taken for a cause which acts from purpose toward some certain end, and causes another end not intended; and thus the Philosopher in Physics II speaks of it; and thus it pertains only to inferior causes — by no means to God, as the things had above have shown. It can also be taken for a cause secret and hidden from us — beyond our knowledge, intention, and supposition (though not its own) — producing something; and thus it can pertain to inferior causes, and likewise to superior, to Angels and to God. Whence the Philosopher in Physics II, [text] 47, says: "There are some to whom there seems to be a certain cause Fortune — unmanifest indeed to human intellect, as a certain divine and more felicitous being." This judgment is also strengthened by Augustine, City of God V, 9, cited above; which especially of God and of the divine will many things, both philosophical and theological, set forth above seem to attest.

But here perhaps someone may object to me with that of Averroes who, on Physics II, [text] 48, refutes Avicenna because in Physics I, [chapter] 13, of his own work he posited something to be and to be called casual, in that it is casual with respect to one cause although with respect to another it is necessary. But this does not stand in the way, since Avicenna speaks of the casual according to a respect, not, however, simply — for thus, according to him, nothing is casual, as is plain through his authority, Metaphysics X, 1, alleged above. Averroes, however, who from custom willingly catches a man at his words, argues against Avicenna's words, not against his meaning, by proving that from this cause nothing ought to be called simply casual; and so he concludes only verbally, but in fact nothing against him. Whence Proverbs 19: "He who follows only words shall have nothing." Wherefore Avicenna can say to Averroes what once Aphratagoras said to Socrates, as the same Averroes recites from Themistius on De Caelo III, comment 17: "If your contradiction against me," he says, "were according to the meaning of my intention, surely it would conclude against me. But since you do not understand the meaning of my speech, I do not consider that anything is concluded against me."

Yet, favoring neither of these, but holding the truth in honor above all, it seems to me that nothing is called absolutely casual, according to the common usage of the speech of Philosophers or of the common people, except what is casual with respect to any of its inferior causes known to us, or at least with respect to its principal cause known to us — not, however, what is casual or beyond the intention of an instrumental and accessory cause whatsoever. For if someone deliberately kills a man with a sword, that killing is not called casual, although it is beyond the intention of the sword — which only intends to descend and cut — and beyond the intention of the air, which, principally intending something else, perhaps acts accessorially to this.

CHAPTER XXX. THAT VOLUNTARY THINGS ARE GOVERNED BY THE LAWS OF DIVINE PROVIDENCE.

Lest, however, anyone should believe that the things had concerning providence are true only in natural things, it must specially be shown that voluntary things also are by no means exempted from the laws of this providence. For this follows from chapter 27, and can be shown in like manner by the reasons and authorities of that chapter, as also the next two chapters from abundance make plain. Likewise, every wise Father of a family provides for and cares for better and more perfect things more diligently and solicitously. But rational and voluntary things are better and more perfect than other natural things, for they are the end of these, as chapter 21 teaches.

This seems to be the reason of the Savior against the Epicureans, anxious for themselves and not placing their hope in divine providence, salutarily admonishing: "Be not anxious for your soul, what you shall eat, nor for your body, what you shall put on. Is not the Soul more than Food, and the body more than raiment? Behold the birds of the air, that they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; and your heavenly Father feeds them. Are you not of much more value than they? Which of you by being anxious can add a single cubit to his stature? And about clothing, why are you anxious? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they neither toil nor spin: I tell you, however, that not even Solomon in all his glory was arrayed like one of these. But if the grass of the field, which today is and tomorrow is cast into the oven, God so clothes, how much more you, O you of little faith?" Matthew 6. From which he thus concludes:

"Be not therefore anxious, saying, What shall we eat? or What shall we drink? or Wherewith shall we be clothed? for after all these things do the Gentiles seek; for your Father knows that you have need of all these." But of what avail to us would be this knowledge of the Father, if according to it he did not provide for his sons?

In this passage, as is plain to one beholding it, and as Chrysostom says, Christ argues by a twofold argument or topic: first descending from the greater to the lesser, when he premises, "Is not the soul more than food, and the body more than raiment?" Second, on the contrary, ascending from the lesser to the greater, when he premises, "Behold the birds of the air," etc. And Chrysostom adds, on that "Are you not of much more value than they?": "All animals God made for the sake of man, but man for his own sake. As much, therefore, as the creation of man is more precious, so much greater is God's solicitude for him." So also many holy Doctors expound this passage, whom the Gloss in part recites there.

Likewise, after the Savior, in Matthew 10, foretold to the Apostles the persecutions which they were about to suffer for his name, in order to strengthen them against the fear of death by means of divine providence, he said thus: "Fear not them that kill the body. Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear not, therefore: you are of more value than many sparrows." On which Chrysostom says that he again introduces the discourse on God's providence; and Jerome says, as is alleged in the Gloss, and it is the meaning: "If little animals do not fall without God as Author, and there is providence in all things, and the things which in these are to perish do not perish without the will of God, you who are eternal ought not to fear that you live without God's providence." But that he says, "the very hairs of your head are all numbered," shows the immense providence of God toward men, and signifies an ineffable effect — that nothing of ours is hidden from God. According indeed to Hilary and Chrysostom, the numbering of the hairs shows the diligence of divine providence concerning us.

This reason the Apostle also seems to confirm, 1 Corinthians 9, where he wills that providence, or God's care concerning natural and irrational things, is as it were nothing in comparison with his care concerning us, saying thus: "It is written in the law, Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the grain. Doth God take care for oxen? or saith he it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes it is written." With which the Philosopher agrees in De Caelo II, [text] 50, where, arguing against those positing the stars to be moved by their own motion, he supposes that nature more cares for the precious, saying thus: "Moreover, it would be irrational that nature gave them" — namely, the stars — "no organ for motion; for nature does nothing in vain, nor that, having cared for the animals, has she despised the precious." Otherwise, the entire Scripture concerning the Predestination of the Saints, and the Reprobation of the wicked, would be emptied.

CHAPTER XXXI. THAT VOLUNTARY ACTIONS ARE SUBJECT TO DIVINE PROVIDENCE.

But here someone might still be willful, saying that voluntary things themselves are contained under providence, but not voluntary actions themselves. Wherefore it seems expedient to restrain this willfulness, which can plainly be done through the proximate Chapters and their proofs. Likewise, by the reasons and Authorities of the proximate chapter, voluntary things are subjected to divine providence, and this in particular more than the rest; therefore, according to the mind of the Authors, this is according to that, or with respect to those things which are voluntary, namely according to their voluntary actions. For the very volitive power, and whatever else apart from voluntary actions, is purely natural and necessary. In the providence over such things, then, no such great distinction is to be made by discreet men from the providence over other natural things; nay, more truly it might be said, "The face of man like the fishes of the sea, and like the creeping thing that has no ruler" (Habakkuk 1) — unless God provided also for voluntary actions.

Likewise, by chapter 9, the will of God is the moving cause of every motion, and not at random, but with disposing wisdom; and neither of them is new, but eternal, as the foregoing have taught: therefore the proposition is plain through the definition of providence given above. Likewise, all natural actions, as much of animate things as of inanimate, are from providence, since they are produced by his will and knowledge — as is plain enough from earlier chapters — and since they happen naturally and necessarily; therefore they are reduced to the first necessary being, from which they flow and on which they depend. This, even of the actions of irrational creatures, of which it seems less so, is plain through Augustine, On Faith, to Blessed Peter, chapter 31, saying: "Those irrational animals carry out the course and order of the present age according to the incomprehensible will of the Creator; which animals are about to render no account of their deeds, since they are not rational."

Voluntary actions, however, are better and more acceptable to God; for to these he prepared a fitting retribution, not to those — as both Philosophers and Theologians say with one mouth in concert. Wherefore they are also disposed by a more solicitous providence, as the proximate chapter argued; which is plain enough through the Apostle, Ephesians 1 and 2, where he sets forth a twofold preordination or predestination: the first, of justice and just works in the present; the second, of glory and rewards in the future. Whence for the preordination of justice, in chapter 1 he says: "He chose us before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and unspotted." And for the preordination of just works, in chapter 2 he says thus: "We are his workmanship, created in good works, that we should walk in them." All this is plain there through the Gloss, which more amply pursues this twofold preordination or predestination, citing under these words of Jerome: "He distinguishes two preordinations of God, and their effects: of which the one is of the present, to justice; the other of the future, to the crown."

Augustine also, On Grace and Free Will, chapter 21, expounding the authority alleged from the second chapter, says thus: "What is this that he said, Not from works, lest anyone should be exalted? Hear, and understand: not from your own works existing of yourselves, but as in those in which God formed you — that is, fashioned and created you. For this is what he says: We are his workmanship, created in good works — not by that creation by which we were made men, but by that of which he was speaking who was indeed a man: 'Create in me a clean heart, O God.'" The same author, On Faith, to Peter, chapter 32, says thus: "Those will reign with Christ whom God by his gratuitous goodness has predestined to the kingdom. For he who prepared them as such by predestining them, prepared them to be called according to his purpose, that they should obey, to be justified, that having received grace they should rightly believe and live well." Whence it is most clearly plain that God prepared for those predestined to the kingdom to obey, to believe rightly, and to live well — which are to act voluntarily, or voluntary actions. These therefore are reduced to divine providence.

Likewise, Augustine, On Genesis according to the Letter VIII, 11 and following, at length shows that God presides over the entire creation, rational and irrational, even over wills of every sort, by the bipartite work of providence: namely, of creation and of administration; of creation as regards the production of any creature; of administration as regards its actions and passions and other motions — which in chapter 13 he shows by a likeness thus: "Just as the motion of any member of an animal is from the soul, and even relies on something fixed in moving, so the motion of any creature is from God, and relies on him as on the fixed, while it is moved." The same, Confessions I, 6: "I received the consolations of human milk; nor did my mother or my nurses fill their breasts of themselves, but you, O Lord, gave me the nourishment of infancy according to your justification, and your riches disposed even to the foundation of things." And below, in chapter 12: "I was urged to learn letters, and good came to me, nor did those who urged me act well; but good came to me from you, my God. For they did not consider toward what end I should refer that which they compelled me to learn — beyond satisfying the insatiable desires of copious want and of ignominious glory. But you, by whom the very hairs of our head are numbered, made use of the error of all who were urging me to learn for my benefit." And in Confessions VII, 6, on consulting the Mathematicians, and on those consulted: "You, most just Moderator of the universe, by hidden instinct so act with consulters and consulted being ignorant, that when each consults, he hears that which he ought to hear by the hidden merits of souls from the abyss of your just judgment."

Likewise, all voluntary actions are from divine fate, and absolutely nothing in voluntary acts is casual or fortuitous, as chapters 28 and 29 teach; therefore all voluntary actions are derived from divine providence. Likewise, all prosperous or adverse things which befall men through voluntary actions are foreseen by God; therefore also all such voluntary actions: for if they were casual with respect to God, whatever proceeded from them would likewise be casual. For Aristotle in De Bona Fortuna, chapter 2, proves that fortune is not the cause of intellection and counsel, since then all things would be from fortune. For all our works are caused by intention and counsel — or at least the argument is understood concerning such things. Wherefore Averroes on Physics II, [text] 44, refutes those of opinion that the motion of the Heaven is from chance, since, since it itself bestows order on other beings, all other causes would be found to be from Chance. For what is found from that which is from chance, is found from Chance. Reason itself persuades the same: for if God reasonably intends some end coming about through voluntary actions, either he intends to do it immediately by himself alone, or through some intermediate means, or in neither way. Not in the first way, since he does not so do. If in the second way, either through the same means by which it is produced — and so the proposition is had — or through others; and so his will is frustrated in something, or changed, contrary to what was said before. If in neither way, he does not reasonably intend that end. For whoever reasonably intends any end, likewise intends the means through which such end may come — unless he wills to do it immediately by himself, as is plain from Ethics III, 8, where it is said thus: "Setting some end, one intends in what manner and through what means it shall be" — and to this the whole of that chapter conduces.

That all prosperous things are derived from divine providence is sufficiently established from earlier chapters; from abundance, however, it can otherwise be shown thus: Otherwise, one receiving such things would not be bound to render thanks to God for them, which no one will presume to affirm save the enemy of grace, the subverter of either Testament, the mocker of the holy Fathers, and the most untaught reproacher of all Catholic Doctors — who teach to give to the Lord our God always not feigned or foolish thanks, but true and discerning, for all things. For "the thanks of the foolish are poured out," Ecclesiasticus 20; and according to Augustine, On the Predestination of the Saints, chapter 26: "If anyone should give thanks to a man, on the ground that he thought that man either had not foreknown, or knew not, it would more truly be called adulation or mockery than thanksgiving. But be not deceived, says the Apostle, God is not mocked." And according to the same, On the Good of Perseverance, chapter 2: "It is a mocking thanksgiving, if for this thanks are given to God which he himself did not bestow, nor did." Likewise, otherwise such prosperous things would not be gifts of God; and since this destroys the sequence of either Testament, and faith, as it were the common conception of the soul innate in all — or rather, is destroyed by these — no one of the faithful will concede this, and scarcely any unbeliever.

Likewise this is plain concerning the Powers, Dignities, and all Prelacies. To begin from the loftier and worthier: if anyone could be Pope without the Lord providing, it would not be certain to us that the Lord provides the Pope; wherefore neither ought we to write to the Supreme Pontiff thus, "By such divine providence" — though this style is customary to all, and admitted by the curia, and hitherto approved. Nor ought other Prelates or Kings to write thus: "By such grace of God, Bishop, or King," nor we to them — lest perhaps we be found false witnesses of God, giving testimony against God, that he provided whom he did not provide; which is no small peril, as is plain from 1 Corinthians 15. For according to Augustine (and the Gloss alleges this), "by no less but perhaps a greater crime, falsehood is praised in God than truth blamed."

Likewise this is true of secular Kings; wherefore also of any Ecclesiastical persons; which must first be declared concerning the Kings of England. William of Malmesbury reports, in On the Deeds of the English Kings and Pontiffs, Book 2, chapter 106, concerning the most holy Edward the Confessor, in these words: "Brithwold, Bishop of Winchester, had once seen, by the revelation of a dream, the felicity of that age; he had seen, and had announced it. For while in the time of King Cnut he was watching at Glastonbury in heavenly vigils, and there came upon him a thought which often disturbed him, of the royal stock of the English nearly extinguished, while he was meditating on this, sleep crept upon him; and behold, caught up on high, he sees Peter the Prince of the Apostles consecrating Edward himself, who was then in exile in Normandy, as King — designating him for a celibate life, with a fixed number of 24 years of reign computed for him. And to him complaining about posterity, [Peter] answered: 'The kingdom of the English is God's; he has provided himself a King after thee at his own pleasure.'" All Kings of the English, therefore, are exalted by divine providence; wherefore also all others. For "the earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof."

This same thing is plain concerning the institution and destitution of Kings, and the division and translation of kingdoms, in the books of Kings and Chronicles, in many places: first, of the institution of Saul, 1 Samuel 9; and of his destitution, 1 Samuel 15; of the institution of David, 1 Samuel 16; of the division of the kingdom predicted in the time of Solomon, but for the merits of David deferred to the time of Rehoboam, and then completed; of the institution of Jeroboam over the 10 tribes, and of Rehoboam and his sons over the residue, that a Lamp might remain to David, 1 Kings 11 and 12. And therefore when Rehoboam, with the tribe of Judah and the house of Benjamin, wished to fight against Jeroboam and the house of Israel, that he might restore the kingdom, the Lord said to them through the Prophet: "You shall not go up, nor fight; for from me has this thing been done," 1 Kings 12, and 2 Chronicles 11: "Let each return to his own house, for this hath been done by my will." Whence Hosea 8 [Proverbs 28]: "By the sins of the land are its many princes." And Ecclesiasticus 10: "In the hand of God is the power of the earth; he shall raise up a useful ruler over it in his time. The kingdom shall be transferred from one nation to another, on account of injustices, and injuries, and contumelies, and various deceits." These things, however, God willed to manifest in his peculiar kingdom — namely, of the Hebrews — that through fewer or one he might teach in many, and universally in all, that it is so. Whence the Apostle to the Romans 13: "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers; for there is no power but of God, and those that are, are ordained of God. Therefore he who resists the power, resists the ordinance of God." Likewise 1 Peter 2: "Be subject to every human creature for God's sake, whether to a King as supreme, or to governors as sent by him for the punishment of evildoers, but for the praise of the good. Servants, be subject in all fear to your masters, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward."

Yet further, this is true of those kingdoms concerning which it seems less so — namely, of unbelievers and of evil men; wherefore also universally of any whatsoever. Whence Amos 9: "Are you not as the children of the Ethiopians to me, O children of Israel, says God? Did not I cause Israel to come up out of the land of Egypt, and the Philistines from Cappadocia, and the Syrians from Cyrene? Behold the eyes of the Lord are upon the kingdom that sins, and I will destroy it from the face of the earth." With which the Apostle agrees, Romans 3: "Is he the God of the Jews only? Is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also." And below, chapter 10: "There is no distinction of Jew and Greek; for the same is Lord of all." For which Augustine, in City of God V, and elsewhere very diffusely, shows that the Kingdom of the Romans was from God. Whence also in V, 11, he says thus: "The most high God, who disposes the great and small parts of the world, is in no wise to be believed to have willed that the kingdoms of men, and their dominions and servitudes, should be alien from the laws of his providence" — and he speaks there principally concerning the Kingdom and Empire of the Romans, for the time of their unbelief. The same, above, in chapter 1: "The cause of the magnitude and long duration of the Roman Empire is neither fortunate nor fatal — according to the opinion of those who say things are fortunate which have no causes, or do not come from any rational order, and fatal which happen by some necessity beyond the will of God and men: utterly, by divine providence, are human kingdoms established." And the same is clearly plain in IV, 33.

Likewise Jerome in Book 5 of his commentary on Isaiah — which he composed in the more lovable historical exposition for the 10 visions of Isaiah, namely of Babylon, Philistia, Moab, Damascus, Egypt, the desert of the sea, Idumea, Arabia, the valley of vision, and Tyre, which according to him are there better called the 10 burdens; for the Hebrew word Massa is understood as burden or weight, for which the Seventy translated vision — handles this matter at length; and on that of Isaiah 22, "The burden of the valley of vision," he says thus: "The Seventy translated more manifestly: the valley of Sion. For this city is the seedbed of the Prophets, in which the temple was constructed, and the visions of the Lord were multiplied; which, although it is founded on a mountain, is in no way called a mountain, but a valley, because it has been humbled — which Jeremiah also speaks of, when he takes the cup full of wine and gives it to all the nations, and last gives it to Jerusalem, that she may drink, and vomit, and fall, and be mad — signifying that this is to be devastated by the Babylonians. From which we understand the Creator of all to be equally God, and to dispense all things by the same judgment, according to that which he himself speaks through Amos, Are you not as the children of the Ethiopians, etc., recited above — lest the Jews should think they had a privilege of merits because they had been led out of Egypt. He says also that other nations are translated to other lands by his command."

Likewise this is plain especially of the four great kingdoms, unknown to no one: first of the Chaldeans or Babylonians, second of the Medes and Persians, third of the Greeks, fourth of the Romans — concerning which it is found scattered in Scripture frequently and conjointly, in Daniel 2, under the metaphor of the four parts of the statue revealed to Nebuchadnezzar himself through a dream; and below in chapter 7, under the figure of four great beasts seen through a dream by Daniel. Whence Daniel himself says thus: "The Lord himself changes times and ages, transfers kingdoms and establishes them"; on which the Gloss: "We should not therefore wonder if at times we see Kings succeed Kings, and Kingdoms Kingdoms. All things happen by the will of him who knows the causes of all, who founded all things, and permits even evil Kings to be raised up, that they may punish the evil, and cleanse the good." And below, Daniel said to Nebuchadnezzar, the first Monarch of the Chaldeans, in this special manner: "Thou, O King, art King of Kings, and the God of Heaven hath given thee a kingdom, and strength, and power, and glory, and all things wherein the children of men dwell; and the beasts of the field also, and the birds of the air, hath he given into thy hand, and hath put all things under thy dominion." With which the most holy Jeremiah agrees in chapter 27, in the person of the Lord saying thus: "I made the earth, and man, and the cattle that are upon the face of the whole earth, in my great strength, and in my outstretched arm; and I gave it to whom it pleased in my eyes. And now therefore I have given all these lands into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, my servant; moreover, the beasts of the field also have I given to him, that they may serve him; and all nations shall serve him, and his son, and his son's son, until the time of his own land come, and of himself." And below, chapter 43: "Behold, I will send and take Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon, my servant, and I will set his throne upon these stones, and he will set his seat upon them, and coming, he shall strike the land of Egypt." This same thing the voice rushing down from heaven testifies, in these words: "To thee it is said, O King Nebuchadnezzar: Thy kingdom hath passed from thee, until thou know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will" (Daniel 4). And below, in chapter 5, the destruction of this first kingdom and the institution of the second is found explicitly through the writing Mene, Tekel, Peres, and its interpretation, saying to Belshazzar the last King: "God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it; thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians" — which was at once fulfilled, Babylon being captured by Darius and Cyrus, Kings of the Medes and Persians, and Belshazzar slain.

Of Cyrus also, the successor of Darius, Isaiah 45 says: "Thus saith the Lord to my anointed Cyrus, whose right hand I have taken hold of, that I may subdue nations before him, and turn the backs of Kings," etc. Whence also that same Cyrus, 2 Chronicles, last chapter, and 1 Esdras 1, says thus: "All the kingdoms of the earth hath the Lord God of Heaven given to me." Of the third kingdom also, or third Monarchy — namely the Greeks, over which Alexander presided — the same is plain especially through what was set forth in showing the 32nd part of the first Corollary of this [book]. Of the fourth Monarchic kingdom, namely of the Romans, Augustine in City of God V, at length, especially teaches the same. Of these great kingdoms and of unbelievers, let these things suffice for this occasion. Through which, although the proposition is sufficiently apparent concerning the kingdoms of the wicked, yet it can be briefly shown from abundance thus. Job 34: "He maketh a hypocrite to reign for the sins of the people." On which Gregory, Morals XXV, 15: "Let no one who suffers such a ruler accuse him whom he suffers, since surely it was of his own merit to lie under the dominion of a perverse ruler." And below, chapter 16: "According to the merits of the subjects, the persons of those ruling are bestowed." This Augustine also in City of God V at length shows. Whence in chapter 20, of Nero, he says thus: "Whose luxury was so great that nothing manly was to be feared from him, and so great his cruelty that nothing soft would be believed of him if it were not known. Yet even to such, the power of dominating is given only by the providence of the most high God, when he judges the affairs of men to be worthy of such Lords. Open on this matter is the divine voice, the wisdom of God speaking: Through me Kings reign, and tyrants through me hold the earth. But lest tyrants should be esteemed not the worst and most wicked Kings, but be reckoned by the ancient name as the strong — whence Virgil says, Part of peace it shall be for me to have touched the right hand of the tyrant — most openly in another place is it said of him: Who maketh a hypocrite to reign for the perversity of the people." And below, chapter 22, he says that the true God, when he willed and as much as he willed, gave the kingdom to the Romans, the Assyrians, and the Persians; thus also to Nero and Domitian, the most cruel, and to Julian the Apostate. "These plainly the true God rules and governs as he pleases." Let these things, then, suffice to have introduced concerning Kingdoms and Kings.

Nor can anyone pretend that God provides for these great things, but does not care for lesser. For this folly Wisdom 6 refutes, saying: "The Lord shall not exempt the person of any, nor shall he stand in awe of any man's greatness; for he himself made both the small and the great, and he careth for all alike." And Job 34: "He accepteth not the persons of princes." Reason also persuades this: for if God provides Popes and Emperors or Kings, why not Cardinals and Dukes? And if these, why not Archbishops and Counts? And if these, why not Bishops and Barons; and so step by step, descending from the greatest to the least. Whence Proverbs 29: "From the Lord proceeds the judgment of every one." And Job 34, "Over a nation, and over all men," etc. On which Gregory, Morals XXV, 15, says thus: "What we see done in the greatest things, let us cautiously fear even in our individual selves. For divine judgments are extended over one soul as over one city; over one city as over one nation; over one nation as over the universal multitude of the human race; for thus the Lord intends individuals as if he were free from all, and so simultaneously intends all as if he were free from individuals. He who, by administering, fulfills all things, rules by fulfilling, neither is absent from the universe when he disposes one, nor absent from one when he disposes the universe — quietly working all things by the power of his nature."

By the laws of this providence also are the victories of wars disposed. This follows from the foregoing, and can be proved like the foregoing. For through victories, kingdoms and many dominions are acquired, which are given through the providence of God. Likewise this is plain in the battle of Israel against Amalek, in which, when Moses lifted up his hands, Israel conquered; but if he let them down a little, Amalek prevailed (Exodus 17). Likewise it is plain from Joshua 7, of those 3,000 fighters going up against Ai, who, immediately turning their backs, fell, fleeing headlong; and the Lord said to Joshua: "Israel will not be able to stand before their enemies, and will flee from them, because it is polluted with the anathema; I will be no more with you." Behold the cause of their flight and of the victory of the enemies: "I will be no more with you, until you crush him who is guilty of this crime." Does not the following history, especially chapter 11, plainly teach the same? Is it not written in chapter 11: "For it had been the sentence of the Lord, that their hearts should be hardened, and they should fight against the children of Israel, and fall, and not deserve any mercy, but should perish." Does not that most strenuous David say thus: "Let all this assembly know, that the Lord saveth not by sword and spear; for it is his battle" (1 Samuel 17)? Does not also the man of God say thus to King Amaziah of Judah, who had only 30,000 fighters of his own, and therefore was hiring 100,000 stout men of Israel, that he might fight against Edom: "O King, let not the army of Israel go forth with thee; for God is not with Israel; but if thou thinkest that battles consist in the strength of an army, the Lord shall make thee fall before thy enemies; for it is God's to help and to put to flight" (2 Chronicles 25)? Did not Jonathan with his Armor-bearer alone, about most boldly and most happily to attack the garrison of the Philistines, send word ahead, "It is not difficult for the Lord to save, either with many or with few" (1 Samuel 14)? This too the most strenuous of soldiers, the Maccabee, well understood, who armed his few — fatigued with fasting — against a very great multitude thus: "It is easy for many to be shut up in the hand of a few; and there is no difference in the sight of the God of Heaven, to deliver with a great multitude or with a small company. For not in the multitude of an army is the victory of war, but strength is from heaven; the Lord himself shall crush them before our face" (1 Maccabees 3). And below, in the same: "As the will is in heaven, so let it be done." And in 2 Maccabees, last chapter: "The Lord giveth victory to the worthy, not according to the power of arms, but as it pleaseth himself."

Do not testify to this truth that horse with the terrible rider, those two youths fair in virtue, of best glory, beautiful in apparel (1 Maccabees 3 [2 Maccabees 11])? Those five men also from heaven, adorned with golden bridles, providing leadership to the Jews (2 Maccabees 10)? Saint Jeremiah too, dead to the world, living in heaven, giving Judas a golden sword, a gift from God (2 Maccabees, last chapter)? That Angel of the Lord also, who in one night struck down 185,000 in the camp of the Assyrians (2 Kings 19)? Let that truthful witness also approach, the eminent of the Prophets, and most illustrious of Kings, holy David, bringing forward the whole Psalm 43 [44] in testimony of the truth: "O God, with our ears we have heard," etc.; "the work that thou hast wrought," etc.; "thy hand destroyed the Gentiles," etc.; "they did not get the land in possession by their own sword, neither did their own arm save them, but thy right hand," etc. — all the verses that follow. And above, Psalm 32 [33]: "The King is not saved by a great army; nor shall the giant be saved by his own great strength. Vain is the horse for safety: nor shall he be saved by the abundance of his strength. Behold, the eyes of the Lord are on those that fear him," etc., "to deliver their souls from death." And because he himself was greatly assailed by enemies, and had the greatest victories, he attributes them, as in nearly all the Psalms, not to himself but to the Lord, with most humble thanksgiving.

What else also is, "A man shall not be strengthened by his own strength," and, "Lest thou shouldst say, My strength and the might of my hand have furnished all these things to me; but thou shouldst remember the Lord, that he himself gave thee the strength" (Deuteronomy 8). And below, in chapter 32: "On account of the wrath of my enemies I have deferred, lest perhaps their enemies should be proud, and should say, Our high hand and not the Lord hath done all these things." And Jeremiah 46: "The swift shall not flee, nor the strong think to save himself." What else also does it sound, that occurs so often in Scripture, that the Lord will send his fear upon the enemies, that he himself will be the Captain of the war, that he will be with his own in war, will fight for his own, will go before them, will shut up the enemies in the hands of his own, will turn them to flight, will overthrow the enemies, will lay low, humble, slay, crush, break together with his own — with infinite similar expressions? And to conclude many things in few: to this conduces the entire series of either Testament, where mention is made of bodily, or even spiritual, war.

But, as I think, this the Lord deigned to show in his elect people, and in bodily war, by manifest virtue, in order that — since in fewer matters the way is greater, and through bodily things spiritual things are known — he might at least show by his hidden virtue that it is generally so in all things, and especially in spiritual war, that thus he might teach the impotent and the wretched where to hope and seek for fortitude, victory, and salvation. "For all these things befell them in figure, and they were written for our correction" (1 Corinthians 10). But to whomever these things are not pleasing, let him hope in princes, trust in man, place flesh as his arm, and let his heart depart from the Lord; let him hope in his bow; let his sword save him; and if at any time victory befall him, let him not give thanks, nor in hymns and confessions bless the Lord — because, [he will say,] he did not do great things for him, nor give him victory. Nor do I doubt, if such a one is at least a Christian in name, that he will be more ungrateful to the true God than any unbeliever to the false god, or to false gods, to whose grace and virtue he ascribes his victory and honor; and to whom or to which, according to his rite, rendering thanks, he slays victims and offers fat solemn sacrifices. Let such men hope as they wish; for me, however, in any battle of mine, to cleave to God is good, to place my hope in the Lord my God. "For the name of the Lord is a most strong tower; the just runneth to it, and shall be exalted." Let him place me beside himself, and let anyone's hand fight against me; "for I can do all things in him who strengtheneth me," and in myself nothing — for I cannot even think the smallest thing.

This whole thing the lofty Roman Emperor Justinian humbly professes, in the Code, On the Old Law to be Made Plain, when he says: "With God governing our empire, which has been handed down to us by the celestial Majesty, we both happily wage wars, and adorn peace, and sustain the state of the Republic, and we so raise our minds to the help of God Almighty, that we trust neither in arms, nor in our soldiers, nor in our captains of war, nor in our wit, but refer all hope to the providence alone of the supreme Trinity." This too the universal Church confesses, which, when she prays the Lord for peace, truly and not falsely puts forth this cause: "For there is no other who fights for us, but thou, O God." The proposition is also proved through Augustine, City of God XIX, 15, saying thus: "Every victory, when it comes even to the wicked, by divine judgment humbles the conquered, either correcting their sins or punishing them. The man of God Daniel is a witness, when, placed in captivity, he confesses to the Lord his sins or the sins of the people, and testifies with pious grief that this was the cause of that captivity."

And although it is established from earlier chapters that wisdom, riches, and other prosperous things are bestowed by divine providence, yet it can be confirmed by a few testimonies. For in 1

Kings 3 the Lord says to Solomon: "I have given thee a wise and understanding heart, riches and glory." And Ecclesiasticus 1: "All wisdom is from the Lord God." Which King David, full of the Spirit of God, most fully attests in 1 Chronicles, last chapter, in these words: "Thine, O Lord, is the magnificence and the power and the glory and the victory; for whatsoever is in heaven, and whatsoever is on earth, is thine; thine the riches, and thine the glory; thou rulest over all; in thy hand is virtue and power, greatness, and command. Who am I, and who is my people, that we should be able to promise thee all these things? All things are thine, and what we have received from thy hand, we have given to thee." And since the whole Scripture is filled with such fitting testimonies, let it suffice to have briefly touched on these.

This also is plain through Augustine, Tractate 2 on that of Psalm 32, "Confess to the Lord on the harp; sing to him on the psaltery of ten strings," saying that "the harp has on the lower part that which sounds, but the psaltery on the upper, so that the harp signifies earthly life, the psaltery the heavenly, which is in the 10 commandments; and in each God is to be praised. In earthly life there is prosperity and adversity. In all prosperous things God is to be praised; and whoever does not praise from these is ungrateful, since they are God's, and are not given by another.

Adversities are in pains, languors, oppressions, temptations, tribulations: everywhere let him praise God who plays the harp; let him not heed that they are lower things, but that they cannot be ruled and governed save by that Wisdom which reaches mightily from end to end and disposes all things sweetly. For he does not rule heavenly things and abandon earthly, or is it not said to him: Whither shall I go from thy spirit? and whither shall I flee from thy face? If I ascend into heaven, thou art there; if I descend into hell, thou art present. Where, then, is he absent who is nowhere not present? Therefore in all prosperous or adverse things, confess to the Lord on the harp. If you abound, give thanks to the giver; if you lack, or it is taken away by loss, play the harp securely, and say: The Lord gave, the Lord hath taken away; as it pleased the Lord, so is it done; blessed be the name of the Lord."

Likewise this is true of that prosperity concerning which it seems less so — namely of the wicked — which yet many take ill, indeed even some Saints, as it seems. Whence Jeremiah 12: "Thou indeed art just, O Lord, if I dispute with thee; nevertheless I will speak just things to thee. Why doth the way of the wicked prosper? Why is it well with all them that transgress and do iniquitously? Thou hast planted them, and they have taken root." Behold what he attributes these things to God. Which holy Job also vehemently marveling at, that he should dispute not against man but against God, makes the hearers attentive thus: "Hearken to me, and be astonished, and lay your fingers on your mouth; and when I remember, I am afraid, and trembling shall shake my flesh." Then he sets forth the following question: "Why are the wicked exalted, and strengthened with riches? Their seed continueth before them, the multitude of their kindred and grandchildren; their houses are secure, and the rod of God is not over them; their ox hath conceived, and hath not miscarried, the cow hath calved, and is not deprived of her offspring. Their little ones go out like Kings, and their infants exult with sports; they take the timbrel and the harp; who said to God, Depart from us, we will not have the way of thy sciences. Who is the Almighty, that we should serve him?" And he answers: "Yet, since their goods are not in their own hand," — supply, "but in the Lord's," as he said above, "The Lord gave, the Lord hath taken away" — "let the counsel of the wicked be far from me" (Job 21). This question the Psalmist likewise treats at length in Psalm 72 [73], premising the danger of seeing the prosperity of the wicked — for he was nearly cast down, as very many are cast down: "But my feet were almost moved," he says, "etc.; because I was zealous against the wicked," etc.; "for there is no regard to their death," etc.; "in the labor of men they are not," etc.; "therefore pride hath held them; iniquity hath proceeded as it were out of fatness; they have set their mouth in heaven," etc., "and they have said, How doth God know? and is there knowledge in the Most High? Behold these are sinners, and abounding in this world they have obtained riches." — As if he were arguing: therefore God does not know, nor cares, nor distributes human affairs providently — which argument once concluded the Psalmist, or perhaps someone else, in whose person, from the things now set forth, he concludes when he says: "And I said, Then have I in vain justified my heart, etc., and have been chastised," etc. But immediately he refutes this conclusion by deducing it to a manifest impossibility, subjoining: "If I said, I will speak thus" — namely, as that conclusion says — "behold I have reproved the generation of thy sons" — namely, I have shown them to be reprovably, which is a manifest impossibility. On which Augustine: "If I said, I will speak thus, namely, that God does not care for human affairs, behold I have reproved the generation of thy sons, namely, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the Prophets, who all said God cares for human affairs."

This same thing, although it is plain from the foregoing, can yet be shown specially of all adversities and scourges, evil and good things befalling indistinctly. For all these are the punishments of those who suffer; and every punishment is in some way the punishment of sin, and just, and from God, as is plain through Augustine, Retractations I, 9, on the concupiscence of the flesh against the spirit, saying thus: "Every punishment, however, if it is just, is the punishment of sin; but if it is unjust punishment — which no one doubts to be a punishment — has been imposed on a man under the dominion of some unjust power. But because to doubt of the omnipotence and justice of God is the part of a madman, this is just punishment, and is paid for some sin." Every just thing, however, is just from the first justice, which is God, as is sufficiently established from chapter 2. The same author, in book 5 Against Julian, says to Julian: "If this is not the punishment of sin, surely it is unjust punishment, and you make God unjust, by whose command or permission — or weak, by his not turning aside — it is inflicted on the innocent." And in 83 Questions, 24: "God justly governing the universe, allows no punishment to be inflicted undeservedly."

Likewise, otherwise a great cause of patience, hope, consolation, and joy would be taken from the afflicted when they fall into various tribulations. For who shall so patiently, hopefully, consolingly, and joyfully sustain such things, if he believes them to befall him only from an enemy, or from chance, and that through them sins are not purged, virtues exercised, or rewards heaped up — as if he should believe these to be sent upon him by God, for some such good?

Whence Seneca, in the little book which he specially wrote on this matter, entitled Seneca to Lucilius: "Since the world is governed by providence, why do many evils happen to good men? A good man is the disciple of God, his emulator and true offspring; whom that magnificent parent — no light exactor of virtues — like stern fathers, educates more harshly. Therefore when you see good men, accepted by the Gods, laboring, sweating, climbing through hard places, but the wicked riotous and flowing in pleasures, consider that it is not of sons to be delighted by the license of slaves, that those are kept in stricter discipline, while the audacity of these is fed. Let the same be plain to you concerning God: he does not have the good man in delights; he tries him, he hardens him, he prepares him for himself. Do you wonder if that God, most loving of the good, who wills them to be the very best and most excellent, assigns to them a fortune with which they may exercise themselves? I, indeed, do not wonder if at times the Gods conceive an impulse, while they watch great men struggling with some calamity. To us at times it is a pleasure, if a youth of constant mind has received a charging beast on his hunting-spear, if he has undauntedly endured the rush of the lion, and the spectacle is the more pleasing, the more honorable made it. Such things are not what can turn the countenance of the gods to themselves; these are puerile and human entertainments of levity. Behold a spectacle worthy that God, intent on his work, should look upon; behold a pair worthy of God: a strong man matched with evil fortune, especially if he has even challenged it. I do not see, I say, what Jupiter has on earth more beautiful, if he wishes to turn his mind, than that he should look upon Cato — when, his cause having been more than once broken, standing nonetheless among public ruins, you may understand him as a steady helmsman in the storm, a soldier in the line of battle. Fire proves gold, misery brave men. For nothing seems more unhappy than he to whom no adversity has ever come; for it has not been allowed him to test himself. Even if all things have flowed to him as he wished, even before his wish, the Gods have judged ill of him: he seemed unworthy by whom Fortune should at any time be conquered, which flees from every most cowardly man" — as if he should say, "What then? Shall I take this man for an adversary? At once he will lay down his arms; there is no need of all my power against him; he shall be driven off by a slight threat, he cannot endure my countenance; let another be looked round for, with whom we may be able to come to grips. I am ashamed to engage with a man prepared to be conquered; the gladiator judges it ignominy to be matched with an inferior."

And below: "Let us come to Regulus. What did fortune harm him? Did it not make him a model of fidelity, a model of patience? Nails fix his skin, and wherever the wearied body inclines, it presses upon a wound; his eyes are kept suspended in perpetual vigil; the more torment, the more glory shall there be. Do you judge Socrates ill-treated, that he drank that publicly mixed potion no otherwise than as a medicine of immortality?" — as if he were saying, "It is not so." Where also he generally shows that the evils which seem to befall good men are not evils to them, but goods, useful, both for themselves and for all others, of whom the gods have greater care.

Is not this also what the Lord himself says? "I will not destroy the Nations which Joshua left, that in them I may try Israel, whether they keep the way of the Lord, and walk in it, or not" (Judges

2). And it follows: "These are the Nations which the Lord left, that he might instruct Israel in them, and all who knew not the wars of the Canaanites; and that afterwards their sons might learn to fight with their enemies, and have the custom of fighting" — "the five Satraps of the Philistines," etc. (Judges 3). Wherefore also blessed James admonishes, saying: "Esteem it all joy, my brethren, when you fall into divers temptations, knowing that the proving of your faith worketh patience; but patience hath a perfect work" (James 1). Wherefore also the Apostles went rejoicing from the presence of the Council, since they were accounted worthy to suffer reproach for the name of Jesus (Acts 5). And to the Romans 5: "We glory in tribulations, knowing that tribulation worketh patience, and patience trial, and trial hope, and hope confoundeth not." And 1 Peter 1: "Wherein you shall greatly rejoice, if now you must be for a little time made sorrowful in divers temptations, that the trial of your faith, much more precious than gold which is tried by the fire," etc.

This same thing, as concerns the good, the various tribulations of Job show — Job himself in the very first chapter saying: "The Lord gave, the Lord hath taken away; as it pleased the Lord, so is it done." Whence Augustine, on that of Psalm 32, "For he hath spoken and they were made; he commanded, and they were created": "The Devil could not harm Job unless having received the power from God; when he permitted, he could; therefore he could not, but he who permitted. And therefore Job, well instructed, did not say, The Lord gave, the Devil hath taken away; but, The Lord gave, the Lord hath taken away; as it pleased the Lord, so is it done — not as it pleased the Devil; and all this for the merit and glory of his saint." For which the same author says on that of Psalm 34, "Let them be confounded and ashamed": "The Devil had no power to take away the goods of holy Job, except when he received it from the supreme power. Wherefore he also said, Put forth thy hand — that is, give power. But God, who had permitted the Devil to take those things away, did not desert his servant within, but, to overcome the Devil, made the soul of his servant a sword for himself."

The same is proved by the tribulation of holy Tobias, by the testimony of Raphael, who says: "Because thou wast acceptable to God, it was necessary that temptation should prove thee." For which Augustine in the Sentences of Prosper, proposition 221, says: "The progress of the faithful does not come without temptation; nor does anyone become known to himself save by the examination of probation; nor is anyone crowned save he who has conquered, nor does anyone conquer unless he has fought; but who fights save he who has an enemy and resists temptation?" The same author also, on that of Psalm 148, "Fire, hail, snow," etc., "which do his word," concerning the killing of an innocent person by lightning, or any other kind of death whatever, says thus: "Whatever happens here against our will, you must know it does not happen save by the will of God, by his providence, order, nod, and laws. And if we do not understand what or why it is done, let us give this to his providence, since it is not done without a cause; and let us not blaspheme. For all things which to vain men seem in the nature of things to happen rashly, do not happen save at his command." The same on that of Psalm 57, "They shall be carried away as wax that melteth": "Here are punishments, prisons, exiles, torments, deaths, divers kinds of pains and tribulations; and these are dispensed by the judgment of God; but to many they are for probation, to many for damnation."

The same on that of Psalm 31 [32], "Be glad in the Lord, all you upright of heart": "What is upright of heart? Those not resisting God. Whatever a man suffers contrary to his will — afflictions, sorrows, labors, humiliations — let him attribute it solely to the just will of God; he is upright of heart. The perverse of heart, however, are crooked and distorted, who say that they suffer unjustly the evils which they suffer, attributing iniquity to him by whose will they suffer; or, because they do not dare attribute iniquity to him, they take from him governance. And these distorted of heart hold three opinions: either, that there is no God — as the fool said in his heart; or, that God is unjust, who does not distribute worse things to the worse; or, that God does not govern human affairs."

Likewise Jerome, in book 4 on Isaiah, treating that of chapter 28, "Will the plowman plow all day," etc., says thus: "God variously dispenses the human race; now he punishes, now has mercy; now corrects, now defends; now plows, now sows, now reaps the ripe fruits, and threshes them on the threshing-floors when reaped, and governs his world as he wills." With which agrees Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy, prose 4: "What you indeed think most just, to omniscient providence appears different — that is, contrary." Whence also "a certain victorious cause in war pleased the Gods as just, but not Cato; the conquered cause pleased Cato, not the Gods" — as Lucan attests. But he immediately rejects Cato's opinion, saying: "Therefore whatever you see done contrary to expectation, in things indeed there is right order, but to your opinion perverse confusion." And below in the same prose he shows: "Why, by divine providence, do adversities not befall some good men, but befall others; and similarly with the wicked? Adversities do not befall some good men, since they are weak, and would not suffice to bear them, but perhaps would cease to cultivate innocence, by which they could not retain fortune. There is another so perfect, that providence judges it impious that he should be touched by any adversities. There are some good men sometimes greatly raised up, that through them the wickedness of the wicked may be repelled. To others good men, [providence] distributes mixed things according to the quality of their souls. Wherefore providence stings certain good men, prone to luxury, with another adversity, lest by long felicity they riot. Others it agitates with hardships, that they may strengthen the virtues of the soul by the use and exercise of patience. Some pusillanimous fear more than is fitting, but yet can endure harsh things. Others, presumptuous beyond what is fitting, despise as easiest for themselves adversities which yet they cannot endure: these the providence of God leads, through the experience of sad things, to knowledge of themselves. Some good men, however, inexpugnable to every torment, have offered an example to others that virtue is unconquered." And he subjoins: "Although that this is rightly and disposedly, and from the good of those to whom they seem to come, there is no doubt; for to those that love God all things work together for good" (Romans 8). And he shows at once that prosperous and adverse things befall the wicked from like causes: adverse things indeed for three causes: first, because they have so deserved; second, that their punishments may deter others from sin; third, that the wicked themselves may be amended by such things. Prosperous things, however, befall them for many causes: first, that the good seeing this may elicit an argument as to what they ought to judge of such felicity — namely, of riches and the like — which serves even the wicked; second, because some wicked men would become worse if they suffered want of family substance, which disease divine providence remedies by the gathering of money; third, that one having a sordid conscience, while in dread of the punishment due to sin, fears to lose the goods of fortune which he has, may change his ways, and while fearing to lose fortune, may abandon wickedness; fourth, that the more such felicity is heaped upon certain wicked men, the more it may cast them into deeper unhappiness when it is taken from them. For according to the same in Consolation II, prose 4: "In every adversity of fortune, the most unhappy kind of misfortune is to have been happy."

Then he consequently shows why the right of punishing is permitted to evil men, and says this is done so that to the good it may be the cause of exercise, and to the wicked of punishment; from which often that supreme providence has produced an extraordinary miracle: that the wicked have made the wicked good. To this conduces likewise what Jacques de Vitry recounts of a certain Hermit who fell into the spirit of blasphemy, to the extent that he had begun to think the judgments of God to be unjust, in that he allows the wicked to prosper and the good to be afflicted. To him an Angel sent from the Lord, in the form of a man, said: "Follow me, and you shall see the hidden judgments of God." Whom when he had followed, to the house of a certain good man, having all night been entertained with the joyful offices of hospitality, the Angel stole the cup of his host, which he most loved, and gave it to a certain wicked man who had received them on the second night. On the third night they were more kindly entertained by a kindly host, whose servant in the morning he cast off a certain bridge, drowning him; and on the fourth night, having likewise been well received by a good man, he killed his little son crying, and not letting them sleep. At which the Hermit, wishing to leave him, [the Angel] said thus: "I am sent to you by the Lord, that I may disclose his hidden judgments to you. Our first host had loved that cup too much; therefore for his good I took the cup from him, and gave it to our wicked host, that he might receive his reward in the present. The servant of the third I drowned, because he had firmed in his heart to kill his master on the morrow; and so I preserved the good master from death, and the wicked servant from homicide of the work, that he might be more mildly punished in hell. The fourth host, before he had a son and heir, used to give large alms; but his son and heir being born, he withdrew his hand. Wherefore I took from him the cause of avarice, and brought into paradise the soul of an innocent." Of which deed, or of similar, the Wise Man assigns another cause, saying: "He was taken away, lest wickedness should change his understanding, or fiction should deceive his soul" (Wisdom 4).

These and similar things concerning holy Job and Tobias God willed manifestly to show — that they were done by him — that he might generally teach us the same in all similar cases, and thus arm us against all adversities by patience. Whence Tobit 2: "God permitted this temptation to befall him, that an example might be given to posterity of his patience, like that of holy Job. For whatsoever things were written, were written for our learning, that through patience and the consolation of the Scriptures we might have hope" (Romans 15).

That tribulations also brought upon evil and good men by evil men are sent by God, Psalm 77 [78] proves, saying: "He sent upon them the wrath of his indignation; indignation, and wrath, and tribulation, sent through evil Angels."

That, however, I may conclude so long a series in a brief discourse: as is contained scattered in the Canonical Scripture and in various writings of the Fathers, scourges befall for five causes — as is also recited in Sentences IV, distinction 15, of the Lombard. First, that the merits of the just may be increased through patience, as in Job. Second, for the keeping of virtues against pride, as Paul, as is plain from 2 Corinthians 12. Third, for the correcting of sins, as the leprosy of Miriam, as is plain in Numbers 12. Fourth, for the manifesting of the works of God, as is plain from the man born blind, John 9. Fifth, for the inception of punishment in the present, that here may be seen what shall follow in hell — as that of Deuteronomy 32: "A fire is kindled in my fury, and shall burn even to the lowest hell." Whence also Jeremiah 17: "With double destruction destroy them" — as it was concerning Herod, as is plain in Acts 12, and many similar in many places.

Likewise this is true, not only of adults, but also of little ones — concerning whom it seems less so. Whence Augustine, On the Good of Perseverance, chapter 35, says thus: "For God is not driven by fate to come to the aid of those infants, but not these, when there is a common cause for both; or shall we suppose that human affairs in little ones are conducted not by divine providence but by fortuitous chances — when rational souls are either to be damned or to be liberated, since indeed not even a sparrow falls on the earth without the will of our Father, who is in heaven? Or is it to be attributed to the negligence of parents, that little ones die without baptism, so that the divine judgments do nothing there? What shall I say, that sometimes a little one breathes his last before baptism, even when his parents hasten and the ministers are ready that the little one may be baptized — yet, God being unwilling, it is not given, who did not preserve him for a little while in this life that it might be given? What is it also that sometimes baptism could come to the help of the little children of unbelievers, lest they should go into perdition, and yet could not for the children of the faithful? Where surely it is shown that there is no respect of persons with God; otherwise he would deliver the children of his worshipers rather than of his enemies." The same, On Reprehension and Grace, chapter 27: "It is wonderful and yet true, that he alienates from his kingdom certain sons of his friends — that is, of the regenerated good, because they are faithful — leaving this world as little ones without baptism, for whom surely if he willed it, he could provide the grace of this washing, since all things are in his power; whereas he sends thither the parents of those alienated; and certain sons of his enemies he causes to come into the hands of Christians, and to be brought through the washing into the kingdom from which their parents are alien — when both to those there is evil, and to these good, no merit is in the little ones from their own will. Surely these judgments of God, since they are just and lofty, can neither be reprov'd nor penetrated."

The same, On Grace and Free Will, chapter 50: "Sometimes this grace is presented to the children of unbelievers, when by the hidden providence of God they come in some way into the hands of the pious. Sometimes the children of the faithful do not obtain it; sometimes an impediment exists which prevents them from being aided in their peril. These things, however, are done by the hidden providence of God, whose judgments are inscrutable and his ways past finding out."

This whole thing also the universal Church professes in her orations, saying: "Direct our acts in thy good pleasure," etc. And again: "May the virtue of the Holy Spirit be present with us, by whose wisdom we have been founded, and by whose providence we are governed." And again: "O God, whose providence is not deceived in the disposition of itself, we suppliants beseech thee, that thou wouldst remove all hurtful things, and grant us all things profitable" — manifestly supposing that all hurtful and likewise profitable things are disposed by divine providence.

CHAPTER XXXII. THAT ALL THINGS COME FROM THE PROVIDENCE OF GOD ACTUALLY DISPOSING, NOT MERELY PERMITTING.

But because among the Authorities of the Saints which speak of the providence of God, some make mention of permission, it might perhaps appear that by providence they understand only permission. It now remains to show that all things come from actual preceptive — or even positive — providence, namely that which posits an actual will in God. This will be shown by reasons similar to those by which the foregoing chapters have been demonstrated, especially because the chapters speaking of the divine knowledge and will, by which universal providence is proved, speak of the actual and positive knowledge and volition of God, not only of the permissive.

Likewise, otherwise he would not most wisely, nor most perfectly, nor most fittingly dispose the universe. Likewise, all inanimate and irrational things, which do not depend on voluntary actions, are actually provided for, and all their operations, as chapters 27 and 31 teach; therefore much more all voluntary things, and all voluntary actions, as is plain from chapters 30 and 31. Those philosophical testimonies adduced before also cannot fittingly be understood of permissive providence, nor can the other testimonies of Scripture and of the Saints be understood in this sense. For how would the Savior, in Matthew 6, reasonably remove anxiety from us, if he cared for us only by permitting and providing nothing actually? How also in Matthew 10 would such a somnolent providence arm us against the fear of death for his name? For who would more confidently contend, [merely] because God only permits this or that? What also of consolation would this be: "One of the sparrows does not fall without your permitting Father, and you are better than they; therefore fear not, since you shall not fall without your Father permitting this greater event, and indifferently neglecting it"? Indeed, this would not be a consolation but a manifest mockery. What also would the numbering of the hairs profit us, if he provided nothing further actually for us, but permitted all things to run uncertainly and to be agitated by fortuitous motions? How also in the numbering of the hairs would the ineffable affection of God, and the immensity and diligence of providence, be noted, as is alleged above?

The speech of God also imports an act; but all things are from it, since they are from the speaking or pronouncement of the supreme God, as chapter 28 shows. Otherwise also many things would happen by chance simply, and by fortune; for not whatever is permitted is intended, which chapter 29 condemns. Yet further, Job, Tobias, and the narration of Jacques [de Vitry] prove actual providence; every adversity also which is the just punishment of sin. Nor does the manner of speech of Scripture, of the Doctors, or of the common people seem to call bare permission "providence," since thus any neighbor would provide for any other.

And Anselm, On Truth, chapter 8, says: "According to that which acts, it more properly seems to be called acting and striking; according to that which suffers, action and striking. For agentia and percutientia are said from the agent and striker, just as providentia from the providens, continentia from the continens; which" — namely, the agent and striker, the provider and continent — "are active." Therefore it is plain that providence, from its signification, imports not only permission, but some act, or a certain agency.

Furthermore, if this exposition were fitting to Scripture, since Scripture similarly speaks of predestination, creation, governance, the conferral of grace and other goods, the remission of sins, and many similar things — all could be expounded by mere permission. But how much this would derogate from the Christian faith, or rather subvert it entirely, no Christian doubts. Likewise, then the holy Fathers laboriously proving that all things are governed by providence would labor in vain; for they would not be teaching anything doubtful or unknown, since no one is ignorant that all things happen by the Lord's permission.

Likewise, all things that here in any way happen have some causes, and all those causes are reduced to some first cause, as the second Supposition and the second chapter show; and this first cause of all is God, as is doubtful to no one. God therefore in some way causes all these things, and not by natural necessity, nor casually, ignorantly, improvidently, or rashly; therefore through the will, with certain knowledge providing.

Likewise, a loving, prudent, and powerful mother actually provides all things for her sons. But God our heavenly Father is incomparably more loving, more prudent, and more powerful than any mother; wherefore by actual — not permissive or merely forgetful — providence he provides all things for us. Whence also Isaiah 49: "Can a woman forget her infant, so as not to have pity on the son of her womb? And if she should forget, yet will I not forget thee. Behold, I have graven thee in my hands" — Gloss: "that I may always see and remember; nor think thyself utterly forsaken." But of what avail would that vision or memory of the intellect alone be, unless the prudent benevolence of the will were likewise present? Therefore he immediately subjoins: "Those that judged thee, I will judge; thy sons I will save; I am the Lord that saveth thee, and thy redeemer."

Likewise Isaiah 10 says of Sennacherib King of Assyria: "Woe to Assyria, the rod of my fury, and the staff itself is mine indignation in their hand. To a deceitful nation I will send him; against the people of my fury I will give him a charge, that he may take the spoils, and divide the prey, and tread it down." The Lord, then, in such things is the principal agent, and any tyrant only the instrumental. Therefore it follows: "And it shall come to pass, when the Lord shall have performed all his works on Mount Zion and Jerusalem, that I will visit upon the fruit of the magnificent heart of the King of Assyria, and upon the glory of the height of his eyes. For he hath said: In the strength of my hand I have done it, and in my wisdom I have understood," etc. And it follows: "Shall the axe glory against him that cutteth with it? or shall the saw exalt itself against him by whom it is drawn? Just as if a rod should lift itself up against him that lifteth it up, or a staff should exalt itself, which is wood; therefore," etc. — there follows his punishment, where the Gloss says: "as if to say, just as these inanimate things are instruments doing nothing of themselves, but through him who moves them, so neither did Sennacherib act of himself, but operated in the virtue of God; whence his glorying is foolish and worthy of vengeance." On which Jerome also, in book 4 on Isaiah, says: "O most foolish of mortals, you think the wrath of God to be your own wisdom, and you refer his command to your own fortitude; just as if the axe should glory against him who holds it, and the saw against him by whom it is drawn, and they should say that all the works which are done through axe and saw are their own, perfected by their art; and if anyone should lift up a rod and exalt a staff with power to strike whomsoever he wills, and that very rod or staff should glory and say that the one struck has been struck by themselves — so you also, when you have been the instrument of God's will, are raised up in pride, and glory that all the things done were of your virtue." This same judgment is plain much more fully in chapter 4.

Likewise Isaiah 13: "The burden of Babylon," etc. — "I have commanded my sanctified ones, and have called my strong ones in my wrath, them that rejoice in my glory. The Lord of hosts hath given charge to the troops of war that come from a country afar off, from the highest heavens — the Lord and the vessels of his fury — to destroy the whole land." On which Jerome, on Isaiah, book 5, says: "We, following the order of history, say these sanctified and strong ones to be the Medes, of whom Scripture testifies more openly in the consequents, saying: Behold, I shall stir up the Medes against you, who shall not seek silver, nor will they have gold." And he adds: "Nor is it wonderful if he calls the Medes sanctified for the subversion of Babylon, since through Jeremiah he calls Nebuchadnezzar himself, who served his command in destroying the prevaricating Jerusalem, his servant and his dove. Moreover, that he says, Strong in my wrath and rejoicing in my glory, shows that they overthrew the power of so lofty a kingdom not by their own strength, but by the wrath of God." Whence also Daniel 1: "The Lord delivered into his hand" — that is, of Nebuchadnezzar — "Jehoiakim King of Judah," etc. Gloss: "by whose" — namely, the Lord's — "will it was done, not by the strength of the enemies."

Likewise Jeremiah 31: "He that scattered Israel will gather him." Gloss: "Therefore not the power of the enemies, but the will of the Lord." And above, chapter 10: "I know, O Lord," says the Prophet, "that the way of a man is not his, neither is it in a man to walk and direct his steps." Where the Gloss: "Let those be ashamed who say that everyone is at his own choice. For the way of a man is not his," etc. Whence David: "By the Lord shall the steps of a man be directed." Nor can anyone expound this authority of the good ways of man and good steps only — on account of the grace of God being necessarily required, which is not totally in the power of man — since Jeremiah is speaking there literally of the way of a Babylonian man, namely Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon, as he later many times expresses his name as one to come, as a scourge and the hammer of God's wrath, that he might lay waste Judaea in punishment of sin, as the preceding and following text shows. For the voice of hearing says, Gloss: "of the Babylonian coming, Behold he comes, and a great commotion from the land of the North, that he may make the Cities of Judah a desolation, and a habitation of dragons." For Babylon was on the North side with respect to Judaea, as Jerome says on that of Daniel 11, "His kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided toward the four winds of Heaven": Egypt is to the South, Macedonia to the West, Syria and Babylonia to the North, and Asia to the East with respect to Judaea. Wherefore in Jeremiah, the Lord said to Jeremiah thus: "From the North an evil shall break forth upon all the inhabitants of the land," Gloss: "of Judaea: For behold I will call together all the families of the kingdoms of the North," Gloss: "subject to the King of Babylon," "and they shall come, and they shall set every one his throne in the entrance of the gates of Jerusalem, and upon all the walls thereof round about, and upon all the cities of Judah; and I will pronounce my judgments against them, touching all their wickedness, who have forsaken me, and have offered libations to strange gods." Wherefore also below in chapter 27, the Lord calls Nebuchadnezzar his servant, saying: "Now I have given all these lands into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon my servant." And it follows in Jeremiah 10, immediately after the text recited above: "I know, O Lord, that the way of a man is not his," Gloss: "of the Babylonian man, but of our merit and thy indignation." And it follows: "neither is it in a man to walk and direct his steps. Correct me, O Lord, but yet with judgment, and not in thy fury, lest thou bring me to nothing." Yet this man of Babylon did not do this from charity, but from cruelty, nor from zeal of justice or obedience to the divine will, but rather from pride and lust of dominating. Therefore he did not merit, but sinned, as also was the case of Sennacherib King of Assyria, as is shown above.

For this is plain expressly in Jeremiah 25, where the Lord says: "Because you have not heard my words, behold I will send and take all the kindreds of the North, and Nebuchadnezzar my servant the King of Babylon, and I will bring them against this land, and against the inhabitants thereof, and I will destroy them," and all the other evils. And it follows consequently: "And they shall serve the King" or Kings "of Babylon 70 years; and when the 70 years shall be expired, I will visit upon the King of Babylon, and upon that nation, their iniquity, and upon the land of the Chaldeans, and I will make it perpetual desolations." Which is more expressly had below, in chapter 50, where his sin and his punishment are more clearly expressed: "Go forth out of the midst of Babylon," he says, "and go out of the land of the Chaldeans, for behold I am stirring up, and I will bring against Babylon an assembly of great nations, and they shall be prepared against her, and on the day she shall be taken; and Chaldea shall be a prey, all that waste her shall be filled with spoils, says the Lord, because you have rejoiced and spoken great things, plundering my inheritance. Your mother is exceedingly confounded, and she that bore you is made even with the dust. Behold, she shall be the last among the nations, and a desert in the way, and parched, by the wrath of the Lord; she shall not be inhabited, but shall be wholly brought to desolation. Make haste against Babylon, fight against her round about, for she has sinned against the Lord. Her foundations are fallen, and her walls are destroyed, since it is the vengeance of the Lord; take vengeance on her. As she has done, do to her: scatter the sower from Babylon, and him that holds the sickle from the face of the sword of the dove" — Gloss: "He calls Nebuchadnezzar a dove not for simplicity but for the foolishness of his pride." And it follows in the Prophet: "Israel is a scattered flock; the Lions have driven him away. First the King of Assyria devoured him, this last one, Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon, has even disjointed his bones. Therefore thus saith the Lord: Behold I will visit the King of Babylon and his land, as I have visited the King of Assyria." And there follows the manner of the visitation: "destroy and slay, the voice of war in the land, and a great commotion. How is the hammer of the whole earth broken and bruised? How is Babylon turned into a desert?" And it follows: "Behold I am against you, O proud one, says the Lord, for the time of your visitation has come, and the proud shall fall," and many other similar things, before and after. This whole thing also the burden of Babylon, by no means light, prophesied in Isaiah 13, plainly attests.

Likewise Jeremiah 47, [the prophet] is said to Nebuchadnezzar himself, under the name of a sword, in the person of the afflicted: "O sword of the Lord, how long wilt thou not be quiet? Go into thy scabbard, rest, and be still." And the Prophet answers for him: "How shall it be quiet, when the Lord hath given it a charge against Ascalon," etc. Where the Gloss: "as if to say, the sword cannot be quiet save by the command of the Lord, whose vengeance it executes." Likewise Lamentations 3: "Who is he that hath commanded a thing to be done, and the Lord did not command it?" Where the Gloss: "Who is he, how foolish, how audacious, who has commanded that anything be done, and the Lord did not command it — by whose just disposition all things are done?" And he shows this very diffusely, both in evil and in good things.

All these things signify divine providence, not merely permissive but actually preceptive. Nor can anyone say that God provides for those great things, but does not care for some small matters; for if he provides the deeds of Popes and Emperors or Kings, why not Cardinals and Dukes? And if of these, why not Archbishops and Counts? And if of these, why not Bishops and Barons, Rectors and soldiers? And so descending from the greatest to the least, from the proud to the humble, and from the rich to the poor — as the proximate chapter argued — most of all because he hides his mysteries from the wise and prudent, and reveals them to the little ones. Do not even the Angels of the little ones always see the face of the Father in heaven, who also looks on the lowly from near at hand, and knows the lofty from afar? Who himself, being poor, has chosen the poor in this world?

Likewise the Apostle, Augustine, Jerome, Gregory, and other holy Doctors, supposing that "all things befell them in figure," and that they "were written for our learning and correction," draw greater things of this kind to lesser, and to all other similar things universally. Jerome also says, in book 4 on Isaiah, where above: "Whatever, however, is said to the Assyrian — that is, to Sennacherib King of the Assyrians — can be referred to the pride of heretics and to the Devil, who in the Scriptures are called the axe, and the saw, and the rod, because through him unfruitful trees are cut down, and the hardness of unbelievers is divided and sawn, and they are struck with a rod, who do not receive discipline." And the same, the burden of Babylon, which in book 5 he expounded historically, as has been said, in book 6, expounding it anagogically, says: "Babylon, which is interpreted confusion, signifies this world, which lies in evil, and confounds not only the tongues, but the works and minds of individuals; and Nebuchadnezzar her King signifies the Devil; and his sanctified, strong, and Captains, the Apostles and Apostolic men and Captains of the Church"; and all the Doctors understand and expound the entire sacred Scripture in similar places in a similar manner.

Likewise the greatest and most horrible evils that ever were done — namely the persecution and killing of Christ and the Apostles, and of his other members — emanated from the actual providence of God. For it is not probable that God the Father should ever have negligently exposed his only Son, so beloved, of whom he commanded his Angels that they should keep him in all his ways, and whom he himself never abandoned, since they are one — to chance, or fortune, or the greatest misfortunes; nor did he permit anyone to touch his Christ, or anything to befall him in any way, except from the most wise counsel of his most provident will. For so a wise, good, and powerful parent, if he could, would provide for his most tender, beloved son in all things. For this most befits and is fitting, nor is it otherwise fitting, as chapters 27 and following have taught.

And this Isaiah 53 seems to attest, when he says: "He was offered, because he himself willed it." Nor is there doubt that the Father and the Son are of inseparable will; wherefore many of the faithful unanimously testify this, saying: "Lord, thou who didst make heaven and earth, the sea, and all things that are in them, who through the Holy Spirit by the mouth of our father David thy servant didst say: Why have the heathen raged, and the people meditated vain things? The Kings of the earth stood up, and the princes assembled together, against the Lord, and against his Christ. For there assembled together truly in this city, against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, Herod, and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, to do what thy hand and thy counsel decreed to be done" (Acts 4). And similar is what the Apostle says, Romans 11: "According to the gospel, indeed, they are enemies for your sake." And 1 Corinthians 11: "There must be heresies, that they who are approved may be made manifest among you."

Of these three authorities, however, Augustine treats the first two, in On the Predestination of the Saints, chapter 21, with the foregoing meaning, and adds: "So much, indeed, did the hand and counsel of God predestine to be done by the Jewish enemies, as much as the Gospels were necessary for our sake." And the same, in On Reprehension and Grace, chapter 22, says that God chose Judas, for the pouring out of his blood, and that through his damnable work the venerable work of Christ might be completed. Likewise the Lombard, Sentences III, distinction 20, says thus: "Of Christ it is read that he was handed over by the Father, and that he handed himself over, and that Judas handed him over, and the Jews. He himself handed himself over, since he willingly went to the passion. The Father handed him over, because by the will of the Father — indeed of the entire Trinity — he suffered. Judas handed him over by betraying, and the Jews by instigating. And the act of Judas and the Jews was evil, but the act of Christ and of the Father was good. The work of Christ and of the Father was good, since the will of the Father and the Son was good. The work of Judas and of the Jews was evil, since their intention was evil. There were diverse things done there or works — that is, diverse acts — and one matter, or thing done — namely, that passion. Therefore the Doctors sometimes unite in that deed the Father, the Son, Judas, and the Jew; sometimes they distinguish — looking at the passion, they call it one work of theirs; attending to the intentions and acts, they discern diverse deeds. Whence Augustine: 'A handing-over was made by the Father, a handing-over was made by the Son, and a handing-over was made by Judas; one matter was done, that is, the passion. What therefore distinguishes among them? That this the Father and the Son did in charity, but Judas in betrayal. You see that not what a man does, but with what intention, must be considered. In the same deed, that is, operation, we find God where Judas is: God we bless, Judas we detest, since God thought of our salvation, Judas thought of the price, by which he sold his Lord; the Son the price which he gave for us. Diverse intention, therefore, makes diverse deeds, although one matter is made from diverse things.' Behold, he says there was one matter, and diverse deeds, since there was one passion there, but diverse acts; and the acts of Judas and the Jews indeed evil, by which they wrought the passion of Christ — which is good, and is the work of God. The passion of Christ, then, is called both the work of the Jews, since it came from their acts, and the work of God, since by his Authorship — that is, by his willing — it was. Whence Augustine: "No one takes away the soul of Christ from him, since he has the power of laying down and taking up. Behold you have the Author of the work. He shall lay down his soul; behold you have the work of the Author"; and to conclude generally: as often as Christ in the flesh suffers anything, it is the work of the Author; for since he himself suffers by his own will, no other compelling, he himself is the Author of the work.

Likewise Augustine on that of Psalm 103: "From thy rebuke they shall flee, from the voice of thy thunder they shall fear; the mountains ascend, and the plains descend," etc., "thou hast set bounds," etc.: "the Emperor commanded; but who would have commanded, if God had not thundered? Because God willed, they commanded and it was done. Therefore let no one of men arrogate anything to himself; the waters shall fear, but from the voice of thy thunder." And below, in the same: "The mountains ascend" — namely, the powers, by raging — "and descend" — by being appeased. "Why, then, do they not now rage? Why do they not give effort, if they cannot overthrow our land, at least to cover it? Hear: Thou hast set bounds which they shall not pass, neither shall they return to cover the earth."

Furthermore, if not all things came from actual providence, some act could be simply evil, unjust, and disordered — namely, by an order preceding. For there is a twofold ordering, namely preceding and following. Preceding ordering is that which preordains a thing to its being, as God preordained to create the world. Following ordering is that which, the thing being placed in being, orders it by a certain order through something fitting to it — as an evil act through misery and through punishment. Such an evil act, therefore, if it does not proceed from preceptive providence but only from permissive, is simply unjust and disordered — namely, by preceding ordering. For nothing is just in such matters except what is conformed to the first rule of justice, which is the actual will of God, as chapter 21 teaches; nor is anything simply preordained which is not preordained by that which is the principle of this order and the primary orderer. But no act, however evil, is simply unjust or disordered by preceding ordering, since then the entire universe would not be best disposed — the contrary of which the 27th chapter alleged. The universe is better and more wisely disposed, however, if such acts are disposed by preceding and following ordering, than only by following. Therefore any such act is just with respect to God who wills it, and with respect to the sufferer who suffers it on account of his sins, or on account of some other cause approved by the divine will — although with respect to the particular agent, as the devil or man, it is unjust, who does it with malevolent and harmful mind, not with the mind of exercising divine justice. Just as if a torturer should hang someone justly handed over to him by a Judge to be hanged, not from love of executing justice, but from the lust of avenging; and as if a servant ordered to beat the son of his Lord should beat him with the mind of avenging, not with the mind of chastising at the command of the Lord. As is said in Isaiah 10 of Sennacherib King of the Assyrians, who was the rod of God's fury against the delinquent people; but because this man knew it not, nor did it with such mind, he sinned: "Woe," he says, "to Assyria, the rod of my fury, to a deceitful nation I will send him, against the people of my fury I will give him a charge, that he may take," and tread it down. "But he shall not so think, and his heart shall not so esteem; but his heart shall be set to crush, not to correct: for he shall say, Are not my princes altogether Kings?" — proudly attributing the whole to his own forces. And therefore there follows the threat of his punishment: "And it shall be," he says, "when the Lord shall have completed all his works" — not Sennacherib — "on Mount Zion, I shall visit upon the fruit of the magnificent heart of the King of Assyria, and upon the glory of the height of his eyes. For he hath said, In the strength of my hand, I have done it," etc. And his punishment follows: "Therefore the Lord shall send leanness among his fat ones," etc. That treading down of the people, then, was just with respect to God who willed it and through that rod of his made it; it was just likewise with respect to the people suffering, but not with respect to Sennacherib cruelly and proudly inflicting it as if by his own forces. The same is plain concerning Nebuchadnezzar, as is shown above, and concerning many other scourgings of the people of God most often in Scripture.

But lest in so great a judgment I should seem to say anything from my own understanding insensately, behold, Doctors of sense who manifestly hold this view. Blessed Augustine, then, in 83 Questions, Question 27, says thus: "It can come to pass that through an evil man divine providence may both punish and aid. For the impiety of the Jews both supplanted Judas and was for salvation to the Gentiles. Likewise it can come to pass that divine providence through a good man may both damn and aid, as the Apostle says: To some we are the odor of life unto life, to others the odor of death unto death. But since every tribulation is either the punishment of the impious or the exercise of the just — since the same threshing-floor both crushes the chaff and frees the grain from the chaff (whence also it took the name tribulation) — and again, since peace and rest from bodily molestations both gain the good and corrupt the evil: all these divine providence moderates according to the merits of souls. Yet the good do not choose for themselves the ministry of tribulation, nor do the evil love peace; therefore they themselves, through whom is wrought that which they know not, receive a reward not of justice, which is referred to God, but of their malevolence. Just as it is not imputed to the good, that to those wishing to profit them harm comes to someone, but the reward of benevolence is given to a good mind. For with the supreme God well administering all things which he has made, nothing in the universe is disordered, nothing unjust — whether we know it or know it not. But when in part the sinning soul offends, then, since by its merits it is there where such ought to be, and suffers those things which such it is fair to suffer, it deforms the universal kingdom of God by no foulness of itself. Wherefore, since we do not know all the things which the divine order rightly does concerning us, we act according to the law in good will alone; in other matters we are acted upon according to the law, since the law itself remains immutable, and moderates by most beautiful governance all mutable things." The same, On the Nature of Good, chapter 11: "It is in no wise possible for the nature of God to be harmed, nor for any nature under God to be harmed unjustly, since when by sinning some harm unjustly, the unjust will is imputed to them. The power, however, by which they are permitted to harm is only from God, who, even with them being ignorant, knows what those ought to suffer whom he permits them to harm." And below in the same, chapter 32: "Since the power of those who harm is only from God, as it is written: Through me Kings reign and Tyrants through me hold the earth. The Apostle also says: There is no power but from God. And Job: Who maketh the hypocrite to reign for the perversity of the people. And of the people of Israel he says: I gave them a King in my anger. It is not unjust, when the wicked receive the power of harming, that the patience of the good should be proved, and the iniquity of the evil punished. For through the power given to the devil, Job was proved, that he might appear just; and Peter tempted, lest he presume of himself; and Paul buffeted, lest he extol himself; and Judas damned, that he might hang himself. Since, therefore, through the power which he gave to the devil, God himself did all things justly, yet not for these just deeds the reward, but for the wicked will of harming, which was of the devil himself, was the punishment rendered to him."

Likewise blessed Gregory, Morals II, 12, on that of Job 1, "Naked came I out of my mother's womb," etc., says thus: "But because consolation must be drawn not only from the consideration of [the human] condition but also from the justice of the Creator, he rightly subjoins: The Lord gave, the Lord hath taken away; as it pleased the Lord, so is it done. The holy man, the adversary tempting, had lost all things; yet knowing that Satan had no powers of tempting against him save by the Lord's permission, he does not say, The Lord gave, the devil hath taken away, but The Lord gave, the Lord hath taken away. For perhaps it would have been to be grieved, if what the Creator had given, the enemy had taken away; but since none took away save he himself who gave, his own he received back, ours he did not take away. Where it is well subjoined, As it pleased the Lord, so is it done. For when in this life we suffer those things which we do not wish, we must necessarily incline the studies of our will to him who can will nothing unjust. Great indeed is the consolation in that which displeases — that what is acted toward us, by his ordering, to whom only what is just pleases. If, therefore, we know that just things please the Lord, but we can suffer none save those which have pleased the Lord, then all things which we suffer are just; and it is greatly unjust if we murmur about a just suffering."

This Anselm also testifies, On Truth, chapter 7, saying thus: "If all these are what they are in the supreme truth, without doubt these are what they ought to be. Whatever, however, is what it ought to be, is rightly. Therefore everything which is, is rightly." And below, chapter 8, he raises a doubt about sin — how it itself is rightly, since it ought not to be — and concerning the act of an evil will specifically he asks thus: "Do you suppose that the affect of an evil will ought to be?" And he answers that it ought to be and ought not to be. "For it ought to be, since it is permitted well and wisely by him without whose permission it could not come to be; and it ought not to be, with respect to him by whose iniquitous will it is conceived. Just as when one sinning is struck by someone to whom it does not pertain, since this one ought to be struck and that one ought not to strike, the striking ought to be and ought not to be — and therefore right and not right, it cannot be denied. But if you consider the judgment of the supernal wisdom and goodness, whether on one side only or on both — namely of the agent and of the sufferer — that the striking ought not to be, who shall dare to deny that what is permitted by such great wisdom and goodness ought to be? Let him deny who dares; I do not dare."

Likewise Titus, as is alleged in the Gloss, on that of Luke 13, "There were present some, telling of the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices," says thus: "He manifests here also that whatever befall in the punishment of the guilty from judgments, happen not only by the power of those judging, but also by the nod of God. Whence whether the Judge punishes with a just conscience, or condemns intending something else, the matter must be commended to the divine censure." And Chrysostom, on that below in the same, [verse] 18, "The tower fell here in Siloam and slew them," says thus: "He does not punish all, granting respite to others to repent; nor yet does he reserve all for future punishment, lest more should deny providence. Yet, even did he so act, none would deny permissive providence; therefore all such things come from preceptive providence."

The whole of Scripture, both of the Old Testament and of the New, also attributes to God almost all active verbs — as: to lead in enemies, to send fear and dread, to turn into flight, to humble, to depose, to root up, to destroy, to scatter, to overthrow, to scourge, to strike, to wound, to kill — and their contraries with many similar names, of which kind are: Saviour, Helper, Protector, Defender, salvation, virtue, protection, defense, fortitude — with infinite similar — which would not be unless God in some way did this, and not only permitted, as it seems. Wherefore also all these are contained under his providence, not merely permissive, but actually positive, and in some manner preceptive.

This, however, seems to be the argument of the Apostle, Romans 11. For when he cites the divine response, "I have left to myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed their knees before Baal," he himself argues that this was according to the operation and election of God, concluding thus: "Therefore in this time also a remnant according to the election of grace are saved." And similarly the Gloss argues on that of Jeremiah 31, "He that scattered Israel will gather him," saying: "Therefore not the power of the enemies, but the will of the Lord." Therefore the Lord truly does all these things. Whence Isaiah 45: "I am the Lord, and there is none other; forming light, and creating darkness, making peace, and creating evil; I am the Lord, doing all these things." Nor let anyone contradict prophetic truth, lest he incur the woe of malediction; for there follows: "Woe to him that gainsays his Maker, a sherd of the earthen pots." Whoever also try with a lying gloss to restrict this universal multitude of works of God's virtue, are reckoned among the enemies of the Lord, the Psalmist saying in Psalm 65: "Sing joyfully to God, all the earth," etc., "Say to God, How terrible are thy works! In the multitude of thy strength thy enemies shall lie to thee"; and to the end of the Psalm he pursues the works of the Lord commonly in prosperous and adverse things.

Otherwise, moreover, the beginning and end of the Christian Religion would be detracted from men — namely, fear and love. For "the beginning of wisdom is the fear of the Lord"; and "the end of the precept" — indeed, the fullness of the whole law — is love and charity. Through fear one departs from evil, and through love one perseveres in good. Fear is conceived from adverse things; love is generated from prosperous. He, therefore, who takes from God prosperous and adverse things — except according to that improvident providence, merely permissive, not actually positive — takes from him fear and love together. Therefore Augustine says, 83 Questions, Question 36: "Nothing is more true than what was said: The beginning of wisdom is the fear of the Lord. For there is no one who does not flee pain more than seek pleasure. Whence it comes that men, whom the beauty of virtue does not yet delight, are deterred from sin by punishments, which are most truly preached through holy men and divine [Scriptures]. That God, then, may be feared, it must be persuaded that all things are ruled by divine providence — not so much by reasons, which he who can find can also feel the beauty of virtue, as by examples, either recent if any occur, or especially from the History of the Old Testament and the New."

Whoever also takes away this providence of God takes from any sufferer the greatest portion of patience, hope, consolation, and joy. For who shall so patiently, especially, consolingly, and joyfully sustain adversities, if he believes them to befall him from an enemy alone, or from chance, and that through them sins are not purged, virtues exercised, or rewards accumulated — as if he should believe these to be sent upon him by God actually providing, on account of some such good? Indeed, so firmly to believe softened harsh things to all the saints of God, blunted sharp things, made gentle anything hard, and sweetly tempered every bitter and contrary thing; and there was in all sad things a singular solace — which is also for me, a sinner, the principal remedy in any adversities. Oh, how easily contraries does he sustain who fears or loves God, believing God to will him to sustain such things — who can will nothing save most wisely and most justly. This, as I think, makes the yoke of the Lord sweet, and his burden light, and grants rest to laboring souls; which also clearly the Authority of blessed Gregory, Morals II, 12, recited above, attests.

Hope in God also is taken from men by him who so posits, and gives them hope in princes, in men, and in flesh; for these truly liberate man from adversities, and truly place him in prosperities, with God as it were sleeping in some way and only permitting — into whose counsel my soul shall not come; rather, let their counsel be far from me, since it is far from the counsel of truth, since it itself is the counsel of vanity. For God commanded all things, both adverse and prosperous, to the ancient Fathers to make known to their sons, that another generation might know — sons that should be born and rise up, and shall declare to their sons especially to this end, that they may put their hope in God, and not forget the works of God (Psalm 77). To me, therefore, "to cleave to God is good, to place my hope in the Lord my God"; for this hope does not confound.

Likewise he who so posits not only takes the foregoing things from men in adverse things, but in prosperous things also he takes from God love, honor, and the manifold rendering of thanks, as the proximate chapter argued. For who shall love and honor his God, and render thanks to him, because he merely permits prosperous things to befall him — as also at times does a robber or tyrant — as much as he would render if he gave them to him from special love, positively, actually, and truly foreseen and given? Likewise, so to posit places men with the ungrateful and the foolish in the denial of God, and renders them more prone to all evils. Whence Job 21, having recited the manifold prosperity of the wicked, as is plain from the proximate chapter, the wicked said to God: "Depart from us" — as if to say, "We are well enough without thee" — and as if with the foolish, denying God, they said, "Who is the Almighty, that we should serve him?" In Psalm 72, the prosperity of the wicked having likewise been recited, as is plain from the proximate chapter, they said: "How doth God know?" etc.; "Behold these sinners obtained riches" — as if they should argue, therefore God does not know, or does not care, nor justly distributes human affairs; and as if further they should say, at least in heart, therefore there is no God; and behold the proneness which arises to sin: "And I said: Therefore in vain have I justified my heart," etc.; and above, in the same: "But my feet were almost moved, my steps had nearly slipped, since I was zealous over the wicked, seeing the peace of sinners," etc. And Ecclesiastes 9: "All things equally happen to the just and the unjust, to the good and to the evil, to the clean and the unclean, to him that offereth victims, and to him that despiseth sacrifices; as the good is, so also is the sinner. Whence also the hearts of the children of men are filled with malice and contempt while they live, and after this they shall be brought down to the dead." And above in the same, chapter 8: "Because sentence is not speedily pronounced against the evil, the children of men commit evils without any fear." Against these, therefore, and similar dangers, the actual providence of God in all things must be preached.

De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium

Book I, Chapters XXXIII–XXXIV

CHAPTER XXXIII

That with respect to whatsoever there is a permission of God, there is also His actual volition.

To these things I judge it not impertinent to join, that with respect to whatsoever there is a permission of God, there is also His actual volition. For this evidently follows from the immediately preceding chapter. Likewise by the twenty-second [chapter] of this [book]: God has some act of will with respect to whatsoever is permitted, and not an act of nolition, since by the tenth [chapter], in that case it would not come to pass, and therefore neither would it be permitted. The same is also proved by the authorities adduced in the preceding chapter, namely, that nothing is unjust simply because it is permitted by God; if, however, that permission had no act of will, it would not render anything just, as has been argued above. Likewise Augustine says in Enchiridion 75: "Nothing is done unless the Omnipotent willeth it to be done, either by allowing it to be done, or by Himself doing it." And he continues in chapter 76: "Nor is it to be doubted that God doeth well, even by allowing those things to be done that are done ill; for He alloweth them only by a just judgment, and certainly all that is just is good. Although therefore those things which are evil, in so far as they are evil, are not good; nevertheless it is good that not only good things, but also evil things, should be. For unless this were good, that evil things should be, in no wise would they be permitted to be by the omnipotent Good, to whom without doubt, just as it is always as easy to do what He willeth, so it is as easy not to allow to be that which He willeth not to be."

From which it appears that God has a positive act of will, of willing actually or not willing, concerning whatsoever. For he proves that it is good that evils exist, by the fact that otherwise they would not be permitted by the omnipotent Good; which he likewise proves by the fact that as easily as He doeth what He willeth, so easily doth He not allow to be what He willeth not, intimating that He willeth anything to be, or willeth it not to be. Either, therefore, he there means "willeth not" positively, as importing a positive act contrary to this verb "willeth," or purely negatively. If positively, the proposition is established—namely, that he supposes this disjunctive in God concerning whatsoever: "God willeth this, or God willeth this not, positively." If purely negatively, then by this he does not prove that unless it were good that evils should be, evils would not be, nor would they be allowed to be—which nevertheless is what he intends, when he says: "It is as easy not to allow to be that which He willeth not"—intimating that if it were not good, but evil, that evils should be, God would not will this, and so would not allow them to be, and therefore neither would they be. If, however, he means "willeth not" purely negatively, thus there could be a middle ground in God between actually willing and not willing positively, just as there is in a stone, or in a sleeping man; and so it would not follow: "He willeth not this, therefore this is not done"—just as it does not follow concerning a man who can hinder some doable thing, or even promote it: "He willeth not this, speaking purely negatively, therefore this is not done, nor doth he allow this to be"; nay rather, it can be done by another, even though he willeth it not, provided he doth not actually positively will it not, since then he would not hinder another doing it.

Likewise, just as by saying that "as easily as He doeth what He willeth," he means some act, so it appears that by saying "so easily doth He not allow to be that which He willeth not," he means some equally easy and equally efficacious act, namely, willing not, positively. Moreover, it is established that he allows and permits who could prohibit and does not; whence also he does not allow who could prohibit and does. When therefore Augustine says, "How easy it is for God not to allow to be that which He willeth not," by "not allowing" he means prohibiting, which imports some act; but what act, save willing not, positively—which by the tenth [chapter] is as efficacious for impeding or prohibiting as willing is for doing whatsoever?

That also in Augustine's mode of speaking, "willeth not" imports some positive act contrary to volition, is plain by him below, in the same [book], chapter 80, thus saying: "As regards angelic and human creatures who sinned, what God willed not, they did; but as regards the omnipotence of God, in no wise were they able to effect it." If, however, this verb "willed not" imported only a negation, it would seem that the angel and the man could do what God willed not, nor would this in any way derogate from His omnipotence. Likewise the first chapter, 80, below, thus speaks: "In a wonderful and ineffable manner, that is not done apart from the will of God which is even done against His will, since it would not be done if He did not allow it; nor doth He unwillingly allow, but willingly; nor would He allow good things to be done ill, were He not omnipotent, and able to make good out of evil."

The same in 22 De Civitate Dei 4: "Many things are done by evil men against the will of God; but He is of such great wisdom and such great virtue, that all things which seem contrary to His will tend toward those issues or ends which He hath foreknown to be good and just." Likewise [in] 26 Contra Faustum: "Indeed we know that to have been done which the will of God hath; but that which the will of God hath not, in no wise can be done by anyone." Therefore God not only permits, but actually willeth that every fact be done.

The same on Psalm 61: "God hath spoken once": "God by His own counsel permitted His Son to be slain by the unjust"; and below, in the same place: "God would not have permitted, unless it were just; by judgment He permits; by measure, number, and weight He permits." Therefore the permission of God hath with it counsel, judgment, measure, number, and weight—therefore also some act of will. The same in De Bono Perseverantiae 56 cites St. Gregory thus speaking: "I beseech you, confess the Trinity of one Divinity; but if you wish otherwise, say of one essence; and God will be entreated to grant you a voice from the Holy Spirit"—that is, God will be asked to permit a voice to be given to you, by which you may confess what you believe. Yet that voice permitted to be given would truly and properly be a gift of God: for he there adduces Gregory to testify that to believe in God, and to confess what we believe, is a gift of God.

Likewise the blessed Gregory, in 6 Moralia 11, on Job 5: "Who taketh the wise in their craftiness," etc., thus says: "For often some, puffed up with human wisdom, when they perceive divine judgments to be contrary to their desires, attempt to resist by cunning machinations, and that they may twist the force of the supernal dispensation according to their wish, persist in subtle thoughts and seek out subtler counsels; but thence they accomplish the will of God, whence they strive to alter it, and while they strive to resist the counsel of omnipotent God, they obey it; for often even that which trifles against His counsel by human striving aptly serves His disposition. The Lord therefore catches the wise in their craftiness, when human deeds fittingly serve His counsels even when they resist." And below, [chapter] 12: "For the just and merciful Disposer of mortals' acts, some things grants propitiously, others permits in anger; and those things which He permits, so tolerates, that He turneth them to the use of His counsel. Whence in a wonderful manner it comes about, that even what is done apart from the will of God is not contrary to the will of God; because while evil deeds are turned to good use, even those things which oppose His counsel serve His counsel. Hence the Psalmist says: 'Great are the works of the Lord, sought out unto all His wills.' Thus indeed His works are great, that through everything that is done by men, His will is sought out. Hence again Solomon says: 'There is no wisdom, there is no prudence, there is no counsel against the Lord.' It remains therefore that in all things which we do, we should inquire the force of the supernal will, to which our action ought devoutly to do service when known, and to follow as the leader of its journey, lest it serve Him even unwillingly, if proudly it declines from Him. For the force of the supernal counsel can in no wise be avoided, but he tempers it to himself with great strength who restrains himself under His commands, and lightens its weights to himself who bears it willingly with the submitted shoulder of his heart."

From these things it is shown evidently that with respect to whatsoever there is divine permission, there is also divine actual volition—which his authority in 2 Moralia 11, cited in the preceding chapter, fully testifies.

But against this seem to militate many sayings of the saints, distinguishing permission against the divine will, and saying that He permits many things which He willeth not, nor loveth. Whence Hosea 8: "They have reigned, and not by Me; they have been princes, and I knew it not." And Jeremiah 14: "The prophets prophesy falsely in My name; I sent them not, and I commanded them not, neither have I spoken to them." And below, 23: "I sent not the prophets, yet they ran; I spake not to them, yet they prophesied."

Likewise then whoever entered into the sheepfold, that is, into the Church, in any manner whatsoever, would enter through the door, since he would enter through God and Christ, nor would anyone climb up another way—which is contrary to that good Shepherd, John 10.

Likewise, then it would not be a thing to be indignantly borne, that the unworthy are preferred to great dignities—which is contrary to the common custom and teaching of the saints. Whence also Ecclesiastes 10: "There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, as if proceeding by error from the face of the prince: a fool set in high dignity, and the rich sitting beneath. I have seen servants on horses, and princes walking like servants on the ground."

Likewise, then no one ought to be deposed from any dignity or any state whatsoever, since God hath placed him there; nor ought anyone to write: "such-and-such, by divine permission," but "by divine providence, or will, or election." Nor ought one to resist anyone whomsoever doing anything whatsoever, since he doeth it from the will and ordination of God. Whence also Rehoboam, with the houses of Judah and Benjamin willing to fight against Jeroboam and his men, in order to reintegrate the divided kingdom, the Lord said unto them through the prophet Shemaiah: "Ye shall not go up, nor fight against your brethren; let every man return to his house, for this thing was done by Me of My will," 2 Paralipomenon 11 and 3 Kings 12. With which the Apostle agrees, Romans 13, thus admonishing: "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers; for there is no power but of God, and the powers that be are ordained of God. Therefore he that resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist purchase to themselves damnation."

Likewise, then one would have to obey the precept of anyone whatsoever, and any suggestion, and any appetite whatsoever; for all these proceed not only from the permission, but also from the volition of God.

For more easily resolving these objections, it must be known, according to the Philosopher in 3 Ethics 1, that "to will" is said in two ways, namely, simply, and in a certain respect; just as a merchant in danger of shipwreck simply willeth safety, but because perhaps he cannot have it unless he cast forth his merchandise, he willeth to cast forth his merchandise—not, however, this simply, but for the sake of safety. Whence also Proverbs 13: "The slothful willeth and willeth not." Augustine likewise, De Spiritu et Littera 26, thus says: "Nor is it usually said that anyone hath done something by will, if he hath done something unwillingly, although if we consider more subtly, even that which anyone is compelled to do unwillingly, if he doth it, he doth by will. But because he would prefer something else, therefore he is said to do it unwillingly—that is, not willing. For someone is compelled by some evil to do that which, willing to avoid, he doth what he is compelled; and through this, if he doth it, not indeed by full and free will, yet he doth it not but by will." The laws also say, that a coerced will is a will. But such operations, according to the Philosopher in the same place, are mixed of voluntary and involuntary, and therefore are sometimes denominated from one of these and called voluntary, sometimes from the other and called involuntary, or not voluntary, so that, according to Augustine just cited, such a one is said to do "unwillingly and not willing."

Wherefore the Philosopher says in 2 Topics, that desire with respect to anything desired can be threefold: either as an end, like health; or as of those things which are unto an end, like to sew, or to compound; or as of those things which are by accident, as in the desire of mixed [wine] for sweetness. For not because it is wine, but because it is sweet [is it desired]; for per se one desires sweetness, but wine by accident. For if it be sour, he no longer desires it; therefore he desires it by accident. And in 7 Ethics 9: "If anyone choose or pursue this for the sake of that, per se he chooseth and pursueth this, but by accident the former; but simply we say that which is per se."

And according to him in 6 Metaphysics 4: "Accident appears near to non-being; and therefore Plato did not badly place sophistic about non-being, since [it is] about being by accident. Wherefore there is no speculation about it, nor any active, productive, or theological science studious about it." And in 1 Physics 74 thus speaks: "Since most properly we say a physician doth something, or suffereth, or comes-to-be from a physician, if as physician he so suffereth or doeth, [it is] manifest that from that which is not, something comes-to-be, and this insofar as it is not." Therefore the authors and doctors, both philosophical and theological, speaking frequently, as is fitting, properly, and in propositions not by accident but simply and per se true, say of him who willeth something only by accident in the said way, that he willeth it not, or willeth not.

Wherefore the Philosopher in 8 Ethics 3 says, that friendships for the sake of the useful and the delightful are friendships by accident. And below, 9.1: "On account of these," says he, "namely, the useful and the delightful, friendship existing, dissolution comes about when those things, for the sake of which they loved, are not done. For they did not love each other, but the things existing." And what is "to love," save to will good to the beloved, the Philosopher saying, 8 Ethics 3: "Lovers will good things to one another"—with which Anselm agrees, De Casu Diaboli 13: "He who willeth something for the sake of beatitude, willeth nothing else than beatitude"—with many other authorities adduced in the 26th [chapter] of this [book] for this same purpose.

Thus also God simply willeth the elect to be saved, and to be rewarded with eternal beatitude; but because it is fitting that their merits should precede, He hath ordained for them rebellious tyrants and many enemies, like Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar, and others, as rods of His fury, that thus He might visit their iniquities with the rod, and their sins with stripes, and so might mercifully chastise them, or innocently preserve them from sins, or even usefully exercise their virtues. For what would the patience of the humble and the just merit, unless the injury of the malicious afflicted and pricked it?—all which things are sufficiently plain from what has gone before. Wherefore God willeth not such persecutors of the just simply to exist or to persecute, but only in a certain respect and by accident, on account of the elect; therefore frequently it is said that God willeth not them, nor their works, but only permits them—just as a sick man, who must be cut or burned in order to be cured, says not "I will," but says "if it must be so, I shall permit." He says not "I will," because he willeth it not simply; yet he willeth it in a certain respect and by accident, namely for the sake of health.

Which manner of speaking is also had in Sacred Scripture expressly, Genesis 47, where Joseph says to the Egyptians: "Take ye, and sow the fields, that ye may have grain. Ye shall give the fifth part to the king, and the four remaining parts I permit unto you for seed and for food, for your children and your families." He said, "I permit": nor is there any doubt that he willed them to have the four remaining parts for themselves and theirs; but principally more he willed to have the fifth part for the use of the king, to whose business he specially attended. And Tobias 2, the Scripture speaking of the blinding of Tobias, thus says: "But this temptation the Lord permitted to befall him, that an example of his patience might be given to posterity, as also of holy Job." Behold, he says that the Lord permitted, and yet He willed that temptation, since it was good, and in no way evil through fault—which is plain by Raphael's testifying below, the same chapter, 12: "Because thou wast acceptable to God, it was necessary that temptation should prove thee"—and this was not but by the divine will. God therefore willed this, not, however, simply and for itself, but in a certain respect and by accident, insofar, namely, as it was an occasion of patience in Tobias and of good example to posterity.

It is plain, therefore, in what manner with respect to the same thing the divine permission and His actual volition are not repugnant. By this is plain [the answer] to the first [objection] from Hosea, that "they reigned, and not by Me," that is, [not by Me] willing simply, although [they reigned by Me willing] in a certain respect and by accident, as has been said. Or otherwise: "They reigned, and not by Me," that is, as far as it lay in them, since perhaps [they reigned] against their own conscience, and against human and legal justice, although not against simple justice which is divine—as the preceding chapter showed by proving that nothing is unjust simply.

To the others concerning Jeremiah and John it is plain by the same [argument] that unworthy prelates are not to be borne unworthily, but worthily as regards divine justice, which so disposes; they may, however, be borne unworthily as regards proper justice, if they have ascended less justly. Yet for us subjects I reckon it safe and salutary not to murmur easily against any prelates whatsoever, but to support them humbly for God's sake, who hath set them over us. For if they be mute or evil, this perchance is in punishment of our sins, who deserve to have such. Whence Job 34: "He maketh a hypocrite to reign because of the sins of the people." Whereon the blessed Gregory says, 25 Moralia 15: "Let none who suffereth such a ruler accuse him whom he suffereth, since assuredly it was of his merit to be subject to the jurisdiction of a perverse ruler. Therefore let him rather accuse the fault of his own work, than the injustice of the governor." And below, in the same place, 16: "Thus, then, according to the merits of subjects, are the persons of those who rule bestowed."

Sometimes, however, subjects through their own sins not only receive an evil prelate, but, what is more wonderful, he whom they had received as good is changed into evil. Wherefore Gregory says below, in the same place: "Thus according to the qualities of subjects are the acts of those who rule disposed, so that often, on account of the merit of the flock, the life of the very pastor, who is truly good, is forsaken. That David, praised by God's testimony, the prophet, puffed up with the swelling of sudden elation, sinned by numbering the people; and yet, when David sinned, the people received the punishment. Why this? because, namely, according to the merits of the multitudes are the hearts of rulers disposed. The just Judge corrected the vice of the sinner from the chastisement of those, on whose account he sinned; but because he himself, by his own will being puffed up, was not free from fault, he himself also received punishment for the fault. For the wrath which raged corporally smote the people, but with intimate sorrow of heart it laid the ruler of the people prostrate."

A good prelate also, admitted and continually remaining good, sometimes on account of the sins of subjects is rendered mute as to the office of preaching and correction. Whence the Lord said to Ezekiel: "I will make thy tongue cleave to the roof of thy mouth, and thou shalt be dumb, and not as a man rebuking, for they are a provoking house." Where the Gloss on the word "provoking" [says], as if to say: "They are of such great bitterness, and contention against God, that they merit not even to hear rebuke." From which it is plain that where there hath been a multitude of sinners, there are unworthy sinners who are corrected by the Lord. Let subjects therefore first correct their own life, and let them not murmur against their prelates; but let them devoutly entreat the Lord for them, in whose hands are the hearts of kings and of all prelates.

Nor doth that which is argued consequently proceed, namely, that just as God placed a prelate in high station, so, if he be deposed, He deposes him. For He is who hath put down the mighty from their seat; nor did He place him there for his perpetual [tenure], but for a time, just as He gave the kingdom to Nebuchadnezzar, and to his seed after him—not for ever, but until the time of his land and of himself should come, as had been alleged earlier from Jeremiah 27—not understanding by "the time of his land and of himself" the time of the duration of the kingdom necessarily predetermined in some great, greater, or greatest conjunction, which renews sects and kingdoms (as the lying astrologers lie, who not only attempt to predetermine the times of great kingdoms, but also the time of the Christian faith, Albumasar De Coniunctionibus attesting), but the time prefixed by the Lord. For He changeth times and ages, transferreth kingdoms, and establisheth, Daniel 2: and a kingdom is transferred from nation to nation on account of injustices, Ecclesiastes 10. And as from nation to nation, so from tribe to tribe, from person to person, of which Saul and David are witnesses, as was touched above. And as He transfers kingdoms, so also any lesser dignities whatsoever.

Therefore, since some less worthy ones sometimes occupy dignities, and this as far as concerns them, namely according to human and inferior justice, less justly—although as regards divine and superior justice in some manner justly—well can these judges, judging according to human and inferior justice, since concerning the future they are ignorant of divine and superior justice, namely the most just will of God, will them to be deposed, although perchance not utterly absolutely, but with this expressed or tacit condition: "If it shall be pleasing before God"—and so further to act unto the deposition of such prelates; and if it should happen that this be done and they be deposed, this is wholly done according to divine and superior justice, as has been said. All this, moreover, the authority of Augustine Ad Simplicianum, prescribed in the twenty-fifth [chapter] of this [book], seems to confirm.

The fifth argument can likewise be retorted upon the head of the arguer. For if, because some write "such-and-such by divine permission," therefore by pure permission and not by the will of God is so-and-so [in office]: by similar reason, because to certain ones it is always written "by divine providence," or "election," or "by the grace of God," to the supreme Pontiff, bishop, or king, all such are preferred by divine providence and grace, and none of them by pure divine permission—although some of them are, or could be, evil, just as also among those constituted in lesser dignities. Likewise, if because someone writes "by divine permission, such-and-such," therefore by pure permission of God he is such-and-such—since all those constituted in other small dignities always write thus—all are always by pure divine permission such, and none by His volition or election or actual providence: which reason does not permit, since among them are many holy and good men, and God so cares for the little flock as for the great, as the preceding things have taught. Yet because the permission of God seems less than His grace, providence, election, or will, therefore the lesser, for the sake of humility, write thus.

To the sixth, however, concerning not resisting anyone doing anything, it must be answered as was said to the fourth, concerning the deposition of presidents: since just as God willeth one to do anything whatsoever, so He willeth to be resisted, if anyone resists Him, etc., as there. And if you argue: therefore in vain hath He ordained the first action, which He hath similarly ordained to be destroyed by a second; for "one building up, one tearing down: what doth it profit them but the labor?" Ecclesiasticus 34. I respond, that thus could be proved that fire and water and any contraries ought not to be in the world, since one of contraries impedes and destroys the action of the other; nay rather, what is more wonderful, the good angels sometimes mutually resist one another, and contend by turns. Whence Daniel 10: "The prince of the kingdom of the Persians resisted me one and twenty days," and below in the same place: "And now I will return to fight against the prince of the Persians"—who both were good angels, as is plain by Gregory, and the Gloss there cites him.

And there is some good and just will, contrary, however, in a certain manner to the divine will: as is plain concerning a good son, who willeth his father to live, whom God willeth to die—as appears by Augustine Enchiridion 70, and Lombard cites him in 1 Sentences dist. 48.1, and 22 De Civitate Dei 2 distinguishes a twofold will of God: one essential and eternal, by which God willeth; another temporal, by which He maketh others to will. Of this second [will] he thus says: "According to this will, by which we say God willeth what He maketh others to will, by whom future things are not known, He willeth many things, nor doth He do them. For many things His saints will to be done, inspired by Him with a holy will, nor are they done; as when they pray for certain ones holily and piously what they pray He doth not do, although He hath made in them this will of praying by His Holy Spirit." Which the Lord also expressly testified when He said to David: "Whereas thou hast thought in thy heart to build a house to My name, thou hast done well, taking this in mind," 3 Kings 8. That will, therefore, or thought pleased God, and yet the work toward which it tended, finally pleased not. For He immediately added: "Nevertheless, thou shalt not build Me a house." Where also the Gloss says, "an argument that the will of an act pleases, even if not the act."

From all these things it is plain, that although God ordains something, it is not necessary that He will nothing to resist Him, nor [will] to destroy it; nay rather, He hath ordained all agents and resistants, generators and corrupters, and universally all contraries, and to them, both in acting and in resisting, in generating and corrupting, and generally in doing and not doing, hath constituted proper limits which they shall in no wise transgress.

To the last [objection] it is plain by the same: For the precepts of tyrants, the suggestions of the devil, and the appetites of the flesh, God willeth to be done, not that they may be obeyed by all, but for the punishment of sinners, or for humiliation and to forestall sins, or even for the exercise of virtues and the heaping up of merits. Nor is it wonderful: for God Himself sometimes commanded something, and forbade something, nor yet did He will this to be done, nor that not to be done—as is plain Genesis 22 concerning Abraham, to whom He commanded to immolate his son, nor yet willed He him to be immolated; but to prove the faith of Abraham He thus commanded. And Matthew 9, concerning the two blind men illumined, to whom He said: "See that no man know it"; but they, going forth, spread His fame in all that land—nor yet in this, according to the sentence of the Fathers, did they sin. And this is what Lombard manifestly teaches, 1 Sentences, distinction 45 and 47.

Yet, these things notwithstanding, it cannot be denied that the rationale of permission and of proper volition—namely, of an actually positive [will] in God and in men—is diverse, although not contrary. For men will some things to be done, which they also permit to be done; yet they will not whatsoever they permit, neither do they permit whatsoever they will. For no one is properly said to permit himself to do anything, but another whom he could hinder if he willed. Wherefore by similar reason it appears that God doth not permit whatsoever He willeth; nay rather, whatsoever He permitteth to be done by anyone, He willeth that thing to be done by the same: for He voluntarily effects it, the same way as the eighth and ninth chapters of this [book] manifestly show.

CHAPTER XXXIV

Whether, and in what way, God willeth, and willeth not, sin.

Here it remains consequently to inquire whether God willeth sin. And it appears that in some way He willeth it. For God permitteth sin; therefore by the preceding chapter it appears that in some way He willeth it. Likewise, by the twenty-second chapter, God hath either willing or not willing with respect to sin—and not not willing, since then it would not come to pass, by chapter 10—therefore willing. Likewise, God voluntarily provides and does all voluntary works, both evil and good, with all their positive circumstances, as is manifest from what has gone before, which necessarily import sin. Likewise, "Sin exists" is true, and is not the first true, as is plain from the twelfth [chapter] of this [book]; therefore it is true from the first true, as is clearly evident from the same 12 and 13. The first true, however, is in God, as is plain in the same place; therefore God is the cause of this truth, and not but voluntarily. Therefore God willeth this to be true, "Sin exists"; therefore also that it should be so on the part of the thing as is signified by it; therefore He willeth sin to be.

Although Lombard in 1 Sentences, distinction 46, reckons this argument sophistical and unworthy of response, yet it appears more unworthy to respond [to him this way], and to confirm the response by a most unworthy instance. For according to the Philosopher in 2 Topics, an instance is an argument unto opposition; this instance, however, opposes nothing against the prior position. For he says the argument does not hold, just as in a similar [case] it does not follow: "God prohibits theft to be done, and that theft be done is true; therefore He prohibits the true." It is true that this does not follow, nor is it an instance, as he believes. For "to prohibit" imports a negation, namely, to will or to command something not to be done or not to be; therefore it confounds the following term confusedly and distributively, so that for "to be said of none" it is allowed to descend to any supposit negatively, as is plain from the first [book of the] Prior [Analytics]. Now it does not follow: "God prohibits to steal, and every stealing is some operating; therefore God prohibits some operating"—since this term "some operating" in the minor supposits or signifies confusedly only, so that it is not allowed there to descend to any of its supposits; and in the conclusion it is taken confusedly and distributively, as has been said: from which mutation of supposition arises the fallacy of figure of speech.

Nor is there any doubt that that conclusion does not follow, since if God prohibits some operating, He willeth or commands that nothing be operated, and so it is not lawful to operate anything. If, however, it be argued thus: "God prohibits to steal, and to steal is some operating; therefore some operating and some operation is prohibited by God"—it follows well, and that conclusion is true.

And in the same way it appears to be concerning truth and its prohibition. For truth follows the being or non-being of a thing. For if it be argued thus: "God prohibits this true [proposition], or this to be true, 'A thief steals'; and this is true, 'A thief steals'; therefore God prohibits the true"—it does not follow; well does it follow, however, that some true thing, or some proposition to be true, God prohibits. For everyone is bound to beware of such a true [proposition] concerning himself: "This man steals"; and this is by reason of some divine prohibition. For God could rationally prohibit, and so He seems effectually and really to have prohibited each one concerning himself, that this should never be true: "This man steals," "This man commits adultery," and so concerning all similar evils. Wherefore "blessed are those against whom they have spoken every evil thing, lying."

Furthermore, this is true: "Sin exists." Therefore there is some cause of that truth; and God is the first cause of all causes, and every second cause causes by virtue of the first cause, as the preceding has taught. Likewise, there is some cause of that truth, and not the terms alone, nor sin itself alone, since itself is nothing, as is plain by the 26th [chapter] of this [book]. Therefore there is some positive cause; and God is the first cause of all such. Likewise sin is a certain privation, as is plain in the 26th [chapter], and prior to every negation and privation is the affirmation and habit, and the cause of that, as is plain in the 13th [chapter]; and of every affirmation and habit God is the first cause, as is plain in the same place. Likewise God is the first cause of every being and non-being, as the 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th [chapters] have proved. Therefore also of the non-being of due justice, and of the being of sin.

Likewise otherwise God would not best dispose the universe, nor most perfectly ordain it. For better and more perfect it is to order, and to dispose, nay rather to predispose and preordain, as has been said in the preceding chapter, all things, both evil and good, both privative and positive, than only good and positive things. Otherwise the evil and privative would be left disordered—the said preceding ordination notwithstanding—and there would be something unjust and unbecoming simply, which would not in the least defile the most just and most beautiful order of the universe; which is contrary to what is held in the preceding chapter.

Likewise, every thing whose being is good, is good to be from the first good, and God willeth it to be; but for sin to be is good, as is plain by the authority of Augustine adduced in the preceding chapter. Hugh also, in 1 De Sacramentis 4 part 14, shows that God willeth evils to be, since this is good. And above, 13, thus says: "If it be said 'God willeth evil,' it is grievous to the hearing, and the pious mind doth not receive this concerning the Good, that He willeth evil. And therefore the pious mind refuses this, not because what is said is not well said, but because what is well said is not well understood: for it hath the zeal of God, but not according to knowledge."

Likewise, every thing which is expedient to men, is from the first good profitable to all, and God willeth it to be expedient and to be. But sins are expedient to men, not only the sins of others, as has been shown above, but even their own. Whence to the Romans 8: "To them that love God all things work together for good, to those who, according to His purpose, are called saints." For to such, as Augustine says in De Correptione et Gratia 35: "God so worketh all things together for good, that if any of them deviate and stray, this very thing He maketh to profit them for good, since they are made humbler and more learned, like Peter." And Psalm 82: "Fill their faces with shame, and they shall seek Thy name, O Lord."

Augustine also, 14 De Civitate Dei 13: "I dare to say, that to the proud it is useful to fall into some open and manifest sin, by which they may be displeased with themselves who, by being pleased with themselves, had fallen. For more wholesomely Peter was displeased with himself when he wept, than he was pleased with himself when he presumed." This says also the sacred Psalm: "Fill their faces with shame," etc.

Likewise, every thing that contributes to the beauty of the universe, God, the beautiful Author of all beauty, willeth to be. Sin is of this kind. For according to that prophetic and famous saying in 2 De Caelo 40, and 3 Meteorology, and 1 Elenchi: "Contraries, or opposites, placed beside each other, appear more." Whence also in De Mundo 10, he thus says: "Some have wondered how the world, consisting of contrary principles—I mean dry and moist, cold and hot—is not corrupted of old; as if anyone wondered how a city continues, consisting of contrary peoples—I mean, poor and rich, young, old, weak, strong, of the reprobate and the upright" (in another translation, "of the evil and the good"); "but they know not that this was the most wondrous thing of civic concord" (in another translation, "of harmony")—"I mean, that out of many it accepts one, and like nature and fortune of all. But perhaps the nature of contraries thrives, and to make consonance from these, not from likes. As, therefore, He hath joined the male to the female, and not each to its proper sex, and the first compact He joined together by contraries, not by likes, as is seen. Art also, imitating nature, doth this. For painting, mingling the natures of white, black, yellow, and red colors, hath wrought images consonant with their originals; music, mingling acute and grave, long and short sounds in diverse voices, hath perfected one harmony; grammar, making a mixture of vowels and consonants, hath constituted the whole art from these. The same also was that which was said by the obscure Heraclitus: 'It joineth converse and not converse, agreeing and differing, consonant and dissonant; and from all things one, and from one all things.' Thus, therefore, also one harmony hath adorned the constitution of all things—of heaven, I mean, and of earth, the whole everywhere mixed, especially of contrary principles—dry with moist, hot with cold, heavy with light, straight with curved; one virtue, which passeth through all things, hath adorned the whole earth, and sea, ether, and sun, and moon, and the whole heaven; from things unmixed and diverse, from air, earth, fire, and water, creating and disposing the whole world on the surface of one sphere; and forcing especially contrary natures in it to agree with one another, and from these contriving safety for the universe." And below, in the same place, of all things as if contrary, he thus says: "All these things appear to have been made for the cause of good, and to bestow safety through the ages."

Alhazen also in 2 of his Perspective shows, that not only light and likeness, but also shadow, obscurity, and diversity, sometimes make beauty—where, by way of example, he says that the beauty of the stars appears not but in the blackness of the night, and that the stars in dark nights are more beautiful than in moonlit nights. With which the wise [author] of Ecclesiasticus 33 agrees, thus saying: "Why doth one day excel another, and one light another, and one year another, and one sun another?" And he answers: "By the knowledge of the Lord they were made distinct; the sun being made and keeping His commandment, by the wisdom of God they are divided. And He changed (or otherwise, will change) the seasons and their feast days, and from these He hath set in number of days, and all men of the earth in the multitude of the discipline of the Lord. He separated them, and changed their ways. From among them He blessed and exalted, sanctified, and applied unto Himself; from among them He cursed, and humbled, and converted them to their own separation. As clay in the hand of the potter, to fashion and dispose it, all his ways are according to his disposition: so man in the hand of Him that made him, and He shall render to him according to His judgment. Against evil, good; and against life, death; so against a just man, a sinner. And so behold all the works of the Most High, two against two, and one against one."

Augustine says in 11 De Civitate Dei 18: "God would not have created any of the angels or men whom He foreknew would be evil, unless He had likewise known with what uses for good He would commit them, and thus, like the most beautiful poem, would adorn the order of the ages with certain antitheses, as it were. For 'antitheses,' as they are called in the ornaments of speech, are most becoming, which in Latin are called 'opposites' or 'contraposed.' Just as, therefore, these contraries opposed to contraries render the beauty of speech, so by a certain eloquence, not of words but of things, the opposition of contraries composes the beauty of the world. This is most plainly set forth in the book of Ecclesiasticus, in this manner: 'Against evil, good; and against death, life; so against the pious, a sinner.'"

And below, in the same place, 23: "As painting with black color placed in its proper place, so the universality of things, if anyone could behold it, even with sinners is beautiful, although by themselves considered their deformity is foul." The same in De Vera Religione 73 says, that the beauty of the universe is not to be considered in only one part, but in all and in the whole. "Our error also, adhering to a part of the world, is per se foul; but as the black color in a painting with the whole is beautiful, so the unchangeable divine providence becomingly exhibits this whole contest from contraries." The same likewise Enchiridion 7: "In the universality, that which is called evil, well ordered and placed in its proper place, more eminently commends the good, that they may please more, and be more praiseworthy, when compared with the evil." The same furthermore in De Natura Boni 16 thus says: "Privations are so ordered in the universality of nature, that they have not unbecomingly their turns. For God, by not illumining certain places and times, decently makes darkness; for if we, by holding back our voice, decently interpose silence in speaking, how much more becomingly doth He make privations of certain things, as the perfect Artificer of all things." Whence also in the hymn of the three children, even "light and darkness" praise God—that is, they bring forth His praise in the hearts of those who well consider.

Likewise, every just thing is just from the first just, namely God; and God willeth it to be just and to be. Every punishment of sin is just, as is plain in the 31st [chapter] of this [book], and one sin is the punishment of another. For the prophet says, "Let not the foot of pride come to me, etc. There are they fallen who work iniquity; they were cast out, and could not stand," Psalm 35. Wherefore also Solomon: "A deep pit is the mouth of a strange woman; he with whom the Lord is angry, shall fall into it," Proverbs 22. Which is also plain to the Romans 1, concerning those who, when they had known God, glorified Him not as God, neither gave thanks. "Wherefore God gave them up to the desires of their heart, unto uncleanness."

Whence also Augustine on Psalm 35 cited above says: "Hear the foot of pride: 'who, when they had known God, glorified Him not as God.' Therefore the foot of pride came upon them, whence they came into the deep. God gave them up to the desires of their heart, to do those things which are not convenient." Who also on Psalm 57: "As wax that melteth they shall be taken away," thus says: "These punishments few perceive, therefore the Spirit of God most often commemorates them. Hear the Apostle saying, 'God gave them up,' etc. And he enumerates many things which are sins, and says they are the punishments of sins. For the first sin is pride, the last punishment is fire or hell. The sins, however, of the damned, intermediate between that first sin and this last punishment, are both sins and punishments. That he be an adulterer is now a punishment, that he be a liar, that he be avaricious, that he be fraudulent, that he be a homicide, are now punishments. Whose punishments? Of the prior apostasy, of that pride, by which they said themselves to be wise, since they said they had of themselves what they had received from God." Which he also similarly teaches in the fifth [book] Contra Iulianum 3, and afterwards diffusely, and similarly in the sixth book.

Gregory also says on Ezekiel, homily 11: "A sin which is not quickly blotted out by penitence, is either a sin and the cause of sin, or a sin and the punishment of sin, or a sin both the cause and punishment of sin. Whence Moses: 'The sins of the Amorites are not yet completed.' And David: 'Add iniquity to their iniquity.' And another prophet: 'Blood hath touched blood,' that is, sin hath been rendered for sin. Paul also says: 'Therefore He gave them up,' etc. To John also it is said by the angel: 'He that is in filth, let him be filthy still.'" Whom Isidore follows in the second [book] De Summo Bono 19, saying that "the preceding sin is the cause of the following sin, but the following sin is the punishment of the preceding offense; nor are any who are just impelled by God to become evil, but while they are now evil, they are hardened, that they may exist as worse, as the Apostle says: 'Because they have not received the truth of God that they might be saved, God hath sent them the spirit of error.' God therefore makes some to sin, but those in whom such sins have already preceded, that by His just judgment they deserve to go in their desires."

Perhaps it will be answered that one sin is the punishment of another, but according to the pure substance of the act, not according to its deformity. But how is this true of the act of sin, to which great delight, and no sadness at all, is admixed? since also no act is per se essentially evil, by the 26th [chapter] of this [book]. And if anyone shall say that such an act of sin is harmful and penal to the man, insofar as it takes from him the due justice which he had, and induces an opposite privation, he must say consequently that such ablation and privation passively is rather his punishment, and that per se and properly is sin, as the 26th of this [book], and very many doctors testify—otherwise also after sinning sin would not remain. Wherefore Peter [Lombard] in 2 Sentences dist. 35 last [says] that the privation and corruption of good is called punishment according to its effect—that is, according to the passion which is the effect of sin, that is, of sinning, itself and the [privation] causing it—and he says that this punishment is from God. Whence also Augustine De Vera Religione, 24, says: "This defect, which is called sin, if it occupied [a man] unwilling like a fever, the punishment which follows the sinner, and which is named damnation, would justly seem unjust." Who also in 5 Contra Iulianum 14, speaking of the evil man working evil, thus says: "That assuredly is sin to him, since he doth evil, and the punishment of sin, since he suffereth evil himself."

And if anyone shall yet respond to the saying of the Apostle, and similar, by glossing thus: "God gave them up, etc., that is, by deserting them, He permitted them to be given up"—just as also certain doctors seem to gloss—it can be argued by the preceding chapter, that if He permitted them to be thus given up, He willed them to be thus given up. Likewise Augustine says, and three other holy [authors] agree, that "to be an adulterer, and a liar," etc., are punishments of the prior sin. Therefore they are in some way just, and willed by God. Likewise, the second sin is in some way the punishment of the prior sin, as is plain by the testimonies of Scripture, and the foresaid doctors; and if this be not by the intention or will of God, nor by the intention or volition of the sinner, nor of any other, this would be purely casual, contrary to the 29th [chapter] of this [book]; and likewise then [God] would not punish it orderly nor justly. For nothing punishes another orderly or justly, unless it be ordained by some just judge in punishment of that.

Likewise, then God would not give over the evil into desires or sins differently than the good: for both He gives over only by permitting, which is contrary to the Scripture and the foresaid doctors. For on account of the foot of pride preceding, "they fell who work iniquity; they were expelled, and could not stand." Wherefore Isidore says, "Nor are any who are just impelled by God to become evil," etc.—intimating that some, while they are unjust, are so impelled by God, that they exist as worse; and therefore he says expressly that God makes such to sin, not others. Which the words of the Apostle adduced also savor of: "Because they have not received the truth of God, God sent them the spirit of error"—where Jerome's translation says more expressly: "Therefore God will send them the operation of error, that they may believe a lie," 2 Thessalonians 2. And Scripture everywhere speaking of such says: "Wherefore," "Therefore," "Because," or some similar [word] which signifies a cause, showing thereby that the preceding sin is the cause of the following.

Likewise Lombard, 2 Sentences, dist. 30, shows that one sin is the punishment of another, and says that sin, insofar as it is the punishment of a prior sin, is from God, but not insofar as it is sin. Either, therefore, he means that as it is the punishment of sin, it is from God only permitting, and so it is, as it is sin: there is therefore no difference. Or [he means] that it is from God willing and ordaining, and then God willeth sin to be done and to be, at least insofar as it is the punishment of a prior sin.

Likewise, this seems a perilous response, unless by permission he means the will of God in a certain respect, as the preceding chapter expounded—just as also doctors, sometimes thus glossing the saying of the Apostle and similar, can be expounded. For this is the response and exposition of Julian the heretic, in the fifth book against whom by Augustine it is more diffusely refuted. For Julian, as Augustine there in chapter 4 cites, thus expounded the saying of the Apostle: "God gave them up," etc., that is, gave them up by deserting [them], and not by power, but by patience. Against whom Augustine thus inveighs: "Thou inquirest in vain how it is to be understood that God gives up, laboring much to show that He gives up by deserting." And below, in the same place: "The Apostle said what evil they had previously done, and added: 'Wherefore God gave them up to the desires of their heart.' Hence this is the punishment of the preceding sin, and yet itself also is sin. But thou, disputing on the contrary, seemest to thyself to have solved this question in some manner, since the Apostle said the desires were given up to themselves; for now they were already burning with the unjust desires of their disgraces, and thou addest how they should be thought to have fallen into such deeds by the power of God who gives them up." And Augustine against him: "What more, I beseech, was done? or why did the Apostle say, 'God gave them up to the desires of their heart,' if they were already in any way possessed by the evil desires of their heart? But is it consequent that, if anyone hath evil desires, now also he should consent to them for committing the same evils? And thus, it is one thing to have evil desires, another to be given up to them, that by consenting to them he may be possessed by them—which is done when he is given up to them by divine judgment."

And below, in chapter 5, he cites many things from Scripture, by which he shows that one sin is the punishment of another. "The Lord," says he, "mingled with them the spirit of error, and they have led Egypt astray; again, 'Why hast Thou made us to err from Thy way, O Lord, hardened our hearts, that we should not fear Thee?'; again, 'Behold Thou art angry, and we have sinned, therefore we have erred'; again, 'By the Lord the heart of the nations was strengthened, that they should come against Israel to be exterminated'; again, 'King Rehoboam hearkened not, etc., that the Lord might establish the word of the prophet'; again, 'Amaziah hearkened not, since it was from the Lord that he should be delivered up'; again, 'Because they have not received the love of the truth, etc., God shall send them the operation of error, that they may believe a lie'; again, 'If a prophet shall err, I the Lord have deceived the prophet, etc.'; and again, 'He sent wrath and indignation through evil angels.'" And after the testimony concerning Amaziah, he says he could commemorate many other things, "in which it clearly appears that by a hidden judgment of God, perversity of heart comes about, that what is truly said may not be heard, and thence may be sinned, and the sin itself be the punishment of preceding sin. For to believe a lie, and not to believe the truth, is assuredly sin: yet it comes from that blindness of heart, which by a hidden but yet just judgment of God is also shown to be the punishment of sin."

And below, in the same place, he thus addresses Julian: "What is it that thou sayest? When they are said to be given up to desires, they are to be understood as deserted by divine patience, and not compelled by power into sins—as if the same Apostle had not put both these together, both patience and power, where he says: 'But if God, willing to show His wrath, and to demonstrate His power, hath endured with much patience the vessels of wrath, which are perfected unto destruction.'"

And below, 6: "Who would say that Ahab did not sin by believing the spirit of falsehood? Who would say that this sin was not the punishment of a sin coming from the judgment of God, by whose reading he is sent or permitted a lying spirit? Who says any of these, save he who says what he wishes, and what is true, refuses to hear? But who would so be foolish, that when he hears what is sung in the Psalm, 'Lord, deliver me not from my desire to the sinner,' he should say that the man prayed this, lest God should be patient toward him—if God doth not give up to evils being done, save by exhibiting patient goodness when they are done? But what is it that we say daily, 'Lead us not into temptation,' save that we be not given up to our concupiscences? for everyone is tempted, drawn aside and enticed by his own concupiscence. Or shall we ask this from God, that His patient goodness may not be toward us? Therefore we do not invoke His mercy, but rather provoke His wrath. Who, sane, would have such wisdom, nay rather, who would say these things, even being mad? God therefore gives up to the passions of ignominy, that things not fitting may be done; but Himself fittingly gives up, and the same things are both sins, and the punishments of past sins, and the merits of future punishments."

If, however, anyone shall say with Lombard that God willeth sin under the rationale by which it is punishment, not under the rationale by which it is sin, it can thus be argued against him: That punishment and that sin per se, namely under the rationale by which it is sin, are necessarily and inseparably joined, and that necessity and inseparability is from God, as is sufficiently plain from the preceding things. For He is the first necessity, and the first necessary being. He willeth, therefore, them to be thus joined and to be joined, and to be: He willeth, therefore, sin to be.

Likewise, whoever knoweth any two things to be necessarily and inseparably copulated, and willeth them to be so copulated, and knowingly and rationally willeth one, willeth the other—especially if concerning each he have some act of will, as the twenty-second chapter shows of God. God, however, knoweth and willeth those two thus to be copulated, and knowingly and rationally willeth one, namely the punishment of sin, therefore also sin. This can immediately appear, since if A and B be so copulated, and God willeth A to be done and is able, A is done, and B necessarily is done with it; and God doth nothing casually, but the whole from a most wise intention disposing all things sweetly, as the twenty-ninth [chapter] teaches. God therefore willeth B and in some manner doth it.

Furthermore, in a necessary consequence, he who willeth the antecedent willeth the consequent, as it appears, at least in the universal, although not in the particular, and under its proper form. For he who willeth some whole, willeth in some way all the necessary parts of it. The Philosopher also teaches in 2 Prior [Analytics], that whoever opines any antecedent, similarly opines any consequent of it, at least in the universal, although perchance sometimes in the particular and under proper form he opines the opposite of some consequent. Why, therefore, must it not be similarly judged of volition? But far be it that God will anything in the universal and confusedly, and not will it in the particular and distinctly, or thus will the opposite of it, as the preceding things clearly show. For God knoweth most distinctly whatsoever is contained in any antecedent: for He knoweth every good consequence, and willeth every good consequence to be good. How therefore doth God, willing whatsoever His volition rationally and supremely, will some antecedent, and will not some consequent of it, not only privatively, but even positively, namely by an act positively contrary to volition? For if He willeth not anything, why cannot He rationally not will it thus? But who would even lightly suspect such great contrariety and irrationality in God?

Nay, also, if God willeth anything, to which many things are necessarily annexed, in any way to be done by anyone, that thing shall thus be done by him with all such annexes whatsoever, by the witness of the tenth [chapter] of this [book]; and if some such annexed thing God willeth not, He can rationally not will it, namely by positive nolition. Which if it be put in being, by the same tenth [chapter] that thing is not done. Therefore that thing simultaneously is done and is not done, and similarly that whole.

Likewise, if God willeth some antecedent, that thing is just—at least with respect to His will and divine justice—therefore any consequent of it is in like manner just. Wherefore also it is willed and loved by God the Author of all justice, as the prior things testify, and the Psalm contests, 10: "The Lord is just, and hath loved justice." Otherwise also God could simultaneously will some antecedent, and not will some consequent of it, nay even will the opposite of the consequent—therefore He would not will some just thing, and would will the opposite of the just.

Furthermore, according to every reason and law—Logic, Philosophy, human, and divine—he who concedes, confesses, grants, or says some antecedent, doth and similarly says all and singular things which necessarily follow, nor ought he to be admitted, neither permitted, in the opposite of any such consequent. For who would rationally admit opposites, repugnants, or contradictories from the same person, since not even truth admits this? How therefore doth God, by His most rational will, ordain, grant, or say something, and not in any way ordain, nor grant, nor say something necessarily following from it; nay rather, He willeth and saith the opposite of this consequent? And although these things may seem sufficiently plain per se, yet behold the testimony of the Philosopher in 2 Topics, saying: "Everyone who hath said anything, in some way hath said many things, since many things are by necessity consequent upon any one thing—as if he hath said man to be, he also hath said that he is animal, and that he is animate, and that he is biped, and that he is receptive of mind and discipline; wherefore, by removing any one of the consequents, that which was at the beginning is also removed."

Whence also Thomas, 1 Contra Gentiles 81, thus says: "The will of the wise, by reason of which it is concerning the cause, is concerning the effect, which from the cause necessarily follows: for it would be foolish to will the sun to be above the earth, and not to be the brightness of the day." And below, 83: "Whoever willeth anything, necessarily willeth those things which are necessarily required to that, unless there be some defect on his part, either through ignorance, or because by some passion he is led away from the right choice of that which is unto the intended end—which cannot be said of God. If, therefore, God willing Himself willeth something else than Himself, it is necessary that He will all that which to that willed by Him is of necessity required—as it is necessary that God will the rational soul to be, supposing that He will man to be." And below, 84: "If, therefore, God necessarily willeth those things which are required to that which He is supposed to will, it is impossible that He should will those things which are repugnant to them."

This also testifies the Philosopher, 3 Ethics 12, in these words: "It is irrational for the doer of unjust things not to will to be unjust, or for the violator [not to will] to be incontinent. If, however, anyone, not ignorant, operates from those things from which he will be unjust, willingly he shall be unjust."

Likewise, otherwise, by similar reason someone could of two things thus joined, namely one spiritual thing and another temporal, buy the one—namely the temporal thing—not buying the other, but receiving it as if gratis, without any simony—the contrary of which appears to have been determined by the Lord Pope Paschal, as is cited in the Canon, Causa 1, quaestio 3, Si quis obiecerit, in these words: "If anyone object, [that he buys] not the consecrations, but the things which proceed from consecration, he is proved to dote utterly. For whosoever of them sells the one, without which neither doth the other proceed, leaves neither unsold." And Lombard cites this in 4 Sentences, distinction 25.

To this also makes Augustine, 83 Quaestionum 15, arguing thus: "The intellect understands itself, therefore it is finite to itself, nor would it will to be infinite, although it could—since it would will to be known to itself."

Furthermore, it can similarly be argued of the acts of homicide, theft, and similar things, [together with which], with all their circumstances posited, sin is necessarily joined. If God thus willeth those, nay rather even doth them, as the preceding things have taught, then also He willeth sin. This sentence also John Scotus, on 1 Sentences distinction 41, seems to hold, as inscribed in the 18th [chapter] of this [book].

The opposite of this, however, is urged in many ways. If God willeth sin, God is the Author of sin, witness Augustine 83 Quaestionum 3, thus speaking: "When 'with God as Author' is said, 'with Him willing' is said." And then, with God as Author, man would become worse, contrary to Augustine above, in the same place, thus arguing: "With no wise man as Author, doth a man become worse; God, however, is far more excellent than any wise man—much less, therefore, with God as Author, doth a man become worse." And below, Quaestio 21, he proves that God is not the Author of evil, since He is not the cause of failing, nor of tending to non-being, which happens by sinning, since He is the highest Good and the cause of being.

Likewise, if God willed sin, since by the tenth [chapter] His will cannot be non-efficacious, He would be some cause of sin; and since in every causation of His with the creature, He is the first cause, as it appears, it would follow that God would be the first cause of sin—contrary to Augustine, 3 De Libero Arbitrio 28, by disputation investigating the first cause of sin, and finally thus concluding: "Either, therefore, the will is the first cause of sinning, or no sin is the cause of sinning, nor is there [any] to whom rightly sin is to be imputed but the sinner. Therefore there is none to whom rightly it is to be imputed, save the willing one." And below, 35: "Sins, as we have long disputed, are not to be attributed but to the proper will of the animate, nor any further cause of sins is to be sought."

Likewise, if God willeth sin, and by the tenth [chapter] His will is efficacious, God doeth sin; and "he who doeth sin is the servant of sin," John 8. Therefore God would be the servant of sin and would sin. Likewise, Augustine in De Confutatione Haereticorum 16, [responding to those imputing] false chapters to himself, in the 5th response, says: "That sin is altogether not from God, nor is He the Author of any sin, but the Creator of nature." And in nearly every response, he says expressly that no one falls into sin from the will of God, nor hath He predestined any to sin.

Likewise, then anyone could lawfully rejoice over his own sin, and similarly over any other's: for he would know that God willeth it. Likewise, then every evil-willing one would have rectitude of will: for this is to will as God willeth him to will, as is plain by Anselm De Libero Arbitrio 8, and De Concordia 5; and any such one willeth as God willeth him to will. Likewise, then anyone knowing this part ought, or at least lawfully could, will to sin: since that is the just will of God, to which, when known, a man ought as far as he can lawfully to conform himself. Wherefore also doing thus he would not sin: therefore he would simultaneously sin and not sin.

Whence also Augustine, 3 De Libero Arbitrio 26: "If everyone owes that which he hath received, and man was so made that he must necessarily sin, this he owes, that he sin. Therefore when he sinneth, he doeth what he oweth: which if it is wickedness to say—nature compels no one that he sin, nor doth another's [nature]." And below, 28, speaking of the first cause of evil will, he thus says: "Whatever that cause of will is, it is assuredly either just, or unjust; if just, whoever shall obey it, shall not sin." And Anselm De Veritate 12: "Whatsoever ought to be, rightly and justly is; nor is anything rightly and justly, save what ought to be."

Likewise, no one is justly accuser, or avenger, of a fact of which he is the Author; but God is justly the accuser and avenger of sin. Likewise, Psalm 5: "Thou art not a God that willest iniquity"; and 44: "Thou hast loved justice, and hated iniquity"; and Proverbs 6: "Six things there are which God hateth, and the seventh His soul detesteth," etc. And Habakkuk 1: "Lord, Thy eyes are pure, that Thou shouldst not see evil, and Thou canst not look upon iniquity"; and John 1: "Without Him was made nothing"—that is, sin, according to Augustine, homily 1. Nay rather, this opinion the whole Canonical Scripture, and all the saints and doctors, seem to profess concordantly and unanimously to sustain.

This, therefore, which appears a discord, if by the distinction concerning will premised in the preceding chapter, it be reduced to a middle, perhaps it is reconciled. For God in no wise simply willeth sin, but only in a certain respect, as has been said. For God to will some fact simply, as it sounds in the common manner of speaking, is to love it, to approve it as good, and finally to reward it; and because Scripture and the saints so speak, they deny God to will sin. The vulgar also so understand and not otherwise; therefore that is not to be said before them, since they too greatly abhor it; and well, according to the understanding which they have. For they understand only that God willeth according to the first member of the foresaid distinction.

Whence Hugh says in 1 De Sacramentis 4 part 13: "When it is said 'God willeth good,' it sounds well; but if it be said 'God willeth evil,' it is grievous to the hearing, and the pious mind doth not receive this concerning the Good, that He willeth evil. For this alone seems to be said, when it is said 'God willeth evil,' that the Good loveth evil, and approveth what is depraved, and accounteth iniquity friendly to Himself, and rejoiceth in the like, and reckoneth that good which is evil; and therefore the pious mind refuses this, not because what is said is not well said, but because what is well said is not well understood."

Could it not also be said, that in the whole universe there is no inordination, deformity, or sin simply, but only in a certain respect?—not simply, since not with respect to the first and supreme cause, sweetly disposing all things positive and privative, beings and non-beings, with the highest wisdom, beauty, and justice—as the things premised in the 13th, 14th, and 33rd [chapters] of this [book] have urged. For doth not the 33rd [chapter] of this [book] show that no act is unjust simply, nay that every act is just with respect to the divine will, although some be unjust with respect to the created will, raving (as far as concerns it, although it cannot simply [accomplish anything against] the divine will)? And the 26th [chapter] of this [book] teaches, that every act according to the substance of the act itself, is not evil but good, and is made by God—which the ninth [chapter] of this [book] also confirms. Any act, therefore, with respect to God the Author, is just; therefore also everything necessarily consequent upon any act: for if the antecedent is just, also any thing necessarily consequent upon it shall be just, just as it is also true. And some such act, and some thing necessarily consequent upon it, is sin. It seems therefore that there is no inordination, deformity, or sin simply, in the whole universe, but only in a certain respect, namely with respect to inferior causes, willing—although not able—to disturb the ordination of the superior cause. Therefore, as far as it is in them, they violate and disturb that, as is plain from the 26th and the preceding [chapter] of this [book].

Wherefore also it can not improbably be reckoned, that God at least in a certain respect willeth sin, although not simply, since not according to itself, as the 33rd [chapter] expounded this verb "simply." For He willeth not sin, save perhaps as a physician [willeth] poison in his medicines, namely insofar as it avails for the exercise of the good, for the punishment of the evil, for the beauty of the universe to be contemplated by antiperistasis (counter-arrangement), and for similar things recited above.

Wherefore also Ammonius cited above says, "that the gods have cognition of all things, even of contingents, as producing all things which are in the world, not only substances, but also their operations, both those which are according to nature, and those which are besides nature." And he adds: "That which is besides nature came in together with the necessary order subjecting itself to the running course of beings, in those things which are born to participate in this, not principally, but according to the manner which is called parypostaseōs, that is, secondary subsistence."

Algazel also in fifth Metaphysics last [chapter], treating of the providence of God and of evil, thus says: "Good is provided per se, but evil is provided accidentally. Each, therefore, is ordained." And this is similarly the sentence of Avicenna.

Doth not Scripture and the Church speak thus, often saying that God willeth not the death of the sinner, or of the impious, nor doth He delight in the perdition of men? Doth not the Lord Himself say, "Is it My will that the impious should die?" Ezekiel 18. Doth not Wisdom 1 thus write, "God made not death, neither hath He pleasure in the destruction of the living"? With which there occur many similar [places] in Scripture. And doth not the Church often sing similar things?

But how are these things to be sanely understood? It is certain that the Lord shall damn the impious, the cursed, and the sons of perdition, to death and eternal perdition; and this by willing, not by a new volition but by an eternal one, nor by a volition sad to Himself, but joyful, nay supremely joyful—as the 39th part of the first Corollary of this [book], the 9th [chapter] of this [book], and the 23rd with the third part of the first Corollary of this [book], the Canonical Scripture, and the faith of the Church clearly teach.

Doth not the Scripture testify, that famine and death are created for vengeance, Ecclesiasticus 39? Doth not Moses say in Deuteronomy 28: "But if thou wilt not hearken to the voice of thy God, etc., all these curses shall come upon thee, etc.; and as the Lord rejoiced before over you in doing good to you, so He shall rejoice destroying and overthrowing you"? Doth not the Wisdom of God say to the rebels: "I will laugh in your destruction"? Proverbs 1. Nor is it wonderful: for the Lord shall rejoice in all His works, Psalm 103.

And how shall this contrariety, as it seems, be reduced to concord, or shown to be no [contrariety], save by the help of the foresaid distinction? Wherefore Augustine, 5 Contra Iulianum 15, [says] to Julian: "Thou affirmest these things to be contrary, as if it could not be that one and the same evil be inflicted on sinners both by the iniquity of the devil, and by the equity of God; nor hence are the divine eloquences themselves at variance with themselves, since it is written: 'God made not death,' and likewise it is written: 'Life and death are from the Lord God'—since the deceiver of man is the cause of death, which not as the first author of it, but as the avenger of sin, God brought in." This manner of speaking concerning willing and not willing, several philosophical and theological [authorities] cited in the preceding [chapter] of this [book] also agree with.

Therefore, according to the bifurcation of the foresaid distinction, the objections, as it seems, run, and do not obstruct. For that of Augustine, "With God as Author, man becomes not worse," can, it seems, be understood in the said way, namely, "with God as Author principally," that is, "principally willing this." And if to anyone this please not, let him tell me how, with God as Author, man doth every act of sin, according to the whole substance of the act, as the third [chapter] of this [book], and the 4th, 26th, 27th, and following [chapters] manifest? And how this befits God, and not that? And if with God as Author man doth these, how with God as Author, doth man not become worse? And certainly by this one [argument] one can in some manner respond to almost all the objections.

Yet it is true also otherwise, and can truly be said, that God is not the Author of sin as of the rightly done [act]. For of this latter He is so the Author, that He alone supernaturally creates, and gives to the rightly doer faith, hope, and charity, and perchance other habits inclining to merit, and making every merit—but not so on the part of sin.

Yet, that the intention of Augustine and of the other saints may more appear, the manner of their speaking and understanding is to be heeded, when they deny God to will sin; and the cause of this denial is to be weighed. The cause, however, of this denial seems to be this: when the Apostle, and Augustine, and the other saints had posited predestination, prescience, and the like on the part of God, the Pelagians and other heretics willed to excuse sinners from their sins, and to throw back the cause and the fault upon God, who had thus predestined or foreknown. The saints therefore wish to say, that God by His predestination, prescience, or anything of this kind, doth not coerce them against His will to sin; but that they sin freely and by their own will; and that God by predestining, foreknowing, or willing sins, doth not sin, neither doth He act unjustly, nor is He the first imputable or culpable cause of sins, but that the first imputable and culpable cause is the proper will of the sinner.

Whence Anselm in De Concordia 5 says: "Many complain, because they think free will avails nothing for salvation or damnation, but only necessity, on account of God's prescience." And below, 7: "Some clamor, saying: 'It was thus foreknown and predestined by God, and therefore by necessity it was done, nor could it be done otherwise'"—whom he afterwards refutes. And below, last [chapter], he says, that "by the fault of man alone evils come about which he doth, not by the fault of God."

Wherefore also Augustine, 3 De Libero Arbitrio 4, and in Prosper's sentences 381: "God, compelling no one to sin, yet foreseeeth those who by their proper will shall sin. Why then should He not, as foreknowing just things, judge them which He compels not to be done? For just as by thy memory thou compellest not the things to have been done which have passed, so God by His prescience compelleth not the things to be done which are future. And as thou rememberest some things which thou hast done, nor yet hast thou done all things which thou rememberest: so God foreknoweth all things of which He is the Author, nor yet of all things which He foreknoweth is He the Author; of those things, however, He is not the evil Author, [but] the just avenger." Behold, he denies that God, foreknowing sins, compelleth to sin; and what he had said simply before, that God is not of all things which He foreknoweth, since He is not of evil [things], the Author, immediately he determines and expounds, saying: "Of which He is not the evil Author"; and adds: "He is the just avenger"—and so he excuses God from sin, and accuses the sinner.

Likewise, the Apostle to the Romans 9, treating of the predestination of Jacob and the reprobation of Esau, "not from works, but according to the election of God who calleth": "What shall we say then? Is there iniquity with God? Far be it." And above, 3: "What if some of them have not believed? Shall their unbelief make void the faith of God? But God is true, but every man a liar, as it is written: 'That Thou mayest be justified in Thy sayings, and mayest overcome when Thou art judged.' But if our iniquity commendeth the justice of God, what shall we say? Is God unjust who inflicteth wrath? Far be it: for if the truth of God in my lie hath abounded unto His glory, why am I also yet judged as a sinner?" Where he removes from God iniquity, infidelity, and injustice. Where the Gloss cites certain ones, who, savoring carnally from that prophetic saying, "I have sinned, that Thou mayest be justified in Thy sayings, and mayest overcome when Thou art judged," argued that God willed us to sin, that by our comparison He might appear just, and while He pardoned us our sins, [appear] merciful; and that our sins profited Him and were of advantage; and that the more we sin, the more it pleased Him, and the more His justice and sanctity grew. Where Ambrose, as the Gloss cites him, also says: "It is manifest that if the lie of men avails to the glory of God, that He alone may appear true, those are not to be called sinners who sin, since not by will, but by His impulse, they would seem to sin—which far be it." And the sense is: "If God by my lie," that is, sin, "should appear true, why doth He judge me as a sinner?"

Likewise, Augustine, Enchiridion 78, says: "When the Apostle had answered, 'Far be it'—that is, 'far be it that there be iniquity with God'—soon, that he might prove this to be done by no iniquity of God, he says: 'For He saith to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I shall have mercy, and I will show mercy to whom I shall be merciful.'"

The same in De Praedestinatione [Sanctorum] contra Pelagianos 9, thus says: "Those who without the grace of predestination are, that is, foreign from the purpose of God, and persevere in evil works—if also from this life they migrate, as you suppose—we do not say that they were ordained by God the Author of men, that they should perish, as if He had created in them the manners of an evil life, He had headlong driven them into every work of death unwilling. Far be this from the divine purpose: for God is not willing iniquity, nor hath He commanded any to act impiously."

Behold the understanding and gloss of such authorities in Scripture. And below, last [chapter]: "Since here on either side we are able to say nothing clearly, let us only believe that the guilty of death depends upon the will of the Judge, lest anyone should think it comes about by some divine fault, that not all are saved—the Apostle said, 'Who willeth all to be saved.' Wherefore all men who are saved, by God's willing are saved: for our God is the God of saving, and the Lord, the issues of death; and because there is wrath in His fury, and life in His will." And in De Praedestinatione Sanctorum 12: "By predestination assuredly God hath foreknown those things which He Himself was to do. He foreknoweth, however, things which He doth not, like sins whatsoever; for although there be certain things which are sins and the punishments of sins, whence it is said, 'God gave them up to a reprobate mind, that they should do those things which are not fitting,' there is not the sin of God, but the judgment."

And 5 Contra Iulianum 5, speaking of Ahab deceived by false prophets, thus says: "The king himself sinned, by believing false prophets; but this very [thing] was also the punishment of sin, God judging and sending an evil angel, that we might more openly understand how in the Psalm He is said to have sent the wrath of His indignation through evil angels. But did He err? did He judge or do anything unjustly or rashly? Far be it. But not in vain was that said: 'Thy judgments, like a great deep'; and 'O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God,' etc."

The same in 1 Retractationum 21 says: "I said, 'God seeketh the death of no one'—which is to be taken thus, that man hath acquired death for himself by deserting God, or not running to God, according to what is written: 'God hath not made death.'" Behold, in a certain respect—that is, not according to that, or that manner which imports sin—is death from God; in a certain respect, or as it is from man—and he adds—"But also that is not less true: 'Life and death are from the Lord God.'" And below, 26: "Lest it be ill understood that I said God is not the Author of evil, since He is the Author of all things which are; for insofar as they are, so are they good. And lest hence it be thought that the punishment of evils is not from Him, which surely is evil to those who are punished; but I have said this just as it has been said: 'God hath not made death,' since elsewhere it is written: 'Death and life are from the Lord God.' Evil indeed is evil, but it is in the good works of God, since it is just that the evil be punished; and certainly every thing that is just is good."

Likewise Gregory, 25 Moralia 15, on Job 34: "He maketh a hypocrite to reign," etc.: "When therefore Antichrist shall reign over the impious, this is not from the injustice of the Judge, but from the fault of the sufferer." And below: "He who endureth an evil ruler, let him rather accuse the fault of his own work than the injustice of the governor." Lombard also understands such authorities in the said way, for which 1 Sentences, dist. 38, he adduces Augustine on John saying: "God, foreknowing future things, foretold by the prophet the unbelief of the Jews, but did not cause it: for He doth not therefore compel anyone to sin, because He hath foreknown the future sins of men; for He foreknew their sins, not His own."

The same likewise De Gratia et Libero Arbitrio 3, against those excusing sinners and accusing God, thus says: "There are men who endeavor to excuse themselves even from God Himself, to whom James the Apostle says: 'Let no man, when he is tempted, say that he is tempted by God: for God is not a tempter of evils.' Likewise, of those willing to excuse themselves, the book of the Proverbs of Solomon answers: 'A man's foolishness violates his way, but he layeth blame upon God in his heart.' And the book of Ecclesiasticus says: 'Say not, Because of God I have departed; say not, He hath caused me to err.'" And below, 5: "Let no one lay blame upon God in his heart, but let everyone impute to himself when he sinneth; nor when he doeth anything cruel, let him alienate this from his proper will."

And if anyone shall argue that by the same reason it would have to be said that God doth not will, nor doth He effect, our good merits, since He compelleth no one unwillingly to merit—it must be said that merits are attributed to God otherwise than sins, namely on account of habits created by God alone, and infused into us, exciting unto merits and making all merits; and because God in any merit whatsoever is the first imputable and praiseworthy cause: on account of which also He loveth and approveth the merit, and prepareth a reward for it; not so on the part of sin.

Whence Anselm De Concordia 6 says: "God doth in all good wills and works, both that they are essentially, and that they are good. In evils, however, [He doth] not that they are evil, but only that through essence they are. How, however, God doth good things by His goodness alone, and evil things by the fault of man or of the devil alone; and how man doth good things through free will, by grace bestowing, and evil only by his proper will operating; and what God hath in evils without His fault, and man in good with his praise, so that nevertheless the good of man may seem openly to be imputed to God, and the evils to man, when we shall treat of grace and free will, as I think, with God granting, more openly shall appear."

Similarly is to be understood what Sacred Scripture and the Doctors say very often, namely, that punishment is from God, but not the fault. For punishment is from God alone without man co-acting; not so the fault. And punishment likewise is from God punishing, nay rather as the first and principal cause punishing; but the fault or sin is not so from God, as from the first culpable or sinful cause.

And if it still be said that it always sounds ill to many to say that God in any way wills sin: for certain it is true, and this perhaps according to Hugh in the place cited above, "not because what is said is not well said, but because what is well said is not well understood." Would, therefore, that they would receive the salt of wisdom, and would savor and understand the savory truth to a sound taste, and would know that there is no evil in the world which is not on account of some great good, and perchance on account of some greater good. Why, therefore, should there be subtracted from the world and from God the Author of the whole world, this manner of doing good, or beneficial wonderful and great manner? Nay rather, more miraculous it seems, and greater, to make goods from evils, than from goods, or to make goods alone.

And without doubt it ill sounds to many, if it be said that God willeth and doeth the act of incest of a father with a daughter, of a son with a mother, of one professed in continence with one [similarly] professed, of parricide, of sedition, of blasphemy, and of other similar things; and yet both the saints and the philosophers say so, as the preceding things have manifested. For who in such incest prepareth the seed and moveth, createth and infuseth a soul into the foetus, save God? And however it sound, thus speak the saints of God—nay rather, the Spirit of God who speaketh in them, as was cited above. And Isaiah 26: "O Lord, Thou hast wrought all our works in us"; and below, 45: "I am the Lord, forming light and creating darkness, making peace and creating evil"; and Amos 3: "Shall there be evil in the city, which the Lord hath not done?" The Apostle says, 2 Corinthians 5, that "Christ for us God made sin"—which to the ears of not a few simple ones judging according to the surface of the letter would sound much more horrible. Therefore our most just Judge thus prohibited and otherwise taught to judge, saying: "Judge not according to appearance, but judge just judgment," John 7.

By these things is plain [the answer] to the objections which argue from the authorization of the sinner by God, and how God is not the first cause of sin, since He is not the first imputable cause unto fault—and concerning such [a cause] there speaketh manifestly the authority of Augustine; and that manner of speaking is taken perhaps from that of Psalm 31: "Blessed is the man to whom the Lord hath not imputed sin."

To the other [objection] which argues that God doeth sin, [answer must be made] similarly by retorting concerning the real act of sin. It must, however, be answered by a distinction concerning the second mode of amphiboly. For "[He doeth sin]" can be taken properly or transumptively, and according to the customary manner of speaking, and as the Philosopher says in 1 Elenchi, "when we have been accustomed thus to speak." In the first way it is not true, since sin properly is nothing nor can it be, by the 26th [chapter] of this [book]; therefore neither is it factible by anyone whatsoever. Wherefore also, as the same 26th [chapter] cites from Augustine, "Sin so hath no efficient cause, but only a deficient one." Transumptively can yet be understood in two ways: First, as is the more usual manner of speaking, according to which we say, that "to do sin" is "to sin," and "he who doeth sin sinneth"; and so the Evangelist speaks, and so God doth not sin. Secondly, that God doeth some positive act in the rational creature, from which follows, or with which is conjoined, the sin of that creature, not of God; and so God doeth sin: for He doeth all our works, as has been shown above.

To the other [authority] of Augustine De Confutatione Haereticorum, the response is similar by way of an instance through the positive act of sin; another response, however, is plain from the process there and elsewhere, as had already been cited: For when he says that sin is not from God, and the like, he means in the said way, namely, that sin is not [from God] coercing or impelling anyone unwillingly, and so as to render the man excused, and God accused. Whence in response 16 he thus says: "Those who shall not persevere, when they fail from piety, fail not from the work of God, but from their own will." Behold: not from the work of God, in the sense that it excludes their will, or is contrary to it; but adversatively and contrarily—from their own will they fail. And it follows: "Nor are they impelled to fall, nor are they cast out so as to desert." Behold, by this he denies that coercion or violence is brought by God upon such to sinning.

Likewise above, this objection is made against him as the eleventh: that when fathers commit incest with daughters, and sons with mothers, this is therefore done because God has so predestined that it should be done. Augustine answers: "If it were objected to the devil, that he is the author of such crimes, that he himself is the inciter, I think that by some reason he could exonerate himself from this odium, and could prove the perpetrator of crimes from the will of those very persons; for although he is delighted by the fury of those sinning, yet he would prove that he had not brought in the force of crime. By what folly, then, or what madness is it determined to refer to God's counsel that which not even to the devil can be ascribed in totality?" Behold, that according to Augustine's understanding, even the devil is not the author of human sin in such wise that man through him could totally excuse himself, since he doth not bring in the force of crimes; nor can the sin be ascribed to the devil in totality, since man consenteth and cooperateth freely and by his proper will.

The other [objection], that anyone could lawfully rejoice [over sin], proceeds similarly from the essence of an evil act, and yet does not proceed. For let it be supposed that God willeth thee to be saddened and not to rejoice, and thou doest this knowingly: therefore thou oughtest to rejoice in this; how doth it follow? And just as perhaps a good and grateful son ought not to rejoice over the temporal or eternal death of his father, although he know it to be inflicted on him by God—just as neither, perhaps, did the blessed Mary nor the disciples rejoice over the slaying of Christ, but rather grieved, just as also the other devout Christians, knowing nevertheless that nothing concerning Christ happened by chance or by fortune, but the whole from the divine will and providence disposing.

And if perchance thou yet repliest: "If God willeth sin, thou oughtest, or canst, similarly lawfully will it, wherefore also similarly rejoice over it, the Scripture saying, 'A desire if it be accomplished, delighteth the soul,' Proverbs 13"—it can be answered according to the sentence of Anselm, Augustine, and the other Fathers, that the rectitude of the will is not always for one to will what God willeth, but [for one to will] what God willeth him to will, with the requisite circumstances; wherefore also similarly concerning rejoicing.

Or perhaps it could be said that sin, insofar as it is punishment, is from God; yet [it is] of him in some way, as is plain from the things premised here and in the 32nd [chapter] of this [book]; and so perhaps man can rejoice over it, but not insofar as it is the sin of free will. For which Gregory says, 22 Moralia 10, on Job 31: "If I have rejoiced at the ruin of him that hated me": "When omnipotent God smiteth any perverse one, the misery of the perishing is to be condoled with, and the justice of the Judge to be congratulated."

That [saying] of Anselm, however, that the rectitude of will is for one to will as God willeth him to will, proceeds similarly from the very substance of the evil act. It is also established that that definition, according to those words precisely, is not convertible with rectitude of will—that rectitude, I say, which renders those willing right of heart and morally just. For thus a horse, boys, fools, and the like, willing anything, would be morally right of heart and just, just as is plainly evident from the ninth [chapter] of this [book], the 27th, and the following ones. Nor if God willeth anything to be done by John, and he doth this voluntarily, but ignorantly and without intention—being ignorant, namely, that God willeth this to be done by him, nor having a direct intention toward God, but apart from Him or against Him, as frequently happens, just as the things premised in the 32nd [chapter] of this [book] testify—is he to be said to will rightly morally nor justly, as is sufficiently established to moral philosophers and theologians. For who would not know that works are to be judged from the intention of the workers, as the whole sect of the Stoics concordantly attests?

The Philosopher also, 7 Politics 15: "Two things there are in which it consists for all things to go well: one, indeed, in this, that the intention and end of actions be rightly placed; one, indeed, [is] to find the actions leading to the end." And 6 Ethics 10: "The work is perfected both by prudence and by moral virtue: virtue, indeed, maketh the intention right; prudence, however, [maketh right what is] toward this." And below: "We say that some doing just things are by no means just, [for example] those doing the things ordered by the laws either unwillingly, or through ignorance, or for some other [reason], and not on account of those very things—although they operate, indeed, what is fitting, and whatsoever the studious man ought; but, as it seems, the one who [acts] thus and the one who is so disposed operate single things [differently] as a good man would. I mean, namely, on account of choice, and for the sake of the very things operated."

Who also in 2 Ethics 4 placeth the agreement of art and virtue in this: that for someone to be an artificer, namely a grammarian, it is not sufficient that he do the work of the art, namely a grammatical work, but it is required that he do it in an artificial manner, namely grammatically according to grammar existing in him: for he says, "It happens that one doth a grammatical thing, both by chance, and with another supposing it. Then, therefore, [is one] a grammarian, if he do a grammatical thing, and grammatically; this, however, is according to that which is grammar in him"—intimating that it happens similarly in virtue. Where also he immediately puts the difference of art and virtue, thus speaking: "Furthermore, neither is it similar in arts and virtues. For those things which come about from the arts have well existing in them; it suffices, therefore, that they should come about being thus disposed: but those things which come about according to virtues, neither if they thus dispose themselves are they justly or temperately operated, but [only] also if the operator works being thus disposed: first, indeed, if knowing; then, if choosing; and choosing for this very thing."

Who, moreover, would not know that moral operations are by no means to be discerned from the substance of the work alone, but much more amply from the circumstances?—of which one, and not the least, is with what intention, by obtaining of which end, for the sake of which finally a work is done. Wherefore also the Philosopher in third Ethics 3 enumerates seven moral circumstances: who, what, about what, and in what, by what, for the sake of what, and how. This sentence also many Catholic authorities cited in the demonstration of the 32nd part of the first Corollary of this [book] manifestly show—nay rather, the supreme Author of the whole Catholic faith, under the metaphor of the simple eye and the wicked eye: for who anywhere doubts this is to be referred to the intention of the inner eye?

Wherefore also Anselm himself, who De Veritate 12 teaches that truth, rectitude, and justice are the same really, nay even that they mutually define each other, in De Libero Arbitrio 3 and 8, and in De Concordia 5 and 8, defines justice to be "rectitude of will preserved for its own sake"—namely for the sake of that very rectitude or justice—which never can be done save through an intention finally directed to rectitude or justice for its own sake. Wherefore also in De Concordia 8 he thus says: "But lest anyone should think that by divine authority the just or right [man] is said [to be] he who preserveth not but for the sake of another the rectitude of will: We say that justice is rectitude of will preserved for its own sake. For he who preserveth it only for the sake of another, doth not love it, but that for whose sake he preserveth it; and therefore is not to be called just, nor is such rectitude to be named justice."

The same also De Veritate 12 premised that "whatsoever ought to be, rightly and justly is, nor is anything rightly and justly save what ought to be"—he asks whether a stone descending should be said to be just, since it doeth what it ought, and answers that it should not, since it doth not will what it doeth. Whether also a horse willing to graze can be said to be just since willingly it doeth what it ought, and answers that it should not, since it doth not recognize justice or rectitude. Whether moreover any man willing what he ought, rightly willeth and hath the rectitude of will?—and answers that he doth not, since he can do this not knowing—as if anyone willeth to close a door against him who, the former being ignorant, willeth to slay another in the house.

Furthermore, whether he who knoweth that he ought to will what he willeth, always rightly willeth and hath the rectitude of will?—and he answers that he doth not, since it can happen that an intelligent one willeth what he ought, and willeth not that he ought, just as when a thief is compelled to return the money taken away. Yet again, whether everyone who knoweth and willeth that he ought to will what he willeth, hath the rectitude of will, and he answers that he doth not, like he who feeds a starving pauper for the sake of obtaining vain glory. And he adds: "Every will, just as it willeth something, so also it willeth on account of something. For just as it must be considered what it willeth, so it must be seen why it willeth; for not more right it must be in willing what it ought, than in willing on account of what it ought. Wherefore every will hath both why and what. For we will absolutely nothing, unless there be why we will. The just one, however, when he willeth what he ought, preserveth the rectitude of will, not on account of another, insofar as he is to be called just, than on account of that very rectitude."

From all these things, therefore, it is clearly plain, that not every one willing as God willeth him to will, therefore necessarily simply willeth rightly, unless knowingly, with the knowledge at least required in moral matters, and intentionally he willeth this, namely so that he believe God to so will, and therefore finally, according to his intention and purpose, he so willeth, that he may fulfil the divine and not his own will.

He, however, who would, could much more briefly thus expound Anselm, where he says that "the rectitude of will is for one to will as God willeth him to will," by taking there "willeth" for "willeth simply," "loveth," and "approveth," not in a certain respect, as has been said; and not anyone who willeth something, willeth as God willeth, simply loveth, and approveth him to will.

And if thou yet repliest against this by positing that someone knoweth that God willeth him to commit the sin of adultery, who therefore knowingly and intentionally in the foresaid manner committeth it—in which case he sinneth and sinneth not. For he sinneth by committing the sin of adultery; he sinneth not, since with this acting he rightly willeth and acteth, and hath the rectitude of will and operation, as is seen from the premises. If by the sin of adultery thou understandest the act, which is wont to be adultery and sin, it appears that someone, by dispensation or command of God, could commit the same without sinning, just as it appears to have been according to the letter concerning Hosea, who, the Lord commanding, took to himself a wife of fornications, and made sons of fornication of her, just as appears in Hosea 1—just as also some Doctors understand, although certain ones seem to feel the contrary. For it is established from the things premised in the 26th [chapter] of this [book], that such an act is not per se a sin.

And if thou yet attemptest to obstruct, by positing that someone knoweth that God willeth him to commit some sin existing as a sin, an act of sin involved with malice, who therefore knowingly and intentionally in the foresaid manner committeth it—then he sinneth, as the hypothesis clearly proves, and sinneth not according to the foresaid response—thy positing patently includes repugnancy and contradiction, namely his sinning and likewise his not sinning. For anyone knowing the divine will, and doing something only on account of it, and according to it in all things, seems well to act and not to sin.

But hence perhaps thou wilt argue, that God hath some will concerning man and his free act, to which the man cannot meritoriously conform himself, however much God may reveal it to him to be known, and may attempt to reveal it—a will, namely, by which He willeth the man to sin, or to commit a sin existing as a sin. Wilt thou not also acknowledge that God hath some will concerning the angel and the man confirmed [in glory], to which they cannot knowingly meritoriously conform themselves? For it is established that those confirmed in consummated beatitude cannot further advance in merit; and if thou positest "meritoriously" [as] "rightly or justly," it is established further that God can will someone to conform himself not justly and rightly to the divine will: to which will how knowingly, justly, and rightly will he be able to conform himself? God can also will someone to do something ignorantly: to which will how could anyone knowingly fit himself? God also can will a man to err, by believing this falsehood or that: and how to this will can anyone conform himself knowingly? For how can one knowingly err by believing in particular and under proper form distinctly some falsehood? For who is so knowing something to be false, [also] believes it likewise to be true?

God, moreover, can will someone to will and pray meritoriously, holily, and justly—justly, I say, with respect to the willing one [willing] something to be done, by believing ignorantly and erroneously that to be done would be pleasing to God, or that God willeth this, [when] God is willing the contrary and not that: to which will how could anyone conform himself knowingly?

Furthermore, perhaps thou wilt not cease to object, by positing that anyone knoweth that God willeth him to sin: then such a one ought, or lawfully can, sin. For he ought, or could lawfully, subject himself to the divine will, and conform himself fully to it, especially since he knoweth it. But this proceeds similarly from the essence of a base act, and is nonetheless solved by the premises.

Nor perhaps wilt thou yet cease, but wilt say: "Thou well knowest or believest, that thou wilt sometime sin: thou knowest therefore or believest, according to the premises, that God willeth this. Wherefore thou thyself oughtest, or lawfully canst, will the same." But this proceeds similarly from the substance of an evil act; it is also solved by the premises.

To the other [objection] it is plain by the same, namely by the substance of a base act, and by the other things already premised. The consequence, moreover, halts, and proceeds not. For let it be supposed that thou knowest, that God willeth thee to will nothing, or that He willeth thee to will Himself alone—therefore thou oughtest to will this: how doth it follow? That [authority], however, of Augustine and Anselm concerning "ought," adduced for the confirmation of this, is solved by the premises: For it proceeds similarly from the very essence of an evil act; nor again doth anyone who doeth what he ought, therefore immediately do justly or rightly, unless knowingly and intentionally in the said manner he doeth it, just as the preceding things show; which Anselm cited above also testifies.

Yet "due to be done" can be regarded in two ways, namely with respect to the divine will, and with respect to the rational created will. With respect to the divine will, all things ought to be done as they are done, and just and right it is that all things should be done as they are done, just as the preceding things clearly show. With respect, however, to the rational created will, that alone in its actions is due to be done, just, and right, which it doth knowingly, and intentionally toward God, and from love of Him finally for His sake—just as is plain from the things premised here, and from the 30th part of the first Corollary of the first [book].

To that of Augustine also: "If the will is just, whoever shall obey it, shall not sin," similarly must be answered. For another [argument], it is established that one can justly and rationally accuse and avenge some fact of which he is in some way the author, namely if the doer doth this not knowingly, intentionally, and with the spirit of executing the authority or will of his author, but in the contrary manner, and with the spirit of malice, just as the preceding things have taught.

To the authorities of Scripture it is plain by the foresaid: yet thus can be objected: "God willeth sin; therefore in some way He loveth sin, and hateth all sin; therefore He simultaneously loveth and hateth the same."

It must be said, that speaking of "to love" and "to hate" in a certain respect, the conclusion is true concerning God, just as also concerning man: for one can love someone as a father, and hate him as a punisher. For God to love someone is to will good to him, and to hate him is to will evil to him, as is plain from the 25th [chapter]; and thus He willeth to His elect eternal good and temporal evil; to the reprobate, however, contrarily; and to the devil himself He willeth great good of nature, and great evil of punishment, and of everlasting misery.

Or it can be said in all these things, as is said by some, that just as sin and every privation is not understood per se, but in comparison to its habit, and not properly positively, but in some manner privatively, as the 26th [chapter] sets forth: so also sin is willed by God privatively; yet any act according to that which it is, since, as such, it is good, is willed by God properly positively. This response, however, if it be fully sufficient, and please my elders, pleaseth me: for I would prefer in the magnitude of so great a question to hear my elders, rather than I myself, the least, to respond.

Thomas Bradwardine, De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium

Book I, Chapters 35–38

CHAPTER 35. [D] AGAINST PELAGIUS, THAT GRACE IS GIVEN BY GOD FREELY AND NOT OBTAINED THROUGH PRECEDING MERITS.

Furthermore, since under the magnificent providence of God the divine gifts are contained, it seems necessary that whoever wishes to treat of the providence of God should not be silent concerning the divine gifts. For all things besides God — indeed, even God Himself — are reckoned as divine gifts, as the third [chapter] of this [book], and the 4th, 2nd, 9th, 27th, and following chapters make manifest. Wherefore the Apostle says that He gives to all life and breath and all things [Acts 17:25]. This being known, it must further be shown that God gives all His gifts freely. For He is not greedy, nor is He in need of anything, as the third part and fifth part of the first Corollary teach: and likewise to give thus is more magnificent and more liberal, better and more perfect, [E] than to give in another way, or rather to sell, for some advantage to come to the giver from the gift. This mode of giving must therefore without hesitation be assigned to God, by the first Supposition and the third part of the first Corollary of this [book], as the twenty-ninth part of the same has likewise refuted the Pelagians. Wherefore any gift of God whatever may not incongruously be called a grace of God, namely a grace freely given. This grace is common to all creatures, both irrational and rational, to the grateful as well as the ungrateful. Nor — without the most thankful giving of thanks — is it further to be observed, that there is a certain grace, a certain species of the aforesaid grace, freely most pleasing to all, which is not only freely given by God but even renders the one to whom it is given pleasing to God, dear to Him, His friend and son in the present life, and a sharer of glory in the future. Concerning this grace, therefore — herself loving me through all things — a little must be said against the ungrateful Pelagians, the enemies of grace. For the pestilent Pelagians say that this highest grace of God is in no way [A] freely given by God, but is obtained through preceding merits. But these Pelagians, by the things here premised, and by the 29th part of the first Corollary of this [book], are driven into the deep [pelagus] and struck down. Moreover, if God gives merits or any helps whatsoever to one predestined to the Kingdom, He does not give them on account of any utility to God according to the prior considerations, but in order that the predestined one may obtain the Kingdom through them, because He reasonably wills [it]; and this can be shown by the 22nd of this [book]. And if He wills him to have merits, in order that he may obtain the Kingdom through them, He naturally first wills him to have the Kingdom; for this is in a certain manner the final cause why He wills him to merit, namely that through this he may acquire for himself the Kingdom. And He freely accepts him for the Kingdom prior to willing or accepting his merits. Because, therefore, first by His magnificent liberality He freely accepts him for reigning, and yet it is not fitting that he should ascend to so great a kingdom unmeriting, He wills him to merit, and gives him aid and grace to merit. Therefore graciousness-conferring grace and freely-given grace, according to the distinction written in [Distinction] 25, naturally precedes all merits of anyone whatsoever. This could be proved by a similar [example]: For [B] if a father wishes his son to do business, in order that he may buy a field, he naturally wishes him to have the field before doing business; for this is the final cause of that, and therefore he freely gives him money, not because he has done business, but in order that he may do business and so acquire the field.

This is also wholly confirmed by that common Philosophical [maxim] from Physics II 89, De Anima III 49, and Ethics III 8: In things to be done, what is first in intention is last in execution. Likewise, the will is borne toward the end of itself and primarily, to such an extent that it does not deliberate concerning it, but it is not borne toward the means except for the sake of the end alone; and therefore concerning these it deliberates carefully. Wherefore it wills the end before the means. Whence the Philosopher in Ethics II 8: We deliberate, however, not about ends, but about those things which lead to ends: For the doctor does not deliberate whether he shall heal, nor the orator whether he shall persuade, nor the politician whether he shall make peace; nor any of these about the end, but having posited some end, they consider how and by what means it shall come about. Likewise, God well foreknows and wills that whoever has good merits perseveringly shall reign; nor can anyone have good merits perseveringly unless God Himself [C] wills, works, gives, and preserves [them], by the ninth of this [book]. Therefore prior in time and nature God wills that someone reign before He gives him good merits; and therefore before he has good merits. Therefore not on account of merits, as on account of a prior cause, does He grant him grace and accept him to the Kingdom, but altogether freely, and on account of this gives him grace to merit.

But I, foolish in the knowledge of God and vain, when I was attending to philosophical letters, was seduced by the contrary error. For when I sometimes heard theologians treating this matter, the Pelagian side seemed to me more true. For in the schools of the Philosophers, I was rarely accustomed to hear anything about grace, except perhaps spoken equivocally; but every day I heard that we are masters of our free actions, and that it is in our power to act well or ill, to have virtues or vices, with many similar things. And if at any time in church I heard a reading from the Apostle exalting grace and depressing free will — of which sort is that to the Romans 9: It is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy [Rom. 9:16] — and many similar things, this displeased me as ungrateful to grace. [D] With the Manichaeans I also believed that the Apostle, as a man, could in some matter have deviated from the path of truth. Afterwards, however, before I had become a hearer of theology, having been visited as it were by a certain ray of grace through the aforesaid argument, under a certain thin image of truth, I seemed to see from afar the grace of God preceding all good merits in time and in nature — namely, the gracious will of God, who in both ways first wills the meriter to be saved, and naturally first works his merit in him before he himself does, just as He is in all motions the first Mover; whence I render thanks to Him who freely gave me this grace. Augustine likewise confesses that he was at one time deceived by this error of Pelagius, to such a degree that the texts of the Apostle commending grace seemed to him in no way to agree with the testimonies of the Law and the Prophets, but even to oppose them; from which error a similar reasoning led him to the knowledge of truth. For he says concerning the Predestination of the Saints, chapter 4: When I was erring similarly to Pelagius, thinking that the faith by which we believe in God is not a gift of God, but is from us in us, and that through it we obtain the gifts of God, nor did I think that faith was preceded by the grace of God, struck especially by this testimony of the Apostle, [E] What hast thou that thou hast not received? But if thou hast received, why dost thou glory as if thou hadst not received? [1 Cor. 4:7], I was convicted. And in Confessions VII, last [chapter], after he confessed how through books he had been inflated with secular wisdom and knowledge, and afterwards visited by divine grace, he says thus: Most eagerly I seized the venerable pen of Thy Spirit, and before others the Apostle Paul; and those questions perished in which once he seemed to me to oppose, and the text of his discourse not to agree with the testimonies of the Law and the Prophets; and one face of those chaste eloquences appeared to me; and I learned to read whatever I might find true there, said with the commendation of Thy grace, that he who sees may not glory as though he had not received. Whose footsteps too in this whole matter, as far as [A] I can, I especially follow, because he seems to me as much the Logician as the Philosopher of the Apostles, and another among the Doctors. Many also, as I fear, of the modern Philosophers embrace this false madness more dearly under the appearance of true wisdom. For it seems to many very plausibly colored, agreeing with experience and consonant with reason (for sometimes false things are more probable than true), which nevertheless if they truly wished to philosophize, they could philosophically refute — I do not say through the reasons here set down or to be set down, but perhaps through other stronger ones, which by God's preceding grace they could find. Furthermore, with God's grace as guide, we proceed in this manner: No one can have merits, nor persevere in them, unless God give and preserve, as has just been shown; and if He should wish to give merits to a wicked man and preserve them, as He does to a good man, that one would merit and persevere similarly to the good man, as the tenth [chapter] clearly proves. Therefore not on account of merits, but freely does He choose this one and not that one. Likewise, if God on account of preceding good merits gives grace, why then does He give those merits? Not on account of other prior merits, lest perhaps thus the process should go on infinitely; therefore He gives them freely, and therefore also grace. For grace from the very force of its name, among all things given, seems most freely [B] given. Nor can it be said that He gives this man good merits because He foreknows that he will use them well, because anyone whomsoever would do so, if God willed him to use them well, as is plain by the tenth [chapter]. Nor will he be able [to do so] otherwise, as the ninth chapter proves. How also could anyone use good merits badly, or not well, since a good merit is a good use, or [good] act? Likewise, if God should give grace to someone on account of merits, then because he would merit, He would will him to reign, and because he would merit, He would will him to have merits. Therefore his meriting would be a cause of the divine volition moving the divine will, and the divine will, suffering from "to merit," contrary to the twentieth; and that he would merit would be the cause why God wills him to merit, which is false; for the contrary is true. For because God wills him to merit, he merits, as the 14th [chapter] showed. Furthermore, then God, as far as concerns Himself, would be in potency, and in pure indifference, to willing this man to have grace or to lack it, and would suffer, be actualized, and be determined by the merit of this man, good or bad — which is repugnant to His perfection and supreme actuality, as is plain from the twentieth [C] of this [book]. Likewise, if God did not give grace most freely, but on account of some inferior cause contingent and free, He would certainly not foreknow that He would give it, as the eighteenth of this [book] shows. For by precisely the same cause by which God first foreknows that He will give grace, at the time of the giving He knows that He gives it. For on account of whatever cause He then gives grace, He always foreknew and willed to give grace on account of that [cause]; otherwise He would have a mutable will, contrary to the twenty-third. Likewise, if God should give grace for merits, He would will and do this because it would be just for it to be so done; whereas it is the contrary and not so, as the twenty-first teaches. Likewise, then the conferral of grace, and the merit preceding it, would not be contained under divine providence, since by chapter ten it becomes efficacious, but they would be left to chance and fortune, contrary to the 27th and others which follow. Likewise, by the first supposition God is so great a good that nothing greater than Him can be conceived, and the good is communicative of itself, and the greater good more so; therefore God is so liberally communicative and capable of giving [D] that nothing more liberally communicable or givable can be conceived: but it is more liberal to give freely altogether with no preceding merit; thus therefore God gives, especially since He has no need of our goods; and what will He give more liberally or more graciously than grace? Therefore God gives grace freely. This even the signification of the name of grace seems to signify, namely that it is freely given, in which the Apostle, founding himself, in Romans 11, proves by a demonstration leading to the impossible — namely to its denial of itself — that grace is not from works: If, by grace, he says, not from works; otherwise — that is, if the opposite be granted — grace is no longer grace [Rom. 11:6]. And above, [chapter] 4: To him who works, the reward is not imputed according to grace, but according to debt [Rom. 4:4]. Likewise, some virtuous men, such as the liberal and the magnificent, give purely liberally and altogether freely, according to the requirement of their virtue, without any preceding merit, or even subsequent [merit], as is taught in Ethics IV; therefore also God, since He is more virtuous, more liberal, and more magnificent than any man infinitely [E], will do likewise. Indeed, even if these virtuous men do this for friends, or even for those who are merely not enemies, He will do this not only for friends, and not only for those who are not enemies — if any are such middle [persons] — but even for enemies. For according to Augustine, Enchiridion 56: It is a less good to be benevolent or even beneficent toward him who has done you no evil; but that is a much greater thing, and of the most magnificent goodness, to love your enemy also and to wish and do good to him. Whence the Apostle to the Romans 5: God commends — that is, shows to be commendable — His charity in us, since while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us; and when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God through the death of His Son [Rom. 5:8–10]. Likewise, it seems more fitting that goods should be dispensed according to the will of one wiser and better, than according to the will of one less wise and good; but God is wiser and better than any man infinitely; therefore it seems more fitting that all things should be dispensed according to the divine will, than [A] causally a priori according to the merits of the human will. Whence Ephesians 1: Who works all things according to the counsel of His will [Eph. 1:11]. Likewise, no one doubts that God could confer His grace freely, and that this would be more merciful and more fitting; who therefore so far knows the mind of the Lord, or has been His counsellor, that he should dare to deny that God does so, since he ought rather to affirm this — God who even in little ones [parvulis] does so notoriously, as the thirty-first of this [book] alleges? And if anyone should say, It is not just that it should be so done; therefore He does not do so — let him know from the twenty-first of this [book], that nothing is just in such matters, except because it is willed by God, not the contrary: For not because it is just is it willed by God. Likewise, if anyone has merited his grace, he is more worthy of it than if he had not merited it; for the workman is worthy of his hire [Luke 10:7], and Romans 4: To him who works, the reward is imputed not according to grace but according to debt. Therefore any man having grace which he has merited is more worthy of it than Christ [is worthy] of the grace of union, or of any other grace freely given to Him in the beginning (For He did not merit this [B] or that). Whoever shall concede this will show himself to be not a member of Christ, but rather of Antichrist, since he raises himself above the Head. Whence Augustine, On the Predestination of the Saints [chapter] 19: The most splendid light of predestination and grace is the Saviour Himself, Christ Jesus, who, that He might be such, obtained it by no preceding merits. Let that fountain of grace therefore open itself in our Head, whence to each one according to measure it pours itself through all His members; by that grace any man becomes a Christian from the beginning of his faith, by which grace that man from His beginning was made Christ. And it follows in chapter twenty: Whoever has found preceding merits in our Head of that singular generation, let him in us his members seek the preceding merits of multiplied regeneration. And in Enchiridion 27 and On the Good of Perseverance [the chapters] next-to-last and last, he says many similar things; where in the last chapter he says: He who made this Man just without any preceding merit, He Himself from the unjust makes the just, without any preceding merit on their part, that He might be the Head, they His members. Likewise, the position contrary to this takes away from God the greatest portion [C] of thanksgivings and praises, of fear and honor; it also uproots the hope of man from God, and founds it in himself: For who will give thanks equally, and praise, fear God, and love Him, if He should render to his merits the due reward, as if He should freely come before him even as an enemy, and confer all goods? Why also will he not hope in himself, since he suffices for himself? Yet how pernicious all these things are, and contrary to Christian doctrine, who is ignorant? This too the most copious series of both Testaments testifies, whence I shall now adduce a few testimonies. Deuteronomy 9: For not on account of your justices shall you enter, that you may possess the land [Deut. 9:5]. Job 31: If my heart has rejoiced in secret, and I have kissed my hand with my mouth, which is the greatest iniquity, and a denial against the most high God [Job 31:27–28]. On which blessed Gregory, Moralia XXII 9, says: By the hand, certainly, action is signified; by the mouth, speech. Therefore he kisses his hand with his mouth who praises what he does, and attributes the power of his work to himself. Holy men, however, know that not by their own power, but by preceding [D] grace, they have been changed for the better in their resolutions or works. And because anyone who attributes to himself what he does is convicted of denying the grace of his Author, immediately is added: which is the greatest iniquity, etc., for he denies Him whose grace, despised, he claims for himself the powers of the good work. Psalm 55: For nothing shalt Thou save them, and Psalm 105: They counted as nothing the desirable land [Ps. 105:24]; and above, [Psalm] 67: A free [voluntary] rain shalt Thou set apart for Thy inheritance [Ps. 67:10]. On which Augustine in the exposition cited above adds: Much more fittingly is grace itself understood as voluntary rain, because by no preceding merits of works, it is freely given. For if grace, not from works; otherwise grace is no longer grace. For I am not worthy, he says, to be called an Apostle, because I persecuted the Church of God; but by the grace of God I am what I am [1 Cor. 15:9–10] — this is voluntary rain. Voluntarily indeed He has begotten us by the word of truth [James 1:18] — this is voluntary rain. Furthermore, also, Isaiah 52: Freely (the Gloss: that is, of your own accord) you have been sold, and without silver shall you be redeemed (Gloss: that is, by no merit of yours, but by the gratuitous benefit of God). And Hosea, last [chapter]: I shall heal [E] their contritions, I shall love them spontaneously (Gloss: that is, by mercy alone, because He first loved us). Which also in the New Testament, in the time of grace, is more clearly demonstrated. For the Author Himself of all grace, through John, plainly speaks of the grace of God: No one can come to me, unless the Father, who sent me, draw him [John 6:44]; and No one can come to me, unless it has been given him by my Father [John 6:65]; and below, [chapter] 15: Without me you can do nothing [John 15:5]; and above, [chapter] 3: The Spirit breathes where He wills [John 3:8]; and below, [chapter] 5: The Son gives life to whom He wills [John 5:21]; and Mark 3: He called to himself those whom He willed, and they came to him [Mark 3:13]; and James 1: Voluntarily He has begotten us by the word of truth, that we might be some beginning of His creature [James 1:18]; and many very similar things. The Apostle Paul himself is also a witness — vessel of free election, in whom the effects of freely-given grace most evidently appeared, whom not while persisting in good [A] works, indeed not even while desisting from evils, but still breathing threats and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, and as a man of Belial thirsting for the blood of Christians, and persecuting the Lord Himself, suddenly a light from Heaven shone around, with which the grace of Jesus Christ also came before him, as is plain in Acts 9. He, therefore, especially in some manner a son of grace, and not ungrateful, more devotedly honors, exalts, and proclaims grace his mother in nearly all his Epistles, and especially defends her; who in nearly the whole Epistle to the Romans, prolixly disputing and acutely, principally does these things. Whence in chapter 3 he writes thus: That every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may be made subject to God [Rom. 3:19] (Gloss: attributing all to Him, nothing to one's own merits, because by the works of the law no flesh is justified, and we are justified freely by His grace). And to the Ephesians 2: By grace you are saved through faith, and this not from yourselves, for it is the gift of God; not from works, lest anyone should glory [Eph. 2:8–9]. And to Titus 3: The kindness and humanity of our Saviour God appeared, not from the works of justice which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us [Titus 3:4–5]. The same to Romans 9 [B] and 11 he not only says, but proves by the authorities of the Old Testament, and by reason as well. For in the ninth he alleges that of Exodus 33, that the Lord said to Moses, I shall have mercy on whom I have willed, and I shall be merciful to him whom it has pleased me [Exod. 33:19]. Whence the Apostle concludes, Therefore it is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy [Rom. 9:16]. Yet if grace and mercy were from works, it would rather be said, I shall have mercy and be merciful to him who shall have merited it, and It is of him who wills and of him who runs — that is, in the merit of him who works — that God show mercy and bestow grace. And in [chapter] 11 he proves the same by one authority, 3 Kings 19, saying that God left for Himself seven thousand men, who had not bowed their knees before Baal. Whence he concludes, So therefore in this time the remnants, according to the election of grace, have been saved [Rom. 11:5]; and immediately afterwards he proves the same by a demonstration leading to the impossible, namely to its own denial of itself, namely: If grace be from works, it is no longer grace, as was alleged above. In this opinion also all the Catholic Doctors are unanimously in agreement, among whom Augustine, because just as the Apostle [C] was first an unbeliever and a blasphemer and an enemy of the grace of Jesus Christ, [and] after he was preceded by that same grace was likewise converted, in some singular way imitating the Apostle, [Augustine] became a praiser of grace, a magnificent and strenuous defender of grace. Likewise, to this side a peremptory argument can be adduced: For the contrary side, which holds that grace is given according to our merits, is the Pelagian heresy, which not only the Catholic Fathers in the Episcopal Palestinian judgement condemned, but even Pelagius himself the heretic, fearing to be condemned in the same place, likewise condemned, as is plain through Augustine On Heresies 88, and On the Predestination of the Saints 2, and On Grace and Free Will 11, and through Isidore Etymologies VIII 19, and is recited in the Canon, [Cause] 24, last question, Quid autem. This heresy also Augustine fully and carefully destroys, in various books against the Pelagians in general, and against certain of them, such as against Julian and Caelestius in particular, through other special books, as those know well enough who have known the books of Augustine. For this opinion also, and against the Pelagian heresy, Lombard adduces in 2 Sentences, distinction 24, and in many distinctions following, many [D] and efficacious testimonies of truth, which clearly prove operating and cooperating grace likewise. Against these things, however, Pelagius objects thus by asking: If grace be given freely, since all men are equal in themselves, why is it given to this one and not to that one? I also ask the one so asking, why God of infinite souls, and any other things equally possible and equally good in all respects, if they were created, creates these and not those? Let this man also ask, as in the person of such Augustine asks in On the Predestination of the Saints 19: I am a man as Christ is a man; why am I not what He is? For the grace of God is such and so great in Him; why is grace diverse, where the nature is common? Certainly there is no acceptance of persons with God. And as if responding, Augustine asks: Who — I do not say a Christian, but [who] insane — would say this? The same in homily 26 on that [text] of John 6, No one can come to me, unless the Father who sent me draw him, to one so asking, as if without responding, responds: Great, he says, is the commendation of grace; no one comes unless drawn; [E] whom He should draw and whom He should not, why He should draw this one and not that one, do not wish to judge, if you do not wish to err. To this asker, however, the 21st of this [book] responds. Furthermore, the Pelagians, ungrateful to grace, do not cease to oppose, but like erring forgers [falsigraphi], not understanding the Scriptures nor the truth of God, as blessed Augustine recounts in On Grace and Free Will 11, gather such testimonies from sacred Scripture for the strengthening of their error, and propose them: Be converted to me, and I shall be converted to you [Zach. 1:3]; and 2 Paralipomenon: The Lord is with you if you are with Him; and if you shall seek Him, you shall find Him [2 Par. 15:2]; from which they strive to argue that grace is given according to our merits. But in vain, since elsewhere it is so written: God of hosts, convert us; God, do Thou converting us, give us life; and After Thou converted me, I did penance [Jer. 31:19]; and Lamentations, last [chapter]: Convert us, O Lord, to Thee, and we shall be converted; renew our days as from the beginning [Lam. 5:21]. Behold, that [A] the Lord renews us fallen unto grace, just as also through it in the beginning He makes us new. Yet in such precepts, Be converted to me, etc., according to Augustine in the same place, chapter 11 and 12, He manifests the free will of the will. And below, [chapter] 23: When it is commanded that they work, free will is preceded; but therefore with fear and trembling, lest anyone attribute to himself that he works well; indeed, if Pelagius has even half an eye, he could see, that God by the very fact that He so commands, comes before the will, exciting it itself to act — yet not so that he should do this without Him, but with Him, as the preceding [chapters] taught. Wherefore He says, Without me you can do nothing [John 15:5]. And the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 15: I have laboured more abundantly than all, yet not I, but the grace of God with me [1 Cor. 15:10]. A similar forgery [falsigraphiam] Augustine also recounts in On the Predestination of the Saints 13, in these words: When it is said, they say, If thou shalt believe, thou shalt be saved — one of these is required, the other offered; what is required is in man's [power], what is offered is in God's power. And by asking, he objects against them thus: Why is not each in God's power, both what [B] He commands, and what is offered? And immediately he proves that it is so. For He is asked to give what He commands. For believers ask that faith may be increased to them; they ask for unbelievers that faith may be given them; therefore both in its increases and in its beginnings, faith is the gift of God, although it itself, when it is said If thou believest, thou shalt be saved, with the reward of salvation set forth, is required from us. For therefore are these things and similar commanded of us, and are shown to be the gifts of God, that it may be understood that we do them, and God does them, that we may do them, as through the prophet Ezekiel He most plainly says: I shall make you to do [Ezek. 36:27]. Attend and you will see God promising that He will do that they may do, what He commands to be done. Whence Ezekiel 36: Not on account of you shall I do, O house of Israel, but on account of My holy name. I shall lead you back into your land; I shall pour upon you clean water, and you shall be cleansed, and from all your idols I shall cleanse you, and I shall give you a new heart, and a new spirit shall I place in your midst; I shall take away the heart of stone, and shall give you a heart of flesh, and shall make you to walk in My precepts, and to keep My judgments and to work [them] [Ezek. 36:25–27]. And it could not unfittingly [C] be understood, Be converted to me and I shall be converted to you, in this manner: Be converted to me through operating grace and the free will of the will, and I shall be converted to you through cooperating grace, by preserving the previous grace, or by giving fuller — according to what is written in the last [chapter] of the Apocalypse: Let the holy be sanctified still [Rev. 22:11]. Whence Anselm On Concord 10 says: It is said to those converted, Be converted, either that they may be more fully converted, or that they may preserve what they have been converted to. Furthermore, certain advocates of Pelagius do not cease to bark, alleging many indeed and manifest words of an Epistle, as they say, of blessed Jerome to Demetrias On the Instruction of a Virgin, against the help of grace, and for the sufficiency of free will for any virtuous works whatsoever. But these, as it seems, neglecting in this part the writings of the elders, more dearly embrace Pelagian Scripture rather than Augustinian, heretical Scripture rather than Catholic. For it is well known to those reading and not neglecting the Letter-collection of blessed Jerome, that there are two letters entitled "of Jerome to Demetrias," of which one, namely [Letter] 94, having such a beginning, [D] Inter omnes materias, is without doubt his, in which nothing is contained concerning the excellence of free will; the other however, namely [Letter] 93, beginning in this manner, Si summo ingenio patique fretus scientia, which patently extols free will, and concedes grace, but ambiguous, foolish, and fallacious — is in no way to be believed [the work] of Jerome the Catholic Doctor. For it neither smacks of his style, his procedure, nor his sense, but of others much different, as readers may easily see. And it agrees much in opinion and in style with the great Epistle of Pelagius directed to Bishop Paulinus, with his book On Free Will — which contains four books — and with many other little works of his. Wherefore it is verisimilarly to be esteemed [the work] of Pelagius himself. Does not Pelagius himself in the little book of his faith, which he sent to Rome to Pope Innocent, write thus? Let them read the Epistle which we wrote in the East to the holy Virgin of Christ Demetrias, and they will find that we so praise the nature of man, that we always add the help of God's grace. And what is that Epistle, except that one mentioned above? Wherefore Augustine in Book 1 against Pelagius and Caelestius, On the Grace of Christ [E] and On Original Sin 23, 28, 29, 30, and 31, asserts plainly that that Epistle is of Pelagius, reciting, discussing, and condemning certain particulars of it; who also with Alypius, in Epistle 1 to Juliana, says: Who, indeed, wrote the book to holy Demetrias? and recites by discussing certain particulars of the aforesaid Epistle. Furthermore, also, Guido Prior of Carthusia, in his Epistle sent to Lazarus Prior of Durbon and the brothers, concerning the Epistles of blessed Jerome, plainly says that the aforesaid Epistle is not of Jerome, but rather of Pelagius. The Venerable Bede, however, in [Book] 1 on the Canticle of Canticles (which is especially against Julian) on the grace of God, [chapter] 12, reciting and condemning many particulars of this Epistle, affirms that it is [the work] of Julian, the son and nursling of Pelagius. Whence he says thus: In the book which he wrote to Demetrias the Virgin of Christ, On the Instruction [A] of a Virgin, he displays these same things concerning the power of free will, how he thinks. Which book some of our [people] studiously reading rashly judge to be of the holy and Catholic Doctor Jerome, in no way considering, that the sweetness of the soothing eloquence, and the perversity of the seducing heresy, manifestly prove that this little work is not his. Rather, [Jerome] himself confuted and struck down [Julian's] faith — or rather perfidy — in the Dialogue of Atticus and Critobulus, which, while Pelagius was still living, when as yet Julian was being nourished by him as a small basilisk in the cavern of a serpent, he edited, with divine eloquences. Some, however, looking at a few things, easily declare that nothing such is found in Bede's first book on the Canticles. But these undoubtedly are deceived, thinking the first book of Bede expounding the Canticles to be simply the first book — but it is not so. For in the first book, he does not expound the text of the Canticle, but before he comes to the exposition of the Canticle, throughout that whole first book he discusses and tears apart the errors and heresies of the books of Julian. Wherefore in many codices that first book is in no way found. Whoever, however, sees the beginning of his last book on the Canticles, will manifestly see him saying [B] that he had first written that book against Julian — which is more frequently found in non-defective codices. This book, however, has in some codices such a beginning: I thought first to admonish the reader; that the little works of Julian, etc.; in others, however, such: Being about to write, with God's helping grace, on the Canticle of Canticles, [the reader] is first to be admonished, etc., as above. Nor should anyone judge Bede, saying that that Epistle is of Julian, to contradict Augustine saying it is of Pelagius — for these do not conflict. For it frequently happens that many joined together send one Epistle, or perhaps both together dictated [it], and Pelagius, because he was the elder and master, sent it under his name — which afterwards Julian wished to claim for himself. All these witnesses, however, harmoniously testify that that Epistle is not of blessed Jerome, but of Pelagius, or some Pelagian heretic, and profane.

[C] COROLLARY.

AGAINST CASSIAN, MEDIATING BY SAYING THAT GOD GIVES HIS GRACE TO SOME FREELY WITHOUT PRECEDING MERIT, BUT TO OTHERS NOT UNLESS THEY FIRST MERIT TO RECEIVE IT: WHEREFORE ALSO THAT NO SLAVE OF MORTAL SIN CAN BE FREED BY HIS OWN POWERS ALONE.

From these things, therefore, it evidently appears that Cassian, wishing to mediate between the Catholics (who universally affirm in all things that God gives the first grace freely) and Pelagius (who judges that God gives to anyone grace for preceding merit, and to no one simply, purely freely) — by saying that God to some gives grace purely freely, but to others for preceding merit — gravely raves: wherefore also that no slave of mortal sin can be freed by his own [D] powers alone. This whole corollary patently follows from the premises. The aforesaid error of Cassian also Saint Prosper, throughout nearly the whole little book entitled "Of Saint Prosper, In Defense of the Preachers of God's Grace, against the Book of Cassian the Presbyter, which is entitled On the Protection of God," discreetly refutes, and diffusely repels. The errors of this Cassian in this matter are written in the Conferences of the Fathers. The other part of it [the corollary] is especially persuaded by this — that every slave of mortal sin is ungrateful to God, and cannot be made gracious without grace, nor can he by his own powers alone acquire this through prior [merits]. Unhappy man therefore — who shall free him from the body of this death? The grace of God through Jesus Christ [Rom. 7:24–25], to the Romans 7. Which also the authorities of all Catholic Doctors treating this matter unanimously testify.

CHAPTER 36. AGAINST THE PROCURATORS OF PELAGIUS WHO ASSERT THAT, ALTHOUGH MERITS ARE NOT THE CAUSE OF THE PRINCIPAL CONFERRAL OF GRACE, YET THEY ARE THE CAUSE WITHOUT WHICH IT IS NOT CONFERRED.

Although the Holy Fathers cut down [succiderunt] this Pelagian heresy, yet from its venomous root deeply driven into the hearts of many, certain not entirely spurious but pestilent shoots — because they change not the savor but the color — do not cease to sprout. For some [B] of such men say that merits are not the principal cause of the grace given to us, but a cause without which it is not given. But who does not see that these and those similar to them only verbally decline the Pelagian heresy, while really preaching it? They change the voice, on account of avoiding the horror of the heretical name, that thus the same opinion of depravity, sophistically palliated and fallaciously masked, they may more cautiously introduce, and so corrupt the hearts of the simple more easily and seduce them. The voice indeed is the voice of Jacob — namely, of the faithful man, beloved by God; but the hands inserting the iniquitous opinion are the hands of Esau — that is, of the unbelieving man, hateful to God [cf. Gen. 27:22]. Who also is so destitute of mind, that he should not perceive with how glad a heart such men would reconcile Pelagius, Caelestius, Julian, and the other Pelagian heretics, if they dared, and would condemn Paul, Augustine, Gregory, and the other Catholics? Therefore if our merits are the cause without which grace is given to us, by chapter sixteen it can be shown that merits are in some way a cause, as a co-cause [concausa], [C] and a partial cause of the grace given to us. Nor did Pelagius ever rave to such an extent that he wished to say that merits were the total cause of grace given by God, because this would be to posit and at the same time exclude God as the giver of the grace given to us. In what therefore do these dissent from Pelagius? Likewise, then grace would be from merits and works, contrary to the next chapter [Ch. 35]. Likewise, all the arguments there proving that grace is given freely, not for preceding merits, will likewise reprove this forgery, if duly brought forward. Likewise, if they understand by "principal cause" the most principal cause of all and supreme, then neither are evil merits the cause of damnation and punishment, nor is any inferior cause the cause of any effect, as the preceding [chapters] make manifest. Again, according to this, the unjust would similarly merit the first grace, just as the justified [merit] the second — namely, the increase of the first grace; whereas the first is denied by all, as the next chapter [Ch. 35] taught, but the second is catholicly conceded. Whence Proverbs 4: Acquire prudence, and it shall give increases of graces to your head. And Augustine to Pope Boniface, [D] as Lombard recounts in 2 Sentences, distinction 26, writes thus: No human merit precedes the grace of God, but grace itself merits to be increased, that increased it may merit to be perfected. And in the Sentences of Prosper, proposition 95: The capacity of charity always grows, while by use it is greater, and by liberality is made richer. Likewise, if merits be a prior cause of the giving of grace than is God, then he who so merits comes to God before [God comes to him], and rather draws God to himself than the contrary. How therefore does He say No one comes to me, etc., John 6? How does He say You did not choose me, but I chose you, John 15? And Without me you can do nothing? And how then does the Apostle say Who has first given to Him, and it shall be repaid to him? — which he also philosophically immediately proves, since, he says, From Him, and through Him, and in Him are all things, Romans 11. And how then does he say to the Ephesians 2: By grace you are saved, and this not from yourselves, for it is the gift of God; not from works, when nevertheless it would originally be from yourselves? Likewise, if merits be a co-cause, or a partial cause, of the giving of grace, then this giving is partly to be attributed to God, partly to us; indeed [E] the prior part is ours, as has just been shown; the posterior however God's, contrary to the gloss on the cited word of the Apostle saying: By preceding grace, that is, by the gratuitous will of God; not from yourselves, that is, from the power of your nature, because it is the gift of God purely, not partly from works. Likewise, Augustine says in On the Predestination of the Saints 3: Pelagius, unwilling to oppose such clear Apostolic testimonies, and yet wishing that what he believes should be from himself, as it were composes [an arrangement] between man and God, that he may claim a part of faith for himself, and leave a part to Him; and what is more lofty, he himself takes the first, gives the following to Him; and in that which he says is of both, he makes himself prior, God posterior. Behold how those so saying embrace the mind and words of Pelagius. Likewise, then it could well be asked why God draws this one and does not draw that one — for He has a true cause, namely some [A] antecedent merit, contrary to the [text of] Augustine cited above. How also do these save operating grace, which in all things precedes sinners? But if these object that [saying] of Augustine: He who created you without you will not justify you without you, and similar things — therefore it is necessary that you cooperate to this, that grace be given you — it must be said that this is true perhaps in adults; but it is not necessary for me to do anything antecedently, but consequently, so that with grace infused into me I may will and do well; but the infusion of grace is naturally prior, and my willing well and acting follows it naturally — like the efficient cause its effect, and the cause its caused. Thus, however, Lombard responds in 2 Sentences, distinction 26 (when it is objected that grace does not precede the will of man), through that [text] of Augustine on John, where above: No one can come to me, etc.; Other things a man can [do] unwilling, but [he can] believe only willing; and through that [text of the] gloss on Genesis 24, Let us call the maiden, and let us ask her will, because faith is of will, [B] not of necessity. He says therefore: To which we, responding, say that all these things have been said, because there is no faith except in him who wishes to believe, whose good will faith precedes — not in time, but in cause and nature. Which response he confirms through Augustine Enchiridion 23, saying that good will is among those gifts which it does not precede, and itself helps those whom it precedes, while they consent to it — which also above in many chapters is more expressly contained. For he asks thus: Since without doubt, if a man is of such an age that he uses reason, he cannot believe, hope, love, unless he wills, nor reach the palm of God's calling, unless by will he run; how therefore is it not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy? — except because the will, as is written, is prepared by the Lord. Otherwise, if for this reason it is said Not of him who wills, etc., but of Him who shows mercy, etc., because it is from both — that is, from the will of man and the mercy of God — that we should so understand it as said: Not of him who wills, etc., as if it were said, the will of man alone does not suffice, if there be not also the mercy of God; nor does the mercy of God alone suffice, if there be not also the will of man; and therefore, if it is rightly said Not of him who wills, but of God who shows mercy, because the will [C] of man alone does not fulfill it; why is it not on the contrary rightly said Not of God who shows mercy, but of him who wills, because the mercy of God alone does not fulfill it? Furthermore, if no Christian will dare to say this, lest he most plainly contradict the Apostle, it remains that for this reason it is rightly understood as said, Not of him who wills, but of Him who shows mercy, that the whole may be given to God, who both prepares the good will of man for being helped, and helps the prepared will. For the good will of man precedes many gifts of God, but not all; in those which it does not precede, it itself is also among them. Likewise, in the same distinction 26, he alleges Augustine saying: When faith obtains justification, no human merit precedes the grace of God, but this happens with the will accompanying, not leading, following, not preceding. The same above, distinction 25, last [chapter], says that the will or operation of man does not help the grace of God, but grace itself precedes the will by preparing [it], that it may will the good — which also he diffusely shows in distinctions 26 and 27 consequently. Augustine also On Predestination, Against the Pelagians 3, writes thus: Foolishly! It is God who justifies the wicked, not preceded by human [D] will, but Himself preceding the will of man by His mercy: For my God, He says, His mercy will come before me. Hear another Prophet speaking: Convert me, O Lord, and I shall be converted; heal me, and I shall be healed [Jer. 17:14]. Whence also the Apostle: Justified, he says, freely by His grace. Hear freely, and be silent about merits. The same in On Nature and Grace 32, speaking of our justification, says: Where indeed we also work, but with Him working, we cooperate, because His mercy precedes us. And in On the Good of Perseverance 48, he says, that God precedes the will of those to whom grace is given — for that very reason, lest it should appear not freely given, but according to the merits of the preceding will, as against the truth the Pelagian error declaims. The same in Hypognosticon 52: In every work done, the will of God is prior, and the will of free choice posterior — that is, God works, man cooperates. But if you should say, as you have been accustomed to say, "Because I first willed, God willed," then you are making it a merit, that grace, [being] from works, is no longer grace, but reward: in this place the Apostle refutes you, saying, If therefore by grace, then no longer from works, otherwise [E] grace is no longer grace; grace is given to me, not paid back. The same in On Heresies 88 says, that Pelagius did not put grace before free will, but with unfaithful cunning placed it under [it]. Isidore moreover, Etymologies VIII 5, sentence 14, treating of various heretics and their heresies, says that the Pelagians put free will before divine grace; and is recited in the Canon, [Cause] 24, last question, Quidam autem; where Gratian, following Isidore, enumerates many heretics with their heresies.

[A] CHAPTER 37. AGAINST CERTAIN PELAGIANS WHO SAY THAT MAN CAN BY HIMSELF ALONE DULY PREPARE [HIMSELF]; AND IF HE DOES SO, GOD WILL GIVE HIM HIS GRACE FREELY.

There are still others opining that man cannot by himself properly merit grace; yet he can duly prepare himself, and then God will give him His grace freely — just as in natural things, when matter has been duly prepared, [B] form is immediately introduced. This preparation, however, either helps in something, or it does not help. If it does not help, it does not prepare, nor dispose; if it helps, it is in some way laudable and meritorious, and some cause of justification — contrary to the two next chapters; and so against this error all the arguments made here and there return. Likewise, according to this, the beginning of faith is from us, but the supplement is from God — which Augustine recounts and reproves in On the Predestination of the Saints 2, saying: If it does not pertain to the grace of God that we have begun to believe, but rather that which on account of this is added to us, and through this we ourselves give the beginning of our faith first to God, that there may be repaid to us the supplement of it; but who would say that the one who has now begun to believe merits nothing from Him in whom he has believed? Whence it comes that, [him] now meriting, the rest are said to be added by divine retribution; and through this that the grace of God is given according to our merits — which Pelagius, having objected to himself, [C] lest he himself be condemned, condemned. And concerning preparation it can be argued similarly in every way. In a similar way he argues On Grace and Free Will, chapters 12, 17, 18. Likewise, the very preparation is a gratuitous gift of God, as the 9th and 20th chapters make manifest, which the 27th together with the 10th and the same 20th will corroborate; and is sufficiently plain through our highest Author John 15, saying thus: Without me you can do nothing; and through His Disciple Paul 2 Corinthians 3, confessing: Such confidence we have through Christ toward God, that we are not sufficient to think anything of ourselves, as if from ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God [2 Cor. 3:4–5]. And 1 Corinthians 4: What hast thou that thou hast not received? But if thou hast received, why dost thou glory as if thou hadst not received? And to the Romans 11: Since from Him, and through Him, and in Him are all things. Whence also Augustine, supported by the strength of these authorities, proceeds throughout the whole book On the Predestination of the Saints, showing that the beginning, completion, and end of faith — and the whole entirely — is from God. Whence chapter 7 [D] he says of the elect: Election was freely obtained, which they obtained, did not precede in them as something which they should first give, that it might be repaid to them — which he proves by that [text] of the Psalm cited above: For nothing shalt Thou save them. And below, [chapter] 14: All this reasoning by which we defend grace truly to be — that is, not to be given according to our merits — though it be most evidently asserted by the testimonies of divine eloquences, yet among those who, unless they assign something to themselves which they should first give and which would be repaid to them, think themselves repressed from all zeal of piety, labors somewhat in the age of greater [persons] using free choice of will; but when one comes to the little ones, and to the very Mediator of God and men, the man Jesus Christ, all assertion of preceding grace by human merits fails. The same in On the Good of Perseverance 67: Let them attend, how those are deceived who think it to be from us, that we ask, seek, and knock; and this they say is, that grace is preceded by merit, that it may follow, when we receive asking and find seeking, and it is opened to those knocking; nor do they wish to understand that this also is of divine gift, that we ask, seek, and [E] knock. For we have received the Spirit of adoption of sons, in whom we cry Abba, Father: to which he also alleges blessed Ambrose, saying thus: To pray to God is also of spiritual grace, as it is written: No one says "Lord Jesus" except in the Holy Spirit. Likewise, then to receive grace would be of him who wills and runs, contrary to the Apostle to the Romans 9 — since it is of him to prepare himself duly. And it is confirmed by Augustine, Enchiridion 23, disputing on this authority of the Apostle, and attributing the very preparation of our will totally to God, as was against the error just alleged. The same is plain through him On the Two Souls 15, and is recited in 2 Sentences of Peter, distinction 26, saying that the will, that it may not admit evil and may attain good, is preceded and prepared by the grace of God — which he also confirms by that of the Apostle, [A] Not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, etc. The same is plain through him in Retractations I 23, and On the Predestination of the Saints 4, saying that God prepares the will; and below, [chapter] 6: Although to believe or not to believe is in the choice of the human will, yet in the elect the will is prepared by the Lord. And below, [chapter] 7: When many hear the word of truth, some believe, some contradict, since in others the will is prepared by the Lord, in others not prepared. And in On Grace and Free Will 21: We are formed and created in good works, which we did not prepare, but God Almighty prepared, that we may walk in them. Does not also the royal Prophet say to God: Preparing the mountains in Thy strength, Psalm 64? — namely, mountains, that is, those exalted in the state of life, but Thou preparing the mountains, not the mountains themselves, and this in Thy strength, not in their own. Wherefore also below: The river, he says, of God is filled with waters — that is, according to Augustine, the people of God is filled with the Holy Spirit, that is, with His spiritual gifts. Thou hast prepared their food, namely spiritual, for so is its preparation. Where the Roman Psalter, which Augustine expounds, has thus: For so is Thy preparation [B]; on which Augustine: Not because they merited Thee, those whose sins Thou hast forgiven (for their merits were evil), but Thou on account of Thy mercy, for so is Thy preparation; thus hast Thou prepared their food. How also did Paul prepare himself, raging most cruelly against Christ, to obtain the grace of Christ? How Matthew? And how others similar? Do we not read certain sick to have been cured by the Lord, by whom or for whom He had not been entreated, nor who in any way prepared themselves, out of His mercy alone? Would not also a man merciful, pious, and good, knowing and able, do thus? Why therefore not God in all things infinitely better? And if He so heals bodily infirmities, why not similarly — indeed rather — spiritual ones? Is not the soul more than the body? More similar to the Creator and dearer to the Redeemer? But these will perhaps object that [text] of Psalm 9: Thy ear has heard the preparation of their heart; and Proverbs 16: It is of man to prepare the soul, and of the Lord to govern the tongue; and 1 Kings 2: Thoughts are prepared for them. Likewise, the prayers and alms of Cornelius, not yet baptized nor a believer, [C] ascended into memory in the sight of God; whence He commanded him through an Angel, that he should call for Simon, who being called and coming, baptized Cornelius himself, as is plain in Acts 10. Therefore on account of that preparation through prayers and alms he merited to be baptized. Likewise, in such an adult about to be baptized before baptism there are many thoughts, and deliberations about being baptized, and finally consent — and with this whole preparation completed, baptismal grace is given. The first of these, however, concludes nothing, since God so hears our prayers, which yet are not from us alone nor first from us, but from God in us. For we have received the Spirit of adoption of sons, in whom we cry, Abba, Father, Romans 8 — which the Apostle expounding, in Galatians 4, says: God sent the Spirit of His Son into our hearts, crying, Abba, Father — that is, making us cry, as is plain through the expositions of the saints, and through Augustine On the Good of Perseverance 66, through whom together with blessed Ambrose, chapter 67, the whole response is plain, as was alleged above. [D] To the other, when they allege, It is of man to prepare the soul, and of the Lord to govern the tongue: it is true certainly, but it is not of man alone to prepare the soul, but also of the Lord, as has been shown above; therefore each of these is of the Lord. For who is ignorant that it is greater and better to prepare the soul to speak wisely, than to utter [things already] prepared? Since according to Cato: Speech is given to all, the wisdom of the soul to few. And who — I do not say a Christian, but even a Pelagian — would dare to attribute to himself what is greater and better, but to the Lord God what is worse and lesser? Whence James 1: Every excellent gift, and every perfect gift, is from above, descending from the Father of lights. And Augustine, On the Words of the Apostle, sermon 15: You will be the work of God, not only because you are a man, but also because you are just: for it is better to be a just man, than [merely] to be a man. If God made you a man, and you make yourself just, you are doing something better than what God did. The same on that [text] of Psalm 144, They shall exult in Thy justice: Let no one attribute to God that he is, and to himself that he is just; for you would be attributing better to yourself than to God; for it is better [E] to be just, than [merely] to be a man. And Bernard, On Grace and Free Will 10: Far be it that we should attribute the perfection itself of the will-nature to it, but to God only the creation, since by far indeed it is better to be perfect than [merely] to be made; and since to attribute to God what is less, [and] to ourselves what is loftier, would seem an impious wickedness. Augustine likewise On the City of God XII 9 argues in this way: If the good Angels were prior to the same will, and made it in themselves with God not cooperating, then they were made better by themselves than by Him. But far be it — since they could not make themselves better than He had made them, than whom no one makes anything better — that without His operating help they should be able to have a good will, by which they would be better. He also in Against Pelagius and Caelestius, On the Grace of Christ and On Original Sin I 22, refuting Pelagius (who judged that thought is sent by God, but love is from us), says thus: Let him distinguish thought and love, as they are to be distinguished, and since each [A] is the gift of God — but one less, the other greater — let him not here exalt our justice through the praise of our Justifier, that of these two, what is less he should attribute to divine help, but what is greater he should usurp for the human will. And if he should consent that we receive love by the grace of God, let him not so think it, as if any meritorious goods of ours had preceded. For whence could we then have good merits, when we did not love God? For that we might receive the love by which we should love, we were loved, when we did not yet have it. This John the Apostle most plainly says: Not that we have loved God, but that He has loved us — most well altogether and most truly. For we should not have whence to love Him, unless we received this from Him, when He first loved us. What good would we do, unless we loved? Or how do we not do good, if we love? For though God's command sometimes seems to be performed by those not loving but fearing, yet where there is no love, no work is imputed as good — nor is it rightly called a good work, because all that is not from faith is sin, and faith works through love. Yet because Solomon [B] seems to put some difference between preparing the soul and governing the tongue: it must be known that "to govern" is of some superior ruler, with respect to some inferior directed by him; "to act," however, is of any active cause whatsoever — whether superior or inferior — and therefore it can be said that fire heats iron; but it is of the smith to govern, and to moderate, the heat and the heating: thus also it is of man to prepare the soul, but not of him alone, but as an inferior active cause with the superior active cause, and in the strength of Him who is the Lord; but it is of the Lord alone, as the supreme ruler, to govern the tongue, with man, however, sub-acting [under-acting] — as it is of the smith to govern the hammer striking various sounds. For in the hand of God are both we and our discourses [Wis. 7:16]. Very fittingly also it might be said: It is of the Lord to govern the soul, and of man to prepare the tongue. That [text] however of 1 Kings 2, Thoughts are prepared for them, the Gloss understands thus, that is, for His thought, as if it were said, No thoughts are hidden from Him; and the whole verse seems to support this: Let old things, he says, depart from your mouth, because the Lord is the God of knowledge, and thoughts are prepared for Him. Of [C] Cornelius, however, I say, that whatever good preparation he had, he had received already freely from God, as the preceding [chapters] taught. Nor was he entirely without faith. For how would he have prayed to God and given alms for the love of Him, unless in some way he had believed in Him? Yet he did not have full faith, or [faith] not revealed in all things, but veiled. And in these manners Augustine responded to those objecting the same instance, in On the Predestination of the Saints 8: It is wont, he says, to be said, He merited therefore to believe, because he was a good man before he believed — which can be said of Cornelius, whose alms were accepted and prayers heard before he believed in Christ; nor yet without some faith was he giving and praying. For how was he calling on Him in whom he had not believed? But if without the faith of Christ he could be saved, the architect Apostle Peter would not have been sent to build him up — although unless the Lord build the house, in vain do they labour who build it. Whatever therefore both before he believed in Christ, and when he had believed, Cornelius did well — all is to be given to God, lest perchance any be exalted. To the last point, it is plain by the same — for all such [D] thoughts are made freely by God, without whom we can do nothing, since we are not sufficient to think anything of ourselves, as if from ourselves. For which Augustine says in On the Predestination of the Saints 2: Who does not see that to think is prior to believing? For no one believes, unless he has first thought that it is to be believed. For though by a swift, by a most rapid [movement] certain holy thoughts fly before the will to believe, and presently it follows, so that it accompanies as if most closely joined; nevertheless it is necessary that all that is believed, be believed with thought preceding. What therefore pertains to religion and piety, we are not fit to think anything as if from ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God. Yet although these things are so, it is not my intention to deny every preparation and prior disposition to charity, and to grace in adults: For I know that servile fear, fear of punishment, fear of inconvenience, love of advantage, and the moral virtues, much withdraw from sin, incline to good works, and so prepare and dispose to charity and grace, and to truly gracious works — as the very many authorities written in 3 [E] Sentences of Peter, distinction 34, sufficiently show. No one however can [do] any of these, nor in any way dispose himself, without God specially acting in this — as the preceding [chapters] make manifest. Yet truly, the conferral of grace does not always follow such preparation, just as neither does perseverance follow grace itself when conferred, predestinatively to life — as the things previously had clearly teach.

[A] CHAPTER 38. AGAINST CERTAIN PELAGIANS WHO SAY THAT GOD COMES BEFORE MAN IN THE CONFERRAL OF GRACE BY KNOCKING, AND MAN [PERFORMS] THE VERY RECEPTION OF GRACE BY OPENING AND CONSENTING — YET FROM HIMSELF, [HE OPENING] TO HIM WHO KNOCKS, AND THUS IN A CERTAIN WAY MERITING IT.

Furthermore, there are still others not daring to resist such valid testimonies; therefore they give to God the extrinsic first-fruits of grace and faith and similar goods, [B] but to men grace itself and faith with the other such goods. For they say that God always precedes by knocking and exciting to grace, faith, and similar goods, and man follows by opening and consenting — and this from his own powers through himself — according to that of Apocalypse 3: Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if anyone shall hear my voice, and open to me the door, I shall enter in to him, and sup with him, and he with me [Rev. 3:20]. These men, however, make God a public seller of His grace, and men the buyers. For they say that He, like a poor little merchant, cries out, and knocks at the doors and gates of each one; but to him who opens, on account of his opening, He gives His grace — which yet would more truly be called exchanging, or selling. They also make God a poor little hired scribe publishing his work, and for a small price — for opening and supping — writing the names of those opening in the book of life. And so grace will be from our preceding works, contrary to [C] the 35th of this [book], whose arguments all return. For which Augustine also says in On the Words of the Apostle, as Lombard alleges in the Gloss on that [text] to the Ephesians 2: By grace you are saved, etc., not from works: Do not think that you have received by meriting, you who would have merited nothing unless you had received; grace preceded your merit; not grace from merit, but merit from grace: For if grace [be] from merit, you bought it, you did not freely receive it. Likewise, man cannot open or consent in such things from himself, but from the divine will, as chapter nine teaches; which the Authorities cited above also prove: No one can come to me, unless my Father shall draw him. According to these, however, although man knocked by God, not yet having the Father, by opening to Him who knocks, would more truly draw the Father to himself; and Without me you can do nothing — therefore neither open; nor are we sufficient to think anything from ourselves as if from ourselves — therefore neither to open by believing: for to think is less than to believe. And although this sufficiently appears, behold a fitting witness, Augustine On the Predestination of the Saints 2, saying thus: To believe is nothing else than to think with assent; for not [D] he who thinks, believes — since for that very reason many think, that they may not believe; but everyone who believes, thinks. What therefore pertains to religion and piety, if we are not fit to think anything as if from ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God; surely we are not fit to believe anything as if from ourselves — which we cannot [do] without thought — but our sufficiency by which we begin to believe is from God. Wherefore, just as no one suffices for himself for beginning or perfecting any good work whatsoever, whence in every good work, both in beginning and perfecting, our sufficiency is from God: thus no one suffices for beginning and perfecting faith, since faith, if it is not thought, is nothing; and we are not fit to think anything as if from ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God. How also is it true: Not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy; and By grace you are saved through faith, and this not of yourselves, for it is the gift of God, not from works; and What hast thou that thou hast not received? But if thou hast received, why dost thou glory as if thou hadst not received? — which humbly knowing, and truthfully professing, that egregious [E] Doctor and most glorious Martyr Cyprian in his eleventh Epistle (entitled On the Discipline of the Christian Religion, to Quirinus), chapter 4, says: We must glory in nothing, because nothing is ours; which he proves because in the Gospel according to John it is written: No one can receive anything unless it shall have been given him from heaven [John 3:27]. Likewise in the Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians: What hast thou that thou hast not received? But if thou hast received, why dost thou glory as if thou hadst not received? Which also blessed Augustine frequently cites from him: On Correction and Grace 19; On the Good of Perseverance 43; On the Predestination of the Saints 3. Likewise, although God thus knocks, not by this does He elect us — since He likewise knocks at non-elect — but we, opening, choose Him, contrary to His own [word] saying: You did not choose me, but I chose you. Whence Augustine On the Predestination of the Saints 23: If they were elect for this reason, that they had believed, they themselves indeed had first chosen, by believing in Him, that they might merit to be elected: [A] But this He takes away altogether who says, You did not choose me, but I chose you; the elect indeed without doubt chose Him, when they believed in Him; whence not for any other reason does He say, You did not choose me, but I chose you, except that they did not choose Him that He might choose them, but that they might choose Him, He chose them, because His mercy preceded them according to grace, not according to debt. And although He thus knocks, He gives nothing to us — but we, opening, give to Him our consent — contrary to that of the Apostle: Who has first given to Him, and it shall be repaid to him? Since from Him, and through Him, and in Him are all things. Likewise, according to what was argued above, this position attributes to us what is better and greater, but to God what is worse and less: For who would doubt that opening is better and more useful to us than knocking, since to knock without opening profits not, but harms? Likewise, if man can from his own powers open to Him who knocks, and consent to Him who excites — since the unbelieving adult, who has sufficiently heard the speech of the faith of Christ, and has retained in habit or memory what he has heard — can by the same reason according to the opinion of the Philosopher in De Anima II go from first act [B] to second act, and understand and actually think such things when he wishes, and can from himself consent: therefore from himself without God he can acquire grace and faith for himself, and all things requisite — contrary to what has just been premised. Likewise, when God thus knocks, what does He intend? Either He intends that the one knocked-at open, or that he not open, or in a middle way: He intends neither. If He intends that he open, by chapter ten everyone knocked-at opens, which is not true; for many frequently resist the Holy Spirit of God. If He intends that he not open, by the same tenth he cannot open. If He intends neither, by chapter nine he could not open; and even if he should open, that opening would be casual with respect to God, because beyond His intent, nor contained under divine providence, but would be done by God only permissively — contrary to chapters 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, and 33 manifestly. This is also contrary to the 22nd of this [book]. Likewise, thus to open to Him who knocks is meritorious; therefore prior naturally it proceeds from grace, than from the human will, as has been alleged before. Therefore the first grace does not follow that opening as a reward [or] merit to which [C] it is owed. Likewise, this was the error of Pelagius, as is plain through Augustine On the Predestination of the Saints 25, saying: The Pelagians themselves think that, with the precepts received, by ourselves, by free choice of will, we are made holy and immaculate; but rightly is the Pelagian error refuted by this testimony, where the Apostle says, Therefore us elect in Christ, and predestined before the constitution of the world, that we should be holy and immaculate. When therefore He predestined us, He predestined His work, by which He makes us holy and immaculate. By this error Augustine also at one time erred, as he himself testifies above, in the same [book] 4: When, he says, I was erring similarly to Pelagius, thinking that the faith by which we believe in God is not a gift of God, but is from us in us, and through it we obtain the gifts of God, struck by that special testimony of the Apostle, What hast thou that thou hast not received?, etc., I myself was convicted. For I did not think that faith was preceded by grace, except because we could not believe, if the proclamation of truth did not precede; but that we should consent to the Gospel preached to us, I judged to be of our own determination and from us — which error not [D] a few of my little works sufficiently indicate. This error, however, his book On the Spirit and the Letter seems to indicate; in chapter 26 of which he asks: Whether faith is in our power? And with great disputation premised, in chapter 31 by a certain distinction he responds — namely, that partly is it to be attributed to divine gift, partly to us: It is to be attributed to divine gift on two accounts: First, because faith exists from free choice, which we received from God when we were created; Second, because by the persuasions of things seen, God brings it about that we may will, and believe — whether extrinsically through Angelic exhortations, or through the commandments of the law, or intrinsically, where no one has in his power what may come into his mind. And he adds: But to consent or to dissent is of one's own will. In these manners therefore, when God acts upon the rational soul that it may believe Him (for one cannot believe by anything by free choice, if there be no persuasion or calling to be believed), certainly the will to believe itself God works in man, and in all things His mercy precedes us. To consent, however, to the calling of God or to dissent from it, as I have said, is of one's own will — which thing not only [E] does not weaken what was said, 'What hast thou that thou hast not received?' but even confirms it. For the soul cannot receive and have the gifts of which it hears this, except by consenting; and through this, what it has and what it receives is of God; but to receive and to have, certainly, is of him who receives and has. The retraction of this error from his first [book] of Retractations 23 Augustine recites in On the Predestination of the Saints 4. For he had said, expounding certain propositions of the Epistle to the Romans, That we believe is ours, that we work good is His, who gives the Holy Spirit to those believing. And retracting, he says: Which surely I would not say, if I had then known faith itself to be found among the gifts of God, which are given in the same Spirit. Both therefore are ours on account of the choice of will, and yet both is given [A] on account of the spirit of faith and charity. And what I said a little before, "It is ours to believe and to will, but His to give to those believing the faculty of working well" — is true indeed, but by the same rule, both is His, because He prepares the will, and both is ours, because it is not done unless with us willing. To this also makes for it that from chapter 13 of On the Predestination of the Saints, the thirty-fifth of this [book] alleges. Yet it seems that Augustine in On the Spirit and the Letter did not say the aforesaid response by way of finally determining, but rather by doubting, and by inquiring disputatively. For in that thirty-first chapter he says: This disputation, if it suffices for solving that question, let it suffice; And below: To whom this response is displeasing, let him seek more learned [men]. Likewise, then according to these, there would be only one calling — namely, that knocking and exciting, not opening, leading in, and making consent — which is plainly contrary to Augustine On the Predestination of the Saints 22, distinguishing a twofold calling: one by which it is said, Many are called; and another, with which he deals, by which the elect are called and made [elect], of which the Apostle says: [B] Without repentance are the gifts and calling of God — that is, without change, stably fixed. To this calling those who pertain are all teachable by God; nor can any of them say, I believed that I should so be called — for the mercy of God preceded him, by which he was so called, that he might believe. This calling also in chapter 23 he calls the calling according to the purpose of God, according to that of the Apostle, Romans 8: To those loving God, all things cooperate to good, to those who according to purpose are called holy — namely, according to the purpose of the divine will, not their own. Whence also in chapter 26, with great disputation against the Pelagians premised, he so concludes: Therefore God works in the hearts of men by that calling according to His purpose (of which we have spoken much), not that they should hear the Gospel idly, but that, having heard it, they should be converted and believe. Likewise, this is contrary to the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 3, writing thus: Neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters, but God who gives the increase — because, according to the Gloss, these do not give anything from themselves, but only God, [C] who gives the intrinsic increase. Likewise, Augustine On Faith to Peter 64: Hold most firmly, and by no means doubt, that a man whom no adversity prohibits can read and hear the words of the holy Law and the Gospel; but that no one can obey the divine commandments, except him whom God has preceded with His grace, that what he hears with the body, he may also perceive with the heart, and with a good will divinely received, may will and be able to do the commands of God. For neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters, but God who gives the increase, who also works in us both to will and to perform according to His good will — namely His, not ours, according to the gloss on Philippians 2. Likewise, 1 Thessalonians 2: We give thanks to God without intermission, because when you received from us the word of the hearing of God, you received it, not as the word of men, but as it is, the word of God, who works in us who believe in this very thing. If however God did not work otherwise in knocking and calling those who open and believe, than in others, the Apostle would not say Who works in you who believe. Indeed it seems sufficiently to express what God [D] works in them specially, when he says in this very thing, namely the very thing which you believe. Whence Augustine, treating this word in On the Predestination of the Saints 26, says: What is it that he gives thanks for this to God? Truly it is vain and empty, if He to whom he gives thanks, did not Himself do this; but because this is not vain and empty, surely God, to whom he gives thanks for this work, Himself did it, when they received from the Apostle the word of the hearing of God, when they accepted it not as the word of men, but as it is, the word of God. Therefore God works in the hearts of men, not that they should hear the Gospel idly, but that having heard it, they should be converted and believe. Is not this also what Truth itself says: No one can come to me, unless the Father, who sent me, draw him? It is written in the Prophets, And they shall all be teachable by God: Everyone who has heard from the Father, and has learned, comes to me, John 6? On which Augustine, in the first part on John, homily 26, says: All the men of that kingdom shall be teachable by God; not from men shall they hear, and even if from men they hear, yet what they understand is given within, flashes within, [E] is revealed within. What do men do announcing outwardly? What do I do now when I speak? I bring the noise of words to your ears. Unless therefore He who is within reveals, what do I say, or what do I speak? The exterior cultivator of the tree, the interior is the Creator; he who plants and he who waters works extrinsically — this we do; but neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters, but God who gives the increase. This is They shall all be teachable by God. Which all? Everyone who has heard from the Father, and has learned, comes to me. See how the Father draws. The same in On the City of God XV 6, speaking of the manifold correction of men done through men: In this way, he says, are the citizens of the city of God cured, while sojourning in this earth, and sighing for the peace of the supernal fatherland; but the Holy Spirit works inwardly, that the medicine which is applied outwardly may avail something. Otherwise, even if God Himself, using a creature subject to Him, in some human shape should address human senses, whether those of the body, or those most similar to these which we have [A] in dreams, and not by interior grace should rule and act upon the mind, no preaching of truth profits a man. God does this, however, distinguishing the vessels of mercy from the vessels of wrath, by a dispensation which He Himself knows much hidden, but yet just. The Venerable Bede also, on Luke II 4, treating that of Luke 5: Master, working through the whole night we have caught nothing, but at Thy word I shall let down the net, says thus: Unless the Lord shall have built the house, in vain have they laboured who build it; unless the Lord shall have illumined the heart of the hearers, the Doctor labours in the night; unless in the word of supernal grace the instruments of disputation shall have been let down, in vain does the preacher cast the dart of his voice, because the faith of peoples comes not from the wisdom of composed speech, but from the gift of divine calling. Gregory also Moralia XI 5 on that of Job 12: If He shall destroy, there is no one who builds, writes thus: God Almighty destroys the human heart when He abandons, builds when He fills. Whence very often it happens, that when the heart of the hearer, the [his] faults requiring it, is not filled with the grace of Almighty God, in vain is it moved exteriorly by the preacher, because mute is every mouth which [B] speaks, if He cry not within in the heart, who breathes the words which are heard. Hence the Prophet says, "Unless the Lord build", etc. Hence Solomon says,

"Consider the works of God, that no one is able to correct him whom He has despised". Nor wonder if by a reprobate heart the preacher is hardly heard, since sometimes the Lord Himself, in those things which He speaks, is opposed by the manners of the resistant. Hence it is that Cain even by the divine voice was able to be admonished, and could not be changed, because, the guilt of malice requiring it, God within had already abandoned the heart, to which He outwardly made words for testimony. He also in homily 30 on the Gospel, expounding that of John 14: He shall teach you all things, writes thus: Because unless the same Spirit be present to the heart of the hearer, the discourse of the Doctor is idle. Let no one therefore attribute to the man teaching that he understands from the mouth of the teacher, because unless there be virtue within by which he teaches, the tongue of the Doctor labours outwardly in vain. Behold, you all alike hear one voice of him speaking, yet you do not alike receive the sense of the heard voice. Since therefore the voice is not unequal, why in your hearts is the understanding of the voice unequal — except because by what the [C] voice of the speaker generally admonishes, there is an interior master who teaches certain ones especially concerning the understanding of the voice? Of this anointing of the spirit, again through John it is said, "As His anointing teaches us concerning all things". By the voice therefore one is not instructed, when the mind is not anointed by the spirit. But why do we speak these things about the doctrine of men, when even the Creator Himself does not speak for the instruction of man, if He does not speak to the same man through the anointing of the spirit. Certainly Cain before he perpetrated fratricide in deed, heard, "Thou hast sinned, be still"; but because, his guilts requiring it, by voice he was admonished, not by the anointing of the spirit, he was able to hear the words, but condemned to keep them. The Gloss also on that of Jeremiah 36: From his mouth he was speaking, etc., and I was writing, says thus: To hearers also is the grace of the Holy Spirit necessary: For unless the spirit be present, the discourse of the Doctor is idle; one voice of the speaker we all alike hear in the Church, but not all alike do we understand, except as the anointing of God teaches us concerning all things. The Creator Himself does not speak for the instruction of man, if He does not speak through the anointing of the spirit. For it was said to Cain, "Thou hast sinned, be still"; [D] but because, his guilts prohibiting, he was not anointed, the words of God he was able to hear, but not to keep. Thus Joachim and his servants were able to hear the words of God with the ear of the body, but not of the heart. With which also concords Augustine On Correction and Grace 10 saying thus: Then is correction salutary, when the supernal physician looks upon [the patient]: For it does not profit anything, except when He brings it about, that he should as much as possible repent of his sin; and who does this, except He who looked upon the Apostle Peter denying, and made him weep? And he shows this opinion through the whole book. Furthermore, if a man from himself alone should open to God thus knocking, calling, and offering grace, it seems that certain obstinate men, or others from various causes, would in no way open — which is false, since whoever, according to the opinion of the Apostle, according to the purpose of God are called holy, necessarily come without delay; for otherwise the purpose of the divine will would be frustrated, which chapter 10 does not permit; and therefore Mark 3 it is said: He called to himself those whom He willed, and they came to him. Nor can it be said that God, in calling the elect, does not propose, nor will, that they come, but leaves this to their choice; for by chapter 22, He either wills [E] that, or its opposite; and not its opposite, because then by chapter 10 they would not come, nor would the Apostle and Augustine then specially name them called according to purpose — namely, of God calling, as is plain in Romans 8 and through Augustine On the Predestination of the Saints alleged above. And if that chapter 22 were not, it would not be fitting that God should knock undetermined as to what He should do, and be determined by another, as has been argued above. And because then He would have new volitions, and would somehow be changed, contrary to chapters 23 and 5; nor would it be fitting in any way that some, casually or fortuitously with respect to God, should become holy sons of God and heirs of the kingdom — on account of chapter 27 and other things which follow. Therefore it does not seem that anyone whatsoever, however obstinate, called according to the purpose of God, resists. Whence Augustine On the Predestination [A] of the Saints 9, speaking of the grace of this calling, says thus: This grace, therefore, which is occultly bestowed by divine liberality on human hearts, is rejected by no hard heart: for it is bestowed for this reason, that the hardness of the heart may first be removed. When therefore the Father is heard within and teaches, He takes away the heart of stone, and creates a heart of flesh, as the Prophet, foretelling, promised. Likewise John 6: All that the Father gives me shall come to me — that is, every predestined and elect [person]. If however this depended originally on their free will, not on God's, perhaps some of them would not come. Therefore Bede there says: These are those whom the Father gives to the Son, whom by hidden inspiration He makes believe in the Son. To which consents Augustine On the Predestination of the Saints 9 saying thus: All that the Father gives me, etc. What is shall come to me, except shall believe in me? But that this may happen, the Father gives. It also seems that if they themselves should believe through themselves, they themselves rather would give themselves to the Son, than the Father merely knocking: for through knocking alone, they are in no way made of the lot of the Son, but through believing the faith of Him. To the same makes that which is said below, in the same [chapter], [B] Everyone who hears from the Father and has learned, comes to me; therefore the Father teaches them, and makes them believe in the Son. Whence when immediately He premised: No one can come to me, unless the Father shall draw him, as if expounding that mode of drawing, He adds, It is written in the Prophets, And they shall all be teachable by God; everyone who has heard from the Father and has learned, comes to me, as if He were saying: The Father draws to me by so teaching. This also Augustine sufficiently expresses in On the Predestination of the Saints where above, saying: What is, Everyone who has heard from the Father, etc., except that there is no one who hears from the Father, and learns, and does not come to me? For if everyone who has heard from the Father and has learned, comes; certainly everyone who does not come, has not heard from the Father, nor has learned. Far removed from the senses of the flesh is this school, in which the Father is heard, and teaches that one should come to the Son; there is also the Son Himself, because He is His Word through which He so teaches; nor does He do this with the ear of the flesh, but of the heart. Together is also the Spirit of the Father and of the Son; for neither does He not teach, or teach separately; [C] for inseparable are the works of the Trinity. Likewise, if a sinner could through himself believe one preaching, and have his sins forgiven, he could through himself discern and separate himself from other sinners, hearing and not doing in the said manner — contrary to the Apostle 1 Corinthians 4: Who indeed discerns thee? — namely from the lost or those about to be lost, as if to say, God alone; which the following text shows, when he says, For what hast thou that thou hast not received?, etc. Which understanding Augustine testifies in On Correction and Grace, and is alleged there in the Gloss of Lombard, saying thus: Who indeed discerns thee from the mass of the lost? No one but God: He alone separates thee from the lost. But because man, inflated, could respond by voice or thought and say, "My faith discerns me, my justice, my prayer", the Apostle meets him saying, "What hast thou that thou hast not received?" The same in On the Predestination of the Saints 6 says thus: The nature in which the possibility of having faith was given to us does not discern man from man; but faith itself discerns the faithful from the unfaithful; and through this, where it is said, Who indeed discerns thee? What hast thou that thou hast not received?, anyone who would dare to say, "I have faith from myself, therefore I have not received" — surely contradicts truth most plainly; not because [D] to believe or not to believe is not in the choice of the human will, but in the elect the will is prepared by the Lord; therefore also to faith itself, which is in the will, it pertains: Who indeed discerns thee? What hast thou that thou hast not received? And it follows in chapter 7: Many hear the word of truth, but some believe, others contradict; therefore these wish to believe, those do not — who is ignorant of this? But since in some the will is prepared by the Lord, and in others not prepared, one must discern what comes from His mercy, what from His judgment. The same in On Grace and Free Will 16: The Pelagians say that eternal life is rendered to our merits; and if they so understood our merits as also to acknowledge them as the gifts of God, that opinion would not be reprobated; but because they so preach human merits as to say that man has them from himself, the Apostle most rightly responds: Who indeed discerns thee? What hast thou that thou hast not received? But if thou hast received, why dost thou glory as if thou hadst not received? Surely such things you have thought. Most truly is it said: God crowns His gifts, not your merits — if your merits be from yourself, not from [E] Him. For these, if they be such, are evil, which God does not crown; but if they be good, they are gifts of God — because, as James says, Every excellent gift, etc.; and John the precursor of the Lord says, Man cannot receive anything, unless it shall have been given him from above; certainly from heaven into the earth came the Holy Spirit, when Jesus ascending on high led captivity captive, gave gifts to men. And it follows in chapter 17: If therefore your good merits be the gifts of God, God crowns not your merits as your merits, but as His gifts. This opinion he also diffusely pursues consequently. Who also on that of Psalm 118: Render to thy servant, etc., says: Let nowhere human pride exalt itself: to His own gifts God renders good rewards, but he who now prays, and says, Render to thy servant, that I may live, if he were yet entirely dead, would not pray, but received the beginning of good concupiscence from Him, [A] from whom he asks the life of obedience. The same to Sixtus the Presbyter, as Peter recounts in 3 Sentences, distinction 27: When, he says, God crowns our merits, He crowns nothing other than His own gifts. Whence the eternal life which is rendered by God at the end to preceding merits — because the same merits to which it is rendered are not from us, but were made in us through grace — is itself rightly called grace; because it is freely given; not freely because it is not given to merits, but because the very merits to which it is given are given through grace. Furthermore, just as can appear from chapter 2, in the genus of openers there is some primary principal opener, in whose strength the other openers open — as the other instruments — so that these are as it were possible keys, but He Himself is the power using the key: For He is that holy and true [One], who has the key of David, who opens and no one shuts, who shuts and no one opens, Apocalypse 3, as had been foretold in Isaiah 22: I shall give the key of the house of David upon his shoulder; and he shall open, and there shall be no one who shuts, and he shall shut, and there shall be no one who opens. Therefore the whole Church devoutly prays with the Psalmist: Lord, my lips [B] open Thou; and with the Maccabees: May the Lord open your heart in His law and in His precepts. Therefore the Lord Himself opens our hearts, and universally any of our powers — which He deigned to show in the opening of the ears of the deaf, and the loosening of the bond of the tongue of the same mute, by a doubled miracle, when He put the fingers of His power into his ears, and touched his tongue with the spittle of His clemency, and looking up to heaven groaning thus said: Effatha, which is, Be opened — Mark 7 — who, deaf and mute, according to Bede in a certain homily, signifies the human race, which, after disregarding the divine command, obeyed the persuasion of the serpent, and tasted the forbidden tree, was made deaf and mute spiritually. And according to him the Gloss there recounts: He looked up into heaven, that thence He might teach speech for the mute, thence hearing for the deaf, thence the medicine for all infirmities to be sought. Likewise Acts 14: God opened to the Gentiles the door of faith. Of this divine opening also is witness that purple-seller Lydia, whose heart the Lord opened to attend to those things which were said by Paul, Acts 16. Which also the Apostle attests, to the Colossians 4, saying: [C] Be earnest in prayer, that God may open to you a door of speech; and many similar things very often occur in Scripture. On this word of the Apostle, however, Augustine says in On the Predestination of the Saints 27 in this manner: How is the door of the word opened, except when the sense of the hearer is opened, that he may believe, and the beginning of faith having been made, may admit those things which are preached and disputed for building up wholesome doctrine, lest with heart closed by unbelief he reprove and reject the things which are said? Whence also to the Corinthians he says: A great and evident door has been opened to me, and the adversaries are many. What else can be understood here, except that the Gospel having been first preached there by him, many believed, and many were adversaries of the same faith — according to that of the Lord: No one comes to me, unless it shall have been given him by my Father; and To you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom, but to those it is not given. Therefore the door is opened in those to whom it is given, but the adversaries are many of those to whom it is not given. The same Apostle also says: When I came to Troas for the Gospel of Christ, and a door was opened to me in the Lord, etc., bidding farewell to them, I went out into Macedonia. [D] To whom did he bid farewell except to those who had believed, in whose hearts namely the door was opened to him preaching the Gospel? And after a small digression he adds: But let us return to the opening of the door, which the Apostle signifies as the beginning of the faith of the hearers. What is, praying together that God may open to you the door of the word, except a most clear demonstration that the very beginning of faith is the gift of God? For it would not be asked from Him by prayer, unless it were believed to be done by Him. This gift of heavenly grace had descended into that purple-seller, to whom, as Scripture says in the Acts of the Apostles, God had opened the sense, and she attended to those things which were said by Paul: For so was she called that she might believe. God works what He wills in the hearts of men, either by helping or by judging, that through them may now be fulfilled what His hand and counsel had predestined to be done. It seems therefore better and safer to me, to commit the whole rule of our doors to such a doorkeeper, who is never overwhelmed by sleep, deceived by no illusion, allured by no corruption, nor [E] overcome by any power; who, in opening or closing, can never err in the least: than wholly to ourselves, or part to Him and part to ourselves, [we who are] impotent, foolish, and corrupt, who scarcely ever open or close not erring. Yet not that we should give ourselves to drowsiness and idleness, but that under His happy rule, neither above nor beside, we should always most vigilantly persist in the works of grace. Whence Augustine On the Good of Perseverance 9: We live more safely, if we give the whole to God, [and] do not commit ourselves part to Him, and part to ourselves. Therefore I commit myself wholly with whole devotion to Him, and I wholly submit myself to His most gracious grace. And if they should object that of Apocalypse 3: If anyone shall open, etc.; and that of the Beloved knocking, Open to me, my sister, Canticles 5: it must be said, just as was said to similar [objections] in chapter 35, that by such [calls] free will is excited, but it does not follow from this that he can with his own powers alone open — just as he cannot fulfill all the other divine commandments which are likewise commanded.

BOOK I, CHAPTER XXXIX

Against certain persons who think that man by himself alone can merit the first grace of congruity, though not of condignity

Besides these, there are others not content with grace given freely, but who would have it sold by God and bought by them at some price — though a low one, yet (as they assert) a congruous one, not a condign one. For they say that men, by their own powers alone, can merit the grace of God of congruity, though not of condignity. And because this error is more notorious than the others in our day, and because all too many through it slide into the Pelagian abyss, it seems necessary to scrutinize it with more diligent examination. Now this error does not differ much in reality from the others recited above; it can be refuted with them in like manner. For nearly all the reasons and authorities adduced against those proceed against this one likewise with a straight front. For from this view it follows that grace is from works and merits — together with Pelagius's root error; it follows also that grace is from merits at least as a partial cause and concause — together with the first ensuing error; and that those merits of congruity are at least the cause and preparatory disposition of grace — together with the second; and that someone can merit by congruity through himself alone — as the third error posits, namely that a man can open by his own powers alone.

Moreover, if anyone merits the first grace of congruity, this is before he has grace, at least by priority of nature; but before he has grace (of which I am speaking, namely, that which makes one accepted unto the kingdom), he does not even have charity. For charity alone divides the sons of perdition from the sons of the kingdom, as Augustine says, On the Trinity, Book 15, ch. 18, and as is plain through the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 13. Therefore neither does he love God at all — or at least not with a gratuitous love, freely and chiefly for God's own sake. Wherefore neither does he merit anything from Him — and especially no gratuitous good, that sure pledge of the highest and everlasting good. For with what brow does anyone claim a reward from God, to whom he has bestowed no gift? Or by what title does he demand recompense from Him, to whom he has never tendered anything? And how does anyone merit anything from God, who does nothing for Him? Whence Matthew 6: Take heed that ye do not your righteousness before men, to be seen of them; otherwise ye have no reward with your Father which is in heaven. On which Chrysostom: "What will you receive from God, when you have given nothing to God? For what is done for God's sake is given to God; but what is done for the sake of men is poured out into the winds." To this Augustine likewise contributes effectively, Against Pelagius and Caelestius on the Grace of Christ and on Original Sin, Book 1, ch. 22, as Chapter 37 cited.

Moreover, even if someone loves God and acts for Him, not for His own sake but that He may grant him prosperity or ward off adversity, the same conclusion returns. For how does such a one merit more from God than a vendor from a buyer? And besides, he loves the granting of those things and the warding off of these, more than God; and since he loves these for his own sake, he loves himself more than God. For always that for which a thing is, that thing more is; as that for which we love, that is more dear (Posterior Analytics 1.2). Indeed, as was declared in Chapter 26: he who loves something for some certain end does not love this, but the end. Therefore not only does such a one in so loving not merit, but he sins; for he acts contrary to the right and due order of loving (per Part 30 of the First Corollary of this work), and contrary to the precept of loving God with all the heart, and all the soul, and all the strength, and all the mind, Deuteronomy 6 and Matthew 22. Such a one also enjoys himself and uses God Himself; therefore it is established that he sins, as appears at length through Augustine, On Christian Doctrine, ch. 1 and following, and as Lombard recites in Sentences I, dist. 1.

It is also plain that such a one does not merit. For no one in working merits unless he has a right intention — namely, of the right end. For just as in natural things motion is named from its end, so also in moral things, as appears from Chapter 34 of this work. But such a one outside charity does not have a right intention. For no intention is right except that which finally tends immediately into God, or perhaps mediately — that which is borne immediately into a creature, and through it finally into God, and this above all things gratuitously for His sake — as Part 30 of the First Corollary teaches. For if it be desired finally for the sake of something else, already that other is more the end intended, as the foregoing make plain. And since other natural things, insofar as they have received from nature, by that natural inclination so act; man — who has received for this purpose intellectual and freely volitive power — ought to do this knowingly and freely according to the powers given him for this final end. Therefore any man who in acting does not actually or habitually direct his intention finally upon God, and this gratuitously for His sake, acts contrary to the natural order of the universe; wherefore also he sins unnaturally against nature, and against God the principle and end and supreme author of all nature and natural order — or at least does not merit.

This also appears through Augustine, On Christian Doctrine, Book 1, where he says: For if that intention is right, the one intending either enjoys God or through it uses a creature; and if he enjoys God, the proposition is plain; but if he uses a creature, since according to Augustine in the same place, "to use is to refer that which has come into use to the obtaining of that which is to be enjoyed; otherwise to abuse, not to use; for unlawful use ought to be called abuse." Hence it is plain: for the use of a creature, if it is not referred to God, is unlawful use; therefore sin, or at least it is not rightly done; therefore that intention is not right. Nor is anyone's intention without charity and grace borne gratuitously above all things into God. For just as no one's intellect without faith is borne faithfully into God, so no one's affection without grace is gracefully borne into God in such a way that he holds God dear above all things gratuitously. For the proportion is the same here as there.

Again, if a man without the grace of charity could love God gratuitously above all other things, he could likewise know all other commandments and keep them; for he who can do the greater can do the less. But the commandment of the love of God is the first and greatest, Matthew 22. Indeed, whoever loved God in this way would in no way knowingly offend Him, nor would he despise any of His commandments (for this would be expressly repugnant to so great a love), but he would keep them all to the utmost. For the Philosopher says, Ethics 9.4: They posit a friend as one willing and working good things, or things appearing such, for the friend's sake, namely the beloved's; and Rhetoric 2.5: To love is to will to anyone the things he thinks good, for that one's sake, not one's own; and according to active power to be the doer of these. Whence also Wisdom 6: The lover of her, the keeping or guardianship of her laws. Wherefore Truth itself says: If anyone loves me, he will keep my word, John 14. On which Gregory, Homily 30: "The proof of love is the showing of the work." Hence in his epistle the same John says: He that says, I love God, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar; for we truly love if we keep His commandments; we truly love if we restrain ourselves from our own pleasures. For he who still flows down through unlawful desires, certainly does not love God, because he contradicts Him in his will. The Apostle, Romans 13, arguing similarly, concludes: Love therefore is the fulness of the law. Wherefore neither could anyone be in a state of salvation without the grace of charity. For Luke 10, the Saviour says: Do this — that is, keep the commandments — and thou shalt live. In vain therefore are these three habits posited, namely faith, hope, and charity, supernaturally infused into us, since (as Pelagius asserted) without these our natural endowments would suffice for doing and keeping all the divine commandments — as Augustine recites in On Heresies 88, and Peter (Lombard) Sentences II, dist. 28, and Isidore Etymologies 8.14, and Canon 24, q. ult., Quidam autem.

But our Catholic doctors say we need these three habits or others proportionate, because, since the gaze and affection of our soul is depressed by the mass of the body or of sin, or by natural impotence, in such a way that they cannot duly see God or love Him — or even because of the disproportion of so excellent an object — we necessarily need faith or the light of glory, and charity or grace, which elevate them to seeing God duly and loving Him. Whence also Pope Clement V condemns the Beghards' heresy which says that the soul does not need the light of glory elevating it to seeing God and blessedly enjoying Him: Extra. de haereticis, Ad nostrum. And this not only do we in the state of present misery [require], but the angels and our first parents in the state of primal innocence likewise required, when they had placed no mortal obstacle, nor even the smallest venial — as Lombard says and proves through authorities of Augustine, Sentences II, dist. 5, 24, and 29, plainly. And if anyone says that the moral virtues sufficiently elevate the affection to gracefully loving God, he will easily be contradicted by the foregoing. For he falls into the above-mentioned error of Pelagius, namely, that man by the powers of free choice alone, without grace, could effectually fulfill all God's commandments, as the foregoing have shown.

Moreover: what similar [virtue] elevates the angels to loving? Furthermore, the moral virtues are generated from works, as appears in Ethics 2.1 and 2; nor do they exceed their species or their boundaries, but only incline to similar operations from which they were generated. Whence the Philosopher says in the same place, ch. 2: "The operations and the virtues will be in the same things; for as by withdrawing from pleasures we are made temperate, so when made such we can especially withdraw from them; and as by being accustomed to despise terrors and to bear them we are made brave, so when made such we shall especially be able to bear terrors." Since therefore no one out of pure naturals loves God gratuitously above all things for His own sake, but for some other end, the habit generated from such multiplied lovings will only incline to loving God in like manner — and not otherwise.

Wherefore the same Philosopher in Ethics 8 and 9 shows that any one — even the virtuous — first and most loves himself, and that from this love every other love and friendship is derived. Thus Ethics 8.2: "It seems, however, that each one also loves the good for himself"; and below, ch. 7: "Each one most of all wills good things for himself"; and Ethics 9.4: "The acts of friendship which extend to friends and by which friendships are defined seem to have come from those which extend to oneself"; and below, ch. 8, he asks "whether one ought to love oneself most," argues for and against, and determines that one ought; where below, ch. 9: "Every intellect chooses what is best for itself; and the epieikēs (the equitable) obeys the intellect: for it is true of the man of moral worth, that he does and suffers many things for the sake of his friends, and even dies if it be needful: for he will throw away both money and honors, and altogether the goods that are objects of contention, procuring for himself the good. For he will choose to be greatly delighted for a short time rather than mildly for a long time; and to live well for a year rather than many years anyhow; and one good and great action rather than many small ones. And to those dying this perhaps happens: they choose a great thing for themselves, and throw away their money in proportion as their friends will receive more. For money goes to the friend, but the good to himself: he assigns the greater good to himself."

Behold, according to the Philosopher's teaching, that the virtuous man in his most virtuous operation intends and loves finally — not God gratuitously for God's sake, but his own good, his own advantage, and himself, and God perhaps for his own human sake. Whence Sextus the Pythagorean says in his Sentences: "Without God you cannot live for God"; and below: "Wisdom does not make fate; for the grace of God is not subject to fate." Wherefore Anselm in On Concord, last chapter, says: "The will which is the instrument, and the natural liberty of choice, without justice is idle and is made the handmaid of its own affection which is for advantage; because, justice being removed, it can will nothing except what that affection (namely, of advantage) wills. But this justice is undoubtedly the grace of God itself, or depends on grace. For justice gives to each what is its own; therefore to God a gratuitous love above all things for His own sake," according to Part 30 of the First Corollary of this work — which can never come to be without grace, as the foregoing have urged.

This same thing Anselm and other Catholic doctors most often attest. For the Apostle says: Justified freely by His grace, Romans 3; and again: Justified by His grace, we are made heirs, Titus 3; and again: Grace reigns through righteousness, Romans 5; and below ch. 10 of certain holding contrary opinion writes thus: Being ignorant of God's justice, and seeking to set up their own, they have not been subject to the justice of God. Treating which, Augustine On the Words of the Apostle, sermon 15, says: "Let there be justice, but let it be of grace; let it be from God for thee, not from thyself." And expounding the verse of Psalm 118, I have done judgment and justice, he writes thus: "By the name of justice in this place is signified not the virtue itself, but its work. For who works justice in man, but He who justifies the impious? — that is, by His grace makes the unjust just out of the impious. Whence the Apostle, Justified freely by His grace: He therefore works justice — that is, the work of justice — who has justice in him." With which many authors say many similar things. Wherefore it also evidently appears that no philosophical or moral virtue is true virtue, simply right or just, without charity and grace perfecting it, raising it to God, and finally directing it to Him gratuitously for His own sake. For not little is wanting to a virtue which lacks the true final cause, the right intention, the just end — and especially such an end as God is known to be.

Whence no less clearly is it weighed: that no work of any virtue not formed by charity and grace; and universally no work of anyone not having the true virtue of charity and grace, is simply virtuous, right, or just; rather, any such work is in some way sin. For how could a work be simply virtuous, right, and just, which does not proceed from such a virtue as has the simply right final cause, the right intention, and the just end? — nay, how could a work not be in some way obliquity or sin, which is twisted from the right, due, and just end simply to another, and there finally and ultimately rests? Wherefore Plato also and the excellent Platonic philosophers said true virtues are not save such as are in some way impressed on the mind from the form of that eternal and immutable substance which is God. Or is this the virtue of which Aristotle, Ethics 7.1, says: "There is a certain virtue above us, heroic and divine"?

Wherefore also Augustine, Against Julian, Book 4, ch. 4, recites the contrary opinion as a Pelagian error, addressing Julian thus: "You are wont, denying that the virtues by which one rightly lives are God's gifts, and ascribing them to nature and the human will rather than to God's grace, to use this argument: that infidels sometimes have them." And below, Book 5: "Most bitter, you say, enemies of grace, you set forth examples to us of the impious, whom you call alien to faith yet abounding in virtues, in whom there is, without the help of grace, only the good of nature — though enslaved to superstitions — who are often found, by the powers of inborn liberty alone, both compassionate, and modest, and chaste, and sober." But their error he refutes consequently with an erroneous argument, showing diffusely that there is no true virtue in infidels, nor any right work; nay, that every work of infidels is sin; that even the virtues of infidels are truly God's gifts. Wherefore in Book 6 he says: "Far be it that there be in anyone true virtue, unless he be truly just; nor is anyone just unless he live by faith. For the just man lives by faith. Who, moreover, of those who wish to be considered Christians — except the Pelagians alone, or perhaps you alone among them — would call the infidel just, would call the impious just, would call one enslaved to the devil just? But if the impious have not true justice, surely neither do they have true any other virtues, the companions and associates of justice, if they have any; and through this neither continence nor chastity is true virtue in the impious; because, when God's gifts are not referred to their author, by this very evil those using them are made unjust." And below, ch. 8: "Know that virtues are to be discerned from vices not by their offices but by their ends. For the office is what is to be done; thus when a man does something where he does not seem to sin, if he does not do it for the sake of that for which he ought to do it, he is convicted of sinning; which not attending to, you have separated ends from offices, and you have said that true virtues should be called offices without ends; from which so great absurdity follows you, that you are forced to call true even that justice whose mistress you would find to be avarice. For if to refrain the hand from another's goods — if you regard the office — can seem to be of justice; yet if it is asked why this is done, and the answer is, Lest more money be lost in lawsuits, how can this deed truly be of justice, when it serves avarice? — like the virtues which Epicurus introduced as the handmaids of pleasure, which whatever they did, they did for the sake of obtaining or holding it. But far be it that true virtues should serve any one save Him, or for the sake of Him, to whom we say: O God of virtues, turn us. Wherefore the virtues which serve carnal delights, or any temporal advantages and emoluments, cannot at all be true; nor are those true, which wish to serve nothing. For true virtues serve God in men, by whom they are given to men; they serve God in angels, by whom they are also given to angels. And whatever good is done by man, and not done for the sake of that for which true wisdom commands it should be done — even though by office it seems good, by the not-right end it is sin." And below, ch. 12, he recites the rejoinder of Julian the heretic, and answers thus: "Behold, I recall the same things which you posited. If a Gentile, who does not live by faith, has clothed the naked, has freed one in danger, has soothed the wounds of the sick, has spent his wealth on honest friendship, cannot be driven by torments to false witness — I ask of you, whether he does these good works well or ill. For if, although they are good, yet he does them ill, you cannot deny that he sins who does anything ill; but because you do not wish him to sin when he does these things, certainly you will say he both does good things and does them well. Therefore the bad tree bears good fruit — which Truth says cannot be. Or do you say the unfaithful man is a good tree? Then he pleases God; and where will be that which is written: Without faith it is impossible to please God? See therefore whether you dare say the unfaithful will is a good will. But perhaps you will say: a merciful will is a good will. This would be rightly said, if, just as the faith of Christ — that is, the faith which works through love — is always good, so mercy were always good. But if mercy is also found bad — by which the person of the poor man is accepted in judgment, on account of which finally King Saul deserved to be condemned by the Lord, even out of mercy, because contrary to His precept he spared the captive king through human affection — consider attentively, lest perhaps no mercy be good save that which is of this good faith. Indeed, answer — that you may see this without doubt — whether you reckon the unfaithful man's mercy to be good. For if it is a vice to have mercy ill, undoubtedly it is a vice to have mercy unfaithfully; and if of itself by natural compassion the work is good, even by this good he uses ill who uses it unfaithfully; and this good he does ill, who does it unfaithfully; but he who does anything ill, certainly sins. Whence it is gathered that even those good works which infidels do, are not theirs, but His who uses ill men well; whereas the sins are theirs, by which they do good things ill, because they do this not by faithful but by unfaithful — that is, foolish and noxious — will." And below, ch. 13: "Understand what the Lord said: If thy eye is evil, thy whole body shall be dark; but if thy eye is single, thy whole body shall be lightsome; and recognize this eye as the intention by which any one does what he does; and through this learn that he who does not do good works with the intention of good faith — that is, the faith which works through love — has, as it were, his whole body, which consists of those works as members, dark — that is, full of the blackness of sins. For the love of the world, by which any one is a friend of this world, is not from God; the love of enjoying any creatures without the love of the Creator is not from God; but the love of God, by which one comes to God, is not save from God the Father through Jesus Christ in the Holy Spirit. Through this love of the Creator each one uses creatures well; without this love of the Creator no one uses creatures well." Imitating whom, Bede also, Against Julian, Book 13, says: "Whereas Julian says many of the philosophers had patience, chastity, modesty, and other virtues from the good of nature, it is plain that whoever among the philosophers were ignorant of Christ, the virtue of God and the wisdom of God, these by no reason could have any true virtue, just as no true wisdom." Whence also in Prosper's Sentences, proposition 106: "All the life of infidels is sin. For there is no good without the highest Good. Where there lacks the knowledge of eternal and unchangeable truth, virtue is false even in the best morals." Wherefore the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 13, demonstrates that all virtues are rooted in charity. From these, therefore, it plainly stands that no philosophical or moral virtue, without the grace of charity, is simply true virtue, right, or just; nor does it avail to raise the created will to gratuitously loving God above all things for God's sake — but rather it bends it back, or holds the bent-back will, to its own particular advantage and to itself.

Of necessity therefore some higher, supernatural, heroic, and divine virtue is required — namely, grace freely given by God — to raise the created will, insufficient by itself, to loving God above all gratuitously for God's sake, and finally for His sake. This is also fittingly figured in Ezekiel 1, where the Prophet says: I saw, and fell on my face, and heard the voice of one speaking; and He said to me, Son of man, stand upon thy feet. Thus also is it commanded to every man fallen from sin or from the condition of nature, or lying far below; but because by himself he does not suffice to rise or to stand, it is rightly subjoined: And the spirit entered into me after He had spoken to me, and set me upon my feet. Who is this spirit, but the Spirit of grace, the Holy Spirit of God? Wherefore Gregory on Ezekiel, Homily 9, says: "Behold, the divine voice commanded the lying Prophet to rise; but he could not at all rise unless the Spirit of the omnipotent God had entered into him." With which Daniel concordantly says: I lay confounded on my face, and my countenance clung to the earth; and behold, a hand touched me, and raised me upon my knees and upon the joints of my hands, Daniel 10. What is this hand, but the hand of divine helping grace? Wherefore Augustine On the Spirit and the Letter, ch. 11, says: "We endeavour to demonstrate that we are not divinely aided to work justice in this — that God has given a Law full of good and holy precepts; but because our very will, without which we cannot work good, is aided and raised by the imparted Spirit of grace; without which help that doctrine is the killing letter."

Peter (Lombard) also, Sentences II, dist. 24, says: "There is in the rational soul a will, by which it naturally wills the good, though feebly and faintly, unless grace help it, which on coming aids and raises it, that it may effectually will good." And below, dist. 25, last: "The will of man, which he naturally has, cannot be raised effectually to willing the good or fulfilling it in act, save by being freed and aided through grace; freed indeed that it may will, and aided that it may perform; because as the Apostle says: It is not of him that wills to will, nor of him that runs to run — that is, to operate — but of God that has mercy, who works in us to will and to do for the good will; whose grace the will or operation of man does not invoke, but grace itself prevenes the will, preparing it to will the good, and aids the prepared one, that it may not will in vain — that is, that it may complete it."

Furthermore, according to all philosophers, natural and moral, every form and every habit, moral or intellectual, is known by its operation, and through distinct and varied operations distinct and varied forms are demonstrated. Why then is the form or habit of charity and grace not proven by the operation of charity and grace, which is to love God above all things dearly and gratuitously? Again, all the doctors writing on baptism and its effect concordantly hold that to anyone rightly baptized in his baptism the three theological virtues — namely, faith, hope, and charity — are infused, together with informing grace. And lest henceforth any one should dare to doubt of this, holy Church has most certainly defined it. For Pope John, Extravagantes, in the Constitutions of Clement, De summa Trinitate, et fide Catholica, having recited one opinion saying that by the virtue of baptism guilt is indeed remitted to little ones but grace is not conferred; and another asserting that to them in baptism guilt is remitted, and the virtues and informing grace are infused as to the habit, though not for that time as to use, subjoins: "We, attending to the general efficacy of the death of Christ, which through baptism is applied alike to all the baptized, have decided to elect, with the approval of the sacred council, the second opinion — which says that to little ones as well as to adults informing grace and the virtues are conferred in baptism — as the more probable, and as more consonant and accordant with the sayings of the Saints and modern Doctors of theology."

Again, no one can exercise the proper operation of any form unless he first has that form, just as no one can strike strongly unless he first has strength, nor see acutely unless he first has acute vision; and similarly in things intellectual and moral. For no one can act wisely or prudently unless he first has wisdom or prudence; nor in moral things can anyone in general do well unless he first has some virtue in genus, from which (as from a good form, namely goodness) the good action proceeds. Whence in Ethics 2.6 the Philosopher shows that virtue perfects him who has it, and renders his work good; with which a similar saying from Ethics 6.10 Chapter 34 of this work cited; and the same seems true of every virtue in particular, and of its operation. No one therefore can will justly unless he first has justice, nor love God dearly unless he first has charity. Whoever therefore lacks justice, charity, and grace, cannot of himself justly, dearly, or graciously will or act, nor can he have this of himself — as the foregoing have taught; and it can be proved: for if he could, this would be either by gratefully meriting, willing, or by acting otherwise than gratefully. But not by gratefully meriting or willing — for this he cannot do unless he first has grace, by the immediately preceding reason; nor by doing something not gratefully — for it is not consonant with reason that grace should be given as reward and recompense to one who has worked nothing gratefully. (For according to the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 3: Each shall receive his own reward according to his own labour.) Nor can one lacking it receive it from another creature alone. For no one can beget or make sons of God, nor establish heirs of the heavenly kingdom, save God the Father, the Lord of this kingdom. It remains therefore that grace, according to its name, without any preceding merits, is given freely to the ungracious, by God the most liberal Giver of graces.

For this reason Anselm in On Concord professes the same opinion. Where, after he has shown in Chapter 8 that to will rightly is the end of the rational creature, and that justice is the rectitude of will preserved for its own sake (since he who preserves it solely for the sake of something else does not love it but that for the sake of which he preserves it, and therefore is not to be called just, nor is such rectitude to be named justice), in Chapter 9 he subjoins: "There is no doubt that the will does not will rightly except because it is right. For just as sight is not acute because it sees acutely, but sees acutely because it is acute, so the will is not right because it wills rightly, but wills rightly because it is right. But when it wills this rectitude, undoubtedly it wills rightly. Therefore it does not will rectitude except because it is right; for it is the same to the will to be right and to have rectitude. It is therefore plain that it does not will rectitude except because it has rectitude." The same in On Truth, ch. 12: "The reception of rectitude is prior in nature to having or willing it, since to have or to will it is not the cause of reception, but reception causes the having and willing of it." And as is plain through the same in On the Cause of the Devil, ch. 17: "The deserter angel, having lost justice, cannot of himself have the will of justice"; nay, as appears above, ch. 12: "The angel disposed for willing could not of himself have his first will, neither of beatitude nor of justice, but the natural will of advantage." With which agrees his statement, On Concord, last chapter, recited above. Who also, above, ch. 9, after the things recited above, shows that no one can receive that rectitude save from God: "Let us now consider," he says, "whether anyone not having this rectitude can in any way have it from himself. He cannot have it from himself except either by willing or by not willing. By willing indeed no one can attain it through himself, because he cannot will it (namely rightly) unless he have it; and that he could attain it by not willing, no mind accepts. In no way therefore can he have it from himself; nor from any other creature. For just as a creature cannot save a creature, so it cannot give to it that by which it is saved. It follows therefore that no creature has rectitude save through the grace of God. Therefore, with God so granting, we find His grace to save man to be in concord with free choice, in such a way that grace alone can save a man, free choice doing nothing — as happens in infants and in those without understanding — that it always aids natural free choice, which without it avails nothing for salvation, by giving rectitude to the will, which it preserves through free choice. And although it is not given to all (since He has mercy on whom He wills, and whom He wills He hardens), yet it is given to no one for any preceding merit (since, Who has first given to God, and recompense shall be made him?). But if the will, by free choice, by preserving what it has received, merits either an increase of received justice, or power for a good will, or some reward — all these are fruits of the first grace; and grace for grace, and all is to be imputed to grace, because neither is it of him that wills, what he wills, nor of him that runs, what he runs, but of God that has mercy."

Is not this also what the Prophet says: I know, O Lord, that the way is not of man, neither is it in a man to walk and direct his steps (Jeremiah 10)? Whose then is it, but His of whom another Prophet says: By the Lord shall the steps of a man be directed, and He will choose his way (Psalm 36)? Indeed, as another reading more clearly puts it: By the Lord shall the steps of a man be directed — first; and after the directing already done, he shall will His way — namely the Lord's — secondly. Augustine, expounding this, says: "The man himself, that he may will the way of the Lord, his steps are directed by the Lord himself; for if the Lord had not directed the steps of the man, they were so depraved that they would always go through perverse ways and could not, following crooked paths, return. He therefore is the One who directed our steps, that we should will His way." Who also, Ad Simplicianum 1.24, says: "For breaking and casting down the pride of men ungrateful to God's grace, who hear and glory in their own merits, these things are recalled: For when they were not yet born, nor had done any good or evil, not from works, but from Him that called, was it said: The greater shall serve the lesser. Therefore the grace is the Caller's; the works of the receiver of grace are consequent — not such as beget grace, but are begotten by grace. For fire does not heat in order that it may glow, but because it glows; nor does the wheel run well in order to be round, but because it is round. So no one works well in order to receive grace, but because he has received it. For one cannot live justly who has not been justified, nor live at all who has not been quickened. But grace justifies, that the justified may be able to live justly. Therefore grace is first; good works second."

The same in On Faith to Peter, ch. 18, says that God gave to intellectual nature — namely angels and men — the faculty and the will of knowing and loving Him, that each one might both have it and lose it; yet if anyone should lose it of his own accord, he would not be able to resume it by his own choice, but it would belong to Him whose function it was to bestow miraculously the beginnings of holy thinking by the gift of free goodness, renewing whom He would, since it was His function from the very beginning of creation, with no preceding merits, wonderfully to order spirits and bodies in their places and dispositions according as Himself, the wise One, willed as fitting. And below, ch. 21: "That the beginning of good will and thought is not born to a man from himself, but is divinely both prepared and bestowed, in this God evidently shows: that neither the devil, nor any of his angels, from the time when by the merit of his ruin they were thrust into this lower darkness, has been or shall be able to resume a good will. For if it were possible that human nature, after it had turned from God and lost the good of will, could of itself again have it, much more possible would the angelic nature have this — which, the less it is weighed down by the burden of an earthly body, the more it would be endowed with this faculty. But God shows whence good will is given to men, which the angels so lost when they had it that they cannot have it after losing it." The same in City of God 12.9 proves that if the good angels were first without good will, they could not have it of themselves; for if they themselves, with God not working, made it, they were made better by themselves than by Him — which God forbid; and if they could not make themselves better than He had made them — than whom none makes anything better — surely they could not have a good will, by which they would be better, save by the operating help of the Creator.

But it will perhaps be objected, by what is in Ethics 2.1 and 2: that moral virtue is generated from preceding similar works — as justice, temperance, and fortitude from operating justly, temperately, and bravely; therefore one can virtuously operate without having the virtue. Again, otherwise it would seem foolish and vain to seek and desire the virtues; for no one can do this save by having them; but it seems superfluous and foolish for someone to desire and seek what he has. Again, this seems plain in the arts: for no one has the art of harping or building unless first by harping or building, as appears through the Philosopher, Ethics 2.1 and Metaphysics 9.14.

To these it can be answered as the Philosopher answers a similar question in Ethics 2.4. For since it had been said that virtue is generated from works, "someone might ask," he says, "how we say that those operating just things must become just, and those operating temperate things temperate? For if they operate just and temperate things, they are already just and temperate." And he answers that such persons do not operate justly and temperately, but just and temperate things; and he says that "works are called just and temperate when they are such as the just and the temperate man would operate."

Yet it can otherwise — and not improbably — be said: that whoever operates such things, and not altogether by chance (as a cow happens upon a hare or partridge), does this from some form of virtue, and from some virtue which he has, broadly speaking. For according to the same Philosopher, Ethics 6, last, virtue is twofold: one principal, the other natural; or, one acquired, the other innate; and this he proves by common experience, saying thus: "It seems to all that the qualities of character exist for individuals by nature; for in some way we have justice, temperance, courage, and other things from birth. For in children and beasts there exist natural habits, but without intellect they seem to be harmful — just as it happens to a strong body moved without sight that it falls heavily because of not having sight, so it is here. But if such a habit takes on intellect, then it will properly be virtue." And reason convinces of this. For if, because a man, after many sad works, feels himself strongly inclined to doing such things easily and delightfully, he concludes that he has the moral virtue inclining him thus, why if anyone is naturally inclined similarly or more vehemently, more easily and more delightfully, does he not conclude that he has such a natural virtue? And this virtue perhaps, against the acquired virtue (which here he calls principal), Aristotle distinguishing in the Categories placed under the name of disposition in the first species of quality. These virtues — not only natural or moral, but also intellectual and artistic — the mathematicians (astrologers) consider that they see in the births of children. And so the prudent ancients, having diligently investigated and known the natural aptitude of any boy, applied each one fittingly to a vocation according to that. Wherefore among them at that time all the arts flourished most excellently. Whence also Ethics 3.13 it is written thus: "It must be inborn, like one having sight, by which he judges well, and by which according to truth he will desire the good; and he is well-born, in whom this is innately well: that which is greatest and best, and which it is not possible to receive from another, nor to learn; but as it is innate, such will he have it; and that this is innately well and best — this is true and perfect good birth." Wherefore Aristotle, Politics 5.9, recites Socrates affirming that nature produces both depraved and better men by training; and adds: "saying this perhaps not badly: for it happens that some are such that it is impossible to train them or make them studious."

Wherefore in Secret of Secrets, Part 3, ch. 10, he writes thus: "There is to be considered the genesis (horoscope) in some, because the begotten is often disposed according to the power of the planets which are in the region of his genesis; and if it should happen that his parents teach him some of the arts, the higher nature will draw him many times to the art proper to his star. For something like this happened to certain men who came together in a certain village, and were lodged with a certain weaver, to whom in that night a son was born. The guests took his nativity and arranged his planets. His genesis was in Venus and Mars, his degree being in Gemini with Libra; the contrary and worst stars had not yet risen. The genesis therefore showed them that the boy would be wise, courtly, swift of hand, of good counsel, beloved by kings. They concealed this, hiding it from the father. The boy grew in prosperity, and the parents tried to instruct him in some of their arts; but he could learn nothing of them. Beating him and scourging him most heavily, they exposed him to his own will. The youth therefore inclined himself to men possessing learning, and acquired sciences, and knew the courses and times of the heavens, and the manners and governments of kings — and behold, he was made the king's chamberlain." Where also immediately he subjoins: "The contrary of this came about from the wonderful works and dispositions of the planets and their natures: that which befell two sons born to the king of India. Their genesis was compared, but it was hidden from the king. When therefore one of the boys grew up, the king believed it best to instruct him in the sciences. He therefore sent him through India and through other provinces honourably, as became the son of so great a king; but the father's diligence was of no avail, because he could not incline his soul and nature except to the smith's craft. On account of which the king was greatly disturbed, and called all the wise men of his kingdom — who, being asked, all agreed in this: that he should be left to that to which his nature led him. So it was done; and many times this and the like has happened." Wherefore Ovid, On the Old Woman, Book 1, recounts thus:

Time was, when once the State sought out the Philosophers at great expense, watching for the common good, and treated them honorably, that they might counsel her in the highest matters. Then it seemed to the senators, in every city, that they should choose teachable boys from the more gifted, sending them to the gymnasia for the cause of learning, to whom each city furnished pleasing stipends for sustenance. And there they made them be discerned by the judgment of the physiognomists — what art was to be learnt by whom; thus his art was assigned to each; thus, devoted to one art, each always cleaved to it, and to be perfected in one sufficed for any one, nor was it permitted to change. Then the arts flourished, each thing was perfectly known, and could be perfectly handed down to posterity, with leisure for writing books on great matters. Then the mathēseis alone were worthy of the name of doctrine, and had their followers; then what utility each thing brought was clear among the studious.

Therefore a man can, from such virtues innate to himself, work such things; but not gratefully and graciously in the manner aforesaid. For charity and grace are not innate to us; for we were by nature children of wrath (Ephesians 2). And by these things the answer is plain to the objections, and most of all to the first and the last. The second, however, does not proceed: for although someone has a virtue, he can desire that virtue in two ways — namely, that it be more fully increased in him (as the Apostles asked of the Lord, Increase our faith, Luke 17), or that it be stably preserved, according to that of Psalm 15, Preserve me, O Lord, and Psalm 67, Confirm, O God, that which Thou hast wrought in us; and so Anselm answers in On Concord, where above.

But if anyone presses still more urgently, supposing that not everyone has every natural virtue — or, if he has, the Almighty takes one away from him (e.g., the art of harping) — and yet he can learn to harp, and not save by working artistically; for if inartistically, and he multiplies such works, they will generate a similar habit in him (as appears in Ethics 2 above) — therefore he will not acquire art, but rather inertness and error. Therefore one not having art can work artistically; and consequently one lacking virtues can work virtuously.

To this it must be said that for such a one to harp at all, however slightly, he has in his soul, by his own invention or imagination or by hearing and some teaching, some idol and some likeness of harping, which somehow directs him in harping; otherwise he would not by purpose touch one chord more than another, nor harp by purpose more than dance, but perhaps purely by chance, like the cow shaking the harp with its horns; and from such striking of chords, however multiplied, he would never become a harpist. I say therefore that such a one has, from his own imagination or hearing of another, some species and form of harping from which his harping proceeds, and through use grows continuously to the perfect. And this seems to be the answer of the Philosopher in Metaphysics 9.14, who says: "It seems impossible that one be a harpist who has not harped: for one learning to harp, learns by harping. Whence the sophistic refutation comes about, that not having knowledge, one will do that of which there is knowledge; for the learner does not have knowledge." And he answers: "But because of that which comes to be, something has come to be, and of that which is moved totally, something has been moved; and it is plain in those things which concern motion that the learner must have something of the knowledge perhaps." Where Averroes' text speaks more expressly and without "perhaps," and adds: "Nothing therefore is moved to anything, save from that to which it is moved, in itself." Where Averroes says: "Everything which is generated and made into something, it is impossible for this to come to be unless it has something of that which it will have at the last; for example, because it is impossible for one to harp, save he who has something of the art of harping. And therefore an ass does not learn to harp, nor a man who is not innate to harp."

But of charity and grace we cannot have the smallest spark from ourselves, nor from any creature, as is shown above; wherefore neither can we do anything gratefully for God's sake; wherefore neither can we merit anything from Him, unless He first give it to us freely.

Yet someone perhaps will say: that grace much facilitates a man for fulfilling God's commandments, and is said to be necessary to man for this cause; but then a man could without grace, though more difficultly, fulfill these — contrary to the foregoing. Why also could the angels, in no way weighed down by the mass of an oppressing body, not most easily fulfill these without grace — contrary to what was premised? Furthermore, this man too is a son of Pelagius in this part. For he said that grace was given to men for this purpose: that what they are commanded to do through free choice they might more easily fulfill through grace — as Augustine recites of him in On Heresies, where above; Against Pelagius and Caelestius on the Grace of Christ and on Original Sin, Book 1, ch. 7 and 23; On the Words of the Apostle, Sermon 13; and in many other places. Again, this heresy was solemnly condemned in the Council of Mileve, at which Augustine was present, against the Pelagians, as is recited in Canon. de Consecrat., dist. 4, last chapter, in these words: "It is decreed: Whoever shall say that the grace of justification is given to us for this purpose, that what we are commanded to do through free choice we may more easily fulfill through grace — as if, even though grace were not given, we could (not indeed easily, but yet) fulfill the divine commandments without it — let him be anathema."

This same thing the holy Prosper recites in his book On the Predicators of God's Grace, against Cassian, ch. 21, together with the reason of the Pontiffs because of which they condemned that saying of Pelagius as heretical. He says: "Let him fall into the pit of that condemned saying, by which it is said that the grace of justification is given to us by God for this purpose, that what we are commanded to do through free choice we may more easily fulfill through grace — as if, though grace were not given, we could (not indeed easily, but yet) without it fulfill the divine commandments. Which the Catholic Pontiffs judged worthy of anathema. We must use the testimony which they used, saying: 'For of the fruits of the commandments the Lord was speaking, where He did not say: Without Me you can do them with more difficulty, but said, Without Me you can do nothing.'"

Still, the deputy of Pelagius perhaps will respond and say: that grace is for this reason necessary for fulfilling the divine commandments — because through it the divine commandments are revealed to men, and the discrimination of good and evil is shown; and with this revelation and discrimination obtained through grace, man can fulfill them by the powers of his proper will. But this is rebutted by the foregoing. Again, according to this opinion: before law was given to men or angels, grace would not have been necessary to them for loving God above all things gratuitously; or if now the power of law were taken away, and man were committed to the natural law of natural reason's judgment, he would in no way need God's grace — the opposites of which appeared above. Furthermore, even if this be granted, Pelagius's error returns. For Augustine, Against Pelagius and Caelestius on the Grace of Christ and on Original Sin, Book 1, ch. 2, speaking of Pelagius writes thus: "He places the grace of God and the help by which we are aided by the Lord not to sin either in nature and free choice, or in law or doctrine; so that, namely, when God aids man to decline from evil and do good, He is believed to aid by revealing and showing what ought to be done — not also by cooperating and inspiring love, that he may do what he has known he ought to do." And below, ch. 7, he recites Pelagius's words in this form: "He aids us by His doctrine and revelation, while He opens the eyes of our heart, while, lest we be occupied with present things, He shows us future things, while He lays bare the snares of the devil, while He illumines us with the manifold and ineffable gift of heavenly grace. Whoever says this, do you think he denies grace? Or does he not confess both man's free choice and God's grace?" And below, ch. 8: "This is to place the grace of God in law or doctrine. Here it appears that he confesses that grace by which God shows and reveals what we ought to do — not that by which He grants and aids that we may do; whereas the knowledge of the law would rather be effective for this — if grace's help be lacking — that the transgression of the commandment may come about. For where there is not law, neither is there transgression, says the Apostle; and: I had not known concupiscence, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet. And through this, law is so much one thing, grace another, that the law not only profits nothing, but rather harms most, unless grace help. And the utility of the law is shown in this: that those whom it makes guilty of transgression, it compels to flee for refuge to grace to be liberated and to be aided in overcoming evil concupiscences. For it commands rather than aids; teaches that there is a disease, does not heal; nay, the disease is rather increased by it because it is not healed — that the medicine of grace may more attentively and solicitously be sought, because the letter kills, but the Spirit gives life." The same, On Grace and Free Choice, ch. 25: "What is it that those most vain and most perverse men, the Pelagians, say — that the law is the grace of God by which we are aided not to sin? What is it that those wretches say, who without any doubt contradict so great an Apostle? He says that sin received powers against man through the law, and slays him through a commandment, though it is holy, and just, and good — and works death to him through the good — from which he could not be freed unless the Spirit (whom the letter had killed) gave him life, as he says in another place, The letter kills, but the Spirit gives life. And these untaught ones, blind against God's light and deaf against God's voice, say that the killing letter gives life, and contradict the life-giving Spirit." And below ch. 28: "Who is so deaf to the apostolic voices? Who would so dote, nay, be so insane, not knowing what he says, as to dare say the law is grace, when he cries — who knew what he said — You who are justified by the law have fallen from grace?"

The same again, On the Spirit and the Letter, ch. 2, says thus: "We must most fiercely and most vehemently resist those who think that without God's help, by the force of the human will alone, justice can be either perfected or, by tending toward it, advanced toward. And when they begin to be pressed how they presume to assert that this is done without divine help, they restrain themselves and dare not utter this voice, since they see how impious and unbearable it is; but they say that these things are not done without divine help, because both God created man with free choice of will, and by giving precepts He himself teaches how man ought to live; and indeed He aids in this — that by teaching He removes ignorance, that man may know in his works what he ought to avoid and what to seek; whereby, entering through naturally inserted free choice the way shown, persisting and living piously and justly, he may merit to come to that blessed and eternal life. But we say that the human will is so divinely aided to do justice, that besides the fact that man is created with free choice of will, and besides the doctrine by which he is commanded how he should live, he receives the Holy Spirit, by whom there comes to be in his soul delight in and love of that highest, unchangeable Good which is God; even now while he yet walks by faith, not yet by sight; that with this given to him as a kind of pledge of the gratuitous gift, he may be inflamed to cleave to the Creator, and may be enkindled to come to participation of that true Light — that from Him it may be well with him, from whom he has it that he is. For neither does free choice avail anything, save for sinning, if the way of truth lie hidden; and when what ought to be done and toward what we ought to tend begin not to lie hidden, unless it also delight and be loved, it is not done, not undertaken, not lived well; but that it be loved, the love of God is poured forth in our hearts — not by free choice which arises from us, but by the Holy Spirit who has been given to us."

Furthermore, the Council cited above, as recited in the canon, last chapter but one, says thus: "Whoever shall say that the same grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord aids us not to sin only because through Him the understanding of the commandments is revealed and opened to us — that we may know what we ought to seek, what avoid — but not also that through it there be granted to us, that what we have known is to be done, we may also do or be able to do — let him be anathema." If anyone bursts forth into so great an insanity as to say that the grace of God necessary to man for fulfilling the divine commandments is the free choice freely given by God to man, he is swallowed up in the gulf of the Pelagian sea. For it stands clear from the cited authorities of Augustine, that this is the vanity of Pelagian madness, who in Against Pelagius and Caelestius on the Grace of Christ and on Original Sin, Book 1, ch. 2, says: "Since Pelagius establishes and distinguishes three things by which he says the divine commandments are fulfilled — possibility, will, action — possibility namely by which a man can be just; will by which he wills to be just; action by which he is just — of these three the first, that is, possibility, he confesses given by the Creator of nature, nor is in our power, but we have it whether we will or not; but the two others, that is, will and action, he asserts to be ours, and so attributes them to us, that he contends that they are not save from us." Behold, plainly what Pelagius calls the grace of God: namely, the natural possibility, gratuitously given to us by the Creator of nature, by the gracious benefit of creation. This heresy Augustine also recites in On Nature and Grace, ch. 53, and in On Grace and Free Choice, ch. 28, and refutes it here and there. This man too, so erring, falls into the above-mentioned heresy of Pelagius, which posits that man through his free choice can fulfill the divine commandments — and he can easily be corrected through what was premised.

Furthermore, the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 15: I have laboured more abundantly than they all; yet not I, but the grace of God which is with me. And how is it not he, but grace — if he or his free choice be called grace?

Yet some modern Pelagians respond, saying: that man out of his pure naturals can love God above all things gratuitously for His own sake, according to the substance of the act itself, but not meritoriously — or at least not meritoriously of condignity, although perhaps of congruity — without grace accompanying. But this does not consort with reason, and is refuted by the foregoing. Furthermore, according to these: he who has grace, by loving God and keeping His counsels and commandments, can merit even of condignity; why then, if one lacking grace does similar or greater things for God with equally right or righter intention, with equally sincere or sincerer affection, with equally grateful love or even more grateful, does he not similarly or more merit? For as far as the works or the workers are concerned, his work is equally good with that of this one or better; wherefore equally acceptable for the payment of an old debt for sin, and for the redemption of his own soul, and for the purchase of the heavenly kingdom. If therefore God should accept the price of the one and reject the equally just or juster price of the other, He is an acceptor of persons, and does not judge equity.

Again, according to all Catholics — nay, even according to the enemies of grace, the Pelagian heretics themselves — grace much lightens the gravity of every work. For it makes the yoke of the Lord sweet and His burden light. Therefore one lacking grace, doing similar things, works more difficultly than one having it; therefore he merits more. For the Philosopher says, Ethics 2.3: "Around the difficult, however, art and virtue are; for the well, the better, is in this — that is, what is well without difficulty, in this is better." And Ethics 3.18 he proves that fortitude consists more in fears than in audacities, and that this is more praiseworthy than that, and according to some more than temperance — by this, that it is more difficult to bear sad things than to abstain from delightful things; and Ethics 5, Book 2: "Worst is he who uses malice toward himself and toward friends; best, however, not he who uses virtue toward himself, but he who uses it toward another; for this work is difficult." Venerable Bede also, On Times, Book 2.1, alleges to this same point Jerome on the Gospels, who places marriages in the thirtieth fruit and widows in the sixtieth, for this cause: "By how much," he says, "the difficulty is greater of abstaining from the once-experienced enticements of pleasure, by so much is the reward greater."

Furthermore, then one lacking grace could love God with all the heart, and with all the soul, and with all the strength, and with all the mind finally for His own sake, and his neighbour as himself, similarly for God's sake, and observe all the other precepts and counsels in all things; and so be in the state of salvation, and finally be saved — both according to the foregoing and contrary to the foregoing. For God's grace alone makes sons and friends of God, as the foregoing testify; and the Prophet says: Who crowns thee with mercy and compassions (Psalm 102). And the Apostle more plainly: But the grace of God is eternal life (Romans 6) — which also the general faith of the Church holds.

Others still feign: that man without grace from himself can perform the divine commandments according to the substance of the work, but not according to the intention of Him who commands — which is, that they be done in grace. But the fiction of these men shall be broken, like the others preceding. This too seems wonderful, because looking through the Old Testament and the New, and all doctors and expositors of them, no other intention of the Commander appears, save that these be done gratuitously for God's sake; and by this very fact it seems to them that such a one is in grace — namely arguing from the posterior to the prior, and from the effect to its efficient. And in the same way all Doctors and preachers, ancient and modern, in preaching and teaching the people of God the way of salvation, preach nothing else save that gratuitously, for God's sake, they should do His commandments and counsels; nor do they say, Do these things in grace; rather they say, as it seems, that by this very fact, that they so do these things, they have the grace of God — that grace, namely, of which I am speaking, which makes us pleasing unto life, as the root from which these branches sprout. And the contrary of this seems to me not to be preached without danger: namely, that although someone may love God gratuitously with his whole heart, etc., and exercise all the works of piety toward his neighbour for God's sake, and bear for His sake all penal and adverse things perseveringly to the end, and then with the most ardent and purest love of God, for the defense of God's law, be consummated by the harshest death — yet still he be handed over to the second death and to the torments of hell without end. Let those preach this who will; I would not dare preach such things, lest perhaps while I preached to others, I myself should become reprobate, undermining the hope of the pious and making the charity of many to grow cold.

Behold, how express are the testimonies of truth to this point. Behold the testimony of Joel 2: Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved — which the Apostle also attests, Romans 10. And Luke 10: A certain one asked of the Lord, Master, what shall I do, that I may have eternal life? But He said: In the law what is written? He answered: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart, etc., and thy neighbour as thyself. And He said to him: Thou hast answered rightly; do this and thou shalt live. If, however, he could have done these things without sanctifying grace unto life, that doctrine of Truth was not true; for it does not follow: Do these things, even perseveringly to the end, therefore thou shalt live; for he could do this without grace, without which surely no one shall live. And if you say that the Saviour understood that he should do these in grace — then since that mode of doing is more necessary than the deed itself, nor is it known to a man by himself, nor did He, by teaching and commanding, express that mode — it seems that such teaching is too defective, and that it casts a snare upon men, and leads them into the danger of eternal damnation. For it conceals grace, without which no one is made gracious, nor enters into life, and expresses one dead deed, intimating openly that to do this is sufficient for life — as if a physician should answer absolutely to a simple sick man, who consulted him what he should do to have temporal life, Eat the flesh of the viper, but did not tell him the way in which it is wholesomely prepared in the theriac: he would easily prepare for such a simple man a dish of death — which any zealous physician will avoid. But far be it that the physician of bodies be more zealous than our physician of souls. For the Lord, jealous His name (Exodus 34).

To this same end is that whole long sermon of the Lord in John 15: I am the true vine, etc., where He teaches the disciples how they should bear fruit — namely, by remaining in Him; where also consequently He expounds how they should remain in Him: Remain, He says, in My love; and still, like the good Master, He teaches how they should remain in His love: If, says He, you keep My commandments, you shall remain in My love; and afterward expounds singularly how they should keep His commandments — of which He had spoken to them in plural — when He says, This is My commandment, that you love one another, as I have loved you. Which similitude He still would not pass over without exposition, but said: Greater love than this no man has, that a man lay down his life for his friends. Whoever therefore has this love, remains in God, and bears in grace much fruit.

Again, Cyprian, Augustine, and unanimously all Doctors and the whole holy Church of God indubitably affirm that whoever, although not reborn of water, has been killed for the confession of Christ, baptized by the baptism of his own blood, immediately in heaven with the holy Martyrs is crowned with a crown of glory; and this is what Christ Himself testifies, Matthew 10, saying thus: Every one therefore that shall confess Me before men, I will also confess him before My Father who is in heaven. To this they hold a similar opinion concerning an adult wishing to be baptized and prevented by death — as Lombard alleges, Sentences IV, dist. 4, and elsewhere it is often plain. Which yet they would presume too rashly to affirm, if these things could be done without the grace of charity, without which it is established that no one can be saved.

Again, this grace is a certain habit, and to love God above all things gratuitously for His own sake is its proper act; but the act is the end and perfection of the habit (as Chapter 21 showed). Wherefore the habit is for the act, not contrariwise. To this therefore God wills that men should have grace — that through it they may do gratuitously the works specified. If therefore they could without that grace so do these things, it would suffice for God and for them; nay, no reason, no cause, no utility either to God or to man would appear, why these things ought to be done in grace, since they could equally be done without it; rather, it would seem altogether superfluous and empty as to every action, like a cipher last in figure as to every signification. And if anyone says that to this God wills that our works be done in grace, because so they can be done more easily, he falls into the above-mentioned error of Pelagius; and even then, he who did them without grace, on account of the greater difficulty, would merit more — as was argued above.

Again, every moral or other habit is known by its effect — namely by this, that someone promptly and delightfully operates the works of such a virtue. Whence Ethics 2.3: "It is fit to make the sign of the habits the supervening pleasure or sadness in the workers. For he who withdraws from bodily pleasures, and rejoices in this very thing, is temperate; and he who endures dangers and rejoices, or is not saddened, is brave." And Posterior Analytics 2, last, Aristotle argues against Plato (who posits cognitive habits of principles to be in us by nature, but to lie hidden), saying: "If we had them, it is unfitting; for it happens that one having most certain cognitions of demonstrating principles is hidden from himself." Since therefore charity and grace are most perfect habits, they can be known by their operations; and this Truth itself seems to have taught when He said: By their fruits you shall know them, Matthew 7. And below ch. 12: By the fruit the tree is known. And John 13 He gives a rule generally special and specially general for having this knowledge: In this, He says, shall all men know that you are My disciples, if you have love one for another — which also below ch. 15 He pursues much more plainly and fully, as was alleged above. And in this opinion the Doctors and treatisers of canonical Scripture seem unanimously to agree. Whoever therefore so works such things, has the grace of charity.

Again, if one operating in grace merits anything, then also one lacking grace, if he similarly operates similar things; for his act in all respects is equally good as the act of another gracious one — especially since his grace in no way informs nor effects nor directs his act. If it be said that grace, by the very fact that it stands there, renders the act meritorious — this does not seem so, since in an act done out of pure naturals it does altogether nothing, just as in a cucumber-field a scarecrow guards nothing, but stands there blind, deaf, dumb, and dead; nor does that grace in the soul contribute more to such an act than it would in a cup, in a purse, or in a chest. Again, if a gracious act is on this account rendered meritorious — because it is done by a gracious one, although not from grace — it follows that his indifferent acts, nay, also venial sins, and universally all his acts are meritorious of the kingdom of God, and this of condignity — since one can love a wife from carnal affection, lie jokingly, give alms because of vainglory in venial matters, and many similar things, out of pure naturals, not out of grace given to him. Such grace could also be really posited in one not gracious, nay sinning mortally — yet his works would not on that account be made meritorious. Whence it is manifest that to be done in grace and to be done from grace are not the same; rather, every thing done from grace is done in grace, but not contrariwise. It is also manifest that a work is meritorious not because it is done in grace, but because it is done from grace; and every work done from grace is meritorious, but not every work done in grace. All these things will easily appear from the foregoing.

Again, to this is that whole process of Anselm recited above; for he says most plainly that whoever wills rectitude wills rightly, and therefore prior in nature has it, as effective cause of this effect; and he there speaks of the rectitude of grace, as is plain in On Concord, ch. 9, and of the grace without which no one is saved (as is plain above in ch. 8) — as was touched upon above; and to the same purpose goes the process of Augustine touched on before.

There is yet another similar quibble, which says: that man can of himself love God with all his heart, etc., and do all other things according to the substance of the works — yet shall merit absolutely nothing, or at least nothing of condignity, because he does not do them according to the intention of the Commander, which is (they say) that he do them in some way meritoriously, or meritoriously of condignity. But this ineptness can be refuted similarly with the prior. Again, what does he understand by "to do meritoriously"? If to do in charity and grace for God's sake, then it does not differ from the prior position; if to do so that some reward is owed to him, this is altogether irrational and contrary to reason. For if a work is meritorious because reward is owed to it, then prior is the owing of reward to it than the work being meritorious — whereas it is contrariwise: for it is on this account, that the work is meritorious, that reward is owed to it; otherwise there would be no cause or reason why reward should be owed to this work and not to that. Therefore prior in nature is a work being meritorious and worthy of reward, than reward being owed to it.

Again, the owing of reward either depends on the work or on something else not pertaining. If on the work — then whoever does congruously such a work, merits; and this man, according to this position, does so without grace. If on something not pertaining — this seems against all reason and law. Again, in the whole Old Testament and New, God promises to those doing the commandments a reward. Yet if He so understood: Do My commandments meritoriously, and you will be worthy of reward and will have reward — that promise or doctrine would be ridiculous. For He does not teach anything doubtful or unknown, save perhaps to one doubting whether God is, or whether He is just. For it is established for any one, that any potent person is held to render reward to one operating meritoriously for him, and will render unless he be unjust. It seems therefore that God understands according to the common mode of understanding of men whom He was teaching: namely, Do this and you shall have reward — that is, Do this for My sake, and for My love, and you shall have reward; and so one not having grace can do, according to these aforesaid.

Again, to one in grace reward is owed for a work; and this man outside grace, according to these, can do a similar work, or greater, for God, with similar or greater love. Why then does this one not merit as much as that, or more? Again, it is in no way probable that God most liberal and rich, merciful and just, who will render to each one according to his works, should cast away and despise — without any reward — one loving Him gratuitously for His sake with all the powers of mind and body, and his neighbour as himself similarly for God's sake; one who abhors all evils, embraces all good things, sustains all sad things, and at last the most bitter death for God's sake. Especially when He Himself most plainly testifies this, even with an oath interposed, Matthew 10, in these words: Whoever shall give to one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, Amen I say to you, he shall not lose his reward.

But these will perhaps object: that if no one could love God with his whole heart, etc., and do all things to be done, and dismiss all things to be dismissed, gratuitously for God's sake, unless he were in the grace of charity, then a man could know when he was in the grace of charity — contrary to that of Ecclesiastes 9, Man knoweth not whether he be worthy of love or hatred. Again, such great works can be done without the grace of charity. For one can without charity (as appears 1 Corinthians 13) have all faith and do the greatest miracles, so as to remove mountains; distribute all his goods to feed the poor; and deliver his body to be burned.

To the first objection it is plain through what was said in Chapter 25 of this work — that someone predestined to life, existing in the gravest mortal sin (as was David, when on account of adultery he was committing crafty homicide), is not then less loved by God than he will be loved in the future; and similarly, one foreknown to death, existing in the greatest charity, is no less hated then by God than ever he will be hated after his deepest fall into sin and punishment — as was the case of Judas the traitor of the Lord — except perhaps according to the present justice, and very much by way of transmutation. Therefore no man can know whether he is worthy of hatred or love, since whatever sort he is now, he does not know what end he will have, nor whether he is finally predestined a son of life or of death. And this is what the same Scripture testifies: for when it had said, Man knoweth not whether he be worthy of love or hatred, it adds: but all things in the future are kept uncertain. Yet to no one is it doubtful but that man can know himself to be worthy of hatred according to the present justice. For he can know himself to be in the gravest sins, and in the gravest actual will of committing, and in despair of salvation — as was the case with Judas and Cain. Similarly it seems probable to me that man can probably know — at least according to the present justice — that he is in grace and worthy of God's love, by this, namely, that he loves God with his whole heart, etc., so that he would not in the least wish to offend Him, neither for any avoidable thing to be avoided, nor for any desirable thing to be obtained; and would wish to fulfill the divine will in all things, even though there were never punishment or reward, but only gratuitously for His sake; and through many other signs.

But to be brief, although less truly, the said authority can be expounded thus: Man knoweth not whether he be worthy of love or hatred — that is, finally — as the same place expounds itself continuously, as has been said.

As to the other point: it is true that without the grace of charity many great works are done, but not the work of loving God with the whole heart, etc., in the said mode; nor are those works done with gratuitous love for God's sake. And therefore the Apostle well says: If I shall do these and those things, but have not charity, it profits me nothing. And straightway through her effects he in some way defines and notifies charity: Charity is patient, is kind, etc., as if he wished plainly to intimate that he who truly does not have these things, has not charity, and he who truly has these things, similarly has charity. For according to the same, Romans 11: If the firstfruit be holy, so is the lump. But this whole argument from its beginning down to here, so far protracted, is so briefly restricted into a syllogism: Whoever merits of congruity grace from God, does, before the receiving of grace in time or in nature, something gratefully for Him; no one does anything gratefully for Him beforehand.

Again, if one lacking grace can merit the first grace of congruity, and one having grace can merit the increase of his grace only of congruity, not however of condignity — then one lacking grace could similarly earn the first grace as one having grace earns the increase of his grace; whereas the first of these is the heresy of Pelagius reprov'd by the Fathers, and the second is conceded by all Catholics. Therefore the first cannot similarly merit the first, and the second the second. That grace had merits being increased, the authority of Augustine cited above proves: "Grace merits to be increased, that having been increased, it may merit also to be perfected." Whence Proverbs 4: Possess wisdom, and she shall give to thy head increases of graces. And that this is not of condignity, can be shown by the reasons of Chapter 35, showing that grace is not from prior merits or works — since then it would not be grace, but debt — for every increase of grace is grace, and every grace is univocally said with another freely given.

Again, if one can merit increase of grace of condignity, he can merit a higher seat in heaven and more intense beatitude, and great breadth and an eternal portion of it, similarly of condignity — which is false. For in commutative justice of condignity there is required at least equal for equal, as appears in Ethics 5.6 and afterwards diffusely. But the momentary operation of a gracious one is not equally good with so great a portion of everlasting beatitude. Whence the Apostle, Romans 8: I reckon that the sufferings of this time are not condign to the future glory which shall be revealed in us. Gloss: I reckon — that is, I know, that the sufferings of this time — that is, temporal and momentary — are not condign — that is, sufficient, if it were strictly dealt with us, for earning future glory. For tribulation itself is with an end, the reward will be without end; and far greater shall be the glory there than the labour here. This same opinion Augustine more expressly teaches, on Psalm 36, By the Lord shall the steps of a man be directed, and He will choose his way: "Do not regard so much by what way you are going, but whither you shall come; you shall bear hard temporal things, but to glad eternal you shall arrive. If you wish to bear labour, attend to the reward; you will marvel that so much is given for so much labour. For surely, brethren, for eternal rest eternal labour ought to be undertaken, and to receive eternal felicity you ought to bear eternal sufferings; but if you should bear eternal labour, when would you arrive at eternal felicity? Whence it comes about that necessarily your tribulation is temporal, that, ended, you may come to infinite felicity. But yet, brethren, there could be long tribulation for eternal felicity — for example, since our felicity will not have an end, our misery and our labour and our tribulations might be diuturnal: for even if they were thousands of years, weigh a thousand years against eternity. What do you weigh, however much finite, with the infinite? Ten thousands of years, ten times a hundred thousand if it must be said, and thousands of thousands which have an end, cannot be compared with eternity."
