It is said, perhaps: that because God promised to those operating the eternal kingdom, they merit it of condignity; and otherwise they would not merit it of condignity. But this does not seem so. For that promise no one could have earned of condignity, nor without this could anyone have merited the eternal kingdom of condignity. Therefore no one simply of condignity could or can merit the eternal kingdom. Nor is the operation of any one after the promise better than a similar one before the promise was; but no operation before the promise merited the kingdom of condignity. Nor does that promise make the work better, as appears through the substance of the work and through all its circumstances inductively; rather, perhaps less good. For it makes the intention less sincere; for he who first was operating purely for God alone, now perhaps operates for the promised retribution. Again, then God does not so liberally confer eternal life as He did before the promise; for then He conferred it altogether liberally, but now of the necessity of the promise, and of the necessity of preserving justice — which seems greatly to derogate from His highest liberty and from His perfect immutability. Then also one operating meritoriously would compel God either to resuscitating him and rewarding him eternally, or to incurring offense to justice. Where then is His highest liberty and unsurpassable power?

Again, His promise — eternal, mental, internal, in His Word, or eternal Holy Spirit — does not less oblige God than a temporal verbal external one, perhaps by the ministry of some angel; but whatever He temporally vocally externally promised, He eternally mentally internally in His Word or eternal Holy Spirit promised — which His omnimodal immutability through Chapters 5 and 23 will demonstrate. Again, God so promised: that whatever we should ask in His name, He would give us. And Samuel prayed for Saul, and Jeremiah for the people, and many for many reprobates. They merited therefore of condignity to be heard; and God did not hear them — as Chapter 25 of this work alleges. He therefore inflicted upon them manifest injury — which no one save one manifestly unjust will dare even tacitly to think.

Again, principally: if anyone merits the increase of grace of condignity — either he merits a continuous increase of it, or a discrete one. If discrete only, and by turns: then through one great merit he merits one certain increase; therefore through half the merit, half the reward and increase; and so proportionally according to its single parts. Therefore he merits of condignity his grace to be increased continuously. And every reason which proves anyone to merit of condignity his grace being increased by turns and discretely, will likewise prove it continuously. If which be granted, it will be granted consequently that any work of grace merits of condignity the remission of any temporal punishment here and in purgatory, nay even of all such punishments of any persons being punished, if it be duly offered and given to that effect. Which does not seem so; because then it would seem superfluous to do many and great works of grace for punishments, or even for venial sins to be redeemed — since of condignity a brief salutation of the glorious Virgin would suffice, nay even the smallest thought. And the same follows of mortal sins however many. For (as it seems to some) the smallest contrition out of grace takes away guilt and commutes the eternal punishment into temporal. Since therefore any contrition is perhaps more intense than is necessarily required, the intensive half of it not necessarily required takes away the whole temporal punishment left; or at least, if contrition were continued further for ever so brief a time, it would take away the whole punishment. For any work of grace merits of condignity incomparably more than every such temporal remission — namely, the increase of grace and proportionally the increase of glory everlasting; therefore any such merit of condignity will suffice of condignity for any lesser thing — as the Ethics Book 5 teach in the sanctions of commutative justice. And Anselm says, Cur Deus homo II.20: "What can be understood juster than that he to whom is given a price greater than every debt — if it be given with due affection — should remit every debt?"

If, however, it be said: that to commute such a merit (by which one merits the increase of grace and glory everlasting) for the remission of temporal punishment, or temporal punishments, would be his eternal prejudice; and therefore God, judging more equitably, does not do this — still the prior reason stands, especially since to one willing no injury is done, according to the jurists, and according to the Philosopher Ethics 5.17: No one suffers injustice willingly. Indeed it seems that any one can dispense to the needy with pious affection what is duly acquired by him, inflicting prejudice on no other; or let it be supposed that he offers that merit to God for some dead and damned person to so much misery or less, and the said reason will stand. Even according to the said response, no one could through any work of grace merit plenary remission, nor even mitigation of the lightest temporal punishment, the same prejudice always preventing it — which it is established is most false, in the judgment of the whole Church granting indulgences, and changing penances into other works of piety.

Again, without any commutation: whoever merits continuously and condignly incomparably more — namely, increase of grace and glory everlasting — sooner or at least equally soon merits condignly incomparably less, namely, the remission of however great temporal punishment; whoever therefore begins to operate meritoriously out of grace, immediately in the first instant, or immediately afterwards, every temporal punishment is remitted to him from debt and of condignity.

Again, that no one merits a continuous increase of grace of condignity seems so; because then to any work of grace a certain increase of grace would be owed: greater to the greater, lesser to the lesser, and equal to the equal. Let there be therefore two sons of grace equal in grace and in all other things, this excepted: that one, on account of mortal sin or only venial, is debtor of temporal punishment; and let them perform equal works of grace, so that the debtor of punishment is wholly absolved through that merit. Either then beyond that absolution from punishment he merits some reward in the future life, or nothing at all. Not nothing at all, because then it could happen that an adult baptized, actually loving God supremely and actually exercising himself in holy works for a great time of his life — even sustaining martyrdom for Christ and His law — would be equally rewarded in the future life with one little baptized boy who never did anything good. For this evidently follows, if all these things be conjoined into a fitting penance for the sinner, or if all these equally suffice for satisfaction of his sin or sins. Where then is what each Testament most often promises: that God will render to each one according to his works?

According to this opinion also it would seem that it would more profit sinners to defer satisfaction enjoined upon them, or at least owed for venial things, until purgatory after the term of the present life, and to sweat at other good works not satisfactory, nor done with the mind of satisfying for sin, but simply directed to God and simply meritorious. For so doing, and so finally departing, he would acquire for himself a great everlasting reward, and would sustain after death a small temporal purgatorial punishment. But who would presume to affirm this?

Furthermore, if it be so, such a one would be eternally punished, at least with the punishment of loss — namely by subtraction of the portion of everlasting glory which he would otherwise have had. But who would presume to make heaven a prison or a place of punishment? How also will it be true, what James protests of God, who, he says, gives to all affluently and reproaches not — if yet He so did, He would give to a man penitent for sin committed and dismissed, an eternal reproach: namely, a diminution of everlasting glory. Indeed, if it were so, no one ever would satisfy or could satisfy in the present life for any sin, however small and least; for if he be saved, he will be punished for that sin with the eternal punishment of loss in heaven, by some subtraction of the everlasting glory which for that good work, by which he satisfies, he would otherwise have had. Which who would presume to say, or even to think?

Furthermore, it would seem wonderful and exceedingly admirable, that he who, out of dearest charity and dearest grace, dearly and gratefully should love God above all things for His own sake, and so should do his works (although satisfactory for sin) for God's sake — would merit nothing of perpetual reward, nor anything of good at all, save a small dismissal of a small temporal punishment. For how would it consort with equity or agree with justice, that He should accept the most worthy price of the greatest everlasting reward only for the smallest debt, for the smallest temporal punishment, since it is worth infinitely more? For so He would exact too heavy usuries.

Wherefore, perhaps, it will be said that such a one merits some everlasting reward; either then less than the other free from such debt of punishment, or equally with him. If less, either eternally less, or temporally only less. Not eternally less, on account of the reasons premised. For let it be supposed that Peter, a little baptized boy made adult, by sinning mortally falls from baptismal grace, which is A; and Paul, an adult constituted in grace, by some pious work earns B grace, which is equal to A or less, beyond his prior grace, or only an increase of it. But Peter — lacking grace, who according to the hypothesis can merit it of congruity — performs a similar pious work, meriting of congruity the first grace after sin, which is C. Either then C is equal to A, or less, or greater. If equal, the previously specified inconvenience returns: namely, that an adult laudably operating is beatified equally with a little one only baptized. If C is less than A, the inconvenience will be greater. If however greater — why does Peter, less disposed to meriting than Paul, by a similar pious work merit more than he? For Paul merits B grace equal to A only, or less. Indeed, let it be supposed that Paul through some good work merits B grace, less by however much than A grace, and the consequent will be that Peter, through a similar good work, merits an equal grace or less; rather it seems reasonably that less, since he is less disposed to meriting. Furthermore, if C is greater than A, this is according to some finite proportion. Let it be supposed therefore that Peter's merit (through which he merits C grace) is proportionally diminished, or below; and the previously mentioned inconveniences return. Especially if according to the Pelagian hypothesis, God gives no grace freely to Peter, but only on account and according to the antecedent merit.

Furthermore, let it be supposed that Peter and Paul are constituted in equal grace, and Peter is debtor of small punishment for sin, but Paul not at all, and both perform equal meritorious works, etc., as above against the prior response. For it follows plainly that it would more profit Peter to defer that satisfaction to purgatory after this life; that even Peter saved in heaven would be eternally punished; that God gives to him sparingly and reproaches him always; that he never will satisfy nor ever can satisfy for any sin whatever; that moreover God deals unmercifully, cruelly, and unjustly with him — namely, by compensating a portion of his merit (to which is worthily owed a portion of glory everlasting) for satisfaction of small punishment, since this is worth infinitely more of condignity, and so iniquitously diminishing his reward.

Furthermore, if some good work exceeds for satisfaction of this, and some less suffices according to the foregoing — and as the Pelagians confess — some equally suffices, etc., as above. Furthermore, by how much eternally Peter merits less than Paul, according to what should the quantity of that lessness be attended? Unless perhaps according to the quantity of the eternal punishment owed to him before for mortal sin. But that perhaps was more intense than the glory which Paul merits. Wherefore Peter through that satisfactory work merits nothing of everlasting glory — contrary to the hypothesis; nay, neither is he fully cleared from the whole debt of the ancient punishment.

Nor is it necessary that Peter's preceding sin was mortal, or to be punished with perpetual punishment. Is it not so, if Peter is now constituted in glory, that he is free from the debt of eternal punishment, and debtor perhaps only of temporal punishment? How then does the just God now exact debt and satisfaction from him for eternal punishment?

Therefore perhaps it will be said, in the first place: that in the prior case, Peter merits some everlasting reward, only temporally less than Paul — namely, by so much less and shorter extensively for some certain finite time, by as much as the temporal punishment was that was dismissed through his merit; and from then on equal extensively and intensively similarly to eternity. But by no means is such deformity (rather, full conformity is reckoned by the Fathers as to be posited in the saints) in the future felicity and consummated beatitude; nor is the time of merit, or of progress, reckoned in heaven after the final judgment by the Orthodox Fathers; nor is even the place of prison or punishment in heaven esteemed by the holy Fathers. Who also would say that no one satisfies nor can satisfy through any pious works whatsoever, for however small a sin in the present life — but that after this life, if he passes to the future, he will be punished there with some punishment of loss? By a similar reason it would seem that of two equally meritorious not departing at the same time — but the one in the beginning as it were of the world, and the other at the end — the prior would await the posterior, nor would receive any taste of beatitude before him.

Wherefore perhaps it will be said: that in the said case, Peter and Paul merit altogether equally; therefore equal increase of grace in the present, and of glory in the future; wherefore Peter simply merits more — namely, the dismissal of his punishment — contrary to the hypothesis already premised.

If however it be said, with the Apostle to the Romans 5: that where sin abounded, grace did more abound — therefore because Jesus Christ, through whom grace and truth, more applies the virtue of His most blessed and most immaculate Passion to the merit of him who is debtor of temporal punishment on account of his sin; and so beyond his merit common with the other, even temporal punishment is remitted. This however does not solve it; for as the Apostle says, Where sin abounded, grace did more abound — therefore that remission of punishment is from grace, not from merit of condignity. Nor does that response help the ungrateful Pelagians, who profess no gratuitous grace as the debt of merits in such cases. Nor does any reason compel Christ suffering more to assist him, since he is more unworthy, or at least no more worthy than another; nay, since He assists voluntarily, He can assist less or equally as it pleases Him. Let Him therefore assist equally — and the argument stands intact, as before. Then also according to this, however great the temporal punishment which he should owe, the Passion of Christ joined to however small a merit would take away the whole. For no reason appears why so much should be taken away rather than greater; nay, if on this account, that in someone sin so much abounded, so much grace abounded — by the same reason in another, where sin more abounded, more grace would abound proportionally taking it away, nor would he merit any less of increase of grace and glory everlasting.

Others say: that the debtor of punishment will necessarily have one circumstance of merit which the other will not have, namely, that his work is penance and an Ecclesiastical Sacrament; and that circumstance takes away temporal punishment, while the principal merit acquires increase of grace and glory everlasting. But this does not solve it either. For let it be supposed that one guilty of venial sin and of temporal punishment, without confession and sacramental penance for taking these away, performs some pious work, and another wholly free merits equally; or let it be supposed that the free one believes himself guilty of similar sin, and debtor of so much punishment, and for taking these away similarly performs an altogether similar work; or let it be supposed still that, so believing, he is contrite, confesses, and from grace performs all things equally as the guilty one — and the argument returns. Or still let it be supposed that such a one guilty of mortal sin in the time of the ancient law (which perhaps in no way obliged to oral confession), through God's grace, contrition, and other holy works, has satisfied for sin; or that someone in the time of the new law, not having an opportunity of a confessor, similarly satisfies for his mortal sin without the sacrament of penance — and the little response just premised is taken away.

Furthermore, if anyone merits increase of grace of condignity, then equally grateful works merit equal increase. Let John therefore perform some work of grace only for himself, saying with holy David, Have mercy on me, O God; but Peter performs a work of grace equally meritorious for others, and intends their grace, saying with the Apostle to the Philippians 1, This I pray, that your charity may abound more and more. Then John's grace is increased according to some certain amount, and Peter's grace by as much (for he merits equally); and the grace of those for whom Peter prays is increased in some amount; for whatever we shall ask of the Father in the Son's name, He will give to us. Therefore Peter simply merits more — which manifestly contradicts the hypothesis.

It seems also that Peter's prayer in grace would be of infinite merit. For let there be many infidels disposed to the grace of Christian faith, for whom Peter prays only generally that they may be converted to the faith and there may be one fold and one Shepherd. Since therefore whatever we shall ask of the Father in the Son's name, He will give to us, He will convert someone or some of them; and since there is no greater cause for one than for another (granted that they are equally disposed), it follows that all single ones will be converted. And by the same reason it would so happen if there were a hundred or a thousand, or however great a number. Peter's prayer therefore, as far as it is in itself, is not of limited but rather of infinite merit. This reason is confirmed: for if Peter's prayer were of value to one only, it would be of certain merit; if it should be of value to two, of greater; and so on; and the more it is of greater merit, the more worthy it is to be accepted for more. The more therefore it prays for many and is heard, the more for more will it more worthily be heard.

Again, since it seems in no way reasonable that the merit of Peter's prayer should be of more value from debt to another or others than to Peter himself (since Psalm 34 says: My prayer shall return into my own bosom), it seems that that prayer is also for Peter himself of infinite merit.

If however it be said: that the more for many he merits grace, the lesser to each of them he merits — wherefore that reason does not proceed — this cannot stand, because then he would merit for some a grace less than baptismal grace, and a glory less everlasting than the least glory of little ones, or that could be sensed by itself.

Furthermore, that equally grateful works do not merit condignly equal grace being increased is urged: because then by the same reason they would merit equally all other goods, since of two equals the prior departing always equally intensively (and with this longer than the other) is glorified. Again, then one existing in grace through his prayers could merit of condignity the first grace for another not having grace; therefore it would not be grace, by the foregoing; nay, also he could merit of condignity that first grace be given to himself. For let him pray in grace; and if it should happen to him to fall from it by sinning mortally, let God infuse on him the grace of rising again, and let his prayer be so efficacious that he obtains this of condignity — then if he sin mortally, God is held by his prior condign merit to give him the first grace by which he may rise.

Again, then an adult in the first instant in which grace is infused in him, can use it meritoriously, as Anselm plainly teaches, On Truth, ch. 12 — which by many reasons and authorities elsewhere was urged, and (as I esteem) urged through. Wherefore he can merit condignly, and receive in the same instant, an increase of it. And since in an intense quality there is not a heap of remitted parts, but always there is only a single quality purely simple (as I here suppose, because as I judge this is shown elsewhere) — therefore he can merit condignly his first grace, which is against the position of these and against Catholic truth, as Chapter 35 declared.

Again, if in an instant he merits condignly a certain increase of grace given to him, it follows that if he likewise merits continuously throughout some whole time, he will merit condignly an infinite increase of grace; or throughout some whole continuous time, meriting likewise as in an instant, he will only merit condignly as much as in an instant — and through some whole continuous time still less.

Furthermore, then someone gracious could merit condignly for any wayfarer, even reprobate, the grace of conversion and the everlasting glory which can be with some predestined ones worse than they; the opposite of which appeared as to Samuel praying for Saul, and Jeremiah praying for the people of the Jews, and through Augustine, City of God 21.25, universally about all the reprobate, as Chapter 25 alleged.

Again, someone finally reprobate sometimes has charity, who afterwards looks back and similarly goes back — or at least this is possible; otherwise everyone having charity and grace would necessarily be saved. Which was true of Saul and Judas, as the Doctors affirm. But such a one, existing in however great grace, cannot merit condignly that God love him unto life. For let such a reprobate exercise himself in works of grace however much (even ten thousand times more than one predestinate does); and yet God does not love him unto life, but only hates him unto death — as ever He will do in the future. For since such a one, after all his merits, is dead and buried in hell, and finally damned, it is certain that God does not love him unto life, but hates him unto death. Wherefore neither did He ever love him, nor did He even not hate him — as Chapters 23 and 25 teach.

Furthermore, if such a one could merit condignly that God love him, he could move the divine will from reprobation to predestination, from hatred to love, or at least could move it as a prior and efficient cause — contrary to Chapter 20. And if one existing in grace cannot merit condignly that he be loved unto life eternal, therefore no one can. Similarly also it can be shown that no one existing in grace can merit of congruity causally and antecedently to the divine will, that he be loved by God unto life eternal, or that he be more loved by Him.

Furthermore, it seems that no one can merit of condignity, and according to the rigor of right, anything good from God — unless perhaps it be such a good that follows the merit inseparably (as is perhaps to be one meriting good and just simply or in part). Otherwise he who merits would compel God and the divine will necessarily to giving — or to willing to give — the reward, or to losing justice. For if the just Lord remains in all His ways, and someone merits condignly anything from Him, it is just that he have it; and every such just thing is just from God's will, as Chapter 21 teaches. Wherefore it is necessary that He will to render this to him — especially since (per Chapter 22) He has the act of will concerning the rendering of reward; therefore, since power is not lacking to Him, it is necessary that He render — as Chapter 10 showed; and so the creature would compel God to will, and even to operate externally — which the first Supposition and its infinite perfection in no way allow, nor can Chapter 20 consent.

Again, let it be supposed (according to the adversaries) that John yesterday merited of condignity the good A to be rendered to him by God tomorrow. Yesterday therefore it was just, and willed by God, that A be rendered to John tomorrow. Let it also be supposed that he today demerits A. Therefore God today does not will to render A to John; wherefore (per Chapter 23) neither did He yesterday will it; nay, today He wills that he never have A; wherefore through the same Chapter 23 He willed yesterday similarly.

Furthermore, if one can merit anything condignly from God, he can (as it seems) merit condignly for himself or another existing in grace, that he persevere finally and be saved; which if he should do, such a wayfarer cannot sin mortally nor be damned.

Again, by Chapter 20 of this work, no merit is the motive of the divine will; wherefore neither the cause why God wills to give to anyone this or that. And by the same arguments it can be shown that no one causally and antecedently merits of congruity anything good from God — supposing that no congruous thing is unjust (just as no unjust thing seems congruous), and that every congruous thing is just and willed by God.

Again, no one merits condignly anything from another, who does not first do anything for him, or give to him. For the proper work of a labourer ought to precede the wage in time or in nature. For if he should receive every operation from God as prior, and continue in His virtue, he does not seem through this to merit condignly anything from Him, but rather to be more bound to Him after his operation than before; because then he has received more of good benignly from Him than before — and especially he who gives nothing of his own as a giver, but only of the good of Him to whom it is given. But no man does first for God; for He, in any making and motion, is the first maker and mover, as is plainly clear from the foregoing. What then does man merit condignly through such making? This seems to be the reasoning of the Apostle, Romans 11: Who, he says, has first given to Him, and recompense shall be made him? For from Him and through Him and in Him are all things. Whence it stands, that out of grace alone He gives goods, not from preceding merit. Wherefore Augustine on Psalm 32, All His works are in faith, intimating the distinction of debtor and debt, says thus: "Let us hold God a most faithful debtor, because we hold Him a most merciful Promiser. For we did not lend Him anything as a loan, that we might hold Him a debtor, since from Him we have whatever we offer Him. For who has first given to Him, and recompense shall be made him? Since from Him and through Him and in Him are all things. Therefore we have given Him nothing, and we hold Him a debtor. Whence then a debtor? Because a most faithful Promiser." With which Anselm agrees, On Concord, ch. 9, saying: "God gives to no one for preceding merit. When did anyone first give to Him, and recompense shall be made him?" The same in Cur Deus homo I.20: "God owes nothing to anyone, but every creature owes to Him; and therefore it is not fitting for man to act with God as peer with peer."

Lombard also, Sentences I, dist. 43, following Augustine, says God is not our debtor save perhaps from promise, not from contract. This same thing Cyprian holds, cited above, when he says: "In nothing must we glory, since nothing is ours." And the Gloss on Romans 4, To him, however, who works, the wage is not reckoned according to grace, but according to debt: "What we work well having received grace, must be ascribed not to us but to Him, who through grace has justified us. For if He were to render the due reward before grace, He would render to sinners the due punishment. Do not therefore flatter yourself about merits, when you hear that the wage is rendered to you according to the debt of the work, as if there were not in the work the grace of the Rewarder, just as in faith there is the grace of the Justifier. For scarcely do I persuade myself that any work be said from debt to claim the remuneration of God, since even this very thing — that we can do something, or think, or speak — we do by His gift and bounty." Blessed Bernard also, On Grace and Free Choice, last chapter, treating of the crown of justice to be rendered to the Apostle, holds the same.

Again, by the first Supposition and the third part of the First Corollary of this work, nothing which in any way diminishes liberty is to be ascribed to God; but to owe of condignity and by the pure rigor of right diminishes liberty, and in some way subjects to slavery. For freer would be a lord who had servants working, and was held to them by no debt or rigor, but only by spontaneous liberty, than one held to his servants working by necessary debt and rigor, who could be compelled unwillingly to render — who would also otherwise lie under the injury of slavery.

Again, by the same: nothing which diminishes the liberty of the giver is to be ascribed to God; but debt diminishes; for it is more liberal to give freely than dutifully.

Again, no one merits anything from another of condignity, who does not do something which is in some way good to the latter, but only to the doer. But by the fifth part of the First Corollary of this work, no man does any good to God. Wherefore Job 22: What does it profit God if you are just, or what do you bring Him if your life is immaculate? But whatever good a man does, profits himself. Whence Augustine, On Free Choice 3.25: "God owes nothing to any one, because He bestows all things gratuitously; and if any one says something is owed to him by Him through his merits, certainly that he should be was not owed to him. For there was no one to whom it would be owed; and yet what is the merit of being converted to Him from whom you are, that from Him you may even be better, from whom you have it that you are? What therefore do you preserve to Him, that as a debt you may demand it — when, if you would not be converted to Him, nothing would be lacking to Him, but you would be wretched? All things, therefore, owe to Him: first, that they are, insofar as they are natures; then, whatever better they can be if they will, whatever they have received that they may will, and whatever it is fit they should be."

Again, no one lacking grace can of himself satisfy God condignly for original sin, or for the smallest actual sin — as appears from the foregoing concerning Part 32, 38th, and 39th of the First Corollary of this work. Wherefore neither merit anything from Him from debt and of condignity. For whatever good such a one will be able to do, is less than the debt for sin. For otherwise such a one of himself could merit condignly grace in the present and glory in the future, contrary to the foregoing. This Anselm also proves in Cur Deus homo I.21 and 22; which also blessed Job seems to feel when he says: I have sinned, what shall I do unto Thee, O Watcher of men? (Job 7) — as if he were saying: I have sinned, what shall I do for Thee for condign satisfaction? — intimating that nothing. On which blessed Gregory, Moralia 8.21, says: "Behold, he confesses the evil which he has done, but the good which he ought to offer to God in recompense, he does not find; because for cleansing guilt the virtue of every human action is feeble, unless the mercy of the Forgiver should foster it, and the justice of the rightly Judging not press it down."

Again, no one can fully render the debt which he has received from God; wherefore neither can he merit from Him by pure debt and of condignity. For a son cannot render to a carnal father as much as he owes; how much less can anyone render to the heavenly Father as much as he owes? For if a son could render to a father as much as he owes, let him render — and he is absolved from every natural obligation and debt towards the father, so that in no emerging case is he held more to the father than to any extraneous person whatever — which the law of nature and gratitude does not permit. Whence the Philosopher, Ethics 8, last: "It must be rendered, contributing what one can; for friendship requires according to power, not according to dignity. For neither is it in all things as in those which pertain to the gods, men, and parents. For no one according to dignity ever shall recompense; but to him who serves according to power he seems to be epieikēs (equitable); for he must render what he owes; but doing nothing worthy of those things which have been bestowed, he has worked; wherefore he always owes." Again, whoever has received anything from another is held to render the equal if he is able, as the law of gratitude clearly proves. Whence the Philosopher says, Ethics 8.13: "It must be rendered to one who is able, according to the dignity of the things he has suffered, and willingly." With which agrees the authority just alleged. And Ethics 5.8 a certain species of commutative justice is posited: to recompense proportionally for an antecedent benefit. For it is said there: "By the doing in turn what is proportional, the city remains; if not, it seems to be slavery; for if not, recompense does not happen; and by recompense they remain. Wherefore also they readily build the temple of the Graces (Charites), that recompense may happen; for this is proper to grace: for one must serve in turn him who has done a grace, and again himself begin doing a grace." Which the seven books of Seneca On Benefits most often attest. Wherefore also if one has received more than he can recompense, he is held to recompense as much as he can, which the first authority of the Philosopher plainly says.

But God has done more for us than we can render to the condign, as the said first authority of the Philosopher wishes, and is plain — because God has given to man all of Himself, and all His powers and habits and acts, as the foregoing make plain. All these things therefore he owes to God. Furthermore, beyond these, God has given to man — and for man wretched and captive, bound to perpetual flames — Himself, incarnate, suffering, dead, and buried, in temporally redeeming the price; furthermore, He promises and gives Himself wholly as a reward in happily consummating, which exceeds any pure man infinitely. Therefore any man owes to God infinitely more than he is and can, or at least as much as he can. This reason is confirmed by Anselm in his Meditation on the Redemption of the Human Soul, where he says, the Christian soul raised from grievous death speaking: "Certainly, Lord, because You have made me, I owe to Your love my whole self; because You have redeemed me, I owe my whole self; nay, I owe so much more to Your love than myself, by as much as You are greater than I, for whom You gave Yourself, and to whom You promise Yourself."

Response is made perhaps according to the same Anselm, Cur Deus homo II.18, saying: "When you say a creature owes to God what it best knows and can — if you understand from debt, and do not subaudibly add, if God commands, it is not always true. Indeed man does not owe virginity from debt, but if he wills, he is bound to use marriage." But this does not solve it. For God by not commanding does not destroy the law of gratitude which He has sanctioned; and by this law any benefited person is held to the benefactor for the equal or greater, or at least for what he can — as the prior authorities will. Again, if God should exact, man would be held to do as much as he could; if however He does not exact, but leaves it to one's own will, He does more for him, since He grants greater liberty; wherefore by this very fact, man more, or at least as much, is obliged to God, as much as he would otherwise be obliged.

Here someone perhaps will respond: that God can remit that whole obligation. For the Philosopher says, Ethics 8, last, immediately after the cited authority concerning recompense to be made to gods and parents, "But to those to whom it is owed, there is the power to release, even the father." But again the argument returns against this man: for to remit so much debt and so much obligation is one benefit not small. For that benefit, then, with the others he is more obliged, as if a creditor were freely to forgive a debtor all the money lent, and were to remit (as much as he could) every obligation — by so much more straitly would he oblige him to himself, as the second benefit would exceed the first.

But, lest I seem to contravene Anselm and Aristotle, I say (as may be elicited from the meaning of both): To owe is twofold: namely, potentially or habitually, and actually. To owe actually — I understand actually being obliged to do something under the penalty of sin, as is the case of a labourer hired for a certain work. And so we are not held to do whatever we shall be able to do for God's sake. And this is perhaps the mind of Anselm; and so according to Aristotle a father can release the son, and God the man, that he may not be obliged as far as he can. Potentially or habitually to owe — I understand this: that anyone benefited from the antecedent benefit has an obligation in potency and habit to do something, which when it shall please the benefactor, can be reduced to act — namely, if he should exact this from him: as if John should hand over to Peter ten with the condition interposed, Have these ten freely, unless I should chance to ask them back; if I ask, you are held to repay them to me. And so any rational creature is held to God in all things as much as it can — namely if He should will to exact this from it. Wherefore he can merit nothing of good from strict, debt, and violent rigor from Him, just as Peter cannot for those ten buy anything from John. For he has somehow free, and his own, this or that for meriting, buying, or doing — not from himself, but from God; and this not from any precontracted debt, but altogether from grace and free permission of His gratuitous will.

Furthermore, that no one merits the first grace of congruity: because either this would be by congruity antecedent to the divine will and moving it to making grace, or by congruity consequent to it and depending on it. If by congruity antecedent — since every such congruity is a certain reason and justice — it is reasonable and just, by reason and justice antecedent to the divine will, that God give His grace to such a one; wherefore (by Chapter 21) this is necessarily reasonable and just. It is necessary therefore that God do this, or do contrary to necessary reason and justice, and sin. Even then such an inferior congruity would move the divine will (contrary to Chapter 20), and would determine it (of itself indifferent), and would be totally alien from divine providence (contrary to Chapter 27 and the others which follow). If by congruity consequent to the divine will — then that is posterior to the divine will; wherefore (by Chapter 20) it in no way moves it to willing to confer grace, as a merit exciting and inducing.

Again, if so it is, it is congruous that God give grace to one so meriting, because this is willed by God; therefore this is not only congruous (as these say) but also condign — because whatever God wills to be done is worthy and just to be done, as Chapter 21 demonstrated. Nor does anyone doubt who is sure of divine justice, and knows that every just is worthy. They will perhaps say that it is well worthy, but not condign. But what is condign, save what is, with reason and justice, worthy? Wherefore Esther 6 is written thus: To this honour is condign whomsoever the King wills to honour. Likewise to the same purpose: every sufficient is condign — for so the Gloss expounds that of Romans 8, the sufferings are not condign etc. — condign — that is, sufficient. But such a work is sufficient for impetrating grace, for nothing is lacking to it; for it impetrates it. That also is sufficient which God wills and discerns to suffice on the part of the worker; and such is this work according to the position of these. If, however, it be said that it is not condign — that is, equally good — neither is the work in grace equally good with the increase of temporal grace and everlasting glory, as is argued above.

Again, if this is congruous by congruity consequent to the divine will, namely because God wills so to be done — then also one who does no good but sins mortally and most gravely (as Paul did when, still breathing of threats and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, he was striving to delete the Christian name) merits of congruity grace to be given to him; because God wills so to be done. For He through His operating grace gratuitously prevenes sinners, as is shown above. And if it be said that God gives to such grace, but not for such evil deeds, and therefore through such they do not merit of congruity grace to be given to them — therefore according to these, to those who merit the first grace of congruity, God gives it on account of their prior merits; therefore grace already is not grace (as is argued above); and even then those merits antecedently and causally a priori move the divine will and cause volition in it — the contrary of which was being said: namely, that it is congruous that God so do by congruity only consequent to the divine will. The contrary of this also Chapter 20 was showing.

Again, Augustine on Psalm 118, Render to Thy servant, distinguishing a fourfold rendering, shows that God renders good for evil. For he says: "There are four renderings: either evils for evils are rendered, as God will render eternal fire to the impious; or goods for goods, as He will render the eternal kingdom to the just; or goods for evils, as Christ through grace justifies the impious; or evils for goods, as Judas through malice persecuted Christ. Of these four renderings the first two pertain to justice, the third to mercy; the fourth God knows not. Now the third is first necessary; for unless He should render goods for evils, in no way would there be those to whom He should render goods for goods."

This reason can also be made under another form: Since one merits God's grace of congruity — either because God so wills it to be, therefore it is congruous; or because this is congruous, therefore God so wills it to be. If the first be granted, similarly so it is condign, and so it is of the worst worker; and even then it is just posterior to the divine will, wherefore it is not the cause of it. For prior in nature God wills so to be, and in so willing makes it congruous — therefore it is not because it is congruous that God wills so to be. If the second be granted, then by Chapter 20 this is not a positive and contingent just (capable of being otherwise) — for every such just depends on the divine will — but rather a necessarily absolute just, or at least a mixed just. And so, supposing that such a deed is of necessity, it is just; and so God of necessity of preserving justice would give grace to one so meriting.

Again, God can freely not give grace to one so working. Let it be supposed therefore that He does not. Then it is not congruous; or if to one so working He gives grace, and to another similarly working does not give it — therefore this is not per se congruous, and so willed by God, but contrariwise.

Again, it is easier for any one existing in grace to merit of congruity that God love him — or that He love him more unto life — than for one lacking grace to merit the first grace and that he be loved by God unto life eternal. But one foreknown to death, existing in grace, cannot do this, as is argued above.

Again, since one merits anything from God of congruity — since every congruous is just (because every unjust is incongruous) — that is just, and the opposite of it unjust; wherefore impossible concerning God, as the first Supposition and the third part of the First Corollary prove. And Anselm says, Cur Deus homo I.10: "In God any unfitting thing, however small, follows impossibility"; and if the opposite of it be impossible, this is necessary; and every necessary just is condign. Whoever therefore merits anything from God of congruity, merits also of condignity.

It is said perhaps, that someone merits anything from God of congruity because, if God should render this, it is congruous. And certainly so it is, if God should render him punishment; therefore he merits no more of congruity grace than punishment. And similarly, if God should render grace to one most gravely sinning, it is congruous; therefore he merits it of congruity. And if two work altogether similarly, and God gives to the one grace and to the other gives nothing, the one merits it of congruity, and the other not — although yet he works similarly in all things. And even if God so render, so to happen is condign; for nothing in such things is worthy or condign, save because it is willed by God — since neither is it reasonable or just, as Chapter 21 showed; and Esther 6: To such honour he is condign, whomever the King wills to honour.

Again, according to these: man lacking grace can merit something of condignity, but grace only of congruity. Either then there is some maximum which he can merit of condignity, or some minimum which he cannot. If the maximum which he can be granted, let it be A; either then A is a finite good or infinite. If finite — he can yet merit something more; A therefore is not the maximum which he can merit. If infinite — this does not seem so; because every act of his was finite, and all together finite in merit and value; and because still he could merit more, nor could God reward him condignly, since He cannot make an infinite (as appears from the showing of Part 40 of the First Corollary). Nor can the first division be denied: that if some good can be merited of condignity, and some not. For let a small good be taken which can be merited condignly, which imaginatively grows continuously until it is as much as cannot be condignly merited. Then A in some instant — which is B — will begin to be as much as such a one cannot condignly merit. Either then A in B begins to be intrinsically as much (namely, that then primally it will be so much), and then there is some thing surely which he cannot condignly merit. For he cannot condignly merit as much as A will then be, but anything less he can. Or A begins extrinsically to be as much as such a one cannot condignly merit (namely, that then it will not be so much, but immediately afterwards it will be); and then A will be the maximum which such a one can condignly merit. Since he can condignly merit so much as A will be in B, as is given, and nothing further greater than it.

Again, let John and Peter, infidels equally and equally long, merit of congruity the first graces to be given to them; and let John, after some time in instant A, receive grace according to what he merited; but Peter dies in A. Since therefore he merited equally with John, nor through him does it happen that he dies (as I posit), God will reward him of congruity with equal grace, and will finally save him — although he has been baptized with no baptism of water, of spirit, or of blood. Which seems contrary to the Gospel, and to all Doctors, and to the general faith of the Church. Whence John 3: Unless one be born again of water and the spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. And this literally and really, or at least spiritually and virtually (as the Doctors expound), which happens in adults by believing and willing to be baptized, or by shedding their own blood for the love of God.

Again, Augustine says, On Grace and Free Choice, ch. 50: "Let men suspect whatever good merits they think to precede, that they may be justified by God's grace — not understanding, when they say this, anything other than denying themselves grace." Therefore they who place merits of congruity before God's grace, deny God's grace.

Perhaps someone will object against what has been said. First, by proving that someone can merit eternal glory condignly. For Wisdom 3 says of the Just: "In few things they were vexed, in many they shall be well disposed, because God hath tried them and found them worthy of himself"; and Ecclesiasticus 26: "All the weighing is not worth a continent soul" — therefore the continent soul condignly merits an infinite reward. And Luke 10: "The labourer is worthy of his hire" — but the hire of the labourers in the vineyard of Christ is the penny of infinite glory. And below in the same Gospel, chapter 20: "They that shall be accounted worthy of that world, and of the resurrection from the dead," etc. And Apocalypse 3: "They shall walk with me in white, because they are worthy," with many other similar passages.

Reason makes the same point clear. For every virtuous act is incomparably better than any useful or pleasurable good distinguished against the honest, virtuous, and just good; otherwise the useful or pleasurable good could be increased to such a degree that it would be equally good with the felicity which consists in virtuous acts, as is shown in Ethics 1.9 and following. Indeed, it would even be better; and so, since felicity is the greatest human good, as is shown there and elsewhere, by all the common philosophers and theologians, it would have to be placed in money or pleasures — against all who are sound and wise, and against the entire process of the said Philosopher. Then also a great good given, or a pleasurable thing forgone, would be received by God as much as the greatest virtuous act; and also a man, even according to right reason, could equally or more elect riches and eternal pleasures without justice and virtue (even when he is bound to the act of virtue), although by so electing he sins and does the contrary of reason.

Moreover, it seems that that is better for a man which, when had, necessarily makes him good, than that which when had does not so make him, but allows him to be evil and miserable. But the virtuous act, when had by anyone, necessarily makes him good; whereas all money and pleasure can be present in any evil and miserable person whatsoever. Thus the Philosopher proves in Ethics 1.12 that felicity is to be placed not in possession or habit, but in operation. For he says: "It makes no small difference whether one judges the best to lie in possession or in use, in habit or in operation. For a habit may exist while accomplishing no good, as in one who is sleeping or otherwise idle; but operation cannot — for he will operate of necessity, and will operate well."

Again, he who loves God above all things with his whole heart, and does all things on his account, cannot be condignly recompensed with anything less than God. For no love seems to be condignly recompensable with a good less than that which the lover prefers his beloved to, and which he would relinquish sooner than the beloved. For if love is to be recompensed with love, then the greater with the greater, and the equal with the equal; otherwise the due proportion would limp. But love in one who is able cannot be idle: for to love is to will good to the beloved and to do it, as the foregoing in chapter 39 of this work teaches. Therefore God, omnipotent, loved by man above all things with the whole heart, condignly loving him equally in return, wills good to him — a good above all goods; and this he can do; therefore he renders it to him, or shall render it at the opportune time. But such a good, above all other goods, is only God himself. Therefore God will condignly render himself to one who so loves; as is also evident from what is shown in the 32nd and 34th parts of the first corollary of this work. Whence Anselm, Monologion 70: "Nothing can be the reward of this love except that which surpasses all natures: For what shall the highest goodness render to one loving and desiring it, except itself? For whatever else it should render, it does not render, since it is neither matched with love, nor consoles the lover, nor satisfies the one desiring." For which the Philosopher in Ethics 9.1 says: "But they contend, since other things become theirs, and not what they crave. For it is similar to becoming nothing, when one does not obtain what he craves."

This is again confirmed: For friendship and love, as it seems, condignly require such proportionality, that as much as the lover would do for the beloved proportionally according to his own powers (or above them, if he could), so much should the beloved do for the lover proportionally according to his powers. But man so loving God would do for him, and would give him if he could, a good above all goods, and a better one. Therefore God, since he is omnipotent, will condignly do as much for him.

Again, that man can condignly merit some good, seems clear. For every good work is essentially and inseparably followed by a certain goodness, a certain rectitude, a certain justice, beauty, decency or honesty, or even actual being-good, right, and just; and this seems to be some reward of his, which he condignly merits.

Furthermore, it ill befits the highest justice and most clement goodness to be more prompt to punish sinners than to reward those who do well, as also seems clear from the 31st part of the first corollary of this work. But every sinner is immediately and inseparably followed by his own punishment, namely injustice, sin, and the servitude of sin, the privation of the justice and liberty he had before — at least with respect to those injustices and servitudes which he then newly incurs — as is also evident through the same 31st part. Therefore the contrary holds in every good deed.

Although it should be sufficiently clear that anyone who sins, by that very fact necessarily and inseparably incurs sin, injustice, and servitude to sin, becoming a sinner, an unjust man, and a slave to sin, with the privations mentioned above and many similar evils, which remain in him even after the act of sinning (just as they inhered in him when he actually sinned), all of which are a worthy punishment of the prior sin or of sinning — yet this can be confirmed from abundance by certain authentic testimonies. For the Author of authors says, John 8: "Everyone that committeth sin is the servant of sin." Whence also Job 7: "I have sinned: what shall I do to thee, O keeper of men? Why hast thou set me opposite thee?" — namely, through sin — "and I am become burdensome to myself," namely, through punishment. Upon which Gregory says in Moralia 8.22: "This contrariety of guilt has been made for man the weight of punishment, that he should serve as a slave to his evil corruption — he who, when well a servant, used to rejoice in the liberty of incorruption."

The same is the view of Augustine in De Libero Arbitrio 1.20 and 2.1, but more manifestly in 3.19 and following, where he shows that every vice and sin is a corruption of nature and of some natural good. The same is evident through him in De Civitate Dei 12.6 and Enchiridion 7. Most manifestly does he show this in De Libero Arbitrio 3.24, saying: "Since no one overcomes the laws of the omnipotent Creator, the soul is not allowed not to render its debt: For either it renders by using well what it has received, or by losing what it would not use well. Therefore, if it does not render by doing justice, it will render by suffering misery. And these are not divided by any interval of time — as if at one time it should not do what it ought, and at another suffer what it ought — lest even for a moment of time the universal beauty be marred, so that there should be in it the disgrace of sin without the comeliness of vindication."

This also appears jointly in good deeds and evil ones. For Hermes says of God: "Who justifies the work of no evildoer, and deprives no benefactor of rewards." With which Aristotle agrees concordantly in the last book of De Mundo: "Always," he says, "is he accompanied by vengeance, or by punishing or tormenting justice, of those who abandon the divine law; but the blessed and happy man is from the beginning forthwith a partaker of justice." Genesis 4 also says: "Is it not so, that if thou doest well, thou shalt receive" — namely, immediately — "but if ill, sin shall forthwith be present at the door?" And Augustine says in De Genesi ad Litteram 8.31: "Divine providence, ruling the universal creature, administers natures, that they may be willing — that the good may not be unfruitful, nor the evil unpunished. For those who will evil have within themselves their own interior punishment, namely that very iniquity of theirs. So therefore the good have within themselves their own interior reward, namely the equity and rectitude of their deed itself." The same in De Quantitate Animae, last chapter: "The supreme and true God by an incorrupt law rules everything that he has founded; he forsakes the soul in no act without punishment or reward." The same on Psalm 118: "I have sworn and am determined to keep the judgments of thy justice"; "By faith are kept the judgments of God's justice, since under God the just judge, no right deed is believed to be unfruitful, nor any sin unpunished."

Again, to be loved or hated by God seems no small reward or punishment; but God loves those who do well and hates those who sin. For Aristotle says in Rhetoric 2.28: "If you should speak just things, men will hate you; if unjust, the gods. But if you should speak just things, the gods will love you; if unjust, men." The same in De Bona Fortuna 1: "We deem God worthy, who is Lord of such things, that he distributes both goods and evils to the worthy." The same in Ethics 10.13: "He who operates according to intellect, and cherishes it, and is best disposed, seems to be most beloved of God: For if there is any care of human things on the part of the gods, as it seems, it would also be reasonable that they should rejoice over what is best and most akin — and this will be intellect — and that they should beneficence in return those most loving and honoring it, as friends caring for them." Where Averroes: "If God has care of men, as is believed, and as ought to be, he rejoices over the better, and it is more worthy that he should benefit those who love him more, and that he should honor and visit them, as is the disposition of friend with friend."

Boethius in De Consolatione Philosophiae 4, prose 1, says: "By that very Author, of whose kingdom we now speak, you shall know that the good are always powerful, but the evil abject and always feeble; and that vices are never without punishment, nor virtues without reward." The same speaking specifically of virtue and virtuous works, De Consolatione 3, prose 4: "There is in virtue a dignity proper to it, which it forthwith transfuses into those to whom it has been joined." And he understands, as it seems, both here and earlier, by "virtue" not only the habit but also the act. With which Ovid concordantly speaks in De Ponto:

"Hardly will you find one in many thousands
Who thinks virtue is its own reward;
The very beauty of a right deed, if rewards are absent, Moves no one, and one repents to be honest for nothing."

Whence also Averroes on Ethics 1.12: "An act which is done according to the requirement of virtue is virtue." And Augustine on Psalm 36 ("The just is merciful, and lendeth"): "If he has wherewithal outwardly, charity itself gives; but if he does not have, he gives benevolence; he always has wherewith to give, whose breast is full of charity." This itself is charity, which is also called good will, and there he takes "will" for the act of will, as the whole process shows. The same in De Doctrina Christiana 3.10, as Peter [Lombard] also recites in Sentences 1, distinction 17: "I call charity," he says, "the motion of the soul to the enjoyment of God on his own account, and of oneself and one's neighbor on God's account." The same in De Moribus Ecclesiae Catholicae, treating that word of the Apostle, "Neither death nor life shall be able to separate us from the charity of God": "The charity of God," he says, "is here said to be a virtue, which is the most right affection of our soul, which conjoins us to God, by which we love." In a similar manner does the Prophet seem to speak when he says: "I have done judgment and justice" — that is, the act of justice, or work — which Augustine, expounding, says: "By the name of justice in this place is signified not the virtue itself, but the work thereof."

It is also commonly said, and the thirty-first part of the first corollary teaches, that God rewards good merits beyond what is condign; therefore good merit demands something condignly. Furthermore, what God wills to be done, and promises to those rightly working, is worthy to be done, and condignly so; but he himself wills and promises that those who perseveringly do well shall have for their hire eternal glory; therefore they condignly merit it.

Again, Christ merited for himself and for us many goods, as Lombard cites in Sentences 3, distinctions 18, 19, and following; and who would dare to assert that he did not merit these condignly — especially since, as Christ exceeds any pure man infinitely, so the merit of Christ seems to exceed the merit of any pure man? Therefore Christ could merit however much condignly. For which Anselm says in Cur Deus Homo 2.14: "Do you think such a gift, so lovable, can suffice to satisfy what is owed for the sins of the whole world?" — and he answers: "Indeed, it can do infinitely more"; therefore he condignly merited eternal glory for all to be saved. Whence Apocalypse 5: "Worthy art thou, O Lord, to take the book and to open the seals thereof, because thou wast slain and hast redeemed us to God in thy blood, and hast made us a kingdom to our God." Behold what he merited for us condignly! And it follows: "Worthy is the Lamb who was slain to receive power and divinity and wisdom and strength and honour and glory and benediction": behold what he condignly merited for himself!

Furthermore, just as it was argued earlier that no one merits any good condignly, so likewise it could altogether be argued that no one merits any evil condignly — which, if anyone should concede, he would be forced consequently to concede that God is unjust, who punishes sinners so grievously when they have merited no punishment condignly. He would also confess that the Scripture of truth lies. Whence Job 11: "Would that God spake with thee, and that thou mightest understand that thou art required less by him than thy iniquity deserveth"; upon which Gregory says in Moralia 10.6: "He who understands the multiplicity of God's law weighs how much less are all the things he suffers." And Job 33: "I have sinned and indeed offended, and as I was deserving I have not received." And Psalm 84: "Thou hast mitigated all thy wrath." And Habakkuk 3: "When thou art angry, thou shalt remember mercy." With which there are many other similar things in Scripture.

Indeed the Apostle says, Romans 6: "The wages of sin is death; but the grace of God, life everlasting." Gloss: "Eternal death is the wage of sin — that is, the worthy retribution for sin; but eternal life is given by the grace of God alone" — which exposition he confirms by many authorities of many [Fathers].

Furthermore, one of the foregoing arguments — that wishing to show that whatever a man merits de congruo, he also merits de condigno — is against the common school, or at least against a great part of it, which distinguishes these from one another.

RESPONSE TO THE OBJECTIONS

But that the objections may be more easily resolved, it must be known that God and man are not related in the same way to rendering reward for any merit, good or evil. For man, as a king or another, by public edict promulgates that whoever shall do such-and-such a good or evil shall receive this or that for a fitting wage; and he himself remains indifferent and undetermined in his will toward those subject to him as to who shall have what. And if one does such a good thing, another however does an evil thing, then by this his indifference of will is determined; and by this also, antecedently, causally, and efficiently is his will moved to willing and to rewarding and punishing this man and that according to their preceding merits.

But not so does God act, who from himself alone, begging nothing from anything posterior, always equally determinately wills, and does not will, whatever things he does or does not will — as the 20th, 21st, 23rd, 25th, 27th, and following chapters have taught. Which the Apostle most plainly testifies, Romans 9, on Jacob and Esau, saying: "When the children were not yet born, nor had done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works but of him that calleth, it was said: The elder shall serve the younger; as it is written: Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated."

And if anyone should object that the whole of sacred Scripture, and all the Doctors, indeed the universal Church, indubitably affirm that God will reward the good because of their good merits, and will punish the evil because of their evil merits — since because, for, therefore, and similar [particles] frequently signify some cause — it must first be shown that merit is no cause of the eternal reward that follows.

For it is not a material cause, since the material cause is necessarily simultaneous with what it materializes, but the meritorious act, by which one merited that reward, does not then remain. Nor is it a formal cause: for the formal cause is necessarily simultaneous with what it informs. Nor a final cause, because the contrary seems more the case, as appears from chapter 35 of this work. Nor an efficient cause — which yet seems most plausible — for it can be neither in act nor in potency. Not in act: For according to the Philosopher in Metaphysics 5.3, "singular agents are simultaneous in being and not-being with the very things of which they are causes, as this physician with this convalescent, and this builder with this building." But the meritorious act precedes the reward in time, and is not simultaneous with it. Nor is it the efficient cause of the reward in potency, for then it would sometime issue into act, and would actually effect the eternal reward, and then, as has been said, would be simultaneous with it. Nor can anyone say that merit is the efficient cause of the reward because it then first moves the will of God (which is naturally indeterminate beforehand) and determines it, effecting in it the actual and certain volition of conferring the reward — for the 20th, 23rd, 25th, and 35th chapters of this work forbid that it be so said.

Furthermore, it must be noted that this particle propter (because, for the sake of) is multiple by mode of equivocation. For first and principally it signifies a cause of being; secondarily and somewhat transumptively it signifies a cause of knowing or making known; and sometimes it signifies an order. That it signifies a cause of being, no one is ignorant. That it also signifies a cause of knowing is clear from the Philosopher in Posterior Analytics 1.12, who says that if, in things equally predicable (that is, convertible — as that the planets are near, which is a cause, and that they do not twinkle, which is its effect, not a cause), the effect should be more known, then demonstration will be through it: as that the planets are near because they do not twinkle. Behold, according to him, this propter there does not signify a cause of being, but the effect, which is only a cause of knowing. Whence, with the demonstrative syllogism ordered through the terms A, B, C, he subjoins: "Therefore it is demonstrated that the wandering bodies are near." This syllogism therefore is not propter quid (a why-syllogism) but propter quia (a because-syllogism). For it is not from this — that they do not twinkle — that they are near; but from this — that they are near — that they do not twinkle. See how he first concedes, and second denies, that the planets are near because they do not twinkle: this is because propter signifies for him first only a cause of knowing, secondarily however a cause of being.

This also accords with the whole process of that chapter and of those following, where demonstration from effect is called demonstration quia; even though this particle quia signifies a cause, just as propter does — therefore it there signifies only a cause of knowing. Although Donatus irrationally subordinates quia, quapropter, propterea, and many similar particles, which are manifestly causal, to the non-causal but rational power of the conjunction; just as he subordinates to the causal power si (if), nisi (unless), and such — which would more properly have been subordinated to the conditional power, which he wholly omitted.

This is also sufficiently proved by that frequent and common example of the Philosopher: namely, why (propter quid) are the angles of a triangle equal to two right angles? Because (propter id quod) the exterior angle is equal to the two interior opposite to it. Yet the quantity of the exterior angle is in no way the cause — indeed not even the effect — of the three angles of a triangle being equal to two right angles. For neither of these is the material, efficient, formal, nor final cause of the other, since both can always exist without the other. That the exterior angle is equal to the two interior opposite to it, however, is only a cause of our cognition why the three angles of the triangle are equal to two right angles: for through this it is demonstratively taught to be so, as the second part of Euclid's Elements I.32 shows. And so Averroes on Physics 8, comm. 58, says that there are three demonstrations: namely, of the cause; of the being only; and of the cause and the being together.

But lest in the Catholic cause I seem to bring forth only pagan witnesses, behold what the most faithful Paul says: "Christ became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Because of which (propter quod) God hath exalted him, and hath given him a name which is above every name" — namely, that he be called God. Yet this name he had before his Passion; indeed he had this name naturally even before all his merit. For that man was prior naturally [a man] and prior naturally God, before he did anything or merited in any way. For every agent precedes naturally any of its actions. Therefore Christ did not merit being God, but this was given him most graciously, without any preceding merit, as is clear from chapter 35 of this work. Lombard also in Sentences 3, distinction 6, adduces many authorities for this same point; and below, in distinction 18, treating the aforesaid authority of the Apostle, he says that that man did not merit so great a good, namely the name of God; therefore it does not seem that he merited that name in any way through the obedience of his passion — except as regards the cognition and manifestation of it, not to God, but to men, who at first did not know this, and through his Passion, Resurrection, Ascension, and the like learned and truly came to know that he is not only man but also God. And this is what Lombard says there: "How then is this said," he says, "Through obedience this name was given him?" And he answers, according to that very common figure of speech in Scripture: "It is to be taken as that whereby a thing is said to come to be when it becomes known. After the Resurrection, what before was in obscurity is set in the open, that men and demons might know it." Whence the Saviour himself says, John 13: "By this shall all men know that you are my disciples, if you have love one for another."

It might therefore be said that, when it is said "This man, on account of (propter) such-and-such merit, shall receive such-and-such reward," the particle propter does not signify a cause of being, but a cause of knowing. For through merit it is made known to men, demons, and perhaps angels what reward each shall have.

This word propter also sometimes signifies an order, and not incongruously. For according to the foregoing in chapter 35, God first wills reward and glory for man as an end, and therefore wills for him and works in him fitting merits, as certain previous means to this end. Therefore, that they may finally rightly be ordered, he bestows on them the end for which and to which he himself finally ordained them. Therefore propter can sometimes designate order, so that the saying of the Apostle may be understood thus: "He became obedient," etc., "on account of which God exalted him" — that is, after which preceding (ordained by God to the subsequent), which he had decreed should not be done except after that. For which Anselm, treating the same authority of the Apostle in Cur Deus Homo 1.9, says: "But that, when the Apostle had said 'He humbled himself,' etc., 'because of which God,' etc. — this was not so spoken as if he could in no way have come to this exaltation except through this obedience of death, and as if this exaltation were conferred only as a reward for this obedience. (For before he suffered, he himself said that all things had been delivered to him by the Father, and that all things of the Father were his.) But because he, with the Father and the Holy Spirit, had disposed himself to show the height of his omnipotence to the world in no other way than by death — and because what is disposed to come about only through this comes about through it — it is not incongruously said to come about because of it. For if we intend to do something, but propose first to do another thing through which that may be done, when what we wish to precede is now done, if what we intend is done, it is rightly said to be done because of the former, since that is done because of which there had been a delaying, since it had been disposed not to be done except through it. For if I have to cross a river that I can cross by horse and by ship, but propose not to cross except by ship, and on this account delay to cross because the ship is absent — when the ship is at hand, and I cross, it is rightly said of me: 'The ship was ready, and on that account he crossed.' And we speak this way not only when what follows is done through that which we want to precede, but also when it is not done through it, but we have only resolved to do something else after it. For if anyone defers taking food because he has not yet been at the celebration of Mass that day, when what he wished to do first is finished, it is not incongruously said to him: 'Take food now, because you have done that on account of which you delayed taking it.' Therefore much less unusual is the locution when Christ is said to have been exalted because he sustained death, through which and after which he had decreed to do this exaltation."

And he sets down another exposition of the same Apostolic saying in these words: "This can also be understood in that mode by which the same Lord is read to have advanced in wisdom and grace before God — not because it was so, but because he so bore himself as if it were so. For thus by death he was exalted, as if it came about because of it."

If therefore anyone should wish to speak consequently of the merit and reward of our head Christ and of his members the Christians, as regards the proposed causality, behold these three modes of speaking of our authentic Fathers. But because this opinion seems ambiguous and doubtful, and could probably be contradicted — especially if it be transferred from the Head to the members — I would gladly, without prejudice or reproach to my venerable Fathers and Authors, for the sake of the less wise (among whom I, who am insufficient to search the deep things of God, am chief), greatly desire if it were possible a clearer opinion, or that same opinion more clearly expressed and more removed from contradiction. Whence Alexander, as Averroes recites in De Caelo 2, comment 1, says of Aristotle's view: "We are not supported on the opinion of this man among all the others except because we see it to be of less ambiguity and more remote from contradiction."

It seems therefore to me that, with every law of retribution established by the will of God set aside, it is not true that on account of such a good or evil deed such a reward is owed; for then it would be necessary absolutely, and God could not [decide] the contrary without offence to justice, but of absolute necessity would so will and so do externally — as has been argued above. But that such a deed should merit such a reward — this is because God so willed, and so established such in the law, which will and law continually persevere unchanged, as chapter 23 has shown.

When therefore it is said "This man, on account of such-and-such merit, will obtain such-and-such reward," a distinction must be made: For this particle propter can signify a cause which is the virtue and efficacy of such merit alone — and so it is not true, as has just been shown. But if in that merit, indeed above and before the merit, it imports a cause which is the divine will and his law concerning retribution to be made similarly to every good or evil work, then it is true and to be conceded catholically. For because of this, that this man so merited and the law is now established, he shall obtain such a reward — that is, because God wills each one to be rewarded according to his works, and this man so works, therefore he shall obtain such a reward.

And when it is said "God wills to reward this man on account of his merits": if propter signifies a posterior cause in the merit moving the divine will, determining it and educing it from potency to the act of willing — it is not true, as has been shown above. But if it signifies the divine will, truly the cause preceding all merit and reward, which will reward him as he has merited — it is true and certain. For it is true that God has a will, which is the first cause of all merits and likewise of all rewards.

It can also be said congruently in another way that merit is the efficient cause of the reward — not properly, but only transumptively — namely, because it effects in the meritorious one a form by which, according to present justice, he is made suited to the reward or to the punishment; or more briefly: because it makes the meriting one such as that to which alone the reward is ordained. For according to the ordination of present justice, no adult shall obtain the foretold glory or punishment unless first, through his good merits, he has acquired a certain comely form by which he is fittingly formed for obtaining glory; or through his evil merits, a certain deformed form, by which he is fittingly deformed in some manner for punishment. Thus, therefore, on account of merit reward is owed, and merit is an effective cause of reward, because it induces a form by which a man is made suited to receive the reward — just as a priest and a soldier, on account of having received their orders, the one celebrates and the other fights, and they are honored with their proper honors.

And when it is said "God wills to reward this man on account of his merits": if propter signifies a posterior cause effective of the divine volition, it is to be denied. But if it signifies a cause in the merit somehow effective of a certain form, or even that very form by which this man is made suited to a reward willed for him by God, according to present justice, it is to be conceded. Therefore: "God wills to reward this man on account of his merits" — that is, "this man, on account of his merits in the said manner, is such as God wills and has established to reward."

For which Blessed Bernard, De Gratia et Libero Arbitrio, last chapter, says: "In this God established Paul as a meriter of the crown — when he deigned to have him as a coadjutor of those works to which that crown was promised. Moreover, he made him coadjutor as a willing one — that is, consenting to his will. And so the will is reckoned as an aid into merit. If therefore from God comes the will and the merit, it is no doubt that from God comes both willing and accomplishing for good will. Therefore God is the author of merit, who both applies the will to the work, and unfolds the work through the will. Otherwise, if those things we have called our merits are properly so called, they are certain seedplots of hope, incentives of charity, indications of hidden predestination, presages of future felicity, the way of the kingdom, not the cause of reigning."

Furthermore, in a third way, not incongruously, it can be said: "This man is to be rewarded on account of his merits" — that is, on account of merits to be ordered, so that propter there signifies the final cause of the order of the universe, most fittingly predestined by God. For it does not befit that the universal order should be perturbed in the smallest matter, as the treatise on Providence makes manifest. And Augustine says in De Libero Arbitrio 1.13: "The eternal law of God is that by which it is just that all things be most ordered." And Anselm in Cur Deus Homo 1.12: "It does not befit God to leave anything inordinate in his kingdom." And according to the same, in the same place: "To order rightly a sin without satisfaction is nothing other than to punish it"; through which he shows that every sin without satisfaction is necessarily to be punished. And Augustine, supported by similar reasoning, De Libero Arbitrio 3.24, shows the same; indeed, that "sin and punishment are not divided by any interval of time, lest even by a moment of time the universal beauty be marred." Therefore likewise it must stand in things rightly done, as the present chapter has shown above. And this mode of speaking accords with the second mode recited above from Anselm.

When therefore it is said "This man is to be rewarded on account of his merits," this is: "This man is to be rewarded on account of merits to be finally ordered" — that is, on account of the final order of merits foretold by God. And when it is said "God wills to reward this man on account of his merits": this is, "God wills to reward this man on account of merits to be finally ordered," that is, "He wills that such be the end of such merits, according to the order foreordained by him for such things," — so that the merits in no way antecedently, causally, a priori move, determine, or actuate the divine will to render rewards. Whence Avicenna Metaphysics 8.7: "God," he says, "loves the order of the goodness of the universe, but does not suffer from it nor concupisce it."

And if anyone should still ask: "If not on account of merits, why then does he choose or reprobate this man or that?" — chapter 21 and other [chapters] respond. For when the why is sought after, the formal cause of that volition is, in a manner, God himself; the prior efficient cause, in a manner, is his will; the posterior, however, among created things, is none whatsoever. And this is what the Apostle says, Romans 9, when he had foretold that God loved Jacob and hated Esau, and this not from works, but from his will, that the purpose of God according to election might stand — he introduces a questioner asking the aforesaid question, to whom he thus responds: "Who resisteth his will? O man, who art thou that repliest against God?" — as if he should say: There is no such cause prohibiting or effecting the divine will, by which it could be answered why he loved this man and hated that. And forthwith by locus a simili or a minori, he proves it thus: "Doth the thing formed say to him that formed it: Why hast thou made me thus?" — that is: on account of what preponderating reason, motive, and effective of thy volition? Certainly not. Indeed, without any prior preponderating reason, he can freely from the same lump make one such vessel, and another otherwise; and this is what he subjoins: "Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour?"

And below, chapter 11, he says the same more plainly: "O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God! How incomprehensible are his judgments, and how unsearchable his ways!" — namely, by any prior effective reason, since none such exists at all. And this is what he immediately subjoins: "For who hath known the mind of the Lord?" — namely, any preceding reason why he so did, as if he should say: No one, since this is not knowable, since it is not true. And he adds more expressly: "Or who hath been his counsellor?" — namely, what posterior caused thing was the prior cause, and as it were offering a reason on which the divine counsel relied in working? Therefore most plainly he immediately subjoins: "Or who hath first given to him, and recompense shall be made him?" — as if he should say: No one, nor any thing posterior to God himself; which he forthwith ostensibly demonstrates, when he says: "For of him, and by him, and in him, are all things," — in the manner that chapter 20 and others teach the same conclusion.

Whence also Augustine, De Correptione et Gratia 12, says: "Why are these called thus, those otherwise, and yet others by innumerable and diverse modes? Far be it from us to say that the judgment is the clay's, not the potter's." Augustine in this part follows not only the Apostle, but also the Sage, Wisdom 15, saying thus: "The potter, of the same clay maketh vessels that are clean, and likewise such as serve to the contrary uses; but what is the use of these vessels, the potter is the judge." And again, De Correptione et Gratia 25: "If it be asked of me, Why did God not give them perseverance to whom he gave that love by which they would live as Christians, I answer that I do not know"; and there [Augustine cites] the Apostle: "O man, who art thou that repliest against God?" — and: "O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God," etc.

The same in De Bono Perseverantiae 16: "Why, you ask, in the same case, will he punish me rather than him? Or will he free him rather than me? If you ask why, this I do not say — because I confess that I find nothing to say, since in this matter, as his justice is just, so are his judgments, as his mercy is great, so are they unsearchable."

But if a why be sought as final cause — and this regarding the reprobation of the wicked, since this disturbs many more — it must be said, according to chapter 21, that the ultimate final cause is God himself: "The Lord hath made all things for himself, the wicked also for the evil day," Proverbs 16. Behold: the wicked one for the evil day, finally and ultimately, the Lord hath made for himself.

The intermediate final cause, however, is as manifold as are the many goods which proceed from the reprobate, of which the 31st part of this work and chapter 34 unfold some. One of these is the manifestation of the Lord's dominion and his power, as he himself testifies, Exodus 9: "Therefore have I raised thee up," namely Pharaoh, "to set me against thee, that I may show in thee my might, and that my name may be declared in all the earth." For if Pharaoh had in no way resisted the Lord, how would God have shown so many miracles? And Psalms 105: "He saved them for his name's sake, that he might make his power known." By this same authority, in like manner, the Apostle responds, Romans 9, when he says: "For the Scripture saith: For this purpose I have raised thee up, that I may show my power in thee, and that my name may be declared throughout all the earth." And it follows: "What if God, willing to show his wrath and to make his power known, endured with much patience vessels of wrath fitted for destruction," etc.

But because, according to chapter 21 of this work, man is the end of all other things, and the elect men are in some manner the end of the reprobate, therefore the reprobate are finally ordered to the utility of the elect. Whence the Apostle, Romans 9: "The elder shall serve the younger," namely the reprobate the elect; and below, chapter 11: "Enemies for your sake," namely the elect;

and 2 Corinthians 4: "All things for your sake"; and 2 Timothy 2 more expressly: "I endure all things for the sake of the elect, that they also may obtain the salvation." For this same point there is the testimony of God, which is greater, Exodus 10, where Moses says of Pharaoh: "I have hardened his heart, and the heart of his servants, that I may work these my signs in him, and thou mayst tell in the ears of thy son and of thy grandsons, how often I have crushed the Egyptians and wrought my signs among them, and that you may know that I am the Lord." Behold the final cause: "That you may know," namely, you, the elect, "that I am the Lord." For how would the wicked fear God, and the good love him so much, unless they had seen, or heard, that hand of God so mighty — so powerful an avenger of the wicked, but so vigorous a helper of the good — as all those miracles concerning the Egyptians and the Hebrews terribly and lovably make manifest.

There is in addition another final cause not small, but a great utility of the elect: namely, that the punishment of one might be the fear of many — indeed, more truly, that the punishment of many might be the fear of a few (for many are called, but few are chosen); namely, that the elect, knowing the guilt and perpetual punishments of the reprobate, may be roused to offices of fear and humility, and turned to the urgency of constant prayer.

Wherefore Augustine, De Bono Perseverantiae 17: "It seems to men that all who appear to be good faithful ones ought to receive perseverance unto the end. But God has judged it better to mix certain ones who will not persevere with the certain number of his saints, that those for whom security in the temptation of this life is not expedient may not be secure. For many are kept back from a pernicious haughtiness by what the Apostle says: Wherefore he that thinketh himself to stand, let him take heed lest he fall." And below, chapter 37: "For this reason, indeed, are the not-persevering mingled with the persevering by the most provident will of God: that we may learn not to be high-minded but to consent to the humble, and to work out our own salvation with fear and trembling. For it is God who worketh in us both to will and to accomplish for his good pleasure."

The same, De Sancta Virginitate 16: "Is it to be believed that God permits, on no other account, that there should be mixed with the number of your profession many men and women who shall fall, except that, as these fall, your fear may be increased, by which pride is repressed — which God so hates that against this alone the Most High humbled himself?"

There is yet a third cause, not small: namely, that the sons of grace and the elect, seeing that they are separated from the reprobate not by their own merits but freely by the grace of God, the grace of God may appear more pleasing, and the elect, sons of grace, may be rendered more thankful to the most Gracious Author of grace.

Whence Augustine on the title of Psalm 87: "Shall thy wonders be known in the dark?" etc. — "There occurred," he says, "the question what is the use of these dead [reprobates], what God may do with them for the utility of his body, which is the Church"; that there might be demonstrated in them what the grace of God is in the predestined, who according to purpose are called. Whence the body itself in another psalm says: "My God, his mercy shall prevent me." These reprobates, indeed, are useful to the elect not only on the way, but even in the fatherland: namely, that, their misery being seen, the glory of these may be more pleasingly held. For things opposed, placed next to one another, appear more, as the 34th part discloses; and so much more dearly is loved the most gratuitous Liberator and most gracious Rewarder, who could equally have damned these as those eternally. Whence Psalm 57 says: "The just shall rejoice when he shall see the revenge." And the last chapter of Isaiah: "And they shall go out and see the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against me: their worm shall not die, and their fire shall not be quenched, and they shall be a sight to satiety to all flesh." Where the Gloss on the words "to a sight of satiety": "Because they shall see them separated from themselves by just judgment, with the loss of the power by which they raged against the good, and a vengeance upon them so great that they shall not seek a greater — they who now say: How long, Lord, dost thou not avenge our blood? They shall also be satisfied with their own beatitude, giving thanks, having seen the unspeakable punishment of the impious."

Wherefore Gregory, Homily 40, treating that gospel story of the rich man buried in hell and the beggar Lazarus carried into the bosom of Abraham, writes thus: "The just always behold the unjust in torments, that hence their joy may grow, since they look upon the evil which they have mercifully escaped, and refer the more thanks to their Redeemer, the more they see what they themselves could have suffered in others, had they been left. Nor does the sight of the punishment of the reprobate cloud that brightness of so great a beatitude in the mind of the just, since, where there shall now be no compassion of misery, doubtless the joy of the good shall not be lessened. But what wonder is it, if while the just behold the torments of the unjust, this comes to them as a service of joys; since even in painting black color is laid underneath, that white or red may appear more bright? Thus, therefore, as has been said, the joys of the good grow as much as the evils of the damned lie beneath their eyes, which they have escaped; and although their joys suffice them fully to enjoy, yet without doubt they always behold the evils of the reprobate; for those who see the brightness of their Creator, nothing is done in the creature which they cannot see."

The same in Dialogues 4.46, to Peter asking: "But no just man is fed by the cruelty of the offender; the slave is commanded to be beaten by the just Lord that he may be corrected from wickedness; therefore he is beaten in order that he may amend. But if the wicked, handed over to the fires of hell, do not come to correction, to what end shall they always burn?" Thus he responds: "But the omnipotent God, who is merciful, is not fed by the torment of the miserable; but because he is just, he is not appeased forever from the avenging of the iniquitous. But all the iniquitous, deputed to eternal punishment, are punished indeed for their own iniquity, and yet shall burn for some end — namely, that all the just may both see in God the joys which they receive, and may behold their tortures which they have escaped; that they may know themselves so much more to be eternal debtors to divine grace, the more they observe in eternity the evils to be punished which by his help they have overcome."

Wherefore Augustine, On the Joys of the Just and the Punishments of the Evil, says thus: "Then the common defendant and enemy, the devil, will be condemned in the sight of all the elect of God, whose damnation and intolerable punishment will offer a delightful spectacle to the elect; then with most ardent love they will love their Liberator and the Giver of all goods, and without end and without weariness they will praise him with the cry of their heart." Peter [Lombard] also professes this opinion in Sentences 4, last distinction.

Therefore, supposing that the misery of the damned somehow is of value to the glory of those to be saved, it can be argued that God ordained the former finally to the latter. Otherwise, this would happen by chance or fortune, and would not proceed from divine providence; therefore those to be saved would not be bound to give thanks to God for that portion of their glory — against chapter 27 and others that follow. Therefore this also plainly seems to be the opinion of the Apostle, Romans 9, in the solution of this same question, when he says: "God endured with much patience vessels of wrath fitted unto destruction, that he might show the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he hath prepared unto glory."

Whence Augustine, De Praedestinatione Sanctorum 10: "Why does God not teach all, the Apostle has uncovered: because willing to show his wrath, and to make his power known, he brought forth in much patience vessels of wrath, which were perfected unto perdition, that he might make known the riches of his glory on vessels of mercy, which he hath prepared unto glory." The same more expressly, Contra Iulianum 5.6: "Of the number of the elect no one perishes; but the rest of mortals, who are not of this number, but indeed of that same lump from which these come — having been made vessels of wrath — are born for the utility of these. For God neither rashly nor by chance creates any of them, nor is ignorant of what good he might work concerning them; since by this very fact he works good — that he creates the human nature in them, and from them adorns the order of the present age." Behold a threefold good from the reprobate: the utility of the elect; the good of nature; and the adornment of the age.

Suppose also, according to the pious zeal of many — though not according to knowledge — that the whole of hell, with all its reprobate inhabitants, were taken from the midst, and there were only heaven with its holy citizens. Then the age would be much perfect, and if God had so made it, he would have done very well. But now, God acts so much more perfectly and so much better, by how much of perfection and goodness those noble damned creatures contain in themselves; and by how much of resplendence and clearer manifestation that comparison, as of an extreme contrariety, confers upon the just — as upon shining sparks, and like stars. For who, or whose reason, would have prohibited the Lord from the beginning, had it pleased him, from creating heaven full of elect in glory and hell full of reprobate in punishment, that this comparatively might have appeared the more glorious — and would have been so? There will not be lacking, however, those who, by human affection, would pity these, and by pious compassion would contend that it ought not so to be done. But why do they not pity little children — not only not sinning, but altogether incapable of sinning — who, dying without the Sacrament of Baptism, are to be punished by the supplication of eternal fire, as Augustine says in De Fide ad Petrum 59 and 24, plainly? Why also do they not contend with God, that he might retract his judgment, by which not by Fate or by chance, but by the counsel of his will, he assumes one such little child to baptism, to the kingdom, to glory, and abandons another, indeed even repels another, in a manner, from baptism to the prison and the punishment, as the authority of Augustine, De Bono Perseverantiae 35, plainly testifies, with others similar to it set forth in chapter 31 of this work? Why do they not also pity the innocent beasts, that they should be subject to so many miseries and so many deaths? Why do they not blame God for these things? Why do they not also accuse the potter, who from the same lump of clay makes one vessel for honor, but another for dishonor and contempt? Is not God as free a Lord of his own as the potter is of his? And this seems to be the reason of the Apostle, Romans 9, in the solution of this question, which is now in our hands.

Indeed, hearken — and diligently hearken; consider — and vigilantly reconsider Augustine in his little book De Praedestinatione et Gratia Dei, which is prefixed in the book of his Sermons as the fifth Sermon, [chapter] 18, writing thus: "With what impudence, finally, will man judge concerning God — clay concerning the potter — not only saying, Why hast thou made me thus, but even concerning others, with damnable curiosity searching out and saying, Why from the same lump didst thou make one in this manner, and another in that? If the human race, which it is plain was first created from nothing, were not born with the debt of death and the original of sin, and yet from them the omnipotent Creator wished to damn some unto eternal destruction — who would say to the omnipotent Creator, Why hast thou done thus? For he who, when they were not, gave them to be, had power to determine the end for which they should be; nor would the rest say, Why with the equal merits of all does the divine arbitration differ? — Because the potter has power over the clay, from the same lump to make one vessel unto honor, and another unto contempt." The same, on the title of Psalm 70, says thus: "In all the holy Scriptures, the grace of God which liberates us commends itself to us, that it may have us as commended ones. For who would say to him, What hast thou done, if he should damn the just? How great therefore is his mercy, if he justifies the unjust!"

And if you should still object that God could have ordered the world and the glory of the elect sufficiently well and congruently by some other more benign mode, and without the perdition of any so noble a creature — therefore it did not befit such a pious and just God to prepare any angel or man for eternal misery freely: I confess undoubtedly that he could so [act], and could have repaired the human race in another way than through the Passion and death of Christ. Why then, out of the whole of compassion, do you not complain that the only-begotten Son of so lofty a King, so innocent, so delicate, so tender — indeed your Lord God — was, on behalf of an offending and miserable slave of his, so contemptibly seized, so cruelly scourged, wounded, lacerated, and finally consummated by a most foul death? Why do you not there recall, annul, and nullify God's judgment? And though, following your will, God should have ordered things more benignly and better — since he could always do better, and better without end — there would always remain the same complaint: Why has he so ordained, and not better, when he could so easily have ordained better?

Let therefore that querulous temerity check itself against God, nor irrationally seek a reason superior to the divine will — since that very [will] in such posterior willed things is the summit of reason, not reason's footwoman or handmaid, but the contrary; for reason follows it as Mistress and Magistress, as chapter 21 demonstrated. Whence Ecclesiastes 8: "I understood that man can find no reason of all those works of God that are done under the sun." Behold, regarding posterior willed things: the more anyone shall labor to seek, the less shall he find; even though the wise man should say he has knowledge, he shall not be able to discover it. Therefore let every human complaint check itself against God, and let it suffice for a reason in all things — that God and the Lord so willed it. Whence Ecclesiastes 7: "Consider the works of God, that no man can correct whom he hath despised. In the good day enjoy good things, and beware beforehand of the evil day: for as he hath made this, so also he hath made that, that man may not find against him just complaints."

Furthermore, perhaps you may turn yourself to canonical authorities, and object that of the Apostle, 1 Timothy 2: "Who will have all men to be saved"; and that of Ezekiel 18: "Is it my will that a sinner should die, saith the Lord, and not that he should be converted, and live?"; and that of Acts 10: "God is not a respecter of persons"; and that of Mark, last chapter: "Preach the gospel to every creature," etc. And Gregory, Moralia 4.24, on that of Job 3 (Now I should sleep silent): "If no putrefaction of sin had corrupted our first parent, he would never have generated from himself sons of hell; but those alone who now through redemption are to be saved would have been born from him as elect."

To these things it must be said: the authorities of sacred Scripture objected cannot be understood according to the literal surface, as chapters 10 and 23 of this work prove. Of these therefore the first — not I, but the Catholic Fathers — expound in many ways. For Ambrose there, expounding the Apostle, first asks: "If God, who is called omnipotent, wills all men to be saved, why is his will not fulfilled?" Secondly he answers: "But in every locution sense and condition lie hidden. Whence Peter the Apostle says: All Scripture needs interpretation. For God wills all men to be saved, but if they come to him. For he does not so will, that the unwilling be saved; but he wills them to be saved, if they themselves will. For he who gave the law to all excepted no one from salvation." And on that of Romans 9, "I will have mercy on whom I have mercy": "He does not judge unjustly who wills all to be saved, with justice remaining."

Augustine also, Enchiridion 77, raises the same question, and after a long discussion concerning the insurmountability of the divine will, in chapter 83 thus responds: "We ought so to understand what is written, Who wills all men to be saved — as if it should be said: no man becomes saved except him whom God himself willed to be saved — not that there is no man whom he wills to be saved." Which, in chapter 84, he confirms by a similar [example], saying thus: "For so we understand what is written in the Gospel: Who enlightens every man — not because there is no man who is not enlightened, but because no one is enlightened except by him." Then he adds another resolution of the same: "Or certainly," he says, "this is so said: Who wills all men to be saved — not that there is no man whom he does not will to be made saved (he who would not work the powers of miracles among those whom he says would have done penance, if he had so worked); but so that we understand by all men every kind of men, distributed by whatever differences: kings, nobles, ignobles, private persons, exalted ones, the humble, the learned and unlearned, those of whole body, the weak, the ingenious, the slower, the foolish, rich, poor, mediocre, males, females, infants, boys, adolescents, young men, old men, in all tongues, in all customs, in all arts, in all professions, in the innumerable variety of pleasures and concupiscences constituted, and whatever other differences are in men." Which exposition, in chapter 85, he shows to accord with the Apostle's process: "The Apostle had ordered," he says, "that prayers be made for all men, and had specifically added, for kings and for those who are in high station — who could be thought, by their more potent pride and worldly haughtiness, to abhor the humility of the Christian faith. Wherefore saying: For this is good before our Saviour Lord — that is, that prayer be also made for such — immediately, that he might remove despair, he added: Who wills all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth"; which he confirms by a similar [comparison] saying: "By this mode of locution the Lord also used in the Gospel, where he says to the Pharisees: You tithe mint, and rue, and cumin, and every herb. For neither did the Pharisees nor any aliens through all the lands of foreigners tithe all the herbs. As therefore every herb, every kind of herbs, so there all men, every kind of men, we can understand." (And this is what is logically often said: that in such expressions distribution can be made for the singulars of genera, or for the genera of singulars, as here: Every animal was in the ark of Noah. Whence Genesis 7: They went in, both they and every beast according to its kind.) And that same exposition of the same saying he sets down in De Correptione et Gratia 61, which he also confirms by the gospel saying just adduced: Who tithe every herb; and through that which Paul says: I please all in all things. And below, [chapter] 74, otherwise he expounds this: "God wills," he says, "all men to be saved — that is, he makes all men will to be saved, since he himself works the willing." And he uses a similar mode of speaking in De Civitate Dei 22.2, as was alleged above. The same also in De Praedestinatione Sanctorum 10 thus expounds a similar saying: "As we speak entirely, when of some master of letters who is alone in the city we say, He teaches everyone here letters — not because all learn, but because no one learns there unless from him whoever learns letters there: so we rightly say, God teaches all to come to Christ, not because all come, but because no one comes otherwise." The same also in De Natura et Gratia says the same — namely, that all are vivified through Christ, since none except through him — as we say that the master of letters in the city teaches all, since none learns except whom he himself has taught.

That objection of Ezekiel, however, is resolved by that distinction concerning willing which chapter 34 made; and if anyone shall wish to weigh his last word — namely, and not that he should be converted, and live — as if this were of the divine will, that every sinner be converted and live: it must be answered according to what has already been said.

And that of Acts mentioned above — God is not a respecter of persons — if it ought to be expounded according to the speaker's mind, it should be understood in the said mode: namely, that God is not a respecter of persons according to genus, not according to species or number. He is not, I say, a respecter of persons according to genus — but rather from every nation and people he calls and receives unto salvation; and this seems to be the mind of Peter the Apostle, who said this. For he, as it seems, first believed that only the Jews were accepted by God to the faith of Christ and the kingdom, according to that of Matthew 15: "I was not sent but to the sheep that are lost of the house of Israel," and earlier in chapter 10: "Go ye not into the way of the Gentiles, and into the city of the Samaritans enter ye not; but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." But after he heard how much grace the Lord had visited even on Cornelius the Gentile, opening his mouth, he said: "In truth I perceive that God is not a respecter of persons; but in every nation, he that feareth him and worketh justice is acceptable to him." Therefore Saint Peter wishes only to say that God is no respecter of those persons who are only of the circumcision, with all others excluded; but that in every other people, nation, or tongue, he that feareth God and worketh justice is acceptable to him. And of the same opinion as Peter were the rest of the faithful from the Jews; and even the other Apostles, as it seems. Whence in the same place: "The faithful of the circumcision who came with Peter were astonished, because the grace of the Holy Spirit was poured out also upon the Gentiles"; and below, chapter 11: "And the apostles and brethren who were in Judea heard that the Gentiles also had received the word of God," and they glorified God.

Whence Augustine, De Bono Perseverantiae 35, says: "What is it that sometimes the children of unbelievers are baptized, but those of believers are not? Surely, that it might be shown that with God there is no respect of persons; otherwise he would liberate the children of believers rather than those of unbelievers." With which his authority in De Correptione et Gratia 27 and De Gratia et Libero Arbitrio 50 agrees, which chapter 31 has.

And that God is a respecter of persons according to number is plain from him in the same book, saying: "This Jesus God hath raised up, and hath made him manifest not to all the people, but to witnesses preordained by God." And below, chapter 13: "And believed, as many as were preordained to eternal life." Whence the Apostle, Romans 4: "According to the purpose of the grace of God, as also David affirmeth the blessedness of the man, to whom God reputeth justice without works." And below, chapter 9: "For when the children were not yet born, nor had done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth, it was said: The elder shall serve the younger." And in the same place: "I will have mercy on whom I have mercy," etc.; "So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy" — together with the whole process of the chapter to this same effect.

Treating which Augustine, Enchiridion 78, says thus: "Both twins were born by nature children of wrath — by no proper works of their own, but originally bound by the chain of damnation from Adam. But he who said, I will have mercy on whom I have mercy, loved Jacob by gratuitous mercy, but hated Esau by debited judgment, which since it was owed to both, in the one the other recognized that he was not to be glorified about his distinct merits — that in the same case he did not incur the same punishment — but about the largesse of divine grace, since it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy."

And in De Bono Perseverantiae 26: "Of two twins, of whom one is taken up, the other left, the outcome is dissimilar, but the merits common." And earlier, chapter 19: "Of two infants equally bound by original sin — why this one is taken, that one left; and of two impious men, already grown in years — why this one is so called that he should follow the Caller, but that one is either not called, or not so called: the judgments of God are unsearchable. Of two pious men, why perseverance to the end is given to this, but is not given to that: the judgments of God are unsearchable."

The same, Enchiridion 75: "Then will not be hidden what now is hidden, why of two one was to be assumed by mercy, the other left by judgment; in which the one who was assumed would recognize what was owed to him by judgment, did not mercy come to his aid; why this one rather than that was assumed, since the cause of both was one." And Blessed Gregory in Moralia 25.14, on that of Job 34, "He himself granting peace, who is he that condemneth?": "Let no one discuss why one is drawn by gift, another repelled by merit." With which Anselm in Proslogion 11 also concords, saying thus to God: "If in any way it can be grasped why you can will to save the wicked, that certainly by no reason can be comprehended: why of similar wicked ones, you should save these more than those by your highest goodness, and damn those more than these by your highest justice."

This Jeremiah, John the Baptist, and the Blessed Virgin Mary plainly prove, who without any preceding merit were sanctified in the womb, while others altogether like them were forsaken. If anyone, however, should fashion for himself any merits whatever for such a sanctification, suppose that another virgin like the glorious Virgin had lived altogether similarly: and if God is in no way a respecter of singular persons, it would follow that God would have similarly been incarnate from her, and so the only Son of God would have had many mothers. But I most firmly believe that even if all the daughters of the house of Jacob had lived as my Lady did, none of them would have been such in divine acceptance; and that he gave to her alone, before all, the honor of being virgin and mother — being uniquely incarnate from her. Yet in no way does it seem that so great a wisdom, which disposes all things sweetly, did not by studious providence singularly and eternally pre-elect a unique mother for himself, but as if negligently left her to be the mother of him to the merits and varying wills of men, and as it were to chance and fortune, and as to the cast of dice.

But because, by revelation of the Lord, I had learned that to reveal and confess the works of God is honorable and grateful — behold a brief story to the same point. I knew a certain young cleric, a devout servant of the glorious Virgin, who, that he might more acceptably serve the most pure Virgin (who has no spot or wrinkle of mind or body), vowed to her perpetual chastity not only of flesh but also of thought, and cleanness of will; and the same vow he renewed daily in his devotions. Envyng him, that crafty serpent who, through a thousand windings and flowing frauds, never ceases to disturb quiet hearts, infused so much venom of temptation that he began solicitously to think and, doubting in some manner, to dispute concerning the value, merit, and reward of chastity — and at length was deceived deceitfully, to such a degree that he held cheap even the chastity of the Blessed Virgin, and consequently her whole most holy life, esteeming that if another woman had led a similar or holier life, she would in other respects have been similar to her, or more blessed. On which account, both in loving and in showing the accustomed observances, he became remiss and tepid. Who, when on a certain night he had given his eyes to sleep, visited by the ray of healing grace, seemed led by someone into a certain pleasant place, like paradise, where there was shown to him a tree incomparably beautiful, and likewise precious, which, rooted in the earth, raised itself into heaven; on whose summit, as in a little nest, a small boy was resting; and the tree was distinguished along its length by spaced and most beautiful knots. To him wishing to know what and what kind of tree this was, the answer was given thus: "This is the virginity of holy Mary." And immediately one of the knots of the tree being opened, like a mouth, a voice was made saying: "And if all the daughters of the house of Jacob had lived as she did, none would have been such."

This whole matter concerning the acceptation and prepositioning of one of equal — and even less worthy — persons is more clear from chapter 21.

To that last [objection] concerning preaching, it must be said as chapters 23 and 25 say concerning prayer. For Christ, who himself preached to men with his own blessed mouth, or through his Apostles, or through any other preachers whatsoever, did not will that all hearers should be compunctioned and acquiesce to the truth — indeed, he did not will that anything else, or otherwise in the smallest degree, should ever be done by any of his sermons than what was fully done, as chapter 10 makes manifest. Whence Isaiah 55: "As the rain and the snow descend from heaven, and return no more thither, but soak the earth, and water it, and make it to spring, and give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater: so shall my word be, which shall go forth from my mouth: it shall not return to me void, but it shall do whatsoever I please, and shall prosper in the things for which I sent it."

And if you should ask: Why then did he will to preach to all indistinctly? — the response is clear from the foregoing. Yet it must be said that he willed this on account of the erudition of the elect and the punishment of the reprobate. Whence Matthew 13 and elsewhere frequently: "Who hath ears to hear, let him hear"; and Matthew 19: "All men take not this word, but they to whom it is given; he that can take, let him take." And John 9: "For judgment I am come into this world, that they who see not may see, and they who see may become blind." And Matthew 13, when asked by the disciples why he preached to the multitudes in parables, he answered: "Because to you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given. Therefore I speak in parables to them, because seeing they see not, and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand: that the prophecy of Isaias may be fulfilled in them, who saith: With the ear you shall hear, and shall not understand: and seeing you shall see, and shall not see. For the heart of this people is grown gross, and with their ears they have heard heavily, and have shut their eyes, lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them." And this is in Isaiah 6 with words slightly different from the foregoing. And in Mark 4 the same is more expressly clear: where, after the Lord had preached to the crowd in parables, he said thus to the twelve Apostles: "To you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God; but to them that are without, all things are done in parables: that seeing they may see and not perceive, and hearing they may hear and not understand, lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them."

But pure men, who do not know how to distinguish between the elect and the reprobate, ought to preach to all, wishing them salvation — just as also to pray for all, as chapters 23 and 25 have shown. Whence Ecclesiastes 11: "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening let not thy hand cease: for thou knowest not which may rather spring up, this or that; and if both together, it shall be the better." Therefore preaching ought to be made to all indistinctly, that the elect may be edified unto life, but the reprobate, that they may be less harmful, and become less evil, and be less damned; or that by such preaching, as by some sword of the Spirit or some spiritual rod of the Lord's mouth, they may be struck; and that to us merit may be increased. For the Apostle says, Ephesians 6: "Take the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God." And Isaiah 11: "He shall strike the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips he shall slay the wicked." And 2 Corinthians 2: "We are the good odour of Christ unto God, in them that are saved and in them that perish: to the one indeed the odour of death unto death; but to the others the odour of life unto life." And Luke 10: "Into whatever house you enter, first say, Peace be to this house; and if the son of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon him; if not, it shall return to you."

Whence Augustine, De Correptione et Gratia 68: "Let men suffer themselves to be corrected when they sin, nor let them argue from the very correction against grace, nor from grace against correction; because both for sins is just punishment owed — to which pertains just correction, which is exhibited medicinally, even if the health of the sick is uncertain, so that, if he who is corrected pertains to the number of the predestined, the correction may be a salutary medicament; if however he does not pertain, the correction is for him a penal torment. Therefore under this uncertainty correction is to be applied out of charity." The same, below, chapter 75: "As far as it pertains to us, who cannot discern the predestined from the not-predestined, severe correction is to be applied medicinally to all, lest they perish, or destroy others; but it is for God to make it useful to those whom he himself foreknew and predestined to be conformed to the image of his Son." And it follows, chapter 76: "If sometimes we correct out of fear, lest someone perish from it, why do we not also correct out of fear, lest someone perish more from it?" And earlier, chapter 73, treating the said authority of Luke: "Since we know not who is the son of peace according to God's predestination, or not, it pertains to us thus to make no exception, to discern none, but to wish all to be saved, to whom we preach this peace. Nor must it be feared that we should lose it, if he to whom we preach is not, we being ignorant, the son of peace; for it shall return to us — that is, profit us."

Gregory's saying does not contradict the foregoing: for if the first parent had perseveringly stood, God would have ordained otherwise.

These things being preliminarily set forth, it now remains to pursue what follows.

RESUMING THE MAIN ARGUMENT: ON THE DISTINCTION OF MERIT DE CONDIGNO

When therefore at the beginning it is argued that someone can merit something de condigno from God, for the matter of solution it must be known: that to merit is to do something rewardable — that is, worthy or due to be rewarded; but everything due, worthy, or condign is reasonable and just. Therefore, just as chapter 21 distinguished concerning the reasonable and the just, so it must be distinguished similarly concerning the due, the worthy, and the condign. What concerns condignum — since concerning this it is argued — let it suffice to demonstrate; once it is known, the rest will not be hidden.

Therefore the condign is either prior naturally and antecedently to the divine will, or posterior and subsequently, or even somehow mixed of both. Or, in other words, the same: there is the condign per se absolutely, and of the inflexible rigor of justice; there is the condign per accidens and with respect to the divine will, and of justice depending on it; there is the condign somehow mixed of both.

Furthermore, according to the common manner of speaking of all, and the proper manner of the Doctors, it must be known: that to merit de condigno is taken differently in good and in evil. For it is said that one sinning condignly merits eternal punishment, because that sin is so evil that, from its malice alone, eternal punishment without any injury of right could be inflicted on the sinner. But it is said that no one condignly merits eternal life, because no one's work is so good or so meritorious before God that, from its goodness or merit alone, eternal life is owed without all grace — indeed, not anything good distinct at all, as has been argued above.

Yet these two modes of meriting condignly can be reduced to some one common, univocal, or at least analogous to both — which is perhaps: to do something to which a pure wage can justly be rendered — so that the word pure excludes from the wage every freely conferred good or evil. And this is potential condign, because a wage can justly be rendered to it.

I can therefore, beginning higher from the principle, distinguish another way concerning meriting and demeriting condignly: namely, actually and potentially. To merit actually is to do something rewardable — namely, something to which a reward is actually owed; and so no one sinning merits any other punishment than what he shall have. For it is not worthy or due that he be otherwise punished than as God has determined him to be punished. And this meriting can be subdivided into the three modes already mentioned. To merit potentially, however, is to do something rewardable — namely, something to which a reward could be rendered. And so every sinner sinning mortally, whether to be damned or to be saved, merits a greater punishment than he shall have, and perhaps eternal punishment of any intensity. For God could justly punish anyone so sinning with a greater punishment than he shall punish — and perhaps with as much as he wished.

This meriting (or meriting condignly) potentially is somehow mixed of meriting condignly antecedently and subsequently to the divine will — as chapter 21 of this work more plainly explained in its similar [case]. For that he should do this or that depends on the divine will, according to chapter 9; but that, this or that being done, a pure wage could or could not be worthily rendered to it, is altogether necessary.

Speaking therefore of meriting condignly actually in the first mode, namely antecedently to the divine will per se and absolutely: it appears that no one can merit any good or evil from God, as the other arguments have shown. According to the second mode, however, one can: for everything that God wills and establishes is worthy and condign, as has been shown above. According to the third mode similarly, one can merit good and evil condignly actually from God — namely, such good or evil which has been proved above to follow inseparably from one's work. For that he do such a work depends on the divine will, as chapter 9 showed; but that, such a work being done with all its universal circumstances, such a good or evil follow does not depend on the divine will, but follows of necessity — like this man's running upon this man's being moved.

Therefore one of the prior arguments does not hold — namely, that which argued that that reward necessarily following necessitates the divine will to willing it, and to rendering it, to him who merits it. For just as it freely wills and works such a merit in anyone whomsoever, so also does it [freely will and work] all things which necessarily follow.

By this premised distinction, many things which were argued above are resolved.

To that which argued that the virtuous act condignly merits every useful and pleasurable good distinguished against the honest good, because it is better than this and that, it must be said that this does not follow. Just as if John saves the life of Peter, Peter is not on that account bound to render to him all his goods — even though, however many and great they may be, they are much less than the benefice received before. Likewise also, if John teaches Peter the sciences and the virtues — although they may be incomparably better than all Peter's goods — Peter is not on that account bound to render to John all his goods. Indeed, it suffices to render in such matters insofar as he can, and as accustomed to be returned competently.

Whence the Philosopher in Ethics 9.1: "But in those [services] which are not done because of agreement — that is, the promise of reckoning, that is, of certain retribution — these [are done] for their own sake — that is, [for the sake of those] receiving or giving — it is said that they are inaccusable. For such, according to the friendship of virtue, is the retribution to be made according to election; for this is of friendship and of virtue. So also it seems concerning communicating in philosophy: For dignity is not measured by money; nor will an equally weighing price be — but perhaps what is sufficient, as in things conceded to gods and parents." And this perhaps is because Peter without his great detriment is unable to render an equally weighing recompense to John; and although God is sufficient, yet he is not bound; for no one in meriting does anything good for God, but for himself. Why then is God bound to render this de condigno? And if you say that I argued thus above — I confess [it]; but this was against those positing that the gracious one merits de condigno from God an increase of grace. And so the argument seems to proceed: that he merits condignly the remission of any temporal punishment, which is less.

The other argument, which argued that he who loves God above all things ought to be similarly loved by him in return, does not well advert to the analogy to be observed in other friendships. For it is not the case that, in proportion as a worthier one is loved by another, he is bound to so love in return; for it suffices that he love in return less, according to the excellence of his state. For the Philosopher says, Ethics 8.7: "But the analogous in all friendships existing according to surpassing — that is, with one extreme of friendship abounding over another in goodness — must come about in love also: namely, that the better one be loved more than he loves, and the more useful one similarly, and each of the others in like manner. For when love is made according to dignity, then there comes to be, in some manner, equality, which seems to be of friendship." And since God is better and worthier infinitely than any whatsoever, it seems, following the proportionality, that he is bound under no degree of love to love any one loving in return. And especially because that one freely gives to him all that love, and is bound to love God as much as he can, as was proved above. And this a brief reason can persuade: for let John and Peter, with many others, equally love God above all things; then if God were bound to love them in return above all things, anyone whatsoever among them — he would be bound to love John more than Peter, and the contrary, and any one over any other, and over all the others, and over Blessed Mary, and as his own only Word.

Yet it greatly befits and behooves God purely gratuitously to love such lovers of his ineffably in return — indeed, more truly, to love them beforehand. And this is what that faithful friend John, much loved and loving, testifies in his First Epistle 4, saying: "In this is charity, not as though we had loved God, but because he hath first loved us."

To Anselm and Aristotle it must be answered that such a one merits only according to his proper foreordination, not according to the absolute rigor of justice. And the confirmation of that argument shall be infirmed by what has been said.

To the other arguments which follow, up to the argument made concerning the merit of Christ, the foregoing shall respond. And that one [the argument concerning Christ's merit] can be resolved through the premised distinction concerning meriting condignly. For in the first mode — namely, antecedently to the divine will, and of absolutely necessary and inflexible rigor of justice — it seems that Christ did not merit for himself, nor for us, resurrection from death and eternal life, nor anything of the sort. For if he had done so, it would be necessary absolutely that God should render these to him and to us, since he cannot be unjust. And so God would raise up and beatify the elect of simply absolute necessity, and not from the good pleasure of his free will — which chapter 9 does not permit.

It also seems possible that, even if no man had sinned, the Son of God might have assumed a passible man, and have done all things, or similar things, or greater, or more often, and have suffered, as he now did — not on account of any reward to be applied to himself or others, but from sincerest charity for God's sake alone — and after all these things have laid down and annihilated the man so assumed, never afterwards to be resumed; and all other men, and any creature whatsoever, never having to create anything thereafter. And the same seems possible, even supposing the lapse of man into sin — since it implies no contradiction formally. And if it had been so, Christ would have merited nothing condignly for himself or for others in the first mode aforesaid; therefore neither now, since as much of merit or good work as he had now, then he would have had as much or more.

Christ, moreover, did not merit through his divine nature, but through his human; and this not from his natural [powers] alone, but from grace freely given, as chapter 35 alleged — which Lombard also attests in Sentences 3, distinctions 13 and 18. The Apostle also seems to be of this mind, Romans 1, saying of Christ:

"Who was predestinated the Son of God in power, according to the spirit of sanctification, by the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ from the dead."

Where the Gloss: "He, in respect to his being man, was predestined — that is, without merits, by grace alone preelected — not only that he should be our Head, but that he should not draw his origin, nor by will perpetrate, sin; and that from a mortal nature he should be clarified immortally." If therefore he did not merit immortality for himself condignly, neither did he merit anything else, as it seems; therefore neither for us.

The Lord Jesus Christ himself also seems to testify this really and in fact, by giving thanks to God the Father because he heard him, John 11. If however he had merited condignly, and from pure debt, to be heard by the Father, no thanks would have been due to be rendered him, as the thirty-first chapter argued: For who, true and wise, will give thanks or render to him who has never done anything gracious or bestowed anything freely on him — since it is proper to thanksgiving that it be a retribution of a benefit freely given. For which the Philosopher says in Ethics 5.8: "In doing the proportional in return, the city remains; for they remain together by retribution; on account of which men readily perform the sacrament of thanksgiving, that retribution may be made; this indeed is proper of thanks: for one ought to serve in turn him who has done a favor" — namely, by acting back to him in thanks, who first did something freely.

With which Tully [Cicero] agrees, in his Old Rhetoric 2, defining thanks in this way: "Thanks is that in which the memory of friendships and offices — that is, benefits — of another, and the will of remunerating that other, is contained." Whence the Poet: "Thanks for things deservedly is owed unbought." But if thanks were reasonably to be referred to him who does no favor, but only pure debt, then buyer and seller, lessor and lessee, hireling or servant and master, would owe thanks to one another mutually — which reason forbids, since without thanksgiving each side has been fully satisfied and recompensed in all things. Why then would thanksgiving further be expected, which is a certain retribution as has been said? Nor does custom hold this; and far be it that all such be mutually ungrateful, since no one can be ungrateful save of grace freely given. But according to the Apostle, Romans 4: "To him that worketh, the reward is not reckoned according to grace, but according to debt" — therefore it does not seem that any thanks be referable from such a worker to his master. Whence Luke 6: "If you love them that love you, what thanks are due to you?" And below, chapter 17: "Which of you having a servant ploughing or feeding cattle, will say to him when he is come in from the field, Pass forthwith, sit down to meat, and will not rather say to him: Make ready my supper, and gird thyself, and serve me whilst I eat and drink, and afterwards thou shalt eat and drink? Doth he thank that servant for doing the things which he commanded him? I think not."

From which therefore Christ gave thanks to the Father because he heard him, it seems that he did not merit de condigno, as is permitted, to be heard; therefore neither anything at all, by similar reasoning.

And when it is argued that the merit of Christ exceeds the merit of any pure man infinitely, since Christ thus exceeds any man: perhaps this is not necessary, since one could thus argue concerning his understanding, his volition, his speaking, his walking, and any other operation of his.

The merit of Christ, however, can be considered in two ways. In one mode, with respect to the act itself of meriting, which is properly called merit; and so it seems to have been only finite, like the soul, the potency, the act, and the habit whence it proceeded. For according to the foregoing in the 40th part of the first corollary of this work, no creature is, nor can be, infinite. Nor does that causal hold: Christ exceeds any man infinitely; therefore the merit of Christ likewise [exceeds]. For likewise God exceeds any creature; and yet not any motion made — or possible to be made — immediately by God, similarly exceeds the motion made by any creature. And specifically this causal does not hold concerning the merit of Christ, because Christ has two natures: the divine, namely, infinite — and according to that he did not merit; and the human, finite — and according to that only he merited.

Otherwise can the merit of Christ be considered: namely, with respect to the price which through it he offered to God the Father; and thus it can congruously be called infinite. For through the meritorious act of his proper human will, he offered himself entire — the perfect Son of God, perfect God and man — to God the Father, as a price for redeeming men. Wherefore, although he had assumed however imperfect a human nature, and so through a meritorious act of will more remiss in any whatsoever proportion he had similarly offered himself, or although perhaps in the natural [endowments] now assumed, through a meritorious act of will as remiss as you will, he had similarly offered himself for redeeming men, he would have most sufficiently redeemed them — not by reason of the infinity of the act, of the will, or of the merit properly, but by reason of this infinite price, infinitely infinite, offered through that merit. Just as if of two willing to buy the same vendible thing, one with most fervent will offers a price less than just, the other with the most remiss will offers a just price, or a greater one — this man will have the thing, that one will lack it. And this not by reason of the diversity of the acts of will, but only of the offered prices.

Whence also 1 Timothy 2: "There is one God," says the Apostle, "and one mediator of God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a redemption for all." And according to this opinion can be understood the saying of Anselm in Cur Deus Homo 2.14, alleged above; and this appears through him below in the same, chapter 20, saying thus: "What can be understood more merciful than that to a sinner, condemned to eternal torments and not having whereby to redeem himself, God the Father should say: Take my only-begotten and give him for thyself, and the Son himself: Take me, and redeem thyself? For as it were they say this when they call us and draw us to the Christian faith. What also can be more just than that he to whom is given a price greater than every debt, if it be given with a due affection, should remit every debt?"

But granting that the merit of Christ had been infinite in the species of merit properly, still it does not follow that he merited anything de condigno in the first mode — namely, antecedently to the divine will. Because still the divine will would have first made in the human will of Christ any merit of his by nature, and would have first willed eternally and in time and by nature that Christ and any Christian have whatever through that he merited for himself or for his own — as can appear from what has been said in this chapter and in others. And if you do not believe me, at least believe the truth saying: "I have not spoken of myself, but he who sent me, the Father himself hath given me commandment what I should say and what I should speak," John 12. And earlier, chapter 5: "I cannot of myself do anything; but as I hear, so I judge, and my judgment is just, because I seek not my own will, but the will of him that sent me, the Father." Treating which Augustine on John, part 2, homily 45 (or 99 of the whole), says thus: "On account of the person of the Son, one made of two substances, divine and human, sometimes he speaks according to what he is as God — as is that which he says: I and the Father are one; sometimes according to what he is as man — as is that: Because the Father is greater than I, according to which we have received what is said by him, and concerning which I now dispute: I cannot do anything of myself, but as I hear I judge."

Yet, these things notwithstanding, certain ones strive to assert that Christ condignly merited both for himself and for us. For one merits condignly that which, if he should demand it, it is necessary to be rendered to him; but if Christ should demand glory for himself and for us, it is necessary that it be rendered. Christ also, by meriting, willed that glory be rendered to himself and to his own; and whatsoever he willed, was necessary to be fulfilled — otherwise the divine will could be frustrated, which chapter 10 manifestly forbids.

To which it must be briefly answered: that the first assumption is not true universally understood. For if Christ — according to what was possible for him, as the divine omnipotence shows, and is plain through Lombard Sentences 3, distinction 18 — had assumed an impassible body, perfectly glorious, such as he now has, and without all merit had demanded glory for himself or for us, it would have been necessary that it be rendered, not because he had condignly merited it, but because he had so willed; and his human will would necessarily have been conformed to the divine will, as appears from the premises, and because he cannot sin; and the divine will is necessarily always just, and effectively fulfilled. Or if his human will could have been contrary to or differently willing from the divine will, it would not have been necessary that such a willed thing be rendered to him, since neither just, as chapter 21 has shown.

Whatever also the Father or the Holy Spirit demands, it is necessary that it be rendered to him, as chapter 10 of this work proves; and yet they merit nothing.

If, however, that first assumption be understood in this way: that one condignly merits everything which, if he should demand it by reason of merit de condigno in the first mode — namely, antecedently to the divine will, and of the rigor of absolute justice — it is similarly necessary to be rendered to him: it must be said as before, that neither Christ, nor any other, can so actually merit anything from God. Therefore neither can Christ, by reason of this merit, demand anything from God — unless Christ could err and will contrarily or differently from the divine will. And if, in demanding anything, he so did, it would not be necessary that it be rendered to him, since neither just, as chapter 21 demonstrated.

The other argument premised can also be resolved through what has already been had. The remaining objections raised above have been rejected by the foregoing — up to the last of them, which was concerning the distinction of merit de congruo and de condigno. For which it seems that this distinction must be made: that merit de condigno is taken triply, as has been said; but merit de congruo is potential merit, of which it was said above — namely, such a good or evil work which by congruity or congruence of the work is rewardable, that is, possible and able to be rewarded; not that by congruity or some congruence prior to the divine will it is actually to be rewarded, as has been shown above.

COROLLARY

A COROLLARY AGAINST CERTAIN OTHER MOST RECENT DEFENDERS OF PELAGIUS, FEIGNING THAT, ALTHOUGH MAN CAN IN NO WAY MERIT THE FIRST GRACE, HE CAN HOWEVER OBTAIN IT BY HIS OWN POWERS ALONE.

From these things, however, is clearly convicted a certain most recent error of the Pelagians feigning that, although man in no way — neither de condigno nor de congruo — is able to merit grace, he can however obtain it by his own powers alone. Whence also no less clearly can be refuted a certain Pelagian error perhaps to be feigned and said: that God does not give grace to man on account of any antecedent merit, but on account of his future merits foreseen by him — just as a sower sows good seed in the earth which he foresees will bring forth abundant fruits. These errors, however, can easily be corrected by what has been touched upon here and in the foregoing chapters.

For many, like baptized infants who continually die, effectively receive great grace, who never bear good fruit from it, never bring forth sweet fruits, but bitter ones; never make grapes, but wild grapes; or if at some time they do certain pleasing works, returning to their vomit and choking grace, they do many evil things, and progress and persevere in them — finally hardened.

Thomas Bradwardine, De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium

Book I, Chapters 40–42

CHAPTER XL.

THAT GRACE, WHICH IS A HABIT FREELY GIVEN BY GOD, TOGETHER WITH THE HUMAN WILL IS PROPERLY THE EFFICIENT CAUSE OF EVERY GOOD AND MERITORIOUS ACT OF ITSELF.

After these things, the grace of God, with me, will demonstrate (as I hope) that grace itself is properly the efficient cause of every good act—namely the grace freely given, which is a habit of the soul freely infused by God, according to the distinction concerning grace made in chapter 25, of which the immediately preceding chapters were also speaking. For if grace were not properly the efficient cause of a good act, a man could from his own natural powers, without grace, fulfill God's commandments and accomplish any good act—contrary to what was demonstrated just above. For if one having grace performs his every act with grace doing absolutely nothing along with him, then he could likewise act with grace removed; for neither the total efficient cause nor even a partial efficient cause would be removed. Likewise, if grace or charity does not produce the act of human love by which one fulfills the commandment concerning love, by the same reasoning neither do faith and hope, infused habits (as is clear from what was alleged in the preceding chapter), produce the acts of believing and hoping. Therefore a man could, from himself and from his natural powers and naturally acquired powers, believe, hope, love, and do whatever he ought—which is a manifest error of Pelagius, and contrary to what was previously shown.

Likewise, the theological and supernatural virtues are not less efficacious for similar acts than the natural, moral, and intellectual virtues; but all these latter properly produce their acts. For who doubts that natural forms and virtues produce their acts? And who is unaware that moral virtues produce moral acts, and intellectual virtues likewise produce intellectual acts? Why otherwise would those lacking these virtues not act in the same way as those possessing them, since no efficient principle would be lacking to them? Hence the Philosopher in Ethics II.1, 2, and 3 shows that moral virtues are generated from works, and once generated they generate similar works; and there in chapter 3, after a multifold demonstration of this, he says: "Therefore virtue is supposed to be such as is operative concerning pleasures and griefs in the best things, but vice the contrary." And further, finally concluding: "Since therefore virtue concerns delights and griefs; and since by those things from which it comes to be, by these same things it is increased and corrupted when not similarly performed; and since from those things from which it comes to be, concerning these things it operates—let this be said." And above in I.7 he defines the happy man as one operating according to perfect virtue, which he very often suggests in many other places.

Likewise grace or charity makes the intention right, lifts and erects the will, as was shown in the preceding chapter—just as in moral matters moral virtue does, by testimony of the Philosopher there, and as more fully alleged in chapter 34. Likewise virtue, and especially the highest virtue—namely grace or charity—is no less efficacious than vice; but vice produces evil acts; therefore grace or charity also produces good acts. To say nothing of morally acquired vices, who is unaware, who does not feel, what acts that one root vice produces—the law of the members, the tyrant of nature, the tinder of sin, concupiscence or the concupiscibility of our flesh, which is also frequently called original sin by the Doctors? Witness is too-frequent experience, exceedingly violent. Witness is the Apostle, saying: "I am carnal, sold under sin; for what I work I do not understand: for what I will, this I do not, but what I hate, that I do; now then it is no longer I that work it, but sin that dwells in me. For I am delighted with the law of God according to the inward man; but I see another law in my members, fighting against the law of my mind, and captivating me in the law of sin," Romans 7. Witnesses are the Glosses and the expositions of the saints expounding this letter. Witness is almost the entire 40th distinction of the second book of the Sentences of Lombard, where he plainly holds this view and confirms it through Augustine. For he says: "Original sin is called the tinder of sin—namely concupiscence or concupiscibility, which is called the law of the members, or the languor of nature, or the tyrant which is in our members, or the law of the flesh." Hence Augustine in the book On the Baptism of Little Ones: "There is in us concupiscence, which is not to be permitted to reign; and there are its desires, which are actual concupiscences, which are the weapons of the Devil, which come from the languor of nature; for that languor is the tyrant which moves evil desires." And further: "By the name of concupiscence he signified not the act of desiring, but the depraved vice, when he called it the law of the flesh." Hence the same Augustine in the Tractate on the Words of the Apostle says: "There is always a battle in the body of this death, because the very concupiscence with which we are born cannot be ended as long as we live; daily it can be diminished, but not ended. What, then, is the concupiscence with which we are born? It is surely a vice, which makes the little child capable of desire, and renders the adult also desiring."

Since therefore cupidity is so combative, so efficacious, and so manifoldly active, how does charity restrain, diminish, and overcome it, if it does absolutely nothing, if it absolutely moves nothing, if it is utterly idle? Not so, not so does the Apostle hold in 1 Corinthians 13, saying: "Charity is patient, is kind; charity envies not, deals not perversely, is not puffed up, is not ambitious, seeks not her own, is not provoked to anger, thinks no evil, rejoices not in iniquity"—as if he were plainly saying: "It does not do these things, but the contraries of these." Hence he immediately adds: "But rejoices with the truth, bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things." Which Augustine, in On the Four Virtues of Charity—where he beautifully shows that "charity tolerates all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things"—demonstrates beautifully. Hence among other things, in the person of Abraham (to whom he attributes the second of these virtues), he says: "The virtue of charity remaining in me believes, does, and says all things. For I hear it speaking within me to my heart without sound of voice." And further: "O charity, who can do so much in this battle of mortality, still anxious—how much will you be able to do in that perfect peace, secure?" The same Augustine in the Enchiridion, near the end, says: "Cupidity is diminished as charity grows, until charity comes here to such a magnitude that there cannot be a greater; but there—who can explain how great charity will be, where there will be no cupidity at all to overcome by restraint? When health will be at its height, when there will be no struggle of mortality?" The same to Anastasius, as Peter [Lombard] alleges in Sentences II, dist. 26: "Without the Spirit, the will of man is not free. For when it is conquered by cupidities, it is not free for good unless it be liberated; nor is it liberated unless through the Spirit charity be poured into the hearts. The will is not free unless grace liberates it through the law of faith—that is, it is not free without faith working through love—and that suffices and is truly good. For there is no good fruit which does not arise from the root of charity. But if faith working through love is present, there comes about a delight in the good." The same in On the Spirit and the Letter 13 says: "There is no good fruit which does not arise from the root of charity"; and as Peter cites in Sentences III, dist. 31: "The root of all evils is cupidity, and the root of all goods is charity. But what kind of root is charity—living or dead? Not dead—it is plainly established. And how is it living, if it produces or yields nothing of living work or fruit?"

The same Augustine on Psalm 31, sermon 1, treating that text of the Apostle in Romans 13, "The fullness of the law is love" (or charity, according to another translation), says: "Does charity ever permit you to do anything evil to him whom you love? But perhaps you do nothing evil and also nothing good. Therefore neither does charity permit you to fail to do whatever you can for him whom you love. Is not that the charity which prays even for enemies? Therefore it does not desert a friend, when it wishes well to an enemy. Therefore if faith is without love, it will be without work. But that you may not think much about the work of faith, add to it hope and love, and do not consider what you may do; for love itself cannot be idle." With which also in concord, Gregory in homily 27 on the Gospels, expounding John 15, "This is my commandment, that you love one another," says: "Every commandment concerns love alone, and all are one precept, because whatever is commanded is grounded solely in charity. For just as many branches of a tree come forth from one root, so many virtues are generated from one charity, nor does the branch of a good work have any greenness, if it does not remain in the root of charity. Therefore the Lord's precepts are both many and one—many through diversity of work, one in the root of love." The same in homily 30: "The love of God is never idle; for it works great things, if it exists; but if it refuses to work, it is not love." And Peter in Sentences II, dist. 26 says: "That grace itself is not idle, but merits to be increased, that increased it may merit also to be perfected." Again the Apostle to the Galatians 5 says: "Faith works through love"; and again 1 Corinthians 15: "By the grace of God I am what I am, and his grace in me has not been void, but I have labored more abundantly than all of them—yet not I, but the grace of God with me." Who therefore would say that charity or grace works absolutely nothing? If anyone should think so, let him read the books and expositions of Augustine and the other Doctors on these and very many similar authoritative passages, and he will cease to think so. The same is testified by very many authorities cited in the preceding chapters—among which is that of Augustine in the Hypognosticon 60, On the Gift of Perseverance 48, On Grace and Free Choice 36, and to Simplicianus 24; and that of Anselm in On Concord and Truth, cited in the preceding chapter, are explicit.

Who, even one who has barely entered the outer court of theology, would not know that most common division of grace into operating and cooperating, since almost all the Doctors and disciples most frequently affirm it? Hence Peter, in the Sentences II, distinctions 5, 26, 27, and 29, diligently expounds it. He also at the end of distinction 25, speaking of the freedom of nature and of grace, says: "The Apostle marks both freedoms when, in the person of unredeemed man, he says: 'To will is present with me, but to perform that which is good I find not'—as if he were saying: 'I have the freedom of nature, but I do not have the freedom of grace; therefore the perfection of good is not with me.' For the will which man has naturally is not able to be raised up to willing the good efficaciously, or fulfilling it in work, unless it be liberated and assisted by grace, that it may perform—because, as the Apostle says, 'It is not of him that wills to will, nor of him that runs to run' (that is, to work), 'but of God that shows mercy,' who works in us to will and to work the good, whose grace neither the will nor operation of man calls forth, but grace itself prevents the will, preparing it that it may will the good, and helps it once prepared, that it may not will in vain—that is, that it may perfect." And in distinction 26 he immediately adds: "This is operating and cooperating grace; for operating grace prepares the will of man so that it wills the good, while cooperating grace helps that he may not will in vain. Hence Augustine in the book On Grace and Free Choice: 'God by cooperating perfects in us what he begins by operating, because he himself operates as beginning so that we may will, and cooperates as perfecting with those who will. So he operates that we may will; therefore when we will, and we will so as to perfect, he cooperates with us; yet without him operating that we may will, or cooperating when we will, we are worth nothing for the good works of piety.'" And Peter adds: "From these words it is sufficiently clear what is operating grace and what is cooperating: for operating grace is that which prevents the will (for by it the will of man is liberated and prepared so that it may be good, and may efficaciously will the good); cooperating grace, however, follows the now-good will, helping it." And there further on he cites Augustine in On the Predestination of the Saints saying that grace is not given according to other merits, but it produces all good merits. Likewise in distinction 27 he writes: "Some not unlearnedly hand down that virtue is a good quality of mind, or a form which informs the soul, and itself is not a movement or an affection of the mind, but by it free choice is helped, that it may be moved and lifted up to the good; and so from virtue and free choice arises a good motion or affection of the mind." And there he immediately says that it is so concerning grace and the human will. And further on: "In meriting good things the principality of cause is attributed to grace, because the principal cause of good merits is grace itself, by which free choice is excited, and the will of man is healed and helped that it may be good—which is also itself a gift of God, and the merit of man, indeed of grace, because principally it is from grace, and is grace. Hence Augustine to Sixtus the Presbyter: 'What is the merit of man before grace, when none of our good merit is in us except by grace?' For from grace, as has been said, which prevents and heals the choice of man, and from this very choice itself, there is procured in the soul a good affection, or a good motion of mind—and this is the first good merit of man. Just as, for example, from faith, virtue, and the choice of man there is generated in the mind a certain good motion that is rewardable—namely the very act of believing—so from charity and free choice there comes forth another motion that is exceedingly good, namely loving. So is to be understood concerning the other virtues." The same in Sentences III, dist. 36 says that "charity is the mother of all virtues; but what kind of mother? barren or fruitful? And how is she barren when she is a mother? But if she is fruitful, how does she bring forth nothing?"

Here, however, many friends of the Pelagians try in many ways to respond, who nevertheless all agree in this one point—that grace, the created virtue, or charity, does not truly and properly produce good acts according to the substance of the acts, but either does not produce them at all, or produces them only in some improper and transferred way. For some say that grace or charity, the created virtue, in no way produces good acts, but rather uncreated grace and charity, which is God and the Holy Spirit of God; and so they understand all the authorities saying grace or charity produces any act. But although these men can in some manner evade certain authorities cited above, they cannot evade the reasons. Whoever is Catholic looks with sound eyes at such authorities—some on the surface of the letter, some a little within—and can immediately perceive another sense, namely concerning created grace and charity. Hence Peter in Sentences II, dist. 27, among the other things alleged above, says: "When good merits are said to be from grace and to begin, either grace freely-giving (that is, God) is understood, or rather grace freely-given, which prevents the will of man (for it would not be a great matter if these were said to be from God, from whom are all things); but rather his grace freely-given is understood, from which good merits begin—which when they are said to be from grace alone, free choice is not excluded, because there is no merit in the adult man which is not through free choice. But in the meriting of good things the principality of cause is attributed to grace, because the principal cause of good merits is the grace itself by which free choice is excited, and the will of man is healed and helped, that it may be good."

Others, however, say that grace is said to produce a good act because it excites the will so that the will itself produces a good act. But these men also are reasonably refuted by the reasons given above. Likewise, if grace excites the will, it moves the will in some way, and produces some act; and if it does this by preventing the will not yet acting, why can it not by similar reasoning co-act the meritorious act with the will itself acting? Who, unless ungrateful to grace, would assign to the grace of God the worse or less good act, and to one's own natural powers the more good act? For who is unaware that the meritorious act is incomparably better than the bare excitation toward it, with which it is consistent that one merit nothing—indeed, sin? But the things alleged in the preceding chapters do not allow this. A man or angel could also will and act without such excitation, since it does nothing along with [the act] here or there; and therefore could fulfill all God's commandments without grace, which is the error of Pelagius, as the preceding chapter recited. Moreover, the human will could similarly be excited by something other than grace—namely by reason, by moral virtue, by a teacher, by natural instinct or inclination, or by various other things; therefore these other things suffice without grace for fulfilling the commandments. According to this view also, the created will would be a more principal cause of merit than grace: for it principally—indeed singularly—produces the merit, while grace only excites toward acting. But this is plainly contrary to the Apostle alleged above: "I have labored more abundantly than all of them—yet not I, but the grace of God with me." For how should this be understood, except that not I principally and grace instrumentally, but the contrary—as is also plainly testified by the saying of Lombard cited against the foregoing response?

Others suppose that grace produces good acts not effectively but only formally, just as whiteness makes the subject white, and the soul makes a thing animate, and any form makes its formed thing. But these things can be refuted by the reasons and authorities alleged above. Likewise grace, which is an infused habit, is not the natural and essential form of the act of willing of the gracious one, just as no habit is the form of its act; for the act is more actual than the habit, nor is the subject of the habit natural [to it], nor composite from habit and act as from form and matter, but is simple. Nor is grace the material cause of the good act—for instance, of due love of God and neighbor—nor the final cause, as no one is unaware; nor (as these say) the efficient cause; therefore a man could perform that act and fulfill the commandments without grace, from his natural powers alone, just as Pelagius raved; for no required cause would be wanting. But if anyone should say that grace is improperly a form, and somehow the actual [form] of the good act, namely because it informs the will performing it, he falls into the deep of Pelagius mentioned above. He must consequently say that every act proceeding from such a will is good and gracious, because similarly informed by grace—which is not true of the acts of children, nor of all the acts of adults, since it is not true of indifferent acts and venial sins. By the same reasoning every act of a wise man would be wise, or done wisely; every act of the temperate, temperate, or done temperately; and so concerning all the virtues and vices universally—which no one doubts to be false. These men also, contrary to the Apostle, place grace empty, that is idle, as the Gloss expounds; therefore they themselves seem empty and inane of grace.

Others still suppose that grace is said to produce good acts because it binds and represses repugnant concupiscence, and once concupiscence is bound, the gracious will produces gracious acts. But the reasons and authorities given above refute these men. How also does grace bind and repress repugnant concupiscence, if it does absolutely nothing, as was touched on above? Or if grace does anything for the repression of concupiscence, why not, by similar reasoning, for the production of a good act—as was argued above against the second response? Likewise, men constituted in grace sometimes have concupiscence as strong, and sometimes stronger, than men destitute of grace, as the lives of many saints, and especially Saint Paul in 1 Corinthians 12, evidently show concerning himself. Therefore such men destitute of grace can produce good acts and fulfill God's commandments, just as such men constituted in grace can. Therefore these men also, like the previous, are absorbed in the gulf of the Pelagian deep. The same can also be shown otherwise thus: because however much concupiscence is bound and quieted by grace, just so much could it be quieted by moral virtues, by medicine, by natural alteration, and in some men by their own natural complexion. Therefore such men by the power of nature, without such grace, could observe all God's commandments; therefore these men also slip back into the deep of Pelagius. To the same point: if a gracious man, with concupiscence somewhat repressed by grace, can produce a great act and great merit, then a non-gracious man, slightly more impeded by concupiscence somewhat greater, can produce a similar act—though perhaps proportionally less, and perhaps so much the better as it is more difficult—as the preceding chapter argued: for similarly unequal causes produce similarly unequal effects. Hence the Philosopher in On the Heavens III, c. 72, refuting those who hold that fire burns on account of angles—namely the sharpness of angles—says: "If fire heats and burns on account of angles, all the elements will be heat-producing; some perhaps more than others. For all have angles—both the eight-based and the twelve-based, and the pyramid; according to Democritus also the sphere has an angle—and so it burns; whereby they differ in more and less."

Likewise, then the angel and man in the state of innocence before the Fall would in no way have needed grace to merit; for he had no reluctant concupiscence—the opposite of which was shown in the preceding chapter. Hence Augustine in Enchiridion 87 says: "Human nature lost through free choice that immortality in which it could not die; this immortality, in which it cannot die, it is going to receive through grace, which it would have received through merit if it had not sinned, although there could not have been then nor any merit then without grace. For although sin was constituted in free choice alone, yet free choice was not sufficient for retaining justice, unless divine help were offered through participation in the immutable Good." This same thing Peter in Sentences II, distinctions 5, 24, and 29 proves and holds.

Others opine that grace is said to produce good acts because, by characterizing the soul to the Lord and clothing it with the garment of the Lord, it renders it terrifying to the adverse power, so that it dare not attack it as another which lacks these things; and so the gracious soul can freely perform gracious works. But these men, like the foregoing, will be propelled into the pit of perdition, into the deep of Pelagius.

Others judge that grace is said to produce good acts because it liberates and justifies a man from sin, which had impeded him from doing good acts. But these men are refuted, by the principal reasons and authorities, and also by what was given above against the fourth response, together with their father Pelagius. The Pelagians are also condemned especially on account of this opinion. For they hold (as Augustine recites in On Grace and Free Choice 16): "That grace alone, which is not given according to our merits, is that by which our sins are forgiven; but that which we expect at the end—namely eternal life—is given according to our merits"—understanding our merits to come to us from ourselves, not from the grace of God or from God. Hence Augustine, after reciting this Pelagian error, adds: "It must be answered them: If they so understood our merits as to recognize them themselves to be gifts of God, this opinion would not be reprehensible. But since they so preach human merits as to say that man has them from himself, the Apostle most rightly answers: 'For who distinguishes you? And what have you that you have not received? But if you have received, why do you glory as though you had not received?' Surely to one thinking such things it is most truly said: God crowns his gifts, not your merits. If your merits are from yourself, not from him, they are evil—which God crowns? But if they are good, they are gifts of God, namely through his grace freely given." In the Council of Mileve also, celebrated against the Pelagians—at which Augustine was present, as is clear from Epistle 134 among his Epistles, and as is contained in the Canon De Consecratione dist. 4—it was concordantly decreed: "That whoever shall say that the grace of God by which we are justified through Jesus Christ our Lord avails only for the remission of sins already committed, and is not a help that they may not be committed, let him be anathema."

There are many other tortuous little responses, which through what has been given here and in the preceding chapters can easily be straightened out, by the help of God's grace—indeed, by it principally operating.

After these things, however, objection is made against these things. For if grace properly produces a gracious act, the gracious man will operate more easily and more strongly than the non-gracious. For the former has the great help of grace, the latter none—the opposite of which, as it seems, the most ungrateful sinners show by experience. Likewise, let A be one whole meritorious act done by grace and the human will; and let B be a part of A done by grace; and let C be a part of A done by the human will alone. Therefore C is meritorious, or A is meritorious only with respect to C, because C alone comes from the free will of man—for in this alone all merit consists. Likewise let a man set for himself a certain degree of love which he would have without grace co-acting; then if he should love with grace co-acting, he will love beyond that degree; therefore he will love at least as intensely, violently, and unwillingly; therefore not meritoriously. Therefore if grace be posited as active, it takes away merit and the freedom of choice. Likewise grace and the human will are either equally powerful or unequally; if equally, each can impede the other so that it does nothing—and so grace could violently prohibit a man from sinning, and from willing this or that; and thus everyone having such grace would be finally confirmed [in good]. If unequally, then either grace is more powerful, or the will. If grace, the foregoing absurdity returns; grace can also make the will will unwillingly, and detain it unwilling in the act of willing. If the will is more powerful than grace, the will can be weakened, or grace strengthened, until they are equally powerful or grace more powerful—and if this be posited, the difficulty returns. Likewise, since grace is an irrational agent, and not [acting] from choice, if it be an agent, it always necessarily acts according to the utmost of its power, as much as it can; therefore whatever action of whatever species or degree grace once produces, the gracious man also always produces it. Nor does it seem consonant with reason that an irrational agent should produce a free act, and freely, but [rather] by necessity of nature. Likewise, then it would not be in a man's power to keep the commandments, nor to be saved, since it is not in his power to have such grace as is necessarily required. Many similar objections could also be raised, but with these solved the solution of others similar will be clear, by the grace of God revealing it.

To these ungracious objections, by the help of grace, response must be made. For the first, what theologian doubts that charity and grace make the yoke of the Lord sweet, and his burden light, when so many Doctors teach this in so many places? Which also that secretary of God Isaiah, seeing, said: "He gives strength to the weary, and to those who are not, he multiplies might and strength. Boys shall fail, and labor, and youths shall fall in infirmity. But they that hope in the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall take wings as eagles; they shall run and not labor, they shall walk and not faint," Isaiah 40. Wherefore concerning the wicked, in the person of the wicked, the Wise Man says thus: "We have wearied ourselves in the way of iniquity and destruction, and have walked through hard ways; but the way of the Lord we have not known"—and Scripture brings forth many similar things.

But for a more sufficient and subtle solution of this objection, it must be noted that—according to what was shown in the preceding chapter—the proper operation of charity and grace is to love God dearly and freely above all things, finally for his own sake, and so to do other things for the sake of God. But no one lacking charity and grace can have such love and operation; rather, as long as he lacks them, he necessarily loves chiefly his own advantage and himself, and on account of his own advantage and himself finally performs all other things. Therefore the love and operation of charity or grace—or of the dear and gracious one—proceeding from charity and grace, differs specifically from the love and operation of one not dear and not gracious. For just as the objects of loves, and the things finally loved, differ in species, so also do their proper loves: as is the case in cognition and proper and distinct vision; otherwise also all volitions and loves would be of the same most special species, and all cognitions and visions likewise; and so concerning the other powers and their proper operations whatsoever. Hence the Philosopher Ethics VIII.3: from the fact that there are three species of lovable things—namely the useful, the delightful, and the honest or virtuous—it follows that there must be three species of lovings and friendships. For he says: "These differ from one another in species; and lovings therefore and friendships are equal in number to lovable things." And further on at VIII.7: "But there is another species of friendship, which is according to superabundance—as of father to son, and in general of an elder to a younger, of a husband to a wife, of every ruler to one ruled. But these differ from one another: for it is not the same in parents toward children, and in rulers toward those ruled; nor in father toward son, and son toward father; nor in husband toward wife, and wife toward husband. For each of these has another virtue and work, another reason for which they love—therefore other lovings and friendships." Anselm also in On Free Choice 7, having made the distinction concerning will into the natural instrument by which we will, and into its use or work, adds: "That which is the work is as manifold as how many and how often we will—just as sight, which is the work, and is named vision, is as numerous as how numerously we see."

The same can also be shown briefly and theologically thus: If a non-gracious man could love and act with any love and action of the same species as the gracious man, he could without grace fulfill all the commandments just as the gracious man does—which is the error of Pelagius, as the preceding chapter manifests. Therefore the love of the gracious one from grace and that of the non-gracious one differ in species. Yet the gracious man can sometimes love and operate not from grace but from natural friendship, from affection of advantage, from appetite for what is delightful and useful to himself—performing an indifferent act, or even a venial sin. Either, then, the objection compares an act of the gracious man proceeding from grace with any act of the non-gracious man, and then they differ in species, and no experience shows that the non-gracious man can act so strongly an act of the same species as an act of the gracious man proceeding from grace; therefore the objection does not stand. Or it compares an act of the gracious man not proceeding from grace with an act of the non-gracious man similar in species—and so they can well act equally strongly, because grace does not co-act, nor help the gracious man there; therefore neither does this objection stand.

For the second, it must be known that it in no way proceeds, because by similar [reasoning] it could be shown that God does not produce a meritorious act of the will—the opposite of which is clear from chapter 3 of this work, and 4, and many other chapters previously discussed. It also imagines a falsehood: for if A has, just as it has, diverse parts, both grace and the will produce the whole and any part of it—not separately but conjointly, not successively but simultaneously, just as God and the will [do]; just as also two men draw a ship. Hence Bernard in On Grace and Free Choice 23: "To this end grace prevents free choice, that thereafter it may cooperate with itself; yet so that what was begun by grace alone is perfected equally by both—that they may operate mixedly not separately, simultaneously not by turns, through each effect; not partly grace, partly free choice, but each performs the whole through an indivisible work—the whole indeed this, and the whole that, but as the whole [is] in that, so the whole [is] from that."

The third is removed as the second: for similarly it could be shown that God does not produce a free and meritorious act of the will. And it is nonetheless solved abundantly as the first: for a man cannot without grace love under any degree with a love of that species which is from grace proceeding. Yet to dig out its root, I say that although the non-gracious man could love similarly in species as the gracious man does from grace, the objection would not stand. For grace would not make him will violently and unwillingly, or so intensely; but from one willing and reluctant it would make him willing freely and loving voluntarily—for this is proper to grace, as what was set forth here concerning grace manifests. This is also specially manifested by the conversion of Saint Paul, and by him whom by the prayers of Saint Stephen, the founder of the Grandimontensian order, divine grace converted. For William of Auvergne, in part three of his Tripartitum 22, recounts in this manner concerning a certain such man—who indeed forbade that prayer be made for him, and who said that he in no way wanted to obtain the grace of repentance or conversion. With him unwilling and resisting, Saint Stephen, founder of the Grandimontensian order, made prayer for him with his community, and was heard. For when they had prayed for him, that man came to them, announcing to them how he had been visited; and making confession of his sins with much devotion and tears, he did penance.

He also sins gravely who is ignorant of the elenchus. For how does it stand contrary, that someone now wills one thing, and previously did not will it, or willed its opposite? What contradiction? Or why does such a man will unwillingly? For example, suppose this man set for himself yesterday that today he would feed one poor man; and that today, visited with more abundant grace, he wishes to feed two, and feeds them. What violence? What contradiction is between these things? It seems also very probable that a man can with grace and from grace will however remissly. Therefore a man can from grace love under as great a degree as he had set for himself, and as he would have been going to have without grace, and even under a lesser degree.

The fourth sins as the third and the second; for so it could be proved that God does not produce our free acts, and also that the grace of confirmation would do violence to the will of the confirmed [one] toward not sinning, and toward his beatific act—which nevertheless can be solved as the third.

The fifth, if it should prove anything, would similarly prove that neither the end, nor its species in the soul, nor its cognition, would move the willing one, nor in any way produce a free act of the will—contrary to chapters 19 and 21 above. Who also, having barely entered into philosophy, has not read that chapter of On the Soul III, On the Mover, where it is sufficiently shown that imagination is one cause moving animals, and intellect [moves] men in their forward motion? How is this to be understood, except that imagination is one efficient cause of appetite in animals; the intellect indeed (namely the species of the object in the intellect, or the act of understanding—the very intellection itself) [is the cause] of will in men—by which and from which animals and men are moved progressively, as is evidently gathered from the discussion? Who does not see that discussion in Metaphysics XII where the Philosopher shows that the first mover, which is God, moves—as the new translation says—just as the desirable and the intelligible move while not being moved, and as the loved [moves]; and as the translation Averroes expounds says, moves as the desired and the understood, and as the loved? On which Averroes, comment 36, says: "This mover is a mover because it produces motion, and because it is the end of motion; but these differ in us—namely that which moves us in place insofar as it is an agent, and that which moves us insofar as it is an end. And it has a double existence: in the soul and outside the soul. For what is in the soul is the agent of motion; what is outside the soul is the mover according to end. For example, since a bath has a double form—in the soul and outside the soul—we desire that other form which is outside the soul beyond that form which is in the soul; and on account of that form which is in the soul we desire the other form which is outside the soul. Therefore the form of the bath, insofar as it is in the soul, is the agent of desire and motion; insofar as it is outside the soul, it is the end of motion, not the agent."

This same thing reason also manifests; for cognition is necessarily presupposed to volition; therefore there is some cause of it (volition), as has been shown in the foregoing; and not the material, formal, or final cause; therefore it is the efficient cause of it. And this seems to be the reasoning of the Philosopher in On the Soul III, where he was alleged. Cognition is also naturally and essentially prior to volition, therefore it is also some cause of it, as is plain from chapter 13 of this work, and so on, as before. From these things it is recognized that it is not contrary to reason—as the sixth supposes—that an irrational agent should produce a free act; rather, necessary reasoning requires this. That, however, only an irrational agent should produce this would be [contrary to reason]; but that it should produce it together with a rational [agent] is in no way contrary to reason. The last objection, however, is purely Pelagian. For it would prove that grace is not necessarily required for the observance of the commandments, nor for attaining perpetual salvation; nor does it stand more against one saying grace is active than against one saying it is not active—provided he says it is necessarily required for salvation, as anyone is necessarily compelled to say who does not wish to profess the Pelagian heresy, as the preceding chapters manifest.

CHAPTER XLI.

THAT GRACE NATURALLY PRIOR TO THE HUMAN WILL PRODUCES GOOD ACTS.

Having shown that grace, together with the will, produces good acts, it must further be inquired whether both [are] equally first according to nature, or one [is] naturally prior to the other—and if so, which of them. I think, however, that grace freely infused naturally prior to the will produces good acts. For the human will, by the heaviness of sin or of nature, is so depressed that it cannot but love itself and its own advantage finally on account of its very self—namely, the will—unless by the power of grace it be raised to God above all things, to be loved gratuitously on account of him alone, as chapter 39 proves.

But such a thing raising it necessarily prevents the thing so raised in its ascent—as appears clearly with a stone elevated above. And especially because the soul thus depressed cannot of itself ascend in any way of that species, as the immediately preceding chapter makes plain. For just as a heavy and weak man lying on the ground, unable much or little to raise himself up by himself, can yet—with another preventing him and continuously fore-raising him, and continuously holding him up that he may not fall back—in some way co-raise himself, and in order to raise himself he necessarily needs at the beginning, and continuously, such a fore-raising and continuously sustaining one—so it is with the created will destitute of grace, or aided by grace.

This, however, is true not only on account of the depression of free choice through sin, but also on account of the natural heaviness of free choice, by which it is naturally bound to loving principally itself and its own advantage, etc., on account of these things, nor is it able to ascend to anything above itself—for instance, to God above itself, etc., to be loved gratuitously—unless it be prevented and raised continuously by grace, and continuously sustained that it may not fall back, as is plain from chapters 39 and 40 of this work.

This whole matter Daniel seems to have figured congruously when he said: "There remained no strength in me, but my appearance was changed in me, and I withered away, having no vigor at all, and I heard the voice of his words, and hearing I lay consternated upon my face, and my countenance clung to the earth. And behold, a hand touched me, and raised me upon my knees, and upon the joints of my hands. And he said to me: Daniel, man of desires, understand the words which I speak to you, and stand in your degree; for now I am sent to you. And when he had spoken these words to me, I stood trembling. And he said to me: Fear not, Daniel," Daniel 10. Hence Gregory Moralia 22, ch. 18, on Job 31, "Through every step of mine I will pronounce him," says: "No one, deserting the lowest things, suddenly becomes the highest, because to obtain the merit of perfection, while the mind is daily led on high, this is undoubtedly arrived at by certain steps, as it were of an ascension. Hence aptly is added: 'Through every step of mine I will pronounce him.' Hence the Prophet says: 'I was awakened, and my spirit failed for a little while.' What is it then that he says, 'My spirit,' but the spirit of man—that is, the spirit of elation? And because by hidden grace we proceed to the love of God by a measure tempered from above, the more in us daily virtue grows from the Spirit of God, the more our spirit fails. For this spirit of error, because it is not suddenly cut off from us by the roots, is well said to have failed 'for a little while.' But then we are perfected fully in God when we have failed by the roots from ourselves. These measures of growing virtues, then, are called by the voices of holy men 'steps.'"

And further on, in the following chapter, confirming this through the deed of Daniel mentioned above, he says: "Well does the Prophet Daniel, when the Lord was speaking to him—while he was eager to insinuate to us the position of his body—signify these increments of merits. For he says: 'I heard the voice of his words, and hearing I lay consternated upon my face, and my countenance clung to the earth. And behold, a hand touched me, and lifted me upon my knees, and upon the joints of my hands. And he said to me: Daniel, man of desires, understand the words which I speak to you, and stand in your degree; for now am I sent to you. And when he had spoken these words to me, I stood trembling. And he said to me: Fear not.' This position of his body, while he was hearing the words of one speaking within, he would by no means express to us with such care, if he had known that it lacked mysteries. For in Sacred Scripture, of just men not only what they say, but very often also what they do, is prophecy. The holy man, therefore, full of mysteries within, expresses by the position of his body the power of the voice; and through the fact that he first lay prostrate on the earth, through the fact that he afterward raised himself upon the joints of his hands and upon his knees, through the fact that at the last erected indeed but trembling he stood in himself, the whole order of our advancement is made known to us." Where, having expounded the prophetic words in order, on the last—namely "Fear not"—he says: "Aptly by the divine voice is it added, 'Fear not,' because when we recognize more in ourselves what we should fear, more is poured into us by internal grace concerning God which we should love—so that our contempt may pass over little by little into fear, and fear may pass over into charity; that whereas we resist God seeking us through contempt, we flee through fear, and with contempt and fear at length set aside, we are joined to him by love alone. For little by little we unlearn to fear him, and we cleave to him by the force of love alone. With certain steps, as it were, of our advancement having been set in place, we first place the foot of our mind in the lowest by fear, and afterward we lift it up to the heights of love through charity." With this is also consonant the saying of the same Gregory Moralia 22, ch. 9, set forth in chapter 35 of this work.

To this likewise sufficiently agrees Ezekiel saying: "I fell upon my face, and I heard the voice of one speaking. And he said to me: Son of man, stand upon your feet, and I will speak with you. And the Spirit entered into me after he had spoken to me, and set me upon my feet," Ezekiel 1. With these the Apostle also agrees, saying: "By the grace of God I am what I am, and his grace in me has not been void, but I have labored more abundantly than all of them—yet not I, but the grace of God with me," 1 Corinthians 15. These passages clearly insinuate the priority of grace. For it is certain that the Apostle labored, by his own testimony. Why then does he say "not I, but grace," except to suggest that grace first and principally—as the principal efficient cause—produces good acts; but the man not so, but secondarily, instrumentally, and subserviently to grace thus acting? Wherefore Gregory in Homily 9 on Ezekiel, treating the words of Ezekiel and the Apostle just set forth, says thus: "Behold, the divine voice commanded the prostrate Prophet that he should rise, but he could in no way rise unless the Spirit of Almighty God had entered into him; because by the grace of Almighty God we can indeed strive after good works, but we cannot fulfill these unless he himself, who commands, helps. So Paul, when he was admonishing the disciples, saying: 'With fear and trembling work out your own salvation,' immediately—lest anyone in them should work these very good things—added, saying: 'For God it is who works in us both to will and to perfect according to good will.' Hence it is that Truth itself says to the disciples: 'Without me you can do nothing.'" And further on: "But it must be known that our evils only are ours; but our good things are both Almighty God's and ours: for he by inspiring prevents us, that we may will, and helping he follows after, that we may not will in vain, but may be able to fulfill what we will. With prevenient grace, however, and good will following, that which is the gift of Almighty God becomes our merit—which Paul well explains in a brief sentence, saying: 'I have labored more than all of them'; who, lest he should seem to have attributed to his own power what he had done, added: 'Yet not I, but the grace of God with me.' For because he was prevented by a heavenly gift, he as it were acknowledged himself to be alien from his own good work, saying, 'Yet not I.' But because the prevenient grace had made free choice in him into the good, by which free choice he had followed the same grace in the work, he added: 'But the grace of God with me'—as if he were saying: 'In the good work I labored not I, but yet I.' For in that I was prevented by the gift of the Lord alone, not I; but in that I followed God by my will, also I." With these things, therefore, briefly said against Pelagius and Celestius, let us return to the order of expounding. "Son of man, stand upon your feet, and I will speak with you." The order of speech and of work is to be noted by us: because first the likeness of the glory of the Lord appears, that it may cast down; afterward he speaks, that he may reveal; then he sends the Spirit of superabundant grace, and lifts him up, and stands him upon his feet. For unless we saw something of eternity in the mind, never would we fall upon our face by repenting. But once we are lying down, the voice of the Lord consoles us—which nevertheless we cannot do by our own power; therefore the Spirit himself fills us, and lifts us, and stands us on our feet, that we who lay prostrate in penitence for our fault, may afterward stand upright in good work.

From these words of Gregory diligently inspected, it evidently appears that it is the heresy of Pelagius to say that grace does not precede free choice, but the contrary—which Augustine, Isidore, and the Canon also plainly testify, as was recited in chapter 36 of this work. Hence Lombard in Sentences II, dist. 26, citing Augustine for this same point, says: "A good will accompanies grace, not grace the will." Hence Augustine, writing to Pope Boniface against the Pelagians, says: "When faith obtains justification, just as God has dealt to each one a measure of faith, no human merit precedes the grace of God, but by it [grace] itself merit is earned to be increased—that increased it may merit also to be perfected—the will accompanying, not leading; following at the heels, not preceding." And Lombard adds: "Behold, expressly here you have it that grace prevents the merit of a good will, and the good will itself is the handmaid of grace, not its forerunner." Fulgentius also, Bishop of the Church of Ruspe—as Isidore reports in the Catalogue of Illustrious Men ch. 14—wrote and sent to the bishops two books On the Truth of Predestination, in which he demonstrates that the grace of God prevents the human will in good things. This same opinion the Apostle plainly teaches, saying: "It is not of him that wills, nor of him that runs, but of God who shows mercy," Romans 9. For why does he say it is not of him willing to will, nor of him running to run (namely to work), but of God showing mercy—except to show that this is of God, and of divine mercy and grace primarily and principally, and as of the prior agent; but [it is] of him willing and running not so, but secondarily and instrumentally, and as of the posterior agent—as has also been shown above concerning a similar saying of his? This same understanding of this Apostolic saying is sufficiently shown by the expositions of Augustine in Enchiridion 23, and On the Two Souls 15, written in chapters 36 and 37 of this work.

Hence Peter in Sentences II, dist. 25, near the end, says: "The will of man, which he has naturally, is not able to be raised to willing the good efficaciously or to fulfilling it in work, unless through grace it be liberated and helped: liberated indeed that it may will, and helped that it may perfect; because, as the Apostle says, 'It is not of him willing to will, nor of him running to run' (that is, to work), 'but of God showing mercy,' who works in us to will and to work the good. The will or operation of man does not call forth grace, but grace itself prevents the will, preparing it that it may will the good, and helps the prepared one, that it may not will in vain—that is, that it may perfect." And further on, in dist. 26, treating certain authorities which seem to assert that faith and the act of faith belong to free will, he says: "These things have been said in this way, because faith is not present except in him who wills to believe, whose good will faith prevents, not in time but in cause and nature. Hence Augustine above congruently said that 'a good will is among those gifts which it does not precede, and grace itself helps it, because it [grace] helps those by whom it is prevented—when it consents to them in the effect of the good—and is in them, because in time it is not preceded by them.'"

Likewise, who is unaware that a prior cause is more principal than a posterior one? But grace is the principal cause of every good act, as appears in the immediately preceding chapter against the second response. This same opinion is plainly taught by very many authorities cited in chapter 36 of this work and in those following—which the whole Catholic Church catholically professes, praying in this manner: "May your grace, O Lord, ever prevent and follow us, and continually grant us to be intent upon good works." If we naturally operate prior to grace, why do we ask that it itself prevent us by operating? Rather, we cause it to be intent upon good works, than it causes us. But if it be said that grace prevents us by liberating from sin, but does not properly produce meritorious acts, the preceding chapter contradicts it, by showing that grace properly produces good acts; against which it can also be specially contradicted, as was done against the sixth response of the same.

It is said otherwise: that grace naturally prior to [the will] produces the first good human act, but the other following acts the will operates naturally prior. But why so variously? What reason for the diversity, since the whole agent and the act are at first and afterward of similar account? Against this response also there proceed the reasons and authorities just given; especially that of the Apostle, "Not I, but the grace of God with me." For the Apostle is speaking of himself—not for the instant of his conversion, but for the time following, in which he was always in grace, and labored with grace—which is also plainly testified by Gregory expounding it, as is alleged above. The same is similarly testified by Augustine alleged above, saying that "grace merits to be increased, that increased it may merit also to be perfected, the will accompanying, not leading; following at the heels, not preceding." For he speaks expressly concerning the merit by which grace merits to be increased, which succeeds the first good act.

COROLLARY.

COROLLARY: THAT BOTH GOD, AND HIS CREATED GRACE, PROPERLY AND NATURALLY PRIOR PRODUCE ANY GOOD ACT OF A RATIONAL CREATURE THAN [DOES] THAT [CREATURE] ITSELF; AND THAT THE AUTHORS WHO SAY GOD PRODUCES OUR GOOD WORKS DO NOT EXCLUDE BUT INCLUDE THE GRACE OF GOD ALSO SIMILARLY PRODUCING THEM; AND THOSE SAYING

GOD'S GRACE PRODUCES OUR GOOD WORKS DO NOT EXCLUDE BUT INCLUDE GOD ALSO SIMILARLY OPERATING THE SAME.

From these things it is evidently inferred that both God and the created grace of God properly and naturally prior produce any good act of a rational creature than [does] the creature itself; and that the authors who say God produces our good works do not exclude but include God's grace producing the same likewise; and those saying that God's grace produces our good works do not exclude but include God producing the same likewise.

That God properly produces any good act is clear from chapters 3 and 4 of this work. It is similarly clear from chapter 27 and the following, together with chapter 10 of this work, plainly. And that grace likewise produces, and even prior in nature to the rational creature, is clear from chapters 40 and 41 of this work. That, however, God naturally prior produces—rather than the rational creature, in the good production common to both—who would not concede this, granted that God's grace there naturally prior produces, rather than such a creature? For who, even lightly considering, would think that God's created grace acts naturally prior in the action common to both, than its author? than its and all things' first mover? This same thing the reasons and authorities of chapter 35 of this work, and of those following, and especially [the passage from] Gregory on Ezekiel alleged above sufficiently prove. The other parts follow lucidly from what has been set forth. They appear also very frequently in Sacred Scripture and in its sacred treatise-writers, who mixedly and indifferently affirm now God's grace to produce our good works, now God—holding these for the same. Those expounding Sacred Scripture (which says that God's grace produces in a man a good act) say very often that God produces that act, and similarly the contrary; those wishing also to show that God produces good human acts show that God's grace produces them, and the contrary; as many authorities in the chapters set forth above, and elsewhere in Sacred Scripture and in the writings of the saints, most plainly testify—which it was not necessary to touch on here, because they offer themselves abundantly not only to the diligent but even to the negligent reader.

CHAPTER XLII.

THAT GOD NATURALLY PRIOR TO GRACE PRODUCES ANY GOOD ACT OF THE CREATED WILL.

Since now—God and God's grace leading the way—it has been shown in the preceding chapter that God and God's created grace properly produce any good act of the created will, and both [do so] prior in nature to the created will, it must further be shown that God and the Holy Spirit of God naturally prior to grace itself produce any such act. Who does not admit this as a notorious principle? Who does not nod assent? Who dissents? Yet for the sake of some slower minds, behold a brief demonstration of this:

Since indeed God and grace produce a good act of the created will, either both [do so] equally first according to nature, or God [is] naturally prior to grace, or the contrary. They are not both equally first, because then those two agents and movers would be reduced to some third [agent] prior to both of them, by whose power both would act and move—as Philosophy fully testifies, and as can be shown from the second Supposition, from chapters 12 and 13 of this work. Nor is God naturally posterior to grace, as was briefly shown in the demonstration of the preceding Corollary. Who also is unaware that it is more dignified and more perfect to be a prior and principal cause naturally, than to be a posterior, instrumental, and subservient one? But God is such, as the first Supposition shows. Who furthermore is unaware that God is universally the first cause of all things, and the first mover?

Likewise, it is true that grace acts, but it is not the first true thing simply, as is plain from chapters 11, 12, and 13 of this work, but caused by it [the first truth]; therefore God is the cause of this truth, and produces it as true; therefore God naturally prior produces what grace produces, than [does] grace itself.

It seems, therefore, that imagination is to be thus engaged in the production of a good human act: that—as chapter 39 touched on—God most graciously and most liberally, in no way prevented nor excited by another, primarily wills eternal life for a man; and because he does not will it for the adult without his own merits, most graciously and most liberally he wills these merits, and also the grace through which he merits, which also most graciously and most liberally he infuses into him, creating it and moving it, and through it the man toward acting well—so that God in this motion is simply the first mover and not moved; grace [is] the second mover and moved; the created will, or the rational creature, the third mover and moved; and the good act produced [is] moved and not moving. Just as also sin separates us from God, so charity and grace conjoin us with him, and is in some way a union of God with man, and of man with God, by which he both heals the infirm, raises the fallen, excites the idle, and directs the operating one. It has been shown, however, in the preceding chapter that grace prevents the man, and naturally prior produces good acts. But it would seem unreasonable that an inanimate and irrational thing—namely grace or charity—should regulate an animate and rational thing, especially in its free and rational acts, unless it itself were principally regulated by some rational thing, and ruled from above. But grace or charity is regulated in acting by the Holy Spirit, as by a more principal and superior agent.

Hence the Apostle says: "The charity of God is poured forth in our hearts by the Holy Spirit," Romans 5. And again: "May the Lord direct your hearts in the charity of God," 2 Thessalonians 3. And again: "No one can say 'The Lord Jesus,' but in the Holy Spirit. There are diversities of graces, but the same Spirit; and there are diversities of ministries, but the same Lord; and there are diversities of operations, but the same God who works all things in all," 1 Corinthians 12. And further: "Whoever are led by the Spirit of God, these are sons of God," Romans 8. And further on: "You have received the spirit of adoption of sons, in which we cry: Abba, Father." And further on: "The Spirit aids our infirmity, and asks for us with unspeakable groans"—that is, makes us ask, according to the Gloss and the expositions of the saints. Hence Augustine in On the Perfection of Justice 21 says: "It is not heavy, what is done by loving, not by fearing. The Jews labor with the precepts, who try to fulfill them by fearing; but perfect charity casts out fear, and makes the burden of the precept light, not only not pressing with the weight of burdens, but even raising as on wings; which charity, that it may be had even as great as can be had in the body of this death, the choice of our will is little, unless the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord helps—for it is poured out in our hearts (which must often be said) not through ourselves, but through the Holy Spirit who has been given to us." And further on, ch. 22: "To the charity of God the commandment of God is not heavy, which charity is not poured forth in our hearts except through the Holy Spirit, not through the choice of the human will—to which giving more than is fitting, they are ignorant of the justice of God." And further on, ch. 33, he says that God produces, and helps, that we may be perfect, and without the infirmity of sin; and adds: "And these things the grace of God works with us through Jesus Christ our Lord, not only by precepts, by deeds, by examples, but also by the Holy Spirit, through whom charity is latently poured forth in our hearts, which intercedes with unspeakable groans, until in us soundness be perfected, and God, as he is to be seen, be shown in eternal truth." The same in On the Freedom of Choice to Hilary 2 says: "That which they say—that free choice suffices for a man for the fulfilling of the Lord's commandments, although it not be helped by the grace of God and by the gift of the Holy Spirit toward good works—is in every way to be anathematized, and detested with all execrations. For those who assert this are utterly alien from the grace of God, because being ignorant of the justice of God (as the Apostle says concerning the Jews) and willing to establish their own, they are not subject also to the justice of God. For the fullness of the law is nothing other than charity, and indeed the charity of God is poured forth in our hearts, not through ourselves or through the powers of our own will, but through the Holy Spirit who has been given to us." The same in On the Spirit and the Letter 13: "What are the laws of God, written by God himself in our hearts, but the very presence of the Holy Spirit, who is the finger of God, by whose presence charity is poured forth in our hearts, which is the fullness of the law and the end of the precept?" The same in Against Julian VI, ch. 26, speaks thus to Julian: "You do not recede from your dogma, by which you think the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord to be concerned only with the remission of sins, in such a way that it does not help us avoid sins, and to conquer carnal desires, by pouring charity into our hearts through the Holy Spirit, who has been given to us by him." The same in On Grace and Free Choice 36: "Charity, although small and imperfect, was not lacking to Peter when he said to the Lord: 'I will lay down my life for you'—for he thought he could do what he felt he willed; and who began to give him this charity—even though small—but he who prepares the will, and by cooperating perfects what he begins by operating, since he himself works as beginning so that we may will, who cooperates as perfecting with those willing? On account of which the Apostle says: 'I am certain that he who works in us a good work will perfect it unto the day of Jesus Christ.'" The same Augustine shows this diffusely in On the Words of the Apostle, sermon 13, treating the authoritative passages of the Apostle just touched on, and in many other places.

COROLLARY.

COROLLARY: THAT GOD AND THE HOLY SPIRIT ARE IN SOME WAY CALLED CHARITY AND GRACE, BY WHICH DEARLY AND FREELY GOD NOT ONLY LOVES HIMSELF AND MAN, BUT ALSO BY WHICH MAN LIKEWISE LOVES GOD AND NEIGHBOR.

From these things it can be gathered in some way that God and the Holy Spirit are called the charity and grace by which dearly and freely God not only loves himself and man, but also by which man likewise loves God and neighbor. For according to the distinction concerning charity and grace set forth in chapter 25, charity and grace are purely and supremely called the dear and gracious will of God, or the love by which he dearly and freely loves himself. Secondly it is taken for the same will or love, insofar as through it he dearly and freely—namely not on account of any preceding merits, nor on account of his own advantage—loves the creature. Thirdly, according to that most frequent trope in poetry, in philosophy, and in theology, by which the effect is named by the name of its maker—which is also one rhetorical color which Tully at the end of his New Rhetoric calls "denomination"—charity and grace are called the habit [infused] from the second charity, namely from the divine will dearly and freely infused into the creature; which, from another cause—namely from likeness to charity taken in the first or second mode—can similarly transumptively in some way be called charity and grace. For according to the Philosopher Topics VI: "Translation makes known in some way what is signified, through likeness; for all who translate, translate according to some likeness." But in this they are alike: because just as God dearly and freely loves himself and the creature through charity and grace taken in the first or second mode, so also the creature [loves] through such a habit freely infused into it.

Fourthly, on account of the same causes, charity and grace can be called the act by which God and neighbor are dearly and freely loved—deriving from the third charity, namely from the habit of charity and grace. Fifthly, according to similar transumption, that is called grace which is freely repaid for grace freely done—as the poets, the philosophers, and the theologians teach, and according to most frequent manner of speaking among all. These things, however, appear in some way from chapter 25 of this work. They appear similarly through Robert, Bishop of Lincoln, who in a certain treatise On Grace and the Justification of the Sinner says thus: "Grace is the good will of God, by which he wills to give us what we have not merited, that from the gift it may be well with us, and not that something may come from it to the giver. So also is wont to be called grace, such a will of one man toward another. Consequently, from grace so called, the very gift which is given by such a will is also called grace. Thirdly, the affection and praise due, repaid by the very recipient, is called grace. It is plain, therefore, that every good which is in us, whether gratuitous or natural, is from the grace of God, because there is no good which he does not will to be, and his willing is doing. Therefore there is no good which he does not make good, and perseverance in good he himself makes. Nevertheless these same things our free will also does—just as a grain germinates, both by a certain intrinsic generative force and by the heat of the sun together with the moisture of the earth." And further on: "A good will, by which a man is conformed to the divine will, is grace given by grace, which is the divine will. And then grace is said to be infused, when the divine will begins to operate in our will. But every good which the good will of God works in us, as has been said, is called grace given; but only the conformity of our will to the divine will is grace given, which renders us pleasing to God; and the good will of God producing and conserving this conformity in us, among the other wills of God, alone is called gratifying grace [gratia gratificans]. And this will of God which is gratifying grace is naturally prior to the conversion of our will to the good. There is another gratifying grace, namely the divine will of conserving in good the will converted to the good." Charity, however, or grace, which is God, is taken in two ways: namely essentially and commonly with respect to the whole Trinity, and to any of the persons; but otherwise personally and properly, and so it is appropriated to the Holy Spirit alone, as Augustine in On the Trinity XV, chs. 17, 19, and 20 manifestly teaches. Hence in chapter 20 he says: "The will of God, if any person in the Trinity is properly to be so called, this name better befits the Holy Spirit, as does charity. For what else is charity than will?"

The Holy Spirit, therefore, is the first and supreme charity by which God dearly loves himself and man, and by which also man dearly loves God and neighbor. Through him, the supreme charity, the habit of charity is given to man, and is poured out into the act by which we dearly love God and neighbor. This, however, I think to be the understanding of Augustine in books 8 and 15 of On the Trinity, and elsewhere, where he most intently strives to show that "charity is God, and the Holy Spirit of God"—as Lombard recites copiously in Sentences I, dist. 17. He himself similarly perhaps could be understood and expounded, although he most pertinaciously labors to prove that there is no charity in man other than the Holy Spirit alone—as his discussion and his words, beyond glossing, build up, as it seems.

It will perhaps be objected that in similar manner God and the Holy Spirit could be called our faith and hope, because from him are faith, hope, the habit, and the act by which we believe and hope. Peter also, in Sentences I, dist. 17, says: "It is not said by expression of cause, 'God is charity'—namely because charity is from God, and is not God himself, just as 'patience' and 'our hope' are said, not because he is, but because these things are to us from him"—to prove which he adduces the authority of Augustine in book 15 of On the Trinity, in chapter 17 thereof.

To the first of these it must be said that, if the manner of speaking permitted, God could according to the aforesaid trope be called our faith, just as he is called our hope, and our patience also. But it must be further noted that God and the Holy Spirit can much more conveniently and more closely to proper truth, and less transumptively, less metaphorically, be called our charity than [our] faith or hope. For as I touched on above, one cause of this tropical speech, and of the denomination of one thing by the name of another, is that one of them is the efficient cause of the other; another cause, according to the Philosopher, is the likeness of one thing to another. But by both of these modes God and the Holy Spirit can be called the charity of man. For the charity of man, both habit and act, is made by him; God too, or the Holy Spirit, and the charity of man are very greatly alike in reality and in name, in such a way that each is in a certain way called charity univocally—because concordantly in reality and in name. For who is unaware that God and the Holy Spirit are charity, and that the created charity of man is charity? And who does not know that God and the Holy Spirit by their charity dearly love first God, secondly man on account of God; that man also by his charity dearly loves first God, secondly man on account of God? But God cannot thus univocally be called our faith or hope: for he believes nothing in a riddle, but sees all things clearly; nor does he hope anything, but always has fullest certainty concerning all things. He nevertheless makes us believe and hope; therefore in the first manner mentioned above he could in some way be called our faith and hope.

To the second it could be said that Peter understands God to be called charity not only by expression of cause—as he is called our patience and our hope—but also on account of the univocal likeness mentioned above. Yet it must be noted that the authority of Augustine does nothing there for Peter, nor does he take it according to its due understanding. For he intends through it to show that the Holy Spirit is the charity by which we love God and neighbor—and this not by expression of cause, but properly according to himself. Hence, having recited Augustine's words, he subjoins: "From the foregoing it is clear that the Holy Spirit is the charity by which we love God and neighbor." But without doubt, to one diligently looking at that chapter 17 of book 15 of On the Trinity which he alleges, it evidently appears that Augustine principally treats that text of 1 John 4, and shows that "it is not said by signification of cause, as has been said to God, 'You are my patience,' and 'Lord, my hope'; and therefore it is not said, 'Lord, my charity,' or 'You are my charity'; but truly and properly according to substance, just as it is said, 'God is Spirit.'" And he shows that charity is taken commonly, in such a way that any person in the Trinity may be called charity; and properly, in such a way as it pertains to the Holy Spirit alone. He understands also there, and speaks, of the charity by which God loves himself and man—not the contrary—as his words set forth above testify. He says: "It has not been said, 'Lord, my charity,' or 'You are my charity'; but it has been said thus: 'God is charity.'" And further on, in the same place, he says that "John the Apostle commemorated the love of God—not that by which we love him, but that by which he himself loved us; and that this love is the Holy Spirit."

CHAPTER XLIII

ON SAVING PENITENCE ACCORDING TO DIVERSE OPINIONS, AND ON THE POWER OF THE KEYS

After these matters, it seems we must treat of the justification of the unjust and of saving penitence, concerning which a manifold opinion is in circulation, but principally a twofold one. The first is that of the Pelagians, which holds that the sinner first naturally repents, and through this secondly merits, receives, and possesses grace and justification. The other is that of certain others, which says that God first naturally and gratuitously infuses grace into the sinner, and that the sinner secondly repents in a saving manner.

The first of these is varied in two ways. For some Pelagians affirm that grace naturally precedes justification; certain others, on the contrary. The first group holds that the sinner first naturally repents; secondly, through this, receives grace; and thirdly, through this is justified. Others, on the contrary, say that the sinner first naturally repents; secondly, through this is justified; and so thirdly, receives grace. And these are still further divided in two ways. For some think that the sinner alone, through contrition, expurgates his sin and so justifies himself. Others judge that God does this, but on account of the merit of contrition temporally and naturally preceding. Therefore the opinion of the Pelagians, generally taken, is only one, but specially threefold.

These opinions of theirs—the common one and the special ones—they strive to establish by many testimonies of Sacred Scripture and by other arguments. For the Pelagians, as Augustine reports in On Grace and Free Will, chapter 11, gather such things from the Scriptures, of which sort is: "Turn ye unto me, and I will turn unto you" [Zech. 1:3], so that according to the merit of our turning to God, His grace might be given to us, by which He Himself also turns to us. And: "The Lord is with you when you are with Him"; and: "If you seek Him, you shall find Him" [2 Chron. 15:2]; and similar passages. He also writes thus in On the Predestination of the Saints 13: "The Pelagians say: When it is said, 'If thou shalt believe, thou shalt be saved,' one of these is required, the other is offered; what is required is in man's power, what is offered is in God's power."

Who also, as they say, is ignorant that penitence is remissive of sins, and the cause of the justification of the unjust, of reconciliation, and of divine acceptance? And therefore [it is] also prior in time or nature to the remission of sin, the justification of the unjust, and divine acceptance: for this is shown commonly by the Old Testament and the New, by all the Catholic Doctors treating of penitence, and by divine, canonical, and human laws. Whence Jeremiah 18: "Suddenly," says the Lord, "I will speak against a nation, and against a kingdom, that I may root it out, and destroy, and disperse it: if that nation shall repent of their evil which I have spoken against them, I also will repent of the evil that I thought to do to them" [Jer. 18:7-8]. Likewise Jonah 3: "God saw their works, that they were turned from their evil way: and God had mercy with regard to the evil which He had said that He would do to them, and He did it not" [Jonah 3:10]. The Gloss: "Daily God threatens the peoples, that they may do penance; if they are converted, He Himself also turns aside the sentence, and is changed by the people's conversion." Whence Augustine also on Psalm 50: "The uncertain and hidden things of Thy wisdom Thou hast made manifest to me" [Ps. 50:8]: "On this uncertainty the Ninevites did penance, and merited certain mercy."

The same, On True and False Penitence 1, says thus: "How great is the grace of penitence to be sought, every Authority cries out, every life of the blessed strives to show. For it heals languors, cures lepers, raises the dead, increases health which it preserves, restores walking to the lame, abundance to the withered, sight to the blind, puts vices to flight, adorns virtues, fortifies and strengthens the mind, heals all things, restores all things, gladdens all things, tempers successes, restrains impulses, moderates excesses; one ignorant of himself recognizes himself through this; he who always seeks it finds it. This is what leads men to the angels, and gives back the creature to the Creator. This showed the lost sheep to him who sought, and offered the tenth drachma to her who was anxious; this brought back the prodigal son to the father, and reserved him wounded by robbers to the keeper for healing. In this every good is found, through this every good is preserved; it puts to flight the darkness, brings in the light, refines all things, it is itself a consuming fire."

Likewise, medicine precedes the medicated; penitence is medicine, as is plain from the proximate authority of Augustine; who also further on at chapter 13 says: "Let the penitent believe that this very penitence is medicine." Who also in On Penitence 1 says: "How profitable and necessary is the medicine of penitence," etc. Who also further on at chapter 8 says: "Sins are dried up by the medicament of penitence." Wherefore the whole Church prays: "Heal me, O Lord, by the medicament of penitence, O God." Likewise Ambrose, as alleged in the Gloss on Luke 5: "I came not to call the just, but sinners to penitence" [Luke 5:32]: "Usurpers of justice," he says, "are not called to grace; for if grace [comes] from penitence, surely he who disdains penitence renounces grace."

Likewise Chrysostom, as alleged in the Gloss on Luke 3: "Preaching the baptism of penitence" [Luke 3:3]: "John came," he says, "exhorting them to do penance, that through penitence, made better and contrite, they might exert themselves to receive pardon. Aptly therefore, when he had said that he came preaching the baptism of penitence, he added, for the remission of sins, as if he were saying: For this reason he persuaded them to repent, that they might more easily obtain the pardon following, believing in Christ. For unless they were led by penitence, they would by no means demand grace."

Likewise the Psalmist: "I said, I will confess against myself my injustice to the Lord, and Thou hast forgiven the wickedness of my sin" [Ps. 31:5]. Therefore he said first in his heart, and proposed to confess; and afterwards in time or nature, and on account of this, the wickedness of his sin was remitted. Whence Augustine, expounding this, says: "A great matter: 'I said, I will pronounce'—he did not say, 'I have pronounced,'—'and Thou hast forgiven.' 'I said, I will pronounce, and Thou hast forgiven.' For by the very fact that he said, 'I will pronounce,' he showed that he had not yet pronounced with his mouth; but with his heart he had pronounced this very thing, 'to say, I will pronounce, is to pronounce'; therefore Thou hast forgiven the wickedness of my heart." With whom Cassiodorus also agrees, expounding the same passage. And John Chrysostom, as alleged in the Canon, On Penitence, distinction 1, Nunc autem, says: "If thou rememberest thy sins, and frequently pronouncest them in the sight of God, and entreatest His clemency for them, thou shalt more swiftly destroy them."

Likewise as alleged above and in 4 Sentences, distinction 17: "No one," he says, "can receive the grace of God unless he be purged from every defilement of sin, or from every sin through the confession of penitence, through the gift of saving baptism, or even through baptism." Likewise Ezekiel 18: "If the wicked man," says the Lord, "do penance for all his sins which he hath committed, etc., he shall surely live"; and below: "When the wicked turneth himself from his wickedness, etc., he shall save his soul alive: For he hath considered, and turned himself from all his iniquities which he hath wrought, he shall surely live" [Ezek. 18:21, 27-28]. Likewise the Prophet: "I will wash my bed every night with my tears" [Ps. 6:7]. On which Augustine: "He will wash his bed every night, that with such great tears he may obtain the most efficacious medicine from God's mercy."

Likewise Psalm 84 says most plainly: "Justice shall walk before Him, and shall set His steps in the way" [Ps. 84:14]. Augustine, expounding this, says: "That justice consists in the confession of sins; for it is truth itself. For thou oughtest to be just against thyself, that thou mayest punish thyself. This is the first justice of man—that thou shouldst punish thyself as evil, and that God may make thee good. Because therefore this is the first justice of man, this becomes a way for God, that God may come to thee. There make a way for Him in the confession of sins." Whence John, when he was baptizing in the water of penitence and wished those who came to him to repent of their previous deeds, said this: "Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight His paths" [Matt. 3:3]. "Thou wast pleasing to thyself in thy sins, O man—displease thyself for what thou wast, that thou mayest be what thou wast not. Prepare ye the way of the Lord: let this justice go before, that thou mayest confess thy sins; He will come and visit thee, because He shall set His steps in the way: for there is a place for Him to set His steps, there is a place for Him to come to thee. But before thou didst confess thy sins, thou hadst blocked the way of God against thyself; there was no way by which He might come to thee. Confess thy life, and thou openest the way; and Christ will come, and set His steps in the way, that He may form thee with His footprints."

Likewise Psalm 103: "Thou hast put on confession and beauty" [Ps. 103:1]—confession first, and through it beauty second; which Augustine's exposition also testifies. Who also is ignorant of that most famous Gospel narrative concerning Magdalen, the most fortunate of sinners, which proclaims that she, by fervent love and many tears, merited remission of sins and pardon, and divine friendship? Whence Luke 7: "Many sins are forgiven her," says the Lord, "because she hath loved much" [Luke 7:47]. And below: "He said to the woman: Thy faith hath made thee safe; go in peace" [Luke 7:50]. "In peace," says Theophilus, "that is, in justice; for justice is the peace of man with God." Whence also the Apostle to Romans 2: "The doers of the law shall be justified" [Rom. 2:13]. And James 2: "You see how by works a man is justified, and not by faith only" [James 2:24].

Likewise Peter Lombard, 4 Sentences, distinction 14: "Penitence," he says, "is necessary for those placed far from God, that he may approach"; where he also alleges from Jerome that penitence is "the second plank after shipwreck," because if anyone corrupts by sinning the garment of innocence received in baptism, he can repair it by the remedy of penitence. The first plank is baptism, where the old man is put off and the new is put on; the second is penitence, by which we rise after a fall, while the returning oldness is repelled and the lost newness is resumed. Those who fall after baptism can be renewed by penitence, but not by baptism. Peter adds: "Of penitence, both a sacrament and a virtue of mind are spoken of: for there is interior and exterior penitence; the exterior is sacrament, the interior is virtue of mind, and each is a cause of salvation and justification."

Reason also seems to confirm this same thing. For if justifying grace is given gratuitously before contrition and penitence in time or nature, the sinner need not further be contrite, nor further repent, since he is already justified and just. Likewise, if God justifies one sinner not for any preceding merit, but purely gratuitously, why not another, and another, and so all? Likewise, if God now purely gratuitously justifies anyone, why now rather than at other times after, or before? Likewise, specially for the second opinion, it follows manifestly: This man has grace, therefore he is without mortal sin; and he is not converted, since someone could be without grace and without sin, just as perhaps the Angels and the first men were at their creation. Therefore this is naturally prior to that. Again, if having grace is naturally prior to the deletion of sin, it can be without it; therefore the sinner can simultaneously be in grace and in mortal sin.

But this general error of the Pelagians, the 35th [chapter] and those following generally direct and reduce. For they show that no one can in any way merit the first grace. Likewise, he who is contrite and repents of sins either does this justly, well, meritoriously, and praiseworthy, as he ought, or otherwise. If otherwise, he does not merit justification nor the friendship of the just God. If justly and well, then he already previously has justice, charity, and justifying grace, from which—as from an efficient cause naturally preceding, and as from an original root—a just act of this kind proceeds and sprouts forth, as is established from chapters 39, 40, and 41. Specially from the sayings of Anselm, On Concord 9, On Truth 12, and Augustine, To Simplicianus 24; and again from Anselm, On the Fall of the Devil 17 and 12, and On Concord 9 and last; and from Augustine, On Faith to Peter 18 and 21, set forth in chapter 39 of this work.

Who [Augustine] also on Psalm 110: "Confession and magnificence are His work" [Ps. 110:3], says thus: "What is more magnificent than to justify the wicked? But perhaps man's work precedes this magnificence of God, that when he has confessed his sins, he may merit to be justified." "Not from works," he says, "lest perhaps anyone be exalted; for we are His handiwork, created in Christ in good works. For man does not work justice unless he is justified. But believing in Him who justifies the wicked, he begins from faith, that good works may show—not as preceding what he merited, but as consequent upon what he received."

It was also shown plainly in chapter 40 of this work that there is no good fruit which does not arise from the root of charity. Whence also Hosea, last chapter: "From me," says the Lord, "is thy fruit found" [Hos. 14:9]. The Gloss: "Every operation, and the observance of both the Old and the New Testament, has proceeded from My gift." And Augustine on Psalm 50: "And take not Thy Holy Spirit from me" [Ps. 50:13]: "But the Holy Spirit is in him who confesses; it now pertains to the gift of the Holy Spirit that what thou hast done displeases thee. To the unclean spirit sins are pleasing; to the holy, displeasing. Although therefore thou still beseechest pardon, yet from the part by which the evil thou hast committed displeases thee, thou art joined to God: for this displeases thee, what also displeases Him: now you are two to fight off thy fever, both thou and the Physician. Because therefore there cannot be confession of sin and punishment of sin from himself in man, when each is angry with himself and displeases himself, without the gift of the Holy Spirit, he does not say, Holy Spirit, give me Thine, but, Take it not away from me."

Likewise, he who repents either repents from love of justice, or from fear of punishment, or from another cause. If from love of justice—namely, from gratuitous love of God above all things on account of God—he already has charity and grace by nature first, whence he may thus love God, as was just argued. If from fear of punishment or from some other cause—say, on account of his own advantage, and not from the aforesaid love of justice—how does he merit through this justification and the friendship of God, as in chapter 39 was more fully taught philosophically and theologically? For right intention makes a work right, and according to the Philosopher, Ethics 6.10, virtue makes intention itself right; but no virtue is right without charity and grace, which makes one pleasing to God, as the same chapter 39 shows. Who indeed doubts that on the gratuitous love of God above all things on account of Himself, and of one's neighbor on account of God, the whole law and the prophets depend, since Matthew 22 testifies this as Truth? [Matt. 22:40] Wherefore the Apostle also says: "Now the end of the commandment is charity from a pure heart, and a good conscience, and an unfeigned faith" [1 Tim. 1:5]. Whence Augustine, Enchiridion, penultimate chapter: "The end of every precept is charity—that is, every precept is referred to charity. But what is done thus from fear of punishment, or from some carnal intention, so that it is not referred to that charity which the Holy Spirit pours forth in our hearts, is not yet done as it ought to be done, although it seems to be done. For this charity is of God and of neighbor, and surely on these two precepts the whole law depends and the prophets. Add the Gospel, add the Apostles; for from no other source is this voice: the end of the commandment is charity. Whatsoever therefore God commands, and whatsoever things are not commanded but counseled by special advice, are then rightly done when they are referred to loving God and one's neighbor on account of God." This his authority plainly testifies in Against Pelagius and Caelestius, On the Grace of Christ and on Original Sin 22, which chapter 37 of this work contains.

He also in On the Spirit and the Letter 13: "A commandment," he says, "if it is done from fear of punishment, not from love of justice, is done servilely, not liberally, and therefore is not done. For the fruit is not good which does not rise from the root of charity. But further, if the faith which works through love is present, it begins to take pleasure in the law of God according to the inner man, which delight is not the gift of the letter but of the Spirit, even if another law in the members still resists the law of the mind, until in the newness which from day to day is increased in the inner man, all the oldness, changed, passes through, the grace of God liberating us from the body of this death." From this place seems to be drawn that rule of Law at the end of the fifth book of the Decretals, ascribed to Augustine, saying thus: "He who from fear performs a precept, performs it otherwise than he ought, and therefore he does not perform it."

Likewise, whoever savingly repents does this from gratuitous love of God naturally preceding. For he does this for some end. If on account of God, he loves God gratuitously for His own sake—which he cannot do unless he previously possesses charity, as is plain from chapter 39. If on account of another end, he does not repent savingly, nor does he merit life, as is plain from the same chapter 39 and other premises. Likewise, by the corollary of chapter 41 of this work, God works and pre-works in man any good work whatsoever; and by the same corollary, He does this through grace gratuitously infused, and naturally first operating with the human will. Wherefore also, every saving contrition and penitence.

Likewise, if anyone, as they say, merits remission of mortal sin through contrition, he likewise merits remission of the eternal punishment due for the sin, either as to the whole, or as to a part of it infinite in duration—because at least he merits the conversion of that eternal punishment into some temporal punishment. And if he merits this in one instant or short moment—namely, by repenting once—if at another instant or time, namely by repenting another time in similar fashion, he will merit the full remission of any temporal punishment, since any temporal punishment is incomparably less than the eternal. And thus the penitence which in the Church is wont to be imposed on penitents in the present life would be superfluous, and even purgatorial fire after this life. It also follows that any contrition whatsoever, however slack or brief, takes away every venial fault and every punishment due for a venial sin, or even for any venial sins whatsoever—since it suffices to take away every mortal fault and the eternal punishment due for mortal [sin], or some infinite portion of it, which are incomparably greater than these—which no one is unaware is contrary to reason and Catholic truth.

Indeed, it also follows evidently that any contrition, however lukewarm and slack, provided it is supported by the requisite circumstances, merits full remission of any mortal sin whatsoever, both as to fault and as to any punishment whatsoever, both eternal and even temporal. But that even the slightest contrition accompanied by the requisite circumstances destroys or excludes every mortal sin as to fault—both the Pelagians themselves and others commonly confess; which could be shown manifoldly both by reasons and by authorities. But because scarcely anyone hesitates over this, let it suffice to prove this by a single argument and by a single—indeed threefold—testimony. For every such contrition proceeds from charity and grace, which destroys and excludes every mortal sin.

John Chrysostom also, On the Restoration of the Fallen, alleged in the Canon On Penitence, distinction 3, Talis; and in 4 Sentences of Peter, distinction 14: "Such, believe me," he says, "is God's piety toward men: He never spurns penitence, if it is offered to Him sincerely and simply. Even if anyone has come to the summit of evils, and yet from there wishes to return to the way of virtue, He receives him willingly, embraces him, does all things to recall him to his former state. And what is yet more excellent and eminent: even if one cannot fulfill the whole order of satisfaction, yet however small a penitence and one performed in however brief a time, He does not reject; He accepts it also, nor does He suffer the reward of even the slightest conversion to perish."

Further it also follows against these, that any contrition whatsoever destroys every mortal sin fully as to punishment. For let it be supposed that Peter has sin A, for which is owed the eternal punishment B; and that through contrition C he merits the remission of A as to fault, and as to punishment D—an infinite part of B—but not as to the whole of B. And let it be supposed that Paul has two similar sins or more, and is similarly contrite for his many [sins], as Peter is for his one. Then Paul through his contrition merits to have remitted to himself one infinite part of one eternal punishment equal to B, owed for one of his sins, and another infinite part of another eternal punishment equal to B, owed for another of his sins. These two parts joined together exceed—indeed in some manner infinitely exceed—the whole of B. If therefore Paul through his contrition merits for himself such a great remission, and Peter through his equal [contrition merits the same], much more reasonably and worthily does he merit for himself the remission of the whole of B, which is far less—especially since Peter is more innocent and more disposed to merit.

But that this same thing may be shown more briefly and clearly, let this known truth be supposed: Of any two penalties uniform and similar in species, having a beginning and no end, unequal in intensity and duration, the more intense, however much shorter or briefer in duration, is nevertheless simply greater. But lest anyone say this supposition is not sufficiently notorious, behold its brief demonstration. Let K be one uniform intense punishment of fire, beginning at instant L in the future, to endure interminably; and M another similar uniform but more remiss punishment, beginning at the present instant N, to remain eternally. Therefore K is not equal to M, nor less, therefore greater. For if the adversary shall say that K is equal to M, let O be a part of M beginning at L and from then enduring eternally, and P the remaining part of it; let Q be the intensive imaginary part of K (or true, as some opine), equal to O, and R the residual part of K. Since therefore K and M are equal, if equals be subtracted from them—namely, O and Q—the residual parts are equal, as is plain to anyone, and Euclid in Book 1 of his Elements supposes this as manifest. Therefore P and R are equal, which no one is unaware is most false, since P is in every way finite, but R is infinite according to duration and uniform throughout, as clearly follows from the premises.

Which can also easily be shown to be false. For either P and R are of equal intensity or not. If so, P is altogether equal to a finite part of R as great in duration as P is; for it is similar in species, and equal to it intensively, and similarly extensively. Therefore that part of R is equal to its whole, since they are equal to a third—namely, P. But if P and R are not of equal intensity, one of them is more intense. If R be remitted to equality with P, or P intensified to equality with R—then they will not be equal, but R greater than P, as was just taught. Much more therefore now is R greater. But if P is more intense, this is not infinitely but only finitely. Let it be supposed therefore for the sake of example that [it is greater] in some multiple proportion—say tenfold, or hundredfold, or another, as you please—and let P be divided into intensive parts equal in number according to the denominator of the given proportion, namely into ten, or a hundred. Then any of those parts will be of intensity equal to R; let them be joined in length according to duration, and let T be the whole uniform punishment gathered from them. Then T is simply finite in duration, as is established, and of intensity equal to R; therefore less than R, as was shown above—which can also most easily be demonstrated in continuous permanent quantities.

Yet perhaps more sensibly thus, to the same effect: To P, an intense punishment, can some punishment similar in species, more remiss but more prolonged—yet finite in duration both before and after—be made equal in all things weighed. For some such punishment can be greater simply in penalty, more punishing, and more to be fled from than P, all things being weighed. Wherefore also some punishment equal to it—namely, such that as much as it is lighter from remission, so much is it heavier from duration. To this second more remiss or more prolonged punishment, by similar reasoning, some third punishment more remiss than this second but more prolonged—yet finite in duration before and after—can similarly be made equal. Which, if posited, is necessarily equal to P itself, since both are posited equal to the second punishment. To this third punishment also a fourth, more remiss but more prolonged, similarly equal can be taken; and to this fourth a fifth, and so onwards, until one comes to one as intense as R—indeed less intense than R—and finite in time on both sides, which according to the premises will necessarily be equal to P, and less than R. Wherefore P is also similarly proved necessarily less than R.

But if the false-writer does not cease his obstinacy, saying that P does not exceed R in any multiple proportion, but in some other whatever, let P be intensified or R remitted until a multiple proportion arise between them, etc., as above. But if it be said in the first place that K is less than M, and M greater than K, let K be intensified or M uniformly remitted until the punishments are equal, the prior quantity of duration being preserved, etc., as before. For no one doubts that K can by mere intensification be made a punishment greater simply than M, and M by mere remission less than K. For some uniform intensification throughout K augments K more than one extension altogether finite for one time finite on both sides, as is clearly plain from what precedes. But some extension of K, finite—say from L to N or beyond—augments K beyond M, as is most certainly established to all. Wherefore some intensification likewise augments it. If therefore K is now a less punishment than M, and can by mere intensification be made a greater punishment, it can likewise be made equal; and the same happens of M through remission and shortening to L or beyond.

Likewise differently, to the same effect: If K be a less punishment than M, let its first intensity and uniformity be preserved, and let it be extended toward N continuously until it is a punishment simply equal, all things made equal, with M—for this can be done. For thus by mere extension toward N, it can be made a greater punishment. For if it be thus extended to N, who does not see that K is a greater punishment than M, since it is equal extensively and greater intensively? Let K therefore with its prior intensity and uniformity be extended to some certain instant, so that it thus becomes a punishment equal, all things being weighed, to M. Then that instant cannot be posited as N nor before N, because then K would be notoriously greater than M, as was just taught; nor can it be posited between N and L, as was demonstrated above. Therefore the previously accepted supposition is plain.

Which moreover can also be ostensively demonstrated thus briefly: K is composed precisely of Q and R; M of O and P; and Q is equal to O, and R greater than P, as no one is ignorant, and as was shown above. Therefore the whole K is greater than the whole M; for there is a part of K equal to M—namely, that which is composed of Q and one part of R equal to P—as is clear to all eyes; and it is plain by that common principle, self-evident: "If thou addest equals to equals, the wholes become equal," which Euclid in Book 1 of his Elements enumerates among common conceptions of mind. If therefore a part of K is equal to M, since K is greater than that part—as that common principle, "Every whole is greater than its part," clearly manifests—it is similarly greater than M, as is clearly plain to all, as also Proposition 7 of Book 5 of Euclid's Elements clearly demonstrates, saying: "If two equal quantities be compared to any third, their proportion to it will be one; likewise the proportion of that to both is one."

Therefore the foretasted truth is plain. Retaining therefore the premised case concerning Peter, and his sin A, and his eternal punishment B, and his contrition C, and the part of B—namely, D—remitted through C: let it be supposed that Paul has E, a sin greater than A, for which is owed F, an eternal punishment similar in species to B but more intense, and so greater; and through G, a contrition equal to C, he merits the remission of H, an infinite part of F. Therefore by the premised truth, H is a greater punishment than B. If therefore Paul through contrition G merits what is greater—namely, the remission of H—much more does Peter through contrition C, equal [to G], merit what is less—namely, the remission of the whole of B, the greatest punishment—since he is better, more innocent, and more apt to merit. For who is the just creditor, Lord, or Judge who refuses what is offered by his debtor for the payment of a smaller debt, which—not from grace but by right—suffices for the payment of a greater debt, and which from other debtors not from grace but by right he accepts for the full payment of the greater—greater, I say, not by a little, but by however much you wish to think, as can easily be shown?

Likewise, let it be supposed that there is owed to Peter, for some sin, a punishment equal to that part of the punishment remitted to Paul through his contrition, and that Peter is contrite equally [with Paul]. Therefore Peter through his contrition merits the full remission of his punishment. Therefore any contrition whatsoever suffices for the full remission of any fault and punishment whatsoever.

Likewise, the intensive half of contrition C in Peter, and any small part of it, or another however more remiss contrition supported by the requisite circumstances, would merit the deletion of A as to fault, and as to an infinite part of B—though less than D. Wherefore the other half of C in Peter, or the whole contrition C, which is double or however much more intense and better than that more remiss contrition aforesaid, merits much more the remission of the small remaining part of B—indeed even something great beyond. For otherwise that whole contrition is not fully remunerated by God, nor even any part of it. For the half of any signed part would merit the remission of A as to fault, and as to an infinite part of B—and why does not one half merit as much as another? Why therefore does it not merit the remission of the small remaining part of the punishment, and something beyond, as much as the remission of A as to fault and as to the infinite remitted part of the punishment exceeds the residual part of the punishment?

But who would presume to say that God does not fully remunerate any good act whatsoever, against the 31st part of the first corollary of this work? Whence the Lord Himself says: "Everyone that hath left house, etc., for My name's sake, shall receive a hundredfold" [Matt. 19:29]. And Mark 10: "There is no man who hath left house, etc., for Me, who shall not receive a hundred times as much, now in this time" [Mark 10:29-30]. And Luke 6: "Give, and it shall be given unto you: good measure, and pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall they give into your bosom" [Luke 6:38]. And the Wise Man says: "Afflicted in few things, in many they shall be well rewarded" [Wisd. 3:5]—which the series of either Testament evidently shows.

Not only does it follow against these that God does not fully remunerate any good act whatsoever, but also that He cannot. For if He could, let God fully remunerate Peter's contrition C: either, then, He does this by remitting to him the whole fault A, and the whole punishment B or D, and giving him glory infinite extensively and intensively likewise, or something less than this, or something less. Not the whole, as no one is ignorant, both because Peter through a more remiss act would have merited only equally—since he could not [have merited] more—and so act C would not be remunerated to the full; and also all who merit eternal life would equally merit infinite glory extensively and intensively, and so the difference of heavenly mansions would perish—nor less. For let it be said that he merits remission of fault A, and of punishment B or D, and O—glory infinite extensively, but intensively finite. Then either O glory is more good and eligible than A and B (or D) are evil and to be fled from, or equally so, or less. If more, and not infinitely but only finitely, let it be said for example's sake that [it is more] hundredfold, and let C be divided into many imaginary intensive parts—say into a thousand. According to what was shown before, one of those parts by itself alone would merit the full remission of fault A and of some infinite punishment. Wherefore another equal [part] would merit at least the remission of the residual temporal punishment, and any of the others by similar reasoning glory infinite extensively, as good and eligible as the fault and punishment remitted was evil and to be fled from. All these parts therefore concurring virtually merit glory infinite extensively, more intense than O. And so by further division of C into more parts and more, one can proceed beyond every assignable intensity of glory. From this, however, it also evidently appears that O cannot be posited as equal to A and B (or D), nor less.

Likewise, according to these, any contrition however small merits the full remission of any venial sins whatsoever and of any temporal punishments owed. For if not, let A be a contrition which by no means merits these, and let B be another, lesser contrition. Then according to what was shown before, B in a mortal sinner merits the remission of mortal sin as to fault and as to an infinite part of the punishment owed; and these incomparably exceed any venial sins whatever and any temporal punishments. But what justice, what equity, what law dictates accepting some price for the just, legal, and full payment of the greatest debt, and refusing a greater price for the full payment of the smallest debt?

Likewise, again according to these, any contrition merits the full remission of all fault and punishment. For any mortal—and perhaps even venial—fault is worse and more to be fled than every punishment of sense or loss not including fault, as the 30th part of the first corollary teaches. And any contrition merits the full remission of every mortal sin, and of any mortal sins, as to fault. Therefore likewise as to punishment. For let Peter be guilty of two—or any mortal—sins, and Paul only of one, lesser than any sin of Peter, and of one punishment owed for that. Then if Peter repents, he merits the dismissal of two—or however many more—greater evils (since [they are] of so many mortal sins) than those two evils of Paul. Why then will not Paul, similarly repenting, merit the full dismissal of all his fault and punishment?

Likewise, according to these, any contrition is of infinite efficacy and infinite merit. For however many mortal sins and however grievous, however many and however worthy of infernal punishments anyone has, at any contrition he merits the remission of all mortal sins as to fault, and as to the cutting off of an infinite part of any of the infernal punishments owed.

Likewise, against these similarly it follows that any good act in grace and proceeding from grace is similarly of infinite merit. Since any good act in grace and proceeding from grace is better, or at least as good and meritorious, as a similar act not in grace, or not done from grace—and some such act, namely, a contrition prior to grace, is of infinite merit, as was just argued.

Likewise, if anyone through contrition merits the first grace after sin, it seems he merits as much grace as he previously had and lost by sinning, if he had grace before sinning. For otherwise penitence, diminutively and not perfectly, would heal and vivify the penitent, nor fully reconcile him to God; but God would reproach him with his preceding sin, by subtracting the portion of the preceding grace—against that of James 1: "Who giveth to all men abundantly, and upbraideth not" [James 1:5]. Such a one also, if he so departed [this life], would be punished in heaven eternally with the punishment of loss—namely, by the subtraction of the portion of grace and glory previously owed to him—indeed, however long he might live and merit, he would still be punished eternally in heaven by such punishment of loss. For he would always have less than one similarly working would have had otherwise, and this on account of his preceding sin.

It also seems that if he rises in lesser grace than he lost by falling, his sin is not fully remitted. For he sinned by losing such great grace and in some manner subtracting it from his God and Lord—which he ought always to have kept, and even returned with usury—nor is he absolved from this obligation on account of his sin, because if he had not sinned he would not have been absolved. Nor is it fitting that from his sin he carry away gain and greater liberty. But it is certain that sin is not fully dismissed until what was taken away is fully restored, especially if the obligation is not paid. Whence Matthew 5: "Be at agreement with thy adversary betimes, whilst thou art in the way with him: lest perhaps the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison. Amen, I say to thee, thou shalt not go out from thence till thou repay the last farthing" [Matt. 5:25-26]. And Luke 12: "Thou shalt not go out, until thou pay the very last mite" [Luke 12:59]. And Augustine writes to Macedonius, as alleged in Canon 14, last question, Si res, that "sin is not remitted unless what was taken is restored." And below: "I would say this most confidently: that he who intervenes for a man so that he should not restore what he has taken away, and who does not compel one fleeing to him to repay—as far as he can honestly—is a partner of fraud and crime." Where also in the following chapter Gregory is alleged, strictly precepting that if the thing taken away cannot be restored, its price be given.

Wherefore Anselm, Cur Deus Homo 1.20: "Hold," he says, "most certainly, that without satisfaction—that is, without the spontaneous payment of the debt—God can neither dismiss sin unpunished, nor can the sinner come to beatitude, or such [beatitude] as he had before he sinned"; and chapter 21: "Satisfaction must be according to the measure of sin"; and chapter 24, dialoguing thus he writes: "A. Attend to strict justice, and judge accordingly, whether man satisfies God for the equality of sin, unless that very thing which by allowing himself to be conquered by the Devil, he took from God, by conquering the Devil he restores. So that, as by the fact that he was conquered, the Devil seized what was God's, and God lost; so by the fact that he conquers, the Devil should lose, and God recover B. Nothing stricter or more just can be thought. A. Dost thou suppose the highest justice can violate this justice? B. I dare not think so. A. In no way then ought, nor can, man receive from God what God proposed to give him, if he does not return to God all that he took from Him, that as through him God lost, so through him He may recover."

Indeed it seems that he must return more than the simple thing taken—namely, something satisfactory for the contempt or injury inflicted. Whence in the divine law—Exodus 22—it is precepted that whoever has stolen anything shall in [different] cases restore fivefold, fourfold, or double; with which the civil law also agrees. In Leviticus 5 also it is commanded that if anyone has done damage in things consecrated to the Lord, or in the things of his neighbor, he shall integrally restore all things, and shall offer over and above a fifth part to the Priest, according to the measure and estimation of the sin. Wherefore Anselm, Cur Deus Homo 1.11: "As long," he says, "as the sinner does not pay what he plundered, he remains in fault; nor does it suffice merely to return what was taken, but for the contumely inflicted he ought to return more than what he took away."

Nor can anyone say that the impotence of returning the whole grace lost excuses, because he does not pay the obligation of having grace and returning it, as was shown above; and because thus any damned man and the Devil would be excused from debt and sin. Anselm proves this same thing in Cur Deus Homo 1.25 lucidly and diffusely. Even considering more subtly, perhaps the new impotence of paying the old debt excuses from new and continuous sin, taking sin properly—so that by not paying, he does not properly, anew, and continuously sin with another and another sin (as Augustine speaks in On Free Will 3.30, and as is the case with damned men and demons)—but it does not thus excuse nor exonerate the impotent from his old debt. For who is unaware, according to all laws divine equally and human, that impotence descending from fault by no means excuses, but perhaps rather aggravates, especially with the fault not remitted, but itself remaining? And how is fault justly and fully remitted except through full preceding satisfaction, as also all laws dictate? And if anyone shall say that fault is sometimes dismissed from the grace and mercy of the Lord, this does not help the Pelagians, who say that men merit dismissal and pardon of sins, and so consequently the grace and mercy of the Lord—and that the remission of sins is not made through grace.

And if anyone perhaps wished to investigate more profoundly, it would seem that God cannot fully dismiss sin as to fault unless full satisfaction has first been made for it as to fault. For as can be had from chapter 26 of this work, and all the Doctors agree, sin properly is not anything positive, but only privative; but a privation cannot be removed except through the positing of a habit, at least naturally preceding. Nor can such or such great a privation fully be removed without the positing of such or such great a habit preceding. For if a lesser habit be posited, and not so great, that whole privation is by no means fully removed, but some portion of it remains, as is plain in natural, artificial, and moral things evidently. God therefore cannot, as it seems, dismiss and fully remove sin as to fault, except by first naturally positing fully the habit which He privated, or privates.

Nor is it always true that one rising in lesser grace than he lost is impotent to render so much grace. For he can, by living long and working well, merit so much grace, as the Pelagians acknowledge. Therefore to a sinner now mortally contrite, and so meriting and rendering less grace than he lost, his mortal sin is not fully dismissed as to fault; nor even is it dismissed until he has fully merited so much grace, and merited and rendered fully so much. And so mortal fault and grace would again stand together; and so someone would be at the same time pleasing to God and dear, and not pleasing nor dear, but the enemy of God, hated by God, living and dead, son of the eternal kingdom and of eternal perdition. If therefore, according to the premises, one rising to grace rises to as much as that from which he fell through sin, however small a contrition merits grace and consequently however much glory. And so every contrition however small and remiss would be in some manner of infinite efficacy and infinite merit, since however much grace and glory man could merit immediately through it; for he can lose by sinning however much.

Let it also be supposed that Peter, having little grace, by sinning slightly mortally lost that grace; and immediately after a brief delay in sin (in which he disposed himself to repenting), he repents very intensely and fervently, and so merits grace. Either, then, he merits thus infinite grace intensively, or only finite. If infinite, then by the same reasoning so does any penitent, since Peter's penitence does not infinitely exceed another's. If only finite, let that be A; and let it be supposed further that Paul, having grace B, however much greater than A you wish, by sinning however more grievously mortally lost grace B, and remained very long in sin, and disposing himself to the contrary by all his powers always heaped crimes upon crimes, and at last very remissly and tepidly repents—yet with the requisite circumstances. Therefore Paul, according to the premises, who in the beginning sinned most grievously, persisted very long in sin, continually disposed himself away from penitence and grace by always heaping crimes with all his heart as he could, by the slightest contrition merits the greatest grace B to be returned to himself. Why then does Peter—who in the beginning sinned less, remained less in sin, did not add sin upon sin, but disposed himself toward penitence and grace very greatly, repenting most fervently and most perfectly—merit lesser grace and not so much? What reason, what equity, what justice would dictate this? Indeed rather the contrary would seem: since all the bad circumstances derogating from penitence and grace are much less with Peter, and the good circumstances promoting penitence and grace much greater.

Perhaps it will be said that this circumstance is better with Paul: that he first had greater grace. But undoubtedly that circumstance rather aggravates than alleviates his sin. For who—except perhaps the ungrateful—will deny that the natural law of gratitude insolubly obliges the benefactee and beloved to his benefactor and lover, to render similar things, and that the more benefactee and beloved is more strictly obliged to this? Wherefore [he sins] all the more if he does not return the good of gratitude, and much more amply if he returns the evil of ingratitude, and incurs a graver offense. Whence the Philosopher, Politics 7.7: "The mind is raised more against the accustomed and against friends than against the unknown, thinking itself to be little esteemed; on which account also Archilochus, fittingly complaining to friends, disputes to his soul: 'For not from foes, but from spears come piercings.'" And below, Aristotle himself says: "The magnanimous by nature are not savage, except when acting toward the unjust; but they suffer this more from the accustomed, if they think they suffer unjustly. And this happens according to reason: for from those they think benefits owed, with hurt, they think themselves deprived of these. Whence it is said: 'Savage are the enemies of brothers; and these indeed beyond loving, those beyond hating.'" And the Prophet says: "If my enemy had cursed me, I would verily have borne with it. And if he that hated me had spoken great things against me: I would perhaps have hidden myself from him. But thou a man of one mind, my guide, and my familiar," etc. [Ps. 54:13-14].

Augustine likewise, in On True and False Penitence 14, alleged in the Canon On Penitence, distinction 5, Consideret; and in 4 Sentences of Peter, distinction 16: "He becomes ungrateful," he says, "who, full of virtues, did not fear God at all. For in this each sinner becomes more culpable, the more acceptable he is to God. For Adam therefore sinned more, because he abounded with greater—indeed, with every—good." And if anyone still says that in the more friendly and more pleasing one sinning the fault is greater—nevertheless, if he repents, he is no less received into the former friendship, and into a fuller one—either this is from the gratuitous grace of him receiving such a penitent, or from preceding debt and merit. If from grace, this does not help the Pelagians in any way, since they refuse gratuitous grace and sell it according to the debt of merit. If from debt and the value of merit, it seems much more that he who has sinned less and repents more fervently merits such great grace and friendship.

It seems also most unworthy of perfect reconciliation that he who was the most friendly, and parted in the most hostile manner by sinning, through the least and most frigid contrition seek perfect reconciliation and the greatest preceding friendship. For if he sought this duly, he ought reasonably to repent according to the magnitude of the offense and of the preceding friendship, or beyond, if he were able. Therefore this most frigid penitent seems to set far too little value on the offense, and on the privation of the friendship which he requires. Whence the Philosopher, Rhetoric 2.4, showing by what things the angry are softened and grow tame, says thus: "Therefore softening is the destitution and quieting of anger. If therefore they are angered with those who set little value [on them], and to set little value is voluntary—it is manifest that they are gentle to those who do none of these things, or do them involuntarily, and to those who confess and repent. For having satisfaction—that is, what is to attest concerning deeds—they cease from anger." But satisfaction must be according to the quality and quantity of sin, as was touched on above.

In agreement with this, John the Baptist: "Ye offspring of vipers, who hath shewed you to flee from the wrath to come? Bring forth therefore worthy fruits of penitence" [Luke 3:7-8]; as if he were saying: there is no other way of fleeing. On which Gregory, as alleged in the Gloss: "He admonishes that not only the fruits of penitence are to be done; for the fruit of good work is not said to be equal of him who has fallen less and him who has fallen more, or of him who has fallen in nothing and him who has fallen in some crimes. By this therefore each one's conscience is convened, that he should seek so much greater gains of good works through penitence, as he has inflicted graver damages on himself through fault." In the Sentences of Peter 4, distinction 16, it is also written in this way: "Satisfaction is precepted by John, where he says: Bring forth worthy fruits of penitence—namely, that according to the quality and quantity of fault may be the quality and quantity of punishment. For the fruit of good work ought not to be equal in him who has sinned in nothing or less, and in him who has fallen more grievously."

If also that circumstance—which is to have had greater grace—makes Paul's penitence somewhat better than Peter's, [yet] is made worse or lessened just as much or more through the remission of the penitential act in Paul beneath the intension of the penitential act in Peter, the argument returns.

Further, if a sinner falling from the greatest grace immediately when he repents merits the whole of it suddenly: much more, if he had remained without sin in his grace, [would he merit it]; and any just man persevering in such great grace, by loving God above all things, and on account of Him avoiding sin, and doing similar things, would in any single instant or moment merit so much grace—especially since he has other circumstances more apt for meriting—and so in the briefest time anyone will merit infinite grace intensively. The same can similarly be argued of a penitent continuing the act of penitence which he began, or continually intensifying it, that in any briefest time he will merit infinite grace. For since in the beginning he suddenly merited so much, and in any instant or particle of subsequent time he again newly merited so much—since the act is penitential, equally or more meritorious always—it was so.

Further, how much grace then does a sinner who was never in grace, now contrite, immediately merit? It is certain that some, by the fact that he is now made pleasing to God through contrition. If you say great or small according as his contrition was great or small: therefore through some contrition—say A—he can immediately merit grace under degree B; which either is less than baptismal grace—which is C—or equal, or greater. Not less, because then an adult who through himself has actually merited would in such a case depart with less grace, and pass to less glory, than a small child only baptized. How then will God render to each according to his works, as either Testament often testifies?

According to this also it would seem possible that someone could merit so remissly as to have in the future life lesser glory intensively than is one small delight in the present—say to see some smallest delightful thing, or to taste, which no Christian or even profane man rejects—since according to Philosophers and Theologians felicity and beatitude is a sufficient and perfect good. For according to the Philosopher, Ethics 1.9, "Felicity is a perfect good, and through itself sufficient, which makes life lacking nothing." And Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy 3, prose 2, says that "beatitude is the good, having obtained which one can desire nothing further; which indeed is the highest of all goods, containing all goods within itself, to which if anything were lacking it could not be highest, since something would be left outside which could be wished for. It is plain therefore that beatitude is a state perfect by the gathering together of all goods." And the Prophet says: "Thou shalt fill me with joy with Thy countenance: at Thy right hand are delights even to the end" [Ps. 15:11]. And below 16: "I shall be satisfied when Thy glory shall appear" [Ps. 16:15]. Whence also Apocalypse 7: "They shall no more hunger nor thirst" [Rev. 7:16]; and 1 Corinthians 2: "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man, what things God hath prepared for them that love Him" [1 Cor. 2:9].

But if it be said that B is equal to C, the consequent is that in the case [supposed] an adult who has actually merited through himself is rewarded equally with a small child only baptized, who never merited anything. How then will God reward each according to his works and merits?

Again, let it be supposed that someone who never had grace is contrite with a contrition lesser than A; and then, by hypothesis, he merits lesser grace than B or C—which was just rejected. But if it be said that B is greater than C, this is in some certain finite proportion. Let it be supposed therefore that someone is contrite with a contrition lesser than A proportionally, or below; and then according to the hypothesis he will merit grace equal to C or less—both of which were already destroyed. But if it be said in the first place that any such contrite person merits at least as much grace as is baptismal grace: either, then, he always merits as much equally, or always more, or sometimes as much, sometimes more, never as much equally, as was shown above. And because then those penitent equally would merit equal grace—which is repugnant to all justice, especially where no gratuitous liberality is mixed in, as is the case in the justification of the unjust according to the aforesaid hypothesis of the Pelagians—therefore always more. But if through a certain contrition—say through A—he were to merit B, a grace greater than C, baptismal grace, why not through D, a contrition lesser than A proportionally as C is less than B, or below, will he merit E, a grace equal to C or less? Therefore proportionally to merits rewards must always be rendered, as all justice human and divine alike dictates, especially where pure rewards are repaid, and nothing is given of grace gratuitously.

Likewise, he who by sinning most grievously lost the greatest grace, and continually after, having sinned most grievously, through the least contrition merits the greatest grace—why then does not he who never had grace, nor has exercised himself in such great ingratitude, through a greater contrition merit so much grace, or more, and so any grace whatever, even infinite?

Likewise, if every such penitent, immediately when he merits, merits a grace greater than baptismal, why, if he continues that act, or continually intensifies it, in however small a time he will merit infinite grace? Why also does not any just man constituted in grace, through any act of his equally good as the act of this penitent—or however much better—merit so much grace or more, and so in however small a particle of time, infinite grace? as was argued above. And the same can similarly be argued concerning the excess of grace which he merits beyond baptismal grace.

But if anyone will obstinately persist against the premises, saying that one falling from great grace through sin by no means rises through any small contrition always to as much, but always or sometimes to less—besides the premised reasons showing the opposite, [his view] can also through the just-premised matters be specially castigated. For such a one either rises to grace less than baptismal, or equal, or greater, etc., as before.

Further, how can a dead man obtain life for the dead, and in some way raise the dead—another or himself? For either he would do this through a living work, or a dead one. Not through a dead one—no one is unaware. If through a living one, he naturally previously has life. For every operation naturally presupposes the form from which it proceeds, as chapter 39 makes plain. Therefore he does not through such living work bestow on the dead the spiritual life of grace. For just as a tree does not first by nature bring forth living fruit, and afterwards by nature is therefore alive—but the contrary—so also man, who is called by the Philosophers an inverted tree.

Whence the Saviour, John 15: "As the branch," He says, "cannot bear fruit of itself, unless it abide in the vine; so neither can you, unless you abide in Me. I am the vine, you the branches: he that abideth in Me, and I in him, the same beareth much fruit; for without Me you can do nothing"—nothing, namely, of good, without My making grace. On which Augustine, part 2, sermon 27 (or 81 of the whole): "From a living root," he says, "another shoot can sprout from a cut branch; but he who is cut off, without root cannot live. Then He adds: As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, unless it abide in the vine; so neither can you, unless you abide in Me. A great commendation of grace, my Brothers; it instructs the hearts of the humble, it stops the mouths of the proud. Behold to whom—if they dare—let them respond, who, ignorant of God's justice and willing to establish their own, are not subject to the justice of God: behold to whom let them respond who please themselves and think God not necessary to themselves for doing good works. Do not such men resist this truth—men corrupt in mind, reprobate concerning the faith—who reply and speak iniquity, saying: 'From God we have that we are men, but from ourselves that we are just'? What say ye who deceive yourselves, not assertors but precipitators of free will, from the height of elation, through the emptiness of presumption, into the depths of submersion? For your voice is that man of himself does justice; this is the height of your elation. But see what follows you, and—if there is in you any sense—shudder. For he who thinks to bear fruit from himself, is not in the vine; he who is not in the vine, is not in Christ; he who is not in Christ, is not a Christian; these are the depths of your submersion."

"Again and again consider what truth still adds, and says: I am, He says, the vine, you the branches: he that abideth in Me, and I in him, the same beareth much fruit; for without Me you can do nothing. Lest anyone should think that the branch could bear at least some little fruit from itself, when He had said the same beareth much fruit, He did not say, 'because without Me you can do little,' but, you can do nothing. Whether little, then, or much, without Him it cannot be done, without whom nothing can be done; because even if the branch bears a little, the Husbandman cleanses it that it may bring forth more. Yet unless it abides in the vine, and lives from the root, it cannot bear however much fruit from itself. But although Christ would not be the vine unless He were man, yet He would not give this grace to the branches unless He were also God."

On which also Alcuin, as alleged in the Gloss: "Every fruit of a good work proceeds from that root, who has freed us by His grace, and advances us by His help, that we may be able to bear more fruit." With this also agrees that of Matthew 7: "A bad tree cannot bring forth good fruits" [Matt. 7:18]. On which Augustine, On the Sermon of the Lord on the Mount 2.36: "The tree," he says, "is the soul itself—that is, man himself; and the fruits, the works of man. The bad man therefore cannot work good things, nor the good evil. Therefore the bad, if he wishes to work good, let him first be made good." Similar to these is also the example of earth, seed, rain, and warmth. For the earth is not good because the seed is vivified and grows; nor for that reason does it receive rain and heavenly warmth. But it is first naturally good earth, having moisture and warmth from heaven, and therefore and afterwards naturally germinates good fruit, and therefore the seed sown in it is vivified and grows. So also of the dry earth of our heart, and the seed of the word of God sown in the soul of the sinner—according to the parable and Lord's exposition recited more fully in Matthew 13 and Luke 8—of the rain of grace, and the heat of charity, descending from heaven heavenly. Nor however do I separate grace and charity essentially, but join them, so that both grace and charity is warm and moist, having virtually warmth and moisture, which are the principles of life, in which life consists, as both natural Philosophers and Physicians attest.

But that charity is a certain heavenly heat and a certain divine fire, who doubts? Who does not feel it? Whence also the dearest Author of charity says: "I am come to send fire on the earth, and what will I but that it be kindled?" [Luke 12:49]. Wherefore also the Holy Spirit was sent down upon the disciples in the species of fire, as the history of Acts 2 testifies. Treating the first of these, Gregory, on Ezekiel, homily 5 of book 1, says: "When a carnal mind receives the Holy Spirit, kindled with spiritual love, it bewails the evil it has done, and the earth burns when, conscience accusing him, the heart of the sinner is set aflame and is consumed in the sorrow of penitence. Hence again it is written: Thy God is a consuming fire [Deut. 4:24]. For because the mind which He has filled, our Creator renders clean from the rust of sins, He is called both fire and consuming." Who also on the Gospels, homily 30, says: "The Holy Spirit came upon the disciples with sudden sound, and changed the minds of the carnal into love of Himself; and outwardly with fiery tongues appearing, inwardly hearts were made flaming, since while they receive God in the vision of fire, they burned sweetly through love." And below: "God is fire, Paul attesting: Our God is a consuming fire [Heb. 12:29]. God indeed is called fire, because through Him the rust of sins is consumed. Of this fire Truth says: I came to send fire on the earth, and what will I but that it should burn? For earth are called earthly hearts, which while they always heap lowest thoughts within themselves, are trampled by malign spirits; but the Lord sends fire upon the earth, when by the breath of the Holy Spirit He kindles the heart of the carnal."

Not only is charity called fire, but also water, with Truth attesting in John 4, saying: "If thou didst know the gift of God, etc., He would have given thee living water" [John 4:10]; and below: "The water that I shall give him shall become in him a fountain of water, springing up into life everlasting" [John 4:14]. Where Chrysostom, as alleged in the Gloss: "Sometimes Scripture calls the grace of the Holy Spirit fire, sometimes water, showing that these names are not representative of substances, but of action. Through the appellation 'fire,' it enigmatically suggests the elevating and warming and consumptive of sins quality of grace; through the appellation 'water,' however, the cleansing which is from the Spirit, and the much refreshment which it shows to the minds receiving Him." Where also Theophilus in the Gloss similarly alleged called the grace of the Holy Spirit "living water"—that is, vivifying, refreshing, and motive: "For the grace of the Holy Spirit always moves him who works good, disposing assents in his heart."

But what better expositor than the holy Evangelist, who reclined upon the Lord's breast at the Supper, who later in chapter 7 expounding the recited saying of Christ, "He that believeth in Me, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water" [John 7:38], adds: "Now this He said of the Spirit, which they should receive who believed in Him." That charity is called water or waters, Augustine on Psalm 103: "Who covereth the higher rooms thereof with waters" [Ps. 103:3], in sermon 1 and 2 sufficiently diffusely shows. That grace also is designated by the name of rain, moisture, dew, and the like, sacred Scripture and the sacred Doctors very often manifest. For the Prophet says: "A free rain, O God, Thou shalt set apart for Thy inheritance: and it was weakened, but Thou hast made it perfect" [Ps. 67:10]. "Thou," he says—"not it itself, but Thou hast made it perfect"—that is, healed it through the medicine of this rain. On which Augustine, putting forth one exposition and adding another, says: "Much more congruously is grace itself understood as the free rain, since it is given gratuitously without any preceding merits of works. For if of grace, not of works; otherwise grace is no longer grace [Rom. 11:6]. I am not worthy, he says, to be called an Apostle, because I have persecuted the Church of God; but by the grace of God I am what I am [1 Cor. 15:9-10]: this is the free rain. He has freely begotten us by the word of truth: this is the free rain. This free rain therefore, with no preceding merits of good works, did God set apart for His inheritance; and it was weakened: for it knew that it was nothing through itself, attributing not to its own powers but to the grace of God what it is."

Whence also the Apostle, who had said the law was weakened through the flesh—because the flesh does not fulfill what is fulfilled through the Spirit, that is, through spiritual grace—he himself again says: "That the justification of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not according to the flesh, but according to the spirit [Rom. 8:4]." This therefore is Thou hast made it perfect, because the fullness of the law is charity, and "the charity of God is poured forth in our hearts" [Rom. 5:5]—not through ourselves, but through the Holy Spirit who is given to us. Who below in Psalm 146 says of God: "He prepares for the earth rain"—that is, grace for earthly hearts; the effect of which rain he adds: "Who"—he says, or according to Augustine's letter—"makes to spring forth on the mountains hay, and herb for the service of men" [Ps. 146:8]. "Who," I say, "principally makes to spring forth on mountains"—that is, in men first earthly through sin but afterwards, after this rain, made heavenly and exalted; or "in mountains," that is, in elated men—"hay and herb for the service of men," that is, good fruits to be of value to men. On which Augustine: "Behold," he says, "the fruit of the rain, which makes to spring forth," etc. Similar to this is that of Psalm 84: "The Lord shall give goodness, or sweetness, according to Augustine's letter, and our earth shall give her fruit" [Ps. 84:13]. "The Lord," I say, "shall give the goodness of His grace first, and our earth shall give her fruit second." On which Augustine: "Think," he says, "of the word you have heard, lest the birds snatch the seed, that what was sown there may germinate; but unless God shall rain, what does it profit that there is sowing? This is, the Lord shall give sweetness, and our earth shall give her fruit. Let the rain of God come, and let what was sown there bear fruit."

In agreement with this is that of Isaiah 55: "The rain and the snow comes down from heaven, and shall return there no more, but soaks the earth, and waters it, and makes it to spring forth, and gives seed to the sower, and bread to him that eats" [Isa. 55:10]. This rain of grace, therefore, makes the seed of the word of God germinate in those hearing. Robert Lincoln also says, as is alleged in the next chapter: "God and the grace of God, and also our will, makes good in us, just as the grain germinates both by some intrinsic generative force, and by the heat of the sun, with the moisture of the earth." Whence also Peter, Sentences 2, distinction 27: "Just as the earth is watered by rain that it may germinate, and bring forth fruit—so on the earth of our mind, that is, on the will, the rain of divine benediction is poured—that is, grace is breathed in, which God alone does, not man with Him—by which the will of man is watered, that it may germinate and bear fruit; that is, it is healed and prepared to will the good (according to which He is called operating), and is helped to do the good (according to which He is called cooperating); and that grace is not incongruously named virtue, because it heals and helps the infirm will of man." And below: "From the grace which prevenes and heals the will of man, and from the will itself, is procreated in the soul a good affect, or good motion of mind; and this is the first good merit of man."

This whole [matter] is congruously figured in that rod of Jesse, the Blessed Virgin, who before she brought forth the fruit of salvation, is shown to be full of grace, as the history teaches in Luke 1. Foreseeing this order, Isaiah said: "Drop down dew, ye heavens, from above, and let the clouds rain the just: let the earth be opened, and bud forth a Saviour" [Isa. 45:8]. This whole [matter] also that most salutary fruit, true salvation, and truth, which sprang from this earth, truly attests. For He Himself in Matthew 13, as was touched upon above, parabolizing about seed, says: "Others fell upon good ground, and gave fruit" [Matt. 13:8]. Because therefore the seed fell on good ground, therefore it gave fruit, not the contrary; therefore the earth was first naturally good. Which cannot be without charity and grace. For any earth which has not this virtue is sterile and bad, as no Theologian is unaware, as the Apostle in 1 Corinthians 13 also plainly teaches. For charity divides between the sons of the eternal kingdom and the sons of eternal perdition, with Augustine attesting in On the Trinity 15.18. Charity is also a fountain proper to the good and saints, of which it is said: "Let no stranger be partaker with thee" [Prov. 5:17], with Augustine likewise attesting on Psalm 103: "Who covereth the higher rooms thereof with waters," sermon 1.

Therefore this earth had charity by nature first, before it produced good fruit. Wherefore he also says that "others fell on good ground"—not "they made the ground good." The ground therefore was good before the seed fell on it. Whence also Luke 8: "But that on the good ground are they, who in a good and very good heart, hearing the word, retain it, and bring forth fruit" [Luke 8:15]. On which account Matthew 12: "Make," He says, "the tree good, and his fruit good" [Matt. 12:33]"—the tree good first, and the fruit good second. Wherefore he adds: "for by the fruit the tree is known. O generation of vipers, how can you, being evil, speak good things"—that is, speak well—"since you are evil? For out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh; A good man out of his good treasure bringeth forth good things" [Matt. 12:34-35]." But what is this good treasure of the good man, except charity, which alone makes a man good? Whence Augustine, On the Words of the Lord, sermon 12: "The Lord admonishes us," he says, "that we should be good trees, that we may have good fruits. For He says: Either make the tree good, etc.—where He says, make the tree good, this is a salutary precept to which obedience is necessary; but what He says, Either make the tree bad, etc., is not a precept that thou shouldst do it, but an admonition that thou shouldst beware. For He spoke against those who think that, while they are bad, they can speak good things, or have good works. The Lord Jesus says this cannot be: for first the man must be changed, that the works may be changed. Therefore let each one be a good tree, let him not judge himself to have good fruits if he remains a bad tree; there will not be good fruit except of a good tree; change the heart, and the work will be changed; uproot cupidity, plant charity. For just as cupidity is the root of all evils, so is charity the root of all goods."

Wherefore also Anselm, On Concord 10: "Just as the earth," he says, "brings forth innumerable herbs and trees—without which human nature is not nourished, or even by which it is destroyed—without all care of man; but those which are most necessary for nourishing our life, [it brings forth] not without great labor and a cultivator, nor without seeds. So human hearts, without doctrine, without study, of themselves germinate as it were thoughts and wills nothing useful for salvation, or even noxious; but those without which we do not advance to the salvation of the soul, by no means do they conceive or germinate without the seed of their germination, and laborious cultivation. Whence those men to whom such cultivation is given are called by the Apostle the agriculture of God. The seed of this agriculture is the word of God—indeed not the word, but the sense which is perceived through the word. For the voice without sense establishes nothing in the heart, nor only the sense of the word, but every sense or understanding of rectitude—since the human mind, whether through hearing, or through reading, or through reason, or by any other manner conceives, is the seed of willing rightly. For no one can rightly will what he does not first conceive in heart; but to will to believe what is to be believed, is to will rightly. But that the Apostle says faith is from hearing [Rom. 10:17] is to be understood that faith is from this, that the mind conceives through hearing—not that the conception of the mind alone makes faith in man; but because faith cannot be without conception. For when rectitude of willing is added to the conception, through grace there is made faith, since he believes what he hears." And below: "Truly mission, preaching, hearing, understanding are nothing, unless the will wills what the mind understands; which the will cannot do unless it has received rectitude. For he wills rightly when he wills what he ought. Thus what the mind conceives from hearing the word is the seed of the preacher, and the rectitude is the increase which God gives, without which neither he that plants nor he that waters is anything, but God who gives the increase [1 Cor. 3:7]."

And below: "Let us see in examples how the word becomes seed. When those to whom it is said hear: 'If you will and hear Me' [Isa. 1:19], they understand and think what is said, to will to hear—this is to obey. For he who hears and does not obey is said not to hear; but they cannot obey unless they will; and to will to obey is to will rightly. But no one can will rightly except he have rectitude of will, which no man has except through grace. So what was said, 'If you will,' etc., is seed, by no means germinating any fruit through itself without the addition of rectitude." From which it can also appear that there is a twofold rectitude of will, habitual and actual—namely, the habit of grace, and the act proceeding thence; which can also appear by a congruous example. By nature it is prior to have a sound ear than to hear soundly, and this is the cause of that, not contrariwise. But the spiritual ear of the human heart cannot be sound without the medicine of charity and grace. Wherefore also our salutary Physician, about to heal a deaf man, first put His fingers into his ears, which signifies the conferring of grace; and second, He said to him "Ephphatha"—which is, "Be opened"—and so immediately his ears were opened, as Mark 7 recites. Which He congruously hinted, after His parabolic discourse on the sower, the seed, etc. (Matthew 13), He immediately added: "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear" [Matt. 13:9]; similarly Luke 8.

Wherefore also John 8: He said to the wicked Jews: "He that is of God, heareth the words of God; therefore you hear them not, because you are not of God" [John 8:47]. He, I say, who is first of God, hears the words of God afterwards. And above, the same: "Why do you not know my speech? Because you cannot hear my word" [John 8:43]. On which Chrysostom, as alleged in the Gloss: "First therefore must virtue be sought which would hearken to the divine word; for as long as anyone is not cured in his proper hearing, by the word which says to the deaf 'Be opened,' he cannot perceive by hearing." And below 18: "Every one that is of the truth, heareth my voice" [John 18:37]. He, I say, who is first of the truth, from this hears my voice afterwards, not the contrary. On which, Augustine on John, part 2, sermon 61, Sentence 115 of the whole: "What He says, 'Every one that is of the truth, heareth my voice,' commends grace, by which according to His purpose He calls. Of which purpose the Apostle says: 'We know that to them that love God, all things work together unto good, to such as, according to His purpose, are called' [Rom. 8:28]"—the purpose, namely, of the One calling, not of those called; which elsewhere is more openly so put: "Labour with the gospel, according to the power of God; who hath delivered us and called us by His holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace" [2 Tim. 1:8-9]. For if we think of the nature in which we were created, since truth created all, who is not of the truth? But not all are those to whom it is granted that, for hearing the truth and believing, [it is granted] from the truth itself, with no preceding merits whatsoever, lest grace not be grace.

For if He had said, "Every one who hears my voice is of the truth," he would for that reason be thought to be called "of the truth" because he obeys the truth. But this He did not say, but He says, "Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice"; and through this, he is not "of the truth" because he hears His voice, but for this reason he hears, because he is of the truth—that is, because this gift has been conferred on him by the truth. Whence also the 376th proposition of the Sentences of Prosper is excerpted. This same the Authorities of Augustine plainly attest: On Faith to Peter 64; On the City of God 15.6; Gregory, Moralia 11.5; Bede 2 on Luke 4—as chapter 38 more fully recited.

This also seems to hint that of Luke 10: "Into whatsoever house you enter, first say, Peace be to this house. And if the son of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon him" [Luke 10:5-6]. Therefore not because their peace rests on him, is he therefore made son of peace, but the contrary. Whence Augustine, On Rebuke and Grace 73: "He did not say, 'Upon whomsoever your peace shall rest, he shall be made son of peace,' but, 'If the son of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon him,' or upon that house. Already, then, even before this peace was announced to him, he was son of peace, or there [the son of peace] was."

From these, however, it is evidently known that in that sacred Scripture, which the Father sanctified and sent into the world, of which not one iota or one tittle shall pass away [Matt. 5:18], the order of words is not idle, nor of deeds, but full of profound causes and many mysteries. This same can also be shown otherwise thus: It is by nature prior for a man to receive medicine than to be healed of infirmity. For not because he is healed does he receive the medicine, but the contrary; and it is by nature prior for a man to be sound, than to do works of soundness, by similar reasoning. But grace alone is the medicine of the languid soul, as is plain from the premises; and Augustine in On the Words of the Apostle, sermon 13, says: "Grace is medicine." Therefore it is by nature prior to receive grace than to be healed; and so to be healed than to be sound, and to exercise works of soundness. Whence Augustine on Psalm 31: "Blessed are they whose," etc.: "Let everything," he says, "be imputed to His grace, not to our merits. Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered [Ps. 31:1]. God therefore covers the wounds, do not thou. For if thou wishest to cover, the physician, blushing, will not cure. Let the physician cover, and let him cure; for with a plaster he covers; under the covering of the physician the wound is healed, under the covering of the wounded one the wound is hidden."

This priority of heavenly grace gratuitously given to the ungrateful, infirm, and sinners, for the dismissal of sin and the operation of good, the Lord Jesus Christ also mystically intimates to us, while curing the deaf and dumb man, He put His fingers into his ears, and spitting He touched his tongue, and looking up to heaven, He groaned and said Ephphatha—which is, "Be opened"—and immediately his ears were opened, and the bond of his tongue was loosed, and he spoke rightly, as Mark 7 recites. Behold that to the infirm, first by the imposition of hands, the grace of the Holy Spirit is infused; second, through it he is healed; and third, having been healed, he does sound works. This mystical understanding can be confirmed by the very deed and the manner and order of doing—attending to other very many similar things in Scripture—which the expositions of the Saints also ratify.

In agreement with this is also that of Matthew 12: "There was offered to Him one having a devil, blind and dumb: and He healed him, so that he spoke and saw" [Matt. 12:22]. First He healed the infirm; second, having been healed, he did sound works. Whence also Luke: "When," he says, "He had cast out the devil, the dumb spoke" [Luke 11:14]. On which Bede, as alleged in the Gloss: "This demoniac, in Matthew, is narrated to have been not only dumb, but also blind. Three signs, therefore, simultaneously were performed in one man: the blind sees, the dumb speaks, the possessed of the devil is freed—which daily is fulfilled in the conversion of believers, that, the devil first being expelled, they look upon the light of faith; thereafter, mouths previously silent are loosed unto the praise of God."

Which is most beautifully shown in that woman who had a spirit of infirmity for 18 years, and was bowed down, nor could she at all look upward, whom when Jesus saw, He called her to Him, and said to her, "Woman, thou art delivered from thy infirmity": and He laid His hands upon her, and immediately she was made straight, and glorified God [Luke 13:11-13]. What is this woman so infirm, except a sinful soul, or human nature for a long time—namely thrice 6 years, that is, before the law, under the law, and in the time of grace, for all years (since 6 is perfect, as is plain from Boethius's Arithmetic 1.22)—pressed down by the heavy burden of sin, nor able through itself to look up to God by affection? Her—not weeping, not asking, not bringing forth any merit—Jesus the Saviour saw, who not having been sought came to seek and to save what had perished [Luke 19:10]; saw her, I say, with the gaze of internal mercy, and called her to Himself, breathing in gratuitous grace gratuitously, and so healed her, where operating grace is lucidly indicated.

But because not even thus can this woman raise herself up to any good work, without her physician further specially helping her, cooperating, indeed even pre-operating, and previously by nature raising her up—He laid His hands upon her thus first, and immediately she was made straight to working well, and she glorified God second. Wherefore also He well says, "she was made straight," rather than "she made herself straight." For she is first and rather raised up by the hand of God, than she raises herself up—where also cooperating grace is perspicuously demonstrated. To this mystical understanding agree the expositions of the Saints. Whence also Augustine, On the Words of the Lord, sermon 31, says thus: "What of that woman who was 18 years in infirmity? In six days God perfected His works; thrice six makes 18, in the fig-tree this is in the woman 18 years—namely, the human race before the law, under the law, and under grace was bent over, could not look upward, because Lift up your hearts it heard without cause, but the Lord raised her up. Therefore there is hope, but for the sons, until the day of judgment shall come. A man gives much to himself; and what is man? Just man—man is something great, but when he is just, by the grace of God he is just man; for what is man, but that Thou art mindful of him?" [Ps. 8:5]

Which is also patently shown in the cure of the paralytic, to whom the Saviour first said, "Man, thy sins are forgiven thee," and second, "Arise, take up thy bed and go," as the Gospel history of Luke 5 sets forth. Which can also similarly be demonstrated by many other Gospel curative miracles similar to these. This same is lucidly manifested also by very many other Catholic Authorities. For the Lord says through Isaiah 43: "Thou hast not called upon me, O Jacob, neither hast thou laboured for me, O Israel. Thou hast not offered me the ram of thy holocaust, neither hast thou glorified me with thy victims: I have not caused thee to serve in offering, neither have I wearied thee with incense. Thou hast not bought me silver with money, neither hast thou inebriated me with the fat of thy victims. But thou hast made me to serve in thy sins, thou hast wearied me with thy iniquities. I am, I am He that blot out thy iniquities for my own sake, and I will not remember thy sins. Put me in remembrance, and let us judge together: tell, if thou hast any thing to justify thyself" [Isa. 43:22-26]. "I am," he says, "who blot out thy iniquities for My sake"—that is, on account of My mercy gratuitously, not on account of thy prior merits. Wherefore He adds: "Put in remembrance, and let us judge together; tell if thou hast anything to justify thyself"—as if He were saying: "Thou hast nothing whereby thou mightest merit justification"; or according to the Septuagint translation: "Tell thou first thy iniquities that thou mayest be justified"—and then He speaks ironically, and is as much as if he were saying manifestly: "Thou canst say nothing." But what justifications didst thou have, except iniquities, by which thou by no means meritest justification?

Wherefore also the Apostle says: "Justified freely by His grace" [Rom. 3:24]. On which the Gloss—and it is principally Augustine's On the Spirit and the Letter 8: "Justified freely—that is, without preceding merits—and this through His grace, that is, through gratuitous gifts. For the grace of God is the gift of God; but the greatest gift is the Holy Spirit Himself. Therefore they were not justified through the law, not through their own will, but through the grace of Christ; not that it happens without our will, but our will is shown to be infirm through the law, that grace may heal the will, and the sound will may fulfill the law not constituted under the law, nor needing the law. This therefore is the grace by which the wicked is justified—that is, becomes just who before was wicked—and therefore no merits precede the receiving of this grace, since to the merits of the wicked not grace but punishment is owed. Nor would this be grace, if it were not given gratuitously; but it is given gratuitously, because we had done no good before this whereby we might merit it; for nothing had preceded in our merits except that whereby we deserved damnation. Therefore He found not merits of goods, but merits of punishments. Therefore they are justified freely, because they had wrought nothing by His grace."

Who also in On the Spirit and the Letter 20: "When the Apostle says," he says, "man is justified freely by faith without the works of the law [Rom. 3:28], he wishes nothing else to be understood in what he says freely, except that justification is not preceded by works. Plainly elsewhere he says: If by grace, it is not now of works; otherwise grace is no more grace [Rom. 11:6]." The same to Titus 3: "But when the goodness and humanity of God our Saviour appeared: not by the works of justice which we have done, but according to his mercy, he saved us, by the laver of regeneration, and renovation of the Holy Ghost: whom he hath poured forth upon us abundantly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour: that, being justified by his grace, we may be heirs, according to hope of life everlasting" [Titus 3:4-7]. The same to Romans 3: "By the works of the law no flesh shall be justified before Him. Where then is thy boasting? It is excluded: by what law? Of works? No, but by the law of faith. For we account a man to be justified by faith, without the works of the law" [Rom. 3:20, 27-28].

But perhaps someone will say this must be understood of the legal, sacramental, and ceremonial works, which had been customary in the Old Law—not however of the moral works of the Decalogue, which both laws admit. Yet the further course of that Epistle, together with others, manifests another understanding evidently, showing that the Apostle wishes to speak also of the works of the Decalogue aforesaid. For the Apostle intends—as the course of the Epistle and Catholic expositions attest—to refute Jews and Greeks, and all Gentiles converted to the justice of Christian faith, mutually quarreling and exalting themselves over each other; the Jews indeed saying that they had merited this justice through observance, and the works of their law, with the Gentiles meriting nothing but offending grievously by adoring idols; the Greeks and Gentiles, on the contrary, asserting that they had worshiped idols from simple ignorance, and had immediately with joy received the faith of Christ preached by the Apostles, while the Jews having the Law and Prophets had so much more grievously sinned, by killing Christ testified by the Law and Prophets, and despising His Apostles. But how would he truly contradict the Jews by saying, "By the works of the law no flesh shall be justified before Him," unless he understood universally that no flesh will be justified by any works, nor by any work of the law—sacramental, ceremonial, or moral whatsoever—but through the law of Christian faith; faith, I say, not dead, or formless or naked, but living, formed, and clothed through grace and charity?

Which the words of the Apostle also evidently indicate. For when he had premised, "By the works of the law no flesh shall be justified before Him," he immediately adds: "For by the law is the knowledge of sin" [Rom. 3:20]; which below in chapter 7 he more clearly expounding, says: "I had not known sin, but by the law: for I had not known concupiscence, if the law did not say: Thou shalt not covet" [Rom. 7:7]. But what and what kind of law is it that prohibits coveting? Is it not the moral [law] of the Decalogue? Wherefore also above, the same: "Let us serve," he says, "in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter" [Rom. 7:6], because—as he himself says—"the letter killeth, but the spirit quickeneth" [2 Cor. 3:6]. Which is to be understood literally, not concerning the understanding of the Old Testament in sacramentals and ceremonies according to the surface of the letter and the spiritual or mystical understanding, but concerning the ten Commandments of the Decalogue, moral, delivered to Moses on stone tablets and through Moses promulgated to the people. Wherefore also he immediately adds: "Now if the ministration of death, engraved with letters upon stones, was glorious; so that the children of Israel could not steadfastly behold the face of Moses, for the glory of his countenance, which is made void: how shall not the ministration of the spirit be rather in glory?" [2 Cor. 3:7-8]

What therefore is in the Apostle, "By the works of the law no flesh shall be justified, but through the law of faith," this is, "the letter killeth, but the spirit quickeneth"—namely, the grace of the Holy Spirit, which is not from works done according to the letter of the law. For according to the same in 1 Corinthians 12, the Holy Spirit "divides to every one according as He will" [1 Cor. 12:11]; "according as He will," I say, liberally and gratuitously, not according as is owed from anyone's merits.

Augustine in On the Spirit and the Letter—through almost the whole work—most diligently teaches this understanding of the Apostle from the recited Authorities and other similar ones, and he proves it through the words of the Apostle as above, as is clearly plain there in many chapters. Where also in chapter 12, after a great scrutiny he concludes thus: "These things therefore being considered, we gather that man is not justified by the precepts of a good life, except through the faith of Jesus Christ—that is, not by the law of works but of faith, not by the letter but the spirit, not by the merits of deeds, but by gratuitous grace." And below 24: "The law of faith is charity inscribed in the heart, and diffused, perfected in those hoping in Him, that the soul healed not by fear of punishment, but by love of justice may work the good." Who also on Psalm 31, treatise 1, teaches the same understanding and the same sentence clearly. Whence he begins his sermon thus: "The Psalm of the grace of God and of our justification, with no preceding merits of ours, but the mercy of the Lord our God preventing us, commended chiefly by the Apostolic mouth, [is to be] taken up by our slenderness for treating"; the Psalm, I say, commended by the Apostolic mouth in Romans 4, where the Apostle treats this matter. For there he says thus: "David speaketh the blessedness of the man, to whom God reputeth justice without works: Blessed are they whose," etc. [Rom. 4:6-7]. The Gloss: "reputeth"—that is, acceptably, that is, gratuitously bestows, as it were, on one impotent to approach—"justice"—that is, the remission of sins, and good works; and this without preceding works.

Augustine also on the aforesaid Psalm, where above, says: "We must put no works before faith—that is, that anyone before faith should be said to work them well. For those very works which are said to be before faith, although they seem laudable to men, are vain. So they seem to me, like great strength and a most swift course off the road. Therefore let no one count his good works before faith. Where there was no faith, there was no good work; for intention makes a good work, and faith directs intention. Do not greatly attend to what a man may do, but to what he looks at when he does it, whither he directs the muscles of the best governance." And he speaks there not of dead or formless faith, but of [faith] formed by charity, according to that of the Apostle to Galatians 5: "Faith that worketh by charity" [Gal. 5:6]; as also his more diffuse course shows. Wherefore he says: "Faith, taking up hope and love, begins to work well." Where also Augustine asks thus: "How is a man justified by faith, without works? The Apostle himself would respond: 'For this reason I have told thee this, O man, lest thou shouldst seem to presume as it were of thy own works, and to have received the grace of faith by the merit of thy works. Do not therefore presume of works before faith—since thou hast known that faith found thee a sinner; and if faith given made thee just, it found thee wicked, whom it would make just.' He says: 'Believing in Him who justifies the wicked, his faith is reputed unto justice' [Rom. 4:5]. If the wicked is justified, from a wicked he is made just; if from a wicked he is made just, what are the works of the wicked? Let the wicked also boast of his works, and say: I give to the poor, I take away nothing from anyone, I do not covet another's wife, and the like; let him say all these things—I ask whether he is pious or impious. Thou art impious, and thy works are nothing—but believe in Him who justifies the wicked, that thy works also may be good works. For nor would I call them good as long as they do not proceed from a good root."

And below: "Thou hast done nothing of good, and remission of sins is given to thee. Thy works are attended to, and works are found evil. If God repaid those works what is owed them, He would surely condemn. For the wages of sin is death [Rom. 6:23]. To bad works what is owed except damnation? To good works indeed what is owed? Reward—the kingdom of heaven. But thou wast found in evil works; if there be repaid to thee what is owed, thou must be punished. What then? God repays thee not the punishment owed, but gives the unowed grace; He owed vengeance, He gives indulgence. Thou beginnest, then, to be in faith through indulgence. Now that faith, taking up hope and love, begins to work well." Wherefore the Gloss on that of Romans 3 above alleged—"We account a man to be justified by faith without the works of the law"—says thus: "We Apostles think that any man, even a Gentile, is justified through faith without the carnal works of the law—that is, without circumcision and new moons or the veneration of the Sabbath; or without works of the law of any kind even moral; but this is to be understood of the works preceding faith, not following, without which faith is empty, as James says: 'Faith without works is dead' [James 2:20]; and Paul himself says: 'If I should have all faith, but have not charity, I am nothing' [1 Cor. 13:2]. Well therefore the Apostle, preaching faith to the Gentiles, in order to show that one comes to faith not by the merit of good works, but that good works follow faith, says: 'A man is justified by faith without the works of the law'—not but that one believing must afterwards work through love (as Abraham wished to immolate his son [James 2:21]); for works follow the justified, do not precede the one to be justified, but by faith alone without preceding works the man is made just."

This same the Prophet seems to hint, when he says thus: "Repay Thy servant, give me life, and I shall keep Thy words" [Ps. 118:17]. On which Augustine: "If he had asked good things to be repaid for good things, he had already kept the words of God. But he did not say, 'Repay Thy servant, because I have kept Thy words,' as if to demand a good reward for the good of obedience; but he said, 'Repay Thy servant, I shall live and shall keep Thy words.' What is this but to say that the dead cannot keep them—the unfaithful, surely, of whom it is said, 'Let the dead bury their dead' [Matt. 8:22]? Wherefore if we understand the dead as the unfaithful, the living as the faithful—since 'the just shall live by faith' [Hab. 2:4], nor can the words of God be kept except through faith which works through love—he asks this for himself who says: 'Repay Thy servant, I shall live and shall keep Thy words.' And since before faith nothing is owed to a man except evils for evils, but God repays through unowed grace good for evil—he asks this repayment who says, 'Repay Thy servant, I shall live and shall keep Thy words.' For there are four repayments. Either evils are repaid for evils—as God will repay eternal fire to the wicked; or good for good, as He will repay the eternal kingdom to the just; or good for evil, as Christ through grace justifies the wicked; or evil for good, as Judas through malice persecuted Christ. Of these four repayments the two first pertain to justice, that evils may be repaid for evils, goods for goods; the third pertains to mercy, that goods may be repaid for evils; the fourth God knows not: for to no one does He repay evil for good. But this third repayment is first necessary. For unless God repaid goods for evils, there would in no way be those to whom He could repay goods for goods. See that Saul, afterwards Paul: 'Not by the works of justice which we have done,' he says, 'but according to His mercy He hath saved us' [Titus 3:5]. And again: 'I give counsel, as having obtained mercy from the Lord, to be faithful' [1 Cor. 7:25]—that is, that I might live, since the just shall live by faith: dead therefore he was through his injustice, before he lived through God's grace. God therefore repaid him good for evil, that is, life for death—such repayment as is here asked: 'Repay Thy servant, I shall live'; but this man who already prays and says, 'Repay Thy servant, I shall live'—if he were utterly already dead, he would not pray, but he received from Him the beginning of good concupiscence, from whom he asks the life of obedience. For they had some faith who said: 'Lord, increase our faith' [Luke 17:5]; but [the other] both confessed his unbelief and did not deny faith, who when he was asked if he believed, said: 'I do believe, Lord; help my unbelief' [Mark 9:23]. Already, surely, beginning to live, he asks life, who, believing, prays for obedience—not for the keeping [the reward of] kept obedience, but help that it may be kept. For with growing life he comes to life day by day, who is renewed from day to day."

Likewise Job 33: "He shall look upon men, and shall say, I have sinned" [Job 33:27]. He shall look, I say, first with the gaze of gratuitous mercy, gratuitously inspiring grace; and the sinner second, having been compunct through grace, shall say, I have sinned—that is, he will repent of sins. Wherefore Gregory, Moralia 24.5, expounding that word, says: "He could not know himself to be a sinner, did he not have justice. For no one apprehends his own perversity except when he has begun to be upright. For he who is altogether perverse cannot even see this which is. But he who understands himself to be a sinner has already in some part begun to be just, and that which when not just he had done, from this, that he is just, he accuses—by which his own accusation he begins to cleave to God, while bringing forth a right judgment against himself, he condemns in himself this which he feels to displease Him. Therefore having received his justice, this man shall say, I have sinned; and it is to be noted that what is premised, He shall look upon men, and then is added, and shall say, I have sinned."

Wherefore also below 40 the Lord said to Job: "I will ask thee, and do thou tell me. Hast thou an arm like God, and canst thou thunder with a voice like Him? Look on the proud and humble them, look at all the proud and confound them," etc. "And I will confess that thy right hand is able to save thee" [Job 40:2-9]—as if to say, this man cannot, but God [can]. On which Gregory, Moralia 32.7: "Look on, etc.—as if He should say: As I [do]. But in two ways every sinner is looked on by the Lord—when he is converted from sin, or punished for sin. Of the gaze of conversion it is said: 'The Lord turned and looked on Peter, and Peter remembered, and went out and wept bitterly' [Luke 22:61]; of the gaze of vengeance again: 'The countenance of the Lord [is] upon them that do evil things, to cut off the remembrance of them from the earth' [Ps. 33:17]. In both ways the proud is overthrown in humility, because either by repenting he knows fault, or perishing he receives punishment." And below on that, "And I will confess"—as if openly He said, "If thou canst do these things which I have set forth, I shall reckon to thee and not to Me all the goods which thou hast done; but if thou canst not, it is plain that from the guilt of thy wickedness thou canst not by thy virtue free thyself. Behold, by the divine voice it is said to blessed Job that he is not saved by his own virtue; and yet some men, who are far from this man's powers, despising God's help, trust they can be saved by their own fortitude. For these what else ought we to pray, except that, if they have already received the gifts of good works, they may also receive this gift, that they may learn from whom they have received them?"

In agreement with this also is that of Habakkuk 3: "He looked, and dispersed the nations: and the everlasting mountains were crushed to pieces" [Hab. 3:6]. A similar sentence the Prophet seems to teach when he says: "Who looketh upon the earth, and maketh it tremble: who toucheth the mountains, and they smoke" [Ps. 103:32]. For then surely the earth trembled, and the mountains smoke, when the sinner—frigid and dry, lifted up and hard—being compunct by the gaze of God, sends forth a fervent shower of smoking tears.

According to these and other places of Scripture, God seems to be compared to the sun, and God's gaze to the sun's ray. For just as the sun and the solar ray is luminous and warm effectively, so also God and the divine gaze. For He Himself is the Sun of intelligence illuminating the intellect; He is the Sun of justice inflaming the affect, and directing the effect. The ray of this Sun, or its gaze, falling on the mind of a sinner, drives away the darkness of ignorance, and manifests an infinite multitude of sins, and infinite horrid circumstances—just as the ray of the other sun [manifests] an infinite multitude of atoms. Which ray or gaze, reflecting from the sinner unto God, raises the eyes of the sinner, attracts him, and converts him, that he may look upon this most clear Sun, from whom—much turned away, yet in His eyes—he had perpetrated so many and so sordid things. And so this gaze or ray, of punishment, hurls and produces beyond the horrid and dense cloud of sin, the splendor of the sun and the warmth privating it: lightnings and thunders terrible of the divine offense and threat. And so by the spirit of compunction and fear conceived within the sinful earth, an earth-tremor is made, which—through the mouth of the sinner, as through some passage of the earth, hastening to go out—bursts forth into confession. And so at last this cloud of sin is dissolved into a rain of tears, purgative of all squalors, and whitening above snow [Ps. 50:9] the sinner soul.

This rain, received by heavenly virtue, sanctifies, irrigates, and makes fruitful the cursed, parched, and sterile earth of the sinner, by raining upon it. Even when so rained upon, the ray of the divine gaze does not desert it, but cherishes and refreshes it, in marvelous ways causes it to bear fruit, brings it to maturity, and at last marvelously altered, attracts and brings it to heaven. After such tempest and rain of tears, [the gaze] cherishes [the earth] by infusing serenity of conscience, and manifold consolation. Which a certain devout soul experiencing said: "After tempest Thou makest a calm, and after weeping and tears Thou pourest in exultation" [cf. Tobit 3:22]. He refreshes by exhaling the sweet vapor of meditation, return-of-love, and heavenly and sincere prayer. Whence sometimes the abundant rain of tears is remitted, that thus there be made a circular generation of such rain. Sometimes [there comes] a heavenly dew of celestial savor, of celestial sweetness, sweetly feeding and inebriating those who taste—this is Manna, this is the water of refreshment, this is the inebriation of the house of God [Ps. 35:9]. Through this ray or gaze frozen things are dissolved, slimy and slippery things are constrained, withered things grow green again, and dead things live again. This ray makes the earth fruitful by inspiring grace, mother of good works and nurse; which also brings to maturity by giving perseverance; which then this earth, marvelously altered by celestial virtue, emptied of earthly heaviness and grossness, changed into a celestial nature—as it were a shell filled with celestial dew—attracts to heaven, elevates, and brings.

Since therefore the gaze of God is of such efficacy and virtue, no wonder if the Church of God so often desires it and so often implores it. But let it suffice to have moralized these things briefly. With the premises also agrees that Gospel narrative of Luke 22 concerning Peter's sin, the Lord's gaze, and Peter's bitter weeping: "The Lord, turning, looked on Peter; and Peter remembered the word, etc. And going forth, he wept bitterly" [Luke 22:61-62]. The order of the words is to be noted: "The Lord, turning, looked on Peter." Behold that the Lord, in mercy, first turned Himself to the sinner, before the sinner [turned] to Him. Behold that He first looked on the sinner by inspiring gratuitous grace, before the sinner repented of sins. On which Bede, as alleged in the Gloss: "His looking is to have mercy, since not only when penitence is being done, but also that it may be done, the mercy of God is necessary." On which also Augustine, On the Consensus of the Evangelists, as similarly alleged there: "It seems to me," he says, "that that gaze was made divinely; and as it is said, 'Look upon me and hear me,' and 'Turn, O Lord, deliver my soul' [Ps. 6:5], so I judge it was said, The Lord, turning, looked on Peter." The same in Hypognostica 50: "If a sinner presumes to be cleansed by his will alone, he cannot, indeed he is not even compunct from the heart; for unless the Lord had looked on Peter, he would never, moved by penitence, have wept bitterly. Therefore penitence is the best and most perfect thing, which calls back all defects to the perfect; but every best gift, says James the Apostle, and every perfect gift is from above, descending from the Father of lights" [James 1:17].

Also blessed Ambrose, in book 9 on Luke—Augustine Against Pelagius and Caelestius, On the Grace of Christ and on Original Sin reciting—says thus: "Good are the tears which wash fault. Indeed, those whom Jesus looks at weep. Peter denied first, and did not weep, because the Lord had not looked at him; he denied a second time, did not weep, because the Lord had not yet looked at him; he denied also a third time; Jesus looked, and he wept most bitterly. Let these read the Gospel and see that the Lord Jesus was at that time within while He was being heard by the chief of the priests; but the Apostle Peter was outside and below in the courtyard with the servants by the fire, now sitting, now standing, as is shown by the most truthful and most concordant narration of the Evangelists. Whence it cannot be said that the Lord looked on him with corporeal eyes, visibly admonishing him; and therefore what is written there, 'The Lord looked on him,' was done within in the mind, was done in the will. The mercy of the Lord came secretly to his aid, touched his heart, recalled the memory, by His interior grace visited Peter, moved and brought forth the affect of the inner man even to outward tears."

And Isidore, On the Highest Good 2.12, says: "Whoever is compunct by the memory of his sins to lamenting, then let him know that he is being visited by God's presence: for then Peter wept, when Christ looked on him; whence in the Psalms: 'He looked, and the earth was shaken, and trembled' [Ps. 103:32]; the steps of God are in the heart of the inner man, when good desires arise that the bad may be trampled."

It is plain therefore that God's mercy and grace precede penitence, as the efficient cause its effect. Wherefore Jeremiah 31, in the person of the converted sinner, says: "After Thou didst convert me, I did penance" [Jer. 31:19]. The Gloss on "after"—not before, not through me—and "after Thou shewedst me, I struck my thigh: I am confounded and ashamed." The Gloss: "After, not before, not through me." Likewise Lamentations, last [chapter]: "Convert us, O Lord, to Thee, and we shall be converted" [Lam. 5:21]. The Gloss: "Convert us through grace, and we shall be converted as much as is in us by free choice." Whence "by the grace of God I am what I am, and His grace in me hath not been void [1 Cor. 15:10]. For the grace of the One calling precedes and excites the freedom of the will. Ours is that we fall; God's that we rise. For men are flesh, a spirit going and not returning [Ps. 77:39]. It is not therefore of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God who showeth mercy [Rom. 9:16]. It is to be noted nevertheless that we are not converted by God's grace unless we are also converted by our will."

Did not the Lord show this same thing to Moses, in Exodus 33, when He said: "I will have mercy on whom I will, and I will be merciful to him whom it shall please me" [Exod. 33:19]? He does not say, "I will have mercy and be merciful on him who shall have merited it by repenting," but, "On whom I shall gratuitously will, and on him whom it shall please Me gratuitously." This exposition the Apostle authorizes in Romans 9, disputing on grace and the gratuitous will of God: "To Moses," he says, "He says, I will have mercy on whom I have mercy, and I will shew mercy to whom I shew mercy. So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy." And below: "Therefore He hath mercy on whom He will; and whom He will, He hardeneth" [Rom. 9:15-18]. Does not the Lord also testify this in Hosea, last [chapter], when He says thus: "I will heal their breaches, I will love them freely" [Hos. 14:5]? The Gloss: "By mercy alone, since He first loved us [1 John 4:10]." Does not the Lord also say to the sinful people in Isaiah 52: "You were sold gratis, and you shall be redeemed without money" [Isa. 52:3]? The Gloss: "Without money, by no merit of yours, but by the gratuitous benefit of God."

And what else has the Prophet sensed when saying to God: "For nothing shalt thou save them" [Ps. 55:8]—"for nothing," that is, for no preceding merit, but by Thy grace alone? Whence Augustine, expounding this: "By no preceding merits of theirs Thou shalt save them: 'I, who was first a blasphemer,' he says, 'and a persecutor, and contumelious; but I obtained mercy' [1 Tim. 1:13]. He received letters from the priests, that wherever he found Christians, he might bind and bring them. No good merits of his therefore had preceded—indeed, such things had preceded for which he should be condemned; he brought no good, and he was made saved. For nothing shalt thou save them; they did not bring goats, rams, bulls; they did not bring gifts and ornaments to Thy temple; they pour over not anything from a good conscience of libation; in them all is foul, all rough, all detestable. And since they bring nothing to Thee whereby they might be saved, for nothing Thou shalt save them—that is, by gratuitously given grace."

Who also in On Grace and Free Will 49: "Through the Holy Spirit," he says, "He works in the hearts of the elect goods, who has worked that those very hearts should be from evil into good." And it follows in 50: "Let men suspect whatever good merits they think to precede, that they may be justified through the grace of God; not understanding, when they say this, that they do nothing else but deny grace. What else is it that Truth itself says: No man can come to me, except the Father, who hath sent me, draw him" [John 6:44]? According to these, however, the sinner first by meritorious repenting would rather draw the Father and the Son to himself than the contrary. What else did the Apostle understand, when he said: "Knowest thou not, that the benignity of God leadeth thee to penance?" [Rom. 2:4] Therefore the benignity of God precedes, effects, and produces penitence. And in 2 Timothy 2: "Lest at any time God may give them repentance" [2 Tim. 2:25]. Therefore God gives penitence through preceding grace.

Augustine, treating this in 5 Against Julian 5: "He chooses no one worthy," he says, "but by choosing makes [him] worthy; yet He punishes no one unworthy. The Apostle says, you say, 'The goodness of God leadeth thee to penance'; this is true; but whom He hath predestined, He leadeth—although the man himself, according to his own hardness and impenitent heart, as far as it pertains to him, treasures up wrath for himself in the day of wrath, and of the revelation of the just judgment of God, who will render to every man according to his works [Rom. 2:5-6]. For however much patience He shows, unless He Himself give it, who shall do penance? Hast thou forgotten that this same Doctor says: 'Lest at any time God may give them repentance to know the truth, and they may recover themselves from the snares of the devil' [2 Tim. 2:25-26]? But His judgments are like a great deep [Ps. 35:7]." Who also in On True and False Penitence 16: "Since fruitful penitence is the work not of man but of God, He can inspire it whenever His mercy [wills], and reward [those] from mercy whom He could damn from justice." Which the Gloss on the aforesaid passage of Timothy most plainly attests.

Wherefore at the end of the book of holy Prosper, For the Preachers of the Grace of God against the Book of Cassian—where 13 chapters are recited excerpted from the proceedings against the heretic Pelagius and other little books of his condemned in the Synod of Palestine—the last asserted that "penitence is not given according to the grace and mercy of God, but according to the merit and labor of those who through penitence have been worthy of mercy." Where also consequently, among the 13 sanctions destroying those 13 heresies, the 13th says thus: "That [it must be confessed] that pardon is given to penitents according to the mercy and grace of God, not according to their merit—since penitence itself the Apostle calls the gift of God, where he says concerning some: 'Lest at any time God may give them penance.'"

From these things, however, is plain the correction of the whole opinion of Pelagius generally and specially of the first part. Now, however, against the two remaining parts, [we must proceed] first generally.

For both assert that the remission of sin and the justification of the unjust precede grace in time or nature. But according to what can be had from chapter 26 of this work, and according to all Philosophic and Theological treaters, evil itself, or evil-itself and sin, and the malice of sin is not anything positive, but only privative. But no privation is driven from the subject except through the positing of a habit in the subject, and this naturally preceding. For the induction and positing of a habit is the cause of the expulsion and removal of the opposite privation. For privation cannot in any way be taken away except through the positing of a repugnant habit, with the subject capable of either remaining. For how is death taken away except through life, blindness except through vision, darkness except through light, nakedness except through clothing? Or how is ignorance taken away except through knowledge? How then will privative malice be taken away, except through the positing of a habit of goodness causally and therefore naturally preceding? But charity alone or grace is such a habit of goodness, the same restoring [it] after mortal sin, and conserving, as appears from the premises.

Sin is also uncleanness, and the privation of due cleanness; wherefore it cannot be taken away except through the positing of a habit of cleanness, charity, and grace preceding. For it cannot be taken away through the act of penitence without such a habit, since the act of penitence by no means by itself repugns it, and because then on the cessation of the act, the uncleanness of sins would return. Wherefore the Lord, in Ezekiel 36, intimating this order of cleansing, says: "I will pour upon you clean water, and you shall be cleansed; and I will give you a new heart, and put a new spirit within you: and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh" [Ezek. 36:25-26].

The Gloss: "Note that He gives a new heart and a new spirit after the pouring of water."

Expressing the same order of cleansing of sin through fired stone or fire, by which charity is figured, Isaiah says: "There flew unto me one of the seraphim, and in his hand a calculus" (where the Septuagint has Carbunculus) "which he had taken from the altar with the tongs. And he touched my mouth, and said: Behold, I have touched this with thy lips, and thy iniquity shall be taken away, and thy sin shall be cleansed" [Isa. 6:6-7]. On which the Gloss says that "this one so flying is Christ sent from the Father, who alone dismisses sins, which the whole Trinity dismisses; and that this calculus or carbuncle is charity," and says, "that that altar is the altar which John saw in the Apocalypse, which is full of fired calculi by which sins can be purged." And note the order evidently expressed: "I have touched," he says, "this"—namely, with charity—"thy lips," namely first according to nature, "and thy iniquity shall be taken away, and thy sin shall be cleansed" later, namely according to nature. Wherefore he congruously says, "shall be taken away."

Sin is also turpitude, and the privation of due beauty; wherefore it is not taken away except through the positing of a repugnant habit of beauty. But charity and grace is the beauty of the soul, or the restorer of it. Wherefore Augustine on Psalm 103, treatise 1, treating that of the Canticle of Canticles according to the old translation, "Who is this who descends made white?" [Cant. 8:5 LXX]: "Made white," he says, "because not through herself white"; and he adds: "I was first a blasphemer," and likewise: "We also were sometime by nature children of wrath, even as the rest" [Eph. 2:3]. Grace approaches, illuminating and whitening: "First thou wast black, but thou hast been made white from His grace; for you were heretofore darkness, but now light in the Lord" [Eph. 5:8]. The same could similarly be argued: that sin is the injustice, infirmity, and death of the sinful soul; but grace is the justice, soundness, and life of the spiritual soul, or the restorer of it.

Now further specially against the first of these, which says that man cleanses himself from sin by himself: either this is by a clean act or unclean. If by a clean one, he is first himself clean, as appears from the premises. Whence Matthew 23: "Woe to you, etc., who clean the outside of the cup and dish, but within you are full of rapine and uncleanness. Thou blind Pharisee, first clean the inside of the cup and dish, that the outside also may be clean" [Matt. 23:25-26]. And the Apostle says to Titus 1: "All things are clean to the clean: but to them that are defiled, and to unbelievers, nothing is clean: but both their mind and their conscience are defiled" [Titus 1:15]. Nor by an unclean act. For how could the unclean by his uncleanness purge the unclean? Whence Ecclesiasticus 34: "Of the unclean what shall be cleansed? And of a liar what truth shall be told?" [Sir. 34:4]. But such a one, who corrects himself from his sins by himself, and so merits grace, has not to pray with the other sons of the Church: "Have mercy on me, O God, according to Thy great mercy" [Ps. 50:3], but, "Lord, render to me justice according to the demand of my merits"; nor has he further to say, "And according to the multitude of Thy tender mercies"—but, "of Thy justices"—"blot out my iniquity." Indeed, he ought not reasonably to ask this, since not God but he himself blots out his iniquities, as he says. Wherefore he has not consequently to pray, "Wash me yet more, etc., Thou shalt sprinkle me, O Lord, with hyssop, and I shall be cleansed," etc. [Ps. 50:9]. Nor must such a one claim any participation in the blessed blood of Jesus Christ, "which was shed for many for the remission of sins" [Matt. 26:28], as the Gospels and the whole Church of God attest. For he can cleanse himself by himself.

But not so—not so does the Lord Himself feel, when through Isaiah 43 He thus says: "I am, I am He that blot out thy iniquities" [Isa. 43:25]. "I am," he says, "I am He"—namely, discretively, as Grammarians attest, that is, "I, and no other, who blot out thy iniquities." For He is "the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world" [John 1:29], "and the sins of the world," as the whole Church chants. Wherefore Theophilus, as alleged in the Gloss, says: "Why did he not say 'sins of the world,' but 'sin'?—namely, that by what he says 'sin,' he might seem to hint at sin universally; just as we are accustomed to say that man was cast out of paradise, that is, the whole human race." And Augustine, on that passage in sermon 4, teaches that both these—"Behold the Lamb of God, behold who taketh away the sin of the world"—must be taken discretively in the aforesaid manner. Who also, as alleged in the Canon On Consecration, distinction 4, Nemo; and in 4 Sentences of Lombard, distinction 18: "No one taketh away the sins of the world but Christ, who is the Lamb taking away the sins of the world." Similar to this is also that below, the same: "This is He who baptizeth in the Holy Spirit" [John 1:33]. Which Augustine in sermon 5 there similarly understands; the Scholastic History [Comestor] and other Doctors: "This," namely, "and no other—but this alone." With which also agrees that of Acts 15: "God, who knoweth the hearts, gave testimony, giving unto them the Holy Ghost, etc., purifying their hearts by faith" [Acts 15:8-9], and many other places.

Wherefore Augustine in the sermon On the Remission of Sins, as alleged in Canon 1, question 1, Vt euidenter: "That it might evidently be shown," he says, "the Lord, that sins are dismissed by the Holy Spirit, whom He gave to His faithful, not by men's merits—in a certain place He thus says: 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost,' and immediately He added, 'Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven'" [John 20:22-23]; that is, the Holy Spirit dismisses, not you." The same on that of John 20: "Receive the Holy Ghost: Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven; and whose you shall retain, they are retained" [John 20:22-23], part 2, homily 67 (or 121 of the whole), thus says: "The Church's charity, which is poured forth in our hearts through the Holy Spirit, dismisses the sins of its participants; but of those who are not its participants, it retains [them]; therefore after He had said, 'Receive the Holy Ghost,' He immediately subjoined this concerning the remission and detention of sins."

Wherefore the Prophet says: "Send forth Thy Spirit, and they shall be created: and Thou shalt renew the face of the earth" [Ps. 103:30]. On which Augustine: "The poor in spirit," he says, "did not wish to have their own spirit, they will have the Spirit of God; for He said this: 'For it is not you that speak, but the Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you' [Matt. 10:20]. Thou wilt send forth Thy Spirit, and they shall be created. For we are His handiwork—says the Apostle—'created in good works' [Eph. 2:10]. From His Spirit we have received grace, that we may live unto justice, since He it is who justifies the wicked [Rom. 4:5]. Thou wilt take away their spirit, and they shall fail; Thou wilt send forth Thy Spirit, and they shall be created, and Thou shalt renew the face of the earth—that is, of new men, confessing themselves to have been justified, not just from themselves, that the grace of God may be in them. See of what kind they are, whose face has been renewed. Paul says: 'Yea, I have laboured more than all they.' What is it, Paul? Attend, if thou art thyself thy spirit. 'Not I,' he says, 'but the grace of God with me' [1 Cor. 15:10]. What is it, then, that when He has taken away our spirit, we are turned into our dust, looking with profit on our infirmity, that, His Spirit being received, we may be re-created."

The Prophet also says: "Thou hast blessed, O Lord, Thy land: Thou hast turned away the captivity of Jacob: Thou hast forgiven the iniquity of Thy people: Thou hast covered all their sins" [Ps. 84:2-3]. With which in agreement Augustine on that of Psalm 31, "Blessed are they whose," etc.: "The title of the Psalm is called Of understanding. The first understanding, then, [is] that thou shouldst know thyself a sinner; the consequent understanding is that, when from faith through love thou hast begun to work well, thou shouldst not impute this to thy powers, but to the grace of God; since the whole is to be imputed to His grace, not to our merits. Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. If God has covered the sins, He did not wish to advert [to them]." Where also Jerome: "Those whose sins God dismisses, He covers."

Reciting which authorities, Peter in 4 Sentences, distinction 18, says: "From these it is openly shown that God Himself looses the penitent from the debt of punishment, and looses [him] then, when He inwardly illuminates by inspiring true contrition of heart. To which sentence reason gives suffrage, and authorities attest. For no one is truly compunct concerning sin, having a contrite and humbled heart, except in charity; but he who has charity is worthy of life. But no one is at the same time worthy of life and of death; therefore he is not then bound by the debt of eternal death. For he ceases to be a son of wrath from the time he begins to love and repent. Therefore God alone interiorly cleanses man from the spot of sin, and looses [him] from the debt of eternal punishment, who through the Prophet says: 'I alone blot out the iniquities and sins of the people.'" And below, after various sentences of the Doctors are recited: "Behold," he says, "how various are the things handed down by the Doctors; and in this such variety, what is to be held? This indeed we can say and feel: that God alone dismisses sins and retains them, and yet on the Church He has conferred the power of loosing and binding; but otherwise He Himself looses or binds, otherwise the Church. For He Himself through Himself only thus dismisses sin, since He cleanses the soul from every interior spot, and looses [it] from the debt of eternal death." And he adds below: "It has been shown how the Priests dismiss or retain sins, and yet God has retained for Himself a certain singular power of dismissing or retaining, since He alone through Himself looses the debt of eternal death, and inwardly purges the soul."

Such a one, also, has no need of another Saviour or Physician—namely, Jesus Christ. For he can save and heal himself; indeed, neither does this Physician save anyone from sin or heal, but each [saves and heals] himself. Therefore He came in vain to seek and to save what had perished [Luke 19:10]; in vain was His name called Jesus, that is, Salutory or Saviour, since He is to no one the cause of salvation, but each [is the cause] to himself. This man therefore endeavors to extinguish or pervert the name of Christ. But not so—not so. Rather, let him convert his name, and who was a Pelagian, become a Christian; who was a disciple of Pelagius, shipwrecked in the Pelagus [sea] of perfidy, become a disciple of Jesus Christ, freeing [men] from the Pelagus of sin.

Wherefore the Angel of the Lord said to Joseph: "Thou shalt call His name JESUS: for He shall save His people from their sins" [Matt. 1:21]. With which in agreement Peter, filled with the Holy Spirit, said of the Lord Jesus Christ that "there is no salvation in any other; for there is no other name under heaven given to men, whereby we must be saved" [Acts 4:12]. Which the Prophet, well seeing, says: "Thou Thyself art my King and my God, who commandest the saving of Jacob" [Ps. 43:5]; and above 26: "The Lord is my light and my salvation" [Ps. 26:1]; and below 40: "Heal my soul, for I have sinned against Thee" [Ps. 40:5]; and below 102: "Who healeth all thy diseases" [Ps. 102:3]. Wherefore Jeremiah 17: "Heal me, O Lord, and I shall be healed: save me, and I shall be saved" [Jer. 17:14]. With which many similar things very often occur in Scripture.

Likewise, as was touched on above: How can a dead man give life to a dead man? Can a dead man raise a dead man? For no one can do the work of life, unless he previously has life. But every mortal sinner is spiritually dead. Who even of men presumes of himself so much that he could corporeally raise one corporeally dead? Who therefore will presume that he can spiritually raise one spiritually dead—when this is just as much, or more, as the spirit and spiritual life is greater than the body, and corporeal life? Whence Anselm, On Free Will 10: "When free will," he says, "deserts rectitude, it serves sin through the impossibility of recovering it by itself. Thus is made a spirit going and not returning [Ps. 77:39], because 'whoever commits sin, is the servant of sin' [John 8:34]. For just as no will, before it had rectitude, could receive it, with God not giving—so when it has deserted what it received, it cannot receive it except with God restoring it. And I esteem it a greater miracle, when God restores deserted rectitude to a will, than when He restores lost life to a dead man. For the body, by dying from necessity, does not sin, that it should never receive life again; but the will, by deserting rectitude through itself, merits to lack it always."

The same in Cur Deus Homo 2.16: "More marvelously," he says, "did God restore human nature than [He] instituted [it]. (For each is equally easy for God.) But man before he existed did not sin, that he should not have to be made; but after he had been made, by sinning he merited to lose what and that to which he had been made. Therefore God so much more marvelously restored him than He instituted [him], by how much He did this of the sinner against merit, that not of the sinner nor against merit." Chrysostom too, as alleged in the Gloss on Luke 5: "Whether is it easier to say, Thy sins are forgiven thee, or to say, Arise and walk?" [Luke 5:23]: "It is plain," he says, "that to consolidate the body is easier; for as much as the soul is more noble than the body, by so much is the absolution of crimes more excellent. But because you do not believe this, since it lies hidden, I will add what is less but more open, so that what is more hidden may be demonstrated through this." With which in agreement Augustine on Psalm 9: "I will tell of all Thy wonders" [Ps. 9:2]: "He tells all the wonders of God who sees them done not only manifestly in bodies, but also invisibly in souls—but far more sublimely and excellently. For earthly men and men devoted to their eyes more wonder that the dead Lazarus rose in body, than that the persecutor Paul rose in soul."

The Prophet says, speaking to God: "Wilt Thou show wonders to the dead, or shall physicians raise to life, and confess to Thee? Shall any one in the sepulchre declare Thy mercy: and Thy truth in destruction? Shall Thy wonders be known in the dark; and Thy justice in the land of forgetfulness?" [Ps. 87:11-13]. But what else do these seem to signify, except that God alone does wonders spiritually, raising up the dead and buried, the lost and forgotten by His preventing grace? Whence Augustine, expounding the first of these verses: "The Ecclesiastical physicians, although they cure not from their own (since neither do bodily physicians cure from their own), yet however much by faithful ministry they help unto salvation, they can cure those living, not arouse those dead—of whom it was said, Wilt Thou show wonders to the dead? For God's grace is too hidden, by which men's minds in some way come back to life, that they can hear from any of His ministers the precepts of soundness; which grace He commends in the Gospel saying: No man can come to me, except the Father, who hath sent me, draw him [John 6:44]; and a little after, Therefore did I say to you, that no man can come to me, unless it be given him by my Father [John 6:66]. Above He had said, But there are some of you that believe not [John 6:65], and as expounding the cause of this thing: Therefore did I say to you, that no man can come to me, unless it be given him by my Father—to show that even faith itself, by which one believes, and by which the soul revives from the death of its heart, is given us by God. However much therefore from her—excellent preachers of the word, and persuaders of truth even through miracles—as great physicians may treat with men, if they are dead and have not revived by Thy grace: Wilt Thou show wonders to the dead, or shall physicians raise to life, and shall those whom they have raised confess to Thee? For this confession indicates the living. For as elsewhere it is written, From the dead, as if he were not, confession perisheth [Sir. 17:26]." Who also to the same sentence expounds the following verses; on the third thus saying: "Nor shall the physicians raise the wicked that they may confess to Thee, in whom Thy hidden grace does not work, by which they may be drawn to believe; since none come to me, except whom Thou hast drawn."

Peter besides in 4 Sentences, distinction 18, says that the cleansing of the soul from the spot of sin God alone does, who alone raises and illuminates the soul; which the Priests cannot do, who nevertheless are the Physicians of souls. Whence the Prophet: "Shall physicians raise to life, and confess to Thee?" Likewise Ecclesiasticus 17: "From the dead, as if nothing, confession perisheth," or according to another translation, "From the dead, as if he were not, confession perisheth" [Sir. 17:26]. He, therefore, who confesses sin, not because he confesses, is alive. For a dead man cannot do the work of life; but he is first at least by nature alive, and therefore effects the work of life. This sentence also Saint Augustine's exposition above alleged corroborates. Who also in On the Words of the Lord, sermon 8: "They confess," he says, "either praising God or accusing themselves. Each confession is pious—whether when thou reprovest thyself who art not without sin, or when thou praisest Him who cannot have sin. But if we think well, thy reprehension is His praise. For why dost thou now confess in the accusation of thy sin, in the accusation of thyself—why dost thou confess except because from a dead man thou hast become alive? For Scripture says: From the dead, as if he were not, perishes confession. If from the dead confession perishes, he who confesses lives. And if he confesses sin, surely from death he has revived. If a confessor of sin has revived from death, who has raised him? No dead man is the raiser of himself; who has raised him, except He who, the stone removed, cried out saying, Lazarus, come forth [John 11:43]? But what is to come forth, except to come forth into the open from what was hidden? He who confesses comes forth; he could not come forth unless he lived; he could not live unless God's calling were."

And Bernard says, in On Grace and Free Will 23: "The Apostle says: 'What hast thou that thou hast not received?' [1 Cor. 4:7] Thou art created, healed, saved—what of these is from thyself, O man? What of these is not impossible to free will? You could neither create [yourself] when you were not, nor justify [yourself] a sinner, nor as a dead man could you raise yourself—to omit the rest of the goods which are necessary to be healed, or laid up to be saved. What we say of the first, is plain also of the last; but of the middle no one doubts, except 'he who, ignorant of God's justice, and willing to establish his own, is not subject to the justice of God' [Rom. 10:3]. For why dost thou recognize the power of the Creator, the glory of the Saviour, but ignore the justice of the Healer? 'Heal me,' he says, 'and I shall be healed; save me, and I shall be saved, for Thou art my praise' [Jer. 17:14]. He recognized the justice of the Just God, by whom he hoped equally to be saved from sin and freed from misery; therefore he set Him as his praise, and not himself by merit. Who is he who is, who knows not God's justice? Who is he who justifies himself? Who is he who justifies himself, who presumes merits for himself from elsewhere than from grace? But He who has made [it] that He may save, also gives whence He may save. He, I say, gives merits, who has made [those] to whom He may give. And it follows in 24: Therefore those who rightly understand confess a triple operation, not indeed of free will, but of divine grace in it, or concerning it: the first, creation; the second, reformation; the third is consummation. For what was not had to be created in him; what was, [had to be] reformed through a deiform form; the members are not perfected except with the head."

From these it appears that God alone vivifies and resuscitates through grace those dead through sin. Which the Prophet, well noting, says: "Thou shalt vivify us; and we will call upon Thy name" [Ps. 79:19]. "Thou wilt vivify us"—Thou alone, by inspiring the life of grace, and this first; and "we, vivified, shall call upon Thy name" with living invocation, second. And below 84: "O God, Thou turning, wilt vivify us"—or according to another reading, "Thou converting, wilt vivify us" [Ps. 84:7]; "Thou," I say, "singularly, discretively turned to us through the benefit of grace, or converting, wilt vivify us." And below 118: "In Thy equity vivify me" [Ps. 118:40]; "in Thy equity," I say, "not mine"; where Augustine's reading has: "In Thy justice vivify me." On which he says: "Not in mine, but in Thy justice vivify me—that is, in charity; for in me I had whence I might die; but whence I might live I find not, except in Thee." And below: "Quicken Thou me according to Thy mercy: and I shall keep the testimonies of Thy mouth" [Ps. 118:88]. "Quicken me according to Thy mercy, not according to the justice of [my] merits"—and this first—"and I shall keep the testimonies of Thy mouth" second.

Wherefore also our Physician, salvation, and life: "As the Father raiseth up the dead, and giveth life: so the Son also giveth life to whom He will" [John 5:21]. These therefore raise up the spiritually dead—not the dead themselves; etc. This is by gratuitous will, not for the merit of those raised preceding. "The Son," He says, "giveth life to whom He will"—not to those who merit to be vivified. For God alone can raise up sons of Abraham from stones, from stony men—frigid, dry, and hard—as can be known from Matthew and Luke 3.

The third of the aforementioned errors, the things foretasted sufficiently rectify.

The second principal opinion, however—affirming that grace naturally precedes the remission of sin and the justification of the unjust—is divided in two ways. For some say that grace, according to that which it is absolutely, precedes the remission of sin and the justification of the unjust—not however inasmuch as it is grace, but in this respect follows this and that. Others, however, posit that grace, inasmuch as it is grace, naturally precedes these. The first of these dissents little vocally from the principal opinion of Pelagius recited, and agrees really; which therefore can be corrected like that, by taking grace and the other terms required with reduplication, according to the mind of Canonical Scripture and the Doctors. Which could also be reduced to the truth by very many other ways. But because it seems too puerile, it must not be manfully resisted; an older age and a more mature intellect will put this to flight.

But those having an intellect and senses more digested, and positing grace inasmuch as it is grace to precede the remission of sin and the justification of the unjust, are varied in two ways: for some say that grace precedes justification mediately, others, however, immediately. The first of these affirm that God first naturally and gratuitously infuses grace into the sinner; and that the sinner secondly in order of nature elicits some purgative act of sin; and so by such a mediating act merits and obtains the remission of sin. And these, sensing diversely about that mediating act, are further divided into five special sects. The first thinks that this mediating purgative act is contrition of heart; the second, that it is confession of mouth; the third, that it is absolution; the fourth, that it is satisfaction of work; the fifth, that it is sacramental penitence, such as is celebrated in the Church—integral and perfect; for they do not think any single part suffices.

The first of these, which seems subtler than the others, opines that God first naturally gives grace gratuitously to the sinner; and the sinner secondly in order of nature loves God gratuitously; and thirdly naturally repents; and through these merits the remission of sin, of divine offense, of eternal punishment, divine friendship, and eternal life. And so fourthly in natural order, he perceives the dismissal of sin; fifthly, the remission of divine offense; sixthly, the relaxation of eternal punishment; seventhly, divine reconciliation and friendship; eighthly, eternal life—although all these in time, or rather in the instant of time, happen simultaneously.

This opinion very many Doctors seem to profess; with whom also the Glossator on the Decretals at the beginning of the first distinction On Penitence, treating this matter, seems to consent. For he says that grace precedes contrition as a cause, and contrition the remission similarly as a cause. And below: "Note," he says, "that all these are simultaneous in time: justification, contrition, love, remission—but some of these naturally precede, and are prior in nature. For I must understand that one first has grace before he is contrite. Therefore grace precedes; love follows—since he who has grace, loves; whom contrition follows, for he who loves is contrite; remission follows, for he who is contrite, to him is it remitted." But the very many authorities, which the first distinction On Penitence recites of Gratian, and Peter [Lombard] in 4 Sentences distinction 17—of which some were recited above for the Pelagians—seem plainly to attest that sins are dismissed by contrition alone. With which reason also gives suffrage. For otherwise it would seem superfluous to be contrite of sins; and since to repent is also free to man, he could, having received grace, not repent, and so be justified and just without any penitence after or before.

But this opinion the reasons made by way of merit against the first opinion of the Pelagians seem to correct. The reasons by way of life and death, soundness and infirmity, goodness and malice of tree or earth, and other similar ones brought against the Pelagians also correct it. For love and contrition, by which the sinner merits the remission of sin, are living, sound, and good works; wherefore he himself is first by nature living, sound, and good, as was more fully deduced above—as Anselm in On Concord 9, Augustine in Ad Simplicianum 1.24 (as was touched on above), and chapter 39 more fully alleged, evidently attest.

Likewise, as is plain through chapter 26 of this work, and by all the Doctors in agreement: sin or the malice of sin is not anything positive, but only privative—and not [a privation] of contrition or any act whatsoever, because then on the cessation of the actual contrition or that other act whatever, sin would immediately return. It is therefore the privation of some habit which is opposed to it positively, and this immediately, in a disposed subject—just as light and darkness. But this habit immediately opposed to sin is grace, or supplied through grace, or grace necessarily restores it immediately to the sinner. Otherwise, someone could simultaneously be in grace and in mortal sin, which is repugnant to what was previously shown.

Therefore by infused grace sin is immediately deleted, just as by light darkness is immediately taken away; or grace immediately restores the habit immediately opposed to sin, which immediately by itself takes away sin; and so grace, only with that habit mediating, takes away sin, just as the sun [takes away] the darkness of the air only with its ray mediating—not therefore by an act of love or contrition causally and naturally mediating.

Likewise, grace is naturally prior to contrition, and contrition is not its necessary effect, nor inseparably consequent on it, because then everyone receiving and having grace would always necessarily repent. Which is established to be false of the holy Angels, of men before the fall, of small children baptized after the fall, of the holy adults in this life always having the grace of God, but not always sorrowing, and of the Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore grace infused in a sinner can for the time be without an act of contrition in him, just as also after—just as also other infused habits, and habits possible to be infused, namely intellectual and moral, can exist without their proper acts—especially since contrition is a spontaneous act of free will. Since also grace and contrition are two effects of God in the contrite heart, with grace prior in nature, and contrition posterior, nor inseparably following it, [if it be supposed] that this be put into being—since according to hypothesis sin is not taken away except through the act of contrition—the sinner will be at the same time in grace and in mortal sin. Or if in this case sin is taken away without the act of contrition, this is through some habit immediately opposed to sin, which is grace, or immediately introduced through grace, as was touched on above. Wherefore also previously it was similarly taken away. For a habit once immediately opposed by itself and essentially to some privation is always similarly opposed to it, as can be had from chapter 2 of this work.

But if anyone responds that grace is not the habit immediately opposed to sin, nor immediately restores it, but with some medium mediating: that other thing either is a habit, or an act. Not an act, on account of the premises; and because this response defends one saying in the case premised that sin is destroyed without contrition and an act of the sinner prior. Nor can it reasonably be said that it is a habit. For who is that? That habit also either necessarily and inseparably follows grace, or contingently and separably. If contingently and separably, it is possible that infused grace exists without it; and that the sinner be at the same time in grace and in mortal sin, as was argued above. If necessarily and inseparably, by the same reasoning from the beginning it should have been said that the habit immediately opposed to sin immediately follows grace. For through this the difficulty is in no way diminished, but rather increased, as is easy to see.

Likewise, every form, and every habit—natural, moral, and intellectual—immediately denominates its formed and habituated [subject], just as it is immediately opposed to the privation of this form or habit, around its disposed subject—e.g., light [denominates] the lit, justice the just, wisdom the wise, and so of all others. Why then does grace and charity not immediately denominate someone pleasing and dear, especially since to be pleasing and not to be pleasing—or to be not pleasing or ungrateful—just like dear and not-dear, around a disposed subject (say, around a rational creature) are immediately privatively opposed? Why also does grace or charity, which is the spiritual life, soundness, and beauty of the one having it, not immediately denominate him living spiritually, sound, and beautiful—just as life, soundness, and beauty of any natural [thing] denominates it naturally such? Why also does grace not immediately effect and denominate adults pleasing, just as it does small children baptized—as also it did the first men, if they were created in grace, or had grace before sin—and likewise the Angels? Since according to that common saying of the Philosopher, "One inasmuch as one is naturally fit to make always one." Likewise, on the induction of mortal sin, the expulsion of grace immediately follows; wherefore also in the same way conversely by similar reasoning.

This opinion also rectify the Authorities premised, saying that the sinner is justified through the grace of God gratuitously, not from works or merits of the sinner preceding—which both Authorities and reasons very many made above against the Pelagian opinions in agreement attest. This same opinion, on account of many other things it says, could also be castigated manifoldly otherwise.

The second of the said sects relies on this reasoning: If sins are dismissed before oral confession, it is not necessary to confess. For by what reasoning is a man bound to confess sins which he does not doubt have been dismissed? Why also would not a baptized adult similarly be bound to confess anew sins dismissed in baptism—which no one doubts is false? Wherefore the Lord precepts: "Tell thou first thy iniquities that thou mayest be justified" [Isa. 43:26]—according to the translation of the Septuagint, as the Gloss there recites. Augustine also on that of Psalm 74: "We will give praise to Thee, O God: we will praise, and we will call upon Thy name" [Ps. 74:2]: "Confess and call upon Him," he says. "For by confessing thou cleansest thyself, that He may come, called upon. Before invocation, confession precedes; thy confession cleanses thee." Who also on that of Psalm 95: "Confession and beauty in His sight" [Ps. 95:6]: "Beauty," he says, "thou lovest; wilt thou be beautiful? Confess. He did not say, 'beauty and confession,' but 'confession and beauty.' Wast thou foul? Confess that thou mayest be beautiful. Wast thou a sinner? Confess that thou mayest be just. Confession and beauty in His sight. Let them confess their sins, vomit out the evils which they had eagerly devoured, let them not return to their vomit like an unclean dog—and there will be confession and beauty. We love beauty: let us first choose confession, that beauty may follow." This sentence also Augustine's exposition on that of Psalm 103, "Thou hast put on confession and beauty"; and on that of Psalm 84, "Justice shall walk before Him," etc., recited above, plainly attests.

Ambrose says in his book On Paradise, as alleged in On Penitence, distinction 1, Alij e contra; and in 4 Sentences of Peter, distinction 17: "No one can be justified from sin unless he has previously confessed." Who also in his sermon on Lent, as similarly alleged in the same places: "Confession," he says, "frees the soul from death; confession opens paradise; confession bestows hope of salvation." Likewise Augustine, On True and False Penitence 13, alleged in the said places: "In this," he says, "that the penitent through himself says to the Priest, and conquers shame by fear of the offended, the pardon of crime is brought about. For it is made venial through confession what was criminal in operation." In each of the said places many similar Authorities also are recited.

But the correction of this sect follows evidently from the correction of the prior sect. For if contrition of heart proceeding from grace does not precede the deletion of sin, much more does not oral confession—since this is later. Through the same things by which the first sect was reduced [to truth], the second can also be reduced. For sin is a privation only, and not of confession or any act whatsoever, because then on the cessation of the confession or that act sin would return. It is therefore the privation of some habit, which either is grace, or restored by grace, as was shown above; and this before confession not only in nature but in time, when grace is gratuitously infused into the ungrateful, and he is contrite of sins, as also the things previously had manifest.

Likewise, if mortal sin were not destroyed before oral confession in a sinner receiving gratuitous grace and contrite, willing to confess, and seeking a Confessor diligently and long, grace and mortal sin would stand together long—which was rejected above. What Catholic also doubts that in a sinner duly repenting from grace already infused, and willing to confess, and diligently seeking confession, sins are dismissed before confession; and that he, if he die on the way to a Priest, is saved? And if to him so dying before confession sins are dismissed, why not similarly if he had lived until he came to the Priest? Why not similarly to another similar [person] not dying on the way, but living until after confession? What reason for diversity? What cause for variation, all things being equal among these?

This those ten leprous men also lucidly manifest, who at the Lord's command, while they went to seek the Priests to show themselves to them, were cleansed—of whom Luke 17. Which also evidently shows that leper, whom the Lord first touched with His hand and cleansed, and afterwards commanded to show himself to the Priests, and offer what Moses commanded to be offered for a testimony to them, as Matthew 8 and Mark 1 more fully recite. "Show himself," I say, through oral Confession; and "offer what Moses commanded" through satisfaction of work, which the law commands.

Who also doubts that an adult unbeliever, converted in heart by the preaching of a believer, and believing in Christ, willing to be baptized, and diligently seeking a Baptist—even before the baptism of water, by the baptism of breath, is baptized from all mortal sins; and if he so departs, is saved—as is sufficiently shown in 4 Sentences of Peter, distinction 4, and Extra, On Baptism and its Effect: Debitum. Why then not similarly in the Baptism of saving penitence?

This same is proved manifoldly in On Penitence, distinction 1, by the said lepers, and very many efficacious Authorities and reasons. It is true however that Gratian argues for and against, and affirms neither part, but leaves it to the judgment of the Reader, as is clearly plain in the penultimate chapter. The Authorities and reasons there adduced for the first sentence efficaciously prove it. Those, however, adduced to the opposite, some prove the proposition more if subtly inspected; some proceed against the negligent or contemners of oral Confession, and the proposition of confessing—as the whole is plain there through the Gloss, and through Peter in 4 Sentences, distinction 17, where also he proves and holds this sentence.

The third sect founds itself on the power of the keys. For it is not falsely or in vain that the Lord said to Peter: "I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind upon earth, it shall be bound also in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, it shall be loosed also in heaven" [Matt. 16:19]. Who also more generally—His disciples being gathered—says: "Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose you shall retain, they are retained" [John 20:23]. What Christian also is unaware that the vicar of Christ on earth, and other inferior prelates and minor priests, by the virtue of these keys absolve penitents from sins, bind some by the chain of excommunication, and loose some? Otherwise, as he argues, it would be superfluous to be absolved.

But this sect cannot stand at the understanding of [its] sectaries. For if neither contrition of heart nor oral confession precedes the deletion of sin, as was shown above, much more does not the Priest's absolution—since this, if it be done legitimately, is after those. This sect can also be corrected like the proximate one. Wherefore Peter in 4 Sentences, distinction 18, proves and holds that sins are deleted before the absolution given by the Priest. Likewise, if in the absolution of the Priest sins are dismissed, either the Priest by his absolution dismisses them, or God at his absolution. The Priest, however, does not properly delete sins, but God alone, as was shown above. Whence Ambrose, as alleged in 4 Sentences of Peter, distinction 18, and in On Penitence, distinction 1, Alij e contra: "The Word of God dismisses sins; the Priest is judge; the Priest exhibits his office, but exercises the rights of no [his own] power."

And Jerome says, as alleged in the Gloss on Matthew 16: "Whatsoever thou shalt bind," etc., and in 4 Sentences of Peter, distinction 18: "Bishops and Priests, not understanding this passage, take to themselves something of the supercilium of the Pharisees, that they either condemn the innocent, or think they loose the guilty—since with God it is not the sentence of the Priests, but the life of the accused, that is sought. We read in Leviticus concerning lepers, where they are commanded to show themselves to the Priests, and if they have leprosy, then they are made unclean by the Priest—not because the Priests make them lepers and unclean; but because they have knowledge of the leper and the non-leper, and can discern who is clean and who unclean. As therefore there the Priest makes the leper unclean, so here also the Bishop or Priest binds or looses." Who also will even lightly esteem that the Priest by absolving externally creates internally grace in the soul of the sinner purgatory of sins, as was shown above? Wherefore the Lord precepted through Moses—Aaron and his sons saying: "Thus shall you bless the children of Israel, and you shall say to them: The Lord bless thee, and keep thee. The Lord shew His face to thee, and have mercy on thee. The Lord turn His countenance to thee, and give thee peace. And they shall invoke my name upon the children of Israel, and I will bless them" [Num. 6:23-27]. "I," He says—namely, "alone—will bless them"—that is, the effect of blessing, namely grace, or increase of grace intrinsically I will give them.

Nor does God always at the absolution of the Priest bestow grace, or dismiss sins. For these holders of the heavenly keys can sometimes go astray, by binding—putatively and according to their judgment—some who according to truth and the judgment of God are loosed from the chain of sin, and similarly by loosing some who are truly bound. Wherefore Origen, as Peter recites him in 4 Sentences, distinction 18, says thus: "Someone goes out from charity, from faith, from truth; through this he goes out from the camps of the Church, even if he is not cast out by the voice of the Bishop—just as conversely: someone is cast out by an unright judgment, but if he has not done that he should merit to go out, he is not in the least harmed. For sometimes he who is cast out is within, and he who is outside seems to be retained within"—which Jerome, as alleged above, also plainly attests. Wherefore Peter in 4 Sentences, distinction 16, having recited Jerome's saying, immediately subjoins: "Openly here it is shown that God does not follow the judgment of the Church, which sometimes through surreption and through ignorance judges. But God always judges according to truth, both in remitting and in retaining faults." With which in agreement Innocent III, Extra, Sentence of Excommunication, A nobis saepe quaesitum: "The judgment of God," he says, "always rests on the truth, which neither deceives nor is deceived; but the judgment of the Church sometimes follows opinion, which often it happens to deceive and to be deceived; on which account, it sometimes happens that he who is bound before God is loosed before the Church, and he who is free before God is bound by an Ecclesiastical sentence." Which can also be drawn from below, the same, Inquisitioni tuae; and above, On the Restitution of the Despoiled, Literas. Where it is plainly handed down: that if one of the spouses, after marriage celebrated, surely apprehends a legitimate impediment which he cannot however prove, by reason of which they cannot without mortal sin be carnally joined—however much at the instance of the other spouse he be by Ecclesiastical censures judicially compelled to render the carnal debt—he ought in no way [to do] this, but rather, throughout the whole time of his life, humbly to sustain the sentence of excommunication.

The fourth sect seems to be founded on that common saying alleged above: "Sin is not dismissed unless what was taken is restored," and many similar things there similarly placed give it suffrage. Wherefore Pope Leo, as alleged in On Penitence, distinction 1, and in 4 Sentences of Peter, distinction 17: "Christ," he says, "delivered to the prelates of the Church this power, that to those confessing they should give satisfaction of penitence, and admit the same purged by saving satisfaction to the communion of the Sacraments through the door of reconciliation." Wherefore also Raphael in Tobit 12: "Almsgiving," he says, "delivers from death, and the same is what purgeth away sins, and maketh to find mercy and life everlasting" [Tob. 12:9]. Whence also Proverbs 15: "By mercy and faith sins are purged" [Prov. 15:27]; and the Saviour, Luke 11: "Give alms, and behold all things are clean unto you" [Luke 11:41]. With which many similar things, of fasting, and prayer, and the like occur often in the Scriptures.

This [sect] can also be similarly corrected, as the others have been corrected. From the preceding [matters] it is plain that the alms or any works of someone are not dear, pleasing, and acceptable to God so long as he is in mortal sin outside of charity and grace—not dear, not pleasing, nor accepted by Him. Whence Proverbs 15: "The victims of the wicked are abominable to the Lord: the vows of the just are acceptable" [Prov. 15:8]; and Ecclesiasticus 34: "The Most High approveth not the gifts of the wicked, neither hath He respect to the offerings of the unjust, nor will He be pacified for sins by the multitude of their sacrifices" [Sir. 34:23]. And Isaiah 1: "Offer sacrifice no more in vain," says the Lord; "incense is an abomination to me. The new moon and the sabbaths and other festivals I will not abide. Your assemblies are wicked. My soul hateth your new moons, and your solemnities: they are become troublesome to me, I am weary of bearing them. And when you stretch forth your hands, I will turn away my eyes from you: and when you multiply prayer, I will not hear: for your hands are full of blood" [Isa. 1:13-15]. Wherefore Genesis 4: "The Lord had respect to Abel, and to his offerings" [Gen. 4:4]: "to Abel," he says—namely, to the offerer or giver first; "and to his offerings," second; and on account of the giver, to the offerings—not the contrary.

Whence blessed Gregory, Moralia 22.11, on that of Job 31: "My door was open to the traveller" [Job 31:32]: "By the omnipotent God," he says, "a gift is not received from a hand, which from a heart bound in malice is brought forth. For first the soul who gives alms ought to be cleansed, since whatever is given to God is weighed by the mind of the giver. Therefore every spot of malice from our interior man must be wiped off by change of thought, since the offering does not know how to placate the wrath of the Judge, unless it pleases by the cleanness of the offerer. Whence it is written: God had respect to Abel, and to his offerings; but to Cain and his offerings He had no respect [Gen. 4:4-5]. For sacred speech does not say 'He had respect to the offerings of Abel and to the offerings of Cain He had no respect,' but first says that He had respect to Abel, and then adds 'and to his offerings'; and again says, 'He had no respect to Cain,' and then adds, 'nor to his offerings.' For from the giver's heart what is given is received. Therefore not Abel from his offerings, but the offerings offered from Abel were pleasing. For first the Lord is read to have had respect to Him who gave, before to those things which he gave."

Who also, as Gratian recites in question 14, 5, Scriptum, says thus: "It is written, 'The victims of the wicked are abominable to God, and the vows of the just are acceptable.' For neither in the judgment of God is it inspected what is given, but by whom. Hence it is that it is written: 'God had respect to Abel, and to his offerings; but to Cain and his offerings He had no respect.' For about to say that the Lord had respect to the offerings, he carefully premised that He had respect to Abel; from which thing it is patently shown that not the offerer was pleasing from the offerings, but the offerings from the offerer. For 'the gifts of the wicked the Most High doth not approve, nor doth He have respect to their offerings, nor will He be pacified for sins by the multitude of their sacrifices.'"

Likewise Augustine, On True and False Penitence 14: "Let the penitent," he says, "offer to God his mind and contrition of heart, then also what he can of his possession; then let what he offers, he offer secure. The Lord had respect to Abel, and to his offerings—but he says first 'to Abel' than 'to his offerings.' For taking up the mind, which He knew humble and pure, He rewarded the gifts of his liberality." The same in Enchiridion 59: "He who," he says, "wishes to give alms in order, ought to begin with himself, and give them first to himself, and cleanse his interiors—as elsewhere it is read: 'Cleanse those things which are within, and those which are without will be clean' [Matt. 23:26]. Of these alms admonishing, the Lord says: 'But yet that which remaineth, give alms; and behold, all things are clean unto you' [Luke 11:41]." Whom also Peter in 4 Sentences, distinction 15, sententially reciting: "By these alms which a man owes first to himself, the interiors are cleansed, to which Christ exhorts saying: 'Cleanse those things which are within'; for to the unclean nothing is clean, but their mind and conscience are polluted." Of fasting, of prayer, and similar things, by similar reasoning is similarly to be judged.

The fifth sect protects itself by this: that some penitence is remissive of sin (as had been alleged at the beginning), and what [could be] more worthily exercised in the Church than that pleasing penitence which proceeds from grace, and is the most saving sacrament? Wherefore Peter in 4 Sentences, distinction 1, defining a sacrament, says: "A sacrament is properly so called which is so a sign of God's grace and a form of invisible grace that it bears its image and exists as the cause." Augustine says, as alleged in 4 Sentences of Peter, distinction 17, and in On Penitence, distinction 1: "Do penance such as is done in the Church. Let no one say to himself: 'I do it secretly, before God I do it; God knows who pardons me, since I do it in heart.' Therefore Whatsoever you shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven [Matt. 18:18] was said in vain? Therefore the keys of the Church were given in vain? We frustrate also the word of Christ." Wherefore also Peter in 4 Sentences, distinction 14, says that "exterior penitence is a Sacrament and the cause of salvation and justification," as was more fully alleged above. If also penitence is a sacrament, it is a sign of a sacred thing—for thus a sacrament is commonly defined; and it can be had from Augustine, On the City of God 10.11, and Peter recites in 4 Sentences, distinction 1. But what could it more holily designate than the sanctification of a profane sinner and the emendation of sin? Otherwise also it seems that the whole sacramental penitence would be superfluous, or at least some part of it.

The fifth sect's vices, however, can also restrain the others. Who doubts that a penitent, before the whole penitence is performed, is cleansed from sin as to fault—that is, from the spot of sin—although not absolved from the debt of punishment? What otherwise would be done concerning one duly repenting, confessing, undertaking penitence, and beginning and continuing it duly, but dying before the penitence has been performed in full? Who would not know that such a one passes to the purgatorial fire? If however he were to die in mortal sin, he would descend to hell, where there is only the punishing, not the purging, of sins. What also is to be felt of those who repent late, in the article of death, in the last breath and gasp of life, and do not perfect the due penitence in the present? Do they pass with their mortal sins? Far be it, far be it. He sins mortally who says this, as no Christian doubts. Who also is unaware that a Priest performing a long penitence for a mortal sin can lawfully celebrate Mass before the penitence is consummated? And who doubts that no one in mortal sin can lawfully celebrate?

On account of these and similar foretasted things, therefore, the last opinion seems to me to be true, and that grace immediately precedes justification—with no act of the one being justified, namely, mediating temporally or naturally; that justification of the unjust likewise precedes naturally his just acts and works; that, moreover, in every adult [whose] justification [is being effected], certain just acts—namely, dilection and contrition—always in fact naturally consequent and inseparably accompany the justification.

Furthermore, according to the premises of chapters 23 and 25 of this work, I believe that God interiorly—as far, namely, as to the act or intrinsic affection of the will—altogether equally, equally gratuitously, equally dearly, has loved, loves, and will love anyone to be justified, or one justified, e.g. Paul, before his conversion, in it, and after it. I believe also, according to the premises of many chapters, that this eternal dilection of God is purely gratuitous, since prevented by no merits of the creature. Wherefore consequently, that I may be in nothing ungrateful to the most welcome and most ample grace of my most liberal and magnificent Lord God; but that I may render full grace to Him for all things which He has bestowed on me gratuitously, at least by acknowledging in general His benefits according to the things shown above, against the premised opinions:

I confess to my God: just as eternally and gratuitously He has loved me, and eternally has disposed to confer on me gratuitously the justifying grace, in time pleasing before Him; so, when the time pleasing comes, [He has disposed] to infuse gratuitously the justifying grace into me unjust, to justify me gratuitously, to wash my injustices gratuitously, to raise up and to heal me gratuitously, to dismiss to me gratuitously the debt of eternal punishment, and to turn it into temporal punishment gratuitously, to make me a son of the kingdom gratuitously—and this Himself, not me; through Himself and through His grace, not through me, but in me and concerning me, [to do this] purely gratuitously.

Further, however, according to the Corollary of chapter 41 of this work: through Himself and through His grace gratuitously infused into me, and through me at the same time and in me, consequently in nature and inseparably from those gratuitous benefits memorialized, [He has disposed] gratuitously to make me myself gratuitously to love God and to repent of all offenses. Eia, then: "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me His holy Name. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all His benefits" [Ps. 102:1-2].

This also the holy Church of God seems to testify, thus chanting: "From above the Lamb is sent to release gratuitously the debt; let us all give voice with tears for indulgence." "To release," she says, "gratuitously, not for any preceding merit—the debt of mortal fault and of due eternal punishment." Wherefore she well subjoins: "Let us all give voice with tears for the indulgence"—namely, of fault and of the aforesaid punishment, and naturally previously made—the voice, namely, the interior of dilection, with tears, that is, with the bitterness of contrition, and the act of penitence consequently. This also the Lord, foretelling through Isaiah 45, says concerning Cyrus under the type of Christ: "He shall send away My captivity, not for price nor for gifts" [Isa. 45:13].

Wherefore Peter in 4 Sentences, distinction 18, says: "Just as God retained for Himself the power of baptism, so also of penitence; and therefore, just as He interiorly illuminates the soul by His grace, so also at the same time He relaxes the debt of eternal death. For He through Himself covers the sins of penitents, and then covers them when He does not reserve them for punishment. Then therefore He covers when He looses the debt of eternal punishment. That He covers, however, Augustine openly says, expounding that place of the Psalm: 'Blessed are they whose sins are covered'—that is, covered up and forgotten. For if God has covered the sins, He did not wish to advert [to them]; and if He did not wish to advert, He did not wish to animadvert—that is, to punish, but to ignore. So therefore he says them covered by God, that God may not see, that is, that He may not eternally punish. For God's seeing sins is to impute to punishment; but to turn the face from sins, this is not to reserve them to punishment.

"Likewise Jerome: Those whose sins God dismisses, He covers, that they may not be revealed in judgment. Likewise Cassiodorus: Those who have grave sins, to some God imputes [them], to some through mercy He does not impute [them].

"From these things openly is shown that God Himself looses the penitent from the debt of punishment, and looses [him] then, when He inwardly illuminates by inspiring true contrition of the heart"—namely, habitual, that is, the habit of charity or of grace effective of contrition, and at the same time then effecting it. Wherefore he immediately subjoins: "To which sentence reason gives suffrage, and authorities attest. For no one is truly compunct concerning sin, having a contrite and humbled heart, except in charity; he who has charity, however, is worthy of life; but no one is at the same time worthy of life and of death; therefore he is not then bound by the debt of eternal death. For he ceases to be a son of wrath from the time he begins to love and to repent"—from which, I say, he begins to love and repent habitually, that is, from which he received charity, which is the habit of dilection and penitence effective—and then at the same time effecting this and that. And he hints here at the reason against the proximate prior opinion. Wherefore immediately after he adds: "From then, therefore, he is loosed from wrath, which does not abide upon him who believes in Christ, but upon him who does not believe."

This, however, cannot be understood except concerning believing habitually, namely, of having faith—as small children baptized believe, and adults sleeping who do not have the act of faith; where also he immediately infers: "Not therefore afterwards through the Priest to whom he confesses is he freed from eternal wrath, from which he is already freed through the Lord, from when he said 'I will confess'—namely, from which instant of time, he proposed to confess, or from which instant of nature he said habitually 'I will confess,' that is, he received charity or grace, which is the habit of so saying.

Similarly also it can be shown that, the habit of charity received, he is not first naturally through the act of penitence freed from wrath and from the debt of eternal punishment, from which he was first naturally freed through that habit, as was more fully deduced above against the proximate opinion. Wherefore he subjoins, finally concluding: "God alone therefore interiorly cleanses man from the spot of sin, and looses [him] from the debt of eternal punishment, who through the Prophet says: 'I alone blot out the iniquities and sins of the people.'"

In the justification, however, of an adult sinner, although he is justified through the habit of charity or grace antecedent naturally to the act of dilection or saving penitence, nevertheless an act of this kind, according to the law established in the one being justified, is required concomitantly—as a certain gratuitous consequent from such welcome antecedent, and as it were a certain holy fruit proceeding from a tree before dead, sterile, and accursed, but now vivified, made fruitful, and sanctified; as also a certain spontaneous conversion of the sinner to God, who by sinning had spontaneously turned himself away from Him; as also a certain spontaneous sadness of the sinner in his reconciliation to God, whom previously by spontaneous delectation he had offended.

Wherefore Jeremiah 31, in the person of the converted sinner, thus says: "Convert me, and I shall be converted, for Thou art the Lord my God. For after Thou didst convert me, I did penance" [Jer. 31:18-19]. And Lamentations [last]: "Convert us, O Lord, to Thee, and we shall be converted" [Lam. 5:21]—which the Gloss above alleged lucidly attests. Wherefore Augustine in On the Words of the Apostle, sermon 15: "Without thee," he says, "God made thee. For thou didst not bring forth any consent that God should make thee. How didst thou consent, who wast not? He, therefore, who made thee without thee, does not justify thee without thee. Therefore He made thee unwilling, [and] He justifies thee willing—however Himself He justifies, lest there be a justice of thine."

With which in agreement Bernard, On Grace and Free Will 24: "Those who rightly understand," he says, "confess a triple operation, not indeed of free will, but of divine grace in it, or concerning it: the first, creation; the second, reformation; the third is consummation. Since therefore consummation has to be made of us or also in us, but not by us; creation, however, was made even without us; only reformation, which is with us in some way on account of our voluntary consent, will be reputed unto merit for us. Reformation itself: our fasts, vigils, continence, works of mercy, and other exercises of virtues, through which surely it is brought about that our interior man is renewed from day to day; while intention, bowed down by earthly cares, gradually rises again from the depths to the supernal; and affection, languishing around the desires of the flesh, gradually convalesces in love of the spirit; and memory, sordid with the turpitude of the old men, made bright by new and good acts, daily grows resplendent. In these three, therefore, interior renovation consists: namely, in rectitude of intention, purity of affection, and recollection of good operation, by which a memory well conscious of itself is enlightened. But these things, since it is certain that they are stirred up in us by the divine Spirit, are God's gifts; while however with the assent of our will, they are our merits. 'For it is not you that speak, but the Spirit of your Father, that speaketh in you' [Matt. 10:20]."

Augustine also, On Penitence 2: "Everyone," he says, "who is now constituted arbiter of his own will, when he comes to the Sacrament of the faithful, unless penitence for the old life [has been done] cannot begin a new one, [except] from this penitence when he is baptized. Only the small children are immune. For they cannot yet use free will: for whom for the consecration and remission of original sin the faith of those by whom they are offered avails, that whatever spots of delicts they have contracted through others—from whom they were born—even by the interrogation and response of others may be purged. Of other men, none crosses over to Christ that he may begin to be what he was not, unless it repents him to have been what he was. This first penitence is enjoined upon the Jews when Peter the Apostle says, 'Do penance, and let every one of you be baptized'" [Acts 2:38].

Who also in On True and False Penitence 10: "He who has sinned through himself," he says, "obtained indulgence by his own sorrow, [and] through the faith of the Church—just as through baptism—it makes man clean and new, so that nothing remains which displeases God; without penitence baptism profits no one who has sinned spontaneously." And above 2: "He who is converted necessarily sorrows that he has what he rejoices to lose."

The faith of the universal Church holds also constantly that voluntary sins in adults are by no means remitted without penitence—and they are not remitted through an act of penitence causally and naturally preceding justifying grace, or the remission of mortal sins as to fault, as has been shown above. Therefore they are remitted with the act of penitence consequent on grace and remission of this kind, just as also the precedents make manifest.

Thomas Bradwardine, De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium

Book I — Corollary to Chapter 43, through Chapter 45 and its Corollary

COROLLARY [to Chapter 43]

Corollary: that that is prior according to nature, or naturally prior to another, which is the cause of it; that something from which a consequence of subsisting holds to another, and not the converse, is prior to it according to nature. Hence also that not everything from which a consequence of subsisting is not converted is prior according to nature, but [is so] according to superiority or universality, according to consequence, or according to any other such mode; that not whatever is prior to another according to nature can exist without it, nor again whatever can exist without another, and not the converse, is prior to that according to nature, but according to some other mode so called — unless perhaps "prior according to nature" be said equivocally in three modes.

From these things certain sparks of truth, of no small utility to logicians, philosophers, theologians, and all lovers of truth, shine forth: namely, that that is prior according to nature, or naturally prior to another, which is its cause — which seems to need to be understood of efficient, material, and formal cause, although in different special modes. Of the final cause, however, it does not so seem; rather the opposite seems more so, namely that it is naturally posterior to the action or thing of which it is the final cause. Item, that something from which a consequence of subsisting holds to another, and not the converse, is prior to it according to nature; hence also, that not everything from which the consequence of subsisting is not converted is prior according to nature, but according to superiority, or universality, according to non-consequence, or according to any other such mode. Item, that not whatever is prior to another according to nature can exist without it, nor again whatever can exist without another, and not the converse, is prior to it according to nature, but according to some other mode now mentioned — unless perhaps "prior according to nature" be said equivocally in many modes.

The first part of this is clear from what has been said before, and because it is useful in doctrine and is hardly doubted by anyone, it was fitting to mention it rather than to prove it. For Logic, natural science, and divine [science] alike attest to it, which Theology and theologians also attest, of whose abundance, for the sake of testimony, I shall take a few. The Philosopher, indeed, in the Categories, having posited four modes of "prior," subjoins: "It seems, however, that besides those that have been mentioned there is another mode of 'prior'. For of those things which are converted according to the consequence of existence, that which is in any way the cause of the other is rightly called prior in nature. That there are some such things is plain. For 'a man exists' is converted according to the consequence of existence with the true statement about him. For if a man exists, the statement is true by which it is said that a man exists; and if the statement is true by which it is said that a man exists, then it follows that a man exists. But the true statement is in no way the cause that the thing exists, yet the thing in some way seems to be the cause that the statement is true. For while the thing exists or does not exist, the statement must be called either true or false; and so according to five modes one is said to be prior to another."

Who, also, in natural science or in metaphysical wisdom, doubts that causes are prior to and superior in nature to their effects — for example, the simple to the composite, the generator to the generated, the agent to that which is acted upon, and universally that which moves to that which is moved? For how otherwise would they demonstrate God to be the first and supreme of all things according to nature? Which theologian, too, does not know that God truly and really preceded the world and time — yet not temporally, nor according to any successive and long, true, and real duration, but only according to cause and nature, as is shown in the prior matters in the 34th part of the first corollary of this [Book]? The same Boethius attests, in the fifth book of On the Consolation of Philosophy, the last prose; Augustine, Confessions 12, [chapter] 28, as the same part alleges; and Anselm, On Truth, [chapter] 12, as is plain in the 39th [chapter]. How many testimonies also, in the 35th and on this side, copiously set forth above, show that grace precedes our good works — which must be understood not temporally but causally and naturally? Hence also Peter [Lombard], in the second book of Sentences, distinction 26, says: "Faith precedes the good will, not in time but in cause and nature." Who, moreover, will deny that God is the first of causes, and that He acts prior in causality, and therefore prior in nature, in the common action — as the artificer with respect to his instrument — as is also clear from the proximate [chapter] of this [Book]? The remaining particles of this first part will easily appear through these and the like.

The first particle of the second part follows evidently from this first one. For it follows: "God raises this man up spiritually or bodily; therefore he lives correspondingly," and not the converse. "This man lives spiritually or bodily; therefore God raises him up so or so" — for since he has been continuously alive for a long time, the antecedent will be true, and the consequent plainly false, since God by no means continually raises one already alive, but raised him up in a single instant. Some also live naturally whom God does not naturally raise up, nor has He naturally raised them up — such as those who were never naturally dead. Some also live spiritually whom God neither so raises up nor has raised up — such as the holy Angels, Christ, and perhaps the Mother of Christ. God too lives, who was never raised up. Hence to "this living" it does not at all follow that God raises this man up, but rather the converse. Let it then be supposed that God now raises spiritually this man, who was previously spiritually dead, by inspiring the life of grace; then it follows excellently: "God raises him up; therefore he is alive," and not the converse, as has been shown above. And yet that God raises him up is prior according to nature to his being alive: for it is the cause of it; for, because God raises him up, therefore he is alive, and not the converse. Similarly, it follows excellently: "God wills now to raise this man up; therefore he is alive," by the tenth [chapter] of this [Book], and not the converse, as the preceding things make manifest. And yet that God wills now to raise this man up is prior in nature to this man's being alive: for it is the [cause] of it, the efficient cause. Similarly, it follows excellently: "God creates this, or wills to create this now; therefore this is," and not the converse — for He does not continually create things created, but conserves [them]; and yet this is prior to that in nature, because it is the cause of it. Similarly, it follows excellently: "This man has grace; therefore he is clean from mortal sin," and not the converse. For someone could be clean from mortal sin and not have grace — as perhaps, according to some, was the case with the first parents before the fall, for some little while, that they had neither grace nor fault, or at least could so have been; and yet to have grace is prior in nature, because it is the cause of it: for grace purges mortal sins, as has been shown above. The second particle of this second [part] follows most clearly from this first one; and these things being plain, the third is sufficiently plain.

It is perhaps objected that the Philosopher, in the Categories, when laying down the modes of "prior," in assigning the second mode, says that that is prior according to nature from which the consequence of subsisting is not converted. It is not so. For the Philosopher says that that is prior which is not converted according to the consequence of subsisting, and from which there is no conversion in that which is consequence; he does not, however, say that that is prior according to nature, but rather says the contrary. For he says that there are five modes of "prior," as was recited above — namely, according to time, non-conversion of consequence, order, honor, and according to nature; whereas, if the second were the same as the fifth, there would be only four modes.

The first particle of the third part of the foresaid corollary follows evidently from the first particle of the second part of it. For according to that, something is prior to another according to nature, from which to that other a consequence of subsisting holds; therefore it cannot subsist without it. Which can also be otherwise demonstrated. For God's willing to grace the ungraced, to justify the unjust, to give him grace and justice, to make him gracious and just, is naturally prior — because causally — to his being gracious and just, as the prior matters have taught. God's also willing created grace to be, or any creature whatever, and creating it, is prior in nature to its being, because the cause of it, as the ninth [chapter] of this [Book] shows; and yet these cannot be without those, as the tenth [chapter] of this [Book] proves, and the mutual relation makes manifest. To give is also prior in nature to receiving, to act than to be acted upon, to move than to be moved, and yet they cannot be separated. Similarly, to receive grace and to have it is naturally — because causally — prior to sins being effaced, as was shown above; just as it is naturally — because causally — prior for the air to receive light and to have it, than to put darkness to flight; and just as it is prior that the Sun be, than that it shine within or without, the requisite disposition in every way being supposed. Which also seems to be universally true of all those things which some proper passion or proper [property], some action or some effect, necessarily and inseparably follows.

But if anyone object that this is one most common rule and general maxim, "Whatever is prior to another according to nature can exist without it" — it seems to me that [this is] not [so]; nor does any reason or authority occur to me on which it could be securely founded so generally understood. Yet it could be verified with some exceptions, like the rules of the jurists, by excepting, namely, the cases just touched upon, and others as is fitting. The second particle of this third [part] follows evidently from the second particle of the second [part]. The opposite, however, Plato, Aristotle, and Averroes — those famous philosophers — seem to think. For Aristotle in the fifth [book] of the Metaphysics, [chapter] 16, having posited many modes by which some things are called prior and posterior, subjoins: "Other things [are prior] according to nature and substance — those which can exist without others, and those [others] not without them" — by which definition Plato made use, with which Averroes also concurs in the commentary. It can be said that this is to be understood according to popular reputation rather than according to truth, and according to Plato's opinion; or otherwise, that it can be understood as another similar rule already premised. The third particle of this third part will easily be shown through the third particle of the second.

But also it can be otherwise said, that many speak equivocally concerning the priority of nature. For some, speaking more properly and profoundly, call that "prior according to nature" which is so according to causality, as in the first particle of the first part of the foresaid corollary; others, however, more famously and customarily than truly, [call it so] according to non-conversion of consequence, or according to consequence; others again according to the possibility of being without another, [the converse] not [holding], as appears from the things premised. Others further call that "prior according to nature" which is prior intended by nature, and so the whole is said to be prior to the part, and the end to that which is for the end. Whence the Philosopher, in Politics 1, [chapter] 1, says that the city is prior in nature to the household and to each individual. Further, "prior according to nature" can not improbably be called "more perfect according to nature." These [distinctions] disentangle, free, and preserve [people] from many traps of sophists, from many snares of Pelagians, from many many people's nooses, in this matter and many others.

But that all the pestiferous arrows prepared in the Pelagians' quiver may more easily be blunted, it must further be observed that "penitence" is taken in two ways, as also "to repent," as also "to believe," and many similar things. For such words sometimes signify an action or act, sometimes a habit or aptitude for acting. They properly and most usually signify the action or act; but transumptively, according to that metaphor and species of trope by which the name of an effect is sometimes transferred to its cause, they signify the habit productive of such an action, or the aptitude for acting. And this is a sufficiently frequent manner of speaking, both among ordinary people and among those skilled in the various sciences. For we commonly say — and authors say similarly — "the eagle sees sharply," "the horse runs swiftly," "man laughs," "the dog barks," and so of others — even though they are altogether asleep or at rest — meaning not the act but the habit or aptitude. This is found very often in the books On the History of Animals. Hence also the Philosopher in Ethics 2, [chapter] 6, defining virtue and showing the definition of it, says: "It must be said that every virtue, of whatever it is the virtue, both perfects that which has it well, and renders its work well — for example, the virtue of the eye both makes the eye excellent and renders its work [well]: for by the virtue of the eye we see well; similarly the virtue of the horse both makes the horse excellent and good for running and bearing the rider, and for awaiting warriors. If indeed it is so in all things, then the virtue of man too will be a habit from which a good man is made, and from which he renders his work well." With which the Apostle concords: "Charity is patient, is kind, suffers all things, etc." (1 Corinthians 13). Hence also Augustine, On the Good of Marriage, [chapter] 37 and after, in many chapters, teaches diffusely that continence, patience, and the like — which properly sound forth as acts — are sometimes and among some people in operation or in use, sometimes, however, and among some, in habit, not in act.

So also Truth itself speaks, saying, "He who has believed and has been baptized shall be saved; but he who has not believed shall be condemned" (Mark 16) — which seems to be understood of believing habitually, that is, of having faith, that is, of having the habit of faith — on account of baptized infants, who do not believe actually but only habitually, that is, do not have the act of faith but only the habit, nor are they damned. Hence also Innocent III, writing to the Bishop of Arles, as is recited in the Extra, On Baptism and Its Effect, Maiores, recites approvingly that some concede that infants believe, not by use but by the habit of faith which we receive in baptism, just as also many other words, according to the common usage of speaking, are referred not to act but to aptitude. With which Augustine concordantly, as is alleged in On Consecration, distinction 4, Quis autem: "Who," he says, "is ignorant that to believe is in infants to be baptized? But not to believe, is not to be baptized?" The same, in Epistle 14 to Boniface inquiring, when it is asked of a baptized infant whether he believes in God, and it is answered that he believes — whether this is to be taken as for then or for the future, namely that he will believe at a greater age — replying, says thus: "To believe is nothing else than to have faith. Therefore, when it is replied that the infant believes, who as yet has no affection of faith, it is replied that he has faith on account of the sacrament of faith, and turns himself to God on account of the sacrament of conversion." And concerning other responses given on behalf of the infant, and concerning his other works, he is of the same mind. Nor is it strange if the name of an act be transferred to a habit, since sometimes a similar transfer is made conversely, as is plain from the 39th [chapter].

It is plain therefore from the things premised, by the place from the like, that "to repent" and "penitence," "to be contrite" and "contrition," and the like, sometimes signify the act or use, sometimes signify the habit effective of such an act or use, and the [habit] actually causing it — namely the habit of charity and grace given gratuitously to the sinner, whence well, justly, and meritoriously he loves God gratuitously, and on account of Him repents of sins. Hence also Peter [Lombard], in Sentences 4, distinction 14, says: "To strip and emend souls steeped in vices is the work of perfect virtue and heavenly grace; and therefore penitence can be soundly defined thus: Penitence is the virtue or grace by which, with the purpose of emendation, we lament and hate the evils we have committed, and are unwilling to commit further things to be lamented." Therefore the very many authorities asserting that penitence effaces sins, heals infirmities, raises the dead, and the like — and that these things are done through penitence — can, according to the things premised, be conveniently understood of the foresaid habitual penitence, which is the cause of actual penitence. Hence also the Gloss on the beginning of the distinction On Penitence, [responding] to the contrary opinion alleged above, says: "The remission of sins precedes contrition of heart. For no one can truly be contrite unless he first has faith working through love. Therefore sins are said to be remitted through contrition — that is, through that which causes contrition of heart, that is, through charity."

Furthermore, actual penitence is partly formed, partly unformed; partly meritorious, partly preparatory. Of unformed penitence it is said in Wisdom 5: "Then those repenting will say within themselves, etc."; and Matthew 27: "Then Judas, led by penitence, returned the thirty pieces of silver, etc." — to which many similar [passages] occur in Scripture. But formed and meritorious actual penitence is that which proceeds from charity and grace, and is formed [thereby]. Unformed and preparatory penitence is a certain sorrow for sin, from fear of punishment, from fear of inconvenience, from servile fear, temporally preceding grace, and preparing the sinner for the remission of sin, for the working of good, and for the reception of grace and saving penitence — as was taught in the 37th [chapter]. Such penitence, always or for the most part — as I believe — precedes grace, justification, and true penitence in adults. Of this kind also is every displeasure, horror, abomination, detestation, and disapproval of sins which precedes justifying grace and true penitence.

Such penitence is commonly born from fear of the punishment of hell, from fear of inconvenience, from servile fear. Hence also the Lord impresses this fear, as useful to sinners, even by reduplication, saying: "Fear Him who can destroy both body and soul in Gehenna" (Matthew 10 and Luke 12); "Fear Him who, after He has killed, has the power to send into Gehenna; yes, I say to you, fear Him." Hence Proverbs 15: "By the fear of the Lord everyone turns aside from evil." And above, [chapter] 1: "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." Which Bede, expounding, as Peter [Lombard] alleges in Sentences 3, distinction 34, says: "There are two fears of the Lord, the servile, which is the beginning of wisdom, and the friendly, which accompanies the perfection of wisdom. The servile is the beginning of wisdom because he who, after his errors, begins to grow wise is first seized by divine fear lest he be punished; but perfect charity casts this out. There succeeds to it the holy fear of the Lord, which abides forever." Blessed Augustine, too, expounding that of Psalm 127, "Blessed are all who fear the Lord," speaking of this twofold fear — of which one is chaste and abides forever, and the other is excluded by charity — says thus: "Some, on this account only, fear lest they suffer some evil on earth, lest sickness befall them, lest loss, lest bereavement, lest the loss of someone dear, lest exile, lest the condemnation of prison, lest some tribulation — on this account they fear and tremble; this fear is not yet chaste. Hear further: another does not fear to suffer on this earth, but fears Gehenna. Hence the Lord too has terrified [them]. You have heard, when the Gospel was read, where 'their worm does not die, and the fire is not extinguished.' Men hear these things, and because they are truly going to come upon the impious, they fear and contain themselves from sin — they fear, indeed, but do not love righteousness. But when, through fear, they contain themselves from sin, the custom of righteousness is formed; and that begins to be loved which was hard, and God grows sweet, and now man begins to live righteously on this account — not because he fears penalties, but because he loves eternity. Therefore fear is excluded by charity, but a chaste fear has succeeded. For what is the chaste fear? According to which, my brethren, we ought to understand what is said: 'Blessed are all who fear the Lord, who walk in His ways.'"

The same, expounding the First Epistle of John, in Homily 9, says: "Let fear begin, since the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. Fear, as it were, prepares a place for charity. But when charity has begun to dwell, the fear which prepared the place is driven out — for, as we see, when something is illumined, light is introduced through a bristle: the bristle enters first, which, unless it first goes out, the light does not succeed. So first fear occupies the mind, but the fear does not remain there which entered for this purpose, that it might introduce charity."

Therefore the authorities which seem to assert that penitence precedes and produces justification and the purgation of sins can be understood of unformed and preparatory penitence — which does these things because it moves and excites, disposes and prepares, that they may be done. All these things, and things like these — for example, "whence the principle of change," conciliator, physician, and universally everything that changes — are reduced to the third species of cause, which is commonly called efficient, as the Philosopher in Physics 2, [chapters] 29 and 31, and Metaphysics 5, [chapter] 2, makes manifest.

Such, it seems, was the baptism of penitence which John preached for the remission of sins, as is recited in Luke 3. Concerning which word Chrysostom — as is recited in the Gloss, and was partly objected by the Pelagians above — says thus: "Since the sacrifice was not yet offered, nor the Spirit descended, how was remission to be wrought? What then is it that Luke says, 'for the remission of sins'? Indeed, the Jews were ignorant, nor did they ponder their own faults. Since therefore this was the cause of evils, [John came] that they might recognize their sins so as to seek a Redeemer; John came exhorting them to do penance, that, made better and contrite by penance, they might strive to receive pardon. Aptly, then, when he had said that he came preaching the baptism of penitence, he added, 'for the remission of sins,' as if to say, 'For this reason he was urging them to repent, that they might more easily obtain the subsequent pardon, by believing in Christ. For unless they were led by penitence, they would by no means seek grace.' Hence that baptism had no other cause than that it was preparatory to faith in Christ." The same blessed Gregory holds, and other Catholic teachers. Hence Peter [Lombard], in Sentences 4, distinction 2, says: "John foreshadowed Christ's baptism by his own baptism — he who is read to have baptized first, but in water, not in the Spirit, as he himself says: 'I baptize you in water unto penitence.' He washed only their bodies, but did not cleanse them from sins. The baptism of John was unto penitence, not unto remission; the baptism of Christ unto remission. For John, baptizing, called men to penitence, and taught those whom he baptized to repent, according to that: 'They came to John in the Jordan, confessing their sins.' But in John's baptism the remission of sins was not given, which was given in Christ's baptism. To what end then, since it did not confer grace, was John's baptism useful? Because by the use of baptizing it prepared men for Christ's baptism."

Hence also similarly Augustine, on Psalm 110, "Confession and magnificence are His work," showing that such authorities are to be so understood, says: "What is more magnificent than to justify the impious? But perhaps the work of man precedes this magnificence of God, that, when he has confessed his sins, he may merit to be justified. For the publican came down from the temple justified rather than the Pharisee, because he did not dare to lift his eyes to heaven, but struck his breast saying, 'Lord, be merciful to me a sinner.' This is the magnificence of the Lord, the justification of the sinner — since 'he who humbles himself shall be exalted, and he who exalts himself shall be humbled.' This is the magnificence of the Lord, that to whom much is forgiven, he loves much. This is the magnificence of the Lord, that 'where sin abounded, grace also abounded the more.' But perhaps from works? 'Not,' he says, 'from works, lest perhaps anyone be exalted; for we are His workmanship, created in Christ in good works.' For man does not work righteousness unless justified. But believing in Him who justifies the impious, he begins from faith, that good works may show — not preceding what he has merited, but following what he has received. Whence then that confession? It is not yet a work of righteousness, but the disapproval of the offense." Behold therefore, according to Augustine, that the confession of sin preceding the justification of the sinner is not a work of righteousness, but only the disapproval of the offense, the abomination and detestation of sins — which never existed without similar displeasure, sorrow, and penitence. But lest any of the Pelagians should dare to claim even this preparatory and unformed confession as his own, he immediately subjoins: "But neither in this, O man, glory in yourself, that he who glories may glory in the Lord. For what have you that you have not received? Therefore not magnificence alone, by which the impious is justified, but 'confession and magnificence is His work.' What then shall we say? 'Of whom He wills, He has mercy, and whom He wills, He hardens.' Is there iniquity with God? God forbid."

Actual formed and meritorious penitence's justifying the unjust and effacing sins can also be understood in two ways: namely, antecedently in nature, and concomitantly and subsequently according to the law established. Antecedently, namely so that it precede in nature justification and the effacement of sin — and this is false, as has been shown above. Concomitantly and subsequently, namely so that in every justification of an adult sinner, and effacement of his sin, according to the present law, such actual penitence inseparably accompanies and naturally follows — this is true, as has been shown above.

In this way blessed James the Apostle speaks in his epistle, chapter 2, where the Pelagians have alleged him above, saying that man is justified not by faith alone but also by extrinsic works — which are more properly called "works" because he is not justified without them, that is, he does not remain just by faith alone without works, when there is opportunity or necessity of working: because faith then without works dies, by the departure of charity, which is the life and form of Christian faith, which always — when there is need — works, as the things preceding both make manifest. Hence also, according to him, faith is consummated by works and preserved alive, and the just man is preserved. For he intends there principally to refute the heresy of certain ones — perhaps on occasion of that word of the Lord, "He who has believed and has been baptized shall be saved," or that saying of the Apostle alleged above, namely, "No one is justified by works" — those, that is, who say that every baptized person and every one who believes in Christ is just and to be saved even without any good works whatsoever.

Hence he says thus: "What will it profit, my brethren, if anyone say he has faith but does not have works? Can faith save him? But if a brother or sister be naked and need daily food, and one of you say to them, 'Go in peace, be warmed and filled,' but does not give them what is needful for the body, what will it profit? So also faith, if it has not works, is dead in itself. You believe that there is one God; you do well: the demons also believe and tremble. But would you know, O vain man, that faith without works is otiose, or, according to another reading, dead? Was not Abraham our father justified by works, offering Isaac his son upon the altar? You see that faith was cooperating with his works, and by works faith was consummated; and the Scripture was fulfilled, saying: 'Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned to him for righteousness, and he was called the friend of God.' You see that a man is justified by works, and not by faith alone."

But who, reading the history of Genesis, does not know that Abraham was just and the familiar friend of God before he offered his son, or rather wished to have offered him? Therefore he was not justified by that work antecedently, but only concomitantly and subsequently — namely, by that work following his faith and righteousness, which (when necessity required this) preserved him faithful and just in his faith and righteousness, which otherwise he would have lost by despising the Lord's command. Hence also Augustine, on Psalm 31, treatise 1, wishing to harmonize the saying of Paul to the Romans 4, "If Abraham was justified by works, he has glory, but not before God; for what does the Scripture say? 'Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned to him for righteousness'" — and the cited saying of James — by way of objection and response says thus: "'You see,' says the heretic, 'that Abraham was justified not by works but by faith. Therefore I shall do whatever I will, because even if I have no good works, but only believe in God, it shall be reckoned to me for righteousness.' I reply, then, as if against the Apostle, and I say of that same Abraham what we find also in the Epistle of another Apostle who was wishing to correct men who had ill understood this Apostle. For James in his Epistle, against those who refused to work well, presuming on faith alone, commended the work of Abraham, while Paul commended the faith. The Apostles are not at variance with each other. He speaks of a work known to all: Abraham offered his son to be sacrificed to God — a great work, but from faith. I praise the superedification of the work, but I see the foundation of faith; I praise the fruit of the good work, but I recognize in faith the root. But if Abraham did this without right faith, no work of any sort would profit him. Again, if Abraham so held faith that, when God commanded him to offer his son to be sacrificed, he should say within himself, 'I do not do it; yet I believe, because God liberates me even though I despise His commands' — faith without works would be dead, and like a sterile and dry root would remain without fruit. What then? Are we to set no works before faith, that is, that anyone be said to work well before faith? Therefore, brothers, Abraham was justified from faith; but if works did not precede faith, yet they followed. Will your faith be barren if you yourself are not barren? It itself is not barren — hold faith [intending] to work; for the same Apostle says: 'faith which works through love.'"

The same [Augustine], in On the Spirit and the Letter, [chapter] 20, harmonizing the saying of the Apostle alleged above by the Pelagians, "The doers of the law shall be justified" (Romans 2), with another of his sayings, "We reckon that a man is justified by faith without the works of the law" (Romans 3), says: "He would not say, contrary to himself, 'The doers of the law shall be justified,' as if they were justified by works, not by grace, since he says that man is justified freely by faith without the works of the law — wishing nothing else to be understood by 'freely' than that works do not precede justification. Plainly indeed elsewhere he says, 'If by grace, then no longer of works; otherwise grace is no longer grace.' But thus is it to be understood: 'The doers of the law shall be justified,' that we may know they are not otherwise doers of the law unless they be justified — not so that justification accedes to the doers, but so that justification precedes the doers. For what else is 'justified' than 'made just' — by Him, namely, who justifies the impious, that from impious he may be made just? For if we should so speak as to say, 'Men shall be liberated,' it would surely be understood that liberation accedes to those who already are men. But if we should say, 'Men shall be created,' it would surely not be understood that those are created who already were, but that by the very creation they become men. Likewise, if it had been said, 'The doers of the law shall be honored,' we should not rightly understand it except that the honor accedes to those who are already doers of the law. But when it is said, 'The doers of the law shall be justified,' what else is said than 'the just shall be justified'? For the doers of the law are surely just; and so this is just as much as if it were said, 'The doers of the law shall be created' — not who already were, but that they may be — so that the Jewish hearers of the law may also so understand that they need the grace of the Justifier, that they may be able to be doers."

Similarly also sins are said to be remitted by the confession of the mouth, as the second sect of the mediators showed — which yet cannot be understood antecedently in time or in nature: namely, so that the confession of the mouth precede in time or in nature the remission of mortal sins as to fault — as has also been shown against the same — but concomitantly and subsequently according to the law established, namely because, for the justification of the unjust and the conservation of righteousness, it is fitting according to the law of the Church, if there is opportunity, that confession of the mouth should follow; otherwise, on account of contempt, the sins return, which previously had been effaced in contrition and in the purpose of confessing — they return, I say, truly, or imputably, or with equal weight as to guilt, or even with overweight, on account of the aggravation of the new contempt added.

In this way also, similarly, sins are said to be remitted in adults by baptism. For what Catholic doubts that all sinners, great and small, are commonly baptized for the remission of sins, since baptism for the remission of sins was commonly instituted? For who does not profess the Council of Nicaea, which on behalf of the whole Church of Christ and each of His sons says, "I confess one baptism for the remission of sins"? Yet many adults, before the baptism of water or river, in the baptism of the Spirit by believing in Christ, and in the baptism of penitence, are cleansed from all sins, as was shown above against the second sect of the mediators. Therefore these are baptized for the remission of sins not antecedently, but subsequently in the modes foresaid.

Furthermore, that actual penitence justifies the unjust and effaces sins can also have a twofold understanding: namely effectively, or ostensibly, manifestatively, or even significantly. For actual penitence — and especially of the kind which is celebrated in the Church — shows, manifests, and is the sign that the penitent is justified, and that his sins are effaced. For thus we commonly and Catholicly say that sins are remitted by oral confession and by the power of the keys — namely, by the priest's absolution — as the second sect, and the third of the mediators, were demonstrating; which yet cannot be understood properly, effectively, as has been shown above against them, but manifestatively and significantly. For they manifest, and are signs in the forum of the Church, that sins are remitted to those who have confessed and been absolved according to the laws of the Church established. Hence also in On Penitence, distinction 1, after it has been validly proved that sins are remitted by grace before confession, it is subjoined: "Therefore confession is made for the showing of penitence, not for the obtaining of pardon; and just as circumcision was given to Abraham as a sign of righteousness, not as a cause of justification, so confession is offered to the priest as a sign of pardon already received, not as a cause of remission to be received." Hence also the Gloss on the beginning of that first distinction, after reciting the opinion saying that contrition of heart alone does not efface sins where the abundance of a priest is at hand, subjoins: "But whatever it [says], say that neither by contrition of heart nor by oral confession are sins remitted, but only by the grace of God; but contrition of heart itself is the sign that sins have been remitted, just as exterior satisfaction is the sign of contrition of heart."

With which Peter [Lombard], in Sentences 4, distinction 17, concords: "Confession is the witness of a conscience fearing God." With which also accords what was alleged above, that Christ commanded the cleansed leper to show himself to the priests and to offer for his cleansing — not as something to be obtained but as already had — what Moses commanded as a witness to them; he did not say "for efficacy," but "as a witness," and as a sign of the cleansing already attained. Hence also fittingly, in Leviticus 14, where the rite for cleansing the leper is given, it is commanded that the leper to be cleansed be brought to the priest, who, when he has found that the leprosy is cleansed, shall command him to offer this and that, that he who is clean may be lawfully purged. But how is one cleansed anew, or purged, whose leprosy has already first been cleansed and found cleansed — except because, having been cleansed, or being clean and purged, or pure, he is shown to be so by the judgment of the priest? For it is certain that the legal priests by no means miraculously and effectively cleansed the lepers, but only declared the previously cleansed, or the clean. This the words of the Law plainly express: "When," the foregoing law says, "the priest has found the leprosy cleansed, he shall do this and that." This manner of speaking is found above in the same [book], chapter 13, more expressly and more often, where the laws are given concerning him who appears, but is doubted, to be a leper — that he ought to be brought to the priest, and according to his judgment to be reckoned clean or unclean. There also, in the case where he will be judged clean, sometimes it says that "the priest will cleanse him," that is, will judge him clean; sometimes that "such a one will be cleansed," that is, will be judged clean — as is plain, and the Gloss attests. Hence also the text, expounding itself plainly enough in the foresaid case, sometimes says that "the priest will consider him, and will decree him to be clean," sometimes that "he shall pronounce him clean." Where also, in the case where one ought to be judged unclean, sometimes it says that "the priest will contaminate him" — that is, according to the Gloss, will judge him contaminated; and sometimes more expressly says that he will judge such a one to be held by leprosy; sometimes that he will be polluted by the priest's judgment, and reckoned among the unclean. Which the authority of blessed Jerome alleged against the third sect plainly attests.

Hence also Peter [Lombard], in Sentences 4, distinction 18, says: "God looses or binds in one way, the Church in another. For He alone of Himself so remits sin that He cleanses the soul from every interior stain and looses it from the debt of eternal death. He has not granted this to priests, to whom, however, He has given the power of binding and loosing — that is, of showing men to be bound and loosed. Hence the Lord first restored the leper to health Himself; then He sent him to the priests, by whose judgment he might be shown to be cleansed. So also Lazarus, already raised to life, He offered to the disciples to be loosed; for even if anyone is loosed before God, yet he is not held loosed in the face of the Church except by the priest's judgment. Therefore in loosing or retaining sins, the Evangelical priest so works and judges as the legal one once did in those who were contaminated by leprosy — which figures sin; and the Evangelical priests have the same right and office which the legal ones once had under the Law in curing lepers. They therefore remit or retain sins when they judge or show those remitted or retained by God."

Similarly Augustine speaks, in On the Spirit and the Letter, [chapter] 20, where, having posited one exposition of the Apostle's saying to the Romans, "The doers of the law shall be justified," recited above, subjoining a second, says thus: "Or rather it has been said thus, 'shall be justified,' as if it were said, 'They shall be held just; they shall be reputed just' — as it was said of someone, 'But he, wishing to justify himself,' that is, that he might be held and reputed just. Whence we say in one way, 'God sanctifies His saints,' and in another, 'Hallowed be Thy name.' The former, because He Himself makes those holy who were not holy. The latter, that what is always holy in itself may be held holy by men also — that is, holily feared." In a similar manner of speaking, then, it can not incongruously be said that contrition or actual penitence justifies the impious and effaces sins — namely ostensibly, manifestatively, or even significantly, although not properly effectively.

Furthermore, that actual penitence effaces sin can be understood either as to fault, or as to penalty, or the satisfaction owed or established. For who is ignorant that a sinner duly repenting and absolved from sin by the authority of the keys is bound by the same authority to penalty and satisfaction? Although therefore the sinner, by the infusion of grace, is immediately justified and purged from sin as to fault or stain, he yet remains obligated to temporal penalty, and to perform fitting satisfaction. But contrition and penitence interior and exterior — namely, confession, blushing, fasting, prayer, and almsgiving — is part of this penalty and satisfaction foresaid. Yet contrition and interior penitence could be so great, so vehement, so intense that it would suffice fully without any other extrinsic penitence or satisfaction to be made.

It can therefore be reasonably said that contrition and actual penitence justifies the unjust and effaces sins as to the discharge of the penalty and the satisfaction owed for sin. For the sinner is said to be justified and purged from sin by satisfaction and satisfactory works — for example, by fasting, by prayers, by alms, and the like — as the fourth sect of the mediators recites. Although yet it is certain that sin as to fault and stain has previously been remitted, as has been shown against the same; which therefore must be understood in the manner stated. Thus speaks the law — rather, the Lord in the law, in Leviticus 4 and 5, frequently saying: "If anyone has sinned in this way or that, let him offer this or that, and the priest shall pray for him, and it shall be remitted to him." Where also, in the first chapter, it is commanded that the soul which has sinned in such a way perform penance for the sin and offer this or that, and the priest shall pray for him and for his sin, and it shall be remitted to him. And below, more expressly, it is commanded that the soul causing damage in things sanctified to the Lord, or in the goods of his neighbor, restore in full all that was taken, and over and above a fifth part, and offer to the priest a ram without blemish from the flocks, according to the measure and estimation of the sin; who shall pray for him, and it shall be remitted to him for each [sin] which by doing he committed.

With this also accords [the fact] that those contrite, confessed, and absolved — and therefore perfectly cleansed from the faults and stains of sins — yet for the satisfaction enjoined upon them by the priests, by frequently saying the Lord's Prayer, pray to the Heavenly Father, saying, "Forgive us our debts," or as Luke 11 records, "Forgive us our sins." Forgive us, we say, our debts or sins — namely as to Thy offense and wrath, as to punishment and satisfaction, which Thou hast previously remitted as to stain or fault. Hence also Anselm, Cur Deus Homo 1, [chapter] 20, in dialogue manner says thus: "What is this that we say to God: 'Forgive us our debts,' and every nation prays the God in whom it believes to forgive their sins? For if we pay what we owe, why do we pray that He forgive? Is God unjust, that He should again exact what has been paid? But if we do not pay, why do we vainly pray Him to do what — because it is not fitting to do — He cannot do? Or he who does not pay vainly says, 'Forgive'; but he who pays supplicates, since this very thing pertains to payment, that he supplicate."

With this also accords what blessed Gregory relates, on the Gospels, Homily 34, of a certain man named Victorinus, who was of opulent substance and a sinner; but, compunct by the consideration of his guilt, he raised himself against himself, abandoned all things of this world, sought a monastery; in which monastery he was of such great humility and such severity towards himself that all the brothers who there had exercised themselves in the love of divinity were forced to despise their own life when they saw his penitence. For he strove with the whole effort of his mind to torment his flesh, to break his own wills, to seek out stealthy prayers, to wash himself with daily tears, to seek to be despised, to fear the veneration offered by the brothers. He was therefore accustomed to anticipate the brothers' nightly vigils; and because the mountain on which the monastery is situated juts out on one side in a more secret part, there he had made a custom of going out before vigils, that he might daily slay himself in the weeping of penitence the more freely the more secretly. For he contemplated the strictness of his coming judgment, and, already in agreement with that same Judge, in tears was punishing the guilt of his crime. But on a certain night, while the Abbot was watching and seeing Victorinus prostrate in prayer for a long time on the secret side of the mountain, a light from heaven was suddenly poured out upon him, and so great a brightness scattered itself there that the whole part of that region grew bright from it; and a voice came at the same time saying: "Thy sin is remitted to thee."

Furthermore, alongside the foresaid distinction another can consequently be drawn out. For that actual penitence justifies the unjust can be understood either as to the effacement of the stain of sin or fault, or as to full reconciliation with offended God, and the plenary reformation of one's status. For when sin has been remitted to anyone as to fault, God still remains angry with him: for He still wills for him a punishment or satisfactory penalty for the sin. For God's wrath, as was said in the 25th [chapter] of the first [Book], and the throng of doctors attests, is not any commotion or disturbance of His own, but only the will to punish, and its effect, namely the punishment or penalty itself. Which the Prophet, well noticing and lamenting, says: "O God, turn us, etc. O Lord God of hosts, how long wilt Thou be angry against the prayers of Thy servant" — namely the now converted — "wilt Thou feed us with the bread of tears, and give us tears to drink in measure?" (Psalm 79) "In measure," namely, of penalty, against the measure of fault, as is said in Isaiah 27, and the preceding things make manifest. Hence also Augustine, expounding the verse of the Psalm concerning God's wrath premised, says thus: "'Thou wast angry against the prayer of Thine enemy, and still Thou art angry against the prayer of Thy servant. Thou hast turned us, we have known it, and still Thou art angry against the prayer of Thy servant.' So plainly Thou art angry as a Father, correcting; not as a Judge, condemning. Do not think that the wrath of God has now passed because thou art turned: the wrath of God has passed from thee, but lest it damn thee eternally; yet He scourges and does not spare, since 'He scourges every son whom He receives.' But yet how long wilt Thou be angry against the prayer of Thy servant — not now Thine enemy? How long wilt Thou so feed us, and the rest aforesaid?"

Nor again does the sinner, when sin is remitted, immediately have the plenary reformation of his status, as evidently follows from what has been said. He still remains a debtor of penalty and of the satisfaction owed for the sin. He has also, for the most part, a certain infirmity contracted from sin — namely, facility for evil and difficulty for good. For obtaining plenary reformation, then, contrition and penitence — interior and exterior — avails the penitent, as follows from the things premised, as Bernard also testifies in On Grace and Free Will, [chapter] 24, recited above. Hence Augustine, On True and False Penitence, [chapter] 17: "Let each one strive," he says, "to correct his offenses, that after death it may not be necessary to bear punishment. For there are certain sins which are mortal, and in penitence are venial, but not at once healed. For sometimes a sick man would die if he were not treated medically, and he is not at once healed; he languishes in vigor who was about to die." And above, [chapter] 13: "Sin becomes venial through confession, which was criminal in the act; and even if it is not at once purged, yet it becomes venial which had been committed mortally."

And Anselm says, Cur Deus Homo 1, [chapter] 25, that beatitude is to be given to no one except to him from whom sins have been entirely remitted, and that this remission is not made except by the debt being paid which is owed for sin according to the magnitude of the sin. He plainly intimates, then, that sin is remitted in some measure but not entirely, partially not totally, diminishingly not fully, before the plenary discharge of the whole debt for sin.

Through these things and the like, the divine grace inspiring, the foresaid authorities and others similar — which seem to oppose this view — will be reduced to concord, and all the subtleties of the Pelagians will be dissolved, and all other objections lulled to sleep.

Furthermore, although sin, by the infusion of grace, is effaced as to fault and stain naturally before contrition, confession, absolution, and plenary satisfaction, as has been shown above, yet the sinner remains obligated to plenary satisfaction owed for sin, as has been shown above. Contrition, however, confession, absolution — or the due seeking and reception of absolution — and any work of satisfaction is satisfactory in some way, because partially or totally for sin; and it avails for merit, for humility, for guarding against sin, and for subduing the warring flesh. None of these things therefore is superfluous, useless, or otiose, as was objected above. Hence Augustine, On True and False Penitence, [chapter] 13: "Blushing itself," he says, "has its part in remission. For out of mercy the Lord has commanded this: that no one should repent in secret. For in this — that of himself one says it to the priest, and conquers shame by the fear of the Offended One — there is the pardon of the crime. For sin becomes venial through confession, which was criminal in the act; and even if it is not at once purged, yet it becomes venial which had been committed mortally. For he has offered much of satisfaction who, mastering his shame, has not denied to God's messenger any of those things which he committed. And since shame is a great penalty, he who blushes for Christ becomes worthy of mercy. Hence it is plain that the more openly anyone confesses, in the hope of pardon, the foulness of his crime, the more easily he will obtain the grace of remission. For the priests themselves can profit those who confess the more, the more they can spare them, to whom the Lord remits the crime."

Wherefore Peter [Lombard], in Sentences 4, distinction 17, last [chapter], says: "If it is asked to what end confession avails, since in contrition the sin has already been effaced — we say that there is a certain punishment as the satisfaction of work. Through confession also the priest understands how he ought to judge concerning the crime; through it, also, the sinner becomes more humble and more cautious." With which the Gloss, on the beginning of the distinction On Penitence, agrees, asking to what purpose exterior penitence and confession is necessary, since the sin has been previously remitted by contrition. And it answers: "This is done for humility and for the exercise of righteousness, and that one may make satisfaction to the Church, which one has injured, and that he himself and others may be rendered more cautious." And he adds: "But if it be subtly considered, the remission of sins is to be attributed to the grace of God, not to contrition." Hence it evidently appears that the Glossator does not say what was alleged above for the contrary part out of this Gloss, according to his own subtle view — and also because then he would plainly contradict himself, as the things preceding make manifest — but according to the common opinion of others, and famous among all who speak commonly.

Nor let any theologian, I beg, blame me for treating this little gloss, which is not a theological one, in this way. For the Pelagians object it to me; what then evil is to strike them with their own sword? For "to Greeks and barbarians, to wise and unwise, I am made a debtor"; nor am I ignorant that "what is foolish of God is wiser than men, and what is weak of God is stronger than men" — than some men, sometimes. But he who has thought otherwise, let him himself speak wisdom among the perfect, give solid food to the advanced. It goes very well with me if I minister milk to Christ's little ones, if the declaration of my words gives light, and gives understanding to little ones. Would that I might so become all things to all, that I might gain all to truth.

What was argued above — that since to repent is in man's free power, having received grace, one might not at all repent, and so be justified and just without any penitence after or before — perhaps concludes well as concerns absolute power: for omnipotent God could perhaps so justify an adult by the habit without the act, as He justifies baptized infants and those sanctified in the womb. But according to the law now established it does not conclude. Of which the cause, I deem, is this: that the act of contrition is not produced by man alone, nor antecedently by man with God, but by God antecedently with man — as the corollary of [chapter] 41 teaches. For God, magnificent in holiness, whenever He inspires in an adult sinner the habit of charity and grace, also breathes in the act, which He works also through His infrustrable will, as the tenth [chapter] of this [Book] teaches, in man and with man — but prior naturally to man, irresistibly and indefectibly.

This view by no means evacuates the power of the keys. For the power and use of the keys extends to many and great things in the private and public forum: first, to the indication and notification of the true absolution from sin granted by God, as was said above — provided this be done conformably to the divine absolution and to the judgment of the Church triumphant, and concordantly to the condition or merit of the one absolved, as the preceding things make manifest. Hence Augustine, On True and False Penitence, [chapter] 13: "The Lord said," he says, "'Whatever thou shalt loose upon earth shall be loosed in heaven': that is, I God, and all the orders of the heavenly court, and all the saints in My glory, praise with you and confirm those whom you bind and loose. He did not say, 'whom you think to bind and loose,' but, 'in whom you exercise the work of righteousness and mercy'; other works of yours upon sinners I do not recognize."

And Gregory, in Homily 26 on the Gospels, expounding that of John foresaid, "Whose sins ye remit, etc." says: "It often happens that he who holds the place of judgment either condemns the undeserving, or himself, bound, looses others; often he follows in loosing and binding his subjects the motions of his own will, not the merits of the causes; whence it comes about that he deprives himself of this very power of binding and loosing, who exercises it according to his own wills, and not according to the morals of his subjects. Often it happens that the pastor is moved towards a neighbor by hatred or favor; nor can those judge worthily of subjects who in the cases of subjects follow their own hatreds or favors. Hence it is rightly said by the Prophet, 'They were putting to death souls that do not die, and giving life to souls that do not live.' For he puts to death one not dying who condemns a just man, and he strives to give life to one who is not going to live, who attempts to loose a guilty one from his punishment. Therefore the causes are to be weighed, and then the power of binding and loosing exercised: it must be seen what fault, or what penitence, has followed after the fault, that almighty God may absolve, by the pastor's sentence, those whom He visits by the grace of compunction. For then is the absolution of the presider true, when meanwhile the judgment follows the Judge — which the resurrection of the four-day-dead well signifies; which, indeed, demonstrates that first the Lord called the dead man and gave him life, saying, 'Lazarus, come forth'; and afterwards he who had come forth alive was loosed by the disciples, as it is written, 'And when he who had been bound with bands had come out, then He said to the disciples, "Loose him, and let him go." Behold, the disciples loose him, now living, whom the Master had already raised when dead. For if the disciples had loosed Lazarus when dead, they would have shown stench rather than virtue. From which consideration it is to be observed that we ought to loose by pastoral authority those whom we recognize our Author to vivify by raising grace; which vivification, before the work of righteousness, is now recognized in the very confession of sin."

Hence also Peter [Lombard], in Sentences 4, distinction 18: "How is it true," he says, "'Whatever thou shalt loose upon earth shall be loosed also in heaven, and whatever thou shalt bind, etc.' — for sometimes priests show some loosed or bound who are not such before God?" And he answers: "But this is to be understood in those whose merits demand to be loosed or bound. For then the priest's sentence is approved and confirmed by the judgment of God and of the whole heavenly court, when it proceeds from discretion, so that the merits of the accused do not contradict. Whomsoever therefore they loose or bind, employing the key of discretion, by the merits of the accused they are loosed or bound in heaven, that is, before God, since in the divine judgment the priest's sentence so proceeded is approved and confirmed."

Secondly, ecclesiastical priests truly bind and loose certain ones — namely, the notoriously criminal — by debarring them from the communion of the Church's sacraments and admitting the same, when reconciled, to them. For although such a one, prevented by God's grace, may repent and truly be absolved before God from all sins, yet he will not be received to the ecclesiastical sacraments unless cleansed and absolved by the priest's judgment. This well appears concerning those who sin publicly and therefore do public penance, who are openly cast out of the Church on the head of the fast and resumed on the Lord's Supper after their penance has been performed. This was well figured in Lazarus, notoriously dead and buried, whom the Lord first raised by Himself, and then commanded the disciples to loose him still bound, and let him go (John 11) — evidently showing that one notoriously dead through sin, although by Christ's calling through grace he revives, must yet come forth through the door of the mouth, by confessing, and be loosed — that is, absolved — from the bond by which he was held before the Church, and be permitted freely to go away by the liberty of the Church Militant.

Hence Augustine, in the first part on John, sermon 49, expounding this place, says: "What does this signify? Where you condemn, you lie dead; you lie buried; when you confess, you proceed. What is to proceed but, as if going forth from hidden things, to be made manifest? But that you may confess, God brings it about, by calling with a great voice — that is, with a great grace by calling. Therefore when the dead man came forth still bound, confessing and still guilty, that his sins might be loosed by the ministers, the Lord said: 'Loose him, and let him go.' What is, 'Loose him, and let him go'? 'Whatever ye loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.'" The same, in Sermons on the Words of the Lord, sermon 8, after by the example of Lazarus he has shown that one confessing his sin has previously been raised by the Lord (as is more fully recited above), by way of objection and response subjoins: "Then someone will say: 'What does the Church profit, if the confessor, raised by the Lord's voice, comes forth? What does the Church profit the confessor, to whom the Lord says, 'What ye loose on earth shall be loosed also in heaven'?' Note Lazarus himself: he came forth with his bonds; he was already living, by confessing, but he was not yet walking free, entangled with bonds. What therefore does the Church do, to which it has been said, 'What ye loose shall be loosed,' but what the Lord said immediately to the disciples: 'Loose him, and let him go'?"

And Alcuin, as is recited in the Gloss on John 11, says: "Christ therefore raises [the dead], because He gives life interiorly through Himself; the disciples loose, because by the ministry of priests those given life are absolved."

Thirdly, ecclesiastical priests can truly bind by the bond of excommunication, and loose, in the Church Militant, by separating from the communion of the sacraments and the faithful, and reconciling [them] — to such an extent that, although it may be evident to the Church that some excommunicated person truly repented, and that it did not stand by him that he was not reconciled to ecclesiastical unity, and so departed [this life], and therefore that he is truly absolved before God and in the Church Triumphant — yet he ought not to be held as a son of the Church Militant until he has been absolved by her, as Pope Innocent expressly teaches in Extra, On the Sentence of Excommunication, A nobis est saepe quaesitum. Where, concerning such an excommunicated and dead person, he writes thus: "It happens sometimes that he who is bound before God is loosed before the Church, and he who is free before God is bound by an ecclesiastical sentence. The bond, then, by which a sinner is bound before God is dissolved in the remission of his fault. But that by which he is bound before the Church, is relaxed when the sentence is remitted; which the Gospel discourse manifests in the raising of Lazarus, whom the Lord first raised, and then commanded the Apostles to loose the one raised. Hence, however much one has been concerned to humble himself by an oath given that he would obey the command of the Church, and however many signs of penitence have preceded — yet if, prevented by death, he cannot obtain the benefit of absolution, although he is believed to have been absolved before God, yet he is not yet to be held as absolved before the Church. Yet succor can and ought to be afforded him by the Church's benefit, if his penitence in life is established by evident signs; and to the dead man let the benefit of absolution be granted."

Fourthly, ecclesiastical priests can truly bind and loose, by enjoining various penances — graver or lighter — on penitents, by mitigating, changing, and perhaps by indulgences from the immense treasury of the Church, mercifully relaxing every exterior penance that has been enjoined; and they can perhaps, out of the most ample mercy of the Lord, absolve the penitent from every penance and extrinsic penalty owed for sin in the present or in the future. Hence Augustine, On True and False Penitence, [chapter] 13: "The priests themselves," he says, "can spare the confessing, to whom the Lord remits the crime. For He raised Lazarus from the tomb; He offered him to the disciples to be loosed — by this showing the power of loosing granted to the priest. For He said: 'Whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed also in heaven': that is, I God, and all the orders of the heavenly court, and all the saints in My glory praise with you and confirm those whom you bind and loose; He did not say 'whom you think to bind and loose,' but 'in whom you exercise the work of righteousness and mercy'; other works of yours upon sinners I do not recognize."

Fifthly, ecclesiastical priests truly absolve from the obligation by which a sinner, when opportunity is granted, is held according to the law established in the Church to confess his sins to the priest and be absolved by him. For this once being done, he is no longer held to do so concerning the same [sins].

Sixthly, ecclesiastical priests absolve truly and finally in some way from sins, since, according to what was premised, although sins by the infusion of grace are effaced before confession and the absolution obtained, yet, unless the sinner — having opportunity — afterwards confesses and is absolved, they return in some way and are newly imputed; indeed, on account of contempt of the keys, they are aggravated.

Seventhly, the power of the keys, the priest's absolution, and the sacrament of penitence avail for obtaining the increase of grace — which ought, not in a small degree, to excite each one to confess most often. For this, according to Augustine, as Peter [Lombard] recites in Sentences 4, distinction 1, is the difference between the old and new sacraments, that the former only promised and signified, while these give salvation. And it seems to be in the same way concerning the baptism of penitence as concerning the baptism of water; but the baptism of water confers on an adult previously baptized in the Holy Spirit and approaching in grace an increase of grace and of the virtues, as Jerome says, as Peter alleges in Sentences 4, distinction 4: "The faith which makes the faithful is given or nourished in the waters of baptism, since to one not having it is given there, and to one already having it that he may have it more fully" — which Peter expressly holds there.

Hence also, eighthly, this power avails for the diminution and repression of concupiscence and the tinder of sin. For Augustine teaching, Enchiridion, penultimate [chapter], and elsewhere in many places, "When charity grows, cupidity is diminished and decreases." In one baptized first by the baptism of the Spirit, when he afterwards receives baptism in water, the tinder of sin is weakened, as is taught in Peter [Lombard]'s Sentences 4, distinction 4. Why, then, should it not be felt similarly in the baptism of penitence? This effect too ought to excite, not in a small degree, to most frequent confession.

To what was argued above — "If penitence is a sacrament, it is a sign of a sacred reality following it" — some respond, as Peter [Lombard] recites in Sentences 4, distinction 23, that this is not true of the sacrament of penitence, just as not always in other sacraments which effect what they figure. With whom Peter [Lombard] himself concords, on the same matter, in distinction 4, by way of question and reply: "If it is asked of what reality that baptism is the sacrament which is given to one already just, we say that it is the sacrament of the reality that has preceded — that is, of the remission given before through faith; nor wonder that the reality sometimes precedes the sacrament, since sometimes also it follows long after, as in those who approach feignedly, in whom — when they have afterwards repented — the baptism will begin to profit; in whom the baptism was the sacrament of this sanctification which they have through repenting." But it can be said otherwise, and perhaps more truly, according to what precedes — that the sacrament of penitence is the sign of the sacred reality always conferred through it, namely the increase of preceding grace.

Certain authorities also and arguments objected by the Pelagians the 35th and 21st [chapters] of this [Book] expound and resolve.

CHAPTER 44. ON PREDESTINATION ACCORDING TO THE NAME (quid nominis).

After these things, on Predestination some brief things are briefly to be said. Concerning which, it is to be known what the name [signifies]. For according to the Philosopher in Elenchi 1, "Those who are ignorant of the force of names paralogize themselves and others, both when disputing and when listening to others"; with which the Apostle concordantly says in 1 Corinthians 14: "If I do not know the force of the voice, I shall be a barbarian to him to whom I speak, and he who speaks shall be a barbarian to me."

Now destinare (to destine), according to the grammarians, [means] to send, to depute, to mark, to inscribe, to ordain — and in these last modes Sacred Scripture speaks. Hence 2 Corinthians 9: "Let each one, as he has destined in his heart, etc." — Gloss: "has destined, that is, has preordained." And Wisdom 5: "Like an arrow shot to the destined place, etc." Hence also praedestinare and praedestinatio are said in the same modes. Hence blessed Augustine, proceeding by a similar way, in On Predestination against the Pelagians II, defines predestination thus: "Predestination is by way of premitting and foreseeing, or preordaining, something future."

CHAPTER 45. THAT PREDESTINATION IS REALLY TO BE POSITED; WHAT IT IS, IN HOW MANY MODES IT IS SAID; THAT IT IS NOT ON ACCOUNT OF WORKS, BUT ACCORDING TO THE GRATUITOUS WILL OF GOD.

Now, having grasped what predestination is said to be nominally, it remains to inquire whether it is really to be posited; and that it is to be really posited, [chapter] 27 and the things following sufficiently prove. Which both series of the Testament also attest. Hence Exodus 32: "Either forgive them this fault, or, if Thou dost not, blot me out of Thy book, which Thou hast written." But this book written by God — what else can it be understood to be than His predestination of things to come, as all Catholic expositors attest? And Psalm 68: "Let them be blotted out of the book of the living"; and Psalm 138: "In Thy book all shall be written"; and Isaiah 4: "Holy shall be called everyone who has been written in life, in Jerusalem"; and Daniel 12: "In that time Thy people shall be saved — everyone who shall be found written in the book."

In the New Testament likewise the Apostle attests predestination, not with the name suppressed but expressed, where he treats of the Son of God predestined, in Romans 1; and below, [chapter] 8, of those whom He predestined to be conformed to the image of His Son; and in Ephesians 1, of those whom He chose before the foundation of the world, and predestined to the adoption of sons. Truth itself likewise truly taught this, in Matthew 20, speaking of the seat at the right hand or the left, prepared by the Father for those who would sit there; and below, [chapter] 25, of the kingdom prepared from the foundation of the world for those who would reign. For which also, in Acts 10, it is written of witnesses preordained by God; and below, [chapter] 13: "As many as had been preordained to eternal life, believed." Which authorities concerning the divine election, with their many likenesses in both Testaments, evidently insinuate. This too all the doctors — indeed, all the learned, and equally the unlearned Catholics — Catholicly confess.

Now the question "Whether predestination is" being terminated, it remains consequently to inquire what predestination, now found, really is. And, as can be had from [chapters] 9, 27, and the following, with the help of [chapter] 23 — it is the eternal pre-volition, or pre-ordination, of God's will concerning a future thing. And this can be taken in two ways. In one mode, generally, namely for the divine pre-ordination with respect to any future thing whatever, and so it is convertible with providence, as will appear from [chapter] 27 and the following. So speaks the Philosopher in the Secret of Secrets, part 1, chapter 16: "God," he says, "destined all things by His wisdom in equal weight, and in certain number and order." And below, in the same book and part, in chapter 22, he says that "the most high Destiner has not so predestined future things that He should derogate in any way from His own power."

In another mode, specially, namely for the pre-ordination of the divine will concerning a rational creature, angelic or human; and this is the common way of speaking in Sacred Scripture and the doctors. And further, just as God's volition is taken in two ways — namely simply and according to a certain respect, of goods and of evils — as [chapter] 34 and the preceding have taught, so a twofold predestination of this kind corresponds to it, simply and according to a certain respect, of goods and of evils. Now that predestination is of goods, no theologian is ignorant. But because by some perhaps it is doubted whether it is similarly of evils, this I shall show.

For this, as has been touched on, follows from [chapter] 34 with the preceding, and from [chapter] 27 and the following, and from the corollary of [chapter] 23 and the arguments and authorities which it adduces; and from that [chapter] 23 with this [point] most well known to every Christian, that God wills, both in the final judgment and afterwards will will, that many evil angels and men be tortured by eternal fires.

Item, Augustine says in City of God 21, [chapter] 25, that some in this life are predestined to go into the eternal fire with the devil, as [chapter] 23 has more fully alleged. The same, on John, part 2, homily 53 (or 107 of the whole work), expounding John 17, "None of them is lost, except the son of perdition, that the Scripture might be fulfilled," says thus: "The son of perdition was called the betrayer of Christ, predestined to perdition, according to the Scripture which especially prophesies of him in Psalm 108." The same, Enchiridion 80, says that God has predestined some justly to penalty, and some kindly to grace. The same can be had in On the Good of Perseverance, [chapters] 45 and 49, and elsewhere in many places.

But some not holding this view always expound predestination in such cases by simple foreknowledge. Which exposition, if it is fitting, seems likely to be able to fit the whole of Sacred Scripture, our Doctors, and the Saints, wherever they make mention of predestination even of the good — which is sufficiently established as contrary to Catholic truth.

Item, if God has foreknowledge of such [evils], therefore also a willing of them, as chapter 18 has shown; and therefore some predestination of the will. Item, the contrary of this is rather found, namely that the name of foreknowledge is put for predestination. Hence the Apostle in Romans 11: "God has not rejected His people whom He foreknew" — and he is speaking there of the remnant of the Jews predestined to the kingdom, who by grace are saved. For which Augustine says in On the Good of Perseverance, [chapter] 54: "Sometimes predestination is signified also by the name of foreknowledge, as the Apostle says: 'God has not rejected His people whom He foreknew' — which is not rightly understood except as 'whom He has predestined.' This the circumstance of the very reading shows" — which, just as I have briefly touched, he there manifests more diffusely.

Item, this twofold predestination Isidore manifestly posits in the second [book] of On the Highest Good, [chapter] 6, in these words: "Predestination is twofold: either of the elect to repose, or of the reprobate to death. Marvelous is the disposition of the supernal distribution, by which here the just is more justified, and the impious is more soiled; the bad is sometimes converted to good, the good is sometimes turned back to evil." With whom Anselm concords, On Concord [chapter] 7, saying thus: "Not only of the good, but also of the evil, predestination can be spoken. It is therefore not unfitting if in this way we say that God predestines the evil and their evil works, when He does not correct them and their evil works; but He is said more specifically to foreknow and predestine the good, since in these He causes both that they are and that they are good, but in the evil, not [that they are evil] but only that they are essentially, not that they are evil."

Yet very often the Saints say that predestination is only of the good — which is for this reason, that the predestination of the evil is not predestination simply and per se, but only per accidens; and being per accidens is close to non-being, as was said of volition in chapter 33. The predestination of the evil is commonly called reprobation. And because, according to Augustine in On Genesis to the Letter IV, [chapter] 6, "When the matter is conceded, one is not to labor about words"; and according to the Philosopher in Topics 2, "in nominations, that which most often [obtains] is the [proper] thing to be named; but those which are of the things — whether of this or not of this — are not to be attended to in many cases" — let predestination of the good be called predestination absolutely, and predestination of the evil be named reprobation.

Now predestination can be described thus: Predestination is the eternal preparation by the divine will of final grace in the way (in via) and of everlasting beatitude in the fatherland (in patria) for a rational creature. Which Augustine, On the Predestination of the Saints, [chapter] 12, more briefly thus defines: "It is the preparation of grace." But it must be understood in the manner stated. For grace is prepared or given to many who fall from it and are finally damned; but of the predestined, none has ever perished or will perish. The effects of this predestination are: the conferring of grace in the present, justification from sin, good merits, final perseverance, and perpetual beatitude in the future.

It is also to be known that this predestination in the good is twofold: namely, of grace and of merits in the present, and of glory and of rewards in the future, as can be elicited from its description premised, and from chapter 31; and is had expressly from the saying of the Apostle to the Ephesians 1 and 2, with the Gloss alleged in chapter 31. But reprobation and its effects are known by the opposites of these.

But because the Saints and Doctors say frequently that God has predestined and prepared for the reprobate fire and penalty, but not sins, nor [predestined them] to sin — someone might argue against this through the proximate chapter, with [chapter] 23 helping; or through this saying of the Saints might argue against chapter 34, with the same [chapter] 23 succoring. And it can here be answered concerning predestination similarly as concerning volition has been answered in chapter 34, and as has been touched on at the beginning of this chapter.

Now it remains to inquire whether on the side of the predestined there is any cause of divine predestination. And that there is not, chapter 20 makes manifest. Item, if there were any cause, it would maximally seem to be the good works of the predestined; but those, before they exist, cause nothing; therefore no one is predestined before he works; therefore God's predestination is temporal and new — against the proximate chapter, and [chapter] 23, and against canonical Scripture alleged in the proximate chapter, and against all Catholic doctors treating this matter.

Nor can it be said that the foreknowledge of the works of the predestined is the cause of divine predestination, since these things are prior in nature predestined by God to the predestined one, before they are foreknown by God. For God prior in nature wills him to have such merits, and through them the kingdom of heaven, before He knows this; and through this, that He so wills, He knows that it is or will be so, as chapter 18 has shown. The knowledge or foreknowledge of merits, therefore, does not cause predestination in God.

Furthermore, God predestined for Peter, first, the kingdom; and merits, as a means to the kingdom — not the converse — as appears from [chapter] 35.

Item, for whatever cause God eternally prepared grace to be conferred upon someone, for the same cause He confers it upon him temporally, by chapter 23 — and because otherwise the will of God would be frustrated, against chapter 10. For from eternity He willed to confer grace now on account of works, and He does not do so. But, by the hypothesis, on account of the works of the predestined God eternally prepared grace to be conferred on him; therefore He confers it on him temporally on account of works — against chapter 35 and the things which follow. Or otherwise, ostensibly: for whatever [reason] God does not confer grace temporally, [for that reason] He did not eternally prepare grace to be conferred. Every work is that on account of which God does not confer grace temporally [if not done].

Item, as freely as God confers grace temporally on anyone, so freely He prepared from eternity to confer grace upon him. But God most freely confers grace temporally, not on account of preceding merits, according to what chapter 35 and the following have taught.

Item, predestination is the grace of God making the predestined gracious for life, according to the distinction of grace premised in chapters 35 and 42. Therefore it is not from works or merits whatever, according to what chapter 35 and the following have demonstrated. But that predestination is the grace of God is plain, because every volition of God concerning a good extrinsically to be conferred on someone emanates freely, not from any inferior cause causing it from before, as is plain from chapter 20. For which also the Apostle says in Ephesians 1: "He predestined us into the adoption of sons according to the purpose of His will, in praise of the glory of His grace" — which chapter 25 has more fully treated. Furthermore, almost all the reasons proving that grace is given freely will similarly prove that predestination is made freely.

Furthermore, this is plainly against the Apostle, in Romans 9, saying of Jacob and Esau: "When they were not yet born, nor had done anything good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand — not from works but from Him calling — it was said: 'The greater shall serve the lesser,' as it is written: 'Jacob I have loved, but Esau I have hated.'" In which, under the name of "sons of promise" he shows the sons of predestination, as is plain there from the series of the reading, and from the exposition of all Catholic doctors expounding that place. And below, the Apostle shows by Sacred Scripture that predestination is from the mercy of the divine will, not from works, saying thus: "To Moses the Lord says: 'I shall have mercy on whom I have mercy, and shall show mercy to whom I have shown mercy.'" And he concludes: "Therefore it is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, that is, not of one doing anything whatsoever, but of God who shows mercy." And, having alleged another place of Scripture about Pharaoh, he again concludes thus: "Therefore on whom He wills He has mercy, and whom He wills He hardens." But if that volition were caused by the works of such ones, and followed them, he would not say it congruously; rather he ought to say it thus: "He on whom one will work well wills to have mercy; and on him who [will work] evilly, He wills to harden." And this would be originally and principally of him who wills and runs, not of God who shows mercy. And therefore he said above this conclusion: "Not from works but from Him calling, that the purpose of God according to election might stand" — not according to any merits in any way.

Nor do I believe anyone so dull, so impudent, and so frivolously cavilling as to say that the Apostle did not understand this of works then future, but only of present ones — of which there were none then. For how should so great a doctor, the chosen vessel having the firstfruits of the Spirit, who did not learn or receive it from man, but through revelation of the Lord Jesus Christ, who also was speaking wisdom among the perfect — have so unlearnedly taught the Romans, so perfect and learned, that "when they were not yet born, nor had done anything good or evil," not from works then present, was it said: "The greater shall serve the lesser," and "Jacob I have loved, etc."? For who, being most unlearned, would not know that "when they were not yet born, nor had done anything good or evil," nothing could be said to be due to them on account of present works at that time? Or to whom would it not seem ridiculous if he had said: "He predestined them before they existed, and before the foundation of the world, on account of the works which they then had presently" — when this no one even of the simple has ever doubted? And every Christian doctrine ought to be of something useful and unknown — but this is not useful to any Christian, nor can be unknown to any. And how would he have so studiously, if so fruitlessly, adduced testimonies and examples of the Old Testament with such vigilant disputation, to prove that conclusion which could never have been doubtful or unknown?

How also from this conclusion so understood — namely, of the works of those who do not work presently, nor have ever worked — would he, proceeding further, draw the other conclusions which follow? Of which the first is, "Therefore it is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy." The second: "Therefore on whom He wills, He has mercy, and whom He wills, He hardens." For unless he understood his statement commonly, of works past, present, or future, there would be no connection of reason; nor would he have said, "that the purpose of God according to election might stand." For if the purpose of God should follow future works, it is not according to His election, but according to the meritorious election of those who will merit. Nor ought he to have said, "Not from works, but from Him calling," but rather the contrary: "Not from Him calling, but from the future works of those, by which God is first and originally as it were excited and called to predestining." And so God would rather be called the called, and they themselves the callers. Nor ought he to have concluded: "Therefore it is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy" — but rather "not of God who shows mercy, but of him who is going to run and to will." For this is the principle and origin why God shows mercy, not [something] in God. Nor again ought he to have concluded: "Therefore on whom He wills He has mercy, and whom He wills He hardens"; but thus: "Therefore on whomever is going to will well, God has mercy, and whomever is going to will badly, He hardens."

Item, if the Apostle were there denying that God's predestination and calling is from past or present works only, but were permitting it to be from future ones — as some of the Jews converted, dwelling in Rome, then wished to assert (namely those who said that, on account of their merits and the merits of their fathers in observance of the Mosaic law, they had received the grace of Christ and the faith of the Gospel, as is plain from the process of the Epistle to the Romans, and Lombard in the prologue of the Gloss on that Epistle recites this from Haymo and Augustine) — and as the Pelagians now assert, namely that the elect are predestined on account of their future merits — how would he refute them and commend grace, which yet he principally willed [to commend], as is plain through the whole epistle, and through Lombard in the prologue [referenced] above, and through the many authorities of Haymo and Augustine adduced there by him?

And that he intended this specially through that process alleged from chapter 9, is plain from Augustine, Enchiridion 78, saying: "The Apostle was commending grace, for whose commendation he had already spoken concerning those twins of Rebecca's womb: 'When they were not yet born, nor doing anything good or evil, that the purpose of God might remain according to election, not from works but from Him calling, it was said that the greater shall serve the lesser.'"

Item, according to the same Apostle, God does not confer grace presently on account of works, as chapter 35 and the following have more fully alleged; therefore neither did He prepare it on account of future works. For He has the immutability of His counsel, with the same Apostle still attesting, in chapter 6 to the Hebrews. Indeed, just as He calls those existing to grace not on account of their present works, so He does not predestine those to come on account of future ones, but these and those alike, purely freely. Hence in Romans 4 He calls the things which are not, as those which are. And how He calls them, the same called Apostle himself testifies of himself: "He called me by His grace," he says (Galatians 1); and 2 Timothy 1: "He has called us by His holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which has been given to us in Christ Jesus before the secular times, but is now manifested through the illumination of our Saviour Jesus Christ."

This therefore is the view of the Apostle in his words to the Romans treated above: that God calls and predestines purely freely, not from past, present, or future works. And this Augustine attests expressly in his sermon On the Predestination and Grace of God, where he treats the foresaid authority of the Apostle in these words: "If according to their future morals it is said that the divine judgment has decreed, certainly that will be evacuated which the Apostle premised, saying: 'Not from works, but from Him calling, it was said that the greater shall serve the lesser.' For he does not say 'from past works,' but, when he generally said 'not from works,' he willed both past and future to be there understood: past, namely, which were none, and future, which were not yet. Jacob was predestined a vessel unto honor, but not from works, since 'not from works, but from Him calling, it was said: "The greater shall serve the lesser.'" And lest perhaps vessels predestined unto honor, attributing something to their own powers, should deny glory to the Creator, the Apostle in another place named them 'vessels of mercy,' so that they should recognize themselves to be all that they were according to mercy. For the same Apostle so says elsewhere: 'And this not from yourselves, but it is the gift of God.'"

The same is plain through the Gloss of Lombard on the literal text alleged. For there, according to the exposition of that one, the Apostle shows that Jacob was not predestined and Esau reprobated either on account of preceding merits or on account of future ones. Hence he says thus: "'The greater,' that is, Esau, 'shall serve the lesser,' that is, Jacob. And lest anyone should think this is done from preceding merit of theirs (because this was said to her, that is, the mother, 'when they were not yet born,' for it might seem that they could have somehow merited in the womb by struggling), he subjoins: 'Or when they had not yet done anything good or evil; therefore it was said,' that the purpose of God might remain — that is, be fulfilled — according to election, that is, according to the grace by which He has chosen — not according to the debt of merits — by which He Himself makes those to be chosen, He does not find them — 'not from works.' Just as he showed that this had not been said for their preceding merits, so likewise this he shows to have been said not for the future merits of either. Whence I say: not on account of their preceding merits was this said. Again I say: not from works good or evil future, which would not be future good or evil unless grace had been added or subtracted, but 'from Him calling' — that is, from the grace of God."

The same in Sentences 1, distinction 41, says: "He chose Jacob and reprobated Esau, which was not on account of their merits which they then would have, since they had none, since they did not even exist; nor on account of future merits which He foresaw, did He either elect that one or reprobate that one. Yet some have opined that God therefore chose Jacob because He foreknew that he would be such — one who would believe in Him and serve Him — which Augustine sometimes says he held, in the book of Retractations, where he openly shows that if he had been chosen on account of future merits, then the election would not be of grace. Therefore he was not chosen by God because he was going to be such, but from election was made such."

This same view the same Apostle teaches to the Ephesians 1, saying: "He chose us before the foundation of the world, that we might be holy and unspotted." He does not say "because we were, or were going to be, holy and unspotted," but "that we might be holy and unspotted." And there follows: "who has predestined us into the adoption of sons according to the purpose of His will" — not according to the merits of our will. And there follows: "We have been called by lot, predestined according to the purpose of Him who works all things according to the counsel of His will" — not ours, nor according to our future works.

In this — that he says "we have been called by lot (sorte)" — he seems to have imitated the Psalmist, in Psalm 23, speaking thus to the Lord: "In Thy hands are my lots." On which Augustine, treatise 3, says: "Why lots? For the lot is not anything evil, but a thing in human dubiety indicating the divine will. Therefore by 'the lot' he meant — as I judge — the grace by which we have been saved. Why do they call the grace of God 'lot'? Because in the lot there is no election, namely of merits, but the will of God. For where it is said, 'This man does it, this man does it not,' merits are considered; and if merits are considered, it is election, not lot. But when God finds no merits of ours, by the lot of His will He saves us — because He willed [to do so], not because we were worthy. By merit, this lot is the tunic of the Lord, woven from above [seamless], which signifies the eternity of charity. Since it could not be divided, the lot was cast over it. To whom it has come, signifies those who seem to come to the lot of the Saints. This lot is the hidden will of God: the will of God in the human race is a lot — a lot coming from the hidden will of God, with whom there is no iniquity."

The same, in [book] 6 Against Julian, [chapter] 21, says: "They are born condemnable [from] Him creating, who is the Creator of all; and through the Mediator they are liberated from condemnation owed; but by gratuitous compassion, not owed, [they] whom He has chosen before the foundation of the world by election of grace, not from works either past, present, or future — otherwise grace is now no longer grace. Which appears especially in infants, of whom neither past works can be spoken (for they were not), nor present (for they work nothing), nor future (since at that age they die)." The same, above, in book 5, chapter 6, says: "These are the elect, and that 'before the foundation of the world,' by Him who 'calls the things that are not as though they were' — but elected by the election of grace. Hence the same doctor says of Israel: 'The remnant has been saved by the election of grace.' And lest perhaps before the foundation of the world they should be thought elect from works foreknown, [the Apostle], following, added: 'But if of grace, then no longer of works; otherwise grace is no longer grace.'"

Item, this was one of the errors of the heretic Pelagius — namely, to say that God predestines on account of foreknown future merits — as Augustine touches in On the Predestination of the Saints in many places. Hence in chapter 24, treating the saying of the Apostle to the Ephesians 1 alleged above, he says thus: "'God,' as Pelagius said, 'foreknew who would be holy and unspotted by the choice of free will; and therefore He chose them before the foundation of the world in that very foreknowledge by which He foreknew that they would be such. Therefore,' he says, 'He chose them before they existed, predestining as His sons those whom He foreknew would be holy and unspotted.'" Which Augustine refutes thus: "Let us look at the words of the Apostle, and let us see whether He has chosen us before the foundation of the world because we were going to be holy and unspotted, or that we might be. 'Blessed,' he says, 'be God, who has blessed us with every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places, as He chose us before the foundation of the world, that we might be holy and unspotted.' Therefore not because we were going to be, but that we might be — this is sure and manifest. For we were going to be such, because He Himself, predestining, chose, that through His grace we might be such."

By this error too Augustine was sometimes deceived, as he himself testifies above in the same [book], [chapter] 4 — which his error several of his works sufficiently indicate, as he says. Of which one was the Exposition of certain Propositions from the Epistle to the Romans, which he recites in his Retractations he had retracted, in these words, disputing: "What did God choose in the not yet born, to whom He said the greater would serve, and what in the same greater not yet born did He likewise reprobate?" [And] "concerning whom these things were said," and "though much later that prophetic testimony was put forth — 'Jacob I have loved, but Esau I have hated' — to this end I led my reasoning, that I might say: 'Therefore God did not choose anyone's works in the foreknowledge by which He Himself was going to give them, but He chose faith in foreknowledge, that whom He foreknew was going to believe in Him, that one He might choose.' I had not yet sought more diligently nor found, what is the election of grace, of which the Apostle says: 'The remnant has been saved by the election of grace' — which surely is not grace if any merits precede it." And this is the retractation in Retractations 1, [chapter] 23.

The first opinion of Augustine, therefore, was that God did not predestine on account of future works distinguished from faith (and this he does not retract but approves), but on account of future faith — namely, on account of the act of faith, or on account of believing itself, as his own words show. For he says: "He chose faith in foreknowledge, that whom He foreknew was going to believe in Him, that one He might choose." And below: "Hence what I said immediately afterwards, for the same Apostle says, 'But the same God who works all in all,' nowhere is it said, 'God who believes all in all'; and then I subjoined: 'For that we believe is ours, but that we work good is His who gives the Holy Spirit to those who believe' — surely I would not say this, if I already knew that faith too is found among the gifts of God." And this view, as senseless, he reprobates and retracts.

This therefore is Augustine's last view: that God predestines no one on account of the future act of believing — that is, because he will believe in Him — nor on account of any future works of his.

A similar error to the prior one, concerning the matter of predestination, Augustine posited in Eighty-Three Questions, question 68, which in Retractations 1, [chapter] 26, in part he expressly retracts, in part in its like. For from the fact that he retracts one view as erroneous, it is certain that he wills any like view to be held as retracted, since concerning likes one is to judge similarly. This too Lombard holds, Sentences 1, distinction 41. And it can be said that he retracted this error more expressly, after he had perfected the book of Retractations — namely, in On the Predestination of the Saints, [chapter] 4 — where he says, as was recited above, that "several of his works sufficiently indicate this error." There then he reprobates and retracts this error of his, wherever it has occurred in his works.

The same also, below, in the same [work], chapters 11 and 12, makes a similar retraction of a similar view from his work Against Porphyry on the Time of the Christian Religion.

Item, Augustine, On Correction and Grace, [chapter] 56, treating God's promise made to Abraham in Genesis 15 about multiplying his seed, says thus: "For He did not promise them," namely the predestined, "to Abraham because He foreknew that they would of themselves be good. For if it is so, then what He promised is not His but theirs."

Item, if God predestines anyone on account of his future works, why does He predestine those works for him — as chapter 31 has demonstrated — not on account of other prior works, and these on account of others, lest perhaps this proceed without end? It remains, then, that He predestines as much the merits as the rewards purely freely.

Item, in some way God predestines a reward to someone before a merit. For He predestines the reward as the end, and the merit as the means to this end, as chapter 35 was arguing; therefore He predestines a future merit on account of the future reward, and not the converse.

Item, reprobation — about which there is more apparent doubt — is not on account of future works; therefore neither is predestination. For the Apostle to the Romans 9 puts them on equal footing. "For when," he says, "they were not yet born, nor had done anything good or evil, that the purpose of God might remain according to election, not from works but from Him calling, it was said to her: 'The greater shall serve the lesser, as it is written: Jacob I have loved, but Esau I have hated.'"

On which Augustine in Enchiridion 70 says: "The Apostle, sensing how much it could move those who cannot penetrate by understanding this profundity of grace — what was said, 'Jacob I have loved, but Esau I have hated' — says: 'Is there iniquity with God? God forbid.' For it seems unjust that without any merits of good or evil works God should love one and hate the other." The same is plain through the same Apostle below, in the same [chapter], saying: "On whom He wills, He has mercy, and whom He wills, He hardens." And again: "Has not the potter of clay the power, from the same lump, to make one vessel unto honor, another unto contumely?"

Here, however, it is to be known, according to Lombard in Sentences 1, distinction 41, that both predestination and reprobation can be taken in two ways. For predestination is taken for the eternal preparation by God of grace to be conferred on someone, and for its temporal effect — namely, the conferring of that grace itself. Reprobation, again, is taken for the eternal non-volition of God of grace [to be given] to someone, and for its temporal effect — namely, privation or desertion of grace; and this is called obduration. Where also Lombard says that of God's eternal reprobation itself there is no merit. And below, in the same distinction: "God reprobated those whom He willed, not on account of future merits which He foresaw — yet by a most right truth, removed from our senses."

But if anyone hateful to God should wish to cavil sophistically, saying that the works are not the principal cause of predestination — and so all the things premised must be understood — but that they are the cause without which not (causa sine qua non), since God similarly confers grace temporally just as He predestined it eternally, as was argued above — it follows that God confers grace temporally on account of the merits of works, as the cause without which not, although not as the cause that is utterly principal — which chapter 36 has refuted. And this perversity can similarly be confuted, as chapter 16 confuted a like one.

Item, who would so dote as to say that blessed Augustine, when he expounded certain propositions of the Epistle to the Romans, and wrote the book of Eighty-Three Questions, or the 68th question of those, and said that future merits were the cause of divine predestination, as was recited above — that he was so foolishly and tastelessly wise as to believe that future merits were the principal cause of divine predestination, so that God should not be the more principal cause of it — indeed not [a cause] at all? No sane wise man can doubt that Augustine then understood as such a saying is commonly wont to be understood, and as such words sound among ordinary men. Because, according to the same Augustine in On Christian Doctrine, every doctor ought so to speak. And according to the Philosopher in Topics 2, "in nominations, that which is most often is to be named." For those things which are in voice ought to signify the affections of the soul, as the same Philosopher teaches in Peri Hermeneias 1, and Augustine in On the Trinity 15, [chapter] 10. Which the Apostle teaches diffusely in 1 Corinthians 14. For he says: "Brothers, if I come to you speaking with tongues, what shall I profit you, unless I speak to you either in revelation, or in knowledge, or in prophecy, or in doctrine? Yet things without soul giving voice — whether flute or harp — unless they give a distinction of sounds, how shall it be known what is sung or what is harped? For if the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who will prepare himself for war? So also you, by the tongue, unless you give a clear discourse, how shall what is being said be known? For you will be speaking into the air. There are, suppose, so many kinds of languages in this world. If therefore I do not know the force of the voice, I shall be a barbarian to him to whom I speak, and he who speaks shall be a barbarian to me. But in the Church I would rather speak five words with my understanding, that I may instruct others, than ten thousand words in a tongue."

Hence Nehemiah 8: "He read in the book of the law of God distinctly and openly to be understood." And what was said of speech, the same is to be understood of writing. Since, according to the Philosopher in Peri Hermeneias 1, and Augustine in On the Trinity 15, [chapter] 10, "Those things which are written are notes of those things which are in the voice." According to the Apostle in Romans 15, "Whatever things have been written, have been written for our doctrine."

Augustine, therefore, when he first taught that predestination is made on account of future merits foreknown by God, understood it as commonly such words present themselves to all; and when he afterwards recited it, similarly. According to the later view, then, of Augustine, it is not true to the common understanding of men that anyone is predestined on account of his future works. And the common understanding of men of such a proposition — "Jacob is predestined on account of his future works" — is this: that the future works of Jacob foreknown by God were some at least partial cause moving God to predestine him to the kingdom; not that they were the total and principal cause, such that God should there do nothing, or not do predestination more principally than they.

From these things also it appears that all the Catholic doctors and councils — indeed the whole Church of God — when condemning the heretical errors of Pelagius (who held that grace is given according to our merits, and that anyone is predestined on account of his future merits), understand it in the way stated. Hence it is established that that assertion is heretical which asserts merits to be the cause without which not — i.e., the partial cause moving or exciting God to predestine anyone, or to confer grace upon anyone. And if this is not the common understanding of the Church, and of the Ecclesiastical doctors, concerning the causation of merits with respect to grace and predestination, let this falsigraph without understanding assign, if he can, another more competent common understanding, or even a competent one — at least according to the fiction of his fantastic head; and that understanding of his, and his error according to that understanding, by the things premised — and better perhaps by others, which escape me — as not understanding nor intelligible Catholicly, will, by those who understand Catholicly (as I hope), be sufficiently intelligibly convinced.

But let such men consider — I beg — and fear, since "the Holy Spirit of discipline will flee the feigned, and remove Himself from thoughts which are without understanding"; and therefore in the sight of the Lord let them humbly entreat that He give them, according to His own utterance, an understanding, and not at all according to their understanding, that the utterance of the Lord be given to him. And this is a good understanding to all who do it always.

Corollary, that no one is predestined or reprobated on account of works which he would do if he lived longer; nor is anyone saved on account of works, or damned.

From these things this porism is collected: No one is predestined or reprobated on account of works which he would do if he lived longer; nor is anyone saved on account of works, or damned. For according to the things premised, no one is predestined or reprobated on account of his truly future works; and it seems even less so that anyone should be predestined or reprobated on account of works which he would do if he lived longer. And if no one is predestined or reprobated on account of such works, then neither is anyone saved or damned [on their account], since no one is saved or damned on account of anything other than that on account of which he was predestined to be saved or reprobated to be damned, since the salvation and damnation of anyone proceeds from the divine will, which is altogether invariable, as chapter 23 has demonstrated. Yet from some causes here that distinction concerning propter (on account of), premised in [chapter] 39 of this [Book], can be of value.

And lest I, the lowest, in such a sublime matter should seem alone to define anything, behold for this the manifest Catholic faith which is faithfully professed in the Athanasian Creed: "At whose advent all men have to rise with their bodies, and shall give an account of their own deeds" — "of deeds done," he says, not "of those that would have been done if they had lived longer" — "and those who have done good things shall go into eternal life, but those who have done evil into eternal fire" — namely, according to the good or evil things which they have done; not which they would have done if they had lived longer.

Behold for this same point the principal doctor, holy Paul, in 2 Corinthians 5, saying: "We must all be made manifest before the tribunal of Christ, that each may bear the proper things of the body, according as he has done, whether good or evil" — "according as he has done," he says, not "according as he would have done if he had lived longer." With which view sufficiently accords the form of the future judgment written in Matthew 25. For in the final judgment the goods or evils which the judged have done will be recited, and for those they will be adjudged to glory or to penalties. But of the good or evil things they would have done, if they had lived longer, no mention will be made.

This same conclusion Augustine proves diffusely in On the Predestination of the Saints, [chapter] 14, and through the great process following; and in On the Good of Perseverance, [chapter] 21, and many chapters consequently; and below in the same [work], [chapters] 34 and 35, plainly.

Thomas Bradwardine, De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium

Book I, Chapters 46–47 (Conclusion of Book I)

CHAPTER XLVI. [D] AGAINST CERTAIN PERSONS WHO CONCEDE PREDESTINATION AND REPROBATION TO GLORY AND TO PUNISHMENT, BUT DENY THAT THESE ARE TO ANY DETERMINATE DEGREES.

There is yet, concerning the matter of predestination and reprobation, a certain loquacity so foolish that perhaps it appears more foolish to refute it earnestly than to recount it as a fable. For the Philosopher says in Metaphysics III.15, concerning those who play the sophist with fables: "It is not worthy to attend to them with earnestness." Nevertheless, since the wise man counsels us to answer a fool, lest he seem wise to himself, I shall answer this person not earnestly but in a perfunctory manner, by way of a passing rebuttal. Certain persons, then, seeing predestination and reprobation [E] so firmly grounded that they cannot wholly destroy them, at least endeavor to mutilate them in some respect. For they concede that some persons are predestined to glory, and some reprobated to punishment; yet they say that no one is predestined or reprobated to any determinate degree of glory or of punishment. Now this position cites and adduces no reason or authority to prove its contention, but, as if in mere historical narration, simply asserts that this is so; and therefore it is to be despised with the same facility with which it is asserted.

Nevertheless, out of abundance of caution, I shall bring forward some arguments against it.

When the final judgment has been completed, God will will and prepare for each person his own degree of glory or of punishment; therefore, by Chapter 23 above, He so prepared and willed from eternity; wherefore, by the immediately preceding chapters, He predestined that this should so come to pass from eternity. Likewise, He eternally foreknew this; therefore, by Chapter 18, He eternally pre-willed it. The same is proved by Chapters 22 and 27 and others which follow — indeed, by all of them; for whatever proves predestination [A] in general will likewise prove it in species and in degree; and whatever ought to refute the latter will likewise refute the former.

Likewise, God predestined to each person a degree of merit, therefore also of reward. What I have assumed is plain by Chapter 31, and can yet be made further plain, because no creature, without God acting, moving, and conserving, can do anything or move anything, nor indeed can it further conserve an actually existing action or motion, as Chapters 3, 4, and 14 show. No creature, therefore, can of itself intend its motion or merit without God; for this is something greater. If, then, God temporally intends the merit of anyone, this is not by purely natural means, nor by cognition alone, but by His volition, as Chapters 8 and 9 demonstrate; and by Chapter 23, this volition is not new but eternal; therefore, by the immediately preceding chapters, He so predestined it from of old.

Likewise, grace produces every degree of merit, and only as it is acted upon and moved by God, as Chapter 40 was showing, etc., as was just argued. Likewise, to merit much and intensely is better than [B] to merit simply and remissly; therefore by what was set forth in Chapter 38 of this book, the former is from God. Whence in Philippians 1: "He who began a good work in us will perfect it"; where the Gloss, which is Augustine's, says: "By cooperating in us, God perfects what by working He begins, because He Himself, by beginning, works that we may will, who, by perfecting, cooperates with those who will." And in Against Julian VI.18: "Ignorance and concupiscence are remitted in those being reborn, and diminished in those advancing; ignorance is diminished by truth shining more and more, concupiscence is diminished by charity becoming more and more fervent. None of these two goods is from us. For we have not received the spirit of this world, but the Spirit which is from God, that we may know the things which have been given to us by God."

Likewise, the venerable Bede on Canticles, treating the passage in Cantic VII, "I will go up into the palm tree, and I will take hold of its fruits," speaks thus: "The Lord descends into His garden when He bestows heavenly gifts upon the faithful; He ascends into the palm tree when He grants increases of virtues to advancing elect, when He brings them forward to perfection, when He worthily expends Himself." And below, in the same place, on the verse, "Who is this that ascends, leaning upon her beloved? [C]" — "Deservedly leaning upon Him without whose help she was not only unable to ascend to the summit, but not even to rise again. For we cannot have the advances of the virtues, nor the very beginnings of faith, save by the Lord's bestowal."

Likewise, if God predestined and provided merit to His people absolutely, and not any determinate degree, then as to the degree, God would leave merit unprovided for, and would commit it to chance or to fortune, nor would it be governed by any providence or care; which Chapter 27 with those following does not permit. The Wise Man likewise contradicts this in Wisdom 11, saying to God, "Thou hast disposed all things in measure, and number, and weight." The Philosopher too, in Secretum Secretorum, Part I, Chapter 16, in concord with him says: "God has by His wisdom destined and appointed all things in equal weight, and certain number, and order, and has set them for His servants, that they may serve Him." And in Metaphysics XIII, Chapter 2, he says thus: "But the species and order of the good especially, the commensuration and the determinate." Whence then are these goods, except from the First in the genus of goods, who pours into the rest every good?

Whence Hermes, Concerning the World and Heaven I, says — there [D] the text — "the fated series of ages is the disposition of all temporal things, the goal traced out by the finger of the highest disposer," as was more fully recited in Book II of this work.

Wherefore Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy IV, prose 6, introduces Philosophy saying: "Every generation of things, every progression of mutable natures, and whatever else is moved in any manner, derives its causes, order, and forms from the stability of the divine mind. This, set in order in the citadel of its simplicity, has established a manifold mode for things to be done, which mode, when it is contemplated in the very purity of the divine intelligence, is named providence; but when it is referred to those things which it moves and disposes, it has been called by the ancients fate, which, that they are different things, will easily be made clear. For providence is the divine reason itself, which disposes all things; but fate is the disposition inherent in mobile things, by which providence binds each thing in its proper orders" — that which directs each individual thing in motion, distributed by places, forms, and times, as Chapter 28 has more fully alleged.

Whence Augustine, On Free Will II.28: "Whatsoever goods, however small, however great, cannot be except from God; [E] which, however much they fail and tend to non-being, yet some form remains to them, that in some manner they may be; and whatever remains to anything failing is from that form which knows not how to fail, nor permits the very motions of failing or advancing things to exceed the laws of their numbers." This proposition the blessed Prosper excerpted from this place and inserted as Chapter 380 of his Sentences, with this title prefixed: "The Creator leaves nothing in any creatures unordered."

The same Augustine, On Genesis according to the Letter IV.5, treating the aforesaid authority of the Wise Man and showing in what way these three are God and in what way they are not, says thus: "According to that which we know — measure in the things which we measure, number in the things which we number, and weight in the things which we weigh — God is not these things; but according to that by which measure prefixes the mode of every thing, [A] and number presents the species of every thing, and weight draws every thing to rest and stability — primarily and truly and uniquely, He is these things, who terminates all things, and forms all things, and orders all things, and nothing else is to be understood by this. How could it have been said, by means of a heart and human tongue, 'Thou hast disposed all things in measure, and number, and weight,' unless 'Thou hast disposed all things in Thyself'? For neither measure, nor number, nor weight is to be observed and considered only in stones and woods, and such mobile things, however much they be corporeal, whether terrestrial or celestial. There is also a measure of acting, lest there be irrevocable and immoderate progression; and there is a number of the affections of the soul and of the virtues, by which it is gathered from the deformity of folly to the form and beauty of wisdom; and there is a weight of will and love, by which appears how much each thing is weighed in seeking, in fleeing, in preferring, and in postponing. But this measure of souls and minds is contained by another measure, and number is formed by another number, and weight is drawn by another weight. But the measure without measure is that to which is equated what is from it, nor is it from elsewhere itself; the number without number is that by which all things are formed, [B] but it itself is not formed; the weight without weight is that by which all things are referred that they may rest."

And below, in the same place, VII: "Let us know, therefore, that 'all things are disposed in measure, number, and weight' is so said as if it were said: 'These were so disposed that they should have their proper measures, and their proper numbers, and their proper weight, which would be changed in them according to the mutability of each kind by increases and diminutions, by multitude and paucity, by lightness and gravity, according to the disposition of God."

And in On Predestination against the Pelagians IV: "Who suffices to comprehend this measure, this number, this weight of God, that he might be able to set forth all His ordinances in these three definitions? In measure, I think, consists quality; in number, quantity; in weight, balanced reason." Whence in Numbers 22: "If Balak should give me his house full of gold and silver, I shall not be able to alter the word of the Lord my God, to speak more or less."

To this last sentence Gregory plainly accords in Moralia XXVII.22, on Job 37: "The clouds scatter their light, which traverse all things round about: wherever the will of the Governor shall lead them, to all that He has commanded them." [C]

Likewise, what Christian is so undevout and arid as never to pray to God that He purify his thoughts, increase his devotion, and inflame his love, and make him abound in good works, since the whole Church humbly prays: "Almighty everlasting God, direct our actions according to Thy good pleasure, that in the name of Thy beloved Son we may merit to abound in good works"? And the Apostle prays this for his neighbor; who therefore will not pray it for himself? "This I pray," says the Apostle, "that your charity may abound more and more," in Philippians 1; and in 1 Thessalonians 3: "May God multiply you, and make you to abound in charity, both toward one another and toward all"; and to whom did he pray for this, except to God? And why do we ask God for this, unless He brings about what we ask? For otherwise to ask Him would seem vain and ridiculous.

Wherefore blessed Augustine, On the Gift of Perseverance 2, proving that perseverance is not from us but from God, argues in this way: "Why is perseverance asked from God, if it is not given by God? Or is this also a derisive request, when it is asked from Him [D] which is known not to be His to give, but to be in the power of man? But 'do not err,' says the Apostle, 'God is not mocked.' If you truly and faithfully ask anything from so great a wealthy One, from Him from whom you ask, believe that you receive what you ask. Do not honor Him with your lips and lift yourself up against Him in your heart, believing that what you pretend to ask of Him is from yourself."

The same is found below in the same work, 36 and 12, where Augustine always wills that nothing is to be asked from God except what is believed to be done by Him; and On Grace and Free Will 29: "We say, 'Lead us not into temptation,' that sins might be avoided, which we should by no means ask from the Father who is in heaven if we could effect this by the power of human will." And below, in the same place, he says that blessed Cyprian in his book On the Lord's Prayer shows that those things which are commanded to be fulfilled in the Law are also to be sought in prayer; which surely, as Augustine says, "would be done most vainly, if for the doing of these things, without divine aid, the human will sufficed."

And On Holy Virginity 17: "Witnesses are the voices of pious supplications, that those very things which are commanded by God are not done unless He gives and aids who commands; for they are mendaciously asked for, [E] if without His aiding grace we could do them."

Blessed Cyprian also, in Homily 5, which is entitled On the Lord's Prayer, expounding that little verse, "And suffer us not to be led into temptation," says thus: "When we ask not to come into temptation, we are admonished of our weakness and infirmity, lest anyone insolently lift himself up; since the Lord Jesus, teaching humility, said: 'Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation; the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak'; that, when humble and submissive confession precedes, and the whole is given to God, whatever is suppliantly asked with the fear of God may be granted by His piety."

This authority Augustine also adduces to the same conclusion concerning the gift of perseverance, in 9. And the Lord plainly intimates the same thing in Matthew 7, when He says thus: "Ask, and it shall be given you, or ye shall receive; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you" — by Him, namely, of whom ye ask, whom ye seek, on whom ye knock. And the Apostle in Romans 10: "The same Lord of all is rich unto all [A] who call upon Him" — namely, His riches, as Lord, generously distributing to all who from within faithfully call upon Him. Whence the Psalmist: "Delight thou in the Lord, and He shall give thee the petitions of thy heart," in Psalm 36; and James 1: "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him; but let him ask in faith, nothing wavering; for he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea, which is moved and carried about by the wind. Let not that man therefore think that he shall receive anything of the Lord."

He, then, who asks faithfully, by no means wavering, ought to hope that he will receive from the Lord the things asked; which the entire series of both Testaments most frequently testifies. Since therefore we faithfully ask from the Lord increases of good works, no Catholic is to waver but that the Lord will bestow these on us abundantly.

Whence the Apostle, 2 Corinthians 9: "God is able to make all grace abound in you, that ye, having always all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work. And He that ministereth seed to the sower will both provide bread for eating, and will multiply your seed, [B] and will increase the increases of the fruits of your righteousness."

Whence the holy Prosper, in his book On Behalf of the Preachers of God's Grace II, recites a certain definition of Cassian — most Catholic, as he calls it: "From which," he says, "it is plainly gathered, that not only of acts but also of good thoughts the beginning is from God, who both inspires in us the beginnings of holy will, and bestows the strength and opportunity of accomplishing those things which we rightly desire. For 'every good gift, and every perfect gift is from above, descending from the Father of lights,' who both begins the things which are good, and pursues, and consummates them in us, the Apostle saying: 'He who gives seed to the sower will both provide bread for eating, and will make to grow the fruits of your righteousness.'"

Furthermore, who is so foolish a flatterer as to give thanks to God for anything which he does not believe himself to have received from Him, as Chapter 31 was arguing? And who is so ungrateful as never to render thanks to God for the increase of good acts and works? Indeed, since the Apostle says in 2 Thessalonians 1: "We are bound to give thanks always to God for you, brethren, as it is meet, [C] because your faith groweth, and the charity of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth." Upon which Augustine, in On Grace and Free Will 40, says: "These things the Apostle said, lest perhaps concerning so great a good, which they had from God, they should be lifted up as if having it from themselves. 'For what reason, therefore, your faith super-grows,' he says, 'and the charity of every one of you all toward each other abounds, we ought to give thanks to God for you.'"

Likewise, God predestined to Samson so great a merit, that he should many times abstain, and be a Nazarite of the Lord, and should begin to deliver the people of Israel out of the hand of the Philistines, in Judges 7. Likewise, He similarly predestined so great a merit to Solomon, that he should build a temple to Him, in 2 Kings 7. And to Isaiah so much, that he should make his mouth as a sharp sword, that he should be the salvation of the Lord even to the ends of the earth, with many other eminencies of merits, in Isaiah 49. And to Jeremiah so much, that he should be a prophet to the gentiles, that he should go to all to whom He should send him, that he should speak all things which He should command him, and that he should be set [D] over the nations and the kingdoms, to root up, and pull down, and waste, and to destroy, and to build, and to plant, in Jeremiah 1.

And to John the Baptist so much, that he should be great before the Lord, that he should drink no wine nor strong drink, and should turn many of the children of Israel to the Lord their God, and should go before the Lord in the spirit and power of Elias, in Luke 1; indeed, that he should be called an angel, who should also prepare the way before the face of Jesus Christ, as is sufficiently plain from Malachi 3 and Matthew 11. And to Paul so much, that the Lord Jesus Christ predicted concerning him: "He is a vessel of election to me, to bear my name before the Gentiles, and Kings, and the children of Israel: for I will show him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake," as is plain from Acts 9. Many similar instances also occur most frequently in Scripture.

And who, finally, would dare say that no determinate degree of merit was predestined to the Lord Jesus Christ, but that this was neglected through carelessness, and dismissed to chance and to fortune — when nearly all the prophets, in the spirit of the Lord, most studiously prophesied concerning His greatest merits, and Christ Himself said to His Father: "Lord, Thou hast proved me and known me; Thou hast known my sitting down, and my rising up; [E] Thou hast understood my thoughts from afar; Thou hast searched out my path and my line, and Thou hast foreseen all my ways," in Psalm 138?

Nor can anyone feign that He predestines to some a determinate degree of merit, and to some not; or to one some degree of future merit, and to another not — on account of Chapter 27 and others which follow, and because "the Lord, who is the ruler of all, will not subtract the person of any man, nor will He stand in awe of any man's greatness, since He hath made the little and the great, and equally is the care of all to Him," in Wisdom 6.

But to these things the obstinate one will perhaps reply that God did not predestine these great recorded merits, but only foretold them. But this cannot stand, because if God truly foretold these things, He foreknew them; therefore He eternally pre-willed them and predestined them, as Chapters 18, 23, and the immediately preceding chapters [A] clearly show.

It can also be had from Chapter 31 of this book, that God predestined all merits to all persons; therefore these merits to these persons. It is plain, moreover, from the series of Scripture alleged above, that God not only foretold, but also promised those great merits; wherefore He Himself was going to do them, and this by His will — not new, but eternal, etc., as above. Indeed, in Joshua 23 it is written: "As therefore God has fulfilled in deed what He promised, and all things have prospered, so He will bring upon you whatever evils He has threatened, because ye have transgressed the covenant of the Lord your God."

And the Apostle in Romans 4, speaking concerning the promise which the Lord made to Abraham in Genesis 15, that his seed should be as the stars of heaven, says thus: "In the promise of God he hesitated not by distrust, but was strengthened in faith, giving glory to God, most fully knowing that whatsoever God has promised, He is able also to do."

Treating which authority, Augustine in On Rebuke and Grace 56 says: "He Himself, then, makes them good, that they may do good things; for He did not for that reason promise them to Abraham, because He foreknew that they would be good of themselves: for if that, indeed, is not His own but theirs [B] which He promised — but Abraham did not so believe, but because what He promised, He is able also to do — He did not say: what He foreknew He is able to promise, or what He foretold He is able to show, or what He promised He is able to foreknow; but, what He promised, He is able also to do. He, therefore, makes them persevere in good, who makes them good."

The same in On the Predestination of the Saints III: "It must be guarded against, brothers, beloved by God, lest a man should lift himself up against God, when he says he himself does what God promised. Was not faith promised to Abraham? He, giving glory to God, most fully believed, because what God promised, He is able also to do. He Himself, therefore, makes the faith of the gentiles, who is able to do what He promised."

And below in the same work, 12: "God promised what He Himself was going to do, not what men were to do; for although men do good things which pertain to the worship of God, He Himself causes that they may do what He has commanded; not they that He may do what He promised. Otherwise, that the promises of God should be fulfilled, would not be in God's, but in men's power; and what was promised by the Lord would be rendered to Abraham by Abraham himself."

The same, in On the Spirit and the Letter 18: "God promises what He Himself does; for He does not [C] promise and another does — that would no longer be to promise, but to predict." Whence also the 45th proposition of Prosper's Sentences is excerpted.

And if anyone is yet not ashamed to cavil further, by saying that in the foregoing authorities of Scripture there is concerning merits not promise but prediction, let him hear the Apostle in Romans 9, saying: "Not all who are of Israel, are they Israelites; nor are they all the children of Abraham who are the seed of Abraham, but in Isaac shall thy seed be called," from Genesis 21 — that is, "Not those who are the children of the flesh, are the children of God; but those who are the children of the promise are accounted as the seed. For the word of promise is this: At this time will I come, and Sarah shall have a son," from Genesis 18.

And Augustine says in On the Spirit and the Letter 18: "It is itself the promise to Abraham by which it was said to him, 'In Isaac shall thy seed be called.'" If, therefore, these words, "In Isaac shall thy seed be called, and Sarah shall have a son," are words of promise, why not other similar words similarly delivered?

Furthermore, of evil works such as tribulations and persecutions there is a determinate term established beforehand; therefore also of good works: for God's care is no less concerning good works than concerning evil ones. Whence Psalm 79: "Thou shalt feed us with the bread [D] of tears, and shalt give us drink with tears in measure"; and Psalm 103: "The mountains ascend, and the plains descend into the place which Thou hast founded for them; Thou hast set a bound which they shall not pass, neither shall they return to cover the earth."

Where Augustine, in tract 2, by mountains and plains in no way understands different things, but the same — namely, secular powers behaving in different manners. Whence he says thus: "As long as the mountains ascend and the plains descend, they raged and were appeased; when they raged, they were mountains; when they were appeased, they became plains: for He has founded a place for them. Why do they not rage now? why do they not go mad? why do they not labor — if they cannot subvert our land, surely to cover it? why not? Hear: 'Thou hast set a bound which they shall not pass, neither shall they return to cover the earth.' They have received the appointed bound, because they cannot transgress the imposed end."

Likewise, Psalm 94: "In His hand are all the ends of the earth, and the heights of the mountains are His." Upon which Augustine says: "The earthly powers have been opposed to the Church; they have promulgated laws against the Church, [E] they have endeavored to blot out the Christian name from the earth. You perhaps are troubled by so many temptations on account of the scandals of the world; but not even those scandals do anything to you, because they have received their measure from the Lord, because the sea is His. For this world is the sea, nor can the waves rage save up to the shore where He Himself has set the bound. No temptation, therefore, unless it shall have received measure from the Lord, takes anything from you, corrects something, smoothes something, cleanses something."

And in City of God V.22: "These earthly kingdoms the one true God rules and governs as it pleases Him; thus also the very times of wars, as it is in His judgment and just judgment and mercy, either to wear down or to console the human race, that some end more quickly, others more slowly."

Blessed Job clearly manifests the same. Whence in 28 he says thus: "He" — namely, God — "beholdeth the ends of the world, and looketh on all things that are under heaven, who made a weight for the winds, and weighed the waters by measure, when He gave a law for the rains, and a way for the sounding storms." And below, in 38: "I encompassed [A] it" — namely, the sea — "with my bounds, and made it bars and doors, and said: Hitherto thou shalt come, and shalt go no further."

Likewise, every predestined person will have a degree of reward according to the degree of his virtues, and especially of charity or grace, because by however much anyone shall be better, by so much will it be better for him. And according to the Philosopher, Ethics II.6: "Every virtue, of whatever it shall be virtue, also makes that thing well-disposed and perfect."

And according to Augustine, Enchiridion 95: "Charity, by however much greater it is in anyone, by so much better is the one in whom it is."

But every increase of true virtue, of charity or of grace, is from God acting and willing it, and this not by a new volition but by an ancient one. God, therefore, predestined to each one a determinate degree of these virtues in this life, and of rewards in the homeland. That God brings about the increase of virtues in this life is proved from this: that God brings about the increases of good works, as has been proved above; from which the habits are always increased, as is plain from the Philosopher, Ethics II.2; or, if there be any habits which are not increased from works, those are increased by God alone.

Likewise, by Chapter 2, no creature alone can preserve [B] any virtue in being, therefore not in any determinate degree, since this is the same or greater. Likewise, nearly all the reasons and authorities proving the increases of works to be from God will similarly prove the increases of virtues to be from Him; especially the arguments from petition and giving of thanks. For the faithful faithfully ask from God increase of virtues; wherefore the whole Church thus prays: "Grant us, we beseech Thee, O Lord, increase of faith, hope, and charity." Whence the Apostles, who were already faithful, said: "Lord, increase our faith," in Luke 17. And the father of the sick boy: "I believe, Lord, help my unbelief," in Mark 9. The Apostle also, in 1 Thessalonians 3: "May the Lord," he says, "multiply you, and make you to abound in charity also one toward another, and toward all"; and many similar passages occur frequently in Scripture.

Likewise, who is so ungrateful and ingrate as not to render thanks to God for the increase of charity and grace, when he would do this with prompt heart for the increase of temporal goods? Moreover, the Apostle in 2 Thessalonians 1 says thus: "We are bound to give thanks to God always for you, as it is meet, because your faith super-groweth, [C] and the charity of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth." Since therefore the increase of virtue is asked of God, and for it received thanks worthy of God are returned, it is certain that it is given by Him, as has been argued above.

This gradual progress of virtues and merits, and the determinate terms of prosperities and adversities, and of human life itself, divinely constituted, blessed Job shows by saying: "Thou hast appointed his bounds which cannot be passed," in Job 14. And below, in 31: "I will declare him through every one of my degrees."

On the first of which, blessed Gregory, Moralia XII.1, says: "None of those things which happen to men in this world come without the secret counsel of Almighty God; for foreknowing all things that are to follow, He decrees them before the ages, in what manner they may be disposed through the ages. It is even now appointed for man, both how much the prosperity of this world will follow him, and how much adversity will strike him, lest either immoderate prosperity should lift up His elect, or excessive adversity should weigh them down. It is also appointed how long he is to live temporally in this very mortal life. Well, therefore, is it said: 'Thou hast appointed his bounds which cannot [D] be passed.' Which, however, can also be understood according to the spirit, because sometimes we strive to advance in the virtues, and we apprehend certain gifts, but, repulsed from certain others, we lie in the depths. For there is no one who apprehends as much of virtue as he desires, because Almighty God, discerning the inner things, sets a measure to spiritual advances themselves; that, from this good which he strives to apprehend and is unable, he may not lift himself up in those things which he is able to do."

Upon the second, in Moralia XXII.18 and 19, he beautifully teaches the same sentence, as is more fully recited in Chapter 41 of this book. Who also, below in 20, shows the same by that passage in Mark 9, "I believe, Lord, help my unbelief"; and by that passage in Luke 17, "Increase our faith"; and by the authority of Ezekiel 47, which, expounding morally, he speaks thus: "Wisdom itself, which is wont to be the mistress of good works, is granted to the panting mind by increases, that to it, doubtless, the ascent is made by the steps of great moderation; which the prophet Ezekiel well announces in figurative narration, who, concerning that man whom he had seen on the lofty mountain, narrates, saying: 'He measured a thousand cubits, and he led me through the water [E] up to the ankles; again he measured a thousand, and he led me through the water up to the knees, and he measured a thousand, and he led me through the water up to the loins, and he measured a thousand, and he led me to a torrent which I could not pass, because the deep waters of the torrent had swelled, which cannot be forded.' For what is signified by the millenary number, except the fullness of the gift conferred?" This passage of Gregory is also recited in the Canon, De Poenitentia, distinction 2, "Haec quae de charitate."

Furthermore, charity or grace is a habit not naturally acquired, nor naturally acquirable by any creature, but supernaturally infused gratuitously by God, as Chapter 35 and those following have taught. Wherefore neither can it be naturally increased: for it is of the same nature under any of its degrees. As therefore by the Lord alone it is created, so also by Him alone is it increased.

Whence [A] the Psalmist, in Psalm 137, says to God: "Thou shalt multiply strength in my soul." And the Apostle says, in 2 Corinthians 3: "We are transformed from glory to glory by the Spirit of the Lord"; and in Romans 12: "Each one as God hath divided the measure of faith." On which the Gloss, which is ascribed to Augustine, says: "Which faith, namely, God has measuredly divided. For He divides faith measuredly to each one."

Who also, on Psalm 118, "Set me a law, O Lord," etc., in Sermon 11, says: "Why does this man yet ask that a law be set for him, which surely, if it had not been set for him, he would not have run the way of God's commandments in the breadth of heart, that is, in charity, the fullness of the law? But because he speaks as one advancing, and knows that what he advances is God's gift, what else does he ask, when he asks that the law be set for him, except that in it he may more and more advance? Finally, he added: 'And I will seek it always.' For what does he seek which he has, except because he both has it by acting, and seeks it by advancing? But what is 'always'? Or is 'always' said while he lives here, because so long he is advancing?"

And below, in the same place, on the same Psalm: "Give me understanding, that I may learn Thy commandments," Sermon 18, he says thus: "Our understanding advances unto the understanding of those things which it believes, and faith advances [B] unto believing those things which it understands; and that those very things may be more and more understood, the mind advances in understanding itself: but this is not done by its own forces as natural, but by God aiding and giving, just as a remedy is made — not by nature — that the diseased eye may receive the power of seeing. He, therefore, who says to God, 'Give me understanding that I may learn Thy commandments,' is not in every way without it like cattle, nor so, although a man, that he is to be reckoned in the number of those who walk in the vanity of their mind, darkened in understanding, alienated from the life of God: for if he were such, he would not even say this. But it is no small thing of understanding to know from whom understanding is to be sought; and it is to be considered how much more deeply divine commandments are to be understood, when, that he may yet learn them, he asks that understanding be given to him, who already so understands, and who has already said before that he has kept God's words."

Likewise, in 1 Corinthians 12: "There are diversities of graces, but the same Spirit; and there are diversities of ministries, but the same Lord; and there are diversities of operations, but the same God, who worketh all in all. And the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man for [C] profit; to one indeed, by the Spirit, is given the word of wisdom; to another, the word of knowledge; to another, faith; to another, the grace of healing; to another, the working of miracles; to another, prophecy; to another, the discerning of spirits; to another, divers kinds of tongues; to another, interpretation of speeches: but all these things one and the same Spirit worketh, dividing to every one according as He will."

Here the Apostle manifestly shows that as well the habits of virtues as the acts are divided to each one according to the will of the Holy Spirit, and from one God who works all in all. Whence it is clear that as well their beginnings as their increases are similarly distributed.

This Augustine plainly testifies, On the Predestination of the Saints 13, thus saying: "When it is said," they say (namely, the Pelagians), "'If thou shalt believe, thou shalt be saved' — one of these is exacted, the other is offered; what is exacted is in man's power, what is offered is in God's. Why not both in God's — both what He commands, and what is offered? For He is asked to give what He commands. Believers ask that faith be increased to them; they ask for unbelievers that faith be granted them; both in its increases, and [D] in its beginnings, therefore, faith is the gift of God. But it is so said, 'If thou shalt believe, thou shalt be saved,' as it is said, 'If by the Spirit ye shall mortify the deeds of the flesh, ye shall live': for here also of the two one is exacted, the other is offered; 'If by the Spirit,' he says, 'ye shall mortify the deeds of the flesh, ye shall live.' That, therefore, we should mortify the deeds of the flesh by the Spirit, is exacted; that we should live, is offered. Whence, then, does it please that we should say that to mortify the deeds of the flesh is not the gift of God, nor confess this to be the gift of God, since we hear it exacted from us, with the reward of life offered if we shall do this? Far be it that this should please those who are sharers, defenders of grace; this is the damnable error of the Pelagians, whose mouths the Apostle soon after stopped, adjoining: 'For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God,' lest we should believe that we mortify the deeds of the flesh not through God's Spirit, but through our own; concerning which Spirit of God He was also speaking there, where he says: 'But all these things one and the same Spirit worketh, dividing his own to every one as He will' — among which He named also faith."

The error of the Pelagians is, therefore, damnable to share faith or grace — namely, its beginning and increase — [E] giving one to God and the other to ourselves; for the whole is wholly to be given to God, as is plain by the same Augustine, above, in the third [chapter] of the same work, thus saying: "If God works our faith, acting in our hearts in a wonderful manner that we may believe, is it to be feared that He cannot do the whole, and therefore that man claims for himself the first parts of it, that he may merit to receive the last from Him? See if anything else is done in this manner, except that the grace of God should be given according to our merits in any way whatsoever, and so grace would no longer be grace. For thus, by this pact, what is owed is rendered, not given freely; for it is owed to the believer that his faith be increased by the Lord, and the increased faith would be the reward of the faith received."

And below, in the same work: "Man composes with God, that he may claim part of faith for himself, and leave the part to Him; and what is more lofty, he himself takes the first, and gives the latter to Him; and in that which he says is of both, he makes himself the prior, God the posterior." From which it is plain that faith is increased by God, and that it is of pride that man should attribute part of faith to himself, part to God. The whole, therefore, of [A] our good let us wholly give to God, Augustine saying in On the Gift of Perseverance 9: "We live more safely if we give the whole to God, and do not commit ourselves to Him in part, and to ourselves in part."

Likewise, this was the error of Cassian the Pelagian. For he himself, as the holy Prosper recites in his book On Behalf of the Preachers of God's Grace, against Cassian 25, in his second definition spoke thus: "Divine protection, therefore, is inseparably present to us, and so great is the Creator's piety toward His creature, that providence not only accompanies it, but also continually precedes it, which the Prophet, having experienced, confesses, saying: 'My God, His mercy shall prevent me'; who, however, when He has perceived in us a certain rising of good will, illumines it and confirms it, and incites it to salvation, granting increases to that which He Himself planted, or perceived to have emerged by our exertion." Against whom Prosper immediately subjoins: "Now in this point there is a departure from the foregoing definition, and what had been wholly given to grace is now in part assigned to free will."

Likewise, the Pelagian error gave to us the beginning of our faith, and to God the whole increase, as is plain from On the Predestination [B] of the Saints 2 and 3. This error gives to God the beginning, and to us the whole increase. Therefore this differs from that as much as a thing converted from its converse; indeed, this seems worse than that. For the former attributes to man the prior part of faith, but the worse — that is, the less good — and gives the latter, but better, to God; this, on the contrary, attributes the better part to man, and gives the worse to God.

Likewise, if the increase of grace were to be attributed to man, this would be on account of human merit, namely, because the merit of human will would precede, and the increase of grace would follow; which is against Augustine writing to Pope Boniface, against the Pelagians, as Lombard recites in Sentences II, distinction 26, in these words: "Grace itself merits to be increased, that, increased, it may merit also to be perfected, with will accompanying, not leading; following, not preceding." With which Chapter 41 also accords, proving that grace in acting precedes the human will. Chapter 39 also proves that no one merits the increase of grace by condignity; rather, that the very increase of grace is given freely; therefore also it was freely predestined [C] by Him, as has been frequently argued.

This, moreover, the Apostle testifies in Colossians 2, thus saying: "Let no man seduce you, willing in humility and religion of angels, walking in things which he hath not seen, in vain puffed up by the sense of his flesh, and not holding the Head, from which the whole body, by joints and bands, supplied with nourishment and built up, increases unto the increase of God." Upon which the Gloss: "The Head, that is, Christ, from which, that is, of whose fullness receiving, the whole body, that is, the Church, by the joints of charity and the bands of faith and hope and works, in which the faithful are joined and made similar, supplied with nourishment and built up, increases unto the increase of God, that is, as much as God provided." Therefore the increase of virtues and works is provided for and predestined by God under any of its degrees; wherefore also to each predestined person there is predestined a determinate degree of beatitude. For these things mutually correspond to one another, which can also be shown by nearly all the same things by which the foregoing about the degree of works and virtues was shown.

Furthermore, specially to this same purpose: the diversity of mansions in the house of the heavenly Father is no less for the perfection and adornment of the city [D] of the glorious God, than is the number of citizens; but the latter is predestined by God; therefore so also is the former. This number, indeed, the venerable Anselm not only asserts but also proves, in Cur Deus

Homo I.16, in this manner: "It is not to be doubted that the rational nature, which is or shall be blessed in the contemplation of God, is foreknown by God in some rational and perfect number, so that it is fitting that it be neither greater nor less. For either God does not know in what number it is more fitting that it be constituted — which is false — or, if He knows, in that number He will constitute it." And this same reason proceeds similarly concerning the degrees of rewards.

And Augustine says, On Free Will III.18: "If all the angels had sinned, they would have made no scarcity for ruling His empire to the Creator of the angels: for neither would His goodness, as if from some weariness, nor His omnipotence, by difficulty, fall short for creating others whom He would place in those seats which the others by sinning would have deserted; nor could spiritual creation of any number whatsoever, condemned for its own merits, narrow the order, which conveniently and decently receives whatsoever condemned ones." [E]

If, therefore, in the seats of those sinning others are to be placed, the number seems determinate beforehand; and if there is a determinate order which conveniently and decently receives whatever condemned ones, much more does it seem to be similarly so concerning the saved.

The same in Enchiridion 21: "The supernal Jerusalem, our mother, the city of God, will be defrauded of no number of her citizens, or perhaps will reign with even fuller abundance. For we know neither the number of holy men, nor of unclean demons, in whose place succeeding, the children of holy mother Church, who appeared barren on earth, will remain in that peace from which those fell, without any term of time. But the number of those citizens, whether what is, or what shall be, is in the contemplation of that Artificer who calls the things that are not as those that are, and disposes all things in measure, and number, and weight."

The same, in [A] On Rebuke and Grace 61: "So determinate is the number of the predestined, that none can be added to them, nor can any be diminished from them"; which he proves by two authorities of Scripture. The first is from Matthew 3: "Bring forth," says John the Baptist, "fruit worthy of penance, and say not within yourselves, We have Abraham for our father; for God is able of these stones to raise up children to Abraham" — to show that they are so to be cut off, if they bring not forth fruit, that the number which is promised to Abraham may not be lacking.

"Yet more openly is it said in the Apocalypse: 'Hold fast that which thou hast, that no man take thy crown'" — and it is Apocalypse 3. "For if no other is to receive unless this one shall lose, the number of the elect is determinate" — that is, it cannot be increased or diminished, as Lombard expounds it, Sentences I, distinction 40, as also seems a reasonable understanding.

To which Job 34 sufficiently consonants: "He shall break in pieces many and innumerable, and shall make others to stand in their place." Upon which Gregory, Moralia XXV.9, says: "It is to be noted, that while, others falling, others are described as confirmed in standing, the number of the elect is shown to be determinate and definite. Whence also to the Church of Philadelphia [B] is said by the angel: 'Hold fast that which thou hast, that no man take thy crown.'"

Yet further, according to the foregoing: the diversity of the degrees of mansions in heaven is recognized to pertain no less to divine providence and predestination, than the proper names of the future heavenly citizens. But the proper names of all the elect are most certainly contained under divine providence and predestination. For the Prophet says concerning God: "He numbereth the multitude of the stars, and calleth them all by their names," in Psalm 146. And by the stars, Augustine and all the Doctors understand the elect and the predestined. Is not this also fittingly figured in that command of the Lord: "Take the sum of the whole congregation of the children of Israel, by their congregations and houses, and the names of each one," in Numbers 1?

Does not Truth itself say: "Rejoice, because your names are written in heaven," Luke 10? And in John 10 He calls His own sheep by name. Upon which Augustine, in Sermon 45: "For He has their names written in the book of life. Whence the Apostle says: 'The Lord knoweth them that are His.'"

Furthermore, the diversity of degrees of the heavenly mansions in the heavenly [C] Church works the beauty and adornment, just as the diversity of sounds perfects sweeter melody, and the variety of colors makes a picture more beautiful, as none is ignorant. Whence, just as also the philosophical and theological matters concerning contraries and diverse things set forth above, in Chapter 34 of Book I, testify.

Wherefore Alhazen, Optics II, in the chapter on beauty, says: "Diversity makes beauty: since the figures of an animal's members are of diverse parts, and they are not beautiful except on account of the diversity of the parts. For if the entire nose were of equal thickness, it would be at the height of ugliness; and its beauty is on account of the diversity of its two extremities, and its pyramidity. And similarly, the beauty of the eyebrows is only when their extremities are thinner than the remaining anterior parts. And similarly all members of an animal, when they are looked at, it is found that their beauty is only from the diversity of the figures of their parts. And similarly with respect to writing: since if all parts of writing were of equal thickness, they would not appear beautiful, since the extremities of letters do not appear beautiful, [D] except when they are thinner than the rest. For if the extremities of letters, and their middles, and their continuations were of one mode of thickness, the writing would be at the height of ugliness. Therefore, diversity makes beauty."

Why else would God command the curtains of the tabernacle to be made varied, and the veil to be woven with beautiful variety? Why else would the Prophet, from the variety of clothing, praise the heavenly Queen, the triumphant Church, the Spouse of Christ not having spot nor wrinkle, by saying: "The queen stood on Thy right hand in golden clothing, surrounded with variety"? And who is the Author of this beauty, except the most beautiful Author of all beauty, God — and not by a mutable and novel will, but by an immutable and eternal one, as the foregoing have perspicuously taught?

COROLLARY.

COROLLARY: THAT ALL DEGREES OF GRACES, MERITS, PROSPERITIES, ADVERSITIES, [E] OF GLORY OR OF PUNISHMENT, IN THE PRESENT AND IN THE FUTURE, ARE ALIKE PREDESTINED BY GOD ETERNALLY AND DISTINCTLY.

From these things, then, it is evidently perceived that all degrees, both each and every one, of graces, of merits, of prosperities, of adversities, of glory, or of punishment, in the present and in the future, are alike predestined by God eternally and distinctly. This entire Corollary follows so plainly from the foregoing, that it nowhere needs the help of proof.

CHAPTER XLVII. HE OBJECTS, AND HE RESPONDS.

The Pelagians object against the foregoing concerning Predestination and Reprobation, attempting either utterly to destroy them, or at least to show that they are according to the merits of persons. "God," they say, "does nothing irrationally; and there is no reason why He should predestine or reprobate one rather than another. Therefore He predestines or reprobates everyone, or no one. And not everyone, as all alike say; therefore no one. Or if there is any reason why He predestines or reprobates this one and not that one, [B] that reason cannot be founded except in merits, and in the difference of merits."

Wherefore Joachim, Abbot of Fiore, Concerning the Foreknowledge of God and the Predestination of the Elect, dialoguing between Benedict who asks and himself who responds, assigns a twofold reason and cause of God's Election, Predestination, and mercy: of which the first is aptitude for mercy, salvation, and good; the second, the good action itself; and of contraries he posits contrary causes and contrary reasons.

Likewise: "He gave them power to be made the sons of God," John 1. Therefore that men, according to Predestination and grace, may be made sons of God, is in their free power, and only by merits acceptable to God. With which the Prophet also accords, Psalm 68, where, having recited the sins of certain persons, he subjoins: "Let them be blotted out of the book of the living, and with the just let them not be written." And the passage of Apocalypse 3: "Hold fast that which thou hast, that no man take thy crown" — which, namely, God promised to those who choose Him.

Likewise, if Adam had not sinned, no one would have been reprobated, but each would have been predestined; therefore each of these is on account of corresponding merit. Likewise, it would be unjust and cruel [C] for a man or angel to harm another without any preceding fault, nor could he do this without fault; how much more, then, does this not befit the most just and most pious God? Therefore neither does it befit Him to reprobate anyone, and to predestine him to eternal fire, except on account of some preceding fault.

But the irrational reason of the first of these can be lucidly resolved by the foregoing, and by Chapters 21 and 35, and by following chapters. As for what is brought in for confirmation from Joachim — although he was a great Doctor, he does not have great authority. As in the matter of the Trinity he was an Arian, as is plain in the little book which he published against Peter Lombard, On the Trinity, or On the Essence of the Trinity, and through Innocent III, and the General Council, as is recited Extra de summa Trinitate et fide catholica, "Damnamus": so in this matter he was a Pelagian, by positing the original cause of Predestination and Reprobation not on the part of God who Predestines and Reprobates, but on the part of those Predestined and Reprobated — namely, aptitude and act, as is recited above.

He labors, however, to decline as a perilous sea the Pelagian sea, [D] by saying that the cause of Election and divine Reprobation is aptitude for mercy or for wrath, but not for works or acts. And to Benedict asking what that aptitude for good or for evil is, if it is not good or evil works — as the Apostle says concerning Jacob and Esau — he responds that it is not work, but a receptacle of grace or of wrath, from the first of which good works arise, from the second evil ones. And below: "When God elected these or those, He did not seek in them the righteousness which He Himself was about to give, but only the matter of humility and of pitiableness — that is, that they should be apt for mercy."

But because he came too near the shore of the Pelagian sea, suffering precipice, he was absorbed by its whirlpool, so that he also said that the cause of Predestination and Reprobation was the merits of persons. And, that I may briefly recollect his diffuse process: he wills that the cause of Predestination be humility, of Reprobation, pride. For he says: "Abjection and misery are properly the cause of divine election. Whence the Apostle: 'See, brethren, your vocation, that not many are wise according to the flesh, but the foolish things of the world [E] hath God chosen.'"

And below: "It is clearer than light that no one is taken up by God on account of righteousness, but on account of misery; not on account of works, but on account of paltriness; not on account of strength, but on account of weakness; not on account of wisdom, but on account of foolishness; not on account of nobility, but on account of ignobility — just as that Pharisee was repelled on account of his righteousness, but the publican was taken up on account of his sins; not because God loves iniquity and hates the purity of innocence, but because He repels the one who is proud of his righteousness, but spares the humble penitents from sins."

And below: "The cause of election is abjection and affliction, not because these simply please God, but because they bring forth humility — which alone God requires as a virtue in angels and in men." And below: "Because the Lord foreknew that the Jewish people would be proud, He hated and repelled them."

From which it also evidently appears that he is contrary [A] to himself. How also can it stand that aptitude is the cause of predestination or reprobation, since of two equally apt persons one is sometimes taken up, and the other is left; indeed, sometimes the less apt is taken up, and the more apt is left? How also is abjection and misery the cause of divine predestination, when many — as I fear — abject, miserable, and beggarly here, are finally reprobated; many also here always noble, fortunate, and rich, are predestined to life? In the holy angels also, predestined and finally confirmed, there was never abjection nor misery of any kind, since neither of fault nor of penalty. What, moreover, was the abjection or misery the cause whereby Christ was predestined Son of God in power, in Romans 1? Which could also be refuted by many other reasons. But because not many adhere to it, let these few suffice.

But as to their alleging John saying, "He gave them power to be made the sons of God," they seem to wish to construct from this that some are made or can be made newly the sons of God according to predestination — namely, that out of those not predestined, and therefore out of the reprobate, they are made newly and temporally predestined, and similarly cease to be reprobated, against what was shown before in Chapters 23 and 45 of this work, which also evidently includes a contradiction, [B] as can perspicuously be demonstrated from the same places.

Moreover, John's statement seems rather to prove the contrary. For he does not say: "He gave them power to make themselves sons of God," but "to be made sons of God." But by whom? Surely not from themselves, surely not from their own will? Who ever begets himself? Who is ever born from himself? What son of the Devil can beget himself, and bring forth a son of God? Hear what follows: "Neither," he says, "from the will of the flesh, nor from the will of man, but from God they were born." Therefore not they make themselves, but God makes them sons of God.

Wherefore the Philosopher, Metaphysics V.17 and IX.2, shows that power and potency is twofold: namely, active and passive. Such, then, is what is here said: "He gave them power to be made the sons of God," as is what is said in Romans 8: "Whoever are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." God, then, gave to men the power to be made sons of God — namely, the rational soul and free will, freely and voluntarily receptive of grace in the present, and of glory in the future, that thus, both here and there, they may be made sons of God: yet so that, in the present, when they shall have been made sons of God through faith and prevenient grace adopting them as sons of God, [C] they may freely do the acceptable works of sons; that thus, as acceptable sons, they may freely persevere, insofar as nothing can snatch this filiation from them, unless they themselves will it.

Wherefore Chrysostom there says, as is alleged in the Gloss: "He said, 'He gave them power to be made sons of God,' showing that there is need of much zeal, that the image, formed in the baptism of adoption, we may always preserve uncontaminated; together also showing that this power no one will be able to take away from us, unless we ourselves take it away; together also wishing to show that this grace comes to those who are willing and zealous. For it is in the power of free will, and of grace, by their cooperation, to be made sons of God."

And Augustine, Homily 3 on John: "Why," he says, "are all born in sin? Because no one is born except from Adam; but to be born from Adam was of necessity from condemnation, to be born through Christ is of will and of grace; men are not compelled to be born through Christ; not because they have willed it, are they born from Adam — yet all who are from Adam are sinners with sin; all [D] who are through Christ are justified and just, not in themselves, but in Him."

Nor, indeed, by saying "He gave them power to be made sons of God," does He exclude God from that making, and include man alone; nor, if that making be common to both, does He set man before, and place God after, in natural order. Wherefore He says: "He gave them power to be made sons of God," not "to make themselves." And again: "Neither from the will of the flesh, nor from the will of man, but from God they were born" — who is the principle and Author of this divine generation.

Wherefore Bede, as is alleged in the Gloss: "The carnal generation," he says, "of each one took its origin from the embrace of marriage; but the spiritual is administered by the grace of the Holy Spirit." And Chrysostom: "These things the Evangelist narrates, that, learning the vileness and humility of the prior birth, which is by blood and by the will of the flesh, and recognizing the loftiness of the second, which is by grace and is of nobility, we may here receive a certain great understanding, and worthy of the gift of Him who begot, and after these things show much zeal."

And Augustine says, Homily 3 on John: "'As many as received Him, He gave [E] to them power to be made the sons of God.' If they are made sons, they are born; if they are born, how are they born? Not from the flesh, not from blood, not from the will of the flesh, not from the will of man, but from God they are born. Let them rejoice, then, that they are born from God; let them presume themselves to belong to God; let them receive the document that they are born from God. 'And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us.' If the Word was not ashamed to be born of man, will men be ashamed to be born of God?"

Nor by saying "He gave them power to be made sons of God" does he say that He gave them power to be made sons of God through preceding works of merits, as Pelagius dreams. Far be it that the Evangelist should contradict his own Lord, since by the same one's recital, in 6 below, He says thus: "No man can come to me, except the Father, who has sent me, draw him"; and "No man can come to me, except it be given him by my Father." Far be it also that he should contradict himself in so brief a series; for soon after these words of his recited above, he says that the Word was full of grace and truth, and adds, "And of His fullness we all received, and grace [A] for grace."

We received, I say, first, grace freely given and truth, because grace was previously promised; and thus grace for grace — namely, grace freely given for the gracious promise of gratuitous grace prophetically previously made. Or we received, in certain hope, secondly, grace of beatitude in the future, for grace in reality, and gracious works, in the present.

Wherefore Augustine, Homily 3 on John, writes thus: "He does not say: 'And of His fullness we all received, grace for grace,' but says thus: 'And of His fullness we all received, and grace for grace.' Where I do not know what He has wished us to understand: that we received from His fullness, and besides, grace for grace. For we received from His fullness first grace, and again we received grace for grace. What grace did we first receive? Faith. Walking in faith, we walk in grace. Whence have we merited this? By what preceding merits of ours? Grace was given to thee, not a wage rendered. Whence is it called grace? Because it is given gratis. For not by preceding merits hast thou bought what thou hast received. The sinner, then, received this first grace, [B] that his sins might be forgiven him. What did he merit? Let him interrogate justice; he will find punishment. Let him interrogate mercy; he will find grace. But this also God had promised through the Prophets. So when He came to give what He had promised, He gave not only grace, but also truth. How was truth manifested? Because what was promised was done. What is, then, 'grace for grace'? By faith we earn God; thou receivest as reward immortality and eternal life, and that is grace. For for what merit dost thou receive eternal life? For grace. God crowns His own gifts, not thy merits."

It can also very fittingly be understood and expounded according to the letter, concerning those who have actually been made sons of God through faith and grace in the present, that He gave them power — namely, grace assisting free will — to be made sons of God in the future, in the kingdom of heaven. Wherefore He puts before: "But as many as received Him" — namely, through formed faith, by believing in Him — "He gave them," etc. Wherefore Theophilus, as is alleged in the Gloss, says: "Because, in the resurrection, we shall obtain the most perfect filiation, according to what the Apostle says, 'expecting the adoption [C] of the sons of God, the redemption of our body,' He gave power to be made sons of God — that is, of obtaining this grace in future grace."

But when they object that text of the Psalm, "Let them be blotted out of the book of the living," if they understand it according to the literal surface, this man concedes that predestination and reprobation are temporal — namely, that someone was previously predestined and not reprobated, and now is not predestined but reprobated. For if anyone is temporally blotted out from the book of the living, then it is so against what was shown before. Wherefore it is necessary that he should have another understanding.

It can therefore be understood concerning blotting out according to present righteousness, according to the distinction set forth in 25 above; or "let them be blotted out" — that is, let them be held as blotted out, that is, as not written, or shown, according to what is added: "And with the just let them not be written." Or also "let them be blotted out" according to their own hope, just as God is also said to repent, as Chapter 7 has recited.

Wherefore Augustine on that Psalm, in the second tract: "Brothers," he says, "we ought not so to take it, that God writes anyone in the book of life and blots him out. If a man said, 'What I have written, I have written,' concerning the inscription [D] above where it was written 'King of the Jews' — does God write someone and blot him out? He is foreknowing, He has predestined all to reign with His Son in eternal life before the foundation of the world; these He has inscribed; the book of life contains them. How, then, are they blotted out from there where they were never written? This is said according to their own hope, because they themselves thought they were written. What is 'let them be blotted out from the book of life'? May it also be made evident to themselves that they are not there. So, then, those who hoped that they were written in God's book as if by the merit of their righteousness, when their condemnation shall have been brought even to their own knowledge, will be blotted out from the book of the living — that is, they will know themselves not to be there. For the verse which follows expounds what was said: 'And with the just let them not be written.' I have said, then, 'let them be blotted out' according to their hope, but according to Thy equity what do I say? 'Let them not be written.'"

Those who understand that text of the Apocalypse according to the letter, "Hold fast that which thou hast, that no other," or "that no one take thy crown," have likewise to say that someone can temporally and newly lose the crown of predestination, and another receive it, and so consequently this one cease temporally and newly [E] to be predestined, and begin to be reprobated, and the other contrariwise; which the foregoing do not permit.

Nor does John — indeed, nor the Spirit in John — say or intimate that anyone of himself and by his own forces, without God's aid, holds or can hold his crown — namely, perseveres in good life and good works to the end; or that anyone can of himself and by his own forces only, without God specially operating, receive the crown of predestination, or of grace in the present, or of glory in the future, as Chapters 2, 9, 35, and following, with 45, prove.

This same the most faithful words of the same place most faithfully testify: "These things saith the Holy and the True, who hath the key of David, who openeth and no man shutteth, who shutteth and no man openeth: Behold, I have given before [A] thee a door opened, which no one can shut, because thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word, and I will keep thee from the hour of temptation. Behold, I come quickly; hold fast that which thou hast," etc. Where it is plainly taught that perseverance in good is firstly from divine preservation, secondly from human cooperation; how much more is the inception and attainment of good life not from man by himself.

Therefore when it is said, "Hold fast that which thou hast," etc., the good man is prevented and aroused, that he may finally persevere in good. For perhaps he was so predestined, that through such exhortation of God or of man he might finally persevere, and acquire and hold the crown, according to what was set forth in Chapter 23 of this work.

Whence also Augustine, On the Gift of Perseverance 64: "For those who are not yet called, let us pray that they may be called: for perhaps they are so predestined, that they may be granted to our prayers, and may receive grace, by which they would will and be made elect; for God, who has predestined all things, will fulfill them."

This passage of the Apocalypse can also be expounded as the foregoing of the Psalm. For one can [B] lose, or receive, the crown of life according to present righteousness, or according to manifestation, or according to firm hope. Wherefore Augustine, On the Gift of Perseverance 7, proving that final perseverance cannot be lost, and intimating the distinction concerning being lost, says thus: "Final perseverance, since no one has it except him who shall have persevered to the end, many can have it, but no one can lose it. But lest perhaps it be said that perseverance to the end is indeed not lost when it has been given — that is, when it has been persevered to the end — but is then lost in some manner when a man acts through obstinacy, that he is unable to attain to it: just as we say that a man who has not persevered to the end has lost eternal life or the kingdom of God — not that he had already received and had it, but that he would have received it if he had persevered — let us put aside controversies about words, and let us say also that some things which are not had, but are hoped to be had, can be lost."

But what is argued, "If Adam had not sinned, no one would have been reprobated, but each would have been predestined," does not prove that these things depend on merits. For as to the form of the inference, the opposite manifestly stands. For if, as appears from Chapter 45, God [C] does not predestine to a man a determinate end, or a man to a determinate end — say, life on account of his future works — but conversely, in no way does it follow, "Because if a man had acted otherwise, God would have predestined otherwise" — a posteriori to the prior. For that a man should have acted otherwise would not have been the cause, neither prior causally or naturally, why God should have predestined otherwise; but the converse.

An example of this is: "If Christ had not done good works, He would not have been predestined Son of God; therefore on account of His good works He is predestined Son of God" — it fails. "If Paul had not preached, he would not have been predestined, or elected to preach; therefore because he preached, he had been predestined a preacher?" No, but the contrary. "If the Sun never shone, nor fire ever heated, it would not have been predestined to do so; therefore because it does so, it is predestined to do so?" No; but because it is predestined, or pre-ordained to do so, it does so.

Nor is it altogether the clearest of all that, if Adam had not sinned, no one would have been reprobated. For it seems to some not to have been necessary, even though Adam had stood, that all his posterity would have been immediately made impeccable, and finally [D] confirmed; but it was possible that his posterity should have had liberty of contradiction toward good and evil. Holding, however, with Anselm, Cur Deus Homo I.19, that if Adam had finally stood, all his posterity would have been confirmed impeccable, then according to the sentence of Gregory, Moralia IV, set forth in Chapter 39 of this work, none of the reprobate would have been generated, but only those who are now predestined to life; nor for that reason is the sin of Adam the first cause of reprobation, but if he had not sinned, God would have ordered otherwise, as was said above.

And if you object against this, that some predestined person is sometimes generated by some reprobated person, as a Christian by a non-Christian, and a good Christian by an evil one, and would not have been begotten by any if Adam had not sinned, therefore not those alone now predestined would have been then born — you contradict not me, but rather blessed Gregory.

Nevertheless, in defense of blessed Gregory, it can be replied in many ways. In one way, that if Adam had not sinned, those alone would have been then born who are now elect — that is, only as many would have been then born as are now elect. Or otherwise, "those alone," etc., is true according to souls. For God would then have created only those souls which are now the souls of the elect, although He would perhaps have coupled some to other bodies. Or perhaps yet another way, it can be said, that those alone according to souls and according to bodies would have been then born, who are now elect; but some elect now begotten by one father — say, by a reprobate — would have been then begotten by another, namely by an elect.

But you perhaps object to me: "If it were so, Isaac could have begotten Abraham his father, which seems absurd; by equal reason — indeed, by greater — he could have begotten any other man whatsoever, and infinite men, against the foregoing in the demonstration of the 40th part of the first Corollary of this work. If, moreover, it was so, why did he beget Jacob rather than any other man, since he himself was indifferent, and the mother by similar reason? Yet further, if it is so, let two men be supposed equally able to generate the future John, and let them apply [A] the requisite operation, and each will generate the same John in different places. For why this one rather than that one? And if this one or that one alone had acted, he would doubtless have begotten John; therefore also now, since he acts in similar manner.

"It would also be possible, according to this sentence, for a young man to newly generate his old grandfather, and render him a young boy of one day; and at the same time decrepit and an infant — with many other absurdities indeed; nay, he could even raise the dead. For he could generate someone who once was dead and buried. The Philosophers also say that if the agent is the same and the patient the same, the act will be the same; therefore, conversely, if the agent or patient be different — say, the father or mother — the act will be diversified, namely the offspring."

For the solution of these things, it must be said that there is a twofold sentence concerning the numerical identity of a man. One: that for the numerical identity of a man, the numerical identity of the body of the man is by no means required, neither according to the whole, nor according to any part of it, but only the numerical identity of the soul; so that if Peter's soul were placed in Paul's body, or [B] in any other's, it would nonetheless be the same Peter. The other: that for the numerical identity of a man, the numerical identity of the soul is required, and also of the body, either according to the whole or according to some principal part, or some principal parts.

According to the first sentence, all the objections can easily be solved, by saying that it is not in the power of the man generating to generate this A or this B, this man or that one, but in the power of God, who infuses the soul which He shall have willed.

Supposing also the second sentence, it is to be replied not improbably, that the same son can be generated from different fathers — yet not from different seeds, which give to the son the principal matter of the body. That, moreover, the same seed which is shed by one could be shed by another, appears: because that seed is the surplus of nourishment, left from the third digestion; and if another, entirely similar, took the same nourishment, other things being equal, by digesting the same part of it, he would convert it into his own substance, which the other would, and would leave the same surplus. Just as one fire applied to a certain combustible generates one fire; [C] and if another, entirely similar, had been similarly applied, and not the first, it would have generated the same fire numerically as the first; because any combustible whatsoever, or its matter, is in proximate or near potency to one fire only, or to a single form of fire — otherwise it would be in proximate potency to infinite, or to infinite simply.

From these things the response to the objections can easily be elicited. But that philosophical principle, "If the agent is the same and the patient the same, the act will be the same," does not seem to be straightway simply conceded. For the same father and mother at different times generate different offspring; and the same Sun in the same air or glass, and in the same Moon, at different times generates different light. Wherefore Averroes, on Aristotle's Metaphysics XII.11, writes thus: "If the matter were one, and the agent one, and the potency one, then that which comes to be will be one. For when the subject is one, and the potency existing in it is one, and the agent is one, then there will be no cause of multitude."

For the argument from injustice and cruelty, it is to be known that not every penalty rationally inflicted on a man by a man is on account of his preceding [D] fault, but sometimes for caution, and for a manifold cause, as appears in many places in the Scriptures, both divine and human. Wherefore a certain rule of Law says: "Without fault, unless there be cause beneath, no one is to be punished," Extra de Regulis Iuris in sexto — with which many civil and canon laws also accord.

Peter, Sentences IV, distinction 15, also shows that for five causes scourges befall men in this life: sometimes for the correction of sin; sometimes for the inception of the punishment of sin; sometimes for the increase of merit, as concerning Job and Tobias; sometimes for the avoidance of sin, as is plain from Paul, 2 Corinthians 12, concerning the angel of Satan; sometimes, indeed, for the glory of God, as is plain from the man born blind, John 9. Sometimes also one is punished by public penance or punishment, that others may fear, and thus be deterred from evil, and confirmed in good — as the divine, canon, and civil law concordantly attest.

If, therefore, anyone is temporally punished for the temporal benefit of others, why not temporally and eternally for the temporal and eternal benefit of the elect — that they may flee evil more in the present, and [E] choose good, and in the future may rejoice more, more closely love, and more amply praise God? For manifold utility, both in the present and in the future, comes from the reprobate to the elect; nay, the reprobate themselves are specially created on account of the elect, as is plain from Chapter 39.

What injustice, therefore, or cruelty is there with God, if He predestines and makes one creature of His for the service of another creature, and both for His own service, praise, glory, and honor? — especially since He eternally punishes none save one worthy of eternal punishment, namely his sin worthily and justly demanding this eternally; which He always punishes most mercifully and most piously, since much, indeed, and infinitely in some manner short of what is condign, as can be had from Chapter 39 of this work.

If also, as it appears from the sentence of Augustine, On Free Will III.11, and City of God XI.27, to be miserable is more eligible [A] than not to be, what injustice or cruelty is there with God, if He gives to some creature many great goods, even though He punishes it with another good of His creation — say, with sensible pain — provided that its whole state is more eligible than to be fled; nay, on its account, as for a benefit, it is bound to render thanks to God?

Why, then, do they not argue against God, that He punishes innocent beasts, and baptized infants, with no small sensible pain — He who also handed over His most innocent Son and our Lord Christ to the most bitter punishments and most cruel torments?

If also God omnipotent, the most free Lord of all subject creation, whose mere will is the most just law of all subject creation, as is plain from Chapter 12, were to eternally punish an innocent — especially if for the perfection of the universe, the utility of others, and His own honor — who would presume to litigate with Him, to convict Him, and to say: "Why doest Thou thus?" None, I believe, as is plain from Chapters 12 and 39. "Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honor, and another unto dishonor?" Romans 9.

It is true, however, that [B] God has eternally punished none without his fault temporally preceding and eternally remaining; yet not on account of fault, as on account of a cause antecedently moving the divine will, did God reprobate anyone eternally, but on account of certain final causes, as Chapters 20 and 39 have more fully shown.

Not so, however, but far otherwise, must we judge concerning a man with respect to a man. For man does not have pure dominion over his neighbor, nor is his will the highest law, but it is subject to the higher divine law, by which he is bound to love his neighbor as himself.

Some, however — like Scotus on Sentences I, distinction 41 — wishing to avoid that reprobation should be causally from the works of the reprobate, and also cruelty in God, say that Lucifer or Judas is first offered to the divine will in his pure naturals without fault, and so He does not will to damn him; secondly, God wills, and from this knows that He will cooperate with him to the substance of an evil act, and so that he will sin mortally by committing, or that He will not cooperate with him to the substance of a good act, and so that he will sin mortally by omitting; and inasmuch as [C] He foresees him to be such, He wills damnation and punishment for him.

The reason of Scotus, however, by no means evidently proves this, as the foregoing manifest. For it is similar to the argument from injustice and cruelty set forth above. Yet if this position stand with the foregoing here and Chapter 45 of this work, and plainly excuses God from all injustice and cruelty, and pleases the chiefs, it pleases me. May the Spirit of truth teach us truth. AMEN.

THOMAS BRADWARDINE, BOOK II

CHAPTER 1: THAT FREE WILL EXISTS, AND WHAT IT IS.

Since the treatment of the foregoing matters has continued up to this point in an unbroken sequence and has proceeded further than I expected, I fear that if the connected series is prolonged still further, it may bring weariness to the fatigued and distaste to the fastidious. Wherefore, as propriety demands a certain break, I make one here, intending to treat what follows more briefly. Beginning again, therefore, with a fresh starting point, we must now discuss free will. For some things previously established seem to destroy free will entirely; some seem to take away its power; and some seem to annihilate its freedom. All these things, however — relying on the rules of my elders and following in the footsteps of the holy Fathers, with the Lord helping me according to the judgment of His own free will — I hope faithfully to harmonize.

First, therefore, it seems to me that free will itself must be established. And that free will must be posited, all theologians, all logicians, all moral philosophers, and nearly all natural philosophers unanimously attest. Nevertheless, on account of some who might perhaps tremble with fear where there is nothing to fear, it seems to me that this should be briefly shown.

For it is clear from the second, third, and fourth chapters of Book I that God preserves, makes, and moves all things outside Himself, and this not from necessity of nature, as purely natural powers lacking cognition do; nor from sense cognition alone and irrational natural appetite, as other irrational natural powers do; but from the rational judgment, or arbitration, of the intellect, as the sixth chapter of Book I teaches; nor from that alone, but with free will, as the eighth and ninth chapters of Book I prove. Therefore it is clear that God has free will — "will," I say, on account of the judgment of reason or intellect, and "free," on account of the spontaneous power of the will. For on account of these two operations of these two powers in one mind, free will took these two names for itself as one name, as the very meaning of the name makes clear. And because the arbitration of reason ought to precede the will, it would more properly be called "free judgment" (arbitrium liberum) rather than "free will" (liberum arbitrium).

Hence Augustine, Hypomnesticon 31, says that why it is called free will must be briefly discussed: "Arbitrium," he says, "I think received its name from 'arbitrating' — that is, considering or discerning by rational deliberation what to choose and what to refuse." Likewise, it is called "free" because it is placed in its own power, having the capacity to do what it wills. And Bernard agrees plainly in On Grace and Free Will 4.

Free will, moreover, belongs not only to God but also to rational creatures. For necessity and contingency, or freedom, are naturally opposed as contraries with respect to creatures; and one of them is natural, namely necessity, and therefore the other is too. For contraries correspond to one another to such an extent that not only if one is natural the other is natural, but also if one is determinate the other is determinate, and this to the same degree.

For the Philosopher says, De Caelo I.44: "If one of two contraries is determinate, the other will also be determinate." On which Averroes says in his commentary: "This is manifest from the description of contraries, which are at the extreme of separation. For in Metaphysics X.14 contraries are described as those which, placed in the same genus, differ the most." And Averroes adds in the same place: "And since each of them is at the greatest distance, it is necessary that they be equally in contrariety — that is, that neither be stronger than the other. And it is self-evident that they are in the same degree of contrariety," which he immediately proves by saying: "For if not, they would not be at the extreme of distance. For it would be possible to add to the lesser so that it would be more contrary, and then the same thing would have several contraries; and that which was posited at the greatest distance would not be what is the contrary of its position."

From this it is clear that not only is there contingency and freedom in creatures, but also as much as there is necessity in them. The Apostle's rule teaches the same — namely, that if one of two contraries exists, the other ought to exist as well: "If there is an animal body," he says, "there is also a spiritual body" (1 Corinthians 15). If therefore there is necessity, there is also freedom; and if in any creature there is contingency and freedom, among all creatures the rational creature seems worthy of being honored with this distinctive privilege.

Likewise, no one doubts that it is absolutely possible for some creature to have free will, since this includes no contradiction; therefore it is possible for an omnipotent God to create such a creature — for otherwise He would not be omnipotent. And such a creature would not seem to be of a different nature from the present rational creature; therefore the rational creature now present was created with free will.

Likewise, every argument that endeavors to show that no creature actually now has free will proceeds similarly against a possible creature that would have free will if it were actually posited, and would by no means conclude against it; therefore neither does it conclude against an actually existing rational creature.

From these things it evidently appears that free will — or rather, "free judgment" — can be defined or described in this way: that it is a rational power of judging rationally and executing voluntarily. And with these things agree Hugo, Sentences III.20, and I On the Sacraments, part 5, chapters 20 and 21; and Peter, Sentences II, distinctions 24 and 25; and many others in many other places.

CHAPTER 2: ON THE ACT OF FREE WILL AND ITS OBJECT.

Free will having been established, it remains consequently to inquire about its act and its object. Experience and nature teach that its act is willing and not-willing, loving and hating; and its object is the apparent good and the apparent evil.

[Question 1] But one who wished to dig deeper could reasonably ask whether both the aforementioned acts — namely willing and not-willing — are equally primary and proper to the will. This does not seem so. For every single power, just as it has one essence and one form, so also has one end, one perfection, and one operation — at least one that is primary, most proper, and essential. If, however, those two acts are not equally primary and proper to the will, either one of them is reduced to the other, or both to a third, which is the primary and most proper act of the will, by virtue of which the others belong to it, according to what was established in I.2.

But no act of the will seems naturally prior to willing and not-willing, loving and hating, or more proper to the will. In a similar way one can inquire about the primary and most proper object of the will — whether that is the good, or the evil, or some third thing which is neither.

It seems, therefore, that it can be briefly said that the primary and most proper act of the will is to will its primary and most proper object, which is the good. And because it wills the good, therefore it does not will evil; therefore it hates evil; therefore it flees evil. For the good is naturally prior to evil, as is clear from I.2 and I.26.

[Question 2] But since it is agreed that the will wills the good and does not will evil, we must inquire further: whether it can knowingly will evil, and something neutral — that is, what appears to it neither good nor evil. I think it can — if not per se, yet with a great good conjoined. For example, if someone could not have A, a great good, except with or after first having B, a small evil, he could will B, the evil — not per se or for its own sake, but so that through it he might obtain A, the good. And thus, in accordance with the foregoing, he would primarily and principally will the good; indeed, in a manner of speaking common to many, he would will nothing other than the good, as is clear from I.26. And the same applies to the neutral.

Furthermore, from these considerations another question can arise: [Question 3] whether the will can knowingly will per se a pure evil — one that appears to it in every way evil, having no good in any way conjoined, whether subsequent or preceding — and not even the volition itself appears good to it, but in every way evil. Some think so, because otherwise the will would not have full freedom. Yet the opposite seems to follow from the foregoing. For if the good is the primary and proper object of the will, and willing the good its primary and proper act, it cannot will anything except by virtue of these, and finally for the sake of the good.

Likewise, human nature, when evil is set before it, shrinks back and flees — although it may perhaps desire what is pleasurable and useful, as anyone's mind experiences in itself, unless someone happens to be a Manichaean, having an essentially evil and essentially dark soul from an essentially evil God and Prince of Darkness, contrary to I.1 and I.26.

Likewise, by I.26, every thing is good; and as universal experience shows, we see that all natural things — inanimate and animate, insensible and sensible, and irrational — seek what is good for them and flee what is evil for them. By what irrational reason, then, would the sole rational thing, which surpasses all irrational things, seek and love what is evil for itself, and hate and flee what is good for itself?

If also by I.26 every natural thing is good, and every act of it, and whatever is positive in it — how can any natural thing love per se something that appears in every way evil, and in no way whatsoever good, nor conjoined with good, since all friendship or love is always by reason of some likeness and agreement, and never by reason of dissimilarity or perfect contrariety, as universal experience makes clear? What man ever loved a man entirely contrary and adverse to him, hostile, plotting against him, and harming him in all things, and never willing or able to do him good, precisely for this reason? And did he not rather hold him in hatred? Or if he did not at all hate him but loved him, he did this perhaps for the sake of acquiring or strengthening the virtue of patience, as is read in many sources about the philosopher Socrates — that he therefore married the most contentious Xanthippe. Or perhaps he did this for the sake of increasing merit and reward, or for the sake of God who commanded the love of enemies — and so per se and finally he loved the good, and such evil finally for the sake of the good.

Wherefore Boethius, Music I, prologue, says: "Likeness is friendly, dissimilarity hateful and contrary; for a people rejoices in modes that resemble its own manners. For it cannot be that soft things are joined to hard, or hard to softer things, because it is likeness that fosters love and delight." Many ancient philosophers also attest to this, as is clear from Ethics VIII.1, who say: "Like to like," as "jackdaw to jackdaw," and that "like seeks like." Wherefore it is commonly said:

It is and always will be: like seeks its like.

Hence Ecclesiasticus 13: "Every animal loves its like; so also every man loves his neighbor. All flesh is joined to its like, and every man associates with his like."

Likewise, if anyone can will and love evil per se, he can also love someone out of pure malice, and the other can love him in a similar way in return — and so there would be friendship between them solely on account of evil, without any regard for good. This is contrary to Aristotle, Ethics VIII.2, contrary to Cicero, On Friendship, contrary to Seneca, On Benefits — indeed universally contrary to all who treat of friendship, whether philosophical or theological, who all say concordantly that the cause of friendship is the good.

Wherefore Aristotle, in the same place, wishing to consider friendship and its species, says: "Concerning these things, it will become clear once the lovable is known; for it seems that not everything is loved, but what is lovable, and this is the good — namely the honorable, the pleasurable, or the useful. The useful seems to be that through which some good or pleasure comes about; therefore the lovable things are the good, the pleasurable, and the ends." And immediately asking, he says: "Do they love the good, or what is good for themselves? For these sometimes differ." And answering, he adds: "It seems that each person loves what is good for himself; and what is simply good is lovable, but for each individual, what is good for that individual. Each person loves not what is really good for him, but what appears so." And below, chapter 3: "These differ from one another in species" — namely the three lovable goods mentioned above — "and therefore the friendships are equal in number to the lovable things."

Likewise, if something is desired and loved per se because it is such, the more it is such, the more desirable and lovable it will be — as is clearly the case with the honorable, pleasurable, and useful good. This is also clear from the Philosopher's consideration in Topics II, on more and less: "If pleasure is a good, greater pleasure is a greater good." And Averroes on Metaphysics XII, comment 36, says that what is primarily desired is the good, and the more something is esteemed as a greater good, the greater the desire will be. If therefore pure evil is desired per se, a greater evil will be more desired, and the greatest most desired — namely supreme misery, which nevertheless every wretched person and every non-wretched person alike would most flee.

Hence Augustine, Enchiridion 86: "Nor is the will to be blamed, or said not to be a will, or said not to be free, by which we so will to be happy that we not only do not will to be miserable, but are utterly unable to will it."

Likewise, evil by reason of its being evil is hateful and hostile to anyone; and it does not seem that the same thing under entirely the same aspect, to the same person not otherwise but similarly disposed in every way, can be both hateful, hostile, hated, and an enemy, and also lovable, friendly, loved, and a friend — and especially supremely one and also supremely the other.

Likewise, everything lovable or loved, especially that which is loved for its own sake alone, is an end or has the character of an end, as anyone's mind senses in itself — which the authority of the Philosopher, Ethics VIII.2, cited above, and many other authorities also attest. But the end, especially the ultimate end desired for its own sake alone, is the good, or an apparent good, and has the character of the good — as all philosophers treating of causes concordantly attest.

Likewise, by a similar reasoning to that by which one can love pure evil, one can also hate pure good in the same way — namely because it is purely good, a good that would be in every way good for him: useful, pleasurable, and honorable, and in no way whatsoever evil, nor having any evil annexed to it; and also such that through that hatred he would acquire no other good, nor exclude any evil that would otherwise be more pressing. Therefore one could hate any good because it is good, and a greater good more, and the greatest good most — namely happiness and God. The contrary of this everyone's mind experiences, and manifold reason makes clear.

Manifold philosophical and theological authority also attests that no one can will or desire pure evil per se, but in all his works always desires the good, or at least something that appears in some way good — useful, pleasurable, or honorable.

Hence the Philosopher, Ethics I.1: "Every art and every doctrine, and similarly every act and every choice, seems to seek some good; therefore they have rightly declared the good to be that which all things seek." And below, chapter 17: "It is manifest that happiness is among things honorable and perfect; and it seems to be so, also because it is a principle; for it is for its sake that all people do all other things."

In agreement with this, Augustine, City of God VIII.8: "There is a part of philosophy called moral, which the Greeks call Ethics, in which the supreme good is sought — by reference to which we do all that we do, and which we seek not for the sake of anything else but for its own sake, and in obtaining which we require nothing further for our happiness. It is therefore called the end, because it is for its sake that we will other things, but it itself only for its own sake."

And On the Trinity XIII.5: "It is true that all men wish to be happy, and desire this one thing with the most ardent love, and for its sake desire all other things." And above, chapter 3 of the same: "If anyone were to say, 'You all wish to be happy and do not wish to be miserable,' he would say something that no one would fail to recognize in his own will. For whatever else anyone secretly wills, he does not depart from this will, which is sufficiently known to all and in all."

And on Psalm 32, "Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord," tractate 3: "All love happiness, and therefore men are perverse, because they wish to be evil but do not wish to be miserable; and since misery is the inseparable companion of wickedness, what is it? They wish to be evil so as not to be miserable? Consider this a little in all men who do evil deeds: they always wish to be happy. Someone commits theft; you ask why? Because of hunger, because of necessity — therefore so as not to be miserable, he is evil; and therefore he is more miserable because he is evil. Therefore for the sake of driving away misery and acquiring happiness, all men do whatever they do, whether good or evil."

Wherefore Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy III, prose 2: "Every care of mortals, which the labor of manifold pursuits exercises, proceeds indeed by diverse paths, but strives to arrive at the one end of happiness."

Anselm also, in On the Fall of the Devil 22 and after, supposes as manifest that the evil angel could not will that by which he would become miserable, since he received inseparably the will to be happy.

Furthermore, the Philosopher, Politics I.1: "All do all things for the sake of what seems good; it is clear that all aim at some good." And Ethics III.10, he supposes that the will is directed toward some end; and having recounted two opinions — one that it is directed toward the per se good, and the other that it is directed toward the apparent good — he adds his own opinion, saying that simply and according to truth, what is willable is the per se good, but for each individual, what seems so. And Physics II.31, he says that the final cause is the good of the others: "For that for the sake of which is the most powerful, and the end wishes to be the end of the others; it makes no difference to call the same thing good or apparently good." And Metaphysics V.3, in words not far different, he says the same. And De Anima III.51, he says that the appetible is the good or the apparent good.

Avicenna also, Metaphysics VIII.6, says: "Goodness is desired absolutely by whatever exists; that which every thing desires is being, and perfection in being; inasmuch as it is being, and being is pure goodness and pure perfection, and goodness in every way is what every thing desires according to its own measure, since through it its being is perfected."

Wherefore Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy III, prose 10: "The sum and cause of all things sought is the good. For what retains in itself no good, either in reality or in likeness, can in no way be sought. Conversely, even things that are not good by nature, if they seem to be so, are sought as though they were truly good. Hence it happens that goodness is rightly believed to be the sum, hinge, and cause of all things sought. That for the sake of which something is sought seems to be most desired — as for the sake of health someone might wish to ride on horseback, desiring not so much the motion of riding as the effect of health. Since therefore all things are sought for the sake of the good, it is not those things but the good itself that is desired by all; but we have agreed that what is desired for the sake of other things is happiness; therefore happiness alone is thus sought."

Dionysius also, On the Divine Names 4, says: "Existing things desire the beautiful and the good, and whatever they do, they do for the sake of what appears good; and every intention of existing things has the good as its beginning and end. For nothing does anything with an eye to the nature of evil." And below: "All things exist for the sake of the good, both those that are good and those that are contrary; for we do even these things with a view to the good. No one does what he does with an eye to evil."

In agreement with this, Augustine, in Questions on Numbers, question 23, expounding the phrase "the sin of the unwilling," says: "For all men who knowingly do what is not permitted would wish it to be permitted — to such an extent that no one desires to sin for the sake of sinning itself, but for the sake of what follows from it."

And Peter, Sentences II, distinction 39, says that the higher spark of reason, which, as Jerome says, could not be extinguished even in Cain, always wills the good and hates evil. This is also attested by many authorities cited in I.26, and by many other philosophical and theological authorities besides.

[Question 4] Consequently one could ask whether the will can knowingly not-will positively, or hate, the good. And I believe it can, at least per accidens — if, namely, by not-willing and rejecting some small good, it could obtain some greater good or avoid some greater evil, just as it can also will evil, as was said above.

[Question 5] Here one could further ask whether the will can knowingly not-will and hate per se a pure good — one that appears, and because it appears, in every way good. And some argue that it can, because otherwise the will would not be free in every respect. But this cannot stand. For just as the primary reason for willing and loving is the good or the apparent good, as the foregoing attests, so the primary reason for not-willing and hating is evil or the apparent evil — for contraries have contrary reasons. Therefore no one can not-will per se what does not appear in some way evil — dishonorable, useless, or distressing. It also seems equally possible to love per se evil and to hate per se good — namely because it is purely good — but the former is not possible, as was shown above; therefore neither is the latter.

[Question 6] After this, it is reasonable to inquire whether the will can not-will a pure good presented to it. For if it cannot, since it is not in its power what and when something appears to it as a pure good, it is not in its power what or when it wills, and therefore not what it does — for the Philosopher says, Metaphysics IX.10: "What is possible according to reason necessarily does, when it desires that for which it has the power and in the way it has it." And Politics V.7 and Rhetoric II.24 say the same. But this would destroy the freedom of the will, which the previous chapter was establishing.

If, however, it can not-will a pure good presented to it, and by the foregoing it is necessary that it neither not-will it nor hate it, then it can have no act whatsoever regarding that object — and therefore, by similar reasoning, regarding any other object and any other, and regarding any whatsoever — and so be entirely idle for a time, and for any time whatsoever, the opposite of which we seem to experience.

Likewise, then a cause sufficiently disposed for acting could on one occasion act and on another not act, the same disposition remaining precisely — which seems contrary to reason, since there is no better reason why it should act or rest on one occasion rather than another.

For resolving these questions, it should be known that willing and not-willing are sometimes taken for a rational act of the will, and sometimes for a natural act — namely for concupiscence or anger, which are motions of the irrational concupiscible and irascible powers. Speaking in the first way, willing and not-willing are free and in man's free power, as is clear from the preceding chapter; and thus the will, regarding some pure good presented to it, can elicit neither willing nor not-willing, but be entirely idle; and the same will, disposed in precisely the same way at other times, can will it. For this evidently appears from the difference between a rational and an irrational power assigned in Metaphysics IX.10, as the 34th part of the corollary of I.1 more fully manifests.

Speaking in the second way, however, willing and not-willing are not free, nor in man's free power — just as they are not in a beast's — but necessary by natural necessity, and frequently involuntary, as we experience with all too much certainty and frequency, groaning with the most holy Apostle. Yet these motions are in a manner in man's power, insofar as he has a superior rational power by which he can resist them, repress them, and greatly restrain them — which because beasts do not have, they cannot do so.

The Philosopher, well noting this, Ethics I, last chapter, distinguishing in multiple ways the species and powers of the irrational soul, says: "One part resembles the common and vegetative — I mean the cause of nourishing and growing. But there seems to be also another nature of the irrational soul, which participates in reason in some way. For we praise the reason of the incontinent and the continent person; for it rightly urges toward the best things. But there seems to be in them something else besides reason, innate, which opposes and resists reason. For just as the loosened parts of the body, when we choose to move them to the right, move perversely to the left, so also in the soul: for the motions of the incontinent tend toward contraries. But in the case of the body we see what moves perversely; in the soul, however, we do not see it. But perhaps we should estimate no less that there is something in the soul besides reason, opposing and resisting it — though in what way it differs makes no difference."

"But this too seems to participate in reason, as we said. For the irrational part of the continent person obeys reason. And further, that of the temperate and the brave is perhaps still more subject; for all things harmonize with reason. The irrational part therefore seems to be twofold: the vegetative, which in no way shares in reason; and the concupiscible and universally appetitive, which participates in some way, insofar as it is responsive and obedient to it — just as we say we have the 'reason' of father and friends, not in the mathematical sense. That the irrational is in some way persuaded by reason is indicated by admonition, all rebuke, and all entreaty. But if this too must be said to have reason, then what has reason will be twofold: one part principally and in itself, the other as something obedient to a father."

[Question 7] In a similar way one could inquire whether the will can not-will a pure evil presented to it — to which one can similarly argue and similarly respond.

[Question 8] Furthermore, one could ask consequently whether the will can will and not-will any of its objects under any degree whatsoever, since there is no resistance of any kind there. But since it is of determinate entity, it seems similarly of determinate activity. Otherwise, whoever loved something according to the utmost of his power would love it under a degree simply infinite in intensity — contrary to what was previously shown in the 40th part of the corollary of I.1.

[Question 9] Still further, perhaps it would be asked whether it is of the essence of free will to have naturally the freedom, or possibility, of contradiction — and this with respect to any act of its own. For this seems to be implied by the meaning of the name. Yet the opposite is certain concerning God's free will by which He loves Himself, and by which each divine person loves every other and itself, as can be shown by the first supposition.

[Question 10] Furthermore, and in connection with this, it can be further asked whether free will, which of itself is naturally of contradiction, can always freely according to contradiction do the opposite of any of its acts — for this seems to be contained in the meaning of the name. Yet one must distinguish times and qualities of free will. For the time and quality of confirmed beatitude, it cannot, as the very nature of confirmed beatitude demonstrates, and all Catholic Doctors unanimously attest. But for the time and quality of the wayfaring state, it can do the opposite privatively — that is, not perform such an act — yet it cannot always do the positive opposite — that is, the contrary positive act with respect to any object — as the foregoing makes clear.

COROLLARY

COROLLARY: THAT FREE WILL IS NOT SO CALLED BECAUSE IT CAN FREELY WILL AND NOT-WILL ANYTHING WHATSOEVER, BUT BECAUSE IT CAN FREELY WILL WHATEVER IS ITS WILLABLE OBJECT, AND NOT-WILL WHATEVER IS ITS NOT-WILLABLE OBJECT.

From these things I consider it manifest that free will is not so called because it can freely will and not-will anything whatsoever, but because it can freely will whatever is its willable object and not-will whatever is its not-willable object — just as if sight were a free power, it could not therefore see a sound or other invisible things, but only its own visible objects. Nor is it called free because it can freely will or not-will any of its objects in any manner whatsoever, as the foregoing has taught, but in a manner suitable to its power. Nor is it called free will because it can freely do the opposite of any of its acts, as the foregoing demonstrates, but because from rational judgment or arbitration it spontaneously performs that act, as the first chapter of this book shows. Nor is it called free will because it can freely do good and sin, as evidently follows from the foregoing, but for the reason just assigned.

CHAPTER 3: THAT NO LOWER CAUSE CAN NECESSITATE THE CREATED WILL TO ITS RATIONAL AND FREE ACT, TO MERIT PROPERLY, OR TO SIN.

Consequently it remains to show that no lower or secondary cause can necessitate the created will to its rational and free act, to merit properly or to sin. For according to what was shown in the first chapter of this book, a rational creature has free will and is naturally free — indeed, as free as an irrational creature is naturally necessary, or necessitable, or servile. But the latter is so naturally necessitable and servile that it can be necessitated by a secondary cause; therefore the former is so free that it cannot be necessitated by any secondary cause. For if a beast is necessitated by some secondary cause, it will be necessitated by any stronger one; therefore the created will be necessitated neither by that cause nor by any stronger secondary cause — much less by any weaker one.

Likewise, if the human will could be necessitated to its free act by some secondary cause, this would seem most likely to be by the stars and celestial powers, which seem to have the greatest efficacy on subjects, including on humans, to such an extent that those skilled in astrology and other sciences of judgment founded on celestial influence seem frequently to predict their characters and acts. But this does not accord with reason. For the stars and celestial powers are material and irrational things; but the human soul is rational and immaterial, as philosophers and theologians attest, and therefore more perfect and naturally superior to those things.

It is clear that it is contrary to the natural order for the immaterial to be necessarily subjected to the material, the rational to the irrational, the more perfect to the less perfect, and the superior to the inferior, and to be ordered and governed in all things by its irrational motion — especially in its own proper rational and free act. For who, unless perhaps an ass, would say that an ass ought naturally to govern a man, and not the other way around? Or who, more irrational than an ass, would say that an inanimate thing less perfect than an ass ought naturally to govern a man? Not so, not so; but we naturally experience the contrary natural order, which all philosophers attest, and which is expressed evidently in Genesis 1.

Nor do we only see that man ought naturally to govern insensible and irrational things, but also among men themselves, the wise ought to govern the unwise, and the more wise the less wise, in a fitting order. Wherefore the Philosopher says, Metaphysics I: "The more principal is more a wisdom than the one that serves; for the wise man ought not to be ordered, but to order; nor should he be persuaded by another, but the less wise by him." And Ethics VI.6, he says that wisdom is as it were the head, having the most honorable knowledge. And Politics I.1: "The ruler and the subject exist by nature for the sake of preservation. For that which can foresee by the mind is by nature the ruler and by nature the master" — which he further manifests in chapters 2, 3, and 6; and below, III.9: "He who commands that intellect should rule seems to command that God and the laws should rule; but he who commands that a man should rule adds a beast as well." And Ethics V.11: "Not if a man is less, should he rule, but reason."

Also in the Secret of Secrets, Part III.5, it is said that it was found written on a stone in the Chaldean language: "The King and Intellect are brothers." Wherefore the wisest of the kings of the earth says: "The understanding man shall possess the helm" (Proverbs 1). And Augustine, On Free Will I.16: "When reason dominates the irrational motions of the soul, a man is to be called well-ordered. For neither is the right order, nor is it to be called order at all, where better things are subjected to worse ones. This reason, or mind, or spirit, when it rules the irrational motions of the soul — that dominates in man to which dominion is owed by the eternal law."

And below, chapter 19, having shown that no vicious soul can overcome a virtuous soul, he adds: "I think you would not deny that any soul, of whatever quality, is better and more powerful than any body. For no one denies this who sees what is easy — that a living substance is to be preferred to a non-living one, and one that gives life to one that receives it. Much less, therefore, does a body, whatever it be, overcome a soul endowed with virtue."

Someone might perhaps pretend in reply that the celestial bodies are animate and more perfect than animate humans, and therefore it sufficiently accords with the natural order that they should rule over humans. But if they are animate, it is either by a material and extended soul, or by an immaterial and indivisible one. If material, that soul is necessarily irrational and less perfect than the immaterial and rational human soul, as abundant philosophy attests; therefore they are less perfect than humans. Moreover, such a soul in a celestial sphere or star is philosophically rejected. If, however, they are said to be animated by a rational soul, such as an intelligence, this still does not avoid the difficulty. For they do not act on lower things and on humans through that soul immediately, since it is only in the heavens; but only through some material and irrational power flowing from them into the medium and into humans and human souls — such as through light or motion.

That very intelligence, even if it were immediately applied to the human soul, could not necessitate it to will — neither through its substance alone, nor through any act of its own. Not through its substance alone, since it is of itself indifferent to causing willing and not-willing, and one willing and another. Nor through any act of its own, since every act of it is an accident, and therefore less perfect, inferior, and naturally less powerful than the human soul. One intelligence also cannot necessitate another to will; therefore neither can it a human being.

If also the heavens through such a soul could necessitate a man to good, then also to evil. For many are as strongly inclined to evil by certain stars as others are inclined to good by other stars — and so the holy angels, since there are no others in the heavens, would impel humans to sin.

Wherefore Augustine, On Free Will III.19, proves and holds that neither desire, nor a vicious mind, nor a body, nor a mind or intellect having virtue, can cast another virtuous mind from the citadel of virtue and subjugate it to desire. And he adds: "Therefore it remains for you to answer, if you can, whether anything seems to you more excellent than a rational and wise mind. 'Nothing, I think, except God'; and that is also my opinion."

Likewise, then angels would be souls; the heavens too could, or could have, merited and sinned, been saved and damned, made happy and made miserable; and therefore would be our neighbor, and to be loved by humans as a neighbor. But who among philosophers, theologians, or even common people does not know these things to be deliria and empty phantasms?

Wherefore Stephen, Bishop of Paris, condemned the article affirming that the celestial bodies are moved by an intrinsic principle which is the soul, and that they are moved by a soul and an appetitive power, like an animal; and another asserting that the soul of the heavens is an intelligence, and the celestial orbs are not instruments of intelligences but organs, like the ear and eye are instruments of the sensitive power; and another asserting that the nature which is the principle of motion in celestial bodies is an intelligence — an "error," he says, "if it is understood as an intrinsic nature that is an act or form."

Likewise, experience teaches the contrary. For given the conception or nativity of someone, however excellent or bad as to morals, he can be educated contrarily by parents, friends, and himself, and confirmed in contrary habits — as anyone who wished could easily find out, and many astrologers have found out in many ways.

Hence the Father of Philosophers, Hermes, On the Heavens and the World 9, treating of the power of the planets over man from the time of conception to the time of birth and from then to the time of death, says: "This natural power, suited from the beginning, forms and works, and governs human nature not by a law of compulsion but of friendship. For human nature is not made such or such by that higher power, but acquires only a natural aptitude, from which afterward nature or life more powerfully takes on such or such qualities or acts."

Wherefore Ptolemy says in the Centiloquium, saying 1: "The judgments that I deliver to you are between the necessary and the possible" — that is, for one who considers the natures of things and the work of the stars. And saying 5: "The best astrologer will be able to prevent much of the evil that is to come according to the stars, when he has foreknown its nature." And saying 95: "It almost always happens that what ascends in every face of these figures resembles its work."

[The text then provides Haly's commentary with an anecdote about a man whose nativity had the first face of Aries ascending with several significators in the terms of Saturn, yet who dressed splendidly and lived sumptuously — but who confessed privately that his desires were entirely contrary to his outward behavior, proving that astrological indications represent natural inclinations that can be overcome by will.]

Likewise, all Catholic Doctors reject stellar fate — especially if it implies necessity — as I.28 somewhat recounted. Wherefore Stephen, Bishop of Paris, condemned the article affirming that our will is subject to the power of the supracelestial bodies; and another asserting that the will and intellect are not moved in act by themselves but by an everlasting cause, namely by celestial bodies; and another asserting that the celestial orb is the cause of the physician's will to heal; and many others similar to these.

Furthermore, if the human will could be necessitated to its free act by some secondary cause, it would seem that this could be done by vehement temptation. But however great the temptation, so great could be the incitement by stars and celestial powers — since it is most certain that they greatly incite and incline humans — and no incitement by the stars can necessitate the human will, as was shown above.

Likewise, as much as any temptation arouses, so much can some disposition in the body, resulting from stars and complexion. But this is proved false by the experience recounted above from Haly; it can also be proved by the experience about Hippocrates in the Secret of Secrets, Part IV.1, recounted by Aristotle, where he writes: "The disciples of Hippocrates the wise painted his portrait on parchment and brought it to Philemon, saying: 'Consider this figure and tell us the quality of his complexion.' He, looking at the composition and disposition of the figure, compared its parts and said: 'This man is lustful, deceitful, and fond of sexual intercourse.' For which reason they wanted to kill him, saying: 'O fool, this is the figure of the worthiest and best man in the world.' But Philemon pacified them and corrected himself, saying: 'This is indeed the figure of a wise man, but what you asked about from my science, I showed you, and what I think according to it.' When therefore they came to Hippocrates and told him what they had done and what Philemon had answered as his judgment, Hippocrates said to them: 'Philemon certainly spoke the truth; he did not miss a single letter. Nevertheless, since I looked upon these things and considered them to be shameful and reprehensible, I resolved to govern my soul over them, and I drew it back from them, and I triumphed over the retention of my desire.' This, therefore, is the praise and wisdom of Hippocrates: for philosophy is nothing other than abstinence and the conquest of desires."

Wherefore the Philosopher, in the Ethics almost throughout, Plato, Socrates, Seneca, and all moral philosophers in their moral philosophy frequently show and even more frequently suppose that acting well and badly, virtues and vices, are in man's free power. The Author of human nature also clearly expressed this in the institution of humanity itself. For when Cain was exceedingly angry against his brother Abel, the Lord said to him: "Why are you angry, and why has your countenance fallen? If you do well, will you not be accepted? But if badly, sin will immediately be at the door. Its desire will be subject to you, and you will rule over it" (Genesis 4).

Wherefore Augustine, On Free Will I.18: "It has already been found that the rule of the human mind is human wisdom, and that it can also fail to rule." And chapter 19: "Do you think that desire is more powerful than that mind to which we know the eternal law has granted dominion over desires? For I in no way think so; for it would not be most orderly that weaker things should command stronger ones. Wherefore I think it necessary that the mind be more powerful than desire, by the very fact that it rightly and justly dominates desire."

Augustine also, On Free Will [i.e., Anselm, On Freedom of Will] 5, proves at length that no temptation can conquer the will. Hence he says: "Who can say that the will is not free to preserve rectitude, and free from temptation and from sin? If no temptation can turn it from rectitude to sin except when it is willing — that is, to willing what it ought not? When therefore it lies, it lies not by another's power but by its own."

"Is it not clear from what has been said that no temptation can conquer a right will? For if it can, it has the power to conquer, and conquers by its own power. But this cannot be, since the will is conquered only by its own power; therefore temptation can in no way conquer a right will. And when it is said to do so, it is said improperly; for nothing else is meant than that the will can subject itself to temptation."

And below, chapter 7: "Understand that the will has an insuperable strength, not conquerable by any other force." "You see, therefore, that when a man, with some temptation pressing upon him, abandons the rectitude of will that he possessed, he is not dragged away by any alien force, but turns himself."

If anyone should think it is the same with beasts, behold a very great dissimilarity. For beasts by natural necessity follow their appetite, pursuing what is pleasant and fleeing what is painful; but man is subject to no natural necessity. Wherefore Anselm, On Freedom of Will 5, in dialogue form, writes: "How is the will not free, which no alien power can subject without its own consent? Cannot we say by a similar reasoning that the will of a horse is free, which serves the appetite of the flesh only when willing? — No. For in a horse, the will does not subject itself, but being naturally subject, it always necessarily serves the appetite of the flesh. In man, however, as long as the will itself is right, it neither serves nor is subject to what it ought not to be, nor is it turned from its rectitude by any alien force, unless it willingly consents to what it ought not — which consent it evidently has not naturally or from necessity, like a horse, but from itself."

Furthermore, temptation is twofold: through painful things and through pleasurable things; through adversity and through prosperity; and universally through fear of evil and through love of good. Of these, the first is stronger and greater. For everyone naturally dreads and flees from a painful evil more than they desire a pleasant good, as we experience both in ourselves and in beasts. For we naturally seem to love more the good that we have and fear to lose through a painful evil, than to desire a good not yet possessed and not yet our own. For everyone naturally loves himself and his own things more than he desires or loves what is not his own, since he does not naturally desire or love other things except for his own sake, as is clear from I.39.

Wherefore the Philosopher, Ethics III.18: "It is more difficult to endure painful things than to abstain from pleasurable ones." In agreement with this, Augustine, 83 Questions 36: "There is no one who does not flee pain more than pursue pleasure. For we see that even the most savage beasts are therefore most deterred from pleasures by the fear of pains."

Therefore temptation through painful things is stronger than the other, and this one cannot subdue the human will; therefore neither can the other. That this cannot conquer the human will evidently appears because the strongest temptation of this kind cannot subject the human will; therefore none can. For the strongest temptation through painful things is through death, especially through the most painful death — for the Philosopher says, Ethics III.14, that the brave person is concerned with the greatest terrors: "For no one endures dangers more; and the most terrible thing is death."

But this does not overcome the human will. For how many of the faithful, heretics, and unbelievers have chosen and voluntarily endured the harshest death rather than change their profession, will, or work, as many histories attest? How many Gentile philosophers also, living morally and according to the rule of honor, overcame the strongest temptations and subjugated warlike appetites to the command of reason, as histories written about their lives clearly manifest?

Furthermore, if any secondary cause could subdue the human will, this would seem most likely of the devil, whose power is very great, concerning which Job 41: "There is no power on earth that can be compared to him." But he cannot overcome the will of man, as the foregoing makes clear, and as Augustine attests in On Free Will I.19, cited above. Nor can he overcome the will of man through his essence alone, as was shown above concerning good angels; nor through any act of his — because that act would be some temptation, and no temptation can conquer the human will, as was just shown. How many evils also would that malicious spirit do in the world if he had dominion over human wills! How many men and women have also most vigorously resisted his temptations, both among the faithful and among the unfaithful!

[Objection 1] It can, however, be reasonably objected against what has been said. For a pleasurable or painful object has some power to move the human will to willing or not-willing, and the will itself is of only finite power in resisting, as in existing. Therefore it is either of lesser, equal, or greater power. If lesser, it is necessarily overcome. If equal or greater, let the object be increased until it is of greater power in moving than the human will in resisting, or let another object be taken that is as much more powerful than the human will as the will is more powerful than the first object, and the will will be necessitated by it to willing or not-willing.

The will also experiences difficulty in resisting enticement, as we experience all too certainly and frequently, as philosophers and theologians also attest. For the Philosopher says, Ethics II.3, that it is more difficult to fight against pleasure than against anger, and that art and virtue are always concerned with what is more difficult. And Ethics III.2: "It is difficult sometimes to judge what should be chosen for what, and what should be endured for what; and still more difficult to abide by what is recognized."

And Anselm, On Freedom of Will 5, says that it is difficult not to lie in order to avoid death. And chapter 6, he says that it is difficult for us to preserve rectitude of will when we consent to temptations. Wherefore moral philosophers, theologians, and canonists hold concordantly that the greater or lesser quantity of temptation diminishes or increases, lightens or aggravates the guilt of the one consenting, and the punishment.

Since therefore the human will experiences some difficulty in resisting enticement, and is yet of finite power as well as essence, the enticement can be so strong and cause such great difficulty that the human will cannot overcome it, but will necessarily yield to it.

[Objection 2] Likewise, a pleasurable and painful object irresistibly overcomes the wills of small children, fools, the mad, and perhaps the perfectly drunk. But the will of well-disposed adults is not infinitely more powerful essentially or accidentally than the aforementioned wills; therefore it can be overcome by some object.

[Objection 3] Likewise, beasts are necessitated by objects, and man is not infinitely stronger than a beast; therefore he too can be similarly necessitated by some object to will.

[Objection 4] Likewise, final beatitude is some creature, and it necessitates the will of the blessed to its beatific act and to not sinning. For the very nature of beatitude perfectly proves this; and all Doctors hold concordantly that one perfectly and finally confirmed in blessedness cannot become miserable or sin.

[Objection 5] Likewise, some strong temptation can overcome the tempted, and sometimes does, as many say they have experienced. Hence the Philosopher, Ethics VII.7: "If someone is overcome by strong and surpassing pleasures or pains, it is not to be wondered at but pardoned — if he struggles against them, just as those who try to restrain laughter suddenly burst out." This the Apostle seems to have well expressed, 1 Corinthians 10: "God is faithful, who will not allow you to be tempted beyond what you can bear, but will make with the temptation also a way of escape, so that you may be able to endure it."

Wherefore Anselm, On Freedom of Will 6, in the person of the disciple: "I cannot pretend that there is not a certain powerlessness in the will, which nearly all of us experience when we are overcome by the violence of temptation."

[Objection 6] Likewise, someone, through fear of one great evil — such as imminent death unless he perhaps lies, throws treasure or merchandise into the sea, or does something of the sort — is necessarily compelled to act thus in this case. Hence Daniel 14, after recounting how the Babylonians gathered against the king and said "Deliver Daniel to us, or we will kill you and your household," it is added: "The king therefore saw that they were pressing upon him vehemently, and compelled by necessity, he delivered Daniel to them."

[Objection 7] If the will were so free, it would be possible for it knowingly to not-will the good and to will, choose, and knowingly do evil — which seems contrary to the Philosopher, Ethics III.3: "Every evil person is ignorant of what he ought to do and from what he ought to flee, and on account of such error they become unjust and universally bad." And Ethics VII.2, he cites Socrates as holding that no one acts contrary to what is best, but only through ignorance.

Resolution of Objection 1: According to natural philosophers and physicians, the pleasure of any perceptive power is caused by the agreement and certain natural proportion or relationship of the pleasurable created object with the power delighted. For any pleasurable created thing in relation to any power naturally apt to be delighted in it, there is some maximal agreement and some most suitable natural proportion — say, of pleasurable thing A to free power B, with C being the most suitable relationship.

When pleasurable thing A is under degree C, B can resist it and be of greater power in resisting than A in moving, as the foregoing makes clear. Therefore no matter how much A is increased, B can resist more easily than before. For although A is more pleasurable absolutely and stronger and more motive than before, it is not so relative to B; rather, it then moves B less pleasurably, or perhaps unpleasantly or painfully, because of the dissolution of that most suitable preceding proportion.

A fitting example of this is in the visible and in sight. For it is certain that the eye sees light, and this optimally and most pleasurably in a certain proportion and agreement, beyond or short of which, if the light is intensified or diminished, it will not be seen as well, nor will it cause as much pleasure, but perhaps pain — which is similarly clear in the other senses and their objects.

Therefore it evidently appears that such arguments are fallacious: "This pleasurable thing moves this man so much; therefore double moves him twice as much or more strongly, and quadruple four times as much," and so on — because of the cause stated above.

It is also clear by a similar case that the form of the argument does not hold — just as this one does not: "A luminous sphere larger than a dark one illuminates incidentally half of it and some part beyond; therefore a luminous sphere twice as large illuminates twice as much of the dark sphere," and so on. For then some finite luminous sphere would illuminate another dark one according to its entire surface incidentally — which anyone who has even slightly entered the outer court of Optics sees most clearly to be false and manifestly impossible.

Similarly with an eye seeing a sphere larger than the eye according to some part of it at a given distance: at a greater distance it sees more — a larger part of the sphere — and at a still greater distance always more, but not always proportionally more. For then at some certain distance it would see the entire hemisphere, and at a further distance even beyond, and so at some distance the entire surface of the sphere — which anyone who has perceived even a little about optics perceives to be great impossibilities.

Indeed it is most clear that such an argument is fallacious: "This pleasurable thing attracts and moves this man so much; therefore a more pleasurable thing attracts and moves him more." For if the given pleasurable thing is posited in the most suitable proportion for moving this man, and through the intensification of the pleasurable thing the proportion is dissolved, it moves him less pleasurably — or perhaps then it moves him unpleasantly, indeed painfully.

From these things it is also similarly clear that in this most suitable proportion there is the greatest difficulty of resisting; therefore if through the increase of the pleasurable thing the proportion is dissolved, the difficulty diminishes. Concerning the painful, the same should be judged as concerning the pleasurable.

It is therefore clear that no created pleasurable or painful thing can necessitate a man to willing or not-willing — especially so long as free will remains healthy.

[The text continues with further responses to the objections and extensive theological arguments about the finite capacity of the rational soul for grace, glory, pleasure, and punishment, including discussions of Christ's soul, the heresy of the Beguards, and whether there is a maximum possible degree of sin and punishment. These arguments conclude that while the soul has finite capacity for created beatitude and pain, a person can potentially sin without limit, though their capacity for the sensation of punishment is finite.]

Resolution regarding beasts, children, and the mad: It can be said, in accordance with the foregoing, that beasts, children, fools, and similar beings are not entirely necessitated by their objects, but that they of themselves by a certain natural necessity necessarily pursue or flee their recognized objects — as a stone descends and as a plant grows. Yet someone might perhaps answer differently, saying that children, fools, the drunk, and the insane have a free will and its free use, although they lack the use and judgment of reason — just as if God omnipotent were to make a creature lacking intellect but having some other cognitive power together with a free will. For this seems possible to God's omnipotence, especially since intellect and will are diverse powers, at least in operation. Nor therefore can it be inferred that they can merit; for freedom alone does not suffice for meriting, but rational cognition of the object and end is required, preceding with a fitting judgment of reason. Nor can it be inferred that they have free will, for the aforementioned reason: for free will — or rather, free judgment — according to what was shown in the first chapter of this book, implies two things: the rational judgment of deliberating, and the free power of executing.

Resolution regarding necessitation by temptation: It can perhaps be conceded that some pleasurable or painful object can necessitate a man to doing something, but not to his rational and free act. For it can take away from a man the use of reason and free will, and render him demented — and then, like a ship deprived of its helmsman's guidance, he will be tossed by impelling forces; like an untamed horse with broken reins, he will be drawn by pleasures; and like a child, fool, or madman, he will pursue desire in all things.

Resolution regarding the strength of the devil: The devil's power does not give him dominion over human wills, since no temptation can properly conquer the human will. Even the devil cannot overcome man's will through his essence alone, as was shown concerning good angels; nor through any act of his, since that act would be a temptation, and no temptation can properly conquer the human will.

Resolution regarding coerced acts: No one is properly necessitated to willing or doing something by the fear of imminent horrible evil, as was shown above, but only improperly — on account of the great difficulty imposed. For such action is voluntary in some way, though not simply so: for the motion and operation of the members proceeds from the will. Wherefore the Philosopher, Ethics III.1, speaking of such actions that are in a way coerced, says: "Such actions are therefore mixed, but they more resemble voluntary actions; for they are voluntary at the time when they are performed. The end of the action is according to the time, and both the voluntary and the involuntary are to be spoken of at the time when one acts — and one acts willingly. For the principle of moving the organic parts in such actions is in the person himself; and where the principle is in oneself, it is also in one's power to act. Such actions are therefore voluntary — though perhaps simply involuntary, for no one would choose any such thing in itself."

This accords with Anselm, On Freedom of Will 5, as cited above. What is cited from the Philosopher, Ethics III.2 — that in those coerced situations there is pardon for things that exceed human nature and no one would endure — can be explained through the magnitude of difficulty that a person refuses to endure, according to what was touched on above. There is not properly necessity there, as the foregoing also taught.

Resolution regarding the practical syllogism: For the practical syllogism, one should respond that whoever has such a syllogism — "Every sweet thing is to be tasted; this is sweet; therefore this is to be tasted" — if he has a will in conformity and is not prevented, necessarily acts in conformity. Otherwise it is not true. For otherwise the Philosopher would fall into that insane proposition condemned at Paris — that man necessarily obeys reason in all things — just as Socrates seems to have damnably fallen into the same error.

Regarding astrological judgments: The stars and celestial powers greatly dispose and vehemently incline the human body to pursuing certain agreeable things and fleeing contrary ones. This disposition is a natural virtue or vice, of which many natural and moral philosophers and astrologers often treat. This natural virtue or vice inclines as vehemently toward its proper pleasures and operations as moral virtue does toward its own — indeed, sometimes much more vehemently. For we manifestly see some persons from early childhood so affected toward pursuing certain things that they are scarcely and with the greatest difficulty restrained.

Hence astrologers say that if someone has a strong nativity toward some vice, however much he is exercised in the opposite virtue, he will never be perfectly established in it without most easily relapsing into such vice. This proneness, disposition, or natural concupiscence — so firmly inhering, so vehemently impelling, and so pleasurably attracting — is not uprooted, conquered, or subjected except by strong fighting, painful struggle, and manifold labor and pain. But most people flee from sorrows and labors and embrace delights and luxuries; therefore they pursue for the most part their natural desires.

And this is why astrologers, physiognomists, and the like often speak the truth. Concerning natural habits, dispositions, and aptitudes they have certain judgments; but concerning human acts they do not have such certain judgments, because they are not confirmed by any necessity, as the foregoing has taught — as also anyone who wishes can often find out by examining the nativities of many people and other customary judgments.

For let such a judge tell me: "You will then marry a wife, then beget a son, then receive riches and honors, tomorrow you will go to such a place and do this or that" — and for then and perhaps forever I will abstain from such things. Let him also tell me about my newborn child: "He will be so dishonorable, so wicked, addicted to such and so many vices" — and I will procure that all occasions of vice be removed from him to such an extent, and that he be so artificially altered to the contrary, so studiously educated in all virtues, and guarded with such diligence, and I myself will so forewarn and instruct him, that he will not be so evil — indeed not evil at all, but good — though perhaps not so morally good as if he had been born more apt for virtues. For just as according to Ptolemy in the Centiloquium, saying 8, "a wise soul aids the work of the stars, as a sower aids natural forces," so according to the same, saying 5, "the best astrologer will be able to prevent much of the evil that is to come according to the stars, when he has foreknown its nature."

COROLLARY

COROLLARY: THAT THE WILL OF A RATIONAL CREATURE IS NOT MERELY PASSIVE BUT ACTIVE; AND THAT THE WILL, THOUGH MOST SUFFICIENTLY DISPOSED BY SECONDARY CAUSES TO ACT, CAN ON ONE OCCASION NOT ACT AND ON ANOTHER OCCASION PERFORM ITS FREE ACT; AND THEREFORE THAT WHEN UNEQUAL GOODS ARE SET BEFORE THE WILL, IT DOES NOT NECESSARILY WILL THE GREATER; INDEED, WHEN AN HONORABLE GOOD AND A DISHONORABLE BUT VERY PLEASURABLE OR USEFUL EVIL ARE SET BEFORE IT, IT CAN KNOWINGLY NEGLECT THAT GOOD AND CHOOSE THAT EVIL; AND THEREFORE THAT WITH RIGHT REASON IN THE INTELLECT THERE CAN BE ERROR IN THE AFFECTIONS; AND THAT THE IRRATIONAL APPETITE DOES NOT NECESSITATE MAN TO ACT; THAT CELESTIAL BODIES DO NOT NECESSITATE THE WILL; THAT THE DEVIL DOES NOT NECESSITATE THE WILL; AND THAT NO TEMPTATION NECESSITATES THE WILL; THAT PURE EVIL SHOWN TO THE WILL NECESSITATES IT TO NOT-WILLING, AND PURE GOOD TO NOT HATING POSITIVELY; AND THE WILL ITSELF BY NATURAL NECESSITY NECESSARILY CANNOT DO THESE THINGS. WHERE ALSO IT IS SHOWN CONSEQUENTLY THAT PERHAPS IT WOULD GREATLY BEFIT AND MOST GREATLY BENEFIT THEOLOGIANs AND PERFECT CATHOLICS NOT TO BE IGNORANT OF ASTROLOGY AND OTHER SUCH SCIENCES.

[The corollary text restates all the above conclusions and adds an extended argument for why theologians should learn astrology and similar sciences — both for their practical benefits and for effectively refuting their abusers. This section includes discussions of Ptolemy, Abraham, Moses, Solomon, Daniel, and other biblical figures who were learned in these sciences, along with arguments about how such knowledge assists in correcting the calendar, determining Easter, and understanding celestial signs.]

CHAPTER 4: THAT FREE WILL WHEN TEMPTED CANNOT BY ITS OWN POWERS WITHOUT GOD'S HELP AND HIS GRACE OVERCOME ANY TEMPTATION.

Having shown in the previous chapter that no secondary cause and no temptation can necessitate free will to its rational and free act, it remains not irrelevantly to show that free will, when tempted, cannot by its own powers without God's help and His grace overcome any temptation.

For the proud Pelagius asserted the opposite: he said that man by the powers of free will alone can fulfill God's commands, as is more fully recounted in I.3.

Also at the end of the book of Blessed Prosper For the Preachers of the Grace of God against Cassian, where the 13 errors of Pelagius are recounted, two of these are set forth: "That free will is not free if it needs God's help, since each person has it in his own will to do something or not do it"; and "That our victory is not from God's help but from free will."

The same is attested by the Council of Milevis, at which Augustine was present along with Anselm, legate of the Roman Church, against the Pelagians, in which it is written: "It has pleased all the bishops who were at this holy synod to establish what has been defined in the present council." And there follows: "It has been decided that whoever says that the grace of God by which we are justified through Jesus Christ our Lord avails only for the remission of sins that have already been committed, but not also for help so that they may not be committed — let him be anathema."

Hence Augustine, Against Pelagius and Celestius, On the Grace of Christ and on Original Sin I.23, writes: "In his book to the sacred virgin Demetrias, when he says that we may deserve divine grace so as to resist the evil spirit more easily with the help of the Holy Spirit, he clearly indicates what he thinks. For why did he interpose this word 'more easily'? Was not the sense complete without it — 'that we may resist the evil spirit with the help of the Holy Spirit'? But what damage this addition has done, who does not understand? For he wishes it to be believed that the powers of nature — which he extols so as to cast them headlong — are so great that even without the help of the Holy Spirit, though less easily, the evil spirit can still somehow be resisted."

This error of Pelagius, then, although it seems to have been destroyed by what has already been said, can nevertheless be further and not uselessly destroyed and refuted from an abundance of other arguments.

For every temptation either excites to doing what is forbidden or restrains from doing what is commanded. Therefore every temptation is properly overcome either by resting from what is forbidden or by doing what is commanded. But no one can act without God acting, as the third and fourth chapters of Book I show; nor can anyone rest from acting without God causing his rest — for if resting is acting, this is clear from the foregoing; and if it is purely not acting, it is clear from I.10 and the corollaries of I.13.

Likewise, by I.22, God necessarily either wills the tempted person to overcome the temptation — and then by I.10 He gives insuperable help to the tempted — or He does not will him to overcome it, indeed wills him not to overcome it — and then by the same I.10 he will in no way overcome it.

Or let the argument be put this way: Let the falsifier suppose that the tempted person overcomes the temptation without God's help. Then by I.22, God has an act of will regarding this overcoming — either volition or nolition. If volition, then by I.10 He gives insuperable help to the tempted. If nolition, then by the same I.10 he in no way overcomes the temptation.

More briefly: the tempted person overcomes; therefore it is true that the tempted person overcomes; therefore by the corollary of I.22, God wills him to overcome — and so on as before.

Nor can anyone pretend that the tempted person naturally first overcomes and that God naturally afterward wills him to overcome — so that the divine volition does not provide help to the tempted — because by I.22 and I.24, that volition is eternal, and by I.20 and I.21, it is not caused by this overcoming.

Likewise, such a victory pleases God; therefore He approves and wills it — not by a novel volition, nor one caused subsequently by such victory, as was just argued — but by one that is prior, eternal in time and in nature, as I.18 with the three following chapters makes clear. Therefore by I.10 it is an insuperable helper to the one who overcomes.

Likewise, otherwise not every victory of the tempted would be preordained by divine providence, but some would be left to chance and fortune — against I.27 and what follows.

Likewise, by I.31, bodily victory is contained under divine providence; but spiritual victory is better than bodily victory; therefore by I.30, the former cannot exist without divine providence.

Likewise, all the reasons and authorities proving that bodily victory is given by the Lord will prove the same concerning spiritual victory. For all things written about bodily victories in the Old Testament prefigure spiritual victories — for according to the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 10, "all things happened to them in figure," as I.31 more fully treated.

Hence Gregory, cited in the Decretum 23, question 1: "Unless these carnal wars bore the figure of spiritual wars, the books of Jewish histories would never, I think, have been handed down by the Apostles to the disciples of Christ — who came to teach peace — to be read in the churches."

Likewise, to resist a greater temptation requires greater virtue, and a lesser temptation lesser virtue; therefore to resist however small a temptation requires some virtue. But no virtue can do anything without the Lord of virtues, who is the first virtue of all virtues, as chapters 2, 3, and 4 of Book I teach.

[The chapter continues with extensive citations from Scripture — Psalms, Isaiah, Gregory, Augustine — all proving that victory over temptation comes from God's grace, not from human effort alone. It refutes various Pelagian subterfuges: that grace is needed only for meritorious victory; that grace merely means God moderates the tempter's power; that grace is simply free will itself given freely; and that grace is needed only for knowledge of sin. Each is shown to be a form of the Pelagian heresy condemned by councils and Church fathers.]

CHAPTER 5: THAT FREE WILL, HOWEVER GREAT THE CREATED GRACE SUPPORTING IT, CANNOT WITHOUT OTHER SPECIAL HELP FROM GOD OVERCOME ANY TEMPTATION.

After the foregoing, what is more fitting than to demonstrate that free will, supported by however great a created grace, cannot without some other special help from God overcome any temptation? This is evidently demonstrated by the arguments just set forth in the previous chapter. It is also clearly evident from the corollary of I.41.

Moreover, otherwise a wayfarer who is finally reprobate — but presently existing in however great a grace — could by himself, without other help from God, overcome any temptation regarding mortal sin, or some certain given temptation. And if he were to do so, he would die in grace and would be predestined to life; and so someone reprobated to death could from his works be predestined to life — indeed, a reprobate could make himself predestined to life, against I.43.

Here I once heard someone respond by saying that no one can make himself predestined, but someone can bring it about that he is predestined — that is, according to him, he can do something such that, once done, he will be predestined to life.

This response, however, errs in two ways. First, in that it strives to separate things that cannot be separated — namely that someone makes himself predestined, and that he brings it about that he is predestined. For if he brings it about that he is predestined, this is through some merit that is a total or at least partial efficient cause of his being predestined — because through that merit he moves and incites God to predestine him. Therefore that merit is a similar efficient cause, moving and inciting toward his being predestined; therefore it similarly effects his being predestined; therefore it similarly makes him predestined.

Second, it errs in saying that someone can bring it about that he is predestined — that is, according to the same person, he can do something such that, once done, he will be predestined. For that ablative "once done" either signifies the cause of predestination, or the order of prior to posterior, or neither cause nor order but something unrelated. If a cause, then his deed is the cause of divine predestination — against I.43. If order, then after that deed he is predestined and before he was not; therefore predestination is temporal and daily, not eternal — against I.42. If something unrelated, then by the same reasoning a dog can bring it about that someone is predestined: for a dog can do something — such as bark — and once it has barked, some person will be predestined, just as he was eternally before.

Here the respondent further replied, saying the prior division was insufficient, and added a fourth member — namely that the ablative signifies an effect of predestination, and in this way he explained his statement: "Someone can bring it about that he is predestined, because he can do something such that, once done, he will be predestined" — that is, once done, it follows as from effect to cause, and from posterior to prior, that he is predestined.

Wherefore, consistently speaking, he must concede that someone can bring it about that God exists, or that the world exists: for he can do something such that, once done, it follows as from effect to cause and from posterior to prior that God or the world exists.

Likewise, by the same reasoning he would have to concede that someone can make himself predestined, because he can produce its effect. [The text continues with several more logical refutations of this position.]

Likewise, if someone could overcome a strong temptation by his own powers, he could similarly increase his own merit — which is of far greater difficulty — against I.44. Likewise, since overcoming temptation is meritorious, the tempted person could through multiplied victories by his own powers, without God's help, similarly multiply his merit and virtues, and acquire for himself a reward beyond the limit divinely appointed for him — against I.44.

Likewise, if a person in grace who is reprobate and tempted could of himself overcome a temptation regarding mortal sin, he could of himself die in grace and be saved; therefore he could of himself increase the number of the elect, or permute the units of that number — which is against what was established in I.46.

Here perhaps Lombard would respond, as he responds in Sentences I, distinction 40, in these words: "We respond that it is said for the following reason, and it is true, that the number of the elect cannot be increased or diminished — because both cannot simultaneously be the case: namely that someone be saved and not be predestined, or that someone be predestined and be damned."

But this exposition or gloss is too far removed from the text. For Sacred Scripture and the sacred Doctors, when they say the number of such or such persons cannot be increased or diminished, mean what philosophers, logicians, and other practitioners of other arts, and the common understanding of people always mean — namely that no further such unit can be added to or taken from the number of such persons; not that some unit of it is simultaneously such and not such.

[The text provides extensive argumentation against Lombard's interpretation, showing that Augustine's statement that "the number of the predestined is so certain that no one is added to them or diminished from them" must be understood in the straightforward sense — that the actual count cannot change — not merely in the trivial sense that no one can simultaneously be predestined and not predestined. Multiple biblical parallels are offered, along with logical arguments about the absurd consequences of the weaker interpretation.]

Therefore perhaps someone will respond more subtly, saying that the number of the elect cannot be increased or diminished, but can be greater or less than it previously was or currently is — though one of these seems to entail the opposite of the other. And it also seems that if such a number could be greater, it could be made greater by the addition of some unit — and so on as before.

[The chapter concludes with additional arguments showing that if man could persevere by his own powers, the number of the elect would depend on human wills — which are simply contingent in either direction and, with respect to God, entirely fortuitous — making the number of the elect contingent and uncertain, contrary to Scripture and the Fathers. It would also render prayer for overcoming temptation vain, and thanksgiving for victory empty — which is condemned as not merely vain but profanely heretical.]

CHAPTER 6: THAT THE SPECIAL HELP OF GOD IS HIS UNCONQUERABLE WILL.

After it has been shown in the foregoing that no tempted person can overcome any temptation whatsoever by the powers of free will alone, whether without grace or with however great a grace, without other special help from God — it remains consequently to inquire what that help is by which the tempted overcome all temptations, and without which they are overcome in all.

That help, since it is neither free will nor created grace or charity — which are the greatest created gifts of God and of the greatest help — what can it be but the divine will? For whomever God helps, He helps voluntarily, just as whatever He does externally He does not by nature, nor from cognition alone, but by will, as chapters 8 and 9 of Book I teach. Far be it also that He should help anyone fortuitously or by chance, because then I.22, I.27, I.28, and I.29 would shamefully rebuke Him.

The divine will, therefore, is that help without which every tempted person is overcome — as can be known from I.22 and the other things previously established — and through which every tempted person who overcomes efficaciously overcomes the tempter, as I.10 with the foregoing shows.

Hence holy David, well experienced in spiritual battle — having been frequently overcome and overcoming — says: "In His indignation there is wrath, and in His will there is life" (Psalm 29) — wrath, namely, prostrating into guilt the one whom the Lord is indignant at; and life, sustaining in innocence the one whom the Lord deigns to voluntarily help. Though it is also expounded otherwise, the entire course of that Psalm 29 supports this exposition.

"I will exalt You, O Lord, because You have lifted me up and have not let my enemies rejoice over me. O Lord my God, I cried to You and You healed me. Lord, You brought my soul up from hell; You saved me from those descending into the pit." And then, stirring up thanksgiving for such great benefits to the Lord, he immediately adds: "Sing to the Lord, O you His saints, and give thanks to the memory of His holiness; for there is wrath in His indignation, and life in His will."

The same, Psalm 5: "Lord, as with a shield of Your good will You have crowned us" — where the Gloss says: "The good will by which You have crowned us is for us as a shield against the enemy by which we are protected, and it is as a crown — that is, arms — by which the enemy is defeated. This is a shield against him who by temptations and tribulations suggests despair; and the sense is: Your good will protects us and makes us conquer. Or thus: a shield, which is named from its roundness, does two things — it guards the body and crowns the head. So the gratuitous will of God by which He calls us is a defense here against all things, and in the future a crown."

The same, Psalm 43: "For not by their own sword did they possess the land, and their own arm did not save them, but Your right hand and Your arm and the light of Your countenance, because You were pleased with them." And Psalm 88: "You are the glory of their strength, and in Your good pleasure our horn shall be exalted" — the Gloss: "You are the glory — that is, the exaltation — of their strength, whom You not only illumine but also give the ability; and in Your good pleasure — that is, because it has pleased You, not because we are worthy — our horn shall be exalted."

And 2 Maccabees, last chapter: "The Lord gives victory not according to the power of arms, but as it pleases Him." And lest any deceit of Pelagian malice steal upon you, hear from whom anyone is made worthy — "for he is worthy of this honor whom the king wishes to honor" (Esther 6).

And Augustine, On the Predestination of the Saints 12: "Also what I said — that the salvation of that religion has never been lacking to anyone who was worthy, and that he was not worthy to whom it was lacking — if it is discussed and asked from where anyone is worthy, there are some who say by human will; but we say by grace or divine predestination."

Whoever therefore is worthy of victory is not worthy from himself, but from God's gratuitous will, which both makes him worthy of victory and makes him victorious.

CHAPTER 7: THAT NO ONE, EVEN WHEN NOT TEMPTED, CAN BY THE POWERS OF FREE WILL ALONE, WITHOUT GRACE OR WITH HOWEVER GREAT CREATED GRACE, WITHOUT OTHER HELP FROM GOD, AVOID ANY SIN.

To complete the treatment of the avoidance of sin, it only remains to show, in consequence of the foregoing, that no one — even when not tempted — can by the powers of free will alone, without grace or in however great a grace, without other help from God, avoid any sin.

For it is easier for a tempted person to avoid sin than for a non-tempted person to avoid temptation. For all day long we are tempted unwillingly, but we never properly sin unwillingly. But no tempted person can avoid the sin about which he is tempted by the powers of free will alone, without grace or with however great a grace, without other help from God, as the three preceding chapters have taught. Therefore no non-tempted person can avoid being tempted about sin by the powers of free will alone, without grace or in however great a grace, without other help from God. And if he is tempted about sin and God's help is not present, he is necessarily overcome, according to the aforementioned chapters.

Likewise, whoever is not tempted — it is necessarily from God that he is not tempted, as the eleventh part of I.13 proves. And by I.22, God necessarily has some act of will regarding such a person not being tempted — and not a nolition, because then by I.10 he would be tempted — therefore a volition, which by the same I.10 does not allow him to be tempted.

Hence Augustine, in his sermon on the nativity of Saint Mary Magdalene, last chapter: "This your God says to you: I governed you for Myself, I preserved you for Myself so that you would not commit adultery. A tempter was absent, and that the tempter might be absent, I brought it about. Place and time were absent, and that these might be absent, I brought it about."

Likewise, if anyone who is not tempted could by his own powers avoid sin, let this be supposed to occur. Then by I.22, God has some act of will regarding this avoidance — and not a nolition, because then by I.10 it would not occur — therefore a volition; therefore by the same I.10, it provides insuperable help.

Likewise, that avoidance is accomplished either by acting or by not acting. If by acting, God is there the first cause acting, as chapters 3 and 4 of Book I prove. If by not acting, God is still the first cause of that non-action, as the eleventh part of I.13 teaches.

Likewise, according to what was cited in Chapter 3 of this Book II, grace is necessary for avoiding sins — and this, it seems, even for those not tempted. For some of the authorities cited there speak generally of all persons indiscriminately, making no mention of the tempted. And that grace is either the Holy Spirit or some created gift of His which does nothing except under the direction of the Holy Spirit Himself, as is clear from chapters 3 and 4 following.

Likewise, according to what was shown in Chapter 4, every man would commit any sin if he were not specially preserved by God.

COROLLARY

COROLLARY: THAT THE DIVINE WILL, JUST AS IT PRESERVES THE TEMPTED FROM RUIN, SO ALSO IT PRESERVES THE NON-TEMPTED BOTH FROM TEMPTATION AND FROM SIN.

Hence it is manifest that the divine will, just as it preserves the tempted from ruin, so also it preserves the non-tempted both from temptation and from sin. This corollary can be similarly demonstrated through the foregoing, just as the fifth chapter demonstrated a similar conclusion.

O therefore the wondrous condescension of divine mercy toward us wretched and ungrateful ones — which preserves those not tempted untouched from so many and such great whirlwinds of temptation; which preserves those tempted unconquered in so many and such great assaults of temptation; and which heaps up so many and such great rewards for those who conquer through it, not through themselves! So that therefore, with it leading, we may return from ingratitude, let us humbly ask that, with it also granting, we may deserve to receive not the spirit of this world but the Spirit who is from God, so that we may at least know the things that have been given to us by God, in whom, crying "Abba, Father," we may render the most humble thanks in all things.

CHAPTER 8: ON PERSEVERANCE — WHAT IT IS, AND THAT NO WAYFARER, SUPPORTED BY HOWEVER GREAT A CREATED GRACE, CAN BY THE POWERS OF FREE WILL ALONE, OR EVEN WITH THE HELP OF GRACE, PERSEVERE FINALLY WITHOUT OTHER SPECIAL HELP FROM GOD.

After these things, perseverance must be treated. For the proud Pelagius presumed to assert that man by the powers of free will alone can fulfill all God's commands and avoid all sins, as is evident from II.4 of this work; and therefore can persevere finally from himself — which the various books of blessed Augustine published against the Pelagians also attest.

First, therefore, we must see what perseverance is. Cicero, Rhetoric II, defines it thus: "Perseverance is a stable and perpetual remaining in a well-considered plan." And Aristotle, Ethics VII.7, defines perseverance in this way: "To persevere is to hold fast in what one has resolved." And for the difference between perseverance and continence, he adds: "Continence is to overcome, just as not being conquered is different from conquering; on account of which, continence is also more choice-worthy than perseverance."

Having understood what perseverance is, it remains consequently to show that no wayfarer, weighed down by a corrupt body, established in however great a created grace, can by the powers of free will alone, or even with the help of grace, persevere finally without other special help from God.

For by the preceding chapter, no wayfarer however full of grace can so avoid mortal sin. Likewise, no wayfarer however full of grace can so avoid temptation regarding mortal sin, as the preceding corollary inferred — and it is sufficiently clear from the preceding chapter and from what is very evidently apparent in itself. And if he is tempted regarding any mortal sin, he cannot avoid it, as chapters 4 and 5 of this book show.

Likewise, nearly all the arguments that proved similar conclusions about overcoming temptations and avoiding sins in the four preceding chapters will prove this conclusion. And for this conclusion, the entire second chapter of Book I similarly serves.

For this same purpose there are quite many authorities of canonical Scripture and of the Doctors, some of which were cited above, with quite many more remaining to be cited for anyone who wishes. Of these I will cite a few, and briefly.

Psalm 118 says to the Lord God: "By Your ordinance the day perseveres" — that is, the angel or human being, luminous with the light of justice. And Joshua 14 records Caleb as having said: "The Lord has granted me life, as He promised, up to the present day. I am now eighty-five years old, as strong as I was at the time when I was sent; the strength of that time perseveres in me to this day, both for fighting and for marching." But through whom did such great strength persevere for him, if not through Him who promised in Numbers 14: "My servant Caleb I will bring into this land"?

And Deuteronomy 29: "He brought you," says Moses, "for forty years through the desert. Your garments have not been worn out, nor have the sandals of your feet been consumed by age. You have not eaten bread, nor drunk wine or strong drink, so that you might know that He is the Lord your God." But since, according to the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 10, "all things happened to them in figure," what could be better figured by these things than that, with the Lord leading us through all the years of this pilgrimage through the trackless desert of this world, with Him granting perseverance, our spiritual garments — namely our virtues — have not been worn out, nor the sandals of our feet — namely the gifts of genuine charity, of the twofold love of God and neighbor — consumed by age through misuse? We have not eaten bread of doctrine that without Him would strengthen our heart; we have not drunk wine and strong drink of devotion that would perseveringly gladden our heart without Him. Yet we have not failed, so that we may know that He is the Lord our God, from whom all things, through whom all things, in whom all things exist and subsist — who also sustains and supports all things by the word of His power, as the same Apostle attests, Romans 11 and Hebrews 1. Similar is Genesis 27: "With grain and wine and oil I have established him."

What else than perseverance do these words proclaim: "Preserve me, O Lord"; "By the word of the Lord the heavens were established" — that is, according to Augustine, the just or the Apostles; "He set my feet upon a rock"; "Command, O God, Your strength"; "Confirm, O God, what You have wrought in us"; "Who founded the earth upon its stability"; "Guard us, O Lord, as the pupil of the eye"; "Unless the Lord guard the city, he watches in vain who guards it" — and many similar things in many Psalms?

And the most eloquent Isaiah, chapter 26: "The city of our strength is Zion; the Savior — a wall and rampart shall be set up in it" — namely to guard the city. And holy David, 1 Chronicles, last chapter, thus praying to the Lord for the people devoted to him: "Lord God, preserve forever this will of their heart, and let this mind remain always in veneration of You" — what else did he seek than consummated perseverance? And why did he seek it from God, if it were not given by Him, but each person could have it by his own powers, as I.46 more fully argued?

Hence blessed Augustine, On the Gift of Perseverance 2, shows the same conclusion by the same argument: "Why," he says, "is this perseverance sought from God, if it is not given by God? Or is this prayer also mocking, when something is asked of Him that is known not to be given by Him but to be in man's power even without His giving? Just as also that thanksgiving is mocking, if thanks are given to God for what He Himself has neither bestowed nor done. But 'do not be deceived,' says the Apostle, 'God is not mocked.'" And he relies heavily on this argument almost throughout that whole book, as is evident in chapters 3, 6, and 9, where he also cites this from the blessed martyr Cyprian, On the Lord's Prayer (which is his fifth epistle), and in many other places.

And just as that David prayed to God for the perseverance of his people, so also our David, the Lord Christ, prayed to God the Father for His people: "Holy Father, keep them in Your name, those whom You have given Me, that they may be one, just as We are. While I was with them, I kept them in Your name; those whom You have given Me I guarded, and none of them perished except the son of perdition, that the Scripture might be fulfilled." And below: "I do not ask that You take them out of the world, but that You keep them from evil" (John 17).

Following His teaching, His priests pray thus: "Guard, we beseech You, O Lord, Your Church with perpetual mercy; and since without You human mortality slips, may it always be drawn from harmful things and directed to salutary ones by Your helps."

Likewise, 1 Kings 19 [= 3 Kings 19:18]: the Lord said to Elijah: "I have left for Myself seven thousand men whose knees have not been bent before Baal, and every mouth that has not adored him with a kiss." Whoever therefore does not bend his knees before Baal — so as to be deflected from justice in deed — nor adores him with the mouth of heart or body, nor kisses his hand in thought or speech, is kept not by his own powers or merits but by perseverance freely given by the Lord. For the Lord would not have said "I have left for Myself seven thousand men" if He Himself had not done this, but they had rather left themselves to the Lord when they abandoned idols on their own, not through Him.

So the Apostle argues, Romans 11, showing that the remnants of Israel are saved by grace: "Has God cast away His people? God forbid. Do you not know what the Scripture says in Elijah? What does the divine response say to him? 'I have left for Myself seven thousand men who have not bent their knees before Baal.' So therefore also in the present time, remnants according to the election of God's grace have been saved. But if by grace, then it is no longer from works." From the fact, then, that God says "I have left for Myself," the Apostle implies that God did this, not they themselves; and that God did this freely — namely according to the election of grace, not for merits. For if He had done this for their merits, they by their merits would primarily and in a certain way more principally have done this. "So therefore," he says, "also in the present time, remnants according to the election of God's grace have been saved" — just as in that time those remnants, or those left over, were saved, not by themselves, but by God, and this freely, not from works.

[The chapter continues with extensive citations from Augustine's On the Gift of Perseverance and On Rebuke and Grace, showing through each petition of the Lord's Prayer (according to Cyprian's exposition) that perseverance is God's gift and not from man himself. It includes Augustine's key distinction between the help given to the first man Adam — without which he could not persevere if he willed — and the help given to the saints predestined to the kingdom of God — by which perseverance itself is given to them, so that they not only cannot persevere without this gift but also through this gift are made to be none other than persevering.]

Augustine, On Rebuke and Grace 59: "In this place of miseries, where temptation is human life upon earth, strength is perfected in weakness. What strength? None other than this: that he who glories should glory in the Lord. And therefore concerning perseverance in good itself, God did not wish His saints to glory in their own powers, but in Him — who not only gives them help such as He gave to the first man, without which they cannot persevere if they will, but also works in them the willing itself. For since they will not persevere unless they both can and will, perseverance is given to them by the generosity of divine grace both in the possibility and in the will. For their will is so kindled by the Holy Spirit that they can because they so will, and they so will because God works in them to will."

"For if in so great a weakness of this life their own will were left to them, so that they might remain in God's help — without which they could not persevere — if they willed, and God did not work in them to will, among so many and such great temptations their will would succumb through its own weakness, and therefore they could not persevere, because failing through weakness of will they would not will, or would not will so strongly as to be able."

"Help was therefore given to the weakness of the human will, so that it might be driven by divine grace unswervingly and insuperably — and therefore, although weak, it might not fail, nor be conquered by any adversity."

And chapter 53: "To the first man, who in that good in which he was made had received the ability not to sin, not to die, and not to abandon that good itself, was given the help of perseverance — not by which it would be brought about that he would persevere, but without which through free will he could not persevere. But now to the saints predestined to the kingdom of God through grace, not such a help of perseverance is given, but such that perseverance itself is given to them — not only so that without this gift they cannot be persevering, but also so that through this gift they are nothing other than persevering."

"For He did not only say, 'Without Me you can do nothing,' but also said, 'You did not choose Me, but I chose you, and appointed you, that you should go and bear fruit, and your fruit should remain.' By which words He showed that He gave them not only righteousness but also perseverance in it."

Likewise, to posit that a man in grace can persevere in grace by himself was the error of Pelagius — which is evident from Augustine, On the Gift of Perseverance 3, where, wishing to show through the petitions of the Lord's Prayer, according to the exposition of the blessed martyr Cyprian, that perseverance in good is a gratuitous gift of God and not from man himself, he says: "Read somewhat more attentively his exposition, the book of the blessed martyr Cyprian that he composed on this subject, whose title is On the Lord's Prayer, and see how many years before he prepared an antidote against the poisons of the Pelagians that were to come. For in it are things which the Catholic Church especially defends against them — one of which is that the grace of God is not given according to our merits, since all the merits of the righteous are gifts of God, and God's grace confers all of them."

[The chapter concludes with Anselm's testimony from On the Harmony 9 and from his meditations, confirming that no one preserves the rectitude received except by grace both preceding and following.]

Anselm, On the Harmony 9: "In how many ways, after receiving that rectitude, grace helps free will to preserve what it received — although I cannot enumerate them all, for it does this in manifold ways — nevertheless it will not be useless to say something about it. Certainly no one preserves this received rectitude except by willing. But no one can will it without possessing it; and no one can in any way possess it except through grace. Just as, therefore, no one received it except by grace going before, so no one preserves it except by the same grace following. For grace so follows its gift that it never, whether the gift be great or small, ceases to give it — unless free will, by willing something else, abandons the rectitude it received."

The same, in his meditations, in a certain prayer entitled For Enemies: "Almighty and merciful Lord Jesus Christ, just as I could not begin anything good without You, so neither can I complete or keep it without You."

COROLLARY

COROLLARY: THAT NO WAYFARER, BY THE POWERS OF FREE WILL OR GRACE ALONE, OR BOTH CONJOINED, WITHOUT OTHER SPECIAL HELP FROM GOD, CAN PERSEVERE FOR ANY TIME AT ALL.

Hence it is manifest that no man in this state, by the powers of free will alone, or of however great a created grace, without other help from God, can not only not persevere finally, but not even for any time at all — which is sufficiently clear from the foregoing.

Likewise, if anyone could so persevere for one hour — since at the end of that hour he would be as spiritually strong as before, or perhaps even stronger — he could still equally easily or more easily persevere similarly for another following hour, and so for all hours, and thus finally — against the chapter just set forth.

Likewise, if anyone could so persevere for one hour, he could also finally: for the end of that hour will perhaps be for him the end of life. For if of two equals, one who will live many years can so persevere for an hour, so can another who will live only for an hour; therefore he can so persevere finally — which the preceding chapter does not permit.

Likewise, as the second chapter of Book I teaches, everything that is natural and is not per se such but is mutable into not-such, if it is to remain unchanged, must continually lean upon something per se fixed; therefore every just person must continually lean upon God.

Hence Isaiah 50: "Let him trust in the name of the Lord and lean upon his God" — where the Gloss says: "So that human fragility may be sustained by the divine majesty." And Song of Songs, last chapter: "Who is she who ascends from the desert, abounding in delights, leaning upon her beloved?"

Hence Augustine, On Grace and Free Will 15, says: "It is so necessary for man that not only should the ungodly be justified by the grace of God, but also that when he has been justified, grace should walk with him and he should lean upon it lest he fall. On account of this it is written in the Song of Songs concerning the Church itself: 'Who is she who ascends made white, leaning upon her kinsman?' For she was made white — she who could not be white by herself. And now, made white, she walks well, but only if she perseveringly leans upon Him by whom she was made white."

CHAPTER 9: THAT NEITHER MAN NOR ANGEL WITH HOWEVER GREAT A GRACE BEFORE THE FALL COULD PERSEVERE FINALLY, OR FOR A TIME, WITHOUT OTHER SPECIAL HELP FROM GOD.

Having shown that man after the fall, restored through grace, cannot by the powers of free will alone, or even of however great a created grace, without other help from God, persevere finally or for a time, it remains to show consequently that neither man nor angel before the fall, supported by however great a created grace, could so persevere finally or for an hour. This indeed will be shown similarly by the reasons demonstrating the principal conclusion of the preceding chapter.

Likewise, if free will in grace before the fall could so persevere, it could similarly overcome any temptation and guard against any sin. And since it is not now infinitely weaker after the fall — for then it would have entirely lost all its strength — it could also now, with as much grace as it then had, overcome some temptation, namely one weaker in proportion to how much weaker free will now is than before, as due proportionality clearly proves. This is contrary to chapter 4 of this Book II. Or again, to the same conclusion: let free will have as much additional grace as it has been weakened by the fall, so that the same proportion is always preserved — and so on as before.

And if anyone wishes to respond by saying that before the fall there was no difficulty whatsoever in resisting the tempter, but after the fall there is always some difficulty, and therefore the argument does not proceed — indeed that response will retreat. For if free will by its own powers, or with grace without other help from God, could then resist all temptation without difficulty, it could also do so now, though with some difficulty. For difficulty by no means excludes all possibility of free will and includes impossibility — because if it did, it would not be called difficult but impossible. The powers of free will, though weakened and resisting with some difficulty, still exceed the powers of some temptation or tempter.

Many saints in this state also overcame very many temptations, as is believed, without any difficulty or annoyance — indeed with great ease and joy — and also guarded against many sins about which they were not at all tempted, without any difficulty, indeed with the greatest ease. Nor is it entirely clear that for angel or man before the fall there was absolutely no difficulty. For it seems remarkable if man could then move every weight without any difficulty whatsoever, indeed with equal ease however it might be moved; nor does it seem less remarkable if he could then have discerned every letter or color in any light, however intense or dim, and at any distance, great or small, without any difficulty, uncertainty, or error — indeed with equal ease, certainty, and verification. These things, however, I leave to more careful study, pursuing what I have begun.

Holy Augustine, therefore, speaking of man before the fall, Enchiridion 88, says: "Man was so made upright that he could both remain in that uprightness — not without divine help — and become perverse by his own will."

The same, concerning the same subject, On Rebuke and Grace 48: "God had then given man a good will — for He had made him in it, He who had made him upright. He had given him help without which he could not remain in it if he willed." And chapter 49, concerning man and angel before the fall: "If this help had been lacking to either angel or man when they were first made — since their nature was not made such that it could remain without divine help if it willed — they would certainly not have fallen by their own fault; for help would have been lacking without which they could not remain." And below in the same chapter: "The first man did not need grace to receive the good, because he had not yet lost it; but to remain in it, he needed the help of grace, without which he could not do so at all."

The same, On Nature and Grace 50, after recounting the arguments of someone trying to show by analogy that not sinning is placed in our power, says: "Just as those analogies are false, so too is what he wished to show by means of them." He continues: "He follows up and says, 'In a similar way we should understand about the possibility of not sinning — that not sinning is ours, namely in our power.'" And Augustine adds: "If he were speaking of the integral and healthy nature of man, which we do not now have, not even then would he rightly say that not sinning is only ours — although sinning would be ours. For there too there would be the help of God, like light for healthy eyes, by relying on which they see."

The same, to the same effect, City of God XIV, penultimate chapter: "Why did God not permit the first man, who was created upright — that is, of good will — to be tempted by an evil angel? Because he was so constituted that if he trusted in God's help, the good man would conquer the evil angel; but if he proudly abandoned God his Creator and Helper, pleased with himself, he would be conquered — having good merit in a will that was right because divinely aided, but evil merit in a will that was perverse because it abandoned God. For even trusting in God's help was not possible without God's help; yet withdrawing from these benefits of divine grace by pleasing himself was in his power."

"For just as in this flesh, living without God's help and without the aids of food is not possible — yet not living in it is in one's power, as those who kill themselves do — so living well in it, even in Paradise, was not in man's power without God's help, but living badly was in his power."

From these things, therefore, the first part of the principal conclusion to be shown is clear; from which, together with the preceding corollary and the reasons proving it, the second part will similarly be clear.

CHAPTER 10: OBJECTIONS AND RESPONSES.

Here perhaps someone will object against what has been said. For Lombard, Sentences II, distinction 24, after citing certain authorities asserting that God's help was necessary for man or angel before the fall to remain in the good they had then received, says: "Here we must consider what that help was, given to man in creation, by which he could remain if he willed." And he answers: "That was certainly the freedom of will, immune from all stain and corruption, and rectitude of will, and the soundness and vitality of all the natural powers of the soul."

[Bradwardine then mounts an extensive critique of Lombard's position, arguing that identifying the divine help needed before the fall with free will itself is essentially the Pelagian error — that man can fulfill God's commands by free will alone. The argument proceeds through several steps:]

If free will alone sufficed for man to stand in the good, then it sufficed for him not to eat from the tree of knowledge of good and evil — since it was by eating from it that he fell. Therefore free will sufficed for man to fulfill the divine command about not eating from the forbidden tree, which was the only command imposed on him (Genesis 2). And so the Pelagian error returns — that man can keep God's commands by free will alone.

Augustine, On the Literal Interpretation of Genesis VIII.21, inquiring into the cause of the divine command, posits a threefold prohibition: Sometimes something per se evil is prohibited, like tasting a deadly herb. Sometimes something is prohibited that would be harmful to the one prohibiting. But sometimes something is prohibited that is harmful neither to the one prohibiting nor to the one prohibited, except because it is prohibited — and it is prohibited not so that either avoids evil, but only so that the one prohibited may gain the good — namely the good of merit, by obeying the one prohibiting. The prohibition regarding the tree falls under this third category.

Hence Augustine says: "He was prohibited from that tree, which was not evil, so that the very keeping of the command would be his good, and its transgression his evil." And below: "But when that is touched which would not harm the one touching it if it were not prohibited, nor anyone else however much it might be touched — why was it prohibited, if not so that obedience per se good and disobedience per se evil might be shown?" And further below: "The Lord indeed may know why He commanded; what is commanded must be done by the servant, and then perhaps it may be seen by the one who merits why He commanded." He says "by the one who merits," and adds: "But lest we seek the reason for this command any longer — if this itself is a great benefit to man, that he serves God, then by commanding, God makes useful whatever He wills to command."

Likewise, if man had stood fast in the good, he would have merited through this confirmation and eternal beatitude — and this he could have done by free will without grace. Therefore he could merit those things too. But that through standing he would have merited confirmation and beatitude is sufficiently apparent, since the holy angels merited similarly.

Augustine, On Rebuke and Grace 39: "The good angels by their own free will stood in the truth and merited to know most certainly about their future fall that it would never happen." And chapter 40: "The devil and his angels, even if they were blessed before they fell, there was still something to be added to their beatitude if they had stood in the truth by free will, until they received that fullness of supreme beatitude as a reward for their perseverance." And chapter 41: "He made man with free will, and although ignorant of his future fall, nevertheless good, because he perceived that not dying and not becoming miserable was in his power. In which upright state, without vice, if he had willed to remain by his own free will, he would certainly, without any experience of death or unhappiness, have received — by the merit of his perseverance — that fullness of beatitude by which the holy angels are blessed: namely, that he could never fall further, and would know this most certainly."

[The chapter continues with detailed analysis showing that Lombard's exposition of Augustine's authorities is unfaithful to Augustine's actual meaning. Bradwardine systematically shows that throughout On Rebuke and Grace, Augustine always distinguishes between free will and the divine help needed for perseverance — they are really distinct, not identical. He acknowledges that his critique of Lombard, "the Lord's Anointed, Bishop of Paris," may seem harsh, but excuses himself by his zeal for Catholic truth against Pelagian inventions.]

The chapter concludes: It is therefore clear that although the first man before sin could have persevered if he had willed, yet without God's help he could not will it; therefore he could not persevere finally or for a time, as the preceding chapter asserted.

CHAPTER 11: THAT PERSEVERANCE IS NOT SOME CREATED GIFT OF GOD REALLY DIFFERING AND DISTINCT FROM CHARITY AND GRACE.

So that the divine help necessary for free will to persevere in good, mentioned above generally and confusedly, may be known more distinctly, it now remains to show that perseverance is not some created gift of God really differing from or distinct from charity and grace.

For if it were, it would not be incompatible for them to be separated from one another — and for someone to have charity and grace who does not have perseverance. And if this could be for one moment, it could be for another, and so on until the end — and thus someone without final perseverance would persevere finally, which includes a contradiction.

Likewise, if so, someone having charity without perseverance for a moment could at the end of that moment pass away by natural or other death, without final perseverance divinely given to him — and so without final perseverance he could be saved, contrary to Matthew 10: "He who perseveres to the end will be saved" — "he," that is, discretively, because he and not another.

Likewise, no one doubts that whoever has had the gift of charity and grace and does not finally persevere in it falls from it through mortal sin, in which he remains until death, and is a child of eternal death. Such a person therefore, dying in charity and grace yet without final perseverance, would simultaneously eternally inherit both life and death: life because he dies in charity — which according to Augustine, On the Trinity XV.18, "alone divides between the children of the eternal kingdom and the children of eternal perdition"; death because he departs without final perseverance.

Likewise, proceeding from the contrary: if these were really distinct, someone could without charity and grace have final perseverance and be saved — because "he who perseveres to the end will be saved" (Matthew 10). This is contrary to the aforementioned authority of Augustine.

Likewise, if perseverance were such a gift of God, it would have some proper act distinct from the proper acts of other virtues — for habits are discerned by proper acts, just as forms by proper operations, as natural and moral philosophers and theologians alike attest. But such a proper act of perseverance cannot be assigned: for it cannot be posited as an act of memory, understanding, or even will, as induction through each one manifests, nor can it be called anything else whatsoever.

Likewise, if perseverance differed really from charity, since it is necessary for salvation, the Lord would have given some special commandment concerning it — which is nowhere found in the Old or New Testament. Or else the observance of the Lord's commandments would not be sufficient for salvation — yet when someone asked what he should do to receive eternal life, the Lord answered: "You know the commandments: do not commit adultery, do not kill," etc. (Mark 10).

Wherefore it seems to me that habitual perseverance is habitual charity, or enduring charity; and actual perseverance is "per-loving" (peramatio), and to persevere finally is to "per-love" (peramare) finally.

Hence Anselm, On the Fall of the Devil 3: "To persevere in doing something, to say it in one word, is to accomplish (perficere). For we say that to persevere in writing something is to write it through (perscribere), in leading, to lead through (perducere). Let us say therefore — even if it is not in use — that to persevere in willing is to 'per-will' (pervelle)." Therefore to persevere in the love of charity, of which it is said in Matthew 10, "He who perseveres to the end will be saved," is finally to "per-love."

Or alternatively, it can be said more consonantly with the word itself, and perhaps more closely to the thing: that to persevere is to "per-serve" (perservare) the commandments, and perseverance is the "per-servance" (perservantia) of the commandments. Or still more generally: habitual perseverance is justice habitually preserved; actual perseverance is the actual preservation of justice; and to persevere itself is to preserve justice.

COROLLARY

COROLLARY: THAT THE NAME "PERSEVERANCE" SIGNIFIES NO ABSOLUTE THING ESSENTIALLY, BUT ONLY ACCIDENTALLY AND RELATIVELY — NAMELY CHARITY OR JUSTICE WITH A REGARD TO FUTURE CONTINUOUS REMAINING UNTIL THE END; AND THAT IT COULD NOT IMPROBABLY BE SAID THAT PERSEVERANCE IS THIS VERY RELATION.

Hence it is manifest that the name "perseverance" signifies no thing essentially or even absolutely, but only accidentally and relatively — namely charity or justice itself, with a regard to the end, that is, with a regard to future continuous remaining until the end. Wherefore it could not improbably be said that perseverance is this very relation — which the definition of Aristotle, and especially of Cicero, recounted in chapter 7, seems to suggest.

This corollary is sufficiently clear from what was shown in this chapter. It can nevertheless be shown additionally thus: If perseverance signified essentially and absolutely some thing in the wayfarer — since it is not of the essence of the wayfarer nor essentially consequent upon him, as is clear in many who lack it — a wayfarer having final perseverance could lose it, so that it would be true that he had lost final perseverance, just as with other habits and other absolute accidents. Yet this includes a contradiction: for if he lost final perseverance, he once had it; therefore he was then going to persevere finally, and therefore was not going to fall. Yet at the same time he was going to fall, as the subsequent event demonstrated.

Hence Augustine, On the Gift of Perseverance 7: "We call chaste the one we know to be chaste, whether or not he will remain in that chastity; and if he has any other divine gift that can be held and lost, we say he has it as long as he has it, and if he has lost it, we say he had it. But perseverance to the end — no one has it unless he has persevered to the end. Many can have it; no one can lose it."

CHAPTER 12: OBJECTIONS AND RESPONSES.

Through the corollary just set forth, the response to certain possible objections against what has been said is clear.

[The chapter addresses several objections:]

Objection: If perseverance does not really differ from charity, then since perseverance is really identical to charity, everyone having charity has perseverance — which is false, since many who have it will sin mortally and fall.

Response: This is resolved by the corollary. Perseverance adds to charity the regard of continuation through the whole time until the end; it is not a separate thing that can be possessed independently.

[Multiple further objections are addressed regarding: whether perseverance can be greater or lesser as charity is; whether those who have charity can reasonably ask God for perseverance; the case of someone in charity who will sin mortally but later return and finally persevere; and whether perseverance once had can be lost. Each is resolved through the distinction established in chapter 11 — that perseverance is not an absolute thing but a relational aspect of charity's continuation to the end.]

Augustine, On the Gift of Perseverance 7: "Let men not say that perseverance has been given to anyone until the end, unless the end itself has come and he who was given it is found to have persevered to the end." Augustine means that of no one as long as he lives in this life is it determined and certain that he has received final perseverance — not that no one has received it. Indeed, he most frequently shows the opposite, as the preceding chapters recounted.

CHAPTER 13: THAT THE HELP WITHOUT WHICH NO ONE PERSEVERES, AND THROUGH WHICH EVERYONE WHO PERSEVERES DOES PERSEVERE, IS THE HOLY SPIRIT, THE DIVINE GOODNESS AND WILL.

Having shown that free will before the fall or after, supported by however great a created grace, could not persevere finally or for a time without other special help from God, it now remains to show what that help is, supported by which everyone who perseveres does persevere, and without which no one can persevere at all.

This help is the Holy Spirit, the divine goodness and will, as chapters 8 and 9 of Book I easily demonstrated. This can also be shown as the fifth chapter of this Book II showed its similar principal conclusion. The authorities cited in those chapters also attest to this, to which I will add a few others.

Augustine, On Rebuke and Grace 47 and 49, as the end of II.9 more fully cited, shows that the divine help necessarily required by free will for persevering in good is not only that without which we cannot persevere even if we will, but also that which causes us to will. But what is that without which we cannot will, and which makes us will and produces our volitions, if not God — who according to the Apostle, Philippians 2, "works in us both to will and to do," and this through the Holy Spirit and His most omnipotent will, as chapters 8 and 9 of Book I prove?

For the divine goodness and will are frequently in canonical Scripture and in the Doctors appropriately assigned in a certain way to the Holy Spirit. Wherefore Augustine, On Rebuke and Grace 47: "The first grace given to the first Adam is that by which man has justice if he wills; the second can do more — by which it is also brought about that he wills, and wills so much and loves with such ardor that by the will of the spirit he conquers the will of the flesh that desires contrary things" — by the will of the Holy Spirit, as the Apostle means in Romans 8 when he says, "If by the Spirit you put to death the deeds of the flesh, you will live."

The same, On Rebuke and Grace 59: "Concerning perseverance in good itself, God did not wish His saints to glory in their own powers but in Him — who not only gives them help such as He gave the first man, without which they cannot persevere if they will, but also works in them the willing. For since they will not persevere unless they both can and will, the possibility and the will to persevere are given to them by the generosity of divine grace. For their will is so kindled by the Holy Spirit that they can because they so will, and they so will because God works in them to will."

The same, On the Gift of Perseverance 18: "By His own will he falls who falls, and by the will of God he stands who stands." And chapter 36: "It is shown clearly enough that the grace of God — both for beginning and for persevering to the end — is not given according to our merits, but is bestowed according to His most secret and at the same time most just, most wise, and most beneficent will."

CHAPTER 14: THAT PERSEVERANCE IS GIVEN FREELY BY GOD, NOT OBTAINED BY MERITS.

After these things, it remains to inquire whether anyone can merit perseverance for himself.

That he can might appear not improbably. For someone can merit perseverance for another through his devout prayers — otherwise it would seem useless to pour out prayers to God that He might confirm someone in the good, contrary to what was shown in chapter 8. Why then cannot one merit perseverance for oneself?

Likewise, a wayfarer existing in grace and about to fall from it could and can through the insistence of devout prayer obtain perseverance for himself from God. Why else would the Son tell us that whatever we asked the Father in the Son's name, He would give us?

Likewise, man can merit eternal life, as the entire Christian faith attests, and this is greater and better than perseverance; therefore much more can he merit perseverance too.

Nevertheless, the opposite part seems more probable and more consonant with reason and the authorities of the Saints.

For if anyone could merit perseverance, let two wayfarers be supposed — John and Peter, equal in all natural and gratuitous gifts — and let God give perseverance to neither of them except according to the requirement of merits. Let them equally merit perseverance up to time or instant A, at which both are equally tempted regarding mortal sin. And since it is not necessary that when one consents the other consents, nor when one resists the other resists, let John be supposed to resist and so die, and Peter to sin. Then John merited perseverance and received it at A or before; and Peter equally merited it before A. Therefore he too received perseverance at A or before — which is false, since he did not persevere but fell.

Or thus: Peter and John equally merited that perseverance be given to them, and Peter did not merit that perseverance be given to him; therefore neither did John — contrary to the foregoing.

Or let any inequality of merits whatsoever be supposed: still, the one who merited perseverance more, when equally or less tempted, can fall into mortal sin; and the one who merited less, when equally or more tempted, can resist and so die — and therefore persevere finally.

Also, to baptized infants departing thus, a certain perseverance is given; but to many adults who have merited in many ways, it is by no means given.

Indeed, suppose that one person established in the greatest grace most excellently merits that perseverance be given to him, yet finally falls into mortal sin; and that another in a small grace — namely baptismal grace — never merits well, but throughout his whole time exercises himself in indifferent acts or venial sins, but abstains from mortal sin, and so departs. This person therefore had final perseverance, the other by no means. Therefore it seems obvious that final perseverance is not given according to the merits of those to whom it is given, but according to the gratuitous grace of the one who gives it.

[The chapter then provides extensive citations from Augustine's On the Gift of Perseverance and On Rebuke and Grace, and from Gregory's Moralia, showing that the reason why some persevere and others fall is inscrutable to human understanding — it belongs to God's most secret, most just, most wise, and most beneficent will. Augustine's treatment of Romans 11 (the remnant saved by grace), the parable of the workers in the vineyard, and Christ's prayer "I confess to You, Father... because it was pleasing before You" are all adduced to show that perseverance is a free gift of predestination, not a reward of merit.]

Augustine, On the Gift of Perseverance 36: "It is shown clearly enough that the grace of God — both for beginning and for persevering to the end — is not given according to our merits, but is bestowed according to His most secret and at the same time most just, most wise, and most beneficent will; since those whom He predestined, them He also called with that calling of which it is said, 'The gifts and the calling of God are without repentance'" (Romans 11:29).

The same, chapter 19: "Of two pious persons, why perseverance to the end is given to one and not the other — inscrutable are the judgments of God. Yet this should be most certain to the faithful: that the one is among the predestined, and the other is not. For 'if they had been of us,' says one of the predestined who had drunk this secret from the Lord's breast, 'they would certainly have remained with us'" (1 John 2:19).

[The chapter concludes with responses to objections, distinguishing between "impetratory" merit (which obtains something new) and "conservatory" merit (which preserves what one already has). Perseverance cannot be imperatorily merited for oneself, though one's good works serve to conserve it. The reason God wills us to pray for perseverance — even though we cannot merit it — is so that we may clearly recognize that we do not have such goods from ourselves but from God.]

CHAPTER 15: ON ETERNAL PERSEVERANCE — THAT IS, THE CONFIRMATION OF THE BLESSED — AND ITS CAUSE, WHICH IS THE ETERNAL CHARITY OF GOD'S WILL.

Having dealt with temporal perseverance on the way, it remains to inquire about eternal perseverance in the fatherland — that is, the beatific confirmation of the blessed, and its cause.

This perseverance, or confirmation of the blessed, makes them certain; the perseverance of the wretched does not. This makes its own unable to sin; the other does not. This makes the blessed comprehensors unable to fall back from the beatific act and the enjoyment of God; the other does not make the wretched wayfarers likewise unable — as the nature of perfect beatitude requires, as many philosophers and all theologians alike attest, and as Peter, Sentences II, distinctions 5 and 7, somewhat recounts and declares. I therefore do not think I need to linger longer over demonstrating this, as I hasten to other matters.

Concerning the cause of this confirmation, however, multiple opinions are found.

[Opinion 1: Grace] Some think the cause is grace, citing Augustine, Against Maximinus III.13: "To whatever rational creature it is granted that it cannot sin, this is not of its own nature but of God's grace." And Isidore, On the Supreme Good I.10: "The nature of angels is mutable, because mutability is innate in their nature; but eternal charity makes them incorruptible. It is by grace, not by nature, that the angels are immutable." Peter, Sentences II, distinction 7, plainly holds this.

Yet this, in the form stated, seems open to challenge. For if grace indiscriminately and sufficiently confirms, then the grace of a wayfarer confirms him — especially since it is of the same nature as the grace of the blessed. Also, in demons and obstinate humans one need not posit any such habit as the cause of their obstinacy; therefore neither in confirmed angels or humans, by similar reasoning.

[Opinion 2: Great abundance of grace] Wherefore some think that not just any or any amount of grace, but a great abundance of grace, confirms the blessed. They cite Augustine, On Rebuke and Grace 40: "The devil and his angels, even if they were blessed before they fell and did not know that they would fall into misery, there was still something to be added to their beatitude if they had stood in the truth by free will — until they received that fullness of supreme beatitude as a reward for their perseverance: namely, that by a great abundance of the charity of God given through the Holy Spirit, they could never fall further, and would know this most certainly about themselves."

But neither does this seem entirely certain. For it was shown in chapter 3 of this book that no secondary cause can necessitate free will; therefore neither can any charity or grace of whatever quantity. Also, some perfect wayfarer has, it seems, as much charity or grace, or more, on the way as one least among the blessed — say an infant purified from original sin through baptism, circumcision, or otherwise — has in the fatherland; and this does not suffice to confirm.

[Opinion 3: Contemplation of God] Some think that contemplation of God is the cause of the confirmation of the blessed in good. Isidore, On the Supreme Good I.10: "The mutability of nature is aided in the good angels by the contemplation of the Creator, from which the apostate angel was deprived; and while they are mutable by nature, the divine contemplation does not allow them to be changed."

But this opinion, like the previous one, can be challenged. Moreover, the angels before their confirmation contemplated and saw God; man also, according to Peter, Sentences IV, distinction 1, saw God without mediation before sin; and after sin many holy prophets contemplated and saw God. Also, if the vision of God confirms the good in good, what vision confirms the wicked in evil?

[Opinion 4: Fullness of goods attained] Some judge that because the saints in heaven see no good they lack which they might wrongly desire, they therefore cannot sin but are immovably confirmed in the good they have. Hence Anselm, On the Fall of the Devil 6: the good angels "have been advanced by God so that they have attained whatever they could will, and no longer see what more they could will; and on account of this they cannot sin."

But this cannot stand. For confirmation is a positive effect; therefore it has some positive cause, and a merely privative cause does not suffice. According to this, a wayfarer having some small good and seeing nothing greater would be immovably confirmed.

[Opinion 5: Knowledge of future misery] Others, following Anselm, On the Fall of the Devil 22 and after, think that the cause of the confirmation of the blessed is that they know they would be eternally miserable if they sinned, and no one can will that by which he knows he will be eternally miserable.

But far be it! For according to this, the blessed would avoid sins more by fear of punishment than by love of justice, which is unbecoming. Also, even if infernal misery had never been ordained for sinners, God could confirm the good in good eternally.

[Opinion 6: Intensity of beatific delight] Others dream that the blessed, from the great vehemence of beatitude and its annexed delight, become as it were drunk, and thus free will is bound in them so that they can in no way fall back from the beatific act or proceed to any other act.

But no sober person judges this, nor does anyone so dream unless perhaps he is drunk or insane. For who would be so foolish — indeed, insane — as to affirm that in beatitude, which according to both philosophers and theologians is the ultimate perfection of man, the human soul with its powers would not be supremely perfect? Or that when it is supremely perfect, it could not have the use of free will and its perfect act?

[Opinion 7: Total beatitude as collection of all goods] Others, seeing that no single good by itself alone can be a sufficient cause of confirmation, think that total beatitude — which is the collection and sum of all goods together — is the cause of confirmation sought. For it fully satiates, since every desirable thing is present and every thing to be fled is far absent; and it is the natural end of free will, and every movable thing rests once it has attained its natural end.

But this opinion, like the others, seems to err — especially if it speaks of total created beatitude. For no created thing, simple or composite, can necessitate a rational and free will, as chapter 3 of this book makes clear.

Bradwardine's own view: It seems to me that grace, abundance of grace, contemplation of God, and the other things mentioned above are in a certain way the cause of confirmation in good; but none of them suffices by itself. The sufficient cause of confirmation is not and cannot be any lower or secondary cause, but only the supreme and first — namely God Himself, the Holy Spirit, the uncreated, eternal, insuperable, and immutable grace and charity of God's will, as can be clearly drawn from chapters 13, 6, and 3 of this book, and from I.2, I.9, I.10, and I.23.

This seems to be specially testified by that saying of Plato in Timaeus II, introducing God speaking to the angels thus: "O gods, whose maker and father I am: you are indeed my works, dissoluble by nature, yet indissoluble by my will — because my will is a greater bond, and more vigorous for the custody of eternity, than those vital bonds from which your eternity is assembled and composed" — as is more fully cited in the first and second chapters of Book I.

In agreement with this, the Prophet: "By the word of the Lord the heavens were established, and by the breath of His mouth all their power" (Psalm 32). And who are these heavens more fittingly than the rational heavenly creatures dwelling in the heavens?

Augustine, commenting on this verse together with the preceding one ("The earth is full of the mercy of the Lord"), tractate 3, writes: "The earth is full of the mercy of the Lord. What of the heavens? Hear what of the heavens. For where there is no misery, there is no need of mercy. On earth, human misery abounds; the Lord's mercy superabounds. But the heavens where there is no misery — do they not need the Lord because they do not need mercy? All things need the Lord, both the wretched and the happy. Without Him, the wretched person is not lifted up; without Him, the happy person is in need. Therefore, lest you should ask about the heavens when you hear 'The earth is full of the mercy of the Lord' — hear that the heavens too need the Lord: 'By the word of the Lord the heavens were established.' They did not provide their own stability, nor did the heavens themselves furnish their own firmness. 'By the word of the Lord the heavens were established, and by the breath of His mouth all their power.' They had nothing from themselves; but as a supplement they received from the Lord. For by the breath of His mouth, not part but ALL their power."

CHAPTER 16: ON THE ETERNAL PERSEVERANCE, OR OBSTINACY, OF THE WICKED IN EVIL, AND ITS CAUSE.

Now that the eternal perseverance, or confirmation, of the good in good has been treated, what is more fitting than to treat of the eternal perseverance, or obstinacy, of the wicked in evil?

Just as confirmation makes the confirmed unable to sin, so obstinacy makes the obstinate unable to will or do good. And just as the former makes them unable to cease from the beatific act, so the latter makes the obstinate unable to rest from the miserable act — which is well expressed figuratively in Job 41: "His heart shall be hardened like a stone and pressed together like a smith's anvil."

Augustine, On Faith, to Peter 21: "Neither the devil nor any of his angels, from the time when by the merit of his ruin they were thrust down into this lower darkness, could or will be able to resume a good will." And below, chapter 26: "The will of those condemned is such that it has in itself always the punishment of its own malice, yet can never receive the disposition of goodness. For just as those who will reign with Christ will have no remnants of evil will in themselves, so those who are assigned to the punishment of eternal fire with the devil and his angels, just as they will never have rest, so they will never be able to have a good will."

Anselm, On the Fall of the Devil 6: "So the angels are separated that those adhering to justice can will no good which they do not enjoy, and those abandoning it can will nothing which they do not lack."

Concerning the cause of obstinacy, various opinions are offered:

[Opinion 1: Privative — lack of charity or grace] Some posit only a privative cause — the defect or desertion of charity or grace. But if so, since according to Peter, Sentences II, distinctions 5 and 24, the angels and first parents were created without grace, then they were finally obstinate at that point; and every wayfarer lacking grace would be immutably obstinate.

[Opinion 2: Privative — lack of divine mercy] Others say the cause is the lack of divine benevolence or mercy — God not willing to show mercy to the wretch. But this is destroyed by the same reasoning. Also, by I.23, God's will is immutable; therefore if God at some time does not will to show mercy to this wretch, He never willed it. Therefore every obstinate person, whenever he existed, was immutably obstinate.

[Opinion 3: Privative — lack of confirmation in good] Others say the cause is the lack of confirmation in good. But then every wayfarer who is not confirmed would be eternally obstinate.

[Opinion 4: Loss of the use of free will] Some think that the vehemence of the punishment the obstinate endure makes them foolish and, according to what was shown in chapter 3, takes away all use of free will and casts them into outer darkness — and so makes them obstinate.

But before the day of judgment this does not seem to be the case. For now the demons, though obstinate, have great knowledge, predict many truths ingeniously, craftily deceive humans, and subtly accomplish many artificial and wonderful things — as both experience and multiple historical and other books, both profane and Catholic, attest. It also seems that God omnipotent could have struck the apostate angels with the punishment of obstinacy without such great vehemence of sensory punishment.

[Opinion 5: Natural immutability of angelic will] Others think the cause of obstinacy in demons is the natural immutability of the will — since angels, not weighed down by the mass of a body, know and apprehend immutably without discursion, and therefore will and desire immutably.

But this position seems to err both in matter and in form. In matter, by supposing what is false: for just as the angel is mutable in itself and in its nature — from non-being to being and vice versa — so also in its action, especially since it has free will naturally suited for merit and sin. Of similar angels, some sinned and some resisted sin and laudably merited. Also, the evil angels before they sinned had a good will, as did the other angels and the first man. Also, Augustine, On Faith, to Peter 21: "If it were possible that human nature, after turning away from God and losing the goodness of will, could again have it from itself, much more possibly would the angelic nature have it — which, being less burdened by the weight of an earthly body, would be all the more endowed with this faculty." Therefore, according to Augustine's judgment, the angelic will turned away from God is by its own nature more returnable, convertible — and therefore more mutable — than the human will.

This position also errs in form: for the human soul separated from the body, and the whole human being in body and soul together after the final judgment — who by nature is of mutable apprehension and similarly of mutable will — are rendered obstinate just like the demons.

[Opinion 6: Obstinate will itself] Some say the cause is voluntary obstinacy, or an obstinate will in evil. Bernard, On Grace and Free Will 18: "The devil cannot breathe toward the good — this is not caused by any alien violent oppression, but by his own will obstinate in evil, and voluntary obstinacy."

But this cannot stand: nothing can be the cause of itself. And when it is said that the devil's own obstinate will is the cause, one must ask what the cause of that obstinacy is.

[Opinion 7: Free will of the obstinate] Some say the cause is the free will of the obstinate itself, freely refusing all good and freely continuing the evil act. But if free will alone made someone obstinate in evil, this would be either mutably or immutably. Not mutably freely, as the nature of obstinacy implies. Not immutably, since free will by itself and by its own nature is mutable according to contradiction, as the first chapter of this book and what follows taught.

[Opinion 8: Malice and vice] Others say the cause is the malice and vice of the obstinate. But malice and vice are either pure privation or something positive. If pure privation, they are refuted by the foregoing. If something positive — whether act or habit — they are similarly refuted.

[Opinion 9: Vehemence of volition] Others believe that the more perfect the will, the more perfectly it immerses itself in its object — and the angelic will, being separated from a body, is maximally perfect and perfectly free, so it immerses itself in its object so vehemently that it cannot retract itself. But this position, like the fifth, errs in both matter and form.

[Opinion 10: No cause at all] Those who say no cause of obstinacy should be posited say that obstinacy is nothing — merely an impotence or privation of the power to will well and to cease from willing evil. But they err doubly: in matter, because they falsely suppose that no privation has a cause; and in form, because they do not avoid the difficulty.

Bradwardine's own view: Saving the judgment of my elders, it seems that some cause of obstinacy should be posited — both privative and positive. The privative cause, regarding what is privative there — namely the inability to will well — is the privation or lack of grace, according to I.39 and I.43. Nor can they merit this, by I.35 and following. Nor does God will to give them grace freely. Indeed, so that this privative cause may be reduced to a prior positive cause (as I.13 teaches), they lack grace and will lack it because, as the most just punishment for their prior sin, God wills them to lack grace eternally — which they would have had eternally if they had not sinned.

There is also a positive cause of obstinacy, regarding what is posited positively there — namely the eternal continuation of the act — and this is the free will of the obstinate, as Bernard seems to hold. But since this alone does not suffice, as was shown above, it seems, according to what was shown in chapter 15, that God's being indignant and not willing this act ever to cease, and willing it to be eternally continued as the most just eternal punishment for the preceding sin, is the sufficient and supreme cause of this.

Hence the Prophet: "Wrath is in His indignation, and life in His will" (Psalm 29).

CHAPTER 17: THAT NO RATIONAL CREATURE CAN BE CONFIRMED OR OBSTINATED IMMUTABLY BY NATURE.

Having shown that some rational creatures are immovably confirmed in good and some immutably obstinated in evil, and this not solely by free will and their own nature, we must inquire further whether this can be done by nature.

Some argue that it can: in the confirmation of the blessed, no infinite help is applied to nature, but only a finite one; and as much could be applied to it by the addition of a greater and stronger natural endowment. Similarly with the obstinate.

But this does not seem correct — unless one speaks equivocally and too sophistically of "rational creature," supposing for example that God could create a rational creature having only the judgment of reason without freedom of acting, or vice versa. Speaking univocally, however, of a rational creature of the same nature as exists now, it does not seem that anyone can be confirmed in moral or supernatural good by nature alone.

For if the natural strength and power of a rational creature is naturally increased, as the power of the intellect is increased, then — proportionally — so is the free power of the will. However much it can naturally use the power of the intellect, so much also the free power of the will; therefore it can will as mutably as a lower, less powerful will.

Also, whatever created power is posited, however great, it is a created rational power, and as far as concerns its own nature, just as it is mutable in nature and in being — from non-being to being and vice versa — so it is mutable in action and mutable in will, and avails for opposites successively, as was shown concerning the angels in the preceding chapter.

Also, whatever rational creature is posited, it is of itself mutable in intellect: for it can know something after not knowing it, and vice versa; and it can be deceived when what it believes to be true, the relevant thing having been secretly changed, is false. Therefore it is similarly mutable, deceivable, and capable of sinning in will.

Also, under whatever degree of perfection of nature, there can be a rational creature immutably confirmed in good or evil; there can also be a similar creature mutable in the state of wayfaring. For this includes no contradiction — indeed, under whatever degree of finite perfection of nature, there can be a rational creature that is mutable and capable of meriting. Otherwise the omnipotent hand of God would be most shamefully mutilated and rendered excessively impotent. Otherwise there would be a certain limit of natural perfection naturally fixed, beyond which a rational creature could not pass and beyond which God omnipotent could not create such a creature — which accords with no reason. For why to this limit and not beyond?

COROLLARY

COROLLARY: THAT NO RATIONAL CREATURE IS OR CAN BE IMMUTABLE, UNABLE TO MERIT, OR IMPECCABLE BY NATURE.

From these things I consider it manifest that no rational creature is or can be immutable, unable to merit, or impeccable by nature. This follows so evidently that it needs no proof.

Augustine, Against Maximinus III.13: "The nature of celestial creatures could die because it could sin; for angels too sinned and became demons, of whom the devil is prince. And those who did not sin could have sinned. To whatever rational creature it is granted that it cannot sin, this is not of its own nature but of God's grace. Therefore God alone is He who not by anyone's grace but by His own nature neither could, nor can, nor will be able to sin."

Jerome also, Epistle 13 to Pope Damasus, on the Prodigal Son, says: "From many testimonies of Scripture we are taught that perfect justice belongs to God alone." And below: "In the Psalms it is said, 'No living thing shall be justified in Your sight' — he does not say 'no man,' but 'every living thing' — that is, not the Evangelist, not the Apostle, not the Prophet; I ascend to greater things — not the Angel, not the Thrones, not the Dominions, not the Powers, nor the other virtues. God alone is He in whom sin does not fall. All others, since they are of free will — just as man too was made in the image and likeness of God — can bend their will in either direction." This must be understood as referring to their bare nature.

Anselm, Cur Deus Homo II.10, after showing that Christ, God and man, cannot sin and yet is to be praised for His justice, asks: "I think we should ask: since God could make such a man, why did He not make the angels and the two first humans such that they similarly could not sin, and yet would be praiseworthy for their justice?" And answering he adds: "Because it ought not and could not be that each of them should be the very same as God, as we say of this man."

CHAPTER 18: AGAINST CERTAIN PERSONS WHO SAY THAT THE ACT OF FREE WILL IS NOTHING.

With these matters, by God's help, dispatched, it now remains to investigate the proper act of free will, with the same help. But because there are some — of whom Isaiah did not keep silent — "groping like the blind along a wall, and fumbling as though without eyes, stumbling at midday as in darkness, and in gloomy places like the dead sleeping" — so insensible and lifeless that they do not at all perceive their own proper acts, asserting that the act of free will is nothing: therefore I will pause for a while, so that He who illumines the eyes of the blind may deign to pour true light into them and into me.

For it is clearer than light to all that if the act of free will is nothing, neither is the act of any other power or form anything. For free will is the most perfect created power or form; therefore its proper act will not be less perfect than the proper act of any other power. Wherefore it is no less clear that this blind position must consequently hold that every action and passion, every acting and being acted upon, every motion and change, every moving and being moved, changing and being changed — universally — is nothing.

How greatly this opposes nearly all sciences, those who know will easily detect. It endeavors to extinguish all sciences that do not abstract from action and motion — and these are all sciences, with scarcely arithmetic and geometry excepted (though even Euclid's Elements Book XI and Jordanus's On Triangles use motion in their definitions and theorems, and Boethius in the last chapter of his second book of Arithmetic treats all musical consonances, which can never occur without motion).

[Arguments from the trivial arts:] Grammar, Dialectic, Rhetoric, and Music all deal with sound and voice. If sound and voice are something, as these sciences teach, then sounding and voicing are something, and the striking or percussion from which sound is generated is likewise something — for nothing is generated from nothing.

[Arguments from natural philosophy:] Motion is the efficient cause of heat, as natural science frequently attests and everyone experiences without it. Therefore motion is something, since every efficient cause of a real effect is something truly real.

[Bradwardine then refutes a response that claims motion causes heat only by congregating hot parts — showing this would apply equally to cold, wet, dry, etc., and that cold objects like stones, metals, and wood actually grow hotter when moved vigorously, not colder.]

[Arguments from sensation:] Whatever is truly sensed is something; and sensing is truly sensed, as everyone experiences. The Philosopher, De Anima II, shows that by the same external sense we sense an external object and sense ourselves sensing it. Therefore sensing is something and not nothing.

Likewise, imagination, cogitation, desire, anger, joy, sadness, and many similar things are sensed by the material sense; therefore they are something and not nothing. These also multiply and truly really alter bodies and cause many real effects — and nothing alters or causes nothing.

[The chapter then provides extensive evidence from Aristotle, Avicenna, Algazel, and Augustine about the real physical effects of mental acts — how fear causes pallor, anger causes redness, desire causes bodily changes, intense study alters the body, and even maternal imagination affects offspring (citing Jacob's striped rods from Genesis 30).]

[Arguments from intellection:] If understanding, thinking, composing, dividing, and reasoning are not something and do not produce anything — and since they produce knowledge and other intellectual habits — it patently follows that none of those habits is anything either.

[Arguments from beatitude:] If no act is anything, then since beatitude is an act, it is nothing. But that beatitude is an act is clear from the Philosopher, Ethics I, III, and X, where he demonstrates through many chapters that happiness is an operation and act. And Metaphysics IX.16: "Happiness is an operation in the soul, because it is a certain kind of life." Truth itself concordantly attests: "This is eternal life, that they may know You, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom You have sent" (John 17).

All philosophers — Aristotle, Averroes, Avicenna, Algazel, and others except the Epicureans (who should not be called philosophers but rather "pleasure-lovers") — and all theologians without exception agree that final happiness and beatitude is the actual vision or enjoyment of God, or both together. No one, I hope, is so foolish or insane as to deny that eternal life, happiness, and beatitude are something.

Therefore the act of the will is something, and not nothing.

CHAPTER 19: OBJECTIONS AND RESPONSES.

But perhaps someone will object against these things.

Objection 1: Augustine, On the Perfection of Human Justice 5, says that sin is an act, not a thing (res). The same, Hypomnesticon 19: "Evil is not a nature, but truly an act arising from the defect of good." And in the Propositions of Prosper, proposition 176: "There is no substance of evil, because what does not have God as its Author does not exist."

Response: According to Augustine's manner of speaking, "thing" (res) is taken in two ways — generally and specially. Generally, it is convertible with "being" or "something" in its most general community, as common to every true or fictitious, imagined, or however understood being. Specially, however, it is said from "rateness" (raritas) or "the established" (ratum), and thus comprehends only what exists in an established way — whether per se, like substance, or through another, like accidents through substance — and thus is common only to the ten categories.

Still more specially, "thing" is said from "the permanently established," whose being is not in flux or becoming. And most specially, "thing" is said from "that which exists per se in an established way," like substance alone.

Speaking in the first or second way, an act is a thing. Speaking in the third or fourth way, it is not. And Augustine's words attest to this sense. He says: "We respond that sin is said to be an act, not a thing — just as in the body, lameness by the same reasoning is an act, not a thing, since the thing is the foot itself, or the body, or the man. That very defect by which a man limps is neither a foot, nor a body, nor a man."

This is confirmed by Augustine himself, On the Perfection of Human Justice 25, who — having rejected the mode of speaking of his opponent Celestius — says according to his own opinion that an act is a thing (rem). Many other authorities of his cited in the preceding chapter say the same.

The authorities of Sacred Scripture also attest to this most copiously: Genesis 34 calls Shechem's act a "foul thing" (rem foedam); Genesis 38 calls Onan's act a "detestable thing" (rem detestabilem); Genesis 44: "You have done a most wicked thing" (pessimam rem); Psalm 100: "I did not set before my eyes an unjust thing" (rem iniustam); and Hebrews 6, where the Apostle calls God's promise and oath "two things" (duas res). Thus it is clear that acts are things.

Objection 2: Authorities say evil is not a nature or substance but an act or action.

Response: Evil is taken in two ways, as I.26 teaches — for malice itself, which is pure privation, and for the subject of that privation. Similarly, an evil act can be taken in two ways: for the substance or essence of the act itself, and figuratively and tropically for its malice or deformity. Hence Augustine, City of God XII.8: "Evil will is not an affection but a defection." And On Free Will II, last chapter: "The motion of aversion of the will, which is sin, is defective and a defect, and therefore is not from God." And Bernard, On Free Will 10: "To will evil is a defect of the will."

Evil in the first sense is an act in the second sense; and evil in the second sense is an act in the first sense. Augustine's statement in On True Religion that "acting and being acted upon is not substance" is true literally and in intention: he means that it is not substance properly so called — because it does not subsist per se — or more commonly, that it is not a permanent essence but one always consisting in becoming or in flux. From this, therefore, it cannot be proved that acting, an act, or action has no essence whatsoever and is nothing.

CHAPTER XX. THAT GOD IS THE NECESSARY CO-EFFECTOR OF EVERY ACT OF THE CREATED WILL.

With these things having been shown beforehand, the proper order now requires us to show consequently that God is the necessary co-effector of every act of the created will—the opposite of which the Nimrodian and Pelagian heresy barked against. For Josephus, in Book 1 of his Jewish Antiquities, chapter 2, says thus: "Because they were swelling with a multitude of young men, God again caused them to depart from themselves, since they did not think they possessed good things through His favor, but believed their own strength to be the cause of their riches. Whence they resolved to be disobedient to the will of God." And further on, chapter 3: "The one who made them become arrogant toward injury and contempt of God was Nimrod, son of Ham, son of Noah, who, being bolder and strongest of hand, persuaded them not to ascribe it to God that happiness came to men through Him, but that this was furnished to them by their own power. And he drew the kinsmen of his race to the cause of tyranny, he alone presuming to call men back from the fear of God and to place their hope in their own power. The multitude, however, was inclined to obey Nimrod's commands, thinking it a grievous servitude to submit to God."

Pelagius likewise, in the third book On Free Will, distinguishing three things in man—namely, the ability, the willing, and the doing (that is, possibility, will, and action)—said that man has the first from God and from the grace of God, but the remaining two from himself alone, without God. Whence also the blessed Augustine, in Book 1 Against Pelagius and Celestine, On the Grace of Christ and On Original Sin, chapter 2, says: "Although he establishes and distinguishes three things—possibility, will, and action—he confesses the first of these three to be given by the Creator of nature, but asserts the remaining two to be ours, and so attributes them to us that he contends they belong to us from no source but ourselves." And further on, chapter 3: "For we ought to know that he believes neither our will nor our action to be aided by divine help, but only the possibility of willing and working, which alone of these three he affirms we have from God—as though what God Himself placed in nature were infirm, but the other two, which he wished to be ours, were so firm and strong and self-sufficient that they need no help from Him; and therefore He does not help us to will, does not help us to act, but only helps us to be able to will and act"—as other works of this same holy Father indicate in many places.

Therefore, with God who works in us the willing and the accomplishing of our acts directing us according to His good pleasure, we must fearlessly attack this error. Now, according to the two immediately preceding chapters, every act of the will is something, and not from eternity; therefore it is made—and this by the created will, as the corollary of the third chapter of this second book teaches—and not by it alone, because by the third chapter of the first book, God's efficient causality is necessarily required there. Therefore God is a necessary co-effector there—that is, a co-effector with the created will who is necessarily required.

All the arguments proving the principal conclusion of that third chapter likewise prove this one too, from all of which, however, let this one suffice for now: It seems to be less to preserve a thing in being than to produce it from non-being into being; but by the second chapter of the first book, no creature can preserve any thing in being without God also preserving it; therefore neither can it produce any thing into being. And according to the two immediately preceding chapters, an act of the will is some thing, not nothing.

Likewise, it is less to persevere finally or for a time in a good act of the will, or in any good, than to effect that good; but according to the eighth, ninth, and tenth chapters of this second book, no one without God's help can persevere in good, finally or for a time.

Likewise, every act of the will is a certain motion; therefore, by the fourth chapter of the first book, God necessarily co-moves there—which the arguments and authorities of that chapter sufficiently show, from which let these two suffice for the present: It is less to exist than to move, and by the second chapter of the first book, no creature suffices to exist by itself; therefore neither to move. Likewise, if a man could will and move from his own form sufficiently without God co-moving, then any other natural thing could likewise move from its own form; and so there would be no way taken from motion to prove one first mover, which is against both philosophy and theology alike, as the aforementioned chapter cited.

And this is true not only in natural things but also in voluntary ones. Whence the Philosopher, in On Good Fortune, chapter 2, as the twenty-ninth chapter of the first book more fully recounted, proves that appetite is not the cause by which someone is fortunate, because that appetite has some cause, and that cause is either nature or fortune. And having refuted the first, he adds in refutation of the second: "If it is fortune, then fortune will be the cause of all things—namely, of human acts; for even of understanding and deliberating. For the one deliberating did not deliberate before he deliberated, but there is a certain principle; nor did the one understanding understand before he understood, and this to infinity. Therefore intellect is not the principle of understanding, nor is deliberation the principle of deliberating. What then is it other than fortune? Therefore all things are from fortune."

And he responds: "Or there is some principle of which there is no other outside it, and this thing, because it is such by its being, can produce such a thing. But what is sought is this: what is the principle of motion in the soul? It is clear: just as in the whole, so God. For He moves in a certain way all things that are divine in us. The principle of reason is not reason, but something better. What then will be better than both knowledge and intellect, if not God? For the power of the intellect is His instrument."

Behold: God is the motive power, as it were the craftsman; and the art itself and the intellect are instruments moved by Him—which many philosophical and theological authorities cited in chapter 4 of the first book also attest. Indeed, God Himself through Isaiah, chapter 10, teaches the same, where He calls Sennacherib the rod of His fury, a staff, an axe, and a saw; where the gloss says that just as these inanimate instruments do nothing by themselves, but through the one who moves them, so neither did Sennacherib act by himself, but in the power of God—which Jerome also beautifully and extensively pursues in Book 4 on Isaiah, as the thirty-second chapter of the first book more fully recounted.

And Avicenna, in Book 10 of his Metaphysics, chapter 1, as the twenty-ninth chapter of the first book more fully cited, says: "Our acts of willing exist after not having existed; but whatever exists after not having existed has a cause; therefore every act of our will has a cause. The cause of this willing does not proceed to infinity, but to certain things that happen from outside—namely, earthly or heavenly things; but earthly things lead back to heavenly ones. Therefore the collection of all these proceeds necessarily from the necessity of the divine will."

This error was also refuted and overturned by Abraham, the most illustrious patriarch, philosopher, and prophet, by a similar argument, as is evident from the thirty-fifth part of the corollary of chapter 1 of Book 1.

Wherefore also Saint Thomas, in On the Christian Religion, or On Faith, Hope, and Charity, addressed to Raynaldus, chapter 129, says thus: "Since everything mutable and multiform is reduced to some immobile principle as to its cause, and since the intellect and will of man appear mutable and multiform, it is necessary that they be reduced to some higher, immobile, and uniform cause. And since they are not reduced, as to a cause, to the heavenly bodies, it is necessary to reduce them to higher causes." And in the next chapter: "Because secondary causes do not act except through the power of the first cause, just as instruments act through the direction of art, it is necessary that all other agents, through whom God fulfills the order of His governance, act by the power of God Himself. The acting of each of them is therefore caused by God, just as the motion of the mobile is caused by the motion of the mover. But the mover and the moved must be together; therefore it is necessary that God be present to every agent interiorly, acting, as it were, within it, while He moves it to act."

This he also proves and holds equally for natural and voluntary things in his booklet of questions On the Power of God, question 20, as is more fully recounted in the demonstration of the second corollary of chapter 1 of the first book; and similarly in Book 3 Against the Gentiles and in many other places.

Likewise, John Scotus, commenting on Book 1 of the Sentences, distinction 2, showing that the first efficient cause is intelligent and willing, argues in this manner: "Something is caused contingently; therefore the first cause causes contingently; therefore it causes willingly." Proof of the first consequence: "Every secondary cause causes insofar as it is moved by the first; therefore if the first necessarily moves, then every other is necessarily moved, and everything is necessarily caused. Therefore if some cause moves contingently, the first will also move contingently, because the secondary cause does not cause except in the power of the first cause, insofar as it is moved by it." Proof of the second consequence: "There is no principle of operating contingently except the will or something accompanying the will, because everything else acts from the necessity of nature, and thus not contingently."

And he immediately objects against the first consequence in this way: "Our willing can contingently cause something; therefore it is not required that the first cause cause it contingently." And against the second consequence—namely, "it causes contingently, therefore willingly"—he objects thus: "Other things naturally moved can be impeded, and so the opposite will happen contingently and violently."

To the first objection he responds thus: "It must be said that if God is the first mover or efficient cause with respect to our will, the same follows concerning it as concerning other things, because whether He immediately necessarily moves it, or immediately moves something else which necessarily moves it because it is moved, it follows in the end that whatever is proximate to the will necessarily moves the will—even if the proximate thing is the will itself—and so it will necessarily will; and it further follows, impossibly, that it necessarily causes everything it creates."

To the second objection he responds thus: "I say that if another cause can impede this one, it cannot do so except in the power of a higher cause, and so on up to the first cause; and if this immediately and necessarily moves the cause nearest to it, there will be necessity all the way down to that point; therefore it will necessarily impede, and consequently the other cause cannot naturally cause."

And further on, commenting on distinction 39, he recounts these things more briefly in these words: "In distinction 2 it was proved that God is intelligent and willing through the contingency of things, because there can be no contingency in the causation of any cause with respect to its effect unless the first cause stands contingently toward the cause nearest to it or toward its effect. This was proved briefly from the fact that a cause that moves insofar as it is moved, if it is necessarily moved, necessarily moves. Therefore every secondary cause that produces insofar as it is moved by the first necessarily moves what is nearest to it, or produces its effect. Therefore the entire ordering of causes down to the last effect will necessarily produce, if the relation of the first cause to the cause nearest to it is necessary."

And this is sufficiently attested by that well-known first proposition from the Book of Causes: "Every primary cause has more influence upon its effect than the universal secondary cause"—with its commentary, as the second chapter of the first book more fully cited.

Wherefore also Stephen, Bishop of Paris, justly condemned and excommunicated two articles contrary to the aforementioned truth. The first says that in efficient causes, the secondary cause has an action that it does not receive from the first cause. The second holds that in efficient causes, when the first cause ceases, the secondary cause does not cease from operation, provided the secondary cause operates according to its own nature. A third article, however, he does not condemn absolutely, but expounds—namely, that all voluntary motions are reduced to the First Mover. "It is an error," he says, "unless it is understood as referring to the First Mover absolutely, who is uncaused, and understanding it of motion according to its substance, not according to its deformity."

Likewise, by the twenty-second chapter of the first book, God necessarily has an act of will regarding every act of the created will—and not a nolition, because then it would not come about, as the tenth chapter of the first book teaches—therefore a volition; and by that same tenth chapter, that volition is necessarily efficacious. Therefore it is necessary that it effect every such act. Indeed, if the opposite of this were granted, the will of God would not be efficacious, nor would God be omnipotent. For suppose that God wills the created will to produce its act; then if God does nothing there, but the created will acts alone, it can freely of itself alone not produce its act, and consequently frustrate the divine will and likewise mutilate His omnipotence; because if God wills something to be done, and it is not done, God cannot bring it about that it be done. For from the opposite of the conclusion together with the major premise, the opposite of the minor follows, as that same tenth chapter of the first book more fully deduced.

And on account of these arguments, John Scotus holds this conclusion in his commentary on Book 2 of the Sentences, distinction 37, question 2, which asks: "Whether the created will is the total and immediate cause with respect to its own willing, so that God has no immediate efficient causality with respect to it, but only mediate." And having recounted the opinion that affirms this, he says: "Against this opinion there are two arguments. First, because from it it follows that God is not naturally foreknowing of future things. Second, that He is not the best."

Proof of the first consequence: "Because God has no knowledge of future contingents except because He knows with certainty the determination of His own will regarding them, which will is immutable and beyond all potentiality. But if the will is the total cause with respect to its own willing, then however much the divine will is posited as determined to one part of those things that depend on the created will, the created will could will otherwise, and so certainty does not follow from knowledge of the determination of the divine will."

Proof of the second consequence: "Because whatever the best wills, comes about. But if He wills my volition to occur, and that volition is in the power of my will as a total cause standing contingently toward it, it can of itself be determined to one part or to the other indifferently; and so what the divine will determines it to can fail to come about."

Likewise, if the created will alone effected its act, not all actions nor human affairs would be governed by divine providence—contrary to the twenty-seventh, thirtieth, thirty-first, and thirty-second chapters of the first book. For if God provides for such actions, He does so voluntarily, and His will is efficacious, by the tenth chapter of the first book; wherefore the divine will effects all such actions.

Likewise, otherwise many things could be purely causal and fortuitous—that is, with respect to secondary causes, and even the first cause—contrary to the twenty-ninth chapter of the first book.

Wherefore also the Lord Stephen, Bishop of Paris, justly condemned two erroneous articles. The first said that human acts are not governed by divine providence. The second held that some things can happen by chance with respect to the first cause, and that it is false that all things are preordained by the first cause, because then they would happen of necessity.

Likewise, if the created will alone could produce its act, it could also alone sometimes produce a more intense act and sometimes a less intense one; and so it could alone intensify its act and its good merit—contrary to the forty-sixth chapter of the first book.

Likewise, if the created will alone could produce its act, the created intellect could similarly do so; and so it could understand, compose and divide, reason discursively, and know many truths without the aid of the agent intellect, which is God—and this is against the philosophers, as the sixth chapter of the first book more fully cited. For how would a man ignorant of the sciences, both in habit and in act, artfully seek them through his own study, and likewise find them, unless he were directed by someone knowing in act and teaching him? For this cannot happen by fortune or chance.

Whence also Averroes, commenting on On Sleep and Waking, assigning the cause of knowledge acquired in sleep, says thus: "It is manifest that this knowledge acquired in sleep is not preceded by an active mode. Whether a preparatory mode precedes it is doubtful. And since this knowledge is acquired after ignorance, and after it was in potency, and without any preceding knowledge, it is manifest that it is acquired in the same way as first propositions are acquired. And since this is so, it is necessary that the agent producing them be the same and of the same kind; because everything that goes from potency to act has an agent that is of the kind of that thing which goes from potency to act. Therefore it is necessary that the one producing this knowledge be an intellect in act, and this is the one that gives universal principles in speculative matters, whose existence was demonstrated in the book On the Soul."

Likewise, God produces true dreams in the intellect of a sleeping man and true prophecy in the intellect of a waking man, as the sixth chapter of the first book taught. Therefore God is the agent intellect producing human knowledge—and not through a heavenly body as an intermediary, as some imagine, but through Himself, as could be shown in many ways. But for the sake of brevity, I adduce only Stephen, Bishop of Paris, condemning and excommunicating a certain article in these words: "That God, or an intelligence, does not infuse knowledge into the human soul in sleep except through a heavenly body as intermediary."

Likewise, the human intellect is of itself potential and in potency to understanding. Therefore, in order for it to come into the act of understanding, it necessarily requires something actual that moves it from this potency to this act. This cannot be a body, nor anything corporeal, nor anything that is not an intellect, nor an intellect not in act, as is easy to show in each case. Therefore this is an intellect in act; therefore this is the intellect that produces all our understanding.

And by this reasoning Aristotle demonstrates this conclusion in Book 3 of On the Soul, chapters 17 and following, and Averroes on that passage similarly, and on Book 12 of the Metaphysics, chapter 18, and on On Sleep and Waking. And Avicenna, Book 5 of On the Soul, chapters 5 and 6; Algazel, Book 5 of his Physics, chapters 1 and 6. And there is likewise an article condemned and excommunicated by Stephen, Bishop of Paris, in these words: "That the agent intellect is not joined to our possible intellect."

These thinkers, however, seem to disagree somewhat. For Aristotle and Averroes hold this agent intellect to be God, as is evident from chapter 6 of the first book. Avicenna and Algazel, however, hold it to be the lowest intelligence, as is evident from the passages just cited, and also from Book 9 of Avicenna's Metaphysics, chapter 3, and Book 5 of Algazel's Metaphysics. But this is erroneous if it is understood to mean that that intelligence alone, without God, is the principal agent of human understanding, because since it is of limited and finite being, it necessarily has similarly limited activity; and so there could be so many men that it would not suffice to produce understanding in all of them at once, even though all could understand at the same time.

Likewise, since the mover and the moved must be together, as the Philosopher teaches in Book 7 of the Physics, and men can actually understand simultaneously in however many places however far apart, and no such intelligence can of itself be simultaneously in however many places however far apart, since it is of itself of determinate being—therefore no such intelligence is the agent intellect.

The same could be argued by arguments taken from motion, and by many other philosophical and theological arguments; but let these few suffice. It is therefore necessary that the agent intellect be of infinite activity, immense, non-local, present everywhere, and immobile in every way; and no finite intelligence can be such, but only God, who is infinite in every respect.

Nor can anyone say that the agent intellect is necessary for the possible intellect only in order to abstract material intentions from matter and strip them bare, and in a way infuse them into it, but that once these are had, it does not need its help and can do everything by itself; because the foregoing arguments conclude that when the possible intellect is understanding or knowing in potency, in order for it to come into act it necessarily requires some mover in act.

Wherefore also the Philosopher, in Book 3 of On the Soul, chapter 18, says thus: "There is intellect that is such as to become all things, and intellect that is such as to make all things, like a kind of state, like light. For in a certain way light also makes colors that exist potentially into colors in act." Where the translation that Averroes expounds reads thus: "It is necessary that in it—namely, in the soul—there be an intellect that is intellect insofar as it becomes everything, and an intellect that is intellect insofar as it makes it understand everything; and the intellect insofar as it understands everything is like a kind of state, which is like light," etc. Where Averroes, commenting on the words "and intellect insofar as it understands," etc., says thus: "By this he means the agent intelligence; and by his saying 'understands everything, like a kind of state,' he means that it makes every thing understood in potency to be understood in act, after it was in potency, like a state in form."

Avicenna also, in Book 5 of On the Soul, chapter 5, says: "The cause of giving intelligible form is nothing other than an intelligence in act, in which are the principles of abstracted intelligible forms, whose relation to our souls is like the relation of the sun to our sight; for just as the sun is seen by itself in act, and by its light there is seen in act what was not seen in act, so is the disposition of this intelligence with respect to our souls." And after many things said on this subject in chapters 5 and 6, he concludes thus: "It is therefore possible that the soul of some man, because it is clear and adheres to intelligible principles, is so inspired that it is kindled with ingenuity to receive all questions from the agent intelligence, either suddenly or nearly suddenly, and firmly impressed, not probably but with an order that comprehends the middle terms. And this is one mode of prophecy, which is higher than all other powers; whence it is fittingly called a holy power, and it is the highest degree among human powers."

Algazel also, in Book 5 of his Physics, says that the agent intelligence is always acting on our souls unceasingly; and in chapter 6 he says: "The soul is clarified to such a degree that it is joined with the agent intelligence, so that knowledge is infused into it. For there is no thinker who does not discover many things by himself. For first a conclusion passes through his mind, and then he exercises himself to know the middle term, as though it came into his soul and he does not know from where; or first he perceives the middle term, and then the conclusion is presented to him. And every contingent thing needs a cause from which it occurs; wherefore the soul needs an intelligence. These things and similar ones are not impossible to perceive. When this has been understood, then it is not impossible to arrive at the last of the things that are understood, whether in a long or a short time. But the one to whom all these understood things are revealed in a short time without instruction is called the Wisest or a Prophet; and this is magnificence or miracle."

A similar view, drawn from the Platonists, from Aristotle, and from Averroes, was recounted in chapter 6 of the first book.

Likewise, according to all these philosophers and according to truth itself, just as corporeal light effects corporeal vision, so some spiritual light effects spiritual vision; and this light is the agent intellect or some power of its. This view of the pagans agrees with the philosophy of Catholics.

For in Wisdom 7, it is written of uncreated Wisdom herself in this manner: "Wisdom is more mobile than all mobile things; she reaches everywhere because of her purity. For she is a breath of the power of God, and a certain pure emanation of the clarity of God almighty. She is the brightness of the eternal light, and the spotless mirror of the majesty of God; and being one, she can do all things; and remaining in herself, she renews all things; and through the nations she transfers herself into holy souls. She constitutes friends of God and prophets, for God loves no one except the one who dwells with wisdom. For she is more beautiful than the sun, and compared to the arrangement of the stars and their light, she is found to be prior."

And 1 John 1: "God is light." And John 1: "He enlightens every man coming into this world." And Proverbs 2: "The Lord gives wisdom, and from His mouth come knowledge and prudence"—and many similar passages occur very frequently in Scripture.

Likewise, if a man, once he had the stripped-bare intentions, could from himself do the rest, he could from himself through his own study, or through another teacher without God, discover very many truths. Yet that Averroes, commenting on Book 1 of On the Heavens, commentary 32, where it is shown that circular motion has no contrary, says thus: "I for my part spent a long time during which I did not understand the final explanation of this passage, but God led me to the truth."

Robert also, Bishop of Lincoln, commenting on Book 1 of the Posterior Analytics, chapter 1, says thus: "I call 'teaching' not only what we hear from the mouth of a teacher, but I accept scripture in place of a teacher. And if we speak more truly, neither the one who sounds externally teaches, nor the letter of scripture seen externally teaches; these two only move and excite. The true teacher is the one who illuminates the mind inwardly and shows the truth." With which many illustrious testimonies from the thirty-eighth chapter of the first book clearly agree.

Saint Thomas also, in On the Christian Religion, or On Faith, Hope, and Charity, chapter 129, having shown how man is moved to understand by a man—namely, because an intelligible object is proposed—and how by an angel (in two ways: namely, because through the angel an object is proposed to man, and because the natural light of man is strengthened by the light of the angel), adds: "But God helps man to understand not only on the part of the object that is proposed to man by God, or by the addition of light, but also by the fact that the very natural light of man, by which he is intellectual, is from God; and also by the fact that since He Himself is the first truth, from which all other truth has its certainty—just as secondary propositions derive theirs from first principles in demonstrated sciences—nothing can be made certain to the intellect except by the power of God, just as conclusions are not certain in the sciences except by the power of first principles."

The blessed Augustine also, in his entire book On the Teacher, principally and intentionally demonstrates this one conclusion: that in all teaching, God as the supreme Teacher teaches all knowledge. Whence also in Book 1 of the Retractations, chapter 12, he says thus: "I wrote a book whose title is On the Teacher, in which it is discussed, inquired into, and found that there is no teacher who teaches man knowledge except God—according to what is written in the Gospel: 'One is your Teacher.'" And in chapter 4 of the same work he says: "For this reason even those unskilled in certain disciplines give true answers about those disciplines when they are properly questioned, because the light of eternal reason is present to them when they are able to grasp it, in which they behold these immutable truths."

Also, in the Sentences of Prosper, chapter 382, headed "On knowing creatures that are not seen": "The human soul, naturally connected to those divine reasons on which it depends, when it says that this is better done than that, if it speaks truly, sees what it says in those higher reasons. For it would not discern by thought that something ought to have been done, except in those reasons by which all things were made."

And in Book 2 of On Free Will, chapter 14, and in many subsequent chapters, he shows that there is one common truth by which all true things are true and by which all known truths are known. Whence in chapter 21 he says thus: "This truth, then, about which we have been speaking for a long time, and in which, being one, we behold so many things—do you think it is more excellent than our mind?" And in chapter 22: "For this truth shows all good things that are true, which men who understand, each according to his capacity, choose singly or in multiples for their enjoyment. But just as those who choose in the sunlight what they gladly behold, and are gladdened by that sight—among whom, if some happen to be endowed with more vigorous, healthy, and strong eyes, they behold nothing more gladly than the sun itself, which also illuminates the other things in which weaker eyes delight—so the strong and vigorous sight of the mind, when it has beheld many true and immutable things by certain reason, directs itself to that very truth by which all things are shown, and clinging to it, as if forgetting the rest, in that one truth enjoys all things at once."

The same author, in Book 8 of The City of God, chapter 8, says that the philosophers "whom we see not undeservedly placed above the rest in fame and glory said that the light of minds for learning all things is God Himself, by whom all things were made." And in chapter 9: "Whatever philosophers, therefore, have held these views about the supreme and true God—that He is both the maker of created things, and the light of things to be known, and the good of things to be done; and that from Him comes to us the principle of nature, the truth of doctrine, and the happiness of life—whether they are more fittingly called Platonists, or whatever other name they give to their school, whether Ionians, or Italians on account of Pythagoras and the Pythagoreans, or Atlantean Libyans, Egyptians, Indians, Persians, Chaldeans, Scythians, Gauls, Spaniards, or any others who have seen and taught this: we place them all before the rest and confess them to be nearer to us." And in chapter 10: "This, then, is the reason why we prefer these to the rest: while other philosophers wore out their talents and studies in seeking the causes of things, and what the proper mode of learning and living might be, these, by knowing God, found where the cause of the established universe was, and the light of perceiving truth, and the fountain of drinking happiness. Whether therefore these Platonists or any other philosophers of any nations hold these views about God, they agree with us."

And the same author, in Book 5 of the Confessions, chapter 6, says thus: "You had already taught me, my God, by wondrous and hidden ways; and therefore I believe that You taught me, because it is true, and there is no other teacher of truth besides You, wherever and from whatever source it has shone forth."

Likewise, the blessed Gregory, in Book 7 of the Morals, chapter 25, commenting on Job 37—"Are not your garments warm when the earth has been fanned by the south wind?"—understanding by garments the hearers, by earth the heart or mind, and by the south wind the Holy Spirit, says thus: "Let teachers in no way attribute to themselves what they see their hearers profiting in through their exhortation toward the highest things; because unless the Holy Spirit fills their hearts, the voice of the teachers sounds in vain at the ears of the body. For teachers can form the voice outwardly, but they cannot impress it inwardly. 'For neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters, but God who gives the increase.'"

The blessed Ambrose also, commenting on 1 Corinthians 12—"No one can say 'Lord Jesus' except in the Holy Spirit"—says thus: "For whatever is false is from man, and whatever is true, by whomever it is said, is said by the Holy Spirit." Whence also in John 11, after recounting the saying of Caiaphas—"It is expedient for you that one man die for the people, and that the whole nation not perish"—it adds: "This he did not say of himself, but being high priest that year, he prophesied."

And Origen, as cited in the Gloss, on Exodus 4—"I beseech you, Lord, I am not eloquent," and further, "I will be in your mouth"—says: "God opens the mouth of those who speak the words of God; but the Devil opens the mouth of those who speak falsehood, false testimony, scurrilities, base things, of whisperers and detractors, and of those who speak idle words."

Also, in 3 Kings 3, when the Lord offered Solomon to give him whatever he wished to ask, and he asked for wisdom, and the Lord gave it—by this magnificent example it is sufficiently shown that all wisdom is from the Lord God. Ecclesiasticus 1—which the legal, sapiential, and prophetic books also very frequently and most clearly attest.

Not only is speculative or political wisdom given by the Lord, but also manual wisdom, which is called mechanical art. Whence Exodus 31: "The Lord spoke to Moses, saying: Behold, I have called by name Bezalel, and I have filled him with the spirit of God, with wisdom and understanding and knowledge in every work, to devise skillfully whatever can be made of gold, silver, and bronze, marble and gems and various kinds of wood; and I have given him as a companion Oholiab, and in the heart of every skilled man I have put wisdom, so that they may make all that I have commanded you—the tabernacle of the covenant and the ark of the testimony," etc.

Nor is the wisdom only of the faithful given by the Lord God, but also that of the unfaithful. Whence the Apostle, in Romans 1, speaking literally of the philosophers of the nations, says thus: "What is known of God is manifest to them, for God has revealed it to them; for the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood through the things that have been made—even His eternal power and divinity—so that they are without excuse; because although they knew God, they did not glorify Him as God or give thanks, but became vain in their thoughts, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools."

Behold: God revealed His knowledge to them, for which they also ought to have given Him thanks—which, however, they would not have been obliged to do unless they had received it from Him, as the thirty-first chapter of the first book teaches. "Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools." But why, since they spoke the truth? Because they said they were wise, and this from themselves, not from that fountain of wisdom from which all wisdom, like a certain luminous river, is derived—who "makes His sun rise upon the good and the evil, and sends rain upon the just and the unjust" (Matthew 5).

Whence Augustine, in On the Spirit and the Letter, chapter 7, says: "'Professing themselves to be wise'—which is to be understood in no other way than as attributing this to themselves—'they became fools.'" And to the same point belongs the authority of the Venerable Bede against Julian, cited above in the thirteenth chapter of this second book.

And in Isaiah 10, the Lord says: "I will visit upon the fruit of the proud heart of the king of Assyria and upon the glory of the haughtiness of his eyes. For he said: 'By the strength of my hand I have done it, and by my wisdom I have understood.'" Wherefore also, against this pestilential poison of pride, the Lord prepared a salutary antidote: "Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, and let not the strong man glory in his strength, and let not the rich man glory in his riches; but let him who glories glory in this: to know and understand me, that I am the Lord who exercises mercy, judgment, and justice on the earth" (Jeremiah 9)—as if He were saying plainly that man makes none of these things for himself from himself, but God does all of these things for all according to mercy and judgment.

And with this the authority of the Venerable Bede against Julian, mentioned above, sufficiently agrees; and the same author, in the same chapter 7 above, says that Julian uttered blasphemy in saying that the mind of man can become wise by itself. And this whole matter the authorities of both testaments concordantly attest.

Whence Exodus 4: "The Lord said to Moses: 'Who made the mouth of man?'" The Gloss adds: "outwardly or inwardly." "Or who made the mute?" The Gloss: "in reality or in spirit." "And the deaf, the seeing, and the blind? Is it not I? Go therefore, and I will be with you in your mouth, and I will teach you what you are to say."

And Matthew 10: "Do not be anxious about how or what you are to say; for it will be given to you in that hour what you are to say. For it is not you who speak, but the Spirit of your Father who speaks in you." And John 16: "When the Spirit of truth comes, He will teach you all truth." And 1 John 2: "The anointing teaches you about all things." And Psalm 17: "Your discipline itself will teach me." And Psalm 70: "God, You have taught me from my youth." And Psalm 93: "He who teaches man knowledge; blessed is the man whom You instruct, O Lord, and teach out of Your law." And Isaiah 48: "Thus says the Lord: 'I am the Lord your God, who teaches you useful things and guides you in the way you walk'"—which the glosses on these authorities, and other Catholic expositions, clearly teach; I pass over them in silence for the sake of brevity.

Nevertheless, behold for these matters the testimony of the Apostle, taught by the Lord, teacher of the nations, clear enough: "Such confidence we have through Christ toward God—not that we are sufficient to think anything from ourselves, as though from ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God" (2 Corinthians 3).

Without doubt, therefore, we are not sufficient to understand, to compose, to syllogize, or to acquire any knowledge from ourselves as though from ourselves; but in all and each of these things our sufficiency is from God, who opens the ears of the deaf and enlightens the eyes of the blind, who is the Lord of the sciences, who teaches man knowledge, distributing to each as He wills.

If, therefore, according to the foregoing, God is necessarily required as the co-effector of every act of the created intellect, then also of every act of the created will, and of every operation thereof, by a similar argument. And by this reasoning Augustine, Gregory, Prosper, and Bernard demonstrate the same conclusion.

The blessed Augustine therefore, in On the Predestination of the Saints, chapter 2, says thus: "Who does not see that thinking comes first? For no one believes anything unless he has first thought that it ought to be believed. If therefore we are not sufficient to think anything as from ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God, surely we are not sufficient to believe anything as from ourselves, but our sufficiency, by which we begin to believe, is from God. Wherefore no one is sufficient for himself either to begin or to complete any good work, but in every good work, both in beginning and in completing it, our sufficiency is from God."

And Augustine makes the same argument in On the Good of Perseverance, chapter 18, and in On Grace and Free Will, chapter 17, and in many other places.

The blessed Gregory also, in Book 33 of the Morals, chapter 22, commenting on Job 41—"Who has first given to me, that I should repay him?"—says thus: "If we at least anticipate the gifts of good works by thinking well through our own power, where is that which again through Paul is so subtly said—where all confidence of the human mind in itself is cut off from the very root of the heart—when he says: 'Not that we are sufficient to think anything from ourselves, as from ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God?'"

The holy Prosper also, in Against Cassian, chapter 6, recounts the fourth definition of Cassian, who says: "That it may more clearly appear that even through the good of nature, which has been granted by the beneficence of the Creator, the beginnings of good wills sometimes come forth—which, however, unless directed by God, cannot arrive at the consummation of virtues—the Apostle is a witness, saying: 'For to will is present with me, but to accomplish the good I do not find.'" To which Prosper replies: "Falsely therefore, according to this definition, did you say before that not only the beginnings of actions but also of good thoughts are from God, who begins, carries out, and consummates in us the things that are good. But this can in no way be partly false, nor should contraries have been inferred against it—so that what you rightly professed to begin from grace, you afterward confirmed we possess through the good of nature and through free will."

He says: "The blessed Apostle did indeed say, 'For to will is present with me, but to accomplish the good I do not find.' But the same Apostle said, 'Not that we are sufficient to think anything from ourselves, as from ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God.' And the same said, 'It is God who works in us both to will and to act according to His good pleasure.' The Apostle is therefore not contrary to himself; but when the willing has been given to us, we do not immediately find the doing as well, unless—as we ask, seek, and knock—He who gave the desire grants the effect. That voice of the one saying, 'For to will is present with me, but to accomplish the good I do not find,' is the voice of one who has been called and is already established under grace, who delights in the law of God according to the inner man, but sees another law in his members warring against the law of his mind and taking him captive to the law of sin; and although he has received the knowledge of willing rightly, he does not find in himself the power of doing what he desires, until for the good will he has received he merits to find the faculty of the virtues he seeks."

And further, in chapter 25, he holds the same. The blessed Bernard also, in On Grace and Free Will, chapter 22, says thus: "Hence we presume to be God's co-workers, cooperators of the Holy Spirit, and meritorious of the kingdom, because by voluntary consent we are joined to the divine will. What then? Is this the entire work and the entire merit of free will—that it consents? It is indeed, yet not as though even this consent, in which all merit consists, were from itself, since we are not sufficient even to think, which is less than to consent, from ourselves as from ourselves. These are not my words but the Apostle's, who attributes everything that can be good—thinking, willing, and accomplishing according to good will—to God, not to his own free will. Therefore God works three things in us—good thinking, willing, and accomplishing: the first without us, the second with us, the third through us."

Whence also Isaiah 40: "Behold," he says, "the nations are counted as a moment of the balance before Him." Upon which the Gloss says: "In comparison with Him"—namely, God—"a moment that from nothing is inclined to either side." And Proverbs 21: "As the divisions of waters, so is the heart of the king in the hand of the Lord; He will incline it wherever He wills." But every rational creature is called a king, because it rules itself by reason. For this cannot be understood only of the heart of a great earthly king and not of the heart of a small subject, "since He made both the small and the great, and He has equal care for all" (Wisdom 6).

Wherefore we each humbly beseech the Lord, saying with the Psalmist: "Incline my heart, O Lord, to Your testimonies and not to avarice" (Psalm 118). On which Augustine says: "What is it to have a heart inclined to something, if not to will it?" Wherefore also, immediately before, on the preceding verse—"Lead me in the path of Your commandments"—he says thus: "He asks for divine help by which he may be led, because 'it is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy.' Finally, because God works the willing itself in all, 'for the will is prepared by the Lord.'"

To this also pertains Wisdom 11: "You have disposed all things in measure and number and weight"—with the exposition of Augustine in Book 4 On Genesis Literally, chapter 5, and more fully recounted in chapters 9 and 46 of the first book. "There is," he says, "a weight of will and love; but this weight is seized by another weight. The weight without weight is that by which all things are referred so that they may rest."

Likewise, if a man could will from himself alone, he could likewise from himself alone resist temptation—contrary to chapters 4, 5, and 6 of this second book. Likewise, if a man could will from himself alone, he could thus will badly, and since a rational power can bear on its objects, he could likewise from himself alone will well; and so without God's help, by the powers of free will alone, he could merit—which is the error of Pelagius, as is sufficiently clear from the foregoing—and he could from himself alone prepare himself for grace and open to God or to a man who knocks, contrary to chapters 37 and 38 of the first book.

And even if someone is already established in grace, still by the fifth chapter of this second book, without God's help he cannot resist temptation, and therefore cannot merit. No one, however full of grace, merits unless grace cooperates, as chapter 40 of the first book teaches; nor does grace operate unless it is directed by the Holy Spirit, by chapter 42 of the same. All the merits of the faithful are also given by God, as has been shown above. Therefore no one from himself alone without God can will well; therefore neither can he will at all.

Nor can anyone pretend that man, as far as concerns himself and the power of free will, could by himself go in either direction—namely, to evil and to good—but that God does not wish to allow him to do good without Himself; because this would bring back the error of Pelagius. And in

Wisdom 7 it is said that He is "a lover of good action, or of the good, who forbids no one from doing good."

Likewise, neither an angel nor Adam before the fall could will by himself, as the tenth chapter of this second book teaches; and therefore neither can man now. Likewise, if a man could will by himself, he could also act by himself; and since, according to the Philosopher in Book 2 of the Ethics, virtue is generated from works, he could by himself acquire virtues for himself—contrary to the third chapter of the first book, and contrary to Augustine and Bede in their books against Julian, as the sixth chapter of this second book more fully cited, where they hold that every virtue, even of the unfaithful, is from God.

Likewise, no creature has free will more powerful than Jesus Christ had, but He Himself could not will by Himself, as He Himself testifies: "I cannot do anything of Myself; but as I hear, I judge, and My judgment is true, because I seek not My own will, but the will of the Father who sent Me" (John 5). Whence Augustine, on John, Book 2, Homily 45, says thus: "On account of the one person of the Son, consisting of two substances—divine and human—sometimes He speaks according to that by which He is God, as in 'I and the Father are one'; sometimes according to that by which He is man, as in 'The Father is greater than I'; according to which we have received from Him the saying, and this which I now discuss: 'I cannot do anything of Myself, but as I hear, I judge.'" Otherwise Christ could knowingly have willed the contrary of the divine will and could have sinned mortally.

Likewise, the Father does all the works of the Son; therefore the Son Himself according to His divinity likewise does those same works. For in John 14, Christ says: "The Father dwelling in Me, He does the works." And Augustine, in Book 1 on John, Homily 20, says: "The Son of God walked upon the sea; the flesh was walking and the divinity was governing. When therefore the flesh was walking and the divinity was governing, was the Father absent? If He was absent, how does the Son Himself say: 'The Father dwelling in Me does His works'? If therefore the Father dwelling in the Son does His works, that walking of the flesh upon the sea was done by the Father, and was done through the Son. Therefore that walking is an inseparable work of the Father and the Son; I see both working there."

Likewise, it was shown in chapter 46 of the first book that what is asked from the Lord is from Him. But man rightly asks of God that he himself may will, choose, and always do good, and always not will and flee every evil, saying with the Psalmist: "Incline my heart to Your testimonies, and not to avarice" (Psalm 118); and again: "Lord, lead me in Your justice; because of my enemies, direct my way in Your sight" (Psalm 5); and Esther 14: "Give me confidence, O King of gods and Lord of all power; put a well-ordered speech in my mouth in the sight of the lion, and turn his heart to hatred of our enemy, so that he may perish, and the rest who consent to him"—with many similar passages occurring very frequently in Scripture.

And the holy Church of God prays accordingly: "Almighty and everlasting God, direct our acts according to Your good pleasure," etc. And again: "Make us love what You command." She also prays for enemies, that God may convert their evil wills to good. And the priest in the Mass, about to receive the Lord's Body, says: "Make me always obey Your commandments," etc.—with many similar prayers.

Likewise, whatever God promises, He does, as was taught in chapter 46 of the first book. But God promised men their future wills and many of their future works, as that same chapter cited—and this is evident from Ishmael, Isaac, Samson, Solomon, Jeremiah, John the Baptist, and the Lord Jesus Christ, and many others. Whence also Ezekiel 36: "I will take away the heart of stone from your flesh," says the Lord, "and I will give you a heart of flesh, and I will put a new spirit in the midst of you, and I will cause you to walk in My precepts and to keep My judgments and do them."

These two motives Augustine adduces for this one conclusion, in On Grace and Free Will, chapter 31.

Likewise, that for which thanks are given to God is done by Him, as was shown in the thirty-first chapter of the first book. But who is so ungrateful as to give thanks to the Lord his God for no act of his own will or of another's? It is also said in 1 Ezra 7: "Blessed be the Lord God, who put this in the heart of the king, to glorify the house of the Lord." Therefore God effects all the wills of all.

To this same conclusion, and specifically concerning the evil acts of the will, many arguments and authorities adduced in chapters 26, 31, 33, and 34 of the first book contribute.

This same question is clearly proved by the series of both testaments and the manifold authority of the saints—and this universally, of every volition, good or bad. Whence Isaiah 26: "Lord, You will give us peace; for You have worked all our works in us." And further on, 45: "I am the Lord, and there is no other, forming light and creating darkness, making peace and creating evil; I the Lord do all these things"—which the text and the Gloss on Isaiah 10 cited above also most plainly attest.

Likewise, Jeremiah 10: "I know, O Lord, that man's way is not his own, nor is it for a man to walk and direct his steps." Where the Gloss says: "Let those be ashamed who say that each person is governed by his own will. For man's way is not his own," etc. Whence David: "By the Lord the steps of a man are directed." And Proverbs 20: "By the Lord the steps of a man are directed." The Gloss: "Not by the freedom of will."

Hence Isaiah says: "For You have worked all our works in us." And there follows consequently: "But what man can understand his own way?" On which the Gloss says: "Truly, what he has done, he has from God, because what kind of person he will be, or how long he will live, he does not know of himself, but it is in God." And above, chapter 16: "When the ways of a man please the Lord, He will convert even his enemies to peace." And further on, 21: "As the divisions of waters, so is the heart of the king in the hand of the Lord; He will incline it wherever He wills." And Psalm 104: "He turned their heart to hate His people, and to deal craftily with His servants."

Likewise, Exodus 3: "I will give this people favor in the sight of the Egyptians," says the Lord. And further, chapter 4: "I will harden his heart"—namely, Pharaoh's. And further on, chapter 9: "And the Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh, and he did not hear them, as the Lord had spoken to Moses." And again: "But for this purpose I have raised you up, to show My power in you, and that My name may be told in all the earth." And chapter 14: "I will harden the heart of the Egyptians, so that they may pursue you, and I will be glorified in Pharaoh and in all his army."

This same conclusion the Apostle proves through this same Scripture, in Romans 9: "It is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy. For the Scripture says to Pharaoh: 'For this very purpose I have raised you up, that I might show My power in you,'" etc.

Likewise, Joshua 11: "There was no city that surrendered to the children of Israel, except the Hivites who dwelt in Gibeon; he—namely, Joshua—took all of them by war. For it was the Lord's sentence that their hearts should be hardened and they should fight against Israel and fall, and should not deserve any mercy, and should perish, as the Lord had commanded Moses."

And 1 Ezra 6: "The Lord had turned the heart of the king of Assyria toward them, so that his hands might help them in the work of the house of God." And chapter 7: "Blessed be the Lord who put this in the heart of the king, to glorify the house of the Lord." And Nehemiah 7: "God put it in my heart, and I gathered the nobles."

Likewise, 1 Kings 10: "Saul went to his house, and a part of the army went with him, whose hearts God had touched." But how had He touched their hearts, unless because He inspired in them the will?

And 2 Chronicles 21: "Behold," says Isaiah to Joram, "the Lord will strike you with a great plague, with your people and your sons and your wives and all your substance." And there follows: "Therefore the Lord stirred up against Joram the spirit of the Philistines and the Arabs, and they went up into the land of Judah and laid it waste, and carried off all the substance that was found in the king's house," etc.

Likewise, Esther 14: Esther prayed to the Lord in this manner: "Turn his heart"—namely, Ahasuerus—"to hatred of our enemy, so that he may perish." And further, chapter 15: "And when he had raised his face and indicated the fury of his breast with burning eyes, the queen fell down," etc. "And God turned the spirit of the king to gentleness, and anxious and fearing, he leaped from his throne," etc.

Likewise, John 1: "All things were made through Him, and without Him nothing was made." And further, chapter 3: "A man cannot receive anything unless it has been given him from heaven, and the Father who sent me has drawn him." And chapter 6: "No one can come to Me unless the Father who sent Me draws him." And further on: "No one can come to Me unless it has been given him by My Father." And further, chapter 15: "Without Me you can do nothing." And Philippians 2: "It is God who works in us both to will and to accomplish according to His good pleasure." And Romans 1: "God delivered them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things that are not fitting." And 1 Corinthians 3: "Neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters, but God who gives the increase. You are God's field, God's building." And further, chapter 4: "What do you have that you did not receive? And if you received it, why do you boast as though you had not received it?" And further, chapter 12: "There are diversities of operations, but the same God who works all things in all"—with many similar passages, both in the Old Testament and in the New.

The blessed Augustine also, through the foregoing authorities and others in his various books, but especially in those he wrote against the Pelagians, demonstrated this same conclusion with ardent spirit and the most elaborate care. Whence in On Grace and Free Will, chapter 35, he says thus: "It is certain that we keep the commandments if we will; but because the will is prepared by the Lord, we must ask of Him that we may will as much as suffices so that by willing we do. It is certain that we will when we will, but He makes us will the good—He of whom it was said, as I just quoted, that 'the will is prepared by the Lord'; of whom it was said, 'By the Lord the steps of a man are directed, and he will want his way'; of whom it was said, 'It is God who works in us to will.' It is certain that we act when we act, but He makes us act, by providing the most efficacious powers to the will—He who said, 'I will cause you to walk in My justifications, and to observe My judgments and do them.'"

The same author, further in the same work, chapter 43: "Divine Scripture, if diligently examined, shows that not only those good wills of men that He makes out of evil ones, and once made good directs to good acts and to eternal life, but also those that preserve the creature of the world are so in God's power that He makes them incline wherever He wills, whenever He wills—whether to bestow benefits on some or to inflict punishments on others—as He Himself judges, by a most hidden judgment indeed, but without doubt a most just one. For we find that some sins are also punishments of other sins, such as the vessels of wrath that the Apostle says are fitted for destruction; such as the hardening of Pharaoh, whose cause is said to be the showing of God's power in him; such as the flight of the Israelites from the face of the enemy from the city of Ai. For terror was produced in their hearts, so that they fled, and this was done so that sin might be punished in the manner in which it deserved to be punished. Whence the Lord says to Joshua: 'The children of Israel will not be able to stand before the face of their enemies.' What is 'they could not stand'? Why did they not stand by free will, but, troubled by fear, fled by their will—unless because the Lord has dominion even over the wills of men, and turns to fear those with whom He is angry?"

And he demonstrates the same through Joshua 11, which I cited above.

The same author, chapter 44: "Did not the wicked man, the son of Benjamin—namely, Shimei, about whom 2 Kings 16 speaks—curse King David of his own will? And yet what does David say, full of true, profound, and pious knowledge? What does he say to the one who wanted to strike the one cursing? 'What have I to do with you, sons of Zeruiah? Let him alone, let him curse, because the Lord told him to curse David. Leave him alone, let him curse, because God told him to, so that the Lord may see my humility and repay me good for his cursing this day.' How did the Lord tell this man to curse David? Who is wise and will understand these things? For He did not tell him by commanding, where obedience would be praised, but because God, by His just and hidden judgment, inclined that man's own will—evil by its own vice—to this sin; and therefore it is said, 'The Lord told him.' For if he had obeyed God commanding, he would have been to be praised rather than punished—whereas we know he was later punished for this sin. Nor is the reason hidden why the Lord told him in this way to curse David—that is, why He sent or let loose his evil heart: 'So that the Lord may see my humility,' he says, 'and repay me good for his cursing this day.'"

And there follows, chapter 45: "Behold how it is proved that God uses even the hearts of the evil for the praise and help of the good. So He used Judas in betraying Christ; so He used the Jews in crucifying Christ. And how much good He has bestowed on the peoples who would believe through this! He who also uses the Devil himself, the worst of all, but most excellently, for exercising and proving the faith and piety of the good—not for Himself, who knows all things before they happen, but for us, for whom it was necessary that we be dealt with in this way."

"Did not Absalom choose of his own will the counsel that was harmful to him? And yet he did so because the Lord had heard his father praying that this would happen; on account of which Scripture says: 'And the Lord commanded that the good counsel of Ahithophel be overthrown, so that He might bring all evils upon Absalom.' It had called it good counsel, because it was for the time useful to his cause—since it was for him and against his father, against whom he had rebelled—so that he could have overwhelmed him, had not the Lord overthrown the counsel that Ahithophel had given, by working in Absalom's heart so that he would reject such counsel and choose another that was not in his interest."

And there follows, chapter 46: "Who does not tremble at these divine judgments, by which God works in the hearts even of evil men whatever He wills, yet renders to them according to their merits? Rehoboam the son of Solomon rejected the salutary counsel of the elders and rather assented to the words of his contemporaries. Why was this, if not by his own will? But hence the ten tribes of Israel departed from him and established another king for themselves, Jeroboam, so that the will of the angry God might be fulfilled, which He had also predicted would come about. For what does Scripture say? 'And the king did not hear the people, because it was a turning from the Lord, that He might establish His word which He spoke by the hand of Ahijah the Shilonite concerning Jeroboam the son of Nebat.' Assuredly it happened thus, and that through a man's will, yet so that the turning was from the Lord."

"Read the books of Chronicles, and you will find written in the second book: 'And the Lord stirred up against Joram the spirit of the Philistines and the Arabs who were neighbors of the Ethiopians, and they went up into the land of Judah, and devastated it, and seized all the substance that was found in the king's house,' etc. Here it is shown that God stirs up enemies to devastate those lands that He judges worthy of such punishment. But did the Philistines and Arabs come to devastate the land of Judah without their own will, or did they come by their own will so that it was falsely written that the Lord stirred up their spirit to do this? Indeed, both are true: they came by their own will, and yet the Lord stirred up their spirit. This can also be said thus: the Lord stirred up their spirit, and yet they came by their own will. For the Almighty works in the hearts of men even the motion of their will, so that through them He may do what He Himself has willed to do."

And chapter 47: "What does it mean that the man of God said to Amaziah the king: 'Let not the army of Israel come with you, for the Lord is not with Israel'—because if you thought to prevail through them, 'God will turn you to flight before your enemies'? How is there power in God either to help or to turn to flight? How does the power of God help some in battle by giving them confidence, and turn others to flight by sending fear, unless He who 'in heaven and on earth has done all things whatsoever He willed' does so even in the hearts of men?"

"We read what Joash, king of Israel, said, sending a messenger to King Amaziah, who wanted to fight with him. For after some words he said: 'Now sit at home; why do you provoke your own ruin? You will fall, and Judah with you.' Then Scripture adds: 'And Amaziah did not listen, because it was from God, so that he might be delivered into ruin, because they had sought the gods of Edom.' Behold: God, wishing to punish the sin of idolatry, worked this in the heart of the one at whom He was justly angry—that he did not heed the salutary warning, but despising it went to war, where he fell with his army."

He demonstrates the same through the deception of the prophet by the Lord, concerning which Ezekiel 14 speaks, and through Ahasuerus, concerning which Esther 15 speaks, as cited above. And further, in chapter 48, he says: "It is written also in the Proverbs of Solomon: 'As the rush of water, so is the heart of the king in the hand of the Lord; He will incline it wherever He wills.' And in Psalm 104 it is read, concerning the Egyptians, what God did to them: 'He turned their heart, so that they hated His people, and dealt craftily with His servants.'"

"In the apostolic writings, too, see what is written. In the Epistle of the Apostle Paul to the Romans: 'Therefore God delivered them over to the desires of their hearts and to uncleanness.' And a little later: 'As they did not think it worthwhile to have knowledge of the Lord, God delivered them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things that are not fitting.' And in the second Epistle to the Thessalonians, he says of certain people: 'Because they did not receive the love of truth so that they might be saved, therefore God will send them an operation of error so that they may believe a lie, and all may be judged who did not believe the truth but consented to falsehood.'"

And drawing the principal conclusion of the entire discussion, he says thus: "By these and similar testimonies of the divine words, it is sufficiently shown, as I judge, that God works in the hearts of men to incline their wills wherever He wishes—whether to good things according to His mercy, or to evil things according to their merits, sometimes by an open, sometimes by a hidden judgment, but always a just one."

The same author, in On Correction and Grace, shows this same conclusion in many chapters, as the tenth chapter of this second book cited in part. Whence also in chapter 49 he says concerning the perseverance of the good itself: "God did not will that the saints glory in their own powers, but in Himself—He who gives them not only the kind of help He gave the first man, without which they could not persevere if they willed, but who works in them the willing itself, so that since they will not persevere unless they both can and will, the possibility and the will to persevere are granted to them by the liberality of divine grace. For their will is so kindled by the Holy Spirit that they can because they will, and they so will because God works in them to will."

And further in the same work, chapter 70, he says thus: "It is not to be doubted that human wills cannot resist the will of God—who 'in heaven and on earth has done all things whatsoever He willed'—so as to prevent Him from doing what He wills; since indeed He does what He wills with the very wills of men. Unless perhaps—to mention one example among many—when God willed to give the kingdom to Saul, it was so in the power of the Israelites to submit or not submit to that man (which was indeed placed in their will) that they could even resist God. Yet He did not do this except through the wills of the men themselves—without doubt possessing the most omnipotent power to incline human hearts wherever it pleases."

"For so it is written: 'And Samuel dismissed the people, and each one went to his own place; and Saul went to his house in Gibeah, and the mighty men whose hearts God had touched went with Saul. But the sons of Belial said: "Can this man save us?" And they dishonored him and did not bring him gifts.' Is anyone going to say that none of those whose hearts God touched to go with him went with Saul, or that any of the pestilent men went, whose hearts He did not touch to do so?"

"Likewise, concerning David, whom the Lord established in the kingdom with more prosperous success, we read thus: 'And David went on prospering and growing great, and the Lord was with him.' And after this had been stated, a little later it is said: 'But the Spirit of the Lord came upon Amasai, chief among the thirty, and he said: "We are yours, David, and we will be with you, son of Jesse; peace to you, and peace to your helpers, because your God has helped you."' Could he himself oppose the will of God, and not rather do the will of Him who worked in his heart through His Spirit, with which he was clothed, so that he would will, say, and do this?"

"Likewise, a little later the same Scripture says: 'All these men of war, leading the battle line, came with a peaceful heart to Hebron, to make David king over all Israel.' By their own will they made David king—who does not see it? Who would deny it? For they did not do it without heartfelt sincerity or without good will—they did it with a peaceful heart. And yet He worked in them who works in the hearts of men whatever He wills. For which reason Scripture prefaced: 'And David went on prospering and growing great, and the Lord Almighty was with him.' And so the Lord Almighty who was with him brought these men to make him king. And how did He bring them? Did He bind them with bodily chains? He worked within; He held their hearts, He moved their hearts, and drew them by their wills, which He Himself worked in them."

And there follows in the next chapter: "If therefore, when He wills to establish kings on earth, He has the wills of men more in His power than they have their own, who else makes correction salutary and brings about correction in the heart of the one corrected, so that he may be established in the heavenly kingdom? What could be said more clearly or more openly?"

Behold: here Augustine expressly holds that no one could of his own will have gone with Saul unless God had touched his heart to do so. Therefore, by the same reasoning, no one can turn himself this way or that—indeed, cannot will anything at all—unless God touches his heart for this very thing and effects the willing itself.

Whence also in Book 4 Against Julian, chapter 16, he says: "What—do they already use the exercise of the will? Unless He wills and helps, from whom the will is prepared, they cannot will." The same author, in On the Predestination of the Saints, chapter 28: "God does what He wills in the hearts of men, either by helping or by judging, so that through them also what His hand and His counsel predestined to be done may be fulfilled. Vainly, therefore, did they say that even what we have proved from the testimony of the Scripture of Kings and Chronicles—that when God wills to be done what can only be done by willing men, their hearts are inclined to will it, by Him inclining them who works in us to will in a wondrous and ineffable way—does not pertain to the matter we are discussing."

The same author, in On the Good of Perseverance, chapter 37: "'It is God who works in us both to will and to act according to His good pleasure.' We therefore will, but God works in us to will. We act, but God works in us to act according to His good pleasure. This is beneficial for us both to believe and to say; this is pious, this is true, so that the confession may be humble and submissive, and everything may be given to God."

This same thing the blessed Prosper shows in Against Cassian in many chapters, as is partly evident from the citations above. Whence also in chapter 8 he recounts from the African bishops writing back to Pope Zosimus in this manner: "The will is prepared by the Lord, and so that they may do something good, He Himself touches the hearts of His children with fatherly inspirations. 'For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are the sons of God'—so that we may feel that our own free will is not absent, and yet in each individual motion of the good human will, we may not doubt that His help avails more."

The same author, in his Sentences, chapter 312, headed "That man can do nothing without God," recounts Augustine saying: "God does many good things in man that man does not do; but man does no good thing that God does not cause man to do."

Likewise, Bernard, in On Grace and Free Will, chapter 23, says: "What do our words sound like other than that saying: 'It is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy'? The Apostle certainly does not say this as though one could not will or run in vain, but that he who wills and runs ought to glory not in himself but in Him from whom he received both the willing and the running. Finally he says: "What do you have that you did not receive?" And he shows the same in chapters 18, 22, and others.

Likewise, the most glorious doctor and martyr Cyprian, in Epistle 13, addressed to Quirinus, entitled On the Discipline of the Christian Religion, chapter 4, demonstrates this one conclusion alone: "In nothing should we glory, since nothing is ours." And this through John 3: "A man cannot receive anything unless it has been given him from heaven." And through the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 4: "What do you have that you did not receive? And if you received it, why do you boast as though you had not received it?"—and through many other passages of Scripture.

Likewise, the venerable Anselm, in On the Fall of the Devil, chapter 1, and in what follows, shows that the Apostle's saying is addressed to angels as well as to men and to every creature; and that no creature can from itself alone have anything, or will, or pre-will. Whence also in chapter 7, when the disciple objects in this manner—"In our nature this can be asked, since we believe no man can have a good will except with God giving it, but can always have an evil will with only God's permission: Why did God make it such?"—he responds first materially in chapter 8 thus: "I do not think it can be denied that either the will or the turning of the will is something. For even if they are not substances, it cannot be proved that they are not essences, since there are many essences besides that which is properly called substance. A good will is no more something than an evil will is. For the will that wishes to give mercifully is no more something than the will that wishes to seize violently." And consequently he shows this conclusion, which he states in summary at the end thus: "Neither the evil will, nor the perverse turning of the will, is that very evil by which an angel or a man becomes evil—which we call nothing. Nor is the good will, or the good turning of the will, that very good by which they become good."

And through many subsequent chapters he shows that evil, or pure wickedness, is not some positive thing but a pure privation. And in chapter 20, to respond more formally, he shows that every act of the will is from God in a threefold way. In one way, because God, although He could, does not prohibit, but permits. In another way, because the power of willing—namely, the will itself, which is the voluntary power—is from God. In a third way, because God Himself truly through Himself co-effects every act, even an evil one, according to its essence, because in that respect it is good; but not according to its wickedness—in that respect it is made only by the unjust will.

Whence he says thus: "What wonder if, just as God is said to lead into temptation when He does not deliver from it, so we should acknowledge that He gives an evil will by not prohibiting it when He can—especially since the power of willing anything at all is from Him alone?"

Behold, for the first and second points. And he adds for the third: "When the Devil turned his will to what he ought not, both the willing itself and the turning itself were something; and yet they had something only from God and of God. Nor could he will anything or move his will unless He permitted it who makes all natures, substantial and accidental, universal and individual. Insofar as the will and the turning, or the motion of the will, is something, it is good and is of God. But insofar as it lacks the justice without which it ought not to be, it is not simply evil but something evil; and what is evil is not of God, but of the will, or of the one moving the will. For simple evil is injustice, since it is nothing other than evil, which is nothing. But the other evil is the nature in which injustice resides, since it is something, and something other than injustice, which is evil and is nothing. Therefore what is something is made by God and is of God; but what is nothing—that is, evil—is made by the unjust one and is his."

Against which the disciple immediately objects in these words: "That God indeed makes the natures of all things must be admitted; but that He makes the individual actions of perverse wills—such as the very perverse motion of the will by which the evil will moves itself—what is fitting in this?" And he responds: "It is no wonder if we say that God makes the individual actions that are done by an evil will, since we say He makes the individual substances that are made by an unjust will and a dishonorable operation."

And there follows under the disciple's name consequently: "I have nothing to object. For I cannot deny that any action whatsoever is truly something, nor do I wish to acknowledge that what truly has some essence is not made by God. Nor does this reasoning of yours in any way accuse God or excuse the Devil, but entirely excuses God and accuses the Devil."

The same author, in On Concord, chapter 6, having asked whether foreknowledge or the knowledge of God is from things, or conversely, and having destroyed the first part and consequently established the second, and with an objection raised against this view in this manner—"If indeed whatever things exist take their essence from the knowledge of God, then God is the maker and author of evil works; therefore He does not justly punish the wicked"—responds in these words: "This can be easily resolved if it is first recognized that the good, which is justice, is truly something; but the evil, which is injustice, lacks all existence. For injustice is not a quality, or an action, or any other essence, but only the absence of due justice. Every quality, every action, and whatever has any essence is from God, from whom comes all justice and no injustice. God therefore makes all things that are done by a just or unjust will—that is, good works and evil. In good works, indeed, He makes both that they exist and that they are good; in evil works, He makes that they exist, but not that they are evil. For a thing's being just and good is to be something; but no thing's being unjust or evil is to be something."

And further in the same chapter, he shows that God effects every volition, action, and motion in a twofold way: first, because God makes every active and passive thing and all their powers; second, because He truly and efficiently moves and acts. Whence he says thus: "Just as God does not make injustice, so He does not make anything to be unjust; yet He makes all actions and all motions, because He makes the things from which, out of which, through which, and in which they are done, and no thing has the power of willing or doing except by His giving." Behold, for the first point. And there follows for the second: "The very willing also, which is sometimes just and sometimes unjust, and is nothing other than using the will and the power of willing, which God gives—insofar as it is good, it is from God; which indeed, when it is right, is good and just; but when it is not right, by this alone that it is not right, it is evil and unjust. But for something to be rightly is something, and this is from God; but not to be rightly is not something, and is not from God."

"So therefore God, in all good wills and works, makes both what they are essentially and that they are good; in evil ones, not that they are evil, but only that they exist in their essence." And in chapter 8 he says the same, where he posits another mode of making by which God is said to make evil things—namely, because He permits, just as He is said to harden a man when He does not soften him, and to lead into temptation when He does not deliver.

The same author, in On the Virginal Conception, chapter 4: "Certain names are given to certain actions by which it is signified that they are done unjustly, such as 'fornication' and 'lying'; but one thing is understood when the action or the utterance itself is considered, and another when both are considered as done justly or unjustly. For every essence is from God, from whom nothing is unjust." And in many other places he repeatedly holds the same.

Likewise, William, Bishop of Auxerre, commenting on Book 2 of the Sentences, asks whether an evil action is from God working and cooperating, and holds that it is, which he proves both by authority and by reason. First, by the authority of Isaiah cited above: "Shall the axe boast against him who cuts with it?" etc. Whence he concludes that God was the principal agent, and Sennacherib the instrumental one—like an axe or a rod—in the destruction of the Jews carried out through Sennacherib. Second, he proves the same by a twofold argument. The first is that the passion of Christ was good; therefore it proceeded from a good cause; therefore from the good will of God, and not only from the evil will of the Jews. The second is: Someone by fornicating generates a holy prophet; then this action is the cause of a good thing; therefore it is good. And it is evil; therefore an evil action, insofar as it is an action, is good and is from God. And he adds that "we concede this, saying that God is the efficient, formal, and final cause of an evil action, but not the material cause: He is its efficient cause because He is its principal agent."

Saint Thomas also, in his questions On Evil, question 19, asks whether the action of sin is from God, and in responding says thus: "It must be said that among the ancients there were two opinions on this matter. Some of old said that the action of sin is not from God, attending to the very deformity of sin, which is not from God. Others said that the action of sin is from God, attending to the very essence of the act, which must be held to be from God for a twofold reason."

"First, indeed, by a common argument: since God Himself is being through His own essence (because His essence is His being), it is necessary that everything that in any way exists be derived from Him. For nothing else is its own being, but all things are said to be beings by a certain participation. Everything that is said to be such by participation is derived from that which is such through its essence, just as all things on fire are derived from that which is fire through its essence. It is manifest, however, that the action of sin is a certain being, and is placed in the category of being; whence it is necessary to say that it is from God."

"Second, the same is evident by a special argument: it is necessary that all motions of secondary causes be caused by the first mover. God, however, is the first mover with respect to all motions, both spiritual and corporeal. Hence, since the act of sin is a certain motion of free will, it is necessary to say that the act of sin, insofar as it is an act, is from God."

This same thing John Scotus also plainly attests, commenting on Book 1 of the Sentences, distinction 41, as is more fully recounted in chapter 18 of the first book.

From the foregoing, as I judge, it is sufficiently clear that, for the created will to effect any act of its own, whether good or evil, the divine co-efficiency is necessarily required.

COROLLARY

COROLLARY: THAT WHATEVER THE CREATED WILL HAS EFFECTED, THE UNCREATED WILL NECESSARILY CO-EFFECTS; AND WHATEVER THE ANGELIC OR HUMAN WILL HAS DONE, THE DIVINE WILL NECESSARILY COOPERATES IN; AND THAT EVERY ACT OF THE CREATED WILL IS WHOLLY EFFECTED BY THE CREATED WILL, AND WHOLLY LIKEWISE BY THE UNCREATED.

Whence this conclusion is also easily derived: whatever the created will has effected, the uncreated will necessarily co-effects; and whatever the angelic or human will has done, the divine will necessarily cooperates in; and every act of the created will is wholly effected by the created will, and wholly likewise by the uncreated.

This corollary is most clearly proved by the ninth chapter of the first book. It can also be most easily demonstrated from the foregoing, just as that ninth chapter was demonstrated. For if God is necessarily required for co-effecting and cooperating in every act of the created will, and God effects or operates nothing ad extra—indeed, cannot do so—purely naturally or from knowledge alone, His uncreated and efficacious will is necessarily required.

Wherefore also the prophet says: "Incline my heart, O God, to Your testimonies" (Psalm 118). And further in the same Psalm: "I have inclined my heart to do Your justifications." Whence also Augustine, in On the Perfection of Justice, chapter 21, says: "Man prays that he may do the commandments of God—which would not be commanded if our will did nothing there, nor would God be prayed to if our will alone sufficed."

The same author, in On Correction and Grace, chapter 7: "Let not those deceive themselves who say, 'Why are we preached to and commanded to turn from evil and do good, if it is not we who do this, but God who works in us to will and to act?' Rather, let them understand—if they are sons of God—that they are led by the Spirit of God, so that they may do what is to be done; and when it is fitting, let them give thanks to Him by whom they are led. For they are led so that they may act, not so that they themselves do nothing."

And he is recounted in the Sentences of Prosper, chapter 310, in this manner: "It is without doubt more to be led than to be governed. For he who is governed does something, and is therefore governed so that he may act rightly; but he who is led is scarcely understood to be doing anything himself. And the grace of the Savior so prevails over our wills that the Apostle does not hesitate to say: 'As many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are the sons of God.' Nor can our free will do anything better than to commend itself to Him who cannot act badly."

Wherefore also Bernard, in On Grace and Free Will, chapter 23, speaking of grace, writes thus: "Grace itself arouses free will when it sows the thought; it heals it when it changes the affection; it strengthens it so that it may be brought to the act; it preserves it from feeling failure. Grace so works with free will that it only precedes it in the first stage; in the rest it accompanies it—precisely so that what was begun by grace alone is completed equally by both, so that they work mixedly, not separately, simultaneously, not in turns, through each individual effect: not partly grace and partly free will, but each accomplishes the whole in an undivided work. The whole is indeed done by this, and the whole by that; but as the whole is in grace, so the whole is from grace."

CHAPTER XXI. HE RECOUNTS SIX FALSE RESPONSES: THE FIRST SAYS THAT GOD IS SAID TO MAKE EVERY ACT OF THE CREATED WILL ONLY BECAUSE HE MAKES EVERY CREATED WILL, WHICH ALONE TRULY AND PROPERLY EFFECTS ITS ACT. THE SECOND, THAT GOD IS SAID TO MAKE THE GOOD ACT OF THE CREATED WILL BECAUSE HE MAKES THE CHARITY OR GRACE THAT EFFECTS IT. THE THIRD, THAT GOD PRESERVES THE WILL. THE FOURTH, THAT GOD MAKES THE OBJECT AND ALL THINGS MOVING THE WILL. THE FIFTH, THAT HE PERMITS. THE SIXTH, THAT GOD PROPERLY EFFECTS EVERY GOOD ACT OF THE WILL BUT ABSOLUTELY NO EVIL ACT. AND HE CORRECTS THEM GENERALLY AND TOGETHER.

Many, however, not daring or being able to resist entirely so firm a truth and so powerful testimonies for it, attempt at least to obscure it in many ways with certain smoky responses, saying that God does not truly and properly effect the act of the created will, but only metaphorically. For the first group says that God is said to effect every act of the created will because He made every created will, which alone truly and properly effects its act. The second group holds, consequently with the first, that God is therefore said to make every good act of the created will because He makes the charity or grace from which, together with the created will alone, the good act is effected. The third group asserts that God makes every act of the created will only because He preserves every created will, which alone properly effects its act. The fourth, because He makes every object moving the created will and all the other things required.

The fifth, because He permits, when He could freely impede. The sixth, however, imagine that God properly effects every good act of the created will, but absolutely no evil act.

For the first opinion, the Philosopher can be adduced in Book 8 of the Physics, chapters 32 and 33, and Book 4 of On the Heavens, chapter 25, where he shows that the generator or maker of a heavy or light thing moves it locally because it bestows upon it the forms by which it is so moved. To the same end seem to work the authorities of Anselm from On the Fall of the Devil, chapter 20, and On Concord, chapter 6, cited above. Moreover, since God is omnipotent, He can create a nature that suffices by itself for moving, and similarly for acting. Suppose, then, that He does so, and all the arguments made for the contrary part cease; therefore they do not formally conclude. And on this argument, although it is quite irrational, many obstinately rely.

For the second opinion, the same arguments apply by way of similarity.

For the third, because the preserver is in some way a cause of the preserved, and whatever is the cause of a cause is a cause of the effect.

For the fourth, because the object moving the will in some way effects its act, as seems evident from Book 3 of On the Soul, the chapter on the mover. Likewise, Augustine, on Psalm 104—"He turned their heart to hate His people and to deal craftily with His servants"—inquires thus: "Are we to understand or believe that God turns the hearts of men to commit sins? Or is it not a sin, or a small sin, to hate the people of God and to deal craftily with His servants? Who would say this? Is God then the author of such grave sins, when He must not be believed to be the author of even the slightest sin? Who is wise and will understand these things?"

And for a response he adds: "For this is that wonderful goodness of God, by which He makes good use even of evil ones, whether angels or men. For they were not good before they hated His people, but malicious and impious—the sort who would easily envy their prosperous neighbors. Therefore, in that He multiplied His people, by this beneficence He turned the evil to envy; for envy is hatred of another's prosperity. So therefore He turned their heart so that through envy they hated His people and dealt craftily with His servants. Not therefore by making their heart evil, but by doing good to His people, He turned their heart—spontaneously evil—to hatred. For He did not pervert a right heart, but turned a heart spontaneously perverted to hatred of the people, so that He might make good use of that evil—not by making them evil, but by lavishing on His people good things at which the evil could very easily feel envy. How He used their hatred both for the exercise of His people and for the glory of His name—which is useful to us—the following verses teach, which are recounted in His praise."

For the fifth opinion, there seems to support it the Philosopher's statement in Book 8 of the Physics and Book 4 of On the Heavens, cited earlier, that the one who removes an impediment or prohibition moves the elements locally. And Augustine says in the Enchiridion, chapter 75: "Nothing happens unless the Almighty wills it to happen, either by permitting it to happen or by Himself doing it."

Wherefore also Hugh, in On the Sacraments, Book 1, Part 4, chapter 2—and the Lombard recounts it in Book 1 of the Sentences, distinction 45—shows that the will of God is taken in five or six senses in Scripture: namely, for His good pleasure or disposition, for His command, prohibition, counsel, permission, and operation.

For the sixth opinion, there seems to support it Genesis 1: "God saw all that He had made, and it was very good." And the authority of Augustine cited above for the third opinion seems to prove the same. The same author, in the Hypomnesticon, chapter 29: "Man could make the fall by himself, because he willed it, but he could not similarly rise by himself—that is, by his own will." And quite many other authorities of his and of many others attest that man can sin and fall by himself, but cannot merit or rise without God. Whence Hosea 13: "Your destruction is from you, O Israel; your help is only from Me."

But all and each of these responses are evidently refuted by all the arguments and the very many authorities already set forth in the preceding chapter, which can in no way admit such a gloss. Likewise, the authorities of Scripture and the Doctors are to be taken according to their common meaning, as the forty-fifth chapter of the first book teaches; but many authorities of Scripture and the Doctors cited in the preceding chapter clearly convey that God properly effects the act of the created will. The corollaries of the third and fourth chapters of the first book also correct or destroy all of these petty responses.

Likewise, if God effected the act of the created will not properly but only metaphorically in some of the aforesaid modes, why would holy David, Solomon, Jeremiah, Isaiah, Paul, and Christ—and the other authors of the Old and New Testaments—and also the blessed Cyprian, Augustine, Gregory, Prosper, Anselm, Bernard, Thomas, and John, and the other ancient and modern writers, have labored so greatly and vainly in so studiously proving that God effects and works in us both to will and to work, when this would have been doubtful or unknown to no philosopher or Catholic? For it would have sufficed to say that God created or made all things, and that whenever anything acts, He does not impede it from acting but permits it.

Likewise, no philosopher or Catholic Doctor, but only Pelagius or a Pelagian, expounds, glosses, or understands the aforementioned philosophical or theological texts in any of the aforesaid modes; and therefore every such response is suspect.

Whence Pelagius, after he said that man can will and work by the powers of free will through himself—as the preceding chapter of this book discloses—raised against himself the apostolic authority and responded, as Augustine recounts in Book 1 Against Pelagius and Celestine, On the Grace of Christ and On Original Sin, chapter 9, in this manner: "And how," he says, "will that saying of the Apostle stand: 'For it is God who works in us both to will and to accomplish'?" Then, to resolve this objection, as it were, which he saw was vehemently contrary to his doctrine, he continued and added: "He works in us to will what is good, to will what is holy, when He kindles us—who are devoted to earthly desires and, after the manner of dumb animals, love only present things—by the greatness of future glory and the promise of rewards; when by the revelation of wisdom He rouses the stunned will to the desire of God; when He persuades us to all that is good." Many other similar petty responses of Pelagius are also recounted in the thirty-ninth chapter of the first book.

CHAPTER XXII. HE SPECIFICALLY CORRECTS THE FIRST OF THESE.

Likewise, specifically against the first group: no thing made by God can exist by itself, nor can it preserve another thing in being without Him, as the second chapter of the first book showed. Therefore neither can it act or produce another thing into being, as the preceding chapter argued.

Likewise, the corollaries of the third and fourth chapters of the first book, with the arguments and authorities proving them, specifically refute these people.

Likewise, then God would not have knowledge of present things nor even of future things, nor would all things be governed by His providence; many things would happen by chance and by fortune; nor would there be any way taken from motion effective for proving a common first mover. For a secondary cause could move while the first cause was totally at rest—with many other impossibilities and absurdities, as the preceding chapter more fully makes clear.

Likewise, then a man could from himself alone open the door of his heart to the one who knocks—contrary to chapter 38 of the first book.

Likewise, this is against the authorities of Anselm in On the Fall of the Devil, chapter 20, and On Concord, chapters 6 and 7, where he shows that God effects every act of the created will in a threefold way, as the preceding chapter cited.

Moreover, by a similar reasoning, God would be said to be—and would be—the maker and author of sin, contrary to the Doctors. Whence also Augustine, in On the Spirit and the Letter, chapter 29, says thus: "Surely we believe by the will; the question is whence it is in us. If by nature, why not in all, since God is the same Creator of all? If by the gift of God, then again why not in all, since He wills all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth? Let us therefore say the first and see whether it satisfies this question: that free will, naturally attributed by the Creator to the rational soul, is that middle power which can either be directed toward faith or inclined toward unbelief. And therefore neither can the will by which one believes God be said to be one that was not received, since it arises, when God calls, from free will, which he naturally received when he was created."

And in chapter 31: "If, however, it is answered that one must beware lest anyone think sin is to be attributed to God, which is committed through free will—if, in what is said, 'What do you have that you did not receive?', the will by which we believe is therefore attributed to a gift of God because it arises from free will, which we received when we were created—let him attend and see that this will is not to be attributed to the divine gift only because it comes from free will, which is naturally born with us, but also because God acts by the persuasions of things seen, so that we may will and believe, whether externally through angelic exhortations, or internally, where no one has in his power what comes into his mind, but to consent or dissent belongs to one's own will. In these ways, therefore, when God acts with the rational soul so that it believes—for it cannot believe anything by free will if there is no persuasion or calling to which it may believe—surely God works even the willing to believe in man, and in all things His mercy goes before us."

And lest perhaps it trouble anyone that he says consenting or dissenting belongs to one's own will, as if it were only of one's own will and not of God—let everyone beware, I beseech, let him beware; because this was the error of Pelagius, as is evident from chapters 37 and 38 of the first book; which Augustine strives to uproot throughout the entire book On the Predestination of the Saints.

Whence also in chapter 4, speaking of the authority of the Apostle from On the Spirit and the Letter mentioned above—namely, "What do you have that you did not receive?"—he says thus: "By which preeminent testimony I too was struck and convicted, when I was erring similarly, thinking that the faith by which we believe in God is not a gift of God, but is in us from ourselves, and that through it we obtain the gifts of God." And he takes "faith" there not for the habit but for the act. He adds: "For I did not think that faith was preceded by the grace of God, except in that we could not believe unless the proclamation of truth preceded us. But that once the Gospel was preached to us, our consenting was our own affair, I used to think. Which error of mine certain of my works sufficiently indicate, among which is the one you mentioned in your books, where there is an exposition of certain propositions from the Epistle to the Romans."

"Finally, when I was reviewing all my works—of which work I had already completed two books—when in the first volume I came to reviewing this book, I spoke about it thus." And this is in Book 1 of the Retractations, chapter 23.

"Likewise, what I said in my disputation—'What did God choose in the one not yet born, namely Jacob?'—I led the reasoning to this point, to say: 'Therefore God did not choose anyone's works in foreknowledge, works that He Himself would give, but faith'—namely, the act. Whence he adds: 'So that the one whom He foreknew would believe in Him, He chose, to whom He would give the Holy Spirit, so that by working good, he might also attain eternal life.' Accordingly, what I said immediately afterward—'For the same Apostle says, "The same God who works all things in all"; nowhere is it said, "God who believes all things in all"'—and then I added: 'For what we believe is ours; but what we work well is His, who gives the Holy Spirit to believers.' Certainly I would not have said this if I had already known that faith itself is found among the gifts of God, which are given in the same Spirit. Both, therefore, are ours on account of the free exercise of the will, and yet both are given through the spirit of faith and charity. For not charity alone, but as it is written, 'charity with faith is from God.'"

"And what I said a little later—'It is ours to believe and to will'—behold, he speaks of the act of faith—'It is ours,' he says, 'to believe and to will; but it is His to give believers the ability to work well through the Holy Spirit, through whom charity is poured into our hearts.' This is indeed true, but by the same rule, both are His, because He prepares the will; and both are ours, because nothing happens unless we will it."

Behold: Augustine in these two passages retracts what he said on the Epistle to the Romans—that believing and willing are ours. And it is certain that he was by no means of so unsound a mind at that time—namely, after his conversion, when he expounded those propositions of the aforementioned epistle—as to believe that believing and willing are ours in the way that the rational soul, the intellect, and the will are ours, that is, from ourselves and not from God. Rather, as both the series of that exposition and of the retraction attest, he then believed that the intellect and will are in us from God creating, but that the acts of those powers are in us from ourselves alone performing them, without God further co-acting; and this is what he later retracted.

His later view, therefore, is that God properly co-effects with man the acts of those powers, and not only improperly—namely, because He made those powers.

Whence also further in the same work, in On the Predestination of the Saints, chapter 6, treating that saying of the Apostle—"Who then distinguishes you? And what do you have that you did not receive?"—he says thus: "To suspect natural gifts of God in this intention of the Apostle, or the whole perfect nature, such as was given in the first condition, or whatever remains of a vitiated nature—this is, I think, exceedingly absurd. For are men distinguished from men by these gifts, which are common to all men? For here he first said, 'Who then distinguishes you?' and then added, 'What do you have that you did not receive?' For someone inflated against another could say: 'My faith distinguishes me, my justice, or something else of the kind.' Meeting such thoughts, the good Doctor says: 'What do you have that you did not receive?' From whom, unless from Him who distinguishes you from another, to whom He did not give what He gave to you?"

"And so does anyone dare to say: 'I have faith from myself; I did not therefore receive it'? Surely he contradicts the most manifest truth. Not because believing or not believing is not in the exercise of the human will, but because in the elect the will is prepared by God. Therefore to faith itself, which is in the will, pertains: 'Who then distinguishes you? And what do you have that you did not receive?'"

And there follows chapter 7: "Many hear the word of truth; but some believe and others contradict. The former therefore wish to believe, the latter do not wish to. But since in some the will is prepared and in others it is not prepared by the Lord, we must discern what comes from His mercy and what from His judgment."

Likewise, Augustine, on Psalm 118—"Your hands have made me," etc.—distinguishing a twofold mode of man's being made by God, says thus: "Was this said according to Adam, from whom, since all men have been propagated, what man—when Adam was made—cannot say that he too was made, by reason of origin and seed? Or could it also rightly be said, 'Your hands have made me and formed me,' because each person is not without the work of God even from parents—He Himself creating, they generating—since if the operative power of God were withdrawn from things, they would perish, and nothing at all would be born, whether from the elements of the world, from parents, or from seeds, if God did not work them?"

Likewise, then someone with intact natural endowments could from himself alone, or through another teacher without God properly co-acting, acquire for himself moral and intellectual virtues—the opposite of which Augustine teaches in Book 4 Against Julian in many chapters, and Bede against the same Julian in chapter 13, as was cited above.

Whence also Bede says quite expressly against this response: "What Julian therefore says—that many of the philosophers had patience, chastity, modesty, and other virtues from the good of nature—it is established that whatever philosophers did not know Christ, the power of God and the wisdom of God, could have had no true virtue and no true wisdom at all. But insofar as they had even some taste of any wisdom or image of virtue, they received all of this from above—not only by the gift of the first condition, but also by His daily grace, who, not abandoning even the one who abandons His creature, bestows His gifts on men as He Himself judges: great gifts on the great, and small on the small."

To that which is adduced for this opinion, it can easily be responded that that is one good and true mode of speaking, among those with whom it has been customary; but through this it is not proved that the elemental forms do not move the elements. For it is certain that when the generator has been destroyed and the impediment removed, the elements are moved; therefore by some mover, and not by the generator or the one removing the impediment, because neither of those exists and consequently does nothing, causes nothing, and moves nothing; therefore it is the form that moves.

In every motion, moreover, the mover and the moved are together, as is taught in Book 7 of the Physics, chapters 8 and following, and Book 2 of On the Soul, chapter 74; but neither of the aforesaid is together with the element moved, because it does not exist at all.

Also, the elements are then moved naturally; therefore by a nature. For nature, as is taught in Book 2 of the Physics, chapter 3, is a principle and cause of moving and resting in that in which it primarily is; and this is twofold—namely, matter and form—as is shown there consequently. But prime matter is not a principle of local motion, as is unknown to no philosopher; therefore the form of the element naturally moves it.

By the same reasoning also, the element rests in its natural place by the same thing by which it is moved to that place; but it rests there by its own form. Moreover, a greater quantity of earth or fire descends or ascends more swiftly; therefore not only from something extrinsic, but from its own intrinsic form. Mixed bodies also are moved according to the motion of the dominant element; therefore that dominant element has motion naturally from itself.

The same Philosopher also, in Book 4 of the Physics, treating of the void, chapters 71 and following, most plainly assumes that the elements are moved naturally from themselves; and similarly in Book 1 of On the Heavens, where he refutes the infinite. Averroes also, on the aforementioned passages, holds the same; and on Book 3 of On the Heavens, chapter 28, and on Book 4, chapter 22, he shows at length that in simple bodies, the mover and the moved are not actually distinguished from one another, and that their forms are their movers.

And he glosses there the argument of the Philosopher in Book 7 of the Physics proving that nothing moves itself, but that everything that is moved is moved by another, in this way: "Aristotle," he says, "did not intend by this argument that he wrote in Book 7 of the Physics except to declare that nothing moves itself in such a way that the mover is the same as the moved and in the same respect. And therefore he posited that whatever rests through the rest of another, it is necessary that its motion be only from another—that is, it is necessary that the mover in it differ in essence and definition from the moved, although it does not differ in subject." And a similar argument of the Philosopher in Book 8 of the Physics and Book 4 of On the Heavens, mentioned above, can be glossed similarly.

Likewise, if the elements did not have from themselves, but only from the generator or the one removing the impediment, local motion, then by the same reasoning they would have no other action either. Therefore fire would not from itself burn or shine when both the generator and the impediment-remover had been destroyed or removed far away.

It also seems a strange mode of speaking, and too far from the truth, to say that the lamp or candle of my companion, which lit my lamp or candle illuminating my study, illuminates my study along with its room—when perhaps they are too far apart and enclosed by stone walls, or perhaps his lamp has been extinguished.

By a similar reasoning also, whatever I now write at Oxford, my father would be writing at Chichester, because he begot me who am writing—indeed, my grandfather and great-grandfather and the rest of my ancestors, and our first parents themselves, would now be doing all the deeds that are ours.

That saying of Anselm, however, does not disturb the matter, because he does not say that God effects our acts only in that manner, but in that manner metaphorically and in another manner properly, as the preceding chapter recounted.

To the argument, it must be said that although God is omnipotent, He can nevertheless do nothing that includes a contradiction. But just as it includes a contradiction for any nature to exist without God preserving it in being by Himself, properly, actually, and specifically, as the second chapter of the first book taught, so equally or even more does it include a contradiction for any nature to act or move without God by Himself, properly, actually, and specifically co-acting and similarly co-moving, as the third and fourth chapters of the first book more fully showed.

And thus Saint Thomas responds in On the Power of God, question 20, where it is asked whether God works in every operation of nature, to a similar argument for the negative part, brought in the fifth place: "Whenever," says the one arguing, "God institutes some nature, by that very fact He gives it all those things that belong to the nature of that nature. Similarly, by the very fact that He makes a man, He gives him a rational soul. But it belongs to the nature of a power that it be a principle of acting, since power is the ultimate of a potency that is a principle of acting on another insofar as it is other, as is said in Book 5 of the Metaphysics. Therefore, by the very fact that He implanted natural powers in things, He gave them the ability to complete their operations; therefore it is not necessary that He further operate in natural things."

And in the seventh place he adduces another argument similar to this fifth one, to the first of which he responds thus: "To the fifth, it must be said that it belongs to the nature of an inferior power to be in some way a principle of operation in its own order—that is, to act as an instrument of a superior power. Whence, if the superior power is excluded, the inferior power has no operation."

And consequently to the other he responds thus: "To the seventh, it must be said that the natural power, which was bestowed on natural things in their institution, inheres in them as a kind of form, having a fixed and firm being in nature. But what is done by God in a natural thing by which it actually acts is like an intention alone, having a certain incomplete being, in the manner in which colors exist in the air and the power of the art in the instrument of the craftsman. Just as therefore sharpness could be given to an axe by art, as a form permanently remaining in it, but the force of the art could not be given to it as a form permanently remaining in it unless it had an intellect—so a proper power could be conferred upon a natural thing as a form permanently remaining in it, but not the force by which it acts toward being, as an instrument of the first cause, unless it were given to it to be a universal principle of being. Nor again could it be conferred upon a natural power to move itself, or to preserve itself in being. Whence, just as it is clear that it could not be conferred upon the instrument of the craftsman that it should operate without the motion of the art, so it could not be conferred upon a natural thing that it should operate without the divine operation."

CHAPTER XXIII. HE CORRECTS THE SECOND.

The second opinion can be refuted by the same arguments as the first. Likewise, by way of similarity: the bare will cannot perform a bare act without God properly co-acting, as was taught in the preceding chapter; therefore neither can the virtuous will perform a virtuous act without God properly co-acting.

Likewise, by chapter 40 of the first book, grace or charity properly effects the good act; and by chapter 42 of the same, not without God properly co-acting.

Likewise, by chapter 46 of the first book, God properly effects every increase of every meritorious act; therefore also totally every such act.

Likewise, by the fifth and eighth chapters of this second book, no one having charity or grace, however great, can by himself resist any temptation, nor persevere finally or for a time without a special help from God—that is, without the divine will efficaciously doing this, as the sixth and thirteenth chapters of this second book prove. Therefore neither can he elicit a virtuous act.

Likewise, if God makes the habit of charity, and you alone make the act, since the act is better than the habit—as the twenty-second chapter of the first book and the eighteenth of this second book more fully cited—you make something better in yourself, and likewise make yourself better, than God Himself does, which is against what was cited in chapter 37 of the first book.

And by this same argument Augustine proves the same conclusion about the angels in Book 12 of The City of God, chapter 9, where, having proved that there was no efficient cause of the evil will of the evil angels, he adds thus: "If we say there is no efficient cause even of the good will, we must beware lest the good will of the good angels be believed to be not made, but coeternal with God. Since, therefore, they themselves were made, how can their good will be said not to have been made? Moreover, since it was made, was it made together with them, or did they first exist without it? But if together with them, there is no doubt it was made by Him by whom they too were made. But if the good angels first existed without a good will and made it in themselves without God cooperating—then they were made better by themselves than by Him, than whom no one makes anything better. Perish the thought! Or if they could not make themselves better than He had made them—since no one makes anything better than He—then surely they could not have a good will, by which they would be better, except with the working help of the Creator."

"And when their good will accomplished this—that they were turned not toward themselves, who were less, but toward Him who supremely is, and adhering to Him existed more, and by participating in Him lived wisely and blessedly—what else is shown but that any good will would have been needy and would have remained in mere desire, had not He who had made a good nature out of nothing, capable of receiving Him, made it better by filling it from Himself—first by making it, then by arousing it to greater eagerness?"

"We must therefore confess, with due praise to the Creator, that it pertains not only to holy men but can also be said of the holy angels that the charity poured into them is through the Holy Spirit who has been given to them."

Likewise, since final beatitude is an act, as the eighteenth chapter of this second book more fully cited, and if every blessed person alone without God totally effects his act, then every blessed person by himself bestows beatitude on himself and alone beatifies himself. Who does not see with what absurdity this is said? For then the rational creature would have the best and greatest good from itself alone; yet James says: "Every best gift and every perfect gift is from above, descending from the Father of lights." And so by reason of the benefit received, one would have to love oneself more than God, for one receives a greater benefit from oneself alone.

It would also seem exceedingly unreasonable that I should do all my works finally for God's sake, and yet He would not be my ultimate end, nor would He bestow upon me my ultimate end; nor would it befit His clement justice that I should do and suffer so many and such great things finally for His sake, and yet He would not render to me the final reward, which is blessedness and everlasting happiness, but I myself would render it to myself—when in Revelation, the last chapter, He Himself says: "Behold, I come quickly, and My reward is with Me, to render to each one according to his works." And many similar passages occur very frequently in Scripture.

If also the rational creature alone made its beatific act, this would be freely, by the freedom of contradiction. For it would not be necessitated by God—because this would be through His will, which by the tenth chapter of the first book cannot be inefficacious, and so God would effect that act, the opposite of which is supposed—nor would it be necessitated by any created thing, as by the third chapter of this second book. If, therefore, it thus freely makes its beatific act, by the same reasoning it thus freely continues it; and therefore it could likewise freely abandon it altogether, or for a time. Therefore it would not be finally confirmed; and therefore not blessed—for the most illustrious portion of final beatitude is the security of eternally being so.

Whence the blessed Augustine, in Book 13 of On the Trinity, chapter 7, speaking of final beatitude, says thus: "Whatever will be loved will be present, and what is not present will not be desired. Everything that will be there will be good, and the highest good, God Himself, will be present to those who love Him; and what is altogether most blessed, it will be certain that it will always be so."

And the same author shows the same in Book 11 of The City of God, chapter 13. And otherwise, the one finally blessed could thus freely become and be miserable—contrary to chapter 15 of this second book and contrary to all Catholic Doctors.

Indeed, according to this view, it seems that God could not confer beatitude immediately, nor thus beatify anyone. For the essence of beatitude is for the beatific act to be made immediately by the blessed person alone; therefore, if it were made immediately by God, it would no longer be beatific. This was condemned and excommunicated by Stephen, Bishop of Paris, in these words: "That happiness cannot be immediately bestowed by God."

Likewise, if someone who has received charity or grace could by himself produce a good act, he could also always distinguish himself from another who received similar grace but does not produce a similar act; and such a person could, by perseverantly willing well, distinguish himself from another having similar grace but about to fall—just as the predestined are distinguished from the reprobate. This is against the Apostle's saying in 1 Corinthians 4: "Who then distinguishes you?"—as if to say: not you, but God—as is evident from the expositions of Augustine cited above in the preceding chapter and chapter 25 of the first book.

Likewise, if by grace freely given by God, man alone effects a good act without God properly co-acting, since by chapter 43 of the first book justifying grace naturally precedes contrition, an adult sinner under the current law, once such grace has been infused in him, could freely be contrite; therefore also not be contrite; and therefore be justified without any contrition and without any act of the will—which is against the many Catholic testimonies cited in that same chapter.

Likewise, the Apostle says in Ephesians 2: "By grace you have been saved through faith, and this not of yourselves; for it is the gift of God—not of works, so that no one may boast. For we are His handiwork, created in good works, which God prepared so that we might walk in them." Therefore God properly effects our good works. For by the tenth chapter of the first book, the preparation of the divine will cannot be inefficacious.

And if anyone pretends, as before, that the Apostle says we are God's handiwork created in good works because God made us and created in us good habits, from which we alone do good works—how then would the Apostle by this teaching of his, and similar teaching in many of his epistles, cut off from men the occasion of being proud, the material for presuming on their own powers, and for glorying in their own merits as though their own, and recall them to humility and confidence in God alone, and to glorying in Him alone, from the recognition of their own impotence and of divine assistance? For he would do this most ineffectively if this were the case—which, however, the Apostle principally intended, as his words sufficiently suggest: "so that no one may boast," he says.

And 1 Corinthians 1: "Let no flesh glory in His sight. For from Him you are in Christ Jesus, so that he who glories may glory in the Lord." And further, in chapter 4 of the same: "What do you have that you did not receive? And if you received it, why do you boast as though you had not received it?" And 2 Corinthians 3: "Such confidence we have through Christ toward God—not that we are sufficient to think anything from ourselves, as from ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God." And Romans 9: "It is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy." And Philippians 2: "Work out your salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God who works in you both to will and to accomplish—or alternatively, to work—according to His good pleasure." Where the Gloss says: "With fear"—that is, with humility, not proudly. "And therefore He is to be feared, because it is not you, but God who works," etc. "According to His good pleasure"—namely, His, not for your merits.

And there follows—and this is from Augustine's On the Good of Perseverance, chapter 37: "We therefore will, but God works in us to will; and we work, but God works in us to work. This is beneficial for us both to believe and to say, because it is pious and true, so that the confession may be humble and everything given to God."

The same author, in On the Predestination of the Saints, chapter 6: "The Apostle said this testimony to repress man's inflation: 'What do you have that you did not receive?' He did not allow any of the faithful to say: 'I have what I did not receive.' The entire haughtiness of this response is utterly repressed by these apostolic words."

And he sets forth two false responses or expositions of this saying. The first is that this is said because man does not have perfect faith from himself, but does have its beginning by which he first believes in Christ. But he evacuates this response through the same saying: "And here it is answered, 'What do you have that you did not receive?'" etc. Therefore by the same reasoning, the response given above can be evacuated through the same saying.

The second is that this can be said about faith because man received his natural endowments from God, from which he believes. But against those who respond thus he adds: "That argument is understood to avail nothing for what they intend, if we consider why the Apostle said this. For he was acting so that no one might glory in man, since dissensions had arisen among the Corinthian Christians, so that one said, 'I am of Paul,' another, 'I am of Apollos,' another, 'I am of Cephas.' And from there it came to his saying: 'God chose the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, and the weak to confound the strong, and the ignoble and contemptible, and the things that are not, as though they were, to bring to nothing the things that are, so that no flesh should glory before Him.' Here certainly, against human pride, the intention of the Apostle is clear enough: that no one should glory in man, and therefore not in himself either."

"Finally, when he had said, 'Let no flesh glory before Him,' to show in what man ought to glory, he immediately added: 'But from Him you are in Christ Jesus,' etc., 'so that, as it is written, he who glories may glory in the Lord.'"

And there follows: "Do you not see that the Apostle does nothing other than humble man and exalt God alone, since among those who are planted and watered he says that neither the planter nor the waterer is anything, but God who gives the increase—although even the planting and watering themselves he attributes not to them but to the Lord, saying, 'To each as the Lord has given. I planted, Apollos watered.' Hence, then, persisting in the same intention, he came to say, 'Therefore let no one glory in man.'"

The same author, in On Grace and Free Will, chapter 21: "When the Apostle had said, 'By grace you have been saved through faith, and this not of yourselves; it is the gift of God; not of works, lest anyone be exalted,' he saw that men might think this was said as though works were not necessary for believers, but faith alone sufficed for them; and again, that men might be exalted about good works, as though they sufficed by themselves to do them. He therefore immediately added: 'For we are His handiwork, created in Christ Jesus in good works, which God prepared so that we might walk in them.' What is this? Having commended the grace of God, he had said, 'By grace you have been saved through faith.' And giving the reason why he said this, he says, 'For we are His handiwork, created in Christ Jesus in good works.' How then 'not of works'? 'Lest anyone be exalted.' But hear and understand: 'not of works' is said not as though they were your own works, arising from yourself, but as works in which God has fashioned you—that is, formed and created you—not by that creation by which we were made men, but by that of which the one who was already a man was speaking: 'Create in me a clean heart, O God.' Or: we are fashioned by God—that is, formed and created—in good works, which not we but God prepared, so that we might walk in them."

The same author, in the Enchiridion, chapter 78, giving the reason why the Apostle says in Romans 9, "It is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy," says thus: "For looking most closely and most salutarily at the whole face of the holy Scriptures, one finds the admonition that 'he who glories should glory in the Lord.'" And he shows the same at length in On the Good of Perseverance in many chapters toward the end. Whence also in chapter 69 he says that this ought to be preached, so that the one who obediently hears it "may glory not in man, and therefore not in himself, but in the Lord."

The same author, in On the Spirit and the Letter, chapter 32: "But because it can be said that those works—namely, miraculous ones—are divine, but that living justly pertains to our own works, I undertook to show that this too is a divine work; and this I have done in this book, perhaps more verbosely than is enough. But against the enemies of the grace of God, I seem to myself to have said too little; and nothing is so great a pleasure to say as that in which the Scripture of God most abundantly supports me, and where the aim is that 'he who glories may glory in the Lord,' and that in all things we may give thanks to the Lord our God with hearts lifted up—from whom, the Father of lights, comes every best gift and every perfect gift."

"For if this is the work of God because it is not done by us, or because with Him giving we do it, then neither is that work of God—that a mountain be moved into the sea—since the Lord said it could be done through the faith of men, and He attributed it to their own work, saying: 'If you have faith like a grain of mustard seed, you will say to this mountain, Be taken up and cast into the sea, and it will be done; and nothing will be impossible for you.' Certainly He said 'for you,' not 'for Me or the Father.' And yet no man does this except with God giving and working."

And further at the end: "There is therefore something in the hidden and profound judgments of God, such that even of the just, 'every mouth may be stopped' in His praise and not opened except for the praise of God, according to the Apostle's word in Romans 3: 'Let every mouth be stopped, and let the whole world be subject to God.' And further: 'Where is your boasting? It is excluded.'"

This same view is held by the most glorious Doctor and Martyr Cyprian, in his Epistle 13, entitled "To Quirinus, On the Discipline of the Christian Religion," chapter 4, whose title is: "In nothing should we glory, since nothing is ours." He proves this throughout that entire chapter, and through that frequently quoted saying of the Apostle, "What do you have that you did not receive?" etc., and through many other passages of Scripture. And further in the same, chapter 10, he proves clearly that we must trust in the Lord alone, and glory in Him.

From these things it manifestly appears that the intention of the Apostle in his aforementioned teaching was this: that not only natural goods or good habits of whatever kind are properly made and given by God, but also all good acts whatsoever—so that all material for being exalted about any of the foregoing might be utterly uprooted from the hearts of men, and they might be recalled to true humility in all things. He would, however, do this less effectively if the habits alone were from God and the acts from oneself alone, since by the twenty-second chapter of the first book, acts are better than habits.

Likewise, if a son who is a knight, having received from his father his natural endowments, his rank, and his arms, fought valiantly, and so perhaps was puffed up in pride—how would his pride be uprooted and humility planted in him if someone said to him: "Let no knight glory in the sight of his father; for from him he is in knighthood, so that he who glories may glory in his father." And: "What do you have that you did not receive? And if you received it, why do you boast as though you had not received it?"—and the rest of what was mentioned above?

For he could reasonably respond by saying: "Why should I not glory in my knighthood? I received indeed from my father my natural endowments, because no one begets himself; I received my rank, because no one is permitted to confer such rank upon himself; I received my arms, because I was not born armed, nor am I a maker of arms. But the proper use of these things, which surpasses all, I did not receive from another but have from myself. The valiant military deeds I did not receive from another but have from myself. The frequent victories spread abroad by celebrated fame I did not receive from another but have from myself. For such things, therefore, I shall rightly glory in myself, and in no other." And so for any soldier of Jesus Christ.

CHAPTER XXIV. HE CORRECTS THE THIRD.

The third foolishness among the foregoing can be refuted similarly to the preceding ones.

Likewise, if the created will cannot subsist by itself, but necessarily needs God to preserve it in being, much less can its act subsist by itself or by the created will alone, but it necessarily needs divine preservation—and therefore much more so divine co-production or co-action. For if the created will cannot without God preserve in being its act already produced into being—which is less—then neither can it without Him produce any act into being—which is more—as has been argued many times.

The argument adduced above for this opinion only proves that God is therefore said in a certain way to metaphorically effect the act of the created will because He preserves the created will; but it does not prove that He does not also properly effect every such act.

CHAPTER XXV. HE CORRECTS THE FOURTH.

Furthermore, the fourth false writing set forth above can be destroyed like the preceding ones. This was also specifically the gloss of Pelagius, as is evident from the twenty-first chapter of this second book.

Likewise, then God would equally make or give to the one working well regarding any object and to the one not working, or working badly, regarding a similar object similarly presented to him; and therefore they would be equally bound to give thanks to the Lord their God, as can be gathered from the thirty-first chapter of the first book. And so Lucifer and Michael, Cain and Abel, Linus and Peter, any imperfect person and any perfect one, would be equally bound to the love of God and to the giving of thanks—which no grateful Catholic, or scarcely even an ungrateful heretic, would presume to affirm.

The first argument intending to show this is resolved like the preceding one for the immediately preceding opinion.

The authority of Augustine also sufficiently attests that presenting an object to the will is one mode of causing or making the act of the will; but he does not say that God effects the act of the created will in no other way. Nor does he speak there universally about every act of the created will, but only about the evil act; and he denies that the Lord is the author of that, which can be understood with respect to the deformity of the act, not with respect to its substance—as Augustine himself holds in On Grace and Free Will, chapter 48, where among many testimonies of sacred Scripture, he also shows through this same passage of the Psalm that God works in the hearts of men every act of the will, both good and evil, by His hidden but just judgment, as the twentieth chapter of this second book more fully cited.

Isaiah, Anselm, and the Parisian article, along with the passages cited in chapters 20, 19, and 18 of this second book, and chapters 26 and 34 of the first book, hold the same.

Otherwise, however, this can be fittingly understood as meaning that God did not turn the heart of the Egyptians to hate His people in the sense that He compelled them so that they would be excusable, or so that He would be accusable of sin—along with the other interpretations of similar authorities more fully set forth in chapter 34 of the first book.

Whence also Augustine, in On Grace and Free Will, chapter 48, having shown through this passage of the Psalm, together with other passages of Scripture, that God works in the hearts of men to incline their wills wherever He wishes, whether to good things or to evil things—because this seems less evident regarding evil things, and from this it might perhaps seem to someone that God would be unjust—shows that God does this according to the merits of men, by His judgment that is sometimes open, sometimes hidden, but always just: "For it must be fixed and immovable in your heart," he says, "that there is no injustice with God. And so, when you read in the books of truth that men are seduced by God, or that their hearts are blunted or hardened, do not doubt that evil merits preceded, so that they justly suffered these things, lest you fall into that Proverb of Solomon: 'The foolishness of a man perverts his ways, but he blames God in his heart.'"

CHAPTER XXVI. HE CORRECTS THE FIFTH.

The fifth subterfuge will easily have every avenue blocked by the same things that blocked the other evasions.

Likewise, this is fully obstructed by the thirty-third chapter of the first book.

Likewise, every evil act of the will according to the substance of the act and not according to its deformity is made by God, as is sufficiently taught in chapter 26 of the first book and chapters 18, 19, and 20 of this second book. This cannot be understood of merely permissive making, because in that sense He would effect the deformity of anything whatsoever. It is therefore understood of making that is properly and really effective.

Likewise, to say that God delivers men over to sins—which are also punishments of preceding sins—only permissively was the error of Julian, the heretical Pelagian, which Augustine extensively refutes in Book 5 Against Julian, as chapter 34 of the first book more fully cited.

To those authorities that seem to prove this opinion, it can be briefly responded that they do well prove that permission is one metaphorical and improper mode of making; but they do not prove that God only thus improperly, and in no way properly, effects the free acts of the will. Why God is said to make certain voluntary acts and to permit others—even though He properly makes them all—chapters 33 and 34 of the first book sufficiently indicate.

Regarding that manifold divine will that Hugh and the Lombard posit, it must be known that one simple thing sometimes admits a multiplicity of names, as is evident regarding God, as the third chapter of the first book cited from Aristotle in On the World.

The multiplicity of names is twofold: either many names signify the same thing, or the same name signifies many things. The first of these is again twofold: either many names signifying the same thing signify it in every same way and for the same reason—and then they are synonyms, about which Averroes says on Book 1 of the Physics, chapter 1, that "synonymous names are not used in demonstrative teaching"; and the same author holds this on Book 12 of the Metaphysics, chapter 39. Or they signify it in a different way and for a different reason; and then according to Averroes in that same chapter 39, they can be called "dispositional names," because they stand to each other as disposition and disposed, or "attributive names," as the theologians prefer—of which sort are power, clemency, wisdom, and similar things said of God.

If, however, the same name signifies many things, this can be in two ways. Either it does so equally primarily through diverse modes and reasons not related to any one thing in common—and such are equivocals, as is expressly evident through the Philosopher at the beginning of the Categories, and Book 4 of the Metaphysics, chapter 2, suggests the same—and no science considers such things, as is evident there through Averroes. Or it does so not equally primarily, nor by modes or reasons entirely diverse, but primarily and principally signifies some one thing in one way and by one principal and primary reason; and consequently, denominatively and metaphorically, it signifies other things by other modes and reasons—not entirely other, however, but related to the first. And such are called "denominatives," as is evident through the Philosopher at the beginning of the Categories, or "principal and derived," as is evident through the same author in the Topics and Averroes on Book 12 of the Metaphysics, chapter 39; and they are midway between equivocal and univocal, as Averroes says on Book 4 of the Metaphysics, chapter 2. Of this sort are the names "being," "one," and similar names that are used in the sciences, as is evident from Book 4 of the Metaphysics, chapter 2, and Book 5 of the Metaphysics, almost throughout.

Whence also Averroes, on Book 5 of the Metaphysics, chapter 1, says thus: "He intends in this treatise to distinguish the significations of names to be considered in this science; and all these names are said according to a relation to one thing, but with diverse modes. And therefore the exposition of these names is a part of this science in itself. Wherefore also the entire content of this fifth book is this: to know in how many ways each name is said, and why, and what is the primary thing to which the rest are referred, and what is the order of those others to one another and to the first"—as its entire series makes clear.

The Philosopher also, in Book 4 of the Metaphysics, chapter 2, says thus: "Being is said in many ways, but in relation to one thing and to some one nature, and not equivocally; but as everything healthy relates to health—this in preservation, that in action, another as a sign of health, this because it is susceptible of it." Where Averroes says that "all these are attributed to the same thing as to the same end." And further, distinguishing three modes by which things are attributed to the same thing, he says thus: "He intended by this to declare that things that are attributed to the same end—as healthy or salubrious things to health—or to the same agent—as medicinal or medical things to medicine—or to the same subject—as the nine categories to substance." "He omits, however, a fourth mode, by which things are attributed to the same form. For according to each genus of cause, such metaphorical attribution is made. He likewise omitted the converses of these four modes mentioned; because not only are effects attributed to their causes, but causes to effects. Nor is such metaphorical transference made only according to some genus of cause properly so called, but also according to any connection, proximity, comparison, or similarity whatsoever—not, however, according to contrariety or irrelevance in any way. For every metaphorical transference makes one thing known through another, or indicates some pertinence or similarity between them."

Whence the Philosopher, in Book 6 of the Topics, says thus: "A metaphor makes what is signified known in a certain way through similarity. For all who make metaphorical transfers do so according to some similarity."

Wherefore also that florid Cicero, at the end of his New Rhetoric, treating of rhetorical colors, expresses certain other modes of such attributions and suggests many more. For such attribution or metaphorical transference is a certain rhetorical color, which he places as the thirty-third there, and which he also calls "denomination," which he defines thus: "Denomination is that which draws speech from things near and neighboring, by which a thing may be understood that is not called by its own name."

He says this is sometimes constructed from the inventor to the thing invented, sometimes the reverse—as if someone called the Tarpeian Rock "the Capitol" or the Capitol "Tarpeian," or wine "Liber," or grain "Ceres," or the reverse. Sometimes, however, a master using some instrument is denominated from it—indeed, even named by the name of the instrument—as the Macedonians were called "sarissas," just as the English might be called "bows and arrows." Sometimes, however, the deed is named from the doer, as if one called war "Mars"; sometimes the reverse, as if one called a lazy art "lazy" because it makes people lazy, and cold "sluggish" because it makes people sluggish. Sometimes such denomination is made of the contained from the container, sometimes the reverse.

This color is one grammatical figure contained under trope, which is called metonymia or methomia by Bede, Donatus, Isidore, Hugh, and the other grammarians—meaning "denomination" or "trans-nomination"—and they express these aforementioned and certain other modes of it. Cicero, however, leaves the remaining divisions of such denominations to the custom of poets, orators, and everyday speech—and rightly so, because every science, language, and country delights in its own proper modes, tropes, figures, colors, and schemes in such expressions.

I pursued these things a little more broadly than the subject required, because sacred Scripture is most copiously sprinkled with such figures, and without knowing them it cannot be understood. For these clarify its obscure meaning, unfold what is implicit, make certain what is doubtful, and open up what is closed—as no one who knows the figures of grammar and the colors of rhetoric, and considers them, is permitted to be ignorant, just as Augustine in his book on Locutions and in Book 4 of On Christian Doctrine, Bede, Cassiodorus, and the other fathers in their various works have more fully taught.

Whence also almost all the distinctions of names of sacred Scripture that Maurice, Nicholas, and others make are not distinctions of pure equivocal into their equivocated senses, but rather of denominatives into their denominated senses, or of metaphorical transfers into the things to which they are transferred. Wherefore all these distinctions are reduced to the second mode of equivocation, about which the Philosopher says in Book 1 of the Sophistical Refutations: "Another mode is metaphorically or from metaphorical transference, when we are accustomed to speak thus."

The perfect knowledge of these distinctions is to know in how many ways each name is said, what its primary signification is, what is the reason for the metaphorical transference to other things, and what is the order of the other things in that order to one another and to the first—just as was said above about the distinctions of names in Book 5 of Aristotle's Metaphysics.

Applying these things, therefore, to the matter at hand, I say that the divine will—like the angelic and the human—is taken primarily and principally for the instrument of willing, or for the volitional power. Second, it is taken for the habit of this will, of which sort is charity, because it likewise is in a certain way an instrument of willing and a certain volitional power, in that together with the will it co-effects its act, as chapter 40 of the first book teaches. Third, for the proper and intrinsic act of the will taken in the first sense—namely, for the volition itself—because it is effected by it. These three wills are really distinguished in creatures; but in God they are one and the same in reality—His most simple essence, God Himself.

In the fourth place, the divine will is taken for His extrinsic operation, because it is made by the three prior senses, or by the first through the two following. Whence the prophet, Psalm 110: "Great are the works of the Lord, sought out according to all His wills." For although there is only one will in the Lord, he says "according to all His wills"—that is, according to all the effects of that will. Just as God Himself, according to the Philosopher in On the World, chapter 12, though He is one, has many names, being named from all the effects that He Himself brings about—and this both in the abstract and in the concrete. For He is called not only "thunderbolt-hurling," "rain-giving," "thunder-making," and the like, but also "the motion of the unwearying fire," "the root of the sea," "sun," and "moon," as the third chapter of the first book more fully recounted. So also "tongue," both in sacred Scripture and in common speech, is taken for the speech formed by the tongue; so also "hand" is taken for writing. And Augustine gives these examples for the same conclusion in Book 3 of On Free Will, chapter 30, and Book 14 Against Faustus, chapter 2; and he holds the same in the Questions of Orosius, chapter 18, expounding 1 Corinthians 15—"Flesh and blood shall not possess the kingdom of God"—that is, the works of flesh and blood. And on Psalm 50—"Behold, in iniquities I was conceived"—and further, "Deliver me from blood-guilt"—he holds the same. For all these are attributed to the same agent, as Averroes said above.

Fifth, the divine will is taken for its sign. For a sign and the thing signified often correspond. Thus, according to the Philosopher cited above, urine is called "healthy" or "salubrious" because it is a sign. And thus "name" and "word" in sacred Scripture are frequently taken for the thing signified by the name and the word. Whence Psalm 39: "Blessed is the man whose hope is the name of the Lord." And Proverbs 18: "The name of the Lord is a very strong tower." And Jeremiah 29: "I will raise up over you My good word, to bring you back to this place." And Amos 3: "The Lord will not do a word unless He has revealed His secret to His servants the prophets"—"a word," he says, that is, the thing signified by the word. And Matthew 7: "He who hears My words and does them will be likened to a wise man." And further, chapter 24: "But My words shall not pass away."

And thus Christ is called a serpent and a ram, because He was signified by the serpent of Moses (Numbers 21) and by the ram of Abraham (Genesis 22). And thus Daniel 7 says: "These four great beasts are four kingdoms that shall arise from the earth." And further in the same, chapter 8: "The ram that you saw having horns is the king of the Medes and Persians; and the he-goat is the king of the Greeks; and the great horn that was between his eyes is the first king," etc. These things, however, were said to be those things because they were signs of them.

Of signs, however, as the Philosopher says in Book 2 of the Prior Analytics, second to last chapter, one kind is an eikos and another a tekmērion. A tekmērion, as he says, is a demonstrative and necessary sign, which therefore produces knowledge; for it is called a tekmērion as if "held before the finger." Such a demonstrative sign of the divine will is twofold: namely, His exterior operation—that is, His will in the fourth sense mentioned above. For it necessarily follows that if God works something externally, He wills this, as chapters 8 and 9 of the first book teach. God's permission also is such a demonstrative sign of His will, as chapter 33 of the first book proves. This sign, however, is not as evident as the first. For the first is evident to all and in all free works, not only of God but of every creature freely operating. The second, however, is not evident to all, for the rational creature also permits many things to be done that it does not properly will or make. But God does not act thus, on account of the actuality of His will, which is infinitely infinite, as chapter 22 of the first book taught, and because no creature can do anything without Him co-acting—and therefore willing—as chapters 2, 3, 4, 8, and 9 of the first book sufficiently show.

Permission, therefore, taken generally, is superior to willing and properly acting. For whoever voluntarily does anything permits it, but not conversely universally—because not in creatures, although in God, for the aforementioned reasons.

An eikos, however, as he says, is a probable sign: "For what they know to have happened or not happened, or to be or not be, in most cases, this is an eikos." Such a probable sign of the will, both uncreated and created, is threefold: namely, a command, a prohibition, and a counsel. Each of these is a sign of volition in whoever does it; not, however, demonstrative, but probable, and therefore it can deceive, and sometimes does.

Whence God Himself commanded Abraham to sacrifice his son; yet He did not will this, as is evident from Genesis 22 and from the tenth chapter of the first book. Nor can anyone pretend that He first willed this and later did not will it, because of the immutability of the divine will proved in chapter 23 of the first book.

He also forbade the two blind men who had been given sight that anyone should know (Matthew 9), and the cleansed leper that he should tell anyone (Mark 1); yet He did not will this, because they, doing the contrary, were not sinning, as is evident there through all Catholic expositors, who say that the aforesaid healed persons, in spreading abroad the miracles, did not sin because they understood that God had not forbidden them because He did not want His works proclaimed, but in order to give men an example of declining human praise.

He also counseled the young man to sell what he had and follow Him (Matthew 19); yet He did not will this, since the young man did not do it, as is evident through Matthew together with the tenth chapter of the first book.

That these three signs are probable yet fallible with respect to the created will, no one is unaware.

There is also a fourth species of this sign—namely, of the eikos—with respect to the created will: namely, permission. For it is a probable sign that a rational creature, knowing someone to be doing something and permitting it when it could freely impede, wills this; yet it often deceives.

From these things, therefore, it is sufficiently clear that permission and the other signs of the divine will, although they are improperly called God's will in the aforementioned way, are nevertheless not His uncreated and intrinsic will, but are created signs of it. And this is the view of Hugh and the Lombard in the places mentioned above.

These created signs do not properly and sufficiently co-effect the act of the created will, just as they do not of any other creature's act; but besides them, God Himself is necessarily required, who through Himself properly co-effects that act, as chapters 3 and 4 of the first book and chapter 20 of this second book taught—and this through His own volition, intrinsic and uncreated, as is evident from chapters 8 and 9 of the first book and from the corollary of chapter 20 of this second book.

Wherefore everywhere, when I say simply "the will of God," I understand His actual volition—namely, the proper and intrinsic act of the will itself taken in the first sense.

CHAPTER XXVII. HE CORRECTS THE SIXTH.

The last quibble among the foregoing will be easily destroyed by the same things by which the other preceding ones were destroyed.

Likewise, every evil act according to the substance of the act is essentially something, just as a good act is. For the act of fornication is no less something than the licit conjugal act, as the arguments that speak for themselves and walk upon the ground evidently show.

Whence also Anselm, in On the Fall of the Devil, chapter 8, showing the same conclusion, says thus: "Finally, is a good will any more something than an evil will? For a will that wishes to give mercifully is no more something than one that wishes to seize violently."

Every evil act, therefore, according to the substance of the act, is equally effected as a good one; and therefore it equally has an efficient cause, which necessarily requires the co-efficiency of God. God therefore truly and properly effects every evil act according to the substance or pure essence of the act, as chapters 20 and 25 of this second book more fully urged.

Likewise, William of Auxerre, commenting on Book 2 of the Sentences, asks whether an evil action is made by God working and cooperating, and recounts three opinions. The first says that every evil action is only from man or from the Devil. The second holds that every evil action is from God in the sense that God alone gives the power to perform it. The third holds that every evil action, insofar as it is an action, is good and from God—which, having refuted the others, he himself holds, as the twentieth chapter of this second book more fully cited.

The authority of Genesis cited to the contrary does not mean that all things that God had made were very good morally. For how would inanimate or irrational things be morally good, since they are not capable of moral goodness? Yet all things that God had made were naturally very good. So too are evil acts good with respect to their substance or essence, which God makes—not with respect to their wickedness, which by chapter 26 of the first book is nothing, and therefore is not properly made either by man or by God, but only improperly by man.

To the first authority of Augustine, chapter 25 of this second book responds. To the second and similar ones, the response can be given through the same and through chapter 34 of the first book.

CHAPTER XXVIII. HE OBJECTS AGAINST THE TWENTIETH CHAPTER AND RESPONDS.

It is also objected against the twentieth chapter in this manner. If God is necessarily required for properly performing every act of the created will, since God's acting is not in the power of the created will, no act would be in its power; therefore none would be free, nor would the will be the mistress of its own free acts—even though the Philosopher says in Book 3 of the Ethics, chapter 13, that we are masters of our actions from beginning to end, and holds a similar view in many other places.

And the same thing seems to be attested by the Lord Himself in the first institution of human beings. For in Genesis 4 we read that the Lord said to Cain: "If you do well, will you not be accepted? But if you do badly, will not your sin be at the door? But its desire shall be subject to you, and you shall have dominion over it."

Likewise, if man could not by his own proper powers alone accomplish his acts, it would seem unreasonable to command or even to forbid him anything, because it would not be in his free power to do or to avoid such things.

Whence in Ecclesiasticus 15 it is written: "God from the beginning made man and left him in the hand of his own counsel. He added commandments and precepts: if you wish to keep the commandments, they will preserve you, and make faith that is pleasing forever. He has set before you water and fire; stretch out your hand to whichever you wish. Before man are life and death, good and evil; whichever pleases him shall be given to him."

Likewise, if God made man's evil act, He would unjustly punish for it, because if God makes it, He makes it by the divine will, which man cannot resist, as the tenth chapter of the first book teaches.

Likewise, if God by His will makes the evil act, He wills and loves that act; indeed, He wills it by a will of good pleasure. For that is His essential and intrinsic will, through which He makes whatever He makes externally, as is evident from the foregoing. Therefore evil pleases God; therefore He does not justly punish for it.

And in 3 Kings 11 it is written: "Solomon did what was not pleasing before the Lord"—namely, by loving foreign women and worshipping idols. And Romans 8: "Those who are in the flesh cannot please God." And Hebrews 11: "Without faith it is impossible to please God."

Likewise, there are many volitions, both good and evil, that are never fulfilled. If, therefore, God by willing caused these, He would make and will a volition to come about regarding some object of volition that He would not will to be fulfilled—indeed, that He would will not to be fulfilled—as can easily be seen through chapters 10 and 23 together with chapter 22 of the first book. And so He would will and make it in vain.

Likewise, Augustine, in On the Spirit and the Letter, chapter 27: "The Apostle says, 'There is no power except from God.' Nowhere, however, do we read in the holy Scriptures, 'There is no will except from God'; and rightly it was not written, because it is not true."

The same author, in Book 5 of The City of God, chapter 8: "From God are all powers, although from Him are not the wills of all."

The same, in the Sentences of Prosper, proposition 288: "The desire to harm can come from each person's own depraved mind; but there is no power except from God."

The same, in Book 12 of the Confessions, chapter 11: "You said to me, Lord, with a strong voice in my inner ear, that You made all natures and substances that are not what You are, and yet exist; and this alone is not from You: that which does not exist; and the motion of the will from You who are, toward what is less—because such a motion is an offense and a sin."

And he proves the same extensively in Book 2 of On Free Will, the last chapter.

The same, in Book 5 Against Julian, chapter 6: "God does not make evil wills, but uses them as He wishes, since He cannot will anything unjust."

The same, in the Hypomnesticon, chapter 33: "We confess that free will belongs to all men, having indeed the judgment of reason—not through which it becomes fit to begin or certainly to complete without God what pertains to God, but only in the works of the present life, both good and evil. Good, I say, those that arise from the good of nature—that is, to will to labor in a field, to will to eat, to will to drink, to will to have a friend, to will to have clothing, to will to build a house, to take a wife, to raise cattle, to learn the art of various good things, or whatever good pertains to the present life—all of which do not subsist without the governance of God, but indeed are from Him and through Him, and have begun to be. Evil, however—that is, to will to worship an idol, to blaspheme, and similar things."

Likewise, John Damascene, in his Sentences, chapter 39, headed "On what is in our power, that is, on free will," having enumerated six kinds of efficient causes, says thus: "To which of these, then, do we subject those things that are done by men, if indeed man is not the cause and principle of his acts? For it is not right to ascribe to God sometimes base and unjust acts; nor to necessity, for they do not belong to things that are always the same. Nor to fortune, for fortune rules not contingent but necessary things. Nor to nature, for the works of nature are animals and plants. Nor to chance occurrence, for the acts of men are not rare and unexpected. Nor to accident, for accidents are said to be symptoms of inanimate or irrational things. It remains, therefore, that the man himself who acts and does is the principle of his own operations and free in will."

And to the same conclusion he immediately adds another argument: "Furthermore," he says, "if man is the principle of no act, he possesses a counselor superfluously. For to what purpose would he use counsel, being master of no act? For all counsel is for the sake of action. But to declare superfluous what is the best and most precious of the things in man would be utterly absurd."

And in the following chapter, headed "On those things that are not in our power": "Of those things that are not in our power," he says, "some have their principles—namely, causes—from those things that are in our power; that is, the rewards of our acts, both in the present and in the future age. But all the rest depend on the divine will." Therefore, according to him, our acts do not depend on the divine will; therefore neither on God.

Likewise, Ammonius, on the last chapter of Book 1 of On Interpretation: "The gods use us as self-moving beings—that is, as movable from ourselves. And in this way they govern the things that concern us, and distribute all things to us according to our own worthiness."

To the first of these, let this brief response suffice for the present. In the administration of temporal and spiritual things, we see that with respect to the same thing there are many powers and many dominions ordered according to higher and lower. Whence also in certain regions, the mayors or prefects of cities are called "powers," who nevertheless are subject in all things to a superior power—namely, the imperial power. Just as also a certain middle order of angels, who are similarly called "Powers," is subject to the divine power; and another middle order called "Dominations" is subject to the divine dominion.

Wherefore also that centurion rightly said: "I am a man set under authority, having soldiers under me" (Matthew 8). Therefore no one should doubt that although the created will has power and dominion over its act, yet through this the superior power and lord—namely, God Himself—is not excluded from a superior power, dominion, and efficiency with respect to the same act.

Whence also Saint Thomas, in his book On the Power of God, question 20, where it is asked whether God works in every operation of nature, argues in this manner: "The will is the mistress of its act. But this would not be the case if it could not act unless God worked in it, since our will is not mistress of the divine operation. Therefore God does not work in our will when it operates."

And he responds in this manner: "It must be said that the will is said to have dominion over its act not by exclusion of the first cause; but the first cause does not act in the will so as to determine it of necessity to one option, as it determines nature; and therefore the determination of the act is left in the power of reason and the will."

With which the Gloss concordantly expounds Genesis 4—"Its desire shall be subject to you, and you shall have dominion over it"—saying thus: "Not over you, because you are of free will; in your power, because you are of free will."

The second argument should move no one who does not wish to adhere to the heretic Pelagius. For as Augustine recounts in On Heresies, chapter 88, and Peter in Book 2 of the Sentences, distinction 28, and Isidore in Book 8 of the Etymologies, chapter 14, and the Decretum, question 24, last chapter, "Certain people"—his heresy was that man could fulfill the commandments of God by the powers of free will alone; which he also strove to establish by this same argument.

Whence also Augustine, in On Grace and Free Will, chapter 35, says: "The Pelagians think they know something great when they say, 'God would not command what He knew could not be done by man.' Who does not know this? But He commands certain things that we cannot do, so that we may know what we ought to ask of Him. For it is faith itself that obtains by praying what the law commands."

"Finally, He who said, 'If you wish, you will keep the commandments,' in the same book of Ecclesiasticus says a little later: 'Who will set a guard over my mouth, and a seal of wisdom upon my lips, lest I fall because of them, and my tongue destroy me?' He had certainly already received the commandment, 'Keep your tongue from evil, and your lips from speaking guile.' Since therefore it is true that he said, 'If you wish, you will keep the commandments,' why does he seek for a guard to be placed over his mouth, like the one who says in the Psalm, 'Set a guard, O Lord, over my mouth'? Is not God's commandment and his own will enough for him, since if he wills he will keep the commandments?"

"How many of God's commandments are there against pride? He knows them; if he wills, he will keep them. Why then does he say a little later, 'Lord, Father and God of my life, do not give me the haughtiness of eyes'? The law had already said to him, 'You shall not covet.' Let him therefore will and do what is commanded, since if he wills he will keep the commandments. Why does he then say, 'Turn away concupiscence from me'? Against lust, how many things has God commanded? Let him do them, because if he wills he will keep the commandments. What is this cry to Him about the appetite of the belly and sexual desire not seizing him?"

"If we said these things to him now, he would most rightly respond to us and say: 'From this prayer of mine, by which I ask these things from God, understand how I said, "If you wish, you will keep the commandments." It is certain that we keep the commandments if we will; but because the will is prepared by the Lord, we must ask of Him that we may will as much as suffices so that by willing we may do. It is certain that we will when we will, but He makes us will the good—He of whom it was said, as I just quoted, that the will is prepared by the Lord; of whom it was said, "By the Lord the steps of a man are directed, and he will want his way"; "God is the one who works in us to will." It is certain that we act when we act, but He makes us act, by providing the most efficacious powers to the will—He who said, "I will cause you to walk in My justifications, and to keep My judgments and do them.'""

The same author teaches the same in On Correction and Grace, chapter 7. Peter also, in Book 2 of the Sentences, distinction 28, recounts and refutes this Pelagian argument.

Julian also, the disciple and follower of Pelagius, in his epistle to Demetrias—of which mention is made in chapter 35 of the first book—suggests a similar argument: "We ascribe iniquity to the Just One," he says, "when we complain that He commanded something impossible."

This argument, as heretical, along with six other heresies, the Venerable Bede recounts from the aforementioned epistle in Against Julian, chapter 12. And further, in chapter 18, he responds thus: "What he says—that the Lord, who is just, did not command anything impossible—is indeed true, if he looks to the help of Him to whom the Catholic voice supplicates, saying, 'Lead me in the path of Your commandments.' But if he trusts in the powers of his own mind, he refutes the truthful sentence of the same Just One, who says, 'Without Me you can do nothing.'"

Likewise, in On the Perfection of Justice, chapter 7, Augustine recounts such an argument of Celestius the Pelagian: "It must be asked whether man has been commanded to be without sin. For either he cannot, and it was not commanded; or because it was commanded, he can. For why would something be commanded that could in no way be done?"

And there follows Augustine's response: "It is replied that it is most wisely commanded to man that he walk with straight steps, so that when he sees he cannot, he may seek medicine—which, for the healing of the inner man's limping from sin, is the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord."

The same author, in On the Predestination of the Saints, chapter 13: "'When it is said,' say the Pelagians, "'If you believe, you will be saved,'" one of these is required, the other is offered. What is required is in the power of men; what is offered is in the power of God.'" He rebukes them by adding: "Why is not both in the power of God—both what is commanded and what is offered? For God is asked to give what He commands. Believers pray that their faith be increased; they pray for unbelievers that faith be given to them. Both in its increases and in its beginnings, therefore, faith is a gift of God."

"For it is said, 'If you believe, you will be saved,' in the same way as it is said, 'If by the Spirit you mortify the deeds of the flesh, you will live.' For here too one of two things is required and the other is offered. 'If by the Spirit,' he says, 'you mortify the deeds of the flesh, you will live.' To mortify the deeds of the flesh by the Spirit is what is required; to live is what is offered. Does it then please us to say that mortifying the deeds of the flesh is not a gift of God, since it is required of us, with the reward of life offered if we do it? Perish the thought that this should please those who are sharers in and defenders of grace! This is the damnable error of the Pelagians, whose mouths the Apostle immediately shuts by adding: 'For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are the sons of God'—lest we believe that we mortify the deeds of the flesh not through God's Spirit but through our own."

"Just as therefore, although it is a gift of God to mortify the deeds of the flesh, it is nevertheless required of us with a reward proposed—so too faith is a gift of God, even though it too, when it is said, 'If you believe, you will be saved,' with the reward of salvation proposed, is required of us."

The same author, in On Holy Virginity, chapter 17: "The voices of pious prayers in the holy Scriptures are witnesses, by which it is shown that those very things that are commanded by God are not done except with Him who commands giving and helping. For they are falsely asked for if we could do them without His grace helping."

The same, in Book 10 of the Confessions, chapter 30, says to the Lord: "Give what You command, and command what You will." "You command continence; and since I knew," he says, "that no one can be continent unless God grants it, and this itself was a matter of wisdom—to know whose gift this was—O my God, attend to me: You command continence; give what You command, and command what You will."

From these authorities of Augustine, it is sufficiently shown that he holds that the commanded act is not from man alone without God, nor from God alone without man, nor partly from man alone and partly from God alone, but wholly and totally from both—as the corollary of chapter 20 of this second book demonstrates.

Whence also the prophet, Psalm 118: "Give me understanding, and I will search out Your law and will keep it with my whole heart." Behold: first he asks for the divine action—"Give me," he says, "understanding"—then he promises his own: "and I will search out," he says, etc. And again, asking for the divine action, he adds: "Lead me in the path of Your commandments; incline my heart to Your testimonies." And further, expressing his own action, he says: "I have inclined my heart to do Your justifications." But to incline the heart is to make it will, as is evident from the process of the Psalmist and from the exposition of Augustine more fully cited in chapter 20 of this second book.

Likewise, Ezekiel 36: "I will cause you," says the Lord, "to walk in My precepts and to keep My judgments and do them." On which Augustine says in On the Predestination of the Saints, chapter 13: "For these things are commanded of us and are shown to be gifts of God, so that it may be understood that we do them and God causes us to do them—as He says most openly through the prophet Ezekiel. For what is more open than when He says, 'I will cause you to do them'? Attend to the passage of Scripture itself, and you will see that God promises He will cause them to do what He commands to be done. He does not pass over their merits, but their evil ones; by which He shows that He renders good for evil, precisely by making them thenceforth have good works, since He Himself causes them to do the divine commandments."

And if you ask why God commands man things that he cannot fulfill by his own powers without God, chapter 35 of the first book responds: that this is to show that man has free will, by which he can freely fulfill God's precepts. For why should man not be commanded what he can freely do whenever he wills? But because he can do nothing by his own powers alone without God, he is therefore taught not to think or presume anything proudly about his own power, but always to implore divine help humbly, to place his hope in God, and to trust in Him in all things.

Why, I ask, does the master of a ship not quite reasonably command his sailor to haul the ship here or there, raise the mast, lift the sail, and similar things—none of which the sailor can do without the master? This whole matter is expressly proved by the authorities more fully cited in chapter 35 of the first book.

Likewise, Augustine, in On Grace and Free Will, chapter 39: "All these commandments of love—that is, of charity—which are so great and such that whatever a man thinks he has done well, if done without charity, is in no way done well—would be given to men in vain if they did not have free will. But because they are given through both the old and the new law, and the law without grace is a letter that kills, but in grace the spirit gives life—whence comes charity in men if not from God Himself? For if not from God but from men, the Pelagians have won; but if from God, we have defeated the Pelagians."

"Let then the judge John sit between us and say to us, 'Beloved, let us love one another.' With these words of John, when those people begin to exalt themselves and say, 'Why is this commanded of us, unless because we have it from ourselves that we love one another?'—immediately there follows that saying of John, confounding them: 'Because love is from God.'"

"Why then was it said, 'Let us love one another, because love is from God,' unless because by the commandment free will was admonished to seek the gift of God? Which indeed it would be admonished to without fruit if it did not first receive something of love, so that it might seek to have added to it the means to fulfill what was commanded. When it is said, 'Let us love one another,' it is the law. When it is said, 'Because love is from God,' it is grace. For wisdom carries on its tongue both law and mercy. Whence it is written in the Psalm, 'For He who gave the law will also give blessing.'"

The same author, in On the Perfection of Justice, chapter 21: "The commandments would not be ordered to be done if our will did nothing there; nor would God be prayed to if our will alone sufficed." And above, chapter 12: "For the law commanded this so that, when man failed in fulfilling these things, he would not exalt himself swollen with pride, but would flee exhausted to grace; as if the law, terrifying him, would lead him to love Christ by the service of a pedagogue."

To that authority of Ecclesiasticus saying that God left man in the hand of his own counsel, it must be said that by this it shows man to be established in the possibility of free will, by which, if he had willed, he would have kept God's commandments.

Whence Augustine, in the Hypomnesticon, chapter 28, having recounted the entire aforementioned authority, adds: "What does 'and He left him in the hand of his own counsel' mean, except that He left him in the possibility of his free will? For by 'hand' power is understood. This is the first grace by which the first man could have stood, if he had willed to keep God's commandments." But not even then could he have willed this without another special help from God, as the same Augustine shows, touching on the same authority, in On Correction and Grace, chapter 47, and in many other places, as chapters 9 and 10 of this second book more fully cited.

The same author, in On the Perfection of Justice, chapter 32, recounts Celestius citing this authority with many similar ones: "The Apostle," he says, "says of a certain person, 'Let him do what he wills.' Likewise, he says to Philemon about Onesimus, 'Whom I wished to keep with me, so that he might minister to me in your stead; but without your counsel I wished to do nothing, so that your good might not be as of necessity but voluntary.' Likewise, in Deuteronomy, 'He has set life and death before your face, good and evil; choose life, that you may live.' Likewise, in Solomon, 'God from the beginning made man and left him in the hand of his own counsel,' etc. Likewise, in Isaiah, 'If you are willing and hear Me, you shall eat the good things of the earth; but if you are not willing and do not hear Me, the sword shall devour you; for the mouth of the Lord has spoken this.'"

These are the words of the wicked Celestius—not the celestial one. And the heavenly Augustine adds: "Here, however much they cover themselves, they are exposed. For they declare that they are arguing against the grace of God and His mercy, which we wish to obtain when we say, 'Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven,' and, 'Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil.' Why do we ask these things with such great groaning in prayer, if it is of man who wills and runs, and not of God who shows mercy?"

"Not because this is done without our will, but because the will does not accomplish what it does unless it is divinely helped. This is the health of faith, which makes us seek so that we may find, ask so that we may receive, knock so that it may be opened to us. He who argues against this closes against himself the door of God's mercy."

"I do not wish to say more about so great a matter, because I entrust it better to the groaning of the faithful than to my own words. But see, I beseech you, what this amounts to: the mercy of God is therefore not necessary for the one who wills and runs—mercy that even goes before him so that he may run—because the Apostle says of a certain person, 'Let him do what he wills.' There, I think, where it follows, 'He does not sin if she marries'—as though it were a great thing to will to marry, where the help of divine mercy is being more carefully discussed!"

"Or does it even profit anything there to will, unless God by the providence by which He governs all things joins male and female? Or because the Apostle wrote to Philemon that his good should not be as of necessity but voluntary—as though good is voluntary in some other way than when God works in us both to will and to work according to His good pleasure?"

"Or because it is written in Deuteronomy, 'He has set life and death before the face of man, good and evil,' and He admonished him to choose life—as though even the admonition itself did not come from mercy, or it would be of any profit to choose life unless God inspired the charity of choosing and granted the thing chosen? Of whom it was said, 'For His anger is but for a moment, and in His will is life.'"

"Or because it was said, 'If you will, the commandments will preserve you'—as though he should not give thanks to God because he willed to keep the commandments, who, abandoned by all the light of truth, could not have willed this?"

"With fire and water set before man, he indeed stretches out his hand to whichever he wills. But He who calls is higher: 'No one can come to Me,' says the Prince of faith, 'unless the Father who sent Me draws him.'"

"And he thought he had found something great for his cause in the prophet Isaiah, because God said, 'If you are willing and hear Me,' etc.—as though the entire law were not full of such conditions, or these commandments were given to the proud for any other reason than that 'the law was given for the sake of transgression'—that is, so that man, proudly trusting in his own powers, might receive the commandments and, failing in them and being made a transgressor, might seek a liberator and savior; and so the law, humbling him through fear, would, like a pedagogue, lead him to faith and grace. Thus 'when infirmities were multiplied, afterward they hastened.'"

And the same point is directly addressed by his entire book called On the Spirit and the Letter.

Likewise, Saint Thomas, in On the Power of God, the aforementioned question 20, argues in this manner: "Ecclesiasticus 15 says that God made man and left him in the hand of his own counsel; but He would not have left him if He were always working in the will. Therefore He does not work in the will when it operates."

And he responds: "It must be said that God is not said to have left man in the hand of his own counsel so as not to work in the will, but because He gave to the will of man dominion over its act, so that it would not be bound to one side of a contradiction—which dominion He did not give to nature, since through its form nature is determined to one thing."

The blessed Prosper also, in Against Cassian, after showing in chapter 16 that the act of the will is made by both God and man, in chapter 17 recounts a similar argument of the Pelagian Cassian through a similar authority for the aforementioned conclusion: "Cassian says that the freedom of the will lies at hand for man. Also the book called the Shepherd most openly teaches this, in which two angels are said to adhere to each of us—namely, a good and an evil one; and it is placed in man's choice to choose which one he will follow. And therefore free will always remains in man, which can either neglect or love the grace of God."

And in chapter 19, responding, he first says that the book of the Shepherd has no authority; and consequently he proves at length through many passages of Scripture that the will is not so free that it can do anything without God, but everything with Him. Whence he adds: "Nor is this freedom so free that it has from itself so much distaste that it neglects the grace of God, or so much delight from itself that it loves it."

And he proves this because of Lydia the seller of purple, of whom it is written that God opened her heart so that she might attend to the things said by Paul; and because according to the Apostle, the charity of God is poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit; and because according to John, love is from God. From which, in conclusion, he adds: "Let human poverty therefore acknowledge this: what is rightly said about any good things is much more rightly said about that without which all good things are of no profit: 'What do you have that you did not receive? And if you received it, why do you boast as though you had not received it?'"

For the third argument, chapter 34 of the first book responds sufficiently. For the fourth, the next chapter responds, together with the same chapter 34 of the first book.

Yet for this one in particular, it can be said thus: when it is argued that the evil act pleases God, this word "well" can determine "pleases God" by reason of the divine pleasure itself—and in this sense, no one doubts that just as the evil act pleases Him, so it supremely well pleases Him, as the first supposition of the first book and the third part of its corollary prove. Or it can be taken by reason of the act that is the object of good pleasure, and this either by reason of the substance of the act or by reason of its wickedness. If by reason of the act, this is again twofold: either "well" naturally, and so it is true; or "well" morally, and so it is false. If by reason of its wickedness, then it is not properly effected by man or by God, because by chapter 26 of the first book, it is in that respect not an effect or anything, but a pure privation only.

The fifth argument was that of the Pelagian Cassian for proving the same conclusion, as the holy Prosper recounts in the book he wrote against him, chapter 15, in these words: "Wishing to prove that religious thoughts and holy plans, conceived by no inspiration of God, can come forth from natural wisdom, Cassian sets forth the words of Solomon: 'And David my father wished to build a house to the name of the Lord God of Israel. And the Lord said to David my father: Because you have thought in your heart to build a house to My name, you have done well in pondering this very thing in your mind; nevertheless, you shall not build the house to My name.'"

"Was this thought and this purpose of King David good and from God, or evil and to be called from man? For if that thought was good and from God, why is the fulfillment denied to the one in whom it was inspired? If, however, it was evil and from man, why is it praised by the Lord? It remains, therefore, that it should be believed to have been both good and from man. In the same way we can judge our own daily thoughts; for neither was it granted to David alone to think something good from himself, nor is it naturally denied to us that we can ever know or think anything good."

To which Prosper responds by adding: "In no way can it be proved by this testimony and argument that pious thoughts are born from free will alone and not from the inspiration of God. For the will of David, which was certainly good, is not to be believed as not being from God just because the Lord did not want the temple to be built by him, but by his son."

"To make this clearer from examples, let us look for cases where God did not will what men, willing by God's will, wished to do. The Lord commanded the Apostles, saying: 'Go, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe all things that I have commanded you.' When the Apostles heard this, without doubt they did not receive mere empty words through bodily sounds only in their outward ears, but by the power of the living word the inextinguishable flame of charity was kindled in their hearts, by which they most ardently wished to preach the Gospel among all nations."

"But when they were forbidden to speak the word in Asia and were prohibited by the Spirit of Jesus from going to Bithynia—did they not have this will from God, that they desired to convert to the faith the hearts of these peoples as well, whom God by His hidden judgment did not then wish to hear the Gospel? Or because the Church daily prays for her enemies—that is, for those who do not yet believe in God—does she not do this by the Spirit of God? Who would say this, unless one who does not do it, or who thinks that faith is not a gift of God?"

"And yet what is asked for all is not obtained for all; nor is there injustice with God, who often does not grant what He gave the grace to ask for."

Augustine teaches the same in Book 22 of The City of God, chapter 2, as chapter 33 of the first book more fully cited.

Nor should this seem marvelous, because the saints, thus willing in a holy manner, even if they lack one object of volition, nevertheless attain another—namely, God Himself, for whose sake they finally and in a holy manner will other things; and because they are likewise not defrauded of their merit and reward; and because perhaps they do not will any such things absolutely at all, but only under this express or tacit condition: "If this be pleasing before God"—as was urged in chapter 25 of the first book. And so it cannot be proved that such volitions are made in vain.

To the sixth argument, chapter 25 of this second book and chapter 34 of the first book respond.

To the authority of the Hypomnesticon, chapter 33, saying that the free will of men cannot accomplish anything pertaining to God without God, but only good and evil works of the present life—it must be said that Augustine only means that free will cannot accomplish any work of its own pertaining to God without God—that is, without the grace of God and His charity poured into our hearts by the Holy Spirit—as chapter 39 of the first book sufficiently shows. It can, however, do works of the present life, though not without His general influence and providence and special efficiency.

Wherefore, having enumerated various works of the present life and having comprehended the rest universally, he adds: "All of which do not subsist without the governance of God; indeed, they are from Him and through Him, and have begun to be."

And that Augustine means in this way in such expressions, let himself be the witness, in On the Perfection of Justice, chapter 32, where, having recounted the argument of Celestius—by which he wished to show that man from himself alone can will, because the Apostle says of a certain person, "Let him do what he wills"—he adds thus: "But see, I beseech you, what this amounts to: the mercy of God is therefore not necessary for the one who wills and runs—mercy that even goes before him so that he may run—because the Apostle says of a certain person, 'Let him do what he wills.' There, I think, where it follows, 'He does not sin if she marries'—as though it were a great thing to will to marry, where the help of divine mercy is being more carefully discussed. Or does it even profit anything there to will, unless God by the providence by which He governs all things joins male and female?"

Whence also Proverbs 19: "House and riches are given by parents, but from the Lord properly comes a prudent wife." The Gloss: "From the Lord properly"—that is, immediately and through Himself—"is given a good wife." Wherefore also sacred Scripture and other authors, where they speak similarly, are to be similarly expounded, as chapter 34 of the first book also expounded certain similar passages.

For the seventh argument, it must be said that if that Damascene so understood inwardly as his words sound outwardly, he is to be denied unhesitatingly and simply by all philosophers and theologians. And in truth, according to the rule of truth of our Master (Matthew 12), "By your words you will be justified, and by your words you will be condemned"—conjecturing his understanding from his words, I believe that as he outwardly expressed, so he mentally understood. Especially because he expresses that understanding so many times, and according to it weaves the entire course chapter by chapter, nor does he put forth any incidental words from which another understanding might reasonably be drawn.

Therefore, when he says that God is not the efficient cause of human acts, I flatly reject this. And to his first argument, saying "For it is not right to ascribe to God sometimes base and unjust acts," chapter 25 of this second book and chapters 34 and 26 of the first book respond.

To his second argument, it must be said that it does not prove that man is master of his free act of will in any other way than he is of his counsel of the intellect. But he is not master of his counsel in such a way that he is not the servant and instrument of a superior Lord—namely, the agent intellect, the Lord our God—as chapters 6 of the first book and 20 of this second book taught.

Whence also the Philosopher, in On Good Fortune, chapter 2, as chapter 6 of the first book more fully cited: "For the one deliberating did not deliberate before he deliberated, but there is a certain principle; nor did the one understanding understand before he understood, and this to infinity. Therefore intellect is not the principle of understanding, nor is deliberation the principle of deliberating. What then?"

And he responds: "Or there is some principle of which there is no other outside it, and this thing, because it is such by its being, can produce such a thing. But what is sought is this: what is the principle of motion in the soul? It is clear: just as in the whole, God. For He moves in a certain way all things that are divine in us. The principle of reason is not reason, but something better. What then will be better than both knowledge and intellect, if not God? For the power of the intellect is His instrument."

He Himself also, according to the prophet, is "terrible in His counsels over the sons of men" (Psalm 65). And Job 12: "In whose hand is the soul of every living thing and the spirit of all the flesh of man. He Himself has counsel and understanding. If He destroys, there is no one who builds; if He shuts up a man, there is no one who opens; if He holds back the waters, all things will dry up; if He sends them forth, they will overturn the earth."

Wherefore also Joseph in Egypt said to his brothers: "It was not by your counsel, but by the will of God that I was sent here." Nor is this surprising; for He Himself is "the spirit of wisdom and understanding, and the spirit of counsel" (Isaiah 11). "All these things one and the same Spirit works, distributing to each as He wills" (1 Corinthians 12). "He Himself therefore will direct counsel" (Ecclesiasticus 39).

This argument therefore does not conclude that man is master of his free act of will in such a way that he is not also the servant and instrument of a superior Lord—as was shown regarding the act of counsel.

And because, according to the Philosopher in Book 1 of the Physics, chapter 22, "when one absurdity is granted, others follow"; and according to the same author in Book 1 of On the Heavens, chapter 31, "He who has transgressed slightly from the truth at the beginning, as he proceeds, departs more than ten thousand times"—transgressing at the beginning from the truth in this one inconvenient principle (namely, that man alone without God effects his acts), and proceeding further, he has been led into many other absurdities, and indeed ones ten thousand times more absurd.

[1] For from this first absurdity follows this second: that all things for which praise and blame follow are done through us alone.

[2] And from that this third: that all things in which persuasion or law is established can thus be done by us—as is evident from his chapter 40. If this is understood without the divine grace helping us, it is the heresy of Pelagius, as is evident above in this same chapter and in chapter 39 of the first book. If, however, it is understood with such grace, that grace effects our praiseworthy acts and the observance of the divine law, as chapter 40 of the first book teaches—and not without God specifically co-acting, as chapter 42 of the same teaches. And it seems that he means without grace, because he makes no mention of it in the entire discussion.

[3] There also follows from this a fourth: that it is in ourselves alone without God to acquire every art—which he concedes in his chapter 40, contrary to what was shown above about the agent intellect in chapter 20 of this second book.

[4] A fifth absurdity, following nonetheless, is this: that our rewards in the present and in the future, and consequently all predestination of the elect, depend on the human will and not on the divine. Whence in his chapter 42 he says: "Of those things that are not in our power, some have their principles and causes from those things that are in our power—that is, the rewards of our acts, in the present and in the future age. But all the rest depend on the divine will." Therefore, according to him, these do not depend on the divine will, but only on the human. And so predestination itself would not be the preparation of grace in the present and of glory in the future; and therefore predestination would be from the works of the predestined, not from God predestining—which is the Pelagian heresy, as is evident throughout chapters 44 and 45 of the first book.

[5] The sixth is that human acts are in no way contained under divine providence; because if God does not make them, then He does not will them, as is evident from the tenth chapter of the first book; and therefore He never willed them, as is evident from the twenty-third chapter of the first book; and therefore He never provided for them, as is evident from the twenty-seventh and following chapters of the first book.

Whence also, relying on this deduction, or on the principle of this deduction, he says in his chapter 42, headed "On Providence": "It is necessary that the maker of those things that are and their provider be the same; for it is neither fitting nor proper that one should be the maker of all things and another their provider. For both would thus be in utter weakness: this one in making, that one in providing."

And further, he shows consequently that all those things that are not in our power, just as they are under divine efficiency, so are they under divine providence; but those that are in our power are not at all. Whence he says: "Our thoughts and actions, and what is to come, are known to Him alone. But I say 'all things' meaning those that are not in our power; for those that are in our power belong not to providence, but to our free will"—which is against chapters 30 and following of the first book.

[6] The seventh follows evidently from this sixth: namely, that God predestined no one's good works, nor anyone to be good in the future. For He predestined nothing that He did not provide for—which is against chapters 44 and 45 of the first book.

Wherefore also in his chapter 44, entitled "On Foreknowledge and Predestination," he says thus: "It must be known that God foreknows all things, but does not predetermine all things. He foreknows even those things that are in our power, but does not predetermine them"—that is, predestine them.

And in his chapter 91: "It must be known that it is the custom of divine Scripture to call God's permission His action—as when the Apostle says in the Epistle to the Romans, 'Does not the potter have power from the same lump of clay to make one vessel for honor and another for dishonor?' For since He Himself made both one and the other—for He alone is the maker of all things—yet He Himself does not construct honorable or dishonorable vessels, but each person's own will does. And this is manifest from what the same Apostle says in the second Epistle to Timothy: 'In a great house there are not only vessels of gold and silver, but also of wood and clay; and some indeed for honor, but others for dishonor. If anyone therefore purges himself from these, he will be a vessel for honor, sanctified and useful to the master, prepared for every good work.' It is clear, however, that the purging is done voluntarily. 'If anyone,' he says, 'purges himself.'"

And he shows the same from the other side regarding evil, and adds: "All these things are to be received not as God acting, but as God permitting."

[7] From this seventh follows this eighth: that any adult sinner whatsoever can rise from sins by himself, without the grace of God and without any help from Him. For if God did not predestine for the sinner the act of repentance by which he rises, then He never willed it, nor does He will it now, since He is immutable, by the twenty-third chapter of the first book. Therefore He does not make it, because He does nothing ad extra purely naturally, but only voluntarily, as the ninth chapter of the first book taught.

And this is plainly attested by his saying just cited. For he says that the Apostle's statement in Romans, asserting that God makes a vessel for honor, is understood only of permission, and that God Himself does not constitute honorable vessels, but each person's own will does. Nor does his reasoning hold. "God Himself," he says, "does not constitute honorable vessels, but each person's own will; because the Apostle says, 'If anyone purges himself, he will be a vessel for honor.' It is clear, however, that the purging is done voluntarily. 'If anyone,' he says, 'purges himself.'"

But it does not follow that because man purges himself, God does not purge him; because man also washes his hands, and water likewise does, and furthermore the one who pours the water. And because, by the corollary of chapter 20 of this second book, both God and man make the entire act of the human will.

Whence, just as the Apostle says here, "If anyone purges himself"—or according to Jerome's translation, "cleanses himself"—so also elsewhere the same Apostle says: "Making purification of sins"—namely, the Son of God, Jesus Christ (Hebrews 1). And further in the same, chapter 9: "The blood of Christ will cleanse our conscience from dead works." And the Lord concerning Christ: "He will sit refining and cleansing silver, and He will purge the sons of Levi" (Malachi 3). And the Son concerning the Father: "Every branch that bears fruit, He will prune it" (John 15). And Acts 15: "Purifying their hearts by faith." And Ezekiel 36: "I will pour clean water upon you, and you will be cleansed from all your defilements, and from all your idols I will cleanse you; and I will give you a new heart, and I will put a new spirit in the midst of you, and I will take away the heart of stone from your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh." And Isaiah 43: "I am, I am He," says the Lord, "who blots out your iniquities for My own sake." And further: "Tell if you have anything, that you may be justified"—as if He were saying: from yourself, nothing.

Which the prophet of the Lord clearly seeing, humbly prayed: "According to the multitude of Your mercies, blot out my iniquity. Wash me yet more from my injustice, and from my sin cleanse me. You will sprinkle me, O Lord, with hyssop, and I shall be cleansed; You will wash me, and I shall be made whiter than snow" (Psalm 50).

But because, as was said above, God does not wash an adult sinner unless the sinner also washes himself—that is, cooperates with the one washing—therefore the same prophet says: "I will wash my bed every night; with my tears I will drench my couch" (Psalm 6). And Isaiah 1: "Wash yourselves, be clean, and remove the evil of your thoughts." And Jeremiah 4: "Wash your heart from wickedness, O Jerusalem, so that you may be saved." And James 4: "Cleanse your hands, you sinners; purify your hearts, you double-minded."

And Augustine, in On the Words of the Apostle, Sermon 15: "He who created you without you does not justify you without you." But this eighth point—how impiously it sounds to pious ears—what Catholic does not know? For it is worse than the Pelagian heresy, which said that grace is not necessary for meriting and that all grace is given according to our merits—with this sole exception: grace by which sins are forgiven to man, as Augustine says in On Grace and Free Will, chapter 16. It is also against chapter 43 of the first book.

[8] And from this eighth follows this ninth: that man can merit the first grace of God, with the entire Pelagian heretical depravity. For if a man who is a sinner, an enemy of God, and ungrateful to God, can purge himself from himself alone, he can from himself alone transfer himself from the anger and enmity of God to His love and friendship, and consequently to the first charity and grace.

Wherefore also in his chapter 43 he says thus: "It must be known that the choice of actions is in our power, but the end of good actions belongs to God's operation, justly cooperating—according to His foreknowledge—with those who choose the good with a just conscience." But this is against chapter 35 of the first book and the others that follow.

[9] From this ninth follows a tenth: that man from himself alone can follow God when He calls. Whence in his chapter 44 he says thus: "It must be known that the power has been given by God to nature, and He Himself is the principle and cause of every good. But it is in our power to follow God calling us to this, or to depart."

And above, chapter 43: "There is a final abandonment when man—while God does all things that pertain to salvation—remains insensible and incurable, and indeed incorrigible, from his own purpose." Where he clearly implies that the exterior calling or knocking of God suffices for man without an interior calling and the opening of the human heart by the right finger of God. But this is against chapter 38 of the first book.

[10] From these things also follows an eleventh, manifestly: namely, that man from himself alone can persevere finally in virtue. Wherefore also in chapter 44 he says: "It must be known that the power has been given by God to nature, and He Himself is the principle and cause of every good. But it is in our power either to remain in virtue or to depart from virtue, which is to become wicked." But this is against chapter 8 of this second book and the others that follow.

[11] The twelfth absurdity following from the foregoing—or rather from which the foregoing follow—is this: that if God performed the voluntary acts of men, He would violate and compel the will. For he did not know how to see how God's action in the volitions of men and the freedom of the will could stand together. And this, as I believe, was the original cause of his entire error.

Whence in his chapter 91—first treating how God makes one vessel for honor and another for dishonor—he shows that this is only permissively, not properly effectively, as was recounted above in the seventh absurdity. And having enumerated other similar passages from Scripture, he adds: "All these things are to be received not as God acting, but as God permitting." And immediately expressing the cause, he says: "Because free will is not subject to violence with respect to the good." Or according to another reading: "Because it belongs to free will to be free from violence with respect to the good."

And in chapter 44 he says: "It must be known that God foreknows all things, but does not predetermine all things. He foreknows even those things that are in our power, but does not predetermine them. For He does not will wickedness to happen, nor does He compel virtue." As if he were saying plainly: "God does not predetermine the virtuous works that are in our power, because then He would compel us to them."

This error, however, was condemned and excommunicated by the Lord Stephen, Bishop of Paris, in this form: "That some things can happen by chance with respect to the first cause, and that it is false that all things are preordained by the first cause, because then they would happen of necessity."

This is likewise the error of Pelagius condemned in the Synod of Palestine, as the book of Prosper Against Cassian sufficiently attests. Whence also at the end, thirteen errors of Pelagius are recounted. This is placed as the eleventh in these words: "And that free will does not exist if it needs the help of God, since each person has it in his own will to do or not to do something."

Not only in this, however, but in many other things, he falls into articles condemned at Paris. One of which is that human acts are not governed by divine providence. Another is that in efficient causes the secondary cause has an action that it does not receive from the first. A third is that in efficient causes, when the first ceases, the secondary does not cease from its operation, provided the secondary operates according to its own nature. A fourth is that all voluntary motions are reduced to the first mover—this is an error unless it is understood as referring to the first mover absolutely, who is uncaused, and understanding it of motion according to its substance, not according to its deformity.

[12] Moreover, beyond all these things there is another absurdity of contradiction and self-repugnance. For in his chapter 39 he says that God does not effect our acts. And in chapter 44 he says: "It must be known that the power has been given by God to nature, and He Himself is the principle and cause of every good, and without His cooperation and help it is impossible for us to will or to do the good."

And in chapter 42 he says that our permanence is to be attributed to God, for it belongs to His containing power. If therefore a substance cannot by itself permanently exist but necessarily needs the divine power to contain and continuously hold it in being, much more so can no accident, and therefore no act of the created will.

Wherefore, just as an act of the will already made cannot permanently exist unless He specifically preserves it, so neither can it come into being unless He also specifically makes it.

Likewise, in his chapter 43 he first proves that all things are governed by divine providence; but then he says that those things that are in our power do not belong to providence but to our free will.

And if you say on his behalf that he does not understand that first universal statement—"All things are governed by divine providence"—universally and absolutely, but only of all natural things, still all the arguments he made to prove that universal statement under that understanding prove it equally well or better of voluntary things, as will easily appear to anyone willing to consider.

In the same chapter also, he first says that providence is the will of God, on account of which all things that are receive their fitting guidance. Second, however, he says that those things that are in our power do not belong to providence but to our free will. If, therefore, our acts do not belong to providence, neither do they belong to the divine will, nor does God will them—because He wills nothing newly, by the twenty-third chapter of the first book.

Third, however, he says: "Of those things that are in our power, the good things He antecedently wills and accepts."

Notwithstanding all these things, if anyone wishes to gloss him, he can say with some color that he does not intend to prove that God in no way effects human acts, but that God does not so effect them that man does not also similarly perform his own acts; nor does God so make human acts that He compels or violates man to act, taking away from him the free use of the will and excluding the praise and blame of man.

Whence also in that chapter 39 he says thus: "To which of these, then, do we subject those things that are done by men, if indeed man is not the cause and principle of his acts?"—etc., as recounted at the beginning.

And in chapter 41: "Every person deliberating, with the choice of things to be done residing in himself, deliberates so that he may choose what has been prejudged by deliberation, and choosing may act. But if this arises of necessity from the rational faculty, free will will not be rational, or, being rational, the master of actions and free in will."

"Whence also irrational things are not free in will; for they are driven more by nature than they drive, and therefore they do not contradict the natural appetite, but they simultaneously desire something and make an impulse toward action. But man, being rational, drives nature more than he is driven; and therefore, desiring, if indeed he wills, he has the power to restrain the appetite, or to follow it. Whence irrational things are neither praised nor blamed, but man is both praised and blamed."

And to this same point can be adduced his other sayings about compulsion and violence in the demonstration of the eleventh absurdity recounted above.

The last authority, however—namely, that of Ammonius—does not present an obstacle but proves the intended conclusion. For he says: "The gods use us as self-moving beings—that is, as movable from ourselves." He therefore holds that God in our motions uses us as His instruments—not, however, as inanimate instruments, or as animate but irrational ones that are moved of necessity, but as rational ones that are moved from themselves—that is, by their own free will.

Wherefore he adds: "And in this way they govern the things that concern us." But they would not do this unless they also governed our free acts; nor could they govern them except through providence; nor can providence exist without the divine will, and that will is necessarily efficacious, as the tenth chapter of the first book teaches. Therefore, according to him, God through His provident will effects every free act of the human will.

CHAPTER XXIX. THAT THE UNCREATED AND CREATED WILLS, IN CO-EFFECTING THE ACT OF THE CREATED WILL, ARE NOT CO-EQUAL NOR COEVAL IN THE NATURAL ORDER.

Now therefore, having established that God and likewise the creature, the uncreated will and also the created will, properly produce every act of the created will, it remains consequently to inquire whether these two agent causes in this common action of theirs are equal in the natural order and coeval, or whether one of them naturally precedes the other—and if so, which one it is.

If, however, they are posited as equal in the order of action and naturally coeval, both are reduced to some other third cause naturally prior to them, by whose agency they act; since this is the case with all things so ordered, as all philosophers unanimously attest—some of whose testimonies the first, second, third, and fourth chapters of the first book, and especially the proof of the third corollary of the second chapter of the first book, more fully recounted. Therefore God as agent has a prior agent cause, by whose power and agency He acts. That cause is necessarily not God, but a creature; therefore in the common action of creature and God, the creature is prior in the order of acting to God. And if this is true of any creature in any action, it seems most of all true of the rational creature in its free action—but the hypothesis posited them as equals.

Many philosophers also teach in many places that every mover is either absolutely first, or is reduced to that first mover in its moving, as is evident from the fourth and third chapters of the first book, and from the twentieth of this second book. If, therefore, God and the rational creature in their common motion are equals in order, neither of them is absolutely the first mover, as is evident from the preceding argument; and because that first mover is unique, nor is it possible for there to be more than one, as the Philosopher teaches in Book 8 of the Physics and Book 12 of the Metaphysics, and other philosophers elsewhere in many places—which is also attested by that well-known saying in Book 5 of the Topics: "What is said by way of superabundance belongs to one alone, as fire's being the lightest." Whence also the prophet: "You alone are the Most High over all the earth" (Psalm 72). Therefore God in such motion has a prior mover, etc., as before.

CHAPTER XXX. THAT IN EVERY COMMON ACTION OF THE UNCREATED AND CREATED WILLS, THE UNCREATED NATURALLY PRECEDES THE CREATED.

Since the first part of the foregoing division has been destroyed, and therefore the second established, we must inquire about the third. For the most proud Pelagius—more proud than Lucifer, who wished to be made equal to God—compelled to confess that God is the co-effector of human acts, claims for himself the priority and superiority over God, and in the common action sets man as naturally prior and superior, God as naturally posterior and subject, and places the human will above the divine will, as was touched upon in the treatise of the first book on grace.

Whence also the humble Augustine, in On the Predestination of the Saints, addressed to Prosper and Hilary, chapter 3, having destroyed by the testimonies of sacred Scripture the error of Pelagius affirming that faith—namely, the act of faith—is in us from ourselves alone without God, adds: "Not wishing therefore to oppose such clear testimonies, and yet wishing to have from himself what he believes, the man, as it were, makes a deal with God, claiming a part of faith for himself and leaving a part for God; and what is more arrogant, he takes the first part for himself and gives the subsequent part to God, and in what he says belongs to both, he makes himself prior and God posterior."

The same author, in On Heresies, chapter 88, says thus: "Finally, when Pelagius was rebuked by the brethren because he attributed nothing to the help of God's grace for fulfilling His commandments, he yielded to their correction to this extent: that he did not place grace before free will, but with faithless cunning subordinated it."

But what philosopher, in the common action or motion of agents or movers that are naturally first and second, would place the naturally second before the naturally first in an inverted natural order? And what philosopher doubts that God is naturally the first of all things acting or moving together with Him, especially since He is commonly called by the philosophers the first cause, the first agent or efficient cause, the first mover or even the prime mover, as the twentieth chapter of this second book recounted from both philosophers and theologians?

For what theologian, or Catholic—indeed, what heretic, schismatic, or pagan—would dare to place himself before his God, to call himself lord in acting and his God a servant, himself superior and God inferior, himself the architect and principal craftsman and God the subordinate servant and, as it were, his instrument, himself the leader and God the one led, his own will the first and the divine will its attendant, his own will the mistress and the divine will the handmaid, his own will commanding and the divine will obeying, his own will drawing and the divine will drawn, his own will in charge and the divine will subject—when this is against the first supposition of the first chapter of the first book, which is admitted by all who worship God in any way, since no one is ignorant that something else is more perfect than this, as the second supposition and the third part of the corollary of the first chapter also teach?

Although no one can reasonably doubt that God precedes the creature, and the divine will precedes the human, naturally in acting in every action common to them, nevertheless, on account of some who might perhaps tremble with fear where there is no fear, I will endeavor to certify this with a few brief arguments.

Now the divine volition by which God wills the created will to produce its act, and the created will's producing its act, are convertible according to the consequence of being: for whenever one of these exists, the other exists too, and conversely, as is evident from the twentieth of this second book and from the tenth of the first book. And that divine volition is the cause of the other, because it is the efficient cause, as is evident from the ninth chapter of the first book and the twentieth of this second book. Therefore it is prior by nature, as the Philosopher says in the Categories, where, having distinguished four modes of priority, he adds this fifth: "Of things that are convertible according to the consequence of being, that which is in any way the cause of the other is rightly said to be prior by nature."

Likewise, otherwise the human will would be freer than the divine: for the human will, like a mistress, would always precede, and the divine, like an attendant, would follow; the human will would freely pre-choose from among all things possible to it to do this or that, and the divine would necessarily consent; the human will would rule in all things, and the divine would be ruled in all things.

Likewise, otherwise the human will would necessitate the divine will to act, which seems to derogate excessively from the freedom of the divine will and to subject it to excessive servitude. For when the human will effects its act, the effecting of that act then exists, and for that time it is necessary that it exist. For according to the Philosopher, in the last chapter of Book 1 of On Interpretation: "What is, when it is, necessarily is." Therefore, by the twentieth of this second book, for that time it is necessary that God, by willing, co-effect that act; and that necessity befalls the divine will from the action of the human will, as from a prior cause.

And similarly it follows that the human will necessitates the divine will to not performing a certain action, and to not willing that action; indeed, it renders it impossible for God and necessarily prohibits Him from performing or willing such an action. For if a man, at the instant when he could perform volition A with respect to object B, performs a volition with respect to the same object, or does absolutely nothing, then for that time A does not exist, and it is necessary that A does not exist for that time—because according to the Philosopher in the same passage: "What is not, when it is not, necessarily is not." Therefore it is necessary that God for that time does not perform A, nor will that A be performed or exist, as is evident from the tenth chapter of the first book; and it is impossible for God for that time to perform A, or to will that A be performed or exist. And all this necessity and impossibility befalls God and the divine will from man and from the human will, as from a prior cause—which His supreme freedom and omnipotent power in no way permit.

Furthermore, to the same point: if the human will thus precedes the divine, the human will could antecedently necessitate the divine will to act, to continue, to cease, to rest, and to resume again as often and whenever it wished. For every man, as often and whenever he wishes, can perform a free act of his own will, continue it, cease, rest, and resume it again. And if man does so, it follows necessarily, by the twentieth of this second book, that God similarly does so; and the antecedent, as a naturally prior cause, is in man's power, from which another necessarily follows as a posterior effect—and so is naturally in man's free power.

If, however, it is said that this does not follow, because God could freely resist and impede any man from any of the aforesaid, the reply is easy: for at the instant when God performs these things with man, He cannot resist or impede, as the preceding arguments have taught. Likewise, this response does not apply except in action and continuation, not in cessation and rest; because God cannot resist or impede a man who is acting from ceasing, or a man who is not acting from resting, because this would be making him continue or newly act. But God cannot do this, because if He did, He would naturally precede the man in so acting. For if man naturally preceded God there, it would rather be said that man makes God continue or newly do something, than the reverse; for the naturally principal and first cause rather makes the instrumental and secondary cause do something, than the reverse.

If, therefore, in such a free action or continuation God naturally precedes man, and the divine will precedes the human, since this can happen in every species of free acts, in every free act according to species the divine will can naturally precede the human; therefore it does so now in fact. For absolutely no reason can be given why, of two free acts of the same species with respect to the same object, performed by the same two causes—and, to say many things briefly, having all causes and circumstances similar in species—in the action of one the divine will naturally precedes, and of the other the human.

Likewise, whatever is natural to any individual of a species is essential to it—namely, its entire essence, or a part of it, or something following essentially and inseparably from its essence, if it is in its most natural disposition. And whatever is thus essential to any individual is thus essential to the species and to every individual of it; otherwise it would not be essential to the species or to any individual, but accidental and extraneous, since it could, while the species and any individual of it remains in its most natural disposition, be now present and now absent.

Whence a threefold conclusion can follow. First, that whatever is natural to any individual of a species is natural to that species. Second, that whatever is natural to any species is natural to each individual of it. Third, that whatever is natural to any individual of a species is natural to each individual of it. Likewise, the species and each individual of it have the same nature; therefore whatever is natural to one of them is natural to each of them.

Wherefore the Philosopher, in Book 2 of On the Heavens, chapters 48 and 49, argues that if one star moves with a motion of rotation or revolution, every star moves thus; and if one does not so move, neither does another. And in chapter 59, from the fact that one star is of spherical shape, he argues the same universally of every star. On which Averroes in that commentary 59 says: "He gave a natural demonstration and said: If therefore one of the stars is found to be spherical, it is necessary that all be spherical. And this is not obvious, but the demonstration is founded on this: that all celestial bodies are of the same nature in species, and that celestial bodies are many individuals in species, and it is necessary that what exists in some individual of the species among essential properties exists in all individuals of the same species; and that shape is among the essential properties in celestial bodies, because they are animate." According to these propositions, therefore, his statement is verified; and it is not, as we said, merely by example.

Therefore, if in any free act it is natural that God precedes man and the divine will precedes the human, this will be natural in every such act.

Furthermore, the aforesaid response does not apply even in acting. For if the human will performing its free act does not necessitate God to co-act with it, because He could freely impede it—then God freely does not impede it from acting; therefore God voluntarily does not impede it; therefore He wills not to impede it. Because by the twenty-second chapter of the first book, God has some act of will regarding the non-impeding; and not a nolition, because by the tenth chapter of the first book, then the non-impeding would not exist—and therefore the impeding would then exist. Therefore He has a volition. Therefore, with the human will acting, God co-acts by willing to co-act, and by willing not to impede.

Either, then, the human will by acting, just as it naturally precedes the divine volition by which God wills to act, likewise precedes that divine volition by which God wills not to impede; or the reverse. If the former, then both of those divine volitions necessarily follow the human will acting. And by the tenth chapter of the first book, if God wills not to impede but to co-act, He necessarily does not impede but co-acts, etc., as was argued at the beginning.

If the reverse, and from that divine volition by which God wills not to impede, the entire action of the human will depends as from a naturally preceding cause, then the divine volition co-causing the free act with the human will precedes it naturally in causing. And if this volition of God, by which He wills not to impede the human will from acting, naturally precedes it in acting, why not also His volition by which He wills to co-act with the same?

Likewise, if the human will naturally precedes the divine in their common action, and the created or human will of Christ necessarily follows His divine will in all things, then the will of any mere man would be freer than the human will of the Lord Jesus Christ—which no reason permits. For how would it be fitting that the servant be freer than the Lord, or the disciple than the Master? For this would be the most corrupt polity, or rather the very corruption of polity, as almost the entire book of Aristotle's Politics makes manifest. Whence also Luke 6: "The disciple is not above his Master." And John 13: "The servant is not greater than his Lord." And earlier in the same: "You call Me Master and Lord, and rightly so; for so I am."

That in Christ there is a twofold will—namely, divine and human—no Catholic doubts; because if Christ had two perfect natures, divine and human, as the Evangelical creeds and all Catholic doctors attest, He had also the perfect operations and consequently the volitions belonging to them. And conversely, if Christ had only one operation and a single will, He consequently had only one nature—which is the Eutychian heresy, as Isidore says in Book 8, Etymologies, chapter 5 or 14. And this is recounted in the Decretum, question 24, last chapter, "Certain people." Wherefore that heresy must consequently posit this heresy as well: that in Christ there is only one will. And therefore Jerome, commenting on Mark 14—"The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak"—says that this is against the Eutychians, who posit only one will in Christ; which also because Macarius the Archbishop conceded this, he was condemned in the metropolitan synod. The Lombard also, in Book 3 of the Sentences, distinction 17, proves at length by very many authorities that in Christ there was a twofold will, divine and human. Moreover, Damascene, in his Sentences, chapter 36, proves the same.

That the human will of Christ necessarily followed His divine will can easily be demonstrated to Catholics. For who would doubt that this is more fitting and natural than the reverse?

Likewise, otherwise Christ could by His human will will the contrary of His divine will; and so Christ could by His divine will will that Christ by His human will go to the East, and by His human will could will that by the same will He go to the West. With these wills in place, He could not go to the West, because then the human will would overcome the divine—contrary to the tenth chapter of the first book. Nor could He go to the East, because then this supposit would go voluntarily, yet unwilling and against its will; and so the same entire supposit would do the same deed voluntarily and involuntarily with respect to the same entire supposit, and freely willing and freely not-willing—and this even according to the same nature. Nor could He stand in the middle, because then the human will would impede the divine, even though the divine is infinitely more powerful; and the divine will itself would be frustrated from its purpose—contrary to the tenth chapter of the first book.

Otherwise also, Christ the Son of God, who is God, could have willed what was undue and consequently could have sinned, which is exceedingly erroneous and absurd. For according to the Philosopher, in Books 1 and 7 of the Metaphysics, acts and operations concern individuals, and belong to individuals or supposits. Christ, however, was supposed only by the divine supposition—namely, of the Word of God—as the Lombard shows by sufficiently authoritative testimonies in Book 3 of the Sentences, distinction 5. If, therefore, Christ had sinned by willing something unjust according to His human will, that entire supposit—namely, the Word of God, and God—would have sinned by so willing unjustly; and so the highest justice would be unjust, the highest rectitude distorted, the highest goodness evil, and the highest blessedness or happiness would be subject to the highest misery—with infinite other absurdities.

Likewise, if God could sin, He could lie; and so the highest truth would be false. Whence the Apostle, in Hebrews 6, speaking of God, says thus: "Wishing more abundantly to show to the heirs of the promise the immutability of His counsel, He interposed an oath, so that by two immutable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie, we might have the strongest consolation." The Gloss says: "By two immutable things"—that is, by the promise and the oath.

Likewise, 2 Timothy 2: "He"—namely, Christ—"remains faithful; He cannot deny Himself." The Gloss: "He who is the truth—which He would do if He did not fulfill His words." But that He cannot deny Himself is praise of the divine will.

And Numbers 23: "God is not like a man, that He should lie." Whence to you who think God can lie, one can rightly say that word of Psalm 49: "You thought wickedly that I would be like you"—because every man is a liar—"therefore I will rebuke you and set the matter before your face."

Whence also the Truth Himself, Jesus Christ, rebuking such liars, leads them to this as to a manifest impossibility: that He would be like them, a liar (John 8).

Likewise, Anselm, in Book 2 of Why God Became Man, chapter 10, treating the passage of John just mentioned and asking whether Christ could have lied, says that He had the power but did not have, nor could He have, the will. Whence he says thus: "Every power follows the will. For when I say 'I can speak' or 'I can walk,' it is understood: 'if I will.' For if the will is not understood, it is not power but necessity. We can therefore say of Christ that He could have lied—if it is understood: if He had willed to. And since He could not lie unwillingly, nor could He will to lie, it can no less be said that He was unable to lie. So He both could and could not lie."

Likewise, if Christ could have lied, He could have preached falsely and likewise taught falsely by word and deed—and whoever concedes this will drench the entire Catholic faith with excessive hesitation and ferment it with excessive suspicion.

Likewise, Augustine, in On the Predestination of the Saints, chapter 19, speaking of Christ, says thus: "Was it to be feared that with advancing age that man would sin by free will, or that for this reason the will in Him was not free—and was it not rather all the more free, the more it could not serve sin?"

The same author, in On Correction and Grace, chapter 36: "Nor was it to be feared that by this inestimable mode, in which human nature was assumed by God the Word into a unity of person, it would sin through the free exercise of the will, since the assumption itself was such that the human nature assumed by God would admit in itself no motion of an evil will."

The same, in the Enchiridion, chapter 45: "This mode by which Christ was born of the Holy Spirit—not as a son—suggests to us the grace of God, by which that man, with no preceding merits, at the very beginning of his nature when he began to exist, was united to the Word in so great a unity of person that the same one was the Son of God who was the Son of Man, and the Son of Man who was the Son of God; and so in the assumption of human nature, grace in a way became natural to that man, by which He could admit no sin."

Likewise, the Lombard, Book 3 of the Sentences, distinction 12, writes thus: "It is not unreasonably asked whether that man could have sinned or could have not been God. For if He could have sinned, He could have been damned; if He could have been damned, He could have not been God. Therefore, if He could have sinned, He could have not been God—because being God and being able to will iniquity cannot coexist. Here a distinction is needed: whether we are speaking of the person or of the nature. If of the person, it is manifest that He could not sin nor could He not be God. If of the nature, we must discuss whether we are speaking of it as united to the Word, or of it as if not united to the Word but nonetheless existing—that is, either of it according as it was united to the Word, or of it according as it could have existed and not been united to the Word. For there is no doubt that that soul, being and being united to the Word, could not sin; and it is without doubt true that the same soul, if it existed and were not united to the Word, could sin."

Likewise, if Christ could have sinned according to His human will, He could also have been deceived and erred according to His human intellect—for it is less to be so deceived than to sin—and so the highest truth would be false, and the highest wisdom would be deceived, with many other exceedingly great incongruities.

Through these foregoing arguments, Damascene proves the same conclusions in his Sentences, chapter 36, saying thus: "It must be known that we speak of will in God, but we do not principally speak of choice. For God does not deliberate—for deliberation belongs to ignorance; about what one knows, no one deliberates. If deliberation belongs to ignorance, then certainly so does choice. God, knowing all things simply, does not deliberate. Nor do we seek deliberation or choice in the divine soul of Christ; for He had no ignorance. And if His nature was one of which future things were unknown, yet according to the hypostasis being united to God the Word, He had knowledge of all things—not by grace, but as was said, on account of the hypostatic union. For He was both God and man; and therefore He had a sentential will. For He had a natural will that is simple, the one that is considered similarly in all human hypostases. But His holy soul did not have a sentential will—that is, a theleton, or object of will—contrary to His divine will, nor anything beyond His divine will."

"For sentential will is divided along with hypostases—except in the holy and simple and uncomposed and indivisible Trinity and Godhead. For there, since the hypostases are not entirely divided and distant, neither is the object of will divided; and there, since the nature is one, the natural will is also one; and since the hypostases are also inseparable, the object of will is also one, and the motion of the three hypostases is one."

"In human beings, however, since the nature is one, the natural will is also one; but since the hypostases are separated and distant from one another—in place, time, disposition toward things, and many other respects—the wills and sentential preferences are different."

"In our Lord Jesus Christ, however, since the natures are different, the natural wills of His divinity and of His humanity—that is, the volitional powers—are also different. But since the hypostasis is one and the one willing is one, the object of will—namely, the gnomicon, that is, the sentential will—is also one, with His human will following—namely, His divine will—and willing what His divine will willed it to will."

Behold: the human will of Christ follows His divine will.

And if you do not wish to believe Damascene and me, believe Christ Himself, who in John 12 says: "I have not spoken of Myself, but the Father who sent Me, He gave Me a commandment what to say and what to speak." And John 5: "I cannot do anything of Myself, but as I hear, I judge, and My judgment is true, because I seek not My own will, but the will of the Father who sent Me." Therefore His human will follows the will of the Father, and consequently necessarily followed the divine will of Christ in all things.

Whence Augustine, on John, Book 2, Homily 45 (or 49 of the whole), says thus: "On account of the one person of the Son, consisting of two substances, divine and human, sometimes He speaks according to that by which He is God, as in 'I and the Father are one'; sometimes according to that by which He is man, as in 'The Father is greater than I'—according to which we have received from Him the saying, and this which I now discuss: 'I cannot do anything of Myself, but as I hear, I judge.'"

Likewise, Augustine, Book 1 on John, Homily 20: "The Son walked upon the sea; the feet of flesh were set upon the waves; the flesh was walking, and the divinity was governing."

Is it not also written of Christ in Isaiah 11: "The Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon Him"? "Upon," it says—not beneath, nor beside. And further, chapter 41: "Who," says the Lord, "stirred up the righteous one from the East?" The Gloss: "That is, Christ." "He called him to follow Him." The Gloss: "Who, if not I?" And further, chapter 49: "Those from the West shall fear the name of the Lord, and those from the rising of the sun His glory, when He comes like a violent river, whom the Spirit of the Lord drives"—which is plainly understood of Christ.

And further, chapter 61: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon Me," etc.—which was without doubt said in the person of Christ, as Christ Himself most clearly attests in Luke 4.

Whence also, earlier in the same Gospel: "He was led into the desert by the Spirit." And Matthew 4: "Jesus was led into the desert by the Spirit." And Mark 1: "The Spirit drove Him into the desert"—all of which the Doctors understand as referring to the Holy Spirit, God.

Whence also Chrysostom, on that passage in Mark 1, says that the Evangelist does not show Him simply going into the desert but being driven, so that you may understand this to happen according to the word of the divine disposition.

Likewise, Anselm, in Book 1 of Why God Became Man, chapter 9, says thus: "What He Himself says—'I have not come to do My own will, but the will of Him who sent Me'—is of the same kind as 'My teaching is not My own.' For what anyone has not from himself but from God, he ought to call not so much his own as God's. No man, however, has from himself the truth he teaches or the just will he has, but from God. Therefore Christ did not come to do His own will but the Father's, because the just will He had was not from His humanity but from His divinity."

And further, chapter 10: "It can rightly be understood that through that pious will by which the Son willed to die for the salvation of the world, the Father gave Him—yet not by compelling—the commandment and the cup of suffering, and did not spare Him but delivered Him up for us, and willed His death; and that the Son Himself was obedient even unto death, and learned obedience from what He suffered. For just as according to His humanity He did not have from Himself the will to live justly, but from the Father, so also that will by which He willed to die in order to accomplish so great a good, He could not have except from the Father of lights, from whom comes every good gift and every perfect gift. And just as the Father is said to draw by giving the will, so it is not incongruously asserted that He impels. For just as the Son says of the Father, 'No one comes to Me unless the Father draws him,' so He could have said, 'unless He impels him.' Likewise He could have said: 'No one runs to death for My name's sake unless the Father impels or draws him.' For since everyone is drawn or impelled by will toward what he unswervingly wills, it is not unfittingly affirmed that God, who gives such a will, draws or impels. In this drawing or impelling no violence or necessity is understood, but the spontaneous and beloved tenacity of a good will that has been received."

Likewise, the prophet says: "You have held my right hand, and in Your will You have led me" (Psalm 72)—which is said in the person of Christ as man to God, as the expositions of the saints teach, and as the Church attests, which at the time of the Lord's Passion—namely, on Palm Sunday—sings this verse in the Mass. The divine will of Christ therefore holds and leads His human will; and so it naturally precedes it.

Likewise, the Apostle, in 1 Corinthians 15, speaking of the Father and His Son Christ according to the form of a servant, says: "He has subjected all things under His feet. But when He says 'All things are subjected to Him,' without doubt it is except Him who subjected all things to Him. But when all things have been subjected to Him, then the Son Himself will be subject to Him who subjected all things to Him." The Gloss: "Except Him"—that is, His divinity—"who, just as He is from no one, so for no reason can He be subject to anyone; for He is the principle of all things. Therefore God is not subject to Him, but rather He is subject to God according to His humanity." And what it says—"He Himself will be subject"—it does not say this as though He were not already subject, but uses a kind of expression by which Scripture often speaks, so that what always is, is said to come about at some time when it begins to be known.

Furthermore, those who place themselves before God wish to be not only freer than Christ according to His human will, but even according to His divine will and the Holy Spirit likewise—because neither the Son of God nor the Holy Spirit can have any willing unless the Father has first in some way caused and given it to them, and to the Holy Spirit, the Father together with the Son. Indeed, they cannot even understand, or exist, or have anything at all, unless it flows to them from their principle and is causally derived. For they have being from their causative principles, and therefore also the power to understand, to will, and all else.

And who in this most blessed Trinity will presume to assert the Trinity of persons to be entirely confused, with absolutely no order among them? Is not the Father said among theologians to be the principle of the Son? Is not the Father said to be the principle of the entire divinity? Is not the Father said to be the first person? Does not the producing cause, the begetter, and the one who gives being in some way precede the caused, the produced, the begotten, and the one to whom being is given? What philosopher or theologian would deny this?

Whence also Hermes, in On the World and the Heavens, chapter 1, teaching that there are three principles of things—namely, cause, reason, and nature—says that from its cause, the caused is preceded; and he understands there by "cause" the absolutely first cause that is completely uncaused—namely, God the Father, who first causes the reason proceeding from Him, namely the Son, and through Him the entire universe of nature. Wherefore also he says: "Reason from cause, and from both, nature." And further: "Reason is a certain power proceeding from the cause, ordering all things from the beginning"—where he takes these three terms—reason, nous, and divine mind—indifferently and interchangeably for the same thing, as was briefly touched upon in the second chapter of the first book. With this view many other philosophical and poetical testimonies are also known to agree, some of which were recounted in the second chapter of the first book.

Is this not also what Paul seems to have meant when he said that God—namely, the Father—"in these last days has spoken to us in His Son, through whom He also made the ages, and who is the brightness of His glory and the figure of His substance," etc. (Hebrews 1)? Wherefore also Chrysostom, in the second homily on that epistle, says thus: "He is said to work through the Son, because it is established that He begot the craftsman. For if the Father is His cause according as He is Father, much more is He the cause of those things that are declared to have been made through the Son."

And he says—as Robert, Bishop of Lincoln, recounts in On Free Will, chapter 9—commenting on "In the beginning was the Word": "The Father precedes the Word, not by nature but by cause; the Father precedes the Word causally; the Son precedes all things that were made through Him naturally." With which Augustine concordantly writes in Eighty-Three Questions, question 16: "God is the cause of all things that are. And because He is the cause of all things, He is also the cause of His own wisdom, and God was never without wisdom; therefore He is the eternal cause of His eternal wisdom, and is not prior in time to His wisdom." And then: "If it is inherent in God to be an eternal Father, and He was not ever not a Father, He was never without the Son." And the same author, in On the Threefold Habitation, or On the Joys of the Just and the Punishments of the Wicked, says that the Father does not precede the Son in time, but in origin.

Whence also Richard, in Book 5 of On the Trinity, chapter 6, having distinguished a threefold procession—namely, one that is only immediate, one that is only mediate, and one that is both mediate and immediate—and further, in chapters 7, 8, and 9 of the same, shows that the first and third processions are in the divine persons, but the second in no way. And he says that the procession of the Son from the Father is only immediate; the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son is both mediate and immediate; and that this procession is naturally prior to the other, and one person is causally—and therefore naturally—prior to another. Whence in chapter 7 he writes thus: "Duality is naturally prior to trinity; for the former can exist without the latter, but the latter never without the former. Naturally, therefore, that procession is also prior which can subsist in a duality of persons, compared to that which cannot exist without a Trinity of persons."

"But in that plurality of persons and true eternity, nothing there precedes, nothing there succeeds, and by that very fact nothing there is prior in time, nothing posterior in time. But what cannot be prior temporally can be prior causally, and by that very fact naturally. For as we said far above, the perfection of one person requires the fellowship of another, and so it happens that one is the cause of the other."

Is it not the case also that Augustine, in Book 15 of On the Trinity, chapter 17, says that the Holy Spirit proceeds principally from the Father? But the sublimity of this matter is inaccessible, and the words of the Doctors quoted above—both on account of their depth and on account of their superficially apparent contrariety—require a pious and religious hearer or reader, humble and prudent.

Does not the Son Himself also say: "What My Father has given Me is greater than all" (John 10)? Which must be understood of the Son according to His divinity, as Augustine attests in Part 1 on John, Sermon 48, and Hilary in Book 7 of On the Trinity, and Pope Innocent III in the General Council, in the Decretals, "On the Supreme Trinity and the Catholic Faith," chapter "We Condemn": namely, that the Father by begetting the Son gave Him His substance, His essence, and the full being of divinity; He gave Him to be God, to be coeternal with the Father, to be equal to the Father—and this is greater than all creatures and all things that can be created. And is not some kind of priority of origin or cause signified by the past tense "gave"?

Does not the Son, then, in a similar manner receive and have from the Father, and the Holy Spirit equally from both, all His knowing and willing? Is it not written in John 5, from the mouth of the Son: "The Son can do nothing of Himself, unless He sees the Father doing it; for whatever the Father does, these things the Son also does likewise. For the Father loves the Son and shows Him all things that He Himself does"? And further, chapter 8: "Of Myself I do nothing, but as the Father has taught Me, I speak these things." And chapter 16: "The Spirit of truth will teach you all truth; for He will not speak of Himself, but whatever He hears, He will speak."

Wherefore also Augustine, on John, Homily 20, expounding the first of these authorities, says: "This is what 'the Son cannot do anything of Himself unless He sees the Father doing it' means—because the Son's seeing is His being born of the Father. His vision is not one thing and His substance another; nor is His power one thing and His substance another. All that He is, is from the Father; all that He can do, is from the Father—since what He can do and what He is, this is one and the same, and the whole is from the Father."

And in Homily 40, expounding the second: "Incorporeally the Father spoke to the Son, because incorporeally the Father begot the Son. Nor did He thus teach Him as though He had begotten one unlearned; but for Him to have taught is the same as to have begotten one who knows; and 'the Father taught Me' is the same as 'the Father begot Me knowing.' For if—as few understand—the nature of truth is simple, then for the Son, to be is the same as to know. Therefore from Him He has His knowing, from whom He has His being. Not that He first existed from Him and afterward knew from Him; but just as in begetting He gave Him to be, so in begetting He gave Him to know—because, as was said, in a simple nature of truth, to be and to know are not one thing and another, but the very same."

Whence also Proposition 351 of the Sentences of Prosper seems to be sententially extracted, which says: "The Father did not teach the Son as though He had begotten one unlearned and conferred knowledge on one who did not know; but the eternal doctrine is an eternal essence. To be taught by the Father is the same as to be begotten by the Father, because in a simple nature, to be and to know are not one thing and another, but the very same." Wherefore also Proposition 374 says thus: "Whatever God the Father gave to God the Son, He gave by begetting. For the Father so gave the Son, without which the Son could not exist, just as He gave Him to exist; how then would He give Him certain words, in whom He ineffably spoke all things?"

Augustine also, on Psalm 118—"I have understood more than all my teachers"—treating the same authority, says thus: "The Son Himself says, 'As the Father has taught Me, I speak these things'—which is most difficult to understand as spoken by the person of the Word, unless one can somehow grasp that for the Son to have been taught by the Father is the same as to have been begotten. For He for whom to be is not one thing and to have been taught another, but for whom to be is the same as to have been taught—from whomever He has His being, from the same He simultaneously has His having been taught. But as spoken by the person of the man in whom He took the form of a servant, it is more easily understood that He learned from the Father what He said."

And in Part 2 on John, Homily 45 (or 49 of the whole), expounding the third authority quoted above: "'He will not speak of Himself,' he says, 'because He is not of Himself; but whatever He hears, He will speak.' For Him, to hear is to know, and to know is to be—as was discussed above. Because, therefore, He is not of Himself but of Him from whom He proceeds, from whom He has His essence, from Him He has His knowledge, from Him therefore His hearing, which is nothing other than His knowledge."

From this passage also Proposition 368 of the Sentences of Prosper seems to be extracted.

Furthermore, if the Son or the Holy Spirit could have any willing from Himself—that is, a willing of His own that the Father did not give Him—there could be in that most blessed and most harmonious Trinity a discord and contrariety of wills; and therefore some person, or any person, could be not most blessed, and indeed could be miserable, as is evident from the eighth part of the corollary of chapter 1, Book 1. And the blessed Augustine says in Book 13 of On the Trinity, chapter 5: "No one is blessed except the one who has all that he wills and wills nothing badly." Also, some person could be not omnipotent and not have a universally efficacious will; for of contrary wills, one is necessarily impeded, or both. And so a person could not be God—contrary to the first supposition, the third part, the sixth, seventh, and eighth parts of the corollary of chapter 1, Book 1.

Moreover, if this were so, one person could create while the other did not create—which all theologians know to be absolutely false. I will therefore briefly confirm this. The Son of God Himself says: "My Father works until now, and I work" (John 5). And further: "Amen, amen, I say to you: the Son cannot do anything of Himself unless He sees the Father doing it; for whatever the Father does, these things the Son also does likewise." On which Augustine, Book 1 on John, Homily 20, says: "The Catholic faith, confirmed by the Spirit of God in His saints against every heretical depravity, holds this: that the works of the Father and the Son are inseparable." And further: "Not only of the Father and the Son, but also of the Holy Spirit—just as there is equality and inseparability of the persons, so also their works are inseparable." And he shows this principally and, as it were, singularly, but at length throughout that entire twentieth homily.

This is also entirely against the authority of Damascene cited above. It is also manifestly destroyed by the authority of Christ just cited: "The Son can do nothing of Himself, unless He sees the Father doing it; for the Father loves the Son and shows Him all things that He Himself does." This was said, as is evident at length through Augustine in that twentieth homily mentioned, because just as the Son is not, and cannot be, of Himself, but of the Father, so He neither does nor can do anything of Himself alone, but of the Father.

Likewise, John 5: "I cannot do anything of Myself, but as I hear, I judge, and My judgment is true, because I seek not My own will, but the will of the Father who sent Me." Which Augustine, Book 1 on John, Homily 22, expounds of the Son not according to His human nature, but according to His divine nature in the aforementioned manner—although it could perhaps more fittingly be expounded of Him even according to His human nature, especially because there the diversity of wills in the Son and in the Father is expressed, which with respect to His divine nature cannot be understood in any way, as is evident from the foregoing, and because otherwise that most blessed Trinity would not be supremely one.

And Augustine says in that Homily 22: "The will of this Trinity is one; the power is one; the majesty is one." Wherefore also in Book 2 on John, Homily 45, he expounds that authority of Christ according to His human nature, as was cited above. Whence it can be evidently gathered that such authorities spoken of Christ can be understood and expounded in both ways—which the same author also attests on Psalm 118—"I have understood more than all my teachers"—cited above.

Likewise, John 12: "I have not spoken of Myself, but the Father who sent Me, He Himself gave Me a commandment what to say and what to speak; and I know that His commandment is eternal life. Therefore what I speak, as the Father has said to Me, so I speak." And further, chapter 14: "The words that I speak to you, I do not speak of Myself; but the Father dwelling in Me, He does the works." These also Augustine, Book 1 on John, Homily 54 (that is, the last) and Homily 17, expounds of the Son in the aforementioned manner—namely, according to His divine nature.

Whence in that Homily 17 he says: "The Son does not speak of Himself because He is not of Himself; and therefore the Father dwelling in Him does the works; because the one through whom and with whom He acts is from none other than Himself." And in On the Words of the Lord, Sermon 56, he expounds the same authority in the same way, and says: "He attributes to Him whatever He does, from whom He is who does it."

Furthermore, if the human will naturally precedes the divine in common action, the human will is the naturally prior cause why God acts, and therefore why He wills—as is evident from the corollary of the tenth chapter of the first book—which is against the twentieth chapter of the first book.

Likewise, if the divine volition by which God wills to act presently depends on the present human will as on a prior cause, by the same reasoning His eternal volition by which He eternally willed to act now eternally depended on the human will eternally now being future, as on a prior cause. And since God does not know these posterior complex truths except through His own will, as the eighteenth chapter of the first book proved, it patently follows that these posterior things are the causes of the divine essence—contrary to the fifteenth chapter of the first book and others that follow. Indeed, it manifestly follows that God does not know these future things with certainty, nor present things, and therefore nor past things, as is easily seen through the eighteenth chapter of the first book.

For God does not know determinately and certainly future things except through something determined and certain to Him; but a free will, according to the contradiction with respect to its future act, being equally contingent, is not determined and certain with respect to that act—otherwise that act would be determinately and certainly future, and not contingent in either direction. Nor is God certain about that future act through His own will, because His divine will wills and does nothing in such matters unless it is preceded by the human will; but such a preceding is entirely indeterminate and uncertain.

Furthermore, if for the human will to act now is naturally prior to the divine will's acting now, its acting now is the naturally prior cause why the divine will now acts. Therefore, its always having been going to act now was always the naturally prior cause why the divine will always willed to act now. For according to the Philosopher, Book 2 of the Posterior Analytics, chapter 3, what is truly the cause of something's being is the same as the cause of its coming to be, or its being and its future being. Therefore this future being was the naturally prior cause why God willed this to be future—not the reverse—contrary to the fourteenth chapter of the first book, which the arguments of that chapter also refute and condemn.

Likewise, if—some future thing being pointed out—this thing's being future is the cause why God wills this to be future, and by the same fourteenth chapter, God's willing this to be future is the cause why this is future, then this thing's being future is the cause why this is future. And similarly it can be deduced that a thing's being present is the cause why it is present, with the help of the ninth chapter of the first book and the authority of the Philosopher cited above.

Likewise, if the human will's being about to act were the cause of the eternally prior divine volition, its being about to act would be the naturally prior cause of divine predestination and reprobation; and therefore its presently acting would be the naturally prior cause of the effect of predestination—namely, the conferral of grace in the present. Both of these are the heresy of Pelagius condemned by the Fathers, as is evident from chapters 45 and 35 of the first book, with the others that follow, which those same chapters also condemned.

Furthermore, if the human will naturally preceded the divine in acting, human affairs would not be subject to divine providence—contrary to the twenty-seventh chapter of the first book and others that follow. Indeed, what is much more unworthy, if this were so, the divine volitions would be governed by human providence and would be subject to it—which is entirely contrary to reason. For according to the true judgment of reason, it belongs to the wise and good to rule the foolish and wicked, and to the wiser and better to rule the less wise, and to provide for them in all things.

Whence the Philosopher, Book 1 of the Metaphysics, in the Prologue: "We consider the more principal wisdom to be more wise than the subordinate. For it is fitting not for the wise man to be ordered, but to order; and not for this man to be persuaded by another, but the less wise by him." And Book 5 of the Ethics, chapter 11: "We do not allow a man to rule, but reason." And Book 1 of the Politics, chapter 1: "That which can foresee by mind is by nature the ruler and master." And further, in Book 3, chapter 9: "He who orders the intellect to rule seems to order God and the laws to rule; but he who orders a man also adds the beast."

And Cicero, Book 3 of On the Republic: "Do we not see that dominion has been given by nature itself to every best person, with the greatest advantage to inferiors?"

Whence also Wisdom 7 and 8, according to the quotation of some: "Wisdom is not overcome by malice; she reaches from end to end mightily, and orders all things sweetly." But who does not know that these things are found infinitely more abundantly and perfectly in God than in man? He is therefore, according to the view of the Philosopher in Book 12 of the Metaphysics at the end, the one supreme prince of all things.

Likewise, then, man performing anything would be the principal craftsman, and God in a certain way his instrument—whereas by nature the reverse is true, as very many philosophical and theological authorities cited in the twentieth of this second book most plainly attest. Whence also Jeremiah 18: "Behold," says the Lord, "as clay in the hand of the potter, so are you in My hand, O house of Israel."

Furthermore, then God would not be omnipotent. For He could not make man will, however much God Himself willed this; because if He could, let Him do it: therefore God makes a man will at some hour in which the man himself had determined he would by no means will, and in which he would by no means have willed unless God had done this. Either, then, in that volition the human will naturally precedes, or the divine. If the human, then God does not make this man will, but rather the reverse, as was argued above. If the divine, then it is so in all cases, as was shown above.

Indeed, according to the hypothesis, however much God wills this prior naturally or antecedently to the human will, it will produce no action, because then the human will would naturally precede, as that hypothesis posits. Nor is someone rightly judged omnipotent who in performing anything necessarily needs the help of a prior agent that naturally precedes him in acting.

Nor can anyone pretend that this is by no means contained under omnipotence; for this is one truly makeable thing. Indeed, then man would be more powerful than God in this respect. For although God might will a man to will something, and might do everything He could to the utmost for this purpose, the man could freely resist Him and not will. For all human affairs are preordained and provided for by the providence of the eternal divine will, as the twenty-seventh chapter of the first book with the following chapters makes clear. Therefore all inferior causes carrying out this preordination and provision in their every motion or rest are necessarily subject to this divine will and of necessity obey its command. For it would seem too futile for Him to provide or preordain anything unless He could bring it about in effect.

Wherefore also the Philosopher says in Book 3 of the Ethics, chapter 8, that deliberation is about possible things that will come about through us. Whence also the supreme Philosopher says in Isaiah 46: "My counsel shall stand, and all My will shall be done; I have spoken, and I will bring it to pass; I have created, and I will do it." And Isaiah 51: "The Lord has thought, and He has done whatever He has spoken."

Otherwise also, the human will could frustrate the divine will, and thereby render our most happy God miserable—contrary to the tenth chapter of the first book, and contrary to all the happy and even the miserable, however many.

Whence also Proverbs 21: "There is no wisdom, there is no prudence, there is no counsel against the Lord; the horse is prepared for the day of battle, but the Lord grants salvation." Likewise, Ecclesiasticus 42: "He has adorned the great works of His wisdom, which exists from before the ages and unto the ages; neither has anything been added, nor shall it be diminished, and He has no need of anyone's counsel. How desirable are all His works, and like a spark which one may consider! All these things live and remain forever, and in every necessity they all obey Him." And Proverbs 21: "As the divisions of waters, so is the heart of the king in the hand of the Lord; He will incline it wherever He wills." Many other things similar to these are more fully cited in the twentieth of this second book.

And Augustine says in the Enchiridion, chapter 77: "Who is so impiously foolish as to say that God cannot convert the evil wills of men to good—whichever He wills, and whenever He wills, and wherever He wills?" And in On Correction and Grace, chapter 69: "For the willing or not willing is so in the power of the one willing or not willing that it does not impede the divine will nor overcome its power." And chapter 71: "God has the wills of men more in His power than they have their own."

Likewise, human volition is a gift of God, as is evident from the twentieth of this second book; therefore, by the seventh of this second book, it is not antecedently from man but from God. Likewise, the faithful reasonably ask God to make men will this or that, as is evident from the twentieth of this second book; therefore God antecedently does this, as is evident from the forty-sixth chapter of the first book.

Likewise, then the human will in meriting, in repenting, in rising from sin, and in doing any good whatsoever would naturally precede God and the divine will; and therefore would all the more precede the action of grace. All of which are false and allied to the Pelagian heresy, as is evident from chapters 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, and 41 of the first book, and from the authorities of Scripture and the Doctors more copiously cited there.

Whence also the Apostle, in Romans 11: "Who has first given to Him, that it should be repaid to him? For from Him, and through Him, and in Him are all things." And Job 41: "Who has first given to Me, that I should repay him? All things that are under heaven are Mine." On which Gregory, Book 33 of the Morals, chapter 22, writes thus: "Certainly no one, so that divine grace might follow him, has first given anything to God. For if we anticipate God by working well, where is what the prophet says: 'His mercy shall go before me'? If we gave something of good work so as to merit His grace, where is what the Apostle Paul says: 'By grace you have been saved through faith, and this not of yourselves, but it is the gift of God, not of your works'? If our love anticipates God, where is what the Apostle John says: 'Not as though we have loved God, but because He first loved us'? Where is what the Lord says through Hosea: 'I will love them freely'? If without His gift, by our own virtue, we follow God, where is what the Truth protests through the Gospel, saying: 'Without Me you can do nothing'? Where is what He says: 'No one can come to Me unless the Father who sent Me draws him'? Where is what He says again: 'You have not chosen Me, but I have chosen you'? If we at least anticipate the gifts of good works by thinking well through our own virtue, where is what again through Paul is so subtly said—so that all confidence of the human mind in itself may be cut off from the very root of the heart—when he says: 'Not that we are sufficient to think anything from ourselves, as from ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God'?"

"No one, therefore, anticipates God by merits, so that he might hold Him, as it were, as a debtor. But in a wondrous way, the Creator, who is equitable to all, both pre-elected some and justly abandoned others in their reprobate ways; yet He does not show piety to the elect without justice, because here He presses them with harsh afflictions; nor again does He exercise justice toward the reprobate without mercy, because He bears patiently with those whom He will someday condemn in perpetuity. If, therefore, the elect follow grace that goes before them, and the reprobate receive according to what they deserve, and the elect find in mercy something to praise, and the reprobate have nothing in justice to accuse—then it is rightly said: 'Who has first given to Me, that I should repay him?' As if it were openly said: 'I am not compelled by any reason to spare the reprobate, because I am not held as their debtor by any action of theirs.' For this reason they never receive the eternal rewards of the heavenly homeland: because now, while they could have merited them, they despised them by free will. And this free will is indeed formed toward the good in the elect, when their mind is lifted from earthly desires by the breath of grace. For the good that we do is both God's and ours: God's through prevenient grace, ours through obedient free will. For if it is not God's, why do we give Him thanks eternally? Again, if it is not ours, why do we hope for rewards to be repaid to us? Because, therefore, we give thanks not without merit, we know that we are preceded by His gift; and again, because we seek recompense not without merit, we know that by subsequent free will we chose the good things we would do."

And further: "It is clear to all that not only the things that are under heaven, but even those things created above the heavens that are called celestial, serve His will."

With which Augustine concordantly says in Book 4 Against Julian, the son and follower of Pelagius, chapter 5: "When a man is divinely helped, he is not only helped to attain perfection—as you yourself said, wishing it to be understood that he begins by himself without grace, which grace then perfects—but rather, as the Apostle says, 'that He who began a good work in us may perfect it even to the end.' For in what you wish man, as you speak, to be stirred to something praiseworthy by the impulses of a generous heart, in this you do not wish him to glory in the Lord, but in free will, and so to give first that it may be repaid to him. O ungrateful ones toward the grace of God! O enemies of the grace of God, and Christians in name only! Does not the Church pray for her enemies? What does she pray? That the evil will be converted to good—'because the will is prepared by the Lord,' and 'God,' as the Apostle says, 'is the one who works in us both to will and to act.'"

And further in the same, chapter 11: "But with what arrogance and what presumption of your own virtue you have said—'Therefore very easily, by the pursuit of holiness, which God helps, a man can be without sins'—he does not recognize who does not know your dogmas. For you want even the pursuit of holiness to precede, without God's help, in the will of man, which God should then deserve to help—not freely."

Furthermore, those who place their will before the divine will act more proudly than the first proud angel, who, coveting equality with God, said: "I will be like the Most High" (Isaiah 14). For these are by no means content with equality with God or His likeness, but claim majority and superiority over God. But let them beware lest they descend to him, or rather beneath him, as is added in Isaiah: "Nevertheless you shall be brought down to hell, into the depths of the pit; those who see you shall stare at you, and look closely at you."

These also say more proudly of the Lord their God than those uncivil citizens said of that noble man, their lord: "We do not want this man to reign over us" (Luke 19). For they not only say "We do not want this man to reign over us," but "We want to reign over Him." For they wish to naturally precede God, and consequently to lead Him and govern Him in all their deeds. But let them fear and beware of what is said there consequently: "But as for those enemies of mine who did not want me to reign over them, bring them here and slay them before me." Nor is this surprising: for they had conspired against the royal majesty, and so were most justly to be punished with the penalty for the crime of lèse-majesté.

Whence Anselm, in On Similitudes, chapter 8: "Pride is so called because it steps above where it ought to walk; for pride is called a 'stepping above.' Accordingly, one's own will, because it is not subjected to God's will but is exalted above it, is rightly called pride; and it is also the beginning of all sin, because from it every sin is born. And because man has it from himself, and does not wish to have the will of God above himself to follow, he takes from God Himself what properly and uniquely belongs to Him."

And there follows chapter 9: "For God alone ought to will whatever He wills by His own will, so as to have no other will above Himself to follow. When, therefore, man wills something by his own will, he takes from God, as it were, His crown. For just as the crown belongs to the king alone, so one's own will belongs to God alone. And just as someone would dishonor a king if he took his crown from him while he wore it, so man dishonors God when he takes from Him His own will, by having the privilege that He alone should have."

Wherefore also Aristotle, in his Riddles, riddle 3, thus exhorts: "Do not take the king's crown." Those twenty-four elders prudently observing this by no means proudly placed their crowns or wills above the crown or will of God, but humbly submitted them.

Whence Revelation 4: "The twenty-four elders fell down before Him who sat on the throne and worshipped the one living forever and ever, and cast their crowns before the throne, saying: 'You are worthy, O Lord our God, to receive glory and honor and power, because You created all things, and on account of Your will they existed and were created.'"

So also that most illustrious of kings and extraordinary prophet: "Shall not my soul be subject to God?" (Psalm 61). And further: "Nevertheless, be subject to God, O my soul." So also that Antiochus, at first the most proud of princes, at last humbly acknowledged "that it is just to be subject to God, and that a mortal should not think himself equal to God" (2 Maccabees 9). If, then, not equal, how much less higher? "For the Lord is high above all nations" (Psalm 112). Whence also Romans 3: "Let every mouth be stopped, and let the whole world be subject to God."

Likewise, Psalm 22: "The Lord rules me." And Psalm 79: "You who rule Israel, attend; who lead Joseph like a sheep." And Isaiah 49: "He who has mercy on them shall rule them." And Revelation 7: "The Lamb, who is in the midst of the throne, shall rule them and lead them." And Esther 15: "And when she had invoked the God who is the ruler of all and the Savior God," etc. And Psalm 46: "For God is the king of all the earth, and the Lord shall reign over the nations." And Psalm 102: "His kingdom shall rule over all"—with infinitely many similar passages.

These likewise say more impiously than those impious ones who said: "Who is the Almighty, that we should serve Him?" (Job 21). For those merely refused to serve the Almighty; but these not only refuse, but—what is more arrogant—wish the Almighty to serve them, while the human will commands and precedes as mistress, and the divine obeys and follows as handmaid.

Not so the prophet, not so. But: "By Your ordinance the day continues, for all things serve You" (Psalm 118). Not so did Jacob think of his Lord, but: "Let my Lord go before his servant," he said, "and I will follow slowly in his footsteps."

Likewise, then the divine will would rather bow in obedience to the human than the reverse—which no reason allows, and He Himself teaches the contrary: "By Myself I have sworn; the word of justice shall go forth from My mouth and shall not return, because every knee shall bow to Me" (Isaiah 45). Which Scripture the Apostle in Romans 14 cites thus: "For it is written: 'As I live, says the Lord, every knee shall bow to Me.'"

Furthermore, then the human will would lead the divine wherever it wished, whereas it is more reasonable for the reverse to be the case, since God sees, hears, and is able better. Whence Job 37: "The clouds spread His light, which illuminates all things round about, wherever the will of the governor leads them, to whatever He commands them upon the face of the earth, whether in one tribe, or in His land, or in whatever place of His mercy He commands them to be found."

On which Gregory, Book 27 of the Morals, chapter 22, says thus: "For the clouds to spread light is for the holy preachers to extend the examples of their life by speaking and acting. But the holy preachers wish to exhort certain people but cannot; often they desire to turn away from some, yet are compelled by the impulse of internal instigation to exhort them most insistently. Let us see the cloud of God, how it is led by the hand of the governor even to things it does not desire, and is again held back by the hand of the governor from its own impulse."

And he gives the example of Paul, who when he wished to depart from the Corinthians was held with them by the Lord; and who also, when he wished to go to the Thessalonians, neither could nor was able—as he says—to leave those with whom he then was, being impeded—as he says—by the Lord.

Whence he thus concludes: "The clouds of God therefore illuminate all things round about, because they illumine the ends of the world with the light of preaching. But because, being subject to divine commands, they cannot accomplish what they wish, they therefore cannot go except where the will of the governor leads them." Whence it is further added: "To whatever He commands them upon the face of the earth." "For often, when they are led by the will of the governor, they desire to act one way, but are disposed otherwise. For very often they endeavor to correct some of their hearers gently, and yet their speech is drawn into harshness; often they desire to cut off some sharply, yet their vigor or severity is restrained by a spirit of gentleness. Just as therefore they cannot go where they wish, so neither can they act as they wish. For the internal judge who holds them when He sends them also receives them with moderation when

He leads them, so that sometimes they arrange one thing in thought but perform another in action; sometimes they begin one way but finish another. Because, therefore, they serve according to what is commanded them, let it rightly be said: 'Wherever the will of the governor leads them, to whatever He commands them upon the face of the earth.'"

Likewise, Deuteronomy 31: "The Lord your God, He is your leader." And Isaiah 63: "The Spirit of the Lord was his leader." And 2 Chronicles 13: "In our army, God is the leader." And Psalm 54: "My leader and my intimate friend." And Wisdom 10: "The Lord led the just man by right paths." And Psalm 72: "You have held my right hand, and in Your will You have led me"—with very many similar passages throughout Scripture. The divine will, therefore, leads the human, naturally preceding it.

Whence also that Annius Seneca—as Augustine cites in Book 5 of The City of God, chapter 8—speaks somewhat metrically thus: "Lead me, O supreme Father and ruler of the high heavens, wherever it has pleased You; there is no delay in obeying. I am here, eager. Make me to will, and I shall follow; groaning and unwilling, I shall suffer what the good man might have done. The fates lead the willing and drag the unwilling."

Where Augustine also adds: "Plainly, in this last verse, he called 'fates' what he had said above was 'the will of the supreme Father.'"

With which the blessed Gregory concordantly says in Book 6 of the Morals, chapter 12, on Job 5—"Who catches the wise in their craftiness," etc.: "For so great are the works of God that through everything that is done by men, His will is sought out—to which, once known, our action ought to serve devotedly, and, as it were, follow as the leader of its journey, lest it even unwillingly serve Him, if in pride it turns away from Him. For the force of the supreme counsel can in no way be avoided."

Likewise, otherwise the human will would draw the divine after itself, whereas it is more reasonable for the reverse to be the case, as is evident from the authority of Seneca cited above.

Likewise, if this were so, the human will would rather govern the divine by acting than the divine the human—which is contrary to reason and against the authority of Job quoted above: "The clouds spread His light, which illuminates all things round about, wherever the will of the governor leads them." And Wisdom 14: "But You, Father, govern by providence"—and He is speaking of navigation and similar human affairs. And Isaiah 48: "I am the Lord your God, who teaches you useful things, who governs you in the way you walk."

Whence also Song of Songs 1: "Draw me after You." And John 6: "No one can come to Me unless the Father who sent Me draws him." And further, chapter 12: "I will draw all things to Myself." And Isaiah 10: "Shall the axe boast against him who cuts with it, or shall the saw be exalted against him by whom it is drawn?"—which is understood of Sennacherib and of God, as the twentieth of the first book more fully cited.

Likewise, otherwise the human will would rather stir up the divine to do something than the reverse—which is against sacred Scripture very frequently, both in evil acts and in good. Whence 1 Chronicles 5: "The Lord God of Israel stirred up the spirit of Pul, king of the Assyrians, and the spirit of Tilgath-pilneser, king of Assyria, and He carried away Reuben and Gad and half the tribe of Manasseh," etc. And 2 Chronicles 21: "The Lord stirred up against Joram the spirit of the Philistines and the Arabs who bordered on the Ethiopians, and they went up into the land of Judah and devastated it," etc. And Ezekiel 23: "Thus says the Lord God: Behold, I will stir up all your lovers against you, from whom your soul has been sated, and I will gather them against you on every side—the sons of Babylon, and all the Chaldeans, the nobles and tyrants and all the princes, all the sons of the Assyrians, young men of splendid form, leaders and magistrates, all the princes of princes and renowned horsemen; and they shall come upon you," etc. And Amos 6: "Behold, I will stir up against you, O house of Israel, says the Lord God of hosts, a nation, and it shall crush you."

These and many others about evil acts of the will. About good acts, however, it is written in 2 Chronicles, the last chapter, and 1 Ezra 1: "The Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus the king," etc. And Isaiah 41: "Who"—the Gloss says, "if not I"—"stirred up the righteous one from the East? He called him to follow Him. He gave the nations before him," etc. And there follows: "Who has wrought and done this, calling the generations from the beginning? I the Lord, the first and the last; I am." And further, chapter 45: "I," says the Lord, "have raised him up for justice, and I will direct all his ways." And Haggai 1: "The Lord stirred up the spirit of Zerubbabel, and the spirit of Jeshua, and the spirit of all the rest of the people, and they entered and worked in the house of the Lord."

Likewise, if the human will naturally precedes the divine in an action common to both, the human will rather inclines and determines the divine to act, than the divine the human—which is against what has been shown and cited above in the twentieth of this second book. Whence also Proverbs 21: "As the divisions of waters, so is the heart of the king in the hand of the Lord; He will incline it wherever He wills."

With these arguments here set forth, the authorities of Augustine in On Grace and Free Will and in On Correction and Grace, more fully cited in the twentieth of this second book, also sufficiently agree.

Likewise, then it would rather be said that man makes God will, and do, or perform something, than the reverse—for man is the prior and superior cause in these things—which is against many authorities more fully cited in the twentieth of this second book. Whence also the Apostle, in Philippians 2: "It is God," he says, "who works in us both to will and to accomplish (or, alternatively, to work) according to His good pleasure." And Romans 15: "I dare not speak of anything that Christ has not accomplished through me." And Isaiah 45: "I am the Lord, and there is no other, forming light and creating darkness, making peace and creating evil: I the Lord do all these things." The Lord is therefore prior and superior in such action.

And Ezekiel 36: "I will cause you to walk in My precepts and to keep My judgments and do them." And Romans 8: "Whoever are led by the Spirit of God, these are the sons of God." On which Proposition 310 of the Sentences of Prosper, which is from Augustine and is cited in the Gloss, says thus: "It is without doubt more to be led than to be governed. For he who is governed does something, and is therefore governed so that he may act rightly; but he who is led is scarcely understood to be doing anything himself. And the grace of the Savior so prevails over our wills that the Apostle does not hesitate to say: 'Whoever are led by the Spirit of God, these are the sons of God.' Nor can our free will do anything better than commend itself to Him who cannot act badly."

Likewise, Augustine, in On the Words of the Apostle, Sermon 13, treating the same authority, says thus: "Someone says to me: 'Therefore we are led, not leading.' I respond: Indeed, you both lead and are led; and then you lead well if you are led by the good. For the Spirit who leads you is a helper to those who act, because as the Lord says: 'Without Me you can do nothing.' Now then, you who have heard 'Whoever are led by the Spirit of God, these are the sons of God,' do not let yourselves go. For God does not build His temple out of you as from stones that have no motion of their own, are lifted up and placed by the builder. Living stones are not like that; and you, like living stones, are being built together into a temple of God. You are led, but run also; you are led, but follow—because even when you have followed, it will be true that without Him you can do nothing. 'For it is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy.'"

This is especially so because the argument of the Apostle and of the prophets most plainly tends to this: that God in such acts is not only an agent, but also the first agent. For by this teaching of his, the Apostle principally intends to insert and nourish humility in human hearts, as the twenty-third of this second book teaches. Yet he would not only not accomplish this, but would indeed raise men up to greater pride, if he taught that God works in us to will and to accomplish—not antecedently as Lord, but subsequently as servant. For how would he cut off for men, rather than further supply, the material for being proud, by teaching them that they have God always most readily as a mere servant at every nod of their will, obeying their wishes in all things?

Wherefore also the Apostle fittingly prefaced: "Work out your salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God who works in you both to will and to accomplish according to His good pleasure." On which Augustine, in On the Words of the Apostle, Sermon 1, says thus: "Lest they give themselves any credit because he said 'work out,' he immediately added: 'For it is God who works in you both to will and to accomplish.' God is the one who works in you; therefore with fear and trembling." Where also the Gloss says: "With fear"—that is, with humility, not proudly. "And therefore He is to be feared, because it is not you but God who works," etc. "According to His good pleasure"—that is, His will.

For how can it truly be understood that "it is not you, but God who works in you to will and to accomplish," given that from the foregoing it is sufficiently established that these are human acts, unless it means: not you antecedently, or principally, or naturally prior, but God in this way; you, however, subsequently, instrumentally, and in subordination? As if it were said: "It is not the staff, but the man who strikes; it is not the axe, but the man who builds."

Thus also the same Apostle speaks in Romans 9: "It is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy"—which cannot be expounded otherwise.

Whence Augustine, in the Enchiridion, chapter 23: "Again, lest anyone, even if not about works, should glory about the very free exercise of the will—as though the merit might begin from it, to which a reward of working well would be repaid as something due—let that same freedom hear the same herald of grace saying: 'For it is God who works in us both to will and to work according to His good pleasure.' And elsewhere: 'Therefore it is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy.' Since without doubt, if a man is of such an age as to use reason, he cannot believe, hope, or love unless he wills, nor reach the prize of the heavenly calling of God unless he runs willingly."

"How then is it 'not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy'? Unless it is because the will itself, as it is written, 'is prepared by the Lord.' Otherwise, if the reason it was said—'Not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy'—is that it comes from both—that is, from the will of man and from the mercy of God—so that we should take 'Not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy' as if it were said: 'The will of man alone does not suffice unless there is also the mercy of God.' Then the mercy of God alone does not suffice unless there is also the will of man. And so, just as it was rightly said, 'Not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy'—because the will of man alone does not accomplish it—why is it not conversely rightly said: 'Not of God who shows mercy, but of man who wills'—because the mercy of God alone does not accomplish it?"

"But if no Christian would dare to say 'Not of God who shows mercy, but of man who wills,' lest he openly contradict the Apostle, it remains that the reason it was rightly said—'Not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy'—is that the whole may be given to God, who both prepares the good will of man to be helped, and helps it once prepared. For the good will of man precedes many gifts of God, but not all. Among those it does not precede is itself. For both are read in the holy Scriptures: 'His mercy shall go before me,' and 'His mercy shall follow me.' It goes before the unwilling, that he may will; it follows the willing, that he may not will in vain. For why are we admonished to pray for our enemies—who are assuredly unwilling to live piously—unless so that the Lord may work in them to will? Again, why are we admonished to ask that we may receive, unless so that what we will may be done by Him from whom it was done that we will? We pray, therefore, for our enemies, that the mercy of God may go before them, as it went before us; and we pray for ourselves, that His mercy may follow us."

The same author, in On Grace and Free Will, chapter 17, treats the same authority in the same sense.

Anselm also, in On Concord, chapter 9: "It is not of him who wills that he wills, nor of him who runs that he runs, but of God who shows mercy.' For to all, except God alone, it is said: 'What do you have that you did not receive? And if you received it, why do you boast as though you had not received it?'"

Thus speaks John 11: "But one of them, named Caiaphas, said to them: 'It is expedient for you that one man die for the people, and not the whole nation perish.' This he did not say of himself, but being high priest that year, he prophesied."

And thus speaks the Master Himself and the Truth, saying to His disciples: "For it is not you who speak, but the Spirit of your Father who speaks in you" (Matthew 10). And John 15: "You have not chosen Me, but I have chosen you." And 1 John 4: "In this is the love of God: not that we have loved God, but that He first loved us." And Tobit 3: "Your counsel is not in the power of man." And Jeremiah 10: "I know, O Lord, that man's way is not his own, nor is it for a man to walk and direct his steps." Where the Gloss says: "Let those be ashamed who say that each person is governed by his own will. For man's way is not his own," etc. Whence David: "By the Lord the steps of a man are directed." But the second Gloss is evidently convicted of being falsely attributed by the thirty-second chapter of the first book.

Let those Pelagians, then, be ashamed, and let me not be ashamed—I, a Christian, a follower of Paul, Augustine, and Gregory. Let them tremble, and let me not tremble, who in acting with You, O Lord my God, so shamelessly and fearlessly make themselves higher by governing You. Fill their faces with shame, I beseech You, and let them seek Your name, O Lord. Let them be ashamed and troubled forever, and let them be confounded and perish—so that they may know that Your name is Lord; You alone are the Most High over all the earth (Psalm 82).

Moreover, that in the common action of God and man, God naturally precedes man, and the divine will precedes the human, very many authorities of the philosophers, of sacred Scripture, and of the Catholic Doctors concordantly attest. For all philosophers agree on this one thing: that in essentially ordered causes one must not proceed to infinity, but must arrive at one supreme cause, naturally first of all, regulating and moving all others—as the craftsman does his instruments—as was sufficiently cited in the fourth chapter of the first book and the twentieth of this second book.

Whence also Avicenna, in Book 10 of his Metaphysics, chapter 1, speaking of the disposition of beings, says: "All this flows from above, nor does all this follow from the imagination of celestial things only, but because the first true one willed all this; therefore from Him begins the being of every thing that was, but through another as intermediary. Therefore, for these reasons, prayers and sacrifices are useful to men, and especially litanies for rain and other things of the kind."

Likewise, Aristotle, in On the World, chapter 11, says thus: "Just as in a chorus, when the chorus leader begins, the entire chorus of men and women sings in harmony, with various voices, high and low, maintaining one continuous harmony—so it is with God, who disposes all things." And further in the same chapter, comparing God and the world to a commander and an army, he says: "All things move under one signal, at the nod of the commander who exercises power. So also must we think about the universe. For at one impulse, when all things are set in motion, each does its proper work; and this by an invisible and hidden being, which is in no way an impediment—neither to Him for acting, nor to us for believing," etc.—cited more fully in the third chapter of the first book.

The Commentator also, on the first proposition of the Book of Causes, which says: "Every primary cause has more influence upon its effect than the universal secondary cause," says thus: "What does it mean that the universal primary cause acts upon the effect of the secondary cause before the universal secondary cause that follows it acts upon it?" etc.—which is clear enough. Wherefore also certain articles asserting the contrary of this were condemned at Paris, as the twentieth of this second book more fully recounted.

Nor do the philosophers understand this only in the action of nature, but also of the intellect, and likewise of the will, as is evident from the Philosopher in On Good Fortune and from all those who speak of the agent intellect, as the same twentieth chapter similarly recounted.

Whence Avicenna, in Book 10 of his Metaphysics, chapter 1, shortly after the authority cited above, speaking of the disposition of the parts of animals and plants, says thus: "There is no natural cause there in any way, but the principle of it is without doubt from divine care. Similarly, believe that these intentions depend on divine care. Know also that the common people approve and hold and say to be true—and none refuse this except those who wish to appear philosophers, because they are ignorant of the causes and occasions of these things." "We have therefore already composed a book on this subject about sin and its opposite. Therefore attend to the disposition of all things, and believe what is said about the divine scourges that descend upon the cities of the wicked, and upon injurious men, and similar things—how the truth is defended."

"Know also that the cause of prayer here, and of almsgiving and similar things, and likewise the occurrence of injury and sin, are from none other than there. For the principles of all these things extend to nature, or will, or chance. The principle of nature is from there. But wills, which are in us, exist after not having existed. Whatever exists after not having existed has a cause; therefore every will that is in us has a cause. The cause of this will does not extend to infinity, but to certain things that occur from outside—namely, earthly and heavenly things; but earthly things lead back to heavenly ones. Therefore the collection of all these proceeds necessarily from the necessity of the divine will. Chance, however, arises from the convergence of all these things. When, moreover, you resolve all things, they will indeed be reduced to principles whose necessity descends from God. The judgment of God is the first simple positing."

Behold: he says that the common people approve this, and those wishing to appear philosophers alone refuse it—as the prophet says: "Since I did not know literature, I shall enter into the powers of the Lord" (Psalm 70).

And this argument of Avicenna is the argument of Saint Thomas for this same conclusion, in On the Christian Religion, chapter 120, as the twentieth of this second book more fully cited. For this same view, nearly or rather truly all those philosophical and theological authorities can be adduced that were more fully brought forward concerning fate, chance, and fortune in chapters 28 and 29 of the first book.

Wherefore also a certain article condemned by the Lord Stephen, Bishop of Paris, says thus: "That all voluntary motions are reduced to the first mover. This is an error, unless it is understood as referring to the first mover absolutely, who is uncaused, and understanding it of motion according to its substance, not according to its deformity."

This same thing the canonical Scripture attests in many places, some of which were cited above; a few more I will briefly cite now.

That most eloquent Isaiah says, chapter 26: "Before Your face, O Lord, we have conceived, and as it were we have been in labor, and we have brought forth the spirit of our salvation." And the Lord, through the same prophet, chapter 45: "I will go before you." And Ecclesiasticus 33: "As the potter's clay is in his hand, to shape and to dispose it, all his ways are according to his disposition; so man is in the hand of Him who made him."

When those questioning the Lord asked, "Who are You?" He answered: "The Beginning" (John 8). And Revelation 1: "I am the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end, says the Lord God."

Moreover, if according to the view of the wise man in Ecclesiasticus 25, "If a woman has the primacy, she is contrary to her husband"—which he considers unfitting—how much more unfitting would it be if the soul or human will had primacy over God? Certainly as much more as the disparity between God and man is greater than between husband and wife. Whence also above, in chapter 24, uncreated Wisdom herself says: "In every people and in every nation I have held the primacy, and I have trodden down with power the hearts of all the exalted and the lowly."

Wherefore also the Apostle, in Colossians, speaking of the Son who is this supreme wisdom of God: "All things were created through Him and in Him, and He is before all, and all things consist in Him; and He is the head of the body, the Church, who is the beginning, the firstborn from the dead, so that in all things He may hold the primacy." And Colossians 2: "Let no one seduce you, wishing to walk in humility and religion of angels, which he has not seen, vainly puffed up by the sense of his flesh, and not holding the head, from which the whole body, through joints and connections, supplied and constructed, grows into the increase of God." The Gloss: "The head"—that is, Christ—"from which the whole body"—that is, the Church, etc.

Therefore the Church growing in merit is supplied by Christ the head as the first and head agent, not the reverse.

Likewise, Exodus 14: "The Lord will fight for you, and you will be silent." And further, chapter 17, it is written that after the defeat of Amalek, Moses built an altar and called its name "The Lord is my exaltation," saying: "Because the hand of the Lord alone, and the war was God's." The Gloss: "Who works all our works in us"—just as the holy Church sings to God: "There is no other who fights for us, except You, our God."

And Wisdom 6, it is read of Wisdom in this way: "She anticipates those who desire her, so that she first shows herself to them." And further: "The beginning of her is the truest desire of learning"—and she herself anticipates and goes before that beginning, and therefore whatever is begun.

For this purpose there are also very many other authorities of sacred Scripture, which I do not recite this time, lest perhaps they should produce too much weariness or provoke nausea in those who are daily satisfied with such things as daily bread.

I will, however, append a few authorities of authentic Doctors. The blessed Augustine, in the Hypomnesticon, chapter 42, says thus: "In every holy work, the will of God is prior, the will of free choice posterior; that is, God works, man cooperates. But if you say—as you, O Pelagian, are accustomed to say—I willed first, then God willed, you are already making merit, so that grace is no longer from works—for then it is no longer grace, but wages." At this point the Apostle rebukes, saying: "If therefore it is by grace, it is no longer from works; otherwise grace is no longer grace. Grace, therefore, is given, not repaid."

The same author, in On the Predestination of the Saints, chapter 3, having cited the authorities of sacred Scripture against Pelagius, who said that man believes from himself, sets forth the substance of Pelagius's response in these words: "Not wishing, therefore, to oppose such clear testimonies, and yet wishing to have from himself what he believes, the man, as it were, makes a deal with God, claiming a part of faith for himself and leaving a part for God; and what is more arrogant, he takes the first part for himself and gives the subsequent one to God, and in what he says belongs to both, he makes himself prior and God posterior."

Whom he immediately refutes by adding: "The pious and humble Doctor did not think so. I will speak of the most blessed Cyprian, who said: 'In nothing should we glory, since nothing is ours.' To show which he brought forth the Apostle as witness, saying: 'What do you have that you did not receive? And if you received it, why do you boast as though you had not received it?'"

And in chapter 4 he adds: "By which preeminent testimony I too was struck and convicted, when I was erring similarly, thinking that the faith by which we believe in God is not a gift of God, but is in us from ourselves. For I did not think that faith was preceded by the grace of God, except in that we could not believe unless the proclamation of truth preceded us. But that once the Gospel was preached to us, our consenting was our own affair and came from ourselves—this I used to think." From all of which it evidently appears that this Pelagian position contains heresy.

And there follows: "Which error of mine certain of my works sufficiently indicate, among which is the exposition of certain propositions of the Epistle to the Romans." "Finally, when I was reviewing my works and came to reviewing this book on free will, I spoke about it thus: 'What I said—that it is ours to believe and to will, but His to give believers the ability to work well through the Holy Spirit—is indeed true, but by the same rule both are His, because He prepares the will; and both are ours, because nothing happens unless we will it.'" And this retraction is placed in Book 1 of the Retractations, chapter 23.

The same author, on Psalm 126—"It is vain for you to rise before the light"—says thus: "Those who wished to be disciples above the Master, and servants above their Lord, wished to rise before the light; they were going in vain, because they were not going after the light. To them, therefore, this Psalm says: 'It is vain for you to rise before the light.' Such were the sons of Zebedee, who before they were humbled according to the passion of the Lord were already choosing places where they would sit, one at the right hand and the other at the left. And Peter had risen before the light, when he wished to give counsel to the Lord not to suffer for us, when he said: 'Far be it from You, Lord; be gracious to Yourself; this shall not happen.' He wished to rise before the light, and to give counsel to the Light."

"But what did the Lord do? He made him rise after the light: 'Get behind Me, Satan.' 'For this reason you are called Satan: because you wish to rise before the light. Get behind Me, so that I may go first and you follow where I am going—and you may go there, not where you wish to go, and thereby wish to lead Me.'"

And on Psalm 55—"My enemies shall be turned backward"—treating the words of Peter and Christ just mentioned, he says: "Peter was called Satan. Why? Because he wished to go before the Lord and give earthly counsel to the heavenly leader. 'Far be it from You, Lord; this shall not happen.' You say 'Far be it' and you say 'Lord.' If He is Lord, He acts by power. If He is Master, He knows what He is doing. But you wish to lead the leader, teach the teacher, command the Lord, choose for God—you go very far ahead, but you shall be turned backward."

The same author, Book 1 on John, Homily 49, expounding John 11—"Are there not twelve hours in the day?"—and treating incidentally the aforementioned counsel of Peter and the Lord's response, says the same. Whence, among other things, he says in the person of the Lord to Peter: "'And as for what I said, 'Get behind Me, Satan'—hear also the reason for this: 'For you do not savor the things that are of God, but the things that are of men.'" Let no one therefore flatter himself. Of his own he is a Satan; of God he is blessed. For what is 'of his own,' if not of his own sin? Take away sin; what is yours? 'Justice,' you say, 'is of my own.' What do you have that you did not receive?"

And understanding by "the day" the Lord, and by "the twelve hours" His twelve Apostles who were giving counsel to the Lord not to go into Judea, he continues expounding: "When therefore men wished to give counsel to God, disciples to the Master, servants to the Lord, the sick to the physician, He corrected them and said: 'Are there not twelve hours in the day? If anyone walks in the day, he does not stumble.' Follow Me, if you do not wish to stumble; do not give Me counsel—you from whom it is fitting to receive counsel. What then does 'Are there not twelve hours in the day?' mean? In order to show that He is the day, He chose twelve disciples. If I am the day, He says, and you are the hours, do the hours give counsel to the day? The hours follow the day; the day does not follow the hours."

"If, however, God always works all our works with us and naturally posterior to us, He follows our counsel in all our counseled works—not we His."

From the foregoing, then, it is clear that to any such heretic who places himself before God and his will before the divine will, it can be said in the person of God, in a Catholic manner: "Get behind Me, Satan!"—or according to Jerome's translation: "Go behind Me, Satan, for you do not savor the things that are of God, but the things that are of men" (Mark 8 and Matthew 16). "Go behind Me, Satan; you are a scandal to Me," etc.

Likewise, the Lombard, Book 2 of the Sentences, distinction 18, says thus: "It must be known that the causes of all things have been in God from eternity, and these are called primordial causes, because no other causes precede them, but these precede others—they are the causes of causes. And although the divine power, disposition, or will is one thing, and therefore one principal cause of all things, yet on account of diverse effects, Augustine says in the plural that the primordial causes of all things are in God—introducing the likeness of a craftsman, in whose design is the figure of the ark. So also in God, the cause of each future thing preceded."

"In creatures, however, the causes of some things, but not all, exist, as Augustine says, because God also sowed seminal reasons in things, according to which some things come from others—as such a grain from this seed, such a fruit from this tree, and the like. And these are called primordial causes—though not from God properly, because they have before them an eternal cause, which is properly and universally the first. But relative to the remaining things that proceed from them, they are called first. They are also called primordial causes of things because they were implanted in things by God in the first condition of things. And just as creatures are mutable, so these causes too can change; but what is a cause in the immutable God cannot change."

Likewise, Hugh, in On the Sacraments, Book 1, Part 2, chapter 2, says thus: "The entire order and arrangement from the highest to the lowest in the structure of this universe follows upon itself by certain causes and origins of reasons, so that of all things that exist, nothing is found unconnected or separable by nature, or foreign. Of things, some are causes only and not effects—such as the first of all; others are effects only and not causes—such as the last of all; still others are both causes with respect to posterior things that they generate, and effects with respect to prior things by which they are generated. And just as to those that are last and effects only, nothing posterior is seen, so to those that are first and causes only of subsequent things, nothing prior is found."

"Of first causes, some are generated—which are first in their genus—others uncreated—which are universally first. For in this universe of all things, with all things cohering causally, something first is found such that nothing can be prior to it out of all things, since it is itself the first of all. To those causes that are universally first, nothing is prior, since they are themselves the first of all, nor do they have other causes prior to themselves, since they themselves are the causes of all."

And in chapter 6 he shows that these first causes are God's will, wisdom, and power—which the earlier chapters there also hold. Whence chapter 5 says: "In the predestination of things to be created, goodness worked; in the creation of things predestined, power worked; in the beatification of things created, both power and goodness."

And in the last chapter he says thus: "Since, therefore, there are three things in God—wisdom, power, and will—as primordial causes: from the will they proceed, through wisdom they are directed, through power they are brought about. For the will moves, wisdom disposes, power unfolds. These are the eternal foundations of all causes and the first principle."

The same author, Part 4, chapter 1, says: "The first cause of all things is the will of the Creator, which no preceding cause moved, because it is eternal; nor does any subsequent cause confirm it, since it is just of itself. For He did not therefore will justly because what He willed was going to be just; but what He willed was rightly just because He willed it." And in the last chapter: "So therefore the order of things stands, such that later things follow the first. The first of all is the will of the Creator, since from it are all things."

Likewise, Anselm, in the Monologion, chapter 10, writes thus: "In this the intimate utterances of the creative wisdom and of the craftsman with respect to their works to be made differ from each other: that the former, neither assumed nor aided from elsewhere, but as the first and sole cause, was sufficient for its craftsman to complete its work; but the latter is neither the first nor the sole nor sufficient cause even to begin its work. Wherefore the things created through that wisdom are entirely nothing that they are not through it; whereas the things made through this would not exist at all unless they were something that they are not through it."

Likewise, the most eloquent Doctor and most glorious Martyr Cyprian, in his Epistle 13, entitled On the Discipline of the Christian Religion, addressed to Quirinus, in chapter 4 shows at length that in nothing should we glory, since nothing is ours. And in chapter 10: "We must trust in the Lord alone, and glory in Him"—which he confirms through many passages of Scripture, through Jeremiah saying: "Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, nor the strong man in his strength, nor the rich man in his riches; but let him who glories glory in this: to understand and know that I am the Lord who exercises mercy and judgment and justice on the earth; for in these things is My will, says the Lord." And after: "My soul is subject to God alone."

Likewise, Jerome, in Book 12 on Isaiah, treating Isaiah 45—"I girded you, and you did not know Me"—says thus: "The ecclesiastical man—to you God gave speech and wisdom—must beware lest he think what he speaks is his own, but must refer all to the glory of the giver, lest he too deserve to hear: 'I girded you, and you did not know Me.'"

Likewise, the blessed Prosper, in Against Cassian, chapter 1, recounts his first definition, saying: "Not only of actions, but also of good thoughts, the beginning is from God, who inspires in us the beginnings of a holy will, and grants the strength and opportunity to carry out what we rightly desire. For every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, descending from the Father of lights, who both begins in us the things that are good, and carries them out, and consummates them, as the Apostle says: 'He who gives seed to the sower and bread for eating shall provide, and shall make the fruits of your justice to grow.'" And this definition Prosper very frequently approves and confirms as most true.

The same author, chapter 8, recounts the blessed Pope Zosimus writing thus to the whole world: "We, by the instigation of God—for all things must be referred to their author, from whom they are born—have referred all things to the knowledge of our brothers and fellow bishops." Therefore, according to him, all our good works are born from God as author; therefore from God willing. For according to Augustine, Eighty-Three Questions, question 3, when we say "by his authorship," we mean "by his willing." Therefore such works of men are born and proceed from the divine will before the human. For if they were born primarily from the human will, they would be more principally and rather referred to it; and man himself would more truly than God, and more properly, be the author of such works—which no one will say unless he contradicts the Author of all things and all orthodox authorities, as was also briefly shown in the ninth chapter of the first book.

Wherefore also the same Prosper, immediately in consequence in the same chapter, recounts from the synodal letter of the African bishops writing back to that Pope, the words that follow: "That, moreover, which you placed in your letter, which you arranged to be sent to all provinces, saying: 'We, by the instigation of God—for all good things must be referred to their author, from whom they are born—have referred all things to the knowledge of our brothers and fellow bishops,' we have received as having been said so that you might, with the drawn sword of truth, as if in passing, cut off those who exalt the freedom of human will against the help of God. For what did you do by such free will as when you referred all things to the knowledge of our humility—and yet you faithfully and wisely saw, and truly and confidently said, that this was done by the instigation of God? And this because 'the will is prepared by the Lord,' and so that they may do something good, He Himself touches the hearts of His children with fatherly inspirations. 'For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are the sons of God'—so that we may feel that our own free will is not absent, and yet in each individual motion of the good human will, we may not doubt that His help avails more."

This is also plainly attested by Saint Thomas and John Scotus, more fully recounted in the twentieth of this second book.

Likewise, the Lombard, Book 4 of the Sentences, distinction 5, at the end: "In our good works, God Himself works good things, and we; neither we alone, nor He alone, but also He with us and in us; and yet in doing these things we are His ministers, not the authors."

The same author, in Book 1 of the Sentences, distinction 45, asserts and shows by very many authorities that the will of God is the first and supreme cause of all things—namely, of all species and all motions—which the twentieth chapter of the first book also sufficiently showed.

Likewise, if man acted before God, and the human will in meriting acted prior in nature to grace and the Holy Spirit, and likewise in repenting—contrary to chapters 41, 42, and 43 of the first book.

This is also the faith and general profession of the Church, which thus prays: "We beseech You, O Lord, go before our actions by Your inspiration, and follow them with Your help, so that every work of ours may always begin from You, and through You what has been begun may be finished." And again: "The vows which You inspire by going before, also follow with Your help." And again: "O God, from whom come holy desires, right counsels, and just works, give to Your servants that peace which the world cannot give," etc. She also similarly implores the Holy Spirit, when she says: "Drive far away the enemy, and grant us peace forthwith; with You thus going before as leader, may we avoid all harm."

From all the foregoing, it is sufficiently manifest, I judge, to anyone who thinks soberly: in every action or motion common to God and the rational creature, God acts or moves naturally prior, and the will of God, co-doing anything with the created will, naturally precedes it in doing.

COROLLARY

THE COROLLARY HAS A THREEFOLD CONCLUSION: ONE NATURAL—THAT IN EVERY CAUSATION COMMON TO GOD AND A SECONDARY CAUSE, GOD CAUSES NATURALLY PRIOR TO THE SECONDARY CAUSE; ANOTHER THEOLOGICAL—THAT GOD WILL NOTHING CONDITIONALLY; A THIRD LOGICAL—THAT NO PROPOSITION ATTRIBUTING ANY CAUSATION TO ANY INFERIOR CAUSE POSTERIOR TO THE DIVINE WILL, OR ANYTHING ELSE POSITIVE INFERIOR TO ANYTHING UNDER GOD, IS ABSOLUTELY FIRST, UNLESS PERHAPS A PROPOSITION IS SAID TO BE ABSOLUTELY FIRST BY REASON OF THE PRIORITY OF THE SUBJECT, NOT OF THE CAUSE; HOWEVER,

VERY MANY SUCH PROPOSITIONS ARE FIRST IN A QUALIFIED SENSE AND IN A CERTAIN GENUS.

From these things a threefold conclusion manifestly follows. One natural: that in every causation common to God and a secondary cause, God causes naturally prior to the secondary cause. Another theological: that God wills nothing conditionally. A third logical: that no proposition attributing any causation to any inferior cause posterior to the divine will, or anything else positive inferior to anything under God, is absolutely first—unless perhaps a proposition is said to be absolutely first by reason of the priority of its subject, not of its cause; however, very many such propositions are first in a qualified sense and in a certain genus.

The first part is evidently clear. For if, as the chapter demonstrated, in every causation of a rational creature—which is the first, most worthy, and supreme among all secondary causes—God always causes naturally prior and the creature posterior, then much more so in every causation of any secondary cause—which can also be shown for those other causes just as it was shown for these.

The second part is patently inferred. For if God wills something under a condition, that thing is either past, present, or future. Not past, nor present, because He wills every past thing determinately, absolutely, and certainly to be past, and every present thing similarly to be present. If, however, it is said—as seems more plausible—that He wills under a condition something future to come about, how can this reasonably be so, since by the thirtieth chapter of this book and the part of the preceding corollary, and the sixth chapter of the first book, God absolutely knows that no thing, nor any condition of a thing, can exist unless He Himself, antecedently to any secondary cause, independently and unimpededly by a secondary cause, wills and makes it? Since He wills nothing in vain or foolishly.

Likewise, if He willed anything conditionally to come about, the existence or positing of the condition, when it came to exist, would be antecedently determining, moving, and actualizing the divine will to then determinately, absolutely, and simply willing—contrary to the chapter and the part of the corollary just discussed.

Likewise, that condition is either past, present, or future: that is, is the fulfillment or existence of that condition past, present, or future? Not past, nor present, because then that condition is determined, absolute, and certain to God; and so He likewise wills the thing to come about—therefore not under any condition. If, however—as seems more plausible—He wills something future under a future condition: either He wills that condition to come about, or not. If not, then He does not otherwise will the thing to come about; and so He wills vainly and foolishly that it come about conditionally—as if He were to will conditionally all impossibilities and absurdities, such as His not existing if a chimera existed. And if He does not will that condition to come about, by the twenty-second chapter of the first book and its corollary, He wills it not to come about. Similarly He could will all impossible things to come about, and Himself to be a chimera tomorrow.

By a similar irrational reasoning He could will, and would similarly will, nothing to come about. If, however, He wills that condition to come about—either absolutely or under another condition. If absolutely, then by the tenth chapter of the first book, it will absolutely be fulfilled and exist, and God well knows and wills this; and since He wills nothing in vain or foolishly, He wills not conditionally but absolutely, determinately, and simply that the thing come about—especially since His volition or action does not antecedently depend on anything else, nor can be impeded by anything else.

If, however, it is said that God wills that condition to come about under another condition, one must inquire further about that other condition—whether He wills it to come about or not, etc., as before—since no one would dare to imagine an infinite chaos—namely, an infinite regress of such conditions—in the divine will with respect to a single particular object of volition.

Likewise, if God wills a future thing only conditionally, this seems most of all to be the case for a future thing that depends on the freedom of the human will. But why not similarly for what depends on the freedom of His own will? And so God would will no future thing absolutely, determinately, or simply, but only conditionally.

And if anyone responds: "Indeed, because He is certain determinately of His own will"—certainly so also of the human will, since nothing can exist without Him specifically and naturally prior willing and similarly operating the same thing, as the twentieth and thirtieth chapters of this book teach.

Likewise, since an absolute and simple will is more determinate, more certain, and more actual than a conditional one, God would will one future thing more determinately, more certainly, and more actually—and therefore more perfectly intrinsically—than another; and therefore He would similarly know it, as can be shown through the eighteenth chapter of the first book. This can be refuted by the first supposition, and by the third part of the corollary of chapter 1, Book 1.

Likewise, when that thing is present or past, God will determinately, absolutely, and simply will it—just as He always wills all present and past things. And so, according to the passages of time, He would intrinsically will and will will temporal things mutably, differently, and differently—contrary to the twenty-third chapter of the first book and its corollary.

Likewise, some such object of God's volition about the future can not come about: suppose it does not. Then God wills it absolutely not to come about, just as He will later will and know; why then does He vainly will conditionally that it come about?

The third part follows evidently, since no proposition is absolutely first that has an extrinsic cause prior absolutely to the attribution of this inherence of its terms and its truth; but every proposition attributing any causation to any cause has a cause of this that is prior absolutely—namely, God, or the divine will—as the first part of the corollary makes clear. Moreover, every proposition that truly affirms any positive inferior thing of anything under God has a superior and absolutely prior cause—namely, God and the divine will—as can be perspicuously demonstrated from these premises and the ninth chapter of the first book.

If, however, someone wishes to say that a proposition is absolutely first because it attributes a proper attribute, or any accident, to its first subject, even though it has a prior cause, he says enough. For "absolutely first" excludes not only a prior subject but also a prior cause—indeed, universally everything that is prior. But let people speak as they wish; one should not quarrel about words, provided the substance is agreed upon.

It is certain, however, that a proposition attributing any accident to its first subject under God is first by the priority of its subject, since God is the subject of no accident, but the cause, as is evident from the corollary of chapter 1, Book 1.

However, very many propositions are first in a qualified sense and in a certain genus—namely, with respect to inferior and natural causes or things; such as those that attribute a proper effect to a proper cause that is first in the genus of all natural causes, or in a certain limited genus, and in some determinate science—namely, natural science or some other subalternate science—or that attribute a proper attribute to its first subject, or to the definition of its first subject, in the aforementioned modes. According to these principles, I think the Philosopher, in Book 1 of the Posterior Analytics, where he treats this subject, should not be unreasonably expounded.

CHAPTER XXXI. HE OBJECTS AND RESPONDS.

Now with this tower of the city of David erected up to heaven—indeed, above the heavens—fortified with battlements, set with a thousand shields, furnished with every armor of the strong, and on whose summit God alone, more exalted than all, most worthily sits as the supreme ruler, the Pelagians are troubled, rage in mind, are furious in body, grow pale in face, burn with their eyes, gnash and tremble, grind and screech, make tumult, cry out, shout, bark, and rage with all the fury of malice. For nothing is more destructive of the pestilential dogma of the Pelagians, nothing more defensive of the salvific dogma; nothing more humbles their pride, nothing more tramples all their insolence than this tower. Wherefore here with open assaults, there with hidden ambushes; here with art, there with fraud; here with boldness, there with deceit, they endeavor to destroy it. Nor do they consider themselves to have accomplished anything unless they have constructed an opposing tower, in which they themselves sit supreme and trample God underfoot; in which they themselves rule as lords and God is subjected as servant; in which their will precedes as mistress and God's will follows like an attendant; in which their will orders and commands as queen, and God's will obeys and serves as handmaid.

These therefore attack first in this manner: If God acts the free act of the created will prior by nature to the will itself, the will itself suffers prior by nature to acting; therefore it does not freely suffer. And if it suffers unfreely, since for it to so suffer is for it to act—or at least from its so suffering there necessarily follows its performing its free act—it unfreely performs its free act, which includes a contradiction and destroys the freedom of the will.

Likewise, a cause naturally precedes its effect. But our good or evil merits are the cause why God loves us or hates us, why He wills glory or punishment for us, as the entire Catholic faith holds and the entire canonical Scripture attests. And in testimony of their heretical falsehood, they strive to violently pervert the truthful Scripture and the tongues of Catholic Doctors. "It is written," they say: "Let us anticipate His face in confession" (Psalm 94). "In the morning my prayer shall come before You" (Psalm 87). "I anticipated the dawn and cried out; my eyes anticipated You before daybreak" (Psalm 118). "Return to Me, says the Lord of hosts, and I will return to you" (Zechariah 1). "The Lord is with you because you were with Him" (2 Chronicles 15). To which many similar passages present themselves in many places.

Likewise, in the last chapter of Mark it is written: "They went forth and preached everywhere, the Lord cooperating." Therefore, with the disciples operating first, the Lord cooperates afterward.

Whence Damascene, in his Sentences, chapter 43: "It must be known," he says, "that God antecedently wills all to be saved and to be fortunate in His kingdom. For He did not create us for punishing, but for receiving His goodness, since He is good; but He wills to punish sinners, since He is just. The first, then, is called the antecedent will and acceptance, existing from Himself; the second, the consequent will and concession, arising from our cause—and this latter is twofold: one dispensational and instructive, leading to salvation; the other desperate, leading to final punishment. This applies to things not in our power. But of those things that are in our power, the good things He antecedently wills and accepts; the pernicious and truly evil things He wills neither antecedently nor consequently."

Robert also, Bishop of Lincoln, in a certain question on the knowledge of God, asking how God knows things that happen by chance or by free will, responding by distinguishing between an antecedent and a conjoined cause, says that in the first way God is not the cause of contingent things, but in the second, because when they occur He makes them be; for nothing happens that does not happen by His agency. And in a certain question on the will of God, asking about the will of sign, he says that the good pleasure of God is the antecedent cause of the good of the universe and of the good of individuals; but of the evil of individuals, the good pleasure of God is not antecedent but conjoined, because when evil exists it is well ordered in the universe.

With which Damascene concordantly says in the passage just cited: "It must be known that the choice of actions is in our power. But the end of good actions belongs to God's operation, justly cooperating with those who pre-choose the good with a just conscience according to His foreknowledge; of evil actions, however, to God's abandonment, again according to the justice of His foreknowledge, which abandons."

Augustine also, in Book 13 of The City of God, chapter 15, says that for man's evil, his own will is prior; but for his good, the will of his Creator is prior—whether to make it, which had not existed, or to remake it, which had fallen and perished.

To which also certain similar things can be cited from Chrysostom in his various writings. Whence on the Epistle to the Hebrews, Homily 12, he writes thus: "It is necessary to show caution on every side, lest perhaps we fall asleep. For behold, he says, He who keeps Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep; 'and do not give your feet cause to stumble.' He did not say 'do not stumble,' but 'you, do not give cause.' It is in our power to give cause, and in no other's. For if we wish to stand firm and immovable, we shall not be moved."

"What then—is nothing of God? All things indeed are of God, but not so as to injure free will. 'If then all things are of God,' he says, 'why does He blame us?' For this reason I said: so that our free will may not be injured. It is therefore of our free will; for it is necessary that we first choose what is good, and then He introduces what is from Himself. He does not precede our wills, lest our free will be injured. But when we have chosen, then He introduces much help."

"And how then does Paul say, 'It is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy'? First, because he did not introduce this according to his own view, but as if gathering it from what had been set forth before; for he had said, 'It is written: I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy'; and therefore, 'It is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy.' You say to me then, 'Why does He still find fault?'"

"Second, this must be said: that to the one to whom more belongs, he said the whole belongs to that one. For it is ours to choose and to will; but God's to bring about and lead to perfection. Because therefore the greater part is His, he said the whole was His, according to the custom of men. For so we do—for example, we see a house well built and we say the whole thing is the craftsman's work; and yet not the entire work is his, but also the workmen's, and those who supply the material for the house, and many others. But because he contributed more, we call the entire work his. So also here."

"Again, in a multitude where many are, we say 'all are there'; but where few are, 'none.' So also Paul said, 'It is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy.' He establishes here two great things: one, that we may not be raised to pride—if you hasten,' he says, 'the effect cannot be yours unless help comes from above; for without it all will be in vain.' Yet whatever you have attained of those things toward which you hasten, it is clear that you attain it by running and willing."

"He did not therefore say this because we run in vain, but what? Because we run in vain if we think the whole is ours, if we do not attribute the greater part to God. For God did not wish the whole to be His, lest He seem to crown us without cause; nor again ours, lest we fall into pride. For if having the smallest part we think highly of ourselves, what if we were lords of our entire work?"

And further: "The prophet said, 'Wash your heart from wickedness, O Jerusalem.' You see that the good is also ours."

The height of this fortification, arrogantly exalting itself against the knowledge of God, the soldier of Christ, girded with spiritual arms powerful in God, will easily destroy, bring into captivity, and avenge upon the obedience of Jesus Christ, and every disobedience of the impudent neck; he will take away, shatter, and break all their carnal weapons.

For the first arrow of theirs, repelled by the breath of God, wounds the archer; for their first subtlety is refuted by itself. If, as you strive to argue, the created will acts its free act prior by nature to God, the created will acts prior by nature before God wills this, by the corollary of the tenth chapter of the first book—since, as you say, because the will acts, therefore God wills it to act, and not the reverse. Its acting, therefore, is the cause why God wills it to act, and a cause prior according to nature. Therefore the created will and the divine will co-cause that act of the divine will, and the created will does so prior by nature. Therefore, according to your own deduction set forth above, God unfreely causes His own free act. Similarly also you could argue about the Son of God the Father; for according to all Catholic Doctors, the Son has whatever He has from the Father, and this according to a certain causality and priority, as the foregoing in chapter 30 of this book teach.

Similarly also you could argue about the Sun and its action—that the Sun suffers prior by nature before it acts. And if you concede this, I ask what passion. If you say creation or preservation—so also the created will, and this does not help you. If you say preparation for acting—so also the created will. Suppose also the Sun is created most fully prepared to act, and the created will to will—this does not help you either, because a will most fully prepared to act can not act, as is evidently apparent from the first and second chapters of this second book.

If you say motion toward acting—under what species of motion is that motion contained? If it is an alteration, what kind of alteration, and in what kind of quality? That motion and the external illumination of the Sun are also really diverse, and the former can through omnipotence exist without the latter. Therefore from that motion another does not necessarily follow, as you suppose; and so regarding the created will the same must be held.

Such a motion made in the created will is also a certain disposition or preparation for willing; but by the foregoing, when the will is most sufficiently prepared, it does not necessarily follow that it wills. And as the second chapter of this book showed, no created thing, and no secondary cause, can necessitate the created will to its free act.

If you say that the Sun first suffers its acting before it acts—therefore prior by nature it receives its acting before it acts; and so the Sun's acting is prior by nature to the Sun acting it. But how is this, since every efficient cause precedes at least by nature all its effects?

If you say that the Sun's first passion is not its illuminating but some other acting prior to that—this seems to have been refuted above. Moreover, concerning that other acting, the preceding argument returns: for that acting is an acting of the Sun, as you concede; therefore prior by nature the Sun receives that acting before it acts it, etc., as before. And if you still do not blush to pretend that the Sun receives that acting through yet another acting, which it suffers by receiving prior to the first, you will be rebuked as before. Moreover, you will either make an infinite regress in this way—which nature abhors and the second supposition prohibits—or only a finite one, and then you will give some first acting of the Sun, against which the argument returns.

If, however, you say that the Sun's first passion is a certain conjunction or adjunction of it with its acting—that adjunction is either some motion or a relation alone. If a motion, it will be removed by the foregoing. If a relation alone, it must be a real relation, since it really helps toward acting; it must be founded in the conjoined extremes, just as equality is founded in equal quantities and similarity in similar qualities. But the foundation is prior by nature to what is founded, just as a cause to an effect; therefore both the Sun and its acting naturally precede this relation—the opposite of which was posited.

When therefore you argue, "God acts the act of the created will prior by nature to the will itself; therefore the will itself suffers prior by nature to acting," you err and do not conclude. For the will does not suffer there except by receiving its act or acting, and it is prior by nature for the act or acting to exist than to be received; and still prior by nature for the will to produce its act or acting than for it to exist, because through producing it begins to exist. Therefore it is prior by nature for the will to perform its act than for it to receive it and so to suffer.

And if you still reply that the will's acting is acted upon—because it does not eternally but newly has being, and if it is acted upon, it is acted upon through some being-acted-upon preceding it, and so the will still suffers prior by nature to acting—you err as before. For thus you could argue that every agent or active thing, even God Himself, is passive, and this prior by nature to being active, and always suffers before acting.

For let A be God's acting ad extra, in which God does not suffer, or does not suffer prior to acting. Then, as before: God's acting A is acted upon, because it does not eternally but newly has being; therefore it is acted upon through some being-acted-upon preceding it; and so God suffers there prior by nature to acting. Similarly also you could argue that there is no first acting of God ad extra: let A be the first; then, as before, A is acted upon, because it does not eternally but newly has being; therefore it is acted upon through some being-acted-upon preceding it, and every being-acted-upon happens through some acting prior to it. Therefore that being-acted-upon and A, the first acting, are causally and naturally preceded by another acting.

From these things, therefore, it evidently appears that it is not necessary that for every new acting, it be acted upon through some being-acted-upon naturally prior to it—indeed, not even through some acting prior to it—but through some agent causally and therefore naturally prior to it. When therefore you argue that the will's acting is acted upon, and therefore through some being-acted-upon naturally prior—this does not follow. For its first acting is acted upon through

God and through itself, not through any being-acted-upon or acting temporally or naturally preceding it.

If, however, anyone wishes to say that every created agent suffers prior by nature to acting, because in acting it is subjected to and made posterior to God acting, he can do so with much probability, and this would agree with the sayings of many. And speaking of suffering in this way, the argument does not proceed.

As for the argument about the causality of merit with respect to love and hatred in God, it is refuted by chapter 39 of the first book.

That passage from the Psalm, "Let us anticipate His face in confession," does not disturb the matter. For the prophet does not say "Let us anticipate the divine cooperation with us," but "His face in confession"—in confession, I say, of praise, praising God; whence it is added, "and in psalms let us sing joyfully to Him"; and in confession of sin, accusing yourself; therefore it follows, "Come, let us adore and fall down before God, let us weep before the Lord"—which, so that we may do it, He goes before us by working; for "confession and magnificence are His work."

Nor should the passage from Psalm 87, "In the morning my prayer shall come before You," disturb us; because it does not say "my prayer shall come before Your cooperation," but "before You"—as if to say, "In the morning I shall pray before You, before the face of my God"; which, so that I may do it, the Holy Spirit effects; for by Him the sons of God are led.

Those passages from Psalm 118 can similarly be understood and expounded. The remaining ones from Zechariah and Chronicles were expounded in chapter 35 of the first book. That passage from Mark, "the Lord cooperating," etc., does not even have an appearance of support.

The saying of Damascene does not present an obstacle either. For he does not affirm that the choice of actions is ours and God's, and ours prior to God's; but that we first choose well by working before we attain our final reward.

The saying of the Bishop of Lincoln, if rightly understood, does not present an obstacle. For "antecedent cause," as he speaks there, includes natural necessity. Whence he says: "The antecedence of which we speak here is the preordination of a future event that is necessary according to the course of nature."

As for what the same Bishop of Lincoln, Damascene, and Augustine seem to assert—that in good things the divine will is prior to the human, and in evil things posterior—how does this help your case? For the good act of the will and the evil act, according to the substance of the acts, are naturally good, as is evident from the twenty-fifth chapter of this second book and the twenty-sixth of the first book. They are also, with respect to the natural substance of the acts, of a similar nature. If, therefore, one is made antecedently by God according to the substance of the act, so is the other.

If also—as you suppose—it does not befit God to will or make evil antecedently, how does it befit Him to be dragged by the Devil, by any sinner, and by any harlot to consent to their wicked deeds, and to will and do all of them consequently? How does it befit the divine will to be subjected, like an adulteress, to any vile person, and oppressed by anyone violently? How also does God have a novel will following an evil created will? Or how is the divine will caused and followed from the human—contrary to the twentieth and twenty-third chapters of the first book?

Nevertheless, for the understanding of the Fathers, it must be known that, as the foregoing in chapters 34 and 39 of the first book attest, God wills Himself first; second, in a certain way He wills other goods outside Himself; third, evils—namely, insofar as from evils certain goods come, by His providence sweetly disposing all things. And so God wills good in a certain way prior and antecedently, but evil posteriorly and consequently, because finally for the sake of good.

It must further be known that God wills and makes the good merits of the will through grace naturally preceding, as chapters 40 and 41 of the first book taught; but evil things not so. Wherefore it can be said that God wills good things antecedently, but evil things in no way.

Augustine, however, when he says that for man's evil, his own will is prior to God's, means, as I think, that for man's penal evil, his own sinning will is prior to God's punishing will. For he says: "If in what was said, 'You shall die the death,' since it is not said 'by deaths,' we understand only that death which happens when the soul is abandoned by its life, which is God—for it was not abandoned so that it might abandon, but so that it might be abandoned, it abandoned—for man's evil, his own will is prior; for his good, the will of his Creator is prior, whether to make it, which had not existed, or to remake it, which had fallen and perished. Even if, therefore, we understand God to have announced this death in saying 'On the day you eat of it, you shall die the death'—as if He were saying, 'On the day you abandon Me through disobedience, I will abandon you through justice'—surely in that death the other two deaths are also announced, which without doubt were to follow."

What Damascene says—that God wills evil things neither antecedently nor consequently—according to the surface of the letter can be refuted by chapter 34 of the first book, and can also be understood and expounded through what was shown there. And what wonder if Damascene denied the pre-efficiency of God in the act of free will, since he denies even His co-efficiency, as the twenty-eighth chapter of this second book makes clear?

The saying of Chrysostom also, if understood literally, seems to need correction in many things, as the eighth chapter of this book, the twentieth and its corollary, and the thirtieth of this book prove.

COROLLARY

A NOTABLE COROLLARY: THAT SACRED THEOLOGY REQUIRES A PIOUS AND PRUDENT READER.

From these and other foregoing things, it is evidently recognized that sacred theology requires a reader who is equally pious and prudent, lest perhaps with the Manicheans he suspect something false in sacred Scripture, or while truthfully confessing all things to be true, he consent to the falsehood of the Pelagians; lest in defending Catholic Doctors he favor heretics, or in pursuing heretical authors he accuse Catholics; lest because he embraces something rightly said by someone, he also follow that person's error; or because he rejects someone's error, he also despise what was rightly said by that person.

For who, having read the chapters set forth in this second and first book—indeed, having read the books of canonical Scripture and the Doctors—does not easily see how many and how great passages of both superficially seem to consent to the Pelagian heresy? Such passages of sacred Scripture frequently present themselves copiously, some of which are recounted in the foregoing chapters, with which Pelagius also fortified himself; and Augustine himself sometimes partly consented, as is evident from chapters 35 and 45 of the first book; and sometimes appeared to consent to such an extent that Pelagius and the Pelagians sometimes fought against Augustine himself with Augustine's own sayings, as is evident from Book 1 of the Retractations, chapter 9, and chapter 15 of On Nature and Grace, chapter 67, and Book 2 of the Lombard's Sentences, distinction 28. And we experience all too frequently that many bring forth the sayings of Augustine and other Doctors to strengthen Pelagian wickedness, as is also evident from the chapters mentioned.

Chrysostom also seems to agree with this Pelagius. For in Homily 47 on John, expounding John 6—"No one can come to Me unless it has been given him by My Father"—he says: "When you hear 'that He gave,' do not think it a simple determination, but believe that the one who rendered himself worthy to receive, that one received."

And on Matthew 7—"Ask and it shall be given to you," etc.—in Homily 18 of the incomplete work, he says: "Ask, etc. Seek, etc. Knock, and it shall be opened to you, with grace following you. Nor do we acquire grace unless we have been diligent and have labored, so that the gift of God may not be given to the negligent. For grace is the help of human infirmity; but help is not given to those who sleep, but to those who hasten and strive."

And further, in Homily 23 on Matthew 19—"Not all receive this word, but those to whom it is given"—he says: "He did not say 'Not all can,' but 'not all receive'—that is, all can indeed receive, but not all wish to receive—'but those to whom it is given.' This does not signify that it is given to some and not given to others, but shows that unless we receive the help of grace, we can do nothing from ourselves. But that grace is not denied to those who will, the Lord says in the Gospel: 'Ask, and it shall be given to you; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you. For everyone who asks receives, and he who seeks finds, and to him who knocks it shall be opened.' But the will must precede, and so grace follows; for neither does grace without the will accomplish anything, nor can the will without grace."

And on Matthew 13—"To you it is given to know, etc.; but to them it is not given"—as recounted in the Gloss of Thomas, he says: "He said this not introducing necessity or fate, but demonstrating that those to whom it is not given are themselves the cause of all their evils, wishing to show that to know the divine mysteries is a gift of God and a grace given from above; yet not for this reason is free will destroyed. And this is clear from what follows. For so that neither those despair, nor these become lazy hearing that it is given to them, He shows that the beginning of these things is from us, when He adds: 'For to him who has, it shall be given, and he shall abound; but from him who has not, even what he has shall be taken away.' As if to say: when someone has desire and zeal, all the things that are from God shall also be given to him; but when he is empty of these and does not contribute what pertains to himself, neither are the things from God given to him."

And in his complete exposition on Matthew and on the Epistle to the Hebrews in various places, and in many other short works, he seems to profess the same view.

Damascene also, in chapter 39 of his Sentences, seems to agree with Pelagius, striving to show that free will can produce its act without God, as the twenty-eighth chapter of this second book makes clear. And further in chapter 44: "It must be known," he says, "that the choice of actions is in our power. But the end of good actions belongs to God's operation, justly cooperating with those who pre-choose the good with a just conscience according to His foreknowledge; but of evil actions, to God's abandonment, again according to the justice of His foreknowledge, which abandons."

And further in the same: "It must be known that God antecedently wills all to be saved. For He did not create us for punishing, but for receiving His goodness, since He is good; but He wills to punish sinners, since He is just."

Robert also, Bishop of Lincoln, in On Free Will, in his questions on the will of God, and in his other works, seems similarly to favor the Pelagians, saying that God does not make, or does not antecedently make, the free act of the will, and that the will from itself can consent or dissent to God offering grace or exciting it to any good.

The great Cassian likewise, in his book On the Protection of God—being the thirteenth of the Conferences of the Fathers, or the third of the seven conferences of three Fathers written for Honoratus and Eucherius, attributed to a certain Chaeremon—as is evidently apparent to those reading it, raved with Pelagius, as the holy Prosper also clearly shows in his book entitled For the Preachers of the Grace of God, Against the Book of Cassian the Priest On the Protection of God, as is also partially recounted in chapter 37 of the first book and afterward.

Concerning the authority of this holy Prosper, it is sufficiently established for scholarly men. About him also in the Decretum, distinction 15, last chapter, where the authentic writings of the Doctors are recounted, it is written in this manner: "Likewise, the short works of the blessed Prosper, a religious man." About him also Martin in his Chronicles, treating of Leo I the Emperor, says that Prosper, of Aquitanian nationality, flourished in these times, who, having been made a bishop in the kingdom of Italy, was illustrious for his learning and miracles. About him also Cassiodorus, in a certain work to the brothers of his monastery, writes thus: "Read diligently and listen gladly to Cassian the Priest, who wrote about the formation of faithful monks, who at the very beginnings of a sound purpose says that eight principal vices must be fled." And a little later: "Who, however, was rightly censured by the blessed Prosper on the subject of free will. Whence we advise that you should read him with caution in such matters when he goes too far. Whose sayings Victor, Bishop of Maritan, with the Lord's help, so purged, and added what was lacking, that the palm in these matters is rightly awarded to him."

With which Gennadius of Marseilles disagrees, and, consenting as it seems to the Pelagians, in On Illustrious Men, chapter 84, treating of Prosper, says: "Read the book published under his name against the short works of Cassian, which the Church of God approves as salutary, but he defames as harmful." For in truth, the views of Cassian and Prosper on the grace of God and free will are found in some things to be contrary to each other.

The Abbot Joachim also, although a man distinguished in the divine Scriptures, was infected by this plague of Pelagius, as is evident from the last chapter of the first book. Many others also, and great Doctors, seem frequently in many things to agree with Pelagius. Indeed, almost the entire world, as I fear and grieve, goes after him and favors his errors, while nearly all commonly believe that by the powers of free will alone they can decline from evil, do good, keep the commandments, merit grace, persevere finally, make themselves predestined and of the number of those to be saved; or if a few acknowledge that they need the help of God and His special co-efficiency, they most proudly place themselves and their free will before God and the divine free will.

Who therefore between Scylla and Charybdis, between the whirlpool and the storm, between the right and the left, walks directly and safely, unless the pious and prudent reader, not leaning on his own prudence, but upon Him who is at once the guide, the way, and the terminus? Because He is the unbending truth; who, as Wisdom attests, is the guide of wisdom and the corrector of the wise.

And what Catholic does not know that sacred Scripture, which the Father sanctified and sent into the world, can in no part of itself be—nor ought to be—corrected by man? And what theologian does not know that other writings of whatever writers are not always fortified with such firmness, but can sometimes be corrected by men? Which is evidently demonstrated by the real contradiction among them. For who after the canonical writers is greater than Origen, Jerome, Cyprian, and the most illustrious Augustine? The later of whom rightly reprehend the first. For he erred most gravely, as no theologian is unaware, and the blessed Jerome corrected some of his works.

The same Jerome also sometimes reprehends himself on the fault of translation. Whence on Isaiah, Book 5, expounding chapter 19—"There shall not be for Egypt a work that makes head and tail, bending and restraining itself"—he says: "In what we translated as 'bending and restraining,' we can say 'bent and wanton,' so as to understand the old man and the boy. But we, translating the Hebrew word Acmon hastily, were deceived by its ambiguity and said 'restraining.'"

And further in the same book and chapter, on the passage "And the land of Judah shall be a celebration to Egypt," he says: "I think it better to reprehend my own error than, while I blush to confess my ignorance, to persist. For instead of what I translated as 'And the land of Judah shall be a celebration to Egypt,' in the Hebrew is read Agga, which is usually interpreted as 'celebration'—whence also Haggai is turned into 'festive'—and 'fear'; which Aquila translated more significantly into a Greek word meaning when someone, frightened and timid, rolls his eyes around and dreads the approaching enemy. Wherefore I think that it should be translated as 'into fear' instead of 'celebration,' which also better agrees with the course of the prophecy."

And on the matter of bigamy—because writing to Oceanus and on Paul's Epistle to Timothy, as is recounted in the Decretum, distinction 26, "Of one," and further distinction 28, last question, "It is necessary"—he asserted that someone who before baptism had one wife and after baptism another does not become a bigamist, since all old things are dismissed in the entirely renewed person through baptism. On this error Ambrose, Augustine, and Innocent rebuke him, as is contained in the same places in the Decretum, which the Church also follows.

What theologian also is unaware of the great contradiction and contention between Jerome and Augustine, which their letters clearly show? In one of which—namely, the twentieth of Jerome's letters—Jerome says that he judges certain things in a certain letter of Augustine directed to him as heretical. And they contradict each other on translations of the Bible, on the titles of the Psalms, on their authors, on Melchizedek, and on many other things.

The blessed Cyprian also, a Catholic Doctor and distinguished Martyr, teaching that baptism conferred by heretics is invalid, is rebuked by the blessed Augustine in On a Single Baptism, as is also recounted in Book 4 of the Sentences of Peter, distinction 6. The same Augustine, the preeminent Doctor, also frequently reprehends himself, and for this reason composed a book of Retractions of his writings. And after that, in his book On the Predestination of the Saints, he retracts certain sayings of his, as is evident from chapters 35 and 45 of the first book. So also the Venerable Bede wrote a book of Retractions; so also the blessed Hilary is said to have written a book of Retractions, in which he is reported to have rightly retracted what Peter recounts in Book 3 of the Sentences, distinction 15, from his book On the Trinity—namely, that Christ did not feel any pain of the Passion, and indeed did not even have the sensitive nature capable of pain. The blessed Jerome also corrects and retracts certain of his own deeds, as the foregoing makes clear.

If, therefore, so many and such great Doctors and Scribes sometimes erred in writing, why is it not permitted sometimes to suspect the same of others, especially when they sometimes contradict these great Doctors, and sometimes each other? Why, therefore, is it not permitted to examine their sayings in doubtful and suspect places—and especially where they contradict each other—and with all humility, reverence, and sobriety, if necessary, to correct them, or rather humbly to declare what has been corrected by better Fathers?

Wherefore also the most holy and learned Augustine, in On Nature and Grace, chapter 61, having recounted that the adversary against whom he writes brought forth in his support many testimonies not from the canonical Scriptures but from certain short works of Catholic authors, adds: "The first testimonies he put forth—because the name of the one who said them is not read there, either because that person did not write them, or because the manuscript you sent, if it happened to lack them through some corruption—what need is there to examine? Especially since I know that in the writings of any men whatsoever I am free, because I owe unhesitating assent only to the canonical books."

And to Paulina, On Seeing God, chapter 4: "If anything is established by the clear authority of the divine Scriptures—namely, those that are called canonical in the Church—it must be believed without any doubt. But as for other witnesses or testimonies by which something is persuaded to be believed, you may believe or not believe, weighing how much weight they have or do not have for producing faith."

And further, chapter 29: "With these things carefully and confidently examined—those things which you see—attend to those things which you believe; and in these very things which you believe though unseen, weigh the credibility of the witnesses in discerning. For you do not believe me as you believe Ambrose, from whose books I placed so many testimonies. Or if you think we should be believed with equal balance, will you in any way compare us to the Gospel? Or will you equate our writings with the canonical Scriptures? Surely, if you judge rightly in discerning, you see us far below that authority; and me much further. But however much you believe either of us, you in no way compare either to that excellence."

And in Epistle 7, to Marcellinus: "Your letter contains a question not from the divine books but from mine. In such questions I do not labor much; because even if my view cannot be defended by clear reason, it is mine, not that of the author whose meaning it is not permitted to reject, and when, not being understood, what is gathered from him is judged to be blameworthy."

"I therefore confess that I am of the number of those who strive to progress by writing, and progress by writing. Whence if anything has been put forth by me too incautiously or unlearnedly, which is rightly reprehended not only by others who can see it, but also by me myself—because I too should at least afterward see it, if I progress—this is neither to be wondered at nor grieved over, but rather pardoned and rejoiced in; not because an error was made, but because it was disapproved. For he who wants others to err so that his own error may be hidden loves himself too perversely. For how much better and more useful it is if, where he erred, others do not err, and by their admonition he may be freed from error! But if he wishes, let him at least not have companions in error."

"If God grants me what I wish—that I may gather and demonstrate in a work intended for this purpose whatever in all my books most rightly displeases me—then men will see that I am no respecter of my own person. But you who love me greatly, if you assert against those whose malice, ignorance, or intelligence reprehends me, that I have nowhere erred in my writings, you labor in vain; you have not taken up a good cause. You are easily defeated with me myself as judge, since it does not please me when my dearest friends consider me to be such as I am not."

And further, speaking to certain friends urging him to hastily complete his books on Genesis and on the Trinity, so that he himself while still alive could defend them once written against all, he says: "Which you say for this reason: because you do not think there is anything in them that can be rightly censured. Otherwise you would urge me not to their publication but to more diligent correction. But I look more to true judges, severe with truth, among whom I wish first of all to place myself, so that only those things may come to them for reprehension that could not be seen by me, however diligently searching."

And further: "If a reason is given against the authority of the divine Scriptures, however acute it may be, it deceives by its semblance of truth; for it cannot be true. Conversely, if the authority of the holy Scriptures is objected against a most manifest and certain reason, the one who does this does not understand, and opposes to the truth not the meaning of those Scriptures, which he was unable to penetrate, but his own; and sets against it not what is in them, but what he finds in himself, as though in their name."

Whose authority I follow all the more safely, venerate more devoutly, and embrace more firmly for this very reason. For I know that God resists the proud, gives grace to the humble, and understanding to the little ones.

The same author, to Jerome, Epistle 9 in the collection of Augustine's letters: "I confess to your charity," he says, "that I have learned to defer this fear and honor only to those books of Scripture that are now called canonical: that I most firmly believe no author of them to have erred in anything. But if I find in them anything that seems contrary to truth in their writings, I have no doubt that either the manuscript is faulty, or the translator did not follow what was said, or I have failed to understand."

"Other writings, however, I read in such a way that however much they excel in holiness and learning, I do not for that reason think something true because they thought so, but because they could persuade me—either through those canonical authors or by probable reason—that it does not depart from the truth. Nor do I think you, my brother, feel otherwise. I say plainly: I do not think you want your books to be read as those of the Prophets or Apostles, about whose writings it is wrong to doubt that they are free from all error. Perish such a thought from pious humility and truthful consideration."

I have said these things lest I seem to think highly of myself, to act wrongly, or to reprehend the Fathers unjustly. For whoever has been a Father or brother—even an angel from heaven—who has said, written, held, or taught the Pelagian heresy, I will fearlessly reprehend him. For I am most certain, and do not hesitate in the least, that the Old and New Testaments, Christ, Paul, Augustine, Gregory, and the other Doctors, the holy Church of God in so many synods and councils, so many popes and saints, and so many and such powerful arguments in the destruction of this heresy, have not erred, have not been blind, nor have led the blind into a pit.

Furthermore, about sacred Scripture I boldly pronounce that no part of it really contradicts another part, or consents to the Pelagian heresy; and if any passage seems superficially to do so, this assuredly happens from a defect of an eye that is not healthy. Therefore the eye must be purged so that it can sincerely see the true meaning of Scripture according to the expositions of the saints, or another meaning to be divinely inspired.

That Augustine sometimes agreed with the Pelagians in part cannot be denied; and therefore, reproving himself, he repented. If there are any other places in his books beyond those he expressly retracted, in which he truly—and not merely apparently—agreed with Pelagius, those he retracted in general and in their likeness, as can be gathered from chapter 45 of the first book.

If, therefore, Augustine—the most learned of Doctors, the most subtle penetrator, the sharpest disputant, and the most valiant vanquisher of the Pelagians—was sometimes deceived by their error, what wonder if Chrysostom and other lesser ones?

And in truth it seems to me that Chrysostom almost contradicts Augustine, departs from him slightly, draws too close to the Pelagians, and does not in all things walk rightly in his expositions toward the truth of the Gospel. For the Savior, commending the gratuitous grace of God, says: "No one can come to Me unless the Father who sent Me draws him," and "unless it has been given him by My Father." But if, as Chrysostom says, the one who renders himself worthy to receive, that one receives—then rather the one who makes himself worthy, through this, draws the Father and Christ to himself, rather than the reverse. Rather also such a person, through his own worthiness as through a worthy merit and a condign price, buys from the Father the right to come to Christ, rather than the Father giving it to him. And so it would better be said: "No one can come to Me unless by his preceding merit he draws God the Father, and unless he first merits that this be sold or repaid to him by the Father."

And in this exposition he seems to contradict Augustine, Part 1 on John, Homily 26, who expounding that most true word of the Word, says thus: "A great commendation of grace! No one comes unless drawn. Whom He draws and whom He does not draw, why He draws this one and does not draw that one—do not wish to judge, if you do not wish to err." Yet according to Chrysostom, there would be some cause—namely, the difference of merits.

What Chrysostom also says—that someone renders himself worthy of coming to Christ—could perhaps be corrected by the foregoing in chapter 39 of the first book. For there is no worthiness antecedent to the divine will.

Augustine also, in On the Predestination of the Saints, chapter 12, treating what he said in his little book against Porphyry—namely, that the salvation of the Christian religion never failed anyone who was worthy—says: "If one inquires whence anyone is worthy, there are some who say: by the human will. But we say: by grace, or by divine predestination."

What Chrysostom also says—that the will ought to precede grace—seems very suspect and close to the Pelagian error; indeed, not close but identical, as the chapters of the first book on grace make clear.

Does he not also, on the Epistle to the Hebrews recounted above, seem to establish that not giving one's feet cause to stumble, overcoming any temptations, standing firm, and persevering finally, is in the free will of man alone and in nothing else—contrary to chapters 4, 8, and other chapters of this second book, and contrary to authors quite greater than himself recounted in those chapters?

What he also says—that God in no way precedes our wills, but the reverse, even in their good acts—the thirtieth chapter of this book condemns, fortified by greater authorities and valid arguments.

The argument he adduces for himself is, moreover, clearly irrational. "So that our free will may not be injured," he says. For what kind of injury to the created free will is it to serve, to be subject, and to follow the Creator, King of kings and Lord of lords? Perish the thought that anyone with the Nimrodites should think it a grievous servitude to submit to the supreme God! For to serve Him is without doubt to reign, the best freedom, and perfect salvation; and to wish to depart from His subjection is proved to be the worst servitude.

O Catholic Father: either you hold that the human will alone suffices to produce its acts, or that the divine co-efficiency is necessarily required. If the first, you separate and stray from the truth of Catholic doctrine with Nimrod and the Pelagians, as the twentieth chapter of this book attests. If the second, why do you teach soberly? If in the common act of the human and divine wills, the free will of one of them must in your judgment necessarily be injured, why, I ask, would the divine free will not be injured more than the human, while you place the human first and the divine second? While you make the human will the preceding mistress and the divine will the following attendant? While you establish the human will as free, exempting it even from God's service, and make the divine will a handmaid and servant, subjecting it even to man's service?

Here also, Father, you seem to consent to Pelagius, as the thirtieth chapter of this book attests. How also do you say that the Apostle did not introduce "it is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs," etc., as his own view, when he truly—not falsely—concludes this from canonical Scripture? Which both his entire argument and many of his other epistles evidently indicate, as well as many great Catholic Doctors expounding and frequently citing that apostolic word.

Your second response and exposition of that apostolic word also seems plainly to contradict the same Apostle, Christ, and many other disciples of Christ—our doctors—and to consent to Pelagius, as the twentieth chapter of this book and its corollary, with the following chapters, clearly teach.

In that reasoning which you then suggest—"The prophet said, 'Wash your heart from wickedness'; therefore the good is ours"—if you mean ours only, namely that the sinner alone could wash himself from sin without God specifically washing him, as you seem to think, you err disgracefully—just as Damascene in a similar subtlety disgracefully erred, as the twenty-eighth chapter of this book showed. Does not the prophet elsewhere say to God, "Wash me yet more, O God, from my injustice"?

This view seems to consent to the senseless view of Pelagius, as chapter 43 of the first book discloses. I know, however, that I could fashion glosses for him; but in truth I have neither the knowledge nor the conscience to gloss him in these matters. Therefore, as I said above, theological studies require a pious and prudent reader. But whoever more pious and prudent knows how to truly gloss him in such matters, not reconciling Pelagius, it pleases me; I rejoice together and acquiesce.

Perish the thought that I should not more gladly always learn from anyone the true mind of any irreprehensible doctor, rather than reprehend him from ignorance by not understanding him. But let the glossers of his sayings beware, I beseech, lest they open a way for the Pelagians—exiled from the Church of Christ—to return, and provide a Catholic gloss for their heretical sayings.

If indeed such a glosser is found to be more pious and prudent than Augustine, Gregory, Bede, Prosper, very many holy popes and lesser bishops, synods and councils, and the entire holy Church of God—who do not gloss such sayings of Pelagius and the Pelagians, but absolutely condemn them, as many chapters of the first and second books teach, and very many authentic books and histories attest—it would be wonderfully amazing for anyone to dare to profess himself similar and so great.

For if these holy Fathers knew how to gloss such sayings in a Catholic manner and did not wish to, but condemned them as heretical—this would be the worst impiety. If they wished to and did not know how—this would be the greatest ignorance, since you alone and easily know it.

The same seems to be said of Damascene and the other Fathers mentioned above, although some of them in certain of their sayings could be glossed more colorably.

Robert, Bishop of Lincoln, however, wrote much on divine knowledge and will, and on free will. On free will indeed he wrote twice. First, a little book that begins thus: "Since there can be doubt about the being of a thing"—in which he proceeds more disputatively and inquiringly than determinatively or definitively. Whence also at the end: "Whether the motion of free will is from itself or not," he says, "I do not determine, but leave for those who see clearly to investigate." And further, "Having inquired and discussed whether the motion of free will by which it is moved to evil is from God," he adds, "This again I do not determine." And further, "Having inquired and discussed whether free will can will the gratuitous good and consent to the offering of the first grace from itself, or not, but from God first willing and acting this, and how then there would not be necessity there," he does not determine, as he says; and he says he leaves these questions, with many others touched upon there, for posterity to determine.

Second, he wrote another little book on free will, which begins in this manner: "Since by the freedom of the will man is worthier than the other animals"—in which he proceeds more determinatively. Wherefore I never cite the first of these, but sometimes cite the second.

And if anyone objects that it seems unworthy for so small a person to reprehend such great Fathers, the reply must be given firmly: it is more unworthy, assuredly, to consent to heretical errors by favoring such great men, and to allow to be reprehended the irreprehensible Father of our faith, the irreprehensible spotless bride of Christ, our irreprehensible mother, and our greater Doctors.

For what Christian does not know that the Catholic doctrine of Christ is to be preferred to every contrary doctrine? And who does not know that if Doctors disagree, the more authoritative in such a matter is to be preferred? And who in this matter, after the authors of sacred Scripture, is more authoritative than Augustine?

Even if I, a small person, ought not to reprehend such great Fathers, the Truth is great, who does not shrink from reprehending every reprehensible person without regard to persons. Nor do I simply reprehend them, but if they follow the error of Pelagius, I make manifest that they have been reprehended by greater Fathers.

But I do not even simply reprehend them nor show them to have been reprehended. Rather, I say that I do not yet have the knowledge or the conscience to sustain their sayings in all things. For if I accept the surface of the letter, I seem to consent to the Pelagians. If I attempt to gloss the letter, I fear that, if according to the mind of the speakers, I may still favor Pelagius; but if contrary to or beyond the mind of the speakers, I will be a liar against my own mind.

I do not know truly before God how to gloss such sayings unless, in my judgment, I consent to reconcile the Pelagians through a similar gloss and condemn the Fathers who had condemned them, or at least to invalidate their sentence. Which I therefore leave to the prudence of my superiors; and if they teach that such sayings are to be sustained in a Catholic manner, I will most devoutly acquiesce.

Nevertheless, it could probably be said that Chrysostom does not wish to assert that anyone can begin, continue, consummate, or universally do anything good without the help of grace. Wherefore he also seems to wish consequently to assert that no one can merit the first grace.

Whence on Matthew 7—"Ask, and it shall be given to you," etc.—in the incomplete work, Homily 18, where he was cited above, he says: "The Lord, knowing that whatever He had commanded was impossible for men and above nature as regards human nature, and that the commandments were greater than human power, sends them to God, whose grace knows nothing impossible, saying: 'Ask, and it shall be given to you'—so that what cannot be accomplished by men may be fulfilled through the grace of God."

"God created every sensible creature armed and fortified. Some He fortified with swift running of feet; others He armed with claws; others with swift wings; others with teeth; others with horns. But man alone He so disposed that his strength would be God Himself; and in that He made him weaker than all in himself, He willed him to be stronger than all in Himself."

"For knowing, O God, that to know and worship God is eternal life, but to be ignorant of and despise Him is everlasting perdition, He did not create him so weak that he could do absolutely nothing good—lest He whom He had made above all things and for whom He had made all things should be found inferior to all. Nor did He create him so powerful that he could do whatever he wished from himself even without God's help—so that, compelled by the necessity of his weakness, he would always necessarily have his Lord. And truly it is a most just thing that the creature necessarily have its maker."

"For if all man's power is in God, and yet he despises the author of all his goods, how much more would he neglect God if his power were in himself?"

And further, treating Matthew 21 on the tied donkey and its loosing: "Because of certain likenesses, men not knowing the Son of God were compared to donkeys. For this animal is unclean, and compared to almost all other beasts, more irrational, foolish, weak, ignoble, and burden-bearing. So were men before the coming of Christ."

"The donkey, however, was tied—that is, impeded by the bond of diabolical error, so that it did not have the freedom to go where it wished. For before we sin, we have free will to follow the will of the Devil or not. But if once sinning we have bound ourselves to his works, we can no longer escape by our own power; but like a ship with a broken rudder, it is carried wherever the storm wills. So also a man who has lost the help of divine grace through sin does not do what he wills, but what the Devil wills; and unless God by the strong hand of His mercy frees him, he will remain in the bonds of his sins until death."

What he therefore seems to say—that man sometimes merits grace, and the human will precedes grace—can perhaps be expounded of the increase of grace, or of the second grace, not the first; or also of any gift of God that man merits through grace. For further in the same homily he says: "It is written: 'Desire wisdom, keep justice, and God will provide it for you.' But what do you say? This very thing I ask—to know and to do. And how can I do before I receive? Do what you can, so that you may be able to do more; and keep what you know, so that you may know more. For justice itself works itself, and manifests itself."

"How? While you work justice in yourself, justice works you in itself. For every art works itself. For example: you work a vineyard, you gather its fruits, and delighted in them you work better. You see that the vineyard itself cultivates itself by bearing fruit for you while it is cultivated. So conversely, he who carries out the work of sin—since sin is an unclean spirit—works in him the delight of sinning, so that while delighted in sin he sins more. So also he who works justice—since justice itself is the Holy Spirit—works in him the delight of doing justice, so that delighted in justice he does more."

"Such is what Wisdom says: 'Have thought for the precepts of God, and meditate always on His commandments, and He Himself will strengthen your heart and give you the desire for wisdom.' You see that justice itself works itself, with you only beginning and laboring; but it opens itself when cultivated. For just as he who sins, while sinning, becomes more and more darkened in mind, and recedes from the light of truth, so that no salutary knowledge remains in him—only malice alone, of which Solomon says, 'The wisdom of the impious is wickedness'—so also he who works justice, while working, becomes more and more brightened in mind, and ascends to the knowledge of greater wisdom, and justice itself offers itself like a mirror before the eyes of his heart."

By "grace" he also sometimes understands some gift of God that is grateful and accepted, which we merit by laboring—such as knowledge, wisdom. Whence also immediately before that saying from the same homily objected above, expounding the word "Ask, and it shall be given to you," he says: "God so disposed us to be that neither, by being diligent and laboring over the Scriptures, do we acquire the saving knowledge without the grace of God—lest we attribute to ourselves what we know—nor, however, do we acquire grace unless we have been diligent and labored over the Scriptures—lest the gift of God be given to the negligent."

Through that which he implies—that man's labor and will precede grace—he perhaps understands a preparation that sometimes precedes the infusion of grace, as chapters 37 and 43 of the first book make mention. Yet he does not say that man alone makes this preparation without God, nor antecedently to God, nor that it is in any way meritorious of grace freely given.

And although on the Epistle to the Hebrews he seems to wish to deny that God properly performs the act of the human will, he appears elsewhere to hold this view. Whence on Matthew 27—"If anyone says anything to you, say that the Lord has need of them, and immediately he will let them go"—he says: "Do not consider what happened to be a small thing. For who persuaded the owners of the animals not to wish to contradict, or, being unwilling, to be silent and agree? And in this He instructs the disciples that He could also have prevented the Jews, but did not wish to."

Or perhaps he understands that God does not so act or pre-act the act of the human will as to compel it unwillingly, or violently necessitate it to act. Whence on Matthew 16—"If anyone wishes to come after Me," etc.—he writes thus: "See that He does not make the speech coercive. For He did not say, 'Whether you wish or do not wish, you must suffer this.' 'If anyone wishes,' etc. And by saying this, He attracted more; for the one who releases the hearer to freedom attracts more, while the one who uses violence very often impedes."

And on the same word of Christ, Luke 9, he says: "Since the Savior is pious and kind, He wishes to have no unwilling or coerced servant, but willing ones, giving thanks to Him for the service. And therefore, compelling no one and imposing no necessity, but persuading and doing good, He attracts all who are willing, saying: 'If anyone wishes.'"

From this, however, it appears that he does posit God pre-acting the act of the human will. For why else would he say that the Savior wishes to have willing servants, giving thanks to Him for the service? Why indeed would they give thanks to the Savior, unless for the benefit of the service first given and first received from Him? Otherwise it would seem that the Savior ought rather to give thanks to the servants, because they freely anticipated Him with the service of their obedience.

Would not anyone who thought otherwise pervert the words of Christ, and could not be Christ's disciple but rather His master, as the series of the Gospels makes clear? For Christ says: "If anyone wishes to come after Me"—He does not say, "If anyone wishes to go before Me, or to precede Me." And He says, "and follow Me"—He does not say, "and precede Me." And again: "He who does not bear his cross and come after Me cannot be My disciple."

Although, therefore, Chrysostom perhaps erred at times, he seems to have later corrected himself and retracted what he had erroneously said. Whence the blessed Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria, in a certain letter to John, Bishop of Antioch—and it is recounted in the Decretum, distinction 50, "John"—writes thus: "John Chrysostom was judged by two synods of orthodox bishops, but was afterward restored." It is not, however, expressly stated there that he was judged on the charge of heresy or error in his doctrine, in his writings or sayings. Nevertheless, immediately before, the following is prefixed: "Peter denied Christ, and yet afterward was made the prince of the Apostles. Paul stoned Stephen, and yet was chosen by the Lord as an Apostle. And many, returning from heresy to the unity of the Catholic faith, have been received in their orders; some indeed have been promoted to the episcopal rank—such as Augustine and many others."

Isidore, however, Bishop of Seville, in On Illustrious Men, chapter 6, after a great commendation of this John, adds: "He, however, in the thirteenth year of his episcopate, was oppressed by the hostility of Theophilus, Bishop of Alexandria. For the bishops favoring the Emperor Arcadius condemned him though innocent, and deposed him from the episcopate, and thrust him into exile in Pontus."

I do not know, however, whether this condemnation was one of the aforesaid judgments, or another separate one. Yet much should be presumed in favor of the double synodal judgment of many orthodox bishops. Theophilus also, Bishop of the city of Alexandria—as Gennadius, Priest of Marseilles, attests in On Illustrious Men, chapter 33—was a Catholic Doctor, a valiant vanquisher of heretics, and was praiseworthy and distinguished for the holiness of his life.

John Damascene also seems to have erred not a little in his life. Why then could he not have erred similarly in his doctrine? For in the little book On Lovers of the World and Lovers of God, it is reported of him that in Damascus among the Agarenes—who are commonly called Saracens—he learned their letters opportunely, and that because of his gentle and sweet conversation with all, he became known to the king, and was honored by him with the greatest honor, and used to go with him, as a beloved, to the tomb or shrine of Muhammad himself. He was compelled there by the king to worship and venerate his body, and to bow to the stone, and to proclaim Muhammad. And proclaiming Muhammad, he said obscurely, "These people say," and in a loud voice, "that Muhammad is the Apostle of God." On their return to Damascus he was honored by the king and his magnates magnificently, as one who fully proclaimed the defiled one.

If, however, in doing these things he contracted any profane pollution, it seems to have been abolished and purged in the false accusation against him that followed—regarding a most grievous crime toward the king—and in the cutting off of the thumb of his right hand. Carrying it with him, kneeling before an image of the most merciful Virgin, which he had with him, and praying devoutly with tears and the deepest groaning for three days, he obtained its perfect restoration. After the death of the aforementioned king, having become a monk, in his book called Panax or On the Hundred Heresies, as the hundredth heresy, he refutes and vanquishes the heresy of the Agarenes—the same as the Ishmaelites.

Nevertheless, by similar methods perhaps to those by which Chrysostom, and also by what was set forth in chapter 28 of this book, Damascene too can perhaps be expounded, and similar Catholic Doctors who said similar things. For we ought reasonably to interpret the sayings of Catholics in the more benign sense we can; but those of heretics, in their perfect hatred, we should judge according to their heresy. For the understanding of a saying is weighed from the intention and cause of the speaking.

Nor should I reasonably be accused of charging Chrysostom, Damascene, and other saints with the worst crime—namely, heretical depravity—since even if they said a heresy, they would not immediately be held as heretics. For the one who from simplicity and ignorance says a heresy, not intending to defend it obstinately, but prepared to stand by the judgment of the Church and of his superiors, is not immediately to be held as a heretic. Perish the thought! For then too many and too great Catholic Doctors would be heretics. Perish, perish the thought! But rather, about any such person who has zeal for God but not according to knowledge, it can be said: "If in anything you think otherwise, God will reveal this to you also." He is therefore to be admonished and gently instructed.

For Papias says: "They are called heretics who hold wrong opinions about the Lord or creature, or about Christ or the Church, and who thereafter defend with obstinate depravity the perfidy of the newly conceived error." Augustine also, in Book 18 of The City of God, chapter 52: "Those who in the Church of Christ have some morbid and depraved view, if corrected so that they may hold what is sound and right, resist obstinately and refuse to correct their pestilential and death-dealing dogmas, but persist in defending them—these become heretics, and going outside are reckoned among the enemies who exercise the Church."

This same thing is evidently proved by Innocent III, who, as is evident in the Decretals, "On the Supreme Trinity and the Catholic Faith," chapter "We Condemn," condemned and rejected a certain little book of the Abbot Joachim on the Trinity as heretical; yet Joachim himself, because he submitted all his writings to the judgment of the Roman Church, he in no way condemned as a heretic. Whence he says thus: "If anyone presumes to defend or approve the view or doctrine of the aforesaid Joachim in this matter, let him be rejected by all as a heretic. In no way, however, do we wish to derogate from the flourishing monastery of which Joachim himself was the founder; since there the institution is regular and the observance salutary; especially since Joachim himself ordered all his writings to be submitted to us for the judgment of the Apostolic See, either to be approved or to be corrected—also dictating a letter, to which he subscribed with his own hand, in which it is firmly stated that he holds that faith which the Roman Church holds, which, by the Lord's disposition, is the mother and mistress of all the faithful."

And if anyone still objects that according to my view, at least the writings of Chrysostom, Damascene, Cassian, Joachim, and the other Doctors who sometimes write heretical things should not be read, nor even cited, because of the suspicion and fear of enclosed venom—indeed they are to be read, but not as the holy Gospel; rather with prudence and caution, as Cassiodorus advises reading Cassian, as was recounted above. Just as also other Doctors advise reading Origen, who, as the same Doctors affirm, erred most grievously in many things.

Whence Cassiodorus, in On the Institution of Divine Letters, chapter 1: "Origen," he says, "is designated as a heretic by the opinion of many Fathers. Although the authority of so many Fathers attacks him, he has even now been again condemned by the most blessed Pope Vigilius in the present time. But how he should be read, the holy Jerome indicated probably in a letter he wrote to Tranquillinus, so as neither to remove the studious from the reading of him that is necessary, nor again to cast the incautious headlong into ruin. Him indeed they have not undeservedly said should be treated like dill, which while it seasons the foods of the sacred writings, is itself thrown away after being cooked and dried up. About him it was said in conclusion: 'Where good, no one better; where bad, no one worse.' And therefore he is to be read cautiously and wisely, so that we may take from him the most salutary juices, and at the same time avoid drinking the poisons of his perfidy, which are contrary to our life."

To which also that saying of Virgil can be fittingly applied: when asked by someone what he was doing as he read Ennius, he replied: "I seek gold in dung."

"Wherefore in the works of the same Origen, as far as I was able to find in passing, the places that are said contrary to the rules of the Fathers I have marked with the sign of heresy's rejection, so that he may not be able to deceive—he who is shown by such a sign to be guarded against in his depraved meanings. The later writers, however, say he should be entirely avoided, for the reason that he subtly deceives the innocent. But if with the Lord's help caution is applied, his venomous things cannot harm."

In the Fourth Council of Carthage also, as Gratian recounts in distinction 37, we read thus: "A bishop should not read the books of the Gentiles; but let him read through those of the heretics, either out of necessity or for the occasion."

This view is also clearly proved by the authority of Book 7 of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 7, and certain other passages written in the third book of this work.

How, moreover, writers or writings of this sort ought to be cited is known from the foregoing. For they cannot and should not be cited as the holy Gospel, but as probable and reputable witnesses in places where they are not proved to have erred. Nevertheless, the authority of such persons, insofar as it concerns the speaker, does not produce full faith. For how, on the basis of the speaker alone, shall I believe him in other things, when it is established that he once erred and said what is false?

I know that the civil and canonical laws hold the same about witnesses. Wherefore also Augustine, to Jerome, Epistle 19 in the collection of Jerome's letters, shows that there is no falsehood at all in the entire sacred Scripture; because once an officious falsehood is admitted in sacred Scripture, no particle of those books will remain that cannot, as each sees fit, be referred by the same rule to the office of the lying author; and so nowhere in the sacred writings will there be the certain authority of chaste truth.

Indeed, not only the authority of those who have erred, but even of those who have not erred but could have erred—if there are any such—does not, insofar as concerns the authority of the speaker alone, furnish the fullest faith. Only the authority of Him who neither errs, nor could, can, or ever will be able to err furnishes that. The most authentic citation, therefore, is that of the prophets, when they say, "Thus says the Lord"—not "thus says Priscian, Aristotle, Cicero, Justinian, Pythagoras, Boethius, Euclid, Ptolemy," or any of the other fallible ones.

Wherefore it is established that sacred Scripture—which the Father sanctified and sent into the world—by reason of its unerring Author, is to be incomparably preferred in firmness and certainty to all other authentic writings, and that to it alone, by reason of its Author alone, the fullest faith is to be given. For although men seem to have written canonical Scripture, and "every man is a liar," yet they did not write it themselves, but through them as through His pen, the Spirit of Truth, the right finger of God, wrote it, as the same Scripture attests in many places, and the Catholic Doctors attest, and the Catholic faith holds. About other fallible writers, however, through whom it is not established that the Holy Spirit spoke, a different view must be held, as the most learned Augustine proves and teaches in the places mentioned above.

CHAPTER XXXII. THAT IN EVERY NON-ACTION COMMON TO GOD AND CREATURE, IT IS NATURALLY PRIOR THAT GOD DOES NOT ACT THERE THAN THAT THE CREATURE DOES NOT; AND IT IS BECAUSE GOD DOES NOT PERFORM A CERTAIN ACTION THROUGH THE CREATURE THAT THE CREATURE DOES NOT PERFORM IT, AND NOT THE REVERSE.

Having shown that in every action common to God and creature, God acts naturally prior to the creature, it remains consequently to show that in every non-action common to God and creature, it is naturally prior that God does not act there than that the creature does not—namely, because God does not perform a certain action through the creature, therefore the creature does not perform it, and not the reverse.

For this follows plainly from the thirtieth chapter of this book. Just as of two movers ordered according to prior and posterior, such that the first can from itself alone unimpededly move the second, and the second cannot move except as an instrument moved antecedently through the first, it is prior by nature that the first moves than the second—and because the first moves, therefore the second moves, and not the reverse—so also in non-moving similarly, as is evidently apparent in the arm, the staff, and the ball, and in the celestial mover, the heaven, and the air. Which reason also makes manifest.

For privation is not properly an effect but a defect; and therefore it does not properly have an efficient cause, but a deficient one. This, however, can only be a superior cause failing to act, which if it acted, would cause the state by which the privation would be removed. Just therefore as the positing of the prior cause is the cause of the positing of its posterior effect, so also the removal of the cause is the cause of the removal of the effect. Just as the presence of the sun is the cause of day, so its absence is the cause of night; just as the presence of the helmsman is the cause of safety on a ship, and his absence the cause of destruction, as the Philosopher attests in Book 2 of the Physics, chapter 30, and Book 5 of the Metaphysics, chapter 2, and Anselm in On the Virginal Conception, chapter 5.

Wherefore the Philosopher, in Book 5 of the Metaphysics, chapter 16, distinguishing things prior and posterior, says: "Others according to power: that which exceeds in power is prior, and that which is more powerful. Such a thing is one whose pre-will another must necessarily follow; the other is posterior. So that when it does not move, the other is not moved, and when it moves, the other is moved; and the pre-will is the principle."

Where the text that Averroes has reads: "And it is said 'prior' according to power or virtue, as we say 'prior' to dominion. For the lord is said to be prior because he is superior in power. That also is said to be prior which is stronger; and prior is such a thing as compels another to follow its will, so that if what is prior does not move, what is posterior will not be moved; and if it moves, it will be moved; and the will is the principle here."

On which Averroes says: "More worthy is that which compels what is posterior, so that its will follows its own will; so that if what is prior does not move, what is posterior will not be moved. And the beginning, according to which 'prior' and 'posterior' are said here, is the will—namely, because the will of the weaker follows the will of the stronger. And this is what he intended when he said, 'And the will is the beginning.'" In which same view Albert, Thomas, Durandus, and all expositors agree.

Whence also Augustine, on Psalm 148—"His confession is above heaven and earth"—says: "Attend: He Himself made heaven and earth, He Himself governs them, they are governed at His nod. He Himself moves times and moments; He Himself renews; through Him are all things. Therefore these things praise Him whether in rest or in motion, whether from earth below or from heaven above, whether in oldness or in renewal. When you see these things and rejoice, and are lifted up to the Craftsman, and behold His invisible things, understood through the things that have been made—His confession is in heaven and on earth."

This same thing is similarly confirmed through the Philosopher in Book 1 of the Posterior Analytics, chapter 12, where he inquires about the negative middle term, the proximate demonstrative term of a negative conclusion. For example, why does a wall not breathe? He shows it cannot be said "because it is not an animal," because then being an animal would be the proximate cause of breathing, and so every animal would breathe. "For if a negation is the cause of the thing's not being, an affirmation is the cause of the thing's being. Just as being without measure of hot and cold is the cause of not being healed, so being with measure of the same is the cause of being healed. And similarly, if an affirmation is the cause of being, a negation is the cause of not being."

Which Robert of Lincoln, expounding that passage, similarly plainly holds; Thomas also and others expounding it.

Likewise, if the creature's not acting were the cause why God does not act, and the creature's acting were the cause why God acts, then it would be prior by nature for the creature to act than for the first agent, and prior by nature for the secondary cause to move than the first—contrary to the thirtieth chapter of this book plainly.

Likewise, proportional things are judged alike: the prior active not acting on the posterior passive, and the posterior passive not suffering from the prior active; and the prior active not acting through the posterior active, and the posterior active not acting through the prior active. But of the first two, the first is the cause of the second and naturally prior to it; therefore of the remaining two, similarly.

For who would even slightly doubt that because the active does not act on the passive, therefore the passive does not suffer—and not the reverse? Just as because the active acts, therefore the passive suffers—and not the reverse? Just as acting is the cause of suffering and naturally precedes it?

For who does not know that because God did not make a certain possible angel that He did not make, therefore that angel was not made—and not the reverse? And because He did not make another star in heaven, therefore it was not made—and not the reverse? And because He did not make an angel more perfect in natural endowments, therefore it is not more perfect—and not the reverse? And because He did not make heaven greater, therefore it is not greater—and not the reverse?

Likewise, the first cause of every true negation is in God, as the tenth and eleventh parts of chapter 13 of the first book show. The cause of a negation that is not necessary but contingent seems to be in God: His not willing it to be so, or His not making it to be so—just as the cause of similar affirmations in God is God's willing and making it to be so, as the ninth chapter of the first book demonstrates.

Thus, whatever is not done by a secondary cause, God wills not to be done, and positively does not will it—that is, He has a not-willing of its being done by it—as the twenty-second chapter of the first book and its corollaries teach. And this not causally or antecedently from the secondary cause, as the twentieth chapter of the first book shows. Therefore it is prior naturally and causally that God positively does not will—and consequently does not will and does not make—the secondary cause to act, than that the cause itself does not act.

Likewise, by the same twentieth chapter, no positive thing posterior to the divine will is the cause of that will. And it would seem much more unworthy for some privation to be the cause of the divine will. Therefore, the secondary cause's not acting is not the cause why God wills it not to act, and positively wills it not to act, nor why He does not act—but the reverse.

Likewise, by the second chapter of the first book, if God withdrew His hand by which He sustains all things, they would be turned to nothing; and this causally, on account of the withdrawal of divine preservation. For because God would not preserve beings, therefore they would not be—but not because they would not be, therefore God would not preserve them. Just as before the production of things, because God did not produce things, therefore they did not exist—and not the reverse. Just as it would still be the case if He had still produced nothing. And just as it now is for many non-beings not produced, which He could have produced.

Whence also Avicenna, Book 1 of the Metaphysics, chapter 9: "The intention of being comes from a cause that is a cause of being, and the intention of non-being comes from a cause that is the privation of the intention of the cause of being."

With which Augustine concordantly says in Book 12 of The City of God, chapter 17: "God, by one and the same eternal and unchangeable will, brought it about regarding the things He created that they previously were not, for as long as they were not, and that they subsequently were, when they began to be."

And the Apostle says: "who calls those things that are not, as those things that are" (Romans 4)—although this is also expounded otherwise.

The prophet also says: "He called a famine upon the land" (Psalm 104). On which Augustine, having prefaced one exposition, adds: "Or—which is more credible—'He called a famine' is to be understood as meaning that He said that famine should be. So that 'to call' is the same as 'to name,' 'to name' as 'to say,' 'to say' as 'to command.' For He called the famine—He who calls those things that are not, as those things that are."

Whence also Anselm, in On the Fall of the Devil, chapter 1: "God is said to make the non-being of what is not, because when He could, He does not make it be. And if you consider the things that are—when they pass to non-being, does He not Himself make them not be? Since not only is there no other essence except by His making, but neither can what has been made in any way remain except by Him preserving it. When He ceases to preserve what He made, what was returns to non-being—which it has not from Him, namely the non-being, but because He ceases to make being."

Behold how plainly he attests that non-being does not properly have an efficient cause, but rather a deficient one—namely, a making and preserving cause that fails to make and preserve, that is, one not making a possible thing or not preserving what has been made, as was touched upon above.

COROLLARY

THE COROLLARY OF THIS CHAPTER IS NOT FOUND IN THE CATALOGUE.

From these things it seems not improbably to be inferred that God's not giving knowledge, grace, or perseverance, or any gift of His to a capable creature, is the cause why it does not receive and does not have it; and because God does not give, therefore the creature does not receive—and not the reverse.

This corollary does not deny that God sometimes does not give grace or other gifts because of the fault of those not receiving, but it affirms that the proper and per se cause of non-reception is non-giving, and not the reverse.

This corollary seems to follow manifestly from the foregoing. It also seems that it can be shown, just as the principal conclusion was. Who also does not know that all knowledge is given by God, as is evident from chapter 6 of the first book, the third and twentieth of this second book—and especially prophetic knowledge and the manifold revelations of secrets, to which no one can attain by the way of natural ingenuity, but only by divine revelation?

Why then do not all have all these kinds of knowledge, unless because the One through whom is given the word of wisdom and knowledge does not give it—distributing to each as He wills? Wherefore also Elisha said: "The Lord has hidden it from me and has not told me" (4 Kings 4)—thereby giving the cause of his ignorance.

Who also, reading and not neglecting the prophetic books, does not easily see that the prophets did not always have divine revelations, nor the spirit of prophecy; and therefore did not always have prophetic visions, but when it pleased the one revealing? What then is the cause of this non-reception, unless non-giving—as Gregory also seems to attest on Ezekiel, Homily 1?

And if you say that the laziness or sin of someone is the cause why God does not give him such prophetic knowledge—certainly, sin and laziness notwithstanding, God could, if He wished, give him such knowledge. God also sometimes shows prophetic revelations to the wicked and does not show them to the most holy men. To the same most holy prophets also He sometimes shows such visions and sometimes hides them. To evil angels and to our first parents before sin, and to the holy confirmed angels who never sinned and never will sin, God did not give every kind of prophecy, as is evident from chapter 16 of this book. What then is the cause of this non-reception, unless non-giving?

Moreover, if the angels and first parents, according to the opinion of some, were created outside grace and remained thus without fault for some little while, the cause why they then did not receive and did not have grace was because God did not give it—and not the reverse—as no one is unaware. And so now similarly.

Likewise, proportional things are judged alike: not giving grace and not receiving grace, and not giving so much grace and not receiving so much. But it is certain that God's not giving an angel in the beginning, or a baptized infant, so much grace—namely, one greatest grace of which it was capable, which He did not give—was the cause why it did not receive it, and not the reverse.

Likewise, this seems clear regarding infants. For by what image of reason can it be said that the infant does not receive grace, and therefore God does not give it—and not rather the reverse?

Likewise, regarding adults: suppose, according to what was said above about grace and penance in the first chapter of this book, that of two sinners entirely equal before this instant, who as much as was in them would have been equals at this instant, God freely confers His grace on one and by no means on the other. Then the cause why this one does not receive is because God does not give. For if He gave or wished to give to this one, this one would receive just as the other did.

And if you say that one first merited, or at least disposed himself, or now does so, and the other did not, and therefore this one receives grace and the other does not—you do not maintain the supposition set forth, which posited parity in all things. Also, according to what was shown above about grace in the first book, no one merits the first grace by a prior disposition, nor by any other action whatsoever.

Since also these are equal in all things, except for that disposition or merit, and by the thirtieth chapter of this book, no one can elicit a merit, disposition, or any action unless God pre-wills and pre-acts, and by the tenth chapter of the first book, if God pre-wills anyone to do anything, he necessarily does it—the cause, therefore, why this one so merits and so disposed himself for grace is because God antecedently wills this and does it. And if God so willed regarding the other, that one would similarly do it, and otherwise he cannot. The cause, therefore, why this one does not so merit and dispose himself is because God does not will this nor effect it in him. And so likewise this will be the cause why this one does not receive grace—especially since according to you, God does not confer grace without such preceding merit or disposition.

And if you again say that God offers grace to everyone, and wills that he receive it—not absolutely, however, but under this condition: if he freely consents—by the corollary of the thirtieth chapter of this book you are again corrected.

Moreover, you seem to suppose that man can from himself alone, or at least from himself antecedently with God, consent to the offer of grace—contrary to chapter 38 of the first book, and the twentieth and thirtieth of this second book.

Likewise, according to the foregoing, against the former response: suppose two sinners equal in all things, to whom God equally offers grace. And since according to you it is not necessary for everyone to receive grace offered to them, suppose one receives it and the other does not. The one who receives grace consents, and the cause of this is because God by willing and pre-willing works and pre-works consent in him, nor can he otherwise consent, as the thirtieth chapter of this book shows. And the one who does not receive grace does not consent, nor can he do so unless God by pre-willing pre-works this in him; nor can he make God pre-will and pre-work this in him, nor resist God pre-willing and wishing to pre-work, by the tenth chapter of the first book. The cause, therefore, why he does not consent is because God does not will to go before him, and does not go before him by working. For if God willed this, this one would consent just as the other did.

Otherwise perhaps you will say that God freely offers grace to everyone, provided he opens his hand, opens his bosom, opens the chest of his heart that receives grace. And so the one who accepts does so because God gives; but the one who does not accept does so not because God does not give, but because he does not open. And so God does not give because this one does not accept the grace that is offered. Just as if I extend a gift to you and you accept it, I do not give because you accept, but the reverse. And if I extend something to another and he does not accept, he does not fail to accept because I do not give, but I do not give because he does not accept.

This response, however, will be chastised like the preceding one, and by chapter 38 of the first book.

Moreover, when God offers grace to someone, what does He intend regarding the reception of grace with respect to that person? Either He intends and wills that he receive it, or not. If He intends and wills that he receive it, by the tenth chapter of the first book it always happens thus; nor can one say that God intends this conditionally, as the foregoing against the preceding response make clear. If God does not intend or will this—knowing well that unless He intends and wills this, and this antecedently and independently of human action or passion, He offers it vainly and deceptively—for who reasonably offers anything to someone in need without granting the other things necessary, without which the offerer well knows the needy person cannot receive it, nor can have those other things from himself alone or antecedently from himself, nor from anyone else except from the offerer himself, who gives all things freely and gratuitously begins?

A wonderful mercy that would be, which in no way relieves the misery of the wretched, but rather aggravates it by deceptively extending such things and not giving! Indeed, by the twenty-second chapter of the first book and its corollary, if God does not intend or will this, He intends and wills its opposite—where a greater deception and duplicity would seem to appear.

Or let it be argued in this way: when God offers grace to someone, either He wills to give it to him, or He does not will to give it to him, etc., as above.

Likewise, in the example proposed: if you offered me something, and knew well that I could not by myself alone, nor by the help of anyone else, open my contracted hand to receive it, nor begin to open it, nor do anything unless you began everything and continuously followed through; and you knew that it was not in my power what you willed concerning me, and that whatever you willed would immediately happen; and you did not will—indeed, you were unwilling—to act or help toward opening my hand—would you not be the cause why I did not open my hand and receive your gift? And so your not giving would be the cause why I did not receive.

This is also confirmed. To give, as the jurists say, is "to make someone accept." To give, therefore, imports not only offering but also accepting. How then do you say that acceptance is not the cause of giving? Indeed, it is not the cause of offering; but it is a cause of giving, just as offering is. For just as offering, so also acceptance naturally and causally precedes giving, and effects and consummates it. For unless I accept, it does not become mine.

Moreover, if giving imports these two things—offering and accepting—the failure of giving, or not-giving, can occur either from a defect of offering or from a defect of reception. The one, therefore, who when he can does not do both things necessarily required for giving, without which giving cannot happen, is the cause why it is not given.

If, therefore, you offer me something, and you can make me receive it, and I cannot otherwise receive it, the cause why I do not accept is because you do not make me accept.

To make this still clearer, suppose you are a wise teacher and I an ignorant student, and by the command of the Father, our common Lord, you are bound to provide me with teaching, and I am under your authority—such that if you effectively offer me teaching, I will accept it, but otherwise not at all. If, therefore, you do not offer or give me teaching, and I do not accept it, will not the Lord reckon you as the cause why I do not accept the teaching? I believe that by just judgment He will reckon so.

Perhaps you still will not cease responding, saying that God offers grace to everyone, and some do not place an obstacle to grace but rather remove it, and therefore they receive the grace offered to them; but others place an obstacle to grace and do not remove it, and therefore they by no means accept it—just as in the case of illumination and non-illumination of a house by the sun through a window that is open or closed.

For this response, it seems one should reasonably ask what the obstacle is. And it seems to be some object or thing resisting grace—namely, mortal sin repugnant to salvific grace, or a non-consent, or dissent, a non-opening or closing of the human heart when the grace of God is offered. And whatever the obstacle is said to be, this response can be rebuked like the previous ones, since no one can remove this obstacle except God, or through God Himself removing it first; and if He Himself wills to remove it, it is removed irresistibly, as the tenth chapter of the first book teaches.

The same thing is shown by the foregoing on grace and penance together with that same tenth chapter of the first book. Whence also the Lord Himself says: "I will have mercy on whom I will, and I will be clement to whom it pleases Me" (Exodus 33). And again: "I will take away the heart of stone," etc. (Ezekiel 36). The Gloss: "that is, all hardness, and the unbelieving heart." And the Apostle: "He has mercy on whom He wills, and He hardens whom He wills" (Romans 9).

And Augustine, in On the Predestination of the Saints, chapter 9, treating John 6—"Everyone who has heard from the Father and has learned, comes to Me"—says: "Very far removed from the senses of the flesh is this school in which God is heard and teaches. We see many coming to the Son, because we see many believing in Christ; but where and how they heard and learned from the Father, we do not see. This grace is exceedingly secret; but who doubts that it is grace? This grace, therefore, which is secretly bestowed on human hearts by worthy liberality, is rejected by no hard heart. For it is given for this very reason: that the hardness of heart may first be removed."

"Since, therefore, the Father is heard and teaches inwardly so that one may come to the Son, He takes away the heart of stone and gives a heart of flesh, as the prophet predicted in his promise. For thus He makes sons of the promise, and vessels of mercy that He prepared for glory."

And there follows, chapter 10: "Why, however, does He not teach all to come to Christ, unless because all whom He teaches, He teaches out of mercy; but those whom He does not teach, He therefore does not teach because 'He has mercy on whom He wills, and He hardens whom He wills'?"

And if you say the obstacle is some positive act repugnant to grace—such as an actual contradiction, rebellion, or contempt—and that it cannot be removed except by non-action or the privation of such an act, which is not from God, or not antecedently from God, but from man—you can still be rebuked as before.

Moreover, then everyone not having such a contrary act would receive grace—which is false of infants, of those mentally impaired, of adults whether healthy, sleeping, or waking, having good moral acts, or indifferent ones, or only venially evil ones—which acts one established in grace can have.

Likewise, how do you say that such an act cannot be removed except by non-action or the mere privation of acting? For it can be removed by a contrary positive act—as contempt by obedience, hatred by love, and so on. How easily, therefore, could God, if He wished, remove such an obstacle or act!

Such an obstacle, moreover, by the thirtieth chapter of this book, is made and placed antecedently by God. How, then, does God wish to confer grace on this one, in whom He prepares an obstacle repelling grace? Or if God does not give grace because of the resisting obstacle, and God Himself knowingly and precedently causes this obstacle, how is God not the cause of the non-reception of salvific grace?

This corollary also seems to be attested by the series of both Testaments and the copious authority of the Doctors. For who, having even looked at the bark of sacred Scripture or the Doctors, does not know that God originally established all things with their measures, numbers, and weights, as is also briefly touched upon in chapter 46 of the first book?

Why, therefore, just as He antecedently and originally established and provided the number of the elect—as chapters 46 of the first book and 5 of this book attest—did He not similarly establish the number of those who would believe and those who would finally persevere, so that it is just so many and not more, nor fewer?

Who, then, is the primary cause of this negation? Is it not He who numbers the multitude of stars—namely, the multitude of those to be saved—just as He is the cause why there are not more material stars in heaven, just as He is also the cause why heaven is not greater? What also is the cause why these are the units in the number of the elect, and not other ones of equal number in their place, unless He who calls them all by name—just as He is the cause why these material stars are not other ones created, and this world is not another with other creatures?

Who also doubts that just as God provided and established a certain number of stars, so also of the sand of the sea, by which the reprobate are figured, as chapter 27 of the first book and what follows make clear? Since also after the final judgment He will will the number of the damned to be precisely so much and no more—and not by a novel volition, nor one caused by posterior things, as chapters 23 and 20 of the first book teach.

What theologian also, unless a companion of Pelagius, does not know that the first cause of reprobation and of the divine volition by which He eternally reprobates some is on the part of God who reprobates, not on the part of the angel or man who is reprobated, as is evident from chapter 45 of the first book? If, however, not receiving grace and perseverance were the cause of not giving, the reverse would be the case.

Wherefore also Augustine, Gregory, and other Doctors frequently imply and say that no cause of non-drawing by God, of non-hearing, non-obedience, non-perseverance, and the like, is to be sought or assigned on the part of the one not drawn and the like—as many things set forth above about grace, penance, and perseverance make clear.

Augustine indeed, Part 1 on John, Homily 26, says: "Whom He draws and whom He does not draw, why He draws this one and does not draw that one—do not wish to judge, if you do not wish to err." If, however, the Father did not draw someone because that person was not drawn, the reason could reasonably be asked why, and truly given why.

Likewise, in Exodus 4 we read the Lord saying to Moses: "Who made the mouth of man, or who made the mute and the deaf, the seeing and the blind? Is it not I?" The Gloss on the word "mute" says: "In mouth or in spirit." Wherefore the rest are to be similarly expounded.

Where also another Gloss, namely Augustine's, says: "There are those who calumniate God, or rather the Scripture of the Old Testament, because God said He made the mute. What then do they say about Christ, who openly says, 'I came that those who do not see may see, and those who see may become blind'? Who but an ignorant person would believe that anything could happen to a man in bodily defects that God does not will? But that He wills all justly, no one doubts."

With which Moses concordantly says, Deuteronomy 29: "You have seen all that the Lord did before you in the land of Egypt, to Pharaoh and to all his servants and to all his land—the great trials that your eyes saw, those great signs and wonders. And the Lord has not given you a heart to understand, and eyes to see, and ears to hear, until this present day." The Gloss: "A heart to understand"—that is, a will to do what you understand. "And eyes"—namely, of the heart—"to see." "To hear"—that is, to obey.

With which Isaiah also concordantly says: "Blind the heart of this people, and make heavy their ears, and close their eyes, lest perhaps they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and be converted, and I heal them" (Isaiah 6). A similar view Christ also teaches, as Matthew 13, Mark 4, and Luke 8 evidently show.

Whence also John 12: "Although He had done so many signs before them, they did not believe in Him, so that the word of Isaiah the prophet might be fulfilled, which he said: 'Lord, who has believed our report, and to whom has the arm of the Lord been revealed?' For this reason they could not believe, because Isaiah again said: 'He has blinded their eyes and hardened their heart, so that they may not see with their eyes and understand with their heart, and be converted, and I heal them.'"

Which Augustine, treating in Part 1 on John, Homily 53, writes thus: "What He added—'and be converted, and I heal them'—whether 'not' should be understood, that is, 'not be converted'—the sentence being connected from above, where it was said 'so that they may not see with their eyes and understand with their heart,' because here too it was said 'so that they may not understand'—for conversion itself also comes from His grace, to whom it is said, 'O God of powers, convert us.' Or perhaps this too should be understood as done out of the mercy of divine medicine: since they were of a perverse and proud will, and wished to establish their own justice, for this reason they were abandoned so as to be blinded; they were blinded so as to stumble against the stone of stumbling, and their faces were filled with shame—and thus humbled, they would seek the name of the Lord, and not their own justice, by which the proud man is puffed up, but the justice of God, by which the ungodly man is justified. For this indeed profited many of them for good, who, stricken by their crime, afterward believed in Christ—for whom Christ Himself also prayed, saying: 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.'"

And in his Questions on the Gospels, as recounted by the Gloss of Thomas on Matthew 13, where the same authority of Isaiah is cited, he says: "They closed their eyes, lest at some time they see with their eyes—that is, they themselves were the cause that God closed their eyes for them. For another Evangelist says, 'He has blinded their eyes.' But whether they should never see, or rather so that at some time, seeing and being displeased with their blindness and grieving, and being humbled and moved from this to confess their sins and piously seek God."

"For thus Mark says this: 'Lest at some time they be converted and their sins be forgiven them'—where it is understood that through their sins they merited not to understand; and yet this same thing was done to them mercifully, so that they might recognize their sins and, being converted, might merit forgiveness."

"But what John says about this passage—'For this reason they could not believe, because Isaiah again said, He has blinded their eyes and hardened their heart, so that they may not see with their eyes and understand with their heart, and be converted, and I heal them'—seems to oppose this view, and entirely compels us to take what is said here—'lest at some time they see with their eyes'—not as meaning 'lest at some time they may see,' but simply 'so that they may not see.' Since he says openly, 'so that they may not see with their eyes.'"

"And what he says—'For this reason they could not believe'—sufficiently shows that the blinding was not done so that, moved and grieving that they could not understand, they might eventually be converted through repentance. For they could not do this unless they first believed, so that by believing they would be converted, by conversion healed, and by healing they would understand. But rather, they were blinded so that they would not believe. For he says most openly, 'For this reason they could not believe.'"

"If this is so, who will not rise to the defense of the Jews, proclaiming them to be without fault for not believing? For 'for this reason they could not believe, because He blinded their eyes.' But since God must rather be understood to be without fault, we are forced to acknowledge that by certain other sins they merited to be so blinded, by which blinding they could not believe. For John's words are: 'They could not believe, because Isaiah again said, He has blinded their eyes.' In vain, therefore, do we try to understand that they were blinded so that they might be converted, since they could not be converted because they did not believe, and they could not believe because they were blinded."

"Or perhaps we may not absurdly say that some of the Jews were healable, but were so endangered by the swelling of pride that it was beneficial for them first not to believe, and they were blinded for this purpose: so that they would not understand the Lord speaking in parables, and not understanding, would not believe in Him, and not believing would join with the rest of the desperate in crucifying Him. And so, after His resurrection, they would be converted—since they would then be humbled by the guilt of the Lord's death, would love more the One by whom they rejoiced that so great a crime had been forgiven them—because their great pride was to be cast down by such humiliation."

"Let anyone who thinks this has been spoken inappropriately consider whether he does not find that it so happened, as is manifestly read in the Acts of the Apostles. It is therefore not inconsistent with what John says—'For this reason they could not believe, because He has blinded their eyes so that they may not see'—that we understand they were blinded so that they might be converted; that is, the Lord's words were hidden from them through the obscurity of parables, so that after His resurrection they might recover by a more salutary repentance. Because through the obscurity of speech they were blinded, they did not understand the Lord's words; not understanding, they did not believe in Him; not believing, they crucified Him. And so after the resurrection, terrified by the miracles done in His name, they were struck with the guilt of a greater crime, and prostrate to repentance—then, having received pardon, converted with the most burning love. Yet for some, that blindness did not profit unto conversion."

And in On the Good of Perseverance, chapter 41, he says: "In the mass of perdition the Tyrians and Sidonians were left, who could have believed if they had seen the miraculous signs of Christ. But since it was not given them to believe, that by which they would believe was also denied them. From this it appears that some have in their very nature a divine natural gift of understanding, by which they would be moved to faith if they heard words or saw signs suited to their minds. And yet if by a higher judgment of God they are not distinguished from the mass of perdition by the predestination of grace, neither are those divine words or deeds applied to them, by which they could believe if they heard or saw such things."

"In the same mass of perdition the Jews also were left, who could not believe when such great and clear miracles were done in their sight. For why could they not believe? The Gospel did not keep silent, saying: 'Although He had done so many signs before them, they did not believe in Him, so that the word of Isaiah the prophet might be fulfilled, which he said, Lord, who has believed our report? And to whom has the arm of the Lord been revealed? And for this reason they could not believe, because Isaiah again said, He has blinded their eyes and hardened their heart, so that they may not see with their eyes, nor understand with their heart, and be converted, and I heal them.'"

"The eyes of the Tyrians and Sidonians were not so blinded, nor their heart so hardened, since they would have believed if they had seen such signs as these others saw. But it did not profit them that they could have believed, because they were not predestined by Him whose judgments are unsearchable and whose ways are untraceable. Nor would it have harmed these others that they could not believe, if they had been so predestined that God would illuminate the blind and wish to take away the heart of stone from the hardened."

I know that many understand the aforementioned words of the Lord, Moses, and Isaiah, and similar ones, very differently and expound them otherwise. Nor does this present an obstacle. For sacred Scripture, from its manifold fecundity, gives birth to manifold understanding. Yet no Catholic, I think, will so accept other or alien expositions that he would repudiate the exposition of the preeminent Evangelist, instructed by the very preacher of truth—indeed, of the most holy Gospel itself—and of the most learned Augustine.

Therefore the Lord Himself said: "I will harden the heart of Pharaoh, and he will not let the people go" (Exodus 4). And further, chapter 9: "And the Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh, and he did not hear them, as the Lord had spoken."

What does it mean that the Lord is said to harden the heart of a man, unless that the authority, superiority, and causality of the hardening of the human heart belongs to Him, not to man—although it happens because of man's preceding sin? And what is it for the Lord to harden a man's heart, unless not to soften when He could, not to give the oil of piety, not to have mercy on the miserable sinner—or not to will or not to wish to do these things—as the expositions of very many Doctors attest?

Whence Gregory, Book 11 of the Morals, chapter 5, on Job 12—"If He shuts up a man, there is no one who opens": "God is said to harden through justice, when the heart of the reprobate is not softened through grace."

With which Augustine concordantly says in On Predestination and the Grace of God (which is the fifth among his Sermons), chapter 7: "What does 'I will harden' mean, except 'I will not soften'?"

And Peter says in Book 1 of the Sentences, distinction 41, chapter 1, that the reprobation of God is "not to wish to have mercy," and the hardening of God is "not to have mercy"—so that nothing is inflicted by Him whereby man becomes worse, but only that by which he would become better is not bestowed.

Because, therefore, God does not soften the heart of a man, the heart itself is not softened—and not the reverse. Wherefore also the Apostle, in Romans 9, treating this passage of Scripture and showing that predestination or election and reprobation are not from the works of men but from the divine will, after a preceding disputation concludes: "Therefore He has mercy on whom He wills, and He hardens whom He wills." And consequently, by a powerful disputation, he restrains men from presuming to ask or dispute about such matters.

If, however, God hardened someone because that person was hardened—that is, did not soften a man because the man was not softened—a cause could be reasonably sought and given. Why also would the Apostle say, "whom He wills, He hardens"? Otherwise he would rather say: "He who wills to be hardened, or who does not wish to be softened, or who is not softened, is hardened."

Wherefore the blessed Augustine, in On Predestination and the Grace of God, chapter 17, says: "Did not Nebuchadnezzar, after innumerable impieties, repent when scourged, and receive again the kingdom he had lost? But Pharaoh was made harder by the very scourges and perished. Here let the one who judges the divine counsel with a heart that thinks itself too wise in lofty wisdom give me a reason why the medicine compounded by one and the same physician was effective for the destruction of one and for the salvation of another—unless because 'the good odor of Christ is to some an odor of life unto life, and to others an odor of death unto death.'"

"As to nature, both were men; as to dignity, both were kings; as to cause, both held captive the people of God; as to punishment, both were gently admonished by scourges. What then made their ends different, except that one, feeling the hand of God, groaned in the remembrance of his own iniquity, while the other fought by his free will against the most merciful truth of God?"

"Here whoever responds that for the one to be changed, the divine help was present, but for the other to be hardened, it was absent—and contends that this is unjust; on account of which the Apostle, placing the ends of things in the will of God, said, 'He has mercy on whom He wills, and He hardens whom He wills,' and the Lord saying, 'Without Me you can do nothing'—let him understand that all things are either brought to completion with the Lord's help, or permitted when He abandons, yet let him know that without His will absolutely nothing is admitted."

And there follows, chapter 18: "But we return to infants, we return to twins. It is little, what I said; we return to those not yet born, who were sown in the same act of intercourse and were to be brought into the light at the same moment. The discrepant and diverse judgment of the divine will appearing toward them confounds, by the magnitude of the question, the minds of men who dispute too proudly about the will of God."

"Raise now your voice with all your strength, O unjust accuser of the Just, and tell me what good did the one merit, and what evil did the other commit? And I respond to you—not I, but the Apostle Paul—'Neither indeed merited anything, and the potter has power over the clay from the same mass to make one vessel for honor and another for dishonor.'"

"You will say, 'Why?' What is the reason for this confused diversity of judgment? Let him again rebuke this presumption and say, 'O man, who are you to reply to God?' Especially because, returning to the comparison of human acts, he responds that the creditor cannot be accused of injustice who wished to have such a judgment regarding two debtors: to forgive one and to exact from the other what is owed by both."

"If this is so, by what impudence will a man judge God—clay judge the potter—not only saying, 'Why did You make me thus?' but also scrutinizing about others with damnable curiosity, and saying, 'Why did You make another from the same mass thus, and another otherwise?'"

"If the human race, which was created originally from nothing, were not born with the debt of death and sin from its origin, and yet from them the almighty Creator wished to condemn some to eternal destruction—who would say to the almighty Creator, 'Why did You do thus?' For He who gave being when they were not, had the power over what end they should have. Nor would the rest say, 'Why does the divine judgment differ when all have equal merits?' Because 'the potter has power over the clay from the same mass to make one vessel for honor and another for dishonor.'"

"Now, however, since just punishment is rendered to the condemned, but undeserved grace is given to the saved—who will go so far as to forget the human condition and scrutinize the secrets of the divine mind, asking when he himself has justly incurred punishment, why another received a grace that was not owed him?"

On account of these things, however, it must be known that hardening can be taken in two ways. In one way, for reprobation—that is, for active hardening, namely, the divine will not willing or not wishing to soften, or willing not to soften. And in this sense, it does not have a superior and prior cause to be assigned on the part of men, as is evident from chapters 20 and 45 of the first book. And in this sense I think the Apostle speaks in Romans, where he was cited, as his argument evidently indicates.

In another way, hardening is taken for reprobation passively—that is, for the effect of reprobation, the effect namely of the aforementioned divine will; that is, for the defect of conferral, or for the non-conferral itself of softening grace. And in this sense it is said—though improperly—to have a cause on the part of the hardened man: namely, a preceding fault. Yet that fault is not the non-reception of grace itself, but another one prior to it, as is evident regarding Pharaoh and others when they are actually hardened; for one is first a sinner before God is an avenger.

And in this sense the Doctors usually speak, saying that God out of mercy liberates, but according to judgment hardens. Judgment, however, seems to be according to the works of the one judged. Whence also Peter, Book 1 of the Sentences, distinction 42: "Just as the effect of predestination is the conferral of grace, so the effect of reprobation is hardening." And above, distinction 41, chapter 1, he says that there is some merit of hardening, but none of mercy. And he adds: "He has mercy, therefore, according to grace, which is given freely; but He hardens according to judgment, which is rendered for merits." Whence it is given to understand that just as the reprobation of God is not to wish to have mercy, so the hardening of God is not to have mercy—so that nothing is inflicted by Him whereby man becomes worse, but only that by which he would become better is not bestowed.

Further, it should be noted that sometimes it is read that the Lord hardens a man's heart—which must be understood in the aforesaid manner or manners. Sometimes, however, the man himself is read to harden his own heart, his neck, and the like—which can be understood in two ways: either because this happens on account of his prior fault, as the foregoing attest; or because he is hard voluntarily, not unwillingly or by compulsion. Sometimes, however, it is read simply that his heart is hardened—which can be expounded in either way.

Furthermore, concerning Rehoboam we read: "The king did not listen to the people, because the Lord had turned away from him, to raise up His word which He had spoken by the hand of Ahijah the Shilonite to Jeroboam" (3 Kings 12). And concerning Amaziah: "He did not wish to listen to Amaziah, because it was the Lord's will that he should be delivered into the hands of enemies, because of the gods of Edom."

Wherefore also Augustine, in On Grace and Free Will, chapter 46: "Who does not tremble at the divine judgments, by which God works in the hearts even of evil men whatever He wills, yet renders to them according to their merits? Rehoboam the son of Solomon rejected the salutary counsel of the elders and rather assented to the words of his contemporaries, responding threateningly to those whom he should have treated gently. Why was this, unless by his own will? But hence the ten tribes of Israel departed from him, and established another king for themselves, Jeroboam, so that the will of the angry God might be fulfilled—which He had also predicted would come about."

"What does Scripture say? 'And the king did not hear the people, because it was a turning from the Lord, that He might establish His word which He spoke by the hand of Ahijah the Shilonite concerning Jeroboam the son of Nebat.' Assuredly this happened, and that through a man's will, yet so that the turning was from the Lord."

And further, chapter 47: "What does it mean that the man of God said to King Amaziah, 'Do not let the army of Israel come with you, for the Lord is not with Israel, with all the sons of Ephraim; if you think you will prevail through them, God will put you to flight before your enemies'? Then Scripture adds: 'And Amaziah did not listen, because it was from God, that he should be delivered into ruin, because they had sought the gods of Edom.' Behold: God, wishing to punish the sin of idolatry, worked this in the heart of the one at whom He was justly angry, so that he did not heed the salutary warning, but despising it went to war, where he fell with his army."

Likewise, what else does this signify: "Not all receive this word, but those to whom it is given. He who can receive it, let him receive it" (Matthew 19)? And: "Their eyes were held, so that they did not recognize Him" (Luke, last chapter)? And: "You do not believe, because you are not of My sheep" (John 10)?

Indeed, the philosophical rule set forth above—"If the affirmation is the cause of the affirmation, the negation is the cause of the negation"—the Truth Himself seems to canonize when He says: "He who is of God hears the words of God; for this reason you do not hear, because you are not of God" (John 8).

Wherefore also Chrysostom, as cited in the Gloss of Thomas on John 10, says: "He shows why they do not believe, adding: 'But you do not believe, because you are not of My sheep.'" On which word Augustine, Part 1 on John, Homily 48, says: "Sheep are those who by believing follow the shepherd, entering through the door. How then did He say to these, 'You are not of My sheep'? Because He saw them predestined to everlasting destruction, not purchased for eternal life at the price of His blood."

And above, Homily 42, expounding John 8: "Since He foreknew who would believe, He called them 'of God,' since they would be born again of God by the adoption of regeneration. To these belongs: 'He who is of God hears the words of God.' But what follows—'For this reason you do not hear, because you are not of God'—was said to those who were not only vitiated by sin (for this evil was common to all), but who were also foreknown not to believe with that faith by which alone they could be freed from the obligation of sins. Wherefore He foreknew those to whom He said such things would remain in what they were 'of the devil'—that is, they would die in their sins and impiety, in which they were similar to him—and would not come to the generation in which they would be sons of God, that is, born of God, by whom they had been created as men."

"According to this predestination the Lord spoke." This, however, can also be understood and expounded otherwise: of anyone existing in grace, and thus being "of God," as long as he is such; and of anyone lacking grace, and thus not being "of God," as long as he is such—according to what was set forth in chapters 38 and following of the first book.

Whence the Savior says: "Why do you not recognize My speech? Because you cannot hear My word" (John 8)—as long, namely, as you are evil.

Wherefore also Chrysostom, as recounted in the Gloss of Thomas there, says: "First, therefore, virtue must be sought, which hears the divine word, so that henceforth we may stand strong to receive the entire speech of Jesus; since as long as someone has not been healed in his own hearing by the Word—which says to the deaf, 'Be opened'—he cannot perceive by hearing."

Nevertheless, there is one word of God that all the predestined, each and every one, hear or will hear at some time, and no reprobate will ever hear that word. This word, as Augustine shows in Homily 45 on John through a long disputation, is: "He who perseveres to the end, he shall be saved."

It is therefore evident, according to the view of the Truth—with Augustine attesting—that just as being of the sheep of Christ and of God according to predestination, that is, being predestined, is the cause of believing and salvifically hearing the voice of Christ, so also not being so is the cause of not so doing. But not being predestined is originally from God, because not from the works of the reprobate, as chapter 45 of the first book attests.

The same view is also attested by the authorities of the same Augustine from On the Predestination of the Saints, chapter 10, and On the Good of Perseverance, chapter 41, cited above. And in On Correction and Grace, almost throughout, he shows that all men should be charitably corrected and admonished, but that correction profits only the predestined, not the non-predestined.

Where also in chapter 68, after a long disputation, he concludes thus: "Let men therefore endure being corrected when they sin, and let them not argue from the correction itself against grace, nor from grace against correction. Because both just punishment is owed to sins, and just correction pertains thereto—which is administered medicinally, even if the health of the sick person is uncertain. So that if the one who is corrected belongs to the number of the predestined, the correction may be a salutary medicine; if, however, he does not belong, the correction may be a penal torment. Under this uncertainty, therefore, it must be administered out of charity, since the outcome is unknown."

This view also the Savior seems to have taught to those capable, when, with the Jews murmuring against His discourse on the bread of life, He responded: "Do not murmur among yourselves. No one can come to Me unless the Father who sent Me draws him. It is written in the prophets, 'And they shall all be taught by God.' Everyone who has heard from the Father and has learned, comes to Me" (John 6)—where He seems to suggest that because they were not drawn or taught, because they did not hear or learn, therefore they did not come to Him by believing.

Wherefore also further: "There are some of you who do not believe. For Jesus knew from the beginning who would believe and who would betray Him. And He said: 'For this reason I said to you that no one can come to Me unless it has been given him by My Father.'"

If you do not believe me expounding, believe Augustine, saying in Homily 26 on John: "To the murmurers Jesus responded, 'Do not murmur among yourselves,' as if saying: I know why you do not hunger, and do not understand this bread, nor seek it. 'Do not murmur among yourselves. No one comes to Me unless the Father who sent Me draws him.'" Note the "why" and the cause.

And there follows: "A great commendation of grace! No one comes unless drawn. Whom He draws and whom He does not draw, why He draws this one and does not draw that one—do not wish to judge, if you do not wish to err." Do not, I say, wish to judge by a cause taken from the one drawn or not drawn, antecedently moving the drawing divine will—according to the foregoing in chapters 20 and 35 and following of the first book. If, however, someone's not being drawn by God were the cause why God did not draw him, it could be reasonably asked why God draws him, and could be reasonably—because causally—answered: because he is not drawn. And similarly, about similar things the same could be asked and similarly answered.

And further: "'For it is written in the prophets, and they shall all be taught by God.' Why did I say this, O Jews? The Father has not taught you; how can you recognize Me?"

And further, Homily 27, expounding "For Jesus knew from the beginning," etc., he says: "After He had distinguished believers from non-believers, He expressed the cause why they do not believe: 'For this reason I said to you that no one can come to Me unless it has been given him by My Father.'"

And in On the Predestination of the Saints, chapters 9 and 10, he confirms this exposition, as was recounted above. Where also in chapter 10, speaking of the Father's teaching, he asks and resolves: "Why, however, does He not teach all to come to Christ, unless because all whom He teaches, He teaches out of mercy; but those whom He does not teach, He does not teach because 'He has mercy on whom He wills, and He hardens whom He wills'?"

And further: "'Why,' they say, 'does He not teach all?' If we say 'because those whom He does not teach do not wish to learn,' we shall be answered: 'And where is what is said to Him, O God, You will convert and give us life? Or if God does not make the willing out of the unwilling, why does the Church, according to the Lord's command, pray for her persecutors?'"

Behold: Augustine rejects the position that says the Father does not teach someone because that person does not wish to learn. And could he not similarly—indeed even more evidently—reject the opinion that says the Father does not teach someone because that person is not taught?

And there follows: "When therefore the Gospel is preached, some believe and some do not believe. But those who believe, when the preacher sounds outwardly, hear and learn inwardly from the Father. But those who do not believe, hear outwardly but do not hear or learn inwardly. That is, to those it is given to believe, to those it is not given. Because 'No one,' He says, 'comes to Me unless the Father who sent Me draws him'—which is more openly said afterward."

"For after a while, when He was speaking of eating His flesh and drinking His blood, and certain even of His disciples said, 'This is a hard saying; who can hear it?'—Jesus, knowing in Himself that His disciples were murmuring about this, said to them, 'Does this scandalize you?' And a little later: 'The words that I have spoken to you are spirit and life. But there are some of you who do not believe.' And immediately the Evangelist says: 'For Jesus knew from the beginning who would believe and who would betray Him. And He said: For this reason I said to you that no one can come to Me unless it has been given him by My Father.'"

"Therefore, to be drawn to Christ by the Father, and to hear and learn from the Father so as to come to Christ, is nothing other than to receive a gift from the Father by which to believe in Christ. For it was not those hearing the Gospel from those not hearing that He was distinguishing—He who said, 'No one comes to Me unless it has been given him by My Father'—but those believing from those not believing."

"Faith, therefore, both begun and perfected, is a gift of God. And that this gift is given to some and not given to others, no one at all doubts who does not wish to resist the most manifest sacred writings. But why it is not given to all should not disturb the faithful person, who believes that from one all have gone into a condemnation without doubt most just—so that there would be no just reproach of God even if no one were freed from it. Whence it is established that it is a great grace that very many are freed, and they may acknowledge in those who are not freed what would be owed to themselves—so that he who glories may glory not in his own merits, which are equal to those of the condemned, but in the Lord."

"Why, however, He frees this one rather than that one? 'Unsearchable are His judgments and untraceable His ways.' For it is better that here too we hear and say, 'O man, who are you to reply to God?' rather than dare to say, as though we knew, what He willed to be hidden—He who nevertheless cannot will anything unjust."

Not therefore because someone is not drawn, not taught, not freed, does not receive this gift, does God therefore not draw, not teach, not free, and not give—but rather the reverse.

Whence also Augustine, in On the Good of Perseverance, chapter 64, says: "Those who remain in the delight of damnable sins, if they are predestined, have not yet risen because the help of the merciful One has not yet raised them"—although before the infirm he does not wish this view to be preached in this manner, but in another, so that nothing may be subtracted from the meaning.

This same thing the blessed Ambrose also seems plainly to attest, in Book 9 on Luke, saying: "Those whom Jesus looks upon weep. Peter denied the first time, and did not weep—because the Lord had not looked upon him. He denied the second time, and did not weep—because the Lord had not yet looked upon him. He denied the third time; Jesus looked upon him, and he wept most bitterly."

Nor can it be said that the Lord looked upon him with bodily eyes, visibly admonishing him. And therefore what is written—"The Lord looked upon him"—was done inwardly, in the mind, in the will, as chapter 43 of the first book more fully recounts.

Moreover, Augustine also, in Book 4 Against Julian, chapter 16, thus addresses Julian: "You say that the door is opened by Him to those who knock—He who wills all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth—so that we may understand, with you teaching, that the reason not all are saved and do not come to the knowledge of the truth is that they themselves do not wish to ask, while God wishes to give; do not wish to seek, while God wishes to show; do not wish to knock, while God wishes to open."

This, therefore, according to the view of Augustine, was the error of Julian the Pelagian, which he also consequently refutes there. And further, treating that saying of John—"No one can come to Me unless the Father," etc.—he says: "Who already use the exercise of the will—unless He wills and helps, from whom the will is prepared, they cannot will."

And there follows, chapter 17: "If you say to me, 'Why then does He not convert the wills of all the unwilling?' I will respond: 'Why does He not adopt by the washing of regeneration all infants who are going to die, whose wills He finds to be as yet nonexistent, and therefore not contrary?' If you see that this is more profound than can be found by you, let both be equally profound for each of us—why, in both the greater and the lesser, God wills to help one and does not will to help another."

Behold, according to the view of Augustine: just as God's willing to help is the cause of help, so also His not willing or not wishing to help is the cause of non-help. Not because someone is not helped by God does God therefore not wish to help him or not help him—but the reverse. Otherwise it would be perfectly plain, not profound.

And further in the same, speaking of two similar persons, one of whom is condemned according to judgment and the other freed according to mercy: "Why," he says, "does He condemn this one rather than that one, or free this one rather than that one? We—who are we to reply to God? Does the clay say to the one who shaped it, 'Why did you make me thus?' Does not the potter have power over the clay from the same mass of vitiated and condemned origin to make one vessel for honor according to mercy, and another for dishonor according to judgment?"

The same author, in Book 11 on Genesis, chapter 14, objecting and responding, says: "'He could,' they say, 'also convert their will to good, since He is omnipotent.' He could, indeed. Why then did He not do so? Because He did not will it. Why He did not will it is within His own counsel. We ought not to be wiser than is fitting."

And in very many places in his many books he professes the same view.

The same seems similarly to be thought about perseverance: namely, that the reason anyone does not receive or does not have perseverance is because God does not give it to him—although perhaps in punishment of his prior sin—and not the reverse. For this follows from the foregoing and can be shown similarly through the foregoing.

This view also the prophet seems clearly to attest: "Let not the foot of pride come to me," he says. "There those who work iniquity have fallen; they were driven out and could not stand" (Psalm 35).

Which Augustine, expounding, says: "First that one who did not stand in the truth fell, then those parents whom God dismissed from paradise. Whence that humble one who says he is not worthy to loose the strap of the sandal was not expelled but stands and hears Him, and rejoices with joy on account of the voice of the Bridegroom—not on account of his own—lest the foot of pride come to him and he be expelled, and not be able to stand."

Hence also a certain predestined and persevering disciple and Doctor says: "They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would certainly have remained with us. But that they may be manifest, because they are not all of us" (1 John 2)—wishing to show that just as being of the number of the elect according to divine predestination is the cause of remaining and persevering finally, and not being so is the cause of not so remaining. That is, just as the volition and election of God eternally preparing and temporally conferring grace and perseverance on anyone is the cause of persevering finally, so also the non-volition and non-election, or reprobation of God, is the cause of not persevering finally. Otherwise, non-election or reprobation of God would not be originally and causally from the one calling, but from the works and merits of the reprobate—which was rejected in chapter 45 of the first book.

Whence also Augustine, in On the Good of Perseverance, chapter 19, disputating, says: "Why did He not give perseverance to the end to certain people who with good faith served God? Why do you think, unless because he who says 'They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would certainly have remained with us' does not lie?"

"To men, however, it seems that all who appear to be good and faithful should have received perseverance to the end. But God judged it better to mix some who would not persevere into the certain number of His saints, so that those for whom security in this life's temptation is not expedient might not be secure. For that saying of the Apostle represses many from pernicious elation: 'Therefore let him who thinks he stands take heed lest he fall.'"

And further, chapter 19: "Of two pious persons, why perseverance to the end is given to one and not to the other—the judgments of God are unsearchable.' Yet this must be most certain to the faithful: that one is of the predestined, the other is not. 'For if they had been of us,' says one of the predestined, who drank this secret from the Lord's breast, 'they would certainly have remained with us.'"

"What is, I ask, 'they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would certainly have remained with us'? Were they not both created by God? Both born of Adam? Both made of earth? And from Him who said, 'Every breath I have made,' had they not received souls of one and the same nature? Were they not, finally, both called and, following the one calling, both justified from the ungodly and both renewed through the washing of regeneration?"

"But if he who knew what he said heard this, he could without doubt respond and say: 'These things are true; according to all these things they were of us. But according to a certain other distinction they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would certainly have remained with us.' What then is this distinction? The books of God are open; let us not avert our gaze. The divine Scripture cries out; let us apply our hearing. 'They were not of us' because they were not called according to His purpose; they were not chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world; they did not fall into His lot; they were not predestined according to the purpose of Him who works all things."

And further, chapter 45, he recounts certain people objecting in this manner: "But they say—as you write—that no one can be stirred by the goads of correction if it is said in the assembly of the Church, with many hearing: 'The determined sentence of the will of God in predestination is such that some of you, having received the will to obey, have come from unbelief to faith, or having received perseverance, remain in the faith; but the rest of you who remain in the delight of sins have not yet risen because the help of merciful grace has not yet raised you. But if any of you are not yet called, whom His grace has predestined to be chosen, you will receive grace by which you will wish to be chosen. And if any of you obey, if you are predestined to be rejected, the powers of obeying will be withdrawn, so that you will cease to obey'"—or according to another reading: "If any of you obey, if you are not predestined to be received," etc., as above. This must be understood in punishment of a prior fault.

In the following chapters, responding, he destroys nothing of these things about predestination, but asserts all to be true. Whence in chapter 46 he says: "These things, when they are said, should not so deter us from confessing true grace of God—that is, which is not given according to our merits—and from confessing predestination of the saints according to it, as we are not deterred from confessing God's foreknowledge. If anyone were to speak to the people about that foreknowledge and say: 'Whether you now live rightly or not, you will be afterward such as God foreknew you would be—either good if good, or evil if evil.' Would it then, if upon hearing this some turned to sluggishness and apathy, and abandoning exertion inclined more readily to lust and went after their desires—would what was said about God's foreknowledge for that reason be thought to be false?"

And chapter 47: "Let the truth therefore be said, especially where some other question impels that it be said."

And chapter 64: He teaches the foregoing about predestination, and specifically that saying—"If any of you obey, if you are not predestined to be received, or if you are predestined to be rejected, the powers of obeying will be withdrawn so that you will cease to obey"—that although it is true, no one should preach it to a multitude of the infirm in this form of words, speaking in the second person and directing the discourse to them; but in another form, in the third person, so that nothing of the meaning is subtracted.

The same author, in On Correction and Grace, chapter 24: "Those who are not going to persevere, and will thus lapse from Christian faith and conduct, and the end of this life will find them thus—without doubt they are not to be counted among the number of these, not even at the time when they are living well and piously. For they are not distinguished from that mass of perdition by the foreknowledge and predestination of God, and therefore are not called according to His purpose, and consequently not elected."

Where also in chapter 25 he adds: "Here if I am asked why God did not give them perseverance—those to whom He gave the love by which they might live as Christians—I respond that I do not know. For not arrogantly but acknowledging my measure, I hear the Apostle saying: 'O man, who are you to reply to God?' etc. And 'O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His judgments, and how untraceable His ways!'"

And in On the Refutation of the Sixteen Chapters Falsely Attributed to Him, Response 14: "Why He retains this one lest he depart, and does not retain that one—it is neither possible to comprehend nor lawful to investigate."

This last view is also clearly attested by very many authorities of Augustine and Gregory set forth in chapter 14 of this book, all of which can be understood according to the foregoing expositions: namely, that on the part of the one not persevering, no sufficient cause of his non-perseverance is to be assigned—namely, his fault.

For of two persons dear to God, pious, equal, and equally tempted, God preserves the one standing by the fifth chapter of this book; He does not preserve the one falling from a fall. But why this one rather than that one? What did the one who first sinned here sin before the other, so that in this first sin he merited to fall?

Also, of two beloved, equal, equally tempted, and equally sinning persons, God raises up one and accepts him and makes him persevere finally, and leaves the other behind. Indeed, without injustice to anyone, He can raise up the one who sinned more and make him persevere finally, and leave the one who sinned less uncorrected. How then is fault a sufficient cause of non-perseverance?

It is also evident from chapter 39 of the first book that good or evil merit is not properly the cause of reward or of actual punishment, although these are rendered for merits, as was shown there.

Not receiving perseverance, therefore, is not the cause, or the sufficient and preceding cause, of God's not giving it. For if it were a cause, it would be a sufficient and preceding one. It seems, therefore, that the reverse is the case.

Further, for a fuller understanding of the Doctors saying that there is no cause why, of two pious equals, God gives perseverance to one and not to the other, it should be noted that this has a twofold sense: one, that there is no sufficient cause on the part of the men themselves—which is true, just as no cause of predestination and reprobation on the part of men is to be posited, as the preceding teachings showed. Another, that there is no sufficient cause on the part of God—which also can be understood in two ways: in one way, entirely generally—and so it is false; for the divine will is the sufficient cause of both. In another way, specifically—namely, that in God there is no cause or reason preceding His will that determines it more weightily to giving perseverance to this one and not giving to that one. And this sense I believe to be true, as the twentieth and twenty-first chapters of the first book clearly make manifest.

CHAPTER XXXIII. HE OBJECTS AND RESPONDS.

Here, however, certain people object: God does everything reasonably and from some just cause; otherwise He would seem to act rashly. And Job 5 says: "Nothing happens on earth without a cause." There is therefore some reason and some just cause why God gives grace or perseverance to this one and not to that one; and not on the part of God—therefore on the part of those people.

Likewise, then no one would sin simply by omitting; for it is not he who omits who is the cause, but God.

Likewise, God abandons no one unless He is first abandoned by him. For He who seeks the estranged, how does He abandon the already converted? Or He who attracts an enemy, how does He repel a friend? Whence John 6: "Him who comes to Me I will not cast out." And Judith 13: "He has not abandoned those who hope in Him." And He who, as the Apostle attests, said: "I will not leave you nor forsake you" (Hebrews 13). And who through the prophet says thus: "Because you have rejected knowledge, I will also reject you" (Hosea 4).

And Augustine, in Book 13 of The City of God, chapter 15, says that the sinful soul was not abandoned by its life, which is God, so that it might abandon, but so that it might be abandoned, it abandoned. And in On the Refutation of the Sixteen Chapters Falsely Attributed to Him, Response 7, he says that God abandons no one before He is abandoned, and often converts many who have abandoned Him. And further, Response 14: "God does not abandon the one who is about to depart before he is abandoned, and often makes it so that he does not depart, and even if he has departed, that he returns."

Which very many canonical and other authorities also attest.

Likewise, the Wise Man admonishes every wise person, saying: "Do not say, 'Through God it is absent'"—namely, the wisdom of God.

Likewise, Anselm, in On the Fall of the Devil, chapter 1, says that God alone has from Himself whatever He has, and all other things have only from Him; and just as from themselves they have only nothing, so from Him they have only something. Where he also consequently shows that nothing and non-being are not from God but inhere in everything else from itself.

And further, chapter 2, he raises the question: just as the good angel therefore received perseverance because God gave it, did the evil angel likewise not receive perseverance because God did not give it?

And further, chapter 3, responding, he says that in the good angel, giving was the cause of receiving; in the evil angel, however, not giving was not the cause of not receiving perseverance—but the reverse.

The first of these objections is resolved by the foregoing here and in chapter 21 of the first book. Nor does the objection about omission of good proceed. For similarly you could argue that no one merits by omitting evil, or by declining from evil. Similarly also you could argue about commission: that no one sins or merits by doing anything, since God there pre-acts by working.

Wherefore also Augustine, in the Gloss on Deuteronomy 29—"The Lord has not given you a heart to understand," etc.—cited just above, says: "How does He say above, 'You have seen the trials,' etc., if the Lord did not give eyes to see? But they saw with the body, not with the heart. Whence He prefaced, 'The Lord did not give you to know.' To this pertain the two things that follow: 'eyes to see' and 'ears to hear'—that is, to understand and to obey. But what He says—'The Lord did not give you'—He says by way of reproach and accusation, and He would not say it unless it pertained to their fault, lest anyone think himself excusable on this account. For He shows at once that without help they cannot understand and obey with the eyes and ears of the heart; and yet if the help of God is absent, man's fault is not thereby excusable, since the judgments of God, though hidden, are just."

As for the argument that God abandons no one before He is abandoned—what is truer? For God does not inflict punishment unless He is first offended by fault. He therefore abandons no one by taking away grace unless that person first abandons Him by sinning. But what does this obstruct? For it is not because God does not give someone grace and perseverance that he is thereby abandoned by God; nor because someone does not receive grace or perseverance from God is he thereby abandoned by Him—as is evident regarding the angels and first parents, who according to the view of some lacked grace for a certain while, and after they received grace the apostate angels and first parents lacked perseverance for another while, as the following fall showed; yet in neither interval were they abandoned by God, because they had absolutely no fault.

But if it was not so in fact, it could have been so. And what, I ask, was then the cause of not receiving grace? Was it not non-giving? And why should not receiving perseverance be judged similarly?

As for what the Wise Man says—that the wisdom of God is not absent through God—by whom, then, is prophetic wisdom absent from many holy men without any preceding demerit on their part? And present to many evil men, their manifold demerit notwithstanding—as also to evil angels and to the first parents before sin? And from the holy confirmed angels was absent manifold wisdom, as is evident from chapter 16 of this book—and through whom, unless through God not giving?

It is nevertheless true that the wisdom of God necessary for salvation, once given, is not absent from anyone through God wholly voluntarily withdrawing it without any preceding fault, because He abandons no one unless He is first abandoned by him, as was shown above.

That saying of Anselm, however—that non-beings do not have their non-being from God—needs deeper scrutiny. For the opposite seems to follow from the second, fifth, ninth, and following parts of chapter 13, and from chapter 14 of the first book.

Likewise, for the Antichrist not to exist is true, just, and reasonable, and not naturally prior to the divine will—because then it would be necessary, as is evident from chapters 18 and 21 of the first book. Therefore it is posterior, caused, and dependent on that will, as is evident from the same passages and from the demonstration of the twelfth part of chapter 13 of the first book.

Likewise, the Antichrist's not existing is not naturally prior to the divine will—because then it would be necessary by the foregoing, and because then it would not be subject to the divine will. It is therefore posterior and dependent on that will.

Likewise, by the corollary of chapter 22 of the first book, God wills the Antichrist not to exist. And by the twentieth chapter of the first book, it is not because the Antichrist does not exist that God wills him not to exist, since his non-existence is posterior to and subject to the divine will; since also by the same twentieth chapter, contingent beings are not the cause of the divine will—much less, therefore, contingent non-beings. It is therefore the reverse: because God wills the Antichrist not to exist, therefore he does not exist.

Likewise, God knows the Antichrist does not exist—and not because the Antichrist does not exist, as is evident from chapter 15 of the first book—but by chapter 18 of the first book, because He wills him not to exist. This knowledge and volition, therefore, is the cause of his non-being.

Likewise, the Antichrist has non-being and is a non-being—either through himself or through another. If through himself, as Anselm seems to assert there, and Augustine in On the Immortality of the Soul, chapter 13, as the second chapter of the first book cites—then always and necessarily, as is evident from the second and twenty-sixth chapters of the first book.

How also does he have non-being through himself, since he has neither himself nor anything of himself—because neither matter nor form? If also the Antichrist has non-being from himself or through himself—either a necessary non-being, so that it is impossible for him to be, or a possible and contingent non-being. The first clearly does not hold, nor the second, as is also evident from chapter 14 of the first book, even through Anselm.

If through another—either through another being or a non-being. If through another non-being, the same inquiry must be made about that, and since there is no infinite regress in such things, let a stop be given at some point, etc., as above. If through another being, that is either God or something dependent on Him; and so the entire procession will eventually be reduced to Him.

Many things also are non-beings whose being or non-being depends only on God—namely, those that are made immediately and solely by Him.

Likewise, the Antichrist does not through himself have being, nor non-being—because then, by the foregoing, he would always necessarily have one of the two. But of himself he is indifferent—that is, he has from himself no difference toward being or toward non-being. If, therefore, he now has one of these, now the other, this must be through something else determining him now to this, now to that.

Likewise, according to this position, it seems that the non-being of beings, or of non-beings, would be their being—indeed, their necessary being—and that they would have it from themselves, not from God. Also, that God could not destroy that being, and that the being they receive from God would be accidental to them, and, with them essentially remaining, would come and go, like a garment on a man who remains.

For Anselm says there that all things other than God have from themselves only nothing. And further: "When God, as if angry, destroys something by taking away its being, the non-being is not from Him; but when He removes, as it were, His own being that He had bestowed—what had been made and was preserved by Him to be—it returns to non-being, which it has not from Him, but from itself, before it was made." Just as if you reclaim a tunic that you had willingly lent for a time to someone naked, he does not have his nakedness from you, but with you removing what was yours, he returns to what he was before he was clothed by you.

But no one doubts that this is not the mind of Anselm—because his other subtle works show otherwise. For God truly creates from nothing, newly bestowing the entire being of a thing upon it—indeed, perhaps not properly "bestowing upon it," since what is bestowed upon seems to exist before it is bestowed. Rather, He newly makes and produces the entire thing.

Nor should it disturb us that according to the Doctors all things eternally were in God. For they were not there really and truly as things diverse from Him, as can be shown from the first supposition and by manifold arguments and very many authorities. But because I consider this to be virtually known to both philosophers and theologians, I confirm it very briefly.

Augustine indeed says in On the Joys of the Just and the Punishments of the Wicked that the world was in God before it was in itself—not the world, but God. William also, Bishop of Paris, condemned an article asserting that many truths existed from eternity that are not God Himself.

Anselm, however, can be expounded to mean that non-being is not from God efficiently, properly, but deficiently; not as an effect, but as a defect—as the preceding chapter of this book said. Which his words there set forth, and others, seem to attest. For he says: "When God, angry, destroying something, takes away being, the non-being is not from Him; but when He removes, as it were, His own being that He had bestowed—what had been made and preserved by Him to be—it returns to non-being."

And further: "For just as from the highest good nothing comes except good, so from the highest essence nothing comes except essence. Whence since the highest good is the highest essence, it follows that every good is an essence, and every essence a good. Nothing, therefore, and non-being—just as it is not an essence—so it is not a good. For nothing and non-being are not from Him, from whom nothing comes except good and essence."

But what both Anselm and Augustine seem to assert—that things through themselves or from themselves are not, or have non-being—can be expounded by placing the negation first: namely, that things are not through themselves, nor have being from themselves—but through God.

And if anyone objects that even if God did not exist, still non-beings—such as the chimera and the Antichrist—would not exist, the last part of chapter 13 and the corollary of chapter 14 of the first book, with their demonstrations, will respond.

Anselm's second saying also—namely, that not receiving perseverance was the cause of not giving—similarly needs greater scrutiny. For this seems to conflict with his earlier saying. For if no being—since not even God—is the cause of non-being or of a non-being, but every non-being or non-being is such through itself, how will one non-being or non-being be the cause of another? How, therefore, can not receiving be the cause of not giving?

If also not receiving is the cause of not giving—either a positive cause or a privative one. Not a positive cause, clearly. Nor a privative one—for this would be because it would deprive the cause of giving; and since it would only deprive by removing receiving, receiving would be the cause of giving—contrary to Anselm's position.

If also not receiving is the cause of not giving, in what genus of cause? Not material, nor formal, clearly; nor final—for then not giving would be the efficient cause of non-reception, and the one not giving would finally intend and cause the non-reception—contrary to Anselm in the same passage. Nor can it be said that not receiving is the efficient cause of not giving—because not a positive efficient cause, clearly. Nor a privatively efficient cause—for this would be because it would deprive the positive efficient cause. Wherefore receiving would be the positive efficient cause of giving—contrary to Anselm's position.

The venerable Father Anselm intends, as I think, that all the angels received a good will from God, in which, if they had stood until a certain term appointed by God, they would have been beatifically confirmed by the merit of that standing—just as those who persisted were, as is evident below in chapter 6 of On the Fall of the Devil. And in this good will even the apostate angel stood for a time, but did not persist, did not continue to will, did not finally persevere in so willing. And he did not have this persevering will—not because God entirely voluntarily and by mere motion, without preceding demerit, took it away or did not give it, as if He now by His absolute omnipotence were to take away from Gabriel his beatific will purely voluntarily without any preceding fault—but because the evil angel first culpably willed something else, and by that culpable will lost the prior just will.

He therefore understands, briefly, that God did not without the preceding fault of the evil angel take away from him the just will, or cease to give or preserve it; but He did this because of his preceding sin, as is plainly evident from that third chapter.

Where, after a long disputation, he says at the end: "I say that the reason he did not will when he ought and what he ought is not that the will failed to give what was failing, but because he himself, by willing what he ought not, expelled the good will—the bad always coming in. Wherefore the reason he did not have a persevering good will, or did not receive it, is not that God did not give it, but the reason God did not give it is that he, by willing what he ought not, both abandoned it and by abandoning did not hold it."

Which he also shows consequently in chapters 4 and 6. And this accords with many things written in the preceding chapter of this book.

Wherefore also Augustine, in On Correction and Grace, chapter 48: "Then"—namely, in the state of innocence before sin—"God had given man a good will; for in that state He had made him who made him upright. He had given him help, without which he could not remain in it if he willed; but that he should will, He left in his free will. He could therefore remain if he willed, because the help was not lacking through which he could perseveringly hold the good that he willed. But because he did not wish to remain, surely it is his fault—whose merit it would have been if he had wished to remain. Just as the holy angels did: who, while others fell through free will, through the same free will stood, and merited to receive the due reward of this standing—namely, such a fullness of blessedness that they would be most certain of always remaining in it."

COROLLARY

COROLLARY: THAT NOT ONLY DO BEINGS NEED GOD NECESSARILY FOR THEIR TRUE BEING, BUT ALSO NON-BEINGS FOR THEIR NON-BEING; AND THAT GOD MOST WORTHILY HOLDS SOVEREIGNTY NOT ONLY OVER BEINGS BUT ALSO OVER NON-BEINGS.

From these things I consider it manifest that not only do beings need God for their being, but also non-beings for their non-being; and that God most worthily holds sovereignty not only over beings but also over non-beings.

This corollary follows evidently from the foregoing here and from the corollary of chapter 14 of the first book.

Wherefore also the three youths of Daniel, as if with one mouth, invite nights and days, light and darkness, to bless the Lord, praise Him, and superexalt Him forever (Daniel 3).

The blessed Dionysius also, in chapter 4 of On the Divine Names, says: "Every power, every operation, every state, every sense, every word, every deed, every touch, every knowledge, every union—and simply every existing thing—is both from the beautiful and good, and in the beautiful and good, and is turned toward the beautiful and good. And all things whatsoever that are and come to be, all look to it, and are moved by it and are held together. And in its grace and for its sake and in its exemplary form is every principle—namely, material, efficient, formal, elemental—and simply every principle, every containing, every end. Or, to speak comprehensively: all existing things are from the beautiful and good, and all non-existing things are supersubstantially in the beautiful and good. And it is the principle and end of all—super-principial and super-final—because from it, and in it, and through it, and unto it are all things, as the sacred word says."

And further, chapter 5: "All things whatsoever that are and come to be, through the good and the best are and come to be. And to this all things look, and by it are moved and held together. And for its sake and through it and in it is every exemplary, consummative, intellectual, special, formal principle—and simply every principle, every containing, every summit. Or, to speak comprehensively: all things that are, are from the good and the best; and all things that are not are super-essentially in the good and the best. And it is the principle and end of all—super-principial and super-final—because from it, and through it, and in it, and unto it are all things, as the sacred word says."

CHAPTER XXXIV. THROUGH THE FOREGOING HE DRAWS MEN TOWARD FEAR AND LOVE, TOWARD TRUST, PATIENCE AND HUMILITY, TOWARD PRAYER, AND TOWARD THE GIVING OF THANKS.

O great and wonderful God of ours, sole light of our eyes, open, I beseech You, the eyes of my heart and the eyes of others, so that we may truly contemplate the great and wonderful things of Yours set forth above, and having contemplated them, venerate them more devoutly.

For with the foregoing weighed by discreet consideration, who is not shaken with fear? Who is not kindled with love? Who is not strengthened in trust? Who is not armed with patience? Who is not provoked to the lowest humiliation, to assiduous prayer, and to continuous thanksgiving?

Who, I say, considering discreetly the foregoing, is not shaken with fear, seeing Your most omnipotent will efficacious in all things, according to which You govern all things celestial, terrestrial, and infernal? By which You exalt whom You will and when You will; You humble whom You will and when You will; You heal, You make sick, You give life, You put to death; whom You will You predestine and save, and whom You will You reprobate and damn. Even if He were to damn an innocent person, who would accuse Him—since His will in such matters is the mistress of reason, the author of justice, and the rule of equity, as is evident from chapters 20, 21, and 39 of the first book?

Which that great Nebuchadnezzar also experienced and attests, of whom Daniel 4 is written thus: "The word was fulfilled upon Nebuchadnezzar, and he was driven from among men, and ate grass like an ox, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, until his hair grew like eagles' feathers and his nails like birds' claws."

"Therefore at the end of the days, I Nebuchadnezzar lifted up my eyes to heaven, and my understanding was restored to me, and I blessed the Most High, and praised and glorified Him who lives forever, because His power is an everlasting power, and His kingdom from generation to generation. And all the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing before Him. For He does according to His will, both in the powers of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth, and there is none who can resist His hand or say to Him, 'What have You done?'"

Wherefore also Job, though most holy, says: "My foot has followed His steps; I have kept His way and have not turned aside from it. I have not departed from the commandments of His lips, and I have hidden the words of His mouth in my bosom. But He Himself is alone, and no one can turn aside His thought; and whatever His soul has wished, this He has done. And when He shall have fulfilled His will in me, many other similar things are at hand for Him. And therefore I am troubled before His face, and when I consider Him, I am anxious with fear" (Job 23).

On which the blessed Gregory, Book 16 of the Morals, chapter 15, writes thus: "As if he were saying from one side: I now ponder what I suffer, but I still dread what I may be able to suffer. For He fulfills His will in me, because He afflicts me with many blows; but many similar things are at hand for Him, because if He plans to strike, there is still found a place where the wound may grow. Hence it must be considered how fearful before the scourge was one who even when struck still fears being struck further."

"Considering the incomprehensible force of His power and examination, the just man did not wish to be secure even about the scourge. Whence, still fearing, he adds: 'And therefore I am troubled before His face, and when I consider Him, I am anxious with fear.' Rightly is he troubled before the face of the Lord, who sets before the eyes of his heart the terror of that majesty, and is shaken with fear of His rectitude, while he sees himself unable to render a worthy account if he is strictly judged."

"Rightly, moreover, is it said, 'And when I consider Him, I am anxious with fear'—because when anyone least considers the force of the hidden strictness, he least dreads it; and he is all the more secure in this life as he is more distant from the consideration of the internal strictness. For just men always return to the secret chamber of the heart, behold the force of the hidden strictness, stand before the judgment of the innermost majesty—so that they may at some time be all the more secure, the more they did not wish to be secure here as long as they lived."

"But behold: about the blessed Job we know that he was devoted to all the works of holiness, and yet he endures so many scourges, and is not even secure amid the scourges, but still fears, still trembles as he considers the force of divine strictness. What then shall we wretches, we sinners, say, if he who so acted so fears?"

Whence also Augustine, on Psalm 70, Treatise 1: "The love and fear of God greatly move us: fear, because He is just; love, because He is merciful. For who would say to Him, 'What have You done?' if He condemned the just? How great, therefore, is His mercy, that He justifies the unjust!"

Who will not fear such and so great a Lord? And who, struck with such fear, will not take care to avoid offending Him and to appease Him, and thus, fleeing all evils and pursuing all goods, will not finally love Him above all things with all his strength?

For love extends to good, and the greater the good, the more it is to be loved. But You, Lord my God, are the good of every good, good above all goods, a good infinitely infinite, as the first supposition shows. How much, therefore, ought I reasonably to love You? Proportionally infinitely? Would that I could! But how can I, so small and finite, love You infinitely?

And how will due proportion of lovable things and loves otherwise be preserved? For You, my superlovable God, exceed other lovable things infinitely. How also, if I loved You—the infinite good—finitely, could I not love some finite good equally, and some indeed more?

Or perhaps, Lord, I ought to love You infinitely as to the manner, even if perhaps not as to the act. As far as pertains to the manner of loving, I ought to love You finally for Your own sake, and no other good finally for its own sake, but all for Your sake, Lord, the supreme good, who are the beginning and end of all goods.

Or perhaps I do in a way love You infinitely as to the act, both intensively and extensively. Intensively in a way, because more intensely, firmly, and strongly than any finite good, if I love You and it fittingly—since I love that good only for Your sake; for always, "that for the sake of which each thing is, that is more." Extensively in a way, by comparing You, Lord, the supreme good, to other goods however many and however great, and loving You, Lord, above all things and before all things—while I would prefer all of them, and even myself, not to exist rather than You alone; or while I would prefer all of them and even myself not to exist rather than to offend You once.

But still, most loving Lord, considering a certain other proportionality of loves and friendships, I am greatly anxious and troubled. For if it is true that a certain person says, "In all friendships and loves that exist by way of superabundance, the analogy is fitting—that the better should be loved more than he loves, and the more useful, and each of the others similarly. For when love is according to worthiness, then a certain equality is produced, which indeed seems to belong to friendship"—by how much You are better than I and more useful to me than I am to You, by that much more ought I to love You than You love me.

But can I do this? How much, I ask, do You love me, Lord? Do You love me sparingly and feebly, as sparingly and feebly as I am good? Perish this thought from You, Lord, supremely good! For You would not be supremely good unless in every goodness You possess You were supremely and perfectly good, as You have taught me above. Your love, therefore, by which You love Your lover and friend—though unworthy—is not sparse or thin, cold or feeble, but most perfect and supreme. Otherwise also, with the goodness of Your beloved and friend growing, You could intensify Your love, progress in love, and change—the opposite of which You have shown in the foregoing, in chapters 5 and 23 of the first book.

How then shall I love You as much as You love me? Indeed, how shall I love You as much more than You love me as You are better than I?

Or perhaps, because I ought to love You in a way infinitely as to the manner of loving, and as to the act of love both intensively and extensively in the aforesaid ways, but You do not love me so—because I am not to be so loved? For I ought to love You finally for Yourself, and all other things for You; but You do not love me for my sake, nor other things for my sake, but me and other things for Your sake—as indeed they ought not to be loved otherwise. I ought also to love You infinitely in a way intensively—namely, above every finite good—but You do not love me so. I ought also to love You, Lord, the supreme good, infinitely in a way extensively—namely, wishing rather that however many and however great other goods, and even myself, not exist, rather than You, or rather than offend You once. But You do not love me so, because I ought not to be so loved.

I know, however, that in a certain ineffable way, incomparably greater than mute I can express, You love Your friends incomparably more than You are loved by them—just as You are incomparably better and greater. For Your love transcends the love of every creature, just as any goodness of Yours transcends any goodness of any creature, incomparably infinitely.

O great Lord, great good, who fill heaven and earth—indeed, whom the heavens and the heaven of heavens cannot contain—as You deigned to show to me, Your little one, in chapters 2 and 5 of the first book! Why do You not fill my little soul? O soul, how small, so miserable, that is not most fully filled with the love of so great a good! Why do you not open all your little doors? Why do you not spread wide all your folds? Why do you not extend all your capacity, so that by the sweetness of so great a love you, so small, may be totally occupied, totally sated, and totally inebriated? Especially since you, however small, cannot be sated by the love of a lesser good—which seems wonderful. But my God is still more wonderful.

Say therefore, I beseech, humbly, that it may be so, most lovable my God, and without doubt it will be so.

What also is more effective for love than to go before in loving? But You, most loving—would that You were most loved—Lord, went before me, wretched and not loving but hostile, by loving, reconciling, magnificently bestowing the jewels of surpassing charity, as You show from many of the foregoing.

What moreover is more lovable to one who is multiply miserable than manifold mercy, or a more multiplied mercy, without end, number, weight, or measure? But You, Lord, as You show from chapter 1 of the first book—because infinitely and supremely good—are consequently infinitely and supremely merciful, so that nothing more merciful could be or even be thought.

You, most merciful Lord, did not exclude me, Your most ungrateful servant—not only withdrawing the service due to You, but rebelling in many ways—from Your most pious protection; but from the roaring lions, from the gnashing demons, lest they drag me devoured down to the underworld, You mercifully defended me—as You piously teach from chapters 22 of the first book and 32 of this second book and others. And what I count as no less: from so many greater and lesser sins You mercifully preserved me—as many as I could otherwise have incurred—as You show from chapter 4 of this book.

Indeed—and this seems of incomparably greater mercy—not only did You, by Your gratuitous grace, mercifully go before me, who merited nothing good but was heaping sins upon sins and so greatly and continuously offending You, so great a Lord; You healed all my infirmities, and once healed, advancing me from virtue to virtue, You exalted me to all healthy and holy things that I did; and healthy and saved from all enemies and infirmities of the soul, until I should proudly abandon You, You guarded me—as You revealed from chapter 35 of the first book with what follows, and from chapter 5 of this book with its thirtieth chapter and the one following.

Indeed, even if after the gift of such great grace, after the covenant of such great friendship, contumaciously abandoning You—however ungrateful and unworthy I become, however much I mock and despise You, Lord—You defend me from enemies, preserve me from sins, as You have taught above. And when it pleases Your mercy, You go before me by Your gratuitous grace and bring me back—not only undeserving but given over to evil merits—and You do not reproach me for past disgraces; nor do You restore me to a lower degree of Your friendship, but to an equal or more excellent one, most merciful my God. And thus You diligently guard me, cherish and nourish me, protect me and continuously advance me to greater things—until perhaps, becoming proud again, I abandon You, as You teach through the foregoing with chapter 43 of the first book, most pious my God.

And so as many times as I depart from You, however far into a distant region, even to the end of the desert or the depth of the sea—indeed, even if I go to the gates of the lower hell—Your mercy is at hand, ready to bring back the wretch. Otherwise You would be of numerable and finite mercy—the contrary of which You have demonstrated above.

And upon all these remembered goods, You give me the consummative and crowning good of all, without which the rest will not profit—not because of the demand of merits, but from Your gratuitous grace: namely, final perseverance, as You show through chapter 14 of this book. And thus finally, eternal life, glory, and Yourself.

For You crown with mercy and compassions, and Your grace is eternal life. You are the worker of our merits that please You, the rewarder, and the reward. Yet if You wished to reckon strictly with us, we would merit absolutely nothing good, as I have learned from You in chapter 39 of the first book. It is therefore not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of You, Lord, superabundantly showing mercy.

And to consider not only the greater goods but also the lesser ones—such as the goods of nature and fortune, as they are commonly called; goods interior and exterior; interior, of mind and body; of mind: ingenuity, moral and intellectual virtues; of body: health, strength, beauty, and other bodily powers; exterior: nobility, riches, victories, fame, glory, and honor, and whatever else there is—I infallibly see that all these goods are Your gratuitous gifts, as by Your gratuitous grace You taught me through the twenty-seventh chapter of the first book and what follows.

There are also many other great goods that few consider or notice—namely, the privations of all the evils that one does not have: that you are not senseless or foolish, not leprous or blind, not infamous among the people, not the reproach of men and the rejection and derision of the people, not confused by failing in your deeds as cleric or layperson, not ignominiously defeated, not addicted to vile servitude, not wasted by hunger, not robbed or slaughtered by bandits, not devoured by a wild beast, not drowned in the sea, not hanged on a gallows, nor consumed by any more shameful and bitter death.

And from whom, I ask, Lord, are these very many goods—because infinite in multitude and greatest because infinite in magnitude, or nearly so—to Your useless servant, unless from You, most manifoldly supremely and infinitely good God, as You wished to kindly show from chapters 13 and 22 of the first book and chapter 32 of this book?

Whence also You strike my mind with a certain little question: namely, whether I am more bound to You, good Lord, for the love of positive created goods that I received from You giving, or for the aforesaid privative goods—namely, the exclusions of evils—which also, unless You giving, I was unable to receive or have, since those, as it seems, are finite both in multitude and in magnitude, but these are infinite both in multitude and magnitude, or at least more numerous and greater.

But who will rebuke me if, leaping over this good little question, I seek You, Lord, the supreme good, find You, and hold You, and do not let go? For I know—and this time let it suffice for me to know—that both for these goods of Yours and for those, I am bound very greatly to Your love; but for Yourself, the supreme good, incomparably more beyond measure.

You also move me with another question: namely, whether one mercifully preserved from sin is more bound to Your love than one who has fallen and been mercifully raised from sin. But leaving this question also for myself at present, grant that I may seek Your face, find it, and see it perpetually and enjoy it.

With these and similar questions now left aside, who, considering so good a Lord and such great benefits of His, is not entirely kindled with love, entirely suspended in devotion, entirely converted into love?

But I see, Lord, that it is easy to say these things and paint them on parchment—perhaps difficult to do and accomplish in effect. You therefore, best and therefore most powerful Lord, to whom nothing is difficult, grant, I beseech, that I may do these things more easily in my heart than utter them with my mouth. Open, I beg, Your most munificent hand, and grant that nothing may be easier for me, nothing sweeter, nothing more delightful than to fulfill these things most effectively and most affectionately.

But You, most loving Lord, who love those who love You and go before them in loving, and incomparably love us more than You are loved by us—whom will You not raise up to hope in You by the gift of so great love, by the covenant of so great friendship? To trust in You? Indeed, to super-hope and confidently presume?

For You, Lord, are so infinitely good and merciful that nothing better or more merciful could be, or even be thought, as You have mercifully shown above. And as good and merciful as You are, so pious and clement, rich and powerful, magnificent, liberal, and gracious with every virtue—as You most truly make manifest from that first most precious and truest supposition of Yours. What then will You be able to deny to Your needy friend, humbly begging Your help?

Allow me, I beseech, now to presume a little upon the hope conceived, and to dispute with Your magnificent goodness, so that I may hope still more highly and trust more abundantly.

It is not, I say, the part of human friendship to repel a needy, begging, and blushing friend and make his face blush all the more—especially if abundant resources are at hand. How much more is so horrible a vice far from Your friendship?

You have also shown me above that I cannot think or ask for anything good unless You work—and antecedently work—this in me. You, therefore, who plant the beginning, give the middle, grant the end. You who make me ask, make me obtain and hold. You who give many goods to those who do not ask, how will You give nothing to those who ask? You who hear Your enemies, even demons, asking impiously, how do You repel Your friends and children asking piously? Nor can You allege any kind of want, as the aforesaid supposition clearly teaches.

Perhaps You object to me that I do not deserve to be helped. O most liberal Lord, if You help no one unless he has deserved to be helped, You do not give Your help freely but sell it. What then is Your praise? Where is Your great liberality?

Perhaps You still reply that I not only do not deserve but abundantly deserve punishment. O merciful Lord, Your mercy is more abundantly great. For my entire sin, and even the sin of all men, is finite—for it could be increased. But Your mercy is infinite, which cannot be increased.

Is it not also more merciful and liberal to do good to a needy enemy who is continually hostile, than to a well-deserving friend? What is more merciful or liberal than, in no way anticipated, to convert a continually hostile enemy to friendship freely, to freely remit all enmity and injury, and freely confer abundant benefits?

But Your mercy and liberality are so great that they could not be greater, nor even be thought greater. And what is more proportionate and fitting to such great mercy and liberality than to freely make such great misery happy, and freely enrich such great poverty? Or if anything more merciful and liberal is found, who else will be thought its author but You, most merciful and most liberal my God?

You, therefore, who give the greater, how will You deny the lesser? But if You still object to me however great a misery of mine—I confess it, and therefore I confidently approach Your mercy, which is incomparably greater. For where is Your mercy shown, except in misery revealed? And where Your great mercy, except in great misery revealed?

Did You not also show me above, Lord, where You slightly stirred me to Your love, that by Your gratuitous grace You freely go before sinners, freely make the ungrateful gracious, and freely preserve the graced? Who, then, among sinners will not hope in You, Lord?

I know, however, Lord—I know, and not without grief I know or report—that notwithstanding all these things, there are certain people, namely the proud Pelagians, who would prefer to hope in men, that is, in themselves. For they say: "If God freely predestines us and our works, and administers as He wills, so that we can do nothing without Him working and preparing, He can also similarly reprobate us, not give us good works, or take them away once given, precipitate us into evil works, and bind us once precipitated. Who then can be secure? Who will certainly hope, and not rather despair? But if predestination and reprobation depended on our own free will, and we alone were the free lords of our acts without God, we could be secure; it would be well for us; then we could safely trust and hope."

O vain sons of men, lying sons of men, weighing deceitfully in the scales! Why do you not wish to hope in Him who is supremely good, supremely merciful, supremely propitious, and inestimably abundant in all the gifts of grace—but in yourselves, who are multiply wretched and evil, and deficient in all goods? Why do you not wish to hope in His blessed governance, who cannot err—but in yourselves, who, like a sheep that is lost, very often go astray? Why do you not wish to hope in His powerful help, whose power has no end, whom nothing can conquer, whom nothing can resist—but in yourselves, who are fragile and infirm and almost nothing and emptiness?

Beware, I beseech, of the prophetic curse—indeed, the Lord's curse through the prophet: "Thus says the Lord: Cursed is the man who trusts in man and makes flesh his arm, and whose heart departs from the Lord" (Jeremiah 17).

Note also, I beg, what one who hoped in the Lord—and was not defrauded—says in this very matter: "I do not wish to exaggerate with my words, but rather leave it for their reflection to see what sort of thing they have persuaded themselves of: namely, that by preaching predestination, more despair is brought to the hearers than exhortation. This is to say that a man then despairs of his salvation when he has learned to place his hope not in himself but in God—while the prophet cries out: 'Cursed is the man who has his hope in man'" (Augustine, On the Good of Perseverance, chapter 52).

And further, chapter 64, addressing those who say that preaching about predestination makes men despair: "Perish the thought," he says, "that you should despair of yourselves because you are commanded to have your hope in God, not in yourselves. For 'cursed is everyone who has his hope in man,' because 'blessed are all who trust in Him.'"

And chapter 65: "Why do we fear to preach the predestination of the saints and the true grace of God—that is, that which is not given according to our merits—as also the holy Scripture? Or is it to be feared that a man will then despair of himself, when his hope is shown to be placed in God? Would he not rather despair if he, most proudly and unfaithfully, placed it in himself?"

And chapter 69: "Just as other things must be preached so that the one who preaches them may be obediently heard, so predestination must be preached so that the one who obediently hears it may glory not in man, and therefore not in himself, but in the Lord—because this too is a commandment of God. And to obediently hear this commandment—that he who glories may glory in the Lord—is similarly, like the rest, a gift of God. Which gift whoever does not have, I do not hesitate to say, has whatever else he has in vain. We wish the Pelagians to have this."

The same author, in On the Predestination of the Saints, chapter 13: "Since the Apostle says, 'Therefore it is of faith, so that according to grace the promise may be firm,' I marvel that men prefer to entrust themselves to their own infirmity rather than to the firmness of God's promise." "'The will of God concerning me is uncertain to me,' you say. What then? Is your own will concerning yourself certain to you? Do you not fear: 'Let him who thinks he stands take heed lest he fall'? Since therefore both are uncertain, why does a man not rather entrust his faith, hope, and charity to the firmer rather than the weaker?"

And in Book 2 Against Julian, chapter 17, addressing the Pelagians who say that men are provoked to virtue when it is preached to them that they can do their deeds by their own virtue, but that when it is preached that they can do nothing without the mercy of God, His help and grace, they are cast down and broken by desperation, he says: "As much as the saints presume on the mercy of God, which is great, so much do you presume on your own virtue, which is nothing. And as much as they wage war against ingrained vices, aided by the grace of God, so much do you wage war against the grace of God itself. But dare you say in your heart that when men hear you, they are kindled to virtue, but when they hear such great men as Cyprian, Hilary, Gregory, Ambrose, and the other priests of the Lord, they are broken by desperation and renounce the pursuit of perfection? Do such monstrous thoughts ascend into your heart and not strike your forehead?"

You also, Pelagians, who seem to yourselves subtle—how do you not see that if by your cleverness predestination and the cooperation of God are removed, His foreknowledge can similarly be removed? Or if foreknowledge is not removed, neither is predestination?

Hope as you will; but would that you hoped in the Lord! "But for me it is good to cling to God, to place my hope in the Lord God" (Psalm 72). "For blessed is the man who trusts in the Lord, and the Lord shall be his confidence" (Jeremiah 17).

Wherefore also Augustine, on Psalm 70, Treatise 1: "Let our entire hope be in God, and let us presume nothing of goods as from our own powers, lest making our own what is from Him, we lose even what we have received."

With which the entire sacred Scripture agrees, together with all its holy expositors, as also chapter 32 of the first book, concerning fear, love, and hope—although briefly—urged.

And who, perfectly trusting in such and so great a Lord—without whose will, always best, wisest, most just, and most merciful, and never erring, nothing adverse can happen—will not be strengthened to perfect patience in all adversities, as was briefly touched upon in chapter 32 of the first book?

Who also, fully loving God and neighbor, and noticing that for those who love God all things work together for good, and that God orders all things for the elect and for Himself—as is evident from chapters 39, 32, and others of the first book—will not bear with equanimity whatever adversities, and indeed sustain them gladly and cheerfully, and vehemently thirst for adversarial suffering, as is read of the Apostles and many other saints?

Who moreover—any sinner or other, if anyone presumes himself to be otherwise—trusting in the most just and most pious God, that every adversity is sent by Him either for the punishment of sin (so that if it suffices, one may fly immediately after the present life to the eternal), or if it is less sufficient, at least be punished proportionally less—or perhaps incomparably, as it were, less—in Purgatory (especially if he considers that, according to what was set forth in chapter 39 of the first book, whatever adversity or punishment sent to him by God is in a certain way infinitely less than his sin would require, if dealt with without mercy), or for the matter and accumulation of merit while he suffers patiently?

For who will be crowned with glory unless he has fought gloriously? And who will fight gloriously where a combatant is lacking? God therefore brings to man an adversary combatant, so that he may have someone with whom to fight legitimately, and thus by the merit of a victorious contest be crowned—as is evident from chapters 31 and 32 of the first book. Especially if, according to what was set forth in chapter 39 of the first book, he notices that the sufferings of this time and the merits of patience, however great, are not condign—indeed, are almost nothing and emptiness—compared to the future reward and glory to be liberally compensated for these; or both for the punishment of sin and for the increase of his merit no less—as is evident from chapters 39 and 43 of the first book.

Who, I say, thus trusting in God, will not most patiently, most gladly, and most joyfully sustain all adversities?

Furthermore, who, duly weighing these things, will not only not hate enemies and those exercising hostilities, but will love them? Will not only not curse them, but on the contrary bless them? Will not only not reject them, but embracingly receive them as ministers of God and his own beneficent helpers? For through them and they themselves provide the material—which was lacking—for the exercise of most glorious virtue, merit, and reward to be obtained.

Wherefore Sennacherib, the devastator of the Israelite people, is called a rod, a staff, an axe, and a saw in the hand of God; and Nebuchadnezzar, the most savage depopulator of the same, the servant of God—as is evident from chapter 32 of the first book.

Wherefore also Abishai, wishing to kill Shimei who was cursing David and throwing stones at him, holy David answered: "Let him alone, let him curse according to the command of the Lord. For the Lord commanded him to curse David; and who is the one who dares to say, 'Why has he done so?' Let him alone, let him curse according to the command of the Lord; perhaps the Lord will look upon my affliction and will repay me good for this cursing today" (2 Kings 16).

The blessed Gregory also, in Homily 35 on the Gospels, treating Luke 21—"In your patience you shall possess your souls"—reports that a certain Stephen, father of a certain monastery, very holy and singular in the virtue of patience, in whom the virtue of patience had grown so vigorously that he believed him to be a friend who inflicted any trouble upon him, gave thanks for injuries, and if any loss was inflicted on him in his own poverty, he considered it the greatest gain.

And who, endowed with such patience, will lack humility? Who also, discreetly considering that he can do absolutely nothing good by himself without God specifically working it, nor yet with God antecedently but only subordinately—like an instrument in the hand of a craftsman—and this both in the free consent to operate under and with such a craftsman, and in all his other motions and rests—as chapters 20, 30, and 32 of this book show—will not be easily inclined to the lowest humility, as is evident from chapters 23 and 30 of this book?

Wherefore, of two equal or unequal vessels—as noble as you like in the nobility of their material and form—if a most precious liquid is poured into one while the other remains empty, should the first be proud and vainly exalt itself above the other? By the same and not unreasonable reasoning, even a less noble vessel receiving such liquid could similarly be proud. But the nobler vessel, if such liquid is specifically poured into it, could perhaps be proud believing that it was pre-selected for such a service because of its nobility. But could not this liquid be poured into a baser vessel? Why also do you, noble vessel, vainly glory in your nobility? Whence comes your nobility? Not from yourself, clearly. Could not your Maker have made you for the basest use?

Also, of two trumpets, equal or unequal in the aforesaid way, if a noble trumpeter plays one solemnly while the other remains mute—why should the first be proud and exalt itself above the other, considering the causes set forth above?

Moreover, of two pens, equal or unequal however much in the aforesaid ways, if a subtle scribe writes subtly with one while the other rests—what material for being proud and vainly glorying, with all things duly weighed as set forth above?

Truly, this is how it still seems to me, a wretched sinner: if God deigns to pour some habit or act into me, His ignoble vessel, before certain others equal or inferior to me—if there are any such—or superior ones (for it often happens that more liquid is poured into inferior and simpler vessels)—similarly also I feel, if my heart utters some good word—indeed, not my heart, but if the Spirit of our Father through me, His instrument, speaks some good word; or if the supreme Scribe with the finger of His right hand through me, His pen, writes some truth.

Who also will not think most humbly and abjectly of himself, if he prudently considers how poor and miserable he would have been from himself, and that the chief goods he has he does not have from his preceding merits but from the gratuitous gift of God; and that he cannot even preserve his goods already possessed—indeed, not even his smallest good—but God continuously preserves them; and that he cannot by himself avoid any evil of soul or body, interior or exterior, except by God's special help?

How miserable, foul, and abject, then, would he have been—full of all miseries and stench of mind and body, inwardly and outwardly—had not God mercifully preserved him, as the foregoing attest, which draw us to love!

Wherefore also a certain very humble person humbly writes: "Happy is the one to whom God shows His mercy. He himself is the one who cannot be proud—to whom God shows His mercy. For by showing him His mercy, He persuades him that whatever good he has, he has not except from Him who is our every good. And when he sees that whatever good he has, he does not have from himself but from his God, he sees that everything for which he is praised is from the mercy of God, not from his own merits. And seeing these things, he is not proud; not being proud, he is not exalted; not exalting himself, he does not fall; not falling, he stands; standing, he clings; clinging, he remains; remaining, he enjoys and rejoices in the Lord his God. His own delights will be He who made him, and those delights no one corrupts, no one interrupts, no one takes away."

Who also, rooted in this lowest humility, truly perceiving that he has nothing good from himself, and cannot by himself seek anything, or preserve what has been acquired, or avoid any evil—will he not always turn himself with devout and continuous insistence of prayer to Him who is beyond measure rich and powerful, and liberal and clement, as the foregoing attest—that which was brought forth to induce love and trust—most insistently beseeching that He may remove all harmful things and grant all things profitable?

Who will not by all ways and means merit His will? But although the Father, infinitely magnificent and super-overflowingly liberal, does not wish to sell but to give most liberally the good things given to His children, He does not wish them to languish in idleness or waste away in sloth, but rather to reach strenuously for the crown through prayers and other merits of probity—as is evident from chapters 23 and 39 of the first book.

For the Lord's giving a crown to His soldiers, dignified through prayers and other merits of probity, is much more liberal than crowning the unworthy without merits. Is it not more liberal to give manifold gifts than simple ones? But to certain of His children He gives, as it were, a single simple gift—namely, to baptized infants, everlasting glory. But to others, whom He wished to give a more distinguished honor and a more glorious crown, He liberally destined other prior gifts: He liberally girded them with the military belt, liberally gave them valiant contests, glorious victories, and how many manifold works of probity—by which He no less liberally further granted that they should have Him Himself as their patron in war (from whom they had all other things), and should continually invoke His name, which is "Almighty," at least in heart and at opportune times confidently resound it with their mouth. "For the name of the Lord is a most strong tower; the just man runs to it" by invoking it more devoutly, "and shall be exalted" by triumphing.

And who does not know that all prayers and all merits are special gifts of God, as very many passages in the first and second books clearly make manifest? Wherefore also the Lord Himself says: "I will pour out upon the house of David and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem the spirit of grace and of prayers" (Zechariah 12). And all these things God gives to His own, not for any utility of His own, but theirs.

Is there not, then, greater liberality here than there—especially since the Lord does not give the crown of life to His soldiers because of their prior merits, as though for some utility brought to Himself, or for some cause antecedently moving His will; but rather the merits for the crown, and both the merits and the crown according to His most liberal and gratuitous will—as is evident from chapters 35 and 39 of the first book?

And who, gratefully considering so many and so great and so gracious benefits, both positive and privative, is not easily provoked—indeed, drawn and urged by a certain grateful and spontaneous violence—to render thanks of every kind, and the most grateful of grateful actions of thanks, and to sing "Thanks be to God" always? For whatever good we have or can do, whatever evil we do not have and do not do—it is entirely Your gratuitous gift, most gracious grace, and the Author of grace, my God.

Indeed, because these small things seem small to You, who are great, You moreover give us Yourself. For You gave Yourself to us when we did not yet exist—as provider, predestiner, elector, and finally maker. You also give Yourself to us who now exist through You—as most continuous preserver, most magnificent promoter, most ready helper, and most pious protector in all things.

What then shall I render to the Lord for all that He has rendered to me freely? What thanks shall I give to the gratuitous bestower of so many and so great graces? For grateful repayment requires something proportional, as You, Lord, freely teach both through natural reason and through the moral philosophers. What then of Your goods from my goods shall I render to You, since I have nothing good nor can have except from Your gratuitous gift? Nor do You give me Your other gifts in such a way that they are so mine that they cease to be Yours. For I myself entirely am more Yours than mine—indeed, I am Yours, not mine. And all things of mine are more Yours than mine—indeed, they are Yours, not mine. What then shall I render to You, my God? Indeed, Lord, for Your goods I shall render Your goods to You, and the same good in a certain way for itself.

Wherefore also a certain grateful son of Yours, sublimated by the gifts of Your grace, gratefully giving thanks, says: "Blessed are You, Lord God of Israel, our Father, from eternity to eternity. Yours, O Lord, is magnificence and power, and glory and victory, and to You is praise. For all things that are in heaven and on earth are Yours. Yours, O Lord, is the kingdom, and You are above all princes. Yours are riches, and Yours is glory. You rule over all; in Your hand is power and might; in Your hand is greatness and dominion over all. Now therefore, our God, we confess to You and praise Your illustrious name. Who am I, and who are my people, that we should be able to promise all these things to You? All things are Yours, and what we received from Your hand we have given to You."

For You, Lord my God, who do not need our goods, do not so require repayment that You may be made richer thereby; but so that through the same repayment You may make us richer, and give us Your thing and Yourself all the more.

But still, Lord, considering the aforementioned proportionality of benefit and repayment, I am multiply distracted and troubled. For if I wish to repay You at equality or beyond—as perhaps I should if I could—what equal or greater thing shall I repay You for myself, for all my positive and similarly privative goods? What moreover for Yourself, gratuitously given to me?

If, however, I do not wish to repay, or not according to due proportionality, how shall I not be ungrateful to You? How shall I be excused from ingratitude?

Or perhaps You will remit to me the obligation by which I bound myself to repay You. For why, supremely liberal—to such an extent that You could not be more liberal—would You not remit and grant even this obligation? Since You remit and grant much greater things—namely, the gravest sins against You. Since also the strongest obligation, contracted from Your own express command, from a personal oath and solemn vow—whether of virginity of mind or body, or of continence from mortal sin—You remit to the fallen one who rises.

And how are You omnipotent if You cannot do this? And how are You of worse, less liberal, and less generous condition than a miserable man, who can similarly remit—namely, even the strongest obligation, as it seems, by which anyone has been obligated to him?

Wherefore also one of the lovers of Your wisdom—whether wise, I do not know; You know—speaking of the obligation of a son to a father and of repayment, says: "the debtor"—namely, the son—"is to be repaid to the father. But doing nothing worthy of the things that were done for him, he worked. Wherefore he always owes. But those to whom it is owed have the power to remit, and the father certainly."

But otherwise, Lord, You taught me, ungrateful and unwise, more graciously in chapter 39 of the first book. For if You were to absolve me, not repaying, from the obligation by which I am bound to You, You would make me freer, confer a greater freedom, and give me a new benefit. How, then, unless I become ungrateful for so great a new benefit together with the prior ones not withdrawn, am I not more tightly bound and more lovingly obligated?

Is it not the case that if anyone lends me money under an obligatory bond, and when I do not pay freely remits the money and freely returns the obligation, he binds and ties me with a bond of more manifold obligation—not an obligation that produces a violent action in the contentious court, but one that in the court of gratitude and love requires a grateful spirit and a concordant repayment, especially if opportunity permits or necessity requires? Whose spirit, unless perhaps an ungrateful one, does not inwardly feel thus?

Wherefore also another lover of moral wisdom—a studious liberator of benefits, a most just and most grateful rewarder, at least in teaching and word (would that, Lord, it were so before You in deed and action!)—says: "A creditor of a benefit must be sought more diligently than a creditor of money. For the latter must be repaid as much as I received, and if I have repaid I am free and discharged. But to the former, more must be paid, and nevertheless, even when thanks have been returned, we still owe. For I must, when I have repaid, begin again."

But, Lord, so that I may dispute a little with the former wise man—or lover of wisdom—about Your promise, for You and the law of gratitude that You have sanctioned: If, I say, a father can remit to a son the natural obligation by which the son is bound to him—let him remit. And then, by your ungrateful hypothesis, into whatever calamity the father falls, however rich and powerful the son may be, the son is in no way bound to him, or at least no more than to a stranger. Indeed, he would be more bound to liberate from death any stranger from whom he had received even the smallest benefit not yet repaid, rather than his own father who is about to die. Which who, unless a most ungrateful son, would even hear, or even think?

But to descend to lesser obligations, and finally from them to ascend to greater ones: it seems that no obligation, however small, contracted between a benefactor and a beneficiary—even from the smallest benefit—can be fully discharged while both remain, so that the beneficiary is in no way bound to the benefactor by reason of the benefit previously received.

For it cannot be fully discharged by the benefactor remitting every debt and every obligation; for thus benefiting further, he further obligates the recipient. Nor by the beneficiary repaying the equal or the greater, even a hundred thousand times or more.

For suppose, according to the ungrateful hypothesis, that the beneficiary has fully repaid the benefactor and has entirely divested himself of every obligation contracted by reason of the benefit previously received. Then suppose the benefactor and a stranger, both in need, meet the beneficiary—who is able to help only one—with all else being equal, and they humbly beg his help. Who, unless ungrateful—indeed, according to a certain grateful person, the most ungrateful of all, namely one forgetful of the benefit previously received—would hesitate to prefer the benefactor over the stranger by reason of the beneficence previously received?

Who, therefore, will sufficiently repay a father? Or who will sufficiently repay You, supreme Father?

COROLLARY

THE COROLLARY IS MANIFOLD, AND GRATEFUL TO ALL WHO ARE GRATEFUL.

From these most grateful rules of gratitude, a most grateful conclusion is gratuitously derived for all: namely, that the natural obligation of gratitude by which the beneficiary is bound to the benefactor, by reason of any benefit previously received—even the smallest—cannot be fully dissolved; nor can the beneficiary repay the benefactor condignly—that is, sufficiently or fully—so that the entire obligation is totally extinguished. Indeed, perhaps the more abundantly the beneficiary repays the benefactor, the more he is obligated and the more he owes.

Much more so, neither can the natural obligation of gratitude by which a son is bound to a father be fully dissolved, nor can a son repay a father condignly; but perhaps the more he repays him, the more he is obligated.

Wherefore, beyond all measure, more and more, neither can the obligation of the rational creature benefited by God, by which it is bound to Him by the law of gratitude, be dissolved—even by the infinite omnipotence of God. Nor can anyone repay God condignly for any benefit, even the smallest—that is, so that the entire obligation is totally annulled. Indeed—and this seems most wonderful, yet most true and most grateful—the more anyone has repaid the Lord and the more he has paid the debt of gratitude, the more he owes and the more he is obligated.

O admirable bond of gratitude, and grateful ligament of obligation, which neither creature nor Creator can fully loosen! Indeed, the more the giver of the benefit or the receiver strives to loosen it in many ways—by remitting every debt and every obligation, by heaping repayments upon repayments—the more he tightens it, makes it firmer, and ties it more indissolubly.

O, therefore, the vice of ingratitude, most greatly to be detested, which strives to loosen—indeed, to break—and utterly to destroy so indissoluble a bond of gratitude, which neither any creature, nor even God, can dissolve! Who can dispense from such a vice? Certainly neither man, nor angel, nor God—although with other things they can.

Let no one, therefore, who has been benefited by man or by God, intend to repay in such a way that he hastens to free himself from all obligation and further repayment. For this belongs to an ungrateful spirit. Rather, let him always heap repayments upon repayments, gifts upon gifts, and thanks upon thanks, so that he may always be more and more tied by the most grateful bonds of gratitude, and may become ever more grateful, and so at last be entirely transformed into gratitude.

The first part of this conclusion evidently follows from the foregoing. The second follows from this first and similarly from the foregoing.

But what reason or what cause is it that from so small a root, from so slender and finite a benefit, there proceeds and arises so strong an obligation, so great and in a way infinite—since neither by finite power nor perhaps by infinite power, nor by any finite repayment or finite repayments, can it be extinguished?

I think it is because, with benefactor and beneficiary remaining, for the beneficiary to be in a certain way affected and bound to the benefactor is reasonable and just—with a mixed reasonableness and justice, partly antecedent and partly consequent to the divine will, as can be gathered from chapter 21 of the first book. For just as it is reasonable and just in this mixed way for man to be affected and inclined toward the good, so also toward the giver of good; for the giver is good to him.

And just as this is reasonable and just, so also necessary, as is evident from the same chapter 21 of the first book. Just as, therefore, with creature and Creator existing, it is reasonable and just and necessary for the creature to be bound and subject to the Creator, so also for the rational creature to be good, and naturally to be affected and inclined toward the good and toward the giver of good, and similarly to be obligated to him.

Not, therefore, from a small or great benefit alone does so great an obligation arise, nor from any created nature, nor from any human or divine statute, but from the immutable truth of the divine essence, as can to some extent appear from chapter 21 of the first book.

The third part appears from this: everyone, it seems, reasonably loves more and is more bound to love the one through whom he has a good, rather than another. And therefore also the one through whom and toward whom he exercises a praiseworthy operation and meritorious action. Wherefore also the beneficiary making repayment operates laudably and meritoriously toward the benefactor—and the more he does so, the more so.

Following this reasoning, the Philosopher, in Book 9 of the Ethics, chapter 7, asserts that benefactors love their beneficiaries more than the reverse—which he also makes manifest by certain other reasons. But who doubts that a repayment gratefully made is grateful to the beneficiary? The benefactor also, having received repayment, loves the repaying beneficiary more than before, and is more ready to do him good; and therefore the beneficiary can then trust more in the benefactor than before—and the more he has repaid, the more so. Is not, therefore, the beneficiary making repayment more bound to the benefactor who receives than before—and the more he has repaid, the more so?

The three following parts about father and son follow in order from these three, and can be proved like these and by argument from the lesser. The other three following parts follow in similar order from the first three parts and from these, and are similarly proved.

The last of these—which seemed most wonderful—with the foregoing understood, is established to be most true. And it is also better demonstrated otherwise: for according to the foregoing, whatever we repay to God, we first receive from Him; and therefore for every repayment we are further bound to Him. For when the gifts are increased, the reasons for the gifts are also increased. The remaining parts are evident.

O most liberal Lord, who freely gave me to myself, and all my other goods! Moreover, to Yourself—with how great an obligation to repay do You bind me? With how indissoluble a bond do You constrain me—which, as You taught above, can be dissolved neither by me nor by You, omnipotent Lord?

And what worthy thing shall I repay You? What proportional thing shall I find? What equal or greater thing shall I discover?

Or perhaps I may in a way repay You condignly by humbly confessing and truly professing that I can never repay You condignly? Or perhaps I shall sufficiently repay You if I always repay You with all the powers of mind and body as much as I can? For neither Your justice nor Your piety allows me to be obligated beyond my power, to the impossible. Is it not true what a certain person says in this matter: "Friendship requires what is possible, not what is according to worthiness. Nor is this possible in all cases—such as in honors toward the gods and parents. For no one could ever repay according to worthiness; but one who serves to the best of his ability seems to be virtuous."

Is it not enough that another exhorts us: "Glorify the Lord as much as you can, and He will still surpass you; and admirable is His magnificence. Bless the Lord and exalt Him as much as you can; for He is greater than all praise"?

Or perhaps I can repay You something in a way equal to myself, to the goods conferred on me, or something greater than these, or something equal to Yourself conferred on me? Since I cannot give something greater, if I repay You myself entirely and all that I have and all that I can—and more and greater things if I could—and even You Yourself in a certain way: namely, by referring myself entirely, with every power of mind and body, and whatever I in any way have or am able to do in any way, to Your praise, glory, and honor—indeed, to You, Lord, and for You alone—preferring to lose all these things, and more and greater things beyond all number and measure, and even myself, irrecoverably, rather than offend Your majesty even once or in the slightest; and also by loving You for Your own sake alone above all other things, with all my heart.

For thus You teach me to love You, good God. Otherwise indeed, given the choice: either that I lose however great other goods, and even myself, with all things reduced to nothing without recovery, yet without my sin; or that I offend You once and most slightly and sin—I would have to, according to the most right reason, with You, Lord, as judge, sin; and so if I so did, I would not sin. For every sin is a certain deviation from the rectitude of reason.

O powerful and good Lord God, I beseech that as I utter vocally, so I may do effectively, and doing so may persevere finally. Which gift of Yours, conferred on me and through You and through me referred back to You, deign, I humbly beseech, to accept mercifully as some kind of repayment. For I have not, nor will I ever be able to have, anything greater—unless perhaps it would be to effectively will, know, and do, and that in me, concerning me, and about me, in whatever prosperity or adversity, joyful or sorrowful, and in all other things, there should always be done only what would be most grateful to You and most pleasing to Your will.

Which gift also grant, I humbly pray, to me, a wretched beggar; and through Yourself and through me, repay it to Yourself who give it, and accept it as some kind of repayment. And if there is still perhaps something greater—which, however, looking everywhere, I do not see—that also I humbly beg and devoutly request: that You show it to me, earnestly begging, and grant it, so that through You I may repay it to You. So that for Your greatest benefits, most graciously conferred on me, I may most gratefully repay to You the greatest and most grateful repayment possible for me, render the most grateful of grateful actions of thanks, and give the most grateful thanks unceasingly.

But still my trembling mind, like an industrious bee, wavers and inquires: How can I render Him grace—to whom, for His gracious works, for His gratuitous benefits, whatever I can is a debt, and even I myself? Is it not the case that if it is of grace, it is not of works? Otherwise grace is no longer grace. Does a debtor, by repaying a debt, do a favor to the creditor? Do not grace and debt seem to be mutually opposed?

Whence it seems that a wonderful thing is produced: namely, that no one can be in any way obligated to do a favor, or to repay a favor.

Or perhaps I may extricate myself from this ungrateful entanglement by doing freely and voluntarily what I am bound to by debt and necessity—just as the works of Your professed ones, Lord, or of those otherwise obligated to do certain things voluntarily, are no less grateful before Your eyes, provided they are not done unwillingly but with free and spontaneous will?

Is it not true, as one of Your grateful children and our Fathers says: "There is a necessity that takes away or diminishes the favor of one who does good, and there is a necessity by which greater favor is owed for a benefit. For when someone, by a necessity to which he is subject, unwillingly does good, either no favor or a lesser one is owed to him. But when he voluntarily subjects himself to the necessity of doing good, and does not unwillingly bear it, then indeed he merits greater favor for the benefit. For this is not to be called necessity, but grace, because no one compelled him to undertake or keep it, but he did so freely."

"Such is the case when someone freely vows a purpose of holy life. For although he ought to keep it of necessity after the vow, lest he incur the condemnation of an apostate, and although he can be compelled to keep it if he refuses, yet if he keeps what he vowed not unwillingly, he is not less but more grateful to God than if he had not vowed, and he is not to be said to live holy by necessity, but by the same freedom with which he vowed."

Or perhaps a certain distinction about grace, which You taught me above, will defend me from this ungrateful subtlety? For it is called grace because it is freely rendered for a grace freely given. What then is more due? And what is more grateful to You, Lord our God? And what is more fitting for us than that in all things, everywhere and always, with all our heart, mouth, and works, we freely give thanks to the Lord our God?

Did You not teach one of Your grateful disciples—and our Doctors—to say and write: "What is better for us to carry in our mind, press with our mouth, and express with our pen than 'Thanks be to God'? This can neither be said more briefly, nor heard more joyfully, nor understood more gratefully, nor done more fruitfully."

And You also taught him to know and tastefully say that "wisdom is the worship of God, which is chiefly established in this: that the soul be not ungrateful to Him." Whence also in the most true and singular sacrifice we are admonished to give thanks to the Lord our God.

"But the soul will be ungrateful if it attributes to itself what belongs to it from God—as the pestilential and ungrateful Pelagians do."

Not so, however—not so, we, the grateful children of God. But acknowledging humbly, and no less truly, that all and each of our goods—positive and similarly privative—habits, acts, and works, and the lacks of evil habits, acts, and works, are not in us from ourselves, but descend from above from our heavenly Father, from the Father of lights, and are the gratuitous gifts of the Lord our God—always and everywhere, in all and each, for all and each, with all our heart, mouth, and work, let us freely give thanks to the Lord our God.

For thus You, the Author, instruct us through our mother, the most prudent virgin and most beautiful bride of Yours, having neither spot nor wrinkle—Your holy Church. Again, therefore, and again—indeed, continuously, always and everywhere, with the unceasing voice of heart, and mouth, and work—let us give thanks to the Lord our God.

THOMAS BRADWARDINE, BOOK III

CHAPTER 1: THAT GOD CAN IN A CERTAIN MANNER NECESSITATE EVERY CREATED WILL TO ITS FREE ACT, AND TO FREE CESSATION AND REST FROM ACT.

The Pelagians, however — pestilent and ungrateful for the manifold grace of God — strive to take away from God His due thanks and the due expressions of gratitude. For they deny predestination and divine providence in good and in evil, as well as the co-efficiency of God, and especially His pre-efficiency with free will in its free act and in all merits, relying chiefly on this argument: that then there would be necessity, not freedom or merit. But other heretics attempt likewise to take away from God His due expressions of gratitude, saying that He does whatever He does from necessity, and nothing freely, nor by free will. Wherefore also certain heretics endeavor to destroy free will universally, both in God and in creatures, along with all grace, and every gratuitous and free action, saying that all things that happen, happen of necessity. Concerning these matters and similar ones, therefore, we must now inquire. For which purpose it seems that this must be diligently investigated: whether necessity and freedom, and merit, are incompatible.

First, therefore, it must be shown that God can in a certain manner necessitate every created will to its free — indeed, to its most free — act, and to a similar cessation and rest from act. For God can will a created will to produce its free act, and this antecedently and naturally prior to the created will; wherefore also, by I.10, that will would of necessity obey, and this for as long as God so willed it to will. Concerning cessation and rest, the reasoning is entirely the same.

Hence Anselm, On the Harmony 2, says: "Just as it is necessary that whatever God wills should be, so it is necessary that what man wills should be, in those things which God so subjects to the human will that if he wills, they come about, and if he does not will, they do not come about. For since what God wills cannot fail to be, when He wills that man's will should be compelled or prevented by no necessity from willing or not willing, and wills that the effect should follow the will, then it is necessary that the will be free, and that what it wills should be."

Likewise, otherwise a man could make God false and perjured. For suppose that God predicts, and by swearing through Himself affirms, that this person will freely do this or that, and does whatever He can to bring this about; then if this person is not necessitated by God to freely doing this or that, he can freely omit this and that.

Likewise, otherwise a man could frustrate divine providence, predestination, and will — indeed, could make our most blessed God miserable. For no one doubts that God could bring about, provide for, predestine, and pre-will the free acts of humans, and what depends on them — indeed, He has done so from eternity, as I.27 and what follows, together with I.45, prove. The Apostle also plainly testifies to this, Ephesians 2: "We are His workmanship," he says, "created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God prepared beforehand, that we should walk in them." And the Gloss says the same thing even more expressly, as I.31 more fully cited.

Likewise, every power that is stronger in due proportion can necessitate a weaker power naturally subject to it in any of its actions, and in this manner the divine, angelic, and human wills relate to one another, as the first supposition and I.10, together with II.20 and II.30, attest.

Hence the Philosopher, Metaphysics V.16, distinguishing things that are prior, says: "Other things are called prior according to power; for what exceeds in power is prior, that is, what is more powerful. Such a thing is one whose pre-volition the other must necessarily follow — that is, the posterior — so that when the former does not move, the latter is not moved, and when the former moves, the latter is moved; and pre-volition is the principle." The translation which Averroes expounds reads thus: "Also that which is stronger is called prior, and such is that which compels the other to follow its will; so that if what is prior does not move, the other which is posterior will not be moved; and if it moves, it will be moved; and will is the principle here." On which Averroes comments: "Universally, that which is stronger and more worthy is called 'prior,' and it is that which compels what is posterior so that its will follows its own will, because the will of the weaker follows the will of the stronger."

Furthermore, arguing also from physics: suppose there were only one man and one woman. Then since the human species cannot fail or be preserved without generation, it is necessary that they voluntarily generate. Nor can anyone pretend that although they will necessarily generate voluntarily, yet not on this occasion nor that — and therefore any intercourse of theirs will be free and subject to no necessity — because suppose that the man or woman has advanced so far in the days fit for generation (which according to the Philosopher, On Animals IX, in women are 50 years and in men 70, or according to Pliny and Solinus, 80 in men) that there remains for them time only for one such act: then immediately they will necessarily perform that one act voluntarily. For without the will, generation will never occur. Moreover, what constrains them thus is posited by the Philosophers to be universal nature, which by II.3 cannot be called any force of the stars or of any secondary causes whatsoever; therefore it is necessarily the first cause, as I.27 showed through philosophical authorities.

And similarly one can also argue theologically: If there were only one man and one woman before the number of the elect and predestined by God from the natural propagation of humans continuously derived from the first parents had been completed — unless they necessarily and voluntarily begot offspring, the generation of humans would cease and God's purpose would be frustrated, against I.10. Concerning Adam and Eve, before they naturally came together, a similar argument can be made.

Likewise, otherwise God could not necessitate a rational creature so that it would be impeccable and perpetually blessed, against II.17.15.

Likewise, Isaiah 40: "Behold," he says, "the nations are regarded by Him as a moment of the balance" — the Gloss adds: "in comparison with Him," namely God — "which moment is inclined in either direction from nothing." And Proverbs 21: "As divisions of waters, so is the heart of the king in the hand of the Lord; wherever He wills, He will incline it," as II.20 more fully cited.

Blessed Augustine also, in On Grace and Free Will, after reciting this authority of Solomon with many others, in chapter 48 concludes thus: "By these and similar testimonies of the divine Scriptures, it is sufficiently manifest, as I judge, that God works in the hearts of men to incline their wills wherever He wills — whether toward good things, out of His mercy, or toward evil things, according to their merits." The same author, Enchiridion 77: "Who would so impiously rave as to say that God cannot convert the evil wills of men into good — whichever ones He wills, whenever He wills, wherever He wills?" The same, On the Gift of Perseverance 20: "How possible it is for God to convert the wills of men, however averse and adverse, to faith, and to work in their hearts so that they yield to no adversities, nor depart from Him overcome by any temptation." The same also, in On Rebuke and Grace 69, says: "When God wills to save a man, no will resists. For whether to will or not to will is so in the power of the one willing or not willing, that it does not overcome the divine will or surpass its power." And below, throughout the whole of chapter 70 and at the beginning of 71, he teaches the same most plainly and notably, as II.20 more fully cited.

Likewise, otherwise God would not be omnipotent. For although God were to do everything He could so that you would simply or at a certain time will or love something, you could — this notwithstanding — entirely not will the same thing, and for some part of the given time will it and for another part not will it, indeed even will the contrary, and thus you could render God and the man Jesus Christ false, a liar, perjured, and miserable, as was argued at the beginning. Nor can anyone say that the free acts of the will are by no means contained under God's omnipotence — on account of I.10, II.20, and II.30, and on account of the authorities of Augustine just cited. For then they would in no way be enclosed under divine providence, governance, and predestination, against I.27 with what follows, and I.45. What indeed more worthily pertains to His omnipotence than to preserve His truth inviolable in all things, even in free acts? How also does it not pertain to His omnipotence to be able to dispose freely of all possible things, both natural and free, whatsoever?

Wherefore Augustine says, On Rebuke and Grace 70, that God has the most omnipotent power to incline human hearts wherever it pleases Him. And chapter 71: that God has the wills of men more in His power than they themselves do. There is also no doubt that the free acts of the will are the noblest of all, and some acts are contained under God's omnipotence — and not merely the less noble ones, for this is forbidden by His infinite nobility, the first supposition of Book I, and the blessedness of the blessed.

If, however, anyone should wish to say that God can necessitate a man to an act of the will, but that once this is done, such an act will not be free, he can easily be contradicted. For if God does this — since for everything that He does externally His will alone suffices, as the corollary of I.10 teaches, and is demonstrated by His omnipotence — God can do this by His will alone, namely without any habit or any created thing whatsoever that does not now concur with the free volition of man; and only by willing, or by naturally pre-willing, that the man should will. And by II.30, He in fact now does so concerning every free act of the will.

Likewise, let John elicit a free act of will A, together with B and C as sufficient and necessarily required secondary causes. Then God can necessitate John to act A, and this without any other secondary cause, as is clear from the foregoing — namely by merely willing, or naturally pre-willing. And by II.30, He previously did so when A was free; therefore God then necessitated John to A, a free act of the will. And also if A was then free, by the same reasoning it is now free as well: for all things are in entirely the same condition now as then, in all first and secondary causes.

Or also, suppose that God necessitates John to act D, similar to A as much as possible, together with B and C as precisely or entirely similar secondary causes — which He can do, as the foregoing proved. Otherwise, some secondary cause — namely, that other one necessarily required — would necessitate the will of man like that of a brute, against II.3. And A and D will be acts entirely similar in nature, for in their first and secondary causes no difference can be assigned; therefore if one is free or necessary in any way, both will be likewise.

If, however, it is said that D is necessary and A is free because God wills to make them such, this is contradicted in the following way. If God by so willing necessitates to act D, this is not by making act D necessary per se — because of itself it can fail to be, and because only one thing is necessary per se, namely God Himself, as is clear from I.1, corollary, part 17 — nor through any secondary causes that per se necessitate the created will, as nature and object per se necessitate beasts, as was shown above. This is therefore only through the divine will — namely by willing to necessitate to D, or to make D necessary, as the hypothesis admits.

Either, then, God by so willing absolutely necessitates to act D and renders it absolutely necessary, or only relative to His volition — that is, such that given that volition, it is impossible for things to turn out otherwise, or because it cannot in any way be impeded. The first cannot be said, as no one is unaware, and the foregoing has taught. The second remains, then, and speaking thus, free act A, which God wills to make free, is just as necessary relative to that divine volition as D is relative to the other: because, given that volition, it is equally impossible for things to turn out otherwise, and equally impossible for it to be impeded in any respect, as I.10 teaches. Therefore A and every most free act of a creature is just as necessary as D is.

Likewise, suppose imaginatively — or, according to some, as is truly possible — that God performs some act of the created will by simply willing to perform that act, neither willing it to be necessary nor free. Then by hypothesis it will be neither. Likewise, if God were only to simply will and thereby produce the acts of irrational animate or inanimate things, those acts would not be necessary with respect to God, nor with respect to other causes: for no other cause necessitates except through the power, cooperation, and co-necessitation of the first cause, which is the first necessary being, as Book I, chapter 1 and what follows teach.

Likewise, if God performs some act of the created will, not willing to necessitate to it, but simply willing to produce it, that act is still necessary with respect to the divine will, because that will cannot be impeded. The first and per se reason, then, why something is called necessary with respect to God or the divine will is not because He wills to necessitate to it, but because He is the first cause, universally efficacious, omnipotent, and unable to be impeded.

Wherefore also Stephen, Bishop of Paris, condemned a certain error which said that for all effects to be necessary with respect to the first cause, it is not sufficient that the first cause itself be unimpedable, but it is required that the intermediate causes also be unimpedable. "Error," says the Bishop, "because then God could not produce any necessary effect without posterior causes." Therefore all effects, even free ones, can be necessary with respect to the first cause, because they proceed from His will, which cannot in any way be impeded.

Furthermore, just as it is necessary that whatever God wills to happen should happen, so also it is necessary that whatever happens should happen in the way God wills it to happen, as the foregoing clearly shows. Just as, therefore, natural necessary effects must necessarily occur with respect to their natural secondary causes on account of the efficacy of the divine will, so also free effects must freely occur with respect to their lower free causes on account of the universal efficacy of the divine will. Therefore all free effects and acts of all lower free agents are necessary with respect to the divine will — necessarily free, and necessarily freely produced.

Moreover, no created will is freer than the human will of Christ, and His divine will was able to necessitate that will — indeed, it did in fact necessitate it to each and every one of its free acts, and to each and every free cessation and rest from any and all acts. For if His human will had not necessarily consented to His divine will, which naturally preceded it (as II.30 taught), it could have dissented from it, and willed something else — indeed even the contrary — and sinned, which in each part contradicts what was shown concerning Christ in II.30.

Hence also John 5: "I cannot do anything of Myself, but as I hear, I judge" — which Christ says according to what He is as man, as Augustine attests, as is more fully cited there. The same concerning Christ — namely that His human will necessarily followed the divine — Anselm teaches, Cur Deus Homo I.10, and II.10 shows that Christ could have lied if He had willed, but could not have willed to lie, as II.30 more fully cited. And Cur Deus Homo II.17 shows that God had the power to preserve His life so that He would never die, although He could not will that.

Therefore by the same reasoning, He could not will anything that His divine will had not predisposed Him to will, or whose opposite it had disposed concerning Him. Hence below in the same chapter he says: "If you wish to know the true necessity of all that He did and suffered, know that all things were of necessity, because He Himself willed it. No necessity preceded His will" — His divine will, I say — no necessity preceded it, but His human will [was preceded by necessity], as had been cited from the same Anselm in connection with I.10.

This is therefore the judgment of Christ, Augustine, Anselm, Damascene, and Lombard, as the foregoing in this chapter and II.30 declare, nor have I seen any Doctor holding the contrary view. This opinion therefore seems sufficiently certain.

COROLLARY

COROLLARY: THAT A CERTAIN KIND OF NECESSITY AND FREEDOM, AND MERIT, AND ALSO CHANCE AND FORTUNE, ARE NOT MUTUALLY INCOMPATIBLE; AND CONCERNING THE GENERAL HARMONY OF FATE, FOREKNOWLEDGE, PREDESTINATION, AND GRACE WITH FREE WILL AND MERIT.

Hence it is made manifest that necessity and freedom, and also necessity and any merit whatsoever, and furthermore necessity and chance and fortune, are not mutually incompatible. Hence also the harmony of fate, foreknowledge, predestination, and grace with free will and merit is clearly recognized in general.

For the first part of this is shown most clearly by the principal conclusion. The second is shown from this first, and can also be proved by the same means by which the principal conclusion is proved.

Likewise, according to the Philosopher, De Interpretatione, last chapter: "What is, when it is, is necessarily." And some free and meritorious act now is; therefore that it now exists is necessary.

Likewise, in God and in the confirmed angels there is necessity for many acts of will, and the greatest freedom.

Likewise, Augustine, Enchiridion 86, says: "First it was necessary that man be made such that he could will both well and badly; but afterwards he will be such that he cannot will badly, nor will he therefore lack free will. For the will shall be far more free which can in no way be a slave to sin. Neither is the will to be blamed, or said not to be a will, or said not to be free, by which we so will to be happy that we not only do not will to be miserable, but are utterly unable to will it."

The same, City of God V.10: after having first argued against the Stoics who said that our wills are not subject to necessity — on the ground that they would then not be free — he responds to their argument by distinguishing necessity in two ways, showing that there is one necessity that is involuntary, which takes away or removes freedom, and another that is voluntary, which is compatible with freedom.

Hence chapter 9 says: "However the most tortuous contentions and disputations of the philosophers may stand, we, just as we confess the supreme and true God, so we confess His will, supreme power, and foreknowledge, nor do we fear that we do not do by will what we do by will, because He foreknew that we would do it — He whose foreknowledge cannot be deceived. This Cicero feared, so that he attacked foreknowledge; and the Stoics, so that they would not say all things happen by necessity, although they contended that all things happen by fate — whom he refutes consequently."

And chapter 10 adds: "Nor is that necessity to be feared which the Stoics labored to avoid by distinguishing causes of things, so as to remove some from necessity and subject others to it, and among those they wished not to be under necessity, they placed our wills as well — lest they should not be free if subjected to necessity." And distinguishing, he adds: "For if our necessity is to be called that which is not in our power but achieves what it can even if we are unwilling — such as the necessity of death — it is manifest that our wills, by which we live rightly or wrongly, are not under such necessity. For we do many things which we would not do if we were unwilling; to which primarily belongs willing itself: for if we will, it exists; if we do not will, it does not exist; for we would not will if we were unwilling."

And he adds for the second member: "But if that is defined as necessity according to which we say it is necessary that something be so or happen so, I do not know why we should fear it, lest it take away freedom of will. For we do not place the life of God and the foreknowledge of God under necessity" — in the first sense — "if we say it is necessary that God always live and foreknow all things, just as His power is not diminished when it is said that He cannot die or be deceived."

Hence also Josephus, Antiquities XVIII.2, treating of the four sects of philosophers among the Jews, of which one was the Pharisees, says that they were the first because they were esteemed better than the rest, and these, as he says, believe all things to be governed by fate. "But they do not take away the free will of man." Fate, however, imports necessity, as I.28 showed. And the same Josephus, Jewish War VII.8: "Men cannot avoid fate, even if they foresee it."

It is therefore clear that necessity and freedom are by no means incompatible; wherefore neither will necessity and merit be incompatible — which can also be shown in another way. For suppose that God confirmed some wayfarer to freely do all the good things that he will do here on the way, with the wayfarer being utterly ignorant of this, just as good angels are confirmed to do their good deeds knowingly. Then such a person would do good things and do them well, because just as voluntarily and just as freely, as far as lies in him, as any other unconfirmed wayfarer. Therefore also just as meritoriously — which is confirmed by an evident example.

For suppose that someone going devoutly to Mass were followed by some hidden force, unbeknownst to him, such that he could not stop, delay, or turn aside. Then such a person necessarily goes thus, and merits no less than he would if that aforementioned force were entirely removed.

But lest I seem to beg for such an example outside Sacred Scripture, suppose that someone holding a rod or staff, willing and intending to rashly strike his neighbor, but not able to do so by his own powers — and suppose that such a blow is delivered by some hidden force, yet strongly directing him so that he cannot resist at all, while he himself does not think so, but thinks the opposite. Then he sins just as if he were striking by his own strength; and so it is with any free acts whatsoever.

That in all free acts it not only could be so, but that it is in fact so, the Lord Himself sufficiently shows, Isaiah 10: "Woe to Assyria," He says, "the rod of My fury, and the staff — in their hand is My indignation. Against a deceitful nation I will send him, and against the people of My wrath I will command him, to take spoils and seize plunder, and to trample them like the mud of the streets. But he will not so consider, and his heart will not so reckon; rather, his heart will be set on destruction and on the annihilation of not a few nations. For he will say, 'Are not my princes likewise kings?' etc." And below: "As my hand has found the kingdoms of the idol, so also its images from Jerusalem and Samaria. Shall I not, as I have done to Samaria and its idols, so do to Jerusalem and its images?"

And there follows the threat of punishment with the expression of guilt: "And it shall be, when the Lord has completed all His works on Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, I will punish the fruit of the proud heart of the king of Assyria, and the glory of the haughtiness of his eyes. For he said, 'By the strength of my hand I have done it, and by my wisdom I have understood, and I have removed the boundaries of peoples, and have plundered their princes. Shall the axe boast against him who chops with it? Or shall the saw exalt itself against him who draws it? As if the rod should rise against him who lifts it, and the staff exalt itself — which indeed is wood!' Therefore the Lord, the God of hosts, will send leanness upon his fat ones, and beneath his glory — or, as another reading has it, his glory — a burning shall be kindled, like the burning of fire."

On which the Gloss says: "Just as these are merely inanimate instruments, doing nothing by themselves but through him who moves them, so also Sennacherib acted not by himself but by the power of God; hence his boasting was foolish and deserving of vengeance."

From this, therefore, it is clearly seen that even though someone does something good or evil necessarily — yet ignorantly and freely, as far as lies in him — he merits or sins.

Hence Theophylact, as cited in the Gloss on Luke 22, "The Son of Man goes as it has been determined," says: "Not as if unable to defend Himself, but as one determining death for Himself for the sake of human salvation. But because Judas did the things that were written with evil intent, lest anyone think him innocent as a minister of the dispensation, he adds: 'But woe to that man by whom He shall be betrayed.'"

In concordance with this, Isidore, as cited in the Gloss on Luke 24, "Was it not necessary for Christ to suffer these things?" etc.: "But if it was necessary for Christ to suffer, nevertheless those who crucified Him are guilty of punishment; for they were not striving to accomplish what God had disposed; hence their execution was impious."

With these the authority of Augustine, 83 Questions q.27, plainly agrees, with many similar passages more fully cited in I.32.1. That also a good or evil act by someone freely, as far as lies in him — even if not entirely freely — should be counted to him as free merit, reason plainly teaches, because so it is in all other human deeds, whether evil or good, just or unjust. For one who speaks the truth, yet willing and believing himself to be lying, is guilty of falsehood — and vice versa.

Hence Augustine, Enchiridion 12: "No one is rightly judged a liar who says what is false thinking it true, since as far as lies in him, he does not deceive but rather is deceived. On the other hand, as far as lies in him, that person lies who says what is true thinking it false; for as far as his mind is concerned, since he does not say what he thinks, he does not speak truly, even though what he says turns out to be true. Nor is he in any way free from falsehood who unknowingly speaks truth with his mouth but knowingly lies in his will. Not considering, therefore, the things about which something is said, but only the intention of the speaker, better is he who unknowingly says what is false because he thinks it true, than he who knowingly bears a lying intent, not knowing that what he says is true."

Likewise, one who wills to kill someone and does as much as lies in him to kill, is truly called a murderer. Hence 1 John 3: "Everyone who hates his brother is a murderer." In this manner the Apostle speaks, Hebrews 6, saying that those once enlightened and then fallen away "crucify again for themselves the Son of God."

So speaks blessed Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, distinguished Doctor and Martyr, in Epistle 3, entitled On the Lapsed. And so Augustine speaks, Epistle 14, to Boniface, citing and recounting the words of Cyprian in sequence and explaining them: "Rightly," he says, "are parents, or any elders, attempting to bind baptized children or little ones to the sacrileges of demons, called spiritual murderers. For in those cases where they do not accomplish the killing, but as far as lies in them they were killers, they are rightly told when prohibited from this crime: 'Do not kill your little ones.' For the Apostle also says, 'Do not quench the Spirit' — not because it can be quenched, but as far as lies in them, they are rightly called its quenchers who act so as to wish it quenched."

"In this sense can rightly be understood what the most blessed Cyprian wrote in his epistle On the Lapsed, when rebuking those who during the persecution had sacrificed to idols: 'And lest anything be lacking to complete the crime,' he says, 'infants too, placed in or dragged by the hands of their parents, lost as little ones what they had obtained at the very beginning of their birth.' He said 'lost' — as far as pertains to the crime of those by whom they were forced to lose it — 'lost' in the mind and will of those who committed so great a crime against them. For if they had lost it in themselves, they would certainly remain to be condemned by divine judgment without any defense."

"But if holy Cyprian had thought so, he would not have immediately subjoined their defense, saying: 'Will they not, when the day of judgment comes, say: We did nothing; we did not willingly hasten to profane contagions, abandoning the food and cup of the Lord? The treachery of others destroyed us; we found our parents to be our murderers. They denied us the Church as mother, they denied us God as father; so that while we, small and unknowing and ignorant of so great a crime, were joined through others to the fellowship of guilt, we were caught by the fraud of others.' He would not have subjoined this defense unless he believed it most just and likely to benefit the little ones in God's judgment."

"For if it is said, 'We did nothing' — 'the soul that sins, it shall die' — then those will not perish under God's just judgment whom their parents by their own crime, as far as pertains to themselves, destroyed."

Likewise, one who wills and does as much as lies in him to know another man's wife, yet actually knows his own wife whom he believed to be another's, is condemned as guilty of adultery. Hence Matthew 5: "Everyone who looks at a woman to lust after her has already committed adultery with her in his heart." Just as one who wills to know his own wife and unknowingly knows another — or his wife's sister whom he believed to be his own — is excused from the crime, as canon law attests, not only regarding this case but regarding many similar ones, as does Lombard, as I.1 more fully recounted.

Likewise, by I.10, no one can act simply against the divine will; and by the same I.10 together with I.22, it is necessary that everyone always act conformably to the divine will. Therefore no one merits or sins except by freely doing, as far as lies in him, what is in conformity or disconformity with the divine will.

Hence Augustine, Enchiridion 80: "These are the great works of the Lord, sought out according to all His purposes, and so wisely sought out that when the angelic and human creature had sinned — that is, had done not what He willed but what it itself willed — even through that same will of the creature, by which was done what the Creator did not will, He Himself fulfilled what He willed, making good use even of evils, as being supremely good, for the damnation of those whom He justly predestined to punishment, and for the salvation of those whom He graciously predestined to grace. For as far as pertains to them, they did what God did not will; but as far as pertains to God's omnipotence, they were in no way able to accomplish it."

The same, Against Faustus XXII: "A man becomes unjust when he loves for their own sake things that should be used for another purpose, and desires for another purpose things that should be loved for their own sake; for thus, as far as lies in him, he disturbs in himself the natural order which the eternal law commands to be preserved."

In agreement with this, Anselm, Cur Deus Homo I.15, says: "Nothing can be added to or diminished from God's honor, as far as pertains to Him; for He Himself is to Himself His incorruptible honor, in no way changeable. But when each creature keeps its own order, as if prescribed to it, whether naturally or rationally, it is said to obey God and honor Him — and this especially the rational nature, to which it is given to understand what it ought to do. When it wills what it ought, it honors God — not because it confers anything on Him, but because it voluntarily subjects itself to His will and disposition, and in the universe of things maintains its own order and the beauty of that same universe, as far as lies in it. But when it does not will what it ought, it dishonors God, as far as pertains to it, because it does not voluntarily subject itself to His disposition, and disturbs the order and beauty of the universe, as far as lies in it" — which, however, it absolutely cannot do, as he shows in the same chapter consequently, by reducing to two impossibilities.

The first is that if it were so, there would arise in the very universe which God ought to order a certain deformity of beauty from the violation of order. The second is that God would seem to fail in His disposition — "both of which," he says, "as they are unfitting, so they are impossible."

But this same point can be shown still more briefly and perhaps more easily thus. For no philosopher or theologian doubts that a man merits or sins because, in the state of meriting and sinning, he knowingly, voluntarily, freely, and spontaneously consents, wills, and does good or evil. But he can do this and thus, even if he necessarily does this or that, as the foregoing attests.

Hence William of Auvergne, Bishop of Paris, in his Tripartite — whose first principal part concerns faith and laws, the second virtues, the third vices and sins — in the last part, chapter 10, having recounted the error of those who say man cannot sin because he has the necessity or impossibility of doing or not doing anything whatsoever — and therefore, as they argue, he does not have free will, nor guilt, nor praise — and having refuted them, responding to their argument, says: "On account of this, we used to distinguish that there is one necessity of violence and imposition; and whatever is done from it is to be imputed not to the agent but to the one imposing the violence. Indeed, that to which violence is done should not be called an agent, but rather that which imposes the violence — as the wheel of a mill."

"And a second is the necessity of stability and immutability, such as we say is the necessity of God, by which He is immutably good, and whatever exists by this necessity must always act well, and the contrary is impossible. And this necessity does not take away freedom but perfects it."

"A third necessity is extraneous or extrinsic, which some call necessity per accidens; and we make the same distinctions concerning impossibilities. And in this way certain things about the past are called necessary or impossible — such as your having eaten and done whatever you did."

"And there is a fourth necessity, which Aristotle calls determined — as that Socrates is sitting while he sits — and perhaps it can be referred to the necessity we called extraneous. For just as it is necessary that you have done what you did, because time does not admit of the change of return or revocation, so also Socrates sits while he sits; therefore the flow of time is the cause of both necessity and impossibility."

"The necessity of violence, since violence is against the will, renders one free from blame. But we call it against the will — the necessity, impossibility, or even violence — when it is neither sought after, nor procured, nor tolerated, nor neglected."

And below, chapter 11 of the same work: "According to the error of those who say all things happen from necessity, it is not necessary that on account of this no one can sin or act well. And this appears from what we have said about necessity and impossibility — namely, which and when they excuse from guilt and obligation, and to what extent."

"We have shown that the necessity by which God necessarily always acts well, and the impossibility by which it is impossible for Him to act badly, in no way prevent or hinder Him from acting well and laudably in both respects. And this is because they neither violently impel Him to act well, nor violently hinder or turn Him from acting badly, nor does that impossibility in any way resist or contradict His will."

"So the necessity of celestial power or fate — which according to them is impossible to avert or impede, and which also moves human souls, as they think — moves them, I say, to the thoughts and affections that are in them, and through those to actions and the avoidance of deeds. Since they do not move them violently, but voluntarily, this does not excuse human souls from sins and faults."

"And this is because from whatever principle a voluntary deed is done — provided it is voluntary, that is, willed in any of the three ways we mentioned: either sought after, or tolerated, or neglected — it is always to be imputed to the one willing and acting by will. Nor does it follow that if he cannot do otherwise, or even will otherwise, he is for that reason excused — because he neither wills to be able otherwise nor to do otherwise nor to will otherwise."

"On account of this, Seneca says that every sin is so voluntary that if it is not voluntary, it is not sin. Wherefore necessity or impossibility that does not take away from a deed its being voluntary — that is, from the necessity which it is impossible not to be free — takes away neither guilt nor merit from that deed."

"In truth, however, if everything that moves our souls were outside us, and we did not have a motive principle of our works within us or in ourselves, everything would seem to be attributable to the extrinsic mover or movers, if there were several. Wherefore it would not be imputable to us, either for praise or blame, likewise neither for merit nor guilt. For according to this, neither would be in our power. For since from the mover alone who is outside us would come our wills, and the aversions or repressions of our wills, and such a mover would in no way be in our power, those wills would not be in our power. Nor would they be in us as our actions and works, but only as passions from an extrinsic agent, and we would be merely receivers of such impressions and in no way agents. Wherefore we would act neither well nor badly, but the celestial power or fate would do all these things that seem to be our actions, and we would be merely instruments of celestial power and fate."

"Now it is manifest that to an instrument the operation performed through it is not to be imputed, for praise or blame, guilt or merit — just as the various motions of the mill-wheel, neither in their essence nor in their slowness or speed, can be blameworthy imputed to the wheel itself, but to the water alone that impels and revolves it."

"Wherefore it is manifest that if celestial power or fate, or any other extrinsic mover, were to move human souls to willing or not willing, it does not take away from them the mastery, command, and authority over their own wills and actions, since it can impose force, violence, or compulsion upon them for these things. And this is on account of the freedom and sovereignty of the will, on account of which it endures no compulsion and is susceptible of it in no way whatsoever."

From these things, therefore, it evidently appears that even if someone has been necessitated to do something good or evil, if nevertheless he is ignorant of that necessitation and does it voluntarily and freely, as far as lies in him, he merits. But because ignorance is not the per se cause of meriting, nor does merit necessarily follow from it, one can also merit when necessitated to do something not ignorantly but with true knowledge.

For if ignorance were necessarily prerequisite to merit, it would be its essential cause, as I.4 and I.13 teach. For every effect is produced, or can be produced, when all and only its essential causes are posited. But ignorance is not any essential cause of merit, as induction makes manifest; ignorance itself is a pure privation and nothing, wherefore it causes no true thing. And by II.18 of this work, merit is a true existing thing.

Therefore, with the aforementioned ignorance removed and all essential causes of merit remaining, there will be merit just as before — especially because the habit opposed to ignorance, that is, knowledge, does not formally conflict with merit, nor with any other positive thing necessarily concurring with such merit.

Wherefore it also seems that the essential and per se reason for meriting is this: the meritorious agent — if I may speak thus, namely one capable of meriting — does something moral freely, as far as lies in him, or simply freely — that is, voluntarily or spontaneously. I added "meritorious agent" to distinguish from God and the perfectly confirmed saints, as they will be after the final judgment, who can do such things and in such a way without meriting, because they are not or will not be capable of meriting.

This seems very consonant with reason. For if someone, although knowingly necessitated to do something for a friend, does this for him not unwillingly as if compelled by necessity, but as far as lies in him freely and entirely spontaneously and devoutly and with most grateful love — it seems that reason requires and gratitude compels that the one benefited should return some favor to his benefactor, or at least repay some grateful effect. For the inmost force of gratitude does not permit that he should be to him like the rest of men, like a heathen and a tax collector, who never loved him freely, never wished him well, and never benefited him in the least.

All this is demonstrated most clearly in the Lord Jesus Christ, who was in a certain manner necessitated to all His meritorious works, as the present chapter showed — and not ignorantly but with distinct knowledge, as no Christian doubts. He Himself also expressly attests this, saying: "I cannot do anything of Myself, but as I hear, I judge" (John 5) — which He said of Himself according to His human nature, as II.30 cites.

Hence Anselm, Cur Deus Homo II.5, dividing necessity in two according to Augustine's aforementioned distinction, shows that one kind implies prohibition or compulsion, and renders the necessitated person unwilling; and the other implies none of these things, but only the immutability of a spontaneous will. The first, as he says, takes away the grace and merit of the one acting; but the second does not take them away, but is compatible with and increases them.

Wherefore, to the point, he first asks: "How shall we impute our salvation to His grace, if He saves us by necessity?" And immediately responds: "There is a necessity that takes away or diminishes the grace owed to the benefactor; and there is a necessity on account of which greater gratitude is owed for the benefit. For when someone under necessity to which he is subject does good unwillingly, little or no gratitude is owed him. But when he voluntarily subjects himself to the necessity of doing good and does not bear it unwillingly, then indeed he deserves greater gratitude for the benefit. For this is not to be called necessity but grace, because he undertook and keeps it not under compulsion but freely."

"For if what you spontaneously promise today to give tomorrow, you give tomorrow with the same will — although it is necessary for you tomorrow to fulfill the promise if you can, or else lie — nevertheless the one to whom you give owes you no less for the benefit bestowed than if you had not promised, since you were not necessitated to make yourself a debtor before the time of giving."

"Such it is when someone spontaneously vows the resolution of a holy way of life. For although after the vow he must keep it of necessity, lest he incur the damnation of an apostate — and although he could be compelled to keep it if he were unwilling — nevertheless, if he keeps what he vowed not unwillingly, he is no less but rather more pleasing to God than if he had not vowed, because he denied himself not only the common life but even its license for God's sake. Nor should he be said to live holily by necessity, but by the same freedom with which he vowed."

And Anselm recites the same distinction in chapters 10 and 17, where he shows at length that Christ did and suffered all things by this second necessity. Hence he also says that the God-man was unable to will to preserve His life so that He would never die, and since He had this from Himself — namely that He could not will it — not by necessity but by free power, He laid down His life. This he also demonstrates consequently by impossible and ostensive proof.

First by reductio ad impossibile in this way: Christ could have not died; therefore the faith of the blessed Virgin and of the ancient saints, by which they believed Christ would suffer — in which faith they were cleansed from sin — could then always previously have been false. And if it had been false, it would have cleansed no one. Therefore the blessed Virgin and the ancient saints could then never previously have been cleansed, even though it was then a past truth that they had been cleansed.

Second, he demonstrates this ostensively, by arguing from the contrary in this way: At the time of Christ incarnate but not yet having suffered, it was a past and necessary truth that the blessed Virgin and the ancient saints had been cleansed in the genuine — not feigned — faith of Christ's future passion. Therefore it was then necessary that Christ suffer; for if the antecedent is necessary, the consequent will be likewise, as he supposes — which the Philosopher shows in Prior Analytics I. Otherwise the false would sometimes follow from the true.

For if the consequent were not necessary, it would either be false or could become false; therefore, according to Anselm, as much as it was necessary at the time of the incarnate but not yet suffering Christ that the blessed Virgin and the ancient saints had been cleansed, so much was it necessary that Christ would suffer — by the second mode of necessity, not the first.

Hence among other things he says: "He was truly going to die, because if He were not truly going to die, the faith in His future death — through which both that Virgin from whom He was born and many others were cleansed from sin — would not have been true. For if it were not true, it could have availed nothing. Therefore if He could have not died, He could have made not true what was true."

Then, asking why it was true before He died that He was going to die, and the disciple answering that it was because He Himself willed this spontaneously and with immutable will, Anselm adds: "If therefore, as you say, He could not have not died because He was truly going to die, and He was truly going to die because He Himself spontaneously and immutably willed it, it follows that He could not have not died for no other reason than that He willed to die with immutable will."

And shortly after he says: "When we say that that man who, according to the unity of person, as was said above, is Himself the same who is the Son of God, God — could not have not died or willed not to die after He was born of the Virgin — no inability to preserve or will to preserve His immortal life is signified in Him, but rather the immutability of His will by which He spontaneously made Himself man for this purpose: that persevering in the same will He might die, and because no thing could change that will."

"For it would be more of an inability than an ability if He could will to lie or to deceive or to change the will which He previously willed to be immutable. And if, as I said above, when someone spontaneously resolves to do some good thing and afterward fulfills with the same will what he resolved — although he could be compelled to pay the promise if he were unwilling — he is not to be said to act from necessity, but from the same free will with which he resolved."

"For neither necessity nor inability should be said to cause something to be done or not done where neither necessity nor inability effects anything, but will alone. If, I say, it is so in a man, much more are necessity and inability by no means to be named in God, who does nothing except what He wills, and whose will no force can compel or prevent."

"Finally, the Virgin, who was made clean through faith so that He could be taken from her, by no means believed He would die except because He would will it — just as she had learned through the Prophet who said of Him, 'He was offered because He Himself willed it.' Wherefore, since her faith was true, it was necessary that it would be so, just as she believed."

Reading and rereading diligently this book of Anselm, the Christian philosopher, I venture to assert as certain that it was his considered judgment that Christ suffered and did all things by the second aforementioned necessity, not the first. Nor is there any doubt that Christ merited most abundantly in both ways. Wherefore, according to the same Anselm, there is no doubt that known necessity and merit are not incompatible.

The same seems to be attested by Lombard, who in Sentences II, dist. 5 and 11, says that the holy confirmed angels continually progress in meriting; and in Sentences IV, dist. 45, says that the angels know what is in God's will and will it themselves: "For they are so devoted to the supernal will that they can will nothing apart from His will." And it is not likely that the angels themselves are ignorant of that necessity, since we ignorant humans know it.

Likewise: you know that you are now meriting — let this be supposed. And you know, according to the Philosopher, De Interpretatione, last chapter, that what is, when it is, is necessarily. You therefore know that you are necessarily now meriting; wherefore you also know that known necessity and merit are not incompatible.

The first of these demonstrations, therefore — which showed the non-incompatibility of necessity and merit through ignorance — is a demonstration of cognition only. It is neither propter quid nor quia, since it proceeds neither from cause to effect nor conversely. Yet it makes us know the truth more openly and easily. The second is propter quid, because it proceeds from cause. The third — namely in the last argument — is a demonstration only quia, because it is taken from the effect. These three demonstrations Averroes briefly touches upon in his commentary on Physics VIII.58, though in other words.

The third part of the corollary is clear from the first, together with I.29. The fourth part of the corollary — striving to harmonize fate, foreknowledge, predestination, and grace with free will and merit — follows evidently from the first and second. For the reason they seem to be discordant is only that the former are believed to imply necessity, and the latter freedom; but these are not mutually incompatible, but stand together harmoniously, as the aforementioned parts attest.

CHAPTER 2: THAT GOD IN A CERTAIN MANNER NECESSITATES EVERY CREATED WILL TO EVERY FREE ACT OF ITS OWN, AND TO EVERY FREE CESSATION AND REST FROM ACT, AND THIS BY A NATURALLY PRECEDING NECESSITY.

Here, consequently, I think it should be shown that God in a certain manner necessitates every created will to every free act of its own, and to every free cessation and rest from act, and this by a naturally preceding necessity.

For, as Anselm teaches in Cur Deus Homo I.17 and On the Harmony 2, there is a twofold necessity — namely preceding and following, or accompanying. The preceding makes a thing to be, and this is found in all irrational agents; for when the active principle approaches the passive with the due circumstances, the effect necessarily follows, as the Philosopher teaches, Metaphysics IX.10. And the same applies to the necessity of non-being, concerning things prevented from being by irrational agents.

The following or accompanying necessity, however, is one that in a certain way is produced by the existing thing, and arises and descends from any being whatsoever, and inseparably follows and individually accompanies it — and similarly non-being. And this, according to the Philosopher, De Interpretatione, last chapter, is found universally in all beings and non-beings whatsoever. Hence he says: "What is, when it is, and what is not, when it is not, is necessarily." And Anselm holds the same in the aforementioned places.

Not only is this preceding necessity found in irrational agents and their acts, but also in rational agents acting from the freedom of will and their free acts. For once there is posited in a rational and free agent both the power and the will to do any free extrinsic thing, it necessarily follows that it is done — for nothing required is lacking.

And the Philosopher says, Metaphysics IX [10]: "What is possible according to reason necessarily does, when it desires that for which it has the power, and in the way it has it." And he teaches the same opinion elsewhere frequently, as is recounted in the foregoing.

From this a certain general rule seems perspicuously to follow: that universally every effect produced by any rational or irrational and free agent is produced in this way — that once its agent is posited with all its sufficient naturally prior dispositions by which it produces the effect, the production necessarily and infallibly follows, and it is produced from a naturally preceding necessity. This is also sufficiently apparent from the meanings of the terms.

Hence there can be drawn the following definition of naturally preceding necessity: it is an active cause which, once posited with all its sufficient naturally prior dispositions by which it causes its effect, necessarily and infallibly results in that effect being caused.

And from this can clearly be known the definition of an effect that is necessary by naturally preceding necessity: namely, it is an effect caused by a cause which, once fully posited, necessarily results in that effect being caused.

But someone will perhaps object here by denying the rule and the foregoing definitions, saying that they are true of lower and secondary causes only, but not of the supreme and first cause — on the ground that every secondary cause, whenever and however it is disposed or affected, with respect to whatever it can cause or has caused, is necessarily then so disposed or affected. But the first cause is not so, as the respondent claims, because although God now wills something to be future — say the Antichrist — it is not necessary for now that He so wills, but He can for now not so will.

But according to this responsive objection, there would be absolutely no antecedent necessity with respect to any effect, nor any effect necessary with respect to its cause by naturally preceding necessity. For no secondary cause can do anything without the co-efficiency and pre-efficiency of the first cause — namely the divine will — as II.20 and II.30 showed. If therefore in that cause there is no antecedent necessity, neither can there be in any other.

Furthermore, this effect now made or created immediately by God must necessarily now exist; therefore also its efficient or creating cause — namely the divine will — must exist. Or if that will could for now not exist, then this effect too could not exist, contrary to the foregoing.

Similarly it can be argued concerning any past effect: since according to I.14, the will of God is the cause of every past thing, therefore it is past. And if someone says that the divine will is an antecedent necessity with respect to present and past things but by no means with respect to future things, he makes the divine will mutable — against I.5 and I.23. For he makes the divine will free with respect to future things according to contradiction, to such an extent that at the same instant in which it exists with respect to some future thing, it could not exist; and when that future thing becomes present or passes into the past, he makes it necessary with the opposite necessity.

Furthermore, why cannot the omnipotent will of God be as necessary and as great a necessity with respect to a future effect as with respect to a present or past one? For if of itself alone it is necessary and an antecedent necessity with respect to the present and past, it can be likewise with respect to the future, since it intrinsically always relates in entirely the same way to the same thing — first as future, second as present, and third as past.

But if the antecedent necessity with respect to the present and past is posited as not sufficiently or totally from itself alone, but from the aid of something else — namely the present or past thing — then it does not seem fully self-sufficient, nor fully omnipotent, against the first supposition, parts 3, 5, and 7 of the corollary of I.1.

If also the present thing in some way helped to produce the necessity in the divine will with respect to that present thing, it seems that it would be some cause of it and would in some way cause it; therefore it would be naturally prior that the present thing exists and necessarily now exists, than that the divine will has that intrinsic necessity — which can be refuted by I.20 and II.30. Moreover, if that necessity in the divine will were so constituted, it would be a subsequent necessity, and the necessity of the present thing would be an antecedent necessity — contrary to the hypothesis.

If also some extrinsic aid can furnish the divine will with intrinsic necessity with respect to all present and past things, why not similarly with respect to all future things, or some future thing?

Furthermore, even if the divine will that now exists with respect to some future thing could for now not exist with respect to it, as the response claims, this is not in the power of that future thing, nor of any lower cause, nor of any causes, but only in the free power of the divine will — and that will is universally efficacious and infallible in causing. Therefore it is an antecedent necessity with respect to that future thing.

Behold how this manner of speaking about naturally antecedent necessity accords with reason. It also accords with the manner of speaking — indeed, it is the manner of speaking — of the older philosophers and theologians, and of our Fathers, as the foregoing here and in the previous chapter of this work teaches.

Hence Augustine, On Free Will III.3: "The will of Him" — namely God — "is my necessity." And although this is said under the name of the disciple, Augustine does not reject but approves it, showing that will and necessity are not incompatible. With this also the words and opinion of Augustine accord, City of God V.9 and 10, as set forth above in this work. He also, On the Literal

Interpretation of Genesis VI.22, shows that the necessity of future things is in God, in the divine will, where he says: "This is necessarily future because He wills it."

This also accords with the words and mind of Anselm cited in the previous chapter. Hence Cur Deus Homo II.17: "All necessity and impossibility are subject to His will; but His will is subject to no necessity or impossibility. For nothing is necessary or impossible except because He so wills." And below, speaking of Christ, he says: "If you wish to know the true necessity of all that He did and suffered, know that all things were of necessity because He Himself willed it."

And in a certain meditation of his on human redemption, he says: "All necessity and impossibility are subject to His will, for what He wills must necessarily be, and what He does not will is impossible to be."

The same, On the Harmony 2, after the aforementioned distinction about necessity and its extensive demonstration, says: "The work of a will, to which it is given that what it wills should be and what it does not will should not be, is voluntary or spontaneous, since it is done by a spontaneous will. And it is necessary in two ways: because it is compelled to be done by the will, and because what is done cannot simultaneously not be done." "The work," he says, "of a will" — that is, the operation or extrinsic product proceeding from a willing will — "is compelled," that is, necessitated, as his procedure and words clearly manifest.

Hence Metaphysics V.16, where one translation says: "What is prior and more powerful is that whose pre-volition the other must necessarily follow"; another translation says: "What is stronger and prior is that which compels the other to follow its will." Which translation Averroes, expounding, says: "Universally, that which is stronger and more worthy is called 'prior,' and it is that which compels what is posterior so that its will follows its own will, because the will of the weaker follows the will of the stronger" — as the first chapter of this book more fully recounted.

The most divine Isaiah also seems to have had the same manner of speaking by divine inspiration, predicting concerning Christ that He would come "as a violent river, which the Spirit of the Lord compels" — "violent," that is, not unwilling but full of force, the force of the Spirit of the Lord, who rested upon Him fully and drove Him in all things and led Him, and whom He necessarily followed in all things, as II.30 and III.1 more fully declared.

Hence Matthew says that Jesus was "led by the Spirit into the desert"; and Luke, that "He was driven by the Spirit into the desert"; and Mark, that the Spirit "cast out" or, according to another reading, "compelled" Him into the desert — all of which are most certainly said of the Holy Spirit, as II.30 briefly recalled.

Wherefore Stephen, Bishop of Paris, condemned a certain error which said that for all effects to be necessary with respect to the first cause, it is not sufficient that the first cause itself be unimpedable, but it is required that the intermediate causes also be unimpedable. "Error," says the Bishop, "because then God could not produce any necessary effect without posterior causes."

Therefore all effects, even free ones, are necessary with respect to the first cause, because they proceed from His will, which cannot in any way be impeded.

And if anyone thinks to object by saying that the Parisian article does not say universally "all effects" but only particularly or indefinitely "effects" — I confess I do not know how it was written in the original article. I do know, however, that among the heavily corrected articles I found it written universally. Nor does it matter; for from that particular or indefinite proposition, together with other true ones, the universal follows evidently.

For if it suffices for some effects to be necessary with respect to the first cause that it is unimpedable with respect to them — since universally all effects are produced by it, and it is universally unimpedable with respect to some effects, or even to any single one, as the foregoing demonstrated — all effects are necessary with respect to it.

With these things supposed, the principal conclusion is easily shown. For according to the previous chapter, God can so necessitate every created will, and this by naturally preceding necessity — because the entire chapter proceeds according to such necessity. And He could not do this by doing anything other than merely willing, since He acts externally in no other way, as I.9 and I.10 teach. Nor by willing otherwise than as naturally prior; and by II.20 joined with II.30, He always so wills — as was also argued more fully in the previous chapter.

Likewise, by the same II.20, God through His will is the efficient cause properly of every act of the created will; and by the same II.30, He is naturally prior to the created will; and by I.10, the divine will cannot be frustrated. Therefore, by the general rule and definitions set forth above, every act of the created will is produced from a naturally preceding necessity — indeed, by the same reasoning, every created will that does anything does it from a naturally preceding necessity.

To the same conclusion it is argued not implausibly in this way: In the created will that now wills, there is a certain necessity to will — at least a subsequent necessity — and in the divine will likewise, which wills and causes the created will to now will, since according to the Philosopher and Anselm cited above, "What is, when it is, is necessarily."

These two necessities in these two wills — the divine and the human — are either co-equal and disparate in causality, unrelated to each other, or they are not. If they are such, then according to what was established in II.25, both are reduced to a third, as to a common cause prior to both. Therefore the divine will is necessitated by some prior cause to will something outside God — which no one doubts to be false.

For that cause is either rational and free, or irrational and necessary in acting. If the first is granted, then the divine will is not the first of all free causes, nor God the first of free agents — the opposite of which is shown by the first supposition of Book I and chapter 9, together with II.20 and following, and II.30. If the second is granted, then God wills and does something outside Himself by absolutely absolute necessity — which is destroyed by the foregoing.

Moreover, every necessity in any creature, like anything else, is produced by the divine will as by a prior efficient cause, as I.9 taught. Therefore every necessity of willing in the created will is effected by the divine will. Therefore those two aforementioned necessities cannot be called disparate and co-equal with one another. Nor does anyone so rave or go mad as to say that the necessity in the human will is a naturally preceding and efficient cause with respect to the necessity in the divine will; for this would derogate too much from His supreme freedom — which is also proved false by the foregoing.

Therefore that necessity in the divine will is naturally prior to the necessity in the human will, and is its efficient cause.

Likewise, no created will in its acts is freer than the human will of Christ, and His divine will necessitated it to each of His acts, as was shown here above and in the previous chapter. Therefore it also in a certain manner necessitates every other will.

The divine will also antecedently necessitates the blessed confirmed in heaven to their beatific act, and to not sinning, and in the contrary manner the damned, as II.15, 16, and 17 suggested. Why then not all other agents by a similar reasoning?

COROLLARY

COROLLARY: THAT A CERTAIN KIND OF ANTECEDENT NECESSITY AND FREEDOM AND MERIT ARE NOT INCOMPATIBLE; AND THAT NO LOWER CAUSE, BUT ONLY THE HIGHER — NAMELY THE WILL OF GOD — IS AN ANTECEDENT NECESSITY WITH RESPECT TO ITS EFFECT; AND THAT ALL THINGS THAT ARE, HAPPEN, AND COME ABOUT, ARE, HAPPEN, AND COME ABOUT FROM SOME NECESSITY NATURALLY PRECEDING THEM.

Hence it evidently follows that a certain kind of antecedent necessity and freedom and merit are not incompatible, and that no lower cause, but only the higher — namely the will of God — is an antecedent necessity, and that all things that are, happen, and come about, are, happen, and come about from some necessity naturally preceding them.

For the first part of this is shown most clearly by the principal conclusion, which can also be shown straightforwardly in the same way. And the second follows from this first. This corollary can also be demonstrated as to these parts in the same way as the previous one was demonstrated.

The second part of this follows manifestly, since no lower cause, however disposed, can do anything if the divine will resists, or even if it does not act — as I.10, I.9, and II.20 clearly show. Therefore the divine will alone remains as the antecedent necessity.

Hence together with I.9 follows the last part of this corollary.

THOMAS BRADWARDINE, BOOK III (continued)

CHAPTER 3: ON THE CONTINGENT IN EITHER DIRECTION ACCORDING TO DIVERSE OPINIONS, AND THAT IT EXISTS.

Now, according to the general rule about naturally preceding necessity touched on in the preceding chapter, it seems that the contingent in either direction must be discussed. Concerning this contingent there are diverse opinions.

[Opinion 1] Some say that nothing is so contingent, but will be; and they say that such a contingent does not exist in present things, but in future things.

[Opinion 2] Others say the contingent exists in things; and these are divided in many ways. Some say it exists in certain propositions about the future, and in no other things. Others posit it in other things: some only in passive potencies, others only in active ones — and these only in efficient causes actually acting. Others posit it in their effects, only while they are actually being produced.

[Opinion 7] Still others say that something is contingent in either direction only because, and for the reason that, God wills it to be able to be and not to be.

The motive of the first opinion is this: no being essentially relates to both parts of a contradiction — to being and not being — because every being is determined to being. But every contingent in either direction, or equally contingent thing, relates equally to these. Otherwise it would not be contingent in either direction and equally. Hence the Philosopher, Prior Analytics I, in the chapter on the contingent, calling this the "indefinite contingent," says: "Indefinite because it is no more this way than that." This also seems to be the opinion of the same Philosopher, De Interpretatione I, last chapter, where in things that are and things that have been made, he posits necessity because of determinate truth; but in things that will be, contingency in either direction, because of indeterminate truth in singular future propositions that are subject to our power and are no more naturally apt to happen one way than the other.

Hence before that last chapter he says: "In those things therefore that are, and that have been made, it is necessary that the affirmation or the negation be true or false." And below in the last chapter he adds: "Wherefore in other future things, whatever are said to be of such a kind according to potency, it is manifest that not all things happen of necessity, but some are in either direction — the affirmation is no more true than the negation; in others, one is true more often and for the most part, but it is possible for the other to occur and the former not at all. Therefore what is, when it is, and what is not, when it is not, is necessarily."

And below: "I say that it is necessary that there will be a naval battle tomorrow or there will not be; but it is not necessary that there will be a naval battle tomorrow, nor is it necessary that there will not be. But that there will be or will not be is necessary. Wherefore, since propositions are true just as things are, it is manifest that whatever things are such that either alternative obtains and their contraries can occur, it is necessary that the contradiction be similarly disposed."

Where Boethius also says: "Contingent things are whatever relate equally to being and to not being." And below: "These things that we call 'in either direction' are such that while they have not yet been done, they can both be done and not be done."

This motive, however, should not move us. For if such a contingent, because it is equally contingent, is therefore not existing, by the same reasoning it will not be non-existing, nor more future than present, nor even more future than not future. Otherwise it would not relate equally to both parts but would be under only one. Therefore it would have to neither be nor not be, neither be future nor not be future — and so for each pair of contradictories — but it would mediate equally between all contradictories, which evidently implies a contradiction. This motive, therefore, is further removed from the truth.

And the opinion itself is not true: for the contingent necessary, the contingent in the majority of cases, and the contingent in fewer cases are opposed to the equally contingent. And if one of the opposites is possible or natural, so is the other, as was shown in II.1. But those are possible and natural things that actually exist; therefore the equally contingent is possible to be in act — indeed, naturally is in act.

The second position concedes that such a contingent exists, on account of the many authorities attesting to this, but not in things distinct from propositions, on account of the motive set forth above. Therefore it exists only in certain propositions, as was said. But its motive has already been removed, and the position itself is close to error. For if contingency is in such propositions, this is either on account of the propositions themselves insofar as they essentially exist as such things — and then it is in things already actually existing, and by the same reasoning by which contingency is posited in these things, it could be posited in other present things, which these deny — or contingency is posited in such propositions on account of the things signified by them, and then it should rather be posited in those things than in the propositions, for the Philosopher says, Posterior Analytics I.2: "That on account of which each thing is such, is itself more such." And in the Categories, chapter on substance: "In the fact that a thing is or is not, the proposition is said to be true or false." And De Interpretatione I, last chapter: "Propositions are true just as things are" — and reason teaches the same. Therefore this opinion really posits the same as the preceding one.

The third opinion is that of Averroes himself, on Physics II, comment 48, and his reasoning is this: equal contingency is in certain potencies, and not in active ones; therefore only in passive ones. But his strongest reason, which can be drawn from his words there and on Physics VIII, comment 8, is this: if equal contingency is posited in some active potency, that potency relates equally to acting and not acting, and to doing one of the opposites and the other; therefore it will do neither or both — for why would it do this rather than that?

But this reasoning of theirs is entirely irrational, for it destroys all freedom — or rather, is destroyed by freedom — as the 34th part of the corollary of I.1 most clearly demonstrated, showing that once a rational and free agent is posited with all the naturally prior dispositions by which it produces its free action, it does not necessarily follow that it produces it, nor does it necessarily follow that if it produces some action it will produce this one — but the opposite of each can stand. Thus both the opinion and the reason of the one holding it perish together.

The fourth opinion cannot stand. For in a stone at rest there is equal contingency — that it be moved to the east or west, to the north or south. With the third and fourth destroyed, the fifth and sixth are similarly destroyed.

The seventh opinion opines with wondrous wonder. For to begin with the easier matters: every existing thing determinately and necessarily now exists, and every non-being determinately and necessarily now does not exist. Neither of these, therefore, indifferently and equally in either direction, relates to being or not being — which nevertheless, according to the foregoing, seems to belong to the nature of this contingent.

Also, if something is contingent because God wills it to be able to be and not to be, by similar reasoning something is necessary because God wills it to be so and not to be able not to be — for contraries ought to have contrary reasons. This is contrary to what was previously shown in I.21. For it is not because God wills Himself to be that it is necessary for Him to be, but rather the reverse.

Furthermore, that divine volition or will which is posited as the cause of such contingency in things is either simply and absolutely necessary, or contingent. Not absolutely necessary, since by I.10 it is a simply efficacious and infrustrable cause in every way, and all its effects would come about absolutely necessarily. For who does not know that from an absolutely necessary antecedent in an absolutely necessary consequence, nothing follows except what is absolutely necessary — just as from the true nothing follows except the true? And so every effect posited as contingent in either direction, whether present or future, would be and would have been absolutely necessary.

If, however, that will is contingent — what is the cause of its contingency? If another such will, that one is either necessary or contingent: not necessary, for the reasons given; if contingent, the question returns — what is the cause of its contingency? And so either there will be an infinite regress in such wills, or it will stop at some divine will or volition that is contingent in either direction, not for the sole reason that God wills it to be so contingent, but for some other proper reason.

CHAPTER 4: WHAT THE CONTINGENT IN EITHER DIRECTION IS.

Having established through the foregoing that the contingent in either direction exists, and what and of what kind it is not, it remains consequently to inquire what it is and of what kind.

According to the Philosopher, Metaphysics IX.10: just as when an irrational agent is posited with all the sufficient and naturally prior dispositions for acting, it follows of necessity that it acts — so according to the same author in the same place, when a rational agent is posited with all the sufficient and naturally prior dispositions for its free action, it does not follow of necessity that it acts, nor does it follow that it does not act, but the opposite of each can stand, as the first chapter of Book I more fully manifests.

One brief demonstration of this is worth recalling. Supposing that A is some rational and free agent, I take its first free act, which is B, and let C be the collection of all sufficient and naturally prior dispositions. Either, then, given C, B is necessarily produced, or not. If so, and it is not in A's free power for C to be posited, or for any part of it — since the whole of C naturally precedes B, and B is the first free act of A — then neither is B in A's free power, the opposite of which was stated. But if given C, B is not necessarily produced, we have what was sought. For now A with C produces B, and this does not follow necessarily; therefore the opposite can stand; therefore it is possible that A stands with C without producing B, and also while producing it.

Wherefore, just as according to the foregoing in this chapter, together with the general rule about naturally preceding necessity set forth in III.2, the proper effect of an irrational agent is said to be produced from a naturally preceding necessity — naturally predetermined to one part only — so the proper act of a rational and free agent is rightly said to be produced from a naturally preceding freedom — naturally undetermined to either part, but relating equally to either alternative.

And just as the former is called a contingent necessary with respect to its total cause, so the latter is called a contingent that is free, in either direction, and equal with respect to its total cause.

This is also clear from Stephen, Bishop of Paris, condemning a certain erroneous article that said: "When the will is in such a disposition in which it is naturally apt to be moved, and the mover is so disposed that it is naturally apt to so move, it is impossible for the will not to will." And again another article positing: "Knowledge of contraries is the sole reason why the rational soul can do opposites, and a power that is simply one cannot do opposites except per accidens and by reason of something else."

Wherefore it seems to me that the equally contingent, taken per se and primarily, can be fittingly defined thus: it is the per se and primary act of a free agent, which — once posited with all the naturally prior dispositions with which it produces it — does not necessarily follow as produced, but either part can stand equally.

Furthermore, the equally contingent is taken in many ways; but according to what was established in II.26, it is taken per se and primarily in one way only, and to that primary way all others are reduced as attributive and accessory. And that way is the one described above.

For the equally contingent, since it exists, is per se and primarily either a cause or an effect — but not a cause. For every such contingent happens to be from something else; for if it were per se and from itself alone, it would not be said to "contingently happen" in this way. For who would say that God is so contingent, and that it so contingently happens that God exists?

Nor is a cause per se and primarily so contingent. For a cause that is from another is not from another insofar as it is a cause, but insofar as it is an effect.

The equally contingent, therefore, per se and primarily, is an effect, or act — as the definition just given states — of a free agent, because not of an irrational agent, as the foregoing has taught. And it is its per se effect — that is, according to what it is as a free agent (for it also produces many effects not freely but necessarily, each of which is a contingent necessary with respect to its total cause). And it is its first effect or act — namely an immanent action, such as willing or not-willing — not its extrinsic and secondary effect, namely a transient or exterior operation. For such a secondary effect, once the primary act from which it proceeds (namely willing or not-willing) is posited, will be produced from a naturally preceding necessity, as III.2 taught. Therefore it is a contingent necessary with respect to its total cause, not simply an equally contingent thing. Nevertheless, this secondary effect can in a certain way be called denominatively and tropically an equally contingent thing, because it is an action derived from an agent or action that per se and primarily acts or contingently occurs equally.

COROLLARY

COROLLARY: WHAT THE FREEDOM OF CONTRADICTION IS, AND WHAT IS AN ACT FREE BY THE FREEDOM OF CONTRADICTION.

Hence it is clearly known what the freedom of contradiction is, and what is an act free by the freedom of contradiction.

The freedom of contradiction is a free active power which, once posited with all the dispositions necessary for acting, can freely act and not act; nor does it follow of necessity that it acts, but both this and the other part of the contradiction can equally stand.

An act free by the freedom of contradiction is the proper act of the freedom of contradiction — that is, of a free active power — which, once posited with all the naturally prior dispositions for the act, can freely be produced or not produced; that is, it does not necessarily follow that the act is produced, but both this and the other part of the contradiction can equally stand.

CHAPTER 5: DRAWS QUASI-COROLLARILY 13 PARTS FROM THE FOREGOING.

[1] First: propositions about the equally contingent are converted through opposite qualities.

[2] Second: some good consequence is neither simply necessary nor "as of now" necessary, but equally contingent.

[3] Third: some indeterminate cause — that is, one not predetermined to acting — does act.

[4] Fourth: every and only an act free by the freedom of contradiction is equally contingent.

[5] Fifth: every and only an equally contingent thing is an act free by the freedom of contradiction.

[6] Sixth: contingency in either direction and necessity are not incompatible.

[7] Seventh: contingency is properly said with respect to the present.

[8] Eighth: freedom is properly said with respect to the present.

[9] Ninth: no act of a creature is simply equally contingent, but only in a determinate genus — namely with respect to lower causes.

[10] Tenth: no act of a creature is free simply by the freedom of contradiction, but only in a qualified sense — namely with respect to all secondary causes.

[11] Eleventh: only an act of the divine will directed outward is simply equally contingent.

[12] Twelfth: only an act of the divine will directed outward is free simply by the freedom of contradiction.

[13] Thirteenth: the first and supreme freedom of contradiction, and the similar contingency in either direction, is in the divine will; and these are the causes of similar freedom and contingency in all other things.

[Bradwardine then demonstrates each of the thirteen parts in order:]

Part 1 follows manifestly from the preceding chapter. For according to what was shown there, whatever contingently and equally can happen or be from any cause — given that total cause with all its naturally prior dispositions — can also contingently and equally not happen and not be, and vice versa.

Part 2 similarly follows. For according to the authorities cited above, "in the fact that a thing is or is not, the proposition is said to be true or false," and "propositions are true just as things are." And in reality, now in fact, from this free cause with these naturally antecedent dispositions, this free act is really produced and follows — but not necessarily by antecedent necessity, either simply or "as of now," as is clear from the definition of the equally contingent given in the preceding chapter, together with the general rule about naturally preceding necessity shown in III.2 — but only contingently and equally.

Such equally contingent consequences are sufficiently shown by everyday words and deeds. For among all people, nations, and languages it is commonly said: "If you do this or that, I will do this or that"; and "If this king or people does this to that one, the other will repay this to this one" — and so they say and so they do consequently. Many such consequences are also found in Sacred Scripture: Genesis 13, Abraham said to Lot: "If you go to the left, I will take the right; if you choose the right, I will go to the left." And Matthew 11: "Woe to you, Chorazin, woe to you, Bethsaida; for if the mighty works done in you had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would long ago have repented in sackcloth and ashes." Other such conditionals, not a few, are placed most frequently in Scripture, none of which is necessary in any way, but only contingent equally, just as the thing itself.

Part 3 also follows manifestly. For every determination of an active cause to acting naturally precedes the action to which it determines. But by the foregoing in the preceding chapter, it is possible that some freely active cause is entirely equal regarding all the naturally prior dispositions of its free act at the time of rest and at the time of action; and at the time of rest it is undetermined; therefore also at the time of action. Nor does the posterior effect determine its efficient cause to acting, for the reason stated.

Part 6 is immediately inferred. For by what was shown in this chapter and the preceding one and the third, the contingent in either direction is some existing thing; and by the Philosopher, De Interpretatione I, last chapter: "What is, when it is, is necessarily."

But so that this may be more clearly declared, we must begin a little higher. It should be known, according to what was shown in the preceding chapter, that the contingent can be taken in two ways: in one way, per se, properly, and in the first degree of contingency — such is the first and immanent act of a rational and free agent with the freedom of contradiction, such as willing. And such contingency and the following necessity are not incompatible, as has already been shown.

In another way, the contingent can be taken per accidens in a certain way, or through another thing, secondarily and denominatively, and in the second degree — such is the transient and extrinsic act of the aforesaid agent descending from the first act, such as moving the hand, the staff, and striking. Such an effect is necessary with respect to its total cause, as the preceding chapter teaches, and contingent similarly in the way described.

From this it is further clearly gathered that one and the same exterior effect in the second degree of contingency can be called, with respect to one and the same cause (namely willing), both necessary by preceding necessity and also denominatively or by transumption necessary in a certain way by following necessity — because its cause, namely that willing, is necessary in that way.

Part 7: The equally contingent, as III.3 showed, is some existing thing; and as the preceding chapter showed, the equally contingent per se, primarily, and properly taken is the act of a cause actually and presently acting.

John Scotus also says, on Sentences I, distinction 39: "A cause is not contingent merely because it pre-existed before this instant in which it causes, and then as pre-existing could have caused or not caused; for just as this being, when it is, is necessary or contingent, so a cause, when it causes, then causes necessarily or contingently. From the fact therefore that in this instant the will causes this willing, and not necessarily, it does so contingently."

Part 8 is demonstrated from Part 7 joined with Part 4; it can also be demonstrated from the definitions of the freedom of contradiction and of its free act, which the corollary of the preceding chapter showed.

Part 9, as to the first part, follows evidently. For if any act of a creature were simply equally contingent, this would seem most of all to apply to the free act of a rational and free creature, as the foregoing in the preceding chapter teaches. But every free act of such a creature comes from a naturally preceding necessity, and is necessary in that way, as III.2 shows. Therefore by the definition of the equally contingent declared in the preceding chapter, no free act of a free creature is simply equally contingent — because it is necessary with respect to the divine will naturally pre-willing it.

And that every such act is equally contingent in a determinate genus — namely in the genus of lower causes — is clear from the same together with II.3. For once all the lower causes naturally prior to and producing such an act are posited, it does not necessarily follow that it is produced — but the opposite can equally stand.

Wherefore the Philosophers, who for the most part consider natural causes, say simply: "it contingently happens in either direction or equally to do this or that," and they mean this to contingently happen with respect to these causes. Therefore, according to the common manner of speaking, "contingent in either direction or equally" — though stated simply — is taken and signifies in this way.

Hence some say that contingency, freedom, possibility, impossibility, and necessity are said only with respect to lower causes, and not with respect to higher causes at all. Wherefore Stephen, Bishop of Paris, condemning the article affirming that what is simply impossible — that is, in all ways — cannot be done by God or by another agent, adds: "Error, if it is understood of the impossible according to nature." The impossible according to nature — that is, according to lower causes — is more customarily called the simply impossible; and so similarly with the possible, the necessary, and the contingent.

Part 11 also follows manifestly. For according to what was shown in this chapter and the preceding one, some act of the will is simply equally contingent; and by Part 9, no act of the created will is such; therefore it is an act of the uncreated, divine will. And not directed inward, because God cannot not love Himself, nor can He not will any essential thing within Him — because then He could not be God. Therefore only directed outward.

This is also clear from the definition of the contingent similarly from the preceding chapter. For once there is posited in God the simple cognition of the Antichrist, together with the volitional power and all the naturally prior dispositions for the volition by which He wills the Antichrist to exist, it does not necessarily follow that God so wills — but its opposite can equally stand, as was shown concerning a rational agent in the preceding chapter. For if this necessarily followed — since all things naturally preceding that volition in God are simply and absolutely necessary — it would be simply and absolutely necessary that God so wills. And thus by I.10, the Antichrist's future existence would be absolutely necessary, and this by a natural or violent naturally preceding necessity. Therefore nothing would be free or contingent — the opposite of which the foregoing has taught.

Part 13, as to the first part, patently follows from the foregoing. And once the first part is conceded, who will deny or doubt the second? For who does not know that the first in any genus is the cause of all others, insofar as they are contained in that genus? Who furthermore, having considered the foregoing, does not know that if the divine will were not free or contingent, but absolutely necessary, all other things would similarly be absolutely necessary? And this is perhaps what the seventh opinion recounted above was dreaming.

CHAPTER 6: OBJECTIONS AND RESPONSES.

Perhaps someone will object against what has been said.

Against Part 1: Let John be supposed contingently and equally not to will A. Therefore, converting through opposite qualities, it follows that John contingently and equally wills A. Therefore "John wills A" is equally contingent. Therefore by Parts 3 and 4, "John wills A" exists; therefore John wills A. Therefore John simultaneously wills A and does not will A.

Also, a pure negation posits nothing; therefore a negative proposition about the contingent in either direction does not posit the affirmative; therefore neither is it truly converted into it in any way.

Response: The proposition "It is contingent that John..." and every such proposition can be taken in two ways — de inesse and modally. Taken de inesse, it signifies that a contingent thing, or some contingent, is John's willing — and so the argument proceeds, but it does not conflict with the aforementioned conversion, because that conversion is made only in propositions taken modally. Taken modally, it does not signify that some contingent is John's willing, but that John can will in either direction.

Against Part 2: In such a contingent consequence, the opposite of the consequent stands "as of now" with the antecedent; therefore the consequence does not hold "as of now."

Response: I immediately deny the assumption. For the opposite of the consequent does not stand "as of now" with the antecedent, but "as of now" can stand. And therefore the consequence is not "as of now" necessary, but can for now fail to hold.

Against Part 3: If some active cause is undetermined to acting, there is no cause or reason why it should act rather than not act; therefore it simultaneously acts and does not act, or neither acts nor fails to act.

Response: III.3 and the 34th part of the corollary of I.1 respond to this.

Against Part 6: The Philosopher, Prior Analytics I and De Interpretatione II, seems to be expressly contrary. For according to his teaching, it evidently follows: "It is contingent to be; therefore it is contingent not to be; therefore it is not necessary to be" — and conversely: "It is necessary to be; therefore it is not contingent not to be; therefore it is not contingent in either direction to be." Therefore each of these evidently entails the contradiction of the other.

Response: It should be known that every contingency in either direction excludes some necessity and is incompatible with it, and vice versa. Wherefore, just as there is a twofold necessity — preceding and following — as III.2 taught, so also there is a twofold contingency in either direction: one properly and strictly taken, which excludes only the naturally preceding necessity and is incompatible with it alone (as is clear from the definitions of the equally contingent and of naturally preceding necessity given in III.4 and III.2) — yet this contingency does not exclude following necessity, nor is it incompatible with it. The other is contingency in either direction improperly, commonly, and broadly so called, which excludes both the aforementioned necessities from the contingent and is incompatible with both.

And so according to the Philosopher, nothing actually being or not being is said to contingently occur with respect to the present in the broad sense — because according to him, De Interpretatione I, last chapter: "What is, when it is, and what is not, when it is not, is necessarily" — namely by following necessity, as III.2 shows. But according to the same author in the same place, only the future is said to so contingently occur with respect to the future. For the future contingent, although for now it is necessary for it not to be (by this following necessity, because it now is not), for the future according to him it is by neither necessity necessary for it not to be or not to exist, or to be or to exist — but by the opposite of each, it can equally contingently happen this way or that.

Against Part 7: The authority of the Philosopher with the exposition of Boethius, De Interpretatione I, last chapter, adduced in III.3 for the first opinion, evidently suggests that contingency is found only in propositions about the future.

Response: Here one could respond, as Anselm seems to have responded in Cur Deus Homo II.17, by saying that Aristotle erred here — because by positing that everything that is, when it is, is of necessity, he seems to have destroyed the contingent in either direction, since necessity and contingency in either direction seem mutually incompatible. Hence Anselm, having distinguished necessity there into preceding and following (as III.2 set forth), adds concerning following necessity: "This is that necessity which, where Aristotle treats of singular and future propositions, seems to destroy either alternative and to assert that all things are of necessity."

Nevertheless, lest I so simply contradict so great a Philosopher and very many philosophical men, I say that contingency in either direction is taken in two ways for the present purpose — properly and strictly, and commonly or broadly, as the preceding response distinguished. The first is properly said with respect to the present; the second with respect to the future, as was shown just above. And I believe this to be the mind of the Philosopher's cited authority.

Against Part 8: Everything adduced against Part 7 applies here too, since every freedom is a contingency, as Part 4 of the preceding chapter demonstrated.

Also, everyone who freely operates is said to freely operate either because he can now freely operate and not operate, or because he previously could freely do both for now. The first cannot be said, on account of the frequently cited authority of the Philosopher ["What is, when it is, is necessarily"]; therefore the second remains — which proves that freedom is said only with respect to the future.

Response: These are easily resolved by a similar distinction about freedom to the distinction about contingency already given. For freedom, as customarily understood, excludes necessity and is incompatible with it; and it can be taken in two ways — properly and strictly, and commonly or broadly.

Properly, it excludes only naturally preceding necessity and is incompatible with it, as is clear from its definition which the corollary of III.4 set forth. But it does not exclude following necessity, nor is it incompatible with it — rather, it is compatible with it, embraces it, and includes it, as is clear from the said corollary joined with the corollary of III.1.

Freedom so taken is per se, primarily, and properly said with respect to the present. But commonly, broadly, and by vulgar transumption, it excludes all necessity — both preceding and following — and so, supposing that famous dictum of the Philosopher ("What is, when it is, is necessarily"), it is not said with respect to the past or present but only with respect to the future.

When it is asked why a person who freely operates is said to freely operate, I say: properly, because he operates from a power naturally preceding his operation, which — once posited with all the naturally prior dispositions for the work — does not necessarily result in operating, but both operating and not operating can equally stand, as the corollary of III.4 shows — by contrast with irrational agents, which when they can, act necessarily by a natural naturally preceding necessity, as the same III.4 taught.

This natural priority is what many contend about, saying: "Whoever freely operates previously could freely operate and not operate" — which has something false and something true in it. For if the verb "could" signifies a temporally preceding potency, it is false, as the proofs of Part 8 in the preceding chapter showed. But if it signifies a naturally preceding potency — namely that whoever freely operates has a potency naturally preceding his operation, from which he does not operate by a naturally preceding necessity, but with which both operating and not operating can stand — it is true, as the foregoing has taught.

Hence John Scotus, on Sentences I, distinction 39, immediately after his statement recounted above, adds: "There is therefore a potency of a cause for the opposite of what it causes, without succession; and that potency is a real potency of what is naturally prior, as a first act, for the opposites that are naturally posterior, as second acts. For the first act, considered in that instant in which it exists, is naturally prior to the second act; thus it posits the second act in being as its effect contingently — and as naturally prior, it could have not posited it, but its opposite, in being."

Against Part 9: Some creature acts such that, once its acting potency is posited with all the necessary concurrents — natural and supernatural — naturally prior to the action, the action does not necessarily follow, but both action and non-action can equally stand. Therefore by the definition of the equally contingent given in III.4, that action is simply equally contingent. Otherwise every acting creature, if not determined naturally from itself, would be determined by something else — namely by the divine willing, which is necessary with respect to this action. This seems condemned by Stephen, Bishop of Paris, in this form: "What is not of its own nature determined to being or not being is not determined except by something that is necessary with respect to it." And again: "No agent is in either direction; rather, it is determined."

Response: This argument assumes what is false, as the proof of Part 9 shows. Nor does the condemnation of the article conflict: for the article universally posited that everything that is not of its own nature determined, etc. — wherefore the condemnation denies it universally, not affirming the opposite of every singular, but the particular proposition opposed to it for some singular. And this is verified through the willing of God directed outward — not essentially according to what it is (for thus it is the very essence of God), but only relatively, insofar as it is a willing directed outward. For such willing of God is not of its own nature determined to being such willing or not being, nor is it determined by anything that is necessary with respect to it, as Part 11 of the preceding chapter demonstrated.

Against Parts 11, 12, and 13: Every will or volition of God is acted or produced, and is acted or produced; therefore through some acting or producing naturally anteceding it. And once such acting or producing of that will or volition is posited, its being acted or produced necessarily follows. Therefore every act of the divine will is produced from a naturally preceding necessity, and is necessary in that way — and none is simply equally contingent or free by the freedom of contradiction.

Response: [Bradwardine provides an extensive response involving the nature of action and passion — whether they are relations, absolute things, or the same reality under different descriptions. He argues that the first divine production (the generation of the Word) is not preceded by another production, and that positing an infinite regress of divine volitions is neither necessary nor coherent. He ultimately responds that the divine volition directed outward is produced through God's understanding in a certain way causally preceding it, but that understanding does not necessarily cause that willing — as the foregoing has made clear.]

[The chapter continues with a lengthy treatment of whether God's infinite volitions regarding infinite objects constitute an infinite series ordered essentially by prior and posterior, and concludes that such volitions are either collateral and co-equal (like God's volitions regarding infinite points on a line), or — if ordered — ordered downward, not upward, thus not threatening the existence of a first contingent and free act.]

CHAPTER 7: RAISES THE QUESTION WHETHER ANYTHING IS IN THE POWER OF THE CREATED WILL; AND POSITS ONE RESPONSE, AND CORRECTS IT.

The foregoing gives birth to a weighty question: whether anything is in the power of the created will. For how shall anything be judged to be in the power of the created will, when every action and non-action of it depends on the naturally preceding divine will, as II.20, II.30, and II.32 taught? How is it in the power of the secondary cause — namely the created will — that the first cause — namely the divine will — should anticipate it by willing, which divine will the created will must necessarily imitate, as I.10 teaches? How, finally, is any act, cessation, or rest in our power, when all these things occur in us from a naturally preceding necessity, as III.2 set forth? And if nothing is in the power of the created will, how is created free will preserved?

Some respond here that, given the general influence, something is in the power of the created will, but otherwise nothing.

But concerning that general influence, one must ask whether it is something or nothing. If nothing, nothing comes from nothing. If something, it is either a creature or the Creator. Not a creature, because the Creator — namely God Himself — is necessarily required as a truly efficient cause of any action of the created will, as the foregoing has taught. If the Creator — namely God Himself — is posited: either absolutely insofar as He is God only, or insofar as He is actually influencing toward the act of the created will. Not in the first way, because by I.8 and I.9, He does nothing externally in that way, and therefore does not influence in that way. If in the second way, then by I.8 and I.9 He does nothing externally and therefore does not influence except by willing — and this not universally and confusedly, but singularly and distinctly, just as He also knows, as can easily be shown by I.22, I.27, and what follows. And so His general influence is His willing, or volition, special to willing specially to do this or that.

To say, therefore, "given the general influence, some act is in the power of the created will" is nothing other than to say: "given God's special volition or willing toward some certain act of the created will, that act is in the power of the created will." And so this response does not resolve the question but rather entangles it further.

CHAPTER 8: RECOUNTS SIX OTHER LITTLE RESPONSES, AND CORRECTS THEM.

There are also six other similar little responses to the same question, all of which concordantly confess that the uncreated will anticipates the created will in all things, but they are further differentiated.

[Response 1] The first says that something is in the power of the created will because it is in its power that God should will and pre-will its free act.

[Response 2] The second posits that a free future act is in the power of the created will because it is in its power to do something from which it follows that God wills or does not will this.

[Response 3] The third thinks that something is in the power of the created will because, equally as soon as the uncreated will precedes the created to some free act, the created will can do the opposite — namely rest from that act and exercise the opposite act.

[Response 4] The fourth affirms that something is in the power of the created will because, although the uncreated will pre-wills the created will to have a certain act for a certain future measure of time, it is nevertheless in the created will's power to so dispose itself beforehand that God does not then will this, and that it does not then have that act.

[Response 5] The fifth opines that God does not properly produce the act of the created will, but only improperly — namely because He ordained and wills that the created will alone should properly and freely perform its act.

[Response 6] The sixth, weaker than the rest, weakly judges that God co-acts and pre-acts properly every act of the created will, but so weakly influencing that He by no means necessitates it to act.

[Bradwardine then refutes each response at length. Against Response 1, the core argument is:]

Against the first: According to the common manner of speaking of ordinary people and the Doctors, nothing is said to be in anyone's power except what is subject to his will and follows his will as its effect or privation of effect — as motion and rest. Hence Augustine, Retractations I.22: "Nothing is in our power except what follows our will." But for the divine willing to anticipate the human willing is by no means subject to the human will, nor does it follow it as an effect — but the contrary, as II.30 demonstrates.

Also, nothing is in anyone's power except what he can do when he wills, as Augustine says, On Free Will III.3: "I cannot think anything else to be in our power except what we do when we will." But no one can make God anticipate him by willing — because whoever does anything naturally anticipates what he has done; therefore the human will, by willing, would anticipate the divine will, contrary to the hypothesis and II.30. And by I.23, every willing of God is eternal, not temporally made by anyone.

Also, if it is in man's power what God wills, then it is in his power what God willed from eternity (by I.23); and since by I.10, God's willing necessarily results in His doing when He has willed —

"For He spoke and they were made" — it is similarly in man's power what God has already done in the past. Therefore it is in man's power to make what was done in the past not to have been done — contrary to many authorities cited against Part 8 of III.5.

[The refutations of all six responses proceed similarly, each showing that they either collapse into the first (already refuted) or contradict established principles about divine priority, efficacy, and immutability. Key arguments include:]

- If the divine willing were in man's power, the divine will would be more in man's power than his own will — since Augustine says "nothing is so much in our power as the will itself" (On Free Will III.3).
- No Christian will presume to say he has greater power than Christ Himself — yet Christ said: "I cannot do anything of Myself" (John 5).
- If anything were simply in man's power, avoiding sin would seem most of all to be so — yet the whole Church prays "Lead us not into temptation."

[Against Response 5, Bradwardine invokes II.20 and following to show that God properly co-acts every act of the created will. Against Response 6, he invokes I.10 to show that however God acts — even "weakly" — His will cannot be frustrated.]

CHAPTER 9: RESPONDS.

Therefore, so that the perplexity of this question may be more absolutely and briefly untangled, it should be known that power for the present purpose can be taken in two ways — for active power and passive power, as the preceding chapter distinguished. That which we can in no way do but only suffer is not said to be in our power, as the preceding chapter showed. Rather, according to the common manner of speaking of ordinary people and authors, only that is said to be in our power which is in our active power — and this not just any active power, but only the power of contradiction, as the Philosopher says, Metaphysics IX.18, as more fully recounted in the corollary of III.4.

Wherefore everything and only that is said to be in our power which is in our free power — free, I say, with a similar freedom, namely of contradiction, as the same corollary defined.

Therefore, by Part 10 of III.5, no act of ours is simply in our free active power — as the preceding chapter also sufficiently proves — but only in a qualified sense, namely with respect to all secondary causes.

Wherefore both ordinary people and the learned, who for the most part consider natural and secondary causes, say simply that this or that is constituted in our power, and they mean with respect to these causes. Therefore, according to the common manner of speaking, "to be constituted in our power," though stated simply, is taken and signifies in the said way — just as was said about the equally contingent in III.5.

Yet according to the more customary manner of speaking, it can be more intelligibly defined by saying that that is in our power which, when we will, we do, and when we do not will, we by no means do.

Hence Augustine, On the Spirit and the Letter 26, after a great disputation, expressing its definition or meaning of the name, says: "We call this power: where to the will is adjoined the faculty of doing. Hence each person is said to have this in his power: what, if he wills, he does; if he does not will, he does not do." And On Free Will III.3: "I cannot think anything else to be in our power except what we do when we will." And City of God V.10, showing that many things are in our power: "For we do many things which we would not do if we were unwilling — to which primarily belongs willing itself: for if we will, it exists; if we do not will, it does not exist; for we would not will if we were unwilling."

Nothing, therefore, is in our power except in a qualified sense only — namely sub-actively, sub-executively, and sub-serviently necessarily (namely by a naturally preceding necessity with respect to the divine will). And it is therefore said to be in our power because when we will, we do it voluntarily, not unwillingly.

But simply and entirely absolutely, antecedently and sufficiently — without needing anything that is not subject to our power or will — nothing at all is truly said to be in our power. And thus the reasons and authorities that seem contrary are harmonized with one another.

Let no one, therefore, be indignant even if he has nothing absolutely and simply in his own power, but is subject in all things to a higher power — for the Apostle says, Romans 13: "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers."

Let it suffice for any man to have what he ought in his power in a certain way: namely to be subject to the higher divine power in all things, and to be set over the lower. Let him have a middle power between the extreme powers — just as those angelic spirits who, constituted in a certain middle order, are called "Powers," yet are subject to the divine power. Just as even the greatest kings and princes, who have power over subjects, are themselves subject to the King of Kings — to Him, namely, who on His garment and on His thigh has written: "King of Kings and Lord of Lords" (Revelation 19).

And just as other middle men — dukes, counts, barons, satraps, and other prefects who in certain cities are commonly called "Powers" — exercise power over subjects while they themselves are subject to higher powers. This the centurion rightly perceived when he said: "I am a man set under authority, having soldiers under me" (Matthew 8) — as II.28 also recalls.

Hence Augustine, On Rebuke and Grace 69: "Whether to will or not to will is in the power of the one willing or not willing, so as to fulfill the divine will — yet not to surpass its power."

And Retractations I.22: "Unless someone changes his will, he cannot do good — which is placed in our power, where He says, 'Either make the tree good and its fruit good, or make the tree bad and its fruit bad.' This is not against the grace of God which we preach. For it is in man's power to change his will for the better; but that power is nothing unless it is given by God, of whom it is said, 'He gave them the power to become children of God.' For since this is in our power — what we do when we will — nothing is so much in our power as the will itself. But the will is prepared by the Lord; in that way, therefore, He gives the power."

According to this exposition, the authorities of Augustine and others that say absolutely that something is constituted in our power should be understood. And the other authorities of others that say similarly absolutely that nothing is constituted in our power should be expounded according to the distinction set forth above.

CHAPTER 10: DISTINGUISHES CONCERNING NECESSITY AND FREEDOM.

So that the foregoing may be made more clearly manifest, it should be known that necessity and freedom are said in many ways.

Necessity per se and primarily is taken for the vehemence of being of that which per se and primarily is a necessary being — which is God. And thus it cannot properly be defined, as I.13 teaches; it is however described and made known in some fashion — and this better by affirmation than by negation: namely through the vehemence and firmness of being, rather than through the impossibility or non-possibility of not being, as the seventh part of that same I.13 manifests.

Otherwise, necessity is taken for natural necessity, for fatal necessity, for the necessity of violent coercion, and for the necessity of spontaneous stability, permanence, or even firmness — which, though less properly, is also called the necessity of immutability.

There is also preceding and following necessity, as III.2 showed.

And since in however many ways one of two opposites is said, in that many ways the other will also be said, and necessity and freedom are in a certain way opposed: freedom is said contrarily in the same ways — namely freedom from necessity in the first sense, freedom from natural necessity, from fatal necessity, from violent necessity, from preceding necessity, and from following necessity.

Of all these, the three mentioned — namely natural, fatal, and violent necessity — are incompatible with the freedom and merit of a rational creature. Wherefore these three can be reduced to one general category: the necessity that is adversarial or contrary to freedom, which therefore takes away freedom and excuses sin.

The other can be called spontaneous necessity, consonant with and compatible with freedom and merit — according to the distinctions of Augustine and Anselm about necessity set forth in the proof of the corollary of III.1.

All authorities, therefore, that deny necessity from the rational creature deny only the first kind — namely that which is adversarial and contrary to freedom, and takes away freedom — but not the second: the spontaneous kind, consonant with freedom, which is compatible with freedom.

Hence for the most part, when they deny necessity as if opposing it, they use the conjunction "but" (sed) or another similar one — which according to grammarians, truth, and common usage is called adversative, because by opposing the prior statement it posits its opposite — and they affirm will or freedom, saying that someone did or does this or that not from necessity but from freedom, or will, or free power, indicating that they are only rejecting the necessity adversarial to will or freedom.

Hence the Apostle to Philemon: "Without your counsel I wished to do nothing, so that your good might not be as if from necessity, but voluntary." And 1 Corinthians 7: "He who has settled in his heart firmly, having no necessity but having power over his own will, and has judged in his heart to keep his virgin, does well."

[Bradwardine then reviews the three principal errors that subjected human acts to necessity — the Manichaean error (necessity of a naturally evil soul), the error that will is merely passive, and the Pelagian error (that divine foreknowledge imposes violent necessity) — and shows that in each case, the authorities opposing these errors deny only the adversarial necessity in question, never the spontaneous necessity. He provides extensive citations from Augustine's On Free Will III, Anselm's On the Harmony 1 and 7, and Boethius's Consolation of Philosophy V.]

COROLLARY

COROLLARY: THAT NECESSITY AND FREEDOM AND MERIT ARE NOT MUTUALLY INCOMPATIBLE — OR ARE INCOMPATIBLE.

From these things I consider it manifest which necessity and freedom and merit are not mutually incompatible, and which are. For spontaneous necessity by no means is incompatible with freedom, as what has been shown here and in III.1 and III.2 demonstrates; therefore neither will it be incompatible with merit.

This spontaneous necessity is further twofold — preceding and following — as can be gathered from III.2; just as freedom is also twofold — one entirely simple and completely absolute, the other said only in a qualified sense — as III.5 and III.9 show.

Of these necessities, neither is incompatible with the freedom of contradiction said in a qualified sense; nor is following necessity incompatible with the freedom of contradiction simply; as can be gathered from III.2, III.5, and III.9. But preceding necessity is incompatible with the freedom of contradiction simply. And natural, fatal, and violent necessity are incompatible in every way with the freedom of contradiction, as appears from what has been shown here and in II.3; therefore they cannot stand together with merit.

CHAPTER 11: OBJECTIONS AND RESPONSES.

But perhaps it will be objected against what has been said. For it was said in III.9 that although all human acts come from a naturally preceding necessity, man is nevertheless called free and of free will because he does not act unwillingly or under compulsion, but spontaneously — and when he wills, he does, and when he does not will, he does not do some of his acts.

Objection: In the same way, beasts — although they do their deeds from a naturally preceding necessity — nevertheless do not act unwillingly or under compulsion but purely spontaneously, and when they will or desire, they do, and when they do not will or desire, they do not do some of their deeds from naturally preceding necessity. Therefore they act just as freely and just as meritoriously as man.

Also, no possible reason seems assignable why in human acts the necessity with respect to God — that is, the divine will naturally preceding such acts — should be compatible with merit (as the corollaries of III.1 and III.2 say), more than any other necessity, or at least more than the necessity with respect to nature or fate (which the corollary of the preceding chapter denied to it), or more than absolute necessity.

Response: These are easily resolved if what was previously shown is kept in memory. For as the preceding chapter taught, a rational creature is free with a threefold freedom — from natural, fatal, and violent necessity — indeed from necessity with respect to all secondary causes, by II.3. But irrational beings are not so: they are subject in all things to natural necessity, and (as some hold) to the fatal necessity of the stars.

As for Augustine's meaning when he says that man freely does something because when he wills he does it and when he does not will he does not — it can be said that he speaks there against the Pelagians and against the violent and involuntary necessity that they said follows from divine foreknowledge or predestination (as the preceding chapter recounted), removing that from man — but he does not affirm that only that freedom exists in man.

Better, it can be said that man is called free with the freedom of contradiction because, once all the secondary causes naturally prior to his free volition are posited with all the necessarily required dispositions, it does not necessarily follow that he wills — but he can equally will and not will, as is clear from III.4 and following. And therefore, with all these things standing in this way, when he wills, he wills and produces his willing, and when he does not will, he neither wills nor produces his willing.

Therefore, supposing according to the opinion of the fool that God does not exist and man does exist and can act, or according to the opinion of certain people (namely the Pelagians, who say they are wise) that man can act without God in any way co-acting — man in his free acts would be free simply by the freedom of contradiction. But beasts are not so. Indeed, even if they are supposed to be able to act with God in no way co-acting, still — once the appetible object and the other secondary causes with the required dispositions naturally prior to the appetite (namely the act of desiring) are posited — it necessarily follows that they desire, namely by natural necessity.

Hence the Philosopher, Metaphysics IX.10: "Irrational potencies necessarily, when the passive and active approach one another as they can, the one acts and the other is acted upon." And the authority of Damascene attests: "Irrational beings are not of free will; they are driven by nature rather than driving, and therefore they do not contradict the natural appetite, but as soon as they desire something, they rush to the act."

This objection Anselm also resolves in a similar way in On Freedom of Will 5, where first the disciple asks: "How is the will not free, which no alien power can subject without its own consent?" And when the disciple requires: "Cannot we say by similar reasoning that the will of a horse is free, which serves the appetite of the flesh only when willing?" — he responds: "This is not similar. For in the horse, the will does not subject itself, but — naturally subject — it always necessarily serves the appetite of the flesh. In man, however, as long as the will itself is right, it neither serves nor is subject to what it ought not to be, nor is it turned from its rectitude by any alien force, unless it willingly consents to what it ought not — which consent it evidently has not naturally or from necessity, like a horse, but from itself."

Augustine also, On Free Will III.1, responds similarly to a similar objection about the natural motion of a stone.

When the objector further argues — beasts act freely, therefore meritoriously — the inference does not hold. For as is taught most frequently in moral philosophy and sacred theology, for merit it does not suffice merely to do naturally some one good thing, but it is required to do it well — which only a right intention of the end achieves, as is clear from I.34. This is directed by reason rightly pre-judging. Therefore beasts, lacking reason, will of necessity also lack merit.

Indeed, just as it is perhaps absolutely possible that God might make some immaterial nature entirely free to will without the judgment of reason — for since He now makes one nature having both those powers, He could, it seems, make another having only one of them — if therefore He made such a creature, it would be as free as a man or angel, yet could not merit or sin at all, because it would lack the judgment of reason to which it might freely conform or also fail to conform.

There is also an irrefutable reason assignable why necessity in the will with respect to the divine will is compatible with merit, and no other whatsoever. For it is compatible with merit on account of the reason that the proof of the corollary of III.1 assigns. And to briefly assign the reason for this: I say that the nature of the created will is such that in its free acts it is subject of necessity to no secondary cause (as II.3 shows), but only to God (as II.30 and III.2 taught). This was also well shown in the first institution of man, when he was instituted to be subject to God alone and to be set over all other things, as the history of Genesis 1 teaches. Therefore in merit it will be similarly.

Nor should any rational mind doubt that the omnipotent Creator should reasonably be preferred to all other created or creatable active things and agents in some special prerogative over the rational creature, as over all creation universally.

Nor is any other necessity compatible with merit. Concerning violent and entirely involuntary necessity, no one doubts or is ignorant. Every natural necessity belongs to a material and irrational form, as can be gathered from II.3; therefore according to what was shown in this chapter, it cannot have merit. Every form subject to the fatal necessity of the stars is necessarily material and consequently irrational; therefore by the foregoing, it is not susceptible of merit. Nor is absolute necessity compatible with merit — because if there were such necessity in human acts, there would be no possibility of acting otherwise in either man or God; and so God would necessarily produce human acts, and by the same reasoning whatever He does externally; therefore He would not be a rational and free agent (as is clear from III.4 and III.5), but an irrational agent acting from natural necessity.

COROLLARY

COROLLARY: WHAT KIND OF FREEDOM EXISTS IN IRRATIONAL CREATURES, AND HOW IT DIFFERS FROM AND AGREES WITH THE FREEDOM OF RATIONAL CREATURES.

From these things it is clearly known what kind of freedom exists or does not exist in irrational creatures, and how rational freedom differs from and agrees with the freedom of irrational creatures.

For in irrational creatures there is, with respect to their natural actions, freedom from violence and involuntary coercion. For when they desire, they act, and when they do not desire, they do not act — which is first and chiefly verified of their appetite, just as it is in humans concerning their will, as III.9 more fully showed. Wherefore the Philosopher, Ethics III.5, attributes to children and animals both will and the voluntary: "Children and animals share in the voluntary," he says. Anselm also, On Freedom of Will 5, implies that a horse has a will, as the present chapter recounted above.

Furthermore, in beasts there is perhaps freedom from the fatal necessity of the stars. For it seems that if beasts had been created perfect on the first day of the world before the creation of the stars, they could then have performed their proper natural actions.

But there is not in them freedom simply — because not with respect to higher causes, namely the first cause, that is, the divine will — just as there is not in rational creatures either, as III.5 and III.9 show. Nor is there in them freedom from natural necessity, as the present chapter demonstrated above. Therefore there cannot be in them the freedom of contradiction simply, nor with respect to all lower — that is, all secondary — causes, as the corollary of III.4 shows.

The difference and agreement between these freedoms I consider manifest from the foregoing.

Thomas Bradwardine, De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium

Book III, Chapters XII–XXVIII

CHAPTER XII

Begins to dispute that most famous question: whether all things which shall come to pass will come to pass of necessity; and recites the opinion of the Mathematicians or Stoics, who say that all things which shall come to pass will come to pass of an absolutely simple necessity.

Here, however, from what has been laid down, that most famous question manifestly arises — that sharpest axiom and most difficult problem — namely, whether all things which come to pass shall come to pass of necessity. It now remains, accordingly, to discuss this very thing. Now there are various and many opinions concerning it, of which the first steadfastly affirms that all things which shall come to pass shall come to pass by an utterly absolute necessity. And this is the opinion of certain Mathematicians and of those who posit fate; which Boethius, on the first book Peri Hermeneias, asserts to be the opinion of the Stoics.

The most common motive for this opinion is this: Whatsoever God foreknows with certainty as about to come to pass shall come to pass by utterly absolute necessity; for otherwise He would by no means certainly foreknow it, and His foreknowledge could be deceived. But all things which shall come to pass, God foreknows with certainty as about to come to pass. This may be more forcefully confirmed if it be added that the science of God in no way depends on things, and that it includes the divine will, which is necessary and immutable with respect to all future things, as can probably appear from what has gone before.

For this opinion also, as John of Salisbury (afterwards Bishop of Chartres) reports in Policraticus II.23 — which he wrote for the Blessed Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury, while he was discharging the office of the Chancellorship of England, where he treats this matter at length — a certain Stoic adduced another motive. For he would ask whether you could do any of those things which you are not at all about to do. When you had admitted this, he would offer you a thousand gold pieces upon your doing it; and if perchance you refused them, he would order them to be multiplied for you by however great a sum, so that you might effect what can easily be done.

But this opinion takes away every liberty of free will — namely, the liberty of contradiction — and removes at the same time every contingency to either alternative; which the first chapter of Book II and the fourth of this present book, with what follows, do not permit. Wherefore Robert, Archbishop of Canterbury, also condemned at Oxford the article asserting that every true proposition concerning the future is necessary.

CHAPTER XIII

Treats the opinion of Cicero, who says that God does not know future things.

Another opinion is that of Cicero, namely, that many things come to pass freely, but God does not foreknow them, on account of the motive recited in the preceding chapter. For he was unable to see how there could be a certain foreknowledge of all future things unless there were also an absolute necessity in every respect, and so all manner of liberty would be taken away. For he believed that the foreknowledge of future things and their liberty necessarily repel one another; wherefore (as he believed) it was necessary either to deny the one and affirm the other; and it seemed to him more useful for civil intercourse to deny foreknowledge than the liberty of free will. Wherefore in his book On Divination, he denies all divination and all foreknowledge. But this opinion, no less execrable to the ears of unbelievers than to those of the faithful, the sixth chapter of Book I sufficiently refutes.

CHAPTER XIV

Treats the third opinion, which says that many things are future in their own nature, but not with God.

The third opinion asserts that many things are future in their own nature, but not to God. For all things are present to Him in eternity, and therefore He is not properly said to foreknow future things, but rather to behold them as present; and by this it intends to avoid the difficulty of the foregoing motive. And this is the view of Boethius in Consolation of Philosophy V, in the last prose; and of Anselm in On the Fall of the Devil 21 and On Concord 7; whom many Doctors also follow.

But, although this saying is not in itself most clear (for it might be argued against in many ways), nevertheless, taken as admitted, it does not avoid the difficulty. For it is certain that future things are not in God materially, nor do they actually exist, created in their own natures, as they will be when they shall be present; for by the same reason they would always be so; therefore [they would be] when they shall be past; nay, even all past things would now exist materially and in being, in the manner in which they were in God and in their own natures outside God, as ever they were. By some mode of being, therefore — namely, by existing in being and materially actually created in their own natures — future things shall be when they shall be present, which they are not now in God; as Bede says, on that text of John 1, "That which was made, in him was life": that is to say, whatsoever was made in time, whether living or wanting life, all this in the spiritual ratio of its Maker had as it were always lived and lives — not because what He created is co-eternal with the Creator, but because the ratio of His will is co-eternal with Him, in which from eternity He had and has what and when He would create, how He would govern the creature that it might endure, to what end He would conduct each of the things which He created.

And Augustine says in On Genesis to the Letter V, that things, before they were made, both were and were not: they were in the science of God, they were not in their own nature; and this God foreknows with certainty. Let, therefore, an argument be made from such foreknowledge, and the difficulty returns.

For the Authors and Doctors, however, it is to be known that all things are eternally in God, and present with God — that is, in His eternal and utterly immutable knowledge: that is to say, He knows them eternally and immutably, as is plain through Bede and Augustine just recited; and so the Lombard expounds such Authorities in Sentences I, dist. 35, which exposition he confirms by authorities. Nor is it to be wondered at if the Theologians use such a transferred manner of speaking, since the Philosophers use a similar and greater. For Avicenna says in On the Soul IV.2, that all things which in the world are past, present, and future, have being in the Wisdom of the Creator. Aristotle also says, On the Soul III.37, that all those things which are, the soul in some manner is: for they are either things sensible, or things intelligible; and science is indeed the knowables, but sense the sensibles. On which Averroes says, "It comes about of necessity that the soul is all beings in one of the modes according to which it is possible to say, the soul is all beings."

And so perhaps it might be said by the same transference of speech, that things made, before they were made, were God — as seems to appear from Book I, chapter 17. Whence also John 1, "That which was made in Him was life" — which life surely is not in God except as one life which is one God and three persons; which the blessed Augustine on John, in the first homily, shows by the example of the Carpenter. "The carpenter," he says, "makes a chest in his work, and therefore has the chest in his art; but the chest in the work is not life, the chest in the art is life, because the soul of the artificer lives, where these things all are before they are brought forth. So therefore, dearest brethren, because the wisdom of God, through which all things were made, contains all things according to its art, before it fashions all things; here those things which are made through the art itself are not forthwith life, but whatsoever was made, life is in Him. You see the earth; the earth is in the art. You see the heaven; the heaven is in the art. You see the sun and moon; these too are in the art, but outside they are bodies, in the art or the artificer they are life. But that life which is in Him is the light of men. For this follows: 'And the life was the light of men.'"

Yet otherwise, perhaps more clearly and briefly, it may be said that all things are in God not really, but causally, just as, according to the Philosopher in Physics IV.23, a thing is said to be in its cause; and this, according to Averroes, in four ways, according to the four causes of things. Now God is the threefold cause of all things — efficient, formal, and final: He is the cause of every present, past, and future thing; wherefore He Himself is such, and this through His will, ever the same, immutable, and eternal, as the first book shows. Thus therefore, as I think, the sayings of this kind of the Fathers may not unsuitably be understood and expounded.

And if you object that these things do not solve the foregoing difficulty: it is true that they do not solve it perfectly and simply with all men, because not with the subtle and acute. Yet they better quiet the souls of most than would the right solution itself. Therefore it is greatly expedient in disputing — as also in preaching — to use sometimes evident and gross examples, so that he whom the subtlety of reason does not move may at least be moved by the gross and palpable congruity of the example. For not without cause did the Authors place the example among the species of argument; wherefore Aristotle in On the World 9, and Boethius where above, by examples taken from men and their cognition, show that God knows all things future, present, and past.

CHAPTER XV

Recites the fourth opinion of the Sophists, who say that nothing is future.

The fourth opinion contends that nothing is future. And this is the opinion of the Sophists, around which they sophistically wrangle, saying: The future is not a being, therefore it is a non-being, and nothing; therefore nothing is future. Again thus: Let Antichrist be posited as future; then Antichrist is future; therefore by conversion the future is Antichrist — therefore either the future, which is Antichrist, or which is not Antichrist. If Antichrist, then Antichrist is Antichrist; therefore Antichrist is man, and animal, and being, and existing. If not Antichrist, then contradictories are verified of one another, and of the same — which the first principle does not permit.

This same is again refuted thus: If anything be predicated of Antichrist, most of all the same will be predicated of itself, because according to the ancient rule of Boethius, no proposition is truer than that in which the same is predicated of itself. Again, then "Antichrist will be" is true in the divided sense; that "true" either is Antichrist or something else: not Antichrist, because he is not; therefore there is no "true," nor is that "true" something else. For whatever may be granted besides God, when that is destroyed "Antichrist will be" would still be true, or could be — as it was before any creature whatsoever; and then by the same reasoning "God will be" and "God is"

would be something else than God; therefore God exists and shall exist through something other than Himself; therefore, that being destroyed, He would not be. But if it be said that that "true" is God, then God is "Antichrist will be a sinner, and will do all evils." Again, that which is "Antichrist will be" will be "Antichrist exists"; therefore God will be "Antichrist exists"; therefore now He is "any being whatever exists." Again, God is "Antichrist will be"; and "an eclipse will be" is God by the same reasoning; therefore "an eclipse will be" is "Antichrist will be."

Moreover, they themselves say, if anything were future, something could desire and work for the sake of it; which does not appear, since every operation is for some end, and for the sake of the good, as is plain from Ethics I.1 and Metaphysics II.8 and 9; but no such future is; therefore there is no end nor good. This reason is confirmed, since every appetible or willable appears as good, as the second chapter of Book II shows; but the future does not appear as a being, nor as good.

Further they urge thus: Then there could be hope and confidence concerning such a future good; therefore such a one would knowingly trust in nothing, and would incur the prophetic rebuke of Isaiah 59, by which they are rebuked who trust in nothing and speak vanities. But this ineptitude attempts to destroy all knowledge and to subvert all faith. For Grammar and Rhetoric posit three times — present, past, and future — and Dialectic likewise, as appears from book I of Peri Hermeneias; natural and moral science also posit natural and voluntary actions to be done for the sake of an end not yet had but to be had; Medicine, moreover, and Astrology judge concerning future things; every faith also posits hope, foreknowledge, and prophecy, very often concerning future things.

These men also have to say consequently that they themselves cannot imagine or understand any future, nor any non-existent thing, since then it would be imagined or understood, and by conversion conversely; wherefore it would be itself and would exist; they are therefore quite uncouth. Wherefore they have further to concede consequently that they themselves do not act for the sake of felicity, or any other future end whatsoever; wherefore they will always remain unhappy and miserable — which is also repugnant to their profession, which appearance they finally desire. They have also by the same reason to concede that nothing is past, and that they can understand no past thing, nor remember anything. Who then would argue against such men, since they are able to recollect no argument, and therefore can recite none? Who also would do anything for such ungrateful men, who never remember any benefit? But the irrational reasonings of theirs aforesaid have not even the appearance [of reason].

CHAPTER XVI

Refutes the fifth opinion of the Megarics, who deny all power with respect to future things.

There is also a fifth opinion, which not only denies that anything is future, but denies all power with respect to anything future. For it says that no active thing can do anything except while it is actually doing it. And this is the opinion of certain men who, as is recited in Metaphysics IX.5, are called Megarics, and (as Averroes says there) this saying — that is, this opinion — is held by certain loquentes. Albert there gives three of their reasons.

The first is: A cause is called active with respect to its effect, and cause and caused are simultaneous; therefore the cause is not active before it actually acts. The second is: If any mover can move, and is in potency to moving before it moves, and nothing comes from potency to act except through a motion and a mover different from itself, that thing needs another prior mover in order that it may move, and by the same reasoning that other still needs one other prior mover, and so on to infinity, which is impossible. The third is: No nature is destitute of its proper operation; wherefore form or active power always has actual operation; therefore it never precedes it, nor can precede it.

But these reasons Albert solves, as also they are sufficiently soluble by anyone. This opinion Aristotle and Averroes also there sufficiently rebuke and refute.

CHAPTER XVII

Corrects the sixth opinion of certain men who think that something is future to either alternative, or not future, in the composite sense, not in the divided.

The sixth opinion feigns that something is future to either alternative, or not future, in the composite sense, but not in the divided sense; which they endeavor to establish thus. No simple proposition concerning the future in contingent matter is equally true or false, the Philosopher attesting in the last chapter of book I of Peri Hermeneias; wherefore neither is anything future to either alternative, or not future, dividedly.

This opinion, however, I heard in the Roman Curia from a certain famous Toulousan philosopher in a certain solemn disputation concerning the contingency of future things, who responded according to it totally and publicly; which I likewise heard at Oxford. But this is easily refuted: For according to it nothing is contingently future to either alternative, but all things which shall come to pass shall come to pass by an utterly absolute necessity, which the twelfth chapter of this book condemns.

Again, he who so opines is ensnared in the noose of his own opinion: for he says that nothing is contingently future or not future in the divided sense; therefore nothing is contingently future; therefore Antichrist is not contingently future, which is repugnant to the opinion. It also follows that "Antichrist is not future" is true and its opposite is false — which manifests the unreasonableness of the position.

Again, to you who so opine I propose: "Antichrist will be." If you concede or deny [it], you have to concede consequently the opposite of your position and reasoning likewise; nor can you doubt it, because you well know that it is neither true nor false; nor can you distinguish it on account of the simplicity and most great univocation of the terms and of the whole complex. But if you say that you do not understand it, nor can understand it, you are refuted as the fourth opinion was refuted — unless perhaps it seem to you vain and foolish to argue at all with one who cannot understand the arguer, nor even yourself the respondent; wherefore it does not seem worthier to argue with you than with a foolish, dead man, a beast, or a log.

But if at the start you have denied to me this — "Antichrist will be" — and likewise this — "Antichrist will not be," or "non-Antichrist will be" — still the opposite of the position returns; nay, it follows: "Non-Antichrist will be, therefore Antichrist will be," as no one is ignorant who has crossed the threshold of Logic. Wherefore again the opposite of the position follows. Furthermore, if you have denied both of these, you will concede that a middle is found between contradictories, which all Sophists, Logicians, Philosophers, and Theologians detest; which the Philosopher also in Metaphysics IV.27 reprove and condemns in many ways; who also in chapter 29, the last, says: "It is necessary that one or the other part of a contradiction be true"; where also immediately he subjoins: "Furthermore, if it is necessary either to assert or deny everything, it is impossible that both be false."

Again: "Antichrist will be or will not be"; therefore "Antichrist will be, or Antichrist will not be"; therefore that disjunction is true, therefore so is one of the parts. Again, then neither God, nor angel, nor prophet would know dividedly that Antichrist, nor any of the possibles, is contingently future or not future, but only conjunctively that it is future or not future — as also any layman knows; wherefore all foreknowledge would be utterly taken away, and so this opinion coincides with the second, destroyed in chapter 13 of this book.

This opinion Boethius also expressly refutes in Consolation of Philosophy V, prose 3, where he also compares it to the ridiculous oracle of Tiresias, saying, "Whatsoever I shall have said, will either be or will not be"; concerning which Tiresias Ovid in book III of his Mythologies tells more fully.

Again, this free and contingently produced act now is, and was not always; therefore at some time it was future; therefore then it was true that it was future. Again, if anyone yesterday had said that I should speak today, he would have said true, as the issue of the matter proves; for today I am speaking. For he would have said that it was wholly going to be so, as it really now happens; therefore he would have said true; and if he had said the opposite, he would have said false, since it would not so really come to pass — according to that proposition common in Categories: "Through the thing's being or not being, the discourse is called true or false"; and Peri Hermeneias I, last chapter: "Likewise true discourses are, just as the things are." And Jeremiah 28: "The prophet who has prophesied peace, when his word shall come to pass, then shall the prophet be known whom the Lord has sent in truth." And Ezekiel 33: "When that shall have come which has been foretold, then shall they know that a prophet has been among them." And Deuteronomy 18: "This shall be a sign to you: that which the prophet has foretold and has not come to pass, this the Lord has not spoken, but the prophet has feigned through the swelling of his own mind."

Again, then no one ought to believe or hope for any such future thing: for it seems foolish and frivolous for anyone to believe or hope for anything future which he well knows, or firmly opines, is not true that it is future; wherefore no one ought to believe or hope that he or any of men shall die, shall rise again, or shall obtain everlasting life.

Again, this opinion takes away all motion and free, meritorious successive action. For according to it in such contingent matters nothing is future; therefore there is no terminus to which the motion [tends], nor any "having been changed" [mutatum esse]; wherefore no such motion is, nor even can be — which subverts all moral science, nay, all natural science, and all science needing motion or time, just as the opinion of the Sophists [does], or [it subverts] divine omnipotence or liberty, or these will be subverted by it. For all motion is subject to the free will of omnipotent God, as chapter 9 of book I and chapter 30 of book II show; therefore in motion and time there is something freely and contingently future with respect to the divine will, which is repugnant to the opinion. Or if no such thing be freely and contingently future with respect to the divine will, then either it [the divine will] in no way disposes freely, by liberty of contradiction, concerning future things, or, if it so disposes, it can dispose otherwise, but has not the power of executing.

Furthermore, according to this view, no proposition concerning the future would be true, or could be, except a necessary proposition, which Logic, Philosophy, Theology, and every true science reckon false. Wherefore Robert, Archbishop of Canterbury, condemned at Oxford the article asserting that every true proposition concerning the future is necessary.

But what is alleged from the Philosopher — namely, that no proposition concerning a contingent future is true or false — is true, according to those commonly expounding, determinately and of necessity, just as it is in propositions of other times.

CHAPTER XVIII

Rectifies the seventh opinion, which says that something can begin to be future.

The seventh opinion confesses that something can begin to be future, intending by this to avoid the difficulty already touched upon. This opinion, however, I heard from a certain famous Doctor, who also said that it had been common in a certain most solemn University at which he had studied. But this opinion is mistaken in two respects: first, because it is grounded in falsehood; secondly, because it is not helped by it.

For if anything can begin to be future, let A begin in the future instant B to be future; therefore A will begin in B to be future; therefore A in B, or immediately after B, will be future; therefore A will be after B; therefore A will be; therefore A is future — the opposite of which was posited.

But if it be said that this proposition concerning the future, "A will begin in B to be future," is not true, nor ever will be, because neither before B, nor after B, nor in B; but this proposition concerning the present, "A begins to be future," will be true in B — it shall be contradicted in this manner: If this proposition, "A begins to be future," will be true in B, then it is future-true in B; therefore the future is in B really as it signifies, or shall signify in B; therefore the future is in B "A begins to be future"; therefore in B A will begin to be future.

Again, let B be present; then this is true concerning the present: "A begins to be future"; and this likewise: "this beginning is" — either then this beginning was future or not. If it was future, then before B it was true that this beginning was future, and that this beginning will be; therefore then it was also true that A will begin in B to be future. If it was not future, then something is present which was never future, which is contrary to reason, and reproved in the preceding chapter. For if this present beginning was never future, it was never foreknown by God; and if anyone yesterday had said that this beginning will be, he would have said false; but if anyone had said that this beginning will never be, he would have said true — although nevertheless not as the second, but as the first foretold, it really now happens. Nay, it follows that both contradictories were simultaneously true. For by the hypothesis, this was always true: "this beginning will not be," because it was never future; and this was true: "this beginning will be," because if anyone had said it, he would have said true, as the issue of the matter proves and the foreknowledge of God shows: for otherwise He had no foreknowledge of this, or a false one. And if some one thing be present without prior futuration, why not anything whatsoever? And so the opinion of the Sophists, condemned in chapter 15 of this book, would be reconciled forever.

Moreover, this response destroys its own hypothesis, or shall be destroyed by it. For if this is not true — "A will begin in B to be future" — by the same reasoning no such proposition is true, nor even can be. For if it could, let it be posited as so; the argument returns. If, therefore, no such proposition can be true, nothing can begin to be future in any future instant; wherefore neither ever. Or if anything which is not now future can begin to be future in some future instant, let it be posited in being, and the difficulty returns. For if something not now future shall begin to be future in some future instant, then after some future instant it will be; therefore it will be; therefore it is future; therefore something not future is future.

Again, no possible cause can be assigned why something should begin to be future rather in one instant than in any other; therefore in any whatsoever, or in none. But if some certain disposition of the cause of that future thing be assigned as cause of the aforesaid diversity, that will at once be removed, supposing that the future effect is always contingently future equally until it is brought about — as is the case with the free act of the will, which for a long time can remain in equal disposition, in equal indifference, in equal indetermination through all things between two contrary acts wholly equal, around two objects wholly equal — such as whether to eat or to drink, or, of two equal impossible foods, whether to take this or that — and at last to choose freely either, namely this or that, as the fourth chapter of this book with what follows manifests.

But if it be said that nothing shall begin to be future before it be determined through a certain disposition in its cause which is necessary with respect to it, it will follow that every future thing shall come to pass of necessity, which the twelfth chapter of this book condemns.

Again, if something shall begin to be future for some time — say, for a year — before it is brought about, by the same reasoning something can begin to be future for a less time before it is brought about — say, for a month — and by the same reasoning for a week, and for a day; and so finally by the same reasoning every time can be removed: for the reasoning is the same of the whole and of the part; wherefore it will be possible for something to be present which was never future, which has been reproved above.

Again, if one future thing should begin to be future, then by the same reasoning so would another, and any whatsoever; therefore time is not eternal: for some most distant future instant exists — namely, that which does not yet begin to be future; therefore after it there is no future instant, since it does not begin, nor began, to be future; therefore after it there is no future time; therefore after that instant there will be no instant, nor time.

Again, of whatever future thing, whenever anyone had said that it is or was future, he would have said true, and one saying its opposite would have said false; therefore every future thing was always truly future, as the preceding chapter argued.

Again, if future things were not always future, they were not always foreknown by God, nor eternally predestined by Him — against chapter 6 and 45 of book I; nay, of necessity it will follow that at some time He begins to foreknow and predestine future things; therefore He is mutable, which chapter 5 of book I does not allow; nor in the beginning of the world did He know what He would do at the end or in the middle time, which is unbecoming. Whence Isaiah 46: "Return, O ye transgressors, to the heart, and remember the former age, for I am the Lord, announcing from the beginning the latest, and from the start the things which are not yet done, saying, 'My counsel shall stand, and my whole will shall be done.'" And Psalm 118 [119], at the beginning: "I have known concerning thy testimonies that thou hast founded them in eternity." And Psalm 138 [139]: "Thou hast understood my thoughts from afar." How far? "Behold, O Lord, thou hast known all things, the latest and the most ancient." Wherefore Augustine in On Free Will III.3 says thus: "Today God foreknows what He will do after a year"; and there follows: "He has always foreknown this." And the Philosopher says in Peri Hermeneias I, last chapter, that it makes no difference whether one has affirmed or denied something for the thousandth year rather than for any time whatsoever.

Again, if anything can begin to be future, by the same reasoning some future thing can cease to be future without its being placed in being. For if A now begins to be future, this is on account of some cause or disposition in the cause now placed which was not placed before, or not so placed; therefore if that cause or disposition be removed, A not being placed in being, A ceases to be future without its being placed in being. Let, then, A now be future, and in the future instant B let it cease to be future without its being placed in being; then in B, as also always, this consequence will be good: "A was future, and never was, nor is; therefore A is future"; and the antecedent will be true in B, therefore also the consequent; therefore in B A will be future after B. Again thus to the same point: A is future; therefore A will be, and not before B, nor in B; therefore after B; therefore in B A will be future.

Further to this same point: Let A now be future, and without being placed in being let it cease in the future instant B to be future, and remain not future for some certain time, which let be C. Still after that time God can make A to be present, therefore also future: for He can restore all the causes of A with all their dispositions, on account of which A was future before B; let it be posited, therefore, that He does so; and it will follow that A will begin to be future in some instant after the time C; from which it will further follow that A will be or was future in two intermediate instants or times, and in any intermediate instant or time not future nor present — which is utterly irrational and absurd.

Nor does that [opinion] avoid the difficulty. For after anything has begun to be future and to be foreknown with certainty by God, either it is possible for it not to come to pass, and then God by no means foreknows it with certainty — nay, it seems consequently possible that the foreknowledge of God be deceived, as was argued in chapter 12 of this book; or that thing would come to pass of necessity, and then it will necessarily follow that all things which shall come to pass shall come to pass by an utterly absolute necessity — which the same chapter 12 condemned.

CHAPTER XIX

Castigates the eighth and ninth opinions, which believe that nothing of the inferior world is contained under divine providence, and that nothing voluntary or free is disposed by the providence of God.

There are also many other minor opinions besides these, which — because each and all are fully refuted by what has been shown before — I purposed to pass over in silence; but lest they appear wholly untouched, and that it may appear what kinds of phantasms of errors the fantasies of many bring forth, I will briefly touch upon them; that thus at last among the skilled, who in many of the things shown before could condemn me as superfluous because they are as it were notorious, I may deserve to be excused for cause known.

The first, then, of these opinions and the eighth, with the rest recited, affirms that none of the things of the inferior world are contained under divine providence. The ninth opinion, however, says that no voluntary or free things are disposed by divine providence. And this is the common reasoning of both: that divine providence imposes necessity upon things provided, and, that being removed, all necessity is removed, because (as they say) there is no cause of necessity if not that.

But both of these conjointly are refuted by chapters 27, 28, and 29 of book I; the second dividedly by chapters 30, 31, and 32 of the same. Again, specially against this [second]: Then at least it has to concede that all natural things shall come to pass by an utterly absolute necessity, since it speaks of this alone, as it seems. For it concedes that all natural things are contained under divine providence; therefore whatever God provides or does in this inferior world, He does this by an utterly absolute necessity; therefore any man — even a male and female slave — is more free in all his providings and doings than is the Lord his God in His own — which the first supposition of book I forbids.

Again, then God necessarily and not freely provides and does whatsoever is provided and immediately done by Him; He is therefore less free and more servile than every slave — by which the prior opinion is also confuted. Wherefore Stephen, Bishop of Paris, condemned a certain article asserting that God necessarily does whatever is immediately done by Him: "An error," he says, "whether it be understood concerning the necessity of coercion, because it takes away liberty, or concerning the necessity of immutability, because it posits an impossibility of doing otherwise." And the same condemned another article in this form: "That some things can casually come to pass with respect to the first cause, and that it is false that all things are foreordained by the first cause, because then they would come to pass of necessity"; and again another in these words: "That human acts are not ruled by divine providence."

This same insensate view also long before had been judged as it were heretical, in Job 22: "Dost thou think," he says, "that God is higher than heaven, and is lifted up above the height of the stars, and dost thou say, 'God knoweth not, and as it were through a mist He judgeth. The clouds are His hiding-place, He doth not consider our things, and He walketh through the hinges of heaven'?" And Ezekiel 9: "They have said, the Lord hath forsaken the earth."

CHAPTER XX

Corrects the tenth opinion, that God has no volition with respect to any effect of the inferior world; and the eleventh, that He wills no voluntary or free effect.

The tenth says that none of the inferior world is willed by God; and the eleventh asserts that no voluntary or free things are willed by Him. And this is the common reasoning of both: that the divine will is necessary, and the cause of necessity in the things willed, nor is there any other necessary cause, nor [any other] imposing necessity on things caused; wherefore, that being taken away, there will be no necessity, but liberty.

But these two are easily refuted. For if these things are not willed by God, they are not provided by Him, as is plain through chapter 27 of book I; but this was just now refuted. The second of these is also specially reproved by chapters 8, 9, 22, and 45 of book I, and chapter 20 of book II, and may be refuted by the same reasonings by which the ninth opinion is refuted.

CHAPTER XXI

Refutes the twelfth opinion, which thinks that no inferior things are made by God; and the thirteenth, which esteems that no voluntary or free things are made immediately and properly by Him.

There still remain two others similar to these aforesaid. For the twelfth says that no inferior things are made by God; the thirteenth, however, feigns that no voluntary or free things are made properly at least and immediately by Him; and this through similar reasoning, because thus and not otherwise all things would necessarily come to pass.

But these can be refuted conjointly by those things by which the prior similar opinions are refuted, with chapter 10 of book I joined in; which conjointly chapter 3 of book I condemns. The second of these, however, is specially condemned through chapter 22 of book II; all its cavilling subterfuges also are obstructed through chapter 21 of the same and what follows.

CHAPTER XXII

Castigates the fourteenth opinion, that God does not will anything freely future absolutely, but only conditionally; and the fifteenth, that no evils, but only goods, are absolutely provided, willed, or done by God.

The fourteenth posits that God does not will future free things absolutely, but only conditionally — namely, if the active free [agents] themselves should will them. The fifteenth asserts that no evils, but only goods, are absolutely, immediately, and properly provided by God, willed, and done.

But these two both err in two respects: first, because they suppose what is false; secondly, because they do not escape the difficulty of the problem. The first supposes what is false, as the corollary of chapter 30 in book II shows. Nor does it escape the difficulty, because, after God by absolutely willing has made any free thing present or past, it is necessary that God in the present and always in the future will this, as is plain through chapter 23 of book I — and not more necessary then than before, as can be shown through the same chapter 23, and because otherwise the thing willed, present or past, would necessitate the divine will, and would deprive it of its pristine liberty; therefore concerning whatever future thing God now wills, and always willed necessarily that it shall be; therefore also through chapter 10 [of book I] all future things shall come to pass of necessity.

The second likewise supposes what is false, as those things adduced against the six opinions recited in the recent chapters prove. This [opinion] also chapter 26 of book I represses, showing that nothing is per se evil, but that every evil act, according to that which it is, is good and from

God; which chapter 20 of book II also demonstrates. This same is also refuted by chapters 33 and 34 of book I. Wherefore Stephen, Bishop of Paris, condemned the article affirming that all voluntary motions are reduced into the first mover: "An error," he says, "unless it be understood [as referring] to the first mover simply not caused, and understanding concerning motion according to substance, not according to deformity."

This opinion also speaks thus only that it may avoid this universal: "All things which shall come to pass shall come to pass of necessity" — by means of [saying] that not all, because evils are not provided, willed, nor done by God; yet it concedes that all goods are provided by God, willed, and done. Wherefore consequently it has to concede that all goods which shall come to pass shall come to pass of necessity — which also seems a sufficiently great absurdity, and not much less impugnable, than that more universal one above.

CHAPTER XXIII

Argues against the sixteenth opinion, which posits that God does not will the free act of the creature with an antecedent will, but only with a consequent [will], and that God with the creature co-effects every free act of the creature, but posteriorly in natural order; and the seventeenth, which judges that, although God always in fact does and carries through any act of the creature, it is nevertheless absolutely possible for some creature to act through itself alone.

The sixteenth believes that God does not will the free act of the creature with an antecedent will, but only with a consequent — that is, not prior, but posterior, naturally to the creature — and that thus He does every free act of the creature. The seventeenth, however, feigns that God always in fact acts immediately and properly, and naturally prior, [in] every act of any creature whatsoever, but that it is absolutely possible for some creature to act through itself alone, without God so co-acting.

But the sixteenth errs in two respects: first, because it supposes what is false, as chapter 30 of book II demonstrates; secondly, because, this being granted, the difficulty is not removed. For after God has cooperated in anything with man, it is necessary that He has so cooperated, as also that that thing has been; and since He works nothing externally except by willing, as the corollary of chapter 10 of book I teaches, it is necessary that He has willed this; and since by chapter 23 of book I His will is in every respect immutable, it is necessary that He always in the future will so, and always in the past has willed [so]; and since the divine will is not less free, nor more necessary, in the production of a thing, or after, than before — as chapters 5 and 23 of book I show — and because otherwise the thing willed would deprive the divine will of liberty and would impose necessity upon it as to willing, which yet does not do this in the human will, and so the divine will would be less free and more servile than the human: since, I say, these things are so, God necessarily wills concerning any future thing that it shall be; wherefore by chapter 10 of book I, concerning whatever future thing it is necessary that it shall be.

The seventeenth, however, errs in three respects: first, because it affirms what is false; secondly, because it is repugnant to itself; thirdly, because it does not avoid the difficulty. That it affirms what is false is perspicuously demonstrated from chapters 3 and 4 of book I, and from chapters 20 and 22 of book II. Again, that I may briefly touch some short reasonings against this little opinion: If this were possible, it would be consequently possible for a creature to produce something without God properly co-acting, wherefore also to conserve the produced thing without God properly conserving it — against chapter 2 of book I. And it would moreover be possible that something should now be done, or in the future, which God did not will — against chapter 22 of book I and its corollary; and if this were possible, by the testimony of chapter 18 of book I, it would further be possible that something be present or future which God did not know — against chapter 6 of book I; wherefore also it would be possible that something casually come to pass with respect to God and the divine will — against chapter 29 of book I. Wherefore Stephen, Bishop of Paris, condemned the article asserting that some things can casually come to pass with respect to the first cause.

This [opinion] is also repugnant to itself. For let A, according to it, be a creature able to move and act through itself alone without God; either then A creature is, by that very fact, necessarily virtually infinite, or with this it can be finite. If it be said that it is necessarily infinite, this cannot be, as had been demonstrated in chapter 1 of book I; since also every creature, present or future, is or will be only finite, no such thing can or will be able to do anything through itself; this position therefore in no way helps the opining ones, but is repugnant to them, since they speak only of present or future creatures, just as also the problem is only concerning such. But if it be said that A creature can be finite, let it then be posited that A exceeds any other active creature only in finite proportion, wherefore also action [exceeds] action, as natural science demonstrates: if therefore the power A through itself alone can [produce] B motion or act, and any other active power can now in fact [produce] a proportional motion or act — whence then does the opining one know that it is not so in fact? Why then does he affirm the opposite of this?

Thirdly it errs, because it does not avoid the difficulty of the question. For if it is so, and always shall be in fact, that the divine will in every motion and action precedes, and is efficacious and necessarily causing through chapter 10 of book I, nor in the power of any other through chapter 8 of this book, and altogether immutable in itself through chapter 23 of book I, it seems that in fact all things which come to pass come to pass of necessity in the present, and all things which shall come to pass likewise shall come to pass in the future. How therefore can the difficulty of the problem be avoided through this?

CHAPTER XXIV

Treats the eighteenth opinion, which says that God's willing and pre-willing is in man's power; and the nineteenth, that it is in man's power to do something, whence it follows that God does not will, nor ever willed, that A shall be — which nevertheless He now wills and always willed shall be; and the twentieth, that as soon as the divine will precedes the free act of the human will, just as soon the human will can [tend] toward the opposite of such an act; and the twenty-first, that with God willing to lead a man to act A future in the measure B, the man can dispose himself beforehand so that God then does not will this, wherefore also that he then does not have that act; and the twenty-second, that the divine will is not always necessary in acting, but defectible and frustratable somehow; and the twenty-third, that the divine will is not the efficient cause of any things, but only consenting to the divine intellect dictating, and some other executive power, posterior in God or in second causes, effects the things effected; and the twenty-fourth, that although the divine will co-acts and carries through every act of the created will, it nevertheless does this by influencing so weakly that it by no means necessitates it to action.

There are also four others much similar to one another, of which the first and eighteenth affirms that God's willing and pre-willing is in man's power; the nineteenth esteems that it is in man's power to do something, whence it follows that God does not will, nor ever willed, that A shall be — which He nevertheless now wills and always willed shall be. The twentieth opines that as soon as the divine will precedes the free act of the human will, just as soon the human can [tend] toward the opposite of such an act. The twenty-first thinks that, with God willing to produce in a man act A future in a certain measure of time or instant, a man can so dispose himself beforehand that God then does not will this, and that he then does not have that act.

But all these err in two respects: First, because they affirm what is false; secondly, because they do not avoid the difficulty of the problem. That all affirm what is false, the eighth chapter of this book manifestly shows; and that they do not avoid the difficulty can be shown, just as has been shown against the fourteenth opinion and the sixteenth. For the will of God is necessary with respect to all present and past things; therefore also with respect to all future things; wherefore also all future things are in some manner necessarily future, and by some kind of necessity all things shall come to pass.

There are also three other phantastical vanities. Of these the first and twenty-second judges that the divine will is not always necessary in acting, but defectible and frustratable sometimes. The twenty-third dreams that the divine will is not the efficient cause of any things, but only consenting to the divine intellect dictating, and some other executive power posterior, in God or in second causes, effects the things effected. The twenty-fourth thinks that, although the divine will co-acts and pre-acts every act of the created will, it nevertheless does this by influencing so weakly that it by no means necessitates it to action.

But the first of these, and the third, is plainly refuted through chapter 10 of book I; the second of these, however, errs in matter and in form. In matter, because it supposes what is false, as chapter 10 of book I, chapter 10 of book II, and what follows have taught; it errs in form, because it does not escape the proposed difficulty. For if the divine will consents to and wills any executive power whatsoever to execute anything by doing [it], that [power] will necessarily execute [it] through chapter 10 of book I, and the difficulty returns.

CHAPTER XXV

Touches the twenty-fifth opinion, which feigns that God does not provide, predestine, will, nor make degrees of free acts, of merits, or even of rewards; and the twenty-sixth, that no act is anything; and the twenty-seventh, that no not-acting, ceasing, or resting is from God; and the twenty-eighth, that future foreknown things are the cause of God's foreknowledge; and the twenty-ninth, that future foreknown things are the sine qua non cause of divine foreknowledge; and the thirtieth, that God knows and foreknows things according to their mode; and the thirty-first, of the Academics, that no one can search out or know this hidden miracle of nature, this concealed secret of God; and the thirty-second, that in all future, present, and past things, with respect to the science and will of God, there is always contingency to either alternative, and liberty, and absolutely no necessity.

There still remain three other minor opinions briefly to be retracted. Of these the first and twenty-fifth, with the foregoing, affirms that God does not provide, predestine, will, nor make degrees of free acts, nor of any merits whatsoever, or even of rewards. The twenty-sixth thinks every free act, and universally any act whatever, to be nothing. The twenty-seventh esteems that no not-acting, ceasing, or resting is from God.

But these three err commonly in two things: first, because they affirm what is false; secondly, because they do not avoid the difficulty. That all affirm what is false is sufficiently shown by chapter 46 of book I, chapter 18 of book II with chapter 32 of the same. Nor does the first avoid the difficulty. For it says that God in no way disposes concerning degrees, that thus it may avoid the necessity in them, otherwise (as it believes) necessarily to be conceded. Yet it does not deny that all acts and all things, according to their essence, are contained under the divine disposition; wherefore neither can it escape that all acts and things which shall come to pass shall come to pass of necessity.

Again, a degree is either something or nothing. If something, it is contained under divine disposition; therefore all degrees which shall come to pass shall come to pass of necessity, and all other things by the same reasoning, as was just argued; therefore universally all things [shall come to pass of necessity]. If nothing, it is not contained, nor is it distributed under the name of being; wherefore it does not falsify this universal: "All things which shall come to pass shall come to pass of necessity"; and this universal the opining one has to concede for all beings which are not, or shall be, degrees — wherefore also simply for all beings.

Again, either beings are varied numerically and essentially with the variation of degrees, or not. If so, then so they are contained under divine disposition, and shall necessarily come to pass, as was argued above. If not, and all things according to their essence are contained under divine disposition, and degree innovates nothing essentially or numerically, then still all things which shall come to pass, as to their essences and number, shall come to pass of necessity; wherefore also simply all things which shall come to pass shall come to pass of necessity.

Nor does the twenty-sixth extricate itself from the difficulty of the problem. For it denies that act is something, that it may not be forced to concede it to be provided by God, willed, or done — that thus in free acts it may flee the necessity which otherwise (as it judges) it cannot flee. All present and future beings, therefore, which are not and shall not be acts (as the opinion suggests, and the opining one expressly concedes), are and shall be provided by God, willed, and done; wherefore according to him, they shall come to pass of necessity, and no act is anything; wherefore it is not contained, nor is it distributed under such names as "being" or "something," nor does it falsify this universal: "All things which shall come to pass shall come to pass of necessity." This universal therefore is simply true, because it is for any of its singulars.

Again, God wills every agent or one about to act to do whatsoever he does or shall do, as chapter 22 of book I and its corollary, with chapter 30 of the same and the others following, manifest, and most of all meritorious works, as is plain through chapters 42 and 45 of book I. For these, when they are done, are pleasing and accepted to God — and not newly, but eternally — as chapter 23 of book I shows; wherefore by the reasoning of the position just touched on, it is necessary that everyone about to act do whatever he shall do, and most of all virtuous works.

Again, no second cause can move or act without God properly co-moving and likewise co-acting, as chapters 4 and 22 of book I show, and this by willing, as chapter 9 of book I shows; therefore the difficulty returns.

That the twenty-seventh likewise by no means frees itself from the proposed difficulty can perspicuously be demonstrated, just as against the immediately preceding [opinion].

There remain still two other minor opinions similar [to these]: of which the first and twenty-eighth, with the prior ones, esteems that future foreknown things are the cause of God's foreknowledge; the second, however, and twenty-ninth, thinks that future foreknown things are the sine qua non cause of divine foreknowledge.

But both of these suppose what is false, nor through this do they evade the difficulty. They suppose what is false, by the testimony of chapters 15 and 16 of book I. Nor do they exclude the difficulty: for the divine will and His knowledge, with respect to present and past things, is necessary, just as it is also necessary that these be and have been — and not by a new necessity arising from the presence or pastness of things, or any other cause arising temporally, on account of part 6 and corollary 7 of chapter 1, and chapter 23 of book I. The will of God therefore was, and His knowledge likewise, necessary from eternity with respect to all future things; wherefore through chapter 10 of book I, all future things were eternally in some manner necessarily about to come to pass.

There is also a thirtieth opinion, which affirms that God knows and foreknows things according to their mode — necessary things necessarily, and contingent things contingently. Nor does this opinion avoid the difficulty. For if God knows things according to their mode, either God takes the mode of knowing from the posterior things known, or rather they take the mode of being from God knowing and from His knowledge and from its mode. The first cannot be said, on account of the first supposition, part 3 and corollary 5 of chapter 1, and chapters 15 and 16 of book I. Rather, therefore, it seems on the contrary that every future thing known by God takes the mode of knowing and knowability from God, from the divine will, and from His knowledge, as chapter 14 of book I and what follows persuade. Since also every species, mode, and order is from God, according to what is set down in chapter 26 of book I — and since God does not impose mode upon things except by willing, and His will is universally efficacious and in no way frustratable through chapter 10 of book I — it seems that all things are of necessity in that mode in which God shall have willed them to be present, past, or future, especially since the divine will is not in the power of any inferior cause, nor even of any [causes whatsoever], as chapter 8 of this book shows.

Furthermore, if God knows future contingents contingently, how shall He know them necessarily when they shall be present, or shall pass into the past, since also they shall necessarily then be such? Or if then He shall know them necessarily, how does He not necessarily foreknow them while they are future, since He and His knowledge are altogether immutable through chapters 5 and 23 of book I? Furthermore, concerning the divine will, it is altogether similar, as was touched against the preceding opinions.

There is also a thirty-first opinion which judges that no one can search out or know this hidden miracle of nature, and this concealed secret of God: and this seems to have been the most ancient general view of the Academics, which John of Salisbury in Policraticus II.22 seems to profess in this matter; to which Cicero also (as he says at the close of his life) turned aside. But it is most certain that it is fitting, expedient, and necessary that Philosophers, Theologians, and the professors of any faith whatsoever respond — albeit maturely and soberly — to those inquiring, insulting, and opposing, with something more sufficient, more reasonable, or more probable. Wherefore Logicians, Philosophers, Physiologists, Ethicists, and Divines, Catholic and pagan Theologians, will sweat anxiously around the elucidation of this so anxious axiom. Whence also Ammonius the Armenian, in his Recordations on Aristotle's Peri Hermeneias, on the last [chapter] of book I, treating this matter, writes thus:

This theorem is necessary to all parts of Philosophy. According to moral Philosophy it is altogether necessary to presuppose that "Not all things are and come to pass of necessity, but there are some which are in our power." For since, as masters of certain operations, the existing in us [is] to choose or not to choose certain things, and to do them or not. Some of these acts of choice and operations we call blameworthy, and some praiseworthy. Nay, the theorem also seems opportune for Physiology: for the Physiologist will inquire whether all things which come to pass come to pass of necessity, or some from fortune and from chance; and to the Logical method in the same way. For this is what is now sought: whether every contradiction divides true and false determinately. The theorem laid forth, you will find, is also [opportune] to first Philosophy. For the Theologian also will inquire in what manner those things which are in the world are governed, and whether all things come to pass determinately and of necessity (as in the perpetual things), or there are some contingently coming to pass. And not even men of an idiotic disposition will you find neglecting meditation upon this theorem.

Furthermore, there is also a thirty-second opinion — not yet, so far as I know, opined by anyone, but perhaps to be opined, which (to confess the truth) once tempted me, perhaps probably to arise from the things to be said — which will presume to establish that in all future, present, and past things, with respect to the science and will of God, there is always contingency to either alternative, and liberty, and absolutely no necessity.

But this opinion in no way fully satisfies the difficulty of the problem, and also supposes what is false. It does not fully satisfy: for the difficulty of the problem seems most of all to press many men because in their free acts they would not wish to be subject to any superior and prior necessity, but [to be] simply Lords, and entirely free absolutely with respect to their free acts, and to have them also simply in their free power. But this responding opinion does not bestow this upon them. For although a future free human act could contingently and freely not be future, and conversely, through the power of the divine will, this nevertheless is not simply, sufficiently, and antecedently in human power; since the human will in all its actions and non-actions necessarily follows the preceding divine [will], nor does the divine will consist in the power of the human will, as the foregoing things manifest. Furthermore, all things which are, are done, and come to pass — even in the acts and non-acts of men — are, are done, and come to pass by some necessity itself naturally preceding, as the corollary of chapter 2 of this book shows.

Furthermore, it also supposes what is false. For when it says that in future, present, and past things, with respect to the science and will of God, there is absolutely no necessity, either it understands that, with the science and will of God standing with respect to some future, present, or past thing, that thing can not be such — that is, that these stand together without repugnance: "God knows and wills this to be future, to be, or to have been," and "this will not be, is not, or was not"; or it understands that the science and will of God, which are causes of future, present, and past things, is always in itself free and contingent to being for then and to non-being, never in any way necessary to being for then, for any measure whatever — and so consequently these things caused, by reason of these causes.

The first cannot be said: for it stands that it is simply impossible and includes a contradiction — "God knows the false," and "the will of God is frustrated" — through chapter 10 of book I.

Nor can the second be said truly, since according to all Philosophers and Theologians, a thing now presentially existing must by some kind of necessity now exist, and a past thing must have pre-existed, as was somehow touched in chapter 2 of this book. For what theologian would presume to affirm that it is in no way necessary that the world has been created, that Christ has been incarnate of the virgin, born and suffered, has redeemed man, has risen, has ascended, has sat and sits at the right hand of the Father — especially since even concerning future things, by His own testimony, it has been and is necessary that all things be fulfilled which are written in the law of Moses, the prophets, and the psalms concerning Him? And since through chapters 2 and 14 of book I no posterior thing has being or has had being except through the divine volition: this [volition] is in some manner necessary with respect to present and past things. For necessarily it follows: "this now is or was, therefore God now wills it to be or to have been"; and the antecedent is in some manner necessary, wherefore also the consequent. For in every formally simple consequence, and absolutely necessary, if the antecedent is necessary simply or by some certain mode, the consequent will also be confirmed by similar necessity; otherwise from a true the false might sometimes follow. Just as therefore present and past things are in some manner necessarily such, so also is the will, by the divine volition, with respect to them — nay, more necessary than they are: for it is the cause of necessity in them.

Furthermore, this assertion seems contrary to the view of the Philosopher in the last chapter of book I of Peri Hermeneias, who shows that contingency to either alternative is found only in future things, but not in present nor past, but contrary necessity. It will perhaps be said that this is true with respect to inferior causes, but not with respect to a superior or supreme cause. But without doubt, looking more subtly, the opposite manifestly appears: namely, that just as there is contingency to either alternative in future things with respect to inferior causes, so also is there in present and past. For no inferior cause happens to do or not to do anything in the future except with God first willing or not willing it, as chapters 30 and 32 of book II show; and in similar fashion any inferior active cause happens to do or not to do anything in the present, and to have done or not to have done in the past, whatsoever it is possible for it to do or not to do. For if God should will any active cause to do or not to do anything in the present, to have done or not to have done in the past, of necessity it is so through chapter 10 of book I, and God can contingently so will and not will, with a possibility and contingency excluding all necessity, as the opinion asseverates. As therefore it is contingent to either alternative for you to read or not to read tomorrow, so also to have read or not to have read yesterday: for it is contingent to either alternative for God so to will or not to will. And just as it is contingent to either alternative for someone to build or not, to generate or not, for the future, so to have built or not, to have generated or not, for the past: for it is contingent to either alternative for God so to will or not to will. It is contingent therefore to either alternative for Solomon to be a virgin in the present and never to have begotten a son, nor to have made the temple; for John the Evangelist also not to be a virgin in the present, but to have begotten sons, and to have made Solomon's temple — with infinite other similar things.

Wherefore it has consequently to say that determinate truth is not more found in propositions concerning the present or past than in propositions concerning the future in matter equally contingent, but similarly here and there — against the Philosopher where above, and against many philosophical treatises.

Furthermore, this opinion takes from the blessed the most blessed portion of all blessedness — namely, the certitude of being thus eternally — Augustine saying in On the Trinity XIII.7, where he treats of the things of blessedness: "And what is altogether most blessed, it shall be certain that it shall always be so." Nay, according to this view neither are the blessed certain of their past blessedness, nor of the present; nor would any of men have certitude, certain knowledge — wherefore not knowledge of anything; because not of anything future, present, or past — and the opinion of the Academics, once condemned by Philosophers and Theologians, would return; nor would anyone be, or be able to be, certain that he is or has been, that he does anything or has done — against Aristotle, Augustine, nay also against all Philosophers, Theologians, and the common people not infected by the heresy of the Academics. Wherefore neither could anyone safely testify concerning anything past, nor swear, against all the laws of the world, divine and human alike.

For God could most contingently make concerning any future, past, or present thing this side of Himself, that it never shall be, has been, or is. According to this view, also, it would be expedient to pray to God for evils of guilt and of past punishment, that He may make those never to have been; nay, it would seem to be only as expedient to pray for past evils that they may not have been, as for possible or future evils, lest unless God succor, they may not be done. But who so prays? What Church? What person? Why our heavenly Father? Why our mother the Church? Why the Spirit of truth, who taught all truth — [who] has nowhere taught the children so to pray?

Furthermore, the rational creature, angelic and human, which is wholly mutable according to nature in essence and in acts, when it has any act, even most mutable, and most free according to contradiction, it is necessary for it that it then has that act, and that act of his has then a certain necessity of being — namely, consequent necessity; wherefore also much more, as it seems, any act of God [has such necessity], since He Himself is supremely necessary being, immutable, stable, and firm, as the first supposition manifests.

CHAPTER XXVI

Treats the thirty-third opinion, more famous than the rest, which affirms that something always was future, and is still future; nevertheless it is in no way necessary that it ever was, or now is, future. And [it affirms] that something never was future, nor now is future, and that it is possible — with a possibility opposed to all necessity — that it always was, and now is, future; and likewise correspondingly with respect to the foreknowledge of God. Yet concerning every past or present thing, it says that it is necessary that it has been or is, and that it is necessary that God always foreknew that it was about to be, or knows that it is now present, and likewise that it is necessary that God knows that it is past and has been; and [Bradwardine] reprove it for the insufficiency of its response, in that it does not sufficiently empty out the difficulty.

Besides these, however, there is a thirty-third opinion, which affirms that something always was future, and is still future — yet it is in no way necessary that it ever was, or now is, future; and that something never was future, nor now is future, and it is possible (with a possibility opposed to all necessity) that it always was, and now is, future; and concerning the foreknowledge of God correspondingly in every respect. Yet of every past or present thing, it says that it is necessary that it has been or is, and that it is necessary that God always foreknew that it was about to be, or knows that it is now present — and that it is also necessary that God knows it to be past and to have been.

And this is the more common and famous opinion among the more recent Philosophers and Theologians, and especially among our Englishmen, and is, as it were, alone unanimously approved by them. Of these, before all things, with the knees of my heart bent, I humbly implore the kindly patience of charity (which seeks not its own to the prejudice of truth, nor is irritated if anyone has zealously labored to elucidate truth, but rejoices together at truth elucidated by anyone, believing all true things and bearing all things) — that, if not I, but in me and through me the Spirit of truth deigns to bring forth some truth perhaps repugnant to this opinion, they may by no means be jealous, by no means irritated, by no means indignant, lest perhaps they be convicted of resisting not me, but rather the Holy Spirit. For whatever true thing is said by anyone, is said by the Holy Spirit, as chapter 22 of book II recited from the blessed Ambrose; but [I implore them], as true sons of charity, to rejoice together at, believe, and bear truth.

For there is no slight peril in the knowledge of truth to be unwilling to abandon a former — though recognized — falsity, with pride alone forbidding. Whence the Apostle, 2 Thessalonians 2: "They have not received the love of truth that they might be saved; and therefore God shall send them a working of error, that they should believe a lie, that all may be judged who have not believed the truth, but have consented to iniquity." But let us not so [act], but rather, according to the wholesome counsel of the same Apostle, putting off, according to our former conversation, the old man, who is corrupted according to the desires of error, let us be renewed in the spirit of our mind, and let us put on the new man, who, according to God, is created in the justice and holiness of truth — wherefore, putting away lying, let us speak truth in all things, singing with the Prophet: "Open the gates, and let the just nation enter, that keepeth the truth: the old error has departed and receded."

Yet I believe that I shall in truth assert nothing wholly new, which the reasoning and authority of the ancients shall not confirm. May it therefore please the reasonable charity of this opinion not to refuse to hear, but to hear kindly some reasons.

First, then, it appears that the response of this opinion by no means suffices; secondly, that its hypothesis does not stand. For granting the hypothesis of the opinion, the difficulty is not sufficiently solved. The difficulty of the question most of all bites and goads all because in their free acts they would not wish to be subject to any superior and prior necessity, but [to be] simply lords, and entirely free absolutely with respect to their free acts, and to have them simply in their free power. But this response does not avoid all manner of necessity, nor does it save all manner of liberty.

For although that which is future could not be future, and conversely, and that which is foreknown by God could be not foreknown, and conversely; this nevertheless is not antecedently and sufficiently in our power, nor in [the power] of all inferior causes, as chapters 7, 8, and 9 of this book show. For the superior cause — namely, God — does not in the manner of the question follow, by knowing or willing, any or all the inferior causes, as chapters 15 and 21 of book I, with what follows, and chapter 30 of book II show; but on the contrary, all and each of these in all their motions and cessations universally necessarily follow His will, as chapters 30 and 32 of book II, and chapter 2 of book III, with chapter 10 of book I teach.

Therefore, since by the corollary of chapter 9 of book I all future things shall come to pass from the divine will (which is the first and supreme cause through chapter 30 of book II), and is in no way frustratable, but efficacious in every respect through chapter 10 of book I, nor antecedently or sufficiently in our power, nor in [the power] of any or all inferior causes, through chapters 8 and 9 of this book — no future thing is simply, namely sufficiently and antecedently, placed in our power, nor do we have, with respect to any future thing, all manner of liberty simply; but in all things we are necessarily subjected, and we serve a naturally preceding necessity — namely, the divine will — as chapters 5 and 6 of this book with what follows teach.

CHAPTER XXVII

Responds, according to the view of the Philosophers and Theologians, that all future things shall come to pass by a certain necessity with respect to superior causes, not contrary to, but consonant with liberty.

That, however, before I withdraw, I may set forth my own view on this — nay, not my own, but the common view of our Fathers — supposing the distinction concerning antecedent and consequent necessity laid down in chapter 2 of this book, I say that antecedent necessity is twofold: one utterly absolute, and the other in some manner respective; and this latter is twofold, namely with respect to some or all inferior or second causes, or only with respect to superior and first causes — namely, the supreme and first cause of all, who is God.

This manner of speaking concerning superior and inferior causes can be had from Augustine in On Genesis to the Letter VI.22, where he says that Hezekiah, according to inferior causes, had ended his life at the term predicted by Isaiah, but according to other causes — namely, superior, which (as he says) are in the will and foreknowledge of God — was then to end his life when he ended it. The Lombard, however, in Sentences II, dist. 17, speaking of superior and inferior causes, says that the superior causes are the will and power of God. The Glossa on Isaiah 38, where the prediction of Hezekiah's death and the addition of years to his life is treated, suggests the same distinction, though under different words, saying that God considers some things in two ways: namely, according to the merits and nature of the thing, which are called inferior causes, and according to His own counsel. Therefore the counsel of God, according to it, is the superior cause, or [the term] embracing the superior causes; the inferior causes are merit and nature.

The same manner of speaking, also, as to the other part of it — namely, concerning first and second causes, or the first cause — is sufficiently known from Philosophy, where God is most frequently called the first cause; therefore in comparison to the posterior and second [causes], which is also sufficiently expressed in the first proposition of the Liber de Causis.

According to this distinction, therefore, it seems to me to be said that not all things which shall come to pass shall come to pass by an utterly absolute necessity, as chapter 12 of this book proves, nor even by a respective [necessity] — namely, with respect to any or all inferior or second causes, as chapters 5, 8, and 9 of this book show; but all things which shall come to pass shall come to pass by a respective necessity — namely, with respect to superior or first causes, which are the will and power of the supreme God.

It is not to be understood, however, that all or any of the inferior causes — say, rational ones — could, of themselves, act freely [in respect of] this or that, and that the superior cause, God Himself, acts purely necessarily ad extra, and so necessitates them to acting; for it would include a contradiction that any inferior cause should do anything without the first specially and properly co-acting, nay, also naturally pre-acting, as chapters 20, 28, and 30 of book II prove. Likewise, the act of the divine will ad extra is subject to no preceding necessity, but is alone simply contingent to either alternative, and free simply by liberty of contradiction, as chapter 5 of this book teaches.

But it is to be understood in this way: that all things which shall come to pass shall come to pass of the necessity of superior causes — that is, all things which shall come to pass shall come to pass causally from the power and will of God, [these being] superior and prior naturally in causing to any others whatsoever, nor is it simply and antecedently in the power of any one or any several inferior causes that all those things should not come to pass. Or more briefly, in this way: All things which shall come to pass shall come to pass of the necessity of the first cause — namely, the necessity of agency or activity or efficacy in acting; that is, all those things shall come to pass from the divine will, which with respect to all things willed is not impedible, nor avertible by anyone, because in no other's power, and therefore necessary and inevitable in causing — nay, the very antecedent necessity itself.

For all this the next chapter manifests, nor does it irk to recite its manifestation briefly: For the will of God is the cause superior and prior naturally; wherefore whatever future thing shall come to pass, [it shall come to pass] through chapter 14 and the corollary of chapter 9 of book I, with chapter 30 of book II, and [the will of God is] not frustratable, but necessary in causing, through chapter 10 of book I; nor simply in the power of an inferior or several inferior causes, through chapter 8 of this book. For how is God's pre-willing of any future thing whatsoever placed antecedently, sufficiently, and simply in the power of any other? Nay, through chapter 9 of this book, nothing at all is in our simply free power. Further, if it were placed in our power that some future thing should not come to pass, this would be by resisting the divine will, or by impeding or changing it, or by causing it not so to pre-will — which is contrary to the chapters just cited; for the cause naturally and prior superior does not follow in causing the inferior and posterior cause, just as neither does the artificer [follow] the instrument.

Every inferior thing also in its action and passion whatsoever is necessitated in some manner antecedently, naturally, by the divine will: for it is the necessity naturally antecedent to all things, as chapter 2 of this book with its corollary manifests. Just, therefore, as all things which are, are done, and come to pass in the present, are, are done, and come to pass of a certain necessity naturally preceding all these in the divine will, so also those things which shall be, shall be done, and shall come to pass in the future.

All these things can be briefly reduced into one syllogistic argument thus: All things which shall come to pass by a naturally preceding necessity, shall come to pass by some necessity. All things which shall come to pass shall come to pass by a naturally preceding necessity, because [they shall come to pass] from the divine will, which is to all the things willed by it a naturally antecedent necessity; therefore all things which shall come to pass shall come to pass by some necessity. Or more briefly, in this way: All things which shall come to pass by this necessity, shall come to pass by some necessity (the divine will having been pointed out); All things which shall come to pass shall come to pass by this necessity; therefore all things which shall come to pass shall come to pass by some necessity.

But because excessive brevity is the mother of obscurity and doubt, behold a syllogism a little more diffuse and clear to the same point: All things which shall come to pass from a cause such that, with it being posited, it necessarily follows that they shall come to pass, and the positing of which is not nor will be antecedently in another's power according to contradiction, shall come to pass of necessity with respect to that cause, in such wise that it neither is nor will be antecedently in another's power according to contradiction that they shall not come to pass; All things which shall come to pass, shall come to pass from a cause of this kind. And still more expressly thus: All things which shall come to pass from the divine will in this manner, that — it being posited — it necessarily follows that they shall come to pass, and that it should be posited is neither nor shall be antecedently in another's free power according to contradiction, shall come to pass of necessity with respect to the divine will, in such wise that it neither is nor will be antecedently in another's free power according to contradiction that they shall not come to pass; All things which shall come to pass shall come to pass from the divine will in this aforesaid way.

The major can be shown through the definition of the necessity naturally preceding, and of its effect, premised in chapter 2 of this book — assuming this also as notorious: that the future effect of a cause which is necessary in causing, and the antecedent necessity to the meaning of the foregoing definition, cannot otherwise be antecedently in another's free power according to contradiction except as to the positing or not-positing of the cause — just as the future illumination of this transparent thing by this lamp is in my free power, because I can freely remove or not remove, extinguish or not extinguish, this lamp. For otherwise — namely, that, with such a cause standing, it should be in another's power according to contradiction whether the effect should come to pass or not — manifestly implies contradictories. For it implies that some cause is a necessity naturally antecedent to the meaning of the definition laid down in chapter 2 of this book, and that the same, to the same meaning, is not a necessity naturally antecedent. For if, with such a cause standing, it is in another's contradictory power that its effect by no means come to pass, then from it fully posited it does not necessarily, nor indefectibly, follow that its caused thing be caused; therefore by the foregoing definition that cause is not a necessity naturally antecedent — which nevertheless by the hypothesis is posited as a necessity naturally antecedent. The minor is demonstrated by the corollary of chapter 9 of book I, with chapter 10, and chapter 8 of this book.

Furthermore, according to what is laid down in chapters 15 and 23 of book II, the divine will necessitates in some manner — by a certain spontaneous necessity — angels, blessed men, and those finally confirmed, to the eternal preservation of their beatific act, to never sinning, and to all other things which pertain to beatitude; which [necessity] is also so efficacious and firm with respect to all other things, as the foregoing has taught, because it is of infinite power simply in every respect.

But lest in so great a matter so small a one as I should seem to know any less soberly, to act perversely, or to affirm rashly, behold the great and fitting testimonies of my elders to this very point.

The Wise One indeed says, Ecclesiasticus 42: "The Lord has known all knowledge, and has looked upon the sign of the age, announcing the things that have passed and those that shall come, revealing the traces of hidden things: no thought escapes Him, and no word hides itself from Him; He has adorned the great works of His wisdom, which is before the world and even unto the world, neither is anything added, nor shall it be diminished, and He has need of no man's counsel. How desirable are all His works, and as it were a spark which is to be considered! All these things live, and remain forever, and in every necessity all things obey Him."

Whence Augustine in On Genesis to the Letter VI.21, speaking of the making of the first man from clay in the age of manhood, thus says: "It is manifest that man was not so made, contrary to which there was in that first condition — namely, of inferior causes — because there was also the possibility of being made thus, although there was not the necessity of being made thus. For this was not in the condition of the creature, but in the good pleasure of the Creator, whose will is the necessity of things." And in chapter 22: "It is in the nature of this youth that he should grow old, but whether this be also in the will of God we do not know; nor would it be in his nature unless it had first been in the will of God: and certainly the cause of senescence in the youthful body is hidden. For it is not perceived by the eyes, but is gathered by some other knowledge; this cause, therefore, by which it comes about that this can be, is hidden — to the eyes, but not to the mind. Whether, however, this is also necessary in every way we do not know, and that by which it comes about that it can be, we know in the nature of the body itself; that, however, by which it comes about that it must be, manifestly is not there; but perhaps it is in the world that he must grow old: but if it is not in the world, it is in God; for what He Himself wills is necessarily future, and those things are truly future which He has foreknown. For many things are future according to inferior causes, but if they are thus in the foreknowledge of God, they are truly future; if, however, they are otherwise there, they are rather thus future, as they are there where He who foreknows cannot be deceived. For youth is said to be future in old age; but yet it is not future, if he is to die before: but this shall be thus as the other causes hold themselves, whether woven into the world, or reserved in the foreknowledge of God. For according to certain causes of future things, Hezekiah was about to die, to whom God added fifteen years of life — doing in fact that which before the constitution of the world He foreknew Himself to be about to do, and was preserving in His will. Nor would those [years] be rightly said to have been added, unless they were added to something which had held itself otherwise in other causes. According, then, to certain inferior causes he had now ended his life; according, however, to those which are in the will and foreknowledge of God, who from eternity knew what He was to do at that time, and this was truly future — then was he to end his life when he ended it: for even though, on his praying, it was granted to him that he should also so pray that by such a prayer it should be granted to him, He certainly foreknew, whose foreknowledge could not be deceived; and therefore what He foreknew was necessarily future."

The Lombard also in Sentences II, dist. 18, alleges Augustine saying that, that woman should be made from the rib of the man was necessary — not founded in things, but hidden in God; and it can be elicited by sense from On Genesis to the Letter IX.28. Likewise Ambrose, on that text of Romans 9, "that the purpose of God according to election might stand," etc. "In him," he says, "whom He has elected, the purpose of God remains, because nothing else can come to pass than what He has known and proposed concerning him, that he be worthy of salvation; and in him whom He spurns, in like manner the purpose remains which He proposed concerning him, that he shall be unworthy." The same on that text of 1 Cor. 7, "For what knowest thou, woman, whether thou shalt save thy husband?" etc. "This," he says, "He says because perhaps they may believe, just as the Lord has divided to each one — the Lord has divided to each one when he is to be saved; that is, He knows when he can believe, and bears with him."

Likewise the blessed Cyprian, in his epistle 3, entitled On the Lapsed, thus says: "Since the crown of martyrdom comes down from God's appointment, nor can it be received unless the hour of receiving has been [reached], whoever, abiding in Christ, withdraws meanwhile, does not deny faith, but waits for the time."

Likewise 1 Esdras 5: "The eye of God was made over the elders of the Jews, and they could not restrain them." This necessity according to superior causes aforesaid — both as to non-doing and as to doing — the blessed Job evidently shows in various places. For in the fifth chapter, speaking of God, he thus says: "Who frustrateth the cogitations of the malignant, that their hands may not bring to pass what they had begun." And below, chapter 14: "The days of man are short, the number of his months is with thee" — and that He may show how it is with Him, namely by way of the necessity aforesaid, he subjoins: "Thou hast appointed his bounds, which cannot be passed." And below, chapter 23: "No one can turn away His thoughts; and His soul, whatsoever it has willed, this it has done."

Concerning the first of these, the blessed Gregory, Moralia VI.12, thus says: "Our action ought devoutly to serve the supernal will once known, and to follow it as the leader of its journey — lest, even unwillingly, it serve it, if proudly declining it: for the force of the supreme counsel can in no way be evaded." With which sufficiently agrees that of Tobit 30: "Thy counsel is not in the power of man"; and that of Isaiah 14: "The Lord of hosts has decreed, and who shall be able to weaken it?"; and that of Jeremiah 47, concerning the sword of the Lord, which cannot rest when the Lord has commanded it the motion of vengeance, as is more fully alleged in chapter 32 of book I. And that, above, of the same prophet, chapter 10: "I know, O Lord, that the way of man is not his, neither is it of man to walk and to direct his steps." Glossa: "Let those blush who say that each one is governed by his own free judgment: for the way of man is not his." Whence David: "By the Lord shall the steps of man be directed." And Proverbs 20: "By the Lord are the steps of a man directed." Glossa: "Not by liberty of free will." Nor can anyone expound these of good ways or steps only, as chapter 32 of book I shows.

On the second authority of Job aforesaid, the blessed Gregory in Moralia XII.1 says that in the advance of the virtues a man strives to apprehend the good, and is not able, because almighty God has appointed terms for man which cannot be passed, as chapter 46 of book I more fully alleged. Who also below, Moralia XVI [on that text of Job 15, "Before his days be full he shall perish"], thus says: "The days are fixed for each one by the inner foreknowledge of God, nor can they be increased or diminished, unless it should happen that they be foreknown either as longer with the best works, or shorter with the worst — as Hezekiah merited the increase of days by the pouring forth of tears."

But lest anyone believe that Gregory affirms the pre-ordination or foreknowledge of God to depend on future works, let him hear him above, in the same book, chapter 1, saying concerning the same Hezekiah: "The Lord through the Prophet said at what time he himself merited to die; through the largesse of His mercy, however, He deferred him to death at that time which He Himself foreknew before the ages. Nor therefore is the Prophet a deceiver, because the time of death was made known at which that man merited to die; nor are the Lord's decrees broken, because — that the years of life should grow from God's largesse — this also was fixed before the ages, and the span of life which was unexpectedly added on the outside, was inwardly settled without increase to foreknowledge." The same also in Moralia XVI.4, on that text of Job 22, "Who were taken away before their time," thus says: "Almighty God foreknows that time of each one for death at which his life is terminated, nor at any other time can any have died except at that very time at which he dies. For if to Hezekiah fifteen years are recorded as added to life, the time indeed of his life grew from that term at which he merited to die. For divine disposition foreknew his time when it later took him from the present life. Since therefore it is so, what is it that is said — that the wicked were taken away before their time? — except that all who love the present life promise themselves longer spans of the same life. But when supervening death takes them from the present life, it cuts off the spans of their life which they had been wont to extend longer for themselves as it were in thought."

The same again below, in the same book, chapter 15, on that text of Job 23 cited above, "No one can turn away His thoughts," thus says: "Concerning whose immutability it is fittingly subjoined: 'And no one can turn away His thoughts.' For just as He is immutable in nature, so is He immutable in thought. His thought no one will turn away, because no one prevails to resist His hidden judgments. For even if there have been some who by their entreaties seemed to have turned away His thought, His inward thought was such that they were able by entreating to turn away His sentence, and from Him they received what they should do with Him. Let it therefore be said, 'And no one can turn away His thoughts'; because once-fixed judgments cannot in any way be changed: whence it is written, 'He has set a precept, and it shall not pass away'; and again, 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away'; and again, 'For my thoughts are not as your thoughts, neither are my ways as your ways.' When therefore externally the sentence seems changed, internally the counsel is not changed, because concerning each thing it is immutably constituted within whatever is mutably done without."

Nor ought it to move anyone what he says — that the divine sentence can be turned aside by entreaties: for this is sufficiently expounded in chapter 25 of book I; and because here he says that God's thought, judgments, and counsel cannot be changed, as also above, in the same book, chapter 4, on the authority of Job 22 just laid down, he says, "God often changes His sentence, but His counsel never." This same view most plainly the authority of the same in Moralia XXVII.22 attests, which chapter 30 of book II more fully alleged.

This necessity of future things according to superior, not according to inferior, causes Anselm shows in On Concord, though under other words. For he shows that future things in one way come to pass from necessity, and in another way from liberty — namely, because with respect to the divine will they shall necessarily come to pass, but with respect to the created will by no means; and because with God and in eternity they are immutably constituted, but with the creature and in time mutably. Whence chapter 2: "Just," he says, "as it is necessary that be whatever God wills, so it is necessary that be what man wills in those things which God so subjects to the human will that, if he wills, they happen; if he does not will, they do not happen."

For since what God wills cannot not be — when He wills the will of man to be coerced or prohibited by no necessity to willing or not willing, and wills the effect to follow the will — then it is necessary that the will be free, and that what it wills be." And below: "The work of the will, to which it is given that what it wills should be, and what it does not will should not be, is voluntary or spontaneous, since it comes about by spontaneous will, and is in two ways necessary: because it is by the will compelled to come to pass, and because what comes to pass cannot at the same time not come to pass."

Who also below, chapter 3, thus says: "Nothing prevents something to be known or foreknown by God to come to pass or to be future in our wills and actions through free will, so that, although it be necessary that what He knows or foreknows be, yet many things are by no necessity (supply: unwilling), but by free will. For what wonder if in this manner something is — namely, from liberty with respect to ourselves, and from necessity, namely with respect to the divine foreknowledge or knowledge — since there are things which receive opposites in different respects, just as the same going is to-go and to-go-away with respect to different places?" And there follows: "But if, by what Job says of man to God — 'Thou hast appointed his bounds which cannot be passed' — anyone wishes to show that no one could hasten or defer the day on which he dies, although sometimes it seems to us that someone does of his free will something whence he dies — that is not what is objected against what we said above. For since God is not deceived, nor sees anything but truth, whether [a thing] come to pass from liberty or from necessity, He is said to have appointed with Himself immutably what with man, before it comes to pass, can be changed."

"Such also is what Paul the Apostle says of those who are 'called according to purpose, holy': 'Whom He foreknew, He also predestined to be made conformable to the image of His Son, that He might be the first-born among many brethren: and whom He predestined, them He also called; and whom He called, them He also justified; and whom He justified, them He also magnified.' This 'purpose,' according to which the holy are called, is in eternity (in which there is no past or future, but only present) immutable; but in the men themselves, from liberty of free will, it is sometimes mutable. For just as, although in eternity nothing has been or shall be, but only is, and yet in time something has been and shall be without repugnance, so what in eternity cannot be changed is, in time, before it is, proved to be mutable through free will, without inconvenience."

"And, that the same Apostle might show that he had not put those words for temporal signification, those things even which are future he pronounced by a verb of past time. For not yet did he so temporally call, justify, magnify those whom He foreknew as still to be born. Whence it can be recognized that, from the lack of a verb signifying eternal presence, he used a verb of past signification; since the things which are past in time, in likeness of the eternal present, are altogether immutable: for in this respect, things temporally past are more like the eternal present than things present, since those things which are there — namely, in eternity — can never not be present, just as past things in time can never not be past; but the present things in time, all that pass, become not-present."

And in chapter 4 he subjoins: "In this way, then, whatever Sacred Scripture pronounces of those things which are done by free will as it were necessary, it speaks according to eternity, in which every truth — and only truth — is immutably present; not according to time, in which our actions and wills are not always. But since the thing is so otherwise known to be in time than in eternity that sometimes it is true that something is not in time which is in eternity, and that something has been in time which has not been there, and shall be temporally what shall not be there: it seems to be deniable by no reasoning that something be similarly mutable in time, which is there immutable. For mutable in time and immutable in eternity are no more opposed than not to be in some time and to be always in eternity, and to have been or to be future according to time and not to have been or not to be future in eternity. So therefore, without any repugnance, something is said to be mutable in time before it be, which in eternity remains immutably — not before it be or after it be, but unceasingly, because there is nothing there according to time."

Do not many illustrious Prophets confirm this view, as the series of the Old Testament most clearly teaches? Does not also the Sibyl, prophesying concerning Christ and many things concerning Him, say thus: "O Jews, it is necessary that these things be" — as the thirty-second part of the corollary of chapter 1 of book I more fully recited?

Indeed, ten Sibyls are read of, all illustrious Gentile prophetesses; this Sibyl was in Greek surnamed Tiburtina, in Latin Ebulnea — whom Augustine in City of God XVIII.23 and 24 surnames Erythraea, or, according to some, Cumaea: of whom, under that surname, Virgil seems to be mindful in the Bucolics, eclogue 4, saying thus: "The last age of the Cumaean song now comes" — that is, of the song of the Sibyl of Cumae according to Servius in the commentary; and there follows consequently: "Now is born from anew a great order of ages; now the Virgin returns, the Saturnian reigns return; now is sent down a new offspring from the high heaven," etc. — all of which can be aptly applied to Christ, as Jerome also does in the prefatory epistle of the Bible. This [Sibyl] Augustine in City of God XVIII.23 and 24 says was in the time of Ahaz or Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and Romulus and the founding of Rome — or, as some have written, in the time of the Trojan war.

Some of her prophecies concerning Christ, as they are written in her book, Lactantius alleges in his book of Divine Institutions Against the Gentiles; which Augustine also in City of God XVIII worthily commemorates. Of this Sibyl's verses (the thirty-third part of the corollary of chapter 1 of book I in the writings) the holy Church is mindful in a certain sequence on the Nativity, singing thus: "If she will not believe her own seers, [let her believe] the gentiles by the Sibylline verses, [which] foretold these things." These things I have brought forth more abundantly, lest perchance the authority of this wise Sibyl should be thought contemptible.

This Sibyl, then, prophesying many things of Christ, says: "It is necessary that these things be." Does not the very Lord of the Prophets and faithful Author of faith Himself faithfully authorize this view, when He says: "It is necessary that all things be fulfilled which are written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me"? (Luke 24.) Wherefore by similar reasoning, it is necessary that all things be fulfilled which are written in the book of life, in the mind, and in the will of God; and there all future things are eternally and immutably, most distinctly and most certainly inscribed, as the foregoing things have taught.

Furthermore, unless such necessity be supposed, it is possible for the whole holy Church of God to fall, collapse, fail, and perish — for the whole little ship of Peter to suffer shipwreck and be submerged — for the whole faith of Christ before the consummation of the age, even tomorrow or today, to fail and cease — nay, even, as to all its articles concerning the future, to be and always to have been erroneous, false, foolish, and fallacious — for Christ to have been a Pseudo-Prophet, deceiver, liar, and false; the holy Apostles, Martyrs, [Confessors] of Christ also who once passed faithfully in this faith, not to be, nor ever to have been saved, but always damned; or that fictitious faith should suffice for salvation. Which what disciple of Christ — nay rather of Antichrist — what son of holy mother Church — nay rather of the synagogue of Satan — what Catholic — nay rather what heretic — would presume to affirm, since it is so dissonant, so absurd, so horrible, so execrable to Christian ears?

What Christian, moreover, knows not Christ to be the cornerstone, and foundation of the militant Church? And of what kind of foundation: weak, slipping, infirm? — far be this from the soul of a Christian even lightly to dream. Does not Christ on this account compare the faithful Christian to one building his house upon a rock, which no tempest undermines or overthrows? The cause of which He assigns: because it was built upon a rock, as Matthew 7 recites. On which Chrysostom: "The Church," he says, "built by Christ cannot be torn down."

Whence Augustine in On the Words of the Lord, sermon 13: "This name, that he might be called Peter, was imposed upon him by the Lord, and this in such a figure that it might signify the Church: for since Christ is the rock, Peter is the Christian people. For the rock is the principal name; therefore Peter [is named] from the rock, not the rock from Peter — just as not from the Christian is Christ, but from Christ the Christian is named. 'Thou art therefore Peter,'" he says, "and upon this rock which thou hast confessed, I will build my Church: I will build thee upon me, not me upon thee. Let us discern what is of God, what is of ours; for then we shall not be disturbed, then we shall be founded upon the rock, fixed and stable against winds, rains, and floods — namely, the temptations of the present age. Yet behold that Peter, who was then our figure: now believing, now wavering; now confessing the immortal, now fearing lest he should die. Hence, since the Church of Christ has the firm, it has also the infirm; nor can it be without the firm, nor without the infirm." Wherefore the Apostle: "Other foundation," he says, "no man can lay, besides that which is laid, which is Christ Jesus," 1 Cor. 3; and again: "The firm foundation of God standeth, having this seal: the Lord knoweth who are his." He knoweth, I say, the Lord who are His, by knowing and willing, building and guarding, and this infallibly, insuperably, and immutably; and therefore the firm foundation of God stands. And how firm? Without doubt firmer than any other foundation weak, slipping, corruptible, temporal, earthly, or heavenly, as the foregoing testify. Wherefore the Glossa: "The firm foundation of God stands — that is, those whom God has chosen and immovably founded in the faith."

Is not this also what the Prophet figuratively foretold: "Who hast founded the earth upon its stability, it shall not be moved for ever and ever" (Ps. 103); and again: "He has built His sanctuary as an unicorn's horn in the land which He has founded for ever" (Ps. 77); and again: "He has established the orb of the earth, which shall not be moved" (Ps. 92)? Assigning the cause of all this in Psalm 118, He thus says: "For ever, O Lord, thy word remaineth in heaven; thy truth from generation to generation: thou hast founded the earth, and it remaineth; the day continueth by thy ordinance, since all things serve thee."

The blessed Augustine, indeed, on these places understands by "earth" the Church, which still pilgrimages on earth. Who also on that recited text of Psalm 103, sermon 1: "By 'earth,'" he says, "I understand the Church: which is its firmness, upon which it is founded, except its foundation? Or do we incongruously understand by the firmness upon which the earth is founded, the foundation upon which the Church is constituted? What is that foundation? 'Foundation,' he says, 'no man can lay besides that which is laid, which is Christ Jesus.' There then are we deservedly made firm, because there made firm we are not moved for ever and ever. For nothing is firmer than this foundation. You were infirm, but a firm foundation bears you: in yourself you could not be firm; you shall be firm always, if you do not withdraw from that firm foundation; it shall not be moved for ever and ever: this is the predestined column and firmament of truth." And below, sermon 2: "He has founded the earth upon its firmness" — that is, He has made the Church firm upon the foundation Christ. The Church will totter if its foundation totter. And whence shall Christ be changed? Who, before He came to us and took on flesh, [is the one through whom] all things were made, and without Him was nothing made — who contains all things by majesty, and us by goodness. Christ not tottering, [the earth] shall not be moved for ever and ever. Where are they who say that the Church has perished from the world, when it cannot even be moved?" Whereon Cassiodorus: "Mystically," he says, "it can be received that the Church founded on Him cannot be inclined."

Is not this what Christ Himself insinuates, saying thus: "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me, and I give them eternal life, and they shall not perish for ever, and no one shall snatch them out of my hand. My Father who hath given them to me is greater than all, and no one can snatch from my Father's hand: I and the Father are one" (John 10)? Is this not what the Apostle teaches in Romans 8 when he says: "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Tribulation? or anguish? or persecution?" etc.? "But in all these things we overcome because of him who hath loved us." "Because of him," he says, not because of ourselves. And there follows: "For I am sure that neither death nor life," etc., "shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." And 2 Tim. 2: "A faithful saying: for if we be dead with him, we shall live also with him; if we suffer, we shall also reign with him; he that remains faithful cannot deny himself."

Can also the promise of Christ be false, fallacious, and lying, by which He said: "I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the age" (Matthew, last chapter)? Can also that great prayer of Christ to the Father, by which He asked Him for His own that He might preserve them; and that by which He asked for Peter that his faith should not fail; and that posing by which He posed His chosen disciples that they should go and bear fruit, and their fruit should remain (recited in John 17, Luke 22, and John 15) — can [these] be void, empty, and inane?

Far be it even lightly to think this, because then Christ could be and have been not Christ — namely, not the true Christ, but a pseudo-Christ and false, or none. Did not the true Christ truly say thus: "Pseudo-Christ and pseudo-Prophets shall arise, and shall give great signs and wonders, so that even the elect, if it can be done, shall be led into error" (as Matthew 24 makes clear)? Behold the true consequence of the true Christ: "If it can be done, the elect shall be led into error." Wherefore by the true discipline of Logic, from the opposite of the consequent the opposite of the antecedent is truly inferred: It truly follows, therefore: "None of the elect shall be led into error" (as Christ there suggests); therefore this can in no way be done — Christ being their elector, preserving them insuperably. Wherefore the blessed Gregory, on Ezekiel I, homily 9, treating Christ's recited consequence: "One of two things," he says: "for if they are elect, it cannot be done; if it can be done, they are not elect." Who also in Moralia XIV.8, on that text of Job 18, "In his days the latest shall be astounded, and horror shall invade the first," treating Christ's said consequence, thus says: "And if they are elect that they cannot be conquered by torments, yet by this — that they are men — they also fear the very torments which they see." And in Moralia XXXIII.31, on that text of Job 41, "From his nostrils proceedeth smoke," treating that consequence, thus says: "It is added: 'if it can be done,' because without doubt it cannot be done that the elect should be fully captured into error."

With which Augustine agrees, On Faith to Peter 67: "Hold most firmly and in no way doubt that all whom God, by His gratuitous goodness, made vessels of His mercy, predestined by God before the constitution of the world to the adoption of the sons of God — that none of those whom God predestined to the kingdom can perish, nor can anyone whom God did not predestine to life by any reason be saved." The same in On Rebuke and Grace 21: "Those," he says, "elect, who are called according to purpose, who are also predestined and foreknown — if any of these perish, God is deceived: but none of them perishes, because God is not deceived. If any of them perishes generally, God is overcome by human vice; but none of them perishes, because God is overcome by no thing." The same in chapter 26: "What will you contrive against the words of Him saying, 'I have prayed for thee, Peter, that thy faith fail not'? Or will you dare to say that — even with Christ praying that Peter's faith should not fail — it would have been about to fail, if Peter had willed it to fail (that is, if he had not willed it to persevere unto the end), as if Peter would in any way have willed otherwise than that for which Christ had prayed that he might will it? For who is ignorant that Peter's faith would have then perished, if that very will by which he was faithful had failed, and would have remained, if the same will should remain? But because the will is prepared by the Lord, therefore Christ's prayer for him could not be in vain. When therefore He prayed that his faith should not fail, what else did He pray, except that he should have in faith a most free, most strong, most invincible, and most persevering will? Behold how the liberty of will is defended according to the grace of God, not against it: for the human will does not by liberty obtain grace, but rather grace obtains liberty, and that it may persevere — delightful perpetuity and insuperable fortitude."

The same, chapter 34: "Whoever in God's most provident disposition are foreknown, predestined, called, justified, and glorified — I say not even those not yet reborn, but even those not yet born — already are sons of God, and therefore can in no way perish." The same, chapter 35: "Peter was called according to purpose, that no one could snatch him from the hand of Christ, to whom he had been given." The same, chapter 53: With Christ thus posing the disciples that they should go and bear fruit, and that their fruit should remain — "Who shall dare to say, Perhaps it shall not remain? For without repentance are the gifts and calling of God; but [we speak of] the calling of those who are called according to purpose."

Furthermore the same, in On the Words of the Lord, sermon 14, treating that text of Matthew 14 about how, with Christ praying on the mountain, the boat in the sea was tossed by the waves, thus says: "While He prays in the heights, the boat is disturbed by the waves in the deep. Because the waves rise, this boat can be disturbed; but because Christ prays, it cannot be sunk. This boat, brethren, think of as the Church; this troubled sea, the world."

Furthermore through chapter 28 of book I, all things shall come about by fate, named from divine speech [famen]: but fate imports necessity, as is plain through all who speak of it, and through the authorities there adduced. And Boethius says, on the last chapter of book I of Peri Hermeneias: "All things which fatal reason does, undoubtedly happen of necessity"; which Ammonius also intends on the same place, as was alleged in chapter 10 of this book. Josephus also, in On the Jewish War VII.8: "Men," he says, "cannot avoid fate, even if they have foreseen it." Whence the Poet:

"Cease to hope that the fates of the gods can be bent by prayer."

This same plainly the authorities of Augustine, City of God V.9, and Isidore, Etymologies VIII.45, attest, expounding that text of Psalm 61 [62]: "God hath spoken once" — that is, immovably, that is, immutably He has spoken, just as He immutably knows all things which are future, and which He is to do, as chapter 28 of book I more fully recited.

The same, in On the Spirit and the Letter 29: "It is written," he says, "God hath spoken once" — that is, immutably; though it can also be understood of the only-begotten Word."

Boethius also, Consolation of Philosophy IV, prose 6, thus says: "This series of fate, or providence, binds the acts and fortunes of men by an indissoluble connection of causes; which causes, since they proceed from the beginnings of immovable providence, the causes themselves must also be immutable. For thus things are best conducted, if the simplicity remaining in the divine mind brings forth an undeclining order of causes; this, in turn, restrains mutable things by its proper immutability." And below: "God by the series of fatal necessity eliminates every evil from the bounds of His commonwealth."

Furthermore Hermes, the father of Philosophers, On the Eternal Word 43, to Asclepius asking concerning heimarmene, thus responds: "O Asclepius, this is the necessity of all things which are done, ever joined to itself with chained connections: this therefore is either the maker of things, or the supreme God, or, under that God, the second produced God, or the discipline confirmed by divine laws of all heavenly and earthly things. In this way, then, heimarmene and necessity, both joined to one another by divine cement, the prior of which, heimarmene, gives birth to the beginnings of all things, but necessity drives to effect those things which depend on those primordials. Order follows these — that is, the woven texture and disposition of time and of things to be perfected. For nothing is without the composition of order, or rather in all things the world is borne by order, or wholly consists of order. These three, then — heimarmene, necessity, order — most especially are effected by the nod of God, which govern the world by their law and divine reason: from these, then, all willing or unwilling divinely is wholly turned away. These are not moved by anger, nor bent by favor, but serve the necessity of eternal reason; which eternity is non-reversible, immovable, and indissoluble. Heimarmene therefore is first, which, as if a seed of all future things being cast, suffices for offspring; necessity follows, by which all things are driven to effect; the third, order, preserving the texture of all things which heimarmene and necessity dispose."

Who also, On the World and Heaven I, treating of the first cause, reason, and divine mind, thus says: "He governs and composes all things: there are joined in species, written in individual singularity, whatsoever hyle, whatsoever the world, whatsoever the machine of the world, whatsoever time, whatsoever in temporal things the elements bring forth: there is the woven texture of the work, the series of fate, the disposition of ages, the goal of all temporal things engraved by the finger of the supreme disposer; there is the knot of perpetuity."

Whom his son Aristotle also imitated in On the World, last chapter, showing why God, since He is one, is many-named, and after declaring His many names with their causes (as chapter 3 of book I alleges), assigns the cause of these four divine names: Necessity, Heimarmene, Nemesis, Adrastia.

It is to be known, namely (according to Damascene in his Sentences 39), that among the Greeks six famous principles were posited: namely, God, necessity, heimarmene (which according to him is interpreted as fortune), nature, event, and chance. The Philosopher therefore, where above, says: "I think also that necessity is called nothing other than this, namely, as it were, an insuperable substance; heimarmene in turn — because it couples and disjoins; Nemesis — from the distribution made to each one; Adrastia — being an unavoidable cause." Where also, consequently expounding the three fatal Establishments — namely, Atropos of the past, Lachesis of the future, and Clotho of the present — he thus says: "But the fable is perfected not disorderly; these all are nothing other than God, just as also the strenuous Plato says."

Fate therefore, or divine speech, by which He disposes all things by speaking, according to Augustine, Isidore, Hermes, Aristotle, and Plato, and other Authors, imports immutability, incommutability, indissolubility, indeclinability, necessity, and inevitability. Which the faithful saying of the Author of the faith also testifies: "Heaven," He says, "and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away," or "shall pass" (Matt. 24, Mark 13, Luke 21); which Luke 16 thus expounds: "It is easier for heaven and earth to pass, than for one tittle to fall from the law." And Matthew 5: "Amen I say to you: till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall not pass from the law, till all be fulfilled." Whence John 10: "The Scripture cannot be loosed."

With which agrees that of Jeremiah 31: "Thus saith the Lord, who giveth the sun for light by day, the order of the moon and stars for light by night, who stirreth up the sea, and the waves thereof roar; if these laws shall fail before me, then also shall the seed of Israel fail, that they should not be a nation before me for ever." Glossa: "As the order chiefly of the celestial stars cannot be changed, and the wave of the sea is rolled to the shores, and the terrible crash of whirlpools is heard, nor goes beyond the precept whence Thou hast set the bound which they shall not transgress; so by the will of the Lord shall the seed of Israel be perpetual, nor shall it ever cease." And there follows in the Prophet: "Thus saith the Lord, If the heavens above can be measured, and the foundations of the earth searched out beneath, and I will cast away all the seed of Israel for all the things which they have done." Glossa: "As this is impossible, so also that."

Below also, chapter 33: "Thus," says the Prophet, "saith the Lord, If my covenant with the day and my covenant with the night can be made void, that there should not be day and night in their season, then also can my covenant be made void with David my servant, that he should not have a son to reign upon his throne, and the Levites and priests my ministers." On which the Glossa above said, concerning the creation of the sun, and moon, and stars, and their course, that their laws cannot be changed; now likewise it says that the covenant of day and night cannot be made void, nor the Lord's covenant with David. For the legal priesthood being finished, the kingdom and priesthood of Christ shall remain forever.

With these also agrees that of Isaiah 54: "The mountains shall be moved, and the hills shall tremble; but my mercy shall not depart from thee, and the covenant of my peace shall not be moved, said the Lord thy commiserator." On which Jerome, book 15 on Isaiah, thus says: "More easily shall the mountains be moved and the hills, than my sentence shall be changed — according to what He says in the Gospel: 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass.'" And on Matt. 24, on the recited text of the Gospel, he is thus alleged in the Glossa of Thomas: "That He may the more lead them to the faith of what was premised, He subjoins, 'Heaven and earth shall pass away,' etc., as if He should say, It is easier that things fixed and immovable be destroyed, than that anything of my words fall." Where also Hilary: "Heaven," he says, "and earth, from the condition of creation, have nothing of necessity in themselves not to be; but the words of Christ, drawn from eternity, contain in themselves virtue that they may remain." Who also on that text of John 10 cited above, says, in On the Trinity VII (as the Glossa there recites), that the discourse of God is indissoluble. Theophylact also on that recited text of Mark 13, according to the Glossa, thus says: "Sooner shall the immobile elements fail, than the words of Christ" — which Gregory in Moralia XVI.15, cited above, also plainly attests.

The blessed Ambrose also on that mentioned text of Luke 16, "It is easier for heaven and earth to pass, than for one tittle to fall from the law," says that Christ in this said of the law that one tittle could not fall. Chrysostom also on that premised text of Matt. 5, in homily 10 in Opus Imperfectum, thus says: "Since all things which were future from the beginning of the world unto the end were mystically prophesied in the law — lest any of those things which come to pass should seem not to have been beforehand known by God — therefore He says: 'It cannot be that heaven and earth pass, until all things which were prophesied in the law have been fulfilled in the things themselves.' An ingenuous man, if he be found in even a vile lie, blushes — and how shall God not do what He promised in the law, or do otherwise? A wise man does not leave his word in vacuum — and how shall divine words be able to remain empty, without issue? God punishes a man if he himself does not do what he teaches another to do — how shall Christ not have fulfilled in deed what He spoke in the Prophets? This is therefore what He says: 'Amen, indeed, I say unto you, until heaven and earth pass,' etc." — which according to Remigius, there in the Glossa, "shall remain essentially, but shall pass through renewal."

With which the Philosopher in On the World 13 concordantly says, that God, immobile, moves all things and conducts them where He wills, just as the law of a city, being immobile, disposes in the souls of those using it all things which are according to civility; and this shown as it were through each of the works of the city, by way of conclusion he subjoins: "So is it surely to be reckoned of the greater city — I say, of the world. For the law for us equally undeclining, God receiving no corruption," or, according to another translation, "transposition, greater and more certain" (in another translation, "more firm") "than the writings which are on tablets," according to another translation, "on stones."

This same Balaam testifies, Numbers 22, saying: "I cannot change the word of the Lord my God, to speak more or less"; and 23: "I cannot prevent the blessing" — where the Glossa: "For a human tongue cannot, even if it should will, turn away the word of God," as chapter 8 of this book more fully alleged. And behold one greater than Balaam to this point — namely, holy Isaiah, who says: "The Lord of hosts has decreed, and who shall be able to weaken it?" (Isaiah 14). Glossa: "This cannot be changed."

Fate, therefore, or divine speech, by which He utters, orders, and disposes all things — both according to theological and to philosophical letters — introduces and imports necessity at least according to superior and first causes.

Which the holy Thomas in On the Christian Religion 137 [i.e., Summa Contra Gentiles, where this matter is treated] really attests, although verbally (as it seems) he contradicts. Whence he thus says: "Although the order of divine providence applied to things is certain (by reason of which Boethius says that fate is an immovable disposition inherent in mobile things), yet it does not follow on this account that all things happen of necessity: for effects are called necessary or contingent according to the condition of their proximate causes. For it is manifest that if the first cause be necessary, and the second cause be contingent, the effect will follow as contingent" — as he shows by the example concerning the heavenly motion, and generation and corruption below; and he subjoins: "But it has been shown that God carries out the order of His providence through inferior causes; therefore some effects of divine providence will be contingent according to the condition of inferior causes."

He also, on Sentences I, dist. 38, question 5, when it is asked whether God's knowledge is of contingent things, and it is argued that not, because of a necessary and immutable cause the effect seems to be necessary — whence, since God's knowledge is the cause of things and is immutable, it does not seem that it can be of contingents — thus responds: "Since there are many ordered causes, the ultimate effect does not follow the first cause in necessity and contingency, but the proximate cause, as is plain in the flowering of a tree, of which the remote cause is the motion of the sun, but the proximate is the generative power of the plant. Now the flowering can be impeded through some impediment of the generative power, although the motion of the sun be invariable. Likewise also, God's knowledge is the immutable cause of all things; but the effects are produced by it through the operations of second causes; and therefore through the mediation of necessary second causes He produces necessary effects, such as the motion of the sun and the like; but through the mediation of contingent second causes He produces contingent effects."

Who also consequently, on dists. 39 and 40, when inquiring concerning providence and predestination, makes similar arguments and likewise responds. The same, also, in Summa Contra Gentiles I.67 and 85, by the same example shows the same.

The view of this Doctor, therefore, stands in this: that necessity and contingency are not predicated with respect to superior causes, but to inferior causes. Wherefore, although the superior causes be necessary with respect to all causes, yet it does not follow that all things come to pass necessarily, because the inferior and proximate co-causes — from which the effect is named necessary or contingent — are not all necessary, but some are contingent.

But this cannot soundly be understood except according to the common manner of speaking of the Philosophers and the common people, who consider natural things only according to natural and inferior causes, and as they consider, so they speak — as chapter 5 of this book shows. And such "necessary" or "contingent" is not called such utterly absolutely, but only in a certain respect and in a certain genus of causes — namely, of inferior. Since, then, names are by convention, they can be extended that they may be predicated most absolutely — namely, both with respect to superior and to inferior causes; nay also, the necessity of speaking in Theology most especially requires this, as is shown in chapter 5 of this book. For who shall presume to deny: It is necessary that God be omnipotent and good, and impossible that God be not such, and that it be possible for God to enlighten the blind, and to raise the dead, to make the sun stand or to go back, with similar things? Whence Luke 18: "What is impossible with men, is possible with God," and above, chapter 1: "No word shall be impossible with God." Wherefore the blessed

Ambrose, on that text of 1 Cor. 3, "The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God," thus says: "When God does what the world denies can be done, He proves its wisdom to be foolishness." And what Catholic or pagan denies that God is omnipotent — namely, able to do all things, and that all things can be done by Him? What man, even mad, denies that all things which are done by God can be done by Him, and are possible with respect to Him? But all things which are done are done by Him of necessity, as chapter 3 of book I teaches.

Following also philosophical reasoning: from what or with respect to what shall any thing in any genus better be denominated, than from the principle and with respect to the first in that genus? But the first capable [thing] and the first power is the supreme and first cause. Wherefore the Philosopher in Metaphysics IX.2 says that "in all the terms" — that is, definitions — "of powers, the ratio (that is, the definition) of the first power is included." Where also the text which Averroes expounds more expressly thus says: "All these definitions have the definition of the first power"; on which he thus says: "These powers are not predicated equivocally, because all have the definition of the first power"; and he means that, when these powers are considered, they seem to be attributed to the first power. For in the definition of every active power is taken the definition of the action of the first form, which is absolute from matter. Whence at Paris an article is condemned which asserts that "the simply (that is, in every way) possible or impossible is the possible or impossible according to philosophy" — namely, according to the natural and inferior causes which philosophy considers.

Furthermore, the Doctor's example does not help. For he says that, although the heavenly motion be necessary, yet its effects in inferior things are contingent because of the contingency of inferior causes; and so it is to be understood (as he says) of God's knowledge or will and its caused things. For if the motion of heaven were necessary, and embraced perfectly all inferior causes — for example, if there were only irrational agent causes, and in their every action were totally subjected to heaven — all things which should come to pass would come to pass of necessity. But because it is not so, it happens because some inferior causes — for example, rational ones — are not subjected to heaven in their free acts, as chapter 3 of book II showed; which by means of such acts can help or impede the heavenly operation in others, as is plain concerning cultivators of trees and fields, the generation and nutrition of animals, and the like.

But the divine will perfectly embraces all inferior causes, both rational and irrational, in their actions whatsoever, as chapters 9 and 22 of book I, with chapter 20 and 30 of book II, joined with chapter 10 of book I, teach. Wherefore if the first cause act necessarily, all second causes likewise co-act: for all second causes in their every causation are more immediately, more essentially, and more inseparably joined with the first cause than any of them with another, and similarly all their caused things, as the corollaries of chapters 2, 3, and 4 of book I teach.

Wherefore Stephen, Bishop of Paris, condemned the article asserting that "Beings decline from the order of the first cause considered in itself, but not in order to the other causes acting in the universe": "An error," he says, "because the order of beings to the first cause is more essential and more inseparable than to the inferior causes." And again another, affirming that "for all effects to be necessary with respect to the first cause, it does not suffice that the first cause itself be not impedible, but it is required that the intermediate causes be not impedible": "An error," he says, "because then God could not produce any necessary effect without the posterior causes."

Wherefore the same Doctor, more distinctly treating these things in [his question] On the Power of God, q. 4, when it is asked, "Whether something is to be judged possible or impossible according to inferior or superior causes," says in answer that the judgment of the possible and impossible can be considered on the part of those judging: for if there are two sciences, one of which considers higher causes, and another less high, the judgment in each would not be taken in the same way, but according to the causes which each considers. Now wisdom is twofold: namely, mundane, which is called Philosophy, which considers inferior causes and judges according to them, as medicine [does] of health; and divine, which is called Theology, which considers superior causes — that is, divine ones — according to which it judges what are the divine attributes, such as wisdom, goodness, the divine will, and so forth. Wherefore according to the consideration of the Theologian, all those things which are not in themselves impossible are called possible.

Since therefore, according to the view of this Doctor, nothing stands in the way that all things which shall come to pass should not come to pass of necessity, except this — that necessity is not predicated according to superior causes — and this is not in the way, but rather helps, since it is true most especially speaking theologically, as has been taught — it follows manifestly that all things which shall come to pass shall come to pass of necessity with respect to superior causes.

Furthermore, many future things shall be done immediately by God, without the cooperation of inferior causes; therefore those cannot be called contingently future on account of the contingency of inferior causes; wherefore in those his response has no place; therefore according to him at least all such things shall come to pass of necessity, wherefore also simply all things [shall]. For the divine will holds itself more freely and more contingently to its every extrinsic effect than any second cause to its own, as the ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth parts of corollary 5 of this book show.

From all these things, then, I judge it not unmanifestly demonstrated, that fate or divine speech introduces and imposes such necessity on all things. Wherefore Stephen, Bishop of Paris, also condemned an article which said that "fate, which is the disposition of the universe, proceeds from divine providence not immediately, but by means of the motion of the superior bodies, and that this fate does not impose necessity upon inferior things, because they have their contrary, but upon superior things": all things therefore which shall come to pass shall come to pass of the necessity of superior causes — as the other two articles just recited also plainly attest.

This same view the authorities of Augustine in City of God V.9 and 10, alleged in the proof of corollary 1 of this book, expressly profess; and the authorities of the same, On Rebuke and Grace 69 and 70, which chapter 20 of book II recites, will the same. For chapter 69 says that "no [free] judgment resists God willing to make a man saved"; the cause of which he immediately subjoins: "For thus to will or not to will is so in the power of him willing or not willing, that it fulfills the divine will, and does not overcome [its] power." And chapter 70: "When God willed to give the kingdom to Saul, it was not in the power of the Israelites to subject themselves to him or not to subject themselves — which was indeed placed in their will, that they could even resist God; who nevertheless did not do this except through their wills, without doubt having the most omnipotent power of inclining the hearts of men to whom He pleased." And below, concerning a certain Shemei, who however in 1 Paralipomenon 12 is called Abishai, "whom the Spirit of the Lord clothed that he should promise and bring help to King David, thus says: Could that man have been opposed to the will of God, and not rather have done His will, who worked in his heart through His Spirit, with which he was clothed, that he should will, say, and do these things?"

This same most clearly the authority of Avicenna in his Metaphysics X.1, written in chapter 29 of book I, attests. Boethius also, Consolation of Philosophy V, last prose, after very much ventilation of this problem, finally thus responds: "I will confess a thing indeed of most solid truth, but to which scarcely anyone, except the speculator of divine wit, would have access. For I shall reply that the same future thing, when it is referred to the divine notion, is necessary; but when it is weighed in its own nature, seems wholly free and absolute." And below: "If providence sees anything as present, that thing must be — although it have no necessity of nature; and indeed God beholds those future things which proceed from the liberty of free will as present. These therefore, referred to the divine intuition, are made necessary through the condition or disposition of the divine notion; but considered through themselves, they do not desert the absolute liberty of their own nature."

On this response Gratian leans, in Decretum, q. 23, q. 4, where, after the disputation premised on the same matter, definitively responding, he thus says: "Although it be conveniently said: 'If these things be predestined or foreknown, they shall necessarily come to pass,' yet it is not therefore absolutely true that they shall necessarily come to pass which are predestined or foreknown, because here the necessity is referred to the issue of the things, there to the intuition of divine foreknowledge"; which response he confirms by the alleged authority of Boethius — though he alleges it not from Boethius, but from Augustine. Nor wonder if among so many and so often alleged he should once err in one's name. However, if Augustine wrote down the same authority, I do not know — I do not recall — nor do I believe that it can be found in the books of Augustine. If, however, it is found in them, it is so much the more authentic and accepted.

Whom the holy Thomas follows, on Sentences I, dist. 38, last question, where, when it is asked, "Whether God's knowledge is of contingent things," in answering a certain argument, he thus says: "It must be said that the act of divine cognition passes over the contingent, even if it be future to us, just as our sight passes over it while it is; and because what is is necessary when it is, which yet absolutely is not necessary; therefore it is said that what is considered in itself is contingent, but related to God's cognition is necessary, because it is referred to it according as it is in actual being." And on this response he leans consequently in this whole matter.

Again, no man is freer than Jesus Christ; but all things which came about concerning Him came about of the necessity of superior causes, or of the divine will, as had been demonstrated in chapter 1 of this book.

CHAPTER XXVIII

Recites a certain erroneous gloss of the authorities.

To these things, however — and most of all to the authorities which make mention of necessity according to superior causes — the common response is that they speak of the necessity of the consequence, not of the consequent; or of conditional necessity, not absolute; or of the necessity of the saying [dictum], not of the thing; conjointly, not dividedly. And this Boethius seems to suggest where he was alleged; and so the gloss of the Decretum notes on the alleged authority of Boethius.

Likewise Anselm, On Concord 2: "When I say," he says, "If God foreknows something, it is necessary that it be future,' it is the same as if I should say, 'If it shall be, of necessity it shall be': and when I say, 'If it shall be, of necessity it shall be,' it is of the same value if it is so pronounced: 'That which shall be, of necessity shall be.' For this necessity signifies nothing other than this: that what shall be cannot at the same time not be." This is conditional necessity, of the consequence, or of the saying [dictum], and conjunctive — not, however, of the consequent, of the thing, or divided; and this alone he concedes, denying every other — which also below he more expressly manifests, when he says: "It is not the same that a thing be past, and that a past thing be past; or that a thing be present, and that a present thing be present; or that a thing be future, and that a future thing be future — just as it is not the same that a thing be white, and that a white thing be white. For wood is not always of necessity white; but sometimes, before it became white, it could be made not white, and after it is white, it can be made not white: but a white wood it is always necessary to be white, because neither before it is, nor after it is white, can it be made that the white not at the same time be white. Likewise a thing is not of necessity present, since before it was present, it could be made that it should not be present, and after it is present, it can be made not-present: but a present thing it is necessary always to be present, because neither before it is, nor after it is present, can it at the same time be not present. In the same manner, some thing — like some action — is not of necessity future, because before it is, it can be made that it not be future; but a future thing it is necessary to be future, because the future cannot at the same time be not future. Concerning the past, likewise it is true: that some thing is not of necessity past, since before it was, it could be made that it not be — and that a past thing is always necessary to be past, since it cannot at the same time not be past. But in a past thing there is something which is not in a present or future thing. For it can never be made that a thing which is past should be made not-past, just as a thing which is present can be made not-present, and a thing which is not of necessity future can be made not future. Therefore when 'future' is said of the future, it is necessary that be what is said, because the future is never not- future, just as as often as we say the same of the same. For when we say that every man is a man, or if he be a man, he is a man, or every white is white, and if it be white, it is white, it is necessary to be what is said, because a thing cannot at the same time be and not be. For if it be not necessary that every future be future, some future is not future, which is impossible. By necessity, therefore, every future is future, and if it is future, it is future — when 'future' is said of a future thing — but by a consequent necessity which forces nothing to be. When, however, 'future' is said of a thing, the thing is not always of necessity, although it is future. For if I say: 'Tomorrow there will be a sedition in the people,' nevertheless not by necessity will there be a sedition. For it can be made that, before it be, it not happen — even if it be future."

The same in book II, Cur Deus Homo 27, teaches the same. Whence he thus says: "If it be said that it was necessary that He should die by His own will, because the faith or prophecy concerning this had truly preceded, this is no other than if you should say: 'It was necessary that it should be future thus, because thus it was about to be future': but such necessity does not force a thing to be, but the being of the thing makes the necessity to be. For there is a preceding necessity, which is the cause that a thing be; and there is a consequent necessity, which the thing makes. Preceding and effecting necessity is, when it is said: 'Heaven is rolled, because it is necessary that it be rolled.' Consequent, on the contrary, is what effects nothing, but is — as when I say: 'You speak of necessity, because you speak.' For when I say this, I signify that nothing can make it that, while you speak, you do not speak — not that something compels you to speak. For the violence of natural condition compels the heavens to be rolled, but no necessity makes you to speak." And below: "By this consequent and effecting-nothing necessity (since the faith and prophecy concerning Christ were true, because of His will, not of necessity, He was about to die), it was necessary that it be so. By this He was made man; by this He did and suffered whatsoever He did and suffered; by this He willed whatsoever He willed. For therefore they were of necessity, because they were future, and they were future because they were, and they were because they were."

The holy Thomas also, where just now alleged, immediately after his foregoing authority, subjoins: "Whence the distinction is good, that something is necessary by necessity of consequence and not of consequent, or by conditioned necessity, not absolute"; and below he distinguishes this: "Everything known by God is necessary that it be" — because it can be of the saying [de dicto], and so true; or of the thing [de re], and so false. Who also in Summa Contra Gentiles I.67, 83, and 85, recites and expounds this distinction much more clearly and diffusely, and according to it always responds in this matter concerning future things. The Lombard also, in Sentences I, dist. 38 and 40, responds according to this distinction in this matter — whom almost all later Doctors commonly imitate.

But this response in many ways fails. First, because it is false; second, because it is incautious; third, because it is diminished. First, I say, it fails because it is false. For it falsely expounds the authorities which posit the necessity of all future things with respect to superior causes, or to the first cause, but not with respect to inferior or even second [causes], by saying that they speak only of the necessity of consequence or conditional. For this is not the understanding of the Authors, but another which it does not touch — which the preceding chapter expounded.

For if the Authors in such authorities spoke only of the necessity of consequence or conditional, they would have to concede that future things would necessarily come to pass with respect to the inferior and second causes, just as with respect to the superior and first. For the consequence or conditional in such matters with respect to second causes is just as necessary as with respect to the first. For just as this consequence or conditional is necessary — "God foreknows this to be future, or shall make this future" (or "If God foreknows or shall make this future, this shall be") — so is this: "A second cause foreknows this to be future, or shall make this future, therefore this shall be"; and likewise of the conditional.

Again, every doctrine ought to be of something doubtful or unknown; but this consequence or conditional was never doubtful or unknown to anyone — "God, or if God foreknows this to be future, therefore this is future or shall be"; what wise man, then, would write this to teach, since it is not teachable, but per se knowable to anyone, supposing the knowledge of the terms?

Again, if the Authors meant only this, they would in no way solve the proposed question. For supposing and conceding the necessity of consequence and the conditional of this kind, how is the perplexity of the question solved by this? For who, with only this necessity shown to him, will not as much as before doubt concerning free will, merit, demerit, the certitude, fallibility, or mutability of divine knowledge, and the other things touching this problem — since no one ever of sound head doubted concerning that necessity of consequence?

Why also did so many Authors write so many, so ambiguous and so difficult things on this matter and this necessity, if they wished to mean nothing else, when in one most short and easy word they could have dispatched it, by saying that in all such cases there is only the necessity of consequence or conditional?

To the same understanding of necessity they would have to concede that the Chimera, and all things not future, shall come to pass of necessity. For the consequence and conditional premised concerning them is just as necessary as concerning others. For necessarily it follows: "God foreknows, or if God foreknows, that the Chimera and all things not future shall come to pass, then those things shall come to pass." Nor can anyone respond that in past and future things the antecedent is posited as being [in esse], but in these not — and therefore there is not similar necessity here and there — because the consequence or conditional itself per se in things truly foreknown and future does not posit the antecedent in being, just as not in another matter, or other terms whatsoever, but only the necessity of consecution; and so does the other consequence or conditional foreseen.

Speaking, then, precisely of the said necessity alone, similar [necessity] must be conceded concerning the Chimera and all things not future or foreknown, just as concerning future things and things truly foreknown. For the consequence and conditional of this kind is firm by similar necessity, just as another of any sort. Furthermore, in this consequence: "God foreknows the Chimera to be future, therefore the Chimera shall necessarily be," the antecedent is supposed and posited just as in this: "God foreknows Antichrist to be future, therefore Antichrist shall necessarily be"; and the necessity of consequence is equal; therefore simply equal and similar is the necessity in both. Nor does it suffice to say that the antecedent in the second is true, and in the first false, and therefore there is not similar necessity here and there. For the falsity of the antecedent in no way diminishes the necessity of consequence, nor does its truth augment it, as no Dialectician is ignorant. Since therefore the necessity of consequence in no way includes the truth of the antecedent — looking at the necessity of consequence alone — the necessity is similar in both; and this alone in such cases this response posits; wherefore it has consequently to posit that as it is necessary that Antichrist be future, so also that the Chimera [be].

The text also and procedure of the Authors speaking concerning this necessity convict and refute this gloss as viperous — destructive, namely, of its own text, not expository. For the cause which Boethius assigns where above — why future contingents are necessary with respect to the divine cognition or will, and not with respect to inferior causes — is this: that with the divine cognition they are present, and what is, when it is, is necessary; but with inferior causes they are not present, but future, and therefore with them, before they are, they can not be.

For Boethius says, Consolation of Philosophy V, last prose: "Since every judgment comprehends those things which are subject to it according to its own nature, and to God there is always an eternal and present-making state, His knowledge also, having transcended all motion of time, remains in the simplicity of its presence, and embracing the infinite spaces of past and future, considers all things as if they were now being done in its simple cognition. Therefore, if you wish to weigh the presence by which He discerns all things, you will more rightly esteem it not foreknowledge as it were of the future, but knowledge of an instant never deficient; whence it is called not pre-vidence, but rather pro-vidence." And below: "No necessity compels the one walking by his will to walk, although it is necessary that, when he is walking, he walk. In the same way, then, if providence sees anything as present, it must be, although it have no necessity of nature; and indeed God beholds those future things which proceed from the liberty of free will as present. These therefore, referred to the divine intuition, are made necessary through the condition or disposition of the divine notion." And below, to a certain objector asking him: "What therefore does it matter that they are not necessary, since on account of the condition of the divine knowledge they happen in every way as it were necessarily?" — as if to say, if it be so, between being not necessary or necessary it makes no difference — Boethius thus responds: "This much it matters: that those things which I proposed a little before — the rising sun, and the walking man, which while they are happening cannot not be happening — yet of these one, before it was happening, was necessary to exist, the other not at all. So also those things which God has as present, without doubt shall exist; but of these one indeed descends from the necessity of the things, the other from the power of those doing. Not without justice, therefore, did we say: these things, if they be referred to the divine notice, are necessary; if they be considered through themselves, are absolved from the bonds of necessity."

Whom in this assigning of cause the holy Thomas follows, on Sentences I, dist. 38, q. 5, saying: "God from eternity not only saw the order of His own to a thing, from whose power the thing was future, but beheld the very being of the thing — which, in what manner it may be, Boethius evidently teaches in his book of Consolation. For all cognition is according to the mode of him who knows; therefore, since God is from eternity, it is necessary that His cognition have the mode of eternity, which is to be wholly at once without succession. Whence as, although time is successive, eternity is present to all times, one and the same indivisible — as a now standing — so His cognition beholds all temporal things, although they be successive, as present to itself, nor is any of them future with respect to itself, but one [is future] with respect to another. Whence according to Boethius it is better called providence than fore-vidence, because not as future, but all things as present, He provides by one intuition, as from a watchtower of eternity. But it can be called fore-vidence inasmuch as He knows that which is future to us, not to Him." And below: "The act of divine cognition passes over the contingent — even if it be future to us — just as our sight [passes] over it while it is; and because what is is necessary when it is, which yet absolutely is not necessary, therefore it is said that what is considered in itself is contingent, [but] related to God's cognition is necessary, because it is referred to it according as it is in actual being. And therefore it is altogether similar, as if I should see Socrates running presentially, which indeed in itself is contingent, but referred to my sight is necessary." And below: "What is known by God can be taken according to the condition by which it underlies the divine knowledge, and this is, according as it has determinate being, and so it has necessity; or it can be taken without that condition, namely as it is in its causes, before it is in act, and so it does not have necessity."

The venerable Anselm also in On Concord 3 and 4 gives a similar cause of a similar saying. For he says that all future things are necessary and immutable in eternity, but not necessary, but mutable, in time before they happen — because in eternity (as he says) there is no past or future, but only an immutable present.

This therefore is the cause of the Authors why all future things with respect to superior causes — namely, divine cognition and will — are necessary: because what is, when it is, is necessary; and all future things are there in presence and in act. And why with respect to inferior causes they are not necessary: because there they are not actually present, but future. How, then, do they speak of necessity, when they say "what is, when it is, is necessary" — whether of the necessity of consequence, or of saying, or of thing? — or do they understand the whole proposition in the conjoined or in the divided sense?

If they understand it in the second way, then since from that cause they consequently infer that all future things shall come to pass with respect to superior causes of necessity, they will mean a similar necessity; not therefore the necessity of consequence or of condition only, as this response feigns. If, however, they understand it in the first way according to the same understanding, they would have to concede that to-be or to-be-future what shall be, when it shall be, shall be necessary. For this consequence is just as necessary, "If something shall be, it shall be," as this: "If something is, it is"; and this, according to them, is just as necessary de dicto, or in the composite sense, as that. For it is just as impossible that anything be at once future and not future, as that anything at once presentially be and not be — which yet they do not concede, but deny, imitating the doctrine of the Philosopher, Peri Hermeneias I, last chapter, by saying that "what is, when it is, is necessary," but future things, before they come to pass — and this is, when and while they are future — are not necessarily about to happen, but it is possible that they not happen at all.

Furthermore, when Boethius, in assigning the difference between the necessary and the non-necessary in the foregoing authority, says that the rising sun and the walking man, while they are happening, cannot not be happening — yet one of them, namely the first, before it was happening, was necessary to exist, the other [i.e., that the man should be walking] not at all (insinuating that, before the man was walking, it was possible that he not walk) — how does he understand of the necessary and possible? Either simply altogether — namely, with respect to any superior or inferior causes — or in a certain respect, namely with respect to inferior natural causes?

He does not understand in the first way, because according to his view, both before and after that distinction laid down, just as one of them, before it was happening, was necessary with respect to the first cause, so the other; and because God works equally freely ad extra any effect whatsoever (as chapters 9 and 20 of book I, chapter 30 of book II, and the first supposition teach). It is not therefore more necessary, with respect to the divine will willing and doing both, that the sun rise than that the man walk, as also chapter 10 of book I proves. And because he says likewise that the other of them, before it was happening, was minimally necessary to exist (which cannot be understood with respect to the first cause — namely, divine providence and cognition — because, according to his view recited above, all things are there present), it is necessary therefore that he understand the necessity and possibility of these in the second-stated mode — namely, only with respect to natural and inferior causes, with respect to which alone such things are called future. Which his subsequent words also manifest: for he immediately subjoins, "Those things also which God has as present, without doubt shall exist; but of these one indeed descends from the necessity of the things." Of what things, except natural and inferior? And he adds, "the other; however, from the power of those doing"; from the power, namely, opposed to the said necessity — that is, free from the necessity of inferior causes: for the differences of opposites must be opposite.

This therefore, according to him, is the difference between necessities — for example, the rising of the sun — and non-necessaries but free — for example, the walking of a man: that those are necessary with respect to inferior causes, but these by no means, but free; so that according to him acts of free will are not called wholly and simply free, because not with respect to any causes (since with respect to superior they are called necessary), but they are called free in a certain respect only — namely, with respect to inferior causes — as chapters 5 and 9 of this book show. Wherefore also after his foregoing words he immediately subjoins: "Not without justice, therefore, did we say: these things, if they be referred to the divine notice, are necessary; if they be considered through themselves, are absolved from the bonds of necessity."

Boethius therefore in the alleged authorities understands that all future things shall come to pass of the necessity of superior causes, as the preceding chapter expounded — not of the necessity of consequence or conditional only, as this response dreamed; which still another word of his shows. For about to concede this necessity according to superior causes, and to deny another, he premised: "I will confess," he says, "a thing of most solid truth, but to which scarcely anyone, except the speculator of divine wit, would have access. For I shall reply that the same future thing, when it is referred to the divine notion, is necessary; but when it is weighed in its own nature, seems wholly free and absolute." If, however, he were speaking only of the necessity of consequence or conditional, who, even of asinine wit, would not most easily have access to its speculation? Who in known terms ever did not know this consequence or conditional: "God foreknows this to be future, or if God foreknows this to be future, this shall be"? And who, in philosophical or theological letters at least advanced to the threshold — or even an idiot believing in an omnipotent God — was ignorant of this consequence: "God provides and wills this to be, therefore this shall be"? Or who would not most easily have access to the speculation of this consequence?

He does not therefore speak of the necessity of consequence or conditional only, but of another declared in the preceding chapter. And if anyone has not at all gained access to the speculation of this necessity, let him impute it not, I pray, to me, but to the slowness of his own human wit — humbly and attentively asking that he may merit to receive some participation of divine wit, by which he may be able to speculate it. Nor let anyone esteem the authority of Boethius to be despised, since holy Augustine, Anselm, and Thomas, and many other Catholic Doctors imitate him in this matter. For he was a great Philosopher and Catholic Doctor, as his philosophical and theological books manifest, and at last crowned by happy martyrdom and inscribed in the catalogue of saints under the name Severinus: for he had many names according to the custom of the noble Romans, which are commonly prefixed at the beginnings of his books.

Secondly, this response fails as incautious: for it has not guarded against the necessity which it willed and believed to have guarded against, nor has it bestowed on us the free power which it willed and believed [to have bestowed]. For if this consequence is necessary — "God foreknows or pre-wills anything whatsoever, therefore that shall be" — and the antecedent is not in our power (as chapter 15 of book I and chapter 8 of this book show), then neither is the consequent in our simply free power that excludes any preceding necessity.

Thirdly, this response fails because it is greatly diminished. For although to some few authorities it apparently in some way responds, yet to the reasons made and to most numerous other authorities it does not respond and will not be able to respond. For how shall it be able to respond to the reasons there made, and especially to the syllogistic reason? How also shall it respond to Ecclesiasticus, Augustine, the Sibyl, our Lord Christ, Chrysostom, Paul, Job, Gregory, Tobit, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the Glossa? Or how shall it be able to respond to the necessity of divine fate, and to all the authorities and Parisian articles proving that? For no one positing fatal necessity posits it as necessity of consequence, but only as conditional.

By what color shall it be able to respond to the authorities of Augustine in City of God V.9 and 10? For never was any of the Stoics so foolish — nor any of laymen so unlettered — as to believe that every necessity of consequence or conditional is repugnant to the liberty of free will. For who is so rude or foolish as to be ignorant that the necessity of this consequence and conditional, "If you will freely, you will freely," is compatible with the liberty of free will? Why then would Augustine refute the Stoics positing this, if he himself there posit this same and no other? Why also does he in vain teach that this necessity does not take away liberty, when no man ever did not know this? Wherefore not doubtfully he willed there to mean not this necessity, but another patefact in the preceding chapter — which the words of the procedure show.

For speaking there of the necessity of divine fate — namely, said from speaking [fando] — he expounds that text of the Psalm: "God hath spoken once" — that is, immovably, that is, immutably He has spoken, just as He immutably knows all things which are future, and which He shall do. Then he reproves the Stoics, because they did not wish to subject our wills to such necessity, lest then they should not be free; and distinguishing concerning necessity, he removes their motive, showing that one necessity — namely, unwilling, which befalls us being unwilling, e.g., the necessity of dying — is repugnant to the liberty of free will; and that another necessity is defined, according to which we say "it is necessary that something be so, or be done so," which is not repugnant to the liberty of free will. Behold how plainly he expresses this necessity, and defines it by respect to the active cause, as the preceding chapter expounded; and this is twofold — namely, conservative and factive, as is taught in chapter 2 of book I. For the conservative he says, "necessity according to which we say, 'it is necessary that something be so'"; and for the factive he subjoins, "or be done so" — but of the necessity of consequence or conditional he makes no mention at all. Wherefore it does not seem that he wished to speak of the necessity of consequence or conditional only — which the exemplary reasoning, by which he shows his proposition, also clearly teaches.

For he shows the said necessity (according to which, namely, we say "it is necessary that something be so or be done so") not to be feared, lest it should take from us liberty of will — because we do not put the life and foreknowledge of God under necessity (namely, in the first manner, which takes away or diminishes liberty), if we say that it is necessary that God always live and foreknow all things — just as His power is not diminished when it is said that He cannot die or be deceived. In this reason he says nothing at all, nor does he understand, of the necessity of consequence or any conditional.

How also through this necessity can the other authorities of his, On Rebuke and Grace, mentioned in the preceding chapter, be expounded? That authority too of his, On Faith to Peter, how shall it be expounded by this subtle and logical gloss, known only to such [as understand] — nay rather perverted? — especially since he wills all his sayings in that little book to be understood according to the vulgar and customary mode of speaking of simple faithful or unfaithful, rude, untaught, that no sense of heretical falsity might creep upon them. Whence also at the head of the book he says: "Son Peter, I have received the epistle of your charity, in which you have signified that you wish to go to Jerusalem, and have requested to be instructed by our letters [as to] what rule of true faith you ought to hold in those parts, that no sense of heretical falsity might creep upon you." Who also at the heel of the book says: "These forty chapters meanwhile, most firmly pertaining to the rule of true faith, faithfully believe, strongly hold, truly and patiently defend; and if you have known anyone to dogmatize contrary to these, flee him as a pest, and cast him off as a heretic. For so do these things which we have laid down agree with the Catholic faith, that if anyone shall wish to oppose not only all but even single ones of them — in that he contumaciously contradicts each of these, and does not doubt to teach the contrary — he shall appear a heretic and enemy of the Christian faith, and on this account to be anathematized by all Catholics." Wherefore, most plainly affirming and most certainly asserting, "Most firmly," he says, "hold, and in no way doubt that it is so."

Likewise, how through this response shall Anselm be expounded — and especially in On Concord 3, where he says: "Those things which are temporally past, in likeness of the eternal present, are altogether immutable"? For this cannot be expounded of the immutability of consequence, conditional, or saying, but of the thing — since it is one pure categorical [proposition]. Since also immediately after he says that those things which are present in eternity can never not be present there, but present things in time can not be present there — either he means in the composite sense and de dicto, or in the divided sense and de re. Not in the first way: because thus the second part is false; for as this is not possible, "Things present in eternity are not present in eternity," so also this, "Things present in time are not present in time": he means therefore in the second way, just as the preceding chapter [shows], as both his words and procedure evidently indicate.

For the motives of this response, however, it is to be known that that distinction concerning the necessity of consequence or of consequent, conditional or absolute, de dicto or de re, is in its cases good — as in this and the like: "If I am to read tomorrow, it is necessary that I read tomorrow." However, the reasons and authorities premised in the preceding chapter cannot reasonably be expounded — nor to that meaning only — through it, as has been shown above.

First, however, for the saying of Boethius, it is to be observed that he could very fittingly have said this exemplarily. For seeing that it would be very difficult to understand in what way something could be necessary with respect to the will and cognition of God, and free in its own nature, he wished somehow to show this through a manifest example, that thus, through easier and more known things, he might lead the slower to more difficult and more unknown — as in every philosophical and theological discipline this is a frequent and useful manner of teaching, by examples; wherefore not unreasonably is the example reckoned among the species of argument by Logicians.

Wishing therefore to show that some future things are necessary with respect to the first cause, and free in their own nature, he advisedly said: "There are two necessities, one simple — like that 'it is necessary that all men be mortal'; another conditional, like 'if you know someone walking, it is necessary that he walk'" — that thus by the first he might deny pure necessity from contingent future things, and by the second (in which the consequent is necessary with respect to the antecedent, and free in its own nature) he might somehow show — though much disparately and remotely — that it can be so concerning freely future things with respect to the first cause. For this is the cause naturally antecedent, from which all free things necessarily follow: necessarily, I say, with respect to it, not in their own nature — as the preceding chapter expounded.

Wherefore in the whole subsequent procedure he always denies the necessity of nature and of coercion from free acts; another, however — namely, according to superior causes — never. Which yet, as it seems, he would sometime have done if he had in no way posited it. Nay, both here and in IV, prose 6, he always proves it, expressly sustains and defends it — as the whole of his procedure testifies, and especially the authorities recited in the preceding chapter.

Secondly, I say, for the understanding of Boethius and all others, who say expressly that in such cases there is conditional necessity, of consequence, of saying, or conjointly, but not of consequent, of thing, or dividedly: that this is true to a twofold understanding. First, because according to them in every such conditional, consequence, saying, and composite enunciation there is absolute necessity, but in the consequent, or thing, or divided enunciation by no means. Secondly, in the common and customary mode of speaking: for thus the consequence is necessary with all, but the consequent is not so. For the necessity and liberty of such consequents, according to the more common and customary mode of speaking, are reckoned only according to inferior causes — concerning which both the common people and the professors of almost all the sciences consider very much and speak, as chapters 5 and the preceding chapter teach.

Thirdly, for the understanding of Boethius — because the Philosophers are wont to weigh few words with many meanings (Ovid in book III De Vetula saying, "Speaking few, they wished much weight to underlie their words") — I believe that by the necessity of condition, besides the said conditional necessity, he wished to mean with Anselm a concomitant or consequent necessity, which arises in some manner from the placing of the present thing in being, and necessarily accompanies it and follows it while it is present; according to which, by the Philosophers and Theologians, and according to all generally, it is said that everything which is, when it is, must be, as chapter 2 of this book more fully taught. Who, therefore, could thus reasonably understand, since just as in a conditional from a necessary antecedent the consequent necessarily follows, so also in things, from any thing presentially placed in being — as from a cause antecedent according to nature, or at least including a cause antecedent according to nature — necessarily really follows, as if inseparable, a consequent according to nature, because [it is] a posterior naturally a certain such necessity. Of this, however, as of all others, the Sophists are able sophistically to wrangle, asking what is that consequent necessity which necessarily follows every thing — and what seems more wonderful, every non-thing. For as "that which is, when it is, is necessary," so also "that which is not, when it is not." This necessity, however, cannot be caused or descend from non-being. To these, however, and the like, chapters 13 and 14 of book I [will] respond.

If, however, he wished to understand the first necessity — namely, conditional — well indeed; but the second — namely, consequent or following — I firmly believe he wished to mean, as both his view and his words indicate evidently. For the cause of this necessity, according to him, is this: that future things are present with the divine cognition or providence; and everything that is present, while it is present, is necessary to be — as is shown above. Wherefore, evidently showing that by condition he by no means means conditional, but the disposition or state, present or in the manner of presence, of the divine cognition, he thus says: "No necessity compels the one walking by his will to walk, although it is necessary that, when he is walking, he walk. In the same way, then, if providence sees anything as present, that thing must be, although it have no necessity of nature; and indeed God beholds those future things which proceed from the liberty of free will as present. These therefore, referred to the divine intuition, are made necessary through the condition of the divine notion."

Whence Robert of Lincoln [Grosseteste], On Free Will 3, surpassing the elders in understanding, and most profoundly investigating this matter even unto its foundation, says: "Twofold," he says, "is necessity, as Anselm distinguishes in book II of Cur Deus Homo, chapter 17: one which he calls preceding necessity, which is the cause that a thing be, and forces a thing to be; the other which he calls consequent necessity, which is not the cause of a thing, nor forces a thing to be: and this, as he himself says, is that necessity where Aristotle treats of singular and future propositions. It seems to destroy to-either-alternative, and to establish all things to be of necessity. And by this consequent and effecting-nothing necessity, it is necessary that God know my future sitting tomorrow, and similar things. From things necessary by this consequent necessity, no inconvenience follows, but rather a contingent seems to follow necessarily: for while I sit, it is necessary that I sit, and after I have sat, it is necessary that I have sat. But what comparison these sayings have, that I sit and that I have sat, to my sitting while I sit and after I have sat — the same comparison the knowledge of God has to my future sitting before I sit; for He knows future things as present."

And below: "These two necessities — from one of which only the necessary follows, but from the other (as has been said) a contingent seems to follow — I think Boethius called the simple necessity and the necessity of condition; although some understand the necessity of condition not as that which has been said above to be the consequent necessity, but the necessity of consecution of the consequent to the antecedent: as when it is said, 'If a man runs, he moves his feet'; here is the necessity of consecution of consequent to antecedent, although both — namely, both the consequent and the antecedent — are contingent." And he adds: "From the words, however, of Boethius himself, more deeply considered, it can better be weighed that he called the necessity of condition that which we above called the consequent necessity. For he says: 'The same future, when it is referred to the divine notion, is necessary; but when it is weighed in its own nature, it seems wholly free and absolute.' And after a few [words]: 'And indeed God beholds those future things which proceed from the liberty of free will as present. These therefore, referred to the divine intuition, are made necessary through the condition of the divine notion; but considered through themselves, do not desert the absolute liberty of their own nature.' And again: 'These things, if referred to the divine notice, are necessary; if considered through themselves, are absolved from the bonds of necessity.' What other do these words savor than this: that those things which in their own nature are contingent to-either-alternative, flexible, and mutable, in God's notice are invariable — not on account of the invariability of the things, but on account of the immutability of the knowledge of God?"

Furthermore, for the understanding of Boethius, it is to be known that by the necessity of condition or conditional, he could reasonably mean a consecutive necessity between an unimpedible cause and its caused; because, just as in a verbal conditional from the verbal antecedent the verbal consequent necessarily verbally follows, so also in the condition or real connection of the unimpedible cause and the caused, from the cause which naturally precedes — as from a real antecedent — there really necessarily follows (because it is naturally posterior) its caused, which is its real consequent. And this is respective necessity, namely with respect to superior and inferior causes — of which the first he concedes in free acts, but the second he denies, as has been shown above.

This I judge probably to be the meaning of the Authors who say that whatsoever — or, if anything — God wills, foreknows, or provides, shall come to pass of necessity. Because according to them God's will, foreknowledge or knowledge, and providence are causes of things; and unimpedible causes; but efficacious altogether, and necessary in causing — as chapters 9, 15, 27, and what follows, with chapter 10 of book I, teach.

The Glossa of the Decretum, however, could be understood according to the second understanding of Boethius said above; but the gloss could also have expounded its text more closely through consequent necessity, or through the consecutive necessity of superior causes, as the surface of the letter offers, as the foregoing also expound. But perhaps because that exposition would have been too difficult and much more diffuse, passing over it in silence, it chose the easier and shorter, not prejudicing the better.

However, if anyone leans pertinaciously on this gloss, let him beware, I pray, lest perchance he lean on a reed which shall enter and pierce his hand. Behold what it says in the end: "This," he says, "is twofold. It is necessary that this come to pass which God foresaw: de dicto it is true; de re it is false. For that thing which God foresaw, it is not necessary that it come to pass. And note that this argumentation is not valid: 'If God foresaw something, that thing shall necessarily come to pass; therefore if God foresaw something, it is necessary that it come to pass' — because this expression necessary cannot determine that consequence, but only the consequent."

This gloss therefore wishes to deny all such [statements]: "That which God foreknows or foreknew, provides or provided, wills or willed any thing — it is necessary that it come to pass"; because necessity, according to it, in all such [cases] is referred not to the consequence, but to the consequent — not to the saying, but to the thing only.

But behold how diligently it has regarded the text of Boethius and of the Decretum which it expounds by glossing! "If anything," says the text of both, "providence as present sees, it must be," or "it is necessary that it be." Behold likewise how diligently it has regarded the words of canonical Scripture and of the Doctors. For Luke 24, Truth itself says, "It is necessary that all things be fulfilled which are written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me." And Matthew 18: "It is necessary that scandals come." Which Luke 17, expounding equipollently: "It is impossible," he says, "that scandals should not come."

Augustine also, On Free Will III.11: "So far," he says, "is it from being true that the sins of the creature are esteemed to be deputed to the Creator, although the things which He foreknew were future come about of necessity, that, when you have said you find no way how whatever is necessary to be done in His creature should not be deputed to Him, I, on the contrary, shall not find a way, nor confirm one to be findable, or to be at all, by which to Him should be deputed whatsoever in His creature is so done of necessity that it is done by the will of those sinning."

Like view, with similar manner of speaking, are uttered by his many authorities alleged in the preceding chapter. Anselm also says, On Concord 2: "What God foreknows as future, it is necessary that it be future"; and below, "If God foreknows something, it is necessary that it be future." Who also in book II of Cur Deus Homo 17: "Nothing," he says, "is necessary or impossible, except because He Himself wills [it]." In his Meditation on Human Redemption he also thus says: "Christian soul, soul resuscitated from a heavy death — every necessity and impossibility of His underlies the will, since what He wills, it is necessary that it be, and what He does not will, it is impossible that it be." A similar view, similarly, many learned men also utter.

For the understanding of Anselm, however, it is to be known that according to his view there is a twofold necessity, namely preceding and consequent, and each of these is threefold. Now preceding necessity, according to him, is an active cause indefectible in acting, which, namely, being placed, its effect necessarily follows. And this is twofold: because some [is] compatible with liberty, but some destroying liberty; and this latter is twofold: for some such necessity is natural, but some such necessity is violent. These three modes are sufficiently known from chapters 2 and 10 of this book; which also can be elicited manifestly from book II of On Concord, where also in matters of free will he concedes the first of these (as the preceding chapter recited), and denies the other two.

Consequent necessity also is twofold: one dictional or consequential and complex; the other, however, real and incomplex. Now consequent dictional or consequential and complex necessity is the necessity of some saying or composite enunciation — i.e., conjunctly in the composite sense — or conditional necessity or necessity of consequence. And this, according to the Logic of Anselm in On Concord 2, is so great a necessity that its opposite formally implies and involves contradiction, as his alleged authority evidently indicates. Wherefore he has consequently to concede that such [necessity] is utterly absolute. In the thing, however, and in the consequent there is no absolute necessity, as was said in the second exposition of Boethius.

However, according to the probable Logic of the Moderns of Oxford, not all those propositions in which the same is said of the same are reckoned necessary, as Anselm and the older Doctors suppose. For this would not be necessary, nor true, but false, if no man existed, "Man is man"; for it follows: "Man is man, therefore man is a rational animal" — for this is from the per se understanding of that — "therefore man is animal; therefore animal is man"; though yet, no man existing but other animals (as before the creation of Adam was the case), every animal would be irrational and not man; and no animal would be rational nor man.

To that which they are wont to object — "Therefore indeed man is not man" — there is twofold response. For some simply concede this; and if it be argued further, "therefore something is man, and that is not man," they deny that consequence, because the antecedent is simply negative, nor does it posit or imply anything (as they say) — just as neither does this, "The Chimera is not animal," or "is not man." Others, however, denying this — "Man is man" — concede its contradictory thus: "Not-man, or no man, is man"; and so always by prepending the negation, they say the contradictory must be given. Equipollences, however, the Philosopher says always hold, unless something special impedes and is repugnant. But because these things pertain more to Logicians than to Theologians, let it suffice in this place to have briefly touched these things.

Now consequent real and incomplex necessity is twofold: one is presential, the other is causal or effectual — to apply names as closely as possible, though somewhat by transference. Now consequent real and presential necessity can be called from the present thing, or from presence. For this necessarily follows every present thing in this manner: that everything which is, when it is, by this necessity is necessary to be, as was said in the third exposition of Boethius. For this view Anselm says, On Concord 2, in this way: "Because the thing is posited to be, it is said to be of necessity; or because it is posited not to be, it is affirmed not to be of necessity." And below: "What free will wills, it both can [will], and cannot not will, and it is necessary that it will. For it can not will before it wills, because it is free; and when it now wills, it cannot not will, but it is necessary that it will, since it is impossible to it that it both will and not will the same simultaneously." And there follows: "But the work of the will, to which it is given that what it wills, be — is in two ways necessary: because by the will it is forced to come to pass, and because what is, cannot at the same time not come to pass." Who also below in chapter 3 says that future things are necessary in eternity and with God, the cause of which he assigns, because there they are present, not future — as has been shown above.

The same also in book II Cur Deus Homo 17: "The being of the thing," he says, "makes the necessity of being. For there is a preceding necessity, which is the cause that the thing be; and there is a consequent necessity which the thing makes. Preceding and effecting necessity is, when it is said, 'Heaven is rolled, because it is necessary that it be rolled.' But consequent — and which effects nothing, but is — is when I say, 'You speak of necessity, because you speak.'"

Now this consequent necessity cannot only be expounded through dictional or consequential necessity, since whether the thing be or not be, whether you speak or not speak, according to his view in On Concord 2 recited above, this saying is always necessary of any thing whatsoever: "Such a thing is such a thing," and "You speaking, speak"; and the consequence likewise: "If such a thing is, such a thing is"; and "If you speak, you speak." This therefore is not that consequent necessity which he says is made by things, but that real necessity said above, which necessarily follows from every thing.

His subsequent words also seem to attest this: "This," he says, "is that necessity which, where Aristotle treats of singular and future propositions, seems to destroy to-either-alternative and to establish all things to be of necessity." But in Peri Hermeneias I, last chapter, where Aristotle treats of these things, no such necessity appears to be posited which could seem to destroy to-either-alternative and to establish all things to be of necessity, except the said real and presential necessity, which affirms that everything which is, when it is, must be; and similarly concerning what is not. Whence he thus says: "To be, what is, when it is, and not to be, what is not, when it is not, is necessary; but not everything which is, is necessary to be, nor everything which is not, is necessary not to be" (supply: simply).

This understanding of Anselm concerning consequent necessity is also testified by the alleged authority of Robert of Lincoln recited above, in which he first alleges from him a twofold necessity — namely, preceding and consequent; and below shows that the necessity of condition, which Boethius asserts, is not the necessity of consecution, but the consequent necessity which he predicted — namely, presential, as has been shown in the third exposition of Boethius.

Now consequent real, causal, or effectual necessity can be called from the cause or from the effect; and seems to be that consecutive necessity between an unimpedible cause and its effect, in the fourth exposition of Boethius said above, on account of the reason and cause similarly assigned there. And this understanding the authorities of Anselm alleged in the preceding chapter sufficiently seem to attest.

And if anyone objects that then antecedent and consequent necessity would be the same — it must be said that this is sufficiently possible — nay, even necessary, by diverse respects and diverse reasons. Yet preceding necessity properly and strictly taken is only a cause, or in a cause indefectible in causing — concerning which chapter 2 of this book has spoken; and this corresponds to the logical antecedent in a logical consequence. Consequent necessity, however — real, causal, or effectual — can be taken in two ways. In one way, that it be only an effect, or in the effect of such a cause unimpedible in causing — and corresponds to the said preceding necessity, as effect to efficient and patient to agent; and this is likened to the logical consequent in a logical consequence. In another way, that it embrace as it were both — namely, that it be the consecutive necessity, or consecution, or real consequence itself between such a cause and its caused, just as logical consecution or consequence is not in the antecedent or consequent alone, but embraces both, and is a certain habitude in the middle between them; and this consequent real necessity corresponds to the whole necessary logical consequence.

However, it is to be known that antecedent or preceding necessity has a twofold understanding. For in one way it is taken as has here been said, and as chapter 2 of this book defines it; in another way for necessity simply and utterly absolute. For this naturally precedes every other necessity; or for the natural necessity preceding naturally necessary effects — which Robert of Lincoln also seems to suggest in On Free Will 3, where he says: "From the necessary, according to the view of Boethius, a contingent seems to follow — yet not from the absolute or antecedent necessary, which forces the thing to be, but from the necessary of condition and consequent, which permits the thing to be free." Who also below, chapter 10, reckons antecedent and simple necessity as the same. Who also in a certain question of his concerning the knowledge of God, when it is asked, "In what manner does God know those things which happen by chance, or from free will," distinguishing twofold cause — namely, antecedent and conjoined — defining the antecedent cause: "It is," he says, "the antecedent cause — namely, pre-ordaining — that according to the course of nature some thing should come to pass of necessity, like an eclipse of the sun and moon"; and below, after the response that God is not the antecedent cause of effects of this kind, but conjoined, removing one possible objection, he subjoins: "God's doing and His knowing are the same; nor does it follow: 'God's knowledge, which is the cause of the thing, is eternal, therefore it is antecedent'; for the antecedence of which we now speak is the necessary preordination of a future event according to the course of nature."

This also seems to consonate with the words and mind of Anselm, On Concord, and book II Cur Deus Homo, where he was alleged. For On Concord 2, denying antecedent necessity in free acts, he concedes it in the rising of the sun. And Cur Deus Homo II.17, likewise denying antecedent necessity from things of free will, he concedes it in the rolling motion of heaven. For "the violence," as he says, "of natural condition compels the heavens to be rolled."

The understanding of holy Thomas can also be elicited manifestly from what has gone before. For he concedes the necessity of saying, not of thing; the necessity of consequence, of condition, and of supposition — but denies another. For the necessity of condition and from supposition, in his manner of speaking and in the common manner of speaking of the Parisian Doctors, can be expounded in two ways. For some is dictional and complex; some, however, is real and incomplex; and this latter is twofold: some presential, but some consecutive, causal, or effectual, as has been distinguished concerning Anselm's consequent necessity above. For consequence and consecution is twofold: dictional or logical, and real; and this latter is twofold: presential and causal or effectual, on account of the reason and cause assigned in the exposition of Boethius and Anselm above.

Saint Thomas therefore concedes the necessity of saying and of consequence, for necessity simply absolute, according to the Logic of Anselm and of the older Doctors recited above. The necessity of thing and of consequent, however, he denies in similar understanding. Which his words also indicate manifestly: "Good," he says, "is the distinction, that something is necessary by necessity of consequence and not by necessity of consequent; or by conditioned necessity, not absolute" — as was alleged above. Who also in Summa Contra Gentiles I.67, speaking of such necessary, says: "This is not necessary absolutely, but under condition, and by the necessity of consequence." And below, chapter 83: "Although God concerning things caused does not necessarily will anything absolutely, He does will something necessarily from condition, or from supposition." And below, chapter 85: "Necessity from supposition in the cause cannot conclude absolute necessity in the effect; God, however, wills something in the creature not by absolute necessity, but only by the necessity which is from supposition: from the divine will, therefore, absolute necessity cannot be concluded in created things; but this alone excludes contingency."

Saint Thomas therefore wishes only to deny absolute necessity excluding contingency. Necessity, however, of consequence, of condition, and of supposition — real, presential — he concedes, as in the assignment of the cause of necessity which he posits, recited above, clearly appears. Necessity also of consequence, of condition, and of supposition — real, causal, or effectual — he suggests and affirms, if his view and words be intimately scrutinized; which the cause assigned above in the fourth exposition of Boethius evidently shows.

Otherwise, however, and more briefly, it can be said that necessity, according to him, is not predicated according to superior causes, but inferior only — as the preceding chapter recited. When therefore he denies necessity from free acts, he means concerning necessity with respect to inferior causes, as the preceding chapter alleged. According to these expositions premised — or any of them — the Lombard and other Doctors making distinctions of this kind can be understood.

Thomas Bradwardine, De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium

Book III, Chapters XXIX–XXX

CHAPTER XXIX. [B] HE OBJECTS AND RESPONDS.

The deceptive response which sought to undermine the fortifications of necessity according to the higher causes (which had been laid out earlier) having now been excluded, the clamorous assault of the Pelagians comes rushing in from every side. Of their attacks, the first and sharpest is this: If a man is necessitated to do anything whatsoever, he does not sin. For according to Augustine, On Free Will, Book III, ch. 28: "No one sins in that which can in no way be avoided."

And in On the Two Souls, ch. 18, he says: "To hold anyone guilty of sin because he has not done what he could not do is the height of iniquity and madness." Hence Jerome also, in his Explanation of the Faith to Pope Damasus, Epistle 32, says: "We execrate the blasphemy of those who say that anything impossible has been commanded by God to man, and that God's commandments cannot be observed by individuals but only by all in common." And it follows: "We so confess free will that we say that we always need God's help, and that those err equally who say with the Manichee that man cannot avoid sin, and those who assert with Jovinian that man cannot sin." Whence also the Apostle in 1 Corinthians 10: "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that which you are able, but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that you may be able to bear it." In agreement with these, the Philosopher [Aristotle], Ethics III, ch. 12, says that all and only vices that are reproached are in our power, that is, in our power; and Metaphysics V, ch. 6: "It seems that necessity is rightly held to be something not reproachable."

Likewise, precepts are reasonably given to men; therefore they are simply within men's power, as the authority of Jerome cited above attests. Hence Deuteronomy 30: "This commandment which I give thee this day," says Moses, "is not above thee, nor far off, nor placed in heaven, that thou mightest say: Which of us can ascend to heaven to bring it to us, that we may hear and fulfill it in work? Nor is it placed beyond the sea, that thou mightest plead and say: Which of us can cross the sea, and bring it unto us, that we may hear and do that which is commanded? But the word is very near thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it." Hence the Philosopher, Ethics III, ch. 11: "Whatever things are neither in our power nor voluntary, no one urges anyone to perform; for as no purpose is served by persuading someone—say, not to grow warm, or feel pain, or be hungry—since we shall suffer these none the less."

Likewise, then all good and evil merit would perish, and all freedom of choice, since nothing would be freely in man's power. Likewise, then all reproaches or praises, exhortations or dissuasions, prayers, and universally all good and evil operations would seem superfluous; and this in part is the reasoning of Augustine, On Free Will III, ch. 1, and of the Philosopher, Ethics III, ch. 11. Hence the same Philosopher in On Interpretation I, last chapter, proves that not all things either are or come about by necessity, because then there would be no need to deliberate or to engage in business; "For," he says, "if we do this, this will be; but if not, it will be not." Therefore this opinion subverts all polity, corrupts all morals, and overturns all probity. Likewise, this opinion renders men negligent toward the good, prone to evil, indeed even presumptuous in the end, or finally despairing, and therefore eternally to perish; since according to it, whatever men do or do not do, all things will not happen any more or less, nor not happen.

Besides these, very many other clever arguments are raised by others. "Many things," some say, "are done which we are free to impede." For as they argue by example: This little child who has been baptized and is finally to be damned because of a future sin which he will commit when grown up, can be killed at once in a state of grace and saved. Likewise, they say, we all experience in ourselves complete liberty; therefore we all have in ourselves complete liberty.

Hence Augustine, On Free Will III, ch. 1, says: "I see, and in some way touch and hold what you say to be true, namely concerning the freedom of the soul. For nothing do I sense so firmly and so intimately as that I have a will, and that I am moved by it to do something." Likewise, if our will were thus [necessitated], it would not be in our free power, and therefore nothing whatsoever would be, as Augustine says in On Free Will III, ch. 1: "I find absolutely nothing that I can call mine if the will, by which I will or do not will, is not mine."

Likewise, then God would be the author of sin, therefore not a just accuser nor avenger. Likewise, they say: "I am unwilling to have him as my God, who impels me to evil." Likewise, then difficulty and ignorance would excuse no one from sin, because neither would the impossibility of avoiding it. Likewise, then before man's fall into sin there would not have been a greater possibility or freedom of avoiding sin than there is now after the fall—against Peter [Lombard], Sentences II, dist. 25, and against Bernard and similarly Hugh: For then he could not have avoided sin, except by absolute power, and now he cannot either. Likewise, natural and fatal necessity is incompatible with merit; therefore so is any other necessity. Likewise, then there would not be greater liberty in man than in a brute beast: For man cannot not do whatever he is going to do, except by absolute power, and so and not otherwise can a brute. Likewise, then man could not sin, because it is necessary for him always in all things to will as God wills him to will, and this is to will justly and rightly, as is clear through Anselm, On Free Will ch. 8, and On Concord ch. 5.

Likewise, then there would not be greater liberty in the wayfarer than in one finally confirmed in glory. For the wayfarer cannot will the opposite of anything he is going to do, except by absolute power, and the comprehensor [the blessed in heaven] can do likewise; therefore he cannot merit more than the latter; rather, he is also finally confirmed like the latter. Likewise, if future things will come about by some kind of necessity, this is on account of the divine will, namely because God wills them to be; therefore the divine will or volition is the cause of that necessity, and is naturally prior to it; therefore it can exist without that necessity: hence from the divine will with respect to future things, the necessity of future things does not necessarily follow. Likewise, the will is of itself free according to contradiction; therefore God can assist it in such a way that it freely uses this kind of liberty. Likewise, it is more perfect that God so assist the will that it operate freely, than that it operate necessarily; therefore this, and not the other, must be attributed to God.

Likewise, then no one sins by omitting what he ought to do, since Augustine says in On the Two Souls, ch. 18: "To hold anyone guilty of sin because he did not do what he could not do is the height of iniquity and madness." Likewise, then God would permit nothing except what He properly causes, nor would the permission and action of God differ, nor the will of permission from the will of good pleasure—the opposite of which all the Doctors concordantly attest. Likewise, then God would will and love sin, against Psalm 5: "For thou art not a God that willest iniquity"; and against Psalm 44: "Thou hast loved justice and hated iniquity." Likewise, very many canonical authorities condemn this. Hence Genesis 4: "Under thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt have dominion over him"; and Ecclesiasticus 15: "God made man from the beginning, and left him in the hand of his own counsel," etc., as follows; and 1 Corinthians 7: "He who hath determined, being steadfast in his heart, having no necessity, but having power of his own will, and hath judged this in his heart to keep his virgin, doth well." Many other passages similar in letter and meaning could be added.

Likewise, if all things came about necessarily with respect to higher causes, this would be by preceding necessity, against Anselm, Cur Deus Homo II, ch. 17, who shows that the free acts of men and of Christ neither were nor are necessary by preceding necessity, but only by following necessity. Hence he says thus: "Preceding and efficient necessity is when it is said the heavens revolve, because it is necessary that they revolve. But following necessity, which produces nothing, but is itself produced, is when I say that you of necessity speak, because you are speaking. When I say this, I signify that nothing can bring it about that, while you speak, you do not speak; not that anything compels you to speak. For the violence of natural condition compels the heavens to revolve, but no necessity makes you speak." And below: "By this following and effecting-nothing necessity, since the faith and prophecy concerning Christ was true—because He was going to die from will, not from necessity—it was necessary that it should be so; by this He was made man; by this He did and suffered whatever He did and suffered; by this He willed whatever He willed. For these things were necessary because they were going to be, and were going to be because they were, and were because they were. And if you wish to know the true necessity of all that He did and suffered, know that all things were of necessity because He Himself willed; but no necessity preceded His will. Therefore, if these things were not, except because He Himself willed, if He had not willed, they would not have been. So therefore no one took His soul from Him, but He laid it down Himself, and took it again, because He had power to lay down His soul and to take it again, as He Himself says."

The same author in On Concord, qq. 3, 4, and 2, says that things of free will, before they come to pass in man, can both be changed and not come about through free will and in time, as chapters 27 and 28 of this book argued more fully. Boethius also, in On the Consolation of Philosophy V, last prose: "Those things which proceed from free will, before they come to pass, could have failed to occur." Anselm too, in On Concord ch. 2, says: "If it is asked concerning the sin of the will itself when it sins by willing, whether it is by necessity, the answer is that just as it does not will from necessity, so the sin of the will is not from necessity, nor does the same will operate by necessity." Robert of Lincoln [Grosseteste] also, in On Free Will ch. 10, says that for Peter the predestined to be saved—not necessarily but contingently—it is necessary that he be thus saved; and he adds: "But I call it necessary by following necessity, not by antecedent necessity." Likewise, Bernard, On Grace and Free Will chs. 4 and 5, distinguishing a threefold liberty—from sin, from misery, and from necessity—says that the last belongs to free will. Hence in ch. 5 he says thus: "Liberty from necessity belongs equally and indifferently to God and to the entire rational creature, both good and evil."

And to say much in few words: Authors are adduced in great number—almost all logical and philosophical writers, and truly all theological writers—who seem to deny necessity in free acts. Whence Robert, Archbishop of Canterbury, condemned at Oxford a certain error which said that Every true proposition about the future is necessary; and Stephen, Bishop of Paris, condemned at Paris another error which laid down that Nothing is by chance, but all things come about by necessity, and that all future things which will be will be by necessity, and those that will not be it is impossible to be, and that nothing happens contingently, considering all the causes—an error, he says, because the concurrence of causes is part of the definition of the chance event in the Book of Consolation. Likewise another in this form: that God necessarily does whatever is done immediately by Him—an error, whether it be understood of the necessity of coercion (because it removes liberty), or of the necessity of immutability (because it imposes the impossibility of doing otherwise). Bernard also, in his Epistle 10 to Pope Innocent, reckons as heretical the saying of Peter Abelard that God can do or omit only those things, or only in that manner, or only at that time at which He does them, and no other—which the same Pope, as appears from his rescript among Bernard's letters cited as the fourteenth, condemned as heretical.

But certain reasonings strive to destroy the aforesaid necessity, or to use that necessity through them; for, as they say, if the reasonings of this opinion show that all things which will come about will come about by necessity of the higher causes, it can similarly be shown that all things which will come about will come about by necessity of the lower causes, because the divine will will be necessarily fulfilled through these as well as through those. Again, they say that through the reasoning of this opinion its opposite can be shown, or at least the possibility of its opposite. For God can will some creature to be able to act freely without any necessity whatsoever; which is argued by some thus: For God to will the creature to act freely is different from God's willing the creature to act necessarily; therefore this willing can be separated from the other, and since the will of God is efficacious, it is possible for the creature to act freely without any necessity whatsoever. Furthermore, they say: If according to the reasoning of this opinion, because God wills all future things to come about, therefore they will come about by necessity; then by similar reasoning, because God wills certain future things to be able to come about in no way, it is necessary that certain future things be able to come about in no way; therefore it is possible that certain future things in no way come about, and it is necessary that all future things come about—which most plainly contradict.

But whoever is surrounded by the shield of truth from these and similar arrows and assaults of the Pelagians, even should they have suborned the noonday demon, will not fear. The first argument indeed is the proper argument of Pelagius and his followers. For Augustine cites this argument as Pelagius' own in Retractations I, ch. 9, and On Nature and Grace, ch. 67, and responds. For that book [On Nature and Grace], as is clear from Retractations I, ch. 9, and Retractations II, ch. 42, was written against a certain book of Pelagius. This argument, almost in its own form, is also reported by Augustine from Caelestius the Pelagian in On the Perfection of Justice, ch. 2; and in another form, but with the same perverse meaning, in many subsequent passages, where he responds. The venerable Bede also, Against Julian XII, cites the same clever argument from Julian's letter to Demetrias, of which the thirty-fifth [chapter] of Book I made mention, and responds. Peter [Lombard] following them, in Sentences II, dist. 28, cites this same argument from the Pelagians and resolves it. But because this is their strongest argument, I shall treat it for a little while more thoroughly:

This argument can equally be made about meriting well as about sinning. For if no one sins in that which he cannot avoid, by the same reasoning no one merits in that which he cannot avoid or omit—which is false concerning Christ and the confirmed angels according to some opinion, as is evident in Book I of this work and in the proof of its corollary, and as Book II of this work shows. Also, everyone who now merits, necessarily now merits, because according to that common saying of the Philosopher: What is, when it is, necessarily is—which appears more clearly if someone merits in the first instant of attaining adulthood or awakening, or if an angel or man, created with the things necessary for meriting, were to merit in the same instant in which he was created (as was the case with Christ according to His human nature). Otherwise He would not have advanced in merit, against all Catholic Doctors who interpret in a Catholic sense Luke 2: "Jesus advanced in wisdom, age, and grace before God and men"; many of whom Thomas's Gloss recites there. Only Ambrose seems to think the contrary, but Peter [Lombard] in Sentences III, dist. 13, brings him into agreement with the others. The same is held by Gregory on Ezekiel I, homily 6, whom the same Peter cites in Sentences III, dist. 18, who in both of those distinctions shows and holds the same. This same point can be drawn entirely from the demonstration of the eighth corollary of the fifth chapter of this book.

Likewise, whoever wishes to avoid this necessity in merits will, with the heretic Pelagius, against Catholic truth, hold that our merits proceed in no way from God but only from our free will—as is clear from blessed Augustine, On Grace and Free Will, chs. 16 and 17, as the thirty-eighth chapter of Book I argued more fully. This can also be established from the forty-fifth and forty-sixth chapters of Book I and from many other places.

Likewise, no one sins except in that which he cannot avoid, at least for the present, because no one sins except by a present sin, which when it is, cannot not be. And if anyone says that he could have avoided it earlier, he does not press the point nor answer it; for even if he could have earlier, now he cannot; therefore he does not avoid it, since everyone who sins, sins in that which he cannot avoid. The same can be argued more evidently of one sinning in the first instant of attaining adulthood, or of recovery from madness, or of awakening from sleep, or even in the first instant of his being. For this seems possible regarding sinning, since it is possible regarding meriting, as has been shown above.

Likewise, whoever argues thus evidently implies and supposes that any man, not divinely aided by his own powers, can overcome any temptation, avoid any sin, persevere finally by himself alone, and also merit and act, or at least pre-act, anything from himself. But how many heresies and errors this contains, the fourth chapter of Book II together with the fifth and following, the thirty-eighth chapter of Book I together with the forty-fifth and forty-sixth of the same, the twenty-second of Book II together with the thirtieth of the same, and several others, lucidly manifest.

Now these arguers and their argument having been refuted by way of objection, it remains to resolve the argument itself directly. The right resolution is the demonstration of its sin: for it sins mortally and incurably in form, as the corollaries of the first and second [chapters] of this Book III show. Nevertheless the tenth chapter of this book with its corollary much more artfully, lucidly, distinctly, and formally responds.

To the authority of blessed Augustine and to others similar, response can be made in many ways:

First, it can fittingly be understood in this manner: that no one sins in that which he does not do freely, by liberty of contradiction and contingently to either alternative, as the fourth and fifth [chapters] of this book show, so that as far as concerns the power of the will considered nakedly and absolutely in itself, he could not do that thing. The same is to be said of any free act, good, evil, or indifferent, if it be understood in the substance of the act itself.

Second, in agreement with the prior exposition, and with the prior procedure, and with the procedure and letter [of Augustine], it can be said that Augustine intends there to remove from man the natural necessity of sinning, so that no one sins in that which he cannot avoid by the possibility of nature, but does it by necessity of nature. Hence above, in the same Book III, ch. 26: "If anyone owes that which he has received, and man was so made that he necessarily sins, then he owes it to sin: but if it is wicked to say so, then nature does not compel anyone to sin." And below in ch. 28: "An evil will," he says, "is the cause of all evils. But if it were according to nature, it would surely preserve nature, and so would not be evil; whence it is gathered that the root of all evils is not nature." This understanding the tenth chapter of this book also confirms, teaching that Augustine's On Free Will was written against the Manichees, who held that there are two natural souls in man—a good one and a bad one—and that the bad soul does all bad deeds by necessity of nature; whence after the authority cited last, which says that the root of all evils is not according to nature, he immediately adds that this suffices against all who wish to accuse natures. Therefore that book must be understood and expounded correspondingly and refutationally, as was just touched upon, and as was more fully taught above in the tenth chapter of this book.

Third, no less in agreement with the procedure: the foregoing authority can also be expounded thus: that no one sins in that which can in no way be avoided even if he wills, but happens to him unwilling and against his will—so as to remove violent and compelling necessity, against the will, from the sinner. For this is a frequent way of speaking among ordinary people and among the Doctors: I can if I will, you can if you will, he can if he wills, do this or that. For what is easier, what is more free, than to do something if I will, and not do it if I do not will? That this is Augustine's understanding seems clear from his words and procedure in On Free Will III, ch. 28, where he was cited. For having shown that the will is the cause of sin, he inquires further whether there is any prior cause of the will itself to which sin may rightly be imputed; and having proved that there is not (because if the will did not obey it, it would not sin), he objects in the person of an inquirer: "Is it perhaps violent and compels the unwilling?" And he replies, teaching that this is not so, until the end of that chapter. According to this necessity, then, and the liberty opposed to it, his words must reasonably be received and understood; otherwise they would not bear on the proposed question. Above also, in ch. 26, he says: "Nature does not compel anyone to sin, nor does another's [sin]: For one does not sin in suffering what he does not will: for he does not sin in that which he suffers unwillingly." And below, ch. 29, he says: "Nor is it to be wondered at that man, either through ignorance, has not the free choice of will to choose what to do rightly, or through the resistance of carnal habit which has by violence of mortal succession in some way grown naturally upon him, sees what should rightly be done and wills it, but cannot fulfill it. For this is the most just punishment of sin: that one should lose what he was unwilling rightly to use, when he could without any difficulty if he willed." Which he also recites with approval in On Nature and Grace, ch. 68.

He writes still further below in the same Book III, ch. 31: "The Creator of things showed with what facility man could, if he had willed, retain what he was made, since his offspring could even surpass what was born." And subsequently in ch. 36: "The Author of the soul granted it such great dignity that He even put it in its power, if it willed, to tend to beatitude." He also above, in ch. 3, showing almost definitively what it is to be in our power, says: "I cannot understand anything else to be in our power except what we do when we will." The same in On the Spirit and the Letter ch. 26, wishing to inquire whether faith is constituted in our power, first inquires intently and very diligently what power is, and finally determining and as it were definitively making known what is sought, says thus: "We call this power, where the faculty of doing is joined to the will: hence anyone is said to have something in his power who, if he wills, does it; if he does not will, does not do it." This same is concordantly attested by his authority in City of God V, ch. 10, set forth in the ninth chapter of this book.

In agreement with this, Anselm, Cur Deus Homo II, ch. 10: "Every power follows the will; for when I say I can speak or walk, it is understood: 'if I will'; for if the will is not understood, it is not power, but necessity." Likewise Augustine, Enchiridion, ch. 75: "Nor did God unjustly will some not to be saved, since they could be saved if they willed." The same in On the Faith to Peter, ch. 57, and cited in Sentences II, of Lombard, dist. 39 (though incorrectly, since it is actually in Ecclesiastical Dogmas): "Hold most firmly that the first men were created good and upright with free will, by which they could, if they willed, sin by their own will, and that they sinned not by necessity but by their own will."

The same in Hypognosticon, ch. 28, treating that of Ecclesiasticus 15: "God made man from the beginning, and left him in the hand of his own counsel": "By 'the hand'," he says, "is understood possibility; this is the first grace by which the first man could have stood, if he had willed to keep the Lord's commandments." The same in On the Joys of the Just and the Punishments of the Evil, or On the Threefold Habitation: "If God's foreknowledge cannot be evaded, man could not have sinned otherwise than by will, no other force compelling him, because thus God foreknew him to be about to sin: If therefore by will, not compelled, he was led to sinning, undoubtedly he could have not sinned if he willed; therefore he merited punishment, because he did not sin unwillingly." The same in On Rebuke and Grace, ch. 148: "Man could have remained in the good if he had willed." And below in chs. 49 and 59, he repeats and confirms the same opinion. The same in On Nature and Grace, ch. 44: "God made man such that he was sufficient to lack the evil of sin if he had willed."

Likewise Jerome, on Ezekiel 33: "If when I say to the wicked: O wicked man, thou shalt surely die: thou hast not spoken to him that he may keep himself," etc.: "From these things," he says, "we say that man, even though impious and wicked, can be saved if he hears the master's words and repents from his impiety, nor any less can the master be damned if he does not teach; and in both cases free will is preserved, since it is in the master's will either to speak or to be silent, and in the hearer's either to hear and do and be saved, or to despise and perish through contempt." The Truth Itself also says: "The poor you have always with you, and when you will you can do them good," Mark 14.

Nor do the Authors so speak only of men, but indeed also of God. Hence Algazel, Metaphysics III, opinion 8: "The First is powerful, which is so understood that He does when He wills, and does not when He does not will, and is said to be able to destroy the universe of being, because He will do this if He wills; therefore He is powerful over everything that is possible, in this sense, namely, that if He willed, He would do it." Whom also Anselm followed in Cur Deus Homo II, ch. 10, inquiring whether Christ could sin and lie; and answering negatively, he shows what power and being-able is: "Every power," he says, "follows will. For when I say I can speak or walk, it is understood: 'if I will'," etc., as is recited above. And it follows: "We can therefore say of Christ that He could lie, if it be understood: 'if He willed.' And since He could not lie willingly, nor could He will to lie, no less can it be said that He was unable to lie; thus then He could and could not lie." And below in ch. 17, inquiring whether Christ could have preserved His life, he answers in similar fashion; and above in Book I, ch. 1, he hints at the same. Likewise Augustine, Hypognosticon, ch. 61: "The most high God has the power, if He will, to save the evil by undeserved grace, as well as to reserve them by just future judgment to the punishment of Gehenna." Wherefore the Wise Man wisely in Wisdom 12 says to God: "It is in thy power, when thou wilt, to be able." This same the truth of the holy Gospel attests, saying: "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean," Matthew 8.

From all these things, as I hope, it evidently appears that the Authors and authorities saying that men can avoid any sins whatsoever can fittingly be expounded in the manner aforesaid, namely, that they can if they will. But undoubtedly, they cannot will this from themselves alone, or antecedently to God; but only with God, and from God antecedently—as the twentieth and thirtieth [chapters] of Book II declare.

Hence a fourth exposition of such Authors and authorities can be drawn out, no less consonant with truth. For when the Authors say that man can avoid sin, it is true if God wills, if God wills to assist, and with the help of God joined to him; otherwise no one can avoid sin, as has been shown above. Hence Augustine, On the Perfection of Justice, ch. 33, says: "If anyone—namely, Caelestius—says: 'It can come about that man does not sin even in word'—the answer is: If God wills, he can; God does will, therefore he can." Likewise he says (still Caelestius): "If anyone says: 'It can come about that man does not fail in thought'—the answer is: If God wills, he can; God does will, therefore he can." This manner of speaking, although it seems to be Caelestius', Augustine does not reject, but rather approves. This opinion also, although it seems to be Caelestius', Augustine does not totally deny, but rather affirms. For who would deny that man, like the Blessed Virgin, can by the help of omnipotent God avoid any sin, so that for a certain time, or never, he should deviate in any matter? Therefore he immediately adds: "See how he was willing to say: If God assists, he can—to whom it is said: Be thou my helper, forsake me not—not indeed for grasping bodily goods and avoiding bodily evils, but for performing and perfecting righteousness; on account of which we say: Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil."

Considering therefore Augustine's procedure before and after, it evidently appears that he wishes to deny that any man, in the state of present misery, is in fact without sin, or even can be by his own powers alone; he does, however, concede that man through God's help can avoid sin. Hence above, in ch. 2, he cites Caelestius' first argument in this form: "He who denies that man can be without sin must be questioned: What is the sin which can be avoided, or which cannot? If what cannot, it is not sin; if what can be avoided, man can be without sin; for no rational justice allows that to be called sin which can in no way be avoided." And Augustine answers that sin can be avoided, if vitiated nature be healed by the grace of God through Jesus Christ. "Healed," he says, and supply: and preserved healthy, as is clear from him in On Nature and Grace, ch. 26, and in the Sentences of Prosper, ch. 131, as the fifth and eighth [chapters] of Book II argued more fully.

And below he cites Pelagius' fifteenth argument: "If there is any sin which cannot be avoided, how is God called just, if He is believed to impute to anyone what he could not avoid?" And he answers that sin can be avoided when the humble will is helped. The same in On Rebuke and Grace, ch. 71, says that the condemnation of someone by Episcopal judgment can, if God will, work to salutary correction. Likewise the venerable Bede, Against Julian XII, recites from him this heretical argument: "We ascribe iniquity to the just, cruelty to the merciful, when we lament that He commanded something impossible; and then we think man should be damned by Him for things he could not avoid." And he answers: That is true, if it look to God's help, to whom the Catholic voice supplicates saying: Lead me into the path of thy commandments. But if he trusts in the strength of his own soul, he refutes God's truthful saying, by which He says: Without me, ye can do nothing.

Further, that you may receive the true gloss of this authoritative authority of Augustine without doubt, hear Augustine himself in Retractations I, ch. 9, expounding the same authority objected to him by Pelagius: "Who, I ask, sins in that which can in no way be avoided? But sin is committed; therefore it can be avoided. Pelagius made use of this testimony of mine in a certain book of his in these and similar words of mine; because the grace of God is not mentioned, the Pelagians think we have held their opinion. But this is in vain. For will indeed is that by which one sins and lives rightly; but the will itself, unless it is freed by God's grace from the slavery of sin, and is helped to overcome vices, cannot live rightly and piously by mortals." Whom Peter in Sentences II, dist. 28, follows not far off, both in the objection and in the response.

Hear also Augustine in On Nature and Grace, ch. 67, expounding most clearly and glossing the same authority cited by Pelagius for his heresy: "Pelagius says: 'Likewise, in his books On Free Will, Augustine the Bishop says: Whatever is the cause of the will, if it cannot be resisted, it is yielded to without sin; if it can, let it not be yielded to, and there will be no sin. Or perhaps it deceives the unaware? Then let him beware lest he be deceived. But is the deception so great that it cannot be guarded against? Then there are no sins; for who sins in that which can in no way be guarded against? But sin is committed; therefore it can be guarded against.' I acknowledge—the words are mine; but let him also deign to acknowledge all that is said above. The matter at hand is the grace of God, which gives us medicine through the Mediator, not the possibility of justice. That cause therefore, whatever it may be, can be resisted; certainly it can. For we ask help in this, saying: Lead us not into temptation; which help we would not ask if we believed it could in no way be resisted. Any sin therefore can be guarded against, but with the help of Him who cannot fail; for therefore we say: Lead us not into temptation."

To the other authority of Augustine, On the Two Souls, just cited above, both the tenth chapter of this book and especially the second exposition reply, because that book is against the Manichees, as the tenth chapter of this book said. I therefore reply, as the second exposition and the tenth chapter teach. And in this way I confidently reply, because Augustine in Retractations I, ch. 15, retracting this book On the Two Souls, replies to the same authority of his objected by the Pelagians, and to similar ones in the same book in similar fashion. Hence Peter in Sentences II, dist. 28, having recited the aforesaid authority of Augustine, says: "On hearing these things, Pelagius leapt forth saying: 'Why then are little ones, and those who do not have the grace without which they cannot fulfill the divine commandments, held guilty?'" And he adds Augustine's responding opinion: "On what occasion he said this, Augustine reveals in the Retractations, replying to Pelagius. For he said this against the Manichees, who contend that there are two natures in man, one good from God, the other evil from a tribe of darkness, which never was good, nor can will the good; for if there were such, it would seem not imputable to it if it did not do good." To Jerome's authority a similar answer must be made: for it speaks expressly against the Manichees.

To the Apostle's authority a response can be made through the three foregoing expositions. For the first exposition can fittingly be drawn from the words: "He will not suffer you to be tempted above that which you are able." For by this he hints that the temptation is not, nor will be stronger than the power of the will, as the third [chapter] of Book II taught. The third exposition above can be sufficiently drawn from the words power and be able, namely if you will. The fourth exposition is evidently hinted when he says that God will not suffer you to be tempted above that which you are able; as if to say: It is from God and from divine help that you are not tempted above what you are able. This the next words make still more expressly clear: "but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that you may be able to bear it"—as if he said manifestly: From His helping action and the issue of His help you have it that you can bear the temptation, as the fourth and fifth [chapters] of Book II declare.

To the first authority of the Philosopher [Aristotle], the ninth chapter of this book responds; to his second authority, the distinction concerning necessity written in the tenth chapter of this book responds. For he speaks there of the violently necessary; assigning the third mode of the necessary, he says: "Further, that which forces and force, namely that which against impulse and predilection impedes and prohibits; for the violent is called necessary—wherefore also painful, as Evenus says: 'Every necessary thing is painful'; and as a violence, a certain necessity, as Sophocles says: 'If you compel me to do this, force does'; and necessity seems to be something not reproachable; and rightly: for it is contrary to motion according to predilection and according to deliberation."

The argument from precepts no more opposes this opinion than it would oppose one who said that God acts through our free acts, and that God's grace is necessarily required for the observance of the commandments. This argument is therefore Pelagian, heretical, execrable, as the twenty-eighth chapter of Book II shows—which also fully resolves it. Hence Augustine on that of Psalm 118: "The declaration of thy words enlightens, and giveth understanding," etc., sermon 27, says thus: "What is the little one, except the humble and weak? Therefore do not be proud, do not presume from your own virtue—which is none—and understand why a good law has been given by the good God, which yet cannot give life. For this it has been given: that from a great one it might make a little one, that it might show you that you do not have the strength of yourself to do the law; and so, in want and need of help, you might flee to grace and cry: Have mercy on me, O Lord, for I am weak. Yes, Lord, yes, do, O merciful Lord! Command what cannot be fulfilled, indeed command what cannot be fulfilled except through Thy grace, so that, when men cannot fulfill it through their own strength, every mouth may be stopped, and no one may seem great to himself. For who fulfills Thy commandments as they ought to be fulfilled—that is, from faith which works through love—unless the love itself is poured into his heart through the Holy Spirit? For not those who act in spirit, but as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are the sons of God; not because they themselves do nothing, but lest they should do nothing good, they are led by the Good to act."

To the authorities of Jerome and Deuteronomy, the response is the same as to Augustine's first authority above; Jerome's authority too was previously expounded. Concerning the authority of Deuteronomy, it is to be known that Caelestius the Pelagian objects the same passage of Scripture along with many similar ones against Augustine in On the Perfection of Justice, ch. 32; and Augustine responds, as has been answered before in the fourth exposition of Augustine's first authority, as the twenty-eighth [chapter] of Book II more fully recited.

The Philosopher's authority can be expounded through the ninth chapter of this book; yet it expounds itself: "Whatever things are neither in our power, nor voluntary," etc.; and it is true that no one is reasonably urged to non-voluntary things; nor through this does any merit perish, as the corollaries of the first and second [chapters] of this book show; nor even freedom of choice, as the same corollaries manifest. For how does it follow: because God's will, not impendible, but most omnipotently efficacious, wills man to operate freely, therefore he does not operate freely? On the contrary, this does not follow, but the opposite manifestly follows—namely that he operates freely, indeed even necessarily operates freely; necessarily, I say, by the necessity stated in the twenty-seventh chapter of this book; and this is finally the response of Augustine and Anselm, as their authorities evidently testify in On Free Will III, ch. 2; On the Joys of the Just and Punishments of the Evil; On Concord I, and many others, more fully cited in the tenth chapter of this book.

This opinion therefore by no means abolishes free will, but founds and confirms, protects and defends it with inviolable stability. Yet the highest and greatest liberty is in God alone, the highest and most greatly free, as the fifth and tenth [chapters] of this book manifest; in lower causes, however, there is a lower liberty, as the same chapters have taught.

That it is argued that reproaches, praises, exhortations, dissuasions, prayers, etc., must be reckoned superfluous: this no more impugns the twenty-seventh chapter of Book III than the twentieth of Book II, or the twenty-third of Book I; nor does the argument conclude, as is plainly taught in chs. 23 and 25 of Book I, and ch. 28 of Book II. And Augustine in On Free Will III, ch. 1, and the Philosopher in Ethics III, ch. 11, ought to be reasonably content with what has gone before here and in the tenth chapter of this book.

Concerning the saying of the same Philosopher in On Interpretation I, last chapter, weighing it more equitably according to the counsel of the wise man on the four cardinal virtues: "Let not the authority of the speaker move you, nor who, but what he says, attend to; let famous or rather smoky authority be set aside for now, that thus the more freely, the more truly you may judge what reason itself proves; and you will see plainly that he does not conclude what is proposed, but the opposite manifestly." For how does it follow: all future things will come about by necessity; therefore there is no need to deliberate or engage in business? On the contrary, the opposite evidently follows: all future things will come about by necessity, therefore there is need—because of necessity it is necessary to deliberate and engage in business, for many fitting deliberations and businesses are future. But to come closer, even to the very foundation of his reasoning: who, positing necessity in all future things, would posit it only in the ends and not in the means to those ends? For just as God, most wise, has from eternity preordained certain ends, so also has He ordained certain means, as the twenty-seventh chapter of Book I and what follows manifest. For "the things that are, are ordained of God," Romans 13, as the twenty-sixth of Book

I teaches. The wisdom of God, infinitely infinite, as the sixth of Book I taught, "reaches everywhere," Wisdom 7. "It reaches therefore from end to end mightily, and orders all things sweetly," Wisdom 8. It reaches, I say, from the first end, from the term from which, and from any beginning, through all the means even to the last end, and to every term to which, and orders all things, ends and means, by sweetly arranging them. If therefore divine preordination and previolition, not impendible but efficacious, imposes some kind of necessity upon all things, it imposes some such necessity on ends and on means.

If therefore from God's providence it is in some way necessary that men obtain certain ends, it is necessary that they similarly deliberate, engage in business, and proceed through due means—as by way to the term, by care to health, by discipline to a doctorate, by merits to the crown—as the twenty-fifth of Book I touches, and the authority of blessed Gregory, Dialogues I, ch. 21, cited in the canon, plainly attests, and the authorities of Augustine written in the twenty-third of Book I.

Yet, in reverence to the Philosopher, it can be said that his argument is good in logic, because very probable and apparent. Or otherwise, and better: If all things came about by necessity contrary to liberty and simply absolute, there would be no need to deliberate or engage in business, because nothing would then be deliberable, nor could any deliberation exist. For deliberation, according to the same in Ethics III, chs. 7, 8, and 9, is not concerning such necessary things, but only concerning those that are in us, namely in our free power. That he speaks here of necessity contrary to liberty and simply absolute, his procedure and words clearly indicate. For he speaks there of the necessary which excludes everything to either alternative; but such is not the necessary according to the higher causes (as conceded in the twenty-seventh of this book), which is compatible with contingency to either alternative and with liberty, and which is similarly in our free power, as the fifth and tenth of this book teach—but only the necessary contrary to and destructive of liberty and free power, as the same chapters manifest.

Hence the Philosopher says thus: "These are the consequences and similar—if of all affirmations and negations it is necessary that one be true and the other false, that there be nothing to either alternative, but that all things are or come about by necessity. Therefore there will be no need to deliberate or to engage in business," whose cause he subjoins, "since if this"—namely whatever—"we do, this will be"—namely one designated future thing—"but if not"—supply: we do—"it will be"—supply: the same future thing; as if to say, whatever we do or do not do, this future thing will not happen any more or less, and so no future thing would be in men's power, nor would depend on human free acts. Hence below he says thus: "These things are not possible: for we seem to be the principle of future things, by virtue of the fact that we deliberate and do something." Considering therefore the Philosopher's procedure, it evidently appears that he wishes to refute the necessary which is contrary to and destructive of contingency to either alternative, of liberty, and of free power. Hence Ammonius, expounding that chapter, says: "Many are led into the opinion which destroys the contingent itself, and the Philosopher argues against those who do all things by necessity and take away contingency."

He also speaks there of necessity simply. For he says: "It is necessary that what is, when it is, is, and that what is not, when it is not, is not; but not everything that is, is necessary to be, nor is everything that is not necessary not to be"—supply: simply; whence he immediately adds: "For it is not the same to be necessarily when it is, and to be simply by necessity. Likewise also concerning what is not. And in the contradiction the same reasoning holds." This very thing his words immediately following clearly show. For he concedes such things in the composite sense: It is necessary that this will be or will not be; and denies them in the divided sense. In the composite sense, however, there is necessity simply absolute, and this in that sense he concedes; correspondingly therefore and refutationally he denies the same in the divided sense, as in the second exposition of Boethius in the twenty-eighth of this book it was more fully taught. Hence he says thus: "It is necessary indeed that everything either be or not be, and that it shall be or shall not be; yet not, dividing, to say one or the other is necessary. I say, for example: it is necessary that there be a sea-battle tomorrow, or not to be a future one; but not 'there shall be a sea-battle tomorrow' it is necessary, or not to be a future one; that it shall be or not be is necessary." Hence Ammonius, expounding this word of the text Futuris, says thus: "He signifies by saying Futuris that it is taken in contingent matter. For to mellon, that is, what is to come, is one thing, in that which he determines concerning generation and corruption, distinct from to esomenon, that is, the participle of the future tense from sum, es; and esomenon indeed signifies what will entirely come about, as when we say there will be winter or summer, or an eclipse: mellon, that is futurum, what can come about and not come about—say, I am going to walk, I am going to sail. He insinuates therefore that according to other matters indeed [we say] necessary and impossible; but winter and summer and eclipse, according to him as also according to the other Philosophers, will come about by necessity simply and by necessity of nature." This necessity then he denies here, and the corresponding possibility or contingency he affirms.

To one therefore turning over the Philosopher's writings diligently, and turning them more diligently over again, it will plainly appear that he removes from free acts a threefold necessity: namely, simple absolute necessity, necessity of nature, and violently compelling necessity. Here in chs. 1, 2, and 3, as is clear from what has been shown here and in the tenth chapter of this book; the second [type] in Metaphysics IX, as the same tenth manifests; the third in Metaphysics V, as is recited above; the same also in Ethics II and III, chs. 2 and 3. Who also in Posterior Analytics II, ch. 3, writes thus: "Necessity is twofold; one indeed according to nature and motion, as a stone by necessity [moves] up and down, but not by the same necessity; but in those things which are from intellect, some are by no means from that which is per se in vain, as a house or an effigy, nor are they by necessity"—namely, of this or that kind aforesaid.

Further, for all things objected concerning possibility and necessity, and that may be objected, another and perhaps better response can be made—because briefer, and more conformable to the customary mode of speaking, and more cautious—nor on that account less truly. It is established that possible and to be able are derived from possibility or power, as also they are vocally so named; but possibility and power are manifold, as the foregoing have taught. Since therefore

John can do or not do this or that, or John can do this or that, or not do it, is twofold, it must be considered all around whether it be by some power that he can—say, by his own natural power, or another's; whether by power, indeed by the great and absolute omnipotence of God; and it can simply be conceded that it is possible thus to be, because by some possibility or power it is thus to be—as a particular or indefinite proposition having some singular even one true, is true and simply to be conceded. But of necessity it must be thought otherwise. For if of some signed necessity it is necessary for this to be or not to be, it is not therefore simply to be confessed that it is necessary for this to be or not to be, as was said of possibility and the possible—especially according to the customary mode of speaking of common logicians, philosophers, and theologians instructed in logical matters. For according to their understanding it evidently follows: It is necessary that this be; therefore it is impossible that this not be, and It is not possible that this not be, whence it is necessarily inferred further: that by no possibility or power is it possible that this not be. It is therefore established clearly that, speaking thus, it does not follow from some necessity: It is necessary that this be, therefore it is necessary that this be; for then by no possibility or power could this not be, since yet by some necessity it is necessary that something be, and by some possibility or power it can not be, and it is possible for it not to be.

If however perhaps it were lawful to speak more sharply, although a bit more strictly, it might be said that if by some necessity it is necessary that this be, it is necessary that this be on account of the reasoning concerning possibility and power above; but it does not follow further: it is necessary that this be, therefore it is impossible that this not be, and it is not possible to not be, taking it so generally—but only restricting it specially: therefore by some possibility or power, namely opposed to some necessity, it is impossible that this not be, and not possible that this not be. Speaking therefore commonly, as most do, I never simply or absolutely concede, nor intend to concede, unless greater authority compels me, that it is necessary for anyone to do or not do this or that, nor that it is not possible, or that he cannot do or not do this or that; rather, that it is possible, and that he can do or not do this or that, those things being demonstrated in which contingency is found. And although this manner of responding may perhaps appear simpler and more cautious, yet the other manner of responding through the foregoing definitions or other better ones, is approved as more doctrinal.

Nor does this opinion, sensibly understood, corrupt morals or virtues. For it is not opposed to liberty of choice or to merit, as the corollaries of the first and second [chapters] of this book show; on the contrary, this opinion most strongly fortifies, defends, and saves morals and virtues, by the inexpugnable wall of divine power and the aforesaid necessity, as the thirty-fourth of Book II showed.

That it is argued that this opinion renders men negligent: this proceeds against the twentieth and thirtieth of Book II, against foreknowledge, predestination, and grace, and so against the sixth, forty-fourth, thirty-fifth and following [chapters] of Book I, just as against the twenty-seventh of Book III. Hence Augustine, Against Julian the Pelagian IV, ch. 16, recites a similar argument objected by him: "You slander me," he says, "for saying that no zeal is to be expected from human will, against that of the Gospel: Ask and you shall receive."

The same in On the Gift of Perseverance, ch. 46, responding similarly to similar objections against grace and divine predestination, says thus: "When these things are said, they ought not to deter us from confessing the true grace of God—that is, which is not given according to our merits—and according to it, from confessing the predestination of the saints; just as we are not deterred from confessing the foreknowledge of God if anyone speaks thus to the people about it, saying: 'Whether you now live rightly or not rightly, such you shall be afterwards as God has foreknown you to be: either good if good, or evil if evil.' For if some on hearing this turn to torpor and sluggishness, and prone to labor and to lust go after their concupiscences—is therefore that which has been said about the foreknowledge of God to be thought false? Indeed, if God has foreknown them to be good, will they not be good, however much wickedness they are now engaged in? But if evil, will they not be evil, in whatever goodness they are now preserved? There was a certain man in our monastery who, when corrected by the brothers as to why he did certain things which ought not to be done, and did not do certain things which ought to be done, used to reply: 'Whatever I am now, such I shall be as God has foreknown me to be.' Which assuredly he said truly, and yet by this truth he did not advance unto good, but advanced into evil to such a degree that, the society of the monastery being deserted, he became a dog returning to his own vomit; and yet still it is uncertain what he is to be."

Whether this opinion, taken as occasion, may render someone negligent and evil and finally to perish, I do not know, I fear, and I grieve if it shall be so; yet I know that no one [shall do so] except perhaps a son of perdition, that the eternal Scripture of the eternal book of God may be fulfilled, as the Savior Himself said in John 17. And what can I do? For I cannot predestinate, nor even reprobate. Yet undoubtedly I am not a better preacher or doctor than my master Christ, or the doctor of the Gentiles, holy Paul, and even than His other holy Apostles. And the preaching and doctrine of these did not always profit all unto salvation, indeed it harmed some, at least by occasion taken, not given. Hence when Christ was preaching and teaching about the sacrament of His blessed body and blood and on this matter, saying: "No man can come to me except the Father who sent me draw him"; and "No man can come to me unless it were given him by my Father," some of His disciples hearing said: "This saying is hard, who can hear it?" And from this they went back, John 6—went back, namely, from the faith, according to Chrysostom, and from life, according to Augustine, as Thomas's Gloss recites.

The Pharisees also hearing His preaching were scandalized, Matthew 15; and Mark 6 has it that "many hearing him were scandalized"; and Luke 4: "they were filled with wrath in the synagogue"—namely hearing these words of Christ preaching. And below in ch. 6: they—namely hearing Christ preaching the wisdom of God—"were filled with madness, and they talked one with another, what they might do to Jesus." And John 8: they said to Christ teaching: "Thou hast a devil." And to the Apostle disputing with the Athenians, some said: "What is it that this word-sower would say?" Others, however, said: "He seems to be a setter forth of new gods"; and some indeed mocked, Acts 17. Likewise to him speaking words of truth and soberness a certain madman said: "Paul, thou art mad, much learning doth make thee mad," Acts 26. Some also against Christ and His disciples, on account of their preaching and doctrine, raged so cruelly that they consumed them by the harshest death.

But on account of such causes or occasions, ought the organs of truth to be silenced? Truly, although before some people, in time and place, yet not before all everywhere and always—as Christ, Paul, and the other Apostles by their lucid examples have lucidly taught us, as was touched upon above. Hence Chrysostom on that word of John 6 recited above—"From this many of his disciples went back": "This perhaps came about for our consolation, when sometimes it happens that a man speaks the truth, and what he says is not grasped, and those who hear are scandalized and depart. The man repents that he has said what is true. For man says within himself: 'I should not have spoken thus.' Behold it happened to the Lord; He spoke and lost many, and He Himself is not troubled, because from the beginning He knew who would not be believing. We, if it happens to us, are troubled; but let us find consolation in the Lord, and yet let us speak our words cautiously."

In agreement with this, Augustine, On the Gift of Perseverance, where above, namely ch. 46, having recited the perils mentioned, adds: "On account of such souls, are those things which are truly said about God's foreknowledge to be denied or kept silent? And those who do not pray, or pray coldly, because—the Lord saying [it]—they have learned to know that God knows what is necessary for us before we ask Him: should the truth of this opinion be deserted on their account, or thought to be erased from the Gospel?"

These perils therefore by no means standing in the way, the truth must be taught: and this for two reasons; first, that errors concerning other necessary matters may be salutarily avoided; second, that the capable and apt may be usefully instructed. For the first, Augustine says in On the Gift of Perseverance ch. 46: "Are those things which are truly said of God's foreknowledge, on account of such souls, to be denied or kept silent? Then, namely, when, if they are not said, one falls into other errors." Into what and how great errors one would fall, the necessity having been denied which was shown in the twenty-seventh of this book, is easy to see. For since that necessity evidently follows from many antecedents previously set forth, whoever shall deny it must, by Logic compelling, similarly deny each antecedent. He must therefore deny God's pre-action, co-action, help, grace, predestination, foreknowledge, efficiency, conservation, and other such; indeed at length even that God exists, and with the foolish most foolishly say: "There is no God."

For this same first cause, and also for the second jointly, Augustine in On the Gift of Perseverance ch. 47: "Let the truth," he says, "be spoken, especially where another question impels that it be spoken, and let those receive it who can; lest perhaps when it is kept silent on account of those who cannot grasp it, not only those who can grasp the truth (whereby falsity is avoided) be defrauded of the truth, but they be even captured by falsity. For it is easy, indeed even useful, that the truth be sometimes kept silent on account of the incapable. But there is one reason for keeping silent the truth, another reason for the necessity of telling the truth. The reasons for keeping silent it would be long to seek out or insert all of them; among them however is also this one: lest we make those worse who do not understand, while we wish to make more learned those who understand—who, when we are silent on something such, become indeed not more learned, but neither do they become worse. But when the matter stands so that he who cannot grasp it is made worse by our speaking it, but he who can [becomes worse] by our keeping it silent, what should we think ought to be done? Should not the truth rather be spoken, that he who can grasp may grasp, rather than be silent, so that not only do both not grasp, but the more intelligent of them is even made worse, who, if he had heard, would have grasped? Through him also more would learn: for the more capable he is of learning, the more apt he is to teach others. Do we fear that, when we speak, he may be offended who cannot grasp the truth, and not fear that, when we are silent, he who can grasp the truth may be captured by falsity?"

And if anyone still presses and objects: that on account of the doctrine of the few, the many ought not to be disturbed; and that few, if any, receive this doctrine, while many more, perturbed, reject it; and also that the Church has stood very well in past times without this novel doctrine which disturbs so many men. Let him attend, I beg, to the Philosopher, Politics III, ch. 5, saying: "It happens that one or a few differ in virtue; but it is difficult that the many should attain the summit of all virtue." Let him further consider, I supplicate, what similar [objection] could be brought against our master and Lord Christ, against Paul, and against His other disciples, our holy Doctors. For when Christ was teaching about the sacrament of the blessed Eucharist, and about the necessity and impossibility which we have in our hands—namely in the acts of men with respect to higher causes—saying: "I am the true bread that comes down from heaven," etc., and "All that the Father gives me shall come to me; and no man can come to me, except the Father who sent me draw him," etc., many foolish in heart were troubled, so much so that they murmured and quarreled among themselves, and said: "This saying is hard, who can hear it?" And at length they went back: but a few, namely His twelve disciples, remained, John 6. Hence by His own testimony: "Many are called, but few are chosen," Matthew 22. Hence He admonishes: "Enter ye in at the narrow gate, for wide is the gate and broad the way that leadeth to perdition, and many there are who go in thereat. How narrow is the gate and strait the way that leadeth to life, and few there are that find it!" Matthew 7.

Likewise also when Paul preached to the Athenians, many were troubled, deriding his new doctrine; but a few, namely Dionysius the Areopagite and Damaris with a few others, believed, Acts 17. In the city of Ephesus also, as is in Acts 18, on account of his sound doctrine there was a great disturbance, so much so that the city was filled with confusion, and they made an assault with one mind into the theater; and when silence was demanded so that an account might be rendered, there was one voice of all, as of those crying out for two hours: "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." A similar disturbance, commotion, concurrence of people, acclamation, and outcry occurred in the city of Jerusalem on account of his doctrine, as appears in Acts 21 and the chapters that follow consequently—so much so that he was nearly imperiled; he was accused before the judges, and was compelled to appeal to Caesar. Of the other Apostles too, and the rest of the saints of God, you will find too frequently that at their preaching and doctrine many were scandalized and gravely disturbed, but a few salutarily informed: yet this in no way drew them back from evangelizing to all in common, on account of the reason assigned in the thirty-ninth of Book I. Nor did it diminish their merit; whence that most excellent Preacher and Doctor, in the person of all preachers and doctors, says: "We are the good odor of Christ to God, in those who are saved and in those who perish: to some indeed the odor of death unto death, but to others the odor of life unto life," 2 Corinthians 2.

How also will the Church and Catholic truth stand well without the distinction of this problem, since faithful and unfaithful, grammarians, logicians, mathematicians, naturalists, moralists, divines, theologians, old and young, men and women, the lettered and the unlettered, and universally all and each, the learned and the unlearned alike, daily mangle, chew, ruminate on, and gnaw at it? Especially since from the lack of knowledge of the solution of this problem one falls into very many and very great errors, as was shown above, and as the erroneous opinions concerning this problem recited above in this Book III in many chapters evidently demonstrate. Hence Ammonius on the last [chapter] of On Interpretation I says: "This theorem is necessary to all the parts of philosophy: to moral philosophy entirely; nay rather, to physiology, and to logical method; and you will find this theorem extended to first philosophy. For the theologian also will inquire in what manner those things are governed which in the world come about before all things by necessity and determinately, just as in eternal things, [and whether] there are some things contingently happening; nor will you find men of even uncultivated disposition negligent of the meditation on this theorem." And below: "This theorem has great strength for the whole of our life."

Blessed Augustine also in On the Gift of Perseverance ch. 59 cites a similar [objection] from a similar cause objected to him: "They say," he says, "that there was no need of this uncertainty of disputation, by which the hearts of so many less intelligent people are disturbed, since for so many years the Catholic faith has been defended no less usefully without this definition of predestination."

I also opine probably that many receive, and few reject this doctrine; and to use the words of Avicenna, Metaphysics X, ch. 1, recited in the twenty-ninth of Book I: "The crowd more approaches and holds, and says: 'It is true,' nor flee they from this, except those who wish to seem philosophers." This doctrine also is not novel as to substance, but ancient, as the twenty-seventh of this book showed through ancient authors; and if it had any novelty as to a more lucid and fuller manner of speaking, it should not reasonably be reproached. For Christ is not reasonably reproached, but praised, because after the old testament He brought in the new—although men lived very well under the old testament; nor is the learned Scribe reproached, but praised by the Lord, who brings forth from his treasure new and old, Matthew 13. Hence Jerome, in the epistle to Sophronius, which is prefixed in place of a prologue to Jerome's psalter, writes thus concerning the detractors of his new translation after the old: "Most perverse men: for although they always demand new pleasures and the neighboring seas do not suffice their gullets, why in the study of Scripture alone are they content with the old taste?"

Hence the Philosopher, Metaphysics I, last chapter, after he has corrected the opinions of the ancients on causes, says thus: "Tenuously and in a certain way all these have been said before—namely the causes—but in a certain way not at all. For the first philosophy seemed to stutter about all things, as it were a new thing existing about its beginning"; who in Ethics I, ch. 11, also says: "It will seem of every [art] to bring forth and arrange in detail those things which have admirable consideration, and time is the inventor or good cooperator of such things; whence even additions have been made to the arts. For it belongs to anyone to add what is lacking." Averroes also on On the Heavens IV, comment 11, says: "The discourse of the later one ought to be sharper and more correct." Hence Boethius in Book I of On Scholarly Discipline, treating of the excellence of the master, says: "It is of a most miserable mind always to use [only] what has been found out, and never things to be found out; even more foolish to confide entirely in the speeches of masters." Hence the Philosopher, Politics I, ch. 9, shows that it is more expedient for a city to be ruled by the best man than by the best laws; where he says: "In whatever art, to rule according to letters [alone] is wretched: it is therefore manifest that the best polity is not according to letters and laws." With which Varro concordantly in his Sentences says: "Choose that instructor who has learned more in his own [matters] than in others'. He will teach nothing magnificent, who has learned nothing from himself; and they are falsely called masters who are merely narrators of what they have heard, as if those should be heard who would relate rumors."

Hence Vitruvius, On Architecture, Book VII, notably reports that King Ptolemy gathered an outstanding library at Alexandria, dedicating games to the Muses and Apollo; and like athletes, so for victors among writers and poets, he set certain prizes, assigning six judges, to whom he added a seventh, namely Aristophanes, who would read all the books in order. And on a certain day, an assembly being made for the public contest of poets, the people indicated whom they most approved; and the judgment of the judges being implored, those six judges decreed victory to him who had pleased the people. Aristophanes alone, however, judged that man to have won who had pleased the people least; and the King and the whole people were stirred up. And silence at length being obtained, Aristophanes declared that man alone to be a poet, because what he said he discovered by his own labor; the others having stolen others' poems. And the royal cabinets being scrutinized, the books inspected, and a comparison made, he convicted them as thieves, and the King ordered an action of theft to be brought against them.

Wherefore also Jesus the son of Sirach is praised because, after the law and the prophets and the greatest wisdom of Solomon, he renewed wisdom from his own heart, Ecclesiasticus 50. Hence above, in ch. 24, Wisdom Itself says: "They that eat me, shall yet hunger: and they that drink me, shall yet thirst. They that explain me shall have life everlasting." Wherefore also to Daniel, the man of desires, who put his heart to understanding so much that he afflicted himself, the Angel said these things: "But they that are learned shall shine as the brightness of the firmament: and they that instruct many to justice as stars for all eternity. But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words and seal the book even to the time appointed: many shall pass over, and knowledge shall be manifold." And below: "And I heard," says Daniel, "and understood not. And I said: My lord, what shall be after these things? And he said"—namely, the Angel: "Go, Daniel, because the words are shut up and sealed until the appointed time. Many shall be chosen and made white, and shall be tried as fire: and the wicked shall deal wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand, but the learned shall understand."

Hence Gregory in On Ezekiel II, homily 4: "It is to be known," he says, "that through increments of times the knowledge of spiritual Fathers grew. For Moses was more instructed in the knowledge of omnipotent God than Abraham, the prophets more than Moses, the Apostles more than the prophets. I am mistaken if Scripture itself does not say it: 'Many,' he says, 'shall pass over, and knowledge shall be manifold.'" And he proves this clearly afterward, finally concluding thus: "Therefore the measure of the reed, which is six cubits and a palm, is led to ten cubits, and the measure of ten cubits at the end rises into thirteen, because as much as the world is led to its extremity, so much the more largely is the entrance of eternal knowledge opened to us."

Furthermore, just as for the same man at a more tender age food and doctrine more easy and weak rather than more solid is fittingly administered, so also for the whole Church. For at the origin of her birth she was to be imbued with the milk of easy, lucid, and pleasant doctrine; but now after she has, through the progress of time, grown up and been firmly strengthened, she is to be nourished with solid foods—especially those who have a sound taste, strong teeth, and a strong stomach of heart. Hence the Apostle in 1 Corinthians 3: "I, brethren, could not speak to you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal: as unto little ones in Christ. I gave you milk to drink, not meat: for you were not able as yet, but neither indeed are you now able." And to the Hebrews 5: "You are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat. For everyone that is a partaker of milk is unskillful in the word of justice; for he is a little child. But strong meat is for the perfect: for them who, by use, have their senses exercised to the discerning of good and evil." And 1 Corinthians 2: "We speak wisdom among the perfect."

Yet on account of this opinion, men ought not be negligent in the good. For just as God foreknew man's end, namely eternal life, so also He foreknew the way and the means to this end, as was shown above in responding to the Philosopher's reasoning in On Interpretation I, last chapter. Wherefore Daniel, full of the Spirit of God, certainly understanding the term of the seventy years of desolation to be approaching and the beginning of the consolation of the Israelite people aforesaid—captive and promised through Jeremiah 29 by God who cannot lie—did not on that account any less diligently set his face to the Lord his God, to ask and entreat in fasting and sackcloth and ashes, that He should do what He had promised, as Daniel 9 manifests in its history. On which Jerome [says]: "Jeremiah had foretold seventy years of desolation of the temple, after which the people would again come into Judea, and the temple would be built there, and Jerusalem; which thing does not make Daniel negligent, but rather provokes him to ask, that what God promised through His clemency, He might fulfill through his prayers."

In agreement with him, Gregory, Homilies on the Gospels, hom. 32, writes thus: "There was a certain matron, very religious, who frequently came to the church of these martyrs, namely Processus and Martinian; and on a certain day, when she had come as usual to pray, going out, she found two monks standing in pilgrim's habit. She believed them pilgrims, and ordered something to be given them as alms; but before her bringing of alms reached them for distribution, they stood nearer and said: 'You now visit us; we shall seek you on the day of judgment, and whatever we can, we shall bestow upon you.' This said, they were taken from her eyes; she terrified returned to pray, and poured herself out at length in tears, and after this became more instant in prayer the more certain about the promise."

Nor is it true that whatever men do or do not do, all things will not happen any more or less. First, as regards the doings or works themselves; second, as regards the ends of works. For not only ends or terms, such as the mansions in heaven, are predestined by God, but also the way and the ordained means—as was demonstrated above in responding to the similar argument of the Philosopher in On Interpretation I, last chapter, as also the forty-fifth of Book I clearly teaches. Yet it is true that no one will ever do or omit anything, by reason of which some future thing would not come about, or in another and not in every way in which it will come about; nor [such that] some non-future thing would come about: for this includes a contradiction, as the eighteenth of this book shows. Wherefore all things which will come about, and in whatever ways they will come about, will so seriously come about as if they were entirely going to come about by necessity.

That certain people argue consequently that they can freely impede many future things: either they understand that they can do this from themselves alone, without God acting jointly or beforehand—and then they are Pelagian heretics, as the twentieth and thirtieth of Book II demonstrate; or they understand that they can with God acting jointly and beforehand with them—and then it is not only possible, but indeed necessary by the necessity of higher causes, as the twenty-seventh of this book shows. Wherefore concerning any free impediment, future and not future, the necessity is similar, just as concerning any free effect, future or not future. For every such future impediment is some such future effect.

Again, either they understand that with God acting jointly or beforehand they can impede some future thing, which is A, the divine will to A's coming about still standing, as the fourteenth of Book I teaches—which is heretical and blasphemous, as the tenth of Book I shows—or they understand that they can change or avert the divine will from A, or make Him not will A to come about, which is similarly erroneous and against the twentieth of Book I, the thirtieth of Book II, and the eighth of this book; or that, with God acting and pre-acting, and from itself alone, not from any human act not willing but unwilling A to come about, they can impede A from coming about. And so they do not press the point: for thus it is not only possible, but necessary in the manner aforesaid. So also that which they say they can do, is rather to say that God can [do] through them, like an omnipotent artificer through His instruments necessarily subservient to Him. Although how a second cause, like man, can impede the effect of the divine will, could be more fully disputed.

And what they argue concerning the little child, they truly seem to speak as little children, and to think as little children. For how do they understand that they can kill the little child, either by themselves, or with the Lord, etc., as before? For a similar necessity or impossibility in the killing of the little child must be posited, as in any other free effects whatsoever. The argument concerning the little child can also similarly be made about the adult. They also seem to suppose the salvation or damnation of man—the most worthy creature—to fortuitous motions of men, demons, or beasts, and as it were to a chance throw of dice; whence also predestination and reprobation, persons and the number of the heavenly citizens consequently—which the twenty-seventh of Book I together with the following 45 and 46 do not allow, and which the authorities of Augustine in On the Gift of Perseverance ch. 35, On Rebuke and Grace ch. 27 cited in the thirty-first of Book I, On Grace and Free Will ch. 50 with many others cited in the thirty-ninth of Book I, condemn.

That it is argued from the experience of liberty, this does not certify in every way, since as Hippocrates says in the first of the first [book] of the Aphorisms: "Experience is fallacious, judgment difficult." For beasts, the mad, fools, and children seem to experience similar liberty—who yet do not have full liberty, because not the liberty of contradiction, nor [liberty] from necessity with respect to higher causes, nor even with respect to lower causes, as is clear from the eleventh of this book. Nor does Augustine, nor anyone else, experience having liberty exempt from subjection to God, but [only] a will free from unwilling coercion.

Furthermore, what they object consequently is the argument of the Manichees against that [word] of our master Christ: "No man can come to me unless the Father, who sent me, draw him," John 6—Chrysostom there saying: "Here the Manichees leap forth saying, 'Therefore nothing is set in us'; which can also similarly be objected against the twentieth and thirtieth of Book II; yet the ninth of this book fully responds.

That they also object that God would be the author of evil, can similarly be objected against the twentieth and thirtieth of Book II; yet here the thirty-fourth of Book I responds. As to what they also say—"I am unwilling to have him as my God who impels me to evil"—similarly can be said against the twenty-sixth and thirtieth of Book II; against which I, on the contrary, say: I am unwilling to have Him as our God who is not omnipotent in acting, who does not have most omnipotent dominion over my weak will, who could not most omnipotently make me will and do whatever He willed, who does not have a will universally efficacious, infrustrable, indefectible, and necessary in causing—indeed whose will is not a necessity to me, according to the sensible opinion written in the twenty-seventh of this book.

Indeed, constantly and with free voice, I say: I am unwilling to have Him as my God whose most blessed will I, a wretched sinner, can most easily depose from the highest fortress of His most worthy liberty, and submit to the necessary yoke of opposite servitude, and hold submitted indissolubly; whose most holy will I, a sinner, can most easily oppress like a weak little woman, and necessitate to the horrible act of sin; nay even more than any little woman whatsoever I can necessitate to consent to the most foul, vilest act of sin. And to Him still acting confidently, I say: I am unwilling to have Him as my God, whom I, a sinner, impel to necessarily willing or even permitting evil; whom I, a wretched sinner, necessitate by turns, as wickedness pleases, to willing or permitting evil—who is so miserably subjected to the servitude of so wretched a sinner.

For the adversary confesses that, as long as my evil act is future, so long is God most free, with the fullest liberty of contradiction, either to will and permit it, or not. But when it is done by me temporally and presently, then it is necessary, by a necessity opposed to the prior eternal liberty, that the Lord will and permit that act. To which similarly I still say: I am unwilling to have Him as my God who in the whole universe of the creature does or conserves or voluntarily permits any evil thing simply, and not good. Wherefore the twenty-sixth of Book I shows that no thing is evil simply, but every [thing] is good. Wherefore I still say: I am unwilling to have Him as my God—namely, the highest good—from whom (according to the opinion of James) every other good does not descend.

Why again, I say, do you wish to have Him as your God, who does not impel you to every good (at least one necessarily owed), and does not repel you from every evil, since He could most easily, and as easily as He permits the opposite, and without any inconvenience or labor of His own, and to your greatest advantage and worth? Why, I add further, do you wish to have Him as your God, who permits so many evils (according to you) in the universe subject to His regiment, who does not make so many small and lesser goods better, indeed who does not make the whole universe better, since He could so just as easily? Whom I still ask: Do you wish to have Him as your God who impels you to good? If not, you profess the Pelagian heresy, as 21, 23, and 30 of Book II show: if so, then according to you all goods which will come about will come about by necessity, etc., as against the fifteenth opinion repressed in the twenty-second of this book.

Yet undoubtedly God violently impels no one unwilling, but He spontaneously impels and draws all the willing to whatever free acts of theirs.

Further, for this and all similar [objections] concerning sin and necessitation to sinning, or to sinning, perhaps another, more subtle and probable response can be made: that God necessitates in some way to the act of sin according to the substance of the act itself; but it does not therefore seem consequent that He necessitates to sin, or to the deformity of sin, insofar as it is sin or the deformity of sin. For omnipotent God could, as it appears, separate the substance of the act itself, and any positive thing, from the deformity of sin, and could produce and preserve such an effect of His as really positive and good, without such a privative defect and malice—especially since sin, deformity, malice, or defect is not essentially the act itself, nor a necessary consequence of the substance of the act itself, as appears from the twenty-sixth of Book I. Therefore, with God good, rightly acting, pre-acting, and necessitating in some way to such an act good according to substance and nature, malice or sin in no way necessarily follows. Whence then does it follow, except from the free will of the creature deficient, willingly and voluntarily sinning? But if anything sounds otherwise, may God deign to reveal it to me, and render me soberly wise; and if perhaps I sin in falling, may He bring me back to the rule of justice.

That it is argued that difficulty and ignorance excuse no sin, because neither does the impossibility of avoiding it: this can similarly be argued of any merit; yet these excuse sin in some [degree], because they take away or in some way diminish free choice; for either they becloud cognition or weaken execution; whereas this impossibility of avoiding, or necessity of doing, neither diminishes nor offends [free choice], as the corollaries 1 and 2 and the tenth of this book teach.

That it is argued that there was not greater possibility of avoiding sin before the fall than after: this can similarly be argued of avoiding merit, or of doing a possible merit, but not a future one. Nor does the causal reasoning proceed. For how does it follow: man cannot do A except by absolute power, nor can he do B except by absolute power, therefore he cannot do A more than B, nor vice versa? It does not follow similarly arguing: No creature can do anything except by God's power (as the second of Book I and following have proved), therefore no creature can do one thing more than another, more easily than more difficultly, nor can one creature do more than another, the stronger and more potent more than the weaker and more impotent, however much. Nor does it even follow concerning ordained power: No creature can do any future thing except by God's ordained power (as the corollary of the ninth of Book I showed), therefore no creature can do one future thing more than another, more easily than more difficultly, nor can one creature, namely the more potent, [do] more than another more impotent, however much. Thirdly, it does not follow concerning natural power. For just because no natural thing can naturally operate anything except through natural power, [it does not follow that] no natural thing can naturally operate one more than another. Therefore [man] before the fall, when he was wholly sound in nature and very strong in gracious gifts, was more able than after he fell among thieves, and into the latrine of sin—where he is wounded in nature, and despoiled of grace; whence he is rendered impotent and weak. He has now also a most strong enemy whom he did not have then, namely the corrupted body which weighs down the soul, and the concupiscence of the flesh which is opposed to the spirit; to which two pestilential companions are added: too great ignorance for discerning, and very great difficulty in executing. And this is the reasoning and cause of the Doctors who had been cited on the opposing side: Peter, Sentences II, dist. 25; Hugh, On the Sacraments, Book I, part 6, ch. 16; Bernard, On Grace and Free Will, ch. 12, as their writings clearly attest.

How and why natural and fatal necessity is repugnant to merit, and not this [necessity], the eleventh of this book teaches. That it is argued that there is no greater liberty in man than in the brute, the eleventh of this book resolves. For in man there is necessity with respect to God alone; in brutes, with respect to Him, and with respect to lower causes, or natural causes. Nor does its causal reasoning proceed. For [it does not follow that] if man cannot in the opposite of doing except by absolute power, nor can the brute, therefore man no more than the brute—as has been shown above. Nor does this opinion render man impeccable, as the thirty-fourth of Book I shows.

That it is inferred that there is no greater liberty in the wayfarer than in the comprehensor [the blessed]: who would presume to deny this, since there is greater liberty in God, in the holy confirmed Angels, and in any comprehensor whatsoever, than in any wayfarer—as Catholics are not unaware, as the authority of Augustine in the Enchiridion, ch. 86, set forth in the first [chapter] of this book, attests, and as Hugh and Peter, where they were cited near here, show? Nor is the causal reasoning effective, as has been shown above. For the wayfarer has manifold infirmity—ignorance, difficulty, the flesh, the world, and the devil as tempters—and not the abundance of confirming grace; the angel, however, has none of these evils, but the opposite goods fully, with most abundant beatifically confirming grace. And this is the reason of the confirmation in good, as the fifteenth of Book II shows. Yet in one way the wayfarer has freedom of choice which God and the comprehensor do not have, namely to obey the divine commands or not, to sin or not.

That it is consequently inferred that the wayfarer cannot merit more than the confirmed Angel: this seems, according to the opinion of Peter, Sentences II, dist. 5 and 11, recited in the first of this book, to be conceded. But because the same can be argued of the Angels to be beatified plenarily and perfectly after the final judgment, the response must be otherwise: that no one can merit anything good from God of strict deserving, namely by necessity of right and inflexible rigor, but whatever good we merit from Him, all proceeds and depends on His most gratuitous grace and gratuitous will, as the thirty-ninth of Book I more clearly demonstrated. God can therefore, without injury of right, and without prejudice to any one, prefix to angel and to man a certain term for meriting, and accept his works as meritorious up to that point, but beyond that as compensatory and consummating of preceding merits. Yet necessity alone, in fully consummated angels, does not seem to be repugnant to merit, as the corollaries of the first, second, and tenth of this book teach, but only consummated perfection. For those meriting are on the way and in motion to the term, but the comprehensors and consummated [are] plenarily in the ultimate term. Nor does it follow that the wayfaring man is finally confirmed: For not therefore is anyone said to be finally confirmed because he necessarily follows the divine will, but for another reason assigned above.

The clever argument which consequently growls in Logic, Philosophy, and Theology is heretical and condemned, as is established from the forty-third of Book I. Again, according to this insensible opinion, God could will something to be or to come about, and it would not be or come about; could will something to be or come about of such-or-such a kind—namely, predestined and good—and it would not be such, nor come about; could also will something not to be or come about simply or such, and against His will it would be or come about simply or such; and so God most blessed and omnipotent would be rendered miserable and impotent, as the tenth of Book I teaches. Further, according to this vain and false madness, God could know Himself without loving Himself: for in some way He seems to know prior to loving; and the heavenly Father could be without His Son, since He is in a way prior to Him, as the thirty-second of Book II showed.

The two arguments that follow seem to put forward a certain blasphemous exemption from subjection and servitude to the Lord our God, to which through the fifth and ninth of this book a fuller response is made. The same arguments also seem to suppose with the Pelagians that the created will can act without God properly co-acting, or at least without Him naturally preceding—which the twentieth of Book II together with the thirtieth has refuted. Nor is there any doubt but that it is far—nay, infinitely—more perfect that, when God wills to do something through some creature, every knee should necessarily be bent to Him, than that anyone should be able to resist Him in this way; for thus, and not otherwise, is He omnipotent and infinitely perfect, as appears more completely in the first [chapter] of this book.

That which is argued concerning omission no more opposes the twenty-seventh of this book than the twentieth or thirtieth, or the thirty-second of Book II; nor does it proceed concerning omission more than concerning commission. The authority of Augustine has been glossed above; nor does this authority of Augustine intend to destroy his other authority on Deuteronomy 20 and the sacred text there, which were cited in the thirty-third of Book II. The arguments concerning permission, volition, and love of sin proceed against the twentieth of Book II, just as against the twenty-seventh of Book III, which are also fully resolved through the thirty-third and thirty-fourth of Book I. The authorities of Genesis and Ecclesiasticus go against the twentieth and thirtieth of Book II, just as against the twenty-seventh of Book III, which are more clearly expounded in the twenty-eighth of Book II. The authority of the Apostle, however, denies a necessity adverse to free power, as his words show, which the tenth of this book also makes clear; he also seems to speak there of the necessity of law or right, which has its origin from a vow or other contract, and of the opposite power.

To that which is argued concerning antecedent necessity, response must be made through the distinction concerning antecedent necessity set forth in the twenty-eighth of this book; or otherwise: Anselm, denying preceding necessity from effects freely and contingently future, intends to deny it from the first cause of those, namely from the divine will, according to the eleventh and twelfth truths of the fifth of this book; and his words evidently indicate this. For he says: "Know that all things were of necessity because He Himself willed; but no necessity preceded His will." And in such effects he affirms following necessity, because according to him they are made by a cause—namely the divine will necessary by following necessity—as appears in the proximate chapter. The reason of this transumptive denomination from cause to effect can be drawn from what was set forth in the twenty-sixth of Book II; nor does it include any repugnance for the same effect to be necessary with respect to the same cause both by following necessity and even by preceding [necessity], as is per se clear, as the demonstration of the sixth part of the fifth of this book has evidently taught.

The authorities of Anselm and Boethius, saying that things of free will, before they come about in man and through free will and in time, can be changed and in no way come about—they understand manifestly with respect to lower causes, because according to them with respect to higher causes they are necessarily going to come about. For their opinion and words evidently indicate this, as the twenty-eighth of this book shows. They wish therefore to say that as far as concerns the reasoning and causality of lower causes—namely free will, or the whole man, or any other temporal causes—there is no necessity with respect to contingent future things, but contingency and possibility to either alternative; but in eternal God, who has above all times and all temporal things a determined, present, immutable, and infrustrable will with respect to all future things, there is necessity of all future things, as the proximate chapter has more fully shown. The authority of Anselm in On Concord, ch. 2, however, speaks of necessity contrary to and unwilling to liberty, as the following word evidently indicates: for he immediately adds that "if she did not will of her own accord, she would not operate." Robert of Lincoln denies that Peter the predestined is saved necessarily by a necessity repugnant to contingency; another necessity, namely friendly to contingency, he in no way denies but plainly concedes. For he concedes that it is necessary that Peter be saved, not necessarily but contingently; therefore he must consequently concede that it is necessary that Peter be contingently saved. How he denies preceding necessity, appears in the preceding chapter.

Bernard denies of free will an unwilling necessity, contrary to it, not concordant. Hence in ch. 3: "Consent," he says, "is voluntary, having free disposition of itself; for it is not compelled, not extorted; it is of will, not of necessity; nor does it deny itself nor offer itself to anyone except from will; otherwise, if it can be compelled, it is unwilling, violent, not voluntary. For where will is not, neither is consent: for there is no consent except voluntary. Where therefore consent, there will; and where will, there liberty; and this is what I think is called free will." And below, ch. 4: "All things which are man's, except the will alone of himself, are not free; life, sense, appetite, memory, ingenuity, and any such things, by this very fact subject to necessity, that they are not subject to will entirely; the will itself, however, because it is impossible for it to disobey itself (for no one either does not will what he wills, or wills what he does not will)—even is it impossible for it to be deprived of its liberty: indeed the will can be changed, but only into another will, so that it never loses liberty; therefore neither can it be deprived of that, nor of itself. If man could ever either will nothing at all, or will something and not by the will, the will could also lack liberty: only the will therefore, since by its inborn liberty either to dissent from itself, or beside itself in something to consent, is compelled by no force, by no necessity—does it constitute the creature meritorious, just or unjust, worthy and capable of beatitude or misery, according as it has consented to justice or injustice."

Who in ch. 5, giving the reason for what was cited above, says thus: "For just as, converted to good through grace, the consent of the human will makes man freely good and free in good thereby, that he becomes [it] of will, is not unwillingly drawn—so spontaneously rolled down into evil, in evil it constitutes him no less free as spontaneous, led indeed by his own will, not coerced from elsewhere to be evil. And just as a heavenly Angel, or even God Himself, remains freely good, namely by will, not by any extrinsic necessity, so indeed the devil equally freely both falls and persists in evil by his own voluntary nod, not by another's impulse; the will of liberty therefore remains, even where there is captivity of mind, full indeed in the evil as in the good." Hence in ch. 6 he concludes one definition of free will thus: "From this liberty alone, by which it is free for the will to indicate itself either good if it consents to good, or evil if to evil—since indeed it senses itself to consent to neither except certainly by willing—we believe free will is named." Who in ch. 18 also denies necessity of not sinning of God, and denying similar necessity—namely unwilling—of Angels and men, attributes to them the opposite liberty; another necessity, however, according to higher causes (the aforesaid in the twenty-seventh of this book) he in no way denies, but rather affirms. Hence he says thus: "Otherwise, neither does God lack free will, nor the devil; since that He cannot be evil [is] not weak necessity, but firm will in good and voluntary firmness; and that this one is not able to breathe again into good [is] not made by alien violent oppression, but by his own obstinate will in evil and voluntary obstinacy. Therefore even from this rather is free will spoken of, that whether in good or in evil it equally makes the will free, since neither anyone good nor evil ought to be said, or be able to be, except willing. By such reasoning then it will not improperly be said that to good and evil it [the will] is equally disposed, since on either side, namely, there is to it not facility in election, but liberty in will. By this, indeed, prerogative of divine dignity, as has been said, the Creator singularly distinguished the rational creature; that just as He Himself was of His own right, and of His own will, not of necessity, that He was good, so also it [the rational creature] would in some way be of its own right in this part, in that not except by its own will it would either be made evil and justly damned, or remain good and meritoriously saved; not because its proper will could suffice for salvation, but because it would by no means obtain it without its own will. For no one is saved unwilling: for what is read in the Gospel, 'No man comes to me unless my Father draws him,' likewise in another place, 'Compel them to come in,' in no way impedes; because indeed however many the kindly Father, who wills all to be saved, may seem to draw or compel to salvation, He yet judges no one worthy of salvation whom He has not proved willing. For He intends, when He terrifies or smites, to make them willing, not to save them unwilling—although when He changes the will from evil into good, He transfers, not removes liberty."

Yet, on the surface of the letter, what he says seems calumniable: that liberty from necessity belongs equally to God and to creature—since every virtue and perfection belonging to both seems infinitely more to belong to God, since every creature is finite in every way, but He is most infinite in every way, as the first supposition proves.

That it is objected that all Authors deny necessity of free acts: through the twenty-ninth and twenty-eighth and tenth of this book set forth above, this can sufficiently be resolved, I think.

The Oxford article condemned by Robert of Canterbury does not oppose the aforesaid necessity. For from this it does not follow that every true proposition about the future is necessary, but its opposite manifestly. For if this be true and necessary by such necessity—"Antichrist will be born"—it necessarily follows that he will at some time be born, and that afterward in perpetuity it will be false. For the fuller understanding of this article, it should be known that some at Oxford were of the opinion that no proposition about the future in contingent matter is true or false, as can be drawn from the seventeenth of this book; from which it necessarily follows that every true proposition about the future is necessary—namely, that it necessarily be fulfilled, such as: "The sun will rise," "There will be an eclipse," and the like; whereby it justly deserved to be condemned.

Furthermore, it can be said that the article speaks of absolute necessity, contrary, not consonant, with liberty, as the tenth of this book distinguishes. The Parisian article, however, speaks of necessity not with respect to higher causes, but only of lower ones—namely, of celestial bodies and natural causes—that is, of necessity of nature or stellar fate. For some at Paris were of the opinion that the human will is subject to the necessity of the stars, and that it is only passive, and that it necessarily wills, when all the lower required causes are posited, as is clear from the thirtieth of Book II, the sixth and tenth of this book. This is evidently shown by the words of the article, duly weighed. For in the article it is condemned that nothing happens by chance, wherefore its opposite is affirmed: but with respect to God and higher causes nothing at all happens by chance, but only with respect to lower ones, through the twenty-ninth of Book I. Hence the same Stephen of Paris condemned an article asserting that some things can casually happen with respect to the first cause, and that it is false that all things are preordained by the first cause; but the article denies necessity with respect to those causes with respect to which it affirms chance, but this is only with respect to lower causes. The passage of Scripture which the article cites for itself indicates this evidently, because, "the concurrence of causes is part of the definition of the chance event," in the Book of Consolation, that is in Prose 1 of Book V. Where Boethius says: "It is clear to define chance as an unforeseen outcome from confluent causes, in those things which are done for another reason"; which he understood of lower causes, not higher, as his preceding and following words manifest, as is shown more fully in the twenty-ninth of Book I—which fortify and confirm the aforesaid necessity. For after the definition of chance set forth, he immediately adds: "And it is the order proceeding by inevitable connection that makes the causes to concur and flow together, which descending from the fountain of providence, arranges all things in their times and places."

That the article also speaks of necessity with respect to lower causes, namely of necessity of nature or stellar fate, appears through other articles joined with it in condemnation. For with that one is condemned another article asserting that from the diversity of places, necessities of events are acquired; and again, another laying down that from diverse signs of the heaven are signified diverse conditions in men, both of spiritual goods and of temporal things; and again, another which said that in the hour of generation of man, in his body, and consequently in his soul (because it follows the body), from the order of higher causes, namely celestial bodies and lower, there is in man a disposition inclining to such actions and events—an error, unless understood of natural events and by way of disposition. Furthermore, another which laid down that fate, which is the disposition of the universe, proceeds from divine providence, not immediately, but by means of the motion of higher bodies; and that this fate does not impose necessity on lower things, because they have contrariety, but on higher ones; where also many other similar [propositions] are condemned. Now the condemnation of this last article saves the aforesaid necessity. For here it is condemned that fate proceeding from divine providence does not impose necessity on lower things; therefore its opposite is affirmed, namely that it imposes necessity on lower things governed under divine providence. Of this kind, however, are all our free acts, as the thirty-first of Book I shows. Hence the same Stephen of Paris condemned an article asserting that human acts are not ruled by divine providence. Nor is it likely that this Stephen, condemning the aforesaid article, reconciled another which he himself previously condemned, laying down that for effects to be necessary with respect to the first cause, it does not suffice that the first cause itself be unimpedible—as the twenty-seventh of this book has more fully recited.

The condemnation of another Parisian article, and of Peter Abelard, does not oppose the necessity stated in the twenty-seventh of this book; for the twenty-seventh of this book affirms only necessity in future things with respect to the divine will; whether however God can or cannot will and do otherwise, it does not affirm.

That which is argued, according to the reasoning of the aforesaid necessity, that all things which will come about will come about by necessity with respect to lower causes, limps incurably in matter and in form. In matter, because it supposes that all things which will come about will come about through lower causes, since yet God alone will do many things through Himself; for He alone will create future things to be created. Of those things also which will come about through lower causes—say, of things of free will—it sins in form: because, even though, with respect to the divine will, infrustrable and immutable, and determinately and distinctly willing those things to come about through lower causes, it is necessary for them to come about through those, as the twenty-seventh of this book teaches; with respect, however, to lower causes—say, man and free will—it is not necessary for those things which will come about through them, to come about through them, because, as far as concerns their own reasoning and causality, there is no necessity with respect to their free future effects, but indetermination, indifference, contingency, and possibility to either alternative.

That it is argued consequently that the opposite of this position is possible, this neither opposes nor impugns it. For many things are true that are not necessary, and whose opposites are recognized as possible. Yet the argument does not prove that the opposite is possible, nor is it true. It is not true, because through the third and fourth of Book I, it is not possible for a creature to act without God properly co-acting, and this through His own will, not frustrable, prior in nature to any second cause acting, nor existing in the power of any second cause, or any of the second causes, or all of them, as the ninth and tenth of Book I, the thirtieth of Book II, the seventh and eighth of Book III manifest. The reasoning, however, does not proceed. For when it is argued that for God to will the creature to act freely is different from God's willing the creature to act necessarily, therefore this willing can be separated from the other—how does he speak of liberty? If of the liberty opposed to the necessity shown in the twenty-seventh of this book, he assumes a falsehood. For God neither wills, nor can will the creature so freely to act, as has been shown above and there; just as He neither wills nor can will the creature to be so free as not to be of necessity subject to God, or that it could act without Him; for this includes a contradiction, as the twenty-second of Book II, and the twenty-third of Book III against the seventeenth opinion has shown. Just as also He cannot will Himself not to be, or God not to be, not to beget or breathe forth, nor a creature to be simply omnipotent and equal to Himself, and three of the creature to be equal to or fewer than two, a point or a soul to be a body, and similar infinite things. If however he speaks of another liberty, namely that opposed to necessity of nature, of fate, or of violence, and consonant with the aforesaid necessity, he does not refutationally oppose, nor impugn, as is clear in the tenth of this book. Furthermore, when he says "different," if he speaks of essential and real diversity, he assumes a falsehood; because there is not, nor can there be in God such diversity of wills: for all His wills are His one essence. If, however, he speaks of diversity according to reason and the human mode of understanding, he does not conclude. For similarly it could be inferred that God can understand, and not love Himself; that He can beget, and not breathe forth; that He can make three not to be more than two. For to will three to be is different from willing three to be more than two; therefore this willing can be separated from the other, etc., as the adversary above argued. Likewise it could be shown that it is possible for God not to be, and for past things not to have been, and present things not to be—which he denies; because for God to will Himself freely to be, is different from for God to will Himself necessarily to be; therefore etc., as the false-writer argued. Of past and present things also the same is clear. And similarly I will prove that it is possible for a point or soul to be a body, and a simple unit to be any number whatever—since for God to will a point, soul, or simple unit to be a body or number, is different from for God to will these or those not to be; therefore etc., as the contradictor argues.

The last clever argument, finally, raves, deviates, and errs as if blind from ignorance of the refutation. For it does not argue from the same point, nor to the same; or if it so argues, it assumes falsehood, as is clear from what has been said above.

CHAPTER XXX. HE ARGUES THIS [HYPOTHESIS] CONCERNING THE FALSITY OF THE HYPOTHESIS BY A WAY TAKEN FROM THE NECESSITY AND LIBERTY OF THE DIVINE WILL, WHICH ALWAYS NECESSARILY REMAINS UNIFORM AND EQUAL.

The first error, namely concerning the insufficiency of the response set forth in the twenty-sixth of this book, having been rectified, it now remains to do likewise with the second, which arises from the non-subsistence of the hypothesis it supposes. For this hypothesis supposes seven things:

First, that what is now future, can—by a possibility excluding any necessity whatsoever—now and for the present not be future.

Second, that what was always future can in similar manner never have been future.

Third, that what is not now future can similarly now and for the present be future.

Fourth, that what was never future can similarly always have been future.

Fifth, that, these things by no means standing in the way, every existing thing is necessarily now to exist.

Sixth, that everything which has been must necessarily have been.

Seventh, that everything which is or has been must necessarily always before have been future.

And concerning things foreknown and known by God, and His foreknowledge and knowledge correspondingly, it lays down seven similar things in every way.

This error must be opposed in two ways. First, by a way taken from the intrinsic action of God; second, by a way taken from His extrinsic action. The first way has a double method: one from the divine will or volition, and the other from His intellect or cognition; and each of these has yet two paths of truth: one leading through necessity or contingency and liberty; the other proceeding through immutability or mutability.

By this path of truth, then, which leads through the necessity or liberty of the divine will, we proceed in this manner: If the seven aforesaid things concerning present, past, and future things, things foreknown and known, the foreknowledge and knowledge of God be true, also seven similar things concerning what God has previously willed and willed, and concerning the will or volition of Him, will necessarily be true, as the locus from similitude proves sufficiently; which the eighteenth of Book I evidently shows, since God knows or foreknows none of these things except by a previous will. This can also be demonstrated through each individually:

First, namely that God now wills something—say, A to come about—and can, by a free power (that is, of contradiction, excluding all-around necessity), now and for the present not will A to come about: this can be demonstrated in two ways—through the impossible, and simply by ostension. Let the opposite be granted, namely that God for the present cannot not will A to come about; therefore it is necessary for the present that God will A to come about, and through the tenth of Book II it necessarily follows: God wills A to come about, therefore A will be; and the antecedent is necessary for the present, therefore also the consequent, as the common rule of Logicians teaches. This can similarly be demonstrated through the impossible: for otherwise it would be possible that the false should follow from the true. The necessity of the consequent inferred, this hypothesis denies. To the same, by ostension, in this manner: it follows, A will not be, therefore through the tenth of Book I God does not will A to come about; and the antecedent is for the present possible, as the hypothesis says, therefore also the consequent, as no logician fails to know. Which can also easily be demonstrated through the impossible: for otherwise it would be possible from the true to follow the false.

Second, namely that God always willed something future—say, A to come about—and can, by the power aforesaid, never have willed A to come about: it can be demonstrated as the first; it can also be demonstrated through the first. For if through the first it be posited that God now does not will A to come about, it follows through the tenth of Book I that He never willed A to come about, since A was never future, because never has been, is, or will be.

Third, namely that God now does not will A to come about, and can, by the aforesaid possibility, for the present will A to come about: it is proved as the first. To the same, if God can for the present not will what He now wills, by similar reasoning He can for the present will what He now does not will.

Fourth, namely that God never willed A to come about, and can, by the power already aforesaid, always have willed A to come about: it is proved as the proximate; it is also proved through it, as the second through the first.

Fifth, namely that, together with these, of any existing thing which God wills now to be, it is necessary for Him to will it now to be; and that of everything which now is, it is necessary that God for the present will it now to be: as to the first part, it is demonstrated in two ways. First, by ostension thus: Let A be something now existing; then through the ninth of Book I it necessarily follows: A is, therefore A is conserved in being by the divine will, and God wills this to be; and the antecedent is necessary for the present, as the hypothesis posits, therefore also the consequent, as the proof of the first teaches. Through the impossible in this manner: let the opposite be granted, namely that something—say, A—which God now wills to be, can not will to be for the present; therefore through the ninth of Book I A can for the present not be, which this hypothesis denied. The second part of this follows from the prior with this added: that everything which now is, God wills now to be, as the ninth of Book I taught.

Sixth is, that of every past thing which God willed to have been, it is necessary that He willed it to have been; and that of every past thing it is necessary that God willed it to have been: this is proved as the fifth.

Seventh is, that of everything which is or has been, it is necessary that God always before willed it to have been future. For through the eighteenth of this book it necessarily follows, this is or was, therefore it always was future, therefore everything which is or has been, was always before future; therefore through the fourteenth of Book I God always was willing this; and through the hypothesis the antecedent is necessary, namely about every existing and past thing—that this is, this was—therefore also the consequent, as the proof of the first teaches.

From these last three, that is, the fifth, sixth, and seventh, concerning necessity around the divine will, an eighth concerning impossibility around the same can be drawn out: namely, that no existing thing can God now actively nill (that is, by an act of nilling positively contrary to volition) to be now; nor can He will any existing thing now for the present not to be; and that of no past thing can He actively nill it to have been, nor will it not to have been; and that of no present or past thing can He actively nill it to have been future, nor will it not to have been future. This most clearly follows from what has been said and from the confession of the hypothesis, the tenth of Book I being added.

These four concerning necessity and impossibility of the divine will around present and past things being demonstrated lastly, four similar things concerning impossibility and necessity of the divine will around non-present and non-past things can similarly be demonstrated.

The first is, that whatever non-existing thing God does not will now to be, it is impossible for Him to will it now to be; and that of every thing which now is not, it is impossible for God to will it to be now.

The second is, that whatever non-past thing God did not will to have been, it is impossible for Him to have willed it to have been; and that of every non-past thing, it is impossible for Him to have willed it to have been.

The third is, of everything which is not nor has been, it is impossible that God ever willed it to have been future.

The fourth is, of every thing which now is not, nor has been, it is necessary that God actively nill it to be and to have been, and to have been future, that it should be now or earlier.

All these will be shown through the locus from similitude. They can also, like the foregoing, be demonstrated by supposing with the Philosopher in On Interpretation I, last chapter, that what is not, when it is not, must necessarily not be—which this response cannot deny. The fourth of these is also proved through the same twenty-second of Book I, and its corollary coming to its aid.

These foregoing things, as it were in long-distant fashion, having been touched, we must approach more closely. Now, with respect to any extrinsic object whatsoever, the divine will is equally free or necessary, and with respect to any future object it is entirely free, as the hypothesis says; therefore, with respect to any past or present object, against the hypothesis. Or thus, with the same major: also with respect to any past or present object, the divine will is necessary according to the hypothesis; therefore also with respect to any future object, against the hypothesis often spoken of.

Likewise: of whatever sort intrinsically with respect to any object the will of God is at any time, of such sort it always was before, and always after will be; but with respect to A future, the will of God is now entirely free according to contradiction, according to the hypothesis; therefore it always will be so; therefore when A shall be present or past, against the hypothesis. Or thus, with the same major: and with respect to A present or past, the will of God is necessary according to the hypothesis; therefore always before so it was; therefore when A was future, which this hypothesis denies.

Likewise, not under another opinion but under another form: in whatever way intrinsically God wills or actively does not will, loves or hates at some time some object, in such way—if it be lawful to say so—and entirely intrinsically he always before did so, and always after will do; but according to the hypothesis God now entirely freely and contradictorily wills and loves A future; therefore He will entirely similarly freely and contradictorily will and love it when it shall be present or past, against the hypothesis, because then He will do this necessarily, as the hypothesis confessed. Or, with the same major: and according to the hypothesis, God necessarily intrinsically wills or loves A present or past now; therefore always before so He did; therefore when A was future, against the hypothesis often mentioned.

All this, however, consists virtually in this one thing: that the divine will, with respect to any extrinsic object, is always equally free or necessary intrinsically to willing; and with respect to any object, when it is present or past, is necessary; therefore always before, while it was future, so it was; therefore by the same reasoning, with respect to any future thing it is now necessary; therefore concerning any future thing, it is necessary that it come about. For through the tenth of Book I it necessarily follows: God wills this to come about, therefore this will be; and the antecedent is necessary, therefore the consequent, as has been shown above. Or if with respect to a future object, when it is future, it be contradictorily free, it will also similarly equally be free with respect to it when it shall be present and past.

Here, however, all the men of this way concordantly respond, denying the major. For they say that when the thing is future, the divine will is not necessary, but free according to contradiction, to willing it; but when it shall be present or past, then conversely. But these do not heed that then God otherwise intrinsically wills present and past things than He willed them future; wherefore God and His will are necessarily intrinsically changed against the fifth and twenty-third of Book I: for He is intrinsically changed from one of opposites into the remaining—from free choice to non-free, from non-necessary to necessary, from free according to contradiction, to necessary according only to one part.

Likewise then God is less free intrinsically now than before, therefore not of infinite liberty, but defined by certain limits; and a new servitude is imposed on Him as well. Likewise then God is less powerful than He was, wherefore neither omnipotent. For that which yesterday He was able to will and not will, today He cannot; and the intrinsic act of will which yesterday He could produce or have, today He cannot; and what yesterday He could do, now He cannot. For yesterday He could will that A be not now or earlier, today, however, [it is] never [the case that it is] made or would be made, nor would it ever have been future, and today He so cannot. Yesterday He could positively nill A to be ever, to have been, or to have been future; today He so cannot. Yesterday He could produce or have such an act: I will that A was never future, present, or past; today He so cannot, nor so much does He have dominion over His own will. And the same is concerning the act of nilling A ever to have been future, present, or past. Yesterday He could will and do concerning A which was not yesterday, and which was never future, or would be yesterday, that it should be or have been yesterday, and that it should have been always before future to being yesterday; today He can do neither, nor have done—which is no doubt to derogate from God's omnipotence.

Wherefore Lombard, Sentences I, dist. 44, refutes the opinion saying that God cannot always do what He could at some time, and says: "Let us therefore confess that God can always whatever He once was able—that is, have all that power which He once had, and the power of all that thing which He once had—but not always be able to do all that which He at some time was able to do; He can indeed do or have done what at some time He was able [to do]." And let no one be moved that he says, "God cannot always do all that which at some time He could do." For he says this, as his procedure teaches, not on account of any intrinsic diversification of divine power, but only on account of the diverse signification of this infinitive verb facere with this verb of present time posse, and again with this verb of past time potuit. For according to his logic, in the first case [posse facere], it signifies present action with present time; and in the second [potuit facere], with past tense, [it signifies] past [action]; and therefore he denies that God now can rise again, and concedes that He once could rise again, because this is not the same posse with that, but diverse, as the twenty-fourth of Book I, in its similar [example], more fully showed.

And if you object: God once could rise again, and now cannot rise again, therefore He once could something which He cannot now; one must say according to the logic of Lombard previously stated, that in the first case with the verb of past time, this infinitive resurgere supposes or is appended for past resurrection, and in the second with the verb of present time, for present resurrection, and so it is taken for diverse [things]; therefore neither is it rightly concluded for the same, namely that something the same that once He could, now He cannot. But, just as in the premises he takes resurgere for diverse [things], so he can well conclude for diverse [things] thus: therefore God once could something, and other [thing] now He cannot; nevertheless, that same past resurgere, which He once could, He still can: for He can now have once risen, which posse is altogether the same with posse once to rise.

Or otherwise, perhaps it can be distinguished: in the first, resurgere can be taken for to rise now or earlier; but in the second, it cannot be taken except for to rise in the present; therefore taking resurgere uniformly in the premises as to form, [he] concludes; but in matter [he] is deficient, because the first is false. Taking it differently, however, [he] does not conclude. This distinction, however, can be more fully known from the twenty-fourth of Book I.

Lombard, then, on account of the cause of the diverse signification of the verbs aforesaid, denies that God can always do whatever at some time He could do; he affirms, however, that God can always [do] what at some time He could; and that He can now have done whatever at some time He could do or have done.

Likewise, yesterday God could lay down or not have that eternal volition by which He eternally willed A to be now, and could have had a contrary eternal volition; and today He cannot so do. For now it is necessary that He have eternally had that eternal volition, wherefore also that He will have it eternally, since He is intrinsically immutable in every way, as the fifth and twenty-third of Book I teach. God therefore does not have so much liberty, so much dominion of His own will, nor so much power within or without today as yesterday; but as He grows old, so in these things He is diminished and decreased—which horribly mutilates and curtails the omnipotent hand of God and His infinite power; or rather, He vainly strives to do these things and is not able, the Lord saying through the Prophet: "Is my hand shortened and become little?" Isaiah 50; and below in 49: "Behold, the hand of the Lord is not shortened." But let those who say so beware, because still His hand is stretched out, above 5.

Likewise, then God is not always supremely perfect, against the first supposition and the third part of the first corollary of Book I. For it seems more perfect to have a will free toward without, as He once had, than newly necessary, as He now has with respect to present and past things. Or, if this be more perfect, then before He was not supremely perfect; if, however, He was equally perfect, in vain is He intrinsically changed from one to the other—since according to the common opinion of the Philosophers, in vain is anything done through more, if fewer suffice, especially if just as well; since yet, according to the Philosopher, Ethics I, ch. 1: "Every act and election seems to seek [a good]"; and as the Philosophers, both natural and metaphysical, show: every action is for the sake of an end, and every such end is a good, as the twenty-sixth of Book I cites. But according to the Philosopher, On the Heaven and World I, ch. 32: "God and nature do nothing in vain." Hence Ezekiel 6: "I the Lord have not spoken in vain."

And if anyone should say that God is so changed not for His own good, but for the good of the creature, how would the good of the creature remain if God were to destroy the entire creation, never again to create any? Since yet then there would come about and remain in Him a necessity of having willed creatures to have preceded, and of their having been annihilated. Nor is such new necessity in God any better for the creature than His old liberty.

Likewise, in the divine will there is contingency to either alternative simply with respect to all present and past things. For all things naturally previous to that act of divine volition being posited, it does not necessarily follow that it is produced, but this and that stand equally. For so it was while things were future; nor is that act of divine volition now intrinsically caused otherwise than before, on account of the fifth and twenty-third of Book I, nor extrinsically by anything—namely an extrinsic concauser, on account of the same things, and on account of the twentieth of Book I being joined. The divine volition therefore with respect to present and past is simply contingent to either alternative, as is clear from the fourth of this book; and is confirmed through the eleventh truth of the fifth of this book; therefore also simply free according to contradiction, as appears from the fifth truth of the fifth of this book.

Likewise, the divine will freely according to contradiction produces the act of willing present and past things, just as it did when they were future, as is clear through the fourth corollary of this book with the deduction set forth; therefore also similarly contingently, as the fourth truth of the fifth of this book says. Likewise, contingency and liberty are properly said with respect to the present, as the seventh and eighth truths of the fifth of this book show; therefore God contingently and freely wills and does present things.

Likewise, if God can not will and positively nill to come about what He willed to come about, and will otherwise and otherwise intrinsically (because freely and necessarily) through the successions and differences of times, it would be possible that yesterday He positively willed Peter to be saved, and willed him not to be saved, but to be damned; and today He wills him to be saved, not damned. And the same is concerning God's nilling yesterday A to come about, and today willing it to come about. Therefore through the tenth of Book I, yesterday Peter was not to be saved, and A not to come about; and today Peter is to be saved, and A future—against the eighteenth of this book, and against the reason of any man.

Likewise, then God would will otherwise and otherwise according to temporal successions and differences, and would will temporally and successively, and not in eternity, or in the instant of eternity, immutably, indivisibly, and instantaneously always at once; or in eternity itself there would be some succession, and divisibility; wherefore He would necessarily be mutable, nor sufficient to Himself supremely; for He would need time for willing—and this similarly is against all authors speaking of eternity, and of the actions of God in it, as the first of Book I has somewhat cited.

Likewise, then a new action could not come about from an ancient will alone without an intrinsic change of itself preceding. For it is necessary that He intrinsically will otherwise when He produces a thing than before, just as a man wills otherwise this to come about, and otherwise wills this to be. For when He produces the thing, He necessarily wills, and before He freely willed; if however He intrinsically willed altogether similarly, then both then and before He would equally freely and equally necessarily will then and before, since the extrinsic thing does not necessitate God intrinsically to willing. This, however, seems to be the error of Aristotle and Averroes, Physics VIII, as the thirty-fourth part of the first corollary of Book I more fully showed. Wherefore Stephen, Bishop of Paris, justly condemned the article unjustly saying that from an ancient will nothing new can proceed without some preceding transmutation.

Nor can anyone say that that change and that necessity in the divine will follows naturally the production of the thing in being, and does not precede; because this is more inconvenient. For if that necessity follows necessarily and naturally the existence of the thing in being, the existence of the thing in being is naturally prior to it and the cause of it, as the thirteenth of Book I has shown; therefore an extrinsic object necessitates the divine will to willing—which is horrible and absurd. Nor is the extrinsic object the cause moving the divine will, as the twentieth of Book I teaches; wherefore neither the necessity. Of these two necessities, of which one is in the produced thing and the other in the divine will, that one in the divine will is the cause of the other; for this one is newly produced and caused by it, therefore it is prior to it in all things; even in those in which God and the creature agree, more worthy and prior in nature is God, as the first supposition proves, which the Philosopher also teaches in Metaphysics II, chs. 4 and 7, of the same; ch. 3, and Averroes in those same comments, as the second of Book I more fully cited. This necessity also in the divine will is either the first necessity simply, or nearer to it, as no one doubts; therefore prior, as the Philosopher says in Metaphysics V, ch. 16: "Prior and posterior are spoken of, some indeed as some first existing thing and a principle in each genus, that which is nearer to the principle." Where also the text which Averroes expounds has thus: "Some indeed before and after are spoken of as the first being and principle in each genus, and what is nearer to some terminated principle"; on which Averroes says: "Universally before is said of every terminated principle, and of everything which is nearer to some terminated principle."

Also prior in nature is God's willing presentially and in the manner of the present that the thing be, than the thing's being. For this is the cause of that, therefore prior in nature, as the Philosopher says in the Categories, in the chapter "On the prior": "Of those things which are converted according to the consequence of essence, that which is in any way the cause of the other is rightly said prior in nature." And this willing presentially and in the manner of the present in God, after He willed in the manner of the future, is a certain change in Him, as follows from the hypothesis; therefore a change in God necessarily precedes the produced thing.

Likewise, if God were to will a future thing freely, and the same when present or fallen into the past necessarily, there would be some cause why then necessarily and not before; and none except the presence or pastness of the made thing; therefore the made thing would necessitate God's will to willing—which seems indecent and unworthy of God.

To this last reasoning, however, response is made in many ways. For some assign a cause from the part of the thing; others, from the part of God; others, in mixed fashion; and certain others say that nature is the cause of this. Of those assigning the cause from the part of the thing, some assign it from the part of the absolute thing; some from the part of the relative thing, or of relation. The first say that the absolute thing itself, being present or past, is the cause sought.

But this is not true, because through the twentieth of Book I a posterior thing is not the cause of the divine will, nor does it cause anything there, therefore it does not necessitate it. Likewise, the past thing is nothing, therefore it causes nothing, therefore it does not necessitate the divine. Likewise, a future thing has as much being as a past thing, or more, because potential and past being do not have it so, therefore it necessitates as much or more. Likewise, if it were so, this would be because the present or past thing must necessarily be or have been; therefore it is necessary for God to will it to be or to have been; therefore of these two necessities, of which one is in the thing—by which it is necessary for it to be or to have been—and the other in God—by which it is necessary for Him to so will—prior naturally would be the necessity in the made thing, because the cause of the other—which was refuted above. Likewise, God can necessarily will both future things, because those can always not come about, but [also] present and past, because those cannot not be nor have been; therefore God can will in some intrinsic way—say, necessarily—and only with the supposed help of an external thing—say, time or some temporal thing—wherefore He seems miserably needy, and not supremely sufficient to Himself, against what was shown in the fifteenth of Book I. Hence Augustine, On Genesis ad Literam VI, ch. 19: "Did the founder of time need the help of time?" As if to say: in no way. And he holds the same expressly in City of God XI, ch. 30, which seems most true of the intrinsic operations of His own will.

Likewise, it seems more orderly and decorous that the posterior and effect should contract necessity from its prior and cause than vice versa: and through the thirtieth of Book II, the divine will is the first cause of all posterior effects.

Likewise, supposing according to this response that the willed object moves the divine will, still this it does not do immediately of itself according to its real extrinsic being, but according to its intrinsic knowable being, namely through its eternal likeness or idea; just as it moves the created will only through its likeness, or species in the cognition of the causes. But that likeness or idea in the divine mind is always equally clear, equally actual, and in all things equal throughout; therefore it always equally moves the divine will; therefore if once it necessitates it, so always; and if once it does not necessitate it, neither ever.

Likewise, then a spider with its very weak thread could insolubly bind God, and so as it were detain Him in prison and in fetters through the ages. For if it spins and binds anything, it is necessary that God then so will, and after through perpetual ages. Likewise, then any creature would seem stronger than the Creator. Likewise, through the third of Book II the willable object cannot necessitate the created will, which is infinitely weaker than the divine, therefore neither this; or, if the object can necessitate the divine will, the created cannot; this latter is weaker than the created.

Likewise, let A be one not now existing in B—an instant—nor before, which yet God could have made now and before; now therefore, according to what was shown above, it is necessary that God actively nill A to be in B and to have been before B, and to have been future for being in B or before, and so eternally before and after to have nilled, and to be about to nill. Or, that it may proceed more easily for the slower: let it be supposed that God actively nills A to be in B—a present instant—which yet He could have made in B; then it is necessary that He so nill. The cause of this necessity cannot be assigned from the part of the nilled thing, since it is not, wherefore neither does it cause. Likewise, the same case being retained, it is impossible for God to will A to be in B, or to have been before B, or to have been future, that it should be in B or before, and always before He could have willed these things. What therefore is the cause so newly making the divine will impotent? Not that thing, [which is] not a being, since it does not at all cause, nor can it make impotent the created will.

Likewise, it seems absurd, and to be detested by the ears of all, that some weak thing—and (what seems more unworthy) some pure privation of a thing—should necessitate the omnipotent to such impotence, that He cannot now nor ever in the future produce or have an intrinsic act of will which He always could before, nor now or ever will what before He always could will. For now and in the future He cannot produce nor have such an intrinsic act: I will that this day were never future, present, nor past; now also nor in any future times can He produce nor have such an intrinsic act of will: I will that A was future for being in B or before; I will that A be in B; I will that A was before B—and always before He could produce or have such acts not temporally but eternally, and so eternally not temporally will. What therefore from the omnipotent has irreparably taken away so great a power? What has indissolubly bound the so insurmountable? What has incurably mutilated His so great intrinsic dominion over His own will? What has inalienably subjugated His supreme liberty to the lowest servitude of such necessity and impossibility? Far be it that anyone should even lightly think that any creature does this, or any privation of a creature.

Of those, however, assigning the cause of the aforesaid necessity from the part of relation, some posit it as positive, and some as privative. The first say that from the presence or pastness of the thing arises one real or rational relation, which is the cause of this necessity in the divine will. But against this response can be brought the arguments which were against the prior. That relation either is something or nothing. If nothing, it causes nothing, it necessitates nothing. If something, it arises from the absolute present or past thing; therefore that originally so necessitates God. For whatever is the cause of the cause is the cause of the caused; thus therefore the first response returns. Likewise, that relation, if it be something, God can destroy: for otherwise God and the creature equally would be more potent for doing something than God Himself for destroying the same—which does not seem [right], since He is omnipotent over whatever; once it is destroyed, this response also will be destroyed.

Likewise, of the past there is no real relation to the divine will, because there is no real extreme in which it could be founded, since the past has already passed into non-being; nor can it be founded in the divine will, because then it would rather be called a relation of the divine will to the past than vice versa; and because then a new real relation would be present, and accidental, and inhering in God; wherefore He would also be mutable, against the fifth and twenty-third of Book I. Wherefore also Augustine, On the Trinity V, chs. 4 and 5, shows that not everything which is said of God is said of Him according to substance, since some things are said of Him according to relation, as is clear in the divine persons; yet nothing is said of Him according to accident, because not mutably. Hence in ch. 4 he says thus: "Therefore nothing accidental in God, because nothing mutable or losable: nothing in Him is said according to accident, because nothing happens to Him; yet not everything which is said is said according to substance: in created and mutable things, however, what is not said according to substance, it remains, is said according to accident. For all things happen to those which can either be lost or diminished."

And it follows in ch. 5: "In God, however, nothing is said according to accident, because in Him nothing is mutable or losable; nor yet is everything which God is said to be, said according to substance. For He is said toward something, as Father to Son, and Son to Father, which is not accidental; because both He is always Father, and He is always Son, and so always—because the Son was always begotten, nor did He ever begin to be Son. But if at some time He had begun to be, or at some time should cease to be Son, He would be said according to accident; and because the Father is not called Father except from the fact that He has a Son, and the Son is not called Son except from the fact that He has a Father, these things are not said according to substance, but [are said] toward each other; nor yet only according to accident, because both He who is called Father, and He who is called Son, is to them eternal and incommutable."

And below in the same final chapter, he raises a question about temporal relations to God and the creature, by which they are temporally related to each other—how those are not accidents, since nothing happens to God temporally because He is not mutable. And he answers that this is not because anything happens to God's substance temporally, but to that creature with respect to which He is said relatively; wherefore he finally concludes thus: "What therefore God is said temporally to begin, which before was not said—it is manifest that it is said relatively, not according to accident of God, that something has happened to Him, but plainly according to accident of that which God is said to begin to be something, He Himself is changed; God however, far be it that He should temporally love anyone, as if by a new love which was not in Him before, with whom past things have not passed, and future things have already been done."

And through all this he hints at the third mode of those things which are said toward something, as the measurable to the measure, the knowable or known to knowledge, and the sensible or sensed to sense, as the Philosopher teaches in Metaphysics V, ch. 20—which therefore are said relatively, to use the words of Averroes, "not because the relation is in the substance of either relative, but in the substance of one only, and in the other on account of the other"—that is, the other; say, the known or sensed is referred to knowledge or sensation only on account of the relation of the other relative to it. For when whatever is newly known or sensed, nothing new is caused in it, but in the senser or knower only, and through it alone is referred to them.

There is therefore no new real relation between God and the past, which would necessitate Him to willing, nor even any new relation of reason: not in God, since He always intrinsically holds Himself altogether similarly, because otherwise He would be mutable, as the foregoing have taught; nor in present things—for let it be posited that God should annihilate the whole universe; nor in past things, since they are nothing at all, nor is anything at all in them or any of them.

Likewise, the relation of the future to the divine will is as great as that of the past, therefore it necessitates as much. Likewise, relation, as Averroes says on Metaphysics XII, comment 20, "is of weaker being than the other predicaments"; but other absolute predicaments do not necessitate the divine will, as is clear against the prior response. Likewise, then God is necessitated to willing that relation: either through itself, or through another. If through itself, by the same reasoning He could thus be necessitated through an absolute to willing it—especially since the absolute is better, more willable, and more motive of the will. If through another, the process will necessarily be without end.

Those, however, who posit a privative cause from the part of relation, say that God cannot will of any present that it not be, nor of any past that it not have been, because this is not willable. But these do not rightly touch the cause sought; for what was first sought was the cause why it is necessary that God will this to be, or this to have been—not why He cannot will the contrary. For although God could not will the contrary, yet, as it seems according to this response, He could not have this willing, just as a man can not will this to be, although he wills this not to be.

Likewise, no created or extrinsic relation necessitates God to willing, as has been shown against the proximate response; therefore neither the privation of any such relation necessitates Him to not willing, since such privation is not more potent over the divine will than the habit. Likewise, the cause why this not-being is not for the present willable, is because this now is; wherefore for the present it is necessary that this be: for this affirmative is prior to this negative and the cause of it; for some [being] necessarily must be, as the thirteenth of Book I teaches. The existence therefore of this thing is the original cause of the impossibility of God willing this now not to be, and of the necessity of not so willing. Wherefore the external thing is the cause of the impossibility and of the necessity in the divine will, as the first response said.

Likewise, by the same reasoning it is necessary that God now will this to be, because this not to be cannot for the present be not willable, and this is because it is now necessary that this be willable, and this because it is necessary that this be, and this because this is. For this to be is the original and primary antecedent, from which a priori and causally all these consequences follow, as in the proximate similar [example] is deduced; wherefore etc., as there.

Likewise, that it may be more clearly argued, this response must necessarily say consequently that therefore God necessarily wills this to be, because this to be is necessarily willable; and the original cause of this is this to be now; wherefore this to be now necessitates God to willing, because whatever is the cause of the cause is the cause of the caused; and so the first response returns.

Likewise, then any existing thing necessitates God to willing, and any active thing which can produce another, can necessitate, and make impossible the divine will, as the first response said. Likewise, pure and sole privation is never the cause of anything positive; wherefore of no necessary act in the divine will. Likewise, this now not to be is willable by man, and at some time was willable by God, because it is not simply and per se not-willable, or unwillable by Him; and now it is not willable by God, but not-willable or unwillable; therefore some cause of this change is, and of this negation and privation [there is] some affirmation and prior power and cause, as the thirteenth of Book I teaches; and that cannot be posited except this absolute thing now existing, or something relative in it; and so the first response returns, or the second.

Of those, however, assigning the cause of the foresaid necessity from the part of God alone, and intrinsic to God Himself, [there is] a fourfold variation. For the first say that this is from the divine nature: God, they say, is of such a nature that with the present or past thing, He necessarily wills it to be or to have been. But if this be purely naturally and intrinsically only to God: since an agent purely naturally disposed always similarly, the patient also disposed always similarly, the action will always be similar (since no cause of dissimilarity can be given, as the Philosopher teaches in Metaphysics IX, ch. 10); but all things purely natural intrinsic to God always are similarly disposed, since through the fifth of Book I He is immutable in nature, [therefore] He is always equally necessitated to willing.

This reasoning is confirmed because, according to the Philosopher in On Generation and Corruption II, last chapter: "The same having itself similarly is innate to do the same always"; and Metaphysics V, ch. 2, shows that the same is the cause of contraries, but through diverse dispositions; the divine nature, however, is always similarly disposed. Nor can anyone say that the nature of God is otherwise intrinsically disposed when the thing is present or past than when it is future, because then He would be mutable; and because then this would be from the presence or pastness of the thing; therefore that would be the cause of the necessity in the divine will—which was destroyed before.

The second posit that this is from the part of divine truth, which, as the present and past thing necessarily holds itself, so necessarily demands that God should always conformably will. This response, however, can be refuted as the prior, because divine truth, taken purely naturally, always holds itself altogether similarly intrinsically. Likewise, according to this response, the cause of this is the necessary truth from the part of the present or past thing, and the original cause of this is the existence of such a thing; therefore it is the original cause of the necessity in the divine will—which was reproved above. Likewise, God's intrinsic truth with respect to the future is as great, and is intrinsically similarly altogether holding itself, as with respect to the past or present; wherefore as necessary and as firm. For it could not intrinsically hold itself otherwise except on account of the existence or pastness of the extrinsic thing—which it cannot, since it in no way depends on or is caused by it, since this is the inferior truth, and that the superior; this caused, that uncaused; this posterior, that prior, as the eleventh and twelfth of Book I teach.

The third, however, believe that this is from the part of the divine will, namely because He wills Himself to be necessitated to willing the present to be, and the past to have been. But if, when the thing comes and passes away, He wills Himself to be necessitated to so willing, He either wills this necessarily, or freely according to contradiction. If necessarily, whence is that necessity to Him? And the original difficulty returns, because a process to infinity in such wills is not to be granted. If freely according to contradiction, He can not so will; which, if it be posited, He is not necessitated, as this hypothesis says.

Likewise, let A be the will by which God now wills this to be freely according to contradiction, and B the will by which He wills Himself to be necessitated to A. Either then B is now a new or an ancient and eternal will. It is not now new, as the twenty-third of Book I shows. If it is eternal, either then that eternal [will] eternally before was free according to contradiction, or necessary. If free, whence then is it now necessary? And the difficulty returns. If it was eternally necessary, and from it always necessarily followed that A is now to come about, and from A this is to come about; wherefore as before was shown, eternally it was necessary that A be now to come about, and that this thing be now to come about, and so concerning every future thing—the opposite of which the hypothesis supposed.

Likewise, supposing that of these two divine volitions—of which one wills the thing to be or to have been, and the other wills Himself to be necessitated to so willing—if He had only the first, still He would necessarily will the thing to be or to have been, just as the thing necessarily would be or have been. For supposing that He had this volition only: I will this to be or to have been, He would necessarily so will. Likewise, the will of God alone, by which He wills the thing to come about in A—a future instant—suffices for producing it in being in A, as the tenth of Book I and its corollary teach, and because otherwise He would not be omnipotent—which, if it be posited, the response will be destroyed.

Likewise, by the same reasoning He could similarly necessitate Himself to willing all future things, and to producing all things. Who therefore has known the sense of the Lord, or who has been His counselor, so much as to dare to say He has not so done? Likewise, by the same reasoning He could similarly necessitate Himself not to do, and make Himself impossible to do whatever He is not going to do; and so He could render the omnipotent so impotent that He could not lift a straw—namely by willing Himself to be necessitated to willing never to lift a straw, or to be made impossible to willing to lift a straw.

Likewise, since God cannot be necessitated to willing future things, and can [be] to present things, and no cause from the part of God intrinsic can be given on account of His complete immutability, some extrinsic cause will be given, and none except the thing without, as the first response said.

Likewise, the present or past thing is necessarily presupposed to that necessity in the divine will; therefore there is some cause of it, as had been shown in the fourth of Book I; and so the first response returns.

The fourth, however, affirm that this is from the part of the mode of willing in God. For they say that He wills the future as it were futurely—namely, by such an act: I will this to come about; the present, however, and the past, as it were presentially and pastly—that is, by such acts: I will this to be, I will this to have been. Of which modes, the first, as they say, makes liberty according to contradiction; the others, however, necessity according to one part only.

But this is not true, because altogether similarly, and not otherwise intrinsically, He wills first this to come about, second this to be, and third this to have been—otherwise He would be intrinsically changed, against the fifth, twenty-third, and twenty-fifth of Book I.

Likewise, if God willed past, present, and future things otherwise intrinsically, He would otherwise know them intrinsically, against what has been shown before in the twenty-third and twenty-fourth of Book I.

Likewise, even if those modes of willing were diverse, no intrinsic cause could be assigned why one should be free and not another, since cognition, voluntary potency, and all required intrinsic things are equally potent, equally efficacious, and through all equally firm with respect to one as with respect to another; nor can an extrinsic cause be assigned, because then the first response or the second would return.

Likewise, God wills presentially that this wayfarer is predestined, and pastly that this one was predestined; therefore He necessarily wills in these modes; therefore this wayfarer is necessarily predestined; wherefore necessarily he is to be saved, since these two follow necessarily from the antecedent. And similarly it can be argued of any future thing, that it will necessarily come, since of any such God both wills presentially and pastly willed such propositions to be true and to have been true: this will be, is true; this will be, was true; wherefore He necessarily wills and willed in these modes, whence it necessarily follows that this will be. And the same is if A be posited as the volition by which God wills this to come about, and B the volition by which He wills A to be or to have been—that B is necessary, etc., as before.

Wherefore others, perceiving that the cause of the foresaid necessity cannot sufficiently be assigned from the part of the thing alone, nor of God alone, assign it in mixed fashion from both. But with the foregoing standing, this cannot stand, since every effect caused by two causes is either caused partly by one and partly by the other, or by both as to its whole, as the act of the created will is wholly produced by the created will and wholly by the increated similarly, as the corollary of the twentieth of Book II showed. But the necessity above-said is not caused partly by these causes, because no partibility can be assigned there.

Nor can anyone fancy that a certain similitudinary and imaginary partibility according to intension and remission is to be posited there; because let A be that necessity, and B its primary part caused by God, and C its remaining part caused by the second cause: either then A is of infinite intension, or only finite. If infinite, then both B and C [are infinite]: because if either be not infinite, but only finite—let that be C, as it rather seems—then B is simply infinite; for otherwise from it and C there would not be composed something simply infinite, because finite added to finite makes only finite, as can be mathematically demonstrated. It has also been shown in the first of Book I that no form can be simply infinite intensively. Nor can it be conceded that B, the part of A, the foresaid necessity, is simply infinite, because it is necessarily finite in conjunction with C: for there of necessity is some grade which is the common end and term of both, just as some point would be in the continuation of two such lines. And because B is part of A, wherefore also less than it; but no simply infinite is less or greater than another simply infinite, as the Philosopher attests in many places.

If however it be said in the first place that A is not simply infinite, but only in some respect, it can be refuted by the same: since if both B and C are everywhere finite, then also A constituted from them, as has been argued above. Wherefore perhaps it will be granted that A is simply and entirely finite; but then A could be increased, and be greater and better, since A is good in God, because through the third part of the corollary of the first of Book I, nothing else is in Him. Therefore not every good in God is in Him the optimum possible, nor the highest, against the fourth part of the corollary above-said; wherefore neither would God always remain necessarily optimum, against the sixth part of the corollary mentioned.

Anselm also in Monologion, ch. 16: "It is clear," he says, "that whatever good the supreme nature is, He supremely is it; therefore He is the supreme essence, supreme life, supreme reason, supreme salvation, supreme justice, supreme wisdom, supreme truth, supreme goodness, supreme magnitude, supreme beauty, supreme eternity, supreme immutability"; wherefore also the supreme necessity above-said.

Likewise, if God should newly cause in His will, although only partly, such a necessity, He would be mutable, as has been shown above. Likewise, posterior willed things are not the total cause, nor even partial cause of the divine will, as the twentieth of Book I teaches, nor do they do anything in it, wherefore neither do they necessitate it in any way. It has also been shown against the prior responses that the things outside are not the cause of this necessity, wherefore not even partially effective cause. Nor can anyone say that both God and the things outside cause this necessity according to their whole, because both are reproved above against the foregoing responses.

Likewise, God is altogether similarly disposed, and entirely not otherwise, as far as is from His intrinsic part, with this thing now existing, than before, as has been shown above; therefore that new necessity in the divine will is caused totally by the thing outside.

Likewise, every new causation from the part of God being removed, and only the present thing being posited, that necessity will be posited, as the foregoing manifest; therefore the position of the thing alone is the sufficient cause of this necessity.

Likewise, that God in mixed fashion with the thing outside present should cause this necessity is either freely according to contradiction, or necessarily. If freely, He can not so cause with the thing standing present; and then either there will not be such new necessity, which is against the first hypothesis; or, if there will be, it will be caused by the thing alone, which this response denies. If necessarily, whence is that necessity to Him? Etc., as against the sixth response set forth above.

Likewise, that God in mixed fashion with the present thing should cause necessity of this kind: either this is purely naturally or voluntarily. If naturally, this will be reproved as the fourth response before. If voluntarily, let it then be through A, a volition or intrinsic act of will: either then A is a new volition or eternal, etc., as against the sixth response in the similar argument.

Likewise, if it were so, this would maximally seem to occur because God causes the present thing, and that further causes this necessity in the divine will; therefore the present thing, as instrumental, intermediate, and second cause, would cause this whole necessity, which has been destroyed above.

Likewise, the past thing is nothing, wherefore it causes nothing, neither does it necessitate separately or in mixed fashion. The thing also which now is not, nor ever has been, although it could have been now and earlier, is nothing nor was anything; therefore it causes nothing separately or in mixed fashion, wherefore it does not so necessitate or make impossible the divine will, etc., which against the first response have been similarly argued.

Others, however, seeing that no cause of this kind of necessity can reasonably be given, say that there is no cause of it, wherefore neither is any cause of it to be sought, nor any to be assigned—which they confirm through examples: "God," they say, "at some time created the world, but why then? God also is newly creator and Lord of this thing—but why? What makes Him such?" As if to say: no cause.

But this can be said neither philosophically, nor logically, nor theologically: for every change has a cause, as the whole of philosophy attests. For otherwise, with similar levity, it could be said that no motion, no action, or passion, and universally that no change has any cause: but this is a change; for the transit from one of the contradictories to the remaining cannot be without change. But God before was freely and not necessarily willing this; now however He is not freely, but necessarily willing this. That the transit from one of the contradictories to the remaining necessarily requires a change, Logic clearly teaches. For let A be this: God is not necessarily willing this, and B this: God is necessarily willing this, and C this present instant; and according to that most common Logical [maxim]: "Because the thing is, or is not, the speech is true or false"; therefore if it be totally and in every way similarly from the part of the thing signified by A and B in C as it was, and contrariwise; and A was true before C, and B false; therefore also in C—or if A is false in C, and B true, therefore similarly before. Therefore this response makes contradictories simultaneously true, and also simultaneously false, and the same proposition simultaneously true and false.

Likewise, B before was false, and now is true, therefore there is some cause of this; and this necessarily is, because before it was not so really, and now it is so; therefore otherwise it is from the part of the thing now than before; therefore through some change, therefore through something changing, therefore through a cause.

To the same end it can similarly be argued according to the procedure of the Philosopher in Metaphysics IV against those denying first principles, by disputing on the supposition that names have determined and certain significations. As long therefore as the signification or thing signified of any name remains entire, the name similarly remains, and contrariwise; they therefore approach simultaneously, and recede simultaneously; wherefore there is never an acquisition or loss of any name without acquisition or loss of some signification or signified of it, wherefore not without some change of any kind whatsoever.

Likewise, their examples savor neither philosophical nor theological truth. For philosophically speaking: a rational agent acts at a certain time toward without, because then He wills; whence the Philosopher in Metaphysics IX, ch. 10, says that factive potencies with reason are of contraries; and he objects: why then will they do contraries simultaneously? But this is impossible. And he answers, hinting that the consequence is not valid because something else is required which determines the potency to one part, namely the will; and when through it it is determined, then it does the one [thing], not both. That will determining is therefore the cause why then He does this; whence in answering he says thus: "Therefore there must be something else which is proper; I say, however, this either appetite or pre-election: for that which it shall have desired principally, this it shall do, when as it is able it shall have stood forth; therefore that which is potent according to reason necessarily, when it desires, of which it has potency, and as it has, this it does"; God, however, with reason and rationally made the world when He eternally willed Himself to be about to make it; therefore because then He willed, then also He did—which appears more completely in the ninth of Book I.

Hence Apocalypse 4: "Thou hast created all things, and on account of Thy will they were and have been created." And Augustine in Book I of On Genesis Against the Manichees: "The will of God is the cause of all things which are. Whoever therefore says: 'Why did God make heaven and earth?'—it must be answered: 'Because He willed.' For the will of God is the cause of heaven and earth."

Likewise, by the same reasoning they must say consequently of whatever, whenever created or made by God, that there is no cause why then it is or is created; and this seems to destroy the efficient and final cause in God, or to posit Him to act casually and fortuitously at every time and instant. But the foregoing show the efficient cause in God, and that of John 1: "All things were made by Him," with the third, fourth, and ninth of Book I. And the final cause in God many philosophical and theological authorities prove, written in the twenty-fifth of Book I. Hence Proverbs 16: "The Lord hath made all things for himself." And Apocalypse 1: "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end." That God does not act casually or fortuitously at any time or instant, the eighth and ninth of Book I, with the twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth, teach. Hence Ecclesiastes 3: "All things have their season"—but from whom, except from Him who arranges all things in measure and number and weight? Wherefore Augustine, City of God XXII, ch. 2, says thus: "Before the time comes in which He has willed that to come about which before all times He has foreknown and disposed, we say it shall come about, when God shall have willed."

And if they still object that of that volition there is no cause, wherefore neither of the foresaid necessity, this ought to move no one, because that volition of God is eternal, but that necessity is novel, wherefore also it has some cause. That God also is newly Creator has a cause—a cause, I say, formal and efficient similarly. For God is newly said relatively Lord of this thing, and not by a new relation accidentally newly to God Himself, but only to the creature, as has been shown above against the second response. The relation itself therefore arising from the creature, which is necessarily subjected to the divine dominion, is the extrinsic and improper formal cause by which God is formally said Lord of this thing. This relation also has an efficient cause, namely the producer of this thing, from which this relation necessarily sprouts and emanates. Therefore when they ask: who made God Lord of this thing? I say: He who made this thing. For He made in some way that relation by which God is said Lord of this thing; just as he who gives John this thing makes him Lord of this thing; he who sees John or understands [him] makes John seen and newly understood; God therefore makes Himself Lord of this thing by making this thing, from which necessarily arises the relation aforesaid—just as John himself makes himself Lord of this thing by making this thing his own.

Of which canonical scripture often offers examples sufficiently authentic. Hence Psalm 9: "The Lord is become a refuge for the poor." 17: "The Lord is become my protector." 29: "The Lord became my helper." 89: "Lord, Thou hast been our refuge." And 117: "He is become to me salvation," with many similar in many places. That therefore God is newly said relatively to the creature, is on account of a new cause and a new change from the part of the creature, just as in whatever is newly said relatively. For this is either on account of a new change in that which is so newly said, or in that to which it is newly so said, as appears of relatives of the third mode, as can be drawn from the Philosopher Metaphysics V, ch. 20, and from Averroes there, as was cited above; and Physics V, ch. 10, he wills that where there is a new relation, there is change and motion, at least in one of the relata, as Averroes there exemplifies of a column which first is on Socrates' right, and afterward is turned to the left, by Socrates' being moved in place. The same opinion Boethius also in On the Trinity, last chapter, plainly teaches.

Wherefore Augustine, On the Trinity V, last chapter, shows that when God begins temporally to be said relatively to the creature, this is by a change in the creature, not in God: hence he says thus: "Of that immutable substance of God we ought to take it, that something is said relatively to the creature, that although it begin to be said temporally, yet it is not understood that something has happened to that very substance of God, but to that creature to which it is said: 'Lord,' he says, 'Thou hast been our refuge.' God is therefore said relatively as our refuge. For He is referred to us, and then He becomes our refuge when we flee to Him; is anything then made in His nature which was not before we fled to Him? Therefore some change is made in us. So also He begins to be our Father when by His grace we are regenerated: our substance therefore is changed for the better, when we become His sons; and at the same time He begins to be our Father, but by no change of His substance. What therefore God is said temporally to begin, which before was not said, it is manifest that it is said relatively, yet not according to accident, that something has happened to Him, but plainly according to the accident of that of which God is said to begin to be something, He Himself is changed."

Their examples therefore do not contain truth, nor even agree with the things exemplified. For these examples are concerning relations born from the creature, and extrinsic to God Himself. The aforesaid necessity in the divine will, however, is caused by no creature, as has been shown above—which this response also confesses—and is intrinsic to God Himself.

These things therefore, by way of liberty and necessity of the divine will, against the principal hypothesis.

Thomas Bradwardine, De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium

Book III, Chapters XXXI–XL

CHAPTER XXXI. HE RECALLS THE SAME [HYPOTHESIS] BY WAY OF THE NECESSITY AND CONTINGENCY OF THE DIVINE INTELLECT AND KNOWLEDGE.

Against this same hypothesis one can likewise argue by way of the necessity and contingency of the divine intellect and knowledge. For before the presence or pastness of a thing, God knew it contingently always to have been future and to be about to be; but in its presence or pastness he knows necessarily that it has always been future, and is or has been; therefore he then knows otherwise intrinsically than before, which is contrary to the reasons set forth above and contrary to the authorities cited above. Nor can any rational cause of this novel necessity in the divine knowledge be assigned, since the reasons concerning novel necessity in the divine volition or will, set forth in chapter fifteen of Book I and supplemented by chapter sixteen, prohibit it if they are properly transferred to the divine knowledge. Nor can such a necessity be posited without a rational cause, as has been shown against the last response.

Likewise, if the divine knowledge with respect to future things is contingent toward either side, and with respect to present and past things is necessary, God intrinsically knows present and past things more certainly than future things: for these objects of knowledge are more certain than those. For the things which are necessarily of some sort are more certainly of that sort than those which are only contingently of that sort toward either side: for the latter cannot be otherwise than they are, while the former can be. Therefore God knows present and past things more perfectly than future things. For to know what is certainly is more perfect than to know it uncertainly; therefore God is intrinsically changed and improved anew; nor does he even know future things in the highest degree certainly, nor in the highest degree perfectly. Nor can any rational cause for this greater certitude be given, since it is not intrinsic to God himself, given that he himself is not intrinsically changed, nor is it extrinsic, since no extrinsic thing causes anything in him, as chapters 15, 16, and 20 of Book I teach. Wherefore also the Wise Man in Ecclesiasticus 23 says, "To the Lord God, before they were created, all things were known, and so also after they were perfected he beholds all"; thus he says, and not otherwise. Whence also Augustine, On the Trinity 15.13, says: "Nor did he know created things otherwise than as to be created: for nothing accrued to his wisdom from them, just as it is written in the book of Ecclesiastes, 'Before they were created, all things were known to him, so also after they were consummated'"; thus he says, not otherwise. The same Augustine, On Genesis Literally 5.18, says: "Of God himself I dare not say that things became known in any other way when he made them than that in which he knew them in order to make them, with whom there is no change nor shadow of variation." Wherefore also Peter [Lombard], Sentences I, dist. 35: "God knew from eternity what is eternal, and everything which was to be, and he knew immutably; he knows past or future things no less than present things, and by his eternal and immutable wisdom he himself knows all things which are known."

CHAPTER XXXII. HE LEADS BACK THE SAME [HYPOTHESIS] BY WAY OF THE IMMUTABILITY OF THE DIVINE WILL.

The same hypothesis can also be impugned by way of the immutability of the divine will. For if God could nill privatively, or even positively for now, that these present things which he now wills to be should be, and that those past things should have been which he wills to have been, and from now on always nill that those present and past things should have been future, which he always before willed to have been future, he would be mutable, as all the authors of this hypothesis confess. But the divine will stands altogether intrinsically the same way toward future things as toward present or past things, as can be had from what was shown earlier in chapter thirty of this [book]; otherwise indeed it would be intrinsically changed when the future was made present or past, contrary to chapter twenty-three of Book I; therefore if future things, which he wills, and which he always before willed to be, he can for now and always afterward nill to be — they not being placed in being — he is mutable. Or conversely, if God can without his being changed [now nill] future things, which he now wills, and always before willed to be and to have been future — that is, can for now and always afterward nill them to be (they not being placed [in being]) and nill that they have been future — he can likewise without his being changed nill for now that these present things should be and past things should have been, and always afterward nill that these should have been future. For no cause or reason of dissimilarity can be given.

And if perhaps someone says that this is the cause of dissimilarity between these — that now it is necessary that God will and have always willed this present or past thing to have been future, and therefore, if afterward he should nill this, he would necessarily be changed; but not so before concerning future things — therefore God intrinsically wills present and past things otherwise than future things, and intrinsically wills the same thing first as future and then as present otherwise; therefore he is mutable. The divine will too is no more necessary with respect to past or present things than with respect to future things, as chapter thirty of this [book] teaches.

And if someone should still say differently — that if God could after this will, concerning this present or past thing, that it had been future, which he always willed to have been future, and were to do this, the thing itself would be mutable, and would necessarily be changed from "having been future" into "not having been future," but not so concerning a future thing; wherefore the divine will would here necessarily be changed in the same way, and not there [in the case of the future thing] — but why in this case would the present or past thing be changed more than the future thing? For no cause or reason can be rendered, except that a present or past thing must always have been future, and that God always conformably willed it, and not so concerning a future thing; and so this response is similar to the prior one.

Again, to the same point: change in the effect is not the cause of change in the agent, but rather the contrary, where there is change in the agent, and most of all in the effect of the divine will: for otherwise it would be continuously changed at the change of its effects; it is also impassible, unalterable, and altogether immutable from all its effects, as chapter twenty of Book I teaches.

Likewise, this seems to be a kind of common conception of the mind among all: everything which is of one disposition, and can be of the opposite, can be so through some change — speaking of actualizable potency, and not absolute potency. This appears in every other matter, both absolute and also relative. For if this is not a being, or a man, or hot, and can be, it can be this through some change. And the same appears in every relative species: for if this is not the double of that, or a father, or known, and can be, it can be this through some change, as chapter thirty of this [book] shows. The same is not improbably confirmed because, as it seems, if this is not such, and can be, it can be made such, speaking generally of becoming, as "the Lord has been made our refuge," as the same chapter thirty makes manifest. But every such making seems to be some kind of change, since it is a transition or motion from one of the opposites to the other. And the cause of this whole, as if a maxim naturally implanted in all, seems to be this: that it is necessary that what is, when it is, is, and what is not, when it is not, is not; and likewise that what was, was, and what was not, was not. For in this Logicians, Philosophers, Theologians, and the whole common multitude consent. And if it is necessary that this is or has been of one disposition, and it can be of the opposite, it can be changed, since this cannot be except through receding from the prior disposition as from a terminus a quo, and accession to the latter as to a terminus ad quem of motion.

And if anyone should say that this maxim is true only of present and past things which do not depend on the future, let him notice, I beg, that this gloss is sustained by no common conception of the mind, nor by any authority of the elders, but only by certain sophistries of sophists. The will of God too in no way depends on future things, as chapter twenty of Book I and chapter thirty of this [book] teach, but future things [depend] on it, as chapter fourteen of Book I shows; nor is the divine will in any way intrinsically otherwise toward future things than toward present or past things, nor conversely, as chapter thirty of this [book] makes clear.

The aforesaid being supposed, therefore, it seems that if God now is, and always was, willing this to be or this to have been future, and he can be of the opposite disposition, the thing not being placed in being, this can [happen] through some change, and not on the part of the willed before its being placed in being. For it includes a contradiction that something be changed from future to non-future, except through its being placed in being, as chapter eighteen of this [book] showed; therefore through change of the divine will. It can likewise be argued by supposing A to be one [thing] not future, yet possible to be: God always was willing A to be, and can be willing A to be; therefore [this can happen] through some change, and not through change on the part of the thing, since that would be from non-future to future, contrary to chapter eighteen of this [book]; therefore through change of the divine will.

Furthermore, passing over these little logical reasonings, I show the same thing through one theological argument. Namely, if according to the hypothesis God always willed something to be, and can never have willed this, but always have willed the opposite, without any change whatever, by similar reasoning, after God has said, promised, and sworn that he will do A, or that A will be, he can not do A, and it is possible that A not be, without his being changed, lying, or perjuring himself in any way. For he can never have so said, promised, or sworn, without any change whatever; and if this be posited, he can not do A, without change, lie, or perjury of any kind — which seems to be a lie, and contrary to theological truth. For in Numbers 23, when Balak wished to placate the Lord, so that Balaam with God's consent or permission should curse the people of Israel, to whom shortly before the Lord had promised good things and a blessing, Balaam — nay rather the Lord through Balaam — answered, "God is not as a man, that he should lie, nor as a son of man, that he should be changed. Has he then said, and will he not do? Has he spoken, and will he not fulfill? I have been led to bless; I am not able to prohibit a blessing." Therefore if God promises anything — say A future — unless he should fulfill it, he would be mutable and a liar. Yet according to the aforesaid hypothesis Balak could have truly answered: even if God said and spoke that A would be, it is possible that he never said this, nor spoke it, and this without any change whatever; and if this be placed in being, although he should not do A but its opposite, it does not follow that he is changed or even lies.

Nor let anyone esteem this saying of Balaam lightly because he was wicked, as though it were not authentic: for it is a saying of the Lord the supreme author, just as the saying of Caiaphas was. For Scripture there premises: "To whom" — namely Balaam — "when the Lord had occurred and had placed his word in his mouth, he said, 'Return to Balak, and these things you shall speak to him.'" And all Catholic interpreters embrace the sayings of Balaam there as prophetic and divine and authentic — which the holy Church also does, which on the day of Epiphany sings thus: "Balaam, prophesying about whom, says, 'There shall come forth a glittering star out of Jacob.'"

Likewise Psalm 88: "Neither will I profane my testament, and that which proceeds from my lips I will not make void; once I have sworn in my holy place, if I lie to David; his seed shall remain forever." Where the Lord intimates through the Prophet that, if the seed of David should not remain forever, as he himself promised and swore, then he himself would profane his testament, and would make void what proceeded from his lips, and would even lie. But profanation, voiding, and lying import change. Yet if, after he had promised and sworn this to David, he could never have promised or sworn this, he could not do this without profanation of the testament, voiding, or lying of any kind.

Likewise Malachi 3: "Behold," says the Lord to the people of Israel, "I will send my angel and he shall prepare the way before your face"; and he promises many other goods, and as confirmation of the promise he adjoins: "For I am the Lord, and I am not changed" — as if he were saying, "I am not mutable, therefore I will do these things for you; therefore conversely, [if] I shall not do these things for you, therefore I am mutable" — which yet according to the hypothesis would in no way follow. For although the Lord promised these things, it can be without any change whatever that he never promised these things; if this be posited, even if God should not do these things, he is not changed.

Likewise, Hebrews 6: "God, wishing more abundantly to show to the heirs of the promise the immobility of his counsel, interposed an oath, that by two immobile things, in which it is impossible for God to lie, we may have the strongest consolation." Where the Apostle supposes that the promise and oath of God, by which he promised to the heirs certain goods which are A, are immobile things, which if he should not fulfill by exhibiting to them the goods A, he would lie; wherefore also he would similarly be changed. Which yet according to the hypothesis would in no way follow. For let us be in the middle time between the promise and the exhibition of the goods A; then according to the hypothesis it can be that God never promised nor swore to the heirs the goods A as future; if this be posited, God can never exhibit these things to the heirs without change or lie of any kind.

To all these things someone perhaps will briefly respond by saying that all these things are to be understood always conjointly in the sense of composition, not divisively or in the sense of division — because if God should not fulfill what he promised, in such a way that these two concur — that God promised this and that God does not fulfill this — he is changed and lies; yet divisively this — namely A which God promised — he can not fulfill or not do without change and without lie, since it can be that he never promised A.

But the authorities aforesaid, if they are looked at internally, do not speak conjointly but only divisively. For the Apostle, through the things premised, wished to lift up the heirs to the strongest consolation and the firmest hope in Christ; "that by two immobile things," he says, "in which it is impossible for God to lie, we may have the strongest consolation, who flee for refuge to lay hold of the proposed hope, which we have as an anchor of the soul, sure and firm, and reaching to the inner part of the veil, where Jesus our forerunner has entered for us, made a Pontiff forever according to the order of Melchizedek." But how would we have the strongest consolation, or sure and firm hope, only in one composite proposition, in one conditional, in one heap of expressions — say, "God cannot without change and lie [not] fulfill his promise, the promise existing"? — i.e., such a proposition is not possible: "God without change and lie will not fulfill his promise"; or, "If God promised anything and shall not fulfill, he will lie and be changed." Especially when that on which such a proposition or consolatory and hope-bearing conditional rests as on a foundation of the whole consolation and hope — namely, God's promising — would be more infirm and unstable than any thing whatever. For every present or past thing necessarily is or was; but according to the hypothesis God's promising, which now is, and which always was, can for now not be and never have been.

Indeed it seems that in this regard we would reasonably have less consolation from divine promises than from human ones. For if a man should promise anything, at least with solemn stipulation, or oath, or other such security, if he should not satisfy [it], he can be refuted and convicted as false, a liar, and a perjurer; but God not so, since he can never have promised anything. For what Catholic will presume to take it that the hope to which the Apostle leads us is only in propositions or consequences of this sort, and not in things? Nor does the Apostle so feel, but [he holds] that we securely and firmly hope for the very thing promised by God, just as the whole Church hopes, and that thus we may have the strongest consolation. Wherefore also the Apostle, showing that he is not speaking about the immutability of a conditional consequence or proposition of this composite kind, but about the immutability of the will, counsel, promise, or oath of God, says: "God, wishing to show to the heirs of the promise the immobility of [his] counsel, interposed an oath, that by two immobile things" — namely promise and oath — "in which it is impossible for God to lie, we may have the strongest consolation."

It seems, therefore, that the Apostle understands and speaks divisively rather than conjointly — namely according to the common understanding of men, which is this: that whatever has been promised by God must necessarily be fulfilled, or God lies and is changed. For example, God yesterday promised that he would do A good for men tomorrow; then today they will say and so understand: "God will do A good for us tomorrow, or he will lie and be changed." Malachi too, and David, and Balaam — nay rather the Holy Spirit, who spoke through these Prophets — seems to understand and speak likewise in the recited authorities. These same things can also be brought to bear against the same hypothesis by way of the immutability of divine knowledge, with the names competently transferred.

CHAPTER XXXIII. HE MOVES THE SAME [HYPOTHESIS] BY WAY OF REVELATION IN THE WORD, AND SETS DOWN SIX RESPONSES OF THOSE CONCEDED REVELATION IN THE WORD, AND ARGUES SERIOUSLY AGAINST [THEM].

These things, then, having been objected against this hypothesis by way of the intrinsic action of God, it remains consequently to object against the same by way of his extrinsic action — namely, by way of divine revelation and its effect. This, however, according to the doctrine of the Fathers, is twofold. For one kind is in the Word of God — namely in the supreme light itself, the supreme uncreated truth, in the very essence of God; another kind, however, is in the proper genus of the creature — namely in an inferior created light.

First, then, by way of revelation in the Word: Suppose that God reveals or has revealed in the Word to Paul that A will be tomorrow. Then Paul either sees or has seen, knows or has known, that A will be tomorrow; therefore it is necessary that he so see or have seen, know or have known. Since every human act, when it is, must necessarily for then be, and every past human act must necessarily have been: for otherwise what a man now wills and does, he could now not will or do, and what he willed and did, he could never have willed or done; wherefore also that which now is or has been can for now not be now, nor ever have been — contrary to all Logicians, Philosophers, Theologians, and laymen, which this hypothesis also denies.

And if it is necessary that Paul know or have known A will be tomorrow, it is necessary that A will be tomorrow: for it follows necessarily, "Paul knows or has known A will be tomorrow; therefore it is true or has been [true that] A will be tomorrow; therefore A is or has been future tomorrow; therefore A will be tomorrow," as is clear from what was shown in chapter eighteen of this [book]. The whole of this consequence therefore is necessary, and the first antecedent likewise; wherefore so is the last consequent, as chapter thirty of this [book] makes clear. Therefore it is necessary that A will be tomorrow; wherefore by similar reasoning concerning anything future, it is now necessary, and was always necessary, that it will be; and concerning anything not future, that it will not be — the opposite of which the hypothesis supposed.

To this, however, the response is twofold. For some concede such revelation, but others deny it. Now those conceding revelation of this kind respond consequently in accord with the aforesaid hypothesis, by saying that, just as God by his essence now knows, and always knew, whatever future will be, and now can for now not know it nor ever have known it, but now and for now know and always have known its opposite, so also a man or angel, who through the same essence knows and has known whatever future will be, can conformably now and for now not know it, nor ever have known it, but now and for now know its opposite and previously have known it.

But this response seems absurd. For if it were so, it would be possible that Christ, Moses, Paul, and any prophet whatever who saw the secrets of God in the Word, never saw anything there, nor was a prophet, but a pseudo-prophet, and Antichrist if he were past, the worst — Mohammed and any cursed person whatever, who never saw anything there — saw all the secrets of God there, and was the most distinguished of prophets.

This response also does not avoid [the difficulty]. For if Paul knows and has known in the Word that A will be, and can not know nor have known A will be, then either he can will and have willed [conformably], or not will or not have willed conformably, or he cannot. If he can, suppose that it was revealed in the Word to Paul that A is still to be future, and he was likewise commanded that he should will, preach, and act conformably to the revelation shown — just as God commanded Jeremiah, saying, "You shall preach the words which I shall speak to you," Jeremiah 19; and to Ezekiel, "Go and you shall speak my words," Ezekiel 3; and to Jonah, "Preach," he said, "the preaching which I speak to you," Jonah 2. And it is verisimilarly believed that the Archangel Gabriel received through revelation and command in the Word the business of announcing the Lord's incarnation to the most blessed Virgin. The Lord Jesus Christ also testifies of himself, saying: "I have not spoken from myself, but the Father who sent me, he gave me a commandment what I should say and what I should speak," John 12. And further, John 14: "As the Father has given me commandment, so I do." And if any man or angel had revelation and commandment in the Word, who ever more worthily than the Lord Jesus Christ, the only Word of God, the most uniquely-only Word of God?

Whence Augustine on John, part 1, last homily — namely 54 — expounding the first authority, says: "Therefore he says he did not speak from himself, because he is not from himself. The Son is the Word of the Father, and the Wisdom of the Father; in him are all the commandments of the Father; for the Son never did not know the commandment of the Father, such that it would be necessary for him in time to have what he previously did not have. For he received from the Father what he has, in such a way that, by being born, he received, and the Father by begetting gave to him. For he is also life, and he received life — namely by being born, not previously existing without life, since the Father also has life, and what he has he is, nor did he receive, since he is not from anything; but the Son received life, the Father giving, from whom he is, and he himself is what he has. For he has life, and he is life: hear him speaking himself: 'Thus,' he says, 'the Father has life in himself; thus he gave to the Son also to have life in himself.' Did he give to one existing and not having? But he gave by begetting him, who begot life; and because that birth is eternal, never was the Son not, who is life — never was the Son without life. And just as the birth is eternal, so is he who is born — eternal life. So also commandment, not [as if] the Father gave what the Son did not have, but as I said, in the Wisdom of the Father, who is the Word of the Father, are all the commandments of the Father. But it is said that the commandment is given, since he to whom it is said to be given is not from himself; and this is to give to the Son, without which the Son never was, which is to beget the Son who never was not."

The aforesaid revelation and commandment having been made to Paul, then, suppose that he willed, preached, and did, by external operation, conformably to the revelation shown. And according to this response, A still being future, it is possible that it not be, and the Word never have known nor revealed it, and Paul never have seen in the Word that A would be. Wherefore also, as the response says, it is correspondingly possible that Paul never willed conformably to the aforesaid revelation. It is therefore now possible that Paul did not preach, did not externally do what he has now done. For he could not have done such things except by the prior willing; wherefore even that past [willing], it is possible never to have been.

And that this may be more manifestly drawn into the light, let it be supposed, in accord with the authorities about prayer and the manner of prayer set forth in chapters 23 and 25 of Book I, that Paul be given a commandment, under penalty of eternal damnation, that he should absolutely will every and only person shown to him in the Word as to be saved to be saved, and that in his prayers and other beneficences he should aid only such a person; and let it be shown to him in the Word that Peter the wayfarer is to be saved, whom he absolutely wills to be saved, prays for him, builds a house for him, and administers other beneficences; and let him die, and migrate to heaven while Peter is still surviving as a wayfarer. Then, as the hypothesis says, it is possible that Peter not be saved; wherefore also, as this response says, it is consequently possible that this never was shown in the Word, that Paul never saw this, never willed this, never prayed for him, never built him a house, nor administered other beneficences, nor migrated to heaven but to hell.

Or, retaining the aforesaid commandment and revelation, suppose that Paul obeyed the commandment in nothing, and thus dying descended to the lower regions; then it is possible that Peter — still a wayfarer — not be one to be saved, nor that this was ever revealed; wherefore also that Paul did not act, or omit, contrary to the commandment, nor sinned, nor descended to hell, but ascended above.

Or perhaps, as will seem more opportune to many, suppose that Paul received a commandment that he should not will to be saved any one shown to him in the Word as one to be damned, nor pray for the salvation of any such person, and that whomsoever shown to him in the Word as to be saved he should will to be saved, and pray for him; and let it be shown to him in the Word that Antichrist is to be damned, whom he should neither will to be saved nor pray for; and so let him, dying, be saved, or, doing the contrary, dying be damned — Antichrist still surviving as a wayfarer, etc., as before.

Gabriel too, in the middle time after he came to the glorious Virgin announcing that she would conceive the blessed Son, before she conceived, could not have come to her nor have brought that announcement, as is clear by the prior deduction. The Lord Jesus Christ too, in the middle time after he was incarnated for the redemption of the human race, before he redeemed, could not have been incarnated. And after he predicted to the disciples that, "Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and the Son of man shall be delivered to the chief priests and scribes, and they shall condemn him to death, and shall deliver him to the Gentiles to be mocked and scourged and crucified, and on the third day he shall rise again," Matthew 20, and ascended to Jerusalem to that end — before he suffered, he could not have said these things, nor have ascended to Jerusalem. Likewise, after [he was] now nearer to the passion, "he was sad even to death," and "he sweated a bloody sweat" — before he suffered, it was possible that he had not been so saddened nor sweated. All of which are clear by the prior deduction.

Now, that I may collect these many things virtually in one word, I suppose that we are in the middle time between such past effects and revealed future things. And, as the response says, it is possible that those revealed future things will not be, and were never revealed, seen, or willed; therefore it is possible that those past effects were not. For it follows necessarily negatively: "The cause was not, therefore the effect was not"; and the antecedent is possible, therefore also the consequent — as is clear from chapter thirty of this [book]. Or conversely, affirmatively: "It is necessary that those effects were, therefore [it is necessary that] those volitions, visions, and revelations [were]"; for it follows necessarily affirmatively, "The effect was, therefore its cause was"; and the antecedent is necessary, therefore also the consequent, as the same chapter thirty demonstrated. And if it is necessary that those visions and revelations were, therefore also that those revealed [futures] will be, as has been shown above.

Nor can anyone reasonably decline to the other side of the fork by saying that Paul cannot not will what he wills, nor can not have willed what he willed, just as he can not know what he knows, and not have known what he knew, the revelation in the Word having been made — since by the topic of similitude and proportion it seems that, just as Paul knows something in the Word, that is, in the essence of God, so he can will or love something in the Holy Spirit, that is, in the essence of God. For just as the Son and the divine essence stand toward our knowing, so the Holy Spirit in the same essence [stands] toward our loving: otherwise our charity or love would in no way truly be said [to be such], which yet was shown in chapter forty-two of Book I.

Wherefore if, on account of this — that the Word, knowing and showing something future, can now for now not know nor show it — Paul, seeing this, can now and for now not see it, since it is similarly the case with the Holy Spirit willing something future, it will likewise be the case with Paul willing in him.

This response also does not help, but rather harms those responding, since if, the revelation of this kind having been made and Paul willing conformably, it is necessary that Paul so will, or in the past have so willed, it is necessary that he so see, and in the past have so seen: for this volition of his is caused from that vision of his; wherefore it is necessary that it be so revealed in the Word or have been [so revealed]; wherefore also it is necessary that it will be so, as is deduced above.

Likewise, there are some effects caused by sole vision, or by volition or nolition conjoined. For sole certain vision concerning some near prosperous or adverse thing causes in the heart and body of the one so seeing love or sadness, dilation or constriction, hope or fear, and many other corporeal passions, as can be had from chapter eighteen of Book II — as in Christ a bloody sweat, and in some, death, as is seen in Nabal, 1 Kings 25; just as it is reported of a certain great man of England, after his deportation, having been reconciled, who, dissolved incurably from too much joy, ended his life with joy. Wherefore let argument be made about such cases as before. Therefore against all admitting revelation in the Word this one brief argument proceeds: "It is necessary that this effect be or have been; therefore [it is necessary that] that revelation in the Word [have been]; wherefore that revealed thing must be future."

But here many respond in many ways. Yet all converge in this one [point], that this consequence does not hold. And if it be argued against all in common: "It follows necessarily, 'This effect was, therefore its cause was'; the antecedent is necessary, therefore also the consequent" — they concede [this]. But if it be argued further, "Its cause was, therefore that revelation in the Word [was]" — they concordantly say that this does not follow, but is a fallacy of the consequent, since this effect could not have had this cause, but many other causes. In assigning these causes, however, they vary in many ways.

For some say that it is possible that that revelation in the Word was not a revelation, since it was not even true, but one false appearance, and that, it is possible, was the cause of this effect.

Others say that opinion, estimation, or appearance created in its proper genus could have been the cause of this effect.

A third group [says it was] the vision of the opposite of what was revealed in the Word.

A fourth group [says it was] the complex vision and the simple vision of a simple object in the Word.

A fifth group [says it was] the liberty of the created will.

A sixth group [says it was] God by himself alone.

But against all these responses one must argue first generally at once, then against the individual ones individually. For all converge in this one [point] — that an effect produced from one cause can not have been produced from that one, but from another. From this, however, it seems to follow by the topic of similitude — at least concerning the omnipotence of God — that whatever cause produced some effect, can not have produced it at all, and whatever effect produced from any cause can have been produced not from that one but from another. Therefore Paul, who built a house and begot a son, can not have so done, and Peter could have built that house and begotten that son — together with many other very great absurdities.

CHAPTER XXXIV. HE ARGUES SPECIALLY AGAINST THE FIRST.

Now, however, specially against the first: Further, if it were as it says, the essence of God would falsely show and erroneously present, and thus the mirror without spot of the divine majesty would be made foully spotted; the highest truth would be false, the highest light darkened, the highest justice fallacious, and the highest fidelity a liar. Then also Christ and the Blessed could most easily be deceived all day, wherefore even be made wretched all day — nay even never have been blessed: for all fallacy, like every evil, is repugnant to beatitude and felicity. For felicity, according to the Philosopher, Ethics 1.9, is "a good per se sufficient and perfect"; wherefore Boethius too, Consolation 3, prose 2: "It is clear that beatitude is a state perfected by the congregation of all goods." And blessed Augustine on Psalm 2, "Blessed are all they that trust in him": "He said 'blessed,' where there is the sum and heap of all goods." The same Augustine, On the Trinity 13.5: "They are continuously wretched who either do not have what they will, or have that which they do not rightly will. Therefore he is not blessed except he both has all things which he wills and wills nothing wickedly." And further, 13.7: "No one will will to live wickedly in that felicity, or will something which will be lacking, or will what he willed be lacking; whatever will be loved will be present, nor will that be desired which will not be present; everything which will be there will be good."

But who is there who does not naturally and per se hate and flee falsity, love and seek truth? Whence the Philosopher, Ethics 4.14: "According to itself a lie is depraved and to be fled, but the true is good and praiseworthy." And in Secret of Secrets, part one, ch. 4: "Truth is the root of all praiseworthy things and the matter of all goods, since it is contrary to lying." Tully too, in Old Rhetoric 2, says that truth is among those things which totally and partly are to be sought for their own sake, and its contrary among such things to be avoided. Wherefore blessed Augustine, City of God 11.11, showing that the evil angels were not blessed before their fall: "Their life," he says, "was not blessed, since at some time it would cease, whether they knew this or, not knowing, thought otherwise: since fear, for those knowing, and error, for those not knowing, did not allow them to be blessed."

And further, 11.[13], after a great examination of this matter he so concludes: "Wherefore it now occurs to anyone without difficulty that beatitude — which intellectual nature with right purpose desires — is brought about by both joined together: that is, that with no molestation it should fully enjoy the immutable good, which is God, and should waver with no doubt, nor be deceived by any error, that it will remain in him forever." The same, Enchiridion 9: "We must tend to that felicity, where we are shaken by no calamity, deceived by no error: error must be avoided with all the care we can, not only in greater things but also in lesser things." And further, 10: "If, the truth being more diligently considered, since to err is nothing other than to think true what is false and false what is true, or to hold for certain what is uncertain or for uncertain what is certain — whether it be false or true — and this is so deformed and unbecoming in the mind, just as we feel it to be beautiful and becoming in speaking or assenting, 'Yes, yes; no, no'; truly it is on account of this also that this miserable life which we live is such, that to it sometimes, lest it be lost, error is necessary. Far be it that such be that life where the very Truth is the life of our soul, the life where no one deceives, no one is deceived; here, however, men deceive and are deceived, and they are more wretched when they deceive by lying than when they are deceived by believing those who lie. To such a degree, however, does rational nature flee falsity, and as much as it can avoid error, that even those who love to deceive do not will to be deceived."

Likewise, error and deception concerning future things, and especially [things] pertinent to the deceived, seems more to be repugnant to beatitude than simple ignorance of future things. But this [latter] is repugnant. Wherefore Augustine, On Genesis 11.23, 25, 27, shows that the apostate angels were not blessed before their fall, because they were neither prescient nor certain of their future event; which also in chapter 26 he proves in similar fashion concerning the first man. Lombard too, Sentences II, dist. 4, speaking of the angels: "They were never blessed who fell, since they were ignorant of their event" — which causal he confirms through blessed Augustine on Genesis where above.

And if anyone should say that Augustine there is speaking of foreknowledge of future things only pertinent — not impertinent — to the angel or man foreknowing, let argument be made only concerning these things [pertinent ones]. For it pertained to Christ and to the blessed Virgin, beatified in heaven, that their kindred according to the flesh and grace, then journeying away from the Lord, whom they so much loved and desired to be saved, and for which they instantly prayed — for whom Christ specially poured out his blessed blood — whose salvation was granted and divinely revealed to them that they should be saved. What lying spirit, then, would presume to deceive Christ and the now-blessed Virgin in these matters, or even in any pertinent matters whatever? To which of the Blessed too is it not pertinent? Indeed [does not] he stand defiled with errors of dark falsity, or adorned with the splendors of luminous truth? What also more pertains to the blessed than his perpetual beatitude? And concerning that it is possible that he be deceived. For notwithstanding that God has shown to him in the Word that his beatitude will perpetually endure, and he has seen this, he can not beatify him for the future — namely by withdrawing the beatitude, or by annihilating him, or by remitting him to the state of the way, in which he sins finally and is damned.

Likewise, every [thing] which harms beatitude is repugnant; but all ignorance harms, as Anselm says, Why God [Became] Man 2.13: "Ignorance, even if at some time it does not harm regarding something else, on this alone it harms — that it takes away the good of knowledge." Likewise, every penalty is a kind of misery; but all error, or at least involuntary [error], and in matters pertaining to the one erring, is a penalty, as Augustine says, On Free Will 3.29: "To approve false things for true so that one errs involuntarily is not the nature of established man, but the penalty of the damned." Wherefore Christ, Mary, and the blessed, throughout the whole time during which they were blessed, could have been deceived, punished, and wretched, and not blessed.

Indeed this also seems to make God unjust, since punishing a holy angel without fault. Wherefore Augustine, On Genesis Literally 11.30: "It occurs to anyone, and is true and manifest, that it is contrary to justice itself that, with no preceding merit, God should damn this very thing in anyone which he himself has created in him." And above, 24: "Is God prior as avenger before the devil [is] sinner? Far be it." And On Free Will 3.29: "Every penalty, if it is just, is the penalty of sin." And Against Julian 2.20: "If God the just inflicted such great evils on little ones drawing nothing of sin, he would the more appear unjust" — which thereafter in 3, 4, and many subsequent chapters, the last of book 4, the first of book 5, and afterward in various chapters, and the first of book 6 and thereafter in not a few chapters, he most constantly teaches the same.

Anselm 2, Why God [Became] Man 2: "That, however, the first man was made such," he says, "that he should not die by necessity, is easily proved from this — that, as we said, it is repugnant to the Wisdom and Justice of God that he should compel to suffer death without fault one whom he made just for eternal beatitude. It follows therefore that, if he had never sinned, he would never have died." Who in Monologion 69 most sweetly proves the same — which all the Catholic Doctors treating this matter concordantly hold.

Likewise, if this response were true, it would not be possible that God beatify anyone perfectly: for to perfect beatitude there is required certitude that it will perpetually remain. For beatitude, as was shown before, is a good lacking in nothing, but perfect; and as Boethius says, "having obtained which one can desire nothing further." And Anselm, On the Fall of the Devil 6, says that "the angels who stood are so advanced that they have obtained whatever they could will, nor do they now see what more they could will." Whence the Prophet: "I shall be satisfied when your glory shall appear," Psalm 16. And Apocalypse 7: "They shall hunger no more, neither shall they thirst any more." But who would doubt that certitude concerning a good for always is a great good — which all desire and without which they cannot be satisfied, even if they should abound in all other goods however much? For the more and greater goods they had, the more ardently they would desire certitude of always having them; otherwise they could and would reasonably have to have some fear lest perchance they lose those goods; but fear cannot be associated with perfect beatitude.

Whence Augustine, On Genesis 11.23 and afterward, shows that the devil and the first man were not fully blessed before their fall, since they did not have certitude of it. He there in 23 says thus: "Neither are the holy angels uncertain of their eternal life and beatitude. For how blessed, if uncertain?" And further, 24: "If God did not reveal to the devil, while he was still a good angel, what he would do or suffer, he was not yet fully blessed, since the fully blessed are certain of their beatitude, so that no fear may disturb it." And 25: "I do not see how those can be blessed for whom their very beatitude is uncertain." Who also in City of God 11.11 holds a similar process: "And so the blessed life," he says, "is doubtless not [blessed] except eternal, and certain and secure of its eternity." The authorities of his cited above from the same 11 and 12 also attest to this. The same in On the Trinity 13, speaking of final beatitude, says: "Whatever will be loved will be present; nor will that be desired which will not be present. All that will be there will be good, and the highest good will be God himself, and he will be present there to those loving him; and what is altogether most blessed, that he will so be forever will be certain."

To perfect beatitude, then, the certitude of this is required. But God cannot give it: not through any revelation, since not through that in the Word — which is the most luminous of all and the highest. For that, as the response says, can be deception and error; wherefore through it no one can be perfectly certified concerning it or its revealed [content]. Nor through another, since that other would either be certain or uncertain. If uncertain, it would not certify; if certain, [it would be so] either through itself or through another. If through itself, by the same reasoning one would have to stand in the first one, and then likewise the difficulty returns. If through another, thus either there will be an infinite process, or some [revelation] will be certain through itself; wherefore by similar reasoning so [will] the first; and even, with one certain one being posited — however many in number it may be — the argument returns. Indeed, what seems more absurd, God can certify no one concerning his past or present beatitude, as the foregoing makes manifest, since any such revelation can be illusory and false. Every blessed person also believes and hopes for future things, and continuously did so before; and every such credulity and hope can now be, and always before have been, erroneous and false. No one, then, of such a kind now is, nor ever was, certainly blessed; wherefore neither can this be revealed certitudinally.

But if anyone should respond that the good are certain of their beatitude eternally enduring with the certitude of firmest credulity, excluding every actual hesitation and fear of its opposite, by the same reasoning he would have to concede that God cannot certify anyone concerning his omnipotence regarding future things perfectly — nor otherwise than has been said. Which does not seem [right], since concerning present and past things he well can; therefore also concerning future things, since present and past things cause absolutely nothing there, as can be had from chapters thirty and thirty-one of this [book], and especially past things, since they are nothing, wherefore they do not cause [anything]. If even present or past things were the cause of this certitude, they would also be the cause of the beatitude of the blessed; wherefore they would beatify the blessed. Therefore the devil, and his sin and penalty, and his eternal misery, would beatify Christ and the other blessed — which is sufficiently absurd in itself, and even false; since since they are of finite power in acting, they would have a maximum and most remote terminus of action beyond which they cannot [act], as seems quasi per se known, which the Philosopher also shows, On the Heavens I.116, and Averroes in his Commentary.

But God can beatify and certify the blessed concerning such present and past things beyond every assigned terminus; indeed it does not seem that the action of these lowest things ascends to the highest heaven. Or if these present or past things were anything in the certitude of the blessed, God can supply their causation, and cause the whole through himself; for otherwise he would not be omnipotent. Wherefore Stephen, Bishop of Paris, condemned the article asserting that God cannot [bring about] the effect of a secondary cause without it. On account of which Peter [Lombard], Sentences III, dist. 26, says that Christ, in whom were the goods of the homeland, believed and hoped the resurrection on the third day to be future, but did not know it more perfectly as past than he understood it as future.

Likewise, then, by such certitude the good angels could have been certain of their future beatitude before their confirmation, and the saints now in the way [could be]. Indeed it seems that some wayfarers had some such certitude concerning various things. Whence Romans 8: "I am certain," says the Apostle, "that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor virtues, nor things present, nor things to come, nor strength, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the charity of God." And Acts 16: "A vision was shown by night to Paul. There stood a man of Macedonia beseeching him and saying, 'Pass over into Macedonia, help us.' And as soon as he had seen the vision, immediately we sought to set forth into Macedonia, being assured that God had called us to evangelize to them." Wherefore also in Wisdom 7 it is said that "the spirit of wisdom is unique, manifold, subtle, modest, distinct, mobile, undefiled, certain." What Catholic, too, is not so certain of the articles of faith concerning the future — namely, that there will be a final judgment, and a general resurrection of the dead, and that God will render to each according to his works? The saints in the way, then, now have a similar certitude such as the perfectly blessed have and will have.

Likewise, this certitude is the certitude only of hope; for this is found in wayfarers, as has just been shown. Wherefore Lombard, Sentences III, dist. 26: "Hope," he says, "is the certain expectation of future beatitude." Therefore in Christ and in the other blessed there is only the hope and certitude of hope — which is false, since that is imperfect, but beatitude is perfect, as has been shown above. Whence the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 13: "We know in part and we prophesy in part, but when that which is perfect shall come, that which is in part shall be done away. We see now through a glass in a dark manner, but then face to face. Now I know in part, but then I shall know even as I am known. Now there remain faith, hope, charity."

Wherefore also Peter [Lombard], Sentences III, dist. 26, having proposed the question whether faith and hope were in Christ, responds thus: "It seems to certain learned men that faith — the virtue — and hope were not in him, just as they are not in the saints already beatified, or in the angels. And although the saints believe and hope the future resurrection, and the angels also believe the same, nevertheless faith or hope is not a virtue in them, since they enjoy contemplating God by species, and in the Word of God they look upon the future resurrection or judgment, not through a glass in a dark manner, but most clearly. For if, because they believe the future resurrection, therefore it is true that they have faith — therefore, when it has been consummated, after the judgment they will likewise be said to have faith, since they will believe it past. But just as they will then believe, yet will not have faith — which makes [them] faithful — since they will not believe without knowledge, which will not be enigmatic but by species, so also now they believe and hope the resurrection, yet they do not have faith, since they know in believing. For there has come to them what is perfect, and what is in part has been done away. For knowledge has come, and faith has been done away; the species has come, and hope has ceased. So also Christ, in whom were the goods of the homeland, indeed believed and hoped the resurrection to be future on the third day, for which he also prayed to the Father; nor yet did he have faith — the virtue — or hope, since he did not have an enigmatic or speculative [knowledge], but had the clearest knowledge of it: since he did not know it more perfectly as past than he understood it as future. Yet Christ hoped, as he says in the Psalm: 'In you, Lord, I have hoped.' Yet he did not have faith or hope as a virtue, since he saw by species those things which he believed." Hugh too, On the Sacraments 2, part 13, holds the same; and all Catholic interpreters concordantly hold the same.

Likewise, if God can perfectly certify no one, he can perfectly beatify no one — since certitude is the most blessed part of the whole beatitude, as was cited above from Augustine. Whose mind also, having only the aforesaid certitude, would not crave a firmer one? Wherefore he would not be fully quieted, satisfied, or beatified by it, nor by the whole beatitude which he would have; wherefore he would not be perfectly blessed — such as is the beatitude expected in the homeland by all the faithful. For if any beatitude or felicity is perfect, as was taught above, [then] which, if not that one? Wherefore the Apostle says in 1 Corinthians 13: "When that which is perfect shall come, that which is in part shall be done away."

This response, then, eclipses the light of the blessed, deceives their sight, despoils them of certitude — that is, of the most blessed portion of the whole beatitude — drags them miserably down to misery; and what seems more wonderful and more miserable of all, [it] makes Christ, Mary, and the other saints, who long ago were blessed, never to have been blessed, but always before to have been wretched, and transfers the place of beatitude — the highest heaven — into hell, the place of misery.

Furthermore, what seems most heretical of all, this response has consequently to assert that God himself can be deceived and err. For if a man or angel can be deceived and err in the essence of God, so can God, since he understands nothing except what — and as — is shown and shines forth in it. This response also makes God uncertain similarly concerning future things. For if through his cognition of future things he can be deceived concerning them, through it he cannot be certain of them; nor could the Father, by his omnipotence, certify the Son concerning any future thing: for he himself is not certain — how then will he be able to certify another? Indeed, even if he were certain — as no one doubts that he is certain — still he could not certify the Son: for he could not certify him except through revelation in the Word, in the clear essence of God; but that does not certify, since with it stands error; wherefore neither the Son nor the Holy Spirit can certainly know any future. For they can know nothing, nor in any way, except what — and as — they receive from the Father to be known. For just as they have all their being from the Father, so also all their knowing, and all other things, as was more fully shown in chapter thirty-two of this [book].

CHAPTER XXXV. HE ARGUES AGAINST THE SECOND.

Nor can the second response stand, which says that the cause of such a past effect could have been not a revelation in the Word, but an appearance, estimation, or opinion created in its proper genus — since that [appearance] is or was false if the revealed [thing] will not be. Wherefore it is possible that Christ, Mary, and the saintly blessed are deceived and wretched, and not certain of their beatitude — together with the other absurdities induced against the prior response.

Likewise, Paul in his proper genus and in act believed that A was revealed as future, and it was not future. Suppose this, since it is possible and compossible with this. Wherefore the Word did not show him that A would be, but that A would not be; therefore he simultaneously, particularly, and actually believed contradictories under their own proper form — one in its proper genus, the other in the Word — which is a manifest impossibility, and contrary to the Philosopher, Prior Analytics 2.

Likewise, that credulity in its proper genus was one effect, therefore it had a cause; thus none other than that revelation and vision in the Word; for that being removed, no cause for so believing would have been in Paul rather than in Peter. And it is necessary that that effect was, because the effect of it — namely the previously-done extrinsic work — is necessary to have been; therefore it is necessary that its cause was, namely that vision in the Word. Or conversely, if it is possible that that cause was not, therefore also [that] the effect [was not], as chapter thirty-three of this [book] argued more fully.

Nor can anyone say that Paul opined A to be future merely freely and gratuitously without cause, since then there is no reason why Paul would so opine rather than Peter, nor why Paul would opine A to be future rather than A not to be future, since no evidence, no cause whatever is more in favor of this than against — indeed perhaps it is more apparent and opinable and favorable in the case that A not be future than that it be. Nor can Paul gratuitously and freely opine anything whatsoever, as no one is unaware, since no one can opine something unless it appear to him as true, and this is not in anyone's free power. Wherefore the Philosopher, On the Soul 2.151, shows that imagination is not opinion, since imagination is in us when we will — that is, voluntary according to Averroes — but opinion not, since it is necessary that what is opined be true or false, [or] appear true or false. "To opine," says the Philosopher, "is not in us: for it is necessary either to say true or false." Where the text, which Averroes expounds, has thus: "To estimate, however, is not in us: for it is necessary either to falsify or to verify."

Suppose also that Paul be a grave and stable man, and will not or believe anything from sole voluntary levity, but from a preceding rational cause; and the argument returns. Or even suppose that he received this from God in commandment, and wills and believes in his proper genus, and externally operates only conformably to the divine revelation and commandment; and the difficulty returns.

Suppose also that one only so doing has long since died, and is in heaven; and according to this response it is now possible that he did otherwise — indeed contrarily to the aforesaid revelation and commandment — and that he was always after death in hell, as chapter thirty-three of this [book] argued more fully.

This argument also goes immediately against this response, the case set forth in chapter thirty-three of this [book] being retained. For it follows that Paul, after he received this revelation and commandment and obeyed by meriting well, and living and dying in charity, was beatifically crowned — afterward to have omitted, or done the contrary, and always after to have been without charity in mortal sin, wretched and damned — as the prior deduction of chapter thirty-three of this [book] proves.

And if anyone says that it does not follow that it is now possible that Paul was without charity and not saved, since God by his absolute power can preserve charity in one mortally sinning, and save such a person — at least it follows necessarily that it is now possible that Paul, who through the act A merited eternal life, through the same sinned mortally, and merited eternal death — namely by doing that act against the revelation and commandment of God in the Word — and that Paul, who throughout the whole time after A was good and dear to God, throughout that whole time was wickedly mortal and odious to God; and that Paul, who throughout the whole time after his death was blessed, throughout that whole time was wretched. For there is no greater misery than sin: whence Proverbs 14: "Sin makes peoples wretched."

It also follows by the foregoing reasoning that it will be in the power of Antichrist, and of any wayfarer, to pervert the laws of God and change the faith of the Church. For, the revelation and command in the Word having been made to Paul concerning Antichrist, or any other wayfarer, as chapter 33 of this [book] touches, and he having well obeyed in charity, and so having died and been beatified in heaven, it is possible that Antichrist or another wayfarer should so act, that Paul having charity was not good nor dear through it, nor merited, but sinned, and that he, blessed in heaven, was wretched in heaven — together with other abuses similar to these, turning, indeed perverting, the law of God and the general faith of the Church, as is clear to no Catholic knowing the law and faith. Which yet no one will presume to concede, except a disciple of Antichrist, who "shall speak words against the Most High, and shall crush the saints of the Most High, and shall think that he can change times and laws against God," Daniel 7.

This principal falsigraphia, however, does not avoid the argument. For it is possible that God reveal in the Word to Paul that A will be, without Paul having such volition or created credulity in its proper genus, as no one is unaware. If this be posited, the argument is restored. For all two things altogether really distinct, such that neither has any part of the other, nor is any cause of it, can be separated from each other. For every thing is sufficiently constituted with all and only its causes and essential things possessed: for if it were not, this would be on account of some defect of something necessarily required for its being. God, however, cannot be separated from existing things, since he is the necessary form, and somehow the being, of all, and the necessary conserver of them in being, as chapter 2 of Book I shows. All created things, however, that are altogether — that is, according to all parts — really distinct, even if one is the cause of the other, can be separated from one another, on account of the reason aforesaid, and since God of the plenitude of [his] power can supply the causality of the second cause.

This is proved by a most faithful argument: for in the sacrament of the altar there exist accidents without subject; much more therefore can any accident exist without any other [accident] existing, and any substance without any accident, and any substance also without any other altogether distinct created substance. The Philosophers, although obscurely, seem to attest the same. For Aristotle, Metaphysics 7.55, reproving those wishing to define singulars — say, the Sun — says: "They sin by the addition of such things, which being taken away, the Sun will still be — say, 'circling the earth' or 'hidden by night': for if it should stand still or appear, will the Sun still not be? But it is absurd if not. For 'Sun' signifies a certain substance." Plato too in the Timaeus posits two virtues of fire — namely heat and light — and that "the divine powers conjoined the domestic and familiar body of the eyes [with] a perlucid, serene, and unsullied fire, without destructive and devouring heat." Fire, then, according to him, can be without heat, and by the same reasoning every substance without its proper accident, and much more without an accident not its own; and any substance without any other in the manner stated.

With which Augustine concordantly, City of God 11.10: "On account of this, the divine nature is said to be simple, for which to have something is not [the same as] either being able to lose [it], or [being] another thing having that which it has — as some vessel [has] liquor, or a body color, or air light or heat, or the soul wisdom: for none of these is what it has. For neither is the vessel liquor, nor body color, nor air light or heat, nor soul wisdom. Hence it is that they can also be deprived of the things they have, and turned and changed into other habits or qualities, so that the vessel is emptied of the moisture with which it is full, and the body is discolored, and the air becomes dark or cold, and the soul becomes foolish." And On the Trinity 15.13: "Far different from this knowledge is our knowledge: but what knowledge is to God is the very wisdom, and what wisdom is the very essence or substance, since in the simplicity of that nature it is not one thing to know wisely and another to be, but what it is to know is to be. Our knowledge, however, is in many things mixable, both [other things] received and admitted; since for us to be is not what to know or be wise, since we can be even if we neither know nor are wise." And on John part 2 homily 45 [or 99 of the whole]: "Mutable is our mind, which receives by learning what it did not know, and loses by unlearning what it knew; and therefore that substance is not most truly simple, for which to be is not what to know: for it can be and not know; but that divine [nature] cannot, since what it has, is, and through this it does not so have knowledge that one thing is for it the knowledge by which it knows, another the essence by which it is — but both [are] one." Whence also it is translated as the 368th proposition of the Sentences of Prosper. Blessed Gregory too, Moralia 18, on Job 28, "But where is wisdom found?" etc., holds the same.

Likewise, the Word was made flesh prior naturally to all revelation made to him in his proper genus, for us captives and wretches to be redeemed, on account of solely the eternal revelation eternally shown to him by the Father in the sole essence of God, according to what was shown in the immediately preceding chapter. Therefore in the middle time, in which we are between the incarnation and the redemption, it is possible that he was not incarnated, since he did not have that revelation, since the human race was not shown as one to be redeemed by him — since now it is possible that it not be redeemed by him, as the principal hypothesis says.

And if anyone should say that it does not follow that the Word now can not have been incarnated, but [only] that he can not have been incarnated for that cause, namely for man to be redeemed, but for another — therefore even after the redemption of man consummated by him, and after the final judgment, similarly he could [be]; or if then he cannot, neither before: for the divine will is always equally free or necessary with respect to it, as is clear from chapter thirty of this [book].

Then also by similar reasoning God could now never have willed the sacraments of the Church to have been instituted for that end for which they were instituted, nor to have had that effect which they always had; wherefore now also it is possible that those sacraments were always illusory, false, empty, and figments, and men justified and saved through them were always sinners and damned. Likewise, by the same reasoning it is now possible that God conferred on other operations, things, or signs, which evil men used, every sacramental virtue; wherefore it is consequently possible that the evil were always until now and damned in hell, and that those always until now in hell are now good and rewarded in the heavenly places.

It also follows, as is clear by the foregoing deduction, that it would be in the power of Antichrist and of any wayfarer to make the Word to have been incarnated and to have suffered for another final cause than it was — namely, for redeeming him whom he did not intend to redeem, and not for redeeming him whom he intended to redeem — which does not seem to befit sound faith. It also follows that it has been and is in the power of men to evacuate the whole effect and virtue of the Lord's passion, as has been more fully argued in chapter eight of this [book].

CHAPTER XXXVI. HE ARGUES AGAINST THE THIRD.

The third response, however, positing that the cause of the past effect of the past vision in the Word could have been not the vision of the future A shown, but [the vision] of its opposite, fails and errs in many ways.

First, since since God reveals voluntarily only, although it can be that he did not reveal A, which he previously revealed; and if that be placed in being, it is not necessary that he revealed its opposite — indeed it stands well with this that he revealed nothing whatsoever. Suppose, then, this with the other; and the response does not respond.

Second, since it has consequently to say that just as, something having been seen in the Word, it is possible that it never was seen, but its opposite, so something having been willed in the Word, it is possible that it never was willed, but its opposite. Wherefore also, by such volition, something having been done within the seer and willer or outside, it is possible that it never was done, but its opposite — as chapter 33 of this [book] proves. If, however, [someone] should obstinately deny that it is similar concerning vision and volition — since what was previously seen can never have been seen, and its opposite, that which never was seen, can have been seen; but concerning what was willed, not so, since what once was willed must necessarily always have been willed, and what was not willed in like manner not willed — by chapter 33 of this Book III he will be convinced.

Granting also what it says: let such a revelation be made to Paul with the command of willing and acting conformably, and let him obey in all things; then it is necessary that Paul now so will, or in the past have so willed; therefore it is necessary that he now so see, or in the past have so seen. For this volition of his is now caused, or was in the past caused, by this vision of his.

Furthermore, either Paul through the same act by which he saw distinctly that A would be can have seen distinctly the opposite, or through another. If through the same, therefore by similar reasoning through the same act through which he willed distinctly that A would be — or anything else — he can have willed distinctly the opposite; wherefore he did not do what he did.

If through another, therefore one other act, which never was, it is possible to have been; and one which was, not to have been — contrary to the principal hypothesis.

Likewise, the vision of the opposite would have caused the opposite effect, and not that one. For if Gabriel had seen in the Word that the Son of God was not to be incarnated of the Virgin, that vision never would have caused in him the will of going to the blessed Virgin and announcing what he did, but rather no will, or the opposite will. Christ also, if he had not seen in the Word his future passion, but its opposite, would not have had the cause of so much sadness and bloody sweat. Paul likewise, if he had seen in the Word himself to be saved, would have had great delight created in his proper genus; if, however, he had seen the opposite, he would have had great sadness.

Likewise, this response does not avoid the difficulty. For let such a revelation be made to Paul with the command of willing concordantly and acting; and let him fully obey, and so dying be saved. And according to this response it is now possible that he never saw that vision or commandment in the Word, but the opposite of both; and now it is necessary that he was so externally operating; wherefore it is now possible that he acted contrary to the revelation and vision in the Word, sinned mortally, and was wretched and damned.

Concerning Gabriel similarly, in the middle time between the annunciation and the incarnation, it was possible that he was lying. For when he said to the gracious Virgin, "Behold, you shall conceive," it was possible that for then he had not seen this in the Word, but plainly its opposite; wherefore it was likewise possible that that most blessed Archangel of the Lord was a most wretched angel of Satan, since lying against so great and so luminous a truth, and sinning mortally. Let him affirm this who dares; but I, on account of reverence for the truth showing all these things, on account of reverence for the sender and her to whom he was sent, and on account of reverence for the one sent and him on account of whom he was sent, do not dare to affirm such things.

From this, however, it follows that the finally-confirmed blessed can sin; wherefore neither are they finally confirmed, contrary to chapter fifteen of Book II. And from this it is further inferred that the blessed are not, nor can they be, certain of their beatitude. For how will a sinnable creature in a sinnable state — since not finally confirmed — be certain of never sinning, and of perpetual beatitude? Nor can God confer another firmer or more certain state on the blessed.

Even if God could certify the blessed concerning his future beatitude, this would be most of all through some revelation in the Word; but no such [revelation] certifies, since whatever such, even if now it is of one of the opposites, can now and for now not be of that one, but of its opposite. Indeed, what seems more erroneous, neither can God certify the blessed concerning his past or present beatitude. For in this present instant, suppose [it to be the one] in which blessed Gabriel announces to the gracious Virgin that she will conceive a Son: it is possible that he is now sinning by lying, and in the past has sinned, from the time at which he willed this knowingly. For it is possible that he now sees, and continuously before saw, the opposite of this in the Word. No blessed person, then, is certain, nor can be, concerning his future, past, or present beatitude — contrary to what was previously shown in chapter thirty-four of this [book].

CHAPTER XXXVII. HE ARGUES AGAINST THE FOURTH.

The fourth response, saying that the incomplex and simple vision of a simple object in the Word can have been the cause of such a past effect, simply says much. For sole incomplex cognition of an object does not sufficiently move anyone to act — say, to speak, to run, to build, and to do similar things — but beyond it, will is required by necessity, as chapter eight of Book I taught.

Likewise, certain non-voluntary effects — say, delight, sadness, confidence, fear, dilation, constriction, and the other corporeal passions of this kind — are not caused, or are not caused in so great a degree and so vehemently, by the sole incomplex cognition of an object, or by an estimation or opinion that it will happen to the cognizer, and this nearby. For we all know that we shall die, but we do not greatly grieve or fear, since we do not opine that [it will happen] immediately: for these things each of us can experience. Wherefore the Philosopher, On the Soul 2.152, proves that imagination or fancy is not opinion through this — that when we opine something terrible to befall us, we immediately suffer with it; but when we only imagine, by no means — as if we should consider terrible things in a picture. Concerning such effects, then, this response does not respond.

Likewise, suppose the object seen in the Word [be] one effect contingently future — say, the salvation or damnation of the one so seeing, or of another dear to him. Then that object can not be and never have been seen, since not [have been] shown in the Word; therefore any present or past effect of it can for now not be present nor have been past consequently. Or even suppose that object seen in the Word [be] one revelation in the Word concerning something contingently future. Suppose indeed that it be revealed to Daniel in the Word, that Jeremiah sees or saw in the Word that A will be tomorrow, etc., as before.

CHAPTER XXXVIII. HE ARGUES AGAINST THE FIFTH.

The fifth response, however, which posits the liberty of the created will to be able to have been, or to be, the cause of such a past or present effect, seems to say very freely without any action of reason; nor does it evacuate the difficulty, nor is it true. It does not evacuate the aforesaid difficulty: for suppose that he who sees in the Word be commanded to will and operate only conformably to the vision, etc., as chapters thirty-three and thirty-five of this [book] argued more fully; and the difficulty returns. Nor is this response true: since there are some effects caused by the sole vision of certain objects in the Word, without any free operation of the will, as is clear from chapter thirty-three of this [book].

CHAPTER XXXIX. HE ARGUES AGAINST THE SIXTH.

The sixth response also, asserting that God by himself alone can be or have been the total cause of the effect often mentioned, present or past, is not true. For according to it, it would be possible that a man, who from a vision and command in the Word prayed, ran, preached, built houses, and procreated sons, did none of these things, but God did each through himself alone. Wherefore it will also be consequently possible for the deflowered to be re-virginated through his action or quietation, freely and contingently future. And there will be, according to this, as much contingency with respect to present and past things as with respect to future things. For when a revelation in the Word has been made to a man wayfarer concerning some effect — which is A through him — freely and contingently future, and he, from that revelation, doing another effect before A — say B — in the middle time after B and before A, or while B is being done, just as it can happen that he do or not do A as future, so it can happen that he did or did not do B as past, or do or not do B as now present, as is clear from chapter thirty-three of this [book].

Likewise, according to this it is possible that a man who, from such revelation, merited or sinned against it, and was just or unjust, saved or damned, rewarded or punished, blessed or wretched, in heaven above or in hell below — never so did, nor received such things.

Likewise, by the same reasoning by which it is possible that God alone did what he did with a rational secondary cause, it will likewise be possible for him alone to have done whatever he did with an irrational secondary cause; therefore whatever God did with any secondary cause whatever, it is possible that he alone did, and that no secondary cause ever did or moved anything.

Likewise, if those things which God did not do alone, he can have done alone, by similar reasoning those things which he did not do with another nor alone, he can have done — since he does not need the help of another — wherefore also those things which he did, he can likewise not have done. All of which most plainly conflict with the principal hypothesis.

CHAPTER XL. HE REPROVES THOSE DENYING REVELATION IN THE WORD.

These things, then, having so far been disputed against those conceding revelation in the Word, it remains to affirm the same in some words, just as the very Word shall give, against those who, to the Word's injury and our misery, deny it. For there are certain defenders of this hypothesis who, not being able to solve the aforesaid arguments concerning revelation in the Word, and not being willing to relinquish the hypothesis, tend to the other — namely the sinister — side of this fork, by saying that no complex [proposition] concerning a future contingent can be revealed in the Word.

For how does it not redound to the Word's injury to despoil him of his omnipotence — that he cannot show himself to his most beloved lovers through himself? How also does it not redound to our misery, depriving us of final beatitude? For this consists in such a vision, as not only Theologians but also Philosophers in very many places attest.

But these will perhaps respond that our final felicity and beatitude consists in the incomplex vision of God, but not in the complex — that is, the blessed will see incomplexly in the essence of God, and in the Word, the very essence of God, and any of the persons, and the incomplex things which shine forth in it; complexion, however, or composition, or imaginative proposition, or affirmation or negation concerning future contingents — namely, that God affirms intrinsically, just as the Father affirms to the Son, that something will be or not be — cannot be revealed in the Word or essence; in the proper genus, however, [it] well can. Wherefore they also say that all such things are revealed through created propositions, habits, and acts — namely in the proper genus — and cannot be revealed otherwise.

But if a future contingent cannot be revealed to a creature in the essence of God or in the Word, this is either on account of impotence in God, or on account of impotence in the future, or on account of impotence in the creature.

Not on account of impotence in God, since he is omnipotent — and since the Father reveals such things to the Son in his clear essence, as is clear from chapter 34 of this [book]. God can also so reveal incomplex things; wherefore complex things by similar reasoning: for he is not of measured or restricted power.

Nor on account of impotence in that future: for that can be revealed in the essence of God; for in it, it is revealed to the Son. That truth concerning the future is also most truly, most certainly, and most clearly written in the book of divine prescience; why then can it not be likewise revealed there? Since also that truth is more certain and more true there than in any created proposition, it can be more certainly and more truly revealed there.

Nor on account of impotence in the creature: since if it be so, let omnipotent God increase, as much as is needed, the power of the creature. The creature can also see in the Word a thing incomparably higher, subtler, and more difficult — somehow infinitely so — namely, the trinity of persons in the unity of essence. For what we now believe, then we shall see in clear light, as the Catholic Fathers concordantly attest. The creature can see in the Word any incomplex things; why then not by similar reasoning complex things?

If, however, it be said that the creature cannot see future things in the Word on account of its excessive disproportion, distance, and remoteness from the Word, it can be contradicted as before. For omnipotent God can elevate the creature in natural or supernatural [endowments] as much as is needed; wherefore also many learned Doctors not unlearnedly posit a certain created supernatural light, which they call the light of glory, elevating the created intellect to the beatific vision of the beatific uncreated light. Which the Prophet too seems patently to teach, when he says, "With you is the fountain of life; in your light we shall see light," Psalm 35.

Notwithstanding this disproportion and distance, also, the creature can see any incomplex things in the Word; why then not these complex things?

Likewise, the creature can see in the Word a thing contingently future to be when it is, and to have been when it has passed; why then not [see it] to be when it is future — especially since such a truth always intrinsically in every same way is true and written and shining in the Word, whether the thing is future, or present, or sent into the past? Otherwise indeed God would be intrinsically changed, contrary to chapter five and twenty-three of Book I, which is also evidently shown from chapters 30, 31, and 32 of this [book].

Likewise, necessary complex [propositions] concerning the future, and any other necessary complex [propositions], can be revealed in the Word; why then no future contingent — since all true [propositions] are likewise inscribed there?

Perhaps it will be said that all true necessary [propositions], and all true [propositions] concerning the present and past, have a determinate and certain cause and are true in like manner; wherefore they can also be revealed determinately and certainly in the Word; future contingents, however, do not so have, nor are so true; wherefore neither can they be so revealed in the Word.

This, however, is not true: for the immutable divine will is the determinate and certain cause of all future contingents, through which they are also so determinately and certainly known by God, and so determinately and certainly are in him when they are future, as when they are present or past having flowed away — as appears through chapters 14, 18, and 23 of Book I, and through chapters 30 and 32 of this [book]. And God can show to a creature in the Word that he wills such a future to be, wherefore [also] make him foreknow in the Word that it will be — indeed even know most truly and demonstratively in a certain way, since through the truest and infrustrable cause, namely the divine will.

Likewise, the divine essence is more similar, nearer, and more proportional to our mind than created qualities, propositions, or habits; for both are substances, and immaterial substances, and very much akin. Wherefore the Philosopher, Ethics 10.13, says: "If there is some care of human things from the gods, as it seems, it would also be reasonable that they rejoice in the best and most akin; and this is the intellect." Man too, as Genesis attests, was made to the image and likeness of God, and this most of all in the rational soul, as very many Catholic Fathers attest. Wherefore [the divine essence] is also the most natural and most desired end of our mind. If, then, these things be so, in the divine essence too more clearly, more truly, and more certainly all true complex [propositions] are inscribed and shine forth, just as also incomplex ones, [more so] than in any created proposition, than in any habit, than in any creature; why then will our mind in no way more clearly, more truly, and more certainly see there, and be able to see, any true complex [propositions], just as incomplex ones, than in any creature — especially since our mind has been most fully purged from every mass of the burdening body, from all obscuring phantasms, from all rust and gloom, from every dross and misery, and deifically transformed above the splendor of the Sun?

This too can perhaps be argued more strongly concerning all the angels, or any of them, of whom in Ezekiel 28: "You [are] the seal, of likeness," etc. — since [the angel] seems to have been made nearer to the likeness of God, as Gregory says, Moralia 32.23, on Job 40, "He is the beginning of the ways of God": "Although man is created to the likeness of God, yet [the prophet], attributing as it were something greater to the Angel, says that he is not made to the likeness of God, but is himself the seal of the likeness of God — so that, the more subtle his nature, the more fully the likeness of God is believed to have been expressed in him." And Isidore says, On the Highest Good 1.10: "The condition of the Angel differs from the condition of man: for man is created to the likeness of God, but the Archangel, who fell, is called the seal of the likeness of God, God testifying through Ezekiel, 'You [are] the seal of the likeness, full of wisdom, perfect in beauty, you were in the delights of paradise.' For as much as his nature is subtler, so much the more fully has it been expressed to the likeness of divine truth."

Since also God is the most natural end of our mind, and it cannot be perfected except in perfect conjunction with him, how, according to one of its powers — which is apprehensive of simple things — will it be perfected, perfectly conjoined with God (perfectly, since by contemplating incomplex and simple things through the essence of God) — but according to its other power, also nobler, which composes and divides simple things into complex ones, will it remain eternally imperfect? Indeed, neither can it be perfected for eternity, or at least it will not be perfected to such an extent, nor can it be like the other power, its sister, also lower than itself — since it can see no true complex [proposition] in God? Indeed these two powers of the created intellect seem proportional to the power of the divine intellect apprehending simple things, and to the power composing apprehended simple things — speaking very improperly of a "composing power" in God, since stammeringly we can scarcely thinly resound the great things of God, as chapter 18 of Book I more fully touched. Wherefore, just as that power [is perfected] by contemplating in [the divine essence] simple things in some incomplex way, so this other [power will be perfected] by contemplating in it complex things in some complex way. For thus is one part of the image perfectible finally just as the other, and so will it attain its natural and proper end.

Likewise, otherwise omnipotent God cannot certify any blessed person concerning his beatitude as eternally enduring, nor concerning any future contingent. For if he can, suppose [it]; either that revealed certainly will necessarily come to pass, or by no means. It will not come to pass necessarily, as this position posits; therefore it can in no way come to pass. Wherefore this blessed person can be deceived and err, and now not be blessed, nor ever before have been, but now be wretched and always before have been wretched — together with many other and great absurdities, as can appear from chapter 34 of this [book].

Whose mind, also, does not desire infallible certitude concerning his beatitude eternally enduring? Therefore to say that no one can have such certitude is to deprive every rational creature of his beatitude, as is clear from the same chapter 34. According to this also, the blessed now in heaven are not certain concerning the final judgment, the resurrection of the dead, and their future beatitude, except by the certitude of faith or hope — contrary to what was previously shown in chapter 34 of this [book].

These also strive to deceive the truth — namely the Lord Jesus Christ — at least according to his human nature. For if he sees only in his proper genus things contingently future, since those can not be, Christ too can be deceived and err. What Christian, except perchance one deceived and erring, will presume to affirm [this]? Nor can anyone avoid the deception by saying that such vision in Christ and the other blessed could have been [vision] of one of the opposites and not of the other, as is clear from chapter 36 of this [book].

These likewise deprive the blessed not only of certitude of knowledge, but also of multitude [of things known]: for to perfect beatitude perfect knowledge is required, not only as to the clarity of knowledge, but also as to the multitude of things known. The blessed therefore truly knows all things. For how otherwise could he not be deceived, and how otherwise would he not have the evil and darkness of ignorance, and how otherwise could he not always study, progress, and labor further? This [latter], however, is not of the nature of the end, but of the way. Wherefore Augustine, On the Trinity 15.16: "Since now in this enigma there is so great a dissimilarity from God, in which yet some likeness has been found, this also must be confessed, that even when we shall be like him, when we shall see him as he is — which he assuredly said who attended to this present dissimilitude — neither shall we then by nature be equal to him (for nature is always less than the maker by which it has been made); and then indeed our word will not be false, since we shall neither lie nor be deceived; perhaps also our thoughts will not be voluble, going from some things to others and returning, but we shall see all our knowledge at one and the same view." And how otherwise would the appetite of the blessed be satisfied — by which he would will to know whatever proposed thing, [since] he would at least prefer to know than not know the truth? And how otherwise will beatitude be a good in every way perfect, as all these things are clearer from chapter 34 of this [book]?

For how can the blessed actually or habitually know all things in the proper genus? For he could not [do so] except through propositions, acts, and habits infinite [in number]; but thus he cannot. He cannot, therefore, clearly know all things, except through the divine essence demonstrating all things most clearly, except through the book of divine knowledge containing all things most clearly, except through the mirror of divine majesty, in which all things shine clearly, except through the eye of divine power, to which all things lie open clearly. Wherefore the Philosopher, On the Soul 1.65: "If a senior should receive a young eye, he would see indeed as a young man." Where also the text, which Averroes expounds: "An old man," he says, "if he should receive the eye of a young man, would see as a young man." Wherefore also if a man or angel should receive the eye of God, he will see somehow as God. May not that prophetic [saying], "Eye to eye they shall see," Isaiah 52, be so understood — and that, "The eye has not seen, O God, beside you, what things you have prepared for those waiting for you," Isaiah 64? "The Lord is my illumination," Psalm 26 — and many similar things in many places?

Wherefore the Philosophers also assert that man must finally know all things through the substance of the agent intellect, through the very substance of God; and that this is his ultimate and perfect felicity. For Averroes, on On the Soul 3, comm. 36, speaking of the copulation and continuation of the agent intellect with us, says that we are sometimes said to be moved to the continuation of this; and adds: "And it is manifest that, when this motion will be completed, that intellect immediately will be copulated with us in all ways; and then it is manifest that its proportion to us in that disposition is as the disposition of the intellect which is in habit to us; and since it is so, it is necessary that man understand by his proper intellect all beings, and that he do his proper action in all beings, just as he understands by the intellect which is in habit, when it has been continued with the imaginable forms, all beings by proper intellection. Man therefore in this manner, as Themistius says, is assimilated to God — namely, in this, that he is all beings somehow, and knowing them somehow. For beings are nothing other than his knowledge, nor is the cause of beings other than his knowledge; and how wonderful is this order, and how strange this manner of being!" With whom Augustine concordantly On the Joys of the Just and the Pains of the Wicked, or Of the Threefold Habitation, says that "in the future life, in the royal city, the just shall shine as the Sun," as the Lord said, "where there will be the highest peace, the highest rest, no labor, no grief, no poverty, no old age, nor any night, nor any death, nor any desire of food, no burning of thirst — but the food and drink of all will be the vision of Christ and the holy Trinity, and the contemplation, by the eye of pure heart, of the very divinity, and assiduous reading, so to speak, of the book of life, that is, of eternal truth and the highest wisdom, and of the Word of God, which is the vision of Jesus Christ; where whatever now is hidden from us will then be manifest; where the reason will be manifest why this one is elected and that one reprobated, why this one is taken up into the kingdom, why that one reduced to slavery, why one dies in the womb, another in infancy, another in youth, another in old age, why one is poor, another rich, why the son of an adulteress is baptized, and sometimes the son of a legitimate spouse dies before baptism, why one who begins to live well sometimes ends badly, and one who begins badly often ends well — all these things and many such will be plain and open in the book of life." And further: "In the vision of God a triple knowledge is known — namely, the man who beholds, God who is beheld, and all others; all things will be seen and understood. For just as through a glass mirror a triple vision is administered to us, since we see ourselves, and the mirror itself, and whatever is present nearby, so through the mirror of divine clarity we shall see God himself, as he is, as much as is possible to a creature, and we shall know ourselves and others by true and certain knowledge." Who also in City of God, last [book] 28: "If the prophet Elisha, absent in body, saw his servant Gehazi accepting gifts, how much more in that spiritual body will the saints see all things?" Is this what God promised to Moses, desiring to see the face and glory of the Lord: "I will show you all good," Exodus 33? Gloss: "Eternal rest, in which is every good, in the vision of God, as the Psalmist says, 'I shall be satisfied when your glory shall appear.'"

Blessed Gregory too, Dialogues 4.22, speaking of the saints in heaven: "What is there," he says, "that they do not know there, where they know him who knows all things?" It will perhaps be answered, as it seems Peter [Lombard] answers, Sentences II, dist. 11, last [chapter], that Gregory there speaks of the angels, and when he intimates that they know all things, he understands only of all those things whose knowledge makes the knower blessed — namely, those whose knowledge is of the substance of beatitude, of which kind is the mystery of the Trinity. But to those looking at Gregory's process, it is plainly clear that he there speaks of men, and of the mutual knowledge of men — strangers and unknowns to one another in this life. For Peter [the interlocutor] asks whether either the good recognize the good in the kingdom, or the wicked recognize the wicked in punishment, and speaks manifestly of men. Where Gregory, in responding, also shows that yes — both concerning the good and the wicked — and this only concerning men, and adjoins: "It happens, however, in the elect something more wonderful, since they know not only those whom they knew in this world, but recognize as their neighbors and acquaintances good men whom they had never seen. For when they shall see the ancient fathers in that eternal inheritance, they will not be unknown to them by sight, whom they have always known by [their] work. For since there all see God by common clarity, what is there that they do not know there, where they know him who knows all things?"

Anselm furthermore, On the Similitudes 57, says that the eighth part of beatitude is wisdom, and adds: "For the good will be filled with that perfect wisdom which is God, and will gaze upon it face to face. When he has so beheld it, he will see the nature of the whole creature, which subsists better in God than in itself. For then the just will know all things which God made to be known — both those which are past, and those which afterward are to be future. There each will be known by all, and all by each; nor will it altogether escape anyone in what country, of what stock, [each] was born, or what he did in his life."

Likewise, what Theologian will presume to deny that Christ truly knows all things according to the assumed nature, since both reason and the manifold authority of the Fathers attest this? For to him "the Spirit was given not by measure," John 3, and this according to all his gifts; in him too, by the testimony of the Apostle, "it pleased that all the fullness of divinity should dwell corporeally," Colossians 1; in whom also, according to the same, "are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden," ibid., 2.

The same Hugh of Saint Victor, in a certain little responsive book to Master Walter of Mauritania, in many ways strives to approve and pertinaciously to affirm. For Walter asked whether the soul of Christ has so great knowledge and wisdom altogether as the divinity has. He opined and argued that it does not, since beatitude consists in knowledge — the Lord saying, "This is eternal life, that they may know," etc. If, then, the soul of Christ should have equal knowledge with the divinity, it would have equal beatitude, equal charity, and the other goods in which beatitude consists. Likewise, otherwise it would be false that God has greater sufficiency in every good than his creature.

Notwithstanding which, [Hugh] holds plainly that yes, since the soul of Christ thus knows all things not through habits, acts, or any one act, but through God himself, through the very essence of God — which he also holds concerning our beatitude. Whence he says: "This," he says, "is life, that they may know you only true God and Jesus Christ whom you have sent. Knowledge of God therefore is eternal life. And what is the knowledge of God? Is it an accident? Then the love of God is an accident, and beatitude is an accident, and our beatitude is in accidents. Wherefore [is it] not rather God who is our beatitude, he the wisdom by which we know, he the love by which we love, he the joy by which we exult? Therefore there is one wisdom by which all are wise: nor yet do they know in one way, since they know by participating; but if all who are wise are wise by this wisdom, much more by this wisdom was wise that soul which was united to wisdom itself." And further: "The Apostle attests that there is fullness there, and we say that the whole wisdom is not in its house: therefore half dwells within and half outside. And where it is asked, 'If she is not found at home, in whom does the fullness of divinity dwell corporeally?' Where there is fullness, nothing is lacking; where nothing is lacking, all is present. If perhaps the fullness of divinity is there, and the fullness of wisdom is not there? He says again, 'In whom are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden.' But you say well: 'All the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are there, but they are hidden.' He carries, and does not see. But far be it from our understanding that we should so feel; but they are hidden — not so that they are hidden from him, but that they may not be seen by the impious in him. They are hidden and stored away; they are stored away that they may be brought forth at the opportune time."

And further: "Christ saw in the divinity, he saw also in the humanity, yet from the divinity: for the fullness of divinity was in the soul of Christ, and from the fullness of wisdom the soul of Christ was fully wise. Therefore, they say, the soul of Christ has as much wisdom as God has. What does the comparison do? There is one alone; one is the wisdom of God by which the soul of Christ is wise, nor is it [wise] by participating, so that this or that should be wise in it and through it, but by having the fullness, so that it possesses the whole. Let us not say, then, 'so much,' or 'as much,' but let us say: 'the whole wisdom of God is in the soul of Christ, and from the whole wisdom of God the soul of Christ is wise'; nor yet is the soul of Christ equal to God, since the wisdom of God is not [equal to itself in this regard]; there [in God] grace, here [in the soul] nature; and the same there [is] grace as here nature."

And further, responding to the first argument of Walter, he says: "Even if the soul of Christ should have equal knowledge with the divinity, it would not on that account need to have equal beatitude — since to be blessed is to have a good by nature and from oneself, and to be that, [rather] than to have it by grace and from another, and not to be it." And further, responding to the second, he says thus: "Afterward you added: 'If the soul of Christ has equal knowledge with God, it will be false that God has greater sufficiency in every good than his creature' — and so on. Just as the creature cannot be equaled to the Creator, so neither the good of one to the good of the other; but this is well and truly said where the good of the creature is found other and diverse from the good of the Creator. But where it is one and the same itself, who can be greater or lesser? For what is the true good of the creature, especially of the rational [creature], other than God? Or what is the good of God other than himself? If, then, the true and unique good of the creature is God, and the good of God cannot be other than himself, is God on that account less or greater than himself, since he is at the same time himself the good both of his creature and his own? Let then at last cease this so frequent repetition of comparison, where there is the singularity of unity."

And further, at the end: "What need to pursue each thing? Briefly I shall show you what seems to me must be felt in this matter. We believe that full and perfect and whole wisdom of God was in the soul of Christ, and from that wisdom the same soul was fully and perfectly wise — not by participating in it, but by possessing it whole, since 'according to fullness she received.' John, however, who was 'a burning and shining lamp,' had comprehended in part: the soul of John, then, received from the fullness; the soul of Christ comprehended the fullness. Whoever, however, persist in contending to assert that the wisdom by which the soul of Christ was wise was one, and that which was united to the soul of Christ was another — I do not wish to prejudice anyone; let them see for themselves with what sense they assert this, lest perhaps the pronouncement be more carnal — and theirs — than true. This one [thing] I indubitably affirm: that either there was no other wisdom in the soul of Christ besides the divine, or, if there was another, it was not equal to that one. He who does not believe this, the believer does not believe well; to other things I do not compel, but I persuade."

The same Peter [Lombard], Sentences III, distinctions 13 and 14, shows through reasons and authorities of Doctors. Where also in dist. 14, to certain objectors he responds thus: "Responding, we say that the soul of Christ, through the wisdom freely given in the Word of God to which it is united, which also it perfectly understands, knows all things which God knows."

The blessed angels also — all, or at least some — know all things in the Word, or at least will know [them] when final beatitude is consummated; for otherwise the angels and beatified men could always progress by learning, both through their own study and through divine revelation; wherefore they would never be perfectly blessed. Nor does anyone concede this. And Robert [Grosseteste] of Lincoln, on Posterior [Analytics] 1.14, says that "the intelligences receiving irradiation from the first light see in it all knowable things, universal and particular." And Gregory says, on Luke 15, "What woman having ten drachmas?" etc., homily 34: "Cherubim is called the fullness of knowledge, and those higher ranks have been deservedly called Cherubim, since they are filled with so much more perfect knowledge as they more nearly contemplate the brightness of God; so that, according to the manner of the creature, they know all things the more fully as they approach the vision of their Maker by the merit of [their] dignity." And further, showing that the gifts of the orders are so special to each that they are common to all: "Cherubim," he says, "we have called the fullness of knowledge, and yet who is there that does not know something, where they all together see God himself, the fountain of knowledge?"

Isidore too, On the Highest Good 1.10: "The angels of God know all things before they happen in themselves, and the things which among men are still future, the angels already, with God revealing, know."

Blessed Augustine likewise, On Genesis Literally 8.48, says that "God himself speaks with the angels, illuminating their minds with immutable truth, where there is the intellect knowing simultaneously whatever things even through times do not happen simultaneously."

These, then, deprive the blessed angels and all men — indeed even the beatific Lord of the blessed himself, the Lord Jesus Christ — of the certitude and multitude of knowledge required for beatitude, as the foregoing makes manifest. And not only this, but also they deprive them of all knowledge or foreknowledge — the knowledge or foreknowledge, I say, of all contingent futures, and of any other knowable things, except perhaps things known per se, or of which they have a demonstration or sense. Wherefore much more [they deprive] Christ and all the prophets in the way. For where there is not perspicuous certitude, there can be properly no knowledge, but rather faith, opinion, or estimation, as is clear from chapter 18 of Book I. Wherefore the Apostle [says]: "Faith is the substance of things to be hoped for, the argument of things not appearing," Hebrews 11. Whence Augustine, first part on John homily 40: "We believe that we may know," he says. "For what is faith except to believe what you do not see? Faith therefore is to believe what you do not see; truth, to see what you have believed."

Who also To Paulinus, On Seeing God 3, and afterward diffusely shows that to see and to believe differ in this — that to see is to know or know certainly and evidently something, namely by some sense of body or mind, certainly to feel something, or to recall having felt it; but to believe is to assent to other things not so known. Where in 4 he says thus: "Hold this distinction, that if I admonish you in any disputation about something which you so see by the eyes of the flesh, or feel by any other sense of it, or recall to have so felt, as sounds, colors, fragrances, odors, savors, heats are felt, and whatever else through the body, by seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching we feel, are felt; or you do not so see, but with the gaze of the mind you see — life, will, thought, memory, intelligence, knowledge, your faith — and whatever else you behold with the mind, and that it is so not only by believing but plainly by seeing, do not doubt: this judge me to have shown. But what I shall not have shown so that it be held by sense, sight, or perception of body or mind — and when I shall have said something which is seen by neither of those two genera — it remains that it only be believed."

And further, 5: "Some think that this very thing which we say is to believe — when a true thing is believed — to be only this, to behold with the mind. If it is so, this our prolocution would be deceived, in which we distinguished that it is one thing to perceive something by the sense of the body — as in heaven the Sun, and on earth a mountain, a tree, or any body — and another by the gaze of the mind, [which is] nonetheless evident, as our will is beheld by ourselves within when we will something, or thought when we think something, or memory when we recall, or any such thing in the soul or body — or another to believe before what is neither present nor recalled to have been present in the gaze of the body or mind, as that Adam was created without parents, and Christ born of the Virgin and having suffered rose again."

And further, 6: "Is it enough that between seeing and believing we believe this to differ — that present things are seen and absent things believed? Plainly, perhaps, it is enough — if we understand things present in this place to be those which are present to the senses, whether of the mind or the body, whence also they are called things present, the term being drawn from 'at hand.' For just as I plainly see this light by the sense of the body, so I see my will, since it is present to the senses of my mind and is inwardly present to me. But if anyone indicates to me his will — whose mouth and voice are present to me — yet because the will itself, which he indicates to me, lies hidden from the sense of my body and mind, I believe, I do not see, even if perchance it is as he says. Therefore those things are believed which are absent from our senses, if it seems suitable that testimony be borne to them; but those things are seen which are at hand, whence they are also called present — by the senses of the mind or of the body. For though there are five senses of the body — of seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching — sight indeed is principally attributed to the eyes; but we also use this word in the others. For we do not only say, 'See what shines,' but also, 'See what sounds, see what smells, see what tastes, see what is hot.' Nor, because I said that those things are believed which are absent from our senses, should it be so taken that they are reckoned among those things which we sometimes saw, and we retain that we saw, and we are certain — although they then are not at hand when they are recalled by us. For these are not reckoned among believed things, but among seen things, and therefore are they known: not because we had faith in other witnesses, but since we without doubt remember and know that we saw."

Someone perchance will respond, saying that these things do not follow, since God can so illuminate the mind of someone, and the propositions or habits in his mind, and so reveal to him such truths, that he will know and behold them certainly. But if that illumination be made through some created light, however most clear, or through some creature, such revelation about the future can be erroneous, illusory, and false: for the opposite can come to pass. In the same way also any revelation about the present or past not per se known or demonstrated, or sensed, notwithstanding such illumination, can be illusory and false. For why not concerning such present and past things just as concerning future things? Indeed, if to someone existing in London such a revelation were made, that tomorrow at the first hour A as a future contingent will be at Rome, and he should believe continuously, would he not, just as from this revelation he can be deceived and err before the first hour of tomorrow's day, by believing that A then will be — since notwithstanding such revelation it is possible that A not be — so also from the same revelation in substance can he be deceived concerning the present, by believing that tomorrow at the first hour A is, and the first hour having passed, similarly be deceived concerning the past, by believing conformably that A was?

The cause of this is that, however and by however great a created light any proposition is illumined whose truth is not per se known, nor by the light of habit evidently demonstrated through some [things] per se known and in a per se known consequence, nor indubitably sensed — that [proposition] is not certain, since notwithstanding such illumination the thing could be otherwise. For just as such a true proposition is illumined, so could a false one [be]. For so clearly does the Sun and Moon and other luminaries shine on a false writing as on a true, on the lying as on the true-saying. Where, then, can these be discerned? Certainly in no fallible created light, [but only in] the infallible uncreated light. No truth of this kind, then, can be certainly and infallibly seen, except in the intrinsic light of infallible truth, in the brightness of the eternal light, and the mirror without spot of the divine majesty, in the book of life, in the Word of God, who and which cannot lie — in the clear essence of God, where all things, just as they are, are eternally, immutably, and infallibly inscribed; where there is no error, nor even can there be, just as not in God; which also there will see, read, and most certainly know whoever shall have perfectly inwardly seen, read, and known that book — as appears from chapter 34 of this [book].

Did not all that throng of Philosophers wish to say this — some uttering obscurely, some clearly — concerning the agent intellect? And how God is the light for knowing all things, as chapter 6 of Book I and chapter 22 [of Book I] more fully recited. Did not most clear Isaiah feel thus, when he promised to the congregation of the faithful: "There shall be no more for you a Sun for shining by day, nor shall the splendor of the Moon illumine you, but the Lord shall be for you an everlasting light," Isaiah 60? Did not the prince of the Apostles, Peter, feel this, when he wrote thus to the faithful: "We have a more firm prophetic word, to which you do well to attend, as to a lamp shining in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in your hearts," 2 Peter 1? Did not the vessel of election, Paul, feel thus, writing thus to the Corinthians: "We know in part, and we prophesy in part. But when that which is perfect shall come, that which is in part shall be done away. We see now through a glass in a dark manner, but then face to face. Now I know in part, but then I shall know even as I am known"? Did not he who was more loved among the disciples feel this, who also drew from the Lord's breast all that he poured forth to thirsting servants, when he said, "God is light, and in him there is no darkness at all," 1 John 1? And further, 3: "Beloved, now we are the sons of God, and it has not yet appeared what we shall be; we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like to him, since we shall see him as he is." And how? Hear: "No one has ever seen God; the only-begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father, he has narrated [him]," John 1 — which by the testimony of Bede in the Gloss can be referred to the past and likewise to the future. Did not Truth itself feel this, when he said, "I am the root and the offspring of David, the bright and morning star," Apocalypse last? And again, "He who loves me will be loved by my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him," John 14? Are not these and very many other similar places of both the Old Testament and the New to be so understood? If anyone doubts, let him look at the Catholic expositions and glosses, and beyond doubt he will be made certain.

I know, however, that there is a certain knowledge and even certitude said in another way — namely probable and firm credulity, vehement and indubitable adhesion, and firm hope. For thus we know who were and are our parents, brothers, and sisters; thus we know what we have learned by the testimony of trustworthy men or books — books, I say, historical and sacred and even others — say, that Troy was a noble city and destroyed by the Greeks; that Alexander, Charlemagne, Edward, and other princes accomplished many great deeds; that Plato, Aristotle, Ptolemy, and other philosophers taught very many things. Wherefore Geber in the prologue [of book] 1 says that "the better knowledge after the knowledge of faith is that whose principles are certain and firm." And the Philosopher in On Memory and Reminiscence: "It does not happen," he says, "that future things are remembered; but [they are] opinable and able-to-be-hoped; and there will indeed be a certain knowledge of hope-character, just as some say [there is] a divinatory [knowledge]." And Ethics 7.3: "Some of those opining," he says, "do not doubt, but estimate that they certainly know. If, then, on account of [their] quiet, those believing while opining act more than those knowing without [merely] opining, knowledge does not differ in any way from opinion. For some believe no less in those things which they opine than others in those things which they know; Heraclitus makes this manifest." Who also Topics 4 says that "faith is vehement opinion." Where he also recites from certain ones that "faith is the vehemence of opinion."

Wherefore Augustine, To Paulina On Seeing God 4: "If those things which we have not seen — that is, in the present we have not perceived either by mind or body, nor have we learned about them from sacred Scriptures, by reading or hearing — we had not believed at all, whence would we know that there are cities where we never were, or that Rome was founded by Romulus, or — that I may speak of nearer things — that Constantinople [was founded] by Constantine? Whence finally would we know what parents brought us forth, by what fathers, ancestors, forebears we were begotten? Of such things indeed, when we know very many, yet we did not learn them either by any sense, present like the Sun, like the will of our mind, like the authority of canonical eloquences, like that Adam was the first man, or that Christ was incarnate, suffered, and rose again — but [we learned them] by others reporting, of whose testimony in this kind of things alone we have least doubted."

And further, 6, intimating the aforementioned distinction concerning knowledge: "Our knowledge," he says, "consists of seen things, things, and believed things. But in those things which we have seen or see, we ourselves are witnesses; in those, however, which we believe, we are moved by other witnesses. Yet for the faith of those things which we recall neither having seen nor see, signs are given either in voices or in letters, or in any documents whatever, by which, when seen, things not seen are believed. Not without reason, however, do we say that we know not only those things which we have seen or see, but also those things which we believe by suitable testimonies or witnesses moved to each thing. Further, if we say not incongruously that we know that which we believe most certainly, hence it has come about that even those rightly believed things, although they are not present to our senses, we are said to see by the mind: for knowledge is attributed to the mind, whether through the senses of the body, or through the soul itself it retains something perceived and known; and faith itself is seen by the mind, although that be believed by faith which is not seen. Whence the Apostle Peter says, 'In whom now not seeing you believe'; and the Lord himself, 'Blessed are they who have not seen and have believed.'"

But far be it that the perfectly blessed should have only such an improper, fallible, imperfect knowledge, cognition, or certitude — as is clear from what is here premised, and from chapter 34 of this [book]. Not so, then, not so; but they will have the most certain vision in the most clear Word of God, just as Christ also had here in the way; and Peter [Lombard] evidently testifies, Sentences III, dist. 26, as chapter 34 of this [book] more fully recites. Wherefore the Prophet [says]: "I believe to see the goods of the Lord in the land of the living," Psalm 26. He did not say "to opine," "to estimate," or "to believe," but "to see." It was shown above how much there is between believing and seeing. Those, therefore, who take from the blessed such vision, take away at the same time the reward of faith from the faithful: for it is established that this is the reward of our faith. Wherefore Jesus also said to the Jews who believed in him: "If you remain in me, you shall be truly my disciples, and you shall know the truth," John 8 — as if he said manifestly, "You who now believe enigmatically, if you shall remain in believing, you will at last know most certainly the truth." Which Augustine, expounding, homily 40 of the first part, says thus: "What did you say is not the truth? It is the truth — but it is still believed, not yet seen. If one remains in that which is believed, one comes to that which is seen. Hence John himself the holy Evangelist in his epistle: 'Most beloved,' he says, 'we are the sons of God, and it has not yet appeared what we shall be. We are now, and we shall yet be: what more shall we be than we are? Hear: it has not yet appeared what we shall be; we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him.' Whence? 'Since we shall see him as he is.' A great promise — but it is the reward of faith." Who also in City of God, last [book] 28: "It must be considered," he says, "what a great man said: 'In part we know and in part we prophesy, until that which is perfect shall come; and we see now through a glass in an enigma, but then face to face.' So now the holy angels see, and as they see there, so we shall see. The vision is reserved as our reward, and faith is preserved for us in this vision."

The blessed too, who here humbly believed God to be one and triune, if they shall not see this clearly and certainly in heaven, how will this faith be worthily and fully remunerated? Or if they shall see this clearly and certainly, as they thirstingly desire, in what? Certainly not sufficiently in any creature: for no creature can show this clearly and certainly as it is, on account of its infinite dissimilarity. If, however, they shall see this clearly and certainly, and read and know in the Word of God, in the book of life, in the clear essence of God; why not also other true complex [propositions] similarly, since this true complex is seen as the highest, most excellent, and most difficult of all things written there? How also can the blessed not see in that most clear and most certain book of God, and read most clearly and most certainly any true complex [proposition] most clearly and most certainly written there? Why, I ask, can he not — especially since the eyes of his heart have been fully cleansed and made perfect in every way; since also now with his weak and infirm eyes he can see and read such things in other obscure books, less visible and very much less legible? If you say [it is] on account of the excessive excellence of that book over the eye of the angelic and human mind, this is reprov'd above. How also can the blessed there see and read most well that God is one and triune, which seems most excellent of those things written there, and the other inferior things he cannot? How also, just as you yourself concede, notwithstanding this maximum excellence, can the blessed there see and read any incomplex things, and yet not complex ones?

In this you seem indeed to make the blessed similar to a boy knowing simple letters but not knowing how to make from them syllables or a syllable; or knowing syllables, but not knowing how to join them into words or a word; or knowing how to read words, but not knowing how to understand orations or an oration. Indeed — what seems much harder — never able to learn any of these things. How, however, can anyone endowed with the highest ingenuity, seeing, reading, and understanding in some book the individual words and individual incomplex [items], not be able to see, read, and understand in the same book any proposition and any oration whatever — indeed not even any most easy in understanding? How then will the blessed not so see, read, and understand in the book of divine knowledge any complex [things], just as incomplex ones? Not so, then, not so. For so does not blessed Augustine, cited above, feel, who says that there will be for the Blessed an assiduous reading of the book of life. Who also in Sermon 20 on the Words of the Apostle, speaking of the time of the way and of the homeland: "Now," he says, "we walk by faith; then by species. What is 'by species'? 'Beautiful in form before the sons of men,' since 'in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and God was the Word.' 'He who loves me,' he says, 'keeps my commandments; and he who loves me will be loved by my Father, and I will love him.' And what will you give him? 'And I will show myself to him.' This will be the species, when he does what he said: 'And I will show myself to him.' There you will see the equity of God; there without a codex you will read in the Word. Therefore when we shall see him as he is, our pilgrimage will then pass over. 'Without a codex,' he says, 'you will read'; 'without a codex,' I say, the creator in the uncreated codex, in the eternal book of the eternal knowledge of God. And it follows: 'The way is to believe; let us hold this way, and we shall come to the species; when we shall come to the species, we shall see the equity of God; and there it will not be there to say, "Why did he help this one, and not this one? Why has this one been led by the governance of God to be baptized, but that one, although he lived well as a catechumen, has died by sudden ruin and not come to baptism; but that one, although he lived wickedly — luxurious, an adulterer, a stage-actor, a hunter — fell sick, was baptized, departed: in him sin was joined, in him sin was deleted? Why will you find no merits, except punishment? Why grace?' 'O the depth of the riches!' Peter denies, the thief believes. 'O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God!'"

In a similar way, just as it has been argued concerning the book, it can be argued concerning the Word: for how can the blessed not hear and know true complex [propositions] in the Word, and through the Word of God — in whom and through whom all true things are most truly, most distinctly, and most certainly expressed, and the truest and most certain reasons of all true things? And who will presume to say so most eloquent a Word [to be] mute? Who would presume this, except a deaf man? And who would dare to say that the Word of the Lord in no way expresses, nor can express, any true complex [propositions], but only incomplex ones? Or if he expresses true complex [propositions], yet [say] that the creature cannot hear or understand in that Word true complex [propositions], but only incomplex ones — nor [say] that the omnipotent Word can through himself express to the creature true complex [propositions], just as incomplex, orations just as words? Who, I ask, would presume to affirm this, except perhaps one spiritually deaf, who has ears and will not hear the Word of God? Not so the Prophet, not so; but he says: "I will hear what the Lord God will speak in me," Psalm 84. Upon which Augustine: "God was speaking within him," he says, "and the world was making a clamor for him outside. Holding back, then, somewhat from the noise of the world, and turning himself to himself, and from himself to him whose voice he heard within, stopping his ear against the tumultuous unquietness of this life, and against a soul weighed down by a corruptible body, and a sense thinking many things, depressed by an earthly habitation, he said, 'I will hear what the Lord God will speak in me'; and he heard. What? 'For he will speak peace to his people'; and having shown that that peace will not be perfect in the present, but in the future, concluding he says thus: "There will then be peace, purged in the sons of God, all loving themselves, seeing themselves full of God, when God will be all in all. We shall have a common spectacle — God; a common possession, a common peace we shall have — God. For whatever it is that he himself now gives us, he himself will be for us instead of all things, who gives — that itself will be the perfect and full peace; this he speaks to his people, this he wished to hear who said, 'I will hear what the Lord God will speak in me, since he will speak peace to his people.'"

Who also City of God, last [book] 29: "How great will be that felicity, where there will be no evil, no good will lie hidden? There will be leisure for the praises of God, who will be all in all. I am also admonished by the holy Canticle, where I read or hear, 'Blessed are they who dwell in your house, O Lord; into ages of ages they shall praise you, all those.' Now the strings of the corporeal harmony lie hidden; they will not lie hidden, internally and externally disposed throughout all the parts of the body; and with the other things, which there will seem great and wondrous, rational minds will be kindled in the praise of so great an artificer, by the delight of rational beauty. There true glory, true honor, true peace, where no one will suffer anything adverse either from himself or from anyone. The reward of virtue will be he himself, who gave virtue, and to it has promised himself — than which nothing better or greater can be. For what else is it that he said through the Prophet, 'I [will be] their God, and they shall be the people for me,' except 'I will be the source whence they shall be satisfied; I will be whatever things are honorably desired by all — both life, and salvation, and food, and abundance, and glory, and honor, and peace, and all goods'? For thus also that is rightly understood which the Apostle says, 'that God may be all in all.' He himself will be the end of our desires, who will be seen without end, loved without satiety, praised without fatigue. This gift, this affection, this act will assuredly be for all, just as eternal life itself [is] common."

Nor must it be thought that to hear, to see with the mind, and to read in consummated beatitude are really diverse, as it seems from the authority cited above; indeed perhaps perfect beatitude does not have parts really differing. For either some of those parts would be perfect and sufficient for beatifying — and then that one alone would suffice — or any of them would be imperfect; and how then would perfect beatitude result from such imperfect parts, especially when all those parts are finite in number and in power? What also could be the perfect beatitude of an angel or man on this side of God, since he is the end of both? Wherefore Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy 3, prose 10, by way of dialogue between Philosophy and himself, proves diffusely and expressly holds that human beatitude is the highest good, wherefore also God — indeed even divinity itself.

With whom Anselm concordantly, Monologion 70: "If the rational creature, which is useless to itself without the persevering love of God, so eminently surpasses all creatures, certainly nothing can be the reward of this love except that which super-eminently surpasses all natures. For the same good which demands so to be loved is no less compelled to be desired by the lover. For who so loves justice, truth, beatitude, incorruptibility, that he does not seek to enjoy them? What then will the highest goodness recompense to one loving and desiring it, except itself? For whatever else it should recompense, it does not recompense, since it neither is compensated to the love, nor consoles the lover, nor satisfies the one desiring. Or if it wishes to be loved and desired in order to recompense something else, it does not wish to be loved and desired for its own sake, but for the sake of another; and so it does not wish itself to be loved, but another — which is unspeakable to think. Nothing therefore is more true than that every rational soul, if as it ought, it should study by loving to desire the highest beatitude, at some time will perceive that to be enjoyed, so that what it now sees as through a glass and in an enigma, then it will see face to face. To doubt whether it shall enjoy that without end is most foolish, since enjoying it neither will it be able to be tortured by fear, nor deceived by fallacious security."

With whom also concordantly Augustine in the Sentences of Prosper 20: "With this affection," he says, "is God to be worshiped, that the worship itself be its own reward. For he who worships God in order to obtain another rather than himself, does not worship God, but that which he covets to obtain." Boethius too where above [says]: "Since by obtaining beatitude men are made blessed, and beatitude truly is divinity itself, it is manifest that they are made blessed by obtaining divinity. But just as men are made just by obtaining justice, wise by obtaining wisdom, so by obtaining divinity it is necessary by similar reasoning that they be made gods. Every blessed therefore is a god, but indeed by nature one — by participation, however, nothing prohibits that there be very many." And further he shows that those things which seem diverse to be contained in beatitude — say, sufficiency, power, reverence, clarity, pleasure, and other such things — are one and the same, and that all these goods are situated in the substance of the highest good, in the very substance of God.

With whom also concordantly Augustine on Psalm 84, "Your salvation give to us," understanding by 'salvation' Christ: "Already," he says, "you have given us your Christ. Yet still let us say to him, 'Give us your Christ' — since we say to him, 'Our daily bread give us today.' And what is our bread except he who said, 'I am the living bread who came down from heaven'? Let us say to him, 'Give us your Christ.' For he gave us Christ, but a man, whom we know; whom he gave us as a man, that very one he is to give us as God. For to men he gave a man, since he gave such a one to men as could be received by men: for no one of men could receive God as Christ. He was made a man for men: he saved himself for the gods. Or perhaps did I speak arrogantly? Truly arrogantly, unless he himself had said, 'I have said, you are gods, and all sons of the Most High.'" Who also on Psalm 35, "They shall be inebriated with the abundance of your house": "When that ineffable joy has been received," he says, "the human mind somehow perishes, and is made divine, and is inebriated with the abundance of the house of God." And further, on "Since with you is the fountain of life," etc.: "Here," he says, "the fountain is one thing, the light another; there not so: for what is the fountain, this is also the light, and whatever else you call it, since it is not what you call, since you cannot find a congruent name. It does not remain in one name. If you should say that it is only light, it would be said to you: 'In vain therefore was it said to me that I should hunger and thirst. For who is there who eats that light?' Plainly rightly was it said to me: 'Blessed [are] the pure in heart, since they shall see God.' If it is light, let me prepare my eyes; let me prepare my mouth, since that which is light is also a fountain — a fountain which satisfies the thirsty, a light which illumines the blind."

Who also on John, part 2, homily 45 [or 99 of the whole], treating that of John 16 which the Lord said about the Holy Spirit, "For he will not speak from himself, but whatever he will hear he will speak," says: "In that incorporeal and immutable nature, to hear and to see is the same. For when it is said 'to know,' there are all of them — and to see, and to hear, and to smell, and to taste, and to touch. Nor wonder that the ineffable knowledge of God, by which he knows all things, through various modes of human speech is called by the names of all of these corporeal senses; since even our mind itself — that is, the inner man — to which knowing uniformly through these five corporeal messengers diverse things are reported, when it understands the immutable truth, chooses, loves, sees the light of which is said, 'It was the true light,' and hears the word of which is said, 'In the beginning was the Word,' and takes the odor of which is said, 'After the odor of your ointments we run,' and drinks the fountain of which is said, 'With you is the fountain of life,' and enjoys by touch of which is said, 'But for me to adhere to God is good' — nor [are these] another and another, but one intelligence is called by so many names of senses." Which also the words of Hugh recited above attest.

Those, therefore, who strive to assert the contrary of this, strive to deprive the blessed not only of the perfection of sight and hearing, but also of all senses, and of all spiritual powers of their mind, and the greatest sweetness, and highest delights of that great supper, of that heavenly banquet prepared for all the blessed. They attempt furthermore, like tenacious dispensers, to contract the liberal hand of the Lord, and to curtail his infinite power, and to put the infinite abundance of his magnificence under a measure, and constrict it under a small measure.

Who also, having even slightly entered the threshold of theological discipline, would be ignorant of the common distinction between morning and evening cognition, or daily and nocturnal? And [the fact] that morning cognition is the cognition of things in the Word, and evening cognition the cognition of things in the proper genus? For this distinction is held among Doctors and disciples so commonly that it scarcely needs founding. Yet, by way of abundance, behold blessed Augustine, who in On Genesis Literally 4.27, and afterward, diffusely and perspicuously hands it down, and says that the angels knew the things to be done in the Word, and [things] done in the proper genus, and calls the first cognition "morning" and "day"; the second, "evening" and "night," on account of the excellence of clarity of this over that. Where also in 29 he says thus: "Much indeed is between the cognition of some thing in the Word of God, and the cognition of it in its nature, so that the former deservedly pertains to day, the latter to evening. For in comparison with that light which is beheld in the Word of God, all cognition by which we know any creature in itself can deservedly be called night — which again differs so much from the error or ignorance of those who do not even know the creature itself, that in comparison with it, it can not incongruously be called day; which yet day, except again in comparison with that day, two coequal to angels — we shall see God as he is, he himself also would be night — would not need here the lamp of prophecy. Whence the Apostle Peter says: 'We have a more certain prophetic word, to which you do well to attend as to a lamp [shining] in a dark place, until day shines forth and the day-star arises in your hearts.' Wherefore, since the holy angels — to whom we shall be made coequal after the resurrection if we hold the way which Christ has been made for us until the end — always see the face of God, and enjoy his only-begotten Son, the Word, equal to the Father, in whom first of all wisdom was created — they doubtless first knew the entire creation, in which they themselves are principally established, in the very Word of God, in whom are the eternal reasons of all even things temporally made, as in him through whom all things have been made; and then in the very creature which they thus knew, as it were looking down on it as something below, and referring it to the praise of him in whose immutable truth the reasons according to which it was made are principally seen."

And further, 32, he writes thus: "Nor let anyone judge that what I have said about spiritual light, and about the day created in the spiritual and angelic creature, and about the contemplation which it has in the Word of God, and about the cognition by which the creature is known in itself, and its referral to the praise of immutable truth, where the reason of the thing to be made was first seen — which when known was made — does not now properly, but as it were figuratively and allegorically agree to understanding day and evening and morning, but otherwise indeed than in this custom of daily light of this corporeal kind, yet not as if here properly, there figuratively. For where the better and more certain [day is], there is also a truer day. Why then not also a truer evening, and a truer morning?" And further, 35: "The angelic mind, by pure charity adhering to the Word of God, after by that order it has been created so that it precedes other things, first saw them as to be made in the Word of God before they were made, and so first they were coming into being in its cognition, when God said that they should come to be, [rather] than in their own proper nature; which likewise, having been made, it knew also in themselves, with a lesser knowledge — which has been called evening." The aforesaid sentence very many authorities also attest.

Does not Averroes seem to feel this on Metaphysics 12, comm. 18, when he says thus: "We have already searched out concerning these two opinions in the book On the Soul, and we have said that the agent intelligence is as it were a form in the material intellect, and that it makes the things-understood, and receives them according to the material intellect; and that the material intellect is not generable and corruptible, and we declared there that this is the opinion of Aristotle; and that the intellect-in-habit has a generable part and a corruptible part. That, however, which is corrupted is its action; in itself, however, it is not corrupted, and it enters us from within. And if the action of that intellect, insofar as it is copulated with the material intellect, were not generable, then its action would be its substance, and it would not have necessity, in this action, to be copulated with the material intellect. But when it has been copulated with the material intellect through action, its action insofar as it is copulated with it will be an action other than its substance. And it was that which acts, a substance — and is for another, not for itself. And therefore it is possible that something eternal understand something generable and corruptible. If, then, the intellect should be denuded, at human perfection, from potency, it is necessary that this action, which is other than it, be destroyed by it; and then either we shall not understand at all by this intellect, or we shall understand according as the action is its substance — and it is impossible that in some hour we not understand by it. It will remain, then, when this intellect has been denuded from potency, that we understand by it according as the action is its substance — and this is the ultimate prosperity."

The Philosopher too, Metaphysics 12.38, having somewhat described the first principle of things, so concludes: "On such a principle, then, depends heaven and nature. For such a deduction the best is for us for a small time; for thus indeed always is that." Upon which Averroes: "From this," he says, "it appears well that Aristotle opines that the fortune of men, in that they are men, is none except through the continuation of them with the intellect, which has been declared in the book On the Soul to be the active and moving principle in us. The abstract intelligences ought to be principles of those things of which they are principles in two ways: namely, as movers, and as ends. For the agent intelligence, insofar as it is abstract and a principle to us, must necessarily move us according as the loved [moves] the lover. And if every motion must necessarily be continued with that from which it is, according to its end, it is necessary that finally we be continued with this abstract intellect, so that we shall be dependent on such a principle on which heaven depends — although this be in us for a small time, as Aristotle said." Aristotle, that is, and Averroes posit that felicity is possible for man in the present life, and this for a small time near the end.

Does not the Lord himself teach this when he says: "If there shall be a prophet of the Lord among you, in vision I shall appear to him, or through sleep I shall speak to him. But not such my servant Moses, who in all my house is faithful: for mouth to mouth I shall speak to him, and openly, not through enigmas and figures he sees God," Numbers 12 — and elsewhere: "Their angels always see the face of my Father," Matthew 18? Does not his Evangelist Mark teach this when he says: "Which immediately known, Jesus in the Holy Spirit, that they were so thinking within themselves, says to them," and the rest, Mark 2? If, then, Jesus knew that in the Holy Spirit, why not also other things? Does not his Apostle Paul teach this when he says: "I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord. I know a man in Christ fourteen years ago — whether in the body, or out of the body, I do not know, God knows — caught up of this kind to the third heaven," and further: "that he was caught up into paradise, and heard secret words," 2 Corinthians 12? Do not these and many similar [things] insinuate the aforesaid sentence?

Hear blessed Augustine, On Genesis Literally 12, disputing about the rapture of Paul, and about the third heaven, and understanding by three heavens three kinds of visions — namely, corporeal, spiritual, and intellectual — and positing the difference between these, that in corporeal and spiritual vision there can be fallacy, in intellectual not at all. Where after he has shown in 49 the manner of fallacy both in corporeal and in spiritual vision, in 50 he consequently subjoins: "But truly in those intellectual seen things the soul is not deceived: for either it understands, and it is true, or if it is not true, it does not understand."

And further, 52, intimating a double mode of rapture — one from the senses of the body to the likenesses of bodies and to spiritual vision, the other from such likenesses and from spiritual vision to intellectual vision — says thus: "Further, if as someone is rapt from the senses of the body that he may be in those likenesses of bodies which [are seen without] spirit, so also he be rapt from these, that he may be conveyed to that as it were region of intellectual or intelligible things, where without any likeness of body the perspicuous truth is discerned, obscured by no clouds of false opinions — where the virtues of the soul are not laborious and toilsome; there is one and total virtue, to love what you see, and the highest felicity, to have what you love. For there the blessed life is drunk in its fountain. To obtain this, where there will be secure rest and ineffable vision of truth, is the labor undertaken from the temptations of the world to be contained — there is the clarity of the Lord seen, not through a vision signifying — whether corporeal, as it was seen on Mount Sinai, or spiritual, as Isaiah saw, or John in the Apocalypse — but through species, not through enigmas, as much as the human mind can grasp it, according to the grace of the assuming God, that mouth to mouth God may speak to him whom he has made worthy of such colloquy — not the mouth of the body, but of the mind." Where also in 53 he so adjoins: "Thus I judge must be understood what is written about Moses. He had desired, as we read in Exodus, to see God — not indeed as he had seen on the mountain, nor as he saw in the tabernacle, but in that substance by which God is, with no corporeal creature assumed, which is presented to the senses of mortal flesh, nor in spirit by likenesses of bodies figured, but through his own species, as much as the rational and intellectual creature can grasp it, called back from every sense of the body, from every significative enigma of the spirit. For thus it is written: 'If, then, I have found grace in your sight, show me yourself manifestly that I may see you,' since a little above one reads, 'And the Lord spoke to Moses face to face, as a friend speaks to his friend.' He felt, therefore, what he saw, and what he did not see he desired. For also a little after, when God said to him, 'For you have found grace in my sight, and I know you above all,' he answered him, 'Show me your clarity'; and then indeed he received an answer figured from the Lord, about which it would be long to dispute, when he said to him, 'You shall not be able to see my face and live: for man shall not see my face and live.' Yet unless Moses had merited to see the desired and longed-for clarity of God, God would not in the book of Numbers say to Aaron and Miriam his brothers and sisters: 'Hear my words. If there shall be a prophet among you, in vision the Lord will be known to him, and in sleep I shall speak to him; not so in any way my servant Moses — in all my house he is faithful: mouth to mouth I shall speak to him, in species, and not through enigmas, and he sees the clarity of the Lord.' Nor is this to be understood according to the substance of the body, which is presented to the senses of the flesh." And it follows, 54: "In that mode, then, in that species by which God is, far ineffably more secretly and presently he speaks with an ineffable speech, where no one seeing him will live this life: since you live mortally in these senses of the body. But unless someone in some way die from this life — whether wholly going out of the body, or so turned away and alienated from the carnal senses that he deservedly does not know, as the Apostle says, whether in the body or outside the body he is — when he is rapt and conveyed to that vision."

And it follows, 55: "Wherefore, if this third kind of vision, which is superior in every corporeal and spiritual vision, the Apostle has called the third heaven — in this is seen the clarity of God, for the seeing of which hearts are cleansed: whence it is said, 'Blessed are the pure in heart, since they shall see God,' not through any corporeally or spiritually figured signification, as through a glass in an enigma, but face to face — which is said about Moses, 'mouth to mouth' — namely through the species by which God is whatever he is, however much the mind, which is not what he is, even cleansed from every earthly stain, alienated and arrested from every body and likeness of body, can grasp him: from whom — that is, God — we are pilgrims, weighed down by a mortal and corruptible burden, as long as we walk by faith, not by species. Why, however, should we not believe, that to so great an Apostle, Doctor of the Gentiles, rapt up to this most exalted vision, God wished to demonstrate that life in which after this life it is to be seen for eternity? And why is this not said to be Paradise, except that one in which Adam corporeally lived?"

Who also, On Genesis Literally 8.34: "Most certainly we ought to hold," he says, "that God either speaks through his substance, or through a creature subject to him; but through his substance he does not speak, except for creating all natures; to spiritual and intellectual ones, however, not only for creating, but also for illuminating, when they can already grasp his speech, such as is in his Word — which 'in the beginning was with God, and God was the Word, through whom all things were made'; to those, however, who cannot grasp it, when God speaks, he speaks only through a creature, either only spiritual — whether in dreams or in ecstasy, in the likeness of corporeal things — or even through bodily [creatures], when to the senses of the body either some species appears or voices sound." And in City of God 10.14 he says thus: "It pleased divine providence to ordain the course of the times, that the law might be given in the edicts of angels concerning the worship of the one true God; in which the person also of God himself indeed not through his substance — which always remains invisible to corruptible eyes — but through certain signs, by a creature subject to the Creator, was visibly to appear, and by transitory little intervals of times to speak in the voices of human language syllable by syllable — which in its own nature speaks neither corporeally but spiritually, nor sensibly but intelligibly, nor temporally but, so to speak, eternally; nor does it begin or cease to speak — which with him more sincerely they hear not the ears of the body, but of the mind — his ministers and messengers, who in his immutable truth enjoy [him], immortally blessed."

Gregory too, Moralia 28.2: "It must be known," he says, "that divine speech is distinguished in two ways. For either the Lord speaks through himself, or through an angelic creature his words are formed for us." And further, 3: "Since hearing does not at one time grasp all things which are said to it — being one which perceives both the matters through words, and the words particularly through syllables; but our sight, in that it directs itself, grasps the whole suddenly and at once — the speech of God made to us inwardly is rather seen than heard, since while it insinuates itself without delay of speech, with a sudden light it illumines the darkness of our ignorance: whence also Baruch the son of Neriah, when asked, expounded how he had heard the words of the prophesying Jeremiah, said: 'From his mouth he was speaking as one reading, and I was writing.' For he who speaks while reading intends one thing and produces the word in another, since what he sees he says. The prophets of God, therefore, since they see his words rather in the heart than hear them, as it were speak as readers; but when through an angel the Lord indicates his will, sometimes he demonstrates it by words, sometimes by things, sometimes simultaneously by words and things, sometimes by images shown to the eyes of the heart, sometimes by images even before bodily eyes for a time taken from the air, sometimes by heavenly substances, sometimes by earthly, sometimes simultaneously by earthly and heavenly; sometimes, indeed, even through an angel, God so speaks to human hearts that the angel himself also is presented to the gaze of the mind."

Who also, Moralia 18.33, on Job 28, "Whence then comes wisdom, and what is the place of understanding? It is hidden from the eyes of all the living": "As long," he says, "as one lives mortally here, God can be seen through certain images, but through the very species of his nature he cannot — so that the soul, breathed upon by the grace of the Spirit, sees God through certain figures, but does not reach to the very force of his essence. Hence it is that Jacob, who testifies that he saw God, did not see anything but an angel; hence it is that Moses, who 'speaks face to face with God, as a man is wont to speak with his friend,' says to him in the very words of his speech, 'If I have found grace in your sight, show me yourself manifestly that I may see you.' For certainly, if it was not God with whom he was speaking, he would say 'Show me God,' and not 'show me yourself'; if, however, it was God with whom he spoke face to face, why was he asking to see whom he was seeing? But from this his petition it is gathered that, since he was thirsting to discern through the clarity of his uncircumscribed nature him whom he had begun to see through certain images, that thus the supernal essence might be present to the eyes of his mind, no created image might temporally interpose for him to the vision of eternity."

And further, 34: "It must be known," he says, "that there were some who said that God even in that region of beatitude is beheld indeed in his clarity, but is not seen in his nature — whom indeed a lesser subtlety of inquiry deceived. For to that simple and immutable essence clarity is not one thing, nature another; but the very nature is its clarity, and the very clarity is nature. For that the wisdom of God will at some time show itself to its lovers, he himself promises, saying: 'He who loves me will be loved by my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him' — as if he plainly said, 'You who behold me in your [nature], it remains that you see me in my nature.' Hence again he says, 'Blessed are the pure in heart, since they shall see God.' Whence Paul says, 'Now we see through a glass in an enigma, then face to face. Now I know in part, then I shall know as I am known.'" And above the same: "The fathers of the Old Testament saw the Lord, and yet, according to the voice of John, 'No one has ever seen God,' and according to the sentence of blessed Job, 'Wisdom, which is God, is hidden from the eyes of all the living' — that is, of those existing in this mortal flesh: and he could be seen through certain circumscribed images, and could not be seen through the uncircumscribed light of eternity. But if by some still living in this corruptible flesh, yet growing in inestimable virtue, the eternal clarity of God can be seen by some keenness of contemplation — this also does not abhor from the sentence of blessed Job, who says, 'It is hidden from the eyes of all the living.' For whoever sees the wisdom which is God, dies utterly to this life, lest now he be held by its love. For no one sees it who still lives carnally, since no one can embrace God and the world at the same time. For he who sees God, by that very thing dies, by which either by intention of heart or by effect of work he is wholly separated by mind from the delights of this life. Whence also to the same Moses it is said: 'For man shall not see me and live.'"

The same sentence all the Catholic Doctors seem concordantly to attest, and the general faith of the Church.

CHAPTER XLI

HE RECITES THE DIVERSE MODES ACCORDING TO DIVERSE WRITERS OF SEEING IN THE WORD; HE RAISES AN OBJECTION AND ANSWERS IT.

Since indeed it has been shown that true complex propositions can be revealed to a rational creature in the Word and in the very essence of God, it remains consequently to inquire concerning the mode of that revelation — namely, in what way such things are able to be revealed there. For the easier knowledge of which it seems first that we must inquire how incomplex things are revealed in the Word and in the divine essence to a creature, and so to proceed thence in order to complex things. For in these matters, as in those, diverse modes are assigned diversely by diverse writers. For some think that in all such things revealed and seen, the Word of God supplies the place both of habit and of created act, and is both the habit and the act of the seeing creature. Others judge that the Word in all such things supplies the place of species or habit, but not of act — indeed that the creature, by a created act of seeing, sees what the Word, as species, habit, or idea, presents to it; and these are further divided in three ways. For these maintain that the creature distinctly sees individual things, whether incomplex or complex, which it sees in the Word, by a single created beatific supernatural act, presenting individual things distinctly and immediately and supernaturally. Those, however, hold that by one created act it sees all incomplex things in the Word, and by another created act all the complex things which it sees. These others maintain that it sees the individual incomplex and complex things which it sees in the Word by created acts, individual and distinct, corresponding to the individual things seen. Now any pathway of this tripartite sect splits into two trails as regards the number of visible things or things seen: for these hold that the creature can simultaneously see in the Word an infinite number distinctly; those, however, only a finite number.

Now further pursuing the foregoing division, others are of the opinion that the Word does not supply the place of species, habit, or act, but that whatever incomplex or complex thing the creature sees in the Word, it sees through a created species, habit, and act — through a species, I say, or habit mediating between the Word and the act of seeing — and yet that these are said to be seen in the Word, just as material things seen are said to be seen in the Sun or in material light, because the Word, as it were a kind of spiritual Sun and light, illuminates these things and disposes them so that they are able thus to be seen. And these have a triple sect on the side of such habit, just as the former had on the side of act. For some affirm that by a single habit all incomplex and complex things seen there are seen; others, that the incomplex are seen through one habit and the complex through another; others again, that individual incomplex and complex things seen are seen through individual habits, proper and distinct. And further still, all these are divided in two ways through infinite and finite as regards the multitude of visible things or things seen, just as the former, all of whom hold opinions concerning acts corresponding to habits.

Furthermore, there are still others who mediate, who say that all incomplex things which are seen in the Word are seen through the very Word itself, with no creature, no species, habit, or act mediating, as the first opinion says, but whatever complex things [are seen] are seen through some mediating creature; and these, like the former, are separated in many ways. And still further, beyond these mediators, there are others who strive to mediate among the latter sects, saying that all incomplex things which are seen in the Word are seen through a created act mediating between the seeing creature and the Word, but not through any mediating habit or species, but the Word itself supplies the place of every such species and habit; the complex things, however, which are there seen, they say are seen by the mediation both of habit and of created act: by a created habit, I say, mediating between the Word and the act of seeing, and by a created act mediating between such habit and the seer, and both mediating between the seer and the Word. All of whom moreover, like the former, can be divided in two ways as regards the number of things seen in the Word, namely through infinite and finite.

But which of these modes is the truer, and the more fitting to philosophical and theological discipline, I leave to the diligence of scholars to investigate; for this perhaps in this place would seem irrelevant, or to some seem more laborious than the proposed task, and because I hasten to other matters along the path I have begun. First, however, I shall briefly touch here upon the reasons of the opponents. Among all their reasons there are two upon which they chiefly rely: one proceeding through distinction, the other through necessity. The first is this: If the creature distinctly saw in the Word that the Antichrist would be, or that the Antichrist will be contrary to Christ, or any such true complex proposition whatever, it would distinctly see the extremes of such a proposition or true complex proposition; and not by the same act, because by the same act precisely it would in no way distinguish or discern between them; and that act also would be purely equivocal, and the same proposition would be true and false, with other inconveniences which are easily seen as following from these. Their second reason is this: If anything future contingent were revealed to a creature in the Word, it would necessarily come to pass — which they argue by reasonings of the kind which the prior chapters above brought forward against earlier responses.

But the first reason does not proceed. For thus they could argue that the Father could not see such true complex propositions in the Word or in His essence, nor reveal them to the Son or to the Holy Spirit — against the sixth and seventh, the eighteenth and nineteenth chapters of Book I, and the thirty-fourth of this book. God also, by His most unitary and most simple but most infinite power, sees all things most distinctly, as is plain from the seventh of the first; why therefore, according to the prior premises of this book, if He should mercifully and omnipotently — though ineffably — accommodate the eye of His power to a disposed creature, can it not also itself see in like manner in some way, not by its own power but by the divine? Does not also a creature, knowing or believing in its proper kind any true complex proposition whatever, any proposition whatever having extremes however diverse, do this through a single simple act of knowing or believing? Why therefore can it not similarly through one simple act see in the Word any true complex proposition, especially since the Word incomparably more simply expresses any true complex proposition than any proposition, than any habit, than any creature?

The second reason similarly does not conclude. For if, because a future contingent is revealed to a creature in the Word, therefore of necessity it will come to pass, why not similarly because it is revealed to the Son and to the Holy Spirit in the Word and in the essence of God, as is plain from the thirty-fourth of this book? They will perhaps say, because the revelation made to the Son can be not, and not have been, made to Him; but to a creature, in no way. But if the revelation about a future contingent made to the Son, with the thing existing as future, can be not, and never have been, made to Him; it can similarly with the thing existing as present, or transferred into the past — or if then it cannot or could not, neither could it ever, nor can it now, as can be made plain from the thirtieth and thirty-first of this book. Also, if from the revelation to a creature in the Word the necessity of the revealed thing follows, why does it not similarly follow from the revelation in its proper kind?

Now although I have run through the modes of seeing in the Word with such lightness, it does no harm at least to have briefly touched upon them. And although anyone may not at once be able to see fully the mode of seeing in the Word, let him not on that account at once recoil as if disbelieving in the vision. For we see and know most certainly many marvelous things, and many things also we hold by most certain faith, the mode of which in our present blindness we are not able perfectly to comprehend. But we shall comprehend perfectly both the thing and the mode when "that which is in part has been done away, when that which is perfect has come, when we shall know even as we are known, when we shall see face to face" — even as the Word itself most truly is, the brightness of eternal light, the spotless mirror of the divine majesty, and the image of His goodness, in which all things and all modes are most perfectly displayed.

CHAPTER XLII

HE STILL FURTHER REDUCES THE THIRTY-THIRD OPINION AND ITS HYPOTHESIS BY WAY OF REVELATION IN THE PROPER KIND; AND FIRST OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST, AND HE RECITES ONE RESPONSE WHICH SAYS THAT CHRIST COULD BE DECEIVED, AND HE REFUTES IT.

The infirmity of the principal hypothesis having been uncovered by way of revelation in the Word, it remains consequently to uncover it by way of revelation in the proper kind; and first in the Lord Jesus Christ, then in pure creatures, namely the Angels and human beings who are His servants. Let it therefore be supposed that A. — the future, namely the salvation of Paul still surviving as a wayfarer — was distinctly revealed to Christ in the proper kind, and that He likewise believed it; and according to the hypothesis it is possible that Paul not be saved; therefore it is also possible that this was not revealed to Christ, nor that He believed it. For necessarily it follows: Paul will not be saved, therefore this was never revealed to Christ nor believed by Christ; and the antecedent is possible according to the hypothesis, therefore so also is the consequent — which the hypothesis nevertheless denies. Or let it be argued from the contrary side: It is necessary that this was revealed to Christ and believed by Him; therefore it is necessary that Paul be saved. For necessarily it follows: this was revealed to Christ and believed by Him, therefore it will be; if it will not be, neither was it; and the antecedent is necessary, therefore also the consequent.

Here the answer is given in many ways. For some say that it is necessary that Christ in the proper kind received such a proposition, Paul was to be saved; but it is not necessary that it was a revelation, or revealed, because it is not necessary that it was true — indeed, it is possible that it was false. And if it be argued further, and it is necessary that Christ believed this, therefore it is possible that Christ believed something false and was deceived — certainly even this they do not fear consequently to concede in answering. It is wonderful, however, with what brow any Christian would presume to concede this concerning his God and Lord Christ, since no Jew, Saracen, or Gentile of any sort would dare so great an irreverence or rather blasphemy against his god. For who would wish to have such a god, whom any fool and wretch could most easily deceive all day long? If also Christ could be deceived and err, it would be possible that the highest truth were false, and the highest wisdom were beguiled.

And if anyone should still presume to answer that in Christ there are two natures, namely divine and human, and that according to the divine He cannot be deceived or err, but according to the human; let it then be supposed that He is so deceived, falsely believing A. to be B. Then Christ believes in particular and in act that A. is B., and firmly believes and knows it to be true that A. is B., because Christ is God, since He truly knows in particular and in act all true things, as the sixth and seventh of the first teach. Therefore Christ in particular and in act, under His most proper form, believes both contradictories simultaneously — which is a manifest impossibility. For how can anyone most certainly believe in particular and in act, under its most proper form, something to be true, which by the same modes he most certainly knows to be false? Hence the Philosopher in Posterior Analytics II (in that chapter, It happens however sometimes), determining concerning the false of opinion, of the possible and the impossible, shows that someone can simultaneously hold opposite opinions — namely, one in the universal, the other in the particular; one in act, the other not in act; one in proper form, the other indeed outside; in particular, however, and in act, and in proper form, in no way.

Item, if anyone could thus, as Christ, know some consequence to be good, and believe the antecedent in particular and in act under its proper form, and yet not believe the consequent — indeed, most certainly know in the said modes the consequent to be false — this makes the whole of logic foolish and weakens it; and it is against the Philosopher in the same place. For let it be supposed that Christ according to His human intellect falsely believes A. to be true; and by the sixth of the first He believes and most certainly knows that A. is not true, and knows that this consequence is good: A. is true, and A. is not true; therefore the not-true is true; or therefore the same is true and not true. And He believes the whole antecedent because He believes both its parts, and He does not believe the consequent in any way; nay, according to both natures of His He most certainly knows that consequent to be false. Indeed, it necessarily follows that Christ according to the same nature, namely the human, can simultaneously believe contradictories, and a consequence, and the antecedent with the opposite of the consequent. For if according to the soul He believes a falsehood in the proper kind, simultaneously according to the same He believes or knows the opposite truth in the Word — especially concerning a thing specially concerning Himself; or at least concerning the omnipotence of God this is possible, as the things had before in chapter forty of this book teach. This also follows as true not only in Christ God and man, but also in a mere man — namely, by believing in the proper kind one falsehood, and seeing in the Word the opposite truth, as Christ does. According to this, similarly, a man could through a mathematical demonstration know one thing, and through sense-appearance, or through some probable argument, simultaneously believe the opposite — for instance, that the sun or a star is greater and lesser than the earth.

Item, if Christ could be deceived and err, He could have falsely and erroneously preached, and similarly taught — having been a pseudo-Prophet and pseudo-Christ, even Antichrist; which whoever shall concede will leaven the entire Catholic faith with hesitation and excessive suspicion, and will deservedly be convicted as a pseudo-Christian, and as a disciple of Antichrist. Item, if this were possible, it would be consequently possible that Christ deceptively instituted all the Ecclesiastical Sacraments, and that they were always delusive and had no efficacy; therefore men were never saved through them, but always damned, as the thirty-fifth of this book argued more fully. Item, those who presume to concede this veil with the Jews the face of Christ — at least the interior, namely His intellect — with the veil of ignorance, and they strike His head, namely the same intellect, or even the Word of God, His divine nature, with the tongue of blasphemy, saying that He can be deceived and err — and consequently they approve that mocking experiment of the Jews, striking Christ already veiled, and saying, Prophesy unto us, Christ, who is he that struck thee? For if He could believe some falsehood to be true, why could He not have believed that the very one who struck Him had not struck Him at all, and conversely, with His eyes already perfectly veiled? And if falsely, divining erroneously, He had said, This man struck me, and that one did not strike me, with what ridicule of the Jews would He deservedly have lain open? What certain experience they would have had that He was not the Messiah!

Item, let it be supposed that Christ, already veiled and struck, erroneously believed that A. struck Him; either Christ could have said this assertively, or not. If He could have, let it be supposed; either then He was lying properly — namely, going against His mind in so saying — or not. If He was lying properly, this is against what was shown earlier in the thirty-second of the second, and also He spoke only in conformity to His mind. If not, on the contrary He asserted a falsehood knowingly, as is plain through the sixth of the first. If He could not have said this in asserting, then He could not assert what He believed to be true, even if according to that belief He had wished to assert it. Also, if He could not assert that, He could assert its opposite; which if He had done, He would have asserted against His mind, and would have lied.

Item, according to the Philosopher, Metaphysics I and VII, acts and operations are of singulars and supposita; but Christ was suppositated only by a divine supposition, namely of the Word of God, as Peter Lombard, Sentences III, dist. 5, shows by sufficiently firm testimonies. If therefore Christ according to His human nature had erred, the whole suppositum, the Son of God, God, would have erred — and so the highest light would have been darkened, the highest wisdom would have been made foolish, and the highest truth would have been falsified. And this is virtually the reason of Damascene by which he shows that in the soul of Christ there was no deliberation, election, nor ignorance of anything, as the thirty-second of the second alleged more fully.

Anselm in Cur Deus Homo, Book II, chapter 13, shows that Christ according to His human nature has no ignorance of anything, by manifold reason: both because ignorance is useful for nothing; and because He could not have done such great works without immense wisdom; and because men would not have believed Him if they had known Him to be ignorant; and because He loves every good, wherefore also He knows it; and because no one knows the good perfectly except him who knows how to discern it from evil, and no one knows how to make this discrimination who is ignorant of evil — as He will know every good perfectly, so He will be ignorant of no evil. If therefore, according to these, ignorance was not possible in Christ according to His human nature, much more neither deception, nor fallacy, nor error.

Peter [Lombard] also, Sentences III, dist. 13 and 14, shows that Christ according to His soul knows all things; for the showing of which he likewise says that Fulgentius in a certain sermon brought forward many things. Therefore those who, as something contrary to the Christian faith, avoid every ignorance concerning the soul of Christ — would they not much more have shunned every fallacy and error as deadly poison concerning His soul? Let the reason which they adduce be inspected: No one knows anything which his soul is ignorant of; but Christ according to every opinion knows all things; therefore His soul knows all things. If therefore Christ, because God, of necessity knows all things, how shall His soul not only be ignorant of something known, but also estimate the opposite of it? Of Christ also the Apostle says, In whom are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden, Col. 2; but a foolish treasurer would he be, who would exchange the treasure of wisdom and knowledge for foolishness and fallacy.

Item, Augustine on Psalm 21, in the second tractate, treating that word of Christ in Matt. 26, Wheresoever this Gospel shall be preached in the whole world, &c., says, Why then accommodate it to calumniators, namely the Donatists? Either the Lord lied, or he deceived him; let them choose what to say; either let them say that the truth lied, or say that the truth was deceived. Item, if Christ could now be deceived, and could always have been deceived, He can now be wretched and have always been wretched; therefore neither now nor ever before was He blessed — as was shown in chapter 34 of this book — which no one will presume to concede except a wretch. Item, if Christ could be deceived, He would not be certain of His own beatitude, therefore neither fully blessed, as the same chapter 34 teaches.

Item, if Christ could have been deceived in the proper kind, believing Paul to be saved who was not to be saved, He could similarly according to His soul in the proper kind have willed that and prayed the Father for his salvation; therefore He could according to His human will have willed inwardly, and operated outwardly, contrarily to His divine will; and this knowingly, because this man Christ our God knew the divine will to be unwilling of this and willing the opposite of it.

Therefore Christ could have sinned, because He could have done knowingly against the mandate of the Father. For the Father, says Christ, who sent me, He gave me commandment, what I should say and what I should speak, John 12 — which the things shown in the thirty-second of the second by no means allow.

CHAPTER XLIII

HE TREATS ANOTHER RESPONSE.

Now there are others, wishing only to avoid that horror, who say that it is now possible that Christ never believed in the proper kind that Paul was to be saved. But this response falls into Scylla while wishing to avoid Charybdis. For if what Christ believed in the proper kind He could in no way have believed, He could in no way have willed what He likewise willed; therefore also what He did outwardly He could not have done. He could therefore not have prayed, not have spoken, not have walked, not have suffered, nor have redeemed mankind. He could also never have instituted the Ecclesiastical Sacraments, nor have justified or saved anyone — as the series of reasonings in chapters 33 and 35 of this book more fully manifests; all of which plainly destroy the principal hypothesis. Again, then the act of believing or willing of Christ created in the proper kind, present or past, can now not be, nor ever have been — manifestly against the hypothesis.

Furthermore, if Christ according to the man can do this, another mere man like Paul can also, especially since they are of the same nature — at least through the omnipotence of the great God and His co-operation, or special assistance. Therefore Paul the wayfarer, who believed something and willed and did, merited or sinned, can have done none of these things, nor have had operations of this kind — against the principal hypothesis. Further, if it be so, it is possible for Christ to lie, to perjure Himself, and to sin. For let Christ now assert with the firmest oath, without any condition expressed or tacit, as far as He absolutely simply can, that Paul the wayfarer will bear His name before men, or freely will do this or that, or that this or that future thing will contingently come to pass: still according to the hypothesis it is possible that this in no way come to pass; therefore also it is consequently possible that Christ neither knows nor believes it, since by what was shown above in the previous chapter He cannot be deceived or err — indeed, since He always knows all true things, it is possible that He now distinctly knows the opposite of what He now jurally asserts. It is therefore possible that Christ the man now jurally assert against His mind; and so it would be in the free power of the wayfarer to render his Lord God a liar, perjurer, wretched, and infamous — which though in itself is sufficiently absurd and incongruous, was also through what was shown earlier in chapter 30 of the second truly reproved.

CHAPTER XLIV

HE RECITES A THIRD RESPONSE.

To these, however, as to other things, not a few, but more than the hairs of my head, defenders of the old, clamorous, and tumid error — because they refuse to bend their stiff neck under the most sweet yoke of truth — dream up and fabricate countless responses and objections to themselves and contrary to truth: some falsigraphic, some quarrelsome, some sinning in matter, some in form, some in both; many indeed not unwrapping the wrapping of the difficulty, but rather entangling themselves in a more multiplied net; very many of which any friend of truth, advanced even moderately, will easily repress and refute. For the perverse, as Ecclesiastes says, are corrected with difficulty, and the number of fools is infinite. Nor is it strange: for of error there is always a tortuous plurality as companion; but of truth, simple unity. Whence the Philosopher, Metaphysics XIV, 3, says, All things irrational are repugnant both to themselves and to rational things, and the long discourse of Simonides seems to be in them; for the discourse becomes long, just like that of slaves, when they say nothing sound. Hence Proverbs 14: Where words are many, there is frequently want.

These responses, however, not all but the more probable ones, seem rationally to be treated; the emptier ones to be passed over in silence, lest time and study, with useful things omitted, be consumed in vain over empty matters. For the Philosopher says in Physics I, 11, Neither is it fitting to resolve all things, but those by which someone, demonstrating from principles, lies; but those which not, by no means. And in Topics I, To be solicitous about anyone whatsoever offering things contrary to opinion is foolish, or about those of which we have a contrary opinion. Wherefore one ought not to consider every problem, nor every position, but such a one as he who is in want of reason, and not who is in want of punishment or sense, will doubt about. Who also in Metaphysics III, 15: Concerning those who sophistically argue from fables, it is not worthy to attend with study; whence also the Wise Man wisely prohibits answering the fool according to his folly.

One therefore of these responses, which seems to itself probable, asserts that as long as the object believed by Christ, or willed, is future, Christ can not believe nor will it, nor have believed, nor have willed; but when it shall have been present or past, He cannot so. But this will easily be refuted by the reasonings of the thirtieth of this book, since it could assign no cause for this novel necessity, nor posit it without cause. Again, let it be supposed that Christ specially prayed for Paul still surviving as a wayfarer and likewise unbelieving, that he be converted to the faith and convert others by preaching, and be beatified in heaven; and let it be supposed that Christ did other works to the same effect, namely came to him, surrounded him with light, prostrated him, blinded him, and the like, as the history in Acts 9 teaches. Now therefore in the intervening time, in which we are, it is possible that Christ did none of these things — because it is possible that Christ never believed or willed such future things concerning Paul, since it is possible these things not be — or it is possible that Christ irrationally, erroneously, and culpably did these things, because not conformably, indeed dissimilarly and contrarily to the vision in the proper kind and in the Word and the paternal mandate. For let it be supposed that He received a mandate from the Father that He should pray or do nothing except according to what was divinely revealed to Him in the proper kind. Nor can anyone feign that, although it is not possible that the past effects of Christ were not, it is nevertheless possible that they were not done to the aforesaid end concerning Paul, but to another end altogether — on account of the reasonings premised in chapters 8 and 35 of this book. Furthermore, in the intervening time in which we are, between the bloody sweat of Christ and His terrible passion, according to these it is possible that Christ in no way so sweated — as chapter 33 of this book more fully argued.

Others assert that the same act of believing in Christ, which is or was most distinctly of one object, can be and have been most distinctly of the opposite object, not of that one. But then this could be without any change whatever; therefore it would be purely indifferent for showing to the mind of Christ this object or that; on which account, without some determination, of itself it would distinctly show neither, or both, as chapter 7 of the first more fully argued. Again, every such created act in the proper kind is an inanimate thing, purely natural, not free; therefore according to what was shown against the fourth response in chapter 30 of this book, it always so acts and according to the utmost of its power, and signifies; therefore if the same act, disposed in the same way, can represent and show both opposites, it always does so, since no reason at all can be rendered why this act, disposed altogether in the same way, yesterday showed to the soul of Christ one of the opposites, and today the other.

Item, if it be so, since the act represents, signifies, and shows the object most properly, most distinctly, most immediately of itself and primarily, the same likeness or species could similarly be proper to opposites, and by the same reason by which it is proper to one, it would be proper to another; and so any part of the definition and the whole; and so one of the opposites would truly be the other; the same proposition in number would also be true and false, and contradictories simultaneously true. For a proposition affirming through such an act and species common to both opposites one of the opposites of itself would be true; but a proposition affirming through the same act and species in number one of the opposites of the other would be false; and this proposition would be that one, because in nothing at all would this differ from that; and any part of this would similarly be a part of that, and conversely. According to this, also, the likenesses of things in the soul would not naturally always signify one thing, but at pleasure this or that — the opposite of which the wise soul most easily experiences. Hence the Philosopher in Peri Hermeneias I, 1: As letters are not the same to all, so neither are voices the same; but those of which these are the primary signs, the affections of the soul are the same to all, and those of which these are the likenesses, the things also are the same; which all logicians and philosophers concordantly hold; blessed Augustine also in De Trinitate XV, 10, agrees with these.

Item, then such species or act in the soul would be purely equivocal; for it would signify many things, namely both contraries equally primarily, of which the ratio of substance is diverse — and by the same reason by which one species or act, also all; therefore no one could understand, compose or divide, love, nor hate anything certainly, distinctly, and properly. Such equivocation, also, has not yet been discovered by any logician or philosopher; indeed, according to their judgment, neither is it possible to be found. For all hold concordantly that every species in the soul naturally and univocally chiefly always signifies one thing. Such species in the soul, moreover, or act, is most univocal, as the premises witness; which the definition of univocals in the Categories also shows. What term also would be univocal, if not that one? It is therefore univocal and equivocal purely simultaneously.

Furthermore, if it be so concerning species and act in the soul, by the same reason it will be so in memory, and in every interior and exterior sense similarly — indeed, also in the sensitive medium, and even in the object: for here stands and is founded the whole of such natural resolution. Wherefore the contrary happens. For just as one object is only one, so it naturally causes only one species like itself only in the sensitive medium; so also that further in the exterior sense, and so further through the interior senses, until likewise it finally reaches the soul. Furthermore, the vision or cognition of one of the opposites causes one effect in the soul or in the body of the knower, namely delight, dilation, and the like; the cognition and belief of the other, however, causes the opposite effect; therefore some past effect can not have been, and the opposite have been — as was shown in chapter 36 of this book; the reasons also adduced in chapter 36 against this little response go fully against it.

Furthermore, whoever shall say this has similarly to say of the acts of the will, wherefore he has consequently to say that what Christ or any other mere man through such a volition did outwardly, he could never have done, but the opposite of it, which he did not do. Item, then the act in Christ, or in another, which is or earlier was love and merit, can now be, and earlier have been, hatred and sin; the friend of someone could also become or be the enemy of the same without any change whatever in the other or in himself — against what was shown earlier in chapter 30 and 22 of this book, and against Augustine, De Trinitate V, last [chapter], where he says, Friend is said relatively; for he does not begin to be unless when he begins to love; therefore some change of will occurs that he be called friend. And Anselm says in De Libero Arbitrio 7 that that will which is the work — namely the act of will, which is the natural instrument of willing — is as multiple as how many and how often we will. Hence the Philosopher in Ethics VIII, 7, distinguishes the species of love and friendship according to the species of those loved; whence he says, The reasons for which they love are different; therefore the lovings and friendships also are different.

Others, however, hold that it is possible that the past effects done by Christ by means of human cognition or volition were done by Him by means only of His divine cognition and volition. But these are refuted by the thirty-ninth of this book. Again, according to this, it is now possible that Christ according to the human nature never willed anything, never merited anything, never redeemed mankind: for these things He did not do, except according to His human nature; therefore it is now consequently possible that no man was saved. Furthermore, then the past created act of Christ's willing in the proper kind can not have been, or Christ unwillingly have done anything, and have willed dissimilarly and contrarily to the divine will and to the paternal mandate, and to have sinned and been wretched.

Others still, subtle in their own eyes — as it seems to them — answering subtly, affirm that Christ did not understand or believe in the proper kind through natural acts similar to the cognitive acts of other men, but through one supernatural act supernaturally given to Him, which, like the Word itself and the divine essence, can have represented and shown equally any future thing whatever as either future or not future — so also, as they assert, can that act. But this response strives cruelly to mutilate Christ both according to His human and His divine nature similarly. For according to it, Christ could not, nor can, have a proper and perfect natural operation of a man — namely, distinct cognition of an object through an act singularly proper and distinct — as other mere men have; nor can God of His whole power confer such cognition on Christ. For if Christ could or can in any way have such cognition and knowledge or belief concerning futures, let it be supposed; and the response is emptied, and the difficulty returns. Or if Christ is not mutilated in any human power, He can, like other men, in that natural operation of man; and also if God is not curtailed in His omnipotence, He can at least of the plenitude of power give Christ such a cognitive act. For if He cannot, either this is on account of active impotence in God, which no one will concede, or on account of receptive impotence in Christ, which cannot be said, since any other man of the same nature is receptive of such an act. Again, Christ and other men are of the same nature, and these are naturally capable of such actions, therefore also He, as is plain in itself; which the Philosopher also testifies in De Caelo II, 48, arguing that if one star is moved by the motion of revolution, all are so moved; and 49, he hints at a similar argument concerning the motion of rolling of the stars; and 59, he likewise argues concerning the sphericity of the stars. Upon which Averroes says: The demonstration is founded upon this, that all heavenly bodies are of the same nature in species, and that heavenly bodies are many individuals in species; and since it is so, it is also necessary that what exists in any of the individuals of a species among essential things, exists in all individuals of that species; and figure is among the essential things in heavenly bodies, because they are animate; according to these propositions, therefore, this discourse is verified, and is not by way of example.

Item, forms of the same nature are naturally suited to have proper operations of the same nature, and the soul of Christ and the soul of any other man are of the same nature. Item, the human nature in Christ, if it were dismissed by the Word, could in itself produce such an act; nor does the Word weaken it, but rather strengthens it now united. Item, by similar reason they have necessarily to say consequently that Christ had and has a similar act of willing; which though it now were, or earlier was, most distinctly with respect to one object, could now not be and earlier not have been of that, but of another; therefore also the work which in the present would proceed from such volition, or in the past would have proceeded, could now not be, and in the past not have been; the work also which is not now nor was earlier, could be now and have been earlier. Item, Christ can have acts of knowing and willing similar to the acts of other men concerning present and past things; therefore also concerning necessary things, and concerning all future things; therefore also concerning all contingents.

Furthermore, it does not seem that the same created cognitive or volitive act could immediately and through itself alone, always disposing itself altogether in the same way, be most distinctly of all diverse things — as was argued above against a similar response. Other arguments also fighting against that one militate against this one. Item, since Christ according to the man, and another mere man, are of the same nature, and Christ according to the man is capable of such a cognitive act, and likewise of a volitive one, so also is another mere man; since therefore a mere man is capable, and God omnipotent can give him such acts of knowing and willing — by receiving which, even if he now believes and wills, or earlier believed and willed, some future contingent in meriting, sinning, or doing some extrinsic work — he can now and earlier do and have done not those things, but their opposites. Against this response similarly the procedure of chapter 33 of this book plainly goes. Other little responses, however, possible to be fabricated here, will easily be broken through these and similar means, by the help of the grace of Jesus Christ.

CHAPTER XLV

HE VENTILATES A FOURTH RESPONSE.

Some, however, wishing to defend Christ from lying, perjury, and sin, say that those things which Christ asserted and swore to one understanding, He could have asserted and sworn not to that one but to another understanding. But this seems an assertion from a marvelous understanding! For let the words of Christ be so plain and so simple that they cannot rationally be taken in a double sense, nor in another than the literal surface primarily intends; and let Christ say and swear that He understands them only in that way: and if anyone shall yet say that Christ can understand that saying in another way, he has consequently to say that Christ can certify no one concerning any saying of His, in what understanding He said this — and this is to leaven the sacred Gospels with hesitation and excessive suspicion. For who, on account of the uncertain words of Christ, would certainly believe or do something great and uncertain? Nor could a civil or secure contract be made with Christ, however plainly He said, promised, or swore something: for always the snake could lie hidden in the grass, and fallacy under a hidden meaning, and Christ would be more changeable and various in speech than the chameleon in color. For the color which the chameleon now has or had in the past, it is necessary that it now has and had in the past; but concerning the understanding of Christ's discourse, it is in the opposite way. The assertion of Christ would also be more dubitable and uncertain than the assertion of any other man whatever, so that of Him truly could be said that ridiculous reproach of Horace, Epistles I, 1:

By what knot shall I hold Proteus changing his countenance?

Although nevertheless according to Isidore, De Summo Bono II, 31: By whatever art of words anyone swears, God, who is witness of conscience, takes it as he to whom the oath is sworn understands it; and it is alleged in Sentences III of Peter [Lombard], dist. 39, and in the Canon 22, Causa question 5, Whatsoever. Hence concerning our Lord Jesus Christ Himself it is written, Mark 4: He spoke the word to them as they were able to hear; and the Apostle says, 1 Cor. 14: If I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be to him to whom I speak a barbarian, and he that speaks to me a barbarian. Furthermore, a marvelous — indeed a miserable and useless — master and lord would He seem who could teach no disciple to what understanding He spoke: for what would be the communication between them? But this does not befit our Master and Lord Christ; whence in Luke 24 it is written thus of Him, He opened to them the sense, that they might understand the Scriptures; who also said to His disciples, To you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of heaven, Matt. 13. And Luke 8: He that hath ears to hear let him hear. And his disciples asked him, what this parable might be? To whom he said, To you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God, but to the rest in parables, that seeing they may not see, and hearing they may not understand. Whence it appears that, although the parables of the Gospel and the amphibological [sayings] of Jesus Christ can be taken to a manifold and dubious understanding, yet He can certify concerning them — how much more concerning His other sayings; indeed it appears that His other sayings cannot rationally be taken to so dubious an understanding, but to the certain one which the words intend, according to the common understanding of men. Whence John 16: These things I have spoken to you in proverbs; the hour cometh when I shall no more speak to you in proverbs, but plainly of my Father will I declare to you — which ought to be understood for the state of present life, as the following word indicates: for immediately he subjoins, In that day you shall ask in my name. Which also for the same reason Augustine holds, in part 2 on John, homily 48, or 102 of the whole.

Furthermore, let Christ assert something concerning the future in a human soul, or in an Angel, through natural acts or species, naturally signifying only one thing, as the previous chapter showed; and the response will not avoid [the difficulty]. For the Prophet said, I will hear what the Lord God shall speak in me, Psalm 84. Upon which Augustine: The Prophet said, "God spoke in him within," and the world made to him the noise of mouths; restraining therefore somewhat from the noise of the world, and turning himself to himself, and from himself to Him whose voice he heard inwardly — as if stopping his ear against the tumultuous unrest of this life, and against the soul aggrieved by the body which corrupts, and by sense weighing down the earthly habitation thinking many evil things — he said, "I will hear what the Lord God shall speak in me." Likewise on Psalm 88: The Prophet spoke to God, he says, in vision to Thy Saints — where the text of Augustine has, in aspect; which he thus expounds: He spoke to them in aspect, that is, in revelation; whence Prophets were called Seers. They saw something within, which they would speak forth; in secret they heard what they preached openly. According to these also, neither could the Holy Spirit certainly teach the understanding of Sacred Scripture — against that of John 14: The Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, He shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance whatsoever I shall have said unto you; and against that of the same chapter 16: When that Spirit of truth shall come, He shall teach you all truth.

Furthermore, if what Christ said to one understanding, He can have said not to that understanding but to another, since such understanding in Christ is some proper and distinct cognitive act — as can be had from the previous chapter — He can not have had the act which He had, and have had the one which He did not have, which contradicts the hypothesis. Item, Christ can certify a man concerning His understanding in propositions about the present and the past; therefore also in propositions about the future; and those things which in those He uttered to one understanding, He cannot have uttered to another, therefore neither in others about the future. Item, by the same reason they have to say consequently that what Christ willed and did with one intention and to one end, He could not have willed or done with that intention but with another, and to another end; and since the final intention is some proper and distinct act of will, directed to some proper and distinct end, as is plain from the previous chapter, Christ could not have had the act of will which He had, and have had the one which He did not have. He could also not have suffered, nor have instituted the Ecclesiastical Sacraments for the justification of men or salvation; therefore also those justified and saved through them can now not be such, and in the past not have been. Christ also could similarly not have done what He did, and have done what He did not do. Item, if these are possible concerning Christ according to the human nature, similar things will also be possible concerning a mere man, as can be shown from the things had before in the previous chapter. Therefore what a mere man asserted, willed, and did to one understanding and to one proper and distinct end, he could have done not to that one, but to another; therefore the mere man, who in so doing merits or sins, merited or sinned, and receives or received a just reward, can not so, but the opposite singly. These also can be reprov'd concerning a mere man through the same things by which similar things were reprov'd concerning Christ God and man.

Others more specifying this little response judge that He could have asserted under a condition, at least tacit, what He asserted absolutely. But these can be refuted just as the first ones: for every condition tacitly understood is some act of intellect; therefore it is possible that the past not have been. By the same reason what Christ willed absolutely, He can not so have willed, but only under a condition still future; and since from a conditional will an effect does not follow, except perhaps when the condition obtains, the Ecclesiastical Sacraments can not have been, or not have been useful, and His past deeds not have been. Let it also be supposed that Christ yesterday asserted and willed something to come tomorrow under a condition fulfilled today, and the difficulty returns. These things also are all to be conceded by similar reason concerning a mere man, therefore also the inconveniences to which it has been deduced above. Furthermore, if Christ knows future contingents, He can so assert them; but He knows them simply absolutely, for so they are true; and as they are true, so He knows them. Again, if Christ did not know futures except under a condition, either He knows that the condition will obtain, or not. If He knows, then either under another condition, or simply absolutely: if under another condition, there will be such an infinite process in conditions, nor any such determined knowledge: if simply and absolutely, and in similar manner He knows futures, let Him also assert absolutely the fulfilment of that condition, and the response is voided; if He does not know that the condition will obtain, He does not know certainly: nor does He then know otherwise than another mere man. Furthermore, let Christ assert A. to be future under condition B., and let Him assert simply that B. will be, and the difficulty returns. And if anyone still shall say that that assertion can be under another condition, namely C., then there can be an infinite process in such conditions, and no certitude at all except concerning sole uncertainty — as was argued above. Item, let Christ assert anything future, and let Him assert that He asserts it simply absolutely without any condition tacit or expressed.

Others, however, say that not everyone who says a falsehood lies, but [only he] who says a falsehood with the mind of asserting; and that Christ, although He said something with the mind of asserting, can have said it not with such a mind. But this will be refuted by what was had before, since the proper and distinct mind of asserting is the final intention or purpose, and some proper and distinct act of will or intellect.

Others are of the opinion that to lie is to go against the mind with the intention of deceiving; but Christ did not have the intention of deceiving; therefore even if He said anything against His mind, He is not nevertheless to be charged with lying. But these worthless slaves wickedly blaspheme our Lord Christ: for they concede that He can assert a falsehood against His mind knowingly and perjure Himself; therefore they have consequently to concede that He can sin — against what was shown earlier in chapter 32 of the second. For every deed against conscience is sin, the Apostle saying, Whatsoever is not of faith is sin, Rom. 14. Gloss: Whatsoever, even if it be good in itself, which is not of faith, that is, which is done against faith, that is, against conscience, is sin — which the general council also similarly understands, as is plain in the Decretals, De praescriptionibus, last chapter; and Pope Innocent III, in De restitutione spoliatorum, chapter Literas; where also he adds that vulgar saying: Whatsoever is done against conscience builds up to hell. How also will anyone be excused from the intention of deceiving, if he asserted a falsehood knowingly intending that it should be believed by the hearers as a sincere truth?

Others still hold that it is not necessary that Christ lied, even if He asserted one falsehood, because it is not necessary that this was against His mind. But these have a marvelous mind: for they do not advert that Christ is God and man, and therefore at least according to His divine nature knows all things most truly. Item, according to His human nature He knows all things at least pertaining to Him from near, as was shown in chapter 42 of this book; or at least according to that nature He believed to be true what through it He asserted. For He had not forgotten the rule which He taught: Let your speech be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay, Matt. 5; in the heart it is, in the mouth it is — and similarly negatively. But chiefly, whatever He swore, He believed to be true; otherwise He would have sworn too perversely. And it is possible that He asserted and swore a falsehood; therefore also that He believed the falsehood to be true; therefore also that He was deceived — which in chapter 42 of this book had been reproved; whence it also follows that it is possible He sinned, the opposite of which had been demonstrated in the thirty-second of the second. Item, let Him assert with an oath that He so knows or believes in the proper kind that it will be in the future as He asserts and swears, and the response does not respond.

CHAPTER XLVI

AGAINST THE SAME OPINION AND HYPOTHESIS BY WAY OF REVELATION IN THE PROPER KIND CONCERNING PURE CREATURES, NAMELY THE ANGELS.

Christ being our leader along the first path of this twofold revelation in the proper kind — namely concerning the Lord Jesus Christ — having opposed against the principal hypothesis, it seems consequent through its other method, namely concerning pure creatures, the Angels and human beings who are His servants, to proceed against it. Let therefore a revelation be made in the proper kind to Michael concerning future good merits and concerning the salvation of Paul, still a pilgrim in the world; notwithstanding which it is possible that Paul neither merit nor be saved; therefore also that Michael be deceived, and have been deceived earlier; on which account also that he is not now, nor was earlier, blessed — as the things had before in chapter 34 of this book teach.

Again, because, as the Philosopher says, one inconvenience being given, others happen, from this it further follows evidently that Michael is not now certain concerning his future beatitude — nay, what seems more absurd, neither concerning past nor present beatitude. For this depends upon one uncertainty, because contingently future; therefore neither now is he, nor ever was, blessed, as is plain from what was shown earlier in chapter 34 of this book. There follows also from the same that it is in the power of Paul, a wretched pilgrim on earth, to draw down Michael, the most happy citizen in heaven, from his highest beatitude to the lowest misery — that is, by deluding him to deceive him basely all day long. Indeed, what is graver and worse, it follows that it is now possible, and depends on the will of Paul, that Michael now sin, and have sinned earlier.

For let it be supposed, according to the authorities concerning praying and the mode of praying premised in chapters 23 and 25 of the first, that Michael received a mandate in the proper kind, that he should will every and only the one shown to him and seen [as] to be saved in the proper kind and in the Word, and should aid only such a one with services and benefits; and let it be shown to him in the proper kind and in the Word that Paul, still a pilgrim, will be saved; and let him will by a willing in the proper kind that he be saved, and let him also bestow services and benefits on him: with all this so done, it is still possible that Paul not be saved; therefore also that Michael have sinned in willing him to be saved and bestowing benefits on him against the divine mandate — since it is possible that he did not see Paul as one to be saved in the proper kind and in the Word, indeed [that he] saw the opposite of this in the Word, and did not see this in the proper kind, since a falsehood is in no way seen, just as neither is it known. Let it also be supposed consequently to this, that Michael, comforting Paul, appears to him and says, Joy be ever to you, because you are of the number of those to be saved; still it is possible that Paul for now is not to be saved, but to be damned; and that Michael now sees this in the Word, therefore also that he asserts this against his mind, and lies; that he is also an Angel of Satan, an Apostate from truth, and was so in the past.

Furthermore, it follows that Michael can plainly believe two contradictories simultaneously — against what was shown earlier in chapter 42 of this book. For now he believes in the proper kind that Paul is to be saved, and it is necessary that he believe so for now; and it is possible that he sees for now the opposite of it in the Word, because it is possible that for now the opposite is true and shown to him in the Word. Furthermore, if it is possible that Paul not be saved, it is possible that Michael did not certainly know in the proper kind that he was to be saved; therefore neither willed in the proper kind that he be saved, nor bestowed benefits on him — because this certain vision was the cause why he willed and did these things, just as concerning the vision in the Word the thirty-third of this book and the following chapters more fully argue. According to this similarly any wretch can most easily inflict damage and punishment all day long upon the most holy and most blessed Angels without any preceding fault — which seems to redound to their misery and to God's injury, as the thirty-third of this book more diffusely showed.

CHAPTER XLVII

AGAINST THE SAME OPINION AND HYPOTHESIS BY THE SAME WAY CONCERNING PURE HUMAN BEINGS.

Now after the Angels we must come to human beings. Concerning human beings, indeed, in the state of innocence, and in the state of glory, it can similarly be argued, just as concerning the Angels in the previous chapter it was argued. Again, all the saints, even the blessed Virgin, before the salvific passion of Jesus Christ, were cleansed and saved in the faith and virtue of that future passion, in some way revealed to them in the proper kind. For He, the corner-stone made [such], by manifold pounding of the passion, joined both walls into one with the most tenacious cement of His blessed blood. He is also the one to whom the crowds, both those who went before and those who followed after, cried saying, Hosanna to the Son of David. Hence also the Apostle says, One faith, not many. Whence blessed Gregory, on Ezekiel II, homily 5 or 17 of the whole, says, The Jewish people went before, the Gentile followed; and because all the elect, both who could be in Judea, and who now exist in the Church, believed and believe in the Mediator of God and men, those who go before and those who follow cry "Hosanna." Hosanna in the Latin tongue means "Save us." From Him both the former sought salvation and the present seek it, and confess "Blessed is He that comes in the name of the Lord," since one is the hope, one is the faith of the preceding and following peoples. For just as those, by the expected passion and resurrection of the Lord, were saved; so we, by His past passion and His resurrection abiding for the ages, are saved. Blessed Augustine likewise in Hypognosticon 63 says: All the saints of God who were before the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ were saved by no other faith than that which is now; who also in De libero arbitrio 7, De perfectione iustitiae 32, De natura et gratia 44, in Epistle 93 to Optatus, in De nuptiis et concupiscentia II, teaches the same. Anselm also in Cur Deus Homo II, 17 wills this same thing, which all Catholic treatise-writers concordantly will.

This therefore being supposed as a constant, let it be argued for the intervening time in which we are between those past effects and that future passion: it is necessary that those effects were; therefore it is necessary that this passion will be — or if it is not necessary that this passion will be, neither is it necessary that those effects were. For they could not have been cleansed and saved by an erroneous, fallacious, and false faith. For if they could then, they could now and always — which seems to stain, or rather to defame, the Catholic faith with excessive suspicion, and render men tepid and too dubious to believe. How also could falsehood be of as great avail as truth itself avails? Who would concede this except a false person? Furthermore, if false faith would suffice, true faith would be superfluous — especially since the same effect would result, and much more briefly and easily from false faith than from true. For for true faith were required incarnation, nativity, preaching, passion, and death of Christ, with many other deeds of His; for false faith, however, that itself alone would suffice. It would have sufficed, therefore, most fully for salvation to persist in a false faith concerning a future Christ until the completion of the number of the elect, and so to have closed the ages; therefore, just as the Apostle argues by deducing to the impossible, as he reckons it, Christ died in vain — if, he says, justice is by the law, then Christ died in vain, Galatians 2 — Gloss: in vain, that is, frustra, without cause. For according to the judgment of the philosophers, which they always presuppose as a kind of self-evident maxim, In vain are more things posited where fewer suffice. A pseudo-Christ also would have availed as much as the truthful and the truth itself, Christ — which no one, as I hope, will presume to concede, except perhaps a pseudo-Christian and disciple of pseudo-Christ, namely the true Antichrist. Hence Anselm in Cur Deus Homo II, 17, treating this matter, says: Truly He was about to die, since if He had not truly been about to die, the faith of His future death would not have been true, by which both that virgin from whom He was born, and many others were cleansed from sin; and if it were not true, it could have profited nothing. Hence also the faithful Church of Christ wholly faithfully sings: True faith of Him born has purged the crimes of the world.

Furthermore, Christ asserted and swore that some future things would come to pass, namely His passion, resurrection, ascension, the general resurrection, the betrayal of Judas, the denial of Peter, and many similar things. In the intervening time therefore in which we are, if these can in no way come to pass, Christ can have been a liar, perjurer, and sinner — against what was shown earlier in chapter 32 of the second. Or if Christ cannot have been these things, it is necessary that what He swore in asserting, will come to pass. Item, God foretold many future things to men in the proper kind, asserted, promised, and swore them; therefore it is necessary that all those things come to pass, or that God lie; but it is impossible for God to lie. This whole thing also evidently appears from the authorities concerning divine speech or word in chapter 27 of this book, and from the reasonings and authorities premised in chapter 32 of this book.

Hence the Lord through the Prophet: Neither will I profane my testament, and what proceeds from my lips I will not make void, or I will not reprove, as the Roman Psalter has — which Augustine expounds, I have sworn once in my holy one, if I lie to David, Psalm 88. Testament, however, according to Papias, and according to Isidore Etymologies V, 8, in the holy Scriptures is not said only of that which has no force except when the testators are dead, but every pact and agreement is called a testament; hence the translation of Jerome has thus: Neither will I violate my pact, and what has gone forth from my lips I will not change. Whereon Augustine: Not because the sons sin, therefore shall I be found a liar; I have promised, I do. Suppose those have willed even to sin in despair, and so to go altogether into sins, that they offend the eyes of the Father, and deserve to be disinherited; is He not the God of whom it was said, "Of these stones God shall raise up sons of Abraham"? "The Lord knoweth them that are His." For He securely promised, who predestined us before we were. Let the despairing sin as much as they will, let the members of Christ answer, "If God be for us, who is against us?" Therefore God shall not be harmed in His truth, He shall not be deceitful, He shall not profane His testament. His testament remains immovable, because He, foreknowing, predestined the heirs, and what proceeds from His lips He will not reprove. Hear now thy confirmation, hear now thy security; if thou knowest thyself to be among the members of Christ, "I have sworn once in my holy one, if I lie to David"; do you wait for God to swear again? How often is He to swear, if once swearing He lies? Cassiodorus: Once, that is, immutably; in which manner Augustine and Isidore expound that of Psalm 61, Once has God spoken, as chapter 27 of this book more fully recited.

And below upon that, But Thou hast rejected, &c. Thou hast turned aside the testament, &c.: What is this, says Augustine, Thou hast promised all those things, but Thou hast done these contraries? Where are the promises in which a little before we rejoiced, of which we so eagerly applauded, of which we securely congratulated ourselves? As if another had promised, another fulfilled — which is to be wondered at. Not another, but Thou indeed; Thou who didst promise, Thou who didst confirm, Thou who, on account of human doubt, didst even swear; "Those things Thou hast promised, and these things Thou hast done." Where shall I hold Thy oath? Where shall I find Thy promise? What is this? Would God then promise something false, or swear something false? Why then did He promise those things, and do these? I say that He did these things to confirm the promised. For David was placed, to whom these things were promised — to be fulfilled in his seed, which is Christ. Therefore, on account of the things promised which were said to David, men expected them to be fulfilled in David. Therefore, lest any Christian, when he should say, "He spoke of Christ," another should say, "No, but he spoke of David himself," and should err when he saw all things fulfilled in Christ, He destroyed those things in David, that when you should see those things not fulfilled in him which it was necessary to be fulfilled, you should seek another in whom they should be shown to be fulfilled. So also concerning Esau and Jacob we find the elder adored by the younger, since it was written, "The elder shall serve the younger," that when you saw it not fulfilled in those two preceding, you should expect two peoples in whom it should be fulfilled — which the not-lying God deigns to promise. "Behold of thy seed," He said to David, "I will set upon thy throne." He promised something from his seed in eternity, and Solomon was born; he was made of such great wisdom and prudence, that the promise of God concerning the seed of David was thought to be fulfilled in him. But Solomon fell, and gave place for hoping for Christ — that since God could neither be deceived nor deceive, He would not place His promise in him whom He knew to be about to fall, but after his fall thou shouldst look back to God and demand thy promise. "Therefore, O Lord, hast Thou lied? Dost Thou not fulfil what Thou hast promised? Nor dost Thou show what Thou hast sworn?" Perhaps here God was about to say to thee, "I swore indeed, and promised, but this one would not persevere." What then? Didst Thou, O Lord God, not foreknow that this man would not persevere? Surely Thou didst know. Why then didst Thou promise to me, in one not about to persevere, what was to be in eternity? Didst Thou not say: "If they shall forsake my law, and walk not in my judgments, and keep not my commandments, and profane my testimony, my promise shall nevertheless remain, my oath shall be fulfilled — I have sworn once in my holy one, if I lie to David"? Render therefore what Thou hast sworn, return what Thou hast promised. It was taken away from this David, lest it be expected in this David; expect therefore what I have promised. David himself also knew it; see therefore what he says: "But Thou hast rejected, and brought to nothing — therefore where is what Thou hast promised? Thou hast deferred Thy Christ." Although he enumerates certain sad things, in this word he refreshes us: God altogether remains what He has promised; for Thou hast not taken away Thy Christ, but deferred Him. Whereon Cassiodorus: Above, when concerning Christ the Father promised, He spoke of David, concerning whom now He places contraries — that the things which were necessary to be done, since God had sworn, should be sought to be fulfilled not rather in him, but in another.

The Apostle says, 2 Tim. 2: If we believe not, He remains faithful, He cannot deny Himself. Gloss: If we believe not that He punishes the wicked, foolishly are we confident in His mercy; He, however, namely Christ, remains faithful in His sayings, and even in that He has said, "He that does not believe shall be condemned," and is truly faithful, because He cannot deny Himself, who is the truth — which He would do if He did not fulfil His sayings. This, however, that He cannot deny Himself, is a praise of the divine will; just as the fact that some cannot believe is a fault of human will. This last part of this gloss is from Augustine on John, homily 53; who also in De Trinitate XV, 14, says: That Word can never have anything false, because it is immutably so as that of which it is. For the Son cannot do anything of Himself, except what He shall have seen the Father doing; He cannot powerfully — nor is this infirmity, but firmness, because the truth cannot be false. And below in chapter 15: Great is the power of that Word, not to be able to lie.

Item, if God did not render what He promised, He would not be faithful, nor just; whence Heb. 6: God is not unjust to forget your work, and the love which you have shown in His name. And 2 Tim. 4: I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; for the rest there is laid up for me a crown of justice, which the Lord, the just judge, will render to me in that day. Treating which, Augustine on that of Psalm 100, Mercy and judgment will I sing to Thee, O Lord, says: How does he say, see, "I have fought the good fight, &c."? In this time of mercy, hear concerning judgment: "For the rest there is laid up for me a crown of justice, which the Lord, the just judge, will render to me in that day." He did not say "will give," but "will render"; when He gave, He was merciful; when He shall render, He shall be judge — because "Mercy and judgment will I sing to Thee, O Lord." But by giving He made Himself a debtor of the crown of merits. There I obtained mercy; therefore the Lord first was merciful here, but He shall render to me a crown of justice. Whence shall He render? Because He is a just judge. Why a just judge? Because "I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith." Therefore, just, He cannot but crown these things.

The Prophet says, Right is the word of the Lord, and all His works are in faith, Psalm 32 — upon which Augustine in tractate 2: We find God faithful. Hear the Apostle: "If we believe not, He remains faithful, He cannot deny Himself." We have therefore also a faithful God; let us rather distinguish a faithful God from a faithful man: a faithful man is he who believes God promising; a faithful God is He who exhibits to man what He promised. Let us therefore hold a most faithful debtor, since we hold a most merciful promiser. Whence a debtor? Because a promiser. We do not say to God, "Lord, render what Thou hast received," but "render what Thou hast promised," since right is the word of the Lord. What is right is the word of the Lord? It does not deceive thee; do not thou deceive Him; or rather, do not deceive thyself.

Item, God swore many things to come to pass, and every oath of God is necessarily to be fulfilled — otherwise God could perjure Himself, and be perjured. The same thing is plain from the things alleged above from Psalm 88, and from Augustine in the same place; which also that of Psalm 109 seems to attest: The Lord has sworn, and He will not repent; and that of Psalm 131: The Lord has sworn truth to David, and He will not frustrate him — where the text of Augustine has: And He will not repent of it; upon which he says thus: What is "He has sworn"? He firmed the promise through Himself. What is "He will not repent"? He will not change. When He changes His works through His unchangeable counsel, He is said to repent on account of the change, not of His counsel, but of the work. This, however, He so promised, that He should not change. How is that also said: "The Lord has sworn, and He will not repent: Thou art a Priest in eternity according to the order of Melchizedek"? So also this, because it was thus promised that it should not be changed, since necessarily it was about to be in the future and to remain. He said, "The Lord has sworn truth to David, and He will not repent: of the fruit of thy womb I will set upon thy throne."

Item, Isaiah 14: The Lord of hosts has sworn, saying: If not as I have thought, so shall it be. Gloss: He has sworn, that is, immovably has decreed; "if not, &c." as if He should say, otherwise it cannot be done. Item, Genesis 22, the Lord speaking to Abraham: By myself I have sworn, that because thou hast done this thing, &c., I will bless thee, and multiply thy seed, &c.. Gloss upon I have sworn: because immutably has it been constituted by God — which word in sacred Scripture is found in this same way expounded most often. Hence Basil concordantly upon that of Luke 1, The oath which He swore to Abraham our Father: Let no one, he says, hearing that the Lord swore to Abraham, be prompt to swearing. For just as fury said of God does not signify passion but punishment, so neither does God swear as a man, but His word in place of an oath is expressed to us for truth, approving by an immutable judgment what was promised. Which exposition the Apostle seems sufficiently to canonize, Heb. 6, when he says: To Abraham promising, God, since He had no greater by whom He should swear, swore by Himself, saying, "Unless blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee," and so patiently bearing, he obtained the promise. For men swear by one greater than themselves, and the end of all their controversy for confirmation is the oath. In which God, willing more abundantly to show to the heirs of the promise the immobility of His counsel, interposed an oath, that by two immovable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie, we may have the firmest solace, who flee for refuge to hold fast the proposed hope which we have, as an anchor of the soul safe and firm. Gloss: by two immovable things, that is, by promise and oath.

Hence Jerome on Isaiah 33, treating that of Isaiah 45, By myself I have sworn, the word of justice shall go forth out of my mouth, and shall not return, because to me every knee shall bow: He swears, he says, according to the Apostle, that "by two immovable things in which it is impossible for God to lie, we may have most firm consolation." Yet let no one on account of these and similar suspect that God otherwise inwardly swears than He simply says, or that the inward oath of God is firmer or more certain than His simple word. For it is no easier for God to say a falsehood simply than to swear it; whatever also is there is good, and whatever also of good is there, is there infinitely and supremely, as the preceding things have taught. To this also attests the Gloss upon that of Amos 6, The Lord God has sworn in His soul: Every word of God ought to be taken for an oath; and He speaks in our manner; not because He has a soul as we, but by the name "soul" the affection of the divine will is shown. Therefore He swore in His will. Why therefore does God swear to men? That mercifully condescending to their slowness and incredulity, He may certify and quiet them in human manner.

Item, future things revealed by God to ancient Prophets, and prophesied by them, will of necessity come to pass — otherwise it would now be possible that they saw only false and vain things, and prophesied only such, therefore also that they were never Prophets. For according to all men of every sect, only those are called Prophets who proclaim true things from afar, or foretell. It would also now be possible that ancient seers were never seers but blind: for he who is now called Prophet, of old was called Seer, 1 Kings 9. The ancient truthful Doctors were never such, but seducing deceivers; who had a glorious dignity and an exceptional grade of goodness — never had these things, but always the opposite. For who is ignorant that the truthful is more worthy and better than the deceiver, and one believing what is true than one believing what is false? Who would not choose this rather than that? For truth itself is more worthy and better than falsehood, as is also shown in chapter 34 of this book. Indeed, what seems more absurd, it would now be possible that ancient Prophets and Apostles, friends of God (Wisdom 7 and John 15), organs of the Holy Spirit — for He, as the Nicene Symbol says, spoke through the Prophets, nor were the Apostles speaking, but the Spirit of their Father was speaking in them — who had His glorious gifts, namely Prophecy and the discernment of spirits (1 Cor. 12), never were such, never received such things, but were organs of that lying spirit in the mouth of all the lying Prophets (3 Kings 22). The Holy Spirit, also, did not speak what He did speak, and did not do what He did do.

Item, according to this, it would now be possible that Isaiah, in that which he saw most truly without any deception, was deceived; and consequently, in that he well merited, mortally sinned; and in that he truly asserted, lied — as the previous chapter concerning Angels argued more fully. Furthermore, if it is now possible that the elders who were Prophets, seers, and such-and-such, and had such-and-such gifts, and performed such-and-such works, were not such, nor had such things, nor did such things; correspondingly it is possible that the elders who were not such, nor had such things, nor did, were such, had such things, and did them. Indeed, those who were, had, and did in the opposite manner, were not so, had not, or did not so, and were and had and did just as the true Prophets — which without doubt by exchange converts, indeed perverts, the true Prophets, and their true gifts and works, into pseudo-prophets, and their false gifts and works, and conversely — as chapter 33 of this book more fully argued.

Furthermore, then the Prophets and Apostles can have been deceived in believing a falsehood concerning the future, and this through Christ and the Holy Spirit of God. For the Apostle says in Galatians 1 that he received and learned the Gospel preached by him through the revelation of Jesus Christ; who also in 1 Cor. 12 enumerates prophecy among the gifts of the Holy Spirit. Whence 2 Peter 1: We have a more sure prophetic word, to which you do well to attend; this first understanding, that no prophecy of Scripture is of private interpretation. For prophecy was not brought at any time by human will, but holy men of God spoke, inspired by the Holy Spirit. Which the whole Catholic Church also catholically professes in the Nicene Symbol, saying, who, namely the Holy Spirit, spoke through the Prophets. How then does Christ call Himself only truth, John 14, and not also falsity? How also is God and Christ, knowingly asserting a falsehood concerning the future in the soul of Isaiah or Paul, and deceiving him, remaining truth, and excused from fallacy and lying — John, the disciple of truth, saying, Every lie is not of truth, 1 John 2? Hence Augustine in Eighty-three Questions, q. 14: If, he says, the body of Christ was a phantasm, Christ deceived; and if He deceived, He is not truth; but Christ is truth; therefore His body was not a phantasm. Who also in De agone christiano says: Nor let us hear those who deny that such a body of the Lord rose, as was placed in the tomb. For if it had not been such, He Himself would not have said after the resurrection to the disciples, "Handle and see, for a spirit hath not bones and sinews, as you see me have." For it is sacrilege to believe that our Lord God, since He Himself is truth, lied in any matter.

If also He can assert a falsehood concerning the future, why not concerning the past and present, and any false notorious things, so as to lie notoriously and sin — against the things had earlier in chapter 30 of the second of this book? How also, if it be so, is the Holy Spirit called only the spirit of truth (John 14), and not also the spirit of falsity, the lying spirit in the mouth of all the prophets (3 Kings 22), and the spirit of giddiness and error (Isaiah 19)? How also does it befit a just and true God to deceive men, especially the most devoted and most familiar servants, His most beloved and most loving friends, and this without fault or cause? Augustine does not so think on Psalms 32, 88, and Eighty-three Questions q. 14, alleged above; who also in De Civitate Dei XI, 12, says: Who of men knows himself to persevere in the action and progress of justice unto the end, unless he is made certain by some revelation by Him who, by a just and hidden judgment, instructs not all in this matter, but deceives no one? Hence also Pope Innocent III says: The judgment of God always rests on truth, which neither deceives nor is deceived.

The most wise Sibyl also says thus: There shall arise from the stock of the Hebrews a woman by the name of Mary, having a husband by the name of Joseph, and there shall be procreated of her, without intercourse with man, of the Holy Spirit, the Son of God, by the name of Jesus; and she shall be virgin before birth and after birth; He, however, who shall be born of her shall be true God and true man, as all the Prophets predicted, and shall fulfil the law of the Hebrews, and shall add His own things together, and His kingdom shall remain for ages of ages. And to the indignant and objecting priests of the Hebrews, she answered: O Jews, it is necessary that these things be done, but you shall not believe in Him.

Item, Cassiodorus in his prologue on the Psalter defines prophecy in this way: Prophecy is a divine inspiration which announces the events of things with immovable truth. With which the gloss of Peter [Lombard] on the Psalter also concords in the prologue, as chapter 25 of the first more fully alleges. The same is plain through the authority of Augustine on John, part 2, homily 62 or 116 of the whole, alleged in chapter 27 of this third [book].

And behold, greater than Augustine: that most beloved disciple of truth, who from the very fount, namely from the breast of truth, drew his Gospel, who says, though He had done so great signs before them, they did not believe in Him; that the saying of Isaiah the Prophet might be fulfilled, who said: "Lord, who has believed our report, and to whom has the arm of the Lord been revealed?" Therefore they could not believe, because Isaiah again said, "He has blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart, that they may not see with their eyes, and not understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them" (John 12). Treating which, Augustine in De bono perseverantiae 41 understands according to the literal surface; whence he says: In the mass of damnation the Jews were left, who could not believe with such great and clear powers done in their sight. For why could they not believe? The Gospel did not keep silent, saying, "Although however such great, &c.," recited above. Who also on John part 1, homily 53, expounding the same, says: It is so said "they could not," in the same way as it is said of our Lord God, "If we believe not, He remains faithful, He cannot deny Himself"; concerning the Omnipotent it is said, "He cannot." Therefore just as that the Lord cannot deny Himself is a praise of the divine will, so that they could not believe is a fault of the human will.

And if anyone object that Augustine in the same homily, in the same place, thus expounds they could not, that is, they did not will; and on the same: Why could they not? Because they did not will; this does not run counter to the preceding understanding. For Sacred Scripture from its marvelous fecundity has a manifold understanding, as all its Catholic treatise-writers sufficiently show. Yet it seems an exposition very strange, and very remote from the way of speaking of Scripture, of the Doctors, and of the common people, to expound not being able by not willing; nor does Augustine expressly thus expound, but says, It is said, "they could not," where it is to be understood that they did not will; and it is true that they did not will. Yet it does not evidently follow that this is the exposition of that, but he says it is to be understood that they did not will, that he may show that they did not believe voluntarily, not unwillingly, and therefore that they were culpable in not believing, and sinned, according to what was premised in chapters 1 and 10 of this book. Hence also he immediately subjoins: Just as it is said of our Lord God, "If we believe not, He remains faithful, He cannot deny Himself," because of the Omnipotent it is said, "He cannot"; therefore just as that the Lord cannot deny Himself is a praise of the divine will, so that they could not believe is a fault of human will. Where also he evidently hints that this cannot be taken properly and to the common understanding. For he says it is said they could not in the same way as concerning the Lord, He cannot deny Himself, which is taken properly and to the common understanding; for thus He cannot deny Himself, as neither lie. When, however, he says they could not, because they did not will, he understands that from their voluntary merits they had been blinded; whence opposing and answering he subjoins, But the Prophet says another cause, not of their will. What cause does the Prophet say? "Because God gave them the spirit of compunction, eyes that they may not see, and ears that they may not hear, and He blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart"; even this, I answer, their will deserved; for thus God blinds, thus hardens. Yet this exposition does not seem to fit the mind of the Evangelist: for he in no way explicitly or implicitly assigns that cause, but this — because Isaiah said, "He has blinded their eyes, &c." — manifestly supposing that the prophecies cannot fail to be fulfilled.

For which reason it must be adverted that Augustine there in no way definitively, but inquisitively proceeds. Whence he says: When questions of this kind have come up — why one is so, the other so; why one, with God deserting, is blinded, the other, with God aiding, is illuminated — let us not usurp judgment of the judgment of so great a Judge, but trembling let us cry out with the Apostle, "O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How inscrutable are His judgments, and unsearchable His ways!" Whence it has been said in the Psalm, "Thy judgments are like a great deep." Therefore let not the expectation of your charity, brethren, push me to penetrate this height, to discuss this abyss, to scrutinize unscrutable things; I acknowledge my measure, and I seem to myself to feel even your measure: this is higher than my growths, and stronger than my strengths, I think than yours also. Together therefore let us hear the Scripture admonishing and saying, "Seek not higher things, and search not into things stronger than thee" — not because these things are denied us, since the divine Master says, "Nothing is hidden which shall not be revealed," but if we have come to anything, in that let us walk, as the Apostle says, "Not only what we know not and ought to know, but also if we are wise of anything otherwise, this also God will reveal to us." We have come, however, into the way of faith; let us most perseveringly hold this; this will lead us to the chamber of the King in which all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hidden. We must walk, we must progress, we must grow, that our hearts may be capable of those things which we cannot now grasp; if the last day shall find us advancing, we shall there learn what we could not here. If anyone, however, knows that he can expound this question more clearly and better, and has confidence, far be it from me not to be readier to learn than to teach. Whence the very great difficulty of this matter appears.

To this Apostle, however, his co-Apostle Peter agrees, saying: You killed Jesus of Nazareth, whom God raised up, the sorrows of hell being loosed, according as it was impossible that He should be held by it. For David says concerning Him, "I foresaw the Lord before me always, because He is on my right hand that I be not moved; therefore my heart hath been glad, and my tongue hath rejoiced; moreover, my flesh also shall rest in hope, since Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, nor wilt Thou give Thy holy one to see corruption. Thou hast made known to me the ways of life; Thou shalt fill me with joy with Thy face," Acts 2. And behold, greater than both, who says: Scripture cannot be loosed, John 10 — from whom many similar things are alleged in chapter 27 of this book; who also Luke 24 says: It is necessary that all things be fulfilled which are written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms concerning me.

That also prophecies will necessarily be fulfilled, the places of Scripture saying, This and that was done that the Scripture, prophecy, or word of the Prophet might be fulfilled seem to attest: if it behoves or behoved that Scripture be fulfilled, it is necessary that Scripture be fulfilled and similar things. Whence Matthew 1: Now this whole was done — namely the incarnation of Jesus Christ — that there might be fulfilled what was said by the Lord through the Prophet saying: Behold a virgin shall conceive in her womb, &c. Gloss: Prophecy is one thing from the predestination of God, which it is necessary should come to pass in all manners, that it should be fulfilled without our choice, as this one of which here we are treating; another is from the foreknowledge of God, with which our choice is mixed; another is what is called threat, which is made for the sake of a sign of divine animadversion, that the elect may flee from the face of the bow, and the incautious justly perish; and this is not from foreknowledge, because it is foreknown far otherwise than the future is threatened. Which the gloss of Thomas also recites almost under the same words.

And below 21: Now this whole was done, that there might be fulfilled what was said through the Prophet saying: "Tell ye the daughter of Sion: Behold, thy King cometh to thee meek, sitting upon an ass and a colt, the foal of one used to the yoke." And still further below at 26, Peter wishing to defend the Lord about to be taken, He says: "Turn back thy sword, &c. Or thinkest thou that I cannot pray to my Father, and He will exhibit to me presently more than twelve legions of Angels? How then shall the Scriptures of the Prophets be fulfilled, that so it must be done?" Mark 14 also writes: "As to a robber are you come out with swords, &c. Daily I was with you in the Temple teaching, and you laid not hands on me, but that the Scriptures might be fulfilled." Item John 19: They said one to another: Let us not cut it, but let us cast lots for it whose it shall be, that the Scripture might be fulfilled saying: They have parted my garments among them, and on my vesture they have cast lots. And below: That the Scripture might be consummated, He says, "I thirst." Furthermore, Luke 24: O foolish, and slow of heart to believe in all things which the Prophets have spoken! Was it not necessary that Christ should suffer these things, and so to enter into His glory? And John 20: For they did not yet know the Scripture, that

He must rise from the dead. Blessed Peter also in Acts 1 says: Brethren, the Scripture must needs be fulfilled, which the Holy Spirit foretold by the mouth of David concerning Judas.

This word must, however, imports necessity. Whence Isidore on that of Luke 24, Was it not necessary that Christ should suffer these things, as is alleged in the gloss of Thomas, says: But if it behoved Christ to suffer, yet they who crucified Him are guilty: for they were not striving to perfect what God had disposed; whence also their execution was impious. And behold, greater than Isidore, Jesus Christ, expounding behooves through it is necessary: These, He says, are the words which I spoke unto you while I was yet with you — namely in mortal flesh, according to Bede — because it is necessary that all things be fulfilled which are written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me, Luke 24. And when He was with them in mortal flesh, He said to them that it behoved the Son of Man to suffer many things, and to rise again, as is plain Matt. 16, Mark 8, and Luke 9. And it is verisimilar that He not only simply foretold this to them, but also showed it through the Scriptures, as Luke manifestly indicates. Hence Matthew at the same place: Jesus began to show His disciples that He must go to Jerusalem and suffer many things; and Mark 8: He began to teach them that the Son of Man must suffer many things, &c.; and below 9: He said to them, "How is it written of the Son of Man that He shall suffer many things"; and Luke 18: Jesus took the twelve, and said to them, "Behold we go up to Jerusalem, and all things shall be accomplished which were written by the Prophets concerning the Son of Man, for He shall be delivered to the Gentiles, &c."

Hence according to the most true exposition of truth, behoove and be necessary are the same, which is also plain from His words in Luke 24: O foolish, and slow, &c. Was it not necessary that Christ should suffer these things, &c.; and beginning from Moses and all the Prophets, &c. And below the same: It is necessary that all things be fulfilled which are written in the law of Moses and the Prophets, &c. And still further below: Then He opened their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures; and He said to them, "Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, &c." It therefore appears evidently that He uses these words alternately and indifferently for the same sense, and that the true sense and the true understanding of the Scriptures is that all the prophetic Scriptures concerning Christ behoved necessarily to be fulfilled.

The same evidently appears through the common manner of speaking of almost all the Prophets: for they frequently predict future things in the manner of the past, and under words of past time, as very many prophecies show — which they do, according to the exposition of the Doctors, because such things are at least as certain with God and with the Prophet as if they were past and already done. Whence the Prophet in Psalm 3, in the person of Christ, says: I have slept and taken my rest, and I have arisen. Upon which Augustine in De Civitate Dei XVII, 18: Or perhaps anyone is so foolish as to believe that the Prophet wished to indicate to us as something great, that he had slept and arisen, unless that sleep were death, and the awakening were resurrection — which thus could be prophesied of Christ? For also in the fortieth [Psalm] much more manifestly is this shown, where, in the person of the same Mediator, in the customary manner, things future were predicted as things past — since what was to come, was already done in the predestination and foreknowledge of God: "My enemies", he says, "spoke evils of me, &c."

The same on that of Psalm 43, For Thou hast saved us from those that afflict us, &c.: This, he says, is said in the figure of past for future; but it is therefore said as past, because it is so certain as if it had been done. Note why most Prophets speak as if past things, when future things, not yet done, are foretold. For also concerning the Lord Himself the future Passion was foretold, and yet, "They have dug", He said, "my hands and my feet, they have numbered all my bones": He did not say "they shall dig" and "they shall number"; "But they themselves have considered and looked upon me": He did not say "they shall consider" and "they shall look"; "They have divided my garments": He did not say "they shall divide". All these things are said as past, when they are future, because to God even future things are as certain as if they were past — for to us things which are past are certain, and things which are future are uncertain: for we know that something has happened, and it cannot be that what happened did not happen. Give a Prophet to whom the future is not as certain as the past is to thee, and as that which thou rememberest happened cannot be that it did not happen, so to him what he knows is future cannot be that it does not happen. Whereon Cassiodorus: "Thou alone wilt save us, and Thou wilt confound those who hate us" — so it would seem ought to be said; but since the future is so certain as the past, which cannot not have been, he says, "Thou hast saved", "Thou hast confounded".

Item, Augustine expounding the title of Psalm 84: The Prophet sings, he says, into the future, and uses words as of already past time; he speaks as if done what was about to be done, because with God even what is future is already done; there therefore the Prophet was seeing things future to us, but already done in His most certain providence and predestination. The same in De Agone Christiano: Thus the Scriptures speak, that they insinuate past time for future, just as that which the Apostle said, "He has made us sit together in the heavenlies" — has not yet been done, but because it is most certainly future, it is so said as if it were already done. The same in De correptione et gratia 33, treating that authority of the Apostle, Romans 8, Whom He predestined, them He also called, &c.: Not in all, he says, have these things been done: for still even unto the end of the age many are to be called and to be justified; and yet he placed words of past time even of future things, as if God had done them — which He so disposed from eternity to be done. Therefore concerning Him says also the Prophet Isaiah, "Who has done the things which are to come"; therefore future things prophetic are with God in eternity as past, therefore also firmed by similar necessity.

For which reason also immediately in chapter 34 from these things he concludes: Whoever therefore are foreknown, predestined, called, justified, and glorified in the most provident disposition of God — I do not say even those not yet reborn, but even those not yet born — already are sons of God, and therefore can in no way perish. With whom also concordantly Anselm in De Concordia III, treating the same authority, says thus: In order that the same Apostle should show that he did not place those words for temporal signification, even those things which are future, he uttered with the word of past time. For not yet did He temporally call, justify, magnify those whom He foreknew as still about to be born; whence it can be known that He, on account of the indigence of a word signifying eternal presence, used words of past signification, since the things which in time are past are altogether immutable to the likeness of the eternal present. In this indeed they are more like the eternal present, things temporally past, than things present: since those which are there, namely in eternity, can never not be present — just as things past in time can never not be past; but things present in time, all things which pass, become non-present. Therefore future things prophesied of this kind with God in eternity, and past in time, are firmed by similar necessity.

Furthermore, if prophecies could be falsified, and now not be true, nor ever have been true, no one ought to assert them most firmly, nor with a simple oath; for they are not most firmly true, and he would expose himself to the danger of perjury and sin. But what Catholic, for the conversion of one unbeliever unwilling to be converted to the Catholic faith, except by most firm assertion and with absolute and simple oath concerning the resurrection and final beatification, would doubt to do these things? — just as the Lord did frequently, saying, Amen, amen, I say to you, that thus and thus it shall be; just as the Prophets also frequently say, The Lord has sworn this and that. With what great security also the Apostle says, Although we, or an Angel from Heaven, should preach to you besides what we have preached to you, let him be anathema; the cause of which after a few he subjoins: I make known to you, brethren, the Gospel that has been preached by me, that it is not according to man; for neither did I receive it from man, nor did I learn it, but through the revelation of Jesus Christ, Galatians 1. Gloss: Note that he therefore says "we, or an Angel" who can be understood as good, not because this should ever happen, but he is certain from God concerning the truth of his Gospel; which even if an Angel should announce otherwise, he would not believe, but would anathematize.

Furthermore, if the Prophets can be falsified, so also can sacred Scripture; therefore sacred Theology is more uncertain, weaker, lower, and less worthy than other faculties which cannot. Again, if sacred Scripture can be falsified, what security do we have in this life? For this is the teacher and leader, mirror and register of all human life. What security is possible to a man in the divine promises, if God can — without lie, fault, or cause — cut off, violate, scrape away, cancel, infringe, and falsify any book, any pact, any chirograph, any instrument however solemnized with witnesses, signs, even an oath, any testament even firmed by the death of the testator? How then could a contract with Him be safe? Indeed, incomparably less safe would a contract be for a man with God, who cannot lie and sin, than with another man, who can do these things. For God, if according to the hypothesis He can [do] the opposite of any pact of promise whatever, can do this without duplicity or change, without lying, perjury, or sin, and can never have so contracted; but no man so can; therefore any man can have remedy and recourse against any man so contracting and not fulfilling the contract, by suing him for perjury, for violation of faith and contract.

This therefore seems to vary the most beautiful uniform color of sacred Scripture with foul stains, to change its most pleasing odor with putrid fumes, to leaven its sweetest taste with venomous draughts. Concerning men of this way, therefore, the Apostle did not keep silent: They have changed, he says, the truth of God into a lie, Romans 1; and 2 Corinthians 2: We are not as very many adulterating the word of God: for these things they do who change truthful Scripture into mendacious, and Scripture, an incorrupt virgin, into an adulterous harlot. Not so its Author and witnesses. Scripture cannot be loosed, says Christ, which the Father has sanctified and sent into the world, John 10. Nor is it doubtful to any Christian, but that the testimony of the Lord is faithful. For He Himself is the faithful witness in heaven; therefore His testimonies are made very credible. This also is plainly proved by what was alleged above from Psalm 88. Hence also Augustine on that of Psalm 144, The Lord is faithful in His words, says: What did He promise, and not give? Some things He still has promised, and not given; but let Him be believed from those things which He has given. We could believe Him simply saying; He did not wish to be believed simply saying, but wished His Scripture to be held; just as if you should say to some man, when you promised something, "Do you not believe me? Behold, I write to thee." For since "generation goes, and generation comes," and so these ages run by, mortal men yielding and succeeding, the Scripture of God ought to remain, and a kind of chirograph of God which all passing should read, and hold the way of His promise; and how many are the things which He has rendered from this chirograph! Men doubt to believe Him concerning the resurrection of the dead, and the future age, which alone now remains to be rendered; through all generations He has rendered the things which were written, and what remains is not believed Him, with all these things rendered? Behold, you have made the calculation: He has rendered so great things; surely on account of a few remnants He has not become unfaithful? Far be it! Why? Because the Lord is faithful in His words, and holy in all His works. Behold what Augustine expressly supposes — that if God should not render the things promised in the chirograph of sacred Scripture, He becomes unfaithful; but this is a manifest impossibility; therefore it is necessary that He faithfully render whatever through His canonical Scripture He has repromised.

CHAPTER XLVIII

HE RECITES FOUR RESPONSES, AND CORRECTS THEM.

Here, however, occur many petty stubborn responses. For some, wishing to excuse God from all lying, say that although God has predicted, promised, and sworn anything to men in the proper kind, it is yet possible that He never did such a thing. This, however, even if according to some fancy it seems possible to be said of God, cannot yet be said of Christ according to the human nature, as was shown in chapters 44 and 45 of this book. For although it would seem this could be said of God revealing in the Word, yet it cannot be said of Him revealing in the proper kind: for such revelation is some created thing, signifying naturally in one mode, as chapter 44 of this book teaches; therefore it is necessary that every such past revelation already was, and signified naturally in that mode. Let therefore such a revelation be made, that A. will be; then if it be possible that A. not be, it is consequently possible that when God asserted and swore it, He did this against His mind, since He always knows all things; therefore also He had lied, and was perjured, and had also deceived His most beloved without fault — against what was shown earlier. It can also similarly, and perhaps more probably, be argued concerning the present.

Item, then no faith, or the least, would be to be applied to the divine promises, even those by oath, and less than to human ones, as in chapters 45 and previous it was argued. Item, this is expressly against the authorities from Psalm 88 and its expositions, and other similar ones recited in the previous chapter; it is also against what was shown earlier in chapter 32 of the second of this book. Item, then what God revealed to one understanding in the proper kind, He could have revealed not to that one but to another — against what was had before in chapter 45 of this book. Item, by the same reason what God never revealed in the proper kind to Isaiah, He can have revealed to him, and not only to him, but also to any other person whatever; therefore he who never was a Prophet can now have been a Prophet. God can also by similar reason never have instituted those things which truly were and are the Ecclesiastical Sacraments to the effect of salvation, but have instituted others; therefore past faithful ones can not have been on the way of salvation, nor saved, and past unfaithful ones can have been so. By like reason God can now not have commanded what once He commanded; therefore he who only by acting against that sinned, and received damnation, can never have sinned nor have been damned. Otherwise an impotent man, by sinning, would necessitate omnipotent God to have once commanded something. Furthermore, if God can not have predicted or promised the future, He can also [not have predicted or promised] the past, namely the incarnation, passion, and the like — which does not seem [right]; He can also by similar reason not have foreseen or foreknown past things; therefore also consequently past things can not have been, as the whole appears from chapters 30 and 31 of this book.

Others, however, say that what God revealed in the proper kind to one understanding, He can have revealed not to that one but to another. This response will be reproved just as the previous one, which can also be refuted by what was had before in chapter 45 of this book; which also similarly the authorities from Psalm 88 and its expositions, and other similar ones alleged in the previous chapter, destroy. Others, however, hold that God never reveals a future contingent in the proper kind, except under some condition tacit or expressed. But these do not avoid the difficulty. For although God in fact had not revealed something absolutely without a condition — namely, of any kind whatever — He could yet so reveal something. For so He knows many futures, and so the Father has revealed to the Son, and to the Spirit of both, and to the man Christ Jesus, as can be had from chapters 34 and 42 of this book; who also can be reduced to truth through what was had before in the correction of a similar response in chapter 45 of this book. And if anyone shall not yet blush to be stubborn, saying that God can have revealed and asserted in the proper kind to a man under a condition at least tacitly understood that which He revealed and asserted absolutely, he will be corrected — as I hope — through the same things by which a similar response in chapter 45 of this book was corrected; he can also be reduced through the same things by which the first response of this chapter was reduced from going astray and from error.

All the responses also premised are insufficient and in many ways diminished. For although they perhaps seem to answer some one reason or authority, or to a few, yet to many other ones they have no appearance of answering, as is clear to anyone considering these and those distinctly.

CHAPTER XLIX

HE RECITES A DOUBLE OPINION SAYING THAT IN REVEALED FUTURE THINGS THERE IS ORDAINED OR ABSOLUTE NECESSITY; IN OTHERS, HOWEVER, NONE.

Some, however, weighing more diligently the reasons and authorities premised, and seeing that they cannot avoid all-encompassing necessity in future things — somehow drawn and attracted by truth itself to necessity — approach more nearly, and confess that in some future things there is some kind of necessity: namely, in things divinely revealed, divinely prophesied, and divinely promised. And these are further divided into a double sect. For these hold that in such future things there is only ordained necessity, and that they cannot fail to come to pass de potentia ordinata, but that they can fail de potentia absoluta; those, however, [hold that there is] indefectible absolute necessity, which by no power can fail of coming to pass.

And because such sayings as, It is necessary that the Antichrist will be, by ordained necessity, and, It is impossible that the Antichrist will not be, de potentia ordinata, have an ambiguous and obscure meaning, some of the first sect thus clarify and expound them: It is ordained that the Antichrist will be. But these deviate and rave triply. First, because they expound badly: for how is one [proposition] of necessity sufficiently expounded by one such simple [proposition] of inesse, since necesse esse simply includes esse, and adds [something] beyond it as antecedent over its non-convertible consequent — or, if it is necessary, it adds nothing there beyond simple being, [and thus] loses its hitherto-customary signification, and is there placed in vain; nor is such a proposition modal, which seems neither of the old logic nor of the new, but rather of a bastard or of none?

Secondly, because they do not avoid the difficulty: for let necessary and possible and their opposites be taken as among logicians and theologians they are commonly wont to be taken — as I have taken in the premises — and the difficulty returns. Thirdly, because they are inconsistent with themselves. For if it is necessary that the Antichrist will be because it is ordained that he will be, since concerning all future things it has been ordained by the divine will that they will be — as the corollary of the ninth, the fourteenth, and twenty-third of the first teach — concerning all future things it is necessary that they will be, in the same understanding; though concerning some they concede this, concerning others they deny it.

Others, however, of the same sect, expound these things differently, saying: It is necessary that the Antichrist will be by ordained necessity, that is, if the law and Scripture divinely ordained ought to stand fixed, it is necessary that the Antichrist will be — and thus of others predicted in the law. But these sin similarly in many ways. For according to these it is necessary that God do what He promised in the law to do, by such ordained necessity; therefore the law, or the promise of God written in the law, and thus something extrinsic, necessitates God and the divine will to doing something. But how could a small thing of small power bind and necessitate the Omnipotent of infinite power? And how would He not thus be of less power and of more servile condition than a man, who cannot thus be necessitated? How also, if it were thus, would He not be mutable? For He would be changed from free into not-free, and from not-necessary into necessary. To this also resist plainly what was shown earlier in chapter 21 of the first and 33 of the third. By the same reason, also, by which the law would necessitate God to will and do anything, [it would also] make Him impotent to similar things. By similar reason, moreover, God could will and do something de potentia ordinata, and could not [will and do] something so. But how does the omnipotent Creator receive power or impotence from a weak creature?

Furthermore, when they say, It is necessary that this be in the future, if the law ought to stand fixed, either they understand and suppose that it is necessary that the law stand fixed, or not — but [rather] that it is possible for it to be loosed. If it is necessary that it stand, the law itself is necessary, and from the necessary law it follows that the Antichrist will be; therefore by what was had before in chapter 30 of this book, it is now necessary, and not contingent in either direction, that he will be. If, however, it be said that it is necessary that the law stand by ordained necessity, not absolute, then either it is necessary that that ordained necessity stand, or not. If so, and from that follows the law of Scripture, and from this, that the Antichrist will be; therefore still it is necessary that the Antichrist will be, as above was argued. If it be said that it is necessary that that ordained necessity stand by ordained necessity, not absolute, as before, either there will be an infinite process in such ordained necessities — which nature abhors, reason flees, and the second supposition plainly forbids — or only finite, and there will be some first such ordained necessity; and if it is necessary that that one stand, and from it follows the whole series and that the Antichrist will be, therefore it is necessary that the Antichrist will be. If, however, that ordained necessity, or any other by which it is necessary that the law stand, is not necessary to stand, neither is the law necessary to stand, since it has no necessity from elsewhere. If, moreover, it is not necessary that the law stand fixed and true, but it is possible for it to be loosed and falsified, it is similarly possible that revelations be falsified, and so the inconveniences deduced from chapter 42 of this book up to here return. Item, if the law is loosable, it stands contingently in either direction; how then can one [proposition] of necessity be inferred from one contingent [proposition] of inesse? What therefore is it that they say, if the law will stand, it is necessary that the Antichrist will be?

If, however, they shall say that there is only the necessity of consequence, or conditional [necessity], what difficulty therefore do they empty or evade? Indeed, they are also found contrary to themselves. For thus they have to say consequently of any future things whatsoever, that they are necessarily about to be in the future: for that all those things will be necessarily follows from one contingent [proposition] of inesse, namely such a one: These things will be. Furthermore, arguing from the start, these are inconsistent with themselves. For if all things predicted in the law of sacred Scripture will come to pass de necessitate ordinata, much more all things predicted, prescribed, and preordained in the eternal law, in the eternal book, in the divine will and mind, will come to pass by such ordained necessity, since the omnipotent will of God in no way can fail or be frustrated, as chapter 10 of the first teaches. But all future things are eternally preordained, and prescribed, and predicted in the divine will and mind, as the corollary of the ninth, the fourteenth, and twenty-third of the first, with the thirty-fourth of this book, lucidly manifest. Therefore all future things will come to pass by such ordained necessity — though concerning some they concede this, namely the things predicted in sacred Scripture, but concerning others they deny it.

Those, moreover, who profess the other sect, positing in all and only divinely revealed, prophesied, and promised things indefectible necessity, and after such things shall have been, absolute [necessity], so that by no power can they fail to come to pass, go astray in two things. First, because they affirm a falsehood; secondly, because — granted this — they do not avoid the difficulty. First, I say, they affirm a falsehood, namely that God is newly necessitated and bound, as can be had from the things adduced against the response just recited. Who also would dare to say that the Omnipotent, and on every side infinitely perfect, is less powerful, less perfect, less free now than before, in one occurrence than in another, namely after He has revealed or predicted something than before — since, James testifying, with Him there is no transmutation, nor shadow of vicissitude, James 1? Which also chapter 5 of the first shows. Who also would dare to say that the Omnipotent could come to such impotence, that He could not once raise one straw, if yet He will never raise any straw, and this He reveal or say to anyone — He cannot do this? Who also of Christians would dare to say that Christ, indeed and the whole Trinity with the whole army of Angels, could not have preserved Him from death, and that Christ could not still have prayed the Father, and the Father not have heard the Son? Who would deny the Gospel, and the most truthful voice of truth saying, Or thinkest thou that I cannot pray to my Father; and He will exhibit to me presently more than twelve legions of Angels? Matt. 26. Who finally would dare to set his mouth against heaven, and so impiously blaspheme as to say that God is not omnipotent — against all symbols, and against all sacred Scripture, and against the first supposition of the first? Whoever also shall presume to say this, has further to say with the foolish, There is no God: for if He is not omnipotent, He is not God, as the first supposition of the first teaches.

Furthermore, if the revelation in the proper kind, if a word in the air, if one breath of weakest being in the ether, imposes necessity on God and on future things, much more incomparably the intrinsic eternal Word of God, by which He has eternally said and says all future things, and His intrinsic and eternal revelation, by which the Father has eternally revealed and reveals all future things to the Son and to the Holy Spirit, as chapter 34 of this book has shown more fully. Furthermore, let such revelation or prediction concerning the future be corrupted, and every such necessity is corrupted, and the whole difficulty returns. Item, then the cause of that necessity would be the prophetic revelation or prediction. But how does one prophesying in London concerning the free future acts of a man who is in Rome — for instance, of the Pope or Emperor — necessitate him to his free acts, since he does nothing at all concerning him? How also, if the Prophet dies before the one of whom he prophesied is born, does he necessitate him? And if anyone resort to God, and to the divine action and necessitation, I suppose that God after the prophecy does nothing else concerning him about whom it was prophesied than otherwise He would have done: for He knows what otherwise He would have done.

That also prophecy or any prediction whatsoever imposes necessity is against the Philosopher in Peri Hermeneias I, last [chapter], saying thus: Nor does this differ, if anyone says the negation, or does not say it; for it is manifest that thus the matter stands; or if this one shall affirm, but that one deny; for not on account of affirming or denying will it be or will it not be. With which concordantly the Gloss on Matthew 1, Now this whole was done, that there might be fulfilled what was said by the Lord through the Prophet saying, "Behold a virgin shall conceive in her womb, &c.", the Gloss of Thomas reciting, says thus: It can be said that "that" is not placed causally; for it was not therefore fulfilled because it was predicted, but rather it was therefore predicted because it was about to be fulfilled. Let it be placed consecutively, just as in Genesis: "He hung the other on the gallows, that the truth of the diviner might be proved" — because, with one hung, the truth of the diviner was proved; so also in this place it must be understood that, this being done which was predicted, the prophecy has been fulfilled. Which yet according to this series in the old gloss I have not found, but I have found thus in it: Prophecy is a sign of God's foreknowledge. Because what He says is certainly foreknown by God, and therefore ought to be held by man; but no sign of what it designates effects, but only signifies what it shows; just as prophecy does not make the necessity of the things which it predicts, but is a sign of the foreknowledge of God. And below: There is not a necessity of things from the speech of the Prophets, but only the exhibition of truth; prophecy does not make the necessity of the things which it says, but is a sign of the foreknowledge of God.

Furthermore, even if it were true what they say, in no way would it unwrap the perplexity of this wrapping, but would rather wrap it up, and entangle it more manifoldly. For let God reveal to Christ or to Michael concerning all future things that these will be; then according to the hypothesis of necessity all those things will be. Again, let God reveal to anyone, or predict, that this Paul the wayfarer will freely and contingently in either direction do this A. act, and this without any condition tacit or expressed; for God can do this, since He so knows whatever future things, which can also be shown by what was premised in chapters 48 and 45 of this book; therefore Paul will do A. freely and contingently equally, because so it was predicted, and even necessarily, because according to the hypothesis all things divinely revealed and predicted will of necessity come to pass. God also predicts to someone the merits and sins, the salvation and damnation, of this and that one; then those things will of necessity come to pass; therefore also the positors of this hypothesis have to concede that necessity does not repugn liberty of contradiction and contingency in either direction, with merit and sin and the like, but [that they] are amicably associated together — which yet they wholly strive to avoid.

Still further, heaping errors on errors, they answer further, affirming that God cannot reveal singulars, especially in contingent matter. But by so saying, they too narrowly straiten, mutilate, and curtail the most ample omnipotence of God; or if they should wish this and not be able [to do otherwise], what prohibits omnipotent God to say and assert some singular contingent — and this singularly — which He, as He most certainly knows, [knows] to be true? What prohibits God from revealing in the proper kind to Christ, Mary, or Michael some singular contingent, just as He reveals it in the Word? Who would dare to say that Christ did not know, nor could God have revealed to Him in the proper kind, those whom or whom He came to redeem, and redeemed; for whom or for whom He prayed, and many other things did? Who would dare to say that Christ never knew, nor even one of the wayfarers to be saved or damned — since He Himself says, I know whom I have chosen, John 13? Who also specially prayed for Peter, that his faith should not fail, Luke 22. Who also would presume to affirm that Christ did not know that Judas would betray Him, and finally be damned? Who would so contradict the Gospels?

Or who would presume to affirm that Christ could not have said, This man shall do this, and that man shall do that, since concerning Judas He predicted that he would betray Him, and incur the woe of damnation; and concerning Peter, that he would deny Him, as the Evangelists testify; and concerning Paul, that he would bear His name before the Gentiles, and the kings, sons of Israel, Acts 9? Why also could not such a singular be revealed and predicted, since this is not from a defect of active power in God, who would reveal — as no one is ignorant — nor from a defect of passive and receptive power in an Angel or man who would receive the revelation, nor from a defect of singular such revelation power, since God could supply these defects from the plenitude of power. And a man can himself or through another man adhere to such a singular proposition; a man can also, just as it is possible for a man to reveal to another such a proposition: there is therefore here and there the requisite power. Even if a man through himself or through another can [do] these things, much more through God, and God through him.

What also is the reason of the diversity, or the diversity of reason, why God can reveal and say singulars about past and present, and not about the future, since He knows all things intrinsically, equally certainly, as the thirty-first of this book shows? These also seem to have neglected both Testaments. To recount, however, a few of many: Behold, in Genesis it is manifestly written what and what kind of things God predicted and promised to Abraham as to be fulfilled in him and in his seed: Genesis 12, 15, and 17; where He singularly specifies that in a son named Isaac, whom Sarah was to bear to him at this time, in another year — namely, the next then following — and not any Sarah whatever, but Sarah his only wife — to whom also He promised that from Isaac nations and Kings and peoples would arise. Where also concerning Ishmael it is foretold and promised in this way: I will multiply him exceedingly; he shall beget twelve Dukes; concerning whom likewise above 16: He shall be wild, &c. This promise of Isaac as a holocaust, with a most firm oath now performed and confirmed by the Lord through Himself, [is] below 22.

What also could be revealed or predicted more singularly than what the Lord through Joseph revealed concerning the Cup-bearer and the Baker of King Pharaoh, Genesis 40? What more singular than that prophetic blessing by which Jacob blessed Ephraim and Manasseh with hands exchanged, Genesis 48? What more singular than the Lord's so many predictions concerning Moses and Aaron, and Pharaoh and their works, which the beginning of Exodus plainly writes? What more singular than the prediction of the rejection of Moses from the leadership of the people into the promised land, and his death, and the substitution of Joshua, and the introduction through him, as the History of Numbers and Deuteronomy manifests? What more singular than the revelation concerning Saul, 1 Kings 9 and 10, and the revelation concerning David, 1 Kings 16, and afterwards frequently? What more singular than the revelation made to Jeroboam through Ahijah, that he would reign over the ten tribes of Israel, 3 Kings 11? And below 13: concerning Josiah and the altar at Bethel? And further on, 22, and 2 Chronicles 18: concerning Zedekiah and Ahab not returning from battle, through Micaiah?

What more singular than this prophetic prediction of Elisha: At this time, tomorrow, a measure of fine flour shall be at one stater, and two measures of barley at one stater, in the gate of Samaria; and to a certain leader not believing: Thou shalt see with thine eyes, and shalt not eat thereof, 4 Kings 7? Or what more special than the prophesying of Elisha concerning Hazael, who would reign and do evils, in the same chapter 8? What also more singular than the prophecies concerning Babylon, Jerusalem, Zedekiah, Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, Cyrus, and many others through Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and the other Prophets? These are a few from the Old Testament. Now, however, from the New, some brief things are to be briefly proffered.

Who is ignorant of the most singular promises, predictions, and prophecies concerning John the precursor, and concerning the Lord the Saviour, and concerning the glorious Virgin? Who has not heard or read that of Gabriel in Luke 1: Thy wife Elizabeth shall bear to thee a son, and thou shalt call his name John, &c. He shall be great before the Lord, and wine and strong drink he shall not drink, &c.; and that of Zachariah: Thou, child, shalt be called the Prophet of the Most High, &c.? And that of Gabriel again: Behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and shalt bear a son, and shalt call his name Jesus; He shall be great, &c., and the rest of the glorious things? And that of Elizabeth: Blessed art thou that hast believed, because those things shall be perfected which were said to thee? And that of the glorious Virgin: All generations shall call me blessed? And that of Simeon: Behold, this child is set for the ruin and for a sign which shall be contradicted, and a sword shall pierce thy own soul also, Luke 2?

Or who is ignorant of what and what kind of things Christ predicted that He would do and suffer? Or how He predicted that Judas would betray Him, that Peter would deny Him and similarly follow [Him] through martyrdom, and that John, whom He loved, would so remain until He should come, as the Evangelists testify? That also Paul would bear His name before the Gentiles and Kings and sons of Israel, and how much it behoved him to suffer for the name of Christ, as the history of Acts 9 teaches? Concerning whom also below 21, Agabus prophesied sufficiently singularly.

Furthermore, [it is] not doubtfully but most certainly to be affirmed [that] every true prophecy, even though uttered generally, was understood, and predicted, salutarily by the same Holy Spirit who spoke through the Prophets specially and distinctly — indeed singularly and discreetly — concerning that one or those of whom or which it has been, is, or will be fulfilled. For otherwise He would speak ignorantly, uncertainly, in vain, and foolishly. Which by one brief example I reckon sufficient to confirm. Blessed Peter says: Brethren, the Scripture must needs be fulfilled, which the Holy Spirit foretold by the mouth of David concerning Judas, &c. For it is written in the book of Psalms: Let his commemoration — or according to the truer text, Let his habitation — be made desolate, and let no one dwell in it; and let another receive his bishopric, Acts 1. These things, however, in the book of Psalms, namely Psalm 108, were prophesied generally; therefore prophecies prophesied generally necessitate as much as those prophesied singularly; and whatever the Holy Spirit prophesied generally, He could also have prophesied singularly.

These things therefore [are advanced] against the thirty-third opinion, and against its premised hypothesis. For which reason it seems much to be wondered at, and how admirably to be admired, how grave men dare in so great a matter posit so plainly so great a supposition — so dubious, so uncertain — indeed, [one] which so probably appears false, and its opposite true — as if it were a self-evident first principle. For it seems worthy that it should be a conclusion demonstrated by violent reasonings, not a supposition assumed gratuitously. And if anyone shall wish to prove it, let him weigh, I beseech, faithfully both the proper reasons and the contrary reasons.

Thomas Bradwardine, De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium

Book III, Chapter L

He responds, in accordance with the judgment of the Philosophers and Theologians, that God necessarily wills and knows whatever He wills and knows by a consequent necessity—of immutability, immobility, stability, and ordained necessity—not by an antecedent and absolutely simple necessity, not a natural, violent, or unwilling necessity, not contrary, but consonant with the highest and greatest liberty.

Good Master, sole Master, Master and Lord, who from my youth—when, with thy inspiration, I undertook this work—hast taught me thus far all the truths I have learned and which I have written with thy pen: even now, most loving Lord, send forth thy light, that thou who hast led me into this most profound abyss mayest thyself bring me up onto the mountain of this inaccessible truth; thou who hast led me into this widest sea, lead me to harbor; and thou who hast led me into this longest and pathless desert, do thou, who art guide, way, and end alike, lead me to the end. O Lord of knowledges, who hast the key of the pit of the abyss, who hast the key of knowledge, who hast the key of David, who openest and no man shutteth, who shuttest and no man openeth, who alone art worthy to take the book and to loose its seals: show, I pray, most learned of teachers, the solution of a word so intricately bound, to thy little child who knows no way out. Now, however, I give thanks to thee, most serene Lord, who hast granted to him that asked, hast shown to him that sought, hast opened to him that knocked the door of mercy, the door of clarity, the door of truth. For now, with thee illuminating thy face upon thy servant, as in a certain brightness of eternal light and a spotless mirror of the divine majesty, I seem to see that this is the most correct solution of this word, which long ago thou wast pleased to show to thy beloved sons and disciples—our most worthy Fathers and Masters: for in them was a more abundant spirit of thine, prudence and intelligence, the interpretation of dreams, the disclosure of secrets, and the loosing of things bound. Now these set down a twofold necessity, namely antecedent and consequent, and said it is necessary that God will and know whatever He wills and knows—by consequent necessity, but in no way by antecedent necessity, as is more fully recounted in chapter twenty-eight of this book.

Furthermore, that I may the more briefly and clearly set forth what God has taught me, let it be known that in the divine will ad extra—that is, with respect to its posterior objects of willing—there is no antecedent necessity, but the highest contingency to either alternative, and the supreme freedom of contradiction, than which none greater can be conceived, as appears from the fourth chapter of this book, and from the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth parts of the fifth. Yet a certain concomitant or consequent necessity is in it. For just as the present act of the will of most mutable man, with respect to any object whatever—present, past, or future—although it be contingent and free (and even if, according to the opinion of certain ones, it were as contingent and free as the act of the divine will, and were not produced by God but by man's own most free will alone), nevertheless when it exists, it is necessary that it exist by this consequent necessity—so also is the act of the divine will, which is altogether immutable, as the twenty-third chapter of Book One teaches, necessary, I say, by a consequent and present necessity, as has been more fully shown from the second supposition of the consequent necessity of Anselm in chapter twenty-eight of this book. The points laid out in chapter thirty of this third book show the same: for the act of the divine will with respect to a present or past thing is necessary; therefore also with respect to a future thing. For it is not made newly necessary by the presence or pastness of the thing, nor by anything extrinsic or intrinsic, as was shown there. Therefore it is eternally and always necessary by its own proper and intrinsic firmness—that firmness whereby, generally, everything that is, when it is, must be; and specifically, just as the present act of an angelic or human will with respect to an object of any temporal difference, when it is, must be—so also the present act of the divine will, with respect to any temporal difference, while it is, must be.

All these things can be reduced more briefly to syllogistic form thus:

Every will altogether intrinsically immutable, once free or necessary with respect to any object whatever, is always free or necessary with respect to it; the divine will is of this kind.

Or thus:

Every will not newly necessitable from without nor from within, once necessary with respect to anything willed, is always necessary with respect to it; the divine will is of this kind.

Furthermore, lest in matter so hidden and dangerous, so transcendent and unsearchable, so closed and sealed, I—so very small a person—should seem to dream up something singularly out of the shadowy fantasy of my own head, behold most sound minds, most lucid geniuses, most famous Authors, Catholic Doctors—some explicitly, some implicitly, all in concord—setting forth this judgment.

Hermes Trismegistus indeed (thrice greatest, Father of the Philosophers), in De verbo aeterno 9, says: "Necessity follows the decree of God; the effect accompanies His will." And the reason for what was earlier said follows: "For neither is it credible that what has pleased God will displease Him, since He long beforehand foreknew that this same thing would come to pass and would please." With this judgment also accord his other sayings, written in chapter twenty-seven of this book.

May not those obscure words of Plato in Timaeus 17 also be expounded concerning this consequent necessity, where he says: "Now since we have set forth all things, with very few exceptions, which the understanding of the Mind has established, we must speak also of those things which Necessity introduces; for the generation of the sensible world has been constituted as mixed, from the assembly of necessity and intelligence, intellect and salutary persuasion holding sway and continually drawing the rigor of necessity to the best acts. And so, with necessity overcome and yielding to the providential authorities, the first beginnings of things and of the world were established." Yet it is true that both of these sayings could be understood concerning the efficacious necessity in the divine will set forth in chapters 27 and 28 of this book; just as many things said there can also be conveniently understood of this consequent necessity. For necessity, according to what was set down in chapter 27 of this book—and as the foregoing words of Plato seem to attest—was posited among the Greek Philosophers as a famous principle of beings, and in God; which some expounded in this way, others in that, and certain others in both, and all not badly. For it can fittingly be understood and expounded in either way.

Anselm, the great Philosopher of Christ, Archbishop of Canterbury, imitating these in Cur Deus Homo II.17, and in De Concordia 2 and 3, explicitly and in plain terms denies antecedent necessity in God, but affirms and demonstrates this consequent necessity, as has been briefly shown in the second member of the distinction concerning consequent necessity in chapter twenty-eight of this book. But that the great testimony of so great a man may be more fully published, behold thus does he speak finally: "The Virgin who was made clean through faith—that He might be assumed from her—by no means believed He would die except because He willed it; just as she had learned through the Prophet who said of Him: He was offered because He Himself willed it. Wherefore, since her faith was true, it was necessary that things should be as she believed. But if it troubles you again that I say it was necessary, remember that the truth of the Virgin's faith was not the cause that He should die, but rather, because this was to come to pass, true faith existed. Hence if it is said that it was necessary that He should die by His own will, because the true faith or prophecy which had preceded concerning this was true, this is no different than to say it was necessary that thus it should come to pass, because thus it would come to pass. But this kind of necessity does not compel the thing to be; rather, the being of the thing causes the necessity to be. For there is an antecedent necessity, which is the cause that a thing is, and there is a consequent necessity, which the thing causes. Antecedent and efficient necessity is, when it is said the heaven turns because it is necessary that it be turned; but consequent necessity, which effects nothing but is brought about, is when I say that you speak of necessity because you speak. For when I say this, I signify that nothing can bring it about that, while you speak, you do not speak—not that something compels you to speak. For the violence of natural condition compels the heaven to be turned, but no necessity makes you to speak. But wherever there is antecedent necessity, there is also consequent; not however wherever there is consequent, there immediately is also antecedent. For we can say it is necessary that the heaven be turned because it is turned; but it is not similarly true that therefore you speak because it is necessary that you speak. This consequent necessity runs through all times in this manner: whatever has been, it is necessary to have been; whatever is, it is necessary to be, and necessary to have been about to be; and whatever is to come, it is necessary that it shall come to pass. This is that necessity which, where Aristotle treats of singular and future propositions, seems to destroy 'either alternative' and to assert that all things are by necessity—by this consequent and inefficient necessity. Since, then, faith and prophecy concerning Christ were true, because by will, not by necessity, He was about to die, it was necessary that thus it should be. By this He was made man; by this He did and suffered whatever He did and suffered; by this He willed whatever He willed. For therefore by necessity they were, because they were going to be; and they were going to be because they had been; and they had been because they had been. And if you wish to know the true necessity of all the things He did and suffered, know that all were by necessity because He Himself willed them; but no necessity preceded His will. Wherefore if they were not save because He Himself willed them, if He had not willed them, they would not have been. Thus, then, no man took His soul from Him, but He Himself laid it down and again took it up, because He had power to lay down His soul and again to take it up, as He Himself says."

Behold how, according to the foregoing, he posits a similar consequent necessity in the intrinsic acts of God with respect to future things, just as also in human acts intrinsic and extrinsic—namely, in the faith and cleansing of the Virgin, in the prophecy and speech of a man while he is presently speaking—such as Aristotle posits in Peri Hermenias I, last chapter, as inseparably following all things: that whatever is, when it is, must be, as was more fully said in chapter twenty-eight of this book. This same necessity, with the same cause and likeness applied to human acts, the authoritative passages of the same De Concordia 2 and 3 most plainly demonstrate, as was more fully shown in chapters twenty-seven and twenty-eight.

This Archbishop is humbly followed by his devoted Suffragan, the most subtle Philosopher and most profound Theologian, Robert, Bishop of Lincoln, in De Libero Arbitrio 3, who explicitly denies antecedent necessity in God but concedes this consequent necessity, as was briefly touched upon in the third exposition of Boethius set forth in chapter twenty-eight. But because so great a testimony is not to be cramped within brief space, behold his words more diffusely. Wishing indeed to preserve contingency together with necessity—nay rather, to show that the contingent follows from necessities—thus he says: "Necessity is twofold, as Anselm distinguishes in Book Two of Cur Deus Homo, chapter 17. One he calls antecedent necessity, which is the cause that a thing is and compels the thing to be; the other he calls consequent necessity, which is not a cause of the thing nor compels the thing to be. And this, as he himself says, is that necessity which, where Aristotle treats of singular and future propositions, seems to destroy 'either alternative' and to assert all things by necessity. By this consequent and inefficient necessity, it is necessary that God knows my sitting tomorrow, and the like. For there is no necessity in God, since all things in Him are voluntary; nor is anything else necessity in Him than the voluntarily-persevering inflexibility of His own will. From necessities by this consequent necessity nothing inconvenient seems to follow—nay rather, more truly, the contingent seems to follow.

For while I sit, it is necessary that I sit; and after I have sat, it is necessary that I have sat. But the same comparison that these sayings I sit and I have sat have to my sitting while I sit and after I have sat—the same comparison has the knowledge of God to my future sitting before I sit. For He Himself knows future things as present, nor does He know them otherwise when they are future and when they are present or past. Therefore, by every similar mode by which it is necessary that God know things when they are or are past, it is necessary that He know the same things before they are. But when things are or are past, His knowledge has consequent necessity; therefore He has the same necessity before things come to pass. And just as, supposing per impossibile that this saying I have sat had, before my sitting, the same necessity which it has after I have sat, that necessity would not compel my sitting to be, but yet from that necessity the contingent fact of my sitting would follow—so from the necessity of God's knowledge follows the contingent future. By this very same thing, the objections which from the truth of the saying about the future seem to destroy 'either alternative' and free will may seem solvable. For if I am to sit tomorrow, it was true without beginning that I was to be or had been about to sit; nor can it not have been true, because the truth which was without beginning in this saying cannot not have been in it. Therefore it is necessary that it has been and is true; and from this necessarily follows my still-contingent sitting.

These two necessities—from one of which nothing follows but the necessary, and from the other of which (as has been said) the contingent seems to follow—Boethius perhaps called simple necessity and necessity of condition; though some understand by necessity of condition not that which has been called above consequent necessity, but the necessity of consequence (of consequent following antecedent), as for example when it is said: If a man runs, he moves his feet. Here is the necessity of the consequence (of consequent to antecedent), although both—both consequent and antecedent—are contingent. But from the words of Boethius himself, considered more inwardly, it can be more clearly weighed that he himself called necessity of condition what we have been calling above consequent necessity. For he says that the same future thing, when referred to the divine notion, is necessary; but when weighed in its own nature, it appears altogether free and absolute. And a little after: But God beholds as present those future things which proceed from the freedom of choice. These therefore, related to the divine intuition, become necessary by the condition of the divine notion; but considered in themselves they do not desert the absolute freedom of their nature. And again: These, if they be referred to divine knowledge, are necessary; if considered in themselves, they are absolved from the bonds of necessity. But what else do these words savor of, save that those things which in their own nature are contingent to either alternative, flexible, and changeable, are in the knowledge of God invariable—not on account of the invariability of the things, but on account of the immutability of the knowledge? And that God knows this to be is inflexible and immutable from the truth which it has. And so, since from this invariable God knows this there follows this contingent this is: the contingent follows, according to Boethius's judgment, from the necessary—not however from a necessary that is absolute or antecedent which compels the thing to be, but from a necessary of condition and consequent, which permits the thing to be free."

Behold how he attests the sixth truth set forth in the fifth chapter of this book; behold also how he professes what is shown in chapters thirty and thirty-one of this book—namely, that God does not intrinsically know any future thing otherwise when it is future than when it is present or past, but in every way similarly: namely always necessarily, by this consequent necessity. Wherefore he doubtless wills, consequently, to say the same concerning God's willing anything first as future, then as present, and finally as past.

The same again, lower in the same fifth chapter, says: "God knows all things by one indivisible and simple gaze, eternally, always, similarly, immutably. Wherefore what He knows He cannot afterward not-know, which can also be proved in many ways. For it is plain from what has already been said, that the same comparison which these sayings I sit and I have sat have to my sitting while I sit and after I have sat, the same comparison has God's knowledge to my future sitting tomorrow before I sit. For He knows future things as present, nor does He know them otherwise when they are future and when they are present or past. Therefore by every same mode by which it is necessary that God know things when they are or are past, it is necessary that He know the same things before they are. But when things are or are past, His knowledge has consequent necessity; therefore He has the same necessity before things come to pass.

Likewise, supposing per impossibile that the future running of Socrates tomorrow were now presently in my bodily sight, in every same mode in which his running will tomorrow be present in my sight, then just as tomorrow it will be necessary that I see or have seen Socrates running, so now it would be necessary, before Socrates ran. But all future things are much more presently in God's gaze than any present thing can be presently in my gaze; therefore much more strongly does God necessarily see and know all future things."

Behold also how, here and above, in accordance with the foregoing, he supposes—with Anselm—that the act of divine cognition with respect to any future thing is as necessary, nay more necessary, by this consequent necessity, as is the act of human cognition with respect to a present thing, as also as is its extrinsic act, such as a present sitting. Mark also, I beg, the cause given by the Doctor here and above: for he says, He knows future things as present. What else does this cause set forth, save the cause of Aristotle and Anselm: namely that being which is, when it is, must be by this consequent necessity, and therefore God thus necessarily knows future things?

The same consequent necessity, though not so explicitly, and the same cause of necessity itself with the same likening of the divine act to the human—namely, to a present walking—is so explicitly shown by Boethius, the human Philosopher and divine, in De Consolatione Philosophiae V, in the last prose, as chapter 28 of this book and the first authoritative passage from Lincoln set forth above more fully manifest. His worthy footsteps, both in this necessity and in the cause of it and in the comparison set forth, are clearly followed by Saint Thomas on the First Sentences, distinction 38, question 5, where it is asked: Whether God's knowledge is of contingent things. There, in the fourth place on the negative side, he makes this kind of argument: God knows or foreknows that Socrates will run; therefore Socrates will run; and the antecedent is necessary, therefore the consequent. To which he also recounts two responses, each of which agrees with the principal hypothesis treated above: of which the first says that this proposition is not necessary—God foreknows or has foreknown that Socrates will run, or this is foreknown by God—although it be true concerning the past, because it depends on the future; and the other posits that God can, for the present, not know what He now knows, and this, as he says, seems to be the Master's view in the text. He rejects both, and so speaks: "To the fourth it must be said, that to this argument many responses are made. For some say that this antecedent—This is foreknown by God—is not necessary; and if it be objected that it has been said of the past, therefore it is necessary, they respond that it has an instance in past things which speak of a respect to the future. Hence when it is said this was about to be, although it be said of the past, yet because it depends on the future, it is not necessary; for what was once future can not-be future, since the one about to walk will not walk, as is said in De Generatione II. But this instance is null; for although what was future can not-be future, with the causes hindered which were determined to the effect, as in the greater part—nevertheless it cannot not-have-been future. For it will always be true to say this was once future. Likewise it is not to the purpose, because when one says foreknown, not only is the order to the future imported, but also a certain act which is signified as past. And therefore others say (as the Master in the text seems to say) that this antecedent is not necessary, because foreknown, although by the word it signifies past time, yet signifies a divine act to which pastness does not befall; and therefore, just as God can not-know, so He can not-foreknow. But neither does this solve the matter; because although the divine act has not the necessity of compulsion, yet it has the necessity of immobility, speaking of intrinsic acts such as to will, to understand, and the like; whence it is not contingent that it not-be, if it be posited to be. And because the consequent cannot be posited not to be, unless the antecedent also be posited not to be, the consequent also cannot be posited not to be. But this is certain: that the antecedent can be posited to be; for it is determinately true that God now knows something future, and so it follows that the consequent cannot be posited not to be even taken absolutely, and much less that it can happen not to be."

See, I beg, how expressly he posits this consequent necessity in God's intrinsic acts, calling it necessity of immobility, by which it is not contingent that the act not-be. See more expressly still, when he subjoins his own response: "And therefore it must otherwise be said, that the antecedent is necessary absolutely, both from the immobility of the act and also from the order to the thing known; because that thing is not posited to be subject to divine knowledge except while it is in act according as it has determination and certainty. For itself it is necessary to be while it is; and therefore similar necessity is to be inferred in the consequent—namely, that Socrates running be taken according as it is in act; and thus it has determination and necessity. Whence it is plain that if Socrates running be taken according to what follows from the antecedent, it has necessity. For it does not follow from the antecedent except according as it is subject to the divine knowledge to which it is subjected, as it is considered presentially in its actual being. Hence the consequent must also be so taken; in which way it is plain that the consequent is necessary. For it is necessary that Socrates run while he runs."

Behold most clearly the aforesaid necessity with the cause assigned above. And he holds this judgment expressly through many distinctions and questions following concerning the knowledge, providence, and predestination of God. He also, in Summa I, q. 14, art. 13, where it is asked Whether God's knowledge is of future contingents, and the second argument is made that it is not, because every conditional whose antecedent is absolutely necessary has its consequent absolutely necessary; but of this conditional—If God knew this to be future, this will be—the antecedent is absolutely necessary, both because it is eternal and because it is signified as past—he sets down the first of the two prior responses, and rejects it in these words: "To the second it must be said that some say this antecedent God knew is not necessary but contingent, because, although it be past, yet because it is contingent, it imports a respect to a contingent future. But this does not take necessity from it; for that which had a respect to the future, it is necessary to have had, although the future thing does not always follow." Where also below, according to his own judgment, he so responds: "Hence it must be said that this antecedent is necessary absolutely." And touching on the ambiguity whether also the consequent is necessary absolutely, he subjoins: "It must be said that, when in the antecedent something is posited that pertains to an act of soul, the consequent must be taken not only according as it is in itself, but according as it is in soul. For one thing is the being of a thing in itself, and another the being of a thing in the soul; for example, if I say if the soul understands something, that is immaterial: it is so according as it is in the intellect, not according as it is in itself. And similarly, if I say if God knew something, it will be: the consequent is to be understood as it is in its presentness, and so it is necessary, just as is the antecedent—because being which is, when it is, must be, as is said in the first of Peri Hermenias."

Nor should anyone be moved that he says God's having foreknown this future is necessary absolutely: for absolute necessity can reasonably be taken in the present sense, as it is opposed to conditional necessity, which had been rejected in chapter 48 of this book—namely, for the aforesaid consequent necessity, by which without any condition whatsoever, everything that now is, for now must be. But absolute necessity is taken otherwise for necessity simply, whose opposite formally includes contradiction; and thus he speaks below, in particle 19, question 3, where it is asked Whether God wills of necessity whatever He wills—where, in responding, he confirms consequent necessity, saying thus: "It must be said that something is called necessary in two ways, namely absolutely and by supposition. Something is judged necessary absolutely from the relation of the terms, as because the predicate is in the definition of the subject—as it is necessary that man be an animal—or because the subject is of the notion of the predicate—as it is necessary that a number be even or odd. But it is not so necessary that Socrates sit; whence it is not necessary absolutely, but can be called necessary by supposition: for supposing that he sit, it is necessary that he sit while he sits. Thus God wills Himself and His goodness by absolute necessity; but other things besides Himself, He does not will by absolute necessity, yet He wills them by necessity by supposition. For supposing that He will, He cannot not-will, because His will cannot be changed."

The same in the Quaestiones de Veritate, part 13, question 4, where it is asked Whether God of necessity wills whatever He wills, responds that He wills Himself as the end necessarily, but other things by no means. Where also, responding to the first argument, he so says: "To the first it must be said that something is called necessary in two ways: in one way absolutely, in another way by supposition. Something is called necessary absolutely on account of the necessary relation among themselves of the terms which are placed in some proposition, as that man be an animal, or that every whole be greater than its part, or any such thing. But that is necessary by supposition which is not necessary of itself, but only when something else is posited—as that Socrates has run; for Socrates, as far as he is of himself, is not more inclined to this than to its opposite, but the supposition having been made that he has run, it is impossible that he has not run. Thus then I say that God's willing something in creatures—for example, that Peter be saved—is not necessary absolutely, since the divine will has no necessary order toward this, as is plain from what has been said. But the supposition having been made that God wills it, or has willed it, it is impossible that He has not willed it or does not will it, since His will is immutable. Hence this kind of necessity is called among Theologians the necessity of immutability." Where also below, responding to the fourth, he says: "It must be said that God's willing or having willed something, after He wills it or has willed it, is necessary by supposition, but not absolutely—just as also Socrates's having run, after he has run; and similarly concerning creation and any act whatever of the divine will which terminates at something exterior."

From these things it sufficiently appears that, in the manner of speaking of the Parisian Doctors, what is called necessity by supposition is the same as what, in the manner of speaking of Boethius and Anselm, is called necessity of condition and consequent necessity in the sense set forth above, as was briefly touched at chapter 28. But that this matter may be made somewhat more diffusely and clearly plain, let it be known that this manner of speaking—necessary by supposition or by hypothesis; good, better, best, eligible, more eligible, most eligible by supposition or by hypothesis; and so of others—is originally Greek. According to which mode Aristotle, the Greek Philosopher, speaks in Ethics IV, last chapter; Politics VII.12 and IV.3; and Theophilus in his exposition of the parable of the dissipating or prodigal son in Luke 15. Nor is it to be thought that the Greek Philosophers, who loved wisdom and sought wisdom and found so much wisdom, were so insipidly wise or so spoke when they said this is necessary, good, better, or best, eligible, more eligible, or most eligible, by supposition or hypothesis, as to mean only this:

This conditional is necessary, good, better, or best, eligible, more eligible, or most eligible: If A is, B will be; If anyone do shameful things, it is good that he be confounded with shame; If citizens of such-and-such a condition exist, such-and-such a polity will be better and more eligible for them; if of another, another will be.

For what is so great in this for ethical or political discipline? Indeed, by considering more subtly according to logical method, it will clearly be seen that these differ. For a conditional posits nothing, and therefore supposes nothing. For what is to suppose but to posit under another? It is plain that this conditional, If a man runs, the man is moved, neither posits nor supposes that the man runs; but whether he runs or does not run, the conditional is always good and true. Nor be it to anyone moving that, among childish rudiments, a conditional is called a hypothetical, that is, a suppositive or suppositional proposition. Sufficiently childish and crudely is it so called—unless perhaps hypothesis has another signification in Greek. But among Greek authors I do not remember that a conditional proposition is called hypothetical, nor a hypothesis. But every supposition supposes something, and therefore posits something; and so does hypothesis. For what does hypothesis sound in Greek but suppositio in Latin?

Wherefore the Philosopher, in Politics VII.12, showing that the best polity is that according to which the city will best be governed and most attain to felicity, and that felicity is the operation and use of perfect virtue—and this not by supposition but simply—and defining by supposition, says thus: "I call by supposition what is necessary; simply, what is good. For example, sentences regarding just actions, punishments, and chastisements are from virtue indeed; yet they are necessary, and what is good they have necessarily. For it would be more eligible that no man and no city need any such things; but those that pertain to honors and abundances are simply the best choices. For the one is the choice of a certain evil; but such choices are the contrary, since they are preparations and generations of goods. The serious man indeed will use poverty and sickness and other ill-fortunes well, but the blessed lies in the contraries. For this also is determined according to the moral discourses, that such is the serious man, for whom things good through virtue are simply good." In a similar mode he speaks also in Politics IV.3, of a polity not simply, but better by hypothesis.

Whence Theophilus in the place earlier cited says: "The Lord corrects the Pharisees' intent through the present parable—those whom by hypothesis He calls just, as if to say: Granted you to be truly just, and not transgressors of any of the commandments. Are not those returning from disgrace then to be admitted on this account?"

Looking, therefore, to the words and mind of the Greeks and of the Parisian Doctors—who in this part judge the Greek glosses to be best, and on that account perhaps imitate them—when they say God's willing or knowing anything ad extra is necessary by supposition, I do not think they understand only the necessity of this kind of conditional or of such a consequence: If God wills or knows that this is or shall be, this is or shall be, as appears from things set forth here and in chapter 28 of this book; but the necessity from condition and the consequent necessity aforesaid. For when any willing or knowing is posited as inhering, and supposed as a foundation or root in God, immediately as it were from itself there sprouts up and arises this consequent necessity, just as also to any other aforesaid thing whatever, posited or supposed in being, is added and as it were supposed this consequent necessity, by which whatever is, while it is, must be.

And to this judgment accord the preceding words of Thomas, who also in Contra Gentiles I.83 thus says: "From these things it can be had, that although God absolutely wills nothing of necessity in regard to caused things, He yet wills something of necessity by condition or by supposition. Now it has been shown that the divine will is immutable; but in any immutable thing, if anything is once, it cannot afterward not-be. For we say that to be moved is to have oneself otherwise now and before. Therefore if the divine will is immutable, supposing that He wills something, it is necessary by supposition that He will it. Likewise everything eternal is necessary; but God's willing any caused thing to be is eternal—for as His being, so His willing is measured by eternity. Therefore it is necessary, but not absolutely considered, because the will of God has no necessary relation to this thing willed. Therefore it is necessary by supposition. Furthermore, whatever God could, He can; for His power is not lessened, nor is His essence. But He cannot now not-will what He is posited to have willed, because His will cannot be changed; therefore He could never before not-will whatever He has willed. Therefore by supposition He has willed of necessity whatever He has willed, just as also He wills it. But neither is necessary absolutely, but possible in the manner aforesaid."

Behold how, by the reasonings of chapter 30 of this book—though briefly much-touched—he shows this consequent necessity in the divine will: namely, because whatever God could ever before will or not-will, He can now; and whatever He cannot now, He never could before. He also, on the First Sentences in the distinction and question aforesaid, leaning likewise on the reasonings of chapter 31 of this book, shows this necessity in the knowledge of God; whence he so says: "I say therefore that the divine intellect intuitively from eternity each contingent thing, not only as it is in its causes, but as it is in its determinate being. For unless this were so, since when the thing exists He sees the thing itself as it is in its determinate being, He would otherwise know the thing when it is than before it comes to be; and so by the events of things something would be added to His cognition." Whence also he subsequently infers consequent necessity in God's knowledge, as is recounted above.

He also in Contra Gentiles I.67, positing similar necessity in the knowledge of God, so says: "From these things it can now somehow be made plain, that God from eternity has had ineffable knowledge of singular contingent things, and yet they do not cease to be contingent. For the contingent does not repugn against the certitude of cognition except in so far as it is future, but not in so far as it is present. For the contingent, when it is future, can not-be, and so the cognition of one estimating it to be future can be deceived—for he will be deceived if that be not which he estimated to be future. But from this, that it is present, for that time it cannot not-be, although it can not-be in the future. But this no longer pertains to the contingent in so far as it is present, but in so far as it is future. Hence nothing perishes from the certitude of sense, when it sees a man running, although this is contingent. Therefore every cognition borne upon the contingent in so far as it is present can be certain. But the gaze of the divine intellect from eternity is borne upon each of those things which are accomplished in the course of time, in so far as it is present, as has been shown above. It remains therefore that nothing prohibits God from having infallible knowledge of contingent things from eternity."

Behold that what is future to us is always so present to God as, when it shall come presentially, will be to us—as also other contingent things now are to us; and so that with Him it cannot not-be, just as contingent things present with us now cannot. Where also he immediately subjoins: "Likewise the contingent differs from the necessary according as each is in its cause. For the contingent is so in its cause, that being and not-being can come from it; but the necessary cannot come from its cause except being. But according to that which each of these is in itself, they do not differ as to the being upon which they are founded; because in a contingent thing, according as it is in itself, there is not being and not-being, but only being—although as a future contingent it can not-be. The divine intellect from eternity knows things, not only according to the being which they have in their causes, but also according to the being which they have in themselves. Nothing therefore prohibits Him from having an eternal and infallible cognition of contingent things."

Behold that, just as the contingent and the necessary that are now beings with us do not differ in being and in the consequent necessity of being, so also eternally with God. And below: "It does not happen that the effect exceeds its cause; sometimes, however, it falls short of it. Hence since with us cognition is caused from things, it sometimes happens that those things which are necessary, we cognize not by the mode of necessity but of probability. But just as with us things are the cause of cognition, so divine cognition is the cause of things known. Therefore it does not prohibit those things to be contingent in themselves, of which God has necessary knowledge."

He also below, supposing that the effect is called necessary or contingent from its proximate cause, not from a remote one, subjoins: "But God's knowledge, although it be the cause of the things known through it, is yet a remote cause; therefore the contingency of the things known does not repugn against its necessity, since it can be that the intermediate causes be contingent." And below, again: "If each thing be cognized by God as presentially seen, it will be necessary that what God cognizes be, just as it is necessary that Socrates sit from this, that he is seen sitting; but this is not necessary absolutely." The Doctor therefore concedes in such things the aforesaid consequent necessity, and denies only absolute necessity, as also was more fully shown in chapter 28 of this book.

This consequent necessity also seems to be conceded by William of Auvergne in his Tripartitum, part the last, chapter 10, asserting—like Thomas—in God a necessity of stability and immutability, by which it is necessary that He be whatever He is and that He always act well, as is more fully recounted in the demonstration of the first corollary of this book.

This same necessity of stability, immutability, and immobility of these Doctors—and therefore the aforesaid consequent necessity—greater Doctors and Authors insinuate and affirm. For Isaiah—nay rather, the Lord through his mouth—says: "My counsel shall stand, and all my will shall be done" (Isaiah 46). But how shall it stand? Firmly? or infirmly? Without doubt whoever shall say infirmly is himself infirm. For whose counsel shall stand firm, if that of the Foundation most firm of all does not stand firm? Not so judges the Apostle when he says: "The firm foundation of God stands, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are His" (2 Tim. 2). Why, I ask, did the Apostle say the firm foundation of God stands, if it stood most infirmly—nay rather incomparably more infirmly than the most infirm and most mutable created thing? For any created thing now standing must now stand by this consequent necessity. Therefore if the divine fundamental counsel and foreknowledge and predestination, which now stands, could for now not-stand, it would stand more infirmly than the most unstable creature.

This word to stand, said of God, designates firmness and immutability. Whence Augustine in Confessions I.6: "With Thee, O God, the causes of all unstable things stand, and the unchangeable origins of all changeable things abide; and the eternal reasons of all irrational and temporal things live." And in V on Genesis literally, chapter 18: "To God Himself created things were not made known otherwise when He had made them than in that mode in which He knew them in order that He might make them—with whom there is no commutation nor shadow of turning, but in a simple and wonderful mode He knows all things stably and unchangeably."

Why also did the Apostle compare the foreknowledge and predestination of God, or the predestined themselves, to a foundation—nay, a firm foundation—if there be there no firmness of necessity, but the greatest infirmness, and greater than in any thing continually slipping and flowing—since in any such thing there is so firm a consequent necessity? For it would be a foundation infirm and weak, so easily about to fail, that now and for now it could fail and not-be; and it would be incomparably more infirm and weak than the weakest natural foundation, which cannot so fail. Rather it seems that, by this transferred locution by which he names God's foreknowledge or the predestined a foundation—which is the firmest and most immobile of all things—he intended a similar firmness and immobility. For as the Philosopher says in Topics VI: Translation makes known in some mode what is signified through likeness; for all who transfer, transfer according to some likeness. Wherefore the Gloss says: "The firm foundation of God stands, that is, those whom God elected and immovably founded in the faith"—as also chapter twenty-seven of this book more fully showed.

Whence Augustine, on that of Psalm 2 He hath established the orb of the earth, which shall not be moved: "There is the orb of lands immobile, which is the good who are stable in faith. For the firm foundation of God stands, having this seal, The Lord knoweth who are His. This is the orb of lands which shall not be moved. There is also a mobile orb of lands, which is the evil." This firmness also the Psalmist frequently insinuates under the metaphor of foundation. Whence Psalm 8: "I shall see Thy heavens, the works of Thy fingers, the lights and stars which Thou hast founded." Upon which Damascene in his Sentences 21, treating of the Planets, so says: "They run their unceasing course, which the Founder appointed for them, and as He founded them, as Lord David says: the moon and stars which Thou hast founded. For because he said Thou hast founded, he signified the stability and immutability of the order and structure given them by God." And below at Psalm 23: "He Himself hath founded it upon the seas—that is, the orb of lands"—that is, the Church, according to Augustine, who in expounding how He founded it upon the seas, subjoins: "He Himself most firmly stabilized it upon all the waves of this world, that they might be overcome by it." And lower at Psalm 118: "In generation and generation is Thy truth; Thou hast founded the earth and it abides." Upon which Augustine, understanding by generation and generation all generations, so subjoins: "But why never even in these generations is truth lacking, opening as it were the cause: Thou hast founded the earth and it abides—calling those who are in the earth, the earth. But another foundation no man can lay, besides that which has been laid, which is Christ Jesus."

This most firm firmness, under the same metaphor, Isaiah also insinuates in chapter 28—nay, the Lord through Isaiah—saying thus: "Behold I will lay in the foundations of Sion an angular stone, tried, precious, in the foundation founded." This stone, sent to us long ago, confirming the same, says: "Every one that heareth these my words and doeth them shall be likened to a wise man who built his house upon the rock; and the rain came down, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house, and it fell not, for it was founded upon the rock" (Matt. 7). Upon which Chrysostom: "Just as the Church built by Christ cannot be torn down, so a Christian who has built himself upon Christ no adversity can cast down. Nor is it contrary that some fall from the Church; for not all who are called Christians are Christ's, but the Lord knoweth who are His."

This necessity, then, of stability, immobility, and immutability, and therefore the consequent necessity, I judge the Apostle to have understood when he said: The firm foundation of God stands; the Lord knoweth them that are His; and the Lord through Isaiah saying: My counsel shall stand. Such immobile stability of the divine counsel David also insinuates, saying: "The counsel of the Lord stands forever, the thoughts of His heart in generation and generation" (Psalm 32). The Gloss: "that is, not changeable but eternal, just as His predestination is immutable, in which all things are stored." Where also Augustine in tractate one: "The thoughts of His wisdom are not changeable, but abiding into the age of the age." Which the Apostle most plainly teaches, in Hebrews 6: "God, willing more abundantly to show to the heirs of the promise the immutability of His counsel, interposed an oath, that by two immutable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie, we may have a most firm consolation, who have fled to hold fast to the hope set before us; which we have as an anchor of the soul, sure and firm." The Gloss: "By two immutable things—that is, by the promise and the oath."

The Apostle therefore wills that the counsel, promise, and oath of God be confirmed by such immobility that God cannot do the opposite, just as He cannot lie. With which also accords that of Numbers 23: "God is not as a man, that He should lie, nor as the son of man, that He should be changed. Hath He said then, and shall He not do? hath He spoken, and shall He not fulfill?" And that of Psalm 88: "Once have I sworn in my holy one, if I lie unto David." Cassiodorus: "Once, that is, immutably." As also Augustine in De Civitate Dei V.9, and De Spiritu et Litera 29, and Isidore in Ethymologies VIII.45 expounds that of Psalm 61: "God hath spoken once, that is, immutably—this is, unchangeably He has spoken; just as He unchangeably knows all things which are to come and which He is to do," as chapter twenty-seven of this book more fully alleged. The same is testified by many authoritative passages of canonical Scripture and the Doctors concerning God's oath, written in chapter forty-seven of this book; and many similar from chapter twenty-three of Book One say in like manner that God knows and wills all things immutably and unchangeably.

To these things perhaps some defender of the contrary opinion will respond, saying: it is true that God wills and knows all things immutably, because He cannot be changed in His volition or cognition; yet He can—without any change at all—now have never willed or foreknown the future thing which He always willed and foreknew, wills and foreknows now, and now not-will or not-foreknow it, but rather its opposite both now and before; therefore it does not follow that God necessarily wills and not-wills future things by the aforesaid consequent necessity.

But this response will be corrected by what was previously shown in chapters 30 and 31, and especially in chapter 32 of this third book. For certain authoritative passages touched here and there imply that God is a liar if what He has predicted does not come to pass; yet if He could without any change whatever not-have-predicted what He has predicted, it would in no way follow, as in chapter 32 was more fully shown. Nor is the necessity in things predicted by God greater than in things simply willed and foreknown, as chapter 49 of this book shows. Therefore God cannot not-know and not-will future things which He knows and wills, unless He be changed, as the same chapter 32 shows. Therefore for now He cannot not-know or not-will what He now knows and wills.

Upon the reasonings of chapter 32, by way of mutability and immutability set forth above, Robert of Lincoln leans, in De Libero Arbitrio 4, where, having recounted the opinion saying that this is not necessary—God knows that A will be, where A is some future contingent—because He can not-know A before A is, and so as A is or is not, He becomes knowing and not-knowing A (and this is the contrary opinion and principal hypothesis), he subjoins: "But to say by this reason that the said proposition is not necessary, is openly impious; because to say this is to say that God is changeable as to knowledge. First therefore must the authoritative passages oppose this impiety, by which it will be plain that He immutably and always and eternally knows all things." And he adduces many authoritative passages saying that God knows and wills all things immutably, as was touched above. He, in chapter 5 below, having rejected the aforesaid opinion through authoritative passages and through some reasonings, subjoins: "Likewise, God knows A. Either then He can not-know A, or cannot. If He cannot not-know A, then necessarily He knows A. But if He can not-know A, then He can come from knowing A to not-knowing A. Therefore He can be changed and altered, which is impossible." The same below in chapter 9, where finally in determining he responds, says that God considered as causally preceding His acts of willing and knowing can not-do those acts; but considered as actually doing those acts He cannot, since He is immutable. Whence so he says: "This predication can be: God can not-will or not-know A—referred back to Him considered in the notion of an agent of one of the opposites, and so it is impossible that He not-will what He wills, or not-know what He knows. For there is in God's nature a power to either, because He causally precedes either; but with respect to Him as an agent of one of them, since He is immutable, there is no power to the opposite of that which is in act." On similar arguments concerning mutability Saint Thomas leans, in Summa I, q. 19, art. 3, and in Contra Gentiles I.83, as was recounted above.

And how, even if it were as the response says, would the firmness and fundamental stability shown above in God's knowledge be saved? How also, if it were so, by the promise and oath of God concerning anything future, according to the Apostle, should we have most strong consolation, as chapter 32 of this book more fully shows? For how should we have most strong consolation in a thing so weak, which for the time or moment in which it is or has been, can not-be and not-have-been—nay, in a thing incomparably more weak in being than the weakest creature? For any creature is stronger and more constant in being: it indeed, while it is, must be, and to have been if it has been. How also, if it were so, would the Apostle have said our hope concerning such promises is as an anchor of the soul, sure and firm? For what security or firmness is in such an anchor, which—although it now most firmly clung where it could, and in the past had clung at a fitting foundation—could now and for now be loosed and altogether deceive, and in the past always have been loosed and totally have deceived? Such an anchor, then, if it be supposed, is more insecure, weaker, and more unstable than any wind or sea, or any flowing thing whatever. Who therefore, trusting in such an anchor, would commit himself to a tempestuous sea? Who, then, in this great and most perilous sea of the world will be safe by such an anchor?

Wherefore it seems to me that the Apostle, by this transferred locution from the anchor, which is the firmest of the things of a ship—stabilizing and firming the whole ship, while indeed it cleaves to something firmer—has figuratively insinuated the most stable security and firmness of our hope, which is as the anchor of Peter's ship tossed by waves and contrary winds of this world; and that this anchor of our hope is not safe and firm of itself, but from cleaving and binding to something more firm—namely, to the immobility of the divine counsel and to the two immutable things aforesaid, which it is impossible should fail or not-be, as it is impossible for God to lie. The reason of this transumption can likewise be shown, as was shown of the response of the transumption from the foundation above.

Furthermore, the words of sacred Scripture and of the Doctors are to be taken according to the customary and common mode of understanding and speaking, as was shown in chapter forty-five of Book One. But it is not the customary and common mode of understanding or speaking, but a very unusual and most strange one—and one scarcely admitted save among deceitful Sophists—to say that God determines or has determined, has willed or wills immutably that anything be, when without any change whatever He can never have determined or willed this, nor now determine or will it. Indeed, the customary and common mode of understanding and speaking seems in such cases to hold for the same: immutably and not able to be otherwise and necessarily; and to reckon them convertible. Wherefore the Parisian Doctors call the aforesaid consequent necessity necessity of immutability and immobility. Whence Anselm in Cur Deus Homo II.17, almost throughout, holds for the same and promiscuously takes immutably to be or to be future, and not-able-not-to-be or not-be-future, and necessarily to be or to be future. Where also, asserting this consequent necessity to be spontaneous, by way of dialogue between Anselm and Boso concerning Christ, thus he writes: "Boso: Since they lie under the same reason, namely to die and to will to die, both seem to have been in Him by necessity. Anselm: Who willed Himself spontaneously to become man, that by the same immutable will He might die, and through the faith of this certitude that the Virgin be made clean from whom that man was to be assumed? Boso: God, the Son of God. Anselm: Was it not shown above, that God's will is compelled by no necessity, but it itself by its own spontaneous immutability preserves itself, when something is said to be done by necessity? Boso: Truly it was shown; but we see the contrary: that what God immutably wills cannot not-be, but it is necessary that it be. Wherefore if God willed that man to die, He could not not-die. Anselm: From this, that the Son of God assumed a man with that will, that he should die, you prove that the same man could not not-die. Boso: So I understand. Anselm: Has it not similarly appeared from what has been said, that the Son of God and the man assumed are one Person, so that the same is God and man, the Son of God and the Son of the Virgin? Boso: Thus it is. Anselm: The same man therefore by his own will could not not-die, and he died. Boso: I cannot deny."

He also below in the same place plainly maintains that, if God proposes to do something immutably, He will necessarily do it—not however by violent or contrary necessity, but by necessity consonant with liberty; which also still further below in the same place, by the distinction of necessity recounted above, he illuminates and clears.

He also in De Concordia 3: "Things which in time are past, after the likeness of the eternal present, are altogether immutable. In this indeed those things in time past are more like the eternal present than things present, since the things in eternity can never not-be present, just as past things in time can never not-be past. But all present things in time, which pass, become not-present." And below, chapter 4, immediately he subjoins: "In this mode therefore, whatever Sacred Scripture pronounces of those things which are done by free choice as if necessary, it speaks according to the eternity in which every truth is present, and not save as truth, immutably."

Behold how indifferently he takes and holds for the same to be immutable (or immutably not-able-not-to-be) and to be necessary (or necessarily that anything be)—necessity, namely, which in the same passages he calls consequent, as was touched above.

Wherefore Robert of Lincoln, De Libero Arbitrio 4, having recounted the authoritative passages of Augustine in De Genesi ad Litteram V.19, and other passages here above, and those previously set forth in chapter twenty-three of Book One, who say that God immutably knows all things, in chapter 5 thus concludes: "From these authoritative passages it evidently appears that God knows all things by one indivisible and simple gaze, eternally, always, [similarly,] immutably. Wherefore what He knows He cannot afterward not-know." And there follows: "Therefore by every same mode by which it is necessary that God know things when they are or are past, it is necessary that He know the same before they are. But when things are or are past, His knowledge has consequent necessity; therefore He has the same necessity before things come to pass." He also below in chapter 6 alleges Augustine saying that the Ideas in God, which he names exemplars, are immortal, immutable, invariable, eternal, and indefatigable. Whence also he concludes: "From these things it is plainly held that the exemplars are necessary."

Sacred Scripture, therefore, the Glosses, and the Doctors saying that God immutably, unchangeably, and immobilely knows, wills, determines, and the like, understand that it is not possible to be otherwise, and that He necessarily so does—necessarily, I say, by the aforesaid consequent necessity. Nor is it to be reckoned for least, that Robert of Lincoln, Saint Thomas, and other Parisian Doctors, recount in proper form, in concord, and reject and condemn, the opinion contrary to this necessity, and the principal hypothesis, as the foregoing have somewhat recounted. Wherefore without doubt they approve and affirm this response according to this consequent necessity, since it is not possible to assign a reasonable middle between these, as the preceding chapters manifest.

The Oxford Doctors likewise deny absolute necessity in such things, but concede a certain other, which they similarly call ordained necessity, or necessity by ordained or established law; which, according to what is shown in chapter forty-nine of this book, cannot rightly be understood otherwise than this consequent necessity. For the divine will, as to its extrinsic objects of willing, is rightly called ordained, and similarly the law ordained or established; because just as a Lawgiver or any other orderer first—at least by nature—thinks of these and those, then freely orders or establishes one certain thing: so God also, the King and Lawgiver of the universe, having thought that these and those could be done, most freely establishing has ordained these to be done and not those; and this is the universal law, established, posited, ordained, ordering, regulating, and moderating the universe, as is plain from chapter twenty-one of Book One. It is also called necessity, because just as a merely positive law, most freely and without any compelling necessity established by man, is from then on necessary by consequent necessity and by such ordained necessity—inasmuch as, according to the Jurists, that is called possible or impossible which is possible or impossible de jure—so also the divine will, although ordained, posited, and established without any antecedent necessity, most contingently and most freely, is firmed by similar necessity.

This judgment seems to be supported by what has been set forth concerning fate in chapter twenty-eight of Book One, and twenty-seven of this book. For all the Authors who posit fate as said by the speech of God, and such fatal necessity, in concord insinuate that God, like man, freely speaks ad extra by way of contradiction; yet that He Himself speaks while He speaks, just as also man speaks while he speaks, is necessary—necessarily, namely, by the aforesaid ordained or consequent necessity, which by accompanying necessarily follows the being of anything, by which whatever is, when it is, must be. For fate, as Isidore recounts in Ethymologies VIII.45 and 46, the ancients said is "whatever the gods speak, and what is appointed and established for individuals." Wherefore the Philosopher in De Mundo, last chapter, says that "there are three established orderings of fates according to as many times," which in another translation are called the three Parcae. These, according to Papias in his Elementarium and Isidore in Ethymologies VIII.45 and other Grammarians, because they spare none, or spare not even the least, are so called from parcendo (Greek terms in original); namely Atropos in the past, Lachesis or Lichesis in the future, and Clotho in the present, "perfecting" (as the Philosopher says in the place earlier cited) "and spinning out to each its own." And he adds: "The fable also is perfected not without order. But all these are nothing other than God, as the strenuous Plato also says." He also above in chapter 13 says that "in the greater city, namely in the world, God is equally inclining law"—in another translation equal—"receiving no corruption, or transposition" (in another translation direction or transposition); "but greater and more certain than those Scriptures which are in the cirbeses" (according to another translation, better and firmer than stones written upon). For Scriptures upon stones are first freely and contingently written, but after they are written, they remain necessarily written, or at least are then necessarily written by the aforesaid consequent necessity. So also—nay, incomparably more firmly—is the firmer Scripture of the book of God. Where also it is consequently subjoined: under whose rule, ever immobily and diligently is governed all the beauty of heaven and earth, and all things are generated, grow, and corrupted, obeying the divine decrees.

This judgment also Hermes confirms, in De Verbo Aeterno 43 and De Mundo et Coelo 1, showing that the necessity of things is from divine law. For he says that these three—Heimarmene (fate), necessity, and order—are most greatly effected by the nod of God, governing the world by their own law and divine reason. And he says that the text of the work, the fatal series, the disposition of the ages, the limit of all temporal things, and universally all things, are written there—namely, in God—by the finger of the supreme Disposer, as chapter twenty-seven of this book more fully recounted. Whence also the Prophet: "Forever, O Lord, Thy word abides in heaven; in generation Thy truth; Thou hast founded the earth and it abides. By Thy ordering the day perseveres, for all things serve Thee, were it not that Thy law is my meditation" (Psalm 118), etc. Behold the legitimate ordering of the Lord, embracing things heavenly, earthly, and universally all things. Behold the law of the Lord most completely ordained, by firm necessity and necessary firmness eternally enduring. For these words of the Prophet import immutability and necessity. For Augustine says in De Trinitate XV.20: "Neither is it for any other cause written, Many are the thoughts in the heart of a man, but the counsel of the Lord abides forever, save that we may understand or believe that, just as God is eternal, so His counsel is eternal, and on this account immutable, just as He Himself is. What is said of thoughts, can also be most truly said of wills: Many wills are in the heart of a man, but the will of the Lord abides forever." And the thirty-second Psalm says: "The counsel of the Lord abides forever; the thoughts of His heart in generation and generation." Upon which Augustine in tractate one: "The thoughts of His wisdom are not changeable, but abiding into the age of the age." And the Gloss: "that is, not changeable but eternal, and His predestination is immutable, in which all things are stored."

Cassiodorus, on that of Psalm 118 alleged above, O Lord, Thy word abides in heaven, says: "Because, literally, the solemn order of the heavenly statutes abides. For the year flows by through days and months, and by the same vicissitudes the conversion of sun and moon returns, and the law of all things once established remains immutable." And below: "In generation and generation Thy truth, that is, in every generation; Thou hast founded the earth, that is, the Church by faith, and it abides. For literally this cannot be said of the earth, which shall be moved. But Christ is the foundation, besides which no other can be laid—that on which those who are not the sons of the bondwoman remain. For there follows, By Thy ordering the day perseveres. For these aforesaid—that the Word in heaven, that the truth in generation, that the earth has been founded—are the day which the Lord has made, on which Christ the Sun of justice, however much He may press, never sets, and which in the future He shall complete, to be closed by no end. And rightly do I say the Word in heaven the truth, and in generation the earth founded, since all things which pertain to this day serve Thee. Literally, all things temporal and eternal He disposes by His nod." Thou hast founded the earth and it abides, he says; but founding and foundation import immutable stability and necessity, as was shown above. Whence also below in the same place: "From the beginning I have known concerning Thy testimonies, that Thou hast founded them forever."

A similar judgment is also insinuated by such words as: "Confirmed is His mercy upon us, and the truth of the Lord abides forever" (Psalm 116); "He hath established the orb of the earth, which shall not be moved" (Psalm 92), where Augustine says it is immobile, as was alleged above; "They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion; he shall not be moved forever," etc. (Psalm 124), where Cassiodorus shows that those trusting in the Lord cannot be moved; "It shall not be inclined into the age of the age"—namely, the earth (Psalm 103), where Cassiodorus: "It cannot be said of the earth which is read to be about to pass; but mystically it can rightly be received as the Church founded upon Christ, which cannot be inclined." "The mountains shall be moved, and the hills shall tremble; but my mercy shall not depart from thee, and the covenant of my peace shall not be moved, said the Lord, thy Comforter" (Isaiah 54). "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away or transeunt" (Matt. 24); and many similar with their expositions and glosses written in chapter 27 of this book. With these likewise accords that of Jeremiah 5: "I have set the sand a bound for the sea, an everlasting precept which it shall not pass; and they shall be moved, and shall not prevail; and the waves thereof shall swell, and they shall not pass over it"—insinuating the limit of tribulations and labors, as is plain from the expositions set forth in chapter 46 of Book One. And again, that of Psalm 148: "He hath established them forever, and forever and ever; He hath made a precept, and it shall not pass away."

Whence blessed Gregory in Moralia XVI.15, on that of Job 23, No one can turn away His thoughts—namely God's—says: "Concerning whose immutability it is aptly subjoined: No one can turn away His thoughts. For just as He is immutable in nature, so also is He immutable in thought. Let it therefore be said, and no one can turn away His thoughts, since judgments once fixed cannot in any way be changed; whence is it written: He hath made a precept, and it shall not pass away; and again, Heaven and earth shall pass, but my words shall not pass; and again, For my thoughts are not as your thoughts, neither are my ways as your ways. Therefore when externally His sentence seems changed, internally His counsel is not changed, since concerning each thing within, immutably is constituted whatever externally is mutably done."

With which also accords Augustine in the Sentences of Prosper, proposition 169: "The thought and re-thought of God concerning things to be changed is the unchangeable reason. Neither indeed, as it does man, does it repent God of any of His deeds, whose sentence concerning all things whatsoever is as fixed as His foreknowledge is certain." With which not discordantly Isaiah: "The Lord of hosts hath decreed, and who can disannul?" (Isaiah 14). The Gloss: "that is, it cannot be changed."

This same necessity, ordained as has been said, is evidently insinuated by the Authoritative passages concerning necessity of stability, immobility, and immutability set forth above; nor less evidently do the Authoritative passages concerning the divine oath, set forth in chapter forty-seven of this book, show it, on account of the immutability and necessity contained in it—especially since, according to what is there shown, every intrinsic word of God with respect to exterior things is firmed by equal necessity, and is equipollent to an oath. The same likewise the Authoritative passages alleged in chapter forty-seven imply, saying that divine predictions and promises are necessarily to be fulfilled—especially since the necessity in such things is no greater than in any whatever known by God ad extra, as the next chapter of this book teaches; but the whole necessity which is there is from the firm presentness, and the present firmness, of the act of divine cognition and volition: by which it, like all other present things and acts of any kind, while it is, must be, by the aforesaid consequent and ordained necessity.

Further still, this same ordained and consequent necessity all the Authors who posit fate as said by the speech of God, and such fatal necessity, in concord insinuate, as was shown above. But how many and how great are the philosophical and theological Authors and Doctors who explicitly and implicitly posit this fatal necessity, as chapter twenty-eight of Book One and twenty-seven of this book teach? What else does the intransibility, immutability, stability, firmness of Christ's words, of laws, of pact, also of God's covenant, signify, from the Gospels and Prophecies, with the glosses and expositions of the Doctors, which chapter twenty-seven of this book more fully recounted? How also can the Philosopher in De Mundo 13 more conveniently be expounded, where he says that God immobile moves all things and turns them whither He wills, as the law of the world receiving no alteration, more certain and firmer than the Scriptures which are in stones, as the same chapter 27 and here above more fully alleges? For Scriptures upon stones are first freely and contingently written, but after they are written, they remain necessarily written, or at least are then necessarily written by the aforesaid consequent necessity. Thus, nay incomparably more firmly, is the firmer Scripture of the book of God. Why also did he compare the divine law governing all things rather to a Scripture in stones, than to a Scripture in wax, parchment, painting, dust, or earth, or in any metal, save that in some mode—exemplaritably and figuratively—he might designate its greatest firmness, as such a Scripture is more firm than others? As Job also says: "Who shall grant me that my words be written? Who shall grant me that they be exarated in a book with an iron stylus or a leaden plate, or be carved with a chisel in flint?" (Job 19). Wherefore also the sons of Seth wrote the discoveries of the sciences upon two columns—one indeed of bricks, the other of stones—as was previously recounted. How firm therefore the necessity, and how necessary the firmness, of the divine Scripture written in the most firm science of God, in His most firm mind, in the book of His most firm life!

Authorizing this Philosopher in this part, the supreme Philosopher says: "Scripture cannot be loosed which the Father sanctified and sent into the world" (John 10). With which similarly accord not a few similar passages prepared in chapter forty-seven of this book, which testify that the Prophetic Scriptures—promissory and juratory—of the Prophets and of God are necessarily to be fulfilled. For that natural Scripture written with fragile pen, fluid ink, and corruptible skin or papyrus cannot be loosed—this can be from no firmness or stability of this infirm and fleeting Scripture, but only from the insoluble and necessary firmness of the Scripture of the book of immortal life, indelible, unerasable, uncancellable, and indefectible; from which all true material Scripture originally and figuratively flows down and emanates.

To this cause of necessity in the Scriptures the Gloss on the first chapter of Matthew testifies, which first says that prophecies are necessarily to be fulfilled, as chapter forty-seven of this book alleges. Afterward, however, it says that the Prophet brings no necessity to the things prophesied, but is a sign of God's foreknowledge, as chapter forty-nine of this book more fully recounted. This necessity, then, is founded upon God's foreknowledge: it cannot be founded upon the prophesied things, which are as it were the effects and outcomes of prophecy—which also impose no necessity upon themselves, since they have none of themselves; nor upon the prophecy, which does not produce the prophesied things, but is only a sign of divine foreknowledge. Therefore the necessity of the Scripture of the book of immortal life—the firm foreknowledge of God—is the necessity of the aforesaid prophetic Scripture.

Whence also Augustine De Correptione et Gratia 29 says that the sons of God according to foreknowledge, before they were made, were already sons of God, written in the memorial of their Father with unshaken stability. He also below in chapter 34, more fully expressing this unshaken stability, thus writes: "Whoever therefore in God's most provident disposition are foreknown, predestined, called, justified, and glorified—I say not not yet reborn, but not yet born—are already sons of God, and therefore can in no wise perish." Note, I beg, the causal: they are already sons of God, and therefore they can in no wise perish. What else does this causal insinuate, nay rather express, save that those things, whatever they may be, which are in the providence, disposition, foreknowledge, and predestination of God, cannot there not-be—at least for now—according to that saying of the Philosopher so often remembered, being which is, when it is, must be?

How great then a number, how great a crowd, how great an army of authoritative passages of canonical Scripture and of the Doctors expressly or implicitly profess this judgment of necessity, doubtless not easy to count. But that I may bring forth in brief the greatest abundance, behold this judgment of consequent necessity is insinuated and confirmed by the reasonings and authoritative passages from chapter thirty of this book up to this place, manifoldly prepared—which it does not seem possible to solve plainly, solidly, and truly for one not holding this judgment, but scarcely by some insipid sophistries, by oblique cavils, by profane forgeries and violent obstinacies, by distorted ambiguities, by schismatic expositions, and by viperous glosses destroying their own text. To this judgment, however, all the reasonings and Authoritative passages seem—both according to the surface of the letter and according to the deep and solid meaning—plainly and fully, solidly and sincerely and spontaneously, to consent, and in concord to attest. Let any indifferent Judge, simply, and a friend of truth alone, compare the proofs, responses, and authoritative passages of any other judgment with this one. Let him for the time set aside, I beseech, hate and love, since the Philosopher in Rhetoric I.1 says that to a prefect and a Judge, love and hatred and his own commodity are often joined, so that he cannot sufficiently see the truth, but attends in judgment to his own delightful or sad. And in Rhetoric II.1: "Things do not appear the same to lovers and to haters, nor to the angry and to those mildly disposed, but either altogether different, or different by magnitude." With which also accords Ptolemy in word

12 of his Centiloquy: "Love and hatred remove men from rectitude"—or according to another translation, Love and hatred pervert the truth of judgment. Or if he will not set those aside, then let him exchange, giving freely to this judgment that hatred and to the other that love and favor, and contrariwise; and so weigh them by an equal balance, which is more firmly founded, more copiously attested, and more reasonably defended; and that one, until God reveal another to him, let him soberly choose, hold, and defend. For, as the Philosopher says in Ethics I.11: "All existing things are consonant with the true; but the true is quickly dissonant from the false." This is plainly the doctrine of the same Philosopher in De Caelo II.1, and of his Commentator Averroes, who there recounts that famous saying of Alexander: "We are not sustained upon the judgment of this man among all others, save because we see it of less ambiguity and more remote from contradiction."

Furthermore, the authoritative passages concerning the necessity of fate or of the divine speech, and similar ones, positing necessity in God and in things, and rendering the cause of it because being which is, when it is, must be—or because all things are always present with God on account of the necessity of things according to higher causes, adduced in chapters twenty-seven and twenty-eight of this book—much more immediately and evidently make for this consequent necessity of this chapter than for that. But because from this necessity follows the other, they make also for that one. And because that necessity was contradicted, it had to be confirmed by the valid testimonies of many truthful witnesses, the greatest above all exception—so that, with that conceded, this might be more easily admitted. The process and order could also have been contrarily permuted, that first this consequent, then that according to higher causes, had been shown. For this is prior by nature to that. Yet not so commodiously for doctrine. For not always are things prior and more known by nature prior and more known in human cognition. Indeed, for the most part, the contrary, as the Philosopher attests in Physics I.2 and after, and in Metaphysics II.1; which also the Apostle attests, saying: "The invisible things of Him"—namely God—"from the creation of the world, that is, by man, are clearly seen, being understood by the things which are made, His eternal power also and divinity" (Romans 1). Hence therefore it seemed more commodious to observe the order set forth, as in the beginning was observed. For prior by nature seems God's making something to His preserving what is made, and yet it was first shown that God is the necessary preserver of beings, before that He is their maker; because this was more useful for doctrine: for from this, before human cognition, the other is more easily shown than contrariwise.

COROLLARY

That every present act of divine volition and cognition is necessary, by the aforesaid consequent necessity, always to have been and similarly always to be; wherefore also that all things which presentially are, are done, or come to pass, by similar necessity are, are done, and come to pass in the present; and that all things which shall come to pass shall by similar necessity come to pass in the future. Nay further, that all things which now are done, are now done from some antecedent necessity; and that all things which shall come to pass shall come to pass from some antecedent necessity in the future.

From these things, as it were porismatically, it clearly shines that:

Every present act of divine volition and cognition must, by the aforesaid consequent necessity, now be, always have been, and similarly always be to be;

wherefore also that all things which presentially are, are done, or come to pass, by similar necessity are, are done, and come to pass in the present; and that all things which shall come to pass, by similar necessity shall come to pass in the future;

nay further, that all things which now are done are now done from some antecedent necessity; and that all things which shall come to pass shall come to pass from some antecedent necessity in the future.

The first part, second, and third of this porism lucidly follow. For according to what was previously shown, every such act now present must now be, and therefore have always been and similarly always be to be, since God is immutable in every way, as chapters 5 and twenty-three of Book One teach. Whence is also evidently known the agreement and difference of the divine and the angelic or human will. For in two things they agree and in two things they differ. For just as the created will must, for now, will what it wills and have willed what it has willed, so the divine. But this—namely, the human—is possible in the future not so to will, and in the past not to have willed; the divine, in no wise after or before. The cause of this is not hidden: for the one is mutable, but the other is altogether immutable.

The three following parts will be easily concluded from these three with certain things shown previously. For syllogistic reasoning manifestly teaches that:

All things which presentially are, are done, and come to pass from a cause which is, by consequent necessity, necessary in being and infrustrable in causing, by similar necessity are, are done, and come to pass in the present;

All things which presentially are, are done, or come to pass, presentially are, are done, and come to pass from such a cause.

Why then does it not follow concerning future things? In a similar mode in which the syllogism was applied to present things, it will also be applied to future things:

All things which shall come to pass from a cause which is, by consequent necessity, always necessary in being and infrustrable in causing, by similar necessity shall come to pass;

All things which shall come to pass shall come to pass from such a cause.

For there does not seem possible to be assigned a cause why not all things which shall come to pass from any cause whatsoever shall come to pass from some necessity, save either because the cause can fail in being, or because, even if it remain, it can be impeded, frustrated, and fail in causing—as a man willing to do something future can dismiss that will, and even if he hold it continually, can be impeded and frustrated in many ways. It is also certain that all things which shall come to pass shall come to pass from such a cause; for they shall come to pass from the divine will, by the corollary of chapter 9 of Book One, and that is necessary in being by consequent necessity, by the parts of the preceding corollary; it is also infrustrable in causing, by chapter 10 of Book One.

Here perhaps some will respond that all future things are necessary inasmuch as they are present with God and in Him, but not inasmuch as they shall come to pass outside, in material or real being in their own natures. But this response, if it understands that future contingents, as far as they are of themselves, and as their inferior causes are absolutely considered, shall not necessarily come to pass, understands truly, but does not avoid the issue. If, however, it understands that future contingents, related to the divine prevolition and precognition (which is necessary in being and infrustrable in causing), shall not necessarily come to pass outside in material, real, or natural being at the times preordained by God, it does not understand truly, as the preceding things clearly showed. Which can also be more briefly shown thus:

It necessarily follows: Whatever God wills and foreknows shall be in real extrinsic natural being, thus shall be; God wills and foreknows this thus to be; therefore this thus shall be.

Or enthymematically, if anyone wills:

God wills this to be really; therefore this thus shall be.

And the antecedent is necessary, as is shown above, as also these responders confess; therefore the consequent likewise, as chapter thirty of this book makes plain.

All this is clearly testified by Robert of Lincoln in De Libero Arbitrio 10, where, treating of the concord of predestination and free choice, he first really makes the foregoing argument, and recounts virtually the response of the contrary opinion and of the principal hypothesis—distinguishing such propositions (Whatever God predestines or wills to be, must be) according to composition and division, and conceding the composite sense and denying the divided; and then, that opinion having been formally approved and materially rejected, according to his own judgment in responding, says that prevolition—namely, divine predestination—is a cause necessary in being by consequent necessity, and infrustrable in causing; therefore also any total effect of it future by similar necessity. Whence so he says: "God's predestination especially seems to annihilate free choice. For it itself is a cause of the goods predestined, and such a cause as cannot not-be, nor can it be frustrated by its effect. But of every cause which cannot not-be, nor be frustrated by its effect, every effect cannot not-be. Therefore the effect of predestination cannot not-be; therefore it is necessary that every effect of predestination be. Necessarily therefore every one to be saved shall be saved; therefore not from free choice is salvation or any good work meritorious of eternal life.

Perhaps some responder, to evade, will so distinguish, saying: the predestined is necessary; yet that which is predestined is not necessary, but contingent. But this distinction, although it be true, yet seems nothing to the truth of the solution. For let A be called any effect of predestination, considered in itself bare of this accident, predestined; and let it be syllogized in this mode: Every effect of a necessary cause not able to be frustrated by its effect is necessary and not able not-to-be; A is the effect of such a cause; therefore A cannot not-be, but is necessary. And so as to its being, free choice is nothing, since to have being from the free choice of a rational creature is contingent, not necessary. And behold the proper response: Or perhaps will the effect of predestination simply be rather A's contingently being than A's being? For example, let some present wayfarer be named Peter: not this—namely, that Peter is to be saved—but that Peter's being saved is contingent, that is, that Peter is to be saved not from necessity, but with possibility of the existing of its opposite, namely that Peter not be saved—is simply the effect of predestination. For God knows not only that Peter is to be saved, but that Peter is to be saved not from necessity, but contingently, and so from eternity He preordains—namely, that Peter is to be saved, and not from necessity but with possibility of the contrary. And this whole, infallibly foreknown and preordained by God—namely, that Peter is to be saved not from necessity, but with possibility of existing of its opposite, namely that Peter not be saved—is necessary simply. And so the effect of predestination, which is an invariable cause that cannot be frustrated by its effect, is not that Peter be saved, but that Peter be saved not necessarily but contingently; and this whole—namely, that Peter be saved not necessarily but contingently—is necessary, just as the syllogism placed above argued must be the effect of predestination. But necessary I say by consequent necessity, not antecedent—necessity of condition according to Boethius, not simple. And on this account, that Peter be saved is not necessary, but contingent.

This major proposition of the syllogism placed above, namely, Of every cause which cannot not-be nor be frustrated by its effect, the effect cannot not-be, but is necessary, must thus be understood: that we understand the effect simply and totally, and not according to part—that is, the whole effect proportionate to the cause, with no conditions omitted. For instance, with respect to this cause which is predestination, the effect will not be Peter's being saved simply and totally, but this whole: Peter's being saved not from necessity but contingently. Therefore, according as the major proposition is truly understood, if under the effect of predestination be assumed Peter's being saved or some such thing, without this condition added—not from necessity but contingently—the assumption does not correspond to the major proposition, nor does the conclusion follow. But if there be taken simply and totally the effect falling under predestination—as for example Peter's being saved not from necessity but contingently—it correspondingly is assumed to the major, and the conclusion follows."

He also below in chapter 11, showing the concord of grace with free choice, clearly puts forth a similar judgment. Nor be anyone moved that he says it is not necessary that Peter be saved, but that Peter be saved not necessarily but contingently—although it follows necessarily: Peter shall be saved not necessarily but contingently; therefore Peter shall be saved; and the antecedent, according to him, is necessary, therefore also the consequent. Because when he says it is necessary that Peter be saved not necessarily but contingently, he understands it of the aforesaid consequent necessity, consonant with contingency and the liberty of choice, as he also evidently expresses. But when he denies that Peter be saved is necessary, he understands of necessity contrary to contingency and the liberty of choice, which—according to what was set forth in chapter 10 of this book concerning this adversative conjunction Sed (but)—he evidently insinuates, saying thus: Peter to be saved is not necessary, but contingent. For which also below in chapter 11 he says: "Since grace is nothing else than God's will, by which He gratuitously saves, but He wills (for example) not only that Peter be saved, but that he be saved from the liberty of his choice, and not necessarily but contingently—just as He foreknows and predestinates not only that he be saved, but that he be saved with the aforesaid addition: grace or the divine will does not compel that Peter be saved or any such similar thing to be necessary, but, as has been said, that he be saved from free choice and contingently to be necessary."

Nor again let it move anyone that he says perhaps, and as it were doubting—he does not seem to respond by way of definition. For this is his final response; and because he can reasonably do this, even if he himself does not doubt, in order to repress the presumptuous audacity of others, and that they may soberly take instruction. Adverbs of doubt and similar words also do not always import doubt of the speaker, but sometimes by the figure of Irony certitude and certain affirmation; sometimes, however, doubt in the minds of hearers, and reproof of them. Wherefore the Prophets, the Apostles, and God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, knowing most certainly, sometimes uttered such adverbs and words. Whence Psalm 80: "For nothing perhaps I had humbled their enemies." Cassiodorus: "Perhaps—that is, truly, if it be said ironically." And below at Psalm 118: "Unless that Thy law is my meditation, I had perhaps perished in my humility." And the Apostle to Romans 8: "I reckon that the sufferings of this time are not worthy to be compared with the future glory." Gloss: "I reckon, that is, I know." And in 1 Corinthians 7: "I think that I also have the spirit of God." Gloss: "Note that in saying I think, the Apostle does not doubt, but reproves contemners." And Job 14: "Dost thou think that a dead man shall live again?" Upon which Gregory in Moralia XII.5: "Just men are wont, in that which they themselves feel certain and solid, as it were to bring forth something out of doubt, that they may transfer the words of the weaker to themselves; but again by a strong sentence in every way contradict that infirm doubt, so that by the fact that they seem to bring forth doubtfully, they somewhat condescend to the weak, and by the fact that they bring forth a certain sentence, they draw the doubtful minds of the weaker to solidity."

He Himself also, in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge—Jesus Christ—similarly speaks, saying: "Doth He give thanks to that servant because he hath done what He commanded him? I think not" (Luke 17). And Matthew 11: "*If in Sodom etc., they had perchance remained unto this day. And John 4: "Thou perchance wouldst have asked of Him,"

etc. And below in chapter 5: "If you believed Moses, perhaps you would believe me also." And still below in 8: "If you knew me, perhaps you would know my Father also." Upon which Augustine, part 1, homily 37: "He who knows all things, when He says perhaps, does not doubt but reproves. Note then how perhaps—which seems to be a word of doubt—is said reprovingly. But it is a word of doubt, when it is said by a man doubting because not knowing; but when a word of doubt is said by God, since nothing whatever lies hidden from God, by that doubt unfaithfulness is reproved, divinity does not opine. For men, concerning those things which they hold certain, sometimes reprovingly doubt—that is, place a word of doubt—when in heart they do not doubt: as if you were indignant with your servant and should say, Dost thou despise me? Consider, perhaps I am thy Lord. Hence also the Apostle, speaking to certain contemners of his, says: I reckon that I also have the spirit of God. He who says I reckon seems to doubt, but he reproves, he does not doubt." In Matthew 24 also the very Wisdom of God says: "They shall give great signs and wonders, so that even the elect, if it be possible, may be led into error." Upon which Gregory on Ezekiel I.9: "Why is this said with doubt, since what is to be is foreknown by the Lord?" And he responds: "This doubting of dominical speech was, from the hearts of the elect, a designation of the temptation. Through this then is expressed that the elect shall be tempted in heart; for they nod, if they do not fall. It is therefore said if it be possible, because they shall tremble, and yet they are called elect, because they shall not fall."

For the two remaining parts, however, it must be observed that in the divine will, with respect to its extrinsic effects present or future, there is fullest contingency to either alternative, and supreme freedom of contradiction, as has been more often said. Yet with respect to them there is in it antecedent necessity—as with respect to present things, as the last part of the second corollary of this book shows. Wherefore also by similar reasoning with respect to future things likewise. For all things which shall come to pass from a cause necessary in being and infrustrable in causing shall come to pass from naturally antecedent necessity, as the definitions of naturally antecedent necessity and its effect in chapter 2 of this book show; and all things which shall come to pass shall come to pass from such a cause—namely, from the divine will, as has been shown above. Nor does this imply any repugnance, as is more fully declared in chapters 29 and 5 of this book.

THOMAS BRADWARDINE — DE CAUSA DEI CONTRA PELAGIUM

Book III, Chapter LI — On Eternity

(with Corollary)

CHAPTER LI. ON ETERNITY.

But further, with the spirit of understanding raising us up a little higher, this same truth can be shown by another way, namely, by the way of eternity, touched upon in the thirtieth chapter of this book. For when this is known, God and His knowledge and willing can in some manner be known; but when this is unknown, those things also are necessarily unknown. Therefore, we must first discourse a little concerning eternity itself.

It is established, then, according to the opinion of the Philosophers, that the measure ought to be of the same nature as, and similar to, the thing measured. Now man is mutable, and his actions are mutable; therefore they are also measured by a mutable measure, namely a temporal one — by time itself, that is, or by an instant. But God, and any intrinsic action of His whatsoever — to wit, His knowing and willing — is altogether immutable, as the fifth and twenty-third chapters of the first book teach. Therefore, neither God, nor any intrinsic action of His, is per se, immediately, and properly measured by a mutable measure (namely, by time or an instant), but by an immutable, invariable, stable, and eternal measure — or rather, by eternity itself, immutably, wholly without succession, uniformly, and stably enduring.

For in eternity itself there is no divisibility, no greater, no less, no priority, no posteriority, no mutability, no approach, no recession, no succession, nothing past, nothing future, nor any successive difference whatsoever, but an indivisible, simple, single, identical, unsuccessive, and instantaneous presentness and simultaneity, as is shown in the first chapter of the first book — nay rather, a super-indivisible, super-simple, super-single, super-identical, super-unsuccessive, and super-instantaneous presentness and simultaneity beyond the temporal instant. For the temporal instant is the end of the past and the beginning of the future; but in eternity there is nothing past nor future — that is, nothing mutable and successive in any way — for the past comes and recedes, begins and ceases. Not so in eternity: the temporal instant stands now only, but eternity always. The temporal instant, as also time itself, is posterior to eternity and to the eternal instant, and imitates each as best it can.

Therefore God knows and wills indivisibly, simply, singly, presently, and simultaneously — nay rather, super-simply, super-singly, super-instantaneously, super-presently, super-simultaneously beyond the temporal instant. For who would presume to say that God knows or wills intrinsically in different and different ways according to different and different successive differences of time? Who would presume to say that the omnipotent and altogether self-sufficient Creator of time stands in need of time and of the successions of flowing time, like miserable man, in order to know or will anything — or to know anything intrinsically, contingently, freely, necessarily, or in any other manner whatsoever? For the first supposition, the fifth and twenty-third of the first book, and the thirtieth of this book, set forth above, forbid that it be so said.

The same opinion, although obscurely, the ancient Philosophers also testify. Among them, Father Hermes, in the first book On the World and the Heaven, wrote thus: "Whatever is extended through spaces consists either as yearly, or temporal [secular], or perpetual, or eternal. The yearly is dissolved by old age, the temporal by an age, the perpetual by durability, the eternal is unbounded. Time, beginning from eternity, is resolved into the bosom of eternity, wearied by its longer circuit — namely, departing from unity to number, from stability to motion. The moment of time is what is moved, the moment of eternity is that from which time is born and into which it must be resolved, that which is extended throughout the universe."

The same author, on the eternal Word, in the forty-third chapter, says: "Eternity is unopposable, immobile, and indissoluble. This, then, is eternity, which neither begins to be nor ceases, which, fixed by an immutable law of running, is turned by sempiternal commotion, and rises and sets often through the members of another, so that with the changing of the times it rises again through those members through which it had set."

For the fuller exposition and better understanding of this saying, however, one should attend to what he writes upon the thirty-fourth chapter of the same work, saying that God alone is immobile — unless someone should dare to say that His commotion is in eternity. But rather eternity itself is immobile, in which the agitation of all times remains, and from which the agitation of all times takes its beginning. Therefore God was stable, and similarly eternity was always with Him. And so, although eternity is stable, immobile, and fixed, nevertheless because the agitation of time, which is mobile, is always called into eternity — and so mobility is turned by reason of time — it comes about that eternity itself, alone immobile, seems to be agitated through the time in which it is, and in which is all agitation. Thus it comes to pass that the stability of eternity is moved, and the mobility of time becomes a stability fixed by the law of running. Thus also it is credible that God is agitated within Himself by the same immobility; for His stability in greatness is an immobile agitation, since the law of His own immobile greatness is so. Hence this — being such as is not subject to the senses — is undefined, incomprehensible, inestimable; nor can it be sustained, nor be brought to pass, nor be tracked out. For where, and how, and whence, or when, or of what kind it is, is uncertain. For it is borne in the highest stability, and in itself is its own stability, whether it be God, or eternity, or both, or one in the other, or both in both. Wherefore eternity is without the definition of time. For stability, since it is fixed in such wise that, by the benefit of firmness, it is able to sustain those things which are agitable, deservedly holds the principate. Therefore the beginning of all things that are is God and eternity. But the world, since it is mobile, does not have the principate; for its mobility forestalls its own stability by holding an immobile firmness in the law of sempiternal agitation.

After him Plato, and certain Platonists, discoursed concerning eternity, age, and time. Whence Plato, in the ninth chapter of the first book of the Timaeus, using "age" for "eternity," speaks thus: "Days and nights and months and years, which were not before the celestial adornment, He commanded then to exist when the world was being born — all of which are parts of time. And we, when we ascribe these things together with age to the same solitary nature, do not rightly fashion them as parts of an indivisible thing. For we say it was, is, will be; but to that solitary nature only to be belongs, according to its true and certain reckoning. To have been, however, and to be about to be, do not belong to it; these indeed are proper to the begetting of time. For these are motions: the one of that which goes before, the other of that which is impending — not of age, but of time. For the abode of age is perpetual and immutable; therefore neither younger nor older, nor was, nor will be, nor will it suffer any of those things which sensible nature suffers, but all these things are alternations of time, which images age." In the same author, moreover, this same eternity is sometimes called saeculum (an age). Whence Averroes, on the second book On the Heaven and the World, chapter 100, where the translation he expounds has saeculum, says thus: "Plato called that which was before time existed saeculum, because time is new according to him; and he intends by saeculum a being terminating all beings, which existed before time."

Aristotle, following these, in the first book On the Heaven, chapter 100, divides and distinguishes eternity in two ways: positing one as the natural period of any life whatsoever, but the other as that which derives its name from "always being" — namely, uniformly and immutably — being called the immortal divine, that is, of God, who according to His substance and every intrinsic disposition is intransmutable and altogether immortal. For whatever is transmuted, at least intrinsically according to some disposition, necessarily dies in respect of that disposition which it loses. Whence he says thus: "This name has been divinely uttered by the ancients. For the end which contains the time of the life of each thing, of which there is nothing outside according to nature, has been called the eternal of each thing. According to the same reckoning, the end of the whole heaven, and all time, and that which contains infinitude in its perfection, is eternal, taking its name from 'always being,' immortal and divine. Whence to other things also it is communicated — to some more clearly, to some more obscurely — to be and to live. For just as has been many times declared in the encyclic discussions concerning divine matters by reasonings, that the divine is intransmutable, necessary, first, and supreme, that which is so disposed bears witness to the things said. For neither is there anything else that will move it (for that would surely be more divine), nor does it have anything depraved, nor is it in need of any of its goods, since none is wanting." These three causes of the Philosopher are to be noted.

Likewise it is to be noted that, where the new translation says that the eternal takes its denomination from "always being," the translation which Averroes expounds says thus: "this name is derived from its act, since it always is." Whence it can be elicited that to be is a certain acting, or a certain action of being, just as to live is the action and the life of the living, as had been declared in the eighteenth chapter of the second book. Whence further it is to be observed that, just as according to the Philosopher in the fourth book of the Physics, fluxible time follows fluxible action — namely, the motion of the heaven — so stable eternity follows stable action — namely, the being of God — and from it in some manner is derived, flows down, and emanates. For just as a flowing point causes a line, and an instant time, so also God, the most stable instant, through His act, as it were by a certain flux, is seen to cause eternity. And this most of all in human cognition, which according to the Philosopher in the book On Memory and Reminiscence does not occur without the continuous, nor without the reckoning of time and motion — although in God there is no flux mutably or temporally successive.

From these things, eternity is seen to be definable thus, briefly: Eternity is the measure, impartibly and immutably abiding, of an act likewise abiding. The reckoning of the genus and differentiae is not hidden. Whence it is also clear that eternity precedes time according to nature; for time is a passion of that which is prior according to nature. For the being of God and His act is naturally prior to the motion of the heaven, just as God is naturally prior to the heaven, since both this and that are caused by God, as the second and fourth chapters of the first book show. Whence the Philosopher, in the fifth book of the Metaphysics, chapter 16: "Things prior," he says, "are called the passions of the prior, as straightness is of lightness; for the former is per se a passion of a line, but the latter of a surface."

By the same considerations also, that saying of Exodus 15 can be expounded: The Lord shall reign for eternity, and beyond. For if "eternal" be taken in the first manner, it is plainly true; if in the second, then still the Lord is in some manner higher than eternity, and transcends it, as the cause originating and exercising principate over its caused, originated, and produced effect. For from Him in some manner causally, originally, and by way of principle it is derived. Wherefore the second proposition of the Book of Causes says thus: "Every higher being is either being higher than eternity and prior to it, or with eternity, or after eternity and above time."

Nor do I reckon it should be neglected — for the understanding of Scripture frequently — that where the new translation has "eternal," the translation which the Commentator expounds has sometimes "age of ages" (saeculum saeculorum), sometimes "age" (saeculum), sometimes "age of an age" (saeculum saeculi), sometimes "ages" (saecula); and Plato sometimes calls eternity aevum. Whence it appears that these are really the same. With these things in concord, Augustine, on Psalm 105 (or Psalm 135), Confess to the Lord because He is good, because His mercy endures unto an age, says that this Greek word, eis tòn aiōna, can be interpreted "unto an age" and likewise "unto eternity." The same author, on Psalm 101, In generation and unto generation, or as he himself has it, In the generation of generations are Thy years, says that by this phrase, "in ages of ages," eternity is wont to be designated in the sacred Scriptures. The same author also, on Psalm 130, Let Israel hope in the Lord, from this now and unto an age, sententially approving both the translation and the distinction of the Philosopher, speaks thus: "What is written in Greek, eis tòn aiōna, has been expounded as 'from this now and unto an age.' But the name of saeculum does not always signify this present age, but sometimes eternity. For 'eternal' is understood in two manners: 'unto eternity,' that is, always without end; or 'until we arrive at eternity.' This, therefore, is how it should be understood: until we arrive at eternity, let us hope in the Lord God, because when we have come to eternity, hope will be no more, but the very thing itself will be."

Further, of the Twenty-four Philosophers, the ninth of the twenty-four definitions concerning God says thus: "God is He to whom alone is present whatever pertains to His time" — calling God's time His eternity.

Among all the Philosophers whom I remember to have seen, however, Boethius, the familiar disciple of Philosophy, in the fifth book of the Consolation, last prose, expressing more clearly the usefulness of the cognition of eternity and its aforesaid property, speaks thus: "That God is eternal is the common judgment of all who live by reason. What therefore eternity is, let us consider; for this lays open to us in like measure both the divine nature and the divine knowledge. Eternity, then, is the whole, simultaneous, and perfect possession of interminable life — which becomes more clear from a comparison of temporal things. For whatever lives in time, this, being present, proceeds from things past into things future; and there is nothing constituted in time which can equally embrace the whole space of its own life: but the morrow, indeed, it has not yet apprehended; the yesterday it has already lost; even in this present life of yours, you live no more than in that mobile and transitory moment. What therefore suffers the condition of time, although — as Aristotle judged concerning the world — it never began to be nor ever ceases, and its life be extended with the infinity of time, yet not such is it that it should be rightly believed eternal. For it does not at once comprehend and embrace the whole space of an infinite life, but the future it does not yet have, the past it has now no longer. Whatever, therefore, comprehends and possesses, equally and at the same time, the whole plenitude of interminable life, to which neither anything of the future is wanting nor anything of the past has flowed away — this is rightly held to be eternal. And this must of necessity, both being in possession of itself, always be present to itself, and have the infinity of mobile time present to itself. For that infinite motion of temporal things imitates this present-stationed state of immutable life; and since it cannot represent and equal it, it falls from immobility into motion, decreases from the simplicity of presence into the infinite quantity of future and past. And since it cannot possess equally the whole plenitude of its life, by the very fact that it never in any manner ceases to be, it seems to some extent to emulate that which it cannot fulfill and express, binding itself to whatever presence there be of this scant and fleeting moment — which, since it bears a certain image of that abiding presence, bestows upon whomsoever it falls upon that they should seem to be. But because it could not abide, it has snatched at the infinite journey of time, and in that manner it has come to pass that, by going, it should continue that life whose plenitude it could not embrace by abiding. And so, if we wish to impose upon things their fitting names, following Plato, let us say that God indeed is eternal, but the world perpetual."

In concord with whom, Anselm, in the Monologion, chapter 24, says: "It is established that the supreme substance is without beginning and without end, and that it has neither past nor future, nor the temporal — that is, fleeting — present which we now use, since its age, or eternity, which is nothing other than itself, is immutable and without parts. Therefore, does not 'always,' which seems to designate all time, when it is said of that supreme substance, much more truly be understood to signify eternity, which is never dissimilar to itself, than the variety of times, which is always in some respect not similar to itself? Wherefore, if it be said 'always to be,' since for it to be and to live are the same, nothing better is understood than 'eternally to be' or 'to live' — that is, perfectly at once to obtain interminable life as a whole. For its eternity is seen to be interminable life, perfectly existing as a whole at once."

Likewise the Prophet shows this same present and uniformly always-instant of eternity, in Psalm 83, saying: Better is one day in Thy courts above thousands — as if to say, in Thy courts there is only one day, not many, and in one only manner, and therefore indivisibly always-instant. This same one day can likewise be called many days, and even many years. Whence Job 10: Are Thy days as the days of man, and Thy years as the times of men? And below in 36: The number of His years is inestimable. And Psalm 76: I considered the days of old, and the eternal years I had in mind. And Psalm 101: But Thou art the same, and Thy years shall not fail. And by like reasoning, eternity can be called both singularly and plurally "all time" and "all times": singularly all time, because it singularly and indivisibly coexists with all time and is equivalent to it in existing; and plurally all times, because it stably coexists with all times and is equivalent to them in existing. It can also be called greater than any time even infinite, if according to Aristotle it be supposed that it is superior to and prior to any time, as has been shown above. Nor does anything there, as in fluxible time, flow away or is taken away, but the whole abides stably together at once.

Now although eternity can metaphorically be called all time and all times, it can also figuratively be named "instant," according to that of Ecclesiasticus 42: The Lord knew all knowledge, and looked upon the sign of the age; nay more truly "instant" than "time" or "times," because unsuccessively, impartibly, immutably the same in number it always-instant.

But that I may confirm the aforesaid understanding of Sacred Scripture by sacred witnesses: Behold, Augustine on the same passage cited from Psalm 83 says: "Let men despise thousands of days; let them desire one day — one which has neither rising nor setting; one day, the sempiternal day, to which yesterday yields not, and which the morrow does not press upon." The same author, in the third book On Free Will, last chapter, expounding the same authority, says: "By 'thousands of days' let the mutability of time be understood, but by the name of 'one day' let the incommutability of eternity be called." The same also in the first book of the Confessions, chapter 6: "Thou art not changed, nor is the day of today carried through in Thee, since Thy years shall not fail. Thy years are the day of today. How many of our days, and of those of our fathers, have already passed through Thy today, and have received from it their measures in such manner as they could exist, and yet others shall pass and shall receive and shall in some manner exist; but Thou art the same, and all things of tomorrow and of the last, and all things of yesterday and behind, today Thou wilt make, today Thou hast made. What is it to me, if some man does not understand? Let him also rejoice, saying, 'What is this?' Let him rejoice; and so let him love rather to find Thee by not finding, than by finding not to find Thee."

The same author, on Psalm 101, In generation and unto generation are Thy years: "Which," he says, "are Thy years? Which, but those that come not nor pass away? Which, but those that do not come for this end, that they may not be? For all days in this time come to this end, that they may not be — every hour, every month, every year. Nothing of these stands. Before it comes, it shall be; when it has come, it shall not be. Therefore those Thy years, eternal — Thy years which are not changed — shall be in the generation of generations. For not other are God's years, and other God Himself; but God's years are God's eternity. God's eternity is His very substance, which has nothing mutable, where nothing is past, as if now it were not; nothing is future, as if not yet it were. There is not there save is. There is not was and will be, since both what was now is not, and what shall be is not yet, but whatever is there, is nothing but is." And below, on the verse Thy years shall not fail: "Let us hope," he says, "to come to those abiding years, in which days are not carried through by the circuit of the sun, but that abides which is, just as it is, because this alone truly is."

The blessed Gregory also, in the sixteenth book of the Morals, chapter 16, on that of Job 24, But those who have known Him are ignorant of His days, says: "What are 'the days of the Lord' but His very eternity? Which is sometimes expressed by the change of one day, as it is written: Better is one day in Thy courts above thousands. Sometimes, however, on account of its multitude, it is signified by the appellation of many days, of which it is written: Unto the age of the age are Thy years. We, then, are rolled within times by the fact that we are creatures; but God, because He is the Creator, comprehends all our times by His eternity." The same author also, above in book 9 of the Morals, chapter 26, on that of Job 10, Are Thy days as the days of man, etc.: "The days," he says, "and years of man differ from the days and years of eternity, because our life, which begins in time, while eternity forms it within the breadth of its own bosom, eternity devours; whose immensity, indeed, since it stretches above and below, beyond and on this side of us, without inception and without end its eternal being is dilated, and to it neither things passed pass away nor things yet to come are wanting — as if they did not appear — because He who has always to be sees all things present to Himself, and when in beholding He is not stretched after and before, by no change of intuition is He varied."

The same property of eternity Anselm also insinuates, in the third and fourth chapters of De Concordia, as the twenty-seventh chapter of this book alleges. Concerning which Robert of Lincoln, in the eighth book On Free Will, says that eternity is at the limit of simplicity, simpler than every instant. These things concerning eternity, set forth above, all the Doctors, ancient and modern, profess unanimously.

COROLLARY

COROLLARY: THAT THERE IS ONE AND THE SAME INSTANT, ALTOGETHER IMMUTABLE, IN THE WHOLE OF ETERNITY; AND THAT THE WHOLE OF ETERNITY IS NEITHER MORE MULTIPLE NOR GREATER THAN ITS INSTANT, NOR IS THE INSTANT OF ETERNITY SIMPLER THAN OR LESS THAN IT; WHEREFORE ALSO ETERNITY AND ITS INSTANT ARE REALLY THE SAME. FURTHERMORE, THAT, NOTWITHSTANDING THESE THINGS, ETERNITY IS CALLED WHOLE, GREAT, LONG, EVEN INFINITE; AND IS SAID TO HAVE BEEN, TO BE, AND TO BE GOING TO BE; AND THAT SOMETHING IS SAID, MOREOVER, TO HAVE BEEN, TO BE, AND TO BE GOING TO BE IN ETERNITY. WHEREFORE

ALSO IT IS SAID OF GOD AND HIS INTRINSIC ACT, BY TRANSMPTION, HE WAS, IS, AND WILL BE; CONCERNING HIS EXTRINSIC ACTIONS, HOWEVER, IT IS PROPERLY AND TEMPORALLY SAID, HE DID, DOES, AND WILL DO.

From these things, however, it is evidently inferred that there is one and the same instant, altogether immutable, in the whole of eternity, and that the whole of eternity is neither more multiple nor greater than its instant, nor is the instant of eternity simpler or less than it; wherefore also eternity and its instant are really the same. Moreover, notwithstanding these things, eternity is called whole, great, long, even infinite; and is said to have been, to be, and to be going to be; and something, moreover, is said in eternity to have been, to be, and to be going to be: wherefore also it is said of God and His intrinsic act, by transumption, He was, is, and will be; concerning His extrinsic actions, however, it is properly and temporally said, He did, does, and will do.

The first part of this corollary follows evidently, since according to what was shown before, in eternity, always-instant stably, there is no mutability, nor any diversity whatever. The second follows from the same things, and from the first. The third follows from the second. The fourth is inferred from the second and third. For if eternity and its instant were not really the same, they would differ as time and its instant; wherefore the one would be more multiple and greater, but the other simpler and less. The fifth likewise follows from the premises; for eternity coexists with all time — great, long, even (according to Aristotle) infinite. Wherefore also it admits from time such transumptive denominations. The sixth, too, follows from this fifth, and is proved likewise as the fifth. The seventh also is inferred from the sixth, and by the demonstration of that. The eighth part of it can be inferred from the sixth.

The cause of this transumption, however, is that we have no word properly signifying the stable abiding of eternity; wherefore we are necessarily compelled to transfer, according to whatever sort of similitude, our temporal words — according to whichever temporal differences — to eternity and to the eternal God, and to His coeternal intrinsic acts, since they coexist with all time, and have not been wanting to any time, nor are wanting now, nor will be wanting in future.

To this Anselm bears witness, in De Concordia, chapter 3, saying: "The proposition (propositum), according to which the saints have been called in eternity, in which there is no past nor future, but only present, is immutable in eternity. For it has not been, nor will it be, but only is. Although there is nothing there save the present, nevertheless that present is not temporal, like ours, but eternal, in which all times are contained. For just as the present time contains every place, and the things which are in any place; so to the eternal present is enclosed at once all time, and the things which are in any time. Therefore when the Apostle says that God foreknew His saints, predestined, called, justified, magnified — none of these is prior or posterior with God, but all are to be understood at once in the eternal present. For eternity has its own at once, in which are all things which are at once in place and in time, and which are in diverse places or times. But that the same Apostle might show that he had not put those words in a temporal signification, those things which are future he pronounced by the verb of the past tense. For not yet had he so temporally called, justified, magnified those whom he foreknew as still to be born. Whence it can be known that he used verbs of past signification on account of the lack of a verb signifying the eternal presence, since those things which are past in time are altogether immutable in likeness of the eternal present."

Is it not also said truly of the Holy Spirit by the voice of truth, Whatsoever He shall hear, He shall speak (John 16)? Upon which Augustine, in the second part On John, homily 45 (or the ninety-ninth of the whole), says thus: "Nor let it move you that the verb of future time is set down. For it has not been said whatsoever He has heard, but whatsoever He shall hear, He shall speak. That hearing indeed is sempiternal, since the knowledge is sempiternal; in that which is sempiternal, however — without beginning and without end — whatever verb of time be put down, whether of past, of present, or of future, it is not put down mendaciously. For although that immutable and ineffable nature does not receive was and will be, but only is (for it is truly, since it cannot be changed, and therefore to it alone it befits to say, I am who am, and thou shalt say to the children of Israel, He who is hath sent me to you), nevertheless on account of the mutability of the times in which our mortality and our mutability are involved, we say not mendaciously both was, and will be, and is. Was in the ages past; is in the present; will be in those to come. Was, since He has never been wanting; will be, since He shall never be wanting; and since He always is — for neither, as one who is no more, has He set with things past; nor, as one who does not abide, does He glide on with the present; nor, as one who has not been, does He arise with things to come. Therefore, since human speech is varied according to the rolling of times, of Him who through no times could be wanting, nor can be, nor shall be able to be wanting, true things are said by verbs of any time. Therefore the Holy Spirit always hears, since He always knows; and so He has both heard, and hears, and shall hear; and through this, has heard, and hears, and shall hear."

In concord with which, Gregory in the twenty-third book of the Morals, on that of Job 33, Once shall God speak, says thus: "But that He says not 'has spoken' but 'shall speak,' setting down not the past time but the future, is plain to all, since to God neither past nor future time is fitting. Therefore any time whatever is so freely placed in Him, inasmuch as none truly is; nor would any time be able to be said freely, if even one were said properly. Hence it is permitted to say boldly any time in God, since in Him no time may properly be said."

The last part of this, however, follows manifestly. For just as the eternal intrinsic act of God is measured by eternity or by its instant, so His extrinsic, temporal action upon temporal things is measured by time, or by an instant of time, just as is the action of a creature.

Book III, Chapter LII

CHAPTER LII. BY WAY OF ETERNITY HE DEMONSTRATES THE AFOREMENTIONED OPINION OF THE 50TH CHAPTER.

I have set forth these matters concerning eternity at somewhat greater length for this reason: because I judge it very difficult — indeed almost most difficult — for a temporal man, ever accustomed to act and to understand temporally, with all the differences and respects of fluxing time conceived in the manner of present, past, and future (which are never standing still, but always running), to lift his understanding above those temporal phantasms, and out of that cloudy prison in which he has been so long fettered, up beyond time, beyond the instant, and beyond all temporal differences, in order to contemplate serenely and freely an eternity that ever remains in the same way without mutability — having no flux or succession, nothing prior or posterior, nothing greater or lesser — and to contemplate God, who is in that eternity alone (above time and instant) correspondingly eternal, and eternally simply, uniquely, instantaneously, and simultaneously — nay, supersimply, superuniquely, superinstantaneously, and supersimultaneously beyond the temporal instant — ever knowing, willing, and doing all things from within. Although this is most difficult, nevertheless it is necessary for anyone who wishes to know the truth in this matter without grave error.

But I, when I was younger, being ignorant of the Scriptures and of the power of God, blinded by the ignorance of these things — or rather born blind — and deceived by false imagination, supposed that the divine knowledge and willing, like the human, were altered through the vicissitudes of times, and disposed otherwise and otherwise, just as the whole of Sacred Scripture seems to those reading superficially to attest. For it seems very often to say that God is affected otherwise and otherwise toward men according as they themselves are altered otherwise and otherwise in good or evil merits. But how these and similar things ought to be understood, the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth chapters of Book I expound. I reckon this same ignorance also to be the cause why perhaps some men similar to me believe that God wills and knows things future, present, and past — and the same thing as future, as present, and as transmitted into the past — otherwise and otherwise from within: that is, non-necessarily and necessarily, freely and not freely; whence they also deny every kind of necessity from future things.

But to this ignorance there appears to apply a remedy, by the power of eternity: scientific reason, the authors of the sciences, the knowing Doctors, the wise Prophets, the wiser Apostles, the most wise Jesus Christ, and the series of both Testaments. For every essence existing eternally — that is, most simply, most unitively, and most immutably — wills and knows its volitions and the things known by it altogether in like manner, and universally so. For if His volition or cognition were changed, He Himself would necessarily be changed, as no one is ignorant, and as the twenty-third chapter of Book I shows. But God is such an essence, as the twenty-third and twenty-fifth chapters of Book I taught.

Likewise, every action properly measured by an immutable measure is immutable; this is at once evident from the mutual proportion and correspondence of the measure to the measurable thing and conversely, and it can be confirmed from the tenth book of the Metaphysics. But every intrinsic action of God is measured by an immutable measure, namely by eternity, as the chapters immediately preceding make manifest. Therefore every volition and cognition of God is immutable — immutable, I say, with respect to prior and posterior; for in eternity there is nothing prior or posterior, as appears from what was just shown above. Therefore no intrinsic action of God has — or has had — itself otherwise from within first (for instance, freely according to contradiction before the presence or pastness of the thing) and otherwise afterward (for instance, necessarily); for then it would not be properly measured by eternity, but rather by time, at least as regards being free or necessary, namely by that time in which the foreknowledge was free or necessary; whence the whole of that action would be measured by the whole of that time, as parts by parts — just as the parts of celestial motion, past and future, are measured by similar parts of time, and so the whole by the whole.

[The action is also] immutable in this further sense: that, after it is or has been, it cannot not be, on account of the aforesaid causes. It is immutable thirdly in this sense: that whenever it is, it cannot not be at that time, but it is necessary that it be at that time, just as also is its measure. For just as it is necessary that any most mutable thing measured by most fluxible time or by an instant be when it is, and when it is measured be at that time necessarily measured by a consequent necessity, so also is it necessary that any most immutable action of the most immutable God, measured by most immutable eternity, when it is, be; and when it is measured, be necessarily measured. For how could it be reasonably affirmed that a most fluxible measure now in some way full of a most fluxible measured thing must of necessity be filled by it for that present moment, while a most firm measure now in some way full of a most firm measured thing could for that present moment be wholly emptied of it? Therefore eternity imports a presential necessity, by which — just as eternity itself, so also everything that is in it (because it is always [presentially] in it) — is necessarily.

Now, in order that I may further confirm by the testimonies of the greater authorities the things said above concerning eternal God, His coeternal intrinsic actions, and those future actions ever present in eternity (and therefore necessary insofar as they are there): behold Hermes, On the Eternal Word, ch. 43, who speaks thus: "These three — Heimarmene, necessity, order — are effected especially by the nod of God, which govern the world by their law and by divine reason; from these therefore every divine willing or unwilling is wholly turned away. These are not moved by anger, nor bent by favor, but serve the necessity of eternal reason — which eternity is unturnable, immobile, and indissoluble."

Behold also Ecclesiasticus 42, which says: "The Lord knew all knowledge, and looked into the sign of the age" — that is, the sign or instant of eternity; and there follows: "Announcing what has passed, and revealing the things that are to come; the traces of the ages. No thought passes Him by, and no word hides itself from Him. He has adorned the magnificent works of His wisdom, who is before the age and unto the age; nothing is added, nor shall be diminished, and He needs no one's counsel; for all His works are desirable, and as a spark to behold. All these things live and remain forever, and obey Him in every necessity."

Behold also, more expressly, Boethius, who in Book V of The Consolation of Philosophy, in the last prose, after his words on eternity recited in the preceding chapter, immediately subjoins: "Since therefore every judgment grasps according to its own nature the things that are subject to it; and since to God there is always an eternal and presentary state, His knowledge also, having transcended all motion of time, remains in the simplicity of His presence, and embracing the infinite spaces of past and future, considers all things in His simple cognition as if they were now being done. Therefore, if you wish to weigh the presence by which He discerns all things, you will more rightly judge it to be not foreknowledge as of the future, but a knowledge of an instantaneity that never fails. Whence it is called not previdence but rather providence, because, set far from the lowest things, it surveys all things as from the lofty summit of things. Thus, then, the divine gaze, looking down upon all — that is, looking downward, that is, seeing all things — does not at all disturb the quality of things which, with Him indeed, are present, but with respect to the condition of time are future."

And below, from this presence of future things in eternity in the divine cognition, he concludes a similar necessity, saying: "No necessity compels him who is walking by his will to advance, although when he advances it is necessary that he advance. In the same manner, therefore, if providence sees anything as present, that thing must necessarily be, even though it has no necessity of nature. But God beholds as present those future things which proceed from the freedom of choice; therefore these things, referred to the divine intuition, become necessary." This whole matter, however, was more fully declared in the twenty-eighth chapter of this Book.

This doctrine St. Thomas follows in his commentary on the First Sentences, distinction 38, question 5, as the twenty-eighth chapter of this Book has more fully recited; and not only there, but almost everywhere where he treats this matter. The same doctrine also Anselm most plainly imitates in On Concord, [chapters] 3 and 4, as his words written in the twenty-seventh chapter of this Book clearly indicate.

Of these — namely Boethius and Anselm — Robert Lincolnensis [Grosseteste], in On Free Will, reverently embraces this doctrine. Whence in chapter seven he says: "Although we have spoken of God's knowledge by way of temporal extension, it is most well known that nothing in eternity is according to such a manner of temporal extension; but it is not easy to speak otherwise concerning the simple state of eternity to a weak intellect, still occupied with phantasms of temporal things." Whence also above, in chapter 5, he says that God knows all things by a single, indivisible, and simple gaze, eternally, always, in like manner, immutably; "Wherefore what He knows, He cannot afterward not know; for what relation these statements have — 'I am sitting' and 'I have sat' — to my sitting while I sit and after I have sat, the same relation does the knowledge of God have to my sitting that will be tomorrow, before I sit. For He knows future things as present, nor does He know them otherwise when they are future and when they are present or past; therefore by every same manner by which it is necessary that God know things when they are or when they are past, it is necessary that He know the same things before they are. But when things are or are past, His knowledge has a consequent necessity; therefore it has the same necessity also before things come to pass."

Nor must the reasoning of the Doctors be forgotten: they say that all things are necessary in eternity because they are present there — which is equivalent to the cause given by the Philosopher, namely, "What is, when it is, must necessarily be" — which St. Thomas also most clearly expresses where he was alleged. This necessity of eternity, therefore, is equipollent to the consequent necessity shown in the fiftieth chapter of this Book. Yet certain authorities placing this necessity in eternity were adduced to prove the necessity according to superior causes set forth in the twenty-seventh chapter of this Book — although they support this much more immediately and evidently than that one, on account of the cause stated in the like manner in the fiftieth chapter of this Book.

This aforesaid necessity of eternity is also sufficiently insinuated by such words of Scripture: "The counsel of the Lord remains forever," "The truth of the Lord remains forever," "Unto the age His mercy," "He has established them forever, and unto the age of ages" — as appears in the fiftieth chapter of this Book. And how great a multitude of authorities of the Old and New Testament, and of authentic writers, brings forth such words and insinuates such or some such necessity, who is ignorant? The twenty-seventh chapter of this Book also commemorates a few of these, all or nearly all of which can soundly be understood according to eternity and the necessity in it. Whence Anselm, On Concord 4, says: "Whatever Sacred Scripture pronounces of those things which come about by free choice as necessary, it speaks according to eternity, in which all that is true is present — and nothing but the true — immutably."

Thomas Bradwardine, De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium

Book III, Chapter 2 — Corollary

COROLLARY OF THIRTY PARTS TO BE NOTED, WITH OBJECTIONS RAISED AND RESOLVED

From these things, with the good Spirit of God kindly revealing them, there can be, as I hope, more easily dug up and unearthed certain divine treasures, most precious pearls in the field of Scripture long hidden and unknown to me — namely certain most illustrious and profound truths that quiet tumultuous whirlwinds, pacify the assaults of adversaries, and answer numerous objections. After such long digging I seem to perceive and see their resplendent images by certain subtle rays, although these emerge through a dark and earthy medium. From the premises, therefore, the following seems to follow manifestly:

[Truth 1] That God could not, prior in time or in eternity, have not willed (whether privatively or positively) what he now wills, but only by a certain priority of nature or cause — namely the priority of the volitional power to its act.

[Truth 2] Indeed, even God, and likewise the created will, could similarly prior in this present instant have not willed what he now wills.

[Truth 3] Both could (by possibility, namely either by preceding power, or insofar as it pertains to the nature of his power nakedly and absolutely considered, or by absolute power or non-repugnance) not will now and for now what he now wills — most especially if, according to the opinion of certain ones, the creature were posited as willing and not-willing solely from itself; it could likewise not-will that. But by subsequent and determined, actuated or ordained possibility, it cannot.

[Truth 4] Concerning God's complex knowledge of posterior knowables, the same judgment must be made.

[Truth 5] From these things it furthermore appears clearly how potuit (he could have), potuisset (he might have been able), posset (he could) and potest (he can), posse (to be able), possibilitas, potentia and potestas signify, differ, and agree in this matter.

[Truth 6] Furthermore, how power in God and in man toward some act for now, which it does not have now, can be drawn out or pass into that act, and how it cannot.

[Truth 7] Also that God and the creature is or is not in some way (for instance, willing this or not willing it, knowing or not knowing), and could and can, by preceding absolute possibility or non-repugnance, not be such or be such without any change whatever; but by ordained or actuable possibility, it cannot be so.

[Truth 8] Further, that the divine volition is always equally free and contingent intrinsically, and therefore equally free and contingent intrinsically with respect to present and past things as with respect to future things; and always equally necessary, and therefore equally necessary with respect to future things as with respect to present and past things.

[Truth 9] Likewise, that God, by preceding possibility, or insofar as it pertains to the nature of the divine power nakedly and absolutely considered, or by absolute power or non-repugnance, could and can now and always in the future not will, and never in the past have willed, any later future, present, or past volitum whatsoever; but by subsequent and determined, actuated or ordained power, he cannot. And the same holds concerning God's being able to will, and to have willed, what he never will, does not, or has not willed — and not being able; concerning his being able not to do, and not to have done, what he will do, does, or has done — and likewise not being able; and being able to do or to have done what he will not do, does not do, nor has done — and likewise not being able.

[Truth 10] Wherefore correspondingly: any thing now future could and can for now not be; any created thing now present could or can now and for now not be; and any past thing similarly could not have been; correspondingly also they cannot.

[Truth 11] Also that a thing which is not future can be future, and what is not now can now and for now be, and what is not now past can now be past — and that correspondingly they cannot.

[Truth 12] Moreover, concerning future contingents, with God there is determinate truth, but with the creature by no means, except perhaps when God reveals it.

[Truth 13] Indeed, that with God truth concerning future things is intrinsically equally determinate as concerning present and past things; and therefore with God there is intrinsically equal contingency and freedom with respect to present and past things as with respect to future, and equal necessity with respect to future as with respect to present and past; but with inferior causes there is not such equal contingency or freedom, nor such equal necessity.

OBJECTIONS

That these illustrious truths may shine forth more brightly when their opposites are placed alongside them according to the philosophers' practice, behold what is commonly objected.

Some object against subsequent necessity (whether according to eternity in the divine will as previously stated, at least with respect to future effects), saying: God could before have not willed what he wills, and have willed what he does not will; also not have foreknown what he foreknows, and have foreknown what he does not foreknow. For he is not less powerful than man is. Whence Peter [Lombard], Sentences I, dist. 40, says that God from eternity could have not predestined this man; and above, dist. 38, says that God could have not foreknown what comes to pass; and on this opinion he is sustained by many distinctions and chapters there, which very many imitate.

Again, as they say, God could not do what he does or has done, also do what he does not do or has not done; and besides do other things otherwise and have done them. God can also not do things he will do, and do things he will not do. Otherwise indeed he would not be omnipotent, but bound. Many widely-known authorities of canonical Scripture and of the canonical Doctors testify to this most plainly. Wherefore the opinion of Peter Abelard affirming, as Bernard recites in Epistle 10, that God can do or omit only those things, or only in that way, or only at that time at which he does, and not otherwise — was condemned by Pope Innocent as heretical, as is testified by his bulled rescript transcribed in the fourteenth place among Bernard's epistles.

Stephen, Bishop of Paris, also condemned the article asserting that God necessarily does whatever is immediately done by him; "an error," he says, "whether it be understood of the necessity of coercion, because it removes liberty, or of the necessity of immutability, because it posits the impossibility of doing otherwise."

Likewise it is not absolutely necessary that future contingents come to pass; therefore the revelations, promises, oaths, and predictions of God, of Christ, and of the Prophets can by similar possibility be falsified. Therefore against this opinion, just as against its opposite, return all the absurdities of the many preceding chapters.

Likewise, according to what is premised here and in chapter 50 of this [book], it is not necessary by preceding necessity that God will what he wills; therefore he can by the opposite [possibility] not will it, and by similar reasoning will what he does not will. Since therefore that power is not idle in God, it can pass into act; therefore he can simply will what he does not will. For which reason the arguments adduced through the way of immutability in chapter 32 of this [book] do not at all proceed; or if they do proceed, since from this opinion it follows that God can not-will what he wills, and will what he does not will, it will likewise follow that God is mutable.

Likewise, even if God's volition and cognition were necessary in some manner, they would not be so necessary with respect to future things as with respect to present and past. Therefore it would become more necessary upon the thing's becoming present without any change whatever, which the thirtieth [chapter] of this invalidates; or by a change in him, which the thirty-second of this enervates. For unless the divine volition and cognition were more necessary with respect to present and past than to future, God could equally not will and not know present and past as future things; therefore those [present and past] could not only [possibly fail], but equally fail to be and to have been, just as future things [can fail] to come to be. There would also be in them not only contingency to either side and freedom, but as much as in future things, and as much necessity in future as in those. Moreover determinate truth — indeed truth equally determinate here and there — which all things, both reason and manifold authority, manifestly forbid.

For if a present thing could for now not be, and a past not have been, by some change — namely from such to non-such — this could be, which evidently implies a contradiction. It would also be expedient for men to deliberate about past things just as about future; indeed it would not be expedient to deliberate about these, just as not about those. According to this opinion, also, the deflowered could be revirginated, just as the contrary.

The Philosopher also, in the last [chapter] of Peri Hermeneias I, says: "What is, when it is, must be; and what is not, when it is not, must not be." This is also testified by the authorities of Averroes, Hugh, and Peter cited in chapter 6 of this [book], and not a few others. The same Philosopher in the same place evidently establishes that in past things there is necessity and determinate truth, but in future things by no means — rather contingency to either side, and freedom, and indetermination of truth; and that if all future things came to be necessarily, there would be no need at all to deliberate or to engage in business.

He also in Ethics III.7 shows that deliberation is not about anything necessary whatever, but only about things which are in us, that is, in our power. He also further on, in [Ethics] VI.2, says: "Nothing done is eligible — for instance, no one chooses Troy to have been captured. For one does not deliberate about what has been done, but about what is future and contingent. What has been done cannot not have happened. On account of which Agatho rightly says: 'Of this alone is even God deprived: to make undone things which have been done.'" He also in De Mundo, last [chapter], says: "Thus it is established in [the realm of] the done that one of the Fates is called Atropos, that is, unchangeable, because all things which have been done are immutable."

Concordantly with these, Pliny in Natural History II says that God cannot make it that he who lived did not live, that he who held honors did not hold them, and that he has no right over past things except that of forgetfulness. Many Catholic Doctors hold these same views in many places. But specifically against the revirgination of the corrupted, Amos 5 seems to contradict, saying: "The virgin Israel is cast down upon her own land; there is none that may raise her up." On which the Gloss: "Thus it happens that the virgin Israel who has gone astray has none to raise her, because he who has once departed from union, and has lost the virginity which he had with one man, will not be able to recover his former state and virginity and the blessedness of union."

Whence Jerome to the virgin Eustochium, Epistle 82, writes thus: "Beware, I beg you, lest God should ever say of you, 'The virgin Israel is fallen, and there is none to raise her up.' I will speak boldly: although God can do all things, he cannot raise up a virgin after her ruin. He is able indeed to free from punishment, but he is not willing to crown one who has been corrupted." This is alleged in the canon, Causa 32, quaestio 5, Si Paulus.

DEMONSTRATIONS OF THE TRUTHS

That these assaults may be more safely met, the truths premised must be proved, so that thus, surrounded by the shield of solid truth, no fear may be feared.

[Demonstration of Truth 1]

For the first truth, it must be known that to not-will privatively is said to be not-willing on account of the privation of the act of willing — that is, not to will. To not-will positively, however, is said to be not-willing through a positive act of will contrary to the act of willing — as it were, to reject or to hate. This manifestly follows from the premises. For according to what was previously shown, God in no way is otherwise and otherwise intrinsically — neither temporally nor variably according to successive volumes of times — but eternally, immutably, and stably is whatever he is intrinsically in any way whatsoever.

[Demonstration of Truth 2]

The second truth similarly follows evidently. For according to the premises, in eternity there is no priority or posteriority of duration, nor any succession from this to that.

[Demonstration of Truth 3]

The third [truth] appears to be patent in virtue of the two prior ones. For if there is some priority there, as all confess, and none according to time, nor according to eternity, it remains that [there is priority] only according to nature, since other modes of priority have no place there. For this truth to be more fully shown, however, it must be known that the volitional power in God, just as in the creature, naturally in some way precedes its act, as cause precedes the caused, the begetter the begotten, and the producer the produced — which mode of priority in divine matters is more fully shown in chapter 30 of Book II of this [work].

This volitional power, according to what was previously shown in chapters 4 and 5 of this [book], even most completely prepared or disposed, insofar as it naturally precedes its free act ad extra (which it now elicits presentially and eternally), could not elicit it, because there is no antecedent necessity there — indeed it stands equally, contingently, indifferently, and freely according to contradiction toward producing it and not producing it.

This natural or causal priority in the eternal God is similar in some way to the temporal priority in temporal man, by which prior in time he could have not willed what he now wills. Wherefore, according to the similitude of the protension of temporal priority, it is said that prior God could have not willed what he now wills — where, however, temporal priority is not properly signified, but only the natural or causal priority of free power according to contradiction to its free act.

Nevertheless, in temporal man, beyond this temporal priority, there is also that natural and causal priority — namely of the volitional and active power to the act. For the human volitional power, as far as concerns itself, even most sufficiently prepared, insofar as it naturally precedes its free act which it presentially produces now, could not produce it, because there is no antecedent necessity there, but it stands equally, contingently, indifferently, and freely according to contradiction toward producing it and not, as is clear from chapters 4 and 5 of this [book].

But that this may shine forth more clearly, let it be supposed (according to what was held in the demonstration of the eighth truth of chapter 5 of this [book]) that a rational creature — angel or man — was created in a past instant A with a most sufficient disposition for willing, and willed in that [instant] well or badly (the angel well, the man badly), and existed no further than A. Each therefore, according to the corollary of chapter 4 of this [book], freely according to contradiction willed in A — the one well, the other badly. Therefore each could, and consequently prior could have not so willed. For the past-tense verb implies a prior, which cannot rightly be understood of temporal priority, nor any other successive priority, but only of the aforesaid natural and causal priority.

The greatest reason, also, why it seems necessary to say that God and man prior could have not willed what he wills, is that contingency and freedom may be saved in them — which seem necessarily to import possibility to the opposite according to temporal priority. But they do not necessarily import this, but only that aforesaid causal priority, as is clear from the seventh and eighth truths of chapter 5 of this [book], and from their defenses in chapter 6, and especially from the words of John Scotus posited there.

Therefore God could similarly prior causally have not-willed privatively what he now wills, and likewise positively. This, I judge, is the understanding of certain Doctors saying that active powers in a certain prior [moment] to their acts can not produce those acts, but sometimes contrary ones. Of this causal priority in the eternal God, I think, ignorance is the cause why some perhaps suppose the eternal God, like temporal man, can be and act, be affected and disposed, otherwise and otherwise successively-intrinsically according to prior and posterior in time. For on account of the similarity of these two similitudes, and on account of the very great custom of temporal men of measuring temporal powers and actions according to prior and posterior in time, they by no means distinguish between them, but estimate that causal [priority] as temporal. But not so, not so according to the Fathers' opinion — but far otherwise must be thought.

Therefore one must imagine — imitating the image of truth — that the eternal God, not temporally nor instantaneously by a temporal instant, but supertemporally and superinstantaneously above the instance of a temporal instant, in the unique and most simple instant of eternity, freely willed something posterior; and how prior he could have not-willed that volitum, because not by priority in time nor in eternity, but only by the aforesaid causal priority. That temporal men, thinking temporally through an instant of time as most known, may rise up somehow to the more unknown instant of eternity, the imagining must be done according to the image of creatures premised: that God in the instant of the world's creation (which is A) freely willed something inferior, and never afterward temporally had the freely volitional power, just as he did not properly have it temporally.

For let it be imagined — perhaps by an impossibility, or by a possibility (as it seems) — that no time succeeded A; or by an impossibility, that immediately after A the freely volitional power had been taken away from God himself. And [imagine] how prior he could have not-willed that volitum, because not by priority of time nor of eternity, but only of nature or cause. Nor can anyone posit any successive and long duration before A, as had been shown in I.1 of this [work]; or perhaps, against the obstinate, let it at least be imagined that God did not precede A by any partibly successive duration.

This same thing seems to be able to be shown, with no such imagination supporting it, but by solid Catholic truth alone. For God created the world in A, and then willed freely the world to be. Therefore, according to what was objected at the beginning, prior he could have not willed the world then to be. But by what priority? Not of time, not of eternity, not of successive duration, but only of nature and cause, as was shown above.

Concerning natural and irrational powers, however, although they naturally and causally precede their acts, otherwise must one think. For there is no freedom of contradiction toward acting and not acting, but antecedent necessity, as is clear from what was shown in chapters 2 and 4 of this [book].

Although also the volitional power in God ad intra in some way causally precedes its act — by which, namely, he wills himself to be, wills and loves all his essentials — nevertheless he cannot, nor prior causally could have, not so willed; because by the mode of nature and antecedent necessity, not contradictory freedom, he so does, just as he also generates and spirates. The objections that contrary things are possible to occur — chapter 43 of Book I [of this work] resolves these.

[Demonstration of Truth 4]

The fourth truth is sufficiently clear from the third and its demonstration. According indeed to the opinion of the fourth, perhaps that of Psalm 2 must be expounded: "You are my Son, today have I begotten you." For there must not properly be taken the day for a day of fluxible time, but for a day or instant of eternity, where there is nothing prior or posterior successively, as the premises of this chapter and the previous one make manifest.

Wherefore Augustine, expounding it, says: "Today, because it signifies presence — and in eternity nothing is past as if it had ceased to be, nor future as if it were not yet, but only present, because whatever is eternal always is — is taken divinely according to that saying, 'Today have I begotten you,' by which the most sincere and Catholic faith preaches the everlasting generation of the power and wisdom of God who is the only-begotten Son." Therefore today designates the instantaneous presence of eternity. And yet he does not say "today I beget you," which nevertheless would be most truly said, but "Today have I begotten you," to signify that there is no temporal or durational priority of the Father to the Son, as certain heretics fabricated, but only a certain priority of origin or cause, of which more fully treated in II.32. According to which mode also an angel just now first created, knowing and willing, could say to his act: "I now in this present instant have begotten you, or produced you."

[Demonstration of Truth 5]

For the fifth truth it must be known that necessity is twofold, namely preceding and subsequent, as was said in chapter 2 of this [book] and often afterward. Therefore correspondingly the power, possibility, or potestas is twofold — namely preceding and subsequent. Preceding [possibility] is as it were contrary to preceding necessity: that is, with the active power or cause most sufficiently prepared posited, insofar as it naturally and causally precedes its act, it is possible according to contradiction for the act to be produced and not to be produced, because there is no antecedent necessity there, but contingency to either side, and freedom of contradiction, as was said in the demonstration of the third [truth]. Subsequent possibility, in similar manner, is opposed to subsequent necessity.

Power nakedly and absolutely considered is active power, insofar as it precedes the act, and is not limited or determined by anything. Absolute power, or of non-repugnance, can be called that by which is said to be possible whatever does not formally include contradiction and repugnance in good and formal consequence simply — concerning which it was more fully said in I.1, in the demonstration of the first supposition. And it corresponds necessarily to what is simply and entirely absolutely [possible], namely whose not-being formally implies and involves the repugnance of contradiction. Whence the Philosopher in Prior Analytics I defines the contingent opposed to the necessary in this way: "I call to be contingent, or contingent, that which is not necessary (namely absolutely), but with which posited as existing, nothing impossible will follow on this account." With this posited, he says, as existing — namely through that species of obligation called positio — nothing will be, that is, will result in formal consequence as simply impossible, that is, simply and entirely absolutely [impossible], that which formally implies and includes contradiction. From this absolute power and of non-repugnance, I think, God is truly said to be and is omnipotent.

These expositions of names having been tasted, this fifth truth, understood concerning the posterior volita of God, is shown manifestly through the fourth and the demonstration of it. For who indeed doubts that toward God's volition ad extra there is no preceding necessity, but most pure freedom of contradiction, and therefore by preceding power (according to the previously stated exposition of preceding power) he can not-will what he so wills? Who also will say that omnipotent God, insofar as concerns the nature of his power nakedly and absolutely considered, or even concerning absolute power or of non-repugnance (according to the previous expositions), cannot not-will what he so wills?

Whence John Scotus, on Sentences I, dist. 40, posing the question whether the predestined can be damned, responding first says that predestination properly taken denotes an act of the divine will, namely the election of some intellectual or rational creature to grace and glory. Second, he distinguishes the proposed question according to composition and division; and denying the composite sense, he says that in the divided sense these two — namely to be predestined and to be able to be damned — are said dividedly in two categoricals of the same [subject], nor are the opposites simultaneously true, nor can one succeed the other, because in eternity there can be no succession. But these are simultaneously true insofar as the divine volition is considered as prior, naturally to the transit of itself over that object which is "glory to this one"; in that priority naturally, it is not repugnant to it to be of an opposite object — indeed it could essentially be of the opposite, but not simultaneously of both.

Who, moreover, will concede that the rational creature — most especially if it should will and not-will solely from itself — produces its free volition from preceding necessity and not from contradictory freedom? Or even, as is the fact now (with God acting prior), and from preceding necessity with respect to inferior causes, and not from contradictory freedom with respect to those, produces its free volition? And consequently is able by preceding power to not produce that at all? Nor will anyone judge that the rational creature, insofar as concerns the nature of its power nakedly and absolutely considered, and concerning absolute power and of non-repugnance, cannot not-will what it now wills.

For how does this simple categorical, "He does not will now to read tomorrow," when he now wills to read tomorrow, simply and formally absolutely imply repugnance, or include contradiction? Who is so ignorant in obligational positio that, with this admitted as possible, he does not easily defend himself from contradiction and from every absolute impossible — by formally conceding every consequent, denying repugnant ones, rejecting impertinent ones, like the jurists?

Otherwise, with any one [proposition] posited, one could dispute about anything — or respond according to its quality, if he wishes — just as about this. With A this present instant existing in London, if it be posited as absolutely possible, and similarly admitted, "He is not in London but in Rome in A," no contradiction follows formally in A, nor any absolute impossible — although as-of-now and per accidens contradiction and absolute impossible would seem to follow, namely that he who is in London in A is not in London but in Rome in A. Yet this per se simply and absolutely does not follow. For that he is in London in A is not absolutely necessary, nor does to-be-in-London in A inhere in this man per se and essentially in A. Indeed, insofar as it pertains to the nature of the thing, and to the absolute power of things, it would not be repugnant for this not to inhere in him in A. For he could have set out on a journey long ago, and in A or earlier finally arrived at Rome.

Similarly, this man who in A is white and sitting can in A not be white in A nor sitting, but black and standing or lying. And if anyone object that in similar manner God could or can not be — that is most false, as the corollary to I.14 teaches.

This opinion is plainly testified by John Scotus in Sentences I, dist. 2, saying: "I call contingently caused that whose opposite could come to be when it does"; and further on, on dist. 39: "Not in this way is the cause contingent — namely because it pre-existed before that instant in which it causes, and then as pre-existent could cause or not cause; because just as this being, when it is, is necessary or contingent, so the cause when it causes, then causes either necessarily or contingently. Since therefore in this instant the will causes this volition, and not necessarily, therefore contingently — there is therefore a power of the cause to the opposite of what it causes, without succession; and that real power is the power of the prior naturally, as of the first act, [to] all things which are posterior naturally, as second act. The first act considered in that instant in which it is prior naturally to the second act, so posits it in being as its effect contingently; which as prior naturally could not posit it but the opposite in being."

He also in the same place, distinguishing freedom in many ways, says thus: "There is also another freedom not so manifest, without any succession; for positing a created will to have being only in one instant, and that it in that instant has volition — it does not necessarily then have it"; which he consequently shows through the art of obligations, positing as possible that volition not to be in that instant, as I did above.

This same opinion Henry of Ghent professes, Quodlibet V, q. 4, saying that this proposition in the divided sense, "What God wills, he cannot not-will," has a twofold cause of truth, of the second of which he says: "But another cause of truth is, God does not have in himself the power by which there could be in him the not-willing of what he wills" — which is false, because the power in God's will concerning the actual being of creatures, as has been said, has no determinate necessity; indeed insofar as it concerns itself, is to either side concerning willing or not-willing it, with no connotation concerning the possibility or non-possibility of succeeding (concerning the will of God) the act of not-willing after the act of willing — but states a precise possibility to either, insofar as it pertains to the nature of the divine will. And in this sense similarly that proposition is false in the divided sense: "It is not possible for one not sitting not to sit" — therefore according to him, it is now and for now possible for him who now does not sit, to sit.

This same is confirmed by the saying of St. Thomas, Summa I, q. 19, a. 3, written in chapter 50 of this [book].

[Demonstration of Truth 6]

The sixth truth is shown by this fifth, and through the demonstration of it.

[Demonstration of Truth 7]

For the seventh truth it must be known that subsequent possibility, defined above, and determinate, actuated, or ordained possibility are the same. For just as the necessity by which "everything that is, when it is, is necessarily" is called subsequent, determinate, actuated, and ordained; so also the opposite possibility, by which according to certain ones something which is, while it is, can oppositely not be, is named by the same names, on account of the lack of proper names or denominations — namely the lack of proper differentiae. This seventh truth, so understood, manifestly follows from what was previously shown here and in chapter 50 of this [book] above. For it was shown here and there that an act of the divine will, just as of the human, when it is, is necessary by subsequent necessity. Therefore by the opposite possibility, it is not possible for it not to be.

[Demonstration of Truth 8]

For the eighth, it must be known that God's knowledge is twofold, namely incomplex and complex, in the way it is granted to ignorant and stammering man to know and express it, as I.18 more fully showed. God's complex knowledge of things known posteriorly through the divine will is, by this same chapter 18, [posited] through the divine will, and therefore follows it both negatively and affirmatively according to the truths premised concerning it. But God's incomplex and simple-apprehension knowledge by no means follows the divine will. For God thus knows necessarily and simply all knowable things, and although the cognitive power in God in some way naturally or causally precedes that act, it is in no way possible that he should not always produce and have that act, as was said in the demonstration of the third truth concerning similar matters. Concerning God's complex knowledge of things known prior to the divine will, the same must be thought as concerning his incomplex knowledge.

[Demonstration of Truth 9]

For the ninth, I judge it must be thought that potuit (he could have), said of God, by no means properly signifies temporal priority, nor any successive [priority], as appears from the premises, but the natural or causal priority of free power according to contradiction to its free act — according to which priority, namely insofar as the cause preceded, it could in no way have produced that act, as was said above in the demonstration of the third truth. Yet if it be said of the creature, both priorities can be congruously designated, since in it both priorities are found, as the demonstration of the third made plain.

More conveniently and more customarily, however, the verb potuit of past tense is said for the past than for the present — as that God could have not-willed to create the world in past instant A in which he created it; and similarly of creatures, namely of an angel and a man created and willing in past instant A, as was said in the demonstration of the third [truth] — although it can also be said of the present, although less consonantly, as the fourth truth expressed.

Potuisset (he might have been able), as anyone's mind acquiesces, signifies the same priority, and this more proximately than potuit to this causal priority according to human understanding, and more remotely from temporal priority; and it is said more conveniently of the past than of the present, more conveniently however than potuit of the present. It can also congruously designate power nakedly and absolutely considered, or absolute power or of non-repugnance, as the fifth truth spoke — so that thus it is said that this man "could have" done this or that, that is, insofar as it pertained to the nature of absolute power, so that no repugnance would have followed formally.

Posset (he could), as anyone's mind conceives, signifies the same natural and causal priority — more proximately, however, according to human conception, to this causal priority, and more remotely from temporal priority, than potuit or even potuisset. It also significantly enough signifies absolute power and of non-repugnance, as has been said of potuisset. It is said more conveniently of the present than potuit or potuisset, for it is of present time; of the past it is not said as those are; but of the future, as those are not said. For according to the logicians, it is an amplifying (ampliativum) verb. Therefore under the voice of present time it can be extended further to the future, so that it is said: "God could (posset) tomorrow not-will what tomorrow he will will, and do what he will not do" — where, however, by no means properly is temporal priority designated, but natural or causal priority, or even absolute power or of non-repugnance.

Potest (he can), similarly, is said for two times, namely of present and future, because it is an extensive or amplifying verb, as was said above. If however it be said of the future — as "God can (potest) tomorrow not-will what tomorrow he will will, and not do what he will do" — it does not properly signify temporal priority, but causal or absolute and of non-repugnance, as was said of posset.

If however it should be said of a creature — for instance, of a man — both priorities could be designated, as was said of potuit, which is also true of potuisset when it is said of the past, and of posset when it is said of the future. But if it be said of the present and for the present — as "God now can, and for now, not-will what he now wills" — it does not so plainly signify the aforesaid natural or causal priority. Therefore neither does the mind of the listener so admit this saying, as if it were said potuit, potuisset, or posset — but in some way refuses and resists, as if it were said of man, "A man now willing anything, can now and for now not-will it"; or "A man now white or sitting, can now and for now not be white or sitting." For the mind takes the subject thing with the quality or disposition which it now has, which on first appearance it judges necessarily to be for now — just as every mind takes, as a kind of principle naturally implanted in itself and well-known, that "everything that is, when it is, is necessary to be"; and therefore refuses, and does not admit, the contrary possibility.

Likewise, when it is said, "God or man can now and for now not-will what he now wills," if it be understood of power nakedly and absolutely considered, insofar as it pertains to the nature of power, or of absolute power or of non-repugnance, it is true and to be truly conceded, as can be had from the demonstration of the fifth truth premised. Yet much more readily the mind receives such a sentence with posset than with potest, because the signification of this is more easily known in posset than in potest. According to a similar manner the difference between volui, voluissem, volo, vellem (I willed, I might have willed, I will, I would will); feci, fecissem, facio, facerem (I did, I might have done, I do, I would do); and similar [conjugations] can perhaps be assigned.

Posse, possibilitas, potentia, and potestas seem to signify power preceding naturally or causally its act, free according to contradiction to do it and not. According to which opinion the Philosopher says in Metaphysics IX.10 that "the rational powers, or those with reason, are of contraries"; and below in [chapter] 18 that "the powers according to reason are of contradiction, because what can move thus, can also not thus" — as chapter 4 of this [book] and chapter 25 of Book I more fully showed. They can also signify the naked and absolute power, or of non-repugnance aforesaid, according to the opinion of the same Philosopher in Prior Analytics I, recited above in the demonstration of the fifth.

For thus it is said that in God there was, is, or will be the posse, possibilitas, potentia, and potestas of not-willing what he willed, wills, or will will — which can also be said similarly of the creature.

These things I have judged must be treated somewhat more diffusely, because the cognition of these greatly distinguishes, illuminates, and renders serene the understanding of Sacred Scripture, of the Doctors, and of all who commonly speak; and ignorance of them greatly confounds, beclouds, and obscures it.

This profundity, and the others preceding, that most subtle searcher Robert, Bishop of Lincoln, digging most profoundly even to the foundation in them, also finding and showing most clearly how God prior could and could not have not known or not willed what he knows or knew, wills or willed, and how he could and could not, can and cannot not know and not will what he knows and wills — after he had said in De Libero Arbitrio 7 that "in God there is the posse that he should not have known what he knows," and in chapter 8 he argues against that thus: "Whatever, while it is, is necessary to be, and it is not possible that it not be then when it is — as that Socrates is white, if it is true in instant A, has no posse to be false in A. If therefore what is true in instant A cannot be false in the same A — but eternity, since it is in the limit of simplicity, simpler than every instant — what is true in eternity cannot be false in the same eternity. But that God knows A is true in eternity; therefore there is no posse for him not to know A."

In chapter 9, finally determining, he responds thus: "Just as light is not prior to splendor by time, but by nature and cause; and if there were eternal light without beginning, nonetheless light begetting splendor would be prior to begotten splendor naturally and causally. And as according to Chrysostom: 'The Father is also not prior to the Son by eternity, not by nature, but by cause' — for he says thus on In principio erat verbum: 'The Father precedes the Word not by nature, but by cause; the Father precedes the Word causally, the Son precedes all things which were made through him naturally' — so there posse in some way precedes the act, not by eternity, nor perhaps by nature (since they are one in nature, and one nature), but perhaps there posse precedes the act by cause, and also by a priority from which consequence does not convert; just as animal precedes man, although however posse and act in [God's] substance are not different and different things — so the Father is prior to the Son in cause, although however the Father and the Son are one in substance.

"This causal priority is insinuated from the consignification of past tense through this verb potuit. When I say, 'God potuit (could have) not have known A,' and when it is said, 'God posset (could) not have known A,' is insinuated the freedom of judgment, and one rational power for this thing naturally, which is in act toward its opposite. Therefore this predication, when I say 'God can,' can return upon the powerful nature itself; and thus it is true that he can both of the opposites. Thus it is true what Anselm says: 'God can not-will what he wills'; and it is established that he can will what he wills, and so can opposites — and so according to the force of the expression, on account of the priority insinuated through this verb potuit, returns the predication of the same verb; similarly of this verb posset.

"Or this predication can return upon the same considered in the nature of agent of one of the opposites; and thus it is impossible for him not to will what he wills, or not to know what he knows. For there is in God's nature a posse to either, which causally precedes either; but upon the same agent of one [opposite], since he is immutable, there is no posse to the opposite of that which is in act.

"For just as according to Anselm's distinction the free will of man — where posse precedes the act temporally — can not-will, and cannot not-will, but it is necessary for it to will (for it can not-will before it wills, because it is free, and when now it wills, it cannot not-will, but it is necessary for it to will, since it is impossible for it both to will and not-will the same thing simultaneously) — so perhaps in God, where there is no temporal precession but a causal one, if God's nature is considered itself not in the ratio of acting, and is compared to the free will of man naked of act before he wills, it will be true to say: 'God can not-will what he wills.' But if the divine nature itself is considered in the ratio of acting, and compared to the free will of man when now he wills in act, it will be true to say: 'It is necessary for God to will what he wills, and not to will what he does not will.' For it is impossible for him both to not-will what he wills, and to will what he does not will. Which distinction in our posse and act is made by temporal priority — there in [God] is made by causal priority, and by the subject upon which different predication returns by different consideration; but the distinction is more manifest where temporal priority accompanies it.

"Through such a distinction also of the consideration of the subject, when posse is predicated of God, we say God can create more worlds, or infinite worlds — and yet that he cannot do this. For if the divine nature itself is considered, infinitely powerful, it can indeed do this concerning [its] power; but if the same is considered as most ordered in things to be done, it is impossible for it to create more worlds, and impossible for it not to create one world — yet of his power this is possible. Similarly God could, as concerns power, have liberated man otherwise than through the death of his Son; but if [he is considered as] doing all things most fittingly, he could not have liberated man otherwise. Whence Augustine says that he could have liberated otherwise; but Anselm, that he could not have liberated otherwise; and similarly many other authors.

"And for the evidence of what has just been said, let us suppose a created free will not to be prior to actually willing something rightly or not rightly — as perhaps was the free will of an angel and of the first man. Was it not the case according to this that the angel, when he was simultaneous with the first act of existing, willed by the act of willing something well or badly — for instance, Gabriel something well, Lucifer something badly — and was in the free potestas of each what he willed, and each could have not-willed the opposite of what he willed? Otherwise neither would this be praiseworthy nor that blameworthy, nor would they have had freedom of judgment.

"Let it also be understood that their state was simple, namely instantaneous or eternal. Was not each, simultaneously with the act of one of the opposites, having in the same indivisible the posse to the opposite act — and would not such a predication be true of each: 'This one can will the opposite of what he wills, or not-will what he wills,' if the predication returns upon the nature of the free will nakedly considered without its act?

"And because by the force of the expression the predication so returns with this verb potuit or posset, every mind immediately conceives this to be true: 'The first angel, immediately when he first was, and willed this — could (potuit or posset) have not-willed this same thing.' And because the present-tense verb more by the use of speech returns upon the subject according to the disposition which it actually has, the mind immediately rather conceives this to be false: 'He can not-will what he wills,' if in the indivisible he wills, as has been posited."

He also further on, resolving the argument recited above, writes thus: "It is patent therefore that what is, is necessary to be while it is, and yet not inconveniently, but for some [thing] it is necessary in the same indivisible to have posse to the opposite of what is — as in the example given of the angel — and that the predication of necessity and of possibility of the opposite does not return upon the simply same and considered in the same way."

According to this understanding, then, I think it can rationally be possible to expound Lombard's words alleged on the contrary; and Robert of Lincoln so understands him in similar matters, in De Libero Arbitrio 7, saying: "There is in God an eternal posse that he should not have known without beginning what he knows. Whence the Master in the Sentences: 'God could have created nothing, and so foreknown nothing of the created.' Therefore he has the power that he had never created, and never known many things which he created and knew. From this posse, indeed, which is to either of the opposites — namely to have known and not to have known without beginning — follows the contingency of things."

This understanding also Lombard's words express evidently. For in the first book of the Sentences, dist. 39, he says: "Just as the divine essence cannot be increased or diminished, so neither the divine knowledge — and yet it is conceded that he can know what he does not know, and can not-know what he knows; because there could be subject to his knowledge something which is not, and there could not be subject something which is, without any change in that knowledge." Posse (to be able), he says, and posset (could) — which according to the previous expositions signify power contradictorily free, insofar as it naturally or causally precedes its free act, or power nakedly and absolutely considered, namely insofar as concerns the nature of power.

Wherefore also further on in the same distinction: "If, he says, you say that God cannot know or foreknow what from eternity he did not know or foreknow — that is, [cannot] have the power of knowing and foreknowing from eternity, and now something, yet that has not been foreknown nor is future — it is true." And in dist. 40: "When the question is concerning the foreknowledge or predestination of God, possibility and impossibility may be referred to God's power, which always was and is the same, because predestination, foreknowledge, [and] power are one in God."

In a similar manner the Philosopher seems to speak in the last [chapter] of Peri Hermeneias I, denying necessity in future contingents, and affirming that in them there is the possible to be and not to be, and that in them it happens to be and not to be. These words signify power insofar as it precedes its act naturally, as appears from the premises — indeed, as it more seems, insofar as it precedes its act temporally, by which precession can also rationally be intimated the natural precession, as was said above. That he speaks of temporal priority, however, the example shows well: "Many things, he says, are manifest to us thus disposed: that this garment is possible to be cut and is not cut, but is worn out first; similarly also it is possible not to be cut. For it would not be possible to be worn out first, unless it were possible not to be cut."

It seems also not inconsonant to the text that, when he says "it is possible for this to be and not to be," he understands of absolute power, as appeared in chapter 29 of this [book], or insofar as concerns the nature of power nakedly and absolutely considered. Whence also, after his last words just recited, he immediately concludes by adding: "Wherefore in other future things, namely [other than] the cutting or not-cutting of the garment, whatever are said according to power are of this kind, it is manifest that not all come to be from necessity" — namely from necessity repugnant to this power.

This same opinion is intimated by the words of Scotus on Sentences I, dist. 2, 39, and especially dist. 40, recited above in the demonstration of the fifth of this [chapter].

Otherwise it can be said that Lombard does not speak there definitively and according to his own opinion, but rather inquisitively and according to the opinion of others. For in dist. 40, where he had been alleged, having raised the question concerning predestination, "Whether the predestined can be damned," he says: "In the resolution of this question I would prefer to hear others rather than to teach"; and below: "It is conceded by some that even now God can not have predestined from eternity. Thus also concerning the foreknown and concerning foreknowledge they say, which they by no means concede in the actions or operations of God and of men; for from when something has been done or said, they do not concede that it can not be or not have been."

A third response could be — which does not please me — namely to deny it [Lombard's opinion] plainly in this matter, as St. Thomas seems to do on Sentences I, dist. 38, q. 5, where he manifestly disapproves the response which seems to be his [Lombard's], as is more fully recited in chapter 50 of this [book].

[Demonstration of Truth 10]

The tenth truth, as concerns both its parts, plainly follows from the premises. For as concerns the affirmative part, [it follows] from the fifth and sixth; and as concerns the negative, from the seventh, [it follows] evidently.

And if anyone object that if there were a power which in no way could pass into act, that would be entirely idle; therefore if there is some power which in some way cannot pass into act, that at least in that way is idle; therefore there is some power in some way idle in God — to this argument one could perhaps insist more sophistically than demonstratively, similarly arguing: "In God there is power for the infinite division of the continuum into equal parts, for the infinite creation of finite foot-quantities, for inscribing or circumscribing in an assigned circle a figure of infinite right-line angles, equilateral and equiangular; for any finite continuum or discrete quantity it can create as creatable" — which yet cannot be drawn out into act, for it would include contradiction so to be.

But it can more truly be said that the power by which God can for now not-will positively what he now wills — because it is a rational power — is the same of contraries, and therefore is now in act, not however of not-willing but of willing.

Whence also Robert of Lincoln in De Libero Arbitrio 8 argues against this possibility in this way: "If this possibility is without act and empty, it is not deducible into act." He, further on in [chapter] 9, responding, says: "It is true that a possibility impossible to be drawn into act is no possibility, or is empty; and yet the possibility by which God can not-know, or could have not-known, what he knows, is some [possibility] and is not empty, because it is a rational possibility and the same of opposites; and whichever of the opposites is, it is drawn into its act, since to either there is one and the same [possibility]."

Nevertheless, as it seems, this does not plainly settle the mind of the opponent. For the opponent intends that every active power not only can pass into some act, but into any act with respect to which it is said to be a power — and when, or for when, it is said to be a power. And therefore, that the volitional power of God or of man, which is said to be a power now and for now to an act which it does not have now, can for now [pass] into that. Therefore approaching more proximately, it seems must be said that a power with respect to some act, when and how it is with respect to that, can pass into it; but in the way in which it is not [a power] of that, by no means.

The volitional power, however, in God and in man is not for now a power to the act opposite to that which it now has, except by preceding possibility, and insofar as concerns the nature of power nakedly and absolutely considered, or by absolute power or of non-repugnance — and so it can, or (to be more acceptably said to the mind) it could, for now [pass] into that, as appears from the sixth truth and the fifth and their demonstration. By subsequent and determined, actuated, or ordained possibility through the act which it now has, by no means; indeed thus it is necessary for that power for now to have this act, and to lack the contrary.

Still perhaps it is asked by way of objection: Is such volitional power before the act, or with the act? For this division is by opposites, as the philosophers and all commonly attest. Not before the act, because in this instant there is not, nor can there be, a before and after; nor with the act, because the act is not.

But here, as above, it can be responded that that power is with the act — namely with the act which it now has. But if it be spoken of the act with respect to which it is called a power, which it does not have, it can be said that it is not before that temporally nor with that, because that act is not — just as the volitional power of man with respect to act A, which he can have tomorrow but will not have. Therefore that aforementioned division must seem to be understood by no means concerning merely possible acts, but only concerning acts really present or future. Or it can be said that there is a certain priority there not actual but habitual, not temporal but natural or causal, by which that power could precedently produce that act; and such priority and posteriority, without repugnance, is simultaneous with the simultaneity of a temporal instant.

[Demonstration of Truth 11]

The eleventh truth follows from the fifth, sixth, and eighth. For if God or the creature wills or knows something now, and now and for now can not will or not know it — and this cannot be by a change between opposite terms (namely from such to non-such): because not by a change in the willer or knower, nor in the willed or known, nor in any third [thing].

Not by a change in the willer or knower — as concerning God all concede, which I.5 and I.23 also teach. Furthermore, neither is this possible to occur in the Creator nor in the creature, by a change in him or in her past or future — as no one is ignorant — nor in the present instant. For that necessarily would be between opposite terms, namely from such to non-such, or from non-such to such — as is necessarily every successive or sudden change. But no such change can occur in this present instant. For it evidently includes contradiction that, from one willing A in present instant B, in B should come to be one not-willing A in B. For it includes that the same in the same present instant B should both will the same A and not will it.

Nor is it possible that this occur by a change in the volitum or known — because not in the volitum or known future, which for now can not be future, where it would seem most [possible]. For it formally implies contradiction that something be changed from non-future to future, or from future to non-future, except by its position in being, as I.18 of this [book] shows.

Nor can this occur by a change in the volitum or known present — for this includes contradiction, as has been shown above in a similar case. Nor in the volitum or known past, as no one is ignorant; which can also be shown as was shown above concerning the future.

Nor likewise is it possible for this to occur by a change in any third thing, as anyone's mind conceives, since this would seem impertinent.

Likewise this man, who in present instant A is in London white and sitting, can by this possibility in A not be in London, white, nor sitting — indeed in A be in Rome, black and standing — as the demonstration of the fifth shows; and not by any change, as no one is ignorant.

This opinion is plainly testified by John Scotus, as appears in the demonstration of the fifth truth. Henry of Ghent concordantly holds it in Quodlibet V, q. 4, opposing and responding in this way:

"That God wills, he cannot not-will, otherwise his will would be mutable. It must be said that this proposition, namely 'What God wills, he cannot not-will,' can be de re and de dicto, divided or composite. If de dicto and composite, thus it is true; if de re and divided, thus the sense is, 'What God wills' etc. — that is, 'God does not have the power of not-willing what he wills' — which by the force of the expression can have a twofold cause of truth.

"Of which one is: God does not have the power by which he might at another time not-will what now he wills — which is true, because such power would posit in God a possibility in succeeding concerning God's will, the act of not-willing after the act of willing; for thus he would be mutable, as the objection proceeds. But according to this sense, this proposition is false in the divided sense: 'For one sitting not to sit is not possible' — because a man sitting now, afterwards can in act not sit.

"Another cause of truth, however, is: God does not have in himself the power by which there could be in him the not-willing of what he wills — which is false, because the power in God's will concerning the actual being of creatures, as has been said, is by no necessity determined; indeed insofar as it concerns itself, it is to either side concerning willing it and not willing it, connoting nothing concerning the possibility or non-possibility of succeeding (concerning the will of God) the act of not-willing after the act of willing — but says a precise possibility to either, insofar as it pertains to the nature of the divine will. And in this sense similarly that proposition is false in the divided sense: 'For one not sitting, it is not possible not to sit'; nor does such power posit any mutability.

"For just as for actual change two things are required, namely simply a power to the contrary of what now is in, and an actual succession of one of them after the other — so for mutability two things are required, namely the said power, and a power to actual succession; that is, that that power by which something is to either side, be a power to succession of one after the other — which concerning God's will can in no way occur. Therefore [there is] no mutability, although in some sense he can not-will what he wills, and therefore wills it in no way of necessity.

"Whence concerning what he always willed from eternity, and wills, and will will: simultaneously from eternity he had, and has, and will have the potestas of not-willing; and could from eternity not have willed, or have not-willed from eternity; and can now not-will, and will be able for eternity not-to-will, or not-to-will-for-eternity; and this without any mutability of himself."

[Demonstration of Truth 12]

For the twelfth truth it must be known that actuabile power is to be called not that entirely absolute and of non-repugnance aforementioned, but that which to common manner of understanding and speaking is said to be able to pass into act — by which it is said of one sitting that he can stand, of one in London that he can be in Rome, and similar [cases]. This twelfth, so understood, is known evidently from chapter 32 of this [book].

[Demonstration of Truth 13]

The thirteenth truth manifestly follows from what was previously shown in this chapter. For it was shown above that every intrinsic action of God is measured by eternity, in which there is nothing prior or posterior, nor any mutability whatever; and that every intrinsic action of his is intrinsically immutable in every way; and that no action of his is intrinsically otherwise and otherwise — for instance, freely and not freely — according to prior and posterior. Therefore neither is any volition of his, prior (namely before the presence or pastness of a thing), more free than afterwards (with the thing made present or lapsed into the past); nor less free afterwards than before, nor less before and more afterwards on account of the same reason — as no one is ignorant. Therefore [it] always equally free, immutably, intrinsically perseveres.

Likewise, although in the divine volition there is subsequent necessity, yet in it there is contingency and freedom of contradiction from preceding necessity, as was shown in chapters 4 and 5 of this [book] — which always remains equal, with the volitum first future, then present, and finally past. For the incomplex or simple cognition of the thing in God, and his volitional power, and all things causally previous to the act of will, eternally remain equally potent, equally causing, equally producing that act.

The arguments of chapter 30 of this [book] also show this. Otherwise indeed the eternal God would be intrinsically changed — indeed, he would be incurably wounded, irreparably mutilated, and irrecoverably slain, as the arguments and authorities of the same chapter 30 manifest. Wherefore the Philosopher rightly says that the divine will, or God willing, is "an immobile law moving all things and equally inclining toward us"; therefore it equally always remains free; whence he adds, "receiving no corruption, direction, or transposition," as the same chapter 30 more fully alleged. Avicenna concords with him, similarly alleged there.

Furthermore, who would steal or rob from divine freedom even the smallest portion? Who, moreover, will presume to make his God newly not most freely, but remissly free; not most, but remissly perfect; not most, but remissly powerful — and therefore not omnipotent? Who, I say, will so presume to befool every reason, falsify every faith, and invalidate all symbols?

Otherwise also a posterior thing willed would diminish divine freedom, and would subject it to a new servitude; therefore that freedom could be wholly removed and taken away — all of which there is no doubt are false, as can more fully be known from the same chapter 30. Likewise divine freedom is no more handmaid or slave than human freedom; rather it is equal with respect to future, present, and past.

[Demonstration of Truth 14]

The fourteenth truth, sister most similar of the thirteenth, can be known manifestly through it and through the demonstration of it. For just as in the human will or volition there is equal necessity with respect to a future, present, or past volitum, so also in the divine — since [the divine will] is in no way increased extrinsically from outside (namely from the presence or pastness of a thing), nor from within, since the eternal God is intrinsically immutable in every way. Finally, there is no necessity there except subsequent, [arising] from the firmness and stability of the act of the divine will, as is clear from chapter 50 of this [book]. But that act always intrinsically remains equally stable, equally firm — like the volitional power and the other intrinsics to God himself.

This is also shown manifestly through chapter 30 of this [book]. Furthermore, the cause of the contrary error I think to be ignorance of eternity, and the imagination by which perhaps some temporal men imagine and judge that God's intrinsic volition and cognition vary intrinsically according to the volumes of times, and of temporal things, just as actions and other temporal things [vary]. For they suppose things to be sometimes future, sometimes past intrinsically with God, and therefore that they are otherwise and otherwise, sometimes thus, sometimes thus, with him — which yet is repugnant to the most indivisible, most immutable, and most stable instant of eternity, as is clear from this and chapter 51 of this [book].

Therefore, alongside the premises concerning eternity in these chapters, that we may ascend from the more known instant of time to the more unknown instant of eternity, it seems verisimilar to imagine in this way: as if God in the instant of the world's creation (in which let us suppose us to be), which no succession preceded, nor any would follow — existing in the center of a circular line, reflecting from East through South and West back to East by his most efficacious will going forth (as it were) through individual semi-diameters to the individual points of the circumference — would now create simultaneously, according to truth, all things present, past, and future according to prior and posterior in time, [yet] according to prior and posterior in the line corresponding to the prior and posterior in time, with the beginning of the line placed in the East.

Therefore just as, if it were so, those created things according to prior and posterior in the line would have a similar order among themselves, but by no means with God; rather all to him, and he to all, would equally relate — so also now these temporal things according to prior and posterior in time obtain a similar order compared to one another, but with God in the most simple and most unique instant of eternity by no means; rather there all things temporally past, present, and future, not only present, but equally present always remain. Nothing there arises, nothing dies, nothing there future, nothing past, but instantaneously only present, as this chapter and the next one make manifest.

Whence Hermes in De Mundo et Coelo II says: "Just as a circle to its center, so the temporary world stands to eternity." Therefore even if it were really as this imagination supposes — just as the divine will would be contingent and free, indeed equally contingent and equally free with the freedom of contradiction and from preceding necessity, and necessary and equally necessary by subsequent necessity with respect to any volitum prior or posterior in position among themselves, but with God by no means — so it is even now with respect to any volitum prior or posterior in time among themselves, but with God in the instant of eternity present and equally present.

But how all things are said to be present eternally with God, and to be in him, and to live in him, although chapter 14 of this [book] expounds, still on account of the somewhat slow [understanding] perhaps must more plainly be expounded. This indeed I judge is said causally, according to that figure of trope expounded in II.26, by which an effect is denominated sometimes by the name of its cause. According to which the Philosopher in Physics IV.23 says that something is said to be in something as the caused in the cause — for instance, the things of subjects in the king, and entirely motion in the first mover. According to him in the same place this is also true of things caused by formal cause similarly, and final.

And because according to him in Metaphysics XII, and Averroes there, comment 6, God relates in this triple genus of cause to all things, all things can be said to be in God as in efficient cause, because he makes and creates all things; as in formal cause, because he forms all things and conserves them in being; and as in final cause, because he disposes, perfects, and consummates all things. Wherefore Hermes in De Verbo Aeterno 38 says: "All things are from him, and in him, and through him." Which, as I think, the Apostle felt in Romans 11 when he said: "Of him, and through him, and in him are all things." Whence Esther 13: "Lord, in your dominion all things are placed."

Therefore all things are said to be present eternally with God because the causes of things — namely God's cognition and volition — are present eternally with him. According to this figure also the Apostle says in Hebrews 7 that Levi was in the loins of his father — namely Abraham — when Melchizedek met him; though [Levi] followed him by three generations.

This opinion Moses seems to feel — indeed the Lord through Moses — when he says in Deuteronomy 32: "Are not these things laid up in store with me, and sealed up in my treasures?" And the Prophet says — indeed the Lord through the Prophet — "The beauty of the field is with me," in Psalm 49. On which Augustine: "The beauty of the field, the fertility of all things bringing forth on the earth, is with me. How [is it] with him? With him were all future things, and with him are all future things; nor are all past things subtracted from him; with him are all things by a certain cognition of God's ineffable wisdom constituted in the Word."

Better, however, according to this figure, things are said not to have been, nor to be future, but to be present causally according to the divine volition and cognition eternally with God — because to those causes nothing whatever happens or recedes as future or past, with the things caused acceding or receding. Rather God knows and wills entirely similarly and in no way otherwise intrinsically a thing first future, then present, and finally past. Therefore all things — not only present, but equally present — can be said to be eternally with God.

Whence the Apostle to the Romans 4: "He calls the things which are not as those which are" — that is, entirely similarly, and in no way dissimilarly intrinsically in any manner. Gloss: "Thus those things which are future, are already with God; with God indeed it is already done what by his disposition or predestination is future." Whence elsewhere: "Who made the things which are future." Wherefore Ecclesiasticus 23: "To God, before they were created, all things were known; so also after they are perfected he beholds all things."

Which, understanding according to the previous exposition, Augustine in De Trinitate XV.13 says that "God did not know created things otherwise than [as] to-be-created. For nothing was added to his wisdom from them, but with them existing he remained as he was. For thus it is written in Ecclesiasticus: 'Before they were created, all things are known to him; thus also after they are consummated' — thus, he says, not otherwise."

He also in Super Genesim ad Litteram V.18, speaking of things made by God, says thus: "Before they were made, they both were and were not. They were in God's knowledge; they were not in their own nature. To God himself, however, I do not dare to say [they] became known otherwise when he had made them, than in that mode in which he knew them so as to make them — with whom there is no change, nor shadow of alteration."

For a similar reason I judge it rightly said that past, present, and future things were or are a life in God, because insofar as they are there, in no way at all do they die. For no intrinsic mode of God's cognition or volition dies, nor can it die. Wherefore according to the Apostle, "God alone has immortality" — that is, immutability intrinsically in every way, as chapter 30 of this [book] more fully expounded.

Whence John 1: "What was made, in him was [or, is]" life — according to the translation which Augustine expounds. On which, in homily 1, he says: "What is this? The earth was made, but it itself is not life. There is, however, in that wisdom spiritually a certain ratio by which the earth was made: this is life." Which, shown by the example of the smith and the chest, concluding he adds: "So therefore, because the wisdom of God, through which all things were made, contains all things in art before it fabricates [them], all things which are made through that art are not therefore life, because not in their own nature; but whatever was made, is life in him."

He also in Super Genesim ad Litteram V.15: "All these things, after they were made, were in the knowledge of the Maker — and surely better there where truer, where eternal and incommutable. Furthermore, if he knew them before he made them, surely before they were, with him they were known in that mode in which they sempiternally and incommutably live and are life; but they were made in that mode in which each creature in its kind is."

And in Confessions I.6: "You, Lord, ever live, and nothing dies in you. With you stand the causes of all unstable things, and with you remain immutable the origins of all mutable things, and the sempiternal rationes of all irrational and temporal things live."

This opinion Parmenides, Plato, Aristotle, and Ammonius testify. For Ammonius in the last [chapter] of Peri Hermeneias I writes thus: "As Timaeus taught us, and as Aristotle theologizing pronounces, and before these Parmenides — both with Plato and in his own poems — with the Gods there is nothing past nor future, since both of these are non-being: this no longer, that not yet; and this changed, that born to be changed. But the Gods truly exist, and to undergo change is not even according to intellect possible. Indeed, what is unchangeable must entirely precede what in any way is changed, and remain when that is changed. Wherefore in the Gods having the ratio of principle to beings, it is impossible to consider past and future. But all things with them are in one fixed eternal now, with temporal measures emerging together with the subsistence of [time] itself as a whole, and measuring those things alone which according to time have either subsistence or operation."

And further on: "We will not therefore endure that it be said that the cognition of the Gods runs along together with the flux of things, nor that there is anything with them either past or future, nor it be said of them, was or will be, as we assumed in the Timaeus — since they are signifying of some change. But [the proper word] is only is; and this is not co-numbered with was and will be, and codivided with these; but is understood before all temporal insinuation, and signifies their unchangeableness and undecidedness — which indeed great Parmenides also pronounces along with the intellectual being: 'For he was not, nor will be, but only is.'"

This imagination premised — as if God simultaneously created all things in an instant, and as if all future and past things were instantaneously present with him, and that his volition and cognition have similar and equal necessity now as they would have then — what was just shown seems to confirm; which also, although obscurely, Ecclesiasticus seems to have proffered, who in chapter 42 says thus: "The Lord knew all knowledge, and looked upon the sign of the age, announcing things which have passed and things which shall come, revealing the traces of the ages. No thought escapes him, and no word hides itself from him. He decorated the magnalia of his wisdom, who is before age and unto age; nothing has been added, nor will be diminished, and he has need of no one's counsel. How desirable are all his works, and as a spark which it is to consider; all these live and remain in age, and in every necessity all things obey him."

Augustine in De Trinitate IV.1, expounding more clearly, says thus: "There is one Word of God, through which all things were made, which is incommutable truth. There principally and incommutably are all things simultaneously — not only those which are now in this entire creation, but also those which were and which are future. There, however, they neither were nor will be, but only are; and all things are life, and all things are one, and (what is more wondrous) life is one. For thus all things were made through him, that whatever was made in these things, is life in him, and was not made."

He also in Ad Simplicianum II.17, treating of the penance and foreknowledge of God, says: "When someone treating these things with more limpid consideration shall have asked how foreknowledge agrees with God, and shall have found that the notion of this word is far and wide surpassed by his ineffable divinity — he will not wonder that both could be said of him on account of men, of whom both would be incongruously said on account of himself. For what is foreknowledge but knowledge of future things? But what is future to God, who transcends all times? For if God's knowledge has the things themselves, they are not future to him, but present; and through this no longer foreknowledge, but only knowledge can be said. If, however, just as in the order of temporal creatures, so with him too, things which are future are not yet, but he prevents them by making — therefore he senses them, in one way according to foreknowledge of futures, in another according to knowledge of presents. Therefore something temporally happens to God's knowledge — which is most absurd and most false. It is returned to this, then, that knowledge would now of present things be made, which of these same things future was foreknowledge — and since what was foreknowledge before would afterwards become knowledge in God, [it would] admit mutability and be temporal — since in God, who truly and supremely is, there is no part of him mutable, nor any temporal motion of notion."

And in chapter 18: "If it is so in God that it can properly be said, He understands and understood, He senses and sensed, he admits time, and [there] creeps in nonetheless that mutability which is far to be removed from God's substance. And yet God both knows and foreknows in an ineffable mode; for thus also he repents in an ineffable mode."

And in chapter 19: "When I shall have removed from human knowledge mutability, and whatever is imperfect, and shall have left only the vivacity of certain and unshaken truth surveying all things by one and eternal contemplation — indeed, [I shall] not [have] left it (for human knowledge does not have it), but shall have thought it according to my powers — God's knowledge is somehow insinuated to me."

Anselm confirms this in De Concordia 7, saying: "It must be known that just as foreknowledge is not properly said in God, so neither predestination, because to him neither before nor after is anything, but all things are simultaneously present to him."

He also in De Casu Diaboli 21 says that the deserter angel could not have foreknown by knowledge of certain reason that he was about to fall, because he could have not been about to fall. And to the objection by the disciple concerning God's foreknowledge and matters of free judgment, he says: "Briefly I respond. God's foreknowledge is not properly called foreknowledge. For to him to whom all things are always present, he does not have foreknowledge of futures, but knowledge of presents. Therefore since the ratio concerning the presence of a future thing is different from the knowledge of a present thing, it is not necessary that the divine foreknowledge and that [foreknowledge] about which we ask have the same consequence."

Boethius also in De Consolatione Philosophiae V, last prose, expressing this most clearly, says: "His knowledge, having transcended all motion of time, remains in the simplicity of his presence, and embracing the infinite spaces of past and future, considers in his simple cognition all things as if they were now being done. Therefore if you wish to weigh that presence by which he distinguishes all things, you will more rightly judge it to be not foreknowledge as of future, but knowledge of a never-failing instance." From this he infers consequently in God subsequent necessity, as the present chapter and chapter 50 of this [book] more fully recited.

Following him, John Scotus on Sentences I, dist. 40, asks, argues, and responds thus: "I ask whether the predestined can be damned. That [he cannot]: every past is simply necessary; but the predestination of this predestined has passed into the past, because God predestined him from eternity."

And further on: "To the first argument I say that the argument proceeds from a false imagination, the understanding of which imagination helps to understand the truth of the proposed question. For if by an impossible we should understand God not yet to have determined his will to either part, but to be deliberating whether he wished to predestine this man or not — our intellect could well grasp that he contingently predestined or did not predestine him, as appears in the act of our will. But because we always recur to the act of the divine will as if past, therefore we as it were compare the freedom in that will to the act, as if now placed by the will. But that imagination is false. For that now of eternity, in which is that act, is always present; and so it must be understood concerning the divine will or volition as it is of its object, as if by an impossible God should now begin to have a willing in this now — and so freely God can in the now of eternity will what he wills, as if his will were determined to nothing.

"Then I say, to the form of the argument, that the predestination of this man has not passed into the past. For although it itself co-existed with past things which have passed, yet it itself has not passed; but other things have passed which co-existed with it. Whence as was said in dist. 9: verbs of different times said of God, as they most truly suit him, do not signify parts of the time measuring that act, but consign the now of eternity, as if measuring that act, insofar as it co-exists with those many parts of time. And therefore it is the same that God predestines, has predestined, and will predestine — and so contingent one as the other, because nothing is there except the now of eternity measuring that act, which is neither present, nor past, nor future, but co-existing with all those."

St. Thomas also on Sentences I, dist. 38, q. 5, most plainly follows him and alleges him, saying: "God from eternity beholds the very being of the thing; how this is, Boethius evidently teaches in De Consolatione. For all cognition is according to the mode of the cognizer, as has been said. Since therefore God is from eternity, it must be that his cognition has the mode of eternity, which is total being-simultaneous without succession. Whence just as although time is successive, yet eternity is present to all times, one and the same indivisible as a now standing — so his cognition beholds all temporal things, although they are succeeding, as present to him; nor is any of them future with respect to him, but one with respect to another."

And further on, on dist. 40: "What is measured by eternity is simultaneous with all time, yet so that it is measured by none of them. And therefore the act of divine foreknowledge cannot be posited in being now, as if measured by present time, so as to have an order of present time to future to its known. But to all time and every known [thing] it has the order of present to present. Therefore when it is said God foreknows this, it is not understood that this is future with respect to divine knowledge, but with respect to this time in which it is referred. And therefore it is necessary to absolve verbs and participles of this kind, said of God, from the determination of time, so that they consignify the now of eternity and not of time. Otherwise the error inevitably would follow."

Which in the first [book] Contra Gentiles 66, he declares by an example concurring with the imagination premised, saying: "To any time or instant of time eternity is present-presentially; the example of which is somehow visible in a circle. For a point signed in the circumference, even if indivisible, is not however co-existing simultaneously according to position with each other point in the circumference; for the order of position makes the continuity of the circumference. The center, however, which is outside the circumference, has direct opposition to any point signed in the circumference. Therefore whatever in any part of time is, co-exists with the eternal as present to the same — even if with respect to another part of time it is past or future. But to the eternal nothing can co-exist present-presentially except as a whole, because it does not have the duration of succession. Therefore whatever through the whole discourse of time is done, the divine intellect in his whole eternity beholds as if present."

He also further on in [chapter] 67 writes thus: "When we say God knows, or knew this future, a certain medium is actuated between the divine knowledge and the thing known — namely the time in which the speech is — with respect to which what is said to be known by God is future; not with respect to the divine knowledge is it future, which existing in the moment of eternity has [itself] present-presentially toward all things. With respect to which, if the time of speech be subtracted from the middle, it is not to say that this is cognized as if not existing — so that there be place for the question by which is asked, Whether it can not be. But thus it would be said to be cognized by God as already seen in his essence; with which posited, no place remains for the said question, because what already is, cannot, with respect to that instant, not be. Deception therefore happens from this, that the time in which we speak co-exists with eternity — or also past time, which is designated when it is said God knew. Whence the relation of past or present time to future is attributed to eternity, which in no way pertains to it; and from this it happens, secundum accidens, to be deceived."

Robert of Lincoln, following him, in De Libero Arbitrio 3 writes thus: "While I sit, it is necessary that I sit; and after I have sat, it is necessary that I have sat. But what relation these statements have — that I sit and that I have sat — to my session while I sit and after I have sat: the same relation has the knowledge of God to my future session, before I sit. For he knows future things as present, nor knows them otherwise when they are future and when they are present or past. Therefore in every similar mode by which it is necessary that God know things while they are or have passed, it is necessary that he know the same before they are. But while things are or have passed, his knowledge has subsequent necessity; therefore it has the same [necessity] before things happen."

And further on in [chapter] 5: "God knows all things by one indivisible and simple gaze eternally, always, similarly, immutably. For it is patent from what has been said, that what relation these statements have — that I sit and that I have sat — to my session while I sit and after I have sat: the same relation has God's knowledge to my session about to be tomorrow, before I sit. For he knows future things as present, nor knows them otherwise when they are future, and when they are present or past. Therefore in every same mode by which it is necessary for God to know things when they are or when they have passed, it is necessary for him to know the same before they are. But when things are, or have passed, his knowledge has subsequent necessity; therefore it has the same necessity before things happen."

This always-presential instance of eternity aforementioned in God, and the every-mannered stability and immutability in him according to any of his intrinsic modes, God himself intimates and testifies, saying: "I am who I am; thus shall you say to the children of Israel: He who is sent me to you," Exodus 3. And in John 8: "Before Abraham was made, I am." And concordantly the Prophet: "Before the mountains were made, or the earth and the world were formed, from age to age you are God," Psalm 89; and below 92: "From age you are." And below 101: "As a vesture you will change them and they will be changed; but you yourself are the same, and your years will not fail." And the Apostle, 1 Timothy 6: "He alone has immortality."

Such authorities of this kind, the understanding of this kind, are evidently testified by authentic expositions premised in I.1 and I.5 of this [work], to which I will here add a few others. Blessed Augustine, on Psalm 89 premised, says: "Optimally he did not say from age you have been, or unto age you will be, but he placed a verb of present signification, insinuating God's substance to be in every way incommutable — where there is no was, nor will be, but only is. Whence it has been said: 'I am who I am,' and 'He who is, sent me to you'; and 'You will change them, and they will be changed; but you yourself are the same, and your years will not fail.' Behold what eternity has been made our refuge, that abiding in it, we may flee to it from this mutability of time."

He also on Psalm 101 cited: "Let us hope to come to those standing years in which days are not transacted by the circuit of the Sun, but what is, remains as it is — because this alone truly is." And on the same place above, on "in generation and unto generation" (or as Augustine has it, "in generation of generations are your years"), he says: "Not different are God's years and he himself; but God's years are God's eternity; God's eternity is his very substance, which has nothing mutable — where nothing is past as if it now is not, nothing is future as if it not yet is. There is nothing there except is; there is no was and will be; for what was, now is not, and what will be, is not yet — but whatever is there, is nothing if not is. Meritoriously thus God sent his servant Moses, who knew the name of him sending him; and he, indicating himself immortal to a mortal, eternal to a temporal, says: 'I am who I am.'"

He also in Super Genesim ad Litteram V.16: "That eternal and incommutable nature which is God has in itself to-be — as was said to Moses, 'I am who I am' — far otherwise than these things which were made are. Where that truly and primarily is, which in the same mode always is, and not only is not changed, but cannot be changed at all."

Concordantly with him, Gregory in Moralia 18.31, on that of Job 28, "Nor will they be commemorated in comparison with him," says: "The Prophet, contemplating his incommutability of essence, says: 'All things will grow old as a vesture, and as a covering you will change them, and they will be changed; but you yourself are the same, and your years will not fail.' Hence to Moses is said: 'I am who I am, and you will say to the children of Israel: He who is sent me to you.' Only he truly is, who alone incommutably remains. For all that which now is thus, now otherwise is, is next to non-being. For it cannot remain in its state, and somehow goes toward non-being, while from what it had been it is led to something else through the moments of times."

[Demonstration of Truth 15]

The fifteenth is patently known through the fifth and sixth and the demonstrations of them; which is also concluded manifestly through the thirteenth.

For if according to the thirteenth the divine will is intrinsically equally free and contingent with respect to present and past as with respect to future, and could and can (by the possibility of which the fifteenth speaks) now and always in the future not-will, and never in the past have-willed future things — otherwise indeed by I.10 all future things would necessarily simply come to be, which chapter 12 of this [book] condemns — it could and can similarly with all present and past things.

This is also demonstrated through the fourteenth. For if, as the fourteenth asserts, the divine will is equally necessary with respect to future as with respect to present and past, and could and can (by the possibility of this fifteenth) now and always in the future not-will, and never in the past have-willed future things, it could and can similarly with all present and past things. The saying of [Henry of] Ghent in the demonstration of the eleventh truth, recited above, also testifies to this.

[Demonstration of Truth 16]

The sixteenth is inferred from the seventh manifestly. The thirteenth and fourteenth and the demonstrations of them also show this, with this added: that God cannot by such power not-will present things, nor not have-willed past things; because it is necessary by opposite necessity (that is, subsequent) for God to will present things and to have willed past things, as is clear from this chapter and chapter 50 of this [book].

[Demonstration of Truth 17]

The seventeenth, as concerns both affirmative and negative parts, is correspondingly known through the fifteenth and sixteenth, with help from likeness.

[Demonstration of Truth 18]

The eighteenth, as concerns the first two parts, [is inferred] from [truths] 15 and 16; as concerns the two remaining, from the two parts of the seventeenth, correspondingly — since [God] does or does not do nothing except what he wills or does not will, with [the demonstrations of] I.9 and I.10 of this book remaining.

Through this [truth], as I hope, can be resolved the objections concerning God's possibility of not doing what he will do, does, or has done, and otherwise and other things. Through this also can the error of Abelard be avoided, and the Parisian article condemned — for the fuller understanding of which the matter must be ordered from a little higher.

Now, looking diligently into the writings of the Fathers, it evidently appears that there was a triple necessity erroneously posited concerning God and his actions ad extra — all of which equally are reduced to necessity of nature.

Some indeed said that whatever God does ad extra, he does from necessity of his essence, just as irrational agents — for instance, light [produces] splendor and fire heat. Others posited that whatever God does ad extra, he does from necessity of his knowledge, because through his knowledge he comprehends the better order possible in things, to which he necessarily conforms himself in operating according to his knowledge. The third believed that whatever God does ad extra, he does from necessity of his will, because through his knowledge he comprehends the better order possible in all beings, and the most perfect and best will necessarily conforms itself to similar knowledge by operating exteriorly according to its interior dictamen.

These three errors concerning this necessity Henry of Ghent recites in Quodlibet V, q. 4, which he also imputes to Avicenna. Similar errors St. Thomas imputes to certain philosophers and even theologians — namely Peter Abelard — in the Quaestiones de Potentia Dei, q. 5, asking: "Whether God can do what he does not do, and omit what he does." Where, responding, he says: "It must be said that this error — namely, to posit that God cannot do anything except what he does — was twofold. First, of certain philosophers saying that God acts from necessity of nature; which, if it were so, since nature is determined to one [thing], divine power could not extend to acting upon other things than those it does. Second, it was of certain theologians considering the order of divine justice and wisdom according to which things are made by God, which order they said God could not pass over; and therefore they fell into this — to say that God cannot do anything except what he does. And this error is imputed to Master Peter Abelard."

It is therefore patent that this Peter understands that God is able to do or omit only those things which he does, insofar as concerns the nature of his natural power, and concerning his power nakedly and absolutely taken — so that it could not extend itself to doing other things or omitting other things, because his volitional power could not exert itself toward another in any way — and therefore that he does and omits whatever [he does and omits] by necessity of nature and simply absolute. As his other words also indicate manifestly.

For Bernard recites his similar words in this passage where he had been alleged: "By this reasoning by which it is convinced that God the Father begot the Son as good as he could (for otherwise he would be guilty of envy), it is clear that all things which he does, he makes egregious as he can, and would not wish to subtract any commodity which he could confer." And after a few [lines]: "He so attends to what is good in all things which God does, that he is said to be inclined to the doing of individual things rather by the price of the good itself than by the wish of his will." Item: "From these things therefore — collated as much from reason as from description — I think it is clear to all that God can do or omit only that which he sometimes does."

And after a few [lines]: "He, if he could disturb the evils which occur, nor would he do this except opportunely (he who can do nothing inopportunely) — surely I do not see how he would not be consenting to sins. For who is to be said to consent to evil, except he through whom that could opportunely be disturbed?" Item: "By the aforesaid arguments and resolutions of objections, I think it is clear to all that God can do or omit only those things, or only in that mode, or only at the time at which he does, not otherwise."

And below in chapter 7 he recites the errors of the same [Abelard], saying: "First, it must be seen what it is to consent to evil, and what not. He indeed is said to consent to evil who, when he ought to prohibit it and can, does not prohibit it. If, however, he ought and cannot, and on the contrary, if he can but ought not — he is not guilty. If, however, he neither ought nor can, much less is he to be considered guilty. And therefore God is alien from consent to evils, who neither ought nor can impede evils. Therefore he ought not, because since things happen by his benignity in the way they best can, he ought in no way to will against this. Therefore also he cannot, because his goodness can in no way provide impediment to what is greater, when the lesser good has been chosen."

He wished therefore to say that God in no way had power of doing other things otherwise, nor of omitting what he does — as both his arguments and words, especially according to the ninth truth as expounded, manifest.

Abelard wished to say, however, that just as God necessarily and absolutely wills the ultimate end (namely his own goodness), so also necessarily and absolutely he wills those things which are toward the end — namely all creatures. Thus that all those same in number, in all their modes, emanate from him by a necessary order of goodness; therefore that none of these could in any way be omitted, nor anything else be made in any way, because then the necessary order of goodness would be disturbed, nor could the divine goodness manifest itself.

Who therefore will accuse me of this error? For I say that God, insofar as concerns the nature of his volitional power, most contingently and most freely according to contradiction can not-will what he wills, and will what he does not will, and correspondingly not-do and do — as the fifteenth truth and the following testify. Who yet, without repugnance, by a certain subsequent necessity — to the act of divine will already posited in being and entirely immutable — necessarily wills and does what he wills and what he does. Just as an angel or man, even if most contingently and most freely (even from himself only, as God [from himself]), should will whatever he wills, by this subsequent necessity necessarily he would will it.

Wherefore St. Thomas, where he was previously [cited], having recited the error of the philosophers and Abelard and refuted the first, adds: "Now it remains to investigate concerning the second position. Concerning which it must be known that 'someone is unable to do something' is said in two ways. In one way absolutely — namely when some of the principles which are necessary for action do not extend to that action, as if the foot is contracted, the man cannot walk. In another way from supposition — for, with the opposite of some action posited, that action cannot occur. For I cannot walk while I sit.

"Since, however, God is an agent through will and intellect, as has been proved, it is necessary in him to consider three principles of action: namely first, intellect; secondly, will; thirdly, the power of nature. The intellect therefore directs the will; the will commands the power, which executes; but the intellect does not move except insofar as it proposes to the will its appetible — whence the whole 'moving' of the intellect is in the will.

"Therefore in two ways God is said absolutely unable to do something. In one way, when God's power does not extend to that — as we say that God cannot make affirmation and negation simultaneously true, as is clear from what was said above. Thus, however, it cannot be said that God cannot do anything except what he does. For it is established that God's power can extend to many other things.

"In another way, when God's will cannot extend to that. For it is necessary that any will have some end which it naturally wills, and the contrary of which it cannot will — as man naturally and of necessity wills beatitude, and cannot will misery. With this — that the will wills its natural end of necessity — it also wills those things without which it cannot have the end (if it knows these); and these are those things which are commensurated to the end. As if I will life, I will food. For those things without which the end can be had, which are not commensurated to the end, it does not will of necessity.

"The end, therefore, which is natural to the divine will, is its goodness, which it cannot not-will. But to this end creatures are not commensurated, in such wise that without them the divine goodness could not be manifested — as God indeed intends from creatures. For just as the divine goodness is manifested through these things which now are, and through this order of things, so it can be manifested through other creatures otherwise ordered. And therefore the divine will, without prejudice to will, justice, [and] wisdom, can extend itself to other [things] than those it does. And in this the aforesaid erring ones were deceived. For they esteemed the order of creatures as if commensurated to divine goodness, as if without that it could not be. It is therefore patent that absolutely God can do other things than those he does; but because he himself cannot make contradictories simultaneously true, from supposition it can be said that God cannot do other things than those he does."

Thomas also touches this error in Summa I, q. 25, a. 5, and Contra Gentiles I.81, and refutes it.

Hugh also in De Sacramentis I, part 2, c. 22, similarly understands and refutes this — as detractive and diminutive of the infinite divine power. Whence he says thus: "Let them now go, and glory in their sense, because they think to discuss divine works by reason and constrain his power under measure. For when they say, 'thus far he can, and no further,' what is this but to enclose and restrict his power, which is infinite, to a measure? For they say, 'God cannot do otherwise than he does, nor better than he does.'"

And below: "By such causes and reasons certain ones are induced to say that God is so bound and tied to the measure and law of his works that besides what he does he can do nothing — neither otherwise nor better. And through this they are convinced plainly to bind under term and measure that infinite and immense power of divinity, who extend it to something which truly has an end itself, and deny it to proceed further. For it is certain that everything which has been made in number and weight and measure has its legitimate term and end; and therefore, if to the measure and mode of the work the Creator's power is composed, doubtless it itself is declared to be terminated by end and measure.

"Here those scrutinizers of ours, who failed scrutinizing the scrutinies, say they bring forth something new (and truly new), nor as much true as new. They say that single creatures considered in themselves have less than the perfect, but the universality of all things is expressed in such consummation of good, that it cannot be better than it is."

The same error this same Hugh recites in his book of Sentences, c. 12, and refutes — where he also says: "When Augustine says 'God can do many things which he does not will,' he looked to the effect which he does not will: that is, what he does not operate, he can operate; for he does not omit from impotence. And according to this can be said: 'God can will what he does not will.'"

Whose opinion and almost his words, Peter [Lombard] in Sentences I, dist. 43, follows, reciting and rebutting the same error: "Some, glorying in their sense, have attempted to constrict God's power under measure. For when they say 'thus far God can, and no further,' what is this but to include and restrict his power, which is infinite, to a measure? For they say: 'God cannot do other than he does, nor better do what he does, nor pretermitt any of these things which he does.'"

He also further on, reciting and resolving a certain [argument] of Abelard's, says: "What was proposed: 'God cannot do except what his justice exacts, and he cannot do that which his justice exacts not to be done' — we say that in those expressions the sense is twofold. For if you understand 'he cannot do except what his justice exacts' — that is, except what his just will wills — you say what is false. For God's justice is taken as his most equitable will, in the manner Augustine takes those words of the Lord in Genesis speaking to Lot: 'I cannot do anything until you enter there,' expounding: 'He said he could not, which doubtless he could by power, but he could not by justice.'"

Behold how evidently the aforesaid opinion is here clear: namely that God, insofar as concerns the part of power, can will what he does not will, and do what he does not do; but insofar as concerns the part of his will now actually and immutably willing or not willing something, he cannot.

Wherefore at the end of the distinction, showing that God can will what he does not will nor ever willed, he says thus: "He has the power of willing both now and from eternity what nevertheless he neither now wills, nor willed from eternity." From which and others similar, more expressed [statements], they were alleged in the demonstration of the ninth truth.

Almost all the Doctors of Paris refute this Peter Abelard, the Parisian Master, in this part. Whom, along with his undisciplined disciples following the shadow of certain philosophers and saying that God does whatever he does by necessity of nature, I think to have given cause for the edict of condemnation of the Parisian article objected. Wherefore according to his [Abelard's] opinion already premised against him, [the article] should be understood and expounded thus: that the article condemns that "God necessarily does whatever is immediately done by him" — by necessity of coercion or necessity of immutability (namely natural necessity and of the divine will, which is naturally determined to do these and not other things) — namely absolute necessity, which (as the article posits) places in God the impossibility of doing otherwise: namely, natural impossibility from defect of natural power — namely absolute impossibility.

This understanding of this article is testified by many other [articles] simultaneously condemned with it by the same Bishop. Of which one affirms: "That God is eternal in acting and in moving, just as in being; otherwise he would be determined by another, which would be prior to him." And another: "That what is determined of itself, like God, either always acts or never; and that there are several eternals." And another: "That the first principle cannot immediately produce ungenerable things which are new effects; but a new effect requires an immediate cause that can be otherwise." And another: "That God is the necessary cause of the first intelligence, with which posited, the effect is posited, and they are simultaneous in duration." And another: "That God is the necessary cause of the motion of celestial bodies and of the contingent conjunction in the stars" — to which and to which many others similar are condemned in the same series, before and after the said article.

Henry of Ghent also, on the occasion of this article, in Quodlibet V, q. 4, asks: "Whether God necessarily produces whatever exteriorly he immediately produces?" And first he argues that yes, because it follows necessarily, "God wills to do this, therefore he does this," and the antecedent is necessary, because otherwise God's will would be mutable. Then [he argues] no, by the article recited.

And responding he says that according to the philosophers' opinion in every divine making was posited the triple necessity recited above; and the first two — namely necessity of essence and of knowledge — being reprov'd, in reprov'ing the third necessity (namely of will), he says thus: "Similarly God in no way acts from necessity of his will, whether concomitant matter or absolutely considered, according to which some could say that although he does not act by necessity of his nature, nor of his knowledge, yet he acts by necessity of his will, because his knowledge comprehends the better order in things, and the perfect will necessarily adheres to it. As is patent, since the will is not per se except of its end, and what is per se of something, although it have a necessary order to that, and to those things which have an essential disposition to that, yet not to those things which have an accidental disposition to that."

Which shown by example, he adds: "Wherefore, since God's will is per se of the good end which he himself is — although he necessarily wills it, and those things which have a necessary disposition to it (as are whatever things are in the divine essence) — yet he does not necessarily will those things which have an accidental disposition to it; but such are all things other than himself, because nothing accrues to his goodness from them. By no necessity therefore does he will any of those, but he does nothing except what he wills; therefore none of the others apart from himself which he does, does he do of necessity."

And further on: "God does not of necessity will those things which are outside himself, on account of which when he makes them in the being of existence (concerning which is the question), he does not make them of necessity of his will — so that according to this mode the goodness of his essence is not the ratio for him of willing all things, because he could will other things which he does not will, nor will will, just as the truth of his essence is not the ratio for him of knowing all things which he could know — namely those things which could be or could come to be, and yet will not be. So that just as he does not of necessity know himself to do those things which he does, so he does not of necessity will to do those things which he does, as will be said now. Similarly neither does he of necessity know or will to be those things which are of absolute necessity.

"It must be said therefore simply and absolutely that whatever God does outside himself, none of these does he do of necessity — neither of those things which he does immediately (which according to the Philosopher was only one — that he posited him to do of necessity, as has been said) — nor of those which he does mediating other things, in which the philosophers concord with us. Nor also of these does he do anything by necessity of coercion, which impels the will against its own inclination (whether natural or voluntary) into action — because he is impassible and omnipotent. Nor by necessity of immutability, which simply and absolutely binds and holds virtue in act — as the condemned article well says, as has been said in opposing."

He also further on, responding to the first argument, says thus: "To the opposite argument, that of necessity occurs that which God wills to do — it must be said that this is true by necessity of consequence, not of consequent; because the antecedent is not simply necessary, namely 'that God wills to do that which he does' — except by considering the act of will as it is in God the divine essence itself, in which way it is not considered in the proposed question, but only insofar as it actually transits into the volitum exteriorly. And as it is argued that the antecedent is simply necessary, because what God wills, he cannot not-will — because otherwise his will would be mutable — it must be said," etc., as alleged in the demonstration of the eleventh truth.

In the recited article, therefore, is condemned natural, simple, absolute, and preceding necessity with respect to divine volition and making ad extra — but not the aforesaid subsequent necessity. For who will deny it to be necessary by this subsequent necessity that God does whatever is immediately done by him — just as also by this necessity, "Everything which is, when it is, is necessary to be," and that what occurs and has been made occurs and has been made, and that God wills it so to be?

From these things can be elicited and held that the necessity of immutability, in the understanding of the Doctors, is twofold or threefold:

One, by which (if it were in use) whatever is somehow such, and cannot not be such by a change, could be said: "It is necessary by necessity of immutability for it to be such, because from this it cannot be changed." And so whatever is past, it is necessary to be past, and whatever was future, it is necessary to have been future, and whatever is non-future, it is necessary to be non-future, and the like. Of this the said article does not speak.

Another, which is necessity of stability and subsequent, as is clear from chapter 50 of this [book] — concerning which the said article does not understand.

Third, which is the necessity of natural immutability, by which (namely) some thing is naturally and by necessity of nature determined to do some one thing, nor has it natural power to the opposite — as irrational active powers, as is clear in Metaphysics IX.10. And such necessity of immutability Peter Abelard posited in God ad extra, such as is condemned in the article.

Whence Thomas, De Potentia Dei, where he was previously [cited], says: "Those who said that God acts from necessity of nature posited the power of which we treat, not only by reason of immutability of nature, but by reason of determination of nature to one."

Wherefore also Henry of Ghent says that God does ad extra by necessity of immutability "which simply and absolutely binds and holds virtue in act — wherefore the condemned article well says [it]."

The irrational reasonings of Peter Abelard, however, and of any others — whether philosophers or friend-of-philosophy-foolers (friuolophilorum) — eager to construct natural necessity in God with respect to his done [things], ought to move no rational animal.

For if he acted ad extra by necessity of nature, since any of his effects is finite, he himself would be finite, against the first supposition; or if according to that he were infinite, any of his effects would also be similarly infinite, as in I.9 it was more fully argued.

Nor does God by his knowledge comprehend — indeed cannot comprehend — the best being possible to be made, than which better nothing could be made. For let it be supposed that he comprehend and make [it], and let A be that. Either, then, A is simply infinite in every way, and then it is God, and therefore not made, as the first supposition proves; or finite, and then it would be possible to make something greater than it. Therefore for any good possible to be made, can be made always greater and greater, and therefore similarly to be comprehended; therefore neither can a perfect and best will make the maximum good and best [thing] possible to be made. It suffices for it, therefore, that it make a good as much as it spontaneously wished without evil — especially since there is no reason prior to itself, or regulating it in things to be done, but it itself is the principle and rule of reason, as I.21 of [this book] more fully showed.

Also it was objected above that if this subsequent necessity were posited in God, the omnipotent would be bound. But I wonder by what mind, by what face they dare object this to me, affirming the contrary — when they themselves must necessarily concede that God, eternally before free and at liberty, is now temporally newly bound by an exceedingly weak extrinsic chain (as it were a spider's thread) — also insolubly bound, and unliberatably captivated — as chapter 30 of this [book] more fully argued.

But I do not say that he is newly necessitated by the aforesaid subsequent necessity, nor through anything outside himself, but eternally, uniformly only through his own eternal most-free act of his own and most-free will. If anyone, however, wishes to call this necessary act of the divine will, or this subsequent necessity (according to the metaphors of the poets, grammarians, and rhetoricians), as also love, bond, knot, or chain — I think there is not much to be contended over the name, while the matter is rightly understood. Then it can be metaphorically said that God is bound — namely by this bond of love and chain of charity. I know, however, that some catholic listeners abhor this — not because what is said metaphorically is not catholically said, but because what is catholically said is not catholically understood.

Some indeed, because the customary bond and chain seems to import some violence, similarly understand if anything such is said of God. But these err, since in the customary bond and chain are two things, namely violence and firminess. And because according to the Philosopher in Topics VI, "all who transfer transfer according to some likeness, not however according to all" — as he shows in his Poetria — it suffices that this transference is done for the second property, although not for the first.

Nor is it true that every chain implies violence. For many subject themselves freely to the chains of many obligations toward God and men, and bear them gratis. Whence Ecclesiasticus 6: "Send your foot into her fetters" — namely of wisdom — "and your neck into her chains. Place your shoulder under her, and bear her, and be not weary in her bonds, and her fetters will be to you a protection of fortitude and a base of virtue, and her chains a stole of glory, and her bonds a connection of salvation."

Wherefore the Apostle to the Colossians 3 calls charity "the bond of perfection." Whence also Hosea 11: "I will draw them in the cords of Adam, in the bonds of charity."

Wherefore Hugh of St. Victor, De Laude Caritatis ad Petrum, addressing charity, says thus: "O charity, how much you can — you who overcame God! You compelled him obedient to you to descend from the seat of paternal majesty even to enduring the depths of our mortality; you led him bound by your chains. Whence let man be more ashamed to resist you, when he sees you triumphing over God: you wounded the impassible, bound the insuperable, drew the incommutable."

He also further on praises this charity, because it itself is God. What is this charity, except the dear will of God, and the dear volition of God, according to the premises in I.25?

But because Henry of Ghent imputes to Avicenna the threefold erroneous necessity recited above, and I have alleged him several times, I must briefly discuss whether he accuses him justly. For it seems that he can probably and rationally be defended.

He objects to him that for the first necessity he says thus: "Of the first truth there is no first action of his except through essence." And who would deny this? For his first action is not ad extra, but ad intra, by which he knows and loves himself, and this not freely according to contradiction but purely necessarily by necessity of his essence.

Again he opposes that for the second necessity [Avicenna] says thus: "His knowledge is knowing that his perfection and his excellence are that goodness be made by him, and this is of those communicating his glory. And from his understanding himself follows the ordination of goodness in being, and he understands how it is possible and more elegantly to come to be the existence of the whole. Whence, as he says, from his understanding the ordination and goodness which can be better, according to which he understands it, that flows by such flux by which more perfectly is reached to order according to possibility."

But if for this saying he merits to be condemned, why not similarly Augustine, who in De Libero Arbitrio III.7 thus says: "Whatever shall occur to you by true reason as better, know that God has made it as the maker of all good things. Therefore there can be something in the nature of things which by your reason you do not think; but that there is not what by true reason you think, cannot be. For neither can you in the creature think anything better, that the artificer of the creature has fled. Indeed the human soul, naturally connected to the divine rationes upon which it depends, when it says 'this would be better made than that,' if it speaks truly, and sees what it says — sees it in those rationes with which it is connected. Let him therefore believe that God made what by true reason he knew was to be made by him, even if he does not see this in things made; because even if he could not see the heaven by his eyes, and yet by true reason he gathered some such thing was to be made — he ought to believe it has been made, although he does not see it by his eyes. For he would not see by thought that it was to be made except in those rationes by which all things were made."

And in Super Genesim ad Litteram IV.18: "If God could not make goods, there would be no power; but if he could, and would not make them, there would be great envy. Because therefore he is omnipotent and good, he made all things very good." He also in De Quantitate Animae 18: "By God's justice this universe is sustained and ruled, by which it has also been made that not only all things are, but they are so that they entirely could not be better." And further on in [chapter] 20: "God judged this most beautiful, that there should be whatever is, in the way it is."

And further on: "Who is he who justly grows angry that the soul has been given to act and administer the body, when so great and so divine an order of things could not be better connected?"

Behold Augustine, a Catholic Doctor, professing a similar opinion. As, then, he wishes to expound Augustine, so let him expound Avicenna also. In many ways, however, both can be well understood and expounded.

In one way from the part of God, and from the part of the mode of doing related to God, namely insofar as concerns the part of the maker. For he does all things through wisdom, goodness, and infinite power. And so Peter [Lombard] responds in Sentences I, dist. 44, and Thomas in Summa I, q. 25, last article, asking, "Whether God could do better the things he does."

In another way from the part of things made, and this in many ways: in one way, that God could not make these same things made essentially better in number — because then they would be other and not the same; accidentally however he could. And so Thomas responds where he had been alleged.

Thirdly, it can be said that God could do nothing better — that is, more purely good, namely more unmixed with evil or natural malice. For the Philosopher says in Topics III that "those things which are more unmixed with contraries are more such — as that is whiter which is more unmixed with black"; therefore also a lesser evil is sometimes called good, and better sometimes. Whence the Philosopher in Ethics V.5: "In the ratio of good a lesser evil is to a greater evil; for a lesser evil is more eligible than a greater; the eligible, however, is good, and more, [is] greater."

And Lamentations 4: "It was better for those slain by the sword than for those killed by hunger." And it is the most frequent mode of speaking among all. According to which mode of speaking also sometimes something is said better than another, because that is good and the other evil, or not good. Whence the Philosopher in De Generatione II, second-to-last [chapter]: "It is better to be than not to be." And the Prophet: "Better is a little to the just man than the great riches of sinners," Psalm 36. And Solomon in Proverbs 16: "Better is a little with justice than many fruits with iniquity; and better to be humbled with the meek than to divide spoils with the proud."

The authors say therefore that God cannot do anything better than he does — perhaps against those who posited in beings something per se evil, of which is touched in I.1 and I.26. With which Avicenna along with many other philosophers contradicts, as the same I.26 reveals. With which also almost all the Catholic Doctors contradict, but specifically Augustine in his books De Libero Arbitrio, as there and in Retractations I.9 evidently appears. Of which the first is therefore called Unde Malum, and many other books.

Wherefore in De Libero Arbitrio III.6, [Augustine] warns lest anyone say of sinful souls "It would have been better if they had not existed" — implying that then the universe would have been more pure and more unmixed with evil, and therefore that those [souls] are not of the perfection of the universe, nor have they any goodness, but only pure malice, according to the Philosopher's consideration in Topics III touched on. Wherefore in the same chapter 6 he says that sinful souls are not vituperated except in their own comparison, when it is thought what they would be if they had not wished to sin.

And further on in [chapter] 7 he shows that no thing is reprehensible except in comparison with the better. Nor must anyone say that the whole universe, or anything of it, can be better than it is — so that it could be good, and now is evil, or is not good. Wherefore in the same chapter 6 of the third [book], as he also touches in Retractations I.9, he shows that God for the making of creatures is to be praised in all, not blamed. Who also above in [chapter] 5 intimates that God could have created men in some inferior grade of creature; therefore not according to him does God necessarily always make the better which he could.

Still further perhaps fourthly, as concerns the natural order of things — that the parts of animals and plants and of the whole world (for instance, the elements and heaven) are now better naturally ordered than they would be if placed according to the contrary order — so that nothing is there useless or shameful. And this the Philosopher intimates in De Animalibus XIII, and through three following books, where he treats of the parts of animals, and of their formation, fittingness, and utility — and elsewhere in the same book frequently. Whom Avicenna follows in this part — as both, [as cited] in I.27 of this [work], allege. Whom also Algazel follows, as the same I.27 alleged.

That [it pertains] to the disposition of the elements and of heaven, Augustine intimates in De Libero Arbitrio III.7, where he had been alleged. Who also in De Quantitate Animae 20 says thus: "God in no act deserts the soul without punishment, without reward. For he judged this most beautiful, that there should be whatever is, in the way it is, and so the grades of nature were ordered, that those considering the universe might not be offended by any deformity from any part — and that all punishment of the soul, and every reward, might always confer something of just beauty on the part and the disposition of all things. For free will has been given to the soul; nor however has free will been given to the soul so that, attempting whatever by it, it should disturb that part of the divine order and law. For it has been given by the most wise and most invincible Lord God of every creature. But to see these things as they must be seen is for few, nor is anyone made fit for this except by true religion. Since these things are so, who is he who justly grows angry that the soul has been given to act and administer the body, when so great and so divine an order of things could not be better connected?"

This opinion he also teaches in De Libero Arbitrio III.24. If, however, in some manner said, or in another not said, Avicenna can be sanely understood (as Augustine [can be]) — well; if not, also well — since Avicenna is not entirely a necessary witness to me in this case, especially where he errs. But even if in one or few [things] he should err, like other philosophers, indeed even Catholic Doctors, he can in many other [things] tell the truth.

If, however, he can be sanely understood, it can further be said that the Ghent doctor refutes the surface of the letter, or rather those badly understanding the letter of Avicenna — just as also, by the testimony of Eustathius, Aristotle sometimes refuting (as it seems) Plato did not wish to argue against him, but against those who badly understand his sayings, as II.2 more fully alleged.

Thirdly, the Ghent doctor objects against Avicenna that for the third necessity he says thus: "Every knowledge by which one knows what proceeds from it, nor is mixed with it any impediment, pleases him what proceeds from it. Therefore first it pleased that from his essence flow everything which is." This saying, however, by itself alone does not seem to contain explicitly or implicitly the said necessity of the divine will, but rather to intimate freedom.

[Demonstrations of Truths 19, 20, and 21]

The nineteenth, twentieth, and twenty-first follow lucidly from the corresponding parts of the fifteenth (correspondingly speaking of posse), and similarly from the first three parts of the proximate truth — with this added, that the divine will is a necessary cause (that is, necessarily required) for something to be future, present, or past — to be done or done, or even conserved — as I.14 and I.9 taught.

The nineteenth specifically is doubtful to almost no one. Otherwise indeed all things which would happen would happen by simple absolute necessity, which chapter 12 of this [book] condemns.

The twentieth specifically is also clear from the fifth truth of this [chapter] and the demonstration of it; which the testimonies of Henry of Ghent there, and in the demonstration of the eleventh and eighteenth, plainly confirm — also of St. Thomas, Summa I, q. 19, a. 3, in chapter 5 of this; of Scotus on Sentences I, dist. 29, in the demonstration of the fifth and eighteenth; and of Robert of Lincoln in the demonstration of the ninth truth, more fully recited in those [places].

For if (as they assert) the potestas in God's will concerning the actual being of creatures is determined by no necessity, but insofar as it concerns itself, is to either side concerning willing it and not willing — then creatures now actually existing can now and for now not exist. If also, according to them, "for one not now sitting it is possible now and for now to sit," and contrariwise, why not similarly concerning any creature now being? If moreover (as Scotus and the Lincoln doctor affirm) a creature's volition now existing can now and for now not exist, why not similarly think concerning similar [cases]?

[Demonstration of Truth 21]

Around the twenty-first the contest is keener on account of the many opposing it. Yet I judge this sufficiently shown from the last part of the fifteenth truth — which the demonstration of the fifth of this [chapter] also sufficiently shows.

Let A be the singularly proper name of some past thing — for instance, of the universal flood — yet not connoting the pastness, nor any accidental condition of it, but insofar as is possible the thing itself essentially, simply, and entirely absolutely. Why therefore could not, or cannot, A not have been? What repugnance does it formally imply? What contradiction does it evidently include? None, doubtless, as was shown there.

For sometime — namely when A was, or before — from this enunciation, "A never was," nothing per se impossible, no contradiction formally and simply followed; therefore neither now, as appears from the demonstration of the first supposition.

Also from a proposition which sometime was true, never simply formally does any falsehood follow — because then from the true a falsehood would formally follow.

Likewise, of the same ratio is "the thing being able not to have been when it was" and "the thing being able to have been when it was not" — namely before it was. But a thing which was not always (for instance the world or an angel) can by such absolute possibility have always been — nor does it formally imply any repugnance, nor necessarily import [it]. It can also by such potentia have been for one day before it was, and for one year — and for two by similar reasoning — why therefore not for three and four, and so infinitely thereafter? This same the opinion of many Doctors seems also to confirm.

Likewise by the twentieth truth, and through what was just premised, a thing now present can without repugnance now and for now not be. And it is as necessary for that to be for now, as for A to have been; therefore A also can not have been. Indeed, it seems that for a thing which is now present, it is in some way more necessary — at least multipliciously (in more ways) necessary — for it to be for now, than for A to have been. For a present thing, beyond the necessity from the divine will alone (common and equal to both intrinsically), is necessary to be through proper natural causes: through matter and form, and also through common natural causes conserving it naturally in being. But A is necessary to have been from the divine will alone — or at least not from so many causes, because not from proper [causes], since they no longer are nor cause — or let it be posited that God destroys every natural cause proper and common to A, conserving the existing stone; and then it will more appear that for the stone for now to be is more necessary than A to have been. If therefore the stone now being can now and for now not be, it seems that A as much, or more, can not have been.

It will perhaps be replied that from the pastness of the past thing arises a certain relation, by which it is necessary simply for it to have been, and therefore impossible simply for it not to have been. But this was reprov'd before, when it was shown that "A not to have been" implies no contradiction formally. Also, that relation: it is not necessary simply to be or have been; for sometime it was not; therefore neither would it formally repugn for it now not to be; therefore it makes nothing simply necessary.

That relation also is either to God (or to the divine will), or to some natural thing or things. The first was destroyed by chapter 30 of this [book]. The second cannot stand: for let it be supposed that God destroyed all other natural causes. So great, moreover, and so powerful a relation — indeed rationally a stronger one, whether to God or to natural causes — arises from the presence of the present thing, just as from the pastness of the past. And that not impeding, it is possible for the thing which now is, now and for now not to be — therefore also for the past not to have been.

For no absolute thing — for instance, the most powerful or most efficient natural form — makes its formed [thing] or effect to be necessary simply; therefore neither does a relation (since it is of weaker being, as chapter 20 of this [book] touches) make anything necessarily simply to have been.

So great and so powerful a relation similarly seems to arise from the futurity of the future, just as from the pastness of the past, and therefore would render that as necessarily future, while it is future, just as that [renders the past] necessary. Then also that relation would simply necessitate God's will to willing it to be, and according to it the thing to have been — as can be shown from I.18 and I.19 — which does not befit his most worthy freedom, as chapter 30 of this [book], and the thirteenth and fourteenth truths, manifest.

Still perhaps others will respond otherwise, saying that A cannot not have been on account of the defect of a necessarily required relation — namely on account of the defect of willability or factibility of it by God. But this response does not avoid the arguments made for this twenty-first, nor render the cause of its saying. For although God could not will the contrary — namely "A not to have been" — yet he could (as it seems, and as the fifteenth truth asserts) not-will "A to have been," just as he could before A was. With which posited, A would not have been past, by I.14 — as also against a similar response chapter 30 of this [book] proceeds.

By the same reasoning, the thing which is now present, on account of the defect of a similar relation, could not now and for now not be — against the twentieth truth. Such privation of relation would also necessitate simply the divine will to will it and according to it, and impossibilite it to will oppositely, as it could once will — which was reprov'd before, against a similar response written in chapter 30 of this [book], and is against the thirteenth and fourteenth truths.

Such defect of relation is also not simply necessary to be or to have been, because neither is that relation if it were or had been, as neither are absolute things, as has been shown above — which can also be shown in similar manner.

Indeed, the opposite volition of God — namely "A not to have been" — it is simply possible now to be, just as it was before the pastness of A, as can be shown from the premises, and from the thirteenth and fourteenth truths.

Thirdly it is said by some that the past cannot not have been, nor can God do this, because each implies contradiction. For proving which they adduce testimonies of the Doctors. For Augustine in Contra Faustum XXVI.2 says: "Whoever therefore says, 'If God is omnipotent, let him make things which have been done not to have been done,' does not see that he is saying this: 'If he is omnipotent, let him make those things which are true, by the very fact that they are true, to be false.'"

The same Jerome to Eustochium, Aristotle, and Agatho seem to feel, alleged above. Whom St. Thomas following, Summa I, q. 25, a. 4, asking, "Whether God can make those things which are past not to have been," responding says thus: "It must be said that under God's omnipotence does not fall something which implies contradiction. But the past not to have been implies contradiction. For just as it implies contradiction to say that Socrates sits and does not sit, so also that he sat and did not sit. To say that he sat is to say that it is past; to say, however, that he did not sit, is to say that it would have been the opposite of him." For proving which he alleges the sayings of Augustine and the Philosopher noted.

But these either understand in the composite sense, or in the divided sense, that the past cannot not have been. If in the composite sense, they have to say consequently that the present cannot not be present, and that the future cannot not be future — on account of similar contradiction included. If in the divided sense — namely taking some past thing (for instance, the flood), not convolving the pastness or any accidental condition, but only the thing itself nakedly, essentially, simply, and entirely absolutely — which thus taken let it be named A: thus it is absolutely and per se and simply, without repugnance, possible for "A not to have been," as has been shown above.

For the cause of these moreover, it must further be inquired whether they understand that "the past not to have been" in the divided sense (in the manner aforementioned) includes contradiction per se and entirely formally, or per accidens and as-of-now only.

Not in the first way, as is now established. If in the second way, the cause does not help, speaking of power absolutely, as the truth to be shown speaks. For thus also "you will run" includes contradiction, if you are not about-to-run; for it includes per accidens and as-of-now that one not about-to-run be about-to-run. For you actually and as-of-now are not about-to-run. Indeed, thus also every false proposition concerning the future, and universally every false proposition, includes contradiction. Yet who would deny this to be possible absolutely, and that God can thus verify "you will run," and many other false enunciations?

Thus therefore I judge that the thing which is past — for instance, A — can not have been, and that God can make A not to have been. Through which I understand that God, insofar as concerns his power absolutely, and concerning the nature of his volitional power free according to contradiction (insofar as it causally precedes its act, by which he now wills A to have been) could not elicit nor have it, but its opposite — as he could when A was future — just as also a man might be able to with respect to his past volitum: because with God nothing intrinsically is past or future, but eternally and instantaneously only present, as the demonstration of the fourteenth declared. Yet by subsequent necessity — not from the pastness of the thing (because that itself causes nothing whatever in the divine will), but only from the stability and firmness and presentaneity of the intrinsic act of the divine will — it is necessary for God to will A to have been, and similarly A to have been.

But although these things from the premises seem evident, behold still some testimonies of my elders for fuller evidence.

Anselm in Cur Deus Homo II.17 says: "God improperly is said to be unable to do something, or to do by necessity. For all necessity and impossibility is subject to his will; but his will is subject to no necessity or impossibility. For nothing is necessary or impossible except because he so wills [it]. But that he himself either should will or not-will something on account of necessity, is alien from the truth. Wherefore since he does all things which he wills, and only what he wills, just as no necessity or impossibility precedes his willing or not-willing, so neither his doing or not-doing — although he wills many things immutably and does [them]. And just as when God does something, after it has been done, it can no longer not have been done, but it is always true to have been done — yet rightly it is not said impossible for God that he should make what is past not to be past — for nothing operates there of necessity of not-doing or impossibility of doing, but God's will alone, who always wills the truth (since he himself is truth) immutable, as it is. So if he proposes himself immutably about-to-do something, yet there is no necessity of doing in him, or impossibility of not-doing, since in him will alone operates."

The same in De Concordia 2: "Some thing — like a certain action — is not future of necessity, because after it occurs, it can come to pass that it not be; and concerning the past it is similarly true, because some thing is not past by necessity, since before it was, it could come to pass that it not be" — which not ineptly can be understood of the priority of free power according to contradiction toward its act, as in similar cases above has been shown.

Whence John Scotus on Sentences II, dist. 2, q. 7, says that "the angel's creation, and the angel, can not be in the instant in which it is, in the sense of composition; in the sense of division, however, well [it can]" — as has been touched in the matter on God's predestination and foreknowledge. Where he also says that "the conserved can not be when it is conserved, and when it is produced, in the sense of division."

And further on, responding: "When it is said in the argument 'God cannot make an angel not to have been,' it is denied as of the thing signified by to have been; and if it be said, 'the past cannot not have been,' it is denied — because this is not past in se, that is, per se and essentially, since pastness or to-be-past is not of its essence, nor essential to it, but accidental — therefore also it is absolutely possible to be separated."

This question 7 on the second distinction, in some books is the first on the same distinction. For he wrote twice on the Sentences, and this is the cause of discord in this place, as in many other places.

This same is testified by Gilbert on Boethius's book De Trinitate, affirming that God can make Peter never to have been, and that this corrupted woman never was corrupted.

William, Bishop of Auxerre, follows him also, who on Sentences I, q. 49, asks: "Whether God can damn Peter and save Judas." Having argued that yes, because he can do this of power; and that no, because he cannot do this of justice — he responds thus: "We say that God of power purely considered can damn Peter, having regard to God's power and the natural power of Peter by which he could sin and not sin. But it does not follow, 'therefore he can damn Peter,' because this verb can in the conclusion regards merits.

"Or if it is true what Master Gilbert says on Boethius's book De Trinitate — for he says that God can make that Peter never had been — it can be said according to this, that God can damn Peter, because he can make that Peter begin now to be, and could sin and sin, and so be damned."

He also further on, q. 50, asks, "Whether God can make a virgin from a corrupted [woman]": and having argued that no, by Jerome's authority alleged above; and that yes, because he can repair the blind and the dead, therefore also the corrupted; and recited one response saying that God cannot make a virgin from a corrupted [woman] as concerns every dignity of virginity, because he cannot make her not to have been corrupted, which is a certain dignity in the virgin according to which she merits the aureole — he objects against it: "Let God give to this corrupted [woman] every-mannered dignity of virginity, if he can; therefore he can make a virgin from a corrupted [woman]. If he cannot give now, and gave before, therefore something impedes — and only the pastness, namely because what has been done cannot not have been done. Therefore something impedes God's power; therefore God is not omnipotent."

Wherefore also otherwise responding to the question, he adds: "On account of this it is fitting to say, as Master Gilbert says, that God can make that this woman never have been corrupted, because as concerns himself, he does not relate to things otherwise than he related from eternity. Whence past, present, and future are from the part of things, not from the part of God. But we are accustomed in such matters to speak with the supposition of the past — when it is said 'God cannot from a corrupted [woman] make a virgin'; for this he cannot do with the supposition of the past, but he can according to himself, since he is omnipotent. And in his omnipotence four things are understood: namely amplitude of power, which is not determined to some effect (as the potestas of heating to heating); and that from himself and per se he is able — that is, without indigence of extrinsic help, without coercion, and without impediment."

From this also appears one resolution of the objections. For according to this Doctor, the authorities saying "the past cannot not have been past, nor God make from a past not past, or a virgin from a corrupted [woman]" are understood in the composite sense — namely composing and consignifying with the thing the pastness — not in the divided sense, namely dividing the pastness from the thing, and taking it nakedly, essentially, and simply absolutely, as was said above. Or also according to the common manner of assigning composite and divided sense, which does not differ really from the prior. For he says: "We are accustomed in such matters to speak with the supposition of the past — when it is said, 'God cannot from a corrupted [woman] make a virgin'; that is, 'he cannot do this with the supposition of the past, but he can according to himself.'"

This same logic seems to be Anselm's in De Concordia 2, where, making this distinction in enunciations of necessity, of future, present, and past, he concedes the composite sense and denies the divided. Whence he says thus: "Indeed it is not the same thing — for a thing to be past and for a past thing to be past; or for a thing to be present and for a present thing to be present; or for a thing to be future and for a future thing to be future — just as it is not the same that a thing is white and a white thing is white. For wood is not always necessarily white, but sometimes — before it was made white, it could come to pass that it not be made white; and after it is white, it could come to pass that it be made not white. But the white wood always must be white, because neither before it is, nor after it is white, can it come to pass that the white simultaneously not be white.

"Similarly, a thing is not by necessity present, since before it was present it could come to pass that it not be present, and after it is present, it could come to pass [that it be] not present. But the present thing, it is necessary always to be present, because neither before it is, nor after it is present, can it simultaneously be not present.

"In the same mode some thing — like a certain action — is not by necessity future, because before it is, it can come to pass that it not be future. But the future thing is necessarily future, because the future cannot simultaneously be not future. Concerning the past also it is similarly true, because some thing is not by necessity past, since before it was, it could come to pass that it not be; and because the past is always necessarily past, since it cannot simultaneously not be past."

According to the same logic also John Scotus, proceeding on Sentences I, dist. 39, similarly distinguishes, concedes, and denies that vulgar saying of the Philosopher in the last [chapter] of Peri Hermeneias I: "What is, when it is, is necessary [to be]." For he says that some thing — for instance, A — which now is, now and for now can not be, as in the demonstration of the fifth truth was alleged.

The same logic St. Thomas also intimates, Summa I, where he had been alleged, responding thus: "It must be said that although the past not to have been is per accidens impossible, if there be considered that which is past — namely Socrates's running — yet if the past be considered under the ratio of past, that itself not to have been is per se impossible, and absolutely implying contradiction."

It seems therefore that when he says "the past cannot not have been, nor can God make this," he understands in the composite sense, not the divided. To this also testifies another saying of his in De Aeternitate Mundi, and his distinction concerning the necessary, and the similar distinction in Summa I, q. 19, a. 3, premised in chapter 50 of this [book].

This same can also be otherwise confirmed. For he himself does not dare to concede a diminution of God's power intrinsically of any kind whatever; therefore neither will he dare to concede that God once could will or not-will anything which now he cannot.

For he argues, where he was previously [cited], that the past can not have been, in this way: "Whatever God could do, he can [do], since his power is not diminished. But God could, before Socrates ran, [make] that he not run; therefore," etc. And he responds in this way: "It must be said that just as God, as concerns the perfection of divine power, can do all things, but certain things do not lie under his power, because they fail from the ratio of the possible — so, if attended to is the immutability of divine power, whatever God could, he can. And he could once will the flood never to have been future, present, or past; therefore he can also now."

But against this response of these Doctors it can not improbably be replied: For if the philosophers and theologians asserting "the past cannot not have been, nor can God make this" understand in the composite sense, they have to assert consequently to a similar understanding that "the future cannot not be future, the present cannot not be present, nor can God make this or that, nor anything which he does not do" — yet though they assert these, they deny those.

Wherefore for the understanding of the philosophers and Doctors, perhaps to be more lucidly known, it must be known that the philosophers, considering of natural causes and the natural course of beings, when they say something can or cannot come to be, understand often of the power of natural and inferior causes, and according to the natural course and order naturally established for natural things. And so it is true that the past cannot become not-past — just as the future can become not-future, and the present not-present, when those arrive [and] these recede.

Still further, as I think, there is another more profound and more sincere understanding. For by carefully turning the books of the philosophers, and more carefully reflecting, it appears that they posit a general two-membered division: namely, into terms and into ways. The terms are two, namely being and non-being; the ways, correspondingly, are two: generation and corruption, leading to these terms.

The philosophers, therefore, seeing any thing existing in either term, [and observing] that for it to be in the other [term] it transits through the way to that — or that the term in any way accedes to it — say that this must occur through generation or corruption, mutation, or motion in itself or in another. Therefore when they say that a thing existing in some term (that is, in or under any kind of being or non-being) can be in or under the opposite term, they understand of the power mutable, actuable, and terminable by opposite terms succeeding one another — which cannot pass into act except through some change in that thing or in another, namely through accession to one of the opposites and recession from the other.

That, however, I may expound this as briefly as I can: I say that power is twofold. One, entirely absolute or of non-repugnance; and so something which is somehow can be not-such without any change, as the eleventh truth showed.

The other is natural power, and according to contradiction and natural order, mutable, actuable, and terminable by opposite terms successively. And according to this, whatever, of whatever sort, is, cannot be not-such except through some change between opposite terms in itself or in something else, as the twelfth truth suggested.

And concerning this latter power the philosophers commonly speak, when they say something or some thing can or cannot be such or such, on account of the cause premised. Thus, then, speaking of power, it is most true that the past cannot not be past. For this cannot be by a change or making between opposite terms — namely between past and not-past. For it evidently includes contradiction that A first was past, and now is not past. But concerning future and present things, it is not so. For the future can be changed, and will be changed, from future to non-future, when it becomes present; and the present from present to non-present, when it slips into the past.

This therefore, according to the philosophers and theologians, is the difference of things divided according to the threefold difference of time: that the future can be changed and become from future not-future, and the present from present not-present; but for the past to be changed from past into non-past is absolutely impossible.

Still further, beyond the premises, it must be noted that making is twofold:

One, mutable or itself a mutation, initiable and terminable by opposite terms — which corresponds to similar power, namely natural, mutable, actuable, and terminable aforesaid. Concerning which power almost always understand and speak the philosophers, theologians, and universally all learned and unlearned, when they say anything can or cannot be made — the cause of which is that whatever they see come to be naturally, artificially, voluntarily, violently, casually, or fortuitously, they see come to be through this kind of making.

Of this cause there seems to be another prior cause: for the making naturally and causally precedes (at least) its made; therefore neither can it be temporally preceded by it. The maker also similarly the making — neither can be temporally preceded by it. Wherefore also the maker [is preceded by] its made — neither can it be temporally preceded by it. Therefore just as every temporal maker has a temporal beginning, so any of its making, and any of its made.

By this first making, then — namely mutable and terminable by opposite terms — God cannot make from a past a not-past, in such wise that something first should be past, and afterward should recede from it as from a terminus a quo of making and motion, and accede to not-past as to a terminus ad quem of the same making and motion. For thus something would first be past, and afterward not-past — which evidently implies contradictories.

The philosophers, therefore, and theologians, dividing universally all things according to triple temporal difference (according to future, present, and past), intend further to assign this difference between the members: that God by this making initiable and terminable by opposite terms can make from future a not-future, by producing it into being; and from present a non-present, by withdrawing it from being. But from past a not-past, in no way.

This understanding evidently appears from the words of the Doctors and Philosophers proximately adduced to the opposite. Whence blessed Augustine in Contra Faustum XXVI, denying that God can make that things which have been done not have been (as was more fully alleged above), showing himself to speak of this kind of making terminable and mutable from some terminus into its opposite, immediately adds: "He can make that something which was, not be; for he then makes that it not be, when he finds something to be, of which it should be made — for instance, when he makes him who began to be by being born, not to be by dying. For this made he found, of which it should be made. But who would say that 'of that which now is not, he should make not to be'? For whatever is past, now is not. If of itself something can be made, there is still that of which it would be made. And if it is, how is it past?"

The authorities saying that creature cannot have always been, understand insofar as creature imports a making out of preceding nothing — namely initiable and mutable making — supposing the Catholic truth. Other [authorities], however, which say that nothing else than God can be co-eternal with him, understand perhaps, supposing the Catholic truth, namely that everything else than God is made after non-being by him.

Or perhaps more subtly: that nothing else than God can be eternal properly, namely so that it has its whole being simultaneously, without any mutable succession and without possibility for change — as Boethius, Anselm, and the proximate chapter spoke. Whence although the world had no beginning of duration or time, nor end, by no means would it properly be called eternal on account of the defect of the aforesaid cause.

Wherefore Boethius in De Consolatione Philosophiae V, last prose, writes thus: "What suffers the condition of time — although it (as Aristotle judged of the world) neither ever began to be, nor would cease, and its life be protended with the infinity of time — is not yet such that it should rightly be believed eternal. For it does not embrace and clasp the whole space of life simultaneously, although infinite, but does not yet have future things, the past things it does not have. What therefore embraces and possesses the whole plenitude of interminable life equally simultaneously, to which neither anything of the future is absent nor of the past has flowed by — that is rightly proclaimed eternal; and it is necessary that it both, master of itself, always be present-presentially with itself, and have the infinity of mobile time present.

"Whence not rightly do certain ones, who when they hear it seemed to Plato that this world had no beginning of time, nor would have an ending, in this manner think the made world made co-eternal with its founder. For it is one thing to be led through interminable life (which Plato attributed to the world), and another to have embraced equally simultaneously the whole presence of interminable life — which is manifestly proper of the divine mind. Nor ought God to seem more ancient than the things made by quantity of time, but rather by the property of his simple nature."

For these and others, however, a certain not-useless distinction concerning eternity or eternal must be noted. For in one mode the authors take eternal, as has now been said. In another, however, as it imports only the lack of beginning and end. Whence the grammarians, following Everard of Bithynia (or as some say, of Bath) in his Graecismus — where he assigns the differences of names — say thus: "Aeternum, [is] truly without beginning, without end; perpetuum, [is] that to which there will be a beginning, but lack of end." And because this second mode is easier of understanding than the first, almost all, neglecting the first, adhere to the second.

Other authorities again, which assert that the creature cannot be co-eternal with the Creator, can be understood and expounded as the others touched before.

The same understanding Jerome also intimates manifestly when he says God cannot raise up a virgin after ruin: for raising up evidently imports some transit from one of opposites into the other — for instance, from death to life, from malice to goodness, and universally from any kind of non-being to the opposite being.

In a similar mode also can be understood the gloss on Amos which says that "a virgin who has lost her virginity will not be able to receive virginity": for to receive [signifies] to capture again, and to capture another time, and so designates a change and an initiating terminus.

Or perhaps it understands according to a settled law. For immediately it adds: "Scarcely is it conceded to her, that from one thousand she should return to one hundred, and from one hundred to ten" — which perhaps must be understood according to dignity and order in the Church militant, not according to grace and merit.

For according to the laws of the Church in the Decrees and Decretals sufficiently widespread, those constituted in orders and dignities can sin in such wise that they ought to be deposed or suspended, nor in perpetuity restored, but to remain perpetually in an inferior state. Every sin, however, is a certain deflowering of the sinner, defloration, and corruption.

And this understanding similarly is consonant with the words of the Gloss. For it says: "Thus it happens that the virgin Israel, who has erred, has none to raise her up, because he who has once departed from union and lost the virginity which he had with one man, will not be able to recover his former state, virginity, and beatitude of union. And scarcely is it conceded to her, that from one thousand she should return to one hundred, and from one hundred to ten."

It also concords with the text, which in the same place has "the house of Israel has fallen, and the virgin Israel has been cast upon her land" — which also does not deny the power of rising again to an equal state, but the act, assigning her an inferior grade. Whence it says thus: "The house of Israel has fallen, she will not add that she rise; the virgin Israel has been cast upon her land, there is none to raise her up. Because thus says the Lord God: 'The city out of which a thousand went forth, there shall be left in it a hundred; and out of which a hundred went forth, there shall be left in it ten.'"

On which the Gloss: "He does not deny that she can rise, but the virgin Israel will not rise — because once erring, even if she is brought back on the shoulders of the Pastor, she does not have the same glory with him who never erred from God. Whence through the Prophet: 'I prefer the penance of the sinner rather than [his] death.' He does not compare penance to the sanctity of the Church, but [says] that compared to death and hell, it is better."

To the letter also, no woman vitiated even before baptism can be consecrated among God's virgins, by the testimony of Augustine on the epistle to Titus, and is alleged in the canon, dist. 26, Acutius — with which other laws also concord.

By the aforesaid [things] similarly is patent the understanding of the Philosopher in Ethics VI, saying that "what has been done cannot not have happened." For he speaks there of what is deliberable and eligible through inferior causes — for instance, through men. And he says that no one elects what has been done, namely past, for instance Troy to have been captured, nor deliberates about what has been done, but about future and contingent — because the made does not happen not to be made. All of which uniformly and conformably to the procedure is understood manifestly of the power of secondary causes, namely of men. And it is true that through human power, deliberation, or election, what has been done cannot not be done, but a future contingent can be made, or not made, through these causes.

He understands consequently also that the past cannot be, or be made, not past by mutable power and making, initiable and terminable by opposite terms — as are made all true and proper effects of true and proper making cause. Whence he himself, in Physics II.31: "The doctor, and the deliberator, and entirely the maker — all are principles of mutation or rest."

The saying of Agatho, however, seems to suffer just calumny. For God is not deprived of this alone — to make ungenerated those things which have been made. For he is also deprived of this: from a present, mutably to make now and for now non-present; from a future, to make the exhibition of the thing mutably non-future; from a number of four contingent contradictories, to make all simultaneously true which can be simultaneously true and which he can make simultaneously true; to make a maximum circular line, or a finite straight line possible to be made, or [a line] greater than he can make; to inscribe or circumscribe in a circle a maximum or minimum rectilinear figure; to make another God, and infinite gods; and universally [God cannot do] anything which necessarily implies contradiction.

Someone perhaps will say for Agatho that none of these is something; and I [reply] against either: therefore neither [is it true that he cannot] make ungenerated things which have been made.

Yet, lest Agatho seem not to have spoken rightly (whom Aristotle testifies to have spoken rightly), let me seem to speak less rightly. I say to the letter he spoke rightly. For he says God is deprived of such making, but not of the power of making — and it is true, and it is necessary that God by no means makes ungenerated things which have been made. Yet that he cannot [do] this, he does not say.

It can also be understood and expounded that God cannot do this through the power and action of natural and inferior causes, as he can make future effects — nor also by mutable making and terminable by opposite terms, as the saying of the Philosopher was expounded before.

Perhaps also it can otherwise be expounded more proximately to his mind: that he supposes generally all things to be divided into three — future, present, and past (or done) — and through what he says exclusively, "of this alone is God deprived, to make ungenerated," etc., he intends to include the last of the three members of the aforesaid division, and to exclude the first two. Let him also understand of mutable making and terminable by opposite terms, and so it is true that of the number of these three, of this alone is God deprived to make — that is, [deprived of the power] of making, by such making, from past as from a terminus a quo of making and mutation, a not-past. For this evidently includes contradiction — namely that something first be or was past, and afterwards not-past. From a future, however, as from a terminus a quo, he can make by this kind of making a not-future; and from a present a not-present — which also he continually does, since when that arrives, this recedes.

The saying of Aristotle in De Mundo can be similarly understood and expounded according to the premises, and similarly the saying of Pliny recited. Yet Pliny seems most badly to rave, saying that God has no right over past things except that of forgetfulness, as I.14, I.6, and I.23 teach.

Those denying, therefore, that God can make from a past a not-past, understand of power and making according to the natural course and order naturally instituted for natural things, of the power and making mutable, actuable, and terminable by opposite terms aforesaid.

But (as was briefly touched above) there is a certain other making opposed to this, namely stable, not mutable, not newly actuable, not initiable nor terminable by opposite terms — and this corresponds to absolute power and of non-repugnance aforesaid. According to which also that which is somehow in this present instant can be made by God in this present instant non-such — indeed of opposite condition — without any change, by the eleventh truth.

For God so to do is for him so to will. Thus perhaps God could make the world (which is initiated and temporal) not to be of this kind, but eternal. For it includes no contradiction formally simply, as it seems, that the world should not have a beginning of duration or time, but always to have been — as it seems to some — or at least could thus make the world more ancient, and to have been earlier temporally by however much. For this implies or imports no repugnance formally.

This kind of making is similar to generation, cognition, and divine volition — indeed more truly to the knowledge and volition of God ad extra — by which according to the fifth, sixth, and eighth truths, "what he wills now and knows, he could and can now and for now not know nor will without any change." It is also similar to the doctrine by which the Father eternally teaches the Son and the Holy Spirit, concerning which [is treated in] chapter 34 of this [book].

This kind of mode of speaking concerning making is had in John 11, where it is asked thus concerning Christ: "Could not he, who opened the eyes of one born blind, have made that this man also should not die?"

Thus also speaks Augustine in Contra Faustum XXVI.2: "If I should hear that something was about-to-be, [and] if God made [it] not to come to be, I will most faithfully respond: that rather was about-to-be which God made, not that which, if it had been about-to-be, this he would have made. For God knew indeed what he was about to make; and therefore simultaneously he knew that not-future to have been, which he would-have-made not to come to be."

Thus moreover speaks Peter [Lombard] in Sentences I, dist. 38, saying that "God could make that what comes to be, would not come to be, and so would not be foreknown."

By absolute power, therefore, and of non-repugnance aforesaid, and by this kind of making, God can make a thing which is past — for instance A nakedly and absolutely considered — not to be past. For God so to do would be nothing else than to not-will it itself to be past, or to will the opposite by no-volition or volition not mutable, not initiabile or terminable, but stable and eternal — which is absolutely and irrepugnantly possible, both as concerns the nature of his absolute power, and as concerns the nature of his volitional power free according to contradiction (insofar as it causally precedes its act, by which in every same mode intrinsically he wills now A to have been, just as he willed before A to be future, as the preceding [parts] taught) — the cause of which is that with God intrinsically nothing is past or future, but immutably, stably, eternally, and instantaneously only present, as was shown above.

Furthermore, because perhaps to some it seems difficult of understanding, how the past can be made not-past by making not mutable, not initiabile, nor terminable by opposite terms aforesaid — behold for this an open example easy of understanding.

A future indeed can be made not-future before it occurs — or, to say more truly, with that itself never occurring, with itself never posited in being, with itself never presentified (made present). Let A be John's running tomorrow contingently future. Who of men doubts that God of his power — indeed omnipotence absolute — can make that John will not run, and therefore that A will not be? And consequently can make some future not-future, with itself never made present?

And without doubt this cannot [be done] by the making mutable, initiabile, and terminable aforesaid. For it evidently includes contradiction that something from future, as from a terminus a quo of making and mutation, becomes not-future, except through positing it in being.

Behold still a perhaps more evident example for the same: something — namely a not-future — can be made future. Let A be a possible effect to be made, which will not be made. And (as anyone confesses) God of his absolute power can make that A will be — and therefore that what is not future, be future — but not by the making mutable, initiabile, or terminable often spoken of. For it evidently implies contradiction that something sometime be future, and always or sometime before was not-future, as chapter 18 of this [book] shows.

Just as, then, a not-future can be made future, and a future not-future, without positing it in being, by making not mutable but stable, so also a past [can be made] not-past in similar manner.

Therefore it does not follow (as was objected above) that, if past things can not have been by this power, then they have this through change. Nor does it also follow, if past things can be or be made not-past, that it would be expedient for men to deliberate about them. For not everything which can be or be made, can [be] this through human deliberation or human power.

[Demonstration of Truth 22]

The twenty-second truth says that a future thing cannot not come to be, nor a present now and for now not be, nor past things not have been — taking power correspondingly to the sixteenth truth. Which thus understood follows evidently from the same sixteenth, with this one [thing] added: that the divine will is a necessary cause — namely infrustrable and indefectible in causing — as I.10 teaches. This can also be shown from the first negative part of the eighteenth truth.

[Demonstration of Truth 23]

The twenty-third truth is clearly patent from the first three parts of the seventeenth, with this added — that the divine will is infrustrable and indefectible in causing. It also follows from the corresponding parts of the eighteenth truth.

[Demonstration of Truth 24]

The twenty-fourth manifestly follows from the last part of the seventeenth, with this one [thing] co-assumed — that the divine will is a necessary cause (that is, necessarily required for something to be future, present, or past) as I.14 and I.9 demonstrate. This is also manifestly shown from the last negative part of the eighteenth truth.

According to these things, the vulgar [saying] of the Philosopher, "What is, when it is, must be; and what is not, when it is not, must not be," and similar [sayings] can be conveniently understood and expounded.

The sayings of Averroes, Hugh, and Peter here objected were, however, expounded in chapter 6 of this [book]. That [saying] also of the Philosopher: "If all things were or came to be from necessity, [there would be] no need to deliberate or engage in business," was expounded in chapter 29 of this [book]. It can also be conveniently expounded that he understands there of necessity contrary and repugnant to preceding possibility and contingency, as appears in the demonstration of the ninth truth.

By similar modes can be expounded the saying of the same Philosopher from Ethics III, objected. Many other similar things, I judge, must be similarly expounded.

By the premises similarly, God, Christ, and the Prophets, who predicted some things still future, can be defended from fallacy, lying, and from every inconvenience. Because just as those future things can in no way come to be, so also those past revelations, promises, oaths, and predictions [can] not have been.

[Demonstration of Truth 25]

The twenty-fifth follows evidently from the premises concerning eternity. Concerning future contingents, when they will become present and past, there will be determinate truth with God — and not then first and newly — because with God intrinsically and in eternity nothing is prior or posterior successively, nothing mutable, nothing new, as the premises in this chapter and the next taught.

Likewise, God's will is the cause of all future things, by I.14, and infrustrable and immutable, by I.10 and I.23. And this is determinate with God, as no one is ignorant. And because of present and past things [it is] determinate, therefore also of future similarly — as can be shown by the thirteenth and fourteenth truths.

Likewise, with God there is determinate knowledge of all future things, because [it comes] through a determinate cause — namely through his will, by which he knows them, as in I.18 was shown — and because otherwise God would more certainly know present and past things than future, and thus something would accede to his knowledge from the things known, against I.23 and chapter 31 of this [book].

Likewise, all things are always present in eternity and intrinsically with God, namely causally, as the demonstration of the fourteenth truth shows. Therefore concerning all things, just as concerning temporally present things, there is determinate knowledge, certitude, and truth with him.

Whence Ammonius in the last [chapter] of Peri Hermeneias I says: "Nor is it possible for the Gods to have indeterminate cognition of futures, as if conjecturing about them. First indeed, as Timaeus has taught us, and as Aristotle theologizing pronounces, and before these Parmenides — both with Plato and in his own poems — nothing is with the Gods either past or future, since both of these are non-being: this no longer, that not yet; and this changed, that born to be changed. Therefore conjectural cognition must necessarily be cast off from the Gods, and from rational life in its limit. Second, how, unless we shall participate but slightly in sobriety, shall we not attribute more to the cognition of the Gods than to yours? But [shall we attribute it,] hearing it confessed dubious and indeterminate? For [the cognition] will be of the same ratio."

He also further on, having shown this in many ways, concludes openly: "Therefore even contingents must be said to be ordained by the Gods, and their event determinately known by them" — which, that he may more evidently teach, he alleges Iamblichus, that "cognition is a medium between the cognizer and the cognized; for it is the operation of the cognizer concerning the cognized — which cognized also is sometimes cognized in a higher mode than is its nature, sometimes in a lower, sometimes equally."

"For when our intellect disposes political actions, it cognizes singular matters by referring them to universals. This cognition, however, is higher than the cognized: the singular is partible and changeable, but the ratio by which the practical intellect cognizes is indivisible and unchangeable.

"When, however, the intellect, turned to itself and operating according to purgative virtues, considers according to substance, the cognition is of the same order as that which is cognized.

"When, however, ascending to the summit of its perfection, and meditating according to contemplative virtues, it considers those things which [are] of the divine orders, and how from one principle of all these are produced, and what is the property of each — the cognition is worse than that which is cognized.

"These things being so, it must be said that the Gods cognize all things — done, being, and future — in a mode befitting the Gods. This, however, is by one and determinate and infallible cognition. Wherefore it must be said that they comprehend the knowledge of contingents as producing all things which are in the world, and as causes of perpetual substances, and concauses of generables, according to their proper operations — and as seeing not only the substances themselves, but their virtues and operations, both those which are according to nature and those which are besides nature.

"What is besides nature entered simultaneously with the necessary order subjected to the discourse of beings, in those which are born to participate this — not principally, but according to the mode which is called parypostaseos, namely side-existence. To cognize, however, contingents is the nature of those [Gods]. Wherefore these have an indeterminate nature — to be able to come to be and not come to be — but those [Gods], cognizing them in a more noble mode than is their nature, take in advance and determinately know these.

"For it is necessary that they cognize partible things impartibly and indistantly, and pluralized things unitively, and temporal things eternally, and generables ingenerably. For we will not endure that it be said that the cognition of the Gods runs along together with the flux of things, nor that there is anything with them either past or future, nor it be said of them, was or will be, as we assumed in the Timaeus — since they are signifying of some change. But [the proper word] is only is."

This opinion is also plainly testified by the authorities of Augustine and Cassiodorus on Psalm 43, written in chapter 47 of this [book].

[Demonstration of Truth 26]

For the twenty-sixth it must be known that things are of determinate being and of determinate stability with the creature in three ways: in themselves; in their causes; in both ways.

In themselves — as a present contingent thing (for instance, John's running or sitting), which from its presence has a certain subsequent necessity of being for now, and so it is determinate and certain, and similarly knowable by man; and a past thing similarly.

In their causes — as natural things future by natural necessity (for instance, future eclipse of the luminaries, transmutation of elements, and death of mortals).

In both ways — as such natural effects present or transmitted into the past.

But future contingents are determinate by none of these modes. Not in themselves, [this] is established. Not in their causes, because then they would not be contingent to either side, but contingent to the natural [outcome] or necessary. Therefore neither in either of these modes.

This is the opinion of the Philosopher in the last [chapter] of Peri Hermeneias I, as he is commonly alleged, and was touched in the objections — although the word determinate nowhere is placed there in the whole series of his text.

Whence also Ammonius, expounding that place, says thus: "By its own nature it is the same — contingent — but to the cognition of the Gods, not yet indeterminate but determinate. It is patent, however, that to our cognition it is impossible determinately to be cognized — sometimes contingent — but it will follow from necessity, with the preceding causes of its generation."

Nor do any resist this except perhaps the mathematici and diviners, saying that all human acts are subjected to the necessity of the stars. But these II.3 refutes.

But by divine revelation the rational creature can have determinate and certain cognition of future contingents — indeed, as it were, demonstration propter quid and from cause.

For God can certitudinally reveal to the rational creature his will concerning some such future, in its own genus or in the Word, as chapter 40 of this [book] and the following taught. The divine will, however, is the cause of future things — necessary in being (by subsequent necessity), and infrustrable in causing — as I.14, chapter 52 of this [book], chapter 50 of this [book], and I.10 teach. All of which he can similarly reveal.

The creature, therefore, can cognize the contingent that-it-will-be through cause, and that "of that there is a cause," and that "it is impossible otherwise to be." It can also cognize that-it-will-be from true and first and immediate and more known and prior [things], and causes of the conclusion — or rather and more eminently perhaps than through created propositions, namely through the mirror of eternal truth. Therefore also demonstratively, as is patent in Posterior Analytics I.2 — or more perfectly and excellently than through discursive syllogistic demonstration.

This same is confirmed by Augustine's authority on Psalm 43, written in chapter 47 of this [book].

[Demonstration of Truth 27]

The twenty-seventh can be shown by the twenty-fifth and the demonstration of it. It can also be shown by the fourteenth and demonstration of it, since the divine will is the cause of all future things, through which also God foreknows all those, as I.14 and I.18 teach. This is clearly testified by the sayings of Augustine and Cassiodorus on Psalm 43, written in chapter 47 of this [book].

[Demonstration of Truth 28]

The twenty-eighth can be shown by the proximate, and by the thirteenth and the demonstrations of them.

[Demonstration of Truth 29]

The twenty-ninth can be shown by the proximate, and by the fourteenth, and the demonstrations of those. The authorities of Augustine and Cassiodorus on Psalm 43, premised in chapter 47 of this [book], also seem plainly to testify this.

Augustine also in Contra Faustum XXVI.2 says thus: "Future things can no more not come to be, than past things have not been done." Nor can anyone say Augustine understood in the composite sense, or de dicto, and not in the divided sense, or de re — because then he would render nothing obscure or doubtful clear, nor would teach anything. The procedure also, end, and cause, which he says, show him to speak in the divided sense, and de re. His cause moreover seems to be the efficacious will of God, neither frustrable nor mutable, and the irrefragable and immutable truth in every way.

Whence also immediately before, concerning a certain possible to be made, he says thus: "I concede that it can be made; but whether it is future, I do not know — and therefore I do not know, because what God's will has of this matter is hidden from me. Yet this is not hidden from me, that without doubt it will be future, if God's will has this. Furthermore, if I shall hear that something was about-to-be, but God made [it] not to come to be, I will most faithfully respond: that rather was about-to-be which God made, not that which, if it had been about-to-be, this he would have made. For God knew indeed what he was about to make; and therefore simultaneously he knew that not-future to have been, which he would-have-made not to come to be. And without doubt rather true is what God knows, than what man opines."

From which immediately he concludes: "Whence future things can no more not come to be, than past things have not been done." But how would this follow from the prior, if he were speaking only in the composite sense?

Behold similarly the cause which he immediately adds: "Since it is not in God's will that by it something be false, by which it is true. Wherefore all things which are truly future without doubt will come to be; if, however, they had not been done, they would not have been future. So all things which are truly past, without doubt have passed."

It also manifestly appears, through those two universal affirmatives, one of the future and the other of the past, that he speaks of the future and past things themselves, not only of propositions themselves.

He also further on: "The sentence by which we say that something was, is therefore true, because that of which we speak now is not. This sentence God cannot make false, because he is not contrary to truth. If you ask where this true sentence is, it is first found in our mind, when we know and say it true. But if it be removed from our mind, when we shall have forgotten what we know, it will remain in truth itself. For always it will be true, that what was, and is not, has been. And there it will be true that already has been what was — where it was true, before it came to be, that what was not, was about to be. To this truth God cannot oppose himself, in whom is the highest and incommutable truth itself, by which it is illuminated that whatever is true in the minds of any, [is] true."

This equality of necessity with God with respect to future things, just as with respect to past — insofar as all these are present with him in eternity, indeed because past, since they are confirmed by similar certitude, stability, and necessity, and because they thus co-existed with all past time, indeed and preceded all secular times — all the prophets commonly intimate; indeed more truly the Holy Spirit, who has spoken through the prophets, prophesying future things as if already past, as the [things] previously had in chapter 47 of this [book] manifest.

With which the philosophers seem to consonate. For Aristotle in De Mundo 11 says that "all things are truly God's works," from which (according to natural Empedocles) "all things, whatsoever are, and afterwards will be, proceeded."

Whence Augustine, De Correptione et Gratia 33, treating that of the Apostle to Romans 8, "Whom he foreknew and predestined," etc., writes thus: "All those things have already been done — foreknew, predestined, called, justified — since both they have already all been foreknown and predestined; but still even unto the end of the age many are to be called and justified. And yet he placed verbs of past time, even of future things, as if God had done [them], which from eternity he disposed that they should come to be. Therefore concerning that, the Prophet Isaiah also says: 'Who made things which are about to come.'"

This in Isaiah, however, according to this series I do not remember having read; perhaps he alleges another translation, which I have not seen. Yet this opinion in Isaiah occurs. For in chapter 41, according to the translation of Jerome, Isaiah — indeed the Lord through Isaiah — says thus: "Who has raised up from the East the just one" — namely Jesus Christ — "and called him to follow him? He shall give nations in his sight," etc., and adds mixedly of the future: "Who has worked and made these things, calling generations from the beginning? I the Lord, the first and the last, I am." And below, [chapter] 48: "Earlier things from then I announced, and from my mouth they went forth, and I made them heard; suddenly I worked, and they came."

For this subsequent necessity, however, from the presence or pastness with God in eternity, Augustine further on in [chapter] 34 concludes by adding: "Whoever therefore in God's most provident disposition are foreknown, predestined, called, justified, and glorified — I do not say also not yet reborn, but also not yet born — they are already sons of God, and therefore can in no way perish."

This Anselm in De Concordia 3 also treats, expounding the same authority of the Apostle much more clearly, as chapter 47 and chapter 27 of this [book] reveal.

Furthermore, the same Augustine in part 2 of his commentary on John, homily 14 (or the 68th of the whole), treating that of John 14, "In my Father's house there are many mansions," and below, "If I shall go and prepare a place for you," etc., says: "How are the mansions in the Father's house — not other [mansions] but the same — and without doubt already are, as not to be prepared; and not yet are, as to be prepared? How shall we think — except how also the Prophet preaches God, that 'he made things which are future'? For he does not say 'he is about to make things which are future'; therefore he both made them, and is about to make them. For neither have they been made, if he himself has not made them; nor are they future, if he himself shall not have made them. He therefore made them by predestining, [and] he is about to make them by operating."

Where also that of the Apostle to the Ephesians 1, "He chose us before the constitution of the world"; and that of Romans previously touched, "Whom he predestined, those he also called" — he understands and expounds in similar mode. This authority of Augustine, although not according to its series, is alleged in the canon, De Poenitentia, dist. 4, In domo.

Moreover, the same Augustine in De Trinitate V, last [chapter], says: "With God neither past things have passed, and future things have already been done."

Further on, in De Civitate Dei X.12: "Where and when God should make immutable counsel, lies with him in whose disposition already are made all the times whatsoever are future. For moving temporal things temporally, he is not moved; nor knows things to be done otherwise than things done; nor hears those invoking otherwise than he sees [those] about to invoke; and his eternal commands, written by his eternal law, are temporally done."

He also in Confessions I.6: "Your years, [he says] to God, do not fail. Your years are this present day; and how many, oh how many of our days and our fathers' days have passed through your today, and from it have received their measures, and somehow existed; and yet other days will pass and will receive [measures], and somehow exist; but you yourself are the same, and all tomorrow and to-the-end, and all yesterday and back, today you will make, today you have made. What is it to me, if anyone does not understand? Let him also rejoice, Lord, saying 'What is this?' Let him also so rejoice, and love by-not-finding-to-find rather than by-finding-not-to-find you."

[Demonstration of Truth 30]

The thirtieth seems so certain, that it scarcely needs proof. For inferior causes are temporal, active and passive with motion and time, with beginning and with end. For what is past has already passed beyond the potestas of these causes, nor is subjected further to them. For it cannot be initiated by them through operation and motion, as appears in the demonstration of the twenty-first.

What, however, is present, for now must be by subsequent necessity. What, however, is future, is initiable through action and motion from a secondary cause free according to contradiction toward acting and not acting, nor has it from itself any necessity of being. No secondary cause also has efficacious will in all things as God [does]; indeed, according to the Philosopher in Ethics III.5, "the will is of impossible things"; therefore even if it could will past things not to have been, and present not to be — still the thing does not follow its will, as it follows God's will.

Against the first of these, however, can be probably objected in this way: A secondary cause can make from past a present. For the Sun, in the same mode set against the same illuminable thing (corruptible or eternal), now and earlier, generates the same light now that [it generated] earlier. For according to the Philosopher in Metaphysics VIII.11, "diversity of effects is on account of diversity of efficient, or on account of diversity of matter"; and according to him in Metaphysics XII.11, "if the agent is one and the matter one, what is made is one." Which Averroes also plainly says in either commentary. The Philosopher also in De Generatione II, second-to-last [chapter], says that "the same thing, similarly disposed, is innate to make the same" — supposing, namely, identity of matter.

But just as it has been argued that light corrupted, the same in number, can again be generated, so it can also be argued concerning other forms generable and corruptible, accidental and substantial; therefore also concerning composites themselves the same in number returning. Also water by discontinuation corrupted, by recontinuation is generated the same in number. Some indeed (like the Platonists) concede this. But part 39 of the corollary of I.1, and the philosophers and theologians, refute these and deride them.

Others wishing to avoid such an error, say that not only the Sun, but also all other planets and fixed stars co-act in every effect produced by anything; and because their position and aspect to one another and to the Sun continually varies, also the produced effects continually vary. But these do not escape the alleged authorities of the Philosopher; for not any small accidental diversity in the agent makes a numerical diversity in the effect — and especially in simple substances or composite ones.

The stars of heaven can also be applied to some place of the earth according to an equally strong aspect now as earlier (although perhaps not according to a similar [aspect] in every way), and therefore can regenerate a corrupted effect.

Sometime also (as it seems) all the planets and stars will return to a similar aspect entirely as they now have, and which in any instant earlier they had — for instance, according to the Platonists, at the end of the Great Year of the world, which according to them is the return of all celestial things to their primary state, of which I.1 of [this work] more fully discoursed. Then therefore the corrupted things will return the same in number.

Some, however, wishing to resolve this argument, affirm that the celestial motions are not proportionable among themselves by any rational proportion, but only irrational — such as is the proportion of the diagonal of a square to the side, and of the cone to its half — concerning which elsewhere has been more fully treated. Therefore neither will the celestial motions ever fully return to their primary state, nor to any other subsequent.

But this responsive hypothesis is most voluntarily and easily posited without evidence of reason, and therefore is equally easily refuted. Even, granting the hypothesis, do they show their proposition? It is not entirely evident; what to discuss with mathematical theorems much foreign to the sacred letters would seem to theologians more curious perhaps than fruitful, especially since the proposed axiom can otherwise be fully resolved.

Others say that the diversity of numerical time is the cause of the numerical diversity of effects. But how, since time is not the efficient, material, or formal cause of produced effects? What also is the cause of the numerical diversity of time? If they say "the diversity of celestial motions" — what is the cause of the numerical diversity of these? And so one must continually ascend until reaching the first such diversified [thing].

Others still say that the cause of such diversity of effects is the diversity of natural order in the subject toward diverse effects. But that diversity in relation be the cause of diversity in absolute accidents or in substances does not seem; indeed, rationally it is the contrary. The universality of order also necessarily arises from diverse ordered things as from a foundation and prior cause; therefore those diverse ordered things would rather be the cause of such diversity of effects than diversity of order. What also, of what kind, and how many these diverse ordered things are, [the proponent] does not express, and scarcely if he could express clearly.

The Philosopher also in Metaphysics XII, where he had been alleged, touches one [point] through which he seems to resolve the premised objection, and to expound his own sayings, saying: "That has been made in act, whose matter was in potency, or in potency" — intimating that even if the agent is the same and the matter the same, yet from diversity of potencies in the matter toward diverse effects, can come diverse effects. Therefore for the effect to be the same in number, identity of numerical potency is required. Wherefore Averroes in that commentary 11 says: "If the matter were one, and the generator one, and the potency one, then what comes to be will be one. For the subject, when it is one, and the potency existing in it is one, and the agent is one — then there will be no cause of multitude."

But against these philosophers the principal objection can thus be reduced: If A active acts tomorrow on B passive, having C potency to D effect, tomorrow it will produce D. Let it be supposed that God of his omnipotence today creates D, changing nothing about A, B, or C. Or if a change necessarily follows: D today corrupted, omnipotent God reduces A, B, and C to the prior state in every way; then A tomorrow from B and C will make D past and corrupted.

In a similar mode it can also be shown that a man naturally to be generated in the premised mode, once made by God, deflowered, dead, and buried, can a man newly generate, and a woman bring forth, and bring forth him a virgin — for every birth necessarily comes forth a virgin. A secondary cause can therefore make a past and corrupted present-presentially exist, and therefore not be past.

Among all the recited opinions, however, the opinion of the Philosopher seems to me more consonant to reason: namely that the numerical diversity of effects succeeding one another in the same matter or subject, with the same agent and matter or subject existing, is from the diversity of potency or of potencies in it — although a much greater discussion would be required around the full exposition of this kind of potency.

But whatever the heathen philosophers may feel, let Catholic theologians indubitably acknowledge that the first, highest, and most true cause of these diverse effects is the divine will — not mutable or diverse, but stable and the same — by which without succession of acts of will and any change of itself, he wills and makes diverse effects to succeed one another when he wills, and where, as I.9, I.23, and I.47 teach.

Whence also Judith 9: "This was made which you yourself willed."

Blessed Augustine also in De Trinitate III.2, speaking of all things which come to be usually or unusually, often or rarely, says: "Of these none comes to be except by God's will; but to most it does not appear. And so it pleased the vanity of the philosophers to attribute these things to other causes — either true, but proximate, although they could not see at all the cause superior to all other causes, that is, the will of God — or false, and not even from the very investigation of bodily things and changes, but produced from their own suspicion and error."

Thomas Bradwardine, De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium

(Conclusion of preceding chapter, Chapter LIII, and Closing Epistle to the Mertonians)

[Conclusion of the preceding chapter — continuation of corollaries on free will, divine necessity, and the immutability of past contingents]

Wherefore in the Enchiridion, chapter 6, [Augustine] also says: "When it is asked what is to be believed in regard to religion, the nature of things must not be searched into in the manner of those whom the Greeks call Physicists, nor must it be feared, as if by these same men, lest a Christian be ignorant about the force and number of the elements, about the motion and order and eclipses of the stars, about the figure of the heaven, about the kinds and natures of animals, of waves, of stones, of springs, of rivers, of mountains, about the spaces of places and times, about the signs of impending storms and other things following, concerning those things which they have discovered or think they have discovered. For not even they themselves, men of such excellent talent, blazing with zeal, abounding in leisure, investigating some things by human conjecture and others by historical experience, have discovered everything; and in those things which they boast of having discovered, they are more often opining than knowing. It is enough for the Christian to believe that the cause of created things, whether celestial or terrestrial, whether visible or invisible, is nothing other than the goodness of the Creator, namely his good will."

Furthermore, whether a secondary cause can produce the same effect numerically that preceded — as it seems likely it can, supposing a preceding miracle, as was just objected, and perhaps in the recontinuation of a liquid through the discontinuation of one corrupted — or whether it cannot, as outside these cases it appears it cannot, the objection does not proceed. For if it cannot, there is no obstacle. But even if it could freely make from the past and corrupted thing one presently existing, still on this account it cannot make of the past a non-past, or of one corrupted (whether masculine or feminine corrupted) a virgin, as God can. For although God by his omnipotence might restore Abraham and Sarah to the same state in all respects which they had when Isaac was begotten, and might cause Abraham to beget and Sarah to bring forth Isaac, he would still bring forth Isaac as one [now] corrupted [i.e., one who has died] and as the past father of Jacob. Yet it is true according to the course of nature, and without miracle, that every parturient woman necessarily emerges no longer a virgin.

Yet still perhaps the sophist will sophistically press the objection thus: Let that be called past which was and is not; if therefore the secondary cause can make of the past that it [now] is, it can also make that it not be past. But this does not prove that the secondary cause can make of the past a non-past with respect to this condition, namely "having been," that is, that it lack having been; therefore it is no obstacle.

But still perhaps he will rejoin: A free secondary cause — say, Peter — could earlier have made some past free effect of his (let it be called A) not past, namely simply by omitting it (just as the law speaks of "Doing" in the Digest, On the Rules of Law: "He who does not do what he ought to do," it says, "is seen to do against these things, because he has not done"; and this is a sufficiently common manner of speaking); or by producing a contrary effect impossible with A, which let it be named B; and God omnipotent can restore to Peter every power which he previously had, and even greater; with which done, Peter can make A non-past. Or thus: Peter previously could have made it that A had not been; therefore even now, if through God's omnipotence he is made equally powerful as he was then, or more powerful still, he can.

Or perhaps still more strongly in this manner: Whatever in any way God once could do, he can still in the same way do; otherwise he would become less powerful, and would cease to be omnipotent. But God once could, through a secondary cause — say through Peter — make A not be past, that is, make it that A had not been.

But these things, although they may seem acute, are easily blunted. For although Peter might now have all the power, or greater, than before, on this account he could not now [produce] every effect numerically the same as before, but perhaps the same and equal in species, or greater. The cause of this is that for the numerical identity of the effect, the numerical identity of the agent or of the agent's power alone does not suffice; rather there is required also the numerical identity of the matter or object and of that power [in question], as the foregoing testify. And if it be supposed that God omnipotent fully restore all these same numerical things, granted that Peter can now produce the same effect numerically or the same defect numerically as before — yet on this account he cannot now make A not to be past, because he could never previously have done this, since [he could not have done it] before A existed. For then it was not feasible for Peter that A be not past, since from eternity beforehand it [already] was [past] — just as now it is not feasible by any secondary cause that the Antichrist who is to be should not be past now or before. For how could he produce that which from eternity beforehand was, and which cannot have a beginning and end of production, since nevertheless every doing of a secondary cause necessarily requires this, as is plain in the demonstration of the twenty-first part of this corollary?

Nor when A existed could Peter make A not to be past, for similar reasons. For then, just as always before, A was non-past, nor did this then or before depend in any way on Peter's doing or omitting. Therefore neither after A existed could Peter make A not to be past. For if he had done this, A both then and always before would have been non-past — for nothing can begin to be non-past — and because he could not do this, or have done it after A existed except through an inceptible and changeable production from past into non-past, which involves a contradiction.

The second instance is resolved like the first. For from equal power now and before, or greater, in Peter, it does not follow that he can now [produce] every effect numerically the same as before, as has just been made plain. And if anyone objecting should suppose that God omnipotent restores in Peter as agent, in the subject as patient, and in all the requisites everything numerically the same as before — although Peter may now produce the same effect numerically or defect as before, yet on this account he cannot now make it that A had not previously been, but [only] that A not be now by ceasing, that is, only privatively from the production of A, or by producing a contrary, impossible, and excluding effect of A itself; so that otherwise A would now be, and it would be the same to have made it earlier (or to make it that A had not previously been) and to make it now that A be not now — but not to make it now that A had not previously been, according to the Logic of the 24th [chapter] of the first [book] previously laid down. Just as it was really the same at the time of Christ's passion to say "Christ now suffers" and now [to say] "Christ then was suffering," and so likewise concerning all other past things.

The last instance is resolved like the earlier ones. God cannot through a secondary cause make A non-past, just as he never previously could. For he can do nothing through a secondary cause unless that cause can in some way do it; but no secondary cause can do this in any way, as has been shown above. For every doing of a secondary cause is temporal with change and beginning; but [the state of] A's being non-past cannot be initiated, therefore it cannot come about through a secondary cause through any temporal production, but only by God alone, by an eternal production — namely, by his volition or non-volition, eternal and not having a beginning, by which he does not will A to be past, or wills A to be non-past — as the demonstration of the 21st part more fully manifests.

Yet perhaps still you will not cease to object thus: This man, say John, who did this or that — it is contingent that he did neither this nor that; and John, who did neither this nor that — it is contingent that he did this and that. For it is contingent that God will or not-will this. But this is no obstacle. For although this is possible and contingent in respect to the divine will, yet not in respect to the human will, say John's. For nothing is in John's power except what, when he wills it, he does, as the previous things testify. But although John may will this, it does not therefore follow that it is so. And although John could moreover not have done what he did, yet he cannot make himself not to have done what he did. For whatever he does in the present or even in the future, it does not therefore follow that he did not do what he did.

Against the second particle of this thirtieth [point] it is objected thus: Contingency and liberty are properly said in respect of the present, but in respect of the future improperly or less properly, commonly or extensively, as the 5th and 6th [parts] of this [corollary] affirm. Therefore among inferior causes there is greater contingency and liberty in respect to the present than in respect to the future. But who would not know that it does not follow from being more properly such, that it is more simply such? For who does not know that "perfect" is more properly said of a creature fully made than of God who can in no way be made nor was made? And who would concede that the creature is more perfect than God? Who, again, does not know that "great" is more properly said of body than of God, and of powers extended according to corporeal dimensions than of an indivisible non-extended power? Yet who would concede that a finite body is greater than God, of whose magnitude there is no end? Or that the finite power of any element, of any clod of earth, or of any drop of water is greater than the infinite power of God? Wherefore that consequence does not hold.

Furthermore, against the third particle of this thirtieth, someone perhaps will object that the divine will is an infrustrable and indefectible cause; therefore whatever inferior cause will produce any future effect of its own, just as it produces and has produced every present and past effect of its own — and through the fourteenth and twenty-ninth parts of the aforesaid corollary there is in it equal necessity in respect of futures as in respect of presents and pasts — wherefore it is also equally necessary that inferior causes produce their future effects, just as that they produce present ones and have produced past ones.

But this neither concludes nor obstructs. It does not conclude, because although in the divine will there is equal necessity in respect of futures as in respect of presents, yet there is another necessity in inferior causes in respect of their present effects; but in respect of effects contingently capable of either alternative in the future, there is by no means [such necessity]. Wherefore necessity is many times greater in respect of present effects of inferior causes than in respect of their future effects.

This even if it did conclude would not obstruct. For although it would be necessary, and equally necessary, that inferior causes produce their future effects, just as they produce their present effects, or have produced their past ones, as far as concerns the divine will — yet not so as far as concerns the inferior causes themselves. For an inferior cause, considered nakedly and absolutely as something about to act in either way, of itself, is bound by no necessity to acting that way, but is disposed indifferently, indeterminately, and contingently in either way to acting it and not acting it, as in the 29th [part] of this [corollary] a similar response was given to a similar argument.

Further, beyond the foregoing objections, one can also object otherwise against what has been said. For from the foregoing it seems to follow that contradictories are simultaneously true, at least in eternity, since all things succeeding one another in time are without succession there simultaneously, as the foregoing testify.

Again, if there were such a necessity of consequence and of immutability in God, he would not be of free judgment, since [he would be] in no way pliable hither and thither.

Furthermore, if such a necessity be in God, prayers are vainly offered to him, since by them he can in no way be inclined, in no way bent.

But the first of these was resolved at the 24th [chapter] of the first [book]. The second is resolved through the first and fifth of this [book]; for these show that liberty, contingency, and necessity are not repugnant. Who indeed would doubt that liberty of judgment is compatible with necessity of consequence? For most-mutable man, although according to the opinion of certain ones he could will of himself alone without God co-acting anything, if he now willed anything, would necessarily for now will it with necessity of consequence. Does God then not have liberty of judgment about presents and pasts as about futures, or less in respect of these than in respect of futures, and thus in respect of the same object less now than before — or rather has he irrecoverably lost all liberty about certain willed things, incurring a new servitude, new fetters of new necessity, contrary to what was earlier shown in the 30th, 50th, and 52nd [parts] of this [corollary], and especially against the 13th and 14th parts of this corollary?

Nor because God is of free judgment is it consequent that he is mutably pliable, like mutable man hither and thither. But God is said to be free with the freedom of contradiction because there is no necessity in him antecedent to the act of will toward the outside; rather, insofar as it precedes that act causally, he could in either way produce it and not, as the demonstration of the third truth of this corollary and the ninth more fully manifests.

Whence also Saint Thomas, on Book I of the Sentences, distinction 39, question 1, which asks "Whether God can not know that which he knows" — and where it is argued thirdly that he cannot, because everything that is, must be while it is, but God's knowing is being-in-act; and fourthly because everything eternal is necessary, but any knowing of God is eternal — responds in this way: "To the third it must be said that what is, must be while it is; speaking absolutely, however, it does not have to be; and so it is necessary that God knows while he knows, yet it is not necessary that he know except by necessity of immutability, which does not exclude the freedom of will. And this freedom is signified when it is said that God can not know and not will." "To the fourth it must be said that everything eternal is necessary by necessity of immutability, which does not exclude the freedom of will, as has been said." But how knowing pertains to the freedom of will, he immediately brings out, saying: "Although in God being and knowing are the same in reality, yet knowing follows the will as commanded by it or not; and therefore his being is subject to the freedom of the will, as knowing to the operation of the creature." He also holds the same opinion in [the Summa] Against the Gentiles, Book I, [chapter] 85, as the twenty-eighth [chapter] of this [book] briefly recited.

The third objection supposes with the Egyptians that God is mutable and of alterable will through merits and through prayers, contrary to the fifth and twenty-third [chapters] of the first book. It is resolved through the foregoing, around the saying of the Philosopher in [book] 1 of Peri Hermeneias, last [chapter], and the instance concerning negligence in the 29th [chapter] of this. For God, just as he predestined for some, say the elect, the end, so also the way to it; just as the extreme, so also the means; just as the crown, so also the warfare, the merits, and the labors — as the authority of blessed Gregory in Dialogues I.21, and others written in the 23rd [chapter] of the first [book], lucidly manifest.

CHAPTER LIII

Against ready accusers, easy judges, and headlong condemners; and he sets forth 36 chapters which seem to him erroneous, humbly imploring the authority of the Church to determine the truth.

These things being completed by the grace of God, I look back and reflect upon the dreadful magnitude of this most perilous sea — Pelagius the pestilent with his pestiferous Pelagians being now swallowed up from its abysses, while we, with the Lord as captain, have been brought across into the safest little ship of Peter — rendering manifold thanks for manifold grace. I return to my mind, I roll over the foregoing things, I ruminate and chew them over, considering with myself also the very greatest difficulty of the matter — indeed of the matters — the very great variety of opinions, and the not slight vanity of those holding them. I firmly believe and unhesitatingly judge that many ready detractors will accuse me in many ways, judge me lightly, and perhaps headlong condemn me. But did not our Fathers, both ancient and recent, before the law, under the law, and under grace — indeed our Master and Lord Jesus Christ himself — suffer like things from like men, as not a few histories testify, and as the beginning of this [work] touches upon? And who am I, so very small, rotten and a worm, that I am reckoned comparable to so great and such men? Why therefore should I fear to suffer with them, or shrink from being troubled, that thus at least, however unequally and distantly, I may merit to be compared to them?

Nevertheless, let him who has thought me to err — Timaeus exhorting and the Apostle persuading, I beg — consider, and again and again in considering let him consider and notice that he is himself a man like me, surrounded by infirmity, subject to vanity, in many ways prone to error, and let him beware lest perhaps he himself err. One thing I know: that if I err, I probably err greatly, since [I do so] not alone, but with many great and approved Authors, and likewise with many great probable arguments, and ones not easily refuted.

One thing also I humbly request and require: that whoever shall contend that I err should weigh our reasons and the contrary authorities supporting our contrary opinions on an indifferent and just balance, not a favorable or deceitful one, and embrace the more proven opinion. For I confidently think — indeed I seem to know — that if for the opinion of the contrary part there were as many and as valid reasons, and as many authorities so meaty, so consonant, as for the opinion of this part, and reasons as withered, and authorities as thin, as discordant, for that part as for this, that one would long since have been solemnly canonized, and this one solemnly stoned. The contrary qualities of these opinions also seems perspicuously to demonstrate that the more vehemently both opinions were recently tested in the long and frequent scholastic council-chamber, and the more diligently they were probed, the more this one always appeared brighter, like gold; that one more obscure, like brass or slag.

Nevertheless, because I by no means reckon myself of so great authority, nor am I drunkenly wise enough to esteem even lightly that so great a cause should be finally decided through me so very small, and the mouth of those speaking iniquity be stopped, with bent knees of my heart I implore the Church — and especially the Roman [Church], which is recognized to flourish with supreme authority and to be governed by the spirit of wisdom — to deign to determine what is to be held catholically concerning the foregoing. For it is not without peril to err in such matters. Simon, you sleep — rise up, I beseech you, draw forth the sword, cut off whatever sinister things of heretical depravity, defend and protect the catholic truth. Furthermore, even if the Lord himself sleeps in Peter's little ship, compelled by the excess of the storm, I will also confidently rouse him, that with the storm of the spirit of his mouth calmed, he may make it tranquil and serene. Far be it, however, that he who toiled vigilant in the prow of this little ship should now sleep or doze on a cushion in the stern — unless perhaps for this reason: that thus, weighed down beyond their strength, recognizing their own weakness, [men] may cry to him more fervently, knock more attentively, seek help more diligently, and the help once found may more lovingly hold and more dearly embrace.

But although with great desire I would wish that all the foregoing things, both as a whole and severally, might merit the examination of the Church, yet I beg suppliantly and with all my heart especially in the 36 articles written below, which seem to me erroneous, that thus, whoever shall have erred — whether I, which I fear, or another, which I think — may be led perspicuously back to the path of truth, and confirmed in it unwaveringly.

The 36 Articles Submitted as Erroneous

[1] That God is not so perfect and good but that something more perfect and better could be.

[2] That some thing exists, with God in no way conserving it.

[3] That some thing exists, with God in no way immediately and per se and properly conserving it, but only by means of the heaven or some other thing and through it; or because he prohibits corruptive [agencies], or because he permits the thing to be, or does not destroy the thing when he could.

[4] That some created or creatable thing could exist altogether without divine conservation, or at least without immediate, per se, and proper divine conservation.

[5] That some thing comes to be according to its essence or substance, with God by no means making it.

[6] That some thing comes to be according to its essence or substance without God immediately, per se, and properly making it, but only by means of the heaven or some other [agency], and through it; or [only] with God prohibiting contrary impeditive [agencies]; or only for this reason, that its efficient cause is made, conserved, permitted, or not impeded by God.

[7] That some thing according to its essence or substance could come to be with God by no means making it, or at least with God in no way immediately, per se, and properly making it.

[8] That God is in some way mutable.

[9] That God's knowledge or his will is in some way mutable.

[10] That God in knowing, willing, or doing anything intrinsically is not always intrinsically equally, supremely, and most fully actual.

[11] That God's knowledge is caused by posterior known things.

[12] That God's will, or his volition, is caused by his posterior willed things.

[13] That an act of the divine, angelic, or human will is nothing.

[14] That an act of the created will, according to its essence or substance, comes to be from itself with God by no means co-acting it.

[15] That an act of the created will, according to its essence or substance, comes to be from itself, without God immediately, per se, and properly making it, but only by means of the heaven, the general influence, the object, or some other similar [thing], and through it; or only by such an improper reason, namely because God made or conserves the created will which produces that act, does not destroy it or impede it, but permits it to be and to operate, or because he prohibits it from being impeded by others.

[16] That when God and the rational creature co-effect their free act, the creature naturally acts it before God; and that the created will naturally precedes in acting as mistress, and the divine will naturally follows it as handmaid.

[17] That God's pre-willing — that is, his naturally prior willing, or his eternally prior having willed — this or that present or future thing, is or was in the free contradictory power of man.

[18] That the first cause, or the divine will, is in the free power of a posterior cause or the created will.

[19] That the grace by which we are saved is not given by God simply gratuitously, but is procured by some prior merit, great or small, condign or congruous.

[20] That the divine will is impendible, and not universally efficacious in causing.

[21] That for the divine will to be infrustrable and necessary in causing in respect of any of its effects whatsoever, and of any posterior causes whatsoever — and for all its effects to be necessary in respect of it — it is not sufficient that it be the first cause naturally, and unimpedible by the power of any other or any others, and universally efficacious in causing.

[22] That it is not necessary that God created the world, became incarnate, or redeemed man; nor [necessary] that God wills this, or even has willed it.

[23] That the divine will, in respect of future contingents, as long as they are future, is free with the freedom of contradiction, and not necessary; but when they become present or slip into the past, [his will] ceases to be free with this kind of freedom and begins to be necessary with the opposite necessity in respect of them.

[24] That the divine will is not always equally free or equally necessary in respect of any of its objects whatever, and of any of its intrinsic acts whatever.

[25] That it is not necessary that God knows or has known of any present or past thing whatever that it is or was.

[26] That God's knowledge in respect of future contingents, as long as they are future contingents, is contingent, not necessary; but when they become present or pass into the past,

[his knowledge] ceases to be contingent and begins to be necessary with the opposite necessity in respect of them.

[27] That God's knowledge is not always equally free or equally necessary in respect of any of its objects whatever; and that the divine intellect, or God, in no way eternally remains intrinsically most fully uniform, namely always equally free or equally necessary in respect of any of his intrinsic acts whatever.

[28] That although Christ according to his human intellect, will, and tongue, in their proper genus, by natural human acts distinctly knew or believed, and likewise willed, with living voice asserted and swore that the Sacraments of the Church would endure to the end of the age, that there would be a general resurrection of the dead, and that they [the dead] would have eternal punishment or glory — yet it is not necessary that he knew, believed, willed, asserted, or swore this. Or, as some more sophistically say: that although Christ according to his human intellect, will, and tongue thus knew, believed, willed, asserted, and swore any of these things, and this with the general, plain, simple, absolute meaning, yet it is not necessary that he knew, believed, willed, asserted, or swore this with that meaning, but it is contingently possible that he did this, not with that [meaning], but with some parabolic, mystical, conditional, or other such meaning.

[29] That even if Christ according to his human nature, by natural human acts, distinctly knew, believed, willed, asserted, and swore concerning some future contingent that this will be — yet as long as that remains future contingent, it is contingent and free according to contradiction, not necessary, that Christ thus knew, believed, willed, asserted, and swore it; but when it becomes present or slips into the past, it is not contingent or free that Christ thus did, but necessary with the opposite necessity.

[30] That it was and is in man's power to deceive Christ according to his assumed human nature with the union remaining, to make him believe what is false, to lie, to will vainly and repugnantly to the divine will. Or, as certain ones more subtle in their own eyes do not fear to assert: that it was and is in man's power to do something whence — together with certain other true [premises] — it follows that Christ according to his united human nature was or is deceived by believing what is false, has lied, or in present moment lies, has willed or wills vainly or repugnantly to the divine will.

[31] That it was impossible for Christ according to his united human nature, in his proper genus, to have natural, proper, and distinct acts of knowing or willing in respect of any things placed in man's power, or any things contingently — and not absolutely necessarily — future. Or that it was possible for Christ according to his united human nature, in his proper genus, to be deceived in believing, and to err in willing — namely, to will what would never come to be to come to be, and repugnantly or differently to the divine will (I say will with the rational will, not with the sensual or carnal appetite).

[32] That the prophecies concerning Christ before their fulfillment were not necessarily to be fulfilled; and that in the time between the cleansing or sanctification of the Blessed Mary and the holy Fathers of the Old Testament in the faith of Christ the future Redeemer, and the passage and salvation of those same Fathers, and the passion of Christ — it was not necessary that they were cleansed, sanctified, or saved through faith in Christ the future Redeemer; or that it was possible that they were cleansed, sanctified, and saved through a feigned, false, erroneous, and lying faith.

[33] That the prophecies and promises of Christ before their fulfillment were not, nor are, necessarily to be fulfilled.

[34] That all the prophecies foretold concerning Christ, and all the prophecies and promises of Christ concerning future things, although they appeared verbally absolute, were nevertheless mentally, tacitly conditional, and none simply absolute.

[35] That it is not necessary that the Church of Christ persevere faithful unto the end of the world.

[36] That it is possible that the Church of Christ, by the doctrine of Christ, has always been deceived directly in the substantial articles of the Christian faith, and erroneously believed in the future resurrection of the dead, the day of judgment, and life eternal; and that it is not necessary that there will be a general resurrection of the dead, nor that the reprobate or elect will have eternal punishment or joy.

The 36 Opposed Truths

These articles being condemned as erroneous, what is more consequent than that these same number of opposed truths be sanctioned?

[1] That God is so perfect and good that nothing more perfect or better could be.

[2] That nothing exists unless God conserves it in being.

[3] That nothing exists unless God immediately, per se, and properly conserves it in being — not only by means of the heaven or some other thing, and through it; or because he prohibits corruptive [agencies], or because he permits the thing to be, or does not destroy the thing when he could.

[4] That no created or creatable thing could be altogether without divine conservation, nor without immediate, per se, and proper divine conservation.

[5] That every thing made, according to its essence or substance, comes to be from God.

[6] That every thing made, according to its essence or substance, comes to be from God himself immediately, per se, and properly making it — not only by means of the heaven, or some other [agency], and through it; nor only because God prohibits contrary impeditive [agencies], or made or conserves the efficient cause of the thing, permits, or does not impede [its] operating.

[7] That no thing according to its essence or substance could come to be except from God, nor except from God himself immediately, per se, and properly making it.

[8] That God is in no way mutable.

[9] That neither God's knowledge nor his will is in any way mutable.

[10] That God in knowing, willing, and doing whatsoever intrinsically is always intrinsically equally, supremely, and most fully actual.

[11] That no knowledge of God is caused by posterior known things.

[12] That no will of God, or volition, is caused by his posterior willed things.

[13] That every act of the divine, angelic, and human will is something.

[14] That every action of the created will, according to its essence or substance as an act, comes to be from itself, and from God equally co-acting it.

[15] That every act of the created will, according to its essence or substance as an act, comes to be from itself and from God, equally immediately, per se, and properly co-acting it — not only by means of the heaven, the general influence, the object, or some other similar [thing], and through it; nor only by such an improper reason, namely because God made or conserves the created will which produces that act, does not destroy it, or does not impede it, but permits it to be and to operate, or because he prohibits it from being impeded by others.

[16] That whenever God and the rational creature co-effect their free act, God naturally acts it before [the creature does], and that the divine will naturally precedes in acting as mistress, and the created will follows it in natural order as handmaid.

[17] That God's pre-willing — that is, his naturally prior willing, or his eternally prior having willed — this or that present or future thing, neither is nor was in the free contradictory power of man.

[18] That the first cause, or the divine will, is not in the free power of a posterior cause or the created will.

[19] That the grace by which we are saved is given by God simply gratuitously, nor is it procured by some prior merit, great or small, condign or congruous.

[20] That the divine will is not impedible, but is universally efficacious in causing.

[21] That for the divine will to be infrustrable and necessary in causing in respect of any of its effects whatsoever, and of any posterior causes whatsoever — and for all its effects to be necessary in respect of it — it suffices that it be the first cause naturally, and unimpedible by the power of any other or any others, and universally efficacious in causing.

[22] That it is necessary that God created the world, became incarnate, redeemed man, and that God wills this, and also has willed it.

[23] That when future contingents become present, or slip into the past, the divine will in respect of them does not cease to be free with any freedom, or any mode of freedom intrinsically, by which it was previously free; nor does it begin to be necessary with any opposite necessity in respect of them.

[24] That the divine will is always equally free, or equally necessary, in respect of any of its objects whatever, and of any of its intrinsic acts.

[25] That it is necessary that God knows of any present thing that it is, knows also and has known of any past thing that it was.

[26] That when future contingents become present or pass into the past, God's knowledge in respect of them does not cease to be contingent with any contingency, or any mode of contingency intrinsically, by which it was previously contingent; nor does it begin to be necessary with any opposite necessity in respect of them.

[27] That God's knowledge is always equally free, or equally necessary, intrinsically in respect of any of its objects whatever; and that the divine intellect or God eternally remains intrinsically most fully uniform — namely, always equally free, or equally necessary, in respect of any of his intrinsic acts whatever.

[28] That whatever Christ, according to his human intellect, will, and tongue, in their proper genus, by natural human acts, distinctly knew, believed, willed, with living voice asserted and swore — it is necessary that he so did; and whatever he knew, believed, willed, asserted, or swore with any meaning, it is necessary that he with that same meaning so did.

[29] That if Christ according to his human nature by natural human acts distinctly knew, believed, willed, asserted, and swore concerning some future contingent that this will be — that thing still remaining future contingent — it is necessary that Christ so did, and as necessary then as it will be when that thing will be present or transmitted to the past.

[30] That it never was nor is in man's power to deceive Christ according to his assumed human nature, with the union remaining, to make him believe what is false, to lie, to will vainly, or repugnantly to the divine will; nor was it ever or is it in man's power to do something whence — with certain other true [premises] — it follows that Christ according to his united human nature was or is deceived by believing what is false, has lied, or in present moment lies, has willed or wills vainly, or repugnantly to the divine will.

[31] That it was possible for Christ according to his united human nature, in his proper genus, to have natural, proper, and distinct acts of knowing and willing in respect of certain things placed in man's power, and of certain things contingently — and not absolutely necessarily — future; and that it was impossible for Christ according to his united human nature, in his proper and own genus, to be deceived in believing, or to err in willing — namely, to will what would never come to be to come to be, or repugnantly or differently to the divine will (I say with the rational will, not with the sensual or carnal appetite).

[32] That the prophecies concerning Christ before their fulfillment were necessarily to be fulfilled, and that in the time between the cleansing or sanctification of the Blessed Mary and the holy Fathers of the Old Testament in the faith of Christ the future Redeemer, and the passage and salvation of those same Fathers, and the passion of Christ — it was necessary that they were cleansed, sanctified, and saved through faith in Christ the future Redeemer; and that it was not possible that they were cleansed, sanctified, and saved through a feigned, erroneous, and lying faith.

[33] That the prophecies and promises of Christ before their fulfillment were and are necessarily to be fulfilled.

[34] That not all the prophecies foretold concerning Christ, nor all the prophecies or promises of Christ concerning future things, were mentally, tacitly conditional, but many [were] mentally simply absolute.

[35] That it is necessary that the holy Church of Christ persevere faithful unto the end of the world.

[36] That it is not possible that the holy Church of Christ, by the doctrine of Christ, has always — or ever — been deceived directly in the substantial articles of the Christian faith, or erroneously believed in the resurrection of the dead, the day of judgment, or life eternal; and that it is necessary that these things will be, that the reprobate also will have punishment, and the elect joy eternal.

Here ends this work, On the Cause of God against Pelagius, and on the power of [secondary] causes, and the power of God the cause of causes; written through at London, in the year of our Lord Jesus Christ one thousand three hundred forty-four.

A LATER LETTER TO HIS MERTONIANS

To his beloved brothers and friends, the Warden and Fellows of the Hall of Merton in Oxford, Thomas of Bradwardine [sends] greeting and grace, that they may prosper happily in all things.

I wanted to comply with your petition straightway, but with intervening impediments I have not until now been able to. What I willed, God knows. For detained by long and lasting occupations, scarcely at length, sometime stealing a little leisure, I seized the pen, and what in the meantime for the time being could occur to me on that question — which you proposed, On the Cause of God against the pestilent Pelagius, to be treated — I have transmitted in these writings.

At first indeed I judged what I was attempting to be either perilous or rash. At last, however, looking to your charity and attending to your humility, I judged that I ought by no means to oppose so religious a desire of yours. Receive therefore, and benignly accept, this little gift — small indeed, but offered with no small devotion: in doctrine, of a disciple; in charity, of a friend; in Christ, of a fellow servant.

I beseech [you], do not treat as familiars the inept and importunate questioners into the word of God — those who, by a depraved and perverse custom and curiosity, run about not so much from love of truth as from desire of novelty, and want more to hear new things than to speak true ones. These, indeed, neither measuring their own capacity nor showing reverence to the divine mysteries, presume about all things, ever ready to give faith to depraved doctrines rather than envy to good ones.

To you, therefore, the Collegians daily laboring in the scholastic field, it pertains to chastise the temerity of such men, and to lead [them] back to the form of study and the way of discipline; that any of you may be not only a "scribe instructed in the kingdom of heaven, who brings forth from his treasure new things and old," but also "the faithful servant whom the Lord shall set over his household, that he may give them their measure of wheat in due time."

Farewell in the Lord.

THE END.
